Blues' top diver, Fin Temple, placed a solid second in the one-metre event but sprained his ankle and was forced to withdraw from the three-metre competition on Saturday. However, he was placed on the CIAU team as the thirty-fifth member, and should be able to score well despite his injury.

Blues edge Vees in overtime

The Varsity — Bob White

Action was hot and heavy around Laurentian's Dave Tataryn during the overtime.

By ANNE LLOYD

The Varsity Blues proved many of their critics and fans wrong Friday night as they hung on to take a 4-3 overtime victory from the Laurentian Voyageurs. The Blues now advance to the OUAAs semifinals Friday at 6:30 pm at Varsity Arena. The opposition will be provided by the high scoring Waterloo Warriors, the OUAAs west division champions.

The Blues have had a very much up and down season. This inconsistency has been due largely to the team's inability to put the puck in the net. But it is also a rare Varsity team that doesn't show class and determination — two of the trademarks of coach Tom Watt.

Varsity came out skating and forechecking and seemed determined to eradicate the bad taste left after they "stank the joint out" in Sudbury in the last league game of the year. Varsity lost that one 4-3, a strange turnaround for the team that bounced Queen's from the playoffs 11-0 the previous Friday.

Laurentian played a poor man's version of York's style. The Voyageurs like to hit, and the stellar goaltending of ex-Varsity player Dave Tataryn makes up for the fact that Laurentian does not have as strong an offense as does York.

The Voyageurs came out hitting but Varsity was not to be deterred. The Blues were in peak skating form and dominated the first two periods, outshooting Laurentian 12-5 in the first and 19-7 in the second.

Ron Harris put Varsity in front at 13:12 of the first on a beautifully executed play. Harris cleanly beat Tataryn after taking a pass across the crease from hard-working teammate Doug Herridge.

The Blues continued to press and check every Vee in sight. Charlie Hughes, who seems to have acquired quite a fan club or else a good agent, and Warren Anderson looked particularly sharp in the second period.

It was a hard shot from the blueline by Anderson that Kent Ruhnke flipped over Tataryn's shoulder. This gave Varsity a 2-0 lead going into the third period.

At this point, Varsity made the mistake of going into a defensive shell. If the Blues' offence were a little more potent, they could afford the luxury of protecting a two goal lead.

But the two goal margin looked perilously slim in the early going of the third as the raucous Voyageurs found their second wind and started to force Varsity into what proved to be costly defensive errors.

Varsity netminder, Mark Logan, who played a steady game proved that he was not to be outdone in the pyrotechnics department as he made the save of the game robbing Rick Rebillato, and preserving the 2-0 lead.

But less than a minute later, Logan made a crucial error in judgement. With Rebillato again on the doorstep of Varsity's net, Logan looked as if he had played for the

All voting Varsity staff members are urged to drop by The Varsity office between 10 and 4 pm today to cast their votes in the second ballot of The Varsity editorial election.

Yesterday's vote had the 'official' candidate gaining 17 of 38 votes cast. Under CUP rules, the winning candidate must have a clear majority of all votes cast, and he is allowed two ballots in which to get that majority.

So please, even if you voted yesterday, come out and vote again today.

Should the official candidate fail to receive a majority in the second ballot, The Varsity board of directors is free to appoint its own editor.

At a meeting Monday the board agreed to use its power to appoint, "providing for the maximum degree of democratic participation."

Governing Council gives staff 12 per cent salary increase

By SUSAN SLOTTOW
Both academic and non-academic staff members at the university will receive salary increases effective July 1, U of T president John Evans announced at yesterday's Governing Council meeting.

Faculty members' salaries under $28,800 will be increased by 12 percent and non-academic staff salaries will increase 8 percent plus a $500 bonus, Evans said.

In addition, all staff members will be eligible to receive a "career advancement fund for merit" equivalent to 3 percent of academic staff's salaries and 5 percent of non-academic salaries.

However, U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) president Bill Nelson said last night the association does not accept the 12 percent increase, although he admitted he would have to consult the membership and wait for a report from UTFA's collective bargaining committee before taking any action.

Nelson said he was "not satisfied" with the increase but not surprised by it either.

He said the university's position had changed little since the start of bargaining while faculty demands had been reduced to 18 percent from 25 percent.

Nelson maintained the 18 percent increase was necessary to offset monthly cost-of-living increases from the start of bargaining in the fall of 1974 to the contract's termination in July, 1976.

Evans told Governing Council the increases attempt to compensate for the inflation of the past 12 months. UTFA member and political economy professor Ken Bryden, who was allowed to address the meeting for seven minutes, charged the increases will only bring salaries back into line with what they were last year.

"In terms of real wages, we would need a 20 percent increase just to bring us back to the 1971 level," said Bryden, a former NDP member.

"I do not think it is legitimate to run the university at the expense of the basic standards of living of the people working for it," Bryden said.

"Since 1971, there has been a steady decline in the real wages of the staff, even while the standard of living for the average Canadian is rising," Bryden said.

Appointments policy knocked

Gwen Russell, administrative staff representative on Governing Council, gave a pointed criticism of the university appointments policy to Governing Council last night.

She was describing the precipitous firing earlier this month of Leonard Bertin, News Bureau director. The position was filled by Vice-President James' assistant without advertisement.

One third of the News Bureau staff and a presidential advisory committee on the News Bureau chaired by Robertson Davies resigned in protest.

Russell described the "extremely apprehensive atmosphere on campus fed by the speculation and rumour which has been substantiated rather than denied" and the "deterioration of morale among non-academic staff."

She said "the non-academic staff are as dedicated to the preservation of quality as our academic colleagues."

"The Personnel Policies Manual has become a meaningless, useless document," which has been "readily misinterpreted, easily misunderstood and totally disregarded."

President Evans said he was looking into the matter.

Budget discussion held in first open session

By SUSAN SLOTTOW

For the first time yesterday considerations of the university budget were conducted in open session of Governing Council.

The university budget has always in the past been considered behind closed doors.

"This is a very significant victory for students," SAC executive assistant Chriss Allmett said after the council meeting.

At the meeting, Council approved the revised provisional budget, including the proposed faculty increases.

Primarily because the provincial government refuses to raise the basic income unit value, as well as last year's unexpected inflation, the university expects to carry a deficit of $1.6 million for the next two years.

U of T president John Evans stressed that an attempt was being made to stabilize the deficit. He told council he feels that incurring a large deficit, even as a form of protest to the government, would only lead to a greater government involvement in university affairs.

In other business, Governing Council approved the proposal by the Faculty of Engineering to limit its admission of foreign student visa holders to 5 percent. The faculty now accepts about 10 percent of its students, with foreign visas.

Engineering dean Ben Etkin explained he felt this was necessary due to the pressure caused by increasing numbers of applications. Etkin said he felt it was important to give priority to Canadian citizens and landed immigrants.

Governing Council student member Peter Jarrett voiced opposition to the admission restrictions.

"If we owe the Canadian public an education first, wouldn't this depend on the definition of the Canadian public? Jarrett queried. "Perhaps this would be better decided by the Ontario Legislature," Evans added.

The recent firing of Leonard Bertin, former News Bureau director, was discussed only in the most general terms possible.

Council member Gwen Russell described a letter from the University of Toronto Staff Association protesting the apparent violation of university principles due to Bertin's abrupt firing. Russell, an administrative staff appointee, said this action raised many questions on hiring and firing, grievance, internal promotion and other procedures.

The Bertin firing has lowered university staff morale and given rise to great unease among employees, Russell warned.

First year medical students will have to pay a $15 microscope fee starting next fall to cover maintenance costs, council also decided. In the past this service was provided free of charge.

McCreary gives petition to Evans

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Fired zoology department storekeeper Paul McCreary is continuing his uphill struggle to force the university to reinstate him and recognize storekeepers as being already unionized.

After yesterday's Governing Council meeting McCreary gave university president John Evans a petition which criticized his Jan. 17 firing by the zoology department.

Reached last night, Evans said he was taking the matter under consideration.

But Evans declined to comment "because I have no background information on the matter."

The petition had been circulating for several weeks, McCreary said, and it contained names of concerned zoology support staff, graduate students, SAC members and others who felt the firing was unwarranted.

"I told Dr. Evans that I felt the petition was an indication of popular feeling in the zoology building," McCreary said.

"I also told him I was requesting an investigation of some sort into union activity in relation to my firing," he added.

McCreary, a five-year employee at the Ramsay Wright zoological building, was fired in January by administrator G. H. Temple.

McCreary maintains he was dismissed following his attempts "to promote unionization among the zoology department support staff."

"Dr. Evans told me he would look into the matter," McCreary said. "He was quite pleasant and receptive about it."

McCreary also said he told Evans that "personalities may have been instrumental in the issue, as he (Evans) himself said when referring to another personnel matter earlier in the meeting."

Referring to that other matter, Evans said there might be nothing wrong with the university's personnel policies, but rather with the way administrative officers of various departments chose to interpret them.

McCreary said Evans told him the matter hadn't reached the president's office yet, but that he would speak with someone about it.

U of T mourns loss of student

By BOB BETTSON

Friends and associates of graduate student and Governing Council member Vernon Copeland were deeply saddened to learn of his death yesterday.

The widely respected OISE student who was 28 years old, died early yesterday morning of cancer at Wellesley Hospital. He had been aware of his terminal condition for a number of months but his death came earlier than expected.

Copeland is survived by his wife Barbara who is a teacher. The funeral will be held today at 12:30 pm at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

The family has asked for donations for the planting of trees in Israel in lieu of flowers.

Copeland, a long time student activist, also served on the Toronto Board of Education, where he chaired a working group on students' rights.

Board chairman Gordon Cressy, who worked with Copeland at OISE, said Copeland will be greatly missed.

"He always fought for the little guy," Cressy said. "He came out of hospital even though he was in extreme pain three weeks ago to speak and vote against the return of corporal punishment."

Cressy praised Copeland as a very hard worker who was "extremely competent."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch, one of the first to learn of Copeland's death, said he felt like he had lost his best friend even though he had only known Copeland for five months, since his election to the Governing Council.

"He brought a breath of fresh air into the council," Kanowitch said. "Students were getting demoralized and depressed but Vern inspired them with his fighting spirit."

Kanowitch said Copeland was interested in student affairs at U of T until his death and was actively advising SAC and Governing Council members even when he knew he wouldn't be around anymore.

"That's an indication of what kind of guy he was," Kanowitch said.

Copeland also had warm relations with The Varsity, often disclosing confidential documents as a protest against the secrecy practised by the U of T administration.

His short career on the Governing Council was marked by an impassioned fight to get student-faculty parity on the council as well as on tenure committees.

Before coming to OISE to study educational theory as a PhD student, Copeland was active as an undergraduate at Waterloo University, as president of the Faculty of Arts Society and president of the Psychology Society.

He was also active in student politics at York university where he received his MA.

At the Toronto board he was active on 25 committees during his three years of service, chairing three. He was trustee in north-end Ward II.

On the board he was part of the progressive coalition which has worked to make the Toronto system one of the most liberal in Canada. He fought for community control and a more humane school system.

The Governing Council held a minute of silence in Copeland's memory after a brief speech by student member Peter Varrett.

There will be no council by-election for Copeland's seat. It will be taken over next year by SAC president Seymour Kanowitch who was acclaimed as representative for science and educational theory graduate students. Kanowitch plans to study at OISE next year.

The Toronto board has the option of holding a by-election or appointing a successor for the remainder of his two-year term.

SAC gives Radio Varg FM approval

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

The SAC FM committee Monday released its 29 page report recommending in principle "the goal of establishing an FM station at U of T."

The committee was formed to investigate the feasibility of Radio Varsity applying for an FM licence.

The report states, "It is clear that the climate is excellent for the development and promotion of a non-commercial FM radio station based in and with its outlook towards both the U of T campus and the surrounding Toronto community."

The programming intention, although appealing to a general audience in certain facets, "will be directed towards servicing those segments of the community not presently provided for by other stations," the report notes.

Programming directions as suggested in the report are: information, entertainment, academic educational, news and other.

The report estimates the initial capital funds required to set up the FM operation at $58,000. This includes purchase and installation of a tower, transmitter and antenna, funds for station equipment and money required for the construction of the required FM facilities.

The report says the top of the Manulife may be one potential location of the broadcasting tower.

The estimated annual operating budget for the station is set at $98,500. This contains an expenditure of $76,000 for full and part time salaries.

Financing of the station, in terms of the operating budget, would come from sources such as grants, disc jockey services, advertising, record sales, syndication, a student levy and promotion of concerts.

"While it is clear that these sources will not make the station financially self-sufficient, they should be productive enough to provide significantly large sums of money," the report says.

Suggested organizational structure calls for a 17-member board of directors which would have ultimate responsibility for the station, set policies and goals, and hire the manager and other full time personnel.

Full time staff would include the station manager, the business manager, a program director, chief engineer, and secretary. Nine other positions would be filled by part-time employees.

The report recommends a two stage approach towards an FM operation, with the establishment of an interim station having a structure similar to that proposed for the FM operation.

The first opportunity for the station to commence FM broadcasting would come sometime between this fall and next. Failing this, the report notes, the next chance would be in two years time. "Once the licence is in hand we have 18 months to begin transmission," the report says.

The report also proposes a symbolic name change for the station to "Campus: Community Radio", "a name more in tune with our aspirations." If it were licensed, the station would operate in stereo at 96.3 FM, under the call letters CJCR.

Stefan Dupre sees glum financial future for universities.

OCUA recommends gov't give bigger grants

The Ontario Council on University Affairs has recommended universities be given an additional $16.2 million in grants for the 1975-6 academic year. But the government immediately turned down its request.

The OCUA was created by colleges and universities minister James Auld as an advisory council to look into the problems of universities in Ontario and make recommendations to the ministry. It is chaired by former U of T Political Economy chairman Stephan Dupre.

The extra $16 million would represent a basic income unit increase of 16.5 percent rather than a 7.6 percent rise.

It says the additional grant would be the minimum required "to meet the government's objectives." The council says it did not take into account the granting of fair and equitable salary increases to university employees comparable to other employees in the public sector.

The OCUA called its recommendations "a delicate balance" but admitted its deliberations since its setting up in the fall have not really enabled it to have any influence on government decisions, which were made in the fall and confirmed with the announcement earlier this week.

The council limited its considerations to the government's desires to "offset inflationary trends, maintain levels of service and accommodate predicted enrollment increases."

G.C. GRAD CANDIDATES Kanowitch acclaimed to Governing Council

By ARTHUR STEPHENS

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch has been acclaimed to represent science and OISE graduate students on Governing Council next year.

Kanowitch expects the council to accomplish very little during his one year term.

"Students are living in a fool's paradise if they imagine that anything concrete will be gained without complete parity," he emphasized.

Kanowitch's prime reason for running was to show students that the "cards are stacked against them."

Students are outnumbered 42-8 by faculty, alumni and government appointees on Governing Council, he noted.

"The present student incumbents have been consistently outvoted on all issues this year," he noted, adding students must "be made aware of the situation."

Kanowitch said he is more concerned with representing students as a whole but he does fear graduate students are already doing too much teaching and "the load will increase in the future."

"A decent wage" for graduate students is another of his hopes but he doubts it will be achieved "unless the GAA wins bargaining power." The increased funding will have to come from Queen's Park but, he conceded, "I don't expect any help from the present government."

Loeb runs on middle-of-road platform

By ROGER JONES

"I'll run with a twinkle in my eye but I'll give good service," chuckled Kurt Loeb as he prepared to run for Governing Council to represent graduate students of the humanities and social sciences.

He is 52 years old, a successful businessman and father of two U of T students. He returned to university eight years ago to finish a part-time BA and is now working on a history MA.

"I enjoy the challenge... it keeps me young... I may still find a new career," he grinned with enthusiasm.

Loeb's long-time involvement in campus politics quashes any criticism of his lightheartedness.

Since his return to university in 1968 he has served on the Association of Part Time Students (APUS), rose to be its vice-president in 1972 and is now on the executive of the Graduate History Society and on the GSU's general council.

As APUS representative he sat on numerous committees studying discipline, the arts and science new program, creation of Woodsworth College and other matters.

Loeb said he has no specific platform but rather a commitment to serve the university and graduate students with reasonableness and maturity.

He said he is "old enough to know that there is no glib solution" to the university's problems, but is very concerned over many of the present issues.

"Students are the function of the university and should be represented on every committee," he said.

Loeb is less concerned about parity. "Even students will rarely vote in a block," he noted.

The Campbell Report on Discipline, on which he represented APUS, produced "a most unhappy result," Loeb maintained.

The punishment in its successor the Conway-Cadario code is "exceedingly harsh" and many students will "face double jeopardy" because civil courts and U of T would each punish the offender separately.

Peer judgement is a "basic justice," but Loeb noted "students would often be harsher" than a more mature professor would be.

"I do not know a solution" to the funding problem, Loeb admitted. But, he maintained, the university is "the key to the values of the country" and should be given "across the board" increases.

He fully supported the GAA but "we don't need confrontation or condescension" to get reasonable support for graduate students.

"overspecialization" forced upon too many students, Wall maintained.

Wall would prefer an "adequate and equitable support for all graduate students" provided by increased government support. He points out humanities students are especially needy.

He has "some reservations" about the GAA, but considers it to be "very effective in showing the weight of student opinions."

Wall fears "graduate students will all be treated the same." He desires a probationary period for teaching assistants rather than universal job security and says a uniformity of salary and working conditions is not possible.

He is not a "parity man" because "students are not equally seasoned" but, he added, "we should definitely be heard at all levels."

He said he isn't "in favor of student representation on tenure committees because there is a problem of selection" and "faculty aren't convinced yet that we're responsible."

Wall wants friendly relations at U of T

By BOB COLLIER

Byron Wall is informed and cautious, a "committee man" who believes in persuasion, good faculty relations and "progressive ideas."

Wall is running for the humanities and social sciences graduate school seat on Governing Council. He is a former member of the Forster task force which recommended no student representation on tenure committees.

Wall is 31, married and aiming for academia after completing a doctorate at the Institute for the History of Science and Technology (IHST).

A Canadian citizen, he has been employed in campus politics ever since fleeing the U.S. draft for humanitarian reasons in 1968.

Wall's first post was as Rochdale College 'president' in the very early days when the college "served a purpose for people to explore life." He said he was disappointed the drug culture was overemphasized and the "wrong people attracted."

From 1969 to 1971 Wall served as business manager of the House of Administrative Press, "for idealism, not money", and left to pursue an MA at U of T.

In the last few years he has served as vice-president of his course union, on SGS Council for three years and on many administrative committees.

His 1972 appointment to the Forster task force brought him under severe GSU and Varsity criticism because U of T president John Evans picked the faculty nominee, Wall, rather than the GSU choice. Wall was asked to resign but refused.

Wall is concerned with the direction that graduate education has taken and notes the absence of a general policy statement.

Graduate school, he believes, should provide students with "either job or intellectual training," not the overly common mixture of each.

"Degree requirements should be changed" to reduce the Big NDP brass attending week long campus symposium

The University of Toronto New Democratic Party Club is sponsoring a week-long symposium next week with such party bigwigs as Ontario party leader Stephen Lewis and parliamentary house leader Ed Broadbent on Building a Humane Environment.

There will be 10 sessions, two daily, one at 10:30 am and one at 2 pm. On Monday the morning discussion on Women in Politics will feature former Toronto Board of Education chairperson Fiona Nelson and women's rights activist Kay MacPherson.

The afternoon session will focus on regional disparities with Indian MP Wally Firth and Ontario MP George Samis, recently elected in the Stormont by-election.

The Tuesday morning session will deal with health and will feature Dr. Jan Duzsza, the highly respected Ontario NDP health critic and alderperson Anne Johnston, chairperson of the Toronto Board of Health.

The afternoon session will feature union heavies Lynn Williams of the United Steelworkers and Dennis McDermott of the United Auto Workers in a discussion on Labor and Politics.

Sessions later in the week include transportation, education, food, foreign policy, housing and the state of the NDP.

Broadbent and Lewis will speak at the keynote session on the NDP in Canada Tuesday afternoon. All sessions will be held free of charge at the Medical Sciences auditorium.

The U of T NDP club is just reforming after dissolving during the early 70s when the Waffle commanded most of the student support in the party. After the Waffle expulsion from the party the club was slow in forming and this is its first major action on campus.

Cutbacks should be studied

The library workers union, CUPE local 1230, has called for a meeting of representatives from student, faculty, and staff organizations at U of T next Tuesday to discuss setting up university-wide study sessions on government cutbacks.

In a letter sent to all campus organizations union president Judy Darcy says a forum would be "extremely useful" in trying to get at the truth in the present crisis and work out strategies.

The union wants to define "common interests" and work towards more cooperation and understanding among various elements in the university.

The letter says demands of many groups on campus for more funding are well justified such as those for increased wages for campus workers, graduate assistants'

The union feels groups have too often been pitted against one another in competing for their demands, thus allowing the administration to divide and rule.

It points to the recent university attempts to paint library workers' demands for a Cost of Living Allowance (COLA) as "greedy" and "unreasonable".

The 1230 letter says York University's December study sessions, which resulted from joint student, faculty, and staff pressure, were successful in publicly focusing attention on problems of financing and the administration's response to them.

The meeting will be held Tuesday March 4 at 5:15 in the Library Sciences Auditorium.

The Varsity staff deeply regrets the tragic death of graduate student and Governing Council member Vernon Copeland.

During our association, Vern inspired us with his boundless enthusiasm, conviction, energy and dedication; talents which he served the university and his constituents well. He will be sorely missed.

We extend our condolences to his family.

Chant appointment a breath of fresh air

The appointment of Don Chant to the provost's job will come as a breath of fresh air to the musty chambers of Simcoe Hall.

We hope, more than anything, that Chant will live down the 'corridors and boardrooms' approach of outgoing provost Don Forster (who, to his credit, did the job the way he saw it well) and replace it with an openness and full circulation of information.

The provost is the second most powerful — some would say the most powerful — person in the university. He must be well known and well trusted; and he must be prepared to inform people as fully as possible about the vital decisions he makes. He must retain a sense of identity with the divisions and grass roots of the university.

Chant is admirably qualified for the job. A competent administrator, he has earned deserved respect for his outspoken defence of environmental concerns (a concern we hope he does not forego) and his belief in the importance of the responsibility of public institutions.

Being neither an insider to Simcoe Hall circles, nor heavily involved in campus politics, Chant is in an ideal position to encourage Simcoe Circle to lift its blinkers and deal more imaginatively with both the campus and community.

That works the other way as well. Whether he likes it or not, Chant will become heavily involved in political issues, particularly insofar as he will be responsible for his administration of the academic divisions to Governing Council's powerful academic affairs committee, which this year, for example has dealt with the complex and divisive issue of tenure. Politically, Chant is an unknown quantity.

Whether Chant will be able to rise to some of the more mediocre administrative challenges remains to be seen. However, some crucial challenges lie ahead.

In the past, the provost has been chairman of the university's budget committee. Should Chant fill that role, he may find himself the man in charge of reducing the university's budget by 10 percent, if provincial funding continues at its present level. To be responsible for decisions to lay off university staff will not be easy, nor will it be popular.

By choosing Chant, U of T president John Evans has made a shrewd move. For while he may not have made his decision on that basis, he has given the university a new 'glamor-boy', a high-profile public figure with immense credibility.

That credibility so far has been directed towards, and gained from, environmental issues. Should Chant choose to turn his attention towards the plight of the university — as seems likely — he will undoubtedly gather widespread attention; more, perhaps than John Evans himself has been able to do.

In the long run, that may turn out to be as beneficial as the application of his skills to the provost's job.

Keep TTC fare low

In principle, the current proposal for university students to have special rates on the TTC when a fare increase comes is a good one: students, poor already, can ill afford increased costs when their fixed incomes are continually hit by inflation and government stinginess.

However, the campaign is based on two misconceptions. First, it is assuming that a fare increase is inevitable. That hasn't happened yet, and won't if enough people fight against it. Far better, tactically, to fight to maintain the present fare than fight for an exemption from an increase which will be widely unpalatable.

Second, everyone, not just students, will be hurt by a fare increase. Working people depend heavily on the TTC for daily transportation. They are often going to be as heavily hit by a fare increase as students, and they deserve as much protection against one. For students to fight solely for an exemption for themselves would be to ignore the interests of the wider community.

The present fare of 25 cents a ride should be maintained, if not done away with entirely. Public transportation is a service, and should be as widely available as possible. And that means more government funding.

Currently, 70 percent of the TTC's budget comes from fares, and 30 percent from subsidies. However, for highways, 50 percent comes from gasoline and 50 percent from subsidies. If government can fund highways by that amount, then it can at least do the same for public transportation.

To do even that for public transportation is not to take account of the inherent preferability of public transit over private transit in a city such as Toronto. The side effects and inevitable public cost of automobile traffic are legion: dirt, pollution, noise, delays, crowding — the list is endless and obvious.

To raise the TTC fare would be one of the most retrogressive steps this city could take. Higher fare is not going to make the TTC any more popular, but instead will drive people to private transit, in a city that would dearly like to move in the opposite direction.

Students, with SAC taking some initiative, should fight as hard as they can to keep the TTC fare at its present level. Public transit, widely used, is the only way to ensure Toronto has a worthwhile future.

Chinese Students Association of University of Toronto hereby appeals to the Governing Council and president Dr. John Evans:

1. to genuinely consider the problem of racism in the forthcoming appeal of the above-mentioned students.
2. to issue a denial of statements made by Canadian Medical Association president Bette Stephenson, who, as a staff member of the University of Toronto, is obviously calling for discrimination against landed immigrants in the medical school admission.
3. to set up a presidential commission to investigate racism at University of Toronto as requested by seven faculty members earlier this month.

U of T must set up racism inquiry

Having considered the extraordinarily harsh and unprecedented manner by which Tony Leah and Bill Schabas were suspended by Caput following their attempt to prevent alleged racist sociologist Edward Banfield from speaking in U.C. last spring, and the fact that racism was not considered as an underlying issue during their trial by Caput last summer, the

Scar reps say we done them wrong

The article in The Varsity Feb. 14 was not accurate as it misrepresents the intentions of the people who are involved.

In the matter of the proxies some Scarborough College students indicated that they believed some council members had signed other members' names to proxies and that this in their opinion was forgery. Hence the matter was brought to the attention of the Scarborough College Students' Council. The proxies have been sent to forensic sciences to see if they have been signed by other people. The results will be available shortly. Legal opinion has clearly shown it is not forgery for someone to sign another person's name if the other person has given his or her permission.

Having been closely involved with this year's council, we do not believe that any members of this year's council have signed another member's name without the knowledge of the other person involved. If anyone has done this it remains to be proven to us.

Regarding the president's salary, the purpose in bringing up the raise again was not to declare it was illegal, but rather to ask the president to clarify the matter. The president is very willing to do this. It is hoped that a qualified legal opinion will end the allegations and the questionable Varsity references to this problem.

At Scarborough it is our policy to bring forward all rumors and allegations at council meetings in an effort to resolve them to everyone's satisfaction. This policy may at times make it appear we are in chaos when we are not. The situation at Scarborough College is not perfect but it is far from the state of chaos and mismanagement which The Varsity and others have painted it to be.

We are also critical of The Varsity's reporting of a letter which the SCSA received from the former stable manager. Your article dealt with the manager's complaints on the front page yet you waited until page 17 to print that "Two professional horsemen who had been associated with the stable since its inception spoke for O'Donohue's handling of the stable." In fact they strongly supported the work of the president. Nor did you mention who these men are; they are the President and Vice-President of the Professional Horsemen's Association of Canada.

Such reporting does not give Varsity readers an accurate perspective of Scarborough College news. The reporter involved has agreed that the article was poorly done. We sympathize with the difficulties facing The Varsity in covering Scarborough College news due to our distance from the main campus. Nevertheless, we urge the next Varsity Editor to implement new methods of reporting on Scarborough College news, as the present methods are simply not working.

McReavy helped athletics dept

We would like to express our surprise at the recent firing of storekeeper Paul McReavy by the Zoology Department. Paul has been quite active in athletics at Hart House in past years and has given quite freely of his time for voluntary programs in weight training. He was instrumental in improving the facilities within the weight training area.

It is unfortunate that his five years of service and his contributions to campus activities should be rewarded by so sudden a firing.

We would hope that the situation can be resolved quickly and Mr. McReavy be reinstated to his former position.

Review editor insults monarchy

I have not written to my favorite newspaper for some time, but have been spurred to interperate action as the editor of the Review section apparently misunderstands the sacred constitution and government of Ontario.

On Friday, Feb. 14, in his books blurb, Randy Robertson alleged to have seen an Oh Henry bar in

"Davis' black limousine with the 1-Crown-1 license plate." This car, normally parked at the west door of the Legislature building, where Mr. Robertson presumably passes it on his way to read his hometown newspaper (the Foleyet Flit?), is that of Lieutenant-Governor McGibbon.

Big Daddy Bill is chaffered in a much more anonymous green car, licence AAC-500, normally parked at the east door, beyond Mr. Robertson's territory. This anonymity fits in with his desire to be indistinguishable from the proles, as does his eschewal of aristocratic idiosyncrasies, such as Oh Henry bars, peculiar to the Queen's representative.

Morton clears up name confusion

Featured prominently on the editorial page of SAC's recent Tenure Tabloid is a quotation advancing a fatuous objection to the inclusion of graduate students on tenure committees and attributed to "Desmond Morton, Faculty Member of the Academic Affairs Committee".

I write to make it clear that I am not the Desmond Morton referred to. Not only am I not a member of the Academic Affairs Committee, I hold views on tenure diametrically opposed to those alleged to be held by my namesake. In my view there is a good case for abolishing tenure; if it is to be retained, students should be given at least a voice equal to that of the faculty.

Chilean regime is unconstitutional

In its issue of Feb. 26, The Varsity published a letter by Daniel Stripinis which stated that the Chilean Unidad Popular government was unconstitutional. Even though I do not intend to write a long letter defending Allende, I would certainly like to make some remarks concerning the letter itself and the rationale behind it.

Allende did ignore the courts; that is the bourgeois courts that have for hundreds of years ignored the people of Chile. In this respect I can mention an example from another Latin American country: Colombia.

A few years ago a group of settlers in the east of the country massacred the indian chiefs of the zone. These people were brought to court and found not guilty on the basis that indians are not human but animals. Is this decision to be upheld in the name of constitutionality?

For the information of Mr. Stripinis, the courts in Latin America in general and in Chile in particular are and have been a "constitutional" weapon to maintain the exploitation, misery, and poverty in which the Latin American peasants and workers live.

So Mr. Stripinis questions the constitutionality of Allende's government? I guess thousands of political prisoners know better what "constitutionality" means, and I'm being overly euphemistic. The failure of the "constitutional" tactics adopted by the Chilean bourgeoisie, backed by the C.I.A., brought the infamous coup in the name of the "constitution".

Allende was elected to office and contrary to the wishes of the military (and probably of Mr. Stripinis), popular support to the Unidad Popular was widening as shown by subsequent elections.

It was the fear of Socialism and not the upholding of the constitution that brought Pinochet and his clique to power. For the information of Mr. Stripinis it is the present Junta which is unconstitutional and not the former government of the U.P.; and it requires more imagination to think of it as "legal", "constitutional", and the rest of the liberal jargon.

TTC looks for ways to cut down huge deficit

By JENNIFER WONG

The Toronto Transit Commission (TTC) is looking for funds to offset the predicted $56 million operating deficit for 1975.

For Metro citizens it would mean either paying more to take the subway or paying more Metro property taxes, unless the TTC and Metro can convince the province to raise municipal grants.

The TTC executive decided last week to ask the province to review what levels of subsidy it could provide, said James McGuffin, assistant general secretary at the TTC.

Although reluctant to speculate on the outcome of these discussions, McGuffin said the province, Metro and the TTC were all concerned with keeping fares low in order to encourage use of public transportation.

Colin Vaughn, Ward 5 alderman who attended the TTC executive meeting, is dubious about the pressure the TTC executive will exert on the province.

"My impression was they would not try to push very hard," Vaughn said. "It was as if they had made up their minds to increase the fares already."

However, the TTC could argue its case on the basis of last summer's provincial legislation in the TTC strike settlement. The increased deficit is partly due to the higher wages brought in by that settlement. "The deal may be a subsidy in conjunction with a fare increase," Vaughn speculated.

He would like to see the TTC do a complete cost benefit study of all options, including a no-fare system, a nominal cash fare and higher fares.

Such a study could reveal possible increases in the ridership due to lower fares.

A word of warning for people in the libraries as studying becomes the main preoccupation at U of T — don't leave your handbag on the floor when you are studying.

Recent incidents involving purse snatching have been characterized by thieves crawling along the floor under the desk to grab the bag without the person noticing.

One attempt was foiled but others have been made by several men. Students should keep their purses on their desks beside them.

Scarborough Student Council elections will be held next Wednesday and Thursday during the day and Monday and Tuesday during the evening.

Scott Cavalier is making his second try for the presidency against Russ Henderson, president of the athletic association.

Greg Fitz is running with Cavalier and SAC rep Bruce Edwards is running with Henderson as vice-presidents.

There are four other candidates including Tom Clark. The others names were unavailable to The Varsity despite two telephone calls to the student council office.

The fourth year reps to the council, Ann Brebner and Lou Quennet, were acclaimed. Running for third year posts are Bill Warburton and Paul Caldwell.

Second year representative candidates are Dave Coggins and Brad Hinton. First year posts will be elected in the fall.

In the race for seven SAC representative positions are eight candidates including Dave Watkinson, Bill Denault, Lynne Ferrell, Tom Clark, Marion Myles and three others.

This year elections at Scarborough will be important as council tries to return from a year of bitter charges and counter charges between opposing factions lead by

Cavalier and present president John O'Donahue.

The power of the press has apparently failed to move SAC vice-president Tim Buckley.

Ignoring the unprecedented Varsity editorial Wednesday supporting his candidacy for president before nominations closed, Buckley has declined to run as of press time.

The betting favorite now to head the traditional left-liberal ticket for the upcoming SAC elections will be council's university commissioner Gord Barnes. With Barnes on the ticket are Fa'ad Saidullah and Michelle Harvey, a 1st-year Meds student.

Spears says Star should chop editorial staff

The biggest improvement that could be made to the Toronto Star would be to cut its number of editors by half, Star 'house critic' Borden Spears said yesterday.

Spears was speaking to a lunchtime discussion with Varsity staff members.

Spears said he was "reasonably happy" on the whole with the Star, but that it was only a "really good newspaper in its way, with the potential to be a great one."

The problem with the paper, Spears said, was that it was "too big to be managed. It's hard to maintain any consistency."

Spears called the paper "over-organized and over-structured", noting "it can't help having a deadening effect."

A former editor of MacLeans magazine, and member of the Davey Commission on the Mass Media, Spears was managing editor of the Star until last year when he quit out of "sheer frustration."

Spears currently writes a weekly column for the Star examining the paper's performance.

Although the Star maintains a ratio of 70 to 30 between advertising and editorial copy, Spears said it was "absolutely not true" that Star advertisers had any influence on editorial policy.

Editorial policy is determined by a board which does not necessarily represent the opinions of staff writers, Spears said.

Spears acknowledged criticisms of the paper's approach as too parochial, saying a standing joke at the Star office was that each story had to be treated with a "what does it mean to Metro" approach.

The ambition of the Star is to be "the newspaper of this community," Spears said. "We print the kind of material that affects people in their daily lives."

Spears agreed this had allowed the Globe and Mail to scoop the Star on several occasions, adding, "We knock our heads" every time it happens.

Star 'house critic' Borden Spears calls paper 'overorganized'

Rally backs SDS appeal

By JILL MIZEN

More than 20 people attended a rally at Sidney Smith foyer Wednesday to marshal support for the Caput appeal of two U of T students suspended last spring.

Students for a Democratic Society members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas were given three- and four-year suspensions by the all-faculty Caput last year.

Appeal

Their basic defence, as stated by Leslie Yager, a U of T law student and their legal advisor at the trial, is that in preventing Banfield, an alleged racist, from speaking, they were doing the university a service.

Yager claimed the trial was "totally unfair to the accused." They were denied the right to cross-examine university witnesses she said, adding the summaries of similar Caput cases used to clarify the charges were incomplete and unreliable.

Leah charged the administration has a "tremendous commitment" to keeping the issue of racism out of open discussion.

Their appeal to the maintenance of 'academic freedom', Leah said, is "freedom to expel protesters," freedom "for the people who control things already."

In the final analysis, Leah said, everything that the administration has done has been to cover up the issue of racism.

Also speaking at the rally was Mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal, who noted at a time when university finances are particularly tight, the administration spent $1,000 a day to pay for the lawyers employed in last summer's six-week trial.

The funds, Rosenthal charged, were used to "railroad" the two students.

Leah is still in Toronto, rallying support for uncovering racism within the university. Schabas is currently living in Montreal.

Carleton fee hike to OFS and NUS

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students at Carleton University have voted overwhelmingly to support the National Union of Students (NUS) and the Ontario Federation of Students with fee hikes following a referendum conducted last week during the student general election.

The 10 percent turnout at the polls was described by a spokesman as "average" for Carleton. Of those voting, 80 percent were in favor of the fee increase to NUS, while 77 percent were in favour of the OFS increase.

As a result, Carleton students will now be paying $1 per year for NUS and $1.50 from 30 cents and 40 cents respectively.

NUS executive secretary Maurice Proulx said, "A good feature at Carleton was the consolidation of a NUS committee which was instrumental in telling students why they should support NUS."

"The support of the rank and file for NUS will help the organization avoid bureaucracy that has hurt other organizations."

The positive vote to support NUS is particularly 'sweet' since the NUS national office is located at Carleton and represents solid support on local ground.

Carleton OFS representatives were equally ecstatic about the results. The vote is a turnaround from last year when Carleton students voted down a proposed increase in OFS contributions. OFS organizer and vice-president academic in the current student council, Pat Daley, was exuberant when word was received of the results late Wednesday evening.

Algonquin retains first year classes

OTTAWA (CUP) — A proposal to eliminate first year classes at Algonquin College has been shelved by the college board of governors pending release of an independent study of the school's financial position.

About 450 teachers and students attended a Feb. 12 board meeting ready to call college-wide strike if the board voted to suspend first year enrolment for the 1975-76 school year.

But any decision on the proposal was postponed. Board members hope a statement last week by Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld, that such measures would not be acceptable means more provincial aid is being considered.

The board also decided to await the results of a study on the college's finances sponsored by the province to be completed sometime in March.

The board's finance committee last week accepted an administration proposal to save $3 million during the next academic year by closing the doors to 2,400 students and firing 150 staff members.

But at the Feb. 12 meeting, board members called the scheme an abomination and a disaster for the college.

Board chairman Harold Thayer, a member of the finance committee, said he could not agree with the proposals.

"This has been described as a simplistic solution. It is not just simplistic — it means we would lose $5.7 million in revenue the year after next."

We do not know whether the government is going to abandon slip year financing (provincial funding is based on the previous year's enrolment), so this could be a gamble we could not afford."

He said the college could examine other possible money saving steps, including salary freezes for senior administrators and faculty members making more than $13,000 a year and reductions in administrative and information budgets.

"If beer and beefsteaks have made Englishmen, oatmeal cakes and oatmeal prridge have made Scotchmen."

Since the Reformation, which effected a radical change in the national character, the proverbial Scot has been raised on porridge and the Shorter Catechism, a rigorous diet, but highly beneficial to those possessed of sound digestive organs. Many a 'lad o' pairs' who ultimately rose to fame studied his Bain and Aristotle by guttering candlelight in a garret in which one of the most conspicuous articles of furniture was a sack of oatmeal, and regular holidays were formerly a grant by the authorities to enable the poor student to tramp back to his native glen and replenish his sack.

Writers-in-residence in limbo

It's a difficult time to be a university president.

It's an even more difficult time to be a writer-in-residence.

And U of T president John Evans has, in fact, suspended the U of T writer-in-residence program at Massey College for the next academic year. In the face of the severe financial problems the university is presently confronting, he feels it can ill-afford what is essentially a frill.

But his action and its validity have not been accepted everywhere.

Phyllis Grosskurth, an English professor at University College, and Dave Godfrey, writer and writer-in-residence at Erindale College, have been circulating a petition protesting the move. The petition has been signed by a small number of people, but they are people with influential names. It is a cross-section of such names from inside and outside the university, Grosskurth says. Names like Norman Endicott, Marion Engle, Peter Newman, Marshall McLuhan, Kenneth McNaught . . .

Grosskurth and Godfrey plan to submit the petition to John Evans and to James Auld, Minister of Colleges and Universities at Queen's Park.

Grosskurth and Godfrey view the suspension as a backward step for Canadians studies at the U of T. And the situation of Canadian studies is such that they can ill-afford the decision. That is the context within which they place Evans' action.

"We've been fighting hard for the past few years to get a respectable course of studies in Canadian literature — and we've met with incredible opposition," says Grosskurth. "It's really disgraceful that the U of T does not devote more time to have more Canadian studies here."

Grosskurth does not want to let what has been gained disappear so easily. (The writer-in-residence program was only established by Claude Bissell in the early sixties. It has included Robert Finch, Earle Birney, Margaret Lawrence, Margaret Atwood and W. O. Mitchell in the intervening years.)

D. J. Dooley, English professor at St. Mike's and the chairman of the writer in residence committee (responsible essentially for choosing each year's incumbent) says "in the light of the extreme gravity of the financial situation universities are facing, the position of the writer-in-residence is relatively insignificant. The situation really is serious when the president has to worry about secretarial expenses in his own office. And I know that he is going over everything, everything, seeing what is necessary and justifiable and what isn't."

"I am much less worried about the writer in residence than about the situation in the English departments, where it's a real question whether we'll be able to hire enough instructors for next year. At UC they've got quite a few positions in the last three, four years — Clifford Leech has gone down to the University of Connecticut, J. B. Priestly has left. They've been wanting to make an appointment in 18th century studies for some time. They can't. Clarence Tracy who has been here for a temporary period of two years leaves this year."

"This is the situation that I'm looking at."

"There are creative writing courses on campus, if this is the service the writer-in-residence provides. Frank Watt teaches one course at UC and David Knight another at Vic.

"Besides, the program is only being suspended; and only for the coming year. It is not being terminated. We will in fact be meeting later this spring to consider the names for the 1976-77 writer-in-residence. That year will be the celebration of the university's one hundred and fiftieth anniversary — and I know the president would like to have a really eminent person here then in this capacity."

The writer-in-residence program costs the university around $21,000 a year. The writer receives an honorarium of $15,000. He has a suite at Massey College, which the university has to pay for, since he is displacing a paying graduate student. His secretarial office and telephone expenses are also picked up.

The money for the program does not come from the provincial government — it is not a question of the money not being there due to government cutbacks. It comes out of a portion of the monies raised annually by the Varsity Fund from U of T alumni that is allotted to the president to use as he sees fit.

How does the present writer in residence, Fletcher Markle, feel about all this?

"I have no comment to make on whatever budgetary problems may have come up . . . That's not my province, anyway. My reactions are totally subjective — I'm enjoying myself immensely and I've had all kinds of students come to see me — some in my own field (Markle is a film and TV writer, director, narrator, producer) some who are writing novels, some who are writing short stories."

"Have I been useful?"
 "I hope so. But it's not for me to say. That's up to others. I, a guest here after all. But I hope so."

arts tend to show them as being elitist activities. That is why when you get writers or painters who get very much into a Marxist ideology, they find themselves on very dicey ground as to what to do about their writings: like Mao publishes his poems with an apology for these old-style revisionist things.

As far as a specific political ideology it's not present in my poems. What is present is my own personal belief that the language you use, which includes the emotional content of the language, has a tremendous effect on the world and that I've always seen these things more from a personal point of view. That is to say the individual working his path through the thing and if the individuals claim a ground in common and if the struggle is together, they will build something.

I think that if I was living in Brazil I'd be writing a radically different poetry from what I write living in Canada; on the other hand, there's also something tremendously artificial about me denying I live in Canada and writing as though I live in Brazil, cause I don't.

NP: The book you've worked the longest on is The Martyrology. What were its origins and how is it developing?

bp: Well first there's the saints — David Aylward and my idea. They grew out of the 'st' words in English. Stranglehold became St. Ranglehold, storm became St. Orm.

Now that's where it ended for David and that's where it began for me. I found that in a series I was writing Scriptures — which forms a lot of the book Nights on Prose Mountain — I was beginning to write these rhetorical, often didactic pieces in which I started to address the saints. I was really raving in them, really screaming — very manifestoe tone — talking about concerns re: language (by language, I mean here the commerce that takes place between people — the exchange). The saints began to take on more flesh and blood for me. This whole world had grown up for me around the saints — actually based on a fantasy I had when I was a kid; that the real world was up in the sky where the saints lived and that we were but passing our life in the sea of air.

In many ways The Martyrology is a very schizy book. The narrator, me, is out of it in Book I. A lot of it is addressed very personally to the saints. In Book II you see the move away from kind of leaning on what eventually began to appear to be the false figures of the saints: that it wasn't the saints at all I was addressing, it was myself I was talking to, parts of myself, voices and that these were also different moods within myself I was "evocating".

Now the main thing in writing The Martyrology is that I haven't had conscious control of its direction, it's something that has grown. I've felt very much against a certain view of art which ends up always tying things together, which struck me as totally not like life and what I wanted in my writing were forms which articulate the world as I'm aware of it; the world as I actually encounter. . . . to not plug into forms. If you read the Martyrology the progress from Book I to the end of Book II has also been formal progress — there's a change in the length of line, the type of rhythm, the type of sounds in the piece. In Book III that becomes even more pronounced.

AS: I'm sorry there's a Book III, I liked the ending of Book II.

bp: Yeah, that's where I lose the saints. Book III is almost all addressed to God.

What's happening on Book IV is that in a sense the process of breaking down the language that I was into in the early years is happening but I'm recombining — I'm beginning to look at words as sentences that say things about the single letters (in the word "word", I see W or D; W and D are each four letters from the opposite ends of the alphabet, so you're into this totally balanced structure). It's like I'm beginning — I'm starting to recombine in new ways which is to me the essence of what writing should be — the search for new things.

AS: Are you happy to be writing?
bp: Ahh, yeah, I love it.

AS: Do you go through any pain when you write?

bp: Oh, yeah, but that's beside the point. That's all part of the occasion of getting it out. Sometimes writing is both agony and pleasure because there's something you have to articulate, it's hard to say, you don't want to talk about it, you feel you don't want to say it but you go ahead and say it anyway and then when it's done I always find it hard to imagine the mood I was in when I wrote. It seems like just another kind of whole thing that kind of takes over. It's me; but it's a very high mood, it's a heightened consciousness at that point.

NP: Leonard Cohen has gone back at times to revise some of his earlier work — are you after the "polished" poem?

bp: I've only been articulating it this way for the last few years but I see myself more or less as a "research" writer, that what I publish is finished research, that is to say, accomplished. I publish it both to communicate — because I do want people to hear what I'm saying and there is probably a certain amount of the immortality game in that — and also, deciding: this is research, I'll put it out and someone else will pick up on it and take it further. Not because I think it's perfect in itself or complete in itself, I just think it's a signpost along the road.

I'm only 30. I'm very young in the writing thing, guys who are thirty don't have to have arrived anywhere. I used to think you had to arrive by the time you were 45. Now I don't think you have to have arrived at any point.

we're just individuals and it's often a very dislocating time. That was something we were never quite able to get a hold of.

At this point the energy of the group has moved off into collaborating on writing a novel; we aren't doing performance any more. It's totally fresh, it's unmapped territory, it's never been tried except with Naked Came the Stranger. In Sci-fi and detective novels there are teams — like Ellery Queen is two writers. Four is different!

AS: If one looks at the International Concrete poetry movement it looks like it's going in two general directions: on the one hand there are writers who believe a work of art should be cut off from life and then there are people (like the Brazilian Haroldo da Campos) who believe the poem should have a political impact. Where do you see yourself?

bp: Usually by the term political they mean ideological, that is to say there is a very specific point of view being expressed; now I think any poem by its nature — if it works on the emotional systems of the individual — is in that sense revolutionary, it is in that sense political. I think poetry by its nature is a political activity. Now, as always, the parts have never been able to justify themselves in terms of putting bread in people's mouths. In fact, most of the studies of the into that because I was very bored with the limitation of one voice. What four voices allowed us was more choral, more theatrical possibilities — in short opens up the whole ball game. As a writer this was a tremendously exciting challenge to me.

In fact, The Horsemen as a performance group have been very successful in what we were trying to do: reaching people. We've had difficulty ourselves personally, in knowing what we want to do when we finish a reading. There's been a tremendous input into the audience, the audience has usually been very responsive, we get a lot of feedback just in terms of attentive listening and applause (people also join in on some of the chants that are part of the sound drama); and then, there we are, we're no longer a group and an interview with Alvin Balkind a curator of contemporary art:

One of us has not liked the Art Gallery of Ontario's Chairs exhibition (closing this weekend).

One of us has. One of us thinks that the exhibition is frivolous and irresponsible, that people come to it feeling that they must enjoy it—since it is so obviously a 'fun' exhibition—in the same relentless, unmitigated way that they feel they must be awed by the Old Masters. Also it is paradoxical, to say the least, for the Gallery to encourage people to physically appreciate this exhibition—to touch it, to feel it—when scarcely a hundred feet away they must stand at a respectful distance from the Rembrandts and the Hals. So many people are essentially unable to appreciate it because they have become conditioned to react to the Art Gallery experience in a certain way. Never has one seen so many parents tell so many children 'Don't touch' so often.

And the other one of us doesn't think this at all.

"I ask myself what kind of person likes this exhibition, what kind of person doesn't." Alvin Balkind, curator of contemporary art at the Art Gallery and the man responsible for the Chairs show, was speaking to us in his office last week.

"The creative, amused, laughing person loves this show. He rejoices at seeing the art gallery opened up and its functions broadened.

"The tight, tradition-minded authoritarian person who lives by rigid definitions of things, his life set on strict pathways, dislikes the show. He sees the sacred precincts of the gallery as having been breached, violated."

So!

But perhaps these remarks are not descriptive of either one of us so much as of Alvin Balkind, and of his attitude to his job as a curator. And as such, certainly, they are more important than they would otherwise be.

"How people react to something is something you can't predict," Balkind said. "If people feel they should react in a certain way there's no way of controlling it. You can't tell people what they should feel. It's true an exhibition has a tendency, in spite of itself, to program people's responses, and it doesn't matter which kind of exhibition it is. There is nothing you can do about it unfortunately—but it is rather frustrating. On the one hand, you have a formal exhibition that programs people in one way and on the other hand you want to avoid that formal programming. So loosen the exhibition up a little and you find that the people are being programmed another way."

But perhaps to the degree that one sees the men behind the exhibitions, to the degree that one is able to say not only "I know what I like" but also "I see what you're doing and you're not doing it as well as you might," or, "you're doing it even better than I thought you might," one is able to come to terms in a fruitful way with that built-in programming tendency. Even the critical public that visits art galleries and exhibitions regularly tends all too often to think of those exhibitions as existing in themselves, independent of conception, development, personality politics, compromise. But they are put together by people who do have viewpoints, who have the same faults and virtues as the viewers of the exhibitions, they are put together by individuals who have definite viewpoints and biases themselves.

The curator of contemporary art, especially, since he is dealing with new ideas and concepts in art, is much less the relatively anonymous middleman that other curators may be. He has the basic—and in many ways unenviable—power of selection—of deciding who, among his contemporaries, is to be shown at the gallery and who won't be. An artist's career is tremendously enhanced by appearing at an institution like the Art Gallery of Ontario and as a result the curator is under tremendous pressure from the artists themselves and from collectors and dealers as Balkind freely admits. But beyond this power and more important than it, is his power to use the gallery situation as a means to an end, to use contemporary art within the gallery to reach and affect a greater proportion of the public than otherwise possible in a greater number of ways than otherwise possible.

Balkind talks about the exhibition in words which underlie the significance of the curator. "The exhibition and its aims were formed partly consciously, partly unconsciously, because I follow my ideas, my dreams, with only a semi-conscious awareness of what is going on. I look at it afterwards and I realize what has happened—that's the way many artists work . . ."

He treats the exhibition and what is exhibited in it in much the same terms, the part embodying the whole, the whole reflecting the individual unities of the parts. In making the exhibition, in choosing the chairs, in choosing how to arrange the exhibition, I looked for the same things I look for in contemporary art—imagination, flair, freshness, diversity and diversity in order to achieve the impact we wanted."

Balkind, talking specifically about the Chairs exhibition said, "people come in expecting to have a hard lesson taught to them and that they will have to overwork their brains to get it and all of a sudden they discover something here they can enjoy. They discover that you can laugh in an art gallery—and why not?"

"The show is designed to put some people into a confrontation with their assumptions about art and the art gallery—and for some of these people it will put them in a confrontation with themselves.

"But they must go through the learning experience themselves—I'm not holding them by the hand or feeding them with a spoon—if they want to learn and they have the capacity, they will."

"People are far too solemn for my tastes when they come to an art gallery. I go to Europe, to France especially, and I see people going into an art gallery and I see they are arguing, fussing and fuming with each other about this painting, and that should be over there. Over here we're far too solemn about it—we come in and we're very prayerful—and our voices drop immediately—we get brain-washed into coming and worshipping—I believe worship is an essential need of the human psyche—but I like worship to be non-Old Testament.

"I don't ever say that an exhibition like Chairs is the only function an art gallery serves. This is a mistake that a lot of people make. When they see a show like this downstairs they say, oh yes, he's just into that crazy stuff, he's not interested in the enduring things, he's not interested in paintings by painters or sculptures by sculptors. But that's nonsense. One of the shows I'm working on now which will take place in September, 1976, is a retrospective of the artist Jack Bush, a straight out and out painter in the Clement Greenberg style.

"That's a conventional art gallery activity that an art gallery should provide.

"But I also believe that an art gallery especially one like this one, is not a museum, like the ROM in which everything stays for year and year and year and almost never changes.

"I believe that an art gallery should be partly static and partly dynamic. The Old Masters collection will stay for a long time where it is. It's not going to move. That's the static part. But at the same time there's the dynamic part.

"In the dynamic part of the gallery, the same room should be filled with one kind of show—it should come out and then be filled with another kind of show, and then it should come out and something else go in — so that the public is constantly surprised and constantly knocked around by the unexpected.

"My ideal gallery would be a place where you can alter the space in every conceivable way—raise the floor, raise the ceiling, where you can change the walls and the background so that you never have the same colour for the same show—where you can install space dividers so that you are sometimes forced to go through a kind of maze. I want a gallery where your expectations are constantly surprised.

"If you have changing shows but you also have the same background, you never use space dividers, you always put things around, in a conventional way—dot, dot, dot—so many feet up from the bottom, so many feet down from the top, at eye-level or maybe a little below eye-level the paintings change but the installation is about the same—very soon tedium sets in.

"And I'm anti-tedium. I am aware of other things that are developing in the world of art, that have been developing for some time—and that have as well been a part of the arts ever since the beginning of time: the ritualistic aspects of art. . . . There are many artists today who are concerned with ritualistic activity—and one of these days, somewhere, here or somewhere else, I hope to have an exhibition which deals with artists who are quite consciously into ritual—for example, Anthony Mirallda, from Spain, who lives in New York. He takes food and he cooks it with vegetable dyes—he makes the food brilliant colours. He bakes bread, and it comes out fuchsia, spaghetti comes out orange, rice comes out multicoloured, and he spreads it out in a magnificent feast of colour on a table and people come in and they eat it. It is a ritualistic feeding.

And with the richness of colour, it's a phenomenal experience. At the same time he has professional things in which people dressed in long gowns and Greek-like masks carry smoke bombs of different colours; they proceed through a wood with all these different coloured smokes coming up—that sort of thing fascinates me.

There could be three, four, five, six, artists in the exhibition who are related in their conscious efforts to do ritualistic things.

Given this description of an ideal gallery, an ideal "dynamic gallery", and given Balkind's background as a curator of a university art gallery, (the Chairs exhibition was first staged at the University of British Columbia Art Gallery during his years there) we asked him for his views on the Hart House Art Gallery. . . .

"I'd rather not get involved in internecine warfare. . . . I think much of my attitude towards Hart House has been expressed in what I've said about being dynamic as opposed to being static. . . ."

"Quite frankly, if they had the money, and they don't—they suffer on a poverty-stricken budget—they could do something about brightening up that gallery—everything has a tendency to look a little bit grey, the lighting system could be improved, the walls could alter from time to time, there could be some space dividers, there's always an empty space in the middle and you always go around and around.

Balkind is resigning as curator of contemporary art at the Art Gallery of Ontario. He is leaving to return to Vancouver where he has a home. He is leaving the AGO for entirely personal reasons. He has only been at the Gallery for a year and a half. But perhaps a measure of his achievement is that one considers his possible successors in terms of Balkind himself, in terms of a dynamism and an openness equal to his.

Boo!

Thumbs down on the Art Gallery of Ontario's prudishness.

In the first weeks of their current exhibition, Chairs, one of their exhibits drew particular interest from spectators.

Viewers could open the door to a simulated steambath and eyeball a faded movie queen wreathed in mounds of subcutaneous fat, garish sun glasses and extravagant nail polish.

She also happened to be busily masturbating — not that the giggling children outraged parents, timid management or this fearless writer were interested.

We know what we like and we like art, right?

The steambath door now bears a sign saying "out of order" and its doors are secured by jaunty red rope, complete with tassels.

The mobs have learned, though. All you have to do is peek up under the door. (Hint, hint.)

Hatter promotes pie fights

Harry Stimpson, caterer and restaurateur, looks like some kind of enchanted boy wonder. He is tall and thin, a cross between Alfred E. Newman and Jackie Coogan.

But he does worry unlike the "what-me-worry-kid" and he doesn't have an aunt to cook his favorite pies for him like "Tom Sawyer" did.

A couple of years ago, Stimpson opened up the Groaning Board on Cumberland St. Later Stimpson sold that location to move into the catering business.

The Mad Hatter's Tea Party Ltd. caters children's parties at Stimpson's premises, on Yonge St. just north of Eglinton. The Groaning Board II, a sequel to the Cumberland restaurant, has just opened up in the same cluster of stores.

Stimpson doesn't have a cook. He makes every dish on the menu, from crepes to banana bread — he sweeps the side walk outside the restaurant; he organizes parties and events at one end and teaches cooking classes Monday and Wednesday evenings at 7:30 at the other.

The food at "Groaning Board II" is unimpressive. The salads are adequate and the banana bread is moist and fresh but the crepes are tough and the fillings, either crab or chesse or fruit do not taste fresh, or new or exciting in any way. For four, the meal was under $10.00. The restaurant is unlicensed, so there was no wine to tip the price.

The title "The Groaning Board" goes back to a medieval tradition. The host of the feast would stack so much food on the table that the boards would literally groan. There is little in the menu or the décor of the restaurant to serve the tradition. The room is dark, cramped and modest.

Business is slow and on a Friday evening there were only about ten customers there. Stimpson says the catering company is now carrying the restaurant.

"It's like a car. You just get one tire pumped up and the other one blows."

The Mad Hatter caters to children's parties in what used to be the Cinematek theatre. Children are $5.00 a head and $1.50 extra for pie fights. The parties average about 10 in number. The crowd is shipped in and Stimpson takes all the worry off the hands of the parents.

Yes, he does worry.

He looks around the darkened 250 seat theatre. "They run up and down these aisles playing tag. Not too many have been taken to the hospital.

"No I haven't been sued. No, I don't make them sign a release. What is this? Are you a librarian or something?"

"Signing a release doesn't do any good. In parking lots where it says they 'will not take responsibility for any lost or stolen articles' that doesn't protect anyone. The parking lot can still be sued. There is still a way around it — something in the wording.

"I've had lawyers look into this for me. A release would only cause alarm."

Some more people come in to the restaurant and Stimpson leaves to do some cooking. Maybe he wouldn't be able to handle any rush even if things did pick up. If to you he seems just about as crazy as a hatter you'd be right, but it would be from over work as opposed to mercury poisoning.

Question Time
St. Lawrence Centre
Feb. 25 — March 22

"And what a wonderful thing it is to see an Ontario audience laugh! Those stony, disapproving, thin-lipped faces, eloquent of our bitter winters, our bitter politics, and our bitter religion, melt into unaccustomed merriment, and a sense of relief is felt all through the theatre, as though the straps and laces of a tight corset had been momentarily loosened." (Samuel Marchbanks)

Perhaps it is unfair to quote his famous persona back at him, but in his new play Robertson Davies (Master of Massey College) has created something with which even that accomplished critic would be mightily pleased. Not only does Question Time allow us a liberating laugh at ourselves, but it also poses some vital questions to us. Indeed, I was tempted to see Domini Blythe's embodiment of the Queen of the land (descending out of Les Montagnes de Glace, the scene of the play, replete with diaphanous gown and icing face) as a personification of Meredith's Comic Muse herself, presiding over the play — inspiring us to 'thoughtful laughter' and a 'bettering state', and thumbing her nose at the Adjudicator from A Masque for Mr. Punch who said, "Canadian theatre must be sad — we are miserable or we are nothing."

Much of the play's force stems from a powerful mise en scene: the P.M. stranded in the Arctic wastes who makes his own descent into himself (with the aid of an Eskimo Shaman) while he lies in shock, to discover if he wants to live or die. The problem is that he has no private self to ask that question of, and in the second act the play opens out (through a scene in a fantastical House of Commons) into a question of national identity. The question is asked on our behalf by the P.M. himself, Peter MacAdam, (a name reminiscent of Mr. Punch, that "Old Adam" guided by Mephistophiles into politics) who poses as his own leader of the Opposition — since he is an embodiment of the people; and we realize that the familiar question of Canadian identity can only be answered through the discovery of our own identity as men and women — and that identity, suggests Davies, can only come from the land itself, which is certainly one of the oldest in the world.

While the 'plot' is magnificent, some of the theatrical vehicles are faulty. One of these is Davies' own script, whose first act is in sore need of paring. The Shaman takes too long in persuading a reluctant, cynically rational MacAdam to undertake his inner "wandering". Their Shavian discussion might have been tolerable later in the play, but I think Davies should have been more confident of his fantastical assumptions — just as Doris Lessing is in her Briefing for a Descent into Hell. The same criticism might be made of the second act, with its static Parliamentary blocking; but that whole act is fired by Davies' admirable satiric flair. (In making this criticism of Davies' fondness for wordy explanations and repetitions, I am indeed conscious of the complaints of Marchbanks' playwright friend Apollo Fishorn: 'Yes, but life is 99 per cent talk. Look at the people who want more action in my play; what are they doing? Talking!')

Another area which may benefit from some rewriting is the intriguing relationship of MacAdam to his wife and what she calls the MaAdam Complex. Jennifer Phipps is superb as the First Lady, particularly in a televised interview in which she refuses to break down and thereby gratify the demands of the media's 'squalid art'. And in the Parliament scene their marital relationship becomes the symbol of Peter's inner life, or lack of it. But despite several vital accusations (such as Peter's, that his wife is ruled by egotism herself), the complex is left hanging on the ambiguous (if not contradictory) final confession of Sarah that 'My servitude is my final worth'.

There is one stunning scene in which Peter accepts as his totem animal the Polar Bear, and attempts to wear the Shaman's pelt, only to flounder and suffocate beneath the intense sensual awareness of the environment that he must suddenly endure. This scene, unlike some others, is a dramatic allegory of an inward torment, and therefore far more effective than the boring quizzical looks and knock-kneed stance of Kenneth Fogue, the P.M., in the first act. In Parliament, however, he is excellent, as was his boast.

As for the P.M.'s odyssey, that ends abruptly and unconvincingly when he learns to accept his true Queen, the spirit of the land. I can only take his final remark to his rescuer — 'Do you have anything else to take back?'... 'Only myself' — as Davies' own abandonment of his own plot, in order to turn the questions to us. His own answers are really no answer, and I think he weakens his play by insisting (as in his programme note) that they are. For all the talk of the land, there is little mention of the weather; and faced as I am this week with the chilly gales of spring, I felt more inclined to endorse Margaret Atwood's thesis that we find ourselves in opposition to our environment. And what was the purpose of the multi-national explorers up there in the Arctic raping our land of its mineral wealth? The image works powerfully as an allegory of our inward mental state (other examples are the need for 'self-sufficiency', etc.), but I'm not sure how far the political reality is a necessary adjunct or corollary of the mental journey. Perhaps Davies is simply insisting that we recognize the existence and importance of that northern land, as well as of the terra incognita within ourselves. However, the play would be strengthened if the Arctic was not so heavily stressed as an allegorical item, but simply included, like the string of icebergs round the brim of Mr. Marchbanks' hat, as another essential part in the Canadian whole.

His concept of the Spirit of the Land might have been more powerful if it had been truly personified in either a man of the land (e.g. a trapper), or in Davies' characteristic vos populi, a newspaper editor.

But it is a measure of the play's success that it invokes these musings about what it might also have done. And as I said at the outset, Question Time's great virtue is in its capacity to raise questions about the outer and inner landscape simultaneously, and to give them an essentially 'light' treatment through fantasy, satire, comedy and revue styles, so that the questions can remain with the audience once they leave the theatre. The equation is only solved on the stage for form's sake, but the questions as well as the range of possible answers remain with us, the audience. I believe it is Davies' prayer that we will return from this 'unaccustomed merriment' to discover within ourselves, each for himself, that bedrock of identity on which we can dance with confidence (unlike Peter MacAdam on his fragile ice-rink) — abandon our bitternesses and achieve that 'fulness of life' which the Shaman can only talk about on the stage. Therefore let me entreat you to go see this play, for I would not be associated a moment with that critic of Mr. Punch who declared, "I don't know how to get people into theatre... it's my job to keep them out, if I can." There are too many flaws and too idealities in this play to make it great, but it is exactly what we need right now.

Fine soloists pull the National through

Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn in Sleeping Beauty

A back bench member of the corps in Wednesday's performance of Sleeping Beauty may well have summed up the season, as she tripped, and let loose a "shit" that was heard from wall to wall. Need we note that Cella Franca and David Haber absented themselves from watching the third act (along with many other audience members)?

Fighting to rise above the corps, and various annoying technical mishaps (the wheels that squeaked through the pas de deux, lights bouncing off the scrim), the National's soloists won the battle, but lost the war.

Karen Kain did the best of a bad job. No one in his right mind would ask a dancer to stand on point in attitude, arms fifth position, as four suitors in turn managed to throw her off balance. And this twice in one act! Karen smiled bravely through it all.

Frank Augustyn seemed to be improvising much of the dance in the woods. Again the choreography is to be blamed. Nureyev should stick to dancing, and leave the classics alone.

Mary Jago and Nadia Potts, both joys to watch, seem to dance better with each viewing. Limited to showy divertimenti dances, they flash on and off in a second, leaving a smile, and dying applause in their wake.

Wendy Reiser and Daniel Capouch danced the Pussycats beautifully, breaking the tension that builds up during a production that has somehow missed its mark.

Sleeping Beauty ran three hours, which is certainly not unreasonable for a dramatic piece with some plot. Unfortunately, Sleeping Beauty lacked both that and any character delineation.

Despite shortcomings, praise must be given to the lighting and set designs and the costumes, whose yardage could outfit an army, albeit a well-dressed one.

With all the corps members the National could drag out of the closets on stage, much of the effect of the costumes was lost in the crush.

But all these trimmings could not make a poorly choreographed ballet come to life.

Giselle was quite another matter. Saturday afternoon, the people of Toronto who managed to get tickets, saw the finest Giselle being danced anywhere.

Staged traditionally, Giselle had all of us brushing back tears at the end of Act I, with Giselle mad after being tricked in love.

Kain and Augustyn danced as a team, as dancers and within the plot line, beautifully.

The corps here, pruned down to a reasonable size, dancing in Act II, as the Wills, somehow matched Kain's standard, which is high to say the least.

Again praise should go to the technical staff, who have put together, not one, but five gigantic productions, with only minor details to detract from the generally high quality of their work.

But still, if an audience is paying the prices that O'Keefe charges, they deserve to see the best.

Don Juan sparkles its way into the repertoire

Dark shrouded mourners proceeding by candlelight through a foggy twilight, a grief-stricken daughter still lusting after her father's murderer, the imposing, haughty presence of a faceless, cloaked, plumed figure — these were some of the astounding effects that met the audience as the curtain rose last Wednesday evening for the National Ballet Company's premiere performance of Don Juan.

In contrast to the more traditional ballet approach of expression through movement, Don Juan conveyed much of its essence via a spectacular array of exciting visual delights.

Costumes and scenery, coloured exclusively in beige and black, helped to create a dreamy, yet subtly sinister atmosphere, in which the amorous activities and ultimate damnation of Don Juan were convincingly portrayed.

The free flowing hair and long soft skirts of the court ladies heightened the pervading aura of flagrant sensuality and muted decadence.

After the opening funeral march scene, the action transferred to Don Juan's court salon, where a troupe of dancers performed a series of amorous adventures in tribute to their great lover host.

Still interested in practising his art, Don Juan enticed a young peasant girl, Aminta, away from her betrothed, and then as a further entertainment, pitted this simple innocent against the jealous and pitiful antics of Dona Ana, the spurned, grieving daughter.

A haunting, elegant woman, donned in white, appeared fleetingly during these court activities, taunting the Don with her sensuous, yet capricious presence. Destined to be the Don's most powerful seductress, she eventually lead him into damnation and death.

A slow, sensual dance exchange between Don Juan and this Angel of Death, simply executed on a bare stage, she a vision of ethereal white and he, an arrogant, soon desperate, slim, black-frocked figure, provided one of the climaxes of the evening.

Equally enchanting in a more delightful way, was the prenuptial dance of the peasant couple, performed impressively by Nadia Potts and Daniel Capouche. Later, the unfortunate Aminta, having been rejected by both old lover and new, suffered through tortuous self-deprecation, a personal hell which she superbly conveyed during her contorted, grotesque dance solos.

Don Juan's comical sidekick, played by Thomas Schramek, charmed us throughout the evening with a humorous, witty mimicry of his master.

The major flaw in the production was the uninspiring, flat portrayal of Don Juan by Sergiu Stefanski. His weak rendition of this role could be attributed to its mundane, flimsy choreography, which was particularly disappointing in lieu of the grandiose, awesome dance characterization one would have expected for the legendary Don.

During the opening funeral ceremony, the stage was kept in portentous darkness, and only regained full light with the commencement of the court banquet. Near the ballet's end, after a dance orgy at the cemetery, the stage was again shrouded in semi-darkness, in preparation for another death march (this time that of Don Juan himself).

The macabre meetings between the Lady in White and Don Juan, always performed under a subdued light, tacitly foreshadowed her mission as the emissary of death.

The audience seemed to enjoy the ballet as much as I, and for those of us who were close enough to see the dancer's faces, the program was very exciting and innovative.

A performance which is truly special instills a feeling of exhilaration and of being 'alive'.

When I left O'Keefe on Wednesday evening, I was tingling from head to toe.

The National's social season falls flat

The National Ballet Guild of Canada is one of those peculiar organizations that fall under the seemingly innocuous heading of a "Women's Club". But despite the meddling amateur connotation of this title, the Ballet Guild does serve a very useful purpose as a sort of liaison office between the public and the ballet world.

One of their duties in this role is to host various social functions during the ballet season. This year ballet patrons had the opportunity of attending two affairs under the Guild's auspices.

The Guild traditionally hosts the Gala Opening Night Party, and this year's theme was "Cafe Coppelita", in honour of the new production. It's the sort of thing ballet has always been associated with — an opportunity for the elite of the city to get together and disport themselves elegantly. The elite were there, but somehow the elegance was not.

There had been a feeble attempt to create a French bistro atmosphere, with some tourist posters and fresh flowers, but the only noticeable effect was the total confusion that reigned everywhere. The tables were in no rational form of order, table settings were incomplete and the food (a pitiful crepe and salad) was thrown down as quickly as possible and removed as quickly.

The only saving grace in the entire evening was a fine performance by Veronica Tennant and Thomas Schramek in Erik Bruhn's Coppelia. It was never a ballet known for its smoothness, and Bruhn has cleaned up its lines somewhat. He has added some new and old pieces, especially in the part of Franz, to give Schramek a series of fine entechats with which to show off his technique.

The Guild switched from comedy to high tragedy for another of its functions. This time it was a brunch at Sutton Place, prior to a matinee performance of Giselle. They fared much better here. Gone was the pseudo elegant air of superiority — everyone who was there came because they wished to spend a congenial hour dining with other ballet lovers, not because it was the social thing to do.

There was a great variety of ages and classes present, from tiny children to housewives to monied matrons, all moving together in a friendly, homogeneous mixture. The food and service were excellent (there is something slightly decadent about drinking champagne that early in the day), which only shows that you should leave restaurant services to them as knows what to do. A good time was had by all.

This good time continued at the performance, with Miss Tennant as the female lead dancing opposite Serge Stephanski. Probably ballet's greatest work, Giselle runs the gamut of love, betrayal and death. It also features some of the best acting and dancing opportunities of any role and is thus a favorite of ballerinas everywhere.

Miss Tennant's work in both these areas was faultless. Her portrayal was innocent in first love, heartbreaking in betrayal and ensuing madness, pitiful as a tragic spirit.

Moral of the whole story: Ballet as a social plaything of the upper classes may work in the European spectrum but has really nothing to do with the North American condition and should be dropped.

Ballet as a form of entertainment rises above such petty meanness.

Amarcord
Capitol Fine Art
Yonge and Eglinton

Amarcord ("I remember") patiently and carefully weaves a bittersweet reality of faded shades, muted sounds, and long forgotten visions. Fellini's film is an effort to recover a past, a past of melancholic memories, repressed childhood longings, fears, and literally all manner of sexual uncertainties. In the opening moments of the film we are told that "the origins of this town are lost in the mists of time. And it is into these mists of a time past that Fellini draws us as he gently invites us to learn to feel, see, and breathe his reality which in Amarcord becomes a skillfully and beautifully constructed universe with its own pace and rationality.

The material of Amarcord is the life experience of the common people of a small town in Northern Italy in the period of Fascism.

Emerging from the wealth and richness of detail is a remarkable reflection of the life of that time and place, a life filled with humour, tenderness, and at times even unthinking cruelty.

It is a time and place where the silent appearance of "air-puffs" announce to the children and to the old men that the arrival of spring is at hand. It is a time and place where the playing of the "socialist Hymn" from the church tower sends the town's gruesome, sadistic Fascists into fits of rage. But, above all, it is the dazzling individuality, the exuberance and the expansive spirit of the people which shines forth from the portrait which Fellini presents.

The bourgeois critics of Amarcord claim to see in it Fellini's rather narcissistic preoccupation with his own psyche.

But if it were simply this, Amarcord would hardly stand above those sickening, maudlin movies where the aging, now reflective male herd thinks back on his vivid but courageous youth and life.

Amarcord is a thing apart from those movies of idle, self satisfied reminiscing in which the "arty" crowd likes to wash its neurosis. Amarcord transcends the trite custom of the great personality "bearing his soul".

Fellini, far from indulging in cheap, highly individualized reminiscence, conducts a quiet search for the origins of a common experience of a whole people living in a severely class divided and sexually repressive society.

Fellini guides us through the dense reality of small town Italy; the Italy of an idiotic Fascist dictator whose appearance in Fellini's town is shrouded in a dark, foul dust storm; the Italy of insensate, ashen teachers who teach Hegel, religion, and fascism to sexually awakening and maliciously precocious adolescents; the Italy of an old man lost and terrorized in an overwhelming bluish fog who becomes convinced he has died only to discover, after all, that he is standing in front of his own home; the Italy of an utterly ritualized prince who orders the town's most beautiful woman for his private enjoyment.

Fellini's Italy, the universal Italy, this is the true subject of Amarcord. Although Fellini recalls the casual brutality and the sexual dehumanization with a bit too much mellowness, the pain and outrage are there along with the gentle humour and calm maturity. And it is the complete success of this complex and beautiful mixture which makes Amarcord a truly brilliant and important film.

Steppenwolf
The Towne
Yonge and Bloor

Steppenwolf: heavy metal thunder this isn't. The people who found Hesse's book weighty material may be disappointed by this Classics Illustrated version. The movie is faithful to the plot but condensed and generalized for screen. Some of the visual effects remind one of vintage Looney Tunes. Parts of the cartoon sequence are amusing, but they seem inconsistent with the traditionally cerebral appeal of Hesse's work.

Bergmann regular Max von Sydow plays Harry Haller, the isolated, somewhat confused protagonist. Harry, a middle-aged intellectual with identity crisis, liberally laced with suicidal despair, decides the ultimate control of his life is to fix the date of death. The problem is not uncommon for the Hesse hero and Harry's decision is adequately developed. Unfortunately, von Sydow appears too healthy for the role; his only problem is an intense frontal headache, relieved by raising his glasses and rubbing his forehead, every few hundred feet of film.

Before Harry has a chance to kill himself, the siren Hermonie penetrates his cloud of isolation. Dominique Sanda coolly presents Hermonie as a mirror for many facets of Harry's life. She is an androgynous face from the past; she is his guide for the present. Harry is only too willing to relinquish the direction of his existence and psychic exploration to Hermonie and her coterie of hedonistic comrades. They lead him to drugs, brief gaiety and freedom from his life crises.

Harry is released from his personal suicide pact, born of his need to have tangible control over existence in a world he finds incongruous. By taking mescaline with Hermonie and Pablo, he becomes himself.

And he apparently does understand what happens to him. His one great drug experience opens the metaphysical doors and instead of "seeing God", he sees his god — himself. All the prisms of his personality are experienced and accepted in the parameters of his life. His need for self justification is resolved in this experience.

The Oscar for most eclectic casting is a sure win. Sanda's extraordinary accent creates some unintentionally hilarious lines: "Don't be so cokeure." she admonishes Harry. "I'll see you at the bowl." (as in masquerade bowl). Pablo, the singing saxophonist is played by Pierre Clementi, all dolled-up for the occasion with kohl-darkened eyelids and five o'clock shadow — someone's idea of an erotic Latin male.

cinema viewpoint

In some ways The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz has done more harm than good for film in English-Canada. The film seduced us into complacency by creating an illusion that Canadian cinema has finally scrambled up on its feet.

Unfortunately there is little in Duddy Kravitz for Canadians to be proud about. Its director, Ted Kotcheff, although a Canadian, has been mostly working in England. Five of the principal roles are played by Americans; the cinematographer and composer are English. If Duddy Kravitz reflects Canada, then it's only in its eagerness to sell-out.

Canadian cinema is not only in a depressed state, but it's actually getting worse. In the year of Duddy Kravitz, less English-track feature films were made than in the year before.

The problem with Canadian film is not artistic but commercial.

I spoke with Don McEachern, a filmmaker on the executive of the Council of Canadian Filmmakers (CCFM). The 7,000-member CCFM has been pressuring the government and its agencies such as the NFB, Canadian Film Development Corp. and CBC to adopt policies that would be beneficial to Canadian filmmakers.

McEachern complained that "film is one of the few industries in Canada that is offered no protection.

Almost every other country has some regulation over foreign films, yet Canada does nothing to protect her cinema."

The CCFM has been urging the government to adopt a quota system where theatres would be required to show Canadian films for a specified number of weeks a year.

Many reject this suggestion because they feel a quota system would have nothing to contribute to the quality of Canadian film. But they base their rejection on a misconception that a film that's good and has the public responding to it, will be shown regardless of whether or not it's Canadian.

Why Rock the Boat? is an excellent example of what can happen to a Canadian film because it's not protected.

The film opened very quietly last October, played for a few weeks and then melted away. Nearly all the critics acclaimed this film. Some said that it was superior to Duddy Kravitz and some even went as far as to say it was the best English-track film made in Canada. I was curious to find out why a film that was so highly rated would for so short a time.

Joel Samuels of the NFB, which produced Why Rock the Boat?, told me that once the film was completed it was no longer in the hands of the NFB. The fate of the film rested with Columbia Pictures. Columbia is a foreign-owned distributor which the NFB seems to prefer above Canadian distributors.

Jeremy Katz, who books films from Columbia and other distributors for Famous Players theatres, said that the film was withdrawn because it didn't make money. He thought the film was very good but the public simply wasn't coming out to see it. With such a poor response from the public, the film had to be taken out for "mercenary" reasons, he said.

The story would make sense until I would ask why the public wasn't coming out to the film. Samuels, Katz and somebody at Columbia, all to whom I posed the question, couldn't answer.

It was the assistant manager of another theatre where Why Rock the Boat? played, who shed some light on the situation.

He also said that the attendance for the film was good. During the week the theatre would be from a half to a third full. "This may not sound so great," he said, "but in fact that's quite good."

If the film was doing good, why was it withdrawn?

"The decision was not made by the theatre management but by the head office of Famous Players. There were other films that had to be shown for financial reasons."

The decision had been made regardless of whether Why Rock the Boat? was doing well or not. There were films with a higher "priority" that forced Why Rock the Boat? out; films to which financial commitments had been made.

It's much too often that commercial consideration is given by foreign owned companies to foreign-owned film at the expense of Canadian cinema.

Articles about Canadian cinema are destined to be gloomy. If Canadian film, however, is not going to be offered protection like other industries in this country, there just might not be a cinema left to write dismal articles about.

respect, if not fame

After missing a fall engagement at Convocation Hall, two generations of the Brubecks, finally made it to Toronto. And it was well worth the wait. Encouraged by a large, responsive audience, Dave Brubeck and family and friends played a glowing set as well as two exciting encores.

The evening opened with Dave Brubeck on piano and sons Darius, Chris and Danny on keys, bass and drums respectively. The music seemed intimate, as if it were a family get together and the audience was really incidental. Indeed when Brubeck stood for applause, he had to prod Darius, who shyly rose to accept the praise.

When guest star Gerry Mulligan arrived, it seemed as if time were rolling back. The mostly white shirt and tie audience remembered when Brubeck and Mulligan were the hottest thing at Newport, and "Take Five" was sweeping the country. After a short solo which assured everyone he had lost none of the talent he was then handed back to the sons.

In order to prove that the younger generation of Brubecks no longer relied (entirely) on their father, the Darius Brubeck ensemble was introduced. Proving they were fine musicians in their own right, the boys, joined by Mad Cat (harmonica, flute, jews harp), Perry Robinson (clarinet), Gerry Burgonzi (sax) and Rick Gilbert (bass) explored their versatile talents in the jazz and blues medium. Darius' key work was predominately electronic organ and synthesizer, experimenting in the modern rock influence yet not leaving the style of the older generation completely behind.

Yet Dave Brubeck was not static either. As the two final numbers in the set proved, Take 5 and "Blue Turk a la Rondo" can change a lot. Utilizing the members of the Ensemble as well as David, the group explored every facet of jazz today with these two numbers, shaping the music to fit blues (especially with fine harmonica work), Dixieland, Big Band and even the sound from the original recordings.

Although jazz in our generation has taken so many new paths, although it means a lot of different things to a lot of different people, there is still room for Dave Brubeck. He'll never again enjoy the fame he knew in a simpler time, but he'll always have an appreciative audience ready to welcome a respected talent. Toronto proved this to him last week at Seneca College.

The National Ballet is concluding its spring season this weekend. You have one more chance to see Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn's excellent performance in Giselle, on Saturday evening at 8:30. Student rush tickets available.

Tonight, Nadia Potts and Augustyn dance Giselle; Harwood and Norman on Saturday afternoon.

The Anna Wyman Dance Theatre will be dancing at Ryerson on March 6 and 7. Their program includes several works from their repertoire, and two new works choreographed by the company's artistic director, Anna Wyman.

For those interested in dance classes, a new folk dancing group is meeting on Thursday evenings in Gym 70 at the Faculty of Education, corner of Bloor and Spadina.

The core group of 30 will teach international folk dancing to the uninitiated and dance with those who have experience. All welcome. Admission a scant 50c (to cover the cost of janitorial service).

At A Space, Margaret Dragu is conducting Dance Classes for Artists, a special combination of weird, sleazy and glamorous dances, including jazz, tap, burlesque, and dancing with your boots on.

You will be whipped into shape Wednesday and Friday mornings, beginning March 5 at 10 a.m.

Phone 964-3627 for further information.

To give you time to save your pennies, the National Ballet is sponsoring a Fly into Spring Tour of London and Amsterdam, from April 10-13 which corresponds with the National's European tour.

And the price for eight days of florid European spring? A mere $695.

film

Unlikely as it seems 3030 Bloor St. W. (near Royal York subway station) is the site of a movie house that may prove of interest to university students.

Located there is the Kingsway Theatre which has followed the Roxy down the 99 cent route.

For that price you can surely expect to find some good film in their moveable feast of classics, old reruns, interesting failures, uninteresting failures, cult favorites, and whatever else pops up in their repertoire.

Beginning tomorrow and playing through next Saturday is Ladies and Gentlemen: The Rolling Stones.

The film had a short run at Cinecity and then died, probably because it lacked the violence that even now allows the earlier Stones' film, Gimme Shelter, to do a thriving midnight trade at selected theatres.

The Kingsway people are also attempting to rent a special sound system to properly showcase Jagger's tortured vocal chords.

"We're investing some money in this sound system," said Tom Litvinskis. "We don't know how much yet — estimates range from $80 to $2,000."

Asked whether the Kingsway was in competition with the Roxy, Litvinskis replied, "No, they're 15 miles away, and this is a city of two million. There's enough to go around."

"We're young and having a lot of laughs with this theatre. We don't expect to make a lot of money out of it."

At the Roxy Monday is John Boorman's Zardoz, a futuristic fantasy set in 2293 and completely equipped with pot-bellied Sean Connery.

Next Thursday it's Bunuel's The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, which handles the theme of middle class boredom and self-hatred the same way Joe Frazier works over a sparring partner.

Slim weekend pickings on campus: The UC Film Club isn't scheduling anything and the SMC Film Club's offering, Pulp, is to be avoided at all costs.

It stars (roughly speaking) Michael Caine and Mickey Rooney in an attempted takeoff of the hardboiled detective genre, but in director Mike Hodge's unsure hands, third-rate imitation soon gets the better of parody.

How can anyone have the gall to wish this sort of trash onto university students at a film club? Recommended only for fools or those in love.

At OISE Thursday is Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris. The film allowed New Yorker film critic Pauline Kael to play a one person advertising agency and mount a powerful promotion campaign which almost singlehandedly made the movie the commercial success it was.

Overrated, but still worth seeing. Playing with De Broca's King of Hearts.

In the Art Gallery of Ontario's silent films series, you can see D.W. Griffith's Intolerance (1916). Accompanied by Charles Hoffman's original piano music. Showing 3 pm, March 1, for $2.

At the Ontario College of Art, March 3, 7 pm, are two selections in their continuing German Film series: Carl Jung's Such Is Life (1929) and W. Blasse's People in Germany (1932).

Erindale's French department will be screening the acclaimed Canadian film, Kamouraska, March 5.

Showings are at noon (Room 1104, South Building), 2 pm (Room 239, North Building) and 4 pm (Room 239, North Building).

books

Had a chance Wednesday to look at the special collection of Canadian poetry the Hart House Library Committee is forming. The committee — or rather the sub-committee responsible for the project — has spent $1,000 on books. Bookcases — with doors, with doors that lock — are now being made (to be placed under the portraits of the Masseys, on either side of the fireplace in the second floor library at Hart House). The books, some of them, are being kept in the room of one of the committee's members who lives at Hart House (one can) — and these are the books that I saw. They certainly represent a diversified collection — and a good beginning. (The committee will make substantial additions each year.)

Even just a few moments' cursory examination of the books gives a distinctive impression of the course of Canadian poetry over the past few decades. The collection includes a Fiddlehead Poetry Book, Emu Remembered, published in 1956 by Alfred W. Purdy. Who? There is a copy of Clearing (1973) by Dale Zieroth. George Woodcock is quoted on the back of the book. "Dale Zieroth may well be that genuine recollective poet of the prairies for whom we have been waiting." Who?

There are a number of anthologies including a 1942 Pelican collection compiled by Ralph Gustafson. Canadian poetry exists, he says, in his introduction, but "a Canadian poet can no longer consider that his poem derives importance solely because it is written." The anthology includes William Henry Drummond (remember him? "On wan dark night on Lac St. Pierre De win she blow, blow, blow."), Bliss Carmen ("We took the grasses in our hands, and caught the summer flying low") even John McCrae, and more surprisingly, J. E. H. MacDonald and Joseph Schulz.

A variety of campus productions this week. Closest to home: a TCDS production, Happy as Larry, by Donagh McDonagh, an Irish playwright, at St. Hilda's Cartwright Hall. Opened Wednesday, concludes tomorrow night, 8:30 pm. There is "a collective production after Meyerhold, Brecht and Artaud" at UC Playhouse. It's called A Third of a Show, and it runs March 4, 5 and 6, at 1 pm and March 7 and 8 at 8:30 pm. Free. Balin, by Frederic C. Ford, after the Arthurian legend, and Romance in the Roaring Forties, a farce, are at the aforementioned Cartwright Hall, March 6, 7 and 8 at 8 pm.

Making Stuart Happy appears to be a pretty complicated business. See for yourself at the Ryerson theatre (till March 9, Mondays through Saturday — excluding Wednesdays — and March 6 and 7 when the theatre will be occupied by a dance group.)

Off Toronto campuses, there are several new openings. There have been various chances to brush up your Beckett this year. Now you can add Endgame to the list. It is playing at Central Library Theatre, Tuesdays through Saturdays till March 15. If after that you're still not quite ready to retreat to your particular dustbin, you could try yet another Frankenstein, (Mad Hatter's Theatre, 2637 Yonge, February 28, March 6, 7, 13, 14 at 8:30 and March 1, 8, 15 at 7 and 9:30), or The Captain of Kopenick at TWP, or The Real Inspector Hound and Black Comedy at the Colonnade. (Pretty macabre week looming up, what with one thing and another.) Cosmic Jack will be with us for another ten weeks or so, if he can meanz dimez for Global Village. Passe Muraille is also sprouting alarmingly these days. There's Bahy Blue at Bathurst St. Church, Seed Show The Follies of Conviction at the eastern theatre on Dundas and Sherbourne (Wednesdays through Saturdays at 8:30. Pay-what you can on Sundays at 2:30), and Seed Show Tony's Woman at the Poor Alex. P'tit Bonheur, the French language theatre, has a new show, On Demande un Manage, and at Tarragon there is another French play (translated this time) — Tremblay's loving examination of a somewhat seamy navel, Bonjour la Bonjour. To end with, a new play by Robertson Davies opened at the St. Lawrence this week. It's called Question Time, and it's about as entertaining as the real thing. Oh, and you may have the chance to see the baldest Ulysses yet at the Royal Alex, where they'll be staging Erich Segal's version of the Odyssey ("War means never being able to get back home") with Yul Brynner.

An exhibition of Five Toronto Printmakers opened last weekend in the Print and Drawing Gallery of the AGO.

The prints, by Ed Bartram, Henry Dunsmore, Doreen Foster, Katherine Hunt and Jo Manning, have been exhibited in London and France and are currently being circulated in Canada as well. To complement the GO showing, the Aggregation Gallery will feature earlier work by three of the artists in March: Henry Dunsmore — serigraphs, Katherine Hunt — etchings, Doreen Foster — etchings and watercolours. Also on display will be the original watercolours done by Doreen Foster in 1969 for the book, Nanabozho and His Brother, which are exquisite and far more exciting than the Indian legend that they illustrate.

On campus, the new show at Hart House features the entries and results of their photography competition. At Victoria College great shaggy tapestries by a variety of artists dominate the corridors of the New Academic Building — the effect is incongruous but interesting. More "hangings" at the Merton Gallery by Kai Chan as well as oils and watercolours by Jerry Grey, opening Monday night, until the 15th of March. Paintings by Grant Hollenback at the Gallery O till March 20 and sculpture by Robert Murray at the nearby David Mirvish Gallery. John Greer is at the Isaacs Gallery to March 14 and new paintings and graphics by Charles Pachter are at the Artery, 24 Ryerson Ave. The French Canadian Cultural Centre, 577 Jarvis St., presents recent paintings by Niska at the Chasse-Galerie to March 11.

No more free admission on Tuesdays and Thursdays to the Art Gallery of Ontario but student admission is still only 50c. New policy also says that you can't touch the Henry Moores, except for the roughest bronzes such as "The Warrior" downstairs and the large pieces outdoors. And the Chairs exhibition has encouraged so much participation that people are no longer permitted to touch most of the pieces but if you haven't seen it, catch it this weekend before it closes.

Nor wind nor rain, nor vulgarity, nor kitsch, shall hinder me in my attempt to keep you up-to-date. (This is my credo . . .)

"Can Your Life Become a Work of Art?" That's the title of the F.B. Watts Memorial Lecture to be given by Raymond Moriyoma, no less, at Scarborough College's Meeting Place. Tuesday, 8 pm. Free.

The Toronto music scene over the years has produced a few of its own heroes and even a few legends, like the Kensington Market, Steppenwolf (formerly the Mynah Birds) and an on down the list, to folk artists like Bruce Cockburn, Murray McLachlan, and Neil Young. Not to be left out of such an esteemed group, is Luke Gibson, just out of a secluded semi-retirement in Northern Ontario, and ready as ever to please Canadian audiences. His previous work as a solo folk artist (True North Records, 1971) and as the leading figure in both the Kensington Market and Luke and the Apostles have prepared him well for this new venture, and have done much to bring maturity to his engaging, romantic style. Luke has been at the Riverboat all this week, but Friday night he trips into Beaver's, at Victoria College, and for a meagre dollar, he's got to be the bargain of the weekend.

Disappointing but probably still worth seeing.

That's my verdict on the 53rd annual Hart House Camera Club photographic exhibition, on display until March 2 from 9 to 5 pm every week day.

Over 700 photographs were submitted to this ever-popular campus competition in seven divisions — color transparencies (slides), senior, junior, color print, Milne Trophy, (most entries accepted) Karsh Award (campus life) and pictorial essay.

When visiting a student exhibition, you don't expect to see dazzling professionalism, but rather, originality, boldness, a sense of risk-taking, no matter the success of the final result.

With the exception of the slides division, this was abjectly lacking. No matter how well someone photographs weddings, moonlit seas, children and animals, they have all been done before — and usually a damn sight better by professionals. It's hard to believe youthful minds, supposedly brimming with vision and creativity, could have fossilized so quickly to produce exactly the same photographic triteness and sentimentality as their elders.

Space prohibits an exhaustive documentation of this sad lack of creativity. Go and see for yourself.

Most of the photographs are worthy of some interest, and it's easy enough to set your eyeballs at fs and drop in for a few minutes after visiting the Arbor Room or before going to play squash.

But a few organizational blunders also add to one's disappointment with this exhibition.

With 700 entries, couldn't they have shown us more photos than the few they did? The photos that didn't win or come close were never put on view, but many could have been put somewhere like The Great Hall or perhaps The Debates Room.

It seems especially unfair when many of the entrants are represented more than once — with two candidates getting nine photos each on display. Surely at an amateur student contest this quasi-professionalism could be avoided.

The display is also sloppy, with some photos hung crookedly or with no sense of style. Some boards could certainly have held more photos, if only for balance.

Although a brochure is supplied, it's still difficult to figure out who did what photo. None of the photographs are burdened with either name or title.

Things get even more complicated because some photographs can't even figure out a title and some of their works of art are baldly titled "untitled."

The lighting is too dim to properly display one third of the photos, the slide display and the brochure explaining it move in reverse directions, and the judges (all-verse, by the way) give nary a hint for their, uh, judgements.

And why couldn't the photos have descriptions of how and why the photographs were taken, and what the creator was trying to accomplish?

That would stump many of these photographers anyway, because obviously most tried to just turn out a technically good photo and subject-matter-be-damned.

You won't find any statements about our world: no pictures of pollution, violence, poverty, greed, pain, death, loneliness or hatred.

No street, Bub. Photographers tread only where life is beautiful, cute and in fine focus, and if the rest of us can't see it that way, well, we only have to go to the Hart House camera exhibition, don't we?

Gym Blues place second in OUAA

By JOHN FAIR

The Varsity gymnasts worked their way to a second place finish Feb. 22 in the Ontario Finals held at Ottawa, Sat. 22.

It was a tough meet, and the team was handicapped as it was one man short. Brian Euler, the team captain was unfortunately injured last week and was unable to compete.

Nonetheless, led by Hans Frick, the team surprised people and pulled off second place, beaten only by York University.

Hans Frick, team coach, turned out to be the star of the meet. Attaining a total of 49.3, he left his competition behind and finished in first place all-round, making himself the new Ontario University Individual Champion.

Frick came first in the vault with 9.05, second in the parallels with 8.4, second in the high bar with 8.6, and second in the sidehorse with 8.4. All in all Frick had the amazingly high average of 8.2. He surprised everyone with his 9.05 on the vault as it was one of the highest marks obtained in all of the university competitions this year.

A mark in the nine's is rare because for this high a mark, a routine must be practically flawless.

Frick will now advance to the Canadian Championships which will be held in Manitoba this coming weekend.

Badminton Blues bring Trophy back to Varsity

The Varsity badminton team brought the Jemmett Trophy, emblematic of OUAA badminton supremacy, back to Toronto's trophy case.

The duo of Hinchcliffe and Jim Ooi defeated RMC, Western, and Queen's in the doubles play while Tom Ball and Lane Bishop also won the second doubles match.

Tom Muir and Lane Bishop won their singles matches while Bob Hinchcliffe lost his match to John

Waterloo walks away with OWIAA swim title

By DAVE STUART

The University of Waterloo walked away with the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association (OWIAA) swimming title last weekend in Waterloo by winning 10 of 16 events and setting no less than six new OWIAA records.

Maida Murray was the leading swimmer for Waterloo winning three individual events as well as setting two new records. Murray won the 100 Fly and 200 Fly with record times of 2:21.2 and 1:03.1 as well as the 200 Freestyle.

Elaine Keith set two other Waterloo records with a 9:06.4 in the 800 Freestyle and a 4:22.3 in the 400 Freestyle. Lee Fraser of Waterloo also won the 50 Free with a record time of 26.4 and the 400 Free relay team won with a record time of 3:52.1.

Three other records were also broken. Pat Kitchen of Western set new marks in the 200 Breaststroke (2:39.8) and the 100 breaststroke (1:12.5). Jane Wright of Toronto tied the OWIAA record of 1:04.5 for the 100 backstroke.

Wright, Varsity's leading swimmer, also took firsts in the 200 and 400 IM's.

The top 100 intercollegiate swimmers in Canada now advance to the national championships to be held today at Lakehead University in Thunder Bay.

Getting to the finals has been a problem this year with the strike of airport workers closing down Toronto Airport. The men's swim team, also wanting to travel to Lakehead for the CIAU's this weekend, were thwarted in their attempt to leave Wednesday when the plane crew refused to cross picket lines. The majority of the team left on Thursday with the balance to follow hopefully.

Will the real Helene Smagala stand up ?

Last Wednesday's Varsity carried a picture on page 14 of a woman gymnast who was reported to be Helene Smagala of the Lady Blues.

Well, sports fans, in the excitement of having six whole pages to work with, the sports department erred in identifying the competitor.

In fact, the girl in the picture was Patty Bain from York University. The real Helene Smagala is shown in the accompanying photo. Smagala did win the uneven bars event.

The Varsity apologizes to both women for any embarrassment due to our error.

Intermede Lady Blues become OWIAA champs

By FERN BRAND

Last Friday and Saturday, Toronto hosted the OWIAA Intermediate Basketball finals at the Benson Bldg. with the Lady Blues eventually walking off with the title.

On Friday, the ladies got off to a good start with an early morning win over Ryerson 26-14 and a 51-19 drubbing of Brock later in the afternoon.

Brock played lethargically while the Blues offence was working like clockwork. Donna Walker was the top scorer for the Blues as she kept hitting the hoop for a total of 16 points. Toronto took advantage of the holes in the Brock defence.

On Saturday, the ladies faced Trent and, despite some mechanical difficulties with the clock, came through with a 36-24 win.

With high spirits after the Trent win, the Lady Blues faced Queen's in the final Match for the championship. Varsity took the low scoring contest 17-14.

Both Queen's and Toronto were on the defensive for most of the game as the half time score of 6-4 in Queen's favour indicates. Varsity started the game with a 1-2-2 formation but were not getting the necessary rebounds and later changed to a man-to-man method of coverage. It paid off with a win.

The Lady Blues finally took the championship from Queen's, the usual winner.

Hockey semi finals are tonight

By DAVE STUART

The OUAA semi finals are tonight at Varsity Arena and will feature the Varsity Blues against defending Intercollegiate Champion Waterloo, at 6:30 pm. In the second game at approximately 9:15 pm, the OUAA east division winner, York University, will take on the University of Western Ontario Mustangs.

The Blues are in the happy position of having only one player out of the lineup. Brent Swanick is still sporting a cast to protect the knee injury he received several weeks ago against Cornell. The Waterloo Warriors, on the other hand, have injuries to key personnel. First string goalie Jake Dupuis and high-scoring winger Ron Hawkeshaw will both be out for the remainder of the season with knee injuries.

During the season Waterloo won the only interlocking game these two teams played by narrowly edging the Blues 4-3. However, later in exhibition play, Toronto avenged the loss with a 3-2 squeeze past the Warriors.

Waterloo won the OUAA west division pennant this year with 14 impressive victories losing only to Laurier and Western while the Blues struggled through the regular season losing four games. The last Varsity hockey team to lose that many games in the season was back in 1962. This is also the first year in some time that the Blues have not finished in first place, being displaced from their usual position by the York Yeomen.

Without doubt, the healthy Blues against the Waterloo Warriors will be the most exciting game of the OUAA season this year.

In the second game, the York Yeomen have to be favoured over the Western Mustangs on the strength of their 10-2 romp over the Stangs during the regular season.

On Saturday, the OUAA finals will be staged pitting the two winners from Friday night against each other for the Queen's Cup, emblematic of OUAA hockey supremacy. Game time is 8:00 pm again at Varsity Arena.

Ivan McFarlane is back and was chosen as All-Star along with Warren Anderson.

Wrestling Blues settle for fifth

By EUGENE SHAW-COLYER

Prevented by injuries from gaining a third place as expected, the Varsity matmen achieved a respectable fifth place in the OUAA Wrestling Championships at McMaster, February 14-15.

Veterans Len Gang (109), Roger Vachon (150), and rookie Glenn May (177) gained second place victories while George Multamaki (142) and Chris Preobrazenski (220) managed estimable performances in the face of very formidable competition.

Toronto entered the tournament two wrestlers short of the 12-man team. Former Canadian Junior Champion, Roman Preobrazenski, technician Jack Preobrazenski, captain Wally Cringan, freshman Scott Smith, and Ed Rector were all sidelined with injuries.

The University of Toronto Wrestling Club looks forward to hosting the Ontario Open Junior and Senior Wrestling Championships, Friday and Saturday, March 8-9, in the Benson Building Sports Gym. This tournament will feature competition among the strongest and most skillful wrestlers in the province.

Rob Moore finds the going tough as Varsity took fifth place instead of third as expected.

Interfac hockey into playoffs

By MIKE FRIEND

Interfac hockey playoffs commence Monday March 3 with Vic I squaring off against Grad I.

For those of you who don't know how the playoff system works, here is a brief explanation.

In division I the top three teams make the playoffs as well as two other teams who had the best record in the division. Thus, Vic I (25), Erin (22), SMC A (21), Dent A (20), Scar I (15), and Grad I (17) have all earned post season berths by their standing while PHE (18) and Law I (16) got in by virtue of their records.

The schedule of competitors in the first division looks like this:

- Vic I vs Grad I
- Dent A vs Law I
- Erin vs PHE A
- SMC A vs Scar I

The system in second division is much simpler with the top four teams from each of the A and B sections participating in post season play. The teams include: Jr. Eng, SMC B, For A, PHE B, Pharm, Scar II, UC II, and Music.

First round action will see Jr. Eng against Music, Scar II against PHE B, SMC B against UC II, and For A against Pharm.

Blues regain Ontario title: OUAAs champions

In a heart-stopping OUAAs final Saturday night at Varsity Arena, the Varsity Blues won back the Queen's Cup from a stubborn York University squad, edging the Yeomen 4-3.

For the tenth time in the last 12 years, the Blues have won the Ontario Universities Athletic Association championship. With a convincing 9-3 win over Waterloo Warriors Friday night in semi-final action, the Blues went into Saturday's game with a lot of confidence and emerged victorious.

Two slates vie for SAC presidency

By BOB BETTSON

The only opposition facing the left-liberal slate headed by SAC university commissioner Gord Barnes in the upcoming SAC presidential elections March 12 and 13 will be offered by a joint slate of Young Socialist and Black Students' Union members calling themselves the "Student Militant Caucus."

Barnes is running with former Victoria student council finance commissioner Michelle Harvey, now a first year medical student and 2nd year Etindale commerce and finance student Sa'ad Saidullah, who has been involved in the campaign against quotas on foreign students.

The opposition slate is headed by special student Henry Malta, last year's unsuccessful candidate for SAC president at the University of Alberta.

Malta's vice-presidential running mates are Black Students' Union member and food science student Lynette Batson and Scarborough student Michael Franklin. Franklin and Malta are Young Socialists.

The drama of many previous years was lacking as both slates submitted proper nomination forms by the Friday 5 pm deadline.

The Barnes slate, heavily favored in the race, is the apparent successor to the left-liberal Kanowich slate which was elected last year.

The Student Militant Caucus Slate is the latest in a long line of slates involving the Trotskyist Young Socialists.

The new element is added by the participation of leading members of the Black Student Union in the socialist slate.

This is a clear effort to raise the issue of racism in the university and in government immigration policy, which Malta says will be a major issue in the campaign.

The Militant Caucus slate has an extensive platform, primarily directed towards political issues on campus and off. Malta says the slate is interested in presenting an alternative to the present SAC leadership.

"We should join links with oppressed groups in society such as gays, women, blacks and Indians," said Malta. The slate also opposes the discipline code and calls for SAC to mobilize students to oppose educational cutbacks.

The Barnes slate, on the other hand, offers an integrated program of improved services and political action.

In the area of services Barnes wants to see a non-profit student pub in the campus centre project as well as the maintenance and improvement of present university student services such as the advisory bureau and the housing service.

He also sees the Ontario Federation of Students campaign for improvements in the Ontario Student Awards Plan as a major priority.

Barnes said the present campaigns for parity on the Governing Council and on tenure committees would continue regardless of the outcome of Governing Council votes.

"It is obvious there is strong student support for representation on tenure committees and SAC should continue to raise staffing issues," Barnes said.

Barnes also believes the planned athletic complex should be built and students should pay a $10 levy on the operating costs if they attend classes on the St. George campus.

These are the two questions students are being asked in a referendum on the same ballot.

The Militant slate, however, places much greater emphasis on off-campus issues such as its platform planks in support of abortion on demand, an end to Canadian imperialism abroad, and an end to racism in Canada's immigration policy.

For the Barnes slate it still will be a difficult election.

work hard," said Barnes.

The Young Socialists are also optimistic. "We feel this is the first time a militant alternative has been presented to students," said Malta, maintained. "The constitution can't bind the chairman; he's bound by his appointment by the university."

Clark's term as chairman

Veteran SAC hack and presidential would-be Gord Barnes.

Sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin, who supported abolishing the assembly's legislative functions, declined to comment on the meeting or his views on representation in the department.

However, Zeitlin told a Sociology Students' Union meeting Feb. 14, he had no commitment to parity representation, and saw no philosophical or intellectual justification for it.

Former sociology chairman S. D. Clark, who voted for abolition, said the chairman has the power to change department structure without approval of the present legislative assembly — which has equal student faculty representation.

"The constitution exists at the pleasure of the chairman," Clark

"The fact that we are the favorites won't influence our campaign. We need a strong endorsement to carry out our program. We will have to instituted in 1969 when parity was following a major conflict between students and faculty members.

Sociology professor Austin Turk, another pro-abolition voter, declined to comment on the vote but did acknowledge "of course it's related to the parity issue."

The committee of faculty members reviewing department structure was set up after regular faculty meetings failed to efficiently discuss members' concerns.

Sociology students set up a parallel committee last month to review the department structure, and Zeitlin has reportedly recognized the need to meet with the students when their committee's work is completed.

However, the six sociology faculty members who voted to retain the present department structure fear decisions will be made this summer when most students are off campus and can't make their objections known.

Soc profs consider end to parity

By MARINA STRAUSS

The outcome of a meeting of sociology faculty members Saturday morning could be the abolishment of student-faculty parity representation in the department.

About 30 of the department's 55 faculty members voted overwhelmingly — but only in a straw vote — that sociology's assembly as a legislative body be done away, according to a sociology professor present.

The assembly would become a forum for discussion of department matters which anyone could attend but without a vote — leaving all power in the chairman's hands. Elected committees would advise the chairman.

Sociology is the only department in the Faculty of Arts and Science with student-faculty parity representation on all governing bodies.

The U of T Act specifies all departmental structures are, in theory, merely advisory to the chairman. However, it has been accepted that when a committee spends time and energy on a matter, good reasons are needed for its recommendation to be rejected.

The sociology professor, who prefers to have his name withheld, said the spirit of the Saturday meeting was that "power has to be returned to the faculty."

Discussion at the meeting implied students should be involved in forum talks, but not decision-making, the professor said.

The straw vote — which was about 4-1 for abolishing the assembly's legislative functions — came in response to an interim report drawn up by a committee of sociology faculty members.

The committee, set up in January to review current department structures and programs, presented a majority report generally supporting the status quo parity structures and a minority report recommending a new forum structure which the chairman met twice a year but which had no vote.

The minority report also recommended committees be elected to deal with internal governance.

The faculty members' vote supporting the minority report was taken as guidance for the committee in future deliberations.

It was generally understood at the meeting that it was unlikely students would want to sit on the assembly if it were merely a forum of discussion without any voting powers.

A page three story in last Friday's Varsity on the SAC FM committee bore an inaccurate headline saying 'SAC gives Radio Varg FM approval.'

Actually, SAC did no such thing.

The committee only released a report approving in principle a campus FM station, but SAC has not yet discussed the report, let alone approved it.

Referendum wording criticized

Legendary consumer rights advocate Ralph Nader wings his way into town tomorrow for an 8 pm lecture at Convocation Hall, and to coincide with his visit a day-long consumer and environmental rights fair is being organized.

Held at the International Student Centre, the fair will begin at 11 am with two seminars, one on environmental impact assessment, with representatives from the Canadian Environmental Law Association, and another on recycling, with members of the Garbage Coalition.

At 1 pm, there will be a seminar on food additives, followed by another on worker and public safety, focusing on such issues as lead and mercury poisoning.

The fair will conclude with a 4 pm panel discussion at Simcoe Hall on "ways of effecting change," according to fair organizer John Bee.

Bee said the Nader visit will be used to organize a Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) — of which Nader is the founder. PIRG is a student-funded and student-run group which does research on consumer and environmental issues.

Bee hopes the Nader visit will spark sufficient interest for PIRG organizers to convince SAC to hold a referendum before the end of the term on setting up a PIRG.

In other universities — in Ontario, at McMaster and Waterloo — PIRGs are funded by a voluntary $3 annual student levy.

United Farm Workers (UFW) supporters will confront recruiters from Dominion stores at the U of T Placement Centre tomorrow morning at 10 am when they try and sign up graduating students.

The supporters of the California grapes and lettuce boycott will argue with Dominion representatives over the store's refusal to remove non-UFW grapes and lettuce from their shelves.

Dominion is the target of UFW activity because it has the largest chain of grocery stores. Steinberg's recently bowed to pressure and removed the grapes from sale which are picked by Teamsters in California.

This is the first attack on a corporation recruiting at U of T since Dow Chemical recruiters were faced with a sit-in when they attempted to come on campus in 1968.

Protesters argued Dow was manufacturing napalm for use on civilians in Vietnam and should not be allowed on campus.

New Democratic Party parliamentary leader Ed Broadbent and Ontario leader Stephen Lewis will speak to a keynote session on the NDP in Canada on Thursday afternoon at the Medical Sciences building.

The session is part of a week-long symposium offered by the U of T NDP club on Building a Humane Environment.

Sessions today include one on Women in Politics at 10:30 am with former Toronto Board of Education chairperson Fiona Nelson and women's activist Kay MacPherson.

The afternoon session at 2 pm on Regional Economic Disparities will feature Indian MP Wally Firth and George Samis, recently elected Ontario MPP from Stormont.

The Tuesday sessions include one on unions in the afternoon with Lynn Williams from the United Steelworkers and Dennis McDermott of the United Auto Workers.

The morning session on health features Ontario NDP health critic Jan Duxszta and Toronto Board of Health chairperson and alderperson Anne Johnston.

A meeting called by Library Workers CUPE local 1230 for tomorrow to consider holding university-wide study sessions on budget cutbacks has taken on greater urgency with the announced salary increases for both academic and non-academic staff which fall short of the inflationary rate.

Already underpaid campus workers are being asked to accept 8 percent plus a $500 bonus.

Library workers' president Judy Darcy says a forum would be extremely useful to try and work out strategies for opposing cutbacks.

Darcy says already the U of T Faculty Association and the U of T Staff Association as well as the Graduate Assistants' Association and the Students' Administrative Council have agreed to send representatives to the meeting.

The union wants to try and unite campus interest groups such as faculty, students, support staff and graduate assistants who are now offering competing demands.

The meeting will be held at 5:15 pm Tuesday in the library science auditorium.

Will budding Gordon Sinclairs rush to the Radio Varg mikes?

Reaction cool to Radio Varg FM licence study

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Despite what is recognized as an impressive report, the findings of the Radio Varsity FM committee have received a rather lukewarm reception among the powers that be.

Commissioned by SAC to investigate the feasibility of Radio Varsity applying for an FM broadcasting licence, the committee released its report last week.

The committee recommends the setting up of an interim operation at Radio Varsity, with the intention of applying for an FM licence within two years.

Most reservations about the committee's findings are concerned with the projected financing.

The report calls for an initial capital expenditure of $58,000, providing for the purchase and installation of tower, transmitter and antenna, station equipment and required FM facilities.

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia said "I don't think we could accept a $98,000 pull on our budget every year."

"I think we are all pretty impressed with the report," Sabia said, but added he thought the proposals were ambitious.

Sabia said he would be reluctant to recommend expenditure of the amount of money outlined in the report without a student referendum.

He also said he did not favor the idea of a student levy for funds, one possibility raised in the report, while students are encountering current financial hardship.

There is also a concern on the part of some people that student funds would be used to set up a professional radio station, Sabia said.

In the final analysis, Sabia said, "we're dealing with a really uncertain situation. We're sort of between the devil and the deep blue sea."

SAC's communication commission meets tonight to discuss the report, and will make recommendations to SAC Thursday night when a decision on the future of Radio Varsity will be made.

Radio Varsity's board of directors also meets today to discuss the report, and according to board member Craig Barnard will be "making some points" to SAC regarding the report as well.

"I tend to think the big question for SAC is the operating cost," Barnard said.

Barnard felt the committee's estimate was conservative, saying "once you get beyond the salaries, it's essentially the same budget as the current Radio Varsity... and it's low."

There was also a concern by Barnard about the lack of commitment from the university. He said there was no support indicated in terms of either money or space.

Station manager Brad Reed agreed that "one thing this report didn't bring out is the lack of space."

But Reed, one of the committee members who prepared the report, felt SAC "should support the station simply because of its responsibility."

Reed said although the station would need considerable financial support from SAC initially, the amount of money SAC would be asked for would decrease annually.

As the station got off the ground and gained status, Reed said, advertisers would see it as a "viable medium to put money into."

According to Reed, SAC will certainly need convincing before any approval of the FM proposal. Referring to those in opposition to the recommendation, he said, "it's like Woman's Bakery, you just have to pick a number."

OSAP conference meets this week

ST. CATHARINES (CUP) — An Ontario students' action conference is being held March 7 through 9 at Brock University to discuss and plan a province-wide strategy towards post-secondary educational cutbacks.

Students, faculty, support staff, community members and anyone interested in post-secondary education have been invited by the organizers to the open conference.

Both the Brock Senate and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) have supported the conference as part of a province-wide movement to oppose the Ontario government's cutbacks in university and student financing.

An emergency Feb. 8 meeting of OFS in Toronto passed a resolution supporting the conference and pledging to "communicate the same to students on individual campuses."

The organizational work for the conference has already begun. At a meeting of the steering committee held Feb. 14, about a dozen sub-committees were established to organize the conference.

Some of the more important ones are finance, billeting, publicity and agenda.

Chairpeople for each committee were also selected at that meeting and the frame of reference for each group was established.

A tentative agenda adopted at the meeting includes workshops and general plenary sessions, with discussions of particular interest to individual institutions and general provincial problems such as student loans and university financing.

All delegates were invited to submit informational position papers or proposals for action. The steering committee urged they should be submitted by mail as soon as possible.

Organizers predict about 500 delegates will attend from across the province. Publicity for the conference is already underway at many colleges and universities across Ontario.

For further information, contact Brock's student newspaper, the Press, at 416-684-1775.

Healthy hints for normal people

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The wording of the athletic referendum to decide the fate of the proposed new athletic complex has been criticized by the president of the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association.

"It's practically a rigged ballot," charged Alan McAllister.

"The ballot allows students to only vote for or against the complex, making no provision for those who support the new athletic facilities, but not the way it's currently designed," he said.

Over 24,000 U of T undergraduate students are eligible to vote in the athletic referendum March 12 and 13 which is being held in conjunction with the SAC presidential elections.

They will be voting on two questions: "Do you support the construction of the new athletics complex?" and if so, are students prepared to pay a $10, $20 or no increase in athletics fees to help defray operating costs of the new building.

The first question on the referendum, which may decide whether the complex gets built or not, particularly annoys McAllister.

"Anybody can support the construction of new athletic facilities—even the residents aren't necessarily opposed to this," he said. "What the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association is opposed to is the design, and in particular, the scale of the new athletic facilities. If the university changed these, then we probably wouldn't be against them."

"We would hope students would not support the new athletic complex as it's currently designed when they vote," said McAllister.

SAC president Seymour Kanowich explained the referendum's wording, saying that if students voted against the complex as it was designed, it would mean "no building."

Kanowich said the building had to be built almost immediately or it wouldn't be built because of rising costs and other problems.

At its Feb. 12 meeting, SAC voted 22-3 to support the present structure of the athletic complex, feeling that if the university were forced to redesign the building now, it would use this as an excuse to back out of the complex's construction.

McAllister disagreed with this reasoning, saying it "was a rather childish ploy on the part of the administration to force through something which should be reassessed."

For the athletic referendum's results to be binding, 25 percent of the eligible 24,000 voters must cast ballots.

On the first question at least 51 percent of the voters must vote for the complex, said SAC vice-president Tim Buckley, or it "would be unlikely the administration would build the complex at this time."

On the second question of $10, $20 or no increase, Buckley said whichever motion got the most votes would be considered to have won.

An increase is necessary to offset the raise in operating costs, he said, which would rise from $125,000 this year to $200,000 when the complex is open with its new program.

The referendum only concerns yearly operating costs and has nothing to do with the capital (building) costs.

Buckley welcomed the referendum, saying if students approved it, "then it would be up to the administration to put its money where its mouth is."

Jack Dimond, special assistant to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, said the referendum's first question was "quite clear" but said the second question was "rather hypothetical."

Business affairs kills proxy task force report

Ignoring the advice of its own task force, Governing Council's business affairs committee last week recommended there be no change in the university's investment policy.

The Task Force on Voting of Proxies was set up last summer after political economy professor Cranford Pratt urged the university, to cast dissenting votes with the Exxon corporation shares it holds at the annual shareholders' meeting.

The university's present policy is not to vote any of the shares it holds. But the final report of the task force urges "that a representative committee reporting to the business affairs committee be established to receive and consider complaints from the university community regarding practices and policies having questionable social and moral implications, which are being followed by corporations in which the university holds shares."

Task force chairman Gus Abols said the purview of the committee should extend solely to the "moral and ethical behavior of corporations."

Task force member John Tory (who sits on the boards of 15 corporations), submitted a minority report, saying the university as a public institution should not take sides on such issues.

Instead of dealing with the recommendation of the task force, the committee instead accepted and approved a motion by Tory to leave the university's present policy unchanged. Normally, the recommendations of reports are brought forward as motions.

"We did go to slides; in fact, we even had music... it moved me to tears."

the plight of the university to the people.

Overturn the SDS sentence

Convicted by U of T's archaic Caput last summer for their part in the notorious Banfield affair, SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas appeal their sentences before the executive committee of the Governing Council today.

Unable to appeal the verdict, they are arguing for a reduction of their sentences on the grounds of the illegitimacy of the Caput itself, and the motive by which their action was undertaken; namely, the prevention of racism.

Their appeal deserves the widest support.

Caput is entirely unrepresentative, and acts only at the behest of the administration. A fair trial was prevented from the beginning. In addition, the arbitrary rulings of Caput chairman Albert Abel made a mockery of the entire proceedings.

Leah and Schabas were never allowed to explain why they felt compelled to act. They were consistently prevented from raising the issue of racism, as Abel persisted in telling them it was irrelevant.

Moreover, the university administration seems to have delighted in sparing no expense to hound Leah and Schabas, while steadfastly refusing to consider and investigate the issue of racism. It is a sad comment on the administration's unwillingness to take any initiative that certain people feel compelled to take matters in their own hands and conduct an inquiry themselves, to determine whether there are grounds for a full inquiry into racism.

The university has a lot of territory to cover before it can be said to have acted satisfactorily on the issue of racism. It can start by allowing Leah and Schabas to explain their motives, and overturning their extraordinarily harsh sentences.

SAC tabloid was afraid to be fair

SAC's office came out with "What are they afraid of," and I think I know the answer. The students involved are afraid of fairness. Last year's evaluations were printed and widely distributed in the fall of 1974. This whole community read them, I feel, and the point was perhaps made. The recent rehabbing, which intended to single out a few individuals certainly destroyed whatever good might have come out of the original attempt. By now it looks like cruelty.

It is inconclusive to zero in on a Medievalist because he was given a First Year phonetics' hour and performed below par in the eyes of those who say "pou" instead of "peu". He will know too late that "pou" and a smile might have worked better. No one knows for sure how he'll fare in a first year language course.

Some students are vexed when you correct them; they are also vexed when you don't. This year's victims may well become next year's heroes... unless undue propaganda systematically undermines their chances to benefit from the original evaluations.

Students are not always the best of judges. While their cooperation is needed for the university to maintain its excellence, surely they need not elect or appoint a few representatives bent on destruction as a gratuitous contribution. On the contrary, students as a whole should read these proclamations and speak up when they prove abusive or wrong.

They should act because they are involved in these writings done on their behalf. They should help right the wrong, help improve the quality of teaching without permitting a circus atmosphere to develop just as we, the faculty, help improve their ability to learn without letting our impulses take over.

In the end, we "are all afraid of" something. This is not worthy of print. This is not a professor's exclusive hang up. To cast fear towards one group is already fear enough of the self. Therefore, besides being unfair and cruel, SAC's latest effort is interestingly a double-edged plague.

I think it may be attributed to the unusually mild winter or to the lack of a fashionable event about which to work up loud protests. Aren't there any video reruns of some inhumanity to animals?

Law women urge abortion petition

The Department of Justice is keeping a count of all letters received on the question of abortion. Petitions and form letters are not given the weight of individual letters and most of the letters received oppose giving women the right to choose. The Women's Caucus at the Faculty of Law, University of Toronto, would like all people who support the right of all women to have an abortion, to send letters to:

Otto Lang, Minister of Justice, The Department of Justice, House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario.

We suggest that any or preferably all of the following statements could be used in letters:

I urge that the Federal Government remove criminal sanctions against medically-supervised abortions.

I support the right of all women to have a free abortion on demand.

I urge that the Federal Government do everything possible within its jurisdiction to ensure that every woman who so chooses, is able to have an abortion.

I object to Otto Lang using his position as a platform for expounding his personal views on abortion.

Admin afraid of racism inquiry

During the trial of Tony Leah and Bill Schabas last summer, the Caput ruled that racism was irrelevant insofar as the trial was concerned.

Developments since last September, however, have proven how wrong the Caput was! They also justified the actions of the SDS members who were suspended by Caput following their participation in the 'Banfield incident'.

First, there was the blatant attack on the Chinese students by Bette Stephenson — president of the Canadian Medical Association and a part-time lecturer of the U of T Medical School — regarding the Meds school admission. Stephenson's racist remarks were echoed by her counterpart in the Ontario Medical Association — Manning Mador, Ontario Health Minister Frank Miller and some newspapers, notably the Medical Post.

Second, the academic affairs committee has recently approved a motion put forward by the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering to change the quota on foreign students from 10 percent to 5 percent — a measure aimed obviously at the Chinese students from Hong Kong because out of the total 6 percent first year engineering students who are classified as 'foreign students', 5 percent are students of Chinese origin who come mainly from Hong Kong.

Recently, seven faculty members appealed to president John Evans and his 'special advisor on human rights' to set up a presidential commission to investigate racism in the university. This appeal was met with the type of bureaucratic shuffling well-known to us all! Despite the obvious escalation of racism on campus, university 'authorities' remain unusually reticent about racism and the discrimination against immigrant students, as manifested in their silence in the above-mentioned events.

Neither SAC nor the faculty nor the university administration have shown they are determined to expose the extent to which racism has developed in this university. Meanwhile our 'champions' for 'academic freedom' have not spoken a word notwithstanding the open attacks on the 'academic freedom' of some students.

To quote a frequently-asked question on campus these days: what are they afraid of?

Lee Wai-kwok,
UCH

Canada as racist as United States

I would like to state my support for the setting up of a commission to look into charges of racial discrimination on campus.

White students and faculty at U of T seem shocked and astonished when confronted with charges of racism, as if racism is something confined to the United States of America. But daily, conscious Canadians are realizing that Canada, like her neighbor to the south, is just as racist.

Even the Canadian Prime Minister in a speech in Quebec three weeks ago recognized the need to fight racism in Canada. Witness the government green paper on immigration, which has been under tremendous debate because of its racist content. The continual deportation of 1,500 Haitians from Quebec, maybe to their death, despite nationwide protest, and the prevalence of groups such as the Western Guard in Canada, should be a warning to conscious people to look at the evils of racism.

Closer to home, we see charges of racism brought against the Innis College administration and the transitional year program last summer by the Black Community when they refused to hire two qualified blacks as instructors in the program, a program in which most of the students are black or from the third world.

The university had relations with the Chilean government which is one of the most, if not the most, repressive military junta in South America.

In East Africa U of T professors are instrumental in helping to get Canadian capital into the East African economy, which helps in the process of underdevelopment.

The cultural arm of imperialism — CUSO, whose headquarters are located on the U of T campus — is used to reinforce ideas of white supremacy in the Caribbean.

I hope the committee will address itself not only to specific charges of racism on campus but to the general question of racism in Canadian society.

C.A. Campbell,

SDS trial was not fair

Last summer I attended several sessions of the Caput trial of Bill Schabas and Tony Leah. The comments that follow are an attempt to outline some aspects of their trial that I consider to be unfair and unjust. I hope that students will begin to consider the legitimacy of this body and the whole arbitrary process by which students are disciplined at U of T. These issues are still relevant because the discipline code has not been totally enacted.

It has always been a basic feature of our legal system that a person must know what he has been charged with in order to fully prepare his defense to the accusations made against him. Schabas and Leah were charged with seven or eight counts each of "conduct prejudicial to the best interests of the university." Each charge contained this phrase and then described the specific acts that they had committed such as taking over a microphone, etc.

The defense were quite puzzled as to the definition of the phrase "conduct prejudicial to the best interests of the university." The non-academic discipline code had not been enacted and the U of T Act only repeated the phrase but did not elaborate upon it.

Therefore there was no statutory guideline to prohibit or define their behaviour. They asked the Caput for some clarification and were told to look to precedent. Any precedents that could be found in English or Canadian cases only related to academic offenses. Schabas and Leah asked for access to Caput files in order to try to derive a historical definition of the phrase. This request was denied although they were later given an inadequate and sketchy summary of some of Caput's previous decisions.

Finally the defense decided that the phrase must be meant to raise the issue of racism. They had stopped Edward Banfield from speaking because they believed that the university should not assist a person that they considered to be a notorious racist from promulgating his views on the campus. In other words they had to show that their actions were justified because (1) Banfield was a racist (2) that it was in the best interests of the university community to prevent the spread of racism at every opportunity.

As the hearing progressed it became obvious that Caput was not interested in the issue of racism and blocked any attempts to raise it. Their method of doing this was to consistently interrupt the accused during their cross examination of the prosecution's witnesses. By doing this I feel that they effectively denied Schabas and Leah an opportunity to present their case.

One other ruling of the Caput that particularly disturbed me was when they changed the wording of the charges half way through the course of the trial. The Caput was becoming exasperated by the defendants' continuous attempts to raise the crux of their defense, i.e., racism, so they ruled the phrase "conduct prejudicial to the best interests of the university" was to be struck out of all the charges.

In sum the process used to try these students was very arbitrary and unfair. If the Caput is meant to be a viable alternative to prosecution in the Courts I would ask what advantages students gain by going to this forum? Certainly if the treatment of Bill Schabas and Tony Leah is any indication of how Caput behaves it should be abolished.

As a faculty member sympathetic towards the SAC position that students should have some voice in tenure decisions, I can only regret the inclusion in the SAC tenure tabloid of the article on p. 7, entitled: These might not have (received tenure). Though the author claims in his preamble that it is not his intention "to single out particular individuals", he proceeds immediately to list four professors by name, and to quote from their recent course evaluations.

Thus, the author implicitly sits in public judgment of the tenured status of these professors and pronounces his verdict on the basis of at most two course evaluations per teacher. This procedure I find regrettable because it offends my sense of justice in two ways.

First, it is unjust to the professors mentioned. It is a matter of record that the two evaluations printed for one of these teachers were based on 50 percent returns, in fact on 7 out of 14 students in each class. Several students have subsequently protested in letters to me and in the student press at the inaccuracy of his evaluations.

Is it rash, therefore, to base even tentative conclusions on such obviously inadequate and publicly contested evidence? For this same teacher, the evaluations of some seven courses, mainly favourable, were available to the SAC which produced them. Is it not reasonable to expect the whole record to be taken into account before the public branding of an individual?

This professor has given sterling service to his students over a period of about forty years. Is it logical to challenge, on the basis of two recent evaluations, a tenure decision made before most of today's students were born?

One can only conclude that the author is willing to be cruelly unfair to a professor in the interests of his cause. The end justifies the means, and who cares what individual suffering is caused in the process?

Secondly, this article gives an unfair impression of the students' approach to this question. With few other exceptions, the SAC tabloid presented its case with remarkable fairness and cogency. Moreover, students with whom I have worked on university committees have generally been balanced, logical, and just. It would, therefore, be a pity if the erroneous conclusion were drawn that students, if admitted to tenure committees, would behave with the rashness, insensitivity, and inhumanity observable in this article, which does a disservice to the cause it purports to support and to the interests of all who work for greater staff-student cooperation.

If only to correct the false impression left by this unfortunate article, I should be grateful if you would print the following evaluations of the two relevant professors in my department. They, too, form part of the official record:

Professor A: FRE 371 (19 respondents out of 21). Thirteen respondents were "very satisfied" with this course, and six were "quite satisfied". The calendar description was accurate. Best things about the course included the opportunity for discussion, the relaxed atmosphere of the class and the instructor. Most found lectures either "stimulating and thought provoking" or "interesting and informative." Tutorials were not offered. The instructor was considered definitely responsive to student interests. The workload was considered bearable.

Professor B: FRE 316 (19 respondents out of 28). Eleven students were "very satisfied" with this course, and eight were "quite satisfied." The calendar description was accurate. The best thing about the course was the instructor. Worst things mentioned were the course content and the slow pace. Most students found the lectures "interesting and informative." Tutorials were not offered nor wanted. The instructor was considered definitely responsive to student interests. The workload was considered bearable.

Councillor questions U of T hiring policy

The following is the partial text of an address made by administrative staff representative Gwen Russell to the Governing Council Thursday. Russell expresses the staff's concern over university hiring and firing policies, prompted by recent dismissals and appointments at the university news bureau.

I have been asked to bring to the attention of members of council a copy of a letter addressed to the president from the University of Toronto Staff Association (UTSA), which I understand has been distributed to all members of council.

The letter refers directly to item six in the External Affairs Committee report regarding reorganization of the News Bureau. I don't intend to reiterate the contents of the letter. It is detailed and explicit. Nor will I make any reference to the personalities or individuals involved. I am concerned only with the principles and the apparent violations of university policy and practice as I understand them.

I cannot recall any incident that has caused such a deterioration of morale or stimulated such adverse reaction among the non-academic staff, and I would like to convey to members of council my concern, and the expressed concern of many of my colleagues on the repercussive effects. What process is laid down for dismissal, particularly dismissal of senior staff? What guarantees are there for a fair hearing?

What control is there over the stated grievances procedure? What positive definition is there of internal promotion? What control is there over the promotional program? Is this university genuinely promoting a positive career development program, as it claims? There are many other questions which come to mind, but these make the point and need some answers.

I submit that the Personnel Policies Manual which is not distributed to all members of staff, has become a meaningless, useless document if it can be so readily misinterpreted, or if in practice it can be so readily misunderstood, misapplied, and totally disregarded.

As a member of the academic affairs committee, I am cognizant of the many months spent in discussion and debate on the formulation and approval of faculty appointments, promotions and tenure documents. While I recognize that the non-academic contribution to the university is a service function, I cannot and will not accept the premise that it is a subordinate function. It is an attendant function that goes hand-in-hand with teaching and learning.

Many of us are as dedicated to our careers and as interested in the preservation of quality in this institution as our academic colleagues. Most of us feel that if this university hopes to maintain well qualified, highly motivated, personnel; if it wishes to provide incentive, to encourage quality, productivity, and efficiency; if, as we have heard repeatedly over the last few months, in this period of economic instability and financial stringency it requires loyalty, unity and economy; if it hopes to retain any credibility as an employer, then it must give equal consideration to the appointments, promotions and career development policy of its non-academic staff.

SAC approves ballot for athletic complex referendum

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
SAC approved the proposed ballot for the forthcoming referendum sounding out student support for the new athletics complex at Wednesday evening's general council meeting.

The question will be voted March 12 and 13 with the SAC presidential elections.

The ballot will contain two questions, the first asking: "Do you support the construction of the new athletics complex?"

The Learning Machine

It's election time at U of T and the Learning Machine would like to print the results of elections and announcements of candidates for college council, course union and other student posts.

This applies to all but the presidential races which should be covered with news articles and interviews.

If you have election announcements, either results or candidates, call Bob Bettson at The Varsity, 91 St. George St., 923-8741 or drop in. We're on the second floor.

The SAC elections and Governing Council elections will each be featured in news coverage in The Varsity, but attempts are being made as well to have all-candidates forums.

If any college or faculty would like to hold a forum it can call SAC. The Varsity will publish a special election issue next Monday for the March 12 and 13 SAC elections with coverage of the two slates and a feature on what SAC does as an organization.

We hope this will enable students to familiarize themselves with the issues in order to vote.

Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis will be making his first of two appearances on campus this year when he speaks to the Commerce Students Association Tuesday.

The meeting will be held at noon in room 2108, Sidney Smith Hall. Anyone is welcome to attend.

A team from Trinity College with Gordon Davies and Peter Rekal won the Warden McCulley trophy for inter-faculty debating competition Friday.

The Trinity debaters won as the opposition on the topic: "Resolved: Nothing is too high a price to pay for The Varsity."

The tournament featured 12 teams from across campus facing each other for three rounds of competition before the final between one of the Trinity teams and a team from Victoria College.

St. Michael's College student Chris Dirscoll won the best speaker award. Earlier this month he won the runner-up best speaker award at the McGill debating tournament out of 106 debaters from 30 universities from across North America.

Two of the three U of T teams finished in the top 10. The U of T debating union concluded a successful year of activity at the tournament Friday.

Debaters from U of T won top placings at a number of tournaments this year including Princeton, Villanova, Royal Military College and Columbia.

The debating union executive next year will be headed by Trinity students Oscar Mullerbeck as president and Alan Stewart as vice-president.

The second will inquire whether the voter is prepared to pay a $10 increase, a $20 increase or no increase in athletics fees to help defray the operating cost of the new building.

SAC also passed a motion granting $100 to the University of Toronto Athletics Association to publicize a pro-complex campaign, with the provision the same amount be made available to any campus group wishing to oppose the building's construction.

SAC executive assistant Chris Almutt told the meeting there are now 3,900 names on the U of T Committee on Student Aid petition to Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld calling for reforms in the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP).

Almutt said he soon expects to have 5,000 signatures on the petition.

The meeting agreed to provide funds to send up to 22 people to the March 7, 8 and 9 Brock Conference which is to discuss cutbacks in post-secondary education and plan province-wide strategy.

Some concern was raised that counter-productive policies to the campaign against cutbacks might be formulated at the conference, namely a call for free tuition, a living stipend for students and the proposal of a mass rally at Queen's Park.

After some disagreement over whether SAC should send representatives to the open conference to actively represent their views, it was decided that first preference to those wishing to attend be given to SAC executive members.

Council deferred discussion on the future of Radio Varsity after receiving the feasibility report of the SAC FM committee released Monday.

The committee was formed to investigate the possibility of Radio Varsity applying for an FM broadcasting licence.

Communications commissioner Michael Sabia praised the commission for the report, terming it "essentially a blueprint for a station that will equally serve the campus and the community." Sabia called the recommendations "ambitious."

Council defeated a motion by Univesity-College representative Howie Stein calling for a SAC resolution urging the sentences of SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas be overturned at their appeal hearing March 4.

Leah and Schabas were convicted by the Caput last summer for preventing controversial urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking here last spring.

Council members noted they had previously passed a resolution condemning Caput's verdict. They also defeated a request by Stein to provide Leah and Schabas with $200 for legal expenses.

Stein was successful in an appeal for funding for the Ad Hoc Committee Against Racism, awarding $350 of the $500 request. In other fund allocations, SAC approved an $1,800 grant to finance a free spring concert at Erindale College and awarded $50 to the Toronto Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression.

Supported by Toike Oike editor and SAC engineering representative Richard Pearse, the $50 award was made to help fund tonight's public meeting at the Mediat Sciences Auditorium featuring Black leaders Rosie Douglas and MacWarren.

Engineer Skolnik seeks G. C. seat

By BOB COLLIER

Robert Skolnik is an engineer, an engineer's engineer. He even likes the Robert's library, ("It's pretty fine looking"), doesn't agree with "the political groups on campus" and maintains he is "not subversive."

Skolnik notes, nevertheless, he's "disgusted with Toike Oike."

One of two fringe runners, he will be competing against SAC vice-president Tim Buckley, left-wing radical Howard Levitt and medman John Floras for one of the two professional faculty seats on Governing Council next year.

Skolnik is running because his ideas "haven't been aired on campus" and he wants to get in there where the "issues are being decided."

Educational needs would be his primary concern on Governing Council.

"Students are concerned with examinations, course content, teaching standards and food services not the issues that SAC and The Varsity blow up for a month or two," he says.

He does want representation on those committees "that the student has an active interest in" but opposes parity representation on tenure committees.

"What right do students have to judge a professor's future?" Skolnik asks.

He adds that "students are not responsible enough to sit on many committees" because they "only want to pass the course."

Skolnik's solution to government cutbacks is for "the university to make money for itself."

"There are a heck of a lot of ways to make money," he points out.

First, the university could change to a three semester system "with qualifications" to make full use of the facilities throughout the year.

"Any unused equipment could be rented out to industry" to raise funds for teaching.

He is strongly in favor of the new athletic complex, but is not so favorable to local residents' demands that the building be architecturally satisfying.

Skolnik, with characteristic directness, pointed out that "the ratepayers can go to hell."

Things are looking up for SAC president Seymour Kanowitch who was acclaimed to a Governing Council grad seat.

Professional seats three way-fight

The contest for the two professional faculty seats on Governing Council is quickly narrowing into a three-way fight between engineer Tim Buckley, law student Howard Levitt and political newcomer John Floras.

The other contenders for the seat are engineers Robert Skolnik & Doug Gerhardt.

A second year medical student, Floras has never run for a political office, but as Peter Jarrett, Governing Council student incumbent, says: "I've never seen anyone get involved in so many activities as Floras and do such an excellent job on all of them."

His activities on campus have included work on two student publications, the Trinity Review and the Salterae, and a seat on the Hart House Literary Committee on which he is helping with the International Poetry Festival.

Floras is running because he feared a "vacuum was developing" among the competitors for the student seats on Governing Council. He felt that his "reputation for diligence" and familiarity with the issues would negate his political naivety.

Floras' political stance is a middle path on most issues.

He is very concerned that teaching standards be maintained on campus in spite of government cutbacks. "Teaching is paramount," he stressed.

Even though Floras holds little hope for parity on Governing Council he considers equal faculty-student representation is "essential" on those committees which involve teaching matters.

He recognizes the difficulty in obtaining "mature, responsible students" who can tell the difference between entertainment and teaching," for tenure committees. He has not been favorably impressed with course evaluations in the past and would prefer that conscientious faculty and students audit lectures for a week or two rather than to perform mass student evaluations.

Double jeopardy by civil and university trial is very unfair, Floras says, but he has no real solution to the problem. Perhaps "50-50 faculty-student juries on university hearings" would be suitable, he feels.

Floras notes that the athletic complex is needed and that it should be harmonized with the surroundings as much as possible but maintains the university is "a cancer" which has to expand.

A free tuition and stipend, as advocated by the Ontario Federation of Students, is "hopelessly impractical," but Floras would push for "higher OSAP loan ceilings and removal of parental obligations" to support students.

He is very critical of the conservative government's "detrimental and impractical budgetary restrictions." Enlarging class sizes and introduction of electronic teaching devices are "unfortunately sterile" and "only turn students off."

All professional students may vote for any professional seat nominee, but the two winners cannot be from the same faculty.

We will present interviews of three more contenders for these seats on Wednesday. So hang onto your Varsity.

John Floras contends Gov. Council professional student seat (57).

A SENSE OF

By LORNE MACDONALD

Asked why he was seeking to arouse the whole of Europe over the judicial torture of one man, Voltaire answered, in March 1762, "c'est que je suis homme." By that token, he would, today, be in constant and vain cry . . . The wide-scale reversion to torture and mass-murder, the ubiquitousness of hunger and imprisonment as political means, mark not only a crisis of culture, but, quite conceivably, an abandonment of the rational order of man . . . We must keep vital in ourselves a sense of scandal so overwhelming that it effects every aspect of our position in history and in society.

— George Steiner

For some 160 years after the time of Voltaire, official torture in the Western World was relatively rare, but in this century, and especially since the Second World War, it has made a hideous and astonishing reappearance.

In 1974, Amnesty International undertook an investigation of practices in 140 nations. They received complaints of systematic, institutional torture practised by 69 governments; these have so far been confirmed in over 30 cases.

The list is worth reading; it contains a few surprises: Argentina, Bahrain, Belgium (NATO), Bolivia, Brazil, Burundi, Cameroon, Chile, Columbia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Korea, Malawi, Mexico, Morocco, Namibia, Nicaragua, Oman, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, the Philippines, Rhodesia, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Syria, Tanzania, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, the United Kingdom, Uruguay, the U.S.S.R., Venezuela, Vietnam, Yemen, Zambia.

Almost all of these nations are members of the United Nations, and signatories of its Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The third and fourth articles of this document ensure (so to speak) freedom of opinion and religion, and the fifth reads: "No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment."

The Ideology of Terror

Prisoners are usually tortured before they are brought to trial, or even officially charged.

In Brazil, political offenders are arrested on Friday evenings and handed over to the civil police on Monday, if they are still alive. Somehow, the thought of torture before trial is particularly upsetting to a western liberal sensibility, but it is logical enough: one needs a confession, true or false, to be sure of a conviction, or of what charges to lay. (These comments are relevant to those countries which retain the forms of civil justice.)

Torture is also used to force dissidents to recant, or to punish them, or just for fun. Erich Fromm says: "Sadism is the passion for gaining ultimate control over another being."

I suppose the most notorious example of institutional torture in European history is the Inquisition.

Their use of torture was connected, however superficially, with a belief in the purifying effect of suffering: these were people who believed in purgatory. The torturers of today do not.

If you prefer, for oppression veiled by religious illusions, they have substituted naked, shameless, direct, brutal oppression. (I say this not in defense of the Inquisition, but to emphasize that we live in an exceptional age. The evidence indicates, by the way, that the traditional Christian belief in the purifying effect of suffering is generally false.)

The difference illuminates the basic political purpose of modern torture.

In the days of the Inquisition, the penitent who had confessed and recanted was received back into the bosom of the church. Today the goal is to brand the dissident as an enemy, to exclude him permanently from society and even from humanity.

Sartre tells us: "The purpose of torture is not only the extortions of betrayal: the victim must disgrace himself, by his screams and his submission, like a human animal. In the eyes of everybody and in his own eyes. He who yields under torture is not only to be made to talk, but is also to be marked as sub-human."

It seems that most human beings, unless of really exotic tastes, cannot make a career of inflicting pain on others, unless they can already consider them sub-humans, by virtue of membership of some recognisably sub-human group.

Talking of the field tortures he saw in Vietnam, an American veteran described it this way: "It wasn't like they were humans. We were conditioned to believe this was for the good of the nation, the good of our country, and anything we did was okay. And when you shot someone you didn't think you were shooting a human. They were a Gook or a Commie and it was okay."

The sub-human group need not be defined racially: it can be the Communists, or the reactionaries, or the terrorists, or the Catholics, and so on.

And the victim's degradation confirms the torturer's suspicion that he is really just an animal.

Governments that practise torture usually deny it officially, but make sure the people know what is going on, as a deterrent to dissent.

Fear is a kind of mental pain: it is not too farfetched to say that in these societies torture is a way of life: those in power dehumanize their subjects to the extent necessary to protect that power.

A great variety of methods of torture are in use today. Each country has its own favourites, and technological advances have by no means rendered simpler but still effective means obsolete.

Simple beating, on various parts of the body, is widely popular. In Turkey they use the falanga, severe and prolonged beating on the soles of the feet, which is both excruciating and crippling.

The same treatment is known as the bastinado in Latin countries. Starvation, mutilation, castration, and the insertion of a heated poker into the rectum have been reported in Haiti.

Most people have heard of the "tiger cages" in Con Son, South Vietnam: prisoners are crammed naked into these and left there for months. This is also crippling. These cages are manufactured by American companies.

But torture is now a science, with highly trained personnel. There is a famous torture school in Brazil, where students attend lectures illustrated with colour slides and live demonstrations.

It is continually alleged, and continually denied, that NATO troops are given secret courses in torture. Experts travel from one country to another to exchange techniques.

Modern technology has provided more than the electric grill, the "toasting tables" of Iran.

In Buenos Aires, victims are strapped to couches in the "reverberation chamber" where they hear tape-recordings of screams they made in physical sessions. In Brazil, they are made to watch video-tapes of their own families, intercut with shots of trains approaching at high speed.

During the period of the Stalinist purges and show-trials in the USSR, it was desirable to break the victim without leaving any physical marks, so that he could be produced in court.

This is not always necessary — victims can disappear without trace — but coincidentally, the most effective modern techniques of torture, used carefully, leave no trace. These are torture by electric shock, drugs, or sensory deprivation.

Paulo Schilling describes torture by electric shock in his pamphlet on Theory and Practice of Torture in Brazil: "The torturer's abundant imagination determines where the shocks will be administered to the victim's body. The simplest way is to turn the contacts between the fingers or toes and then turn the crank. The electrical discharge causes a sensation which it is difficult to describe: a physical and psychological commotion filled with electric sparks which, together with convulsive shaking and loss of muscular control, gives the victim a sense of loss, of unavoidable attraction for the turbulent electric trituration.

"The shock causes . . . disorderly, uncontrollable movements similar to epileptic convulsions.

"The tortured victim shouts with all his might, grasping for a footing, somewhere to stand in the midst of that chaos of convulsions, shaking and sparks. He cannot loose himself or turn his attention away from that desparate sensation. For him in that moment any other form of combined torture — paddling, for example — would be a relief, for it would allow him to divert attention, touch ground and his own body, which feels like it is escaping his grasp."

"Pain saves him, beating comes to his rescue. He tries to cause himself pain by beating his head on the ground. But generally he is tied, hanging on the 'parrot's perch', and not even that resource is available to him." (The reader may not be familiar with the 'parrot's perch': the subject is stripped; the wrists and ankles are tied together, and the body is suspended upside-down from a bar slid under the knees.)

Here is part of the story of a young Turkish woman who was arrested in 1972:

"After a while, they disconnected the wire from my finger and connected it to my ear. They immediately gave a high dose of electricity. My body and head shook in a terrible way. My front teeth started breaking. At the same time the torturers would hold a mirror to my face and say, 'Look what is happening to your lovely green eyes. Soon you will not be able to see

"His beauty fang'd, h

As if a pack of wolv

F SCANDAL

his body torn asunder, res had savag'd him."

at all. You will lose your mind. You see, you have already started bleeding in your mouth."

"When they finished with electric shocks, they lifted me up to my feet and several started beating me with truncheons. After a while I felt dizzy and could not see very well. Then I fainted. When I came to myself I found out I was lying half-naked in a pool of dirty water . . ."

"As I struggled to stand he kept on saying, 'You whore! See what else we will do to you. First tell us how many people did you go to bed with? You won't be able to do it any more. We shall next destroy your womanhood.'

"They next made me lie on my back and tied my arms and legs to pegs. They attached an electric wire to the small toe of my right foot and another to the end of a truncheon. They tried to penetrate my feminine organ with the truncheon. As I resisted they hit my body and legs with a large axe-handle. They soon succeeded in penetrating my sexual organ with the truncheon with the electric wire on, and passed current. I fainted . . ."

The electric shock must be used with care, then, if it is not to leave marks.

Pharmacological torture is reliably markless, and can be very effective. There is no such thing as a truth serum, but many people do not know this, and the power of suggestion can work wonders.

Placeboes have other uses: dissidents in the USSR are given drugs which, they are told, will destroy their intellectual and creative powers.

Again, there is no drug that can do this — or not directly. (It can be part of the permanent psychic effect of any kind of prolonged torture. The fear of living the rest of one's life with a crippled mind — or body, of course — is another weapon for the torturer.)

Not all pharmacological tortures are imaginary: Vladimir Gershuni, arrested largely because in 1969 he signed an appeal to the United Nations by the Action Group for the Defense of Human Rights, and who is still being detained in a special mental hospital, can describe one that is not:

"I couldn't sleep at all, yet the same dose was administered to me for twelve days in a row, until they became convinced that I was still not sleeping, and that the injections had not made me give up my hunger strike . . ."

"This medicine makes me feel more awful than anything I have experienced before; you no sooner lie down than you want to get up, you no sooner take a step than you're longing to sit down; and if you sit down, then you want to walk again — and there's nowhere to walk . . ."

The very latest thing in torture techniques in sensory deprivation.

It is infallible: there are people who can withstand physical pain indefinitely, or long enough to die anyway, but SD, as it is affectionately called, can break anyone in a few days at most.

And apparently those who worry a little about such things can persuade themselves that it is humane: nobody lays a finger on the victim; his own nervous system tortures itself.

In 1971 the British Army used this technique on prisoners suspected of belonging to the IRA. Those responsible were later reprimanded.

The internees were dressed in "boiler suits" and thick black bags were placed over their heads. They were made to stand in a firing position for a long time, while being subjected to a painfully loud, high-pitched hiss known as "white noise".

One victim reported: "I heard strange noises, screams, and my only desire was to end all this pain and confusion by killing myself. This I tried to do in my thoughts by striking my head on a pipe but without success." That's humanity for you.

There are grounds for national pride here: one of the world's foremost authorities on SD is Professor John Zubek of the University of Manitoba, who has edited a book called Sensory Deprivation: Fifteen Years of Research, with chapters by experts from all over the world, two by Zubek himself.

He says: "I suppose the book is available in most countries in the world. But as a scientist I have no control over what findings of mine are used or misused."

At the meeting of the World Psychiatric Association in Mexico City in 1971, a motion was submitted condemning the Soviet practice of treating ideological error as a kind of schizophrenia, and confining dissidents in mental hospitals, usually in the same wards as other patients considered a danger to society, such as homicidal maniacs.

Thanks to the bureaucracy of the W.P.A. and the reluctance of many of its members to take a stand on a social issue, the motion never even came to open debate.

"In other words," writes Jean-Pierre Clavel, "in what amounts to the most clear-cut and well-documented instance of contemporary torture science, the world psychiatric community has yet to raise a unified cry of outrage." And the other implicated professions are not far ahead.

It seems to me that opposing violence with violence is not the answer. For one thing, it plays into the hands of the torturers.

A French General in Algiers could tell visiting officials, "Gentlemen, we have in our hands a man who has planted a bomb somewhere out in that city. It will go off within four hours. Would you not use every means to save the lives of innocent people?"

This argument is invalid and despicable, but it is not implausible. To overthrow a torture state by violence is to save a corner of the world at the cost of confirming the evil everywhere else.

For another thing, too many of these governments were themselves put into power by popular revolutions for one to feel quite comfortable about them. Some of us also dislike violence for its own sake.

Most of these considerations are more or less irrelevant to you and me. Too often we hope for a coup really in order to quiet our own consciences; too many of us celebrated Portugal by allowing ourselves to forget for three weeks that there was oppression or injustice or terror anywhere else.

We're a long way away, but they have their hooks into us too, you know. Every time we close our ears against the scream of one of their victims we stifle a piece of our humanity. The process of dehumanization extends this far. I'm serious.

Amnesty International

I want to end this article with a description of one of the ways an ordinary individual can fight this global nightmare.

Amnesty International was founded in 1961 by an English lawyer. It is a world-wide human rights movement, which is careful to remain independent of government, political faction or religious creed.

It acts on behalf of men and women who have been imprisoned for their political or religious beliefs, race or nationality, provided they have neither used nor advocated violence. It is essential for such an organization to have an impeccable reputation — and there are quite enough non-violent prisoners to keep it busy.

Most of Amnesty's members belong to one of the 1,200 adoption groups throughout the world. Each of these groups works for the release of three prisoners — one from the East, one from the West, and one from a neutral country.

When news of an arrest reaches Amnesty's Research Department the cases are investigated and if the prisoners satisfy the conditions for adoption they and their families are taken up by one of Amnesty's working groups. The relevant governments are then faced with an insistent, continuous and informed appeal urging a reconsideration of the case and the release of the prisoner.

"Of all the prisoners of conscience adopted since the founding of Amnesty, over 5,000 have been released. Even in those many cases in which the organization fails in its efforts to persuade a government to release an adopted prisoner, the work on his behalf reminds the prisoner that he is not alone and adds to the growing international pressure for the respect of basic human rights."

Jean-Pierre Debris, who was released from prison in Saigon in 1972, adds, "We could always tell when international protests were taking place. The food rations increased and the beatings inside the prisons got less . . . letters from abroad were translated and passed around from cell to cell . . . but when the letters stopped, the dirty food and the repression started again."

"As well as the long-term adoption of prisoners, three critical cases are selected each month for a special letter campaign in which 20,000 people participate."

"Since the beginning of this campaign in 1965, massive appeals have been launched on behalf of more than 250 prisoners. Of these, at least 115 prisoners in 40 different countries have been released or had their sentences reduced." There is also a similar monthly Campaign Against Torture.

"After the rest of the article this sounds a little, well, pathetic." — I agree with you. To speak generally, evil seems to have more potential for glamour, than good. Right now it also seems to have more power.

Parti Quebecois doesn't represent workers, charges Bergeron Leandre Bergeron wants a real workers' party in Quebec because Parti Quebecois isn't.

By ROB PRITCHARD

The Parti Quebecois, which advocates Quebec independence, "doesn't support workers at all" in that province, Quebec labor supporter and author Leandre Bergeron said at a Hart House meeting Friday evening.

Bergeron, who wrote among other books The History of Quebec: A Patriot's Handbook, told a meeting organized by the Canadian Liberation Movement (CLM) the Parti Quebecois is nothing more than "a petite bourgeoisie."

"There's a need for a working class party in Quebec," Bergeron said, referring to the largely middle class and intellectuals' support of the Parti Quebecois, "one that's formed by workers, not by a few intellectuals in a tavern over a draft beer."

Bergeron and CLM representative Ralph Ellis expressed their discontent over American domination of Canadian unions.

"We must identify the enemy," Bergeron told the audience of 60, "which is American imperialism."

Bergeron made particular reference to the prohibition of the use of French in strike negotiations.

Ellis, chairman of the Hamilton Committee for Canadian Unions, stressed the need for Canadian workers to be "masters in their own house."

"After all expenses had been paid by workers last year," Ellis said, "American unions wound up with $26 million from Canadian workers. Is it logical for Canadian unions to argue that we need them?"

MARCH 20th MAY BE YOUR LAST CHANCE TO AFFECT THE QUALITY OF TEACHING AT THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

On March 20 the Governing Council will be deciding on whether students will be allowed to sit on tenure committees. What they will have before them is a recommendation which excludes students as voting members of tenure committees, i.e., a continuation of the status quo.

In the past, decisions on whether to grant a faculty member tenure have been primarily based on:

1. The number of publications the faculty member has produced.
2. The research projects he/she has undertaken.
3. The way he or she gets along with senior departmental officials.*

This situation will continue as long as students are excluded from being voting members of the tenure committee. For only students have overwhelmingly committed themselves to the principle that teaching ability must be considered to be of equal prominence with all other factors in tenure decisions.

Allison returns to classes

SACKVILLE (CUP) — Students at Mount Allison University have returned to classes after a three-day boycott of classes and demonstrations in support of a popular educational professor, Carey Grobe, who was denied tenure.

More than 200 students demonstrated in front of the main administration building Feb. 5 and set up picket lines at various buildings to support the boycott.

While the tenure committee met to decide whether to reconsider the Grobe case, chanting students circled the building chanting "We want a voice" and "Tenure for Grobe."

More than 500 students of Mount Allison's enrolment of 2,000 jammed into a meeting the night before to hear education students outline the background in the Grobe case. The meeting concluded with an overwhelming vote in support of the boycott and demonstration. The Mount Allison Faculty Association has demanded Grobe be granted tenure because of the widespread support for the professor in the university and the failure of the tenure committee to give any reasons for its decision.

The association called Mount Allison's tenure procedures "woefully inadequate" without sufficient departmental representation or the opportunity for the candidate to defend himself.

Present tenure procedures at Mount Allison have not yet been formalized. Students do not have any voice in tenure decisions.

MPP charges gov't imports immigrants to break strike

An Ontario NDP MPP has charged the provincial and federal governments with collusion in loosening immigration laws to bring in strike breakers from England to work at the strikebound Source Data Control Ltd., Toronto plant.

Dr. Jan Duzsza, who represents the Parkdale riding, charged in an open letter to Immigration Minister Robert Andras the government was negligent in allowing workers in to act as strike breakers in the dispute between Source Data, a business forms firm, and Graphic Arts International Local 12-L.

The incident happened in December when several workers came to Canada, supposedly to work at another Source Data plant. But Duzsza said they were brought in to free other workers to strikebreak.

Immigration to Canada for the British workers was contingent upon filling jobs where there was no skilled Canadian manpower, not replacing workers on strike.

Andras has now conceded by preventing further immigration. But Duzsza feels there has been collusion between Andras' department and the Ontario department of industry, trades and commerce headed by Claude Bennett.

Duzsza says the government knew about the situation in December and the decision on not allowing further immigration of strike breakers was not made until February thus giving the impression the government was condoning the action of the company in importing the workers.

Duzsza charges the whole situation is damaging not only to the workers who are used as pawns of the companies but the Canadian workers whom they are illegally replacing.

Investments cause exodus at SCM

The manager and half the staff of the SCM Bookroom in the Rochdale College building resigned Friday over a dispute with the Student Christian Movement's national office.

Robert Miller, the book steward, resigned because of what he called "interference" in the investments from the sale of a York University book store formerly operated by the Bloor Street West bookroom.

National office general secretary Alan Rimmer criticized the bookroom for investing $25,000 proceeds in high yield investments instead of "socially useful" low yield investments, such as a nursery or rehabilitation home.

Miller, a former United Church minister who started the bookstore in the early 1950s, also cited the national office's support of the appeal of a fired worker as another reason for his resignation.

He said he would only return if the bookroom was run as an "independent and autonomous" operation. Nine staff members resigned in support of Miller.

The SCM bookroom will continue to operate regardless. There are still 10 employees on staff.

Students are some of the store's most frequent customers because of the discounts and wide selection of volumes on politics, history, English, theology and contemporary social issues.

SCM also offers to order any book available in print and in this way it has built up a high reputation among Toronto book buyers.

The basic issue of interference appears to be a conflict between the social conscience of the national movement in conflict with what it sees is the questionable activities of a local operation.

Miller defends his resignation as a necessary measure to maintain independence from outside pressure. He cites his long hours of work training and helping staff as evidence of his dedication.

Rimmer said the national office can hardly criticize big corporations like Alcan for its operations in South America and Angola if one of its own agencies invests in big corporations.

Will students still support SCM, despite investment policy?

Migrant laborers need organizing, panel says

By PETER GRAVES

The only way immigrant workers can improve their lot is through collective action, a three-member panel decided last Wednesday afternoon at Hart House.

The panel, sponsored by the Student Christian Movement, was discussing the plight of European migrant workers and the implications for North Americans.

Panel members were radical French priest Placide Bazoche, grape boycott worker John Godfrey and freelance writer Bob Ward. Brian Ruttan served as moderator.

"The massive agribusiness interests in California control extensive tracts of land and reap huge profits from exploitation of a defenceless migrant worker supply," Godfrey charged.

He explained that a large pool of surplus immigrant labor allowed California farmers — 7 percent of whom control 92 percent of all arable California land — to pay extremely poor wages.

"Immigrants are allowed to enter and work," Godfrey said, "but they have no legal rights at all.

"There has been a history of workers' organizations among the migrant workers, but several were smashed in the 1930s.

"A common tactic of agribusiness has been to import further vast members of surplus labor from south of the border and to simply send away the organizing workers, usually violently," Godfrey said.

Bazoche related the California situation to that in the European industrial nations.

"There are some 14 million migrant workers from the underdeveloped countries in the Mediterranean region and in North Africa," Bazoche noted.

France, Germany, Switzerland and the other industrial nations call these areas their "mining areas" where they dig for the profitable labor source, Bazoche said.

"A migrant worker is imported to France at an age when he is most productive and the costs of his education and upbringing have already been borne by the "mining country," he said.

The migrant worker is not allowed to bring his family along and must return home after a few years, Bazoche charged.

"This makes for a high rate of turnover and workers are not around long enough to establish connections with trade unions," he said.

"The work is dangerous and unhealthy," Bazoche maintained, "and is usually in the mining and construction areas — jobs shunned by indigenous workers."

The living conditions are extremely poor and overcrowded, with improper sanitation, he said.

"Thus the migrant worker is usually in poor health but is criticized for attempting to use hospital facilities."

Relating the European situation to California's, Bazoche explained that in Europe there is also no legal protection for workers. The would-be organizer who wishes to improve wages or living standards conditions is simply fired, he said.

Ward recently appeared on the CBC's Man Alive series in two documentaries about Ontario's migrant workers.

Ninth CIAU title for Blues

Swim Blues are National Champions

By PAUL CARSON

The swimming Blues parlayed some outstanding individual efforts plus excellent team spirit into yet another CIAU championship at the annual national collegiate meet that concluded Saturday at Lakehead University pool in Thunder Bay.

Blues finished with an unofficial total of 382 points for a comfortable lead over Alberta's 290; Waterloo Warriors, who placed second to Varsity in the OUAA finals, slipped a notch this time and finished third as the OUAA again retained the somewhat meaningless conference title.

The result confirms Varsity's supremacy in college swimming over the past decade as Blues have now won nine team championships, losing only to McGill in 1972.

Coach Robin Campbell decided to pack the three relays and the swimmers responded with three gold medals worth 96 valuable points.

Blues made a joke out of the 400-yard medley relay as a phenomenal 1:00.2 breaststroke time by Juri Daniel sparked the team to a new CIAU record. George Gross, Greg Vanular and Dave Wilkin completed the rout.

Wilkin and Gross also formed half of the victorious Varsity entry in the 400 free relay but the race was actually decided thanks to excellent times by Lance Peto and Mike Hibberd.

Hibberd contributed a solid 49.7 seconds effort but the talented sophomore saved his best performance for the 800 free relay on Friday night as he outswam Alberta's best in a thrilling anchor leg that made Blues triple win possible.

Shawn Laari contributed a good time earlier in the race while Gross and Wilkin completed the entry as both swimmers were part of all three winning relays.

Gross added a fourth gold medal by winning the 100 back but Wilkin was unable to maintain Blues' hold on the 50 free as he placed third to McGill's Bob Kasting and McMaster's George Steplock.

Daniel recorded Blues' other victory with a record-setting 1:01.0 in the 100 breast and placed a strong third in the 200 breast despite suffering from a high fever.

Varsity's triumph was earned by a solid team effort as Blues consistently piled up points for second and third place finishes while the big names from other universities were winning their specialties.

As one example of how Blues responded to the pressure of national competition, Hibberd placed third in the 500 free with a personal best time of 4:42; five weeks ago his best time in the event was 5:30, over half a minute slower.

Diver Fin Temple shook off the pain from his injured ankle to place fourth in the 1-metre event and then almost upset Western's dual winner Doug Darling off the 3-metre board.

Laari grabbed silver medals in both the 1650 and 500 free while Vanular put on a great effort for second place in the 100 back.

Breaststrokers Lance Aho, Nick Rottman and John Watt provided many valuable points while Lance Pete fell victim to two controversial judges' decisions in the 50 and 100 free.

Bill Chisholm produced his personal best in the 1650 free with a clocking of 17:48 and veteran Russ Farquhar completed his final year of intercollegiate eligibility by contributing needed points in several events.

Other meet highlights included Kasting's three victories in the 50 and 100 free plus the 100 fly, two records from Alberta's Ross Nelson, and two victories from the Swimmer of the Meet, UBC's Paul Hughes.

The CIAU swim coaches recognized the administrative genius of Western's Bob Eynon by awarding him Coach of the Year honours.

U of T's women's contingent didn't fare as well, since most of the Varsity entries were up against seasoned veterans from Alberta and Lakehead.

Alberta eventually won the women's title as Jane Wright's breaststroke efforts were the top Varsity performances.

Complete results of both the men's and women's competition were not available at press time last night.

Efforts by some OUAA personnel to move the CIAU championships to the new Etobicoke complex next year received a boost of sorts due to the repeated blunders by the Lakehead officials.

The pool was painted a light blue, so light that many swimmers were unable to clearly distinguish the pool ends from the water with the result that many turns were either late or missed completely.

One very perplexed Waterloo breaststroker was disqualified when officials invoked a turn rule that hasn't been enforced in the OUAA for three years and the confused meet starter created so many false starts that swimmers turned from protests to uncontrollable laughter as the only appropriate reaction.

As CIAU swimming celebrates its first decade of truly national competition, Blues can look back on an enviable record of those nine team titles plus countless individual records.

Swimmer of the decade could be either Theo Van Ryn or Jim Adams, as each freestyler won an incredible nine individual races plus numerous relays.

Gaye Stratten is easily the most versatile of Varsity swimmers over the past ten years as he won three CIAU gold medals in both the 100 and 200 yard backstrokes plus two more firsts in the 100 yard butterfly.

Jim Shaw dominated both backstroke events in 1970 and 1971, while breaststrokers Mike Chapelle and Russ Ballantyne produced five gold medals.

Coach Campbell is also in the record book as he won the 200 free in 1968 when the team was coached by Juri Daniel Sr., presently the head of U of T's Physical Education program.

Since most of the current men's team will be returning next year and Campbell always manages to add some new talent every season, Blues should launch decade two in their customary winning fashion.

Everyone Welcome!

The game saw both Gord Davies and hard-working Larry Hopkins each net a pair of goals.

Hopkins got the overtime goal against Laurentian which sent Varsity into the semi-final round, and as Blues rallied from an early 1-0 deficit.

The most spectacular play of the night was Howie Hampton's tremendous solo effort early in the third period when he got the puck at center and then muscled past a sprawling Waterloo defender to put a clean shot on netminder Bob Hnatyk.

Hampton's goal was the second short-handed goal by Varsity; Bill Fifield, who did an excellent job killing penalties all night, got the other.

Gord Davies scored a pair of what have become known as classic Davies' goals, combining a well-placed pass with an excellent hard quick shot.

Other Varsity markers were scored by defencemen Al Milnes and Dave Rooke, plus forward Ron Harris.

Logan held Waterloo to one goal until the third period, when sloppy work by the Varsity defence set up two good opportunities for the Warriors. Erich Bruchbacher scored twice for Waterloo and captain Mike Guimond added the other.

Warriors never seemed to get on track as they played their usual aggressive style for the first two or three minutes of the first period, taking a 1-0 lead in the early going. Not even encouraging words from coach Bob McKillop (who, when down 7-1, muttered the memorable line, "you guys had better smarten up or you're going to lose!!!") could get the Warriors moving.

In the other semi-final, seastern division champion York took on the Mustangs from Western, who finished second behind Waterloo in the western division.

Western jumped to an early 2-0 lead, but York's goaltender Peter Kostek soon got over his early jitters and York took command in the second, and never looking back. Yeoman's big line accounted for five of the York goals as Dunsmuir notched a hat trick and added three assists.

The large crowd was in a festive mood both nights as the LGMB turned in its usual outstanding performance, far superior to the noisy contingents from York and Waterloo.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1975-76

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12th., 1975

CLOSING DATE FOR NOMINATIONS—MONDAY 10th., 1975-5:00 P.M.

To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 121 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate for each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" Collegiate and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"

The nominee polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee - see next paragraph)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from The Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article I of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport".

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at the University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence; also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

Each nominee for election to the Directorate may submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

Blues: OUAA Champions

In what was supposed to be a year of glory for York University Yeomen, the hockey Blues snatched the OUAA Championship and the Queen's Cup away from their cross-town rivals by edging York 4-3 in an exciting final Saturday night, before about 5,000 screaming fans at Varsity Arena.

In presenting the cup to Blues' captain, Gord Davies, York President Ian MacDonald spoke for all fans of intercollegiate hockey when he said, "Clarence Campbell should be here tonight to see how hockey should be played."

The build-up to Saturday's classic started Friday night as Varsity hosted the two semi-final games which pitted the Blues against defending national champion Waterloo and York Yeomen against the Western Mustangs.

Both Toronto and York won their games with identical 9-3 scores, to set the stage for Saturday's showdown, and fans continued to somehow find seats in the crowded arena as the final game began.

Varsity came out forechecking and dished out some good stiff checks in the early going. Varsity netminder, Mark Logan, starting his second game in a row, made some dazzling saves to keep York off the scoresheet. Logan made a particularly effective stop off a hard shot from Al Avery while Warren Anderson was in the penalty box around the seven minute mark.

Varsity's ability to neutralize York's big line of Avery, Doug Dunsmuir, and Tim Ampleford was to be one of the keys to the Varsity victory. As it developed, former Peterborough Pete Bob Wasson, and Peter Titanic combined for two goals, and gave the Blues the most headaches.

Varsity should have been awarded a penalty shot after York defenceman grabbed puck in the crease.

Logan played another fine game looking particularly cool and unruffled in the late going when York pulled its goaltender and threw on top scorers Avery, Ampleford, and Dunsmuir in order to tie the game. Logan made eight key stops in the final three minutes, turning aside 23 York shots in all.

And so the 1975 Blues have finally gelled as a team, proving they can put the puck in the net as well as skate and check anyone. It now remains to be seen if the players can sustain this momentum as they head into interdivisional CIAU playoffs.

Blues are matched against the Atlantic Conference winners and play this week in Halifax. In the other series, Loyola, winners in the Quebec Conference, travel to Alberta and the CIAU final will be played at the home of the most westerly survivor.

The weekend's excitement got off to an auspicious start Friday evening as the first capacity crowd in two years filled the arena for the semi-final between Blues and Waterloo.

Tom Watt and his squad went out determined to win, and it showed in the fine skating effort and polish that Varsity displayed throughout the contest.

York's Doug Dunsmuir (10) crashed into the goalpost and had to leave the game briefly.

Varsity coach Tom Watt expresses his feelings after the game.

Another key to Blues' win has to be conditioning. Varsity players had the momentum in the latter half of the second and were able to continue that effort into the third. True, they looked tired at times and got a little sloppy, but Yeomen were more tired and just didn't have the legs to tie the game.

Varsity checked and forechecked particularly well in the late stages of the game, and York was reduced to pulling its goaltender at 18:46, in a last ditch attempt to send the game into overtime.

Veteran Don Pagnutti gave Varsity a one goal lead at 9:44 of the opening period, breaking in on the left wing and firing a hard shot past York netminder Rick Quance. The puck hit the right goalpost and deflected into the net.

Three minutes later, defenceman Warren Anderson took a page out of the offensive playbook as he capitalized on a miscue during a York powerplay and fired a low shot past Quance to widen the Varsity margin to 2-0.

Blues then went into a defensive shell and York took full advantage as excellent forechecking and skillful opportunism enabled Yeomen to tie the score before the period ended on goals by Wasson and Titanic.

Bill MacKay beat Logan with a well-placed slapshot early in the second period but Davies pulled the Blues into a 3-3 tie at 9:49 only seconds after Dunsmuir was helped off the ice after being stunned in a collision with the York net.

Davies, who is graduating with a Masters Degree in Engineering, then set up the winning goal with a perfect centering pass to Bill Fifield after only 29 seconds of play in the third period.

Fifield whipped a quick 15-foot wristshot and the puck zipped between Quance's legs as the goaltender appeared to be unprepared for the shot.

Then it was check, check and more check for Blues during the remaining exciting minutes.

SDS members appeal Caput conviction over Banfield affair

By MATHILDE VERHULST and DAVID SIMMONDS

Almost exactly a year after the "Banfield incident," former U of T students Bill Schabas and Tony Leah are appealing their convictions by the Caput to the executive committee of the Governing Council. In a precedent-setting move, the pair are appealing their "extraordinarily harsh" sentences, although they are not allowed to question the verdict.

Schabas received a four-year suspension from the university, Leah a three-year suspension for preventing urbanologist Edward Banfield from speaking on campus last March. Both also had "black marks" placed on their transcripts by Caput, U of T's all-faculty top disciplinary body.

Over 50 people attended each of the morning and afternoon sessions of the hearings, expected to continue today and tomorrow.

Governing Council has appointed former Upper Canada Law Society treasurer Sydney Robins chairman of the appeal.

Leah summarized the case for the pair, stressing that the conditions under which the Banfield incident took place represent "in the strongest sense mitigating circumstances in deciding that our sentence is an unduly harsh one."

Leah listed what he considered the mitigating circumstances, among them:

- o Banfield's visit to the university last year was not an "isolated event" but took place in an atmosphere in which racism on campus was seen as a problem and seemed to be increasing.

o Banfield himself was seen as "an unscholarly and political writer" whose racist views and connection with the Nixon administration were well known.

o The U of T administration demonstrated its "unwillingness" to deal with the issue of racism prior to Banfield's visit, and contained a "strong element of provocation" in its attempts to cover up the issue of racism.

Leah spoke of the "unfair and restrictive" nature of the Caput trial, saying he and Schabas were "forced" to ask and to answer questions they themselves posed.

"Basically we were so restricted to such an area that all we could discuss was our physical location on that particular afternoon," Leah added.

He also objected to Caput chairman Albert Abel's rule that racism not be permitted to be part of their evidence to the Caput, calling racism "an essential ingredient" of the incident.

Leah said the Caput trial denied them both an opportunity to defend and justify their action on the afternoon of March 13, 1974, what Caput called "conduct prejudicial to the best interests of the university."

"Clearly the whole case against us rests on the question of what is prejudicial to the university," Leah said.

Schabas and Leah both maintain Banfield is a racist, and that it was in the best interests of the university community to prevent the spread of racism on that particular occasion.

Taking the stand on his own behalf, Schabas said the main point he wished to raise was the existence of racism at the university, and the failure of the administration, Governing Council and later Caput to deal with it adequately. Accordingly, Schabas said, Leah and he were forced to take some action.

"You're going to have more episodes like this until you show

Staff, students plan strategy on cutbacks

By GENE ALLEN

The first steps toward formation of a unified front of campus workers, students and faculty members in the face of university budget cutbacks were taken last night.

Representatives of the groups present at last night's meeting will now approach their organizations to get formal support for a university-wide study session on the cutbacks.

It was suggested pressure should be put on the administration to close down the university completely for a day.

University administration and provincial government representatives would be urged to attend the study session to defend their positions against the common demands of the worker, student and faculty groups.

"It's becoming increasingly obvious to everyone that we won't be able to get what we want by ourselves without the support of other groups," library worker Judy Darcy, president of CUPE local 1230, said in opening meeting. The meeting was called by CUPE 1230 which represents 430 library workers at U of T.

The following groups were represented: Graduate Students' Union (GSU), non-unionized workers from U of T administration offices at 215 Huron st., U of T Faculty Association (UFTA), Arts & Science Students Union (ASSU), Students' Administrative Council (SAC), Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA), Faculty Reform Caucus and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

The groups unanimously recognized the necessity for co-operation in dealing with the administration and the provincial government.

Judy Darcy said campus workers have to "break down their sense of isolation" to work in common with other groups in the university.

Campus workers provide essential services to the university and want to have the value of these services recognized, Darcy stressed.

The administration's offer last week of an 8 percent wage increase plus $500 bonus to non-academic staff is not sufficient to offset the rise in the cost of living, Darcy said.

Furthermore, she said, campus workers are already underpaid in relation to workers in business and industry. "The administration will divide and rule if it is allowed to," she said.

"We will need support from students, faculty and workers on campus," said GAA organizer Andy Stanley.

Stanley said the specific problems facing graduate assistants were that salaries have not increased substantially for five years and as class sizes increase, there will be a decline in the number of teaching positions available for graduate students.

UFTA president, Bill Nelson agreed. "We have common interests," he said.

The administration plays a lot of games," Nelson warned. "They like to play the pie game — if we give you more of the pie, we have to give somebody else less."

Nelson said this was "fundamentally dishonest. The pie is not of a fixed size. The administration can budget for a major deficit if it wishes."

Nelson explained in the past the university has budgeted for apparent deficits which ended up as surpluses. Last year, for example, the administration predicted a deficit of $0.75 million which turned out to be a $3 million surplus.

"If the administration had budgeted for real deficits in the past, we might be getting more from the provincial government now," he said. "We've got to try putting the administration in a real bind by ourselves — I mean, students and employees together."

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley supported the appeal for a unified approach to the cutbacks, and pointed out their effects on students: increased class size, cutbacks in laboratory courses, incidental fees added to tuition fees, and a decline in services such as the housing service, health service, and placement service.

SAC executive assistant Chris Allnut said support for students depending on OSAP grants and loans has stayed static at $32 a week since 1971 while costs for food and rent have greatly increased.

Allnut also said the provincial government's long-term approach to university education will likely lead to increases in tuition, and to an increase in the OSAP loan ceiling.

This will have the effect of further discouraging students who do not come from wealthy or well-to-do families. He said the support of all groups would be needed to stop the provincial government's plans in this area.

GSU president Frank McIntyre said it is important to "build support over the long term for province-wide activity."

McIntyre said the real problem was not how the university administration divides up the pie, but rather how the provincial government's priorities can be influenced.

Graduate students are getting only one-third the amount of provincial support they were getting in 1969, he said.

OFS fieldworker Dale Martin told the meeting similar co-operative arrangements have been made among campus workers, students and faculty at other universities across the province.

Racism inquiry hears testimony

By TOM GERRY

A freelance writer testified yesterday before the Committee of Inquiry into Racism at U of T he was commissioned in 1969 by U of T professor Ian MacNab to write a film script showing "how an Italian worker fakes problems to prolong his stay on workmen's compensation."

MacNab, of the Department of Surgery, "wanted the film to show the psychosomatic nature of an Italian's back problem because he depended on it for his living," freelancer Paul Chaput said.

"MacNab's purpose was to insinuate that Italians are peculiarly like this" and to present to medical students "a case of invented psychological pain," Chaput noted. "The script perpetuated all the silly ideas about Italian culture" and was entitled The Merry-Go-Round, Chaput said.

"I wrote it because I was broke and I didn't understand the issues at the time," Chaput added. The film was never made.

The preliminary meeting of the committee of Inquiry into Racism at U of T was chaired by Rev. Eilert Frerichs, United Church chaplain to U of T. Six people testified about their experiences with racism at U of T.

The committee plans to release a report and present a brief to U of T president John Evans in two weeks.

The committee was set up after presidential human rights advisor Dan Hill told a group of faculty members there were no grounds at present to set up an inquiry into racism.

Other committee members include Governing Council member Peter Jarret; GSU president Frank McIntyre; CUPE rep Tom Bribrisco; National Black Coalition chairperson Ed Clarke; Committee against Racism chairperson Charlie Roach; acting advisory bureau director Farrell Toombs; and faculty members Peter Fitting, Janet Salaff and Peter Rosenthal.

Giuseppe Pulera, a bricklayer who injured his back in a construction accident in 1969 and who now walks with a cane, testified a report prepared for the Workmen's Compensation Board by Dr. Ian Hector of U of T's Faculty of Medicine was racist.

The Varsity — David Simmonds

BSU rep Keith Maynard testifies beside prof. Peter Rosenthal.

Hector's report claims that Pulera's "essential problem is that of a poorly acculturated Italian." Hector's examination resulted in Pulera's being denied full compensation for his injury. Pulera receives $171 a month now, 40 percent of the benefit to which he is entitled.

Pulera's appearance before the committee substantiated charges made by the Students for a Democratic Society last year against Hector's racist views.

Pulera noted there are many other injured workers who have been similarly treated by Hector and other doctors at the Workmen's Compensation board.

Anthony Kwok, an executive member of the Chinese Students' Association, documented the effects of U of T lecturer Bette Stephenson's remarks about the need for admission quotas on Chinese students to the Faculty of Medicine. Stephenson is Canadian Medical Association president.

Stephenson's racist remarks have begun a movement, Kwok noted. He cited examples from the Medical Post to support his claim.

Articles and letters in the Medical Post "present the stereotype of Chinese students as working 18 hours a day and having no time for play," Kwok said.

The Medical Post theorizes Chinese students are in Canada to establish a home for their families in Hong Kong who will be displaced "when the Communists take over in 20 or 30 years."

More budgets cuts to be made

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
Despite the revision of the 1975-76 university budget, several areas are facing drastic decreases which will force cuts in operating costs.

Approved by Governing Council Thursday, the total operating budget will increase 1.5 percent, but even with the allowance for underspending, it is expected to incur a deficit of almost $4 million.

Newer divisions in the university seem to be among the most seriously affected. The Media Centre, established in 1970, faces a 5.5 percent reduction in the amount it asked for.

Director Dave Todgham said the centre actually received the same amount of money as last year, but had hoped for a $36,000 increase to reduce its dependency on the 'charge back' system.

Under this system, the centre relies on user service charges for one-third of its operating revenue. This includes providing commercial services to users outside the university.

However, "for every job we do outside, it decreases our ability to provide service to the university," Todgham said.

Todgham said the Media Centre was "relatively speaking under-financed" noting, "we've been lean ever since we were established."

The centre has failed to build up its budget like other departments, Todgham said, having missed out on the "municipificent sixties."

Woodsword College principal Arthur Kruger said the damage will be felt at the college, formed only last year.

Kruger said the college's 2.6 percent, $86,000 cut would mean the cutting out of smaller classes and a reduction in the summer day program.

"We're not cancelling the big psychology class with 80 people," Kruger noted, but said he felt Woodsword students were entitled to classes as small as those of day students.

With the reduced course offerings, the part-time student will still be able to carry out a specialist program, but without much selection, Kruger said.

Calling the cutbacks serious, Kruger said "If this was repeated in the future, it would significantly cut into student opportunity."

Faculty of Education dean J.C.

Ricker also called the reductions serious. The education faculty budget is down 3.2 percent from last year.

"I'm not convinced we can't do a good job," Ricker said, but added, "it means we have to cut things at one time we thought were essential."

"You have to examine everything you're doing and question it," Ricker said, noting, "how to be better on fewer dollars is a problem."

"What I don't want to do is to continue to work people as hard as they have been doing."

Acting head librarian D.G. Esplin said in the past year library staff have "had to work a great deal harder and we can't promise any relief."

Calling the library "all too well practised" in making cuts, he said they have been experiencing reductions for the past five or six years.

Though the only effect to users will be an even longer waiting period for books, Esplin said the effects will be absorbed internally and the chance of extending hours is "zero."

U of T, residents set up sub-committee

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Another battle between the university and the residents over the proposed new athletic complex was averted yesterday when the city-university liaison committee established a sub-committee to increase communications between the two opposing sides.

The sub-committee was set up after resident representatives Alan McAllister and Rose Smith charged that the university was not consulting with the residents in the Huron-Sussex-Ulster and Annex areas on who would use the proposed new athletic facilities.

The sub-committee will be composed of three residents, three university appointees, one representative from city council (Ward 6 alderman Allan Sparrow) and one from the city's department of parks and recreation.

Discussions at the meeting were desultory because the proceedings began late, slowed under the plodding direction of chairperson Dan Heap, Ward 6 alderman, and ground to a crawl as committee members continually adjourned to the buffet sideboard. (The meeting was scheduled during the urban human's feeding time — 5:15 to 7:15 pm.)

The committee also voted 4-2 to support a motion that had already been passed by City Council Feb. 20.

The City Council motion ordered the city's building commissioner to refuse applications for building permits which exceed residential zoning regulations in the university area.

No longer will the university be allowed to consider the campus as one residential area, thus allowing it to shift densities across the campus.

Because the athletic complex is planned for a 2.6 density and the allowed density is only 2.0, and the university won't be able to average in all the campus green space, they will be forced to either seek rezoning or redesign the complex.

U of T president John Evans argued against supporting the motion, saying that it would limit the university's flexibility in planning.

McAllister said he was afraid the university had backtracked on earlier promises to allow residents use of the new athletic facilities if they were built.

"They've more or less de-emphasized it because it isn't doing them the good they thought it would. The residents are still opposed to the design of the facilities."

"But de-emphasizing resident use shows they weren't serious when they made the promise earlier."

Jack Dimond, administrative assistant to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, said the university was always ready to discuss the issue.

Although plans have been made to build a smaller complex, marginal time was still available to be used by non-university users, Dimond said.

Business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin added that the building would be available to others during the summer, Christmas and Easter holidays among other times.

Dimond had little comment to make on the meeting. "It's just an expression of opinions by everyone. It shows the residents have strong views on certain things... while we (the university) haven't made up our minds."

But Dimond called the university-residents liaison sub-committee "a step in the right direction."

"This will show the university that they now have to behave like other citizens and go by the zoning by-laws," Smith said later of the meeting.

McAllister agreed, saying, "The university was impressed with the difficulty they'll have in transferring the densities."

SAC to bus to Brock

SAC will bus as many people as are interested to the province-wide action conference on cutbacks in post-secondary education to be held at Brock University Friday.

Those interested in attending should call the SAC office at 928-4911, or visit one of the tables to be set up between 11:30 am and 2:30 pm Wednesday and Thursday at Sid Smith or the Robarts library.

Not all of the 22 free places for the conference are taken up yet, and for those not lucky enough to get their trip paid for by SAC, costs are only $2 for the conference fee and $5 for food.

Buses leave at 4:30 pm Friday and return Sunday afternoon.

The conference will attempt to develop a unified strategy with which to confront the government over the cutbacks, and will hold workshops on housing, OSAP and post-secondary financing.

All sessions are open to students, faculty, staff and community members. Accommodation, meals and day care will be provided.

Conference organizers say they feel the conference is important to bring together organizing committees from across the province to fight government "steadfast in its commitment to financially strangulate post-secondary education in this province."

"There is a need to counteract this murderous action quickly and efficiently," they claim. "Closely coordinated province-wide action is the only hope we have."

In a dramatic development in the SAC presidential race the Black Students' Union has formally withdrawn its support from the "Militant Student Slate."

Vice-presidential candidate Lynette Batson, a BSU member and food science student, has withdrawn from the slate headed by Young Socialist Henry Malta.

However, SAC vice-president Tim Buckley said the slate will be able to continue with only two members of the ticket. This is a change from a similar situation in 1972 when the withdrawal of a vice-presidential candidate from a conservative slate led to a temporary Trotskyist slate acclamation.

The Black Students' Union decided on the withdrawal at a meeting Monday, saying it wants to gain broader campus support for the issues it feels are important: the deportation of 1,500 Haitians, racism in the university, the deportation of Rosie Douglas, and fascist attacks by the Western Guard.

BSU president Trevor Milner told The Varsity yesterday that aligning with the Young Socialists could imply the BSU supported one particular political alignment, thus restricting other support.

The BSU entered the slate in the first place, Milner said, because it was concerned about raising numerous immediate issues of vital concern to the black community and other ethnic groups, as well as the wider university community.

"The Black Students' Union intends to continue to pursue these issues on campus as well as in the community and looks forward to receiving the fullest possible support," a statement by the BSU says.

Milner stressed the BSU is not withdrawing because of any conflict with the Young Socialists, but rather because the appeal for wider support requires more liberal support.

Late last night the subdued "Militant slate" presidential candidate, Henry Malta, told The Varsity the Young Socialists would "respect" the BSU decision.

Malta said they still feel "it is necessary to put forward a militant program as an alternative to the status quo slate (headed by SAC university commissioner Gord Barnes)."

The withdrawal of Lynette Batson Malta said, would not cause her removal from the ballot. "She has withdrawn from active candidacy but she remains on the ballot so we can be allowed to put forward our program," he said.

Malta agreed with the BSU the issues of "racist attacks" should continue to be raised in the election.

Dominion recruiters protested

By BOB BETTSON

Twenty students supporting the Boycott of California Grapes and Lettuce took their protest to Dominion stores recruiters interviewing U of T grads at the placement centre yesterday.

After reading a brief statement to a young Dominion recruiter, the delegation of eight left with their companions for picketing at the Dominion store across the road.

Dominion stores is the target of the UFW boycott campaign because, as the biggest chain, it has refused to remove grapes and lettuce from its shelves.

The Dominion recruiter refused to answer any of the boycotters charges but agreed to give a copy of their statement to the Dominion stores vice-president A.C. Jackson.

Three plainclothes U of T police were on hand to make sure there was no repetition of the Dow Chemical recruiting sit-in when protesters occupied the centre in 1968 in opposition to Dow's manufacture of napalm for use in Vietnam.

The statement read to the

The students charge Dominion with maintaining "an insensitive and unjust position" in ignoring labor, church and political leaders support of the boycott.

Still a chance to be Varsity editor

Those interested in being considered for the position of Varsity Editor for 1975-76 should apply as soon as possible. Applications should be addressed to The Chairman, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Students and faculty interested in saving the interdisciplinary studies department from abolition within two years are meeting today at Innis College at 2 pm in the first floor

Bossin room.

All courses are staffed this year but there is a clear threat that with staff freezes, budget cuts and the departure of a number of women's studies professors including vice-president Jill Conway, women's studies may be drastically cut back after next year.

Innis is taking over some of the women's studies courses but others may be in trouble after next year. It is imperative that all concerned students attend.

It's not too late to join the staff of Canada's largest student newspaper. The Varsity still needs writers for general news coverage. No experience needed.

This is the time to get in on the ground floor for next year's paper. Ask for Bob Bettson when you drop in to the 2nd floor, 91 St. George St., or call 923-8741 or 923-8742.

Sociology vote was reprehensible

It looks as though the blood is going to start running through the halls of the sociology department again.

Sociology professors voted Saturday to abandon the department's pioneering attempts at democratic decision-making, by voting to allow the chairman to exercise virtually autocratic power, and giving the departmental assembly, which has student-faculty parity, only advisory responsibilities.

The move is reprehensible. A large number of professors in the department have never been committed to parity, have never accepted its legitimacy, and have done the best they can to sabotage its effectiveness and create division within the department.

The most notable example is the Seeley incident. Department chairman Irving Zeitlin deliberately overruled the recommendation of a parity departmental hiring committee to hire the controversial Canadian, who presently lives in California. That's not much of a commitment to making the department work.

Zeitlin came to U of T from the United States clothed as a progressive who would set Canadian sociology on its head. Since then, he has shown a remarkable capacity to bend with the prevailing wind of senior faculty opinion. Hardly the type of progressive behavior we can admire.

If faculty members in the sociology department want any measure of respect from their students, they should make a sincere attempt to work within the present departmental structure. That seems about as unlikely to happen as John Evans taking up the cudgel for Social Credit.

Course evaluation always valuable

I am writing this letter perhaps seven months too late in order to clarify my position vis-a-vis course evaluations. I believe them to have three main purposes.

First, they allow students the opportunity to read the opinions of those who have gone before them and therefore to make more considered judgments as to which courses they wish to register in. In this way organized evaluations serve to discount heresy evidence both about the quality of the professor and of the course material.

Second, evaluations should serve to aid individual teaching staff members in gauging their own effectiveness and should offer constructive suggestions as to improvement in teaching, choice of texts, course format, structure and approach.

Finally, evaluations should be utilized when making career decisions about the individual instructors involved — hiring, firing, tenure and promotion — as evidence of their teaching ability.

With reference to the French course evaluations published last fall by the French Course Union and the Arts and Science Students Union, let me say that I believe French to be one of the best-taught subjects in the entire faculty.

The statistics bore that out: the average was 1.9 on a one-to-five scale of excellent to poor. But naturally there was a distribution involved, and, while many courses received very high ratings, a very few were not well liked.

However, I would like to emphasize that because an individual instructor does not fare well in one particular year does not mean that there is sufficient evidence to condemn him as a bad teacher. Rather, evaluations must be carried out year after year in order to make any sort of intelligent judgment.

No one should be judged on a single performance, and this is a lesson that applies equally well to Professors A and B in D.W. Smith's letter of March 3 as it does to Mr. J.D. Orsoni of Victoria College's Department of French who, based on one evaluation four years ago and only one of four last year and, in spite of the opinions of 95 percent of his students, has been released from that department.

I hope Prof. Smith's sense of justice was equally offended. Mine was.

Peter Jarrett, member,
French Course Union

Students treated as second class

The key to what may well be the prevailing view of students by the administration and the majority of the faculty lies in the advertisement in the Monday, March 3 issue of your paper (p. 2), "New Music Concerts."

The ticket categories in the said advertisement implies a clear and major distinction between "students" and "adults".

This discovery is so revealing that I have stopped pondering over why the various departments are so firm against parity, and other issues which may suggest a dependence on student opinion. In view of this revelation you may consider the current major question: "What are they afraid of?" Of course, after all, who wants the opinion of minors in this great institution?

The cartoon on page 4 of this same issue (March 3) and the full page picture on page 6 of your paper of Monday, Sept. 30, 1974, even go farther by hinting, albeit vaguely, that a more valid classification might even be, "students" and "human beings".

Petitions must relate to quality

I will not sign, and I urge all students not to sign, the petition to protest the cutbacks in university funding because I feel it obscures the nature of the problems we face.

By failing to show concern about the quality of university education, the petition misses what should be the focus of student concern.

By backing its demands with a call for a changed tax structure, the petition again reveals a lack of awareness of present economic, government and academic realities. Clearly, government financing is not contingent on students' demands. If reduced funding and the resultant larger classes (for example) led to a deterioration in the quality of education, then we should be prepared to accept cutbacks in enrolment as a possible solution.

This is not an argument against equal accessibility, but an attempt to put the issues of quality and accessibility into perspective.

Are students able to govern U of T?

The two French professors whose letters appeared in the Varsity Monday March 3 raise the issue of student representation on tenure committees. However, the real question at hand goes beyond that: are we students intellectually capable of participating in university government? Two recent events in the French department suggest a clear answer.

1. Oral evaluations are being conducted this year at Victoria and University Colleges. Originally the authors of the questionnaire did not even bother to consult their own course unions. When protests arose, U.C. agreed to record the number of students present during the evaluation and the number actually enrolled in the course, as well as to read the summarized written comment back to the class before it was submitted.

Victoria College refused. Why? Do they intend to publish evaluations based on only 50 percent attendance again this year? Are they afraid to check their report with the students involved?

2. The Combined Department held a meeting on Wed. Feb. 26 to discuss two motions I had proposed about marks. Student members were told two weeks beforehand, and the time and place were announced in that day's Varsity. Yet no other students attended!

The department subsequently passed the motions to use the full range of grades in marking, rather than lower all marks by 5 percent, and to give some consideration to class participation. Nevertheless the question arises why students, as the interested party, did not attend.

Unfortunately the answer is painfully obvious. Most students who complain cannot take the trouble to find a solution, and even those who do volunteer their efforts usually show no intention of grappling with the real difficulties of university life.

Professor D.W. Smith of Victoria College might consider such individuals "balanced, logical, and just," but until we stop trying to destroy the system and start trying to work for positive change within, those terms will be utterly meaningless.

Canada aids Peru military regime

On September 5, 1974 the Canadian International Development Agency donated $1.7 million to the military government of Peru, to study living conditions of the poor.

On February 4, 1975 the military government of Peru used Soviet-made tanks to disperse thousands of anti-government demonstrators in Lima.

Was the CIDA's donation used to study living conditions of the poor or to buy bullets to suppress the poor?

Skolnick claims Varg inaccurate

I read the article in Monday's Varsity in which Bob Collier interviewed Robert Skolnick, a candidate for the coming Governing Council election. May I say that I was outraged at many of the statements made by Skolnick in the article, and if I ever meet the god-damned creep I shall feel compelled to punch him in the face with characteristic directness.

I was surprised to learn that there is more than one Robert Skolnick running for Governing Council this year. I can only conclude that there are two Robert Skolniks because the one quoted in the article bore very little similarity with the one I overheard being interviewed by The Varsity on Sunday afternoon.

To wit: Yes, Mr. Skolnik the interviewee (henceforth to be referred to as "Skolnik A") is indeed an engineer's engineer — whatever that may be. However, unlike Skolnik B (the one in the article) he does not recognize the Roberts Library as an overriding issue in this year's Governing Council election — regardless of how fine looking the building itself may be. Furthermore, Skolnik A would never take at all kindly to the suggestion that he was merely a fringe candidate.

Unlike Skolnik B, Skolnik A would never be so irresponsible as to attempt to deal with an issue as complex as that of student representation on tenure committees with a single flippant statement. Rather, I recall Skolnik A developing his argument on the matter for at least ten minutes when he was asked by The Varsity interviewer to comment on the tenure issue.

When Skolnik A discussed possible solutions to budget cutbacks, he explained that one area which deserved investigation was the possibility of instituting a 3-semester system and promoting maximum utilization of resources. Unlike Skolnik B, he never said that "the solution to government cutbacks is for the university to make money for itself."

One further point. Skolnik A is suffering the wrath of undeserved animosity brought on by a statement made by Skolnik B concerning his preferred post-mortem destination for the local repeayers. Skolnik A in his interview would never have wished to imply that all repeayers should go to hell — rather, he wished only to suggest that such a destination would be appropriate for those who, for reasons motivated primarily by obstructionist intent, stalled the building of a much-needed athletic complex at the U of T.

Aside from the above differences, there is considerable similarity between the viewpoints of Skolnik A and Skolnik B.

Governing Council Candidates

Levitt seeks re-election

The Varsity — Phil Stramba

Former Governing Councillor and again candidate Howie Levitt.

Former student governor Howard Levitt is fighting for a professional student seat on Governing Council. He appears intelligent, articulate and knowledgeable and is very outspoken.

He has a reputation for shaking things up, for getting things done and for suggesting novel ideas.

He is also experienced. Levitt sat on Governing Council last year, and has served on its executive committee, SAC, the Committee on the Status of Non-Academic Female Staff, the Committee to Review the U of T Act and Arts and Science Faculty Council.

Levitt is proud of his reputation for livening up dull meetings. He feels "students should be outspoken" to offset their lack of power on Governing Council.

He is committed to parity and sat on the committee recommending it. Levitt says his past experience will allow him to get "right into the work" without "the half-year it takes to acclimatize and learn the ropes."

He didn't run for re-election last year because he had "just entered law school," but now he feels he has "a significant role to play" and wants "to help solve lots of important issues which are coming up."

An improvement in the status of campus women is another of his major concerns. He wants to "eliminate the sexism" practised against non-academic female staff and to give them a fair wage.

He also says "faculty have a grossly disproportionate share" of the salaries on campus. He intends "to lead the battle" to equalize conditions between men and women and between faculty and support staff.

He says he "led the fight against the discipline code" last year and supports Tony Leah and Bill Schabas in their current appeal of Caput sentences.

Maintaining "the quality and integrity" of the teaching program at U of T is central to Levitt's thinking, he demands the Ontario government "provide adequate funding to support it."

If students are given parity on tenure committees faculty will be forced to accept teaching as an important criteria, he says.

Levitt supports course evaluations because they are "the one situation in which students can make an input, but he feels judging a professor's ability on a 1-5 scale is 'meaningless'."

1st year engineer tries for Gov. Council

First year industrial engineering student Doug Gerhart wants a strong undergraduate voice on Governing Council — a voice which will fight for better teaching, better services and more liaison with SAC.

He is aiming for one of the two professional student seats on Governing Council.

Although he has only been at U of T a short time studying first year industrial engineering, he intends to maintain a "close connection with SAC" and "all possible avenues of communication" with professional faculties to make him aware of student's problems and opinions.

At high school he was involved with the students' council, the school newspaper and was nominated to sit on a government task force to evaluate schools.

In residence at U of T, he has taken an active part in college activities.

He is very concerned with the relationship between Governing Council and SAC. Because SAC represents undergraduates, the Governing Council student members should be "SAC appointees, answerable to SAC and recallable by SAC."

This would avoid the present situation in which SAC president "Seymour Kanowitch is only allowed to speak by Governing Council vote," he says.

"Governing Council should be the training ground for SAC" rather than "a place of retirement for ex-student presidents," Gerhart maintains.

If Gord Barnes is elected as SAC president next week, Gerhart will "back him to the hilt" and work closely with him, he says.

Rochdale College would be wasted if it isn't used for university-run housing, Gerhart says. He points to the waiting list for the college residences and the lack of good housing in Toronto.

The problems Rochdale has experienced lately would not reappear, he continues, because only "university students would be admitted" rather than "any social group that came along."

The Varsity — Bob White

First year engineering student Doug Gerhart.

Rochdale could be used for student services or a campus centre, Gerhart says. He points to U of T's position in the centre of the city "with no place to go" and the lack of facilities available for recreation.

"There is no full-time student-run pub on campus, inadequate games and common rooms, poor restaurants and little administrative space for student groups," he notes.

Gerhart's main concern is with undergraduate teaching. He says "teaching methods haven't changed for 500 years."

He would prefer a greater undergraduate input into teaching, including student votes on tenure committees, to initiate a faculty "self-improvement program."

Gerhart asks for "a greater division between teaching and research." For first year courses, teachers "must be up-to-date but not necessarily top-notch teachers," he maintains.

"Course evaluations should be deferred until after exams," Gerhart says, "but they are a fairly accurate assessment of the professor's ability, if you ignore the garbage margin."

SAC vice-pres aims for Gov. Council

The Varsity — Bob White

SAC vice-pres. and engineering constituency runner Tim Buckley.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley says he's a "liberal who believes in compromise to get things done." With wide experience at all levels of student government behind him, Buckley is now contesting one of Governing Council's two professional student seats.

He has been on the Engineering Society for three years, a SAC representative for two years, and a member of the Engineering Faculty Council, the Hart House Board of Stewards, and the Campus Centre Committee.

The third year engineering student, a favorite to win, describes his orientation on SAC as "the liberal half of Seymour Kanowitch's left-liberal slate" and says he is to be more moderate than Kanowitch.

After his two years on the Campus Centre Committee, Buckley envisions a boulevard along Wilcox St., closed to all traffic, with a pub, a student-run non-profit food service, a bank, variety store, post office and other student oriented activities.

"Professional students will pass through it on their way to the new athletic complex," he points out.

Buckley was responsible for the referendum soon to be held on the future of the athletic complex.

He is sympathetic to ratepayers' demands in the Huron-Sussex area but "the realities of the situation demand that it go ahead." A major restructuring of the building would destroy its value, he maintains. Buckley takes "a reasonable approach" to the parity issue by realizing that equal representation on Governing Council is only a dream.

He desires more student representation, but primarily to allow for division of labor between members.

"Student members have too much work and are forced to react to items rather than bring forth new programs," he says.

"An equitable grant structure" should be introduced, Buckley says, because "budget cuts will be the major problem in the next few years."

"An equitable grant structure" should be introduced, Buckley says, because "budget cuts will be the major problem in the next few years."

He says parents should support their offspring if they are able, but if not, the Ontario government should help.

Buckley dismisses faculty disapproval of student representation on tenure committees by pointing out "students have as much commitment to the university as professors do." A chemical engineering student, he feels that the quality of a student's education "controls his future."

Most of his teachers have been "excellent" with the exception of some poor arts and science cross-appointees, but two or three voting student members will ensure teaching is a major part of a tenure decision.

Buckley is worried budget cuts will have a disproportionate effect on student services. He intends "to argue strenuously for maintenance of the Placement Centre, Housing Service and the Advisory Bureau because they are so important to professional students."

As SAC vice-president, he "came into contact with students on other professional faculties" a great deal and considers himself to be well aware of their problems.

In the past year, he says SAC has been "detached from local student councils." If elected, he intends to maintain close liaison between course unions, professional student societies and college councils to avoid previous mistakes.

Interviews with the other candidates for the Governing Council professional student seats, medman John Floras and engineer Robert Skolnik, both in second year, were published in Monday's Varsity.

While all professional students can vote for any two of the five candidates, both winners cannot be in the same faculty.

NDP-labor forum attracts small turnout

Fewer than 40 students greeted three NDP labor bigwigs yesterday afternoon in the 450-seat Medical Sciences auditorium.

But former U of T Governing Council lay appointee and NDP member Lynn Williams was pleased.

"I've been wondering for years where the NDP presence on campus was," he said. "It's encouraging to see it emerge again."

Facing a sea of empty seats in the fourth of a week-long series of forums with many big NDP provincial and federal names, the three panelists responded with rousing, but time-worn, build-the-party speeches.

Only former Ontario party leader Donald MacDonald, still sitting as York South MPP, spoke on the topic of labor, the economy and politics.

MacDonald, currently federal NDP president, traced the history of trade union links with the CCF-NDP, ignoring any working class movement to the left of the social democratic party, such as the Industrial Workers of the World, the One Big Union and the Workers' Unity League.

MacDonald left analysis of current politics to his fellow panelists, both bureaucrats high up in their union's structure.

Williams, United Steelworkers District 6 director, called for expansionist government policy to combat the recession, in a series of political proposals which he only lightly linked to the role of labor in politics.

Filling in for United Auto Workers' (UAW) Canadian director Dennis McDermott, Cliff Pilkey, NDP MPP for Oshawa until he was defeated in 1971, complained manpower training programs are poorly planned.

Escedi, Johnson contesting Engineering Society presidency

By BOB BETTSON
 Third year engineering student Marta Escedi is running against Paul Johnson, a third year geological engineer, for the Engineering Society presidency. Elections are today and tomorrow. But as possibly the first woman ever to head the male-dominated Faculty of Engineering students' council, Escedi hopes students will seriously consider her experience. She is running with wide experience in society activities, including participation in organizing Oktoberfest '73, Cannonball '73, the founding day pub and the homecoming parade. She has been on the ENGSOE executive for two years.

Her opponent, Paul Johnson, admits he has no experience in society activities but with his "team" running mate for vice-president Rick Donnelly, he hopes to expand activities the society is involved in.

Johnson says he wants to get more students involved in society activities and have a "more open student government." He would accomplish this partially with a column in the engineer students' newspaper, The Toike Oike.

"We'll have to see what's going to happen when we get in," he added.

Escedi also feels more students will have to become involved in running society events because two of the three executive officers have failed academically in the past year.

She feels strongly the society should have active class representatives who help organize social and educational events.

As current society social convener she feels the Engineering Society should concentrate on quality rather than trying to run too many events and doing them poorly.

On educational issues, she said there should be a referendum on the use of calculators during tests or exams because U of T is one of the few engineering schools in Ontario not to allow the use of the popular machine aids.

Escedi supports the Toike Oike retaining humorous content but wants to add more serious articles on society activities in an expanded paper.

"It really depends on the editor," she explained.

The Varsity — Lorne Slobnick

Unlike Escedi, Johnson is running on a team because he feels this is necessary to have two people working together. However, election rules make it a split ballot and either one of the two could be elected without the other.

Three jostle for engineering vice-pres job

Third year mechanical engineer Mike Henry and Rob West, a third year engineering science student, are running against "team" candidate Rick Donnelly for Engineering Society administrative vice-president in elections today and tomorrow.

The activities vice-president of the society will be second year geological engineer Dave Robson who was acclaimed. He has worked primarily with social events.

Henry's main priority would be to try and lessen the workload on the top executive members of Engsoc.

He says he is not a "radical" and would not see many changes in the basic activities the society runs.

He said although he would like to see more information in The Toike Oike, the student newspaper should have editorial freedom.

West, another candidate, said he agreed with Henry that the work should be split more. He advocated the addition of more lectures, conventions and exchanges in addition to the social activities such as Oktoberfest and the Cannonball.

He said the Toike has a bit too much emphasis on humor this year but "that's up to the editor." He said more announcements and information on society activities should go in the paper.

West also thinks the vice-president's role is substantially an administrative one, pointing out that the president should take the most important functions such as talking with the dean when problems arise.

Donnelly, the "team" candidate, said he wants to see more activities. He doesn't want to "use" the Toike but would like to see the Engsoc column continued.

WHOSE CHILDREN?

Daycare and S

By ANN SILVERSIDES
and NANCY WARNER

"Day care is an idea whose time has come. That does not necessarily mean it is a good idea, but simply that it is on the national agenda. It is on the national agenda because it is the common interest of a constellation of forces: government bureaucrats concerned with welfare reform, educators concerned with early child development, women concerned with 'liberation'."

— Margaret Steintels,
Who's Minding the Children?

Steintels outlines three attitudes toward the relationship between day care and the general movement of society:

1. Day care as patchwork. This outlook views day care services essentially as repairing breakdowns in present social institutions. It is a kind of first aid — for fatherless families, for children needing better care and extra educational assistance, for mothers prevented from providing full-time care for their children by economic or emotional difficulties.
2. Day care as realization. By assuming the duties of the home, day care would provide entry into advanced industrial society for a vast number of previously excluded women. Society would accept new responsibilities for the care and development of children.
3. Day care as utopia. This outlook views day care as a means of renewing society in a way radically discontinuous with the present.

These points of view should not be regarded as mutually exclusive. Rather, they represent overlapping demands which have resulted in the proliferation of day care facilities in recent years.

Daycare in Toronto

In the late 1800's Hester Howe (an educator concerned with school-age children who brought their younger siblings to class) together with Lady Moss (who represented those Rosedale matrons who had trouble with their charladies coming to work irregularly) got together to organize and finance the first day nursery in Toronto — the Victoria Creche. The motivation behind this and other early day care was largely humanitarian — to provide care for children of working mothers.

The first extensive system of day care, however, emerged during the Second World War. Women were needed in the work force and there was no hesitation in providing day care to facilitate this. After the war men returned home to fill the jobs which women had been performing; the city closed its day care centres.

It took an organized protest of women in 1946 to see that nine centres were kept in operation. These, however, were taken over by the Department of Social and Community Services as a basic welfare service. The war was over and day care was (and still is) regarded as a luxury for those not qualifying as needy.

The attitude which viewed day care as a tragedy gained strength in the 1950's. During that period, for various reasons, social pressure forced most mothers to stay in the home. (As one of the people we spoke to remarked, married women spent their time thinking up new ways of preparing sweet and sour frankfurters and striving to see their face shine in the floor.)

This attitude is reflected in Metro's present system of subsidies, which is based on three priorities:

- 1) the single working mother,
- 2) two parents working but earning only a minimal income,
- 3) parents with specific health problems.

The first obligation of the Metro centres is to subsidized children. The government rationale behind these priorities is both economic and social; there is pressure on welfare departments to get women off welfare and into a working situation.

? WHOSE FUTURE?

Social Change

Day care for those in the middle income bracket who cannot be subsidized costs in the range of $150.00 to $200.00 per child per month.

If such parents cannot join a cooperative, they must generally resort to private day care, whose quality has been criticized because of the profit motive behind it. Even private day care centres, however, have a large percentage of subsidized children.

Of the licensed centres currently operating in Toronto, there are 32 half day and 16 all day co-op nurseries, 31 half day and 25 all day municipal centres, 11 half day and 89 all day privately run centres and 53 half day and 41 all day centres run by private agencies. Basic provincial standards for licensing include:

1. Adequate space for children for play, toilet, washing, dressing, eating and resting.
2. Adequate space for the preparation of food.
3. Outdoor play space, fenced for protection.
4. Furnishings: tables, chairs, cupboards, cots or beds must be provided.
5. Play materials and equipment must be available in sufficient quantity.

Municipalities wishing to establish licensed day nurseries may apply for a grant from the Ontario Ministry of Community and Social Services to cover 80 percent of the cost.

In order to get a better idea of what day care looks like and how it operates, we visited a number of day care centres in Toronto. They were all licensed according to the above regulations, but some differences in programming were apparent.

In the Metro centres all staff are assigned to a group of children, a room, and a specific timetable.

Children are separated by age — usually infants (6 months to 2 years), toddlers (2 years), 3 and 4 year olds, and five year olds who spend half their day in kindergarten. In addition there is a preschool, lunch hour and after school program for children up to 10 years old.

For children who stay all day, time spent in the centre is divided into roughly one hour sessions of different activities: creative play, outside play, free play with toys, rest, etc. The indoor activities all take place in the same room.

By way of comparison, in the Margaret Fletcher Day Care Centre, the West End Parents' Association, and the Snowflake Parent-Child Centre, children are generally not separated by age, and are not restricted to one room or to scheduled activities.

They are encouraged to move from room to room and to participate in a variety of activities at will. At St. Stephen's Day Care Centre, children meet with staff in the morning who have planned specific activities, and then choose which activity they want to do.

All Metro Centres hire staff trained in Early Childhood Education (ECE). Wages and responsibility vary within a hierarchy similar to that of public schools. Centres like Margaret Fletcher and Victoria also have trained staff.

At the West End Parents' Association the supervisor is trained, but the staff have a diversity of backgrounds and do not have ECE degrees. Significantly, there are three males working at this centre.

At St. Stephen's the supervisor and most of the staff are trained, but the supervisor's standards of hiring are not based on formal qualifications.

Snowflake, a co-op, has two paid staff, one of whom is trained. Parents also staff the centre.

At the Jesse Ketchum Centre (Metro) senior citizens come in on a part time basis to play with the children. This is good practice in light of the fact that by far the majority of staff in day care centres are young women. These women are grossly underpaid, which is probably the main reason so few men enter the field. They continue to work because they are often unable to find equally interesting jobs at any salary.

Training in ECE ranges from 2 years at a community college level to a four year degree from Ryerson and post BA training at the Institute of Child Study.

As Ms. McKee (spokeswoman for the Day Care Reform Action Alliance) told us, insistence on this training severely limits the variety of people working in day care. She argued that there should be alternate ways of qualifying, i.e. correspondence courses, night courses, and educational television.

Like mature student qualifications for university, such alternatives would take into account other life experiences. She also pointed out that young staff tend to want to go off and do other things.

The reality of working with children, the long hours, hard work and low pay, tends to produce a high staff turnover. Understandably, such working conditions encourage attitudes which deny children the priority they deserve.

Standards for subsidy, previously stated, allow for minimal parental involvement in Metro centres.

At the Jesse Ketchum Centre parents are encouraged to spend the first day or two with their child to facilitate his or her adjustment to a completely new and alien environment. The Victoria Day Care Centre is actively involved and communicates with parents. Staff are on hand to give encouragement and support to parents, whether in relation to job, spouse or child.

St. Stephen's and Margaret Fletcher encourage parental involvement and feedback, and have regular staff-parent meetings. This feedback reflects some of the specific expectations of the parents as they differ from the way the centre is run.

At St. Stephen's, where the children are largely Portuguese, the parents would like to see more discipline in the form of punishment for children who "misbehave".

At many other centres parents would like to see more formal teaching (reading and writing) going on, but this is generally resisted by day care staff who believe that children learn through playing and don't need the pressures which would accompany such teaching at such an early age. Parents also volunteer their help for replacing equipment and improving the buildings at these centres.

In a cooperative centre the majority of those parents who have the time (because of flexible working hours) are required to work as "staff" in the centre. Other parents fulfill their commitment by cleaning, doing laundry, preparing lunch, etc.

Parental involvement provides a link between the child's world at the day care centre and his world at home with his parents. A child who spends his whole day at a care centre spends 70 percent of his waking hours there. Private centres take children as young as six weeks, Metro centres at a minimum of six months.

This raises the question of the long term effect this separation of the child's life into two worlds — day care and home — has at such an early age.

Another issue came up as a result of visiting these centres — the problem of illness. A single working mother with a sick child stands to lose her job if she takes too much time off work.

She can apply to the Department of Social and Community Services to have a visiting homemaker come in and take care of the child, but this is usually only provided for longer periods of illness and, as Ms. McKee said, the whole area badly needs expansion. The Victoria Day Care Centre received a government grant to facilitate this care, but this is not as yet standard procedure.

To provide for illness among staff, Metro Centres have a supply of casual help. Other centres must rely on friends or their permanent staff must assume the added responsibility.

Daycare and Society

The nature of a society is intimately linked to the way in which its children are raised. The Russian, Chinese and Israeli child rearing systems are examples of the use of day care as a means of infusing radically new values in society. In all of these countries innovative day care was preceded by a very conscious rethinking of the role of the family.

Day care in North America merely seems to temporarily repair breakdowns in social institutions. The underlying impetus of such care (for "disadvantaged children") is clearly concerned with "pushing present tendencies along their logical course, toward equal opportunity for all members of American society to make it through the educational system. This process has become the single most important standard for judging whether people are employable and thus prepared to fit into a rapidly evolving technological society.

In this way day care is inevitably linked to the nature of our society, but unlike Russia, China and Israel an organized method of childrearing designed to facilitate a radical change in society has not yet emerged.

The majority of women who work, not so much out of a desire for economic independence motivated by the ideals of women's liberation as because of economic necessity.

"Low income working women and welfare mothers tend to see day care as supportive of their family situation, a means of keeping the family intact and functioning while a mother either becomes a primary or absolutely necessary secondary breadwinner" (Steintels). (It is worth noting that the "strides forward" that women have made in the past usually dissolve in hard times, i.e. in the thirties and after World War Two.)

Jobs are available for women, but our standard of living harnesses us to the demands of consumption and technology. In recent years the rate of inflation has required two wage earners per family (even in the middle income bracket) so that people can keep up with mortgage payments and afford the luxury items that we are persuaded by advertising to believe we need.

The nature of contemporary society has made it largely an economic expedient for many women to work, and this may be the prime reason that day care has flourished in recent years.

The ideology of women's liberation supports daycare, however, because it can facilitate opening up economic structures to women, and can help change existing structures. The first attitude tends to encourage women to accept the qualifications and orientation of the male-dominated work ethic.

This has led to the demand for day care far exceeding the supply and pressure on government to provide more centres. In June 1974 the provincial government reacted to this pressure with the Birch proposals, put forward by the Provincial Secretary for Social Development, which advocated a higher child-staff ratio — seriously threatening the quality of day care.

The other aim of women's liberation is utopian and challenges the basic economic and social structures of our society. Essentially it necessitates some hard thinking about what sort of life we are leading now and what sort of life we want to prepare our children for.

Among the various day care centres discussed earlier, it is evident that there are a diversity of approaches to providing "care". Such diversity represents only the beginning of a search for answers to questions which have yet to be answered.

"At this moment in history, when we are on the threshold of embarking on a nationwide program of social intervention offered through comprehensive child care, we let ourselves prattle about such things as cost per child, physical facilities, or even community control. And when we begin to think big about what kinds of children we want to have in the next generation, about which human characteristics will stand them in good stead in a world changing so rapidly, we fall back on generalities such as care and protection."

— Bettye M. Caldwell,
"A Timid Giant Grows Bolder", Saturday Review, Feb. 20, 1971.

some interest in coming to terms with this problem," Schabas said. Schabas encouraged the committee to look at racism in its historical context at the university, adding that by its action in appointing a presidential human rights advisor, the university "realizes it must clean up its act." As examples of racism at the university, Schabas cited an earlier Caput trial against a sorority which refused to admit a black woman; alleged racist cartoons in the engineering newspaper, the Toike Oike; allegedly racist remarks by Canadian medical association president and U of T lecturer Bette Stephenson; and allegedly racist remarks made by medical professor Ian Hector in a report to the Workmen's Compensation Board. Leah testified about Banfield's work, calling it "shoddy and polemical," and argued that Banfield should not be given "academic freedom" while he already had wide latitude with his "freedom of expression" in publishing books. Leah also cited similar incidents at the universities of Chicago, Yale and Pennsylvania where, he said, students in similar circumstances had been given much softer sentences than the ones meted out to him and Schabas.

Toronto lawyer Charles Roach, standing before the panel as a character witness, described Schabas and Leah as "sincere."

"I trusted them and I still trust them," Roach said, adding, "I completely support what they did."

The $100,000 said Miller, represented back pay which was traditionally given to employees as a bonus, although National Secretary Alan Rimmer says the money was to be left in a trust account.

The national office has told bookstore employees payments

Miller, who was store manager for twenty years, was also criticized by Rimmer for investing the store's returns in high-yield investments instead of more "socially useful" but lower returning ventures, such as daycare centres.

Rimmer also said the back payments were made in an arbitrary manner, and that the Department of National Revenue may not permit the payment of back wages by a non-profit corporation.

Conference celebrates women's day

International Womens' Day, March 8 will be celebrated with a conference and entertainment program in Toronto on Friday and Saturday this week.

Over 50 women's organizations, trade unions, national groups, community and student organizations — including the SAC Women's Commission and the Graduate Students Union — have come together to sponsor two days of activity.

Toronto City Council has turned over the facilities of City Hall for a one-day conference Saturday and the Mayor's Task Force on the Status of Women is helping.

The celebration will be launched Friday evening with a public meeting at Convocation Hall at 8 pm. The meeting will bring together both the national and international aspects of the struggle for women's equality with speakers from the trade union movement and from the Spanish and Chilean communities in Toronto.

The entertainment program includes singers Rita MacNeil and Shirley Eikhard and actress Diane Grant of Nellie McClung fame. Alderman Dorothy Thomas will chair the meeting.

On Saturday a series of workshops on important issues in the women's movement will be held at City Hall. Topics for the morning workshops range from Good Day Care: Every Woman's Right to Justice in Marriage: Family Property Law.

The afternoon workshops will focus on women's inequality in the work force, including office workers, the professional woman and women in the manufacturing and service industries. Workshop discussion will be introduced by a panel of experts and activists on the various issues.

A general assembly is planned for later Saturday afternoon to deal with recommendations of the workshops for ongoing activity.

According to the conference brochure, "This event is planned as a forerunner for continuing action — action to make sure those in power don't simply forget about women's issues once more, as soon as International Women's Year is over."

Already suggestions have been made at the planning meetings for a large demonstration in cooperation with trade union women to be held later in the spring to put women's concerns before the government.

The Friday evening meeting and the Saturday conference are open to everyone. A registration fee of $1 will be charged at the Saturday event.

Student acquitted over computer smashing

MONTREAL (CUP) — After resisting pressure for the past six years to plead guilty in charges relating to the 1969 computer smashing incident at Sir George Williams University, a reporter with the student newspaper has been acquitted of all charges.

Don Mackay, a first year student and reporter for The Georgian at the time of the incident, was acquitted Feb. 24 of arson, conspiracy and public mischief — charges which carry a minimum sentence of seven years.

Mackay had been assigned by the student newspaper to cover the occupation of the computer centre undertaken by black students who charged the university administration with racism.

Police, including the riot squad, were called in to end the occupation, and in the ensuing battle the computer was demolished.

Mackay went to jail along with 97 other students for eight days during the preliminary hearing and was later released on $2,000 bail.

Most of the arrested agreed to accept a $1,000 fine in exchange for a guilty plea.

Two black students received jail sentences after a protracted trial.

Mackay argued successfully before the court that his presence as a reporter constituted a real reason for being at the occupation.

"What I witnessed and fought as a student journalist at the university was the disgusting spectacle of the administration's attempts over a period of many months to suppress an open and above board inquiry into charges of racism by black students against a professor," he told the court.

FOUNDATION POSITION

Privately endowed philanthropic organization seeks an individual who combines strong secretarial skills with a desire to assume challenging and interesting responsibilities. In addition to carrying out regular office duties, the successful applicant will also serve as a member of a team planning and supervising the foundation's activities in fields of major social and political significance.

Applicants should send a resume and telephone number to P.O. Box 122, Toronto-Dominion Centre, Toronto M5K 1H1.

Speaker urges reform in Ontario family property law

The main concern of the Ontario Status of Women Council is objections to the family property law, a council representative and sociologist said yesterday at a noon lecture. Speaking to an almost full house of a noon-hour lecture on the council's functions and effectiveness at the Toronto Dominion Centre's cinema, Barbara Landau, Queen Street Mental Centre adolescent services director, urged reform for the matrimonial home. The family property law is based on a 150-year-old piece of English legislation which the government has been sitting on for nine years, Landau charged.

She cited the case of Irene Murdock from Saskatchewan who received no financial compensation after her husband divorced her. The result of Murdock's hearings was announced last fall.

"We want reform for the matrimonial home," Landau said. "Right now it's just a matter of 'the house belongs to who paid for it' unless there is joint ownership."

"The home is the biggest asset," Landau said. "The woman contributes to the marriage and therefore there should be joint ownership no matter who holds the title -- 50-50."

"The husband can just say, 'It's ours,' but the wife has to be legally protected in case of divorce," she said.

Landau urged women in the audience to sign a petition to Ontario Premier William Davis calling for "legislation immediately on sharing of the matrimonial home no matter who paid for it."

She warned, however, that any reform measure might simply be used for campaign purposes because an election might be called this year.

But one woman in the audience objected to all aspects of the equal sharing of the home campaign.

"This measure is legally retrogressive," the woman claimed. "It increases the wife's dependency on the home and it will change no fundamental issues."

"It's just putting a band-aid on a rotten situation," she said.

Landau agreed with the woman but maintained legislation for sharing the home equally would still be an important action.

A former U of T undergraduate who took her MA at York University and her PhD in the States, Landau was appointed last year to the Status of Women Council.

But she hastened to add she was relieved in discovering Laura Sabia headed the council. "If it was going to be a tea party, it would be a Boston tea party."

Landau's talk yesterday was one of a continuing series of luncheon lectures on issues for the Urban Women each Tuesday at noon until April 1 and run by the U of T School of Continuing Studies. Doris Anderson, Chatelaine magazine editor, is scheduled to speak on Women as Administrators next Tuesday.

McClelland wants students to back his company - without control!

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Toronto publisher Jack McClelland has offered to sell his company to Canadian university students provided they have no actual control over the operation.

He made the remarks in a lecture at the University of British Columbia. He said if students could raise $3 million for a non-profit foundation, the foundation would own McClelland Stewart Ltd.

McClelland said he doesn't want "student radicals" involved, however, and doesn't want students to have any editorial control.

Among the conditions he set for the sale would be that any profits would be returned to a non-profit foundation to encourage Canadian publishing and employees would be protected from layoffs, as well as setting up a pension fund for himself.

McClelland said although he is not in financial trouble, "I don't want to sell to foreign interests and I don't want to be taken over by the government."

"I'm not all that fond of Canadians either, though this may sound odd coming from the past president of the Committee for an Independent Canada.

"I don't really like Canadian businessmen but I like this country and its potential... I want to make sure there will be one large option open to Canadian authors, because the other publishing houses are becoming more commercial.

"I can't think of better owners of a major publishing house than a group of student unions because if students don't identify with the future more than most people, then we're in terrible trouble," he said.

McClelland said that after 30 years of publishing he was ready for something else. "It no longer excites me," he said.

He explained the company would probably be sold to foreign interests after his death anyway, so he wants to sell now.

Varsity golf tip number nine - putting

By BILL WHITCOMBE

Putting refers to stroking the ball to the hole with a straight faced club after reaching the smooth surface of the putting green.

The putting stroke is certainly the most individual non-conforming stroke of all that you have been exposed to. While the fundamentals of the golf swing are pretty generally agreed upon by teaching experts, there are many varying styles of putting, even amongst the professionals, and it almost amounts to "whatever works".

Putting grips vary a bit, and putting stances vary considerably. One putting grip that is used more universally amongst the professionals, and is recommended for you as a beginner, is 'the reverse overlap' grip.

This grip is almost the reverse of our conventional overlapping grip taught in an earlier tip.

The steps for assuming the grip are as follows: place the right hand on the grip down near the lower part of the putter grip, align the right thumb down the front of the shaft and face the palm of the hand directly towards the target. The left hand is placed above the right with the palm directly opposed to the right palm, the left thumb aligned directly down the shaft, and the index finger of the left hand overlapping the little finger of the right hand.

The right elbow should rest close to the body, while the left elbow may rest where it feels most comfortable. The arms should be pretty well bent over at the waist.

There are almost as many stances as there are putters and a great deal of individuality takes place here. The important thing is to assume a stance that affords good perspective for the eyes with the cup and one that affords maximum stability of the body.

If one putting stance could be termed universal, it would be one in which the player stands with a square stance, feet eight to twelve inches apart, slightly flexed knees, bends forward prominently from the waist and maintains most of the weight on the left foot and the player's eyes are directly over the ball.

A stance that is comfortable and effective is what you should use. There are good putters that putt with their feet together, those that putt with their feet spread widely apart, those that putt off the left foot, and even one well-known professional who faces the hole and putts with one hand grasping the putter right down at the bottom of the shaft.

Two main types of putting strokes can be employed. You will have to decide which is best for you, or possibly utilize a combination of the two.

The first method is known as the 'wrist method', in which you assume your grip and stance over the ball, then strike the ball by simply breaking your wrists away from the ball and then back through the ball with a minimum of arm motion and the wrists breaking towards the cup.

The second method is known as the "shoulder method" in which you assume the stance and grip and then swing the entire arm assembly back and forth with the wrists remaining completely locked. The hinges in the swing are now in the shoulder joints, rather than in the wrists, and the arm assembly swings like a large pendulum. Many golfers will use the shoulder method, adding a bit of wrist action on the very long putts.

While there are some variations in the fundamentals of this phase of the game, we find some strict rules that should prevail no matter which stance or grip you use.

The eyes should be directly over the line running from the ball to the cup when the stance is assumed.

The stroke should follow closely a line running from the ball to the cup on a straight putt.

The body should be locked in to a stable position so as to eliminate any body sway or movement during the stroke.

The backswing should be kept short in proportion to the distance the ball must travel.

Here again we have the great stroke saver. Excellent putting can make up for many errors occurring on other parts of the course.

Putting and chipping are two phases of the game where the ladies can usually match the men, or even excel over them, because they are based on feel and finesse, rather than on strength.

Lady Blues second at OWIAA indoor meet

By JANET FLETCHER

On Saturday, the first official OWIAA Indoor Track and Field Championship meet was held at the CNE in conjunction with the annual OUA meet. Nine women's teams of varying sizes took part, with the large University of Western Ontario contingent taking overall honours.

However, the performance of the small U of T team deserves comment. The seven girls in the team turned in very strong performances to win 4 of the 10 events and place 2nd overall.

Lesley Evans had a busy afternoon. She began it by running the anchor leg of the relay, in which the U of T team finished 2nd. Then she ran the 1,500m, finishing second to her rival, Kathy Prosser from Brock. In the 1000m she managed to turn the tables on Prosser and finished first in the commendable time of 2:57.2.

Brenda Zeman was also kept on the move. She ran the fastest leg of the relay and then achieved a comfortable first place in the long jump despite having to take her jumps in between the 50m heats and semi-finals.

Geri Ashdown showed that she could reproduce her splendid training times in competition. She ran in the relay, the 300m, and 600m, winning the latter event in 1:35.4 despite lack of competition in her section of the event. Connie van Weerden, whose training has not been geared towards competition, surprised herself by winning the second section of the 600m and placing second to Ashdown on times.

Louise Walker demonstrated that she is ready for the nationals next week with a fine 1m 80cm win in the high jump.

Colleen O'Connor and Caroline Hebblethwaite both performed well in the spring events despite lack of indoor training.

Results:

Overall placings: Western 96, Toronto 65, Queens 32.
50m Hurdles: Damman (Wat) 7.2, Cooper (Wat) 7.4, Summers (Mac) 7.7.
4x200m Relay: Western 1:45.7, Toronto 1:49.0, Queen 1:50.2.
1500m: Prosser (Brock) 4:40.6, Evans (Tor) 4:55.7, Sinclair (West) 5:03.7.
High Jump: Walker (Tor) 1m 80, Bittner (West) 1m 65, Hladki (York) 1m 65.

600m: Ashdown (Tor) 1:35.4, van Weerden (Tor) 1:39.8, Bousfield (Queens) 1:42.5.

50m: MacGowan (Brock) 6.5, McIntyre (West) 6.7, Cooper (West) 6.8.
Long Jump: Zeman (Tor) 5m 37, Cooper (West) 4m 97, Vermeij (West) 4m 75.
300m: Damman (Wat) 39.9, McIntyre (West) 41.9, Wallace (York) 42.4.
1000m: Evans (Tor) 2:57.2, Prosser (Brock) 3:00.3, Sinclair (West) 3:09.9.

SMC, skule are winners in interfac playdowns

By MIKE FRIEND

The interfaculty hockey playoffs began on Monday night with Vic I and Grads I playing to a scoreless tie, SMC downing Scar I 4-0, and Jr. Eng. thumping Music 5-2.

In a game Vic figured to win easily, as Vic finished first in Div A while Grads finished third in I B, it proved a much sterner test than anticipated.

Vic had to contend with a much improved and spirited Grads team which was led by all-star goalie, John Haines. Haines and his counterpart in the Vic net, Doug Carter, made many excellent saves, which resulted in the 0-0 tie at the end of regulation time.

The system for breaking ties in playoff action is simple: play a ten-minute sudden-death overtime, and if necessary, play another. If the score is still tied, then replay the game. The latter occurred, and as a result, the replay will take place tonight at 8:30 pm.

On the whole, the game proved to be very entertaining and exciting with constant action. No matter what happens in the replay, Grads can be proud of their effort in this game as they held the Vic at bay with a solid team effort backed by the excellent goaltending of Haines.

The SMC victory over Scar was spoiled as two SMC players received match penalties for high sticking and swinging a stick at an opposing player.

The first incident, involving the SMC captain, Sibbet, seemed to be a case of reaction with an afterthought or the realization of the results before the action took place. Nevertheless, his stick made contact with the helmet of one of the Scar players and he was given a match penalty.

The second incident seemed like a deliberate retaliatory measure. White, of SMC, who was roughed up after the whistle by Scar player, Perkins, who received a roughing penalty, turned and took a deliberate swing at the upper back of the Scar player. Granted, he was provoked, but that does not condone his action which could have resulted in a serious injury.

Stickswinging has become all too common on occurrence in interfac games and must be stopped at all costs, even if it means very severe suspensions.

The game itself was an easy victory for SMC, but it might not have been if Scar's goaltender Allen, who was shaky, had been replaced by Watterson, before the fourth SMC goal. While Watterson was between the pipes he looked very sharp, preventing more SMC who was led by Mazza's two goals with singles going to Platt and Brady.

Music's loss to Jr Eng could have been much worse. It could have been their lives, as the Skulemen attempted to put their size advantage to work and hammer the musicians into submission. It seemed as though the engineers were thinking not about the music game, but the next one and as a result, played down to the level of their opposition and not up to their potential. This made the game very sloppy and at times almost a farce due to the ineptness of both teams.

One must admire the spirit and desire of the musicians for what should have been a rout was not, due to their tenacity. Jr Eng is by far the superior team from a talent point of view.

The musicians gave their fanatical fans a glimmer of hope late in the game when two quick goals made the score 4-2 for the engineers. A goal by MacDonald late in the game gave the engineers a more respectable 5-2 win. Other skule goals came from the sticks of Kennedy (2), Tojcic, and Plarge.

The boxing enthusiasts moved from the weights room at Hart House to the stadium.

Boxing alive and well at Varsity

By ROBERT ALGIE

Earlier this year, the combination weightlifting and boxing room obtained a Universal weightlifting machine, which taxed the already limited space in Hart House. This meant the boxing ring had to go. It appeared the great Varsity boxing tradition was dead.

In the past years, athletic administrators became afraid of boxing injuries, and when it was easy, the sport was given the boot. Only a few other Canadian universities run boxing even on a recreational level. (Queens, McGill and RMC).

Lack of staff as well as misplaced worry (of injuries) has been the problem. At U of T, however, there exists Tony Canzano.

With the loss of boxing imminent, the students who knew boxing as Canzano taught it, became rather upset, and due to their concern and interest, boxing has been revived and now lives in Varsity stadium. The facilities are quite adequate and in fact better than the previous arrangement.

The boxing club has about twenty-three members, with an average daily attendance of about sixteen. This year's activity started late with many experienced boxers. Most people, by this point, have made great progress in their skills. Wednesday, Mar. 5, will test these skills at Hart House.

There will be exhibition matches beginning from 8 pm. Boxing should be good and entertaining. It is presently hoped some fighters from Orangeville, the Parks and Recreation programme, and St. John's Training School in Uxbridge will fight as well.

This series of bouts will give the boxers needed experience to attend an intercollegiate tournament on March 14 and 15. Only five boxers will be travelling to Westchester, Pennsylvania to fight at Westchester State University. A few members are already chosen, but these fights will give Canzano a good chance to evaluate some of his other boxers.

Track Blues win OUA indoor meet

By HARRY ERR

The Varsity Blues track team won its second straight Indoor Track championship at the CNE last Saturday, despite strong opposition from Western and Queen's.

Toronto's Joe Sax and John Sharp placed one-two in the 1,500m run followed by Dave Yaeger from Guelph. Sax, national Steeplechase champion, won with a time of 3:48.6.

Gerry Feeney brought the Blues more points as he broke the Canadian indoor record with a win in the 600m run. He clocked what Feeney called an 'easy' 1:19.4 first place time, leading Wayne Ghans of Western and Blues' freshman Steve Lincoln in third place.

The 50m dash had three Toronto men amongst the six finalists after the heats. Vic Gooding of Queen's took the final with a time of 5.9 seconds followed by a three-way tie for second at a time of 6.0 seconds.

The 1000m run proved a sit and kick race. Brian Stride of Brock led Varsity's Phil Pyatt and Guelph's Jerry Bouma through the first 400 meters, in 57 seconds. Pyatt led at the 800 mark with a time of 1:54. Bouma waited for the final 150 meters and then moved ahead for a meet record of 2:24.6. Pyatt took second followed by Stride.

Queen's dominated the shot getting a first from Kevin Thompson with 13 meters 87 centimeters. Queen's John Ongarato was second, Western's Ken Fisher third.

Blues highlighted the long jumps as Jim Buchanan jumped to gold with 17m 16.

Veteran jumper Dave Watt, competing in his seventh OUA championship, won the triple jump with a total distance of 14m 47. Wally Huber from Western and John Darlington from Queen's took second and third.

In the 4x400m relay the Varsity team of Lincoln, Dave Hones, Dave Colbert, and Feeney, placed first followed by Western and Queen's. Toronto's winning time was 3:21.2.

Varsity also won the medley relay with a time of 10:02.8. The team of Mike Hart, Sharp, and Sax lead York, in second, and Western in third.

SGS declared V-ball champs

By TOM WOODS

The twice-postponed men's interfac volleyball final between Grads and Scar never will be played. In a farcical series of events, SGS has been declared the winner, taking the Victoria Staff Cup from the eastenders (last year's winners) without a fight.

The final match, originally scheduled for Feb. 19, was moved back a week at the request of Scarborough, because two players were writing an exam. SGS further agreed to reschedule the game to last Friday (two Scar players had a ski holiday during reading week), but when Scar captain Ihor Lotocky informed the Grads that this date was not feasible, SGS refused to bend any further.

The Grads, not wishing to win the volleyball title in the committee room, offered to play third place finisher Erindale. This move, however, was ruled out by Dave Copp, head of intramurals, who declared the schedule complete with SGS the champions.

In other volleyball action, the interfac all-stars topped the Blues, winning two games out of three on scores of 8-15, 15-6, and 15-2.

The match featured some of Ontario's top v-ball talent in the all-star lineup and rates as the best volleyball exhibition on campus in many years.

Varsity coach Reg Eadie was pleased with the play of his troops, noting, "I can put anyone out on the floor and he'll do a job. Since the start of the season, their (Blues') fundamentals have improved tremendously, and this has a big effect on their confidence and concentration while on the court."

Currently, the Blues are sporting a 12-6 record in the Ontario Volleyball Association Senior A league, second only to the record of the YMHA.

Attention Varsity staff

All Varsity staff members are urged to come to an important meeting today at 1 p.m. Topics to be discussed include the procedure for making a new staff editorial recommendation to The Varsity Board, candidates in the SAC and Governing Council elections whom the paper should endorse, plans for the last five issues and, most important, the location of the annual banquet.

The decisions made will affect all of us, so come and be part of them. And if you've never written for The Varsity, it's still not too late. The assignments are just pouring in, and we don't have enough reporters to handle everything. So drop by and give us a try—it'll take your mind off essays.

SAC approves FM move in principle

By BOB BETTSON

The Students Administrative Council decided in principle to partially fund the operation of an FM station on the U of T campus but Radio Varsity will be shut down pending the outcome of fund-raising attempts outside the university.

The motion by SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia was passed with only two votes in opposition at last night's SAC meeting.

It was a compromise hammered out with station representatives after the recent FM report's recommendation to immediately gear up for an FM license, which would involve considerable financial expenditures.

The decision to shut the station down will enable a core group of six or seven staff to operate with a budget of $3,800 over the summer. They will prepare for applying to the Canadian Radio Television Commission for an FM license in the fall if SAC approves.

The fall application will also depend on a successful fund-raising campaign outside the university for at least $50,000 and a marked improvement in Radio Varsity programming.

Summer staff will be expected to produce high quality programming for the CRTC to use to gauge the station's technical capabilities.

The approval in principle of the FM license followed the release of a report recommending Campus Community radio late last month.

The report called for a non-commercial FM station with community and campus input with an operating budget of $100,000 a year (a conservative estimate) and three full time employees with nine part-time staff.

Sabia told the council he had "grave" reservations about the ability of the station to put out the quality programming needed, but he felt "it would be irresponsible to make an absolute decision tonight."

"It is almost a Herculean task to become relevant to both the campus and the community," Sabia said.

But he said SAC should allow the FM committee to continue its work finding support for the station outside SAC.

He said the present station programming should not be continued because it is a "waste of students' money." But this is largely because of distribution problems. Radio Varsity is only now heard on a campus carrier current system which is deteriorating, speakers which are only useful for background music, and cable companies which are terminating transmission on April 1 because of licensing problems.

The chief opposition came from UC SAC representative Gus Richardson who questioned whether the students should be asked to support a professional campus radio station with salaries for full time people of up to $15,000.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley also had some reservations. "It's hard to believe if we shut the station down they can suddenly produce the kind of quality programming they want."

Services commissioner John Tuzyk said the proposed operation would be a student run station because with only three full time staff, students would retain control of the programming and direction of the station.

Law SAC representative Danny Henry, a member of the FM committee, said the station had "fantastic potential." He pointed out the CRTC is quite favorable having already given licenses to Vancouver Cooperative Radio and an FM station at Laval University.

The station will still have to face two tests before it goes ahead; being approved by SAC in the fall and the CRTC hearings after that.

Sabia said the station's funding next year will be under constant SAC supervision.

Commissioner Mike Sabia presented compromise motion.

Nader urges public research groups

By PAUL RAYNOR

American environmental and consumer rights crusader Ralph Nader urged Canadian students to set up a network of public interest research groups which could represent "the most powerful single voice in Canada, and that includes Imperial Oil."

He was speaking to an audience of 200 people at the evening session of a SAC-sponsored conference on consumer and environmental action.

"The essence of democracy is citizen action," Nader said. He charged that North American people devote more time to trivial things than they do to things that really matter.

"While the United States has some 15,000 full-time manicurists," Nader pointed out, "there is no such career as a full-time citizen."

"There are no potential changes on the horizon which will not require a great increase in citizen action," Nader said. The basic allotment of time by U.S. citizens to citizen action approaches, on the average, zero, he said.

Nader will not devote the time, Nader said, because they feel it won't do any good, or because they fear punishment from employers or from other institutions.

"A society in which you cannot speak the truth for fear of reprisals is not a free society," Nader charged.

The greatest factor contributing to low citizen action, Nader said, is people simply don't know how to go about it.

"The basic problem is making people aware of the best ways to take citizen action on their concerns."

"The first step is the connection of value and fact. People must be able to apply their dissatisfaction with a situation in a practical way, so they can do something about it."

DISCLOSURES

Nader said there are literally stacks of disclosures on industrial abuses in the U.S. resulting from Congressional hearings which cry out for changes in the system. But little is being done because of the lack of citizen action to take hold of the issues, he added.

He said if Canadians hope to achieve the reforms which are so badly needed, their first job should be to work for the repeal of the Official Secrets Act. "There is no place for an Official Secrets Act in a democracy," Nader stated.

Nader also stressed the need for a Canadian Freedom of Information Act similar to recent amendments in the United States.

The amendments which came about were the result of direct citizen action, he said.

"In citizen activity as in military activity there is always a Khyber

Soc profs knock move to circumvent students

By MARINA STRAUSS

Fourteen sociology department faculty members released a statement to fellow department members yesterday objecting to recent attempts "to reduce student involvement and to eliminate the legislative function of the (department's) assembly."

The statement comes in response to a straw vote at a meeting of sociology faculty members last Saturday which indicated overwhelmingly the department's assembly as a legislative body should be done away with.

The move would likely mean an end to student-faculty parity representation. Sociology is presently the only department in the Faculty of Arts and Science with parity on all governing bodies.

The 14 faculty members' statement says they are "not opposed to changes in the departmental structure if they maintain or accelerate the improvement of the past years."

They urge their colleagues to "reconsider their current view" on the proposal to abolish legislative functions of the department's key governing body.

"This proposal might very well contribute to greater polarization within the department, between our students, the junior and senior faculty."

Sociology faculty members set up an assessment committee of five people in January to review department structure and programs. The committee presented an interim majority and minority report to faculty members Saturday.

The faculty members subsequently voted—to give the committee some guidance in future work—on the minority report, which would abolish legislative functions of the assembly and replace it as a forum of discussion with no voting power. The majority report called for retention of the department's status quo parity structure.

Sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin has reportedly told students if a staff-student split arose over structure proposals, with Zeitlin supporting the staff stand, the recommendation would not go through the present legislative assembly but would be left in his hands.

The chairman theoretically has the power to make such decisions without assembly approval.

Students last month set up a parallel assessment committee to draw up their own review and proposals for department policies and structure to bring to the chairman, and Zeitlin has said he will make no decisions before the students' view has been presented.

In their statement, the 14 faculty members note a "number of critical issues . . . are confronting us now."

"One is to prepare for the coming ACAP (Advisory Committee on Academic Planning) assessment. A second is to find a way to strengthen our teaching program in light of severe budget constraints, and a third issue is how to increase participation and encourage the pluralistic outlook of this department."

Ralph Nader says PIRG could be most powerful voice in Canada.

University to evaluate staff for merit bonus

By RUPERT FORD

The university will conduct regular evaluations of all staff members in the future to determine whether they deserve a merit pay, U of T president John Evans said yesterday.

At a meeting with about 200 non-academic staff members at Convocation Hall to elaborate on last week's budget proposals, Evans said staff "would be made aware of the results of the evaluations and their shortcomings explained" to permit self-improvement.

Evans reminded the non-academic staff a merit increase averaging five percent will be awarded to "staff doing a good job."

The merit scheme will provide higher percentage increases for staff earning less than the midpoint of their salary range, he pointed out.

The merit increases, Evans explained, were intended to provide "the same opportunity for advancement as experienced by the academic staff in the university."

"The vast majority of staff will get some merit increases" and only in "unusual" cases will the employee get nothing.

He added some staff will receive only limited merit increases "if they are close to the top of their salary range."

Evans announced at last Thursday's Governing Council meeting that non-academic staff will be given eight percent salary increases and an across-the-board $500 bonus as of July 1.

At yesterday's meeting Evans emphasized lower salaried non-academic employees will fare better under this scheme. The increase amounts to a 16 percent raise for staff earning $6,000 a year, but only 12 percent for $12,000 a year employees.

Academic staff with salaries under $28,000 will receive a 12 percent increase July 1.

In response to a query from the audience, Evans refused to comment on reasons for the firing last month of former University News Bureau director Leonard Bertin.

Evans would only say the dismissal had been "considered over a long period."

The university president also declined to say why Bertin was not permitted to hear the charges against him at a Governing Council external affairs meeting or whether Bertin had been adequately compensated for the treatment given him.

External affairs vice-president Norman James replaced Bertin with his own executive assistant, Elizabeth Wilson, without offering the post for competition.

Evans said he was "very much concerned" that proper hiring and firing policies be employed at U of T because campus staff morale.

NDP 'obsessed with things human'

By LIAM LACEY

One of the defining characteristics of the NDP party is an "obsession with things human," provincial NDP leader Stephen Lewis said.

He and federal NDP parliamentary leader Ed Broadbent were speaking at yesterday afternoon's NDP Symposium session on The NDP Party in Canada.

The week-long symposium was held in the Med Sci Building this week as part of a concerted effort to resuscitate the defunct campus NDP party.

"It's been said of the NDP it has an inheritance of baby bonuses, welfare and health benefits and once these things are accomplished we will have nothing left to do," Lewis said.

But that was wrong, Lewis argued. "For us it is always a matter of personal cases."

The social priorities of the province are so "out of whack, the rights of man are lost in the lusts of the productivity process," he said.

As an example, Lewis noted that the company Inco made $25 million more last year than the government, "that is, the people," will get from the entire mining industry.

"Nothing makes any sense to us without the human dimensions in social analysis," Lewis argued.

Broadbent addressed the audience first, explaining how the NDP party behaved differently from the other parties.

He cited as an example the last federal budget in which Liberal labor minister John Munro had suggested certain deductions income tax would allow from between $100 to $750 savings to the taxpayer, depending upon his tax bracket.

The Conservative party, "the bastion of 18th century creativity," suggested even more across-the-board deductions, Broadbent charged.

By contrast the NDP suggested a $400 deduction for everyone earning up to $5,000 yearly, but none for those making more than that, he said.

As another example, Broadbent cited the so-called housing crisis that was a big threat in the July federal election.

"When I asked Trudeau about his housing crisis in September, he blithely said, 'Oh, I have four years to handle that.'"

Broadbent said one million housing units had to be built just to meet the minimum requirements, but that the government wasn't doing much about it.

Housing was not a commodity but a right and should not be handled by the ordinary market system, he said. As a solution, he suggested the financial sector be directed how to put money into housing.

As a third example of how the NDP behaves differently from the other parties, he mentioned the handling of natural resources by multinationals such as Syncrude.

In the tar sands development, the Canadian people are putting up 75 percent of the money to get only 35 percent of the shares while multinationals conversely are putting up only 30 percent of the money for 70 percent of the shares. The companies are also securing the right to charge Canadians world prices for oil and to export oil to the U.S.

Broadbent said the NDP would like the resources democratically controlled both to control the rate of development and the price.

In short, he said, the NDP policy is to create "step by step, piece by piece, the transformation of our society whereby resources and industry should be directly or indirectly controlled by the public."

Pass," Nader said. He stressed a selective emphasis on certain strategic points of a citizen campaign can often accomplish more than a general attack on a series of related issues.

GAIN INFORMATION

Nader outlined his individual strategy for effective citizen action. The first step is gaining enough information to stimulate the sense of dissatisfaction in as many people as possible.

Secondly, one must develop a strategy of forming coalitions and allies among groups with common concerns. Finally he called for an attitude of expertise and professionalism which is frequently absent from citizen action groups. This attitude will result in a higher degree of accomplishment he said.

"What is missing," Nader said, "is not a sufficient number of aggrieved people but sufficient communication."

Nader said the greatest source for this communication and citizen action lies within the university community.

"Students have many assets which other citizens lack. They have access to technical information; they are able, unlike many workers, to develop a "double track"—pursuing both studies and citizen action simultaneously.

"Students can work with the society on an investigative base without the same fear that inhibits many workers from citizen action."

He added that students as a rule have more time to channel in these directions than other citizens.

ROLE QUESTIONED

Nader questioned the role of university as trade school which often conceives its purpose as little more than a moulding machine for industry. He argued that the university's role should be on the investigative level, dealing with specific human and social problems.

Nader advocated the concept of the university as "an inquirer into major problems as part of their ongoing academic menu. This can only be accomplished by students."

In support of his conclusions, Nader pointed to the success of student citizen action groups in the United States.

These groups, called Public Interest Research Groups (PIRG) are financed by the students the same way SAC is financed with a per capita levy.

These groups work full-time with students and professionals to support citizen action causes.

Nader said part of his reason for coming to the U of T is to draw attention to the University of Ottawa's newly formed Ontario PIRG.

STUDENT ISSUE

He said student PIRG's represent a welcome and powerful voice for citizen action on the basis of the constant supply of students and the energy, intelligence and drive which gives them their moving force.

In addition, Nader said, students have a wealth of connections with many other active citizen groups in the community.

He stressed what is ultimately most important is the individual dedication of time. He suggested each individual should select a cause which he or she is interested in and begin learning the techniques and strategies to achieve the desired ends.

Nader charged North Americans are suffering from lethargy, depression and apathy. He said citizen action fills the gap, bringing people back to life in a way which is both essential and constructive.

Need alliance to fight cutbacks

Two events this week suggest university communities are not going to take the provincial cutbacks in higher education lying down.

On Tuesday, representatives of campus workers, students and faculty got together and agreed on the importance of mutual aid. As CUPE local 1230 president Judy Darcy put it, "It's becoming increasingly obvious to everyone that we won't be able to get what we want by ourselves without the support of other groups."

And as faculty association Bill Nelson pointed out, a common front will prevent "divide and conquer" tactics by the administration. "They like to play the pie game — if we give you more of the pie, we have to give somebody else less. This ploy is fundamentally dishonest. The pie is not of a fixed size."

The formation of an alliance between students, faculty and non-academic staff is a major step forward. That they perceive themselves in an equally disadvantaged position is enlightening and encouraging.

Starting today, a weekend conference at Brock University brings students from all over the province to analyze the effect of the cutbacks, and to develop a strategy to fight them.

The conference certainly puts the lie to those who say students are either unwilling or unable to take collective action any more. If successful, it will be the beginning of a powerful student movement, fighting tooth and nail for an accessible and affordable higher education system.

Students realize that either things are going to get worse, or worse still. Only if they take collective action will things improve.

There is already a strong research and lobbying base — the Ontario Federation of Students, an organization which has shown remarkable maturity for the few short years it has been in operation. All it needs is mass support.

Make no mistake about it: the government is firm in its intent to cut back spending, make education more "efficient", yet it still insists on quality and maintenance of opportunity, both of which will inevitably decline if the present level of funding continues.

The effects will be severe. University employees have already felt the pinch in low salary settlements — lower than both the civil service and the private sector. Students will soon feel them as the implementation of next year's budgets brings fewer courses, larger classes and the abandonment of innovative programs. And soon after that, tuition fees and loan ceilings will be raised.

Students, staff and faculty have realized concurrently that they have a common enemy — the provincial government — and a common aim — maintenance of properly funded higher education. They have also realized that their best hope for the future lies in working side by side.

Ontario liberals launch "kiss me I'm a liberal" campaign

Saddened by small crowd for Nader

This letter represents a personal reflection on the appearance of Mr. Ralph Nader at Convocation Hall on the evening of Wednesday, March 5.

Quite frankly, I was disgusted by the absence of a large turnout of people to hear this gentleman speak. I would certainly hope that it was the admission that kept crowds away. A nominal price of 50 cents was charged to students which I don't think would have begun to cover Mr. Nader's travel expense.

Considering that issues such as citizen action against consumer abuse, environmental protection, freedom to acquire information from government, and government-corporate conspiracies, to name a few, are of more immediate importance than the no doubt pleasurable renditions of Gentle Giant, the noticeable lack of student interest in vital social areas, demonstrated by such a poor attendance, is appalling.

It is not as if Mr. Nader cried out poetically against injustice, or mourned the passing of democracy in North America for two hours or so. He spoke of decisive action and he clearly and concisely outlined the possible procedures for the successful implementation of such action. The story of the Nader organization in the U.S. is indeed a successful one and it stands as a most encouraging precedent for the future action of those concerned with the actualization of human betterment.

It is with dismay that I notice what appears to be a pall of social apathy descending on this campus. I sincerely hope that, amidst the hustle and bustle intrinsic to the acquisition of a university degree, U of T students never have pause to regret the absence of an education in the equitable satisfaction of human rights and needs.

Contest criteria were too limited

Lawrence Clarke's report of the Hart House photo exhibition in last Friday's Varsity was most pointed, and to an extent justified. However, I would like to point out a few things which Mr. Clarke did not mention, but which underly the exhibition in its present shape.

Mr. Clarke assumes that most of the photographers concentrated on technical proficiency and "kitsch". His assumption is wrong, but understandably so since any visitor to the Hart House gallery sees what only three people (albeit the judges) thought were good photographs, and in this case, it was the judges' professed opinion that technical excellence was the foremost criterion. But in spite of Mr. Clarke's opinion, a photograph need not be of social importance to be good.

Many people (including probably most of the entrants) would like to see all the entered photographs displayed; I feel that despite the lack of space and poor lighting this would be a great boon to the scope and the interest of the exhibition.

Finally, the present form of the exhibition as a contest severely limits it because this form of judging doesn't really have too much to do with photography. Many people who refrain from entering photographs in the exhibition because of its "contest" nature must therefore forfeit the chance to exhibit before the large audience which visits the show or else seek other places to exhibit.

Since the initial impact of the women's movement in the late 60s I have noticed a new imbalance in my and other men's lives. Whereas more women seem to be maintaining and extending their intimacies with both men and women, men are mostly being left without such continuity.

It is instructive to look at this new imbalance, to see the new sexual contradictions that can surface as we try to undo our socialization within the bourgeois culture. Part of this imbalance can be explained by surveying the relative advantages and disadvantages for men and women, as the patriarchal perceptions of the nuclear family within state capitalism begin to break down.

These advantages and disadvantages, as we shall see, are heavily laden with ideological remnants of bourgeois social relations. The single male, for example, faced with the shrinking prospect of stabilising his existence in the roles of the nuclear family, and without a cultural alternative, can look despairingly upon the new freedoms of the women. (Married men, who imagine or fantasize their little kingdom crashing down, obviously also look anxiously upon the new freedoms of women.) This has partly to do with the loss of the paternal role and the chance to be the definer and provider, but it also has to do with the more fundamental loss of the chance to have children — given that no alternative social form to fulfill this need has yet been developed.

But it also has to do with the relative sexual advantages that many single women have over most single men. Women do not centre in on a single man the way that men centre in upon single women. As such, the single male not only faces the loss of his socialized identity within the nuclear family; if he can not or does not want to actively "compete" for a woman's companionship he faces the chance of being utterly alone. Many women also face this predicament, but there is usually an imbalance in the way it is described in the women's liberation literature.

Demystifying the Oedipal Complex

This same imbalance brought about by the ending of the monopoly of patriarchal sex roles without the disappearance of many of the complementary habits and stereotypes, can also be explained by looking at our sexual identifications as children. This has something to do with the so-called Oedipal complex, though the neo-Freudians in the American empire have successfully obscured the issue with their dogmas. The woman, as mother, does not impose the differentiation of "male" and "female" with anything like the intensity that the father (in the nuclear family under state capitalism) does. Both of us, male and female, come from the female body (and the male body, but in a less obvious way and on a far different time scale). So, in a sense, we are more children than males or females to our mothers.

Under the present cultural and economic system, whether we are a boy or a girl, we learn our dominant sexual modes in relation to our fathers. But this sexual differentiation has different implications for the male and female. The little girl, for example, does not have to suppress her erotic relationship with her father nearly as much or so early as the little boy does with his mother. The little girl can imitate her mother and even flirt with her father, or other older men, whereas the little boy will imitate his father in many non-erotic ways but usually doesn't dare compete with him for, or interfere with, the affection of the mother.

This starts the small girl off in a different relation, with some definite advantages to both the mother and father. She can, potentially be affectionate with both parents whereas the boy not only greatly suppresses his earlier intimacy with his mother but ends up relating to his father in a guarded, distant manner. This socialization, highly dependent upon the division of labour under capitalism (home, work; manual, mental; biology, technology, etc.) establishes the emotional foundation for many of our later social roles and relationships. As such, it is far more resistant to change than are the actual roles themselves. This emotional basis of sex roles is actually what cements the social relations around sexuality and therefore an affront on the roles can easily turn into a purely ideological and rhetorical critique, without leading to a basic change of behaviour.

This partly explains why, with the breakdown of some of the sexual stereotypes of this society, we find new sexual contradictions appearing. Because these are a new basis for new polarizations between male and female, and because these contradictions should never be allowed to become antagonistic to the point of shifting attention away from the more fundamental contradictions of power and wealth between classes, we need to both quickly come to grips with this problem.

The Emotional Intellectual Split

Any attempt to make sense of the relative effects of sexual relations, depending upon the family from and the person, male or female, whose experience is being evaluated, can ultimately get very confusing. For example, a man (or woman) who is relatively popular and attractive, according to existing norms, may not be able to identify with the large number of men (or women) who are not in the centre of the "sexual marketplace". The very fact that men still rely upon women for emotional confidence and the added fact that a relatively small number of men try to monopolize the "sexual marketplace" means that a large number of men are left to each other, or alone, in either case without deep communication.

This structural relationship goes a long way in explaining the tendency of men in groups towards infantile and chauvinistic behavior. If deprived of the chance for emotionally satisfying relationships, we are prone to sublimate our energy into superficial roles, at home and work, and then to "let go" every once and a while. Also, the latent hostility many men feel for women, who they do not know how to get close to, or to other men who may undercut their chances of doing this, is the source of a great amount of the male's drive for power and control.

What I am saying can, perhaps, be clarified by making an analogy between women and men. It is common to hear women complain that they have relied more upon men than other women for intellectual stimulation, though this has definitely changed with the growth of the women's movement. This imbalance has obviously been very costly for women. An opposing tendency, also linked to our childhood identifications with our parents, has been very costly for men. In much the same way that women have looked to men for intellectual stimulation in the past, men have and still do look to women for emotional confidence. This is so deeply rooted in the social relations of the society that there is even a grand mythology about it (e.g. the woman who the man confides in becomes the "other woman" in a sexual triangle).

Men don't confide in each other very much or very often, and there has been little change in this regard since the 60s. Women are therefore becoming conversant, both emotionally and intellectually, with men while men are still deprived of such a balanced relationship with men themselves. Now that sisterhood has given more women an independence from men regarding intellectual (though not yet technological) activities, they are potentially conversant, both emotionally and intellectually, with both men and women. Men are not conversant, both emotionally and intellectually, with either.

This imbalance seems to create the conditions for its continuance, unless, that is, men consciously act to overcome it. With men not being socialized to be intimate with their fathers or their sons, or other men, we are often left to ourselves, especially when the going gets rough. Because to be "male" in this culture is to be self-reliant we are further encapsulated in the individual confusion that can result from the new sexual contradictions we will face through the 70s.

This preliminary analysis shows why many of the leadership initiatives on the cultural front can and have been taken by women. It also shows that men have a need and the collective basis to form an emotional and political brotherhood in sharp contrast to the superficial and chauvinistic solidarities of men in groups.

The fact that we both have learned to differentiate our sex mainly in relation to our fathers makes it harder for males to establish non-sexist relationships with both women and men. We are more attuned to the cues of sexual differentiation, and, as such, are less able to see the potential for mutuality with both other men and women. To the extent that we remain competitive, we will relate superficially and likely aggressively and defensively to other men, and women. Through our positive identification with our father we may even have come to non-identify with our mothers and the female in us. Through our father's eyes we may even see women mostly, even if ulteriorly, as wives and mothers of our children, and other men as threats to this system of personal control.

Because of the overriding presence of the male ego (competitive, aggressive, intellectualized) we will find it easier to relate to other women at an emotional level (if we even express this aspect of ourselves) than to other men. Hence the basis for women maintaining and extending their friendships with both men and women, while men have difficulty being mutual with both but are more prone to be intimate with women.

The Learning Machine

In the contests for Head of College and Trinity and St. Hilda's third year math student Gordon Webb and second year student Karen McRae were elected.

This position is similar to the student council president at other colleges. Webb, who has been an active debater, athlete and actor at Trinity, defeated third year philosophy student David Mills for Trinity Head of College.

McRae was acclaimed at St. Hilda's. Elections at Trinity will continue for the next few weeks with the next positions up for grabs Head of Arts and SAC representatives.

Chris Driscoll and Elliott Milstein are contesting the St. Michael's College presidential elections but nominations are still open until later today for SAC representatives and vice-president.

All would be acclaimed if no other candidates appear.

Ellen Kass is the only present candidate for vice-president. Rimus Miscius and services commissioner John Tuzyk are running for re-election as SAC reps and they are joined by Marjan Glovac, Maurice Daniels and John Brown. There are five seats.

Elections are next week.

The Engineering Society has its first woman president.

Third year engineering student Marta Ecsedi was elected yesterday in a turnout which was twice as high as last year.

Elected administrative vice-president was Rob West, a third year engineering science student. Vice-president responsible for activities, Dave Robson, was acclaimed.

Ecsedi was elected on a platform of experienced leadership and a continuation of present successes in social and educational activities.

She stressed quality rather than quantity in running society events and wants to get more students involved.

York GAA applies to board

TORONTO (CUP) — The York University Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) has applied to the Ontario Labor Relations Board for certification as a bargaining agent for over 1,000 York graduate assistants.

The application, the result of almost a year of organizing among part-time teachers, demonstrators and markers, is the second GAA effort currently before the OLRB.

Board examiners, the GAA and the University of Toronto are still haggling over 2,000 U of T teaching assistants.

The association is already certified at U of T's Victoria College, where negotiations for a first contract are underway.

At York the GAA has called for a pre-hearing vote to determine the wishes of the graduate assistants involved. Once that hurdle is cleared, the association hopes to be certified in time to begin bargaining in the fall.

The York application indicates the growing interest in unionism among teaching assistants in the province.

The original application for certification at U of T was made less than a year ago. Since then inquiries about unionizing have come from campuses across the province and the York drive has been completed.

HEADED FOR DISASTER

The decline of corporate credibility

But make no mistake: it is getting harder and harder to peacefully enjoy the fortune you've sweated for.

Part of the problem, says a spokesman for Shell Oil (Canada), is that many people suffer under "the illusion that industry profits are excessive."

To correct this misconception, the Canadian Petroleum Association, embarrassed by last year's record profits, is tackling the very core of the problem. They're bringing in a new accounting system that will make their profits appear smaller. Hopefully, this should help them to avoid problems such as those faced by Bell Telephone, which has been continually harassed by citizen groups claiming its profits (up only 72 percent in the second quarter of 1974, before the rate increase) are too high.

Simultaneously, the Canadian business community is attempting to educate the public to the realities of the broader situation. For example, Arthur J.R. Smith, President of the Conference Board of Canada, argues that it is business that is faring badly in the current inflationary situation, while other groups, such as the jobless, "have improved their relative position."

"Despite the frequently expressed concern about the burdens of high inflation on the elderly, the disadvantaged, the unemployed, and low income groups, it is by no means clear that these have been losing ground," he says.

This seemingly novel viewpoint is borne out by Keith Rapsey, Past President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. Unemployment insurance, he says, is "a glorious windfall to those who would much prefer to live at their neighbour's expense than to work." He leaves the impression that in the face of increasing criticism and income reductions many corporate executives and shareholders might very well be tempted to simply drop their public-spirited quest for profits, the mainstay of the economy, and go on unemployment benefits themselves.

Rapsey is also concerned to make people go beyond their superficial prejudices to realize that wages, not profits, are the real villain in inflation. He isn't fazed by busybody critics who claim to find significance in the fact that wages are rising by 15 percent per year at most, less than the annual rise in the price of food, while profits are rising by 37 percent or more, having reached an all-time high. Despite this, he says, profits have been running "dangerously low," if investment levels are to be sustained.

In this context, Rapsey denounced "our gutless government" for its handling of "illegal" strikes. He finds it "outrageous" that strikers are striking for wage increases to keep pace with inflation even though their current contracts have not run out.

His position is backed by the Ontario Chambers of Commerce, who at their last convention called for stronger action on "illegal strikes," as well as an outright ban on "sympathetic strikes, mass picketing, strikes due to jurisdictional disputes, boycotts, or other forms of intimidation."

If something is not done to reverse the situation in which wage earners, "the elderly, the disadvantaged, the unemployed, and other low income groups" (including students) fatten themselves while the owners of the corporations are plunged deeper and deeper into poverty, our business leaders may decide to stop supporting us with their work, to stop making profits, in short, to "drop out". And then where would we be?

Student Attitudes on Business

By ULLI DIEMER

As if there wasn't enough trouble already. As if the corporate psyche didn't have enough worries, what with taxes, inflation, recession, angry consumers, angry workers, ecologists, and all the rest.

Now there's bad news from the campuses as well.

"Don't be fooled by the quiet: students mean trouble for business" reads a recent headline in Executive Magazine, a glossy Canadian business publication owned by the Southam Corporation.

The article concerns an "exhaustive study of the corporate image among university students", performed recently by Unimarc Consulting, Limited, a Toronto-based management consulting company. Unimarc came up with some interesting figures.

"Perhaps the most significant general finding," says the article, "is the fact that 77 percent of the sample expressed a basically negative opinion of the overall conduct and performance of the business community in Canada. In fact, 35 percent of the students claimed to hold extremely negative views."

It goes on to say that "a clear sign that student feelings toward business have not mellowed in recent years is found among the 62 percent of the recent sample who stated that they have become more negative toward business over the past two years. A mere 7 percent — and these were mostly hard-core business students — reported that their feelings had moved the other way in the same period."

"But," the article adds, finding a note of cheer where it can, "business does have more allies on the campuses than just business school students. While 14 percent of those polled claimed a generally favourable attitude toward business, only about 6 percent of the university student population are enrolled in B-school courses."

But there isn't a hell of a lot to cheer about. Asked their "attitude toward the free enterprise (sic) system as it now exists," 44 percent of the students say they "mostly disapprove" and an additional 38 percent say they "strongly disapprove." A mere 4 percent say they "strongly approve", while a further 6 percent say they "mostly approve."

Eighty-six percent think that the profit motive has done society "more harm than good."

The work ethic fares equally badly. Only 8 percent expressed support for it, more or less, while 41 percent say they "mostly reject" it and 44 percent say they "strongly reject" it.

The article goes on to point out how attitudes to the work ethic are a threat primarily to the values fostered by business. As it says, "it is not work, per se, that students are rejecting. Solid effort is alive and well on the campuses and so is the spirit of competition. But what students are rejecting is the notion that hard work, any kind of work, always pays off and that a regular job, any job, is essential to a person's social and spiritual well being."

Individual business leaders don't fare too well either. The students were asked to rank 20 well-known people in order of how they liked them.

The three businessmen on the list, E.P. Taylor, Stephan Roman, and Henry Ford II, finished in the last three spots.

J. Richard Finlay, President of Unimarc Consulting Ltd., which performed the survey, warns that the implications of the study "threaten to disrupt almost every aspect of corporate life." He warns that it is "dangerously wrong" to think that "students have mellowed a lot in the past few years toward business."

He calls for a major public relations effort to counteract current student attitudes. "Business must do a better job of selling itself," he says.

He suggests "joint corporate-campus advisory groups. Such bodies would include membership of top executives and student leaders" and would "encourage communication."

He also suggests "a centre for corporate-campus affairs" as "a good vehicle for encouraging youthful criticism — in a positive spirit — of business."

Mr. Finlay does not make it clear whether "strong disapproval" of the free enterprise system, the profit motive, and the work ethic are to be considered criticism "in a positive spirit" or whether they are "destructive."

Nor does he consider the possibility that student attitudes might be held strongly enough that even "increased communication" could not reverse them, let alone the possibility that, perhaps, the "youthful criticism" might be correct.

Finlay does think that the survey is reliable. Although it was limited to Ontario campuses, he feels that the results can be extrapolated to the university student population in the rest of the country. Over 1,000 students were surveyed, all in the spring term of 1974.

Bleeding Corporate Hearts

By ULLI DIEMER

Being rich isn't all that it's cracked up to be.

In fact, to judge by what Canada's business groups and publications say, it's a real drag.

Things are so bad, it seems, that making a few million honest dollars is enough to reap you worries, ulcers, and instant unpopularity.

Students, workers, housewives, and other unformed numbskulls are always ready to scream about "rip-offs", it seems, little realizing that things are so bad the average capitalist lives in virtual poverty these days.

Sometimes you even have to pay taxes, although mercifully many corporations can still avoid that at least because of government tax concessions, inadequate though they are.

Lawyer wants sentences upheld

University prosecution lawyer David Griffiths took centre stage at the Caput appeal Wednesday to argue the sentences against SDS members Bill Schabas and Tony Leah should be upheld.

Leah and Schabas were convicted last June by Caput, U of T's all faculty top disciplinary body, for preventing visiting lecturer Edward Banfield from speaking. The pair claimed he was a racist and had no right to speak.

Griffiths said the two had set themselves up as arbiters for the entire university, and that the central issue was not whether Banfield was a racist, but that freedom of speech must be upheld. Leah and Schabas are arguing against the "extraordinarily harsh" sentences meted out by Caput, and claiming there were mitigating circumstances: that Caput over-extended its authority by ordering 'black marks' on their transcripts, and that the university had failed to deal with the issue of racism. Leah was sentenced to a three year suspension, Schabas to four years.

Leah said he did expect some reduction of the sentences.

In similar incidents in the United States, the stiffest sentence meted out has been a one-year suspension.

Local health programs urged

By JILL MIZEN

Parkdale MPP Jan Duxsza and Ward 11 alderwoman Anne Johnston Tuesday called for the establishment of local medical clinics, under central budget in control but with autonomous administrative policy.

Fifteen people attended the symposium sponsored by the U of T NDP Club which was designed to air issues of importance to the provincial NDP.

Toronto spends 25 percent of its tax dollars on public health yet elsewhere in the province, the figure ranges from 50-75 percent. Johnston said. Decentralized administration would cater to disparate regional needs, although Johnston and Duxsza admit such a system would also imply a larger bureaucracy.

One basic drawback of the present system, Johnston says, is "most political decisions are made on a budgetary basis, not on the basis of need." In addition, Board of Health appointments are "made in a very political way," with little interest exhibited by the appointees in health issues.

Ninety five percent of the Ontario health budget is currently being spent on treatment with the remaining 5 percent on preventative measures, Johnston said.

She rejects Morton Shulman's suggestion of a deterrent physician fee to cut treatment costs. Such a measure, both speakers charged, would effectively bar the poorest 15 percent of the population from medical aid.

Health costs are escalating and such increases, Duxsza says, are justified only if the services provided are constructive and flexible. The present system fulfills neither of these requirements, he says.

Johnston suggested reforms which include democratic election by hospital employees and taxpayers of hospital boards and the redistribution of school nurses on the basis of need.

Johnston and Duxsza criticized the "vast gap" which exists in environmental health organization. She says the Board of Health regards the current Environmental Board hearings with "disinterested interest."

The Ministry of Health has consented to finance the hearings which until now have been funded by municipal tax dollars.

Only 12 Toronto doctors have peripheral knowledge of lead poisoning and American doctors have been requested to testify at the hearings, Johnston said.

She charges U of T is "scared of making a response" on the issue of lead poisoning because of its reliance on provincial funds.

Both speakers called for a radical solution to the lead, asbestos, cadmium and zinc poisoning issues. The ministries of the environment, health and labor, they charged, are not prepared to react.

They use the defence that the evidence of contamination levels in the blood of workers and residents in districts where poisoning has been investigated is not statistically significant.

Johnston called for government support for environmental research.

Victor Feldbrill in rehearsal with the university's symphony orchestra which is made up entirely of students.

U of T orchestra tackles the 9th

Beethoven's ninth symphony, the Choral, is loved or hated by musicologists, but remains a cornerstone of both orchestral and choral repertoires.

The Edward Johnson building was humming with activity, as the U of T orchestra, choir, and soloists prepared the ninth for a premiere of sorts.

This is the first time in the orchestra's history that the Ninth has been attempted.

Victor Feldbrill, conducting, is a graduate of the Faculty, who has conducted the Winnipeg Symphony, the National Youth Orchestra, and is presently the resident conductor of the TSO, and conductor in residence for the U of T.

On top of that, Feldbrill holds classes in conducting, and rehearses the orchestra four hours a week. (Playing in the orchestra is a required course for instrumentalists in the faculty.)

Since Feldbrill's appointment as conductor in 1968, not one work has been repeated.

"When deciding on repertoire, I try to see that all styles are represented in four years.

"On top of that, we have reading sessions to play through works not in the year's repertoire."

Feldbrill feels he benefits greatly from working with students.

"They keep you thinking—there are no rules. You also rediscover the music—each year—with them."

Charles Heffernan, head of the Music Education department conducts the choir, whose ranks have swollen to 180 for this performance. Various alumni are returning to sing in the final movement of the Ninth.

Deborah Jeans, soprano, Linda Marcenkus, alto, Paul Fry, tenor, and Daniel Lichty, baritone, are the soloists.

Carla Goldberg will play Mozart's Second Horn Concerto in E Flat to complete the program.

Student tickets are $1 with your ATL. The Box Office is open until 5:00 today, and Sunday evening until the 8:30 curtain.

Pumping Iron

New book brilliantly explores

Pumping Iron

Arnold Schwarzenegger bounds off the posing dias at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with the audience's ravenous applause assuring him he has captured bodybuilding's highest title, Mr. Olympia, for the fourth straight time.

After a year of training, sometimes pushing or pulling as much as 240 tons of iron in a single week, 'The Austrian Oak' has bulked his 6'2" frame up to 240 pounds, sculpting it around his 57" chest, 22" arms, 31" waist, 28" thighs and 20" calves.

Special "bombing" exercises — quick repetitions of heavy poundages—have cut and striated the muscles and gorged the veins so that his choreographed posing routine can show off every ripple, flex and swoop to fan the swollen, almost hysterical crowd's delight.

Asked later what he was thinking about, Schwarzenegger ventures in broken English "Number one, it runs through my mind it is very obvious I am the king."

"Then I thought to the audience, just keep screaming now because you're going to see the poses for just a few minutes here, so eat your hearts out."

So what's the big deal about some musclebound grunt camping it up before a crowd of greaseballs?

Well, Sports Illustrated Magazine says Schwarzenegger "may only be the most extraordinary athlete anywhere today as well as the most perfectly developed male in history."

Arnold navigating.

But they wouldn't have said it had novelist Charles Gaines and photographer George Butler not created the extraordinary book, Pumping Iron, which has to be one of this year's best, doing for the subcult of bodybuilding what Hunter S. Thompson did for the Hells' Angels.

America is a nation of subcults, ranging from big ones like the Republican party to smaller, esoteric ones like midget wrestling, pimping and Roller Derby, all of which have been thoroughly investigated and documented with the exception of the most interesting and resonant one of them all—bodybuilding.

"Like those activities, bodybuilding is an obsession, a living (for a few), and a way of life for the people involved in it—a subculture, in a word, with its own values, aesthetics and vocabulary," the authors write.

"What we have attempted to do is chart, with some accuracy and a proper sense of wonder, the heart of the terrain . . . of an interesting, colorful and hitherto ignored region of American life."

They certainly have done a rip-roaring, magnificent piece which took them two years — every minute worth it.

The book centres on Schwarzenegger and his friendly rivals who are pursuing bodybuilding titles, but it leaves them often enough to valuably explore the sports' beginnings, history, heroes, villains, organizational power struggles, training methods, contest preparations and of course the characters of the men themselves.

art and sport of bodybuilding

Bodybuilders stand at attention while The Star-Spangled Banner is played.

If anything, this book is a study in character, journalistically swift and sketchy but brilliant nonetheless. And the characters of the four men studied—all champions—emerge surprisingly as extremely attractive and very, very human.

Although these men are physically talented—26-year-old Schwarzenegger was a champion swimmer, soccer player, skier, boxer, wrestler, shot-putter, javelin-thrower, and European curling champion before he turned to bodybuilding—they also are intelligent.

Schwarzenegger is doing a business degree at UCLA while Mike Fatz, who played guard for the New York Jets when they captured the Super Bowl, is only a bicep away from the Mr. America title and a thesis away from his PhD.

With this dedication, physical talent and intelligence, it's not surprising then to find these men surprisingly insightful about such things as the way our society destroys and hates the human body and has done so ever since the industrial revolution severed us from our corporeal selves.

On balance, one may not choose to follow bodybuilders' example, but one certainly has to admire them and, unshelving a few prejudices, opine that they will add far less to the world's problems than most of us.

"He's something of a cult figure, and Ways of Seeing is the book that is responsible for that," the art professor at the Ontario College of Art said.

He was speaking about John Berger and about the book made from the BBC television mini-series of the same name that was organized and narrated by Berger. That series of four half-hour segments was shown in the Ontario College of Art auditorium last month and it will be shown again in May by DEC (Development Education Centre).

John Berger: a cult figure? Not yet, but he is on his way there.

As someone wrote recently about Borges: "He is already high chic, and may yet become a cult, meeting his ultimate avatar as a tee-shirt."

Berger is high chic. He is already noted for just one book alone, a book that was written three years ago and that he has gone on from. But that book at least is still being read. Berger is not yet quoted without being read; his quintessential critical perceptions are not yet slogans. That comes later — when he is indeed a mass cult figure.

Berger is not yet an assumption for glibness; he is still a challenge.

As such, a large part of his force and immediacy come from the attack he makes in Ways of Seeing on Kenneth Clark.

It is all too easy perhaps to attack Clark. There have been criticisms of the approach he takes in his television series since they first appeared. Complaints were made when the Civilisation series was originally broadcast in Britain about its obsession with objects, with objects alone as representative of civilization. Critics wrote about "the slow electronic gloat over chattels vicariously possessed for the length of time they are on camera." It was noted that the particular objects used were not only chiefly famous and a part of the colour supplement cultural stock in trade of haut bourgeois Europe but also that they glorified television — colour television, in particular — at the same time that it glorified them.

Raymond Williams observed that the series was a "handsomely furnished rehearsal of Edwardian pieties about art and property": he compared it to the then recently BBC revived Forsyte Saga.

But perhaps on another level of superficiality from that at which Clark is praised, it may in fact be the new creed to criticize and disparage him. Last month in the Sunday New York Times Hilton Kramer wrote a column carried on the Entertainment section front page which dealt at great length with the inadequacies of the Romantic Rebellion, the most recent of Clark's series to be seen on this continent. (There is one more, apparently on Victorian painters.) Kramer says this new series is much like Civilisation — an unendurable Niagara of solemn clichés and simple-minded fictions.

Kramer suggested that Clark's popularity is the product of the troubled sixties. "The great appeal of Civilisation owed much, I think, to the abiding confidence and the surpassing glamour with which the great monuments of Western culture were reaffirmed — reaffirmed precisely as examples of moral grandeur, and reaffirmed, moreover, in a voice that, in neither its diction nor its vocabulary nor its syntax, ever granted the least recognition to the dislocations of recent history. Lord Clark's voice is the voice of reason and high culture — a voice in which there is no trace of violence or vulgarity or the more unruly emotions — and it must have been a balm indeed to the large audiences that had ample enough reason to wonder if the values of reason and high culture had already become permanent casualties of the cataclysms of the 1960s.

"In his sartorial style too, and in the unrivalled refinement of his manner, Lord Clark created for his listeners an immense, illusionary, reservoir of reassurance. He became for a great many people the hero of a historical romance, the romance of Western civilization — a kind of Churchill in the war against dissolution and collapse."

But all of this meant that what was said mattered a lot less than the way it was said, and in the way that was said was illustrated on the screen not only by picturesque views of great places and great works of art by the tranquilizing image of Lord Clark, himself, so perfectly groomed and posed and well-spoken at all times, "the most humane and most elegant of the cultural artifacts offered for our perusal."

If Kramer says this, can everyone else be far behind? And in fact in the following Sunday, "Cyclops" in his TV column, discussing Jacob Bronowski's Ascent of Man described Clark in passing as "resistible — arbitrary and patronizing simultaneously — a kind of highbrow Jacqueline Kennedy . . ."

Berger's importance is that he does not rest content with criticizing Clark. He presents us with a context within which we can approach Clark and works of art themselves. Many of the individual points made against Clark by Berger are not new. But no one else has presented these isolated criticisms in so coherent a system and so potentially popular a degree as Berger — so much so that that system of thought becomes far more important than the initial criticisms.

Lord Clark says in Civilisation, his book of the show, that "as the series proceeded I found myself saying out loud a number of things I should never have said otherwise. Just as the bourgeois gentleman was delighted to find that he spoke prose, so I was astonished to discover that I had a point of view."

No so, Berger says. "When an image is presented as a work of art," Berger says, "the way people look at it is affected by a whole series of learned assumptions about art. Assumptions concerning Beauty, Truth, Genius, Civilization, Form, Status, Taste, etc. Out of tune with the present, these assumptions obscure the past. They mystify rather than clarify."

"Mystification," he says elsewhere, "is the process of explaining away what might otherwise be evident." The past is never there waiting to be discovered, to be recognized for exactly what it is. History always constitutes the relations between a present and its past. Consequently fear of the present leads to mystification of the past . . ."

"Who benefits from this mystification? A privileged minority which is trying to invent a history which can retrospectively justify the role of the ruling classes. Because such a justification no longer makes sense in modern terms, mystification has to be accepted."

The issue between himself and Clark Berger in effect says is between a total approach to art which attempts to relate it to every aspect of experience and the esoteric approach of a few specialized experts who are "the clerks of the nostalgia of a ruling class in decline." (In decline, that is, not before the proletariat, but before the new power of the corporation and the state.) The question is: to whom does the meaning of the art of the past properly belong? To those who can apply it to their own lives, or to a cultural hierarchy of relic specialists?"

Berger does not discuss so much the paintings themselves but how they are most frequently seen — in reproduction. Reproduction has destroyed their uniqueness and paintings can exist everywhere and nowhere in particular. Paintings are present on postcards, in books, on television films. They can be played with and used by anyone for any purpose. Their meaning is no longer constant; these paintings can be changed by what is shown opposite them, by words put around them, by music played over them.

Reproduction has made paintings like words. They can be used to say whatever one wants to with them.

But the means of reproduction are used nearly all the time to promote the illusion that nothing has changed except that the masses, thanks to reproduction, can now begin to appreciate art as the cultured minority once did.

"Understandably the masses remain uninterested and sceptical."

The meaning of the original work of art, insofar as it has meaning, Berger says, no longer lies in what it uniquely is. It is an object whose value depends on its rarity. This value is affirmed and gauged by its price. Its market price is said to be a reflection of its spiritual value. Yet its spiritual value is of relatively little immediate value. The art object is enveloped in an atmosphere of entirely bogus religiosity. Works of art are discussed and presented as though they were holy relics: relics which are first and foremost evidence of tangibility, the texture, the lustre, the solidity of what it depicts. It defines the real as what you can put your hands on. Historically, it did to appearances what capital did to social relations. It reduced everything to the equality of objects. Everything became exchangeable because everything became a commodity. All reality was mechanically measured by its materiality. A painting could speak to the soul — by way of what it referred to, but never by the way it was envisaged. Oil painting conveyed a vision of total exteriority.

The historical period of the oil painting — between the Renaissance their own idealized behaviours. It functioned like a garment held out for the spectator — owner to put his arms into and wear. The genre pictures proved — either positively or negatively — that virtue in this world was rewarded by social and financial success. The spectator identified himself not with the characters painted but with the moral which the scene illustrated.

Berger devotes a separate chapter in Ways of Seeing to another category of oil painting: the nude. It is the female nude which was painted most often, he says, and in all these pictures, no matter whether it is a Biblical or mythological or secular painting, their own survival.

The bogus religiosity ultimately dependent on the market value of original works of art has become the substitute for what paintings lost when the camera made them reproducible. Its function is nostalgic — it is "the final empty claim for the continuing values of an oligarchic, undemocratic culture." If the image is no longer unique and exclusive, the art object, the thing, must be made mysteriously so.

"This concern with possession as an inherent part of the nostalgic part of the view of art is inevitable, Berger says, because of the assumptions upon which the European oil painting rests.

What distinguishes oil painting from any other technique of painting is its special ability to render the and the emergence of Impressionism — celebrated a new kind of wealth which was dynamic and which found its only sanction in the supreme buying power of money. Thus painting itself had to be able to demonstrate the desirability of what money could buy.

The oil painting was more than a demonstration of the virtuosity of the artist. It confirmed the owner's wealth and habitual style of living, firstly, in the fact that he owned the painting itself, secondly in the fact that he owned or could afford what was painted — all the food — the game, the fruit, the wine — in a still life, the animals or the buildings or the land depicted in a landscape.

The history or mythological painting supplied him and his class with a system of references for the forms of

there is always the implication that the subject (a woman) is aware of being seen by a spectator.

This observation leads Berger to make an important formulation:

"To be naked is to be oneself.

"To be nude is to be seen naked by others and yet not recognized for oneself. A naked body has to be seen as an object in order to become a nude. (The sight of it as an object stimulates the use of it as an object.) Nakedness reveals itself. Nudity is placed on display.

"To be naked is to be without disguise.

"To be on display is to have the surface of one's own body turned into a disguise which in that situation can never be discarded. The nude is condemned to never being naked. Nudity is a form of dress."

In the average European oil painting of the nude the principal protagonist is never painted. He is the spectator in front of the picture and he is presumed to be a man. Everything is addressed to him.

The woman is being treated as an object — by the painter and the spectator-owner and she is being shown treating herself as an object. As an object she appeals to the man — and is being taught to do this — as something to be possessed.

To be born a woman in a capitalist society, Berger is saying, has been to be born within an allotted and confined space, into the keeping of man. Men survey women before "It is true that publicity offers a freedom of choice but that freedom is a freedom to choose between one brand of manufacture or another, one firm or another. Every publicity image itself confirms and enhances every other publicity image. Publicity is not merely an assembly of competing messages: it is a language in itself which is always being used to make the same general proposal. Within publicity, choices are offered between this cream and that cream, that car and this, but publicity as a system makes only a single proposal.

It proposes to each of us that we transform ourselves or our lives, by buying something more.

oil painting more thoroughly than most art historians. It has grasped the implications of the relationship between the work of art and its spectator-owner and with these it tries to persuade and flatter the spectator-buyer.

But oil painting was a celebration of private property before anything else. As an art form it derived from the principle that you are what you have. Publicity uses the devices of oil painting to make the individual feel he is what he can buy. The oil painting showed its owner what he was already enjoying. Publicity makes the spectator dissatisfied with his present way of life. It offers him an improved alternative to what acknowledged as a universal right. The existing social conditions make the individual feel powerless. He lives in the face of the contradiction between what he is and what he would like to be. He either becomes fully conscious of the contradiction and its causes or joins the political struggle for a full democracy which entails amongst other things, the overthrow of capitalism; or else he lives continually subject to an envy which, compounded with the sense of powerlessness, dissolves into recurrent daydreams.

Publicity as well turns consumption into a substitute for democracy. The choice of what one eats (or wears or drives) takes the place of significant political choice. Publicity helps to mask and compensate for all that is undemocratic within society, and it also masks what is happening in the rest of the world.

Publicity adds up, then, to a kind of complete self-sufficient philosophical system. It explains everything in its own terms. It is the life of the culture of capitalism — insofar as without publicity capitalism could not survive — and at the same time — publicity is its dream.

Berger obviously goes far beyond Clark. But his arguments are moored at several points to Clark's writings to the esthetic views he has expressed in The Nude and in Landscape into Art in particular. He also attacks Clark specifically for his concentration on great works of art — on works of certain exceptional artists in certain exceptional circumstances who broke free of the norms of the tradition and produced work that was diametrically opposed to its values, and yet who are now acclaimed as the tradition's supreme representatives.

But it would be petty insofar as individuals are of any significance here to concentrate on Clarke.

Reyner Nham has said, in New Society, that "Sir Kenneth's failures are the failures of a whole generation. There is a Forsythian culture of material objects rather than human values... It attained a certain nutty nobility in such memorable incidents as Roger Fry lecturing on a Crucifixion in the National Gallery and never once referring to the suffering Son of Man as anything but 'the main central mass of colour'..." We do need to see Clark's failures as the failures of certain generation within a certain class. The just released first volume of Clark's autobiography Another Part of the Wood helps here.

The volume ends in 1939 with the evacuation of the pictures from the National Gallery in London lest they should be bombed; it depicts well the golden world in which Clark has lived. A reviewer in the TLS noted that Logan Pearsall Smith had coined a word for the buoyant negotiations of the vanities and temptations that the book describes: "swimgloat". "Swimgloat" Clark does. He was born with a silver spoon in his mouth. His parents were among the idle rich in Edwardian times — they kept a servant just to iron their newspapers — and their riches and their connections have ensured that Clark has met great success in whatever he has done. But his success is tempered with an admittedly easily worn humility. "I really have not got a first class mind, only a love of art, a good visual memory, and a certain amount of common sense," he says. He does have enough sense of humour to include a photograph of himself at the age of four or five with the same air of supercilious self-sufficiency that we all know from his television series.

Berger is right in emphasizing the nostalgia inherent in his view of Clark's interpretation of art. Nostalgia is something that is rife right now — and certainly within the university community it is usually directly back at the Bloomsbury world of the twenties and thirties, at the social and literary world of Leonard and Virginia Woolf, of Lytton Strachey and Duncan Grant (though perhaps it is Wittgenstein's Vienna and the world of the Secession artists that is now becoming popular).

I am in no position to draw any definite conclusions about the real significance of Bloomsbury — except perhaps that more work on the period and less sentimentalizing of it, is what is needed. But the views of that world are views that Clark shared and that he represents, proclaims today. Roger Fry was one of his most formative intellectual influences and Bernard Berenson, the other key influence, had at least peripheral connections with Bloomsbury. He was married to a sister of Logan Pearsall Smith who had another sister who was married to Bertrand Russell, one of the "elder brothers" of Bloomsbury. There were intermarriages among the younger generations of the Berensons and the Garnetts.

The attraction of the Bloomsbury group is undeniable. As an acquaintance has said, "I think the delight is discovering some aspect of it for yourself, some way you can tunnel into it yourself. You make the connections yourself. You link up the various characters. It's a personal thing."

Yes, but only do connect.

In an interview broadcast on the BBC and reprinted in The Listener, Clark apologized for the little summary of his beliefs at the end of Civilisation. "Every question is too complicated, all issues are too subtle for me to simplify them to that extent... The wonderful things in Ruskin are when he begins to analyze a Gothic arch, but he contradicts himself a hundred times over. As he's said, he never thinks he's getting near the truth unless he's contradicted himself at least three times..."

And yet Clark also admits in the same interview that "I enjoy doing television because it's a limited form; you have got quite a short time in which to try to say a great deal." He doesn't in fact have time in which to contradict himself. "TV's premier talking head" is perhaps TV's premier victim. If one is to judge by his autobiography, television is really not his medium.

"I must make a dreadful confession, Clark says in Another Part of the Woods, I never think of an audience at all... My television programs, Civilisation, were soliloquies. I was an only child. I used to take very long walks and on those walks I used to talk to myself. That, really, was the origin of my television. Actors can't do it because they have to have an audience. But for whatever reason, my isolated youth, or some form of malformed egotism, I don't mind at all. I'm quite happy to talk to myself..."

So Lord Clark talks to himself and the pale-faced youths in the Hart House Reading Room, at the Roberts Library, go on turning over the pages of the New Yorker, of the Illustrated London News, of Country Life, of Realities, of The Connoisseur, turning over the pages in search of the advertisements, in search of glamour, of envy, of being nude.

treating them. Consequently how a woman appears to a man can determine how she will be treated. To acquire some control over this process, women contain it and interiorize it. That part of a woman's self which is the surveyor treats the part which is the surveyed so as to demonstrate to others how her whole self would like to be treated.

Berger codifies this when he says, "Men act and women appear."

But he goes beyond this discussion of the historical period of European oil painting to show how the psychological attitudes inculcated then are being even more widely spread today by other media and media techniques — advertising, journalism, television — and which Berger discusses collectively as publicity.

This more, it proposes, will make us in some way richer — even though we will be poorer by having spent our money.

But publicity persuades us of such a transformation by showing us people who have apparently been transformed and are, as a result, enviable. "The state of being envied is what constitutes glamour." "And publicity is the process of manufacturing glamour."

Publicity is making all of us, male and female, know with the greatest intensity the state of being nude, rather than naked, of appearing, rather than acting.

Berger says that the language of publicity is systematically exploiting the language of the oil painting. Publicity in fact, he says, has understood the tradition of the

he is. For publicity the present is by definition insufficient. The publicity image which is ephemeral (as compared to the oil painting) uses only the future tense. With this you will become desirable. In these surroundings all your relationships will become happy and radiant. Publicity remains credible because its truthfulness is judged, not by the real fulfillment of its promises but by the relevance of its fantasies to those of the spectator-buyer. Its essential application is not to reality but to daydreams, to the dream of being glamorous.

The industrial society which has moved towards democracy and then stopped is the ideal society for generating the personal social envy on which glamour feeds. The pursuit of individual happiness has been Jack (Bob Baker) and his mother (Elizabeth Swerdlow), in Global Village's current production, Cosmic Jack.

Cosmic Jack Global Village Theatre 17 St. Nicholas St.

Remember the simple fairy tale about Jack and the Beanstalk? Well, it's been psychoanalyzed, philosophized, and fantasized into a full-blown environmental musical called Cosmic Jack.

The idea for the Global Village Theatre's collective creation was conceived by cast members Robert and Elizabeth Swerdlow and Bob Baker, and Carol Lyne. It is a representation of the story between the lines — a surrealist adult continuation of Jack and the Beanstalk, lavishly interspersed with song and dance.

Amid a dreamlike fantasy set of coloured lights, silver and glitter, the singing narrator (Mark Pedrotti) and the chorus introduces Jack (Bob Baker), 'a child of the universe', who frees himself from the 'book of stories' and catapults into space. What emerges is a highly entertaining but uneven production — one which excites with a flamboyant humour, wit, and charm, but at times, undercuts some of its effectiveness with a facile kind of moralising.

The play is filled with tongue-in-cheek sexual overtones. Now that his father is dead, Jack, the modern anti-hero, happily has an affair with his mother (Elizabeth Swerdlow) who gleefully has one with his uncle (Jim Bryant). On the way to market to sell his mother's cow, Jack encounters the "cosmic clowns" who give him the magic "cosmic beans" which later sprout into a gigantic tinsel beanstalk. Jack climbs up the beanstalk into the sky and brings back the three magical 'money-sex' objects: the golden-egg-laying Hen (Diane Drum), the Money Bag (Jo Anne Brooks), and the Singing Harp (Tabby Johnson), who make their gutsy appearance on stage in a campy musical take-off of the Andrew sisters.

Flashing strobe lights and pre-recorded electronic music usher in the second act of the play which leans heavily on the symbolic, the grotesque and the philosophic. It is 20 years later and Jack is the richest 'boy-man' in the world. In a lavish and hyperbolic dramatic monologue, Jack laments his moneyed decadent life marred by paranoia and boredom. He must wake the sleeping giant (Mark Pedrotti) who is (according to how psychoanalytic your mind is) his superego, the ghost of his father, his sleeping conscience etc., and come to some kind of self-realization. Jack later does a Houdini-style escape trick and is symbolically re-born.

From this point on, Cosmic Jack is a little too contrived. In a scene bursting with profuse love, Jack retells the story in terms of his own metamorphosis. His new found love of humanity is written down for posterity by his doting mother. Then Jack's inner freedom is universalized into a rousing "free the children" song of love and trust which is just a little too sweet and easy for my taste.

The talented cast of Cosmic Jack is at its best when Robert Swerdlow's music, lyrics, and dialogue are humorous and witty. Bob Baker in the title role of Jack, fills the stage with a vital strength and charm whether he is speaking, singing, or dancing. The lovely dramatic choreography produced and shared by Baker and Elizabeth Swerdlow is strikingly effective and very moving. The pre-recorded music by Malcolm Buchanan and Gerry Mosby, and Vladimir Svetlovsky's lighting and environmental design of silver and glitter capture the essential spirit of cosmic fantasy.

Although Cosmic Jack has flaws and needs sharper editing, these can be remedied because the play is continually being worked on in workshop; in fact it is the second of the Global Village Theatre's works in progress.

It's an engaging production with lots of potential.

More than an Engineer.

Our Military Engineers are very specialised people. They design and build bridges, airstrips, base facilities, supervise and maintain all kinds of equipment on our bases around the world.

It's a very special job. One that involves working with men. Guiding them. Training them. A job where you can apply your knowledge in all kinds of challenging situations.

If you're into engineering, we can get you into something more than just an office job. An Officer's job, where you can develop your full potential.

Give it some thought. We can give you plenty of opportunities to use your specialised knowledge in some very unusual ways.

Homemade Theatre
 Factory Lab Theatre
 207 Adelaide Street E.
 until 11 march

Those of us who enjoy the risks of improvisational theatre have an opportunity to take all the risks we like. Homemade Theatre, under the auspices of Factory Theatre Lab, is presenting an "improvisational extravaganza" until March 9th at Factory Lab headquarters on Adelaide Street East.

The lobby will tell you a lot. There in a corner you'll find a Do-it-yourself Shakespeare booth complete with tape recorder and a script of Othello which reads like a Twentieth Century version of a Nineteenth Century adaptation.

For Theatre history buffs there is an invitation to enter Homemade Theatre's Toronto Theatre Trivia Contest. If anyone has any idea how old Elizabeth Swerdlow of Global Village is or what Bonjour la Bonjour really means you have a chance to win two tickets to any production of your choice. (The only drawback is that the show has to be in Toronto).

Arrive early enough (8:10 should do it) and you may be one of the chosen "guest directors" for the scene from the Three Sisters which starts the show. Incidentally there was no greater proof that all a good production needs in order to be ruined is a guest director, particularly an amateur.

The scene is already set, Barry Flatman, Larry Mollin and Phil Savath handing the three sisters with grace and (more or less) decorum. At a tinkling bell from the stage manager, guest director number one takes a stab at directing (mostly less) one or more of the cast. The scene carries on with this new "beat" until the bell. If nothing else the audience has great fun discovering what a lousy director it is.

As I mentioned before, improvisational theatre is a risky business for both actor and audience. When it pays off, it does so handsomely as it did in the "At the Beach" scene. The set up was clichéd — Lifeguard, Lifeguard Chair and the nubile (Phil Savath nubile?) university co-ed who coopts the Lifeguard Chair. Using audience suggestions, various theatre styles were imposed and the scene was replayed. In turn we progressed from a superb Shakespearean version of "MacBeach" (in which Lifeguard Larry Mollin refers to his bulging biceps as Phoebe's orbs) through the operatic version of the "Lifeguard of Seville", a Guerilla Theatre presentation which ends, "Twenty-five dollars, or no second Act!" and climaxes with the same scene so overloaded with heat, passion and symbols that only Tennessee Williams could have fathered it. It was a delight.

Less of a delight were the evenings failures — a disastrous Superman sketch for one — all the more so for being the longest. One kept wishing it would improve: it got worse. One kept hoping it would end with the intermission: it came back. It might have picked up if only, and ironically, it had slowed down: One of the greatest temptations in improv work is to dash through it. The result is often slap-dash dialogue and sloppy broad and meaningless movement. A little attention to detail makes all the difference.

Improv work depends on give and take between the actors and occasionally the audience. Both cast and house are very "take" oriented. Only Phil Savath seemed to be willing or able to listen and "give". His expertise was most obvious and rewarding.

If there is one thing this troupe needs to take into account it is the recognition (and the willingness to act on it) that the house, while well-meaning, is all too ignorant of the techniques that make improvisational theatre work (Something that Second City discovered long ago). Its suggestions should be radically edited or denied outright for the benefit of all concerned. Occasionally the cast would turn aside a suggestion from the audience knowing it was clichéd or lead down a blind alley or would end up in a "yes-no" conflict. It needs to do so more often. At the moment the cast tries too hard to please; a greivous fault in a charming cast.

On the other hand this is "Homemade" Theatre and the audience shares in its creation. That is one of its charms. It is also one of its responsibilities and its greatest risk.

The Captain of Kopenick
 Toronto Workshop Productions
 12 Alexander St.

No it's not John Mortimer's adaptation of Carl Zuckmayer's Der Hauptmann von Kopenick which is currently playing at the TWP Theatre on Alexander. It's another translation: one that has come to vivid life in a mostly entertaining and unmistakably live, George Luscombe production.

Zuckmayer often uses actual and well-known incidents for his dramas. The Captain of Kopenick is no exception here, but it is more pointedly satirical than his other plays. A humble shoemaker plods from prison to penury, the pariah of officialdom, until he dons the uniform of a captain of grenadiers in a bid for social justice. To be certificated, to be able to work, to be recognized and to be independent: that's all our mini-hero wants. Wilhelm Voigt does not mean to start a revolution or become a dictator, even though he could have done. "Any child knows that everyone will listen when you wear a uniform in Germany", remarks Voigt at the end of the play that has already forcefully made the point. This is the Germany of 1901-1911, depicted in a play of 1931. Zuckmayer's satire, however, is not only directed against the Prussian mentality or that of any other time, but also at the universal human equation of authority with uniforms.

The production team has been thinking grey. Luscombe accordingly directs his cast in their greily austere roles of burghers and burghermasters. Astrid Janson's set and costumes range from battle-ship to Salvation Army grey — and detroked Salvation Army at that. The only deviant colours are the Prussian blue of the captain's uniform and the Chaplinesque black of Cobler Voigt. But, after all, they are the stars of this show, which a cartoon synopsis in the programme describes as "a modern fairy tale about a worn-out man and a worn-out uniform". The irony, however, is that the power of the uniform is never exhausted. Not so that of the man.

The ensemble of twelve is extraordinarily well disciplined in everything they do, especially in the scenes of overlapping dialogue and simultaneous action. The chorus — that is, almost everyone — does its military numbers with an authenticity imported with Sergeant Sydney of the Queen's Own Rifles. Vigorously goose-stepping and sounding off, they even manage to drop the odd baton with routine precision. The mimetic capacities of the company are remarkable for athleticism and truth. Notice the silent magic in the machine-shop, floor-scrubbing, prison and doss-house sequences. The actors are equally matched save in vocal facility. However, Rich Payne's Prison Governor, Diane Douglass's transvestited grenadier, in addition to the various guises of Doug Stratton and Hollis McLaren, are most memorable. Francois-Regis Klanfer is a very fine Wilhelm Voigt: a subdued, refined and quite moving captain of Kopenick.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ELECTION OF NEW MEMBERS

24 are contesting 10 staff and student seats

On or about March 14th, 1975, ballots will be mailed to eligible voters for the election of 10 new members of the governing Council of the University of Toronto. (If necessary, other arrangements will be announced).

Ten candidates are contesting five teaching staff seats. Five of the other seven seats will be held by the following continuing members seated in previous elections: Professor W.B. Dunphy, G.R. Thaler, V.E. Graham, M.W. Thompson and A.M. Hunt. The two other teaching staff seats in the current election have been filled by acclamation by Professor Maurice W. Lister (Constituency IE) and Professor Michael Bliss (Constituency IF).

Both administrative staff seats are held by continuing members, Mr. Keith R. Bowler and Mrs. Gwen Russell, so no election is necessary in this constituency.

Fourteen candidates are contesting five student seats. Three other seats have been filled by acclamation by Mr. Jonathan Francis Gentry (Part-Time Undergraduate Student Constituency), Mr. Felix M. Salazar (Part-Time Undergraduate Student Constituency), and Mr. Seymour Kanowitch (Graduate Student Constituency I). As all student seats on Council carry one year terms of office, there are no continuing student members.

Sitting members whose current terms of office expire on June 30th, 1975 are indicated below:

Teaching Staff:

Constituency ID — H.C. Eastman
Constituency IE — J.E. Dove
(by resignation)
Constituency IF — C.M.T. Hanly
Constituency II — H.W. Smith
(by resignation)
Constituency III — J.C. Laidlaw
(by resignation)
Constituency V — W.B. Coufils
Constituency VI — M.F. Grapko

Graduate Students:

Constituency I — K. Hoffman
Constituency II — E.V. Copeland
(deceased)

Full-Time Undergraduate Students: Constituency I — S. French
P. Jarrett — P. Jarrett
Constituency II — S. Moses

Part-Time Undergraduate Students:

— O. Shindmand
— A. Oick
— W. Whelton

In accordance with the University of Toronto Act, 1971, the remainder of the Governing Council will be composed of the President and the Chancellor (ex-officio), two presidential appointees, sixteen appointees of the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council, and eight members who are not students or members of the teaching or administrative staff elected by and from among the alumni.

The election will be conducted by mailed ballot, ballots to be mailed to eligible voters on or about March 14th, 1975. Ballots may be returned to the Office of the Governing Council by Canada Post, Campus Mail, or personal delivery. (Other arrangements will be announced should the post office continue to be wholly or partially strikebound). Also, for the convenience of the voters who would prefer to deposit their ballots "on campus" rather than through the mail, ballot boxes will be placed in the following locations:

Erindale College — Library
Scarborough College — Library
Simcoe Hall — Information Desk

Ballots may be cast at the above locations from March 15th to March 27th, at 12:00 noon. Both library locations will be open during regular library hours, and the Simcoe Hall location during regular business hours.

Any eligible voter who should receive an incorrect ballot, or no ballot, due to an error in records, may contact the Office of the Governing Council in order to obtain the correct ballot.

Details of the contested constituencies are outlined below, along with biographical or other comments supplied, on a voluntary basis, by the candidates.

The election is conducted by the Governing Council under the authority of the University of Toronto Act, 1971. Any inquiries should be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160. The election will close at 12:00 noon on March 27th, 1975.

FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"Full-Time

Undergraduate Student"

means all students registered at the University in a programme of full-time study, who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in Arts and Science, on all campuses for electoral purposes, will be considered full-time if enrolled in four or more courses.

Constituency I - two seats

All students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science including Erindale College and Scarborough College.

TIM BERMINGHAM

Students have a vital role to play in the working of the Governing Council. Unfortunately, our best ideas often fail through inflexibility. I am willing to compromise for the sake of accomplishment. My experience on S.A.C. has convinced me that there is much wrong with the tenure system, and the proposed discipline code. We need to athletic complex. But we won't get anywhere if we refuse to listen. I'll not fight. I'll work.

RAYCROFT F. ELLIS

The Governing Council must protect freedom of speech for all groups and individuals on the campus. There should be less concern with internal politics, and more emphasis on educational matters. As a first-year arts and science student, I feel the need for more youthful representation on the Governing Council.

IRVING HANDLER

If the students continue to rush through university with our eyes and mouths shut tight how can we hope to make the administration take us seriously. If students want a voice in governing ourselves we must be willing to work collectively to make ourselves heard.

J. BRADFORD NIXON

1967-69 Architecture Student
1969-72 Work — Travel
1972-75 Arts and Science Student — Political Economy

Member Governing Council Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee.
Co-Chairman Non-Academic Code Revision Committee

I'll work for: NO INCREASE IN STUDENT FEES . . . NO CUTS IN EDUCATION QUALITY . . . Stop cuts in library service and book purchases. Reasonable athletic facilities. Student controlled student services (pubs, catering). End sexism on campus. No repressive discipline code. University responsiveness to community needs. Student parity on tenure committees.

JOHN O'DONOHUE

John O'Donohue, Scarborough Student President for the past year, has concentrated on academic reform. He initiated an investigation of the student academic appeal system, argued successfully for a work-study program in government administration, oversaw publication of two course evaluations and a review of study space proposals. He founded the University of Toronto stables. O'Donohue's larger concerns are the quality of instruction (classroom size, marking) and the state of education at the University of Toronto.

JOHN L. PARKER

— Victoria College II
— majoring in Political Science, Economics
— also studying Zoology, History, Fine Arts
— Bio. 110 MML supervisor
— Toke Oike managing editor
— Skule Nite writer, performer — active in Hart House debates — active in Victoria College, swimming, waterpolo — concerned about retaining standards of learning at Toronto.
— opposes arbitrariness of some proposed marking schemes — anxious to improve quality of life on all campuses — favours Campus Centre proposals to improve area west of St. George.

MICHAEL SABIA

Previous experience — Communications Commissioner, S.A.C.; Debates Committee, Hart House; General Committee, Faculty of Arts and Science; Planning Subcommittee, Governing Council.

The University finds itself in a financial crisis. Undoubtedly cutbacks will be made. Budgetary constraints cannot be allowed to affect adversely teaching quality or the quality of life within the colleges and the University. If tuition is not to increase, it is essential that students have solid, responsible and responsive representation.

Constituency II - two seats

All students registered in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Sciences, Faculty of Medicine, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Pharmacy, School of Hygiene, School of Physical and Health Education, Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture, Faculty of Forestry, Faculty of Law, Faculty of Music, Faculty of Management Studies, Faculty of Social Work (with the condition that both members elected in Constituency II not be registered in the same faculty or school).

TIM BUCKLEY

Previous Experience: Students' Administrative Council Vice-President, Hart House Board of Stewards, Presidential Advisory Committee on Campus as Campus Centre, Faculty Council rep., Engineering Society Executive.

In light of the present financial constraints already restricting program development in some faculties, it is imperative that the needs of the professional schools be enunciated strongly in the event of continuing deficits. Experienced, credible student representation is needed to help prevent this further erosion of professional programs.

JOHN FLORAS

(Meds II) — Priorities should be considered now in the light of decreased government funding. Students should not have to suffer academically, athletically, or a decline in campus services. Quality of teaching must be ensured by effective student representation on staffing committees. Construction of adequate athletic facilities should continue as planned. Furthermore, we must preserve the right to dissent without the threat of a questionable discipline code.

FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATES (con't)

an Engineering student, is seeking election to the Governing Council. Student representation in administration has always been one of Doug's prime concerns. In his experience with student oriented media and government Doug knows that this representation must be strong. Doug Gerhart is seeking the privilege to offer a strong undergraduate view point and voice in the face of budget cuts and continued opposition to student representation at all levels of University administration.

HOWARD LEVITT

U. of T. experience, Governing Council; Executive, Business Affairs, Admissions — Awards, Female Non-Academic Staff Committees. Government Commissioned — U. of T. Act, 1971 — Review Committee, Legal Aid, S.A.C., A & S Faculty Council; Library and Admission Committees, author, Working Paper — Non-Academic Females.

I support preventing fee hikes, raising OSAP ceilings, students on tenure committees — emphasizing quality teaching, no foreign student quotas, University housing rent controlled, monitoring academic quality and course variety despite budget cuts, economically accessible student daycare.

ROBERT SKOLNIK

Second year student of Electrical Engineering, member of Engineering Society — musical director of Skule Nite 7T4 & 7T5. Concerned about improving communications between the student body and administration, especially as regards determination of course content and marking schemes in the professional faculties; and, if it fell under my jurisdiction, a lot more free telephones. Thank you.

GRADUATE STUDENTS

"Graduate Student"

means all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

Constituency I - 1 seat

All students in Division I (Humanities) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division II (Social Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies, with the exception of the Graduate Department of Educational Theory.

KURT LOEB

A mature (euphemism for middle-aged) Graduate Student representative. As former President of the Association of Part-Time Undergraduates, I served on a variety of University committees for many years and am familiar with the delicate structure of this institution. I will be a dedicated, respected spokesman for the needs of students at a time of economic uncertainty, and for the university at large against those forces that would restrict its academic or financial independence.

BYRON E. WALL

Ph.D. student in History and Philosophy of Science and Technology. Persuasion is more effective than confrontation at the policy-making level. I am prepared to devote considerable effort to persuading the Governing Council of the needs and interests of graduate students. Past experience: Decanal Committee on the Final Ph.D. Examination, Task Force on Academic Appointments, Roberts Library Users Committee, and three years on the Council of the School of Graduate Studies.

TEACHING STAFF

"Teaching Staff"

means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges, and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry). In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school will his constituency be determined by another appointment.

Constituency ID - one seat

All teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Anthropology, Geography, History, Philosophy, Political Economy, Sociology and Psychology (excluding those who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges).

GEORGE REID

Professor and Chairman, Business Education Department, has been active in many committees of the Faculty of Education serving as Chairman of the Faculty Council and its Executive Committee since 1971. He is the author of fifteen books used in Ontario schools. Originally a delegate to the U.W.C. on the formation of the Governing Council, he believes that decisions of the Governing Council must be based on the interests of the entire university community.

it's not the real Endgame

Endgame
The Menagerie Players
Central Library Theatre

It is not impossible, or even especially difficult, to stage a successful production of a play by distorting it. The Menagerie Players' current production of Endgame at the Central Library Theatre has not one single badly-acted moment, includes two brilliant performances, is moving, funny. Still it is not the real Endgame. The problem is in the lead role, Hamm, who, says Beckett, should be a "monster in decay". Peter Hyatt's Hamm is a pest in decay. Real malevolence should be at ease with itself; Hyatt's Hamm is constantly fusing.

Hyatt's mistake is to bring character-acting to a play written to be artificial. Beckett is funny because his characters go on trying to act like people when (of course) the game was up long ago. Being a character in Beckett means being artificial.

Hyatt's performance conveys no sense of Hamm's loss of his past, little sense of his viciousness, and — most remarkably — makes not the slightest effort to convey that Hamm is blind. Hyatt turns his head from one side of the stage to the other, always as if he expects to see something there. The control and range of Hyatt's voice are considerable; the poignancy and shape of his long speeches always comes across, especially in their moments of vulnerable tenderness. Hamm, as Hyatt acts him, is a spoiled, self-centered, middle-aged sophisticate. But all this personality makes Hamm appear more secure than Beckett intended him to be, shut up as he is inside the set's four wall from the world-that-is-no-more.

The failings of the production's Hamm can not be clearer in contrast to Peter Stead's marvelous portrayal of Hamm's servant, Clov. Hamm is a character, Clov is a part. Clov is clown, Charlie Chaplin, the fall-guy, the stage bungler with a Limey accent, baffled at his own ineptitude. Clov is expressive flatness: expressive of the habituated mechanicalness that takes the place of personality. Stead's sense of timing makes emptiness begin to seep through the silences between the lines.

The same contrast as between the play's Hamm and Clov, between character and non-character, shows up in duplicate between Beckett's two octagenarians, Nagg and Nell. Bryan Foster's Nagg is a spry old codger, periodically sticking his head into the set, calling for his pap and his sugar-plum. (He gets neither.) But laughs he gets, and well-deserved ones. But in his one scene with Nell (Vivienne Gibbs) his part appears weak in contrast to one who in age has lost everything.

The Menagerie Company likely is keeping some people away from its play with its rather stiff prices. This is unfortunate: it is too easy to criticize an interpretation of Hamm when the part requires the range, if not the intensity, of a major Shakespearean lead. And if Hyatt did lean too much toward a vulnerable Hamm, Hamm's vulnerable moments were powerful theatre, while Peter Stead's performance alone makes the production one to see.

If you read this soon enough, rush over to the Brennan Hall Lounge for what sounds like a very interesting workshop in mind-body efficiency, conducted by Nadia Pavlychenko.

This new technique developed by Nadia attempts to achieve ultimate flexibility of the mind and body through freed channels of energy.

Energy is blocked in tense muscles. By developing proper energy placement and proper body alignment, the dancer, and student will be able to clear their system of unnecessary tension.

The Workshop runs from 11:30 am to 1-pm as part of St. Mike's Women's day.

For further information, contact St. Mike's Student Union, or wander over and see for yourself.

five canadian printmakers

Five Canadian printmakers, Ed Bartram, Henry Dunsmore, Doreen Foster, Katherine Hunt and Jo Manning, have put together a group show which has already been to London and France and is now on view at the Prints and Drawings Gallery of the AGO.

My favourite in the group is Ed Bartram, who creates his etchings from his observations of mineral and land formations. Some of these are bold and open designs using largely black along with earthy rust or ochre colours. Despite a high degree of abstraction, the texture and surface patterning are always evocative of the rugged intricacy of rock formations.

In more recent works, such as "Island Forms", "Rockscape" and others of the Canadian Shield series, the artist creates entire landscapes which seem to predate human or vegetable life. These etchings create expansive worlds of rock and sky which appear to be still shifting and exploding with primordial energy.

By examining the minutiae of nature, Jo Manning also tries to achieve a sense of the awesome presence in natural forces. Her etchings of windswept grasses are highly detailed and beautifully rendered although they seem cramped and overly fussy at times. The absence of colour and her delicate gradations of light and shade often do not allow for enough openness and strength of contrast, to make these works forceful and striking.

Her series entitled "Paradoxes" goes through themes like wind, water, gravity, etc. accompanied by unfortunate poems by Jane Beercoft. These precocious hymns to the universe ("from all those secret dialogues with grass") cheapen rather than enhance the etchings with their pseudo-cosmology.

The prints by Doreen Foster, which are a combination of etching and aquatint, are small intricately worked fantasies with titles like "The Kiss of Death", "The Essence" and "The Offering". They are not enhanced by the display and the viewer is forced to peer too closely into these shadowy fairy-tale worlds to try to figure out the subject matter.

I like better her larger and more lively water-colours like "Hope" and "The Toils of Man" at the Aggregation Gallery, which is currently showing earlier works by Foster, Dunsmore and Hunt to complement the AGO exhibit. The Aggregation also has the water-colours done by Foster to illustrate the Indian legend, "Nanabozho and his Brother", on display. There is something of an illustrative nature about all her works, but these are exquisitely done and worth being presented in their own right.

The Aggregation is also showing works from Henry Dunsmore's "Window Series" began in 1972 and the AGO has a group of these as well. These prints present an arched window shape suffused by blue light, containing images of memory and imagination. Some are photographic images of women, while others suggest a purely psychological landscape.

The window series is more mysterious and challenging than the more recent serigraphs shown. Works like "Canadian Sunset" and "Death on Parliament Hill" have a direct, almost commercial, quality which relates them to pop art. "The Pause That Refreshes", which shows a mountie drinking a coke in front of a Sunset and Toronto's City Hall, has this kind of immediacy and simplicity. The graphic design and the colours are bold and attractive and the print is technically superb like all of Dunsmore's work.

I find Katherine Hunt's work less provocative than that of the others. The large areas of white around her colourful shapes of ribbons of landscape appear empty rather than supportive of a tight overall design.

Resnais' Stavisky: eloquent but empty

Serge Alexandre Stavisky, of Russian Jewish middle class descent, moved to France with his family when he was 14, and not long after graduated from being a gigolo to organized crime, narcotics, thieving and extortion.

Unsatisfied by petty criminality, he pushed himself into international circles where the stakes were bigger and the manners better.

By the late 20's, Stavisky was lionized in France as 'The King Of Crooks.'

That ended in Jan., 1934 when the gentleman crook crumpled to the floor with his head blown apart by a self-administered bullet.

His financial empire and two governments fell with him, and France was rocked by street fights, riots and a general strike.

Unless you know some of this sordid background material, you might leave Alain Resnais' Stavisky believing this common criminal was really a charming, devil-may-care Gallic rascal which is exactly how Jean Paul Belmondo plays him (probably because his acting range is so limited he has no choice).

Charles Boyer, that magnificent old lion now in the twilight of a distinguished career, effortlessly transforms the minor role of Baron Raoul, Stavisky's friend, into a major part.

How much would the film have been improved had Resnais only cast Boyer with his enormous talents as Stavisky and given Belmondo the smaller role.

But one presumes the casting of Belmondo with his guaranteed drawing power was deliberate by Resnais.

Once a celebrated leader of New Wave cinema in the early 60's by making such films as Last Year at Marienbad, Hiroshima Mon Amour and Je T'Aime, Je T'Aime, Resnais has relinquished a six year silence to make a decidedly commercial film.

For what reason is beyond this reviewer.

Certainly when Stavisky played last summer at the Cannes Film Festival the reaction was electrifying. But the French are notoriously partisan about their scandals like the Stavisky affair and their international celebrities like Resnais and Belmondo, so it really isn't much wonder the film was successful there.

But over here the film has barely caused a ripple with North American audiences and critics.

Certainly the film is stylish, with everything shot through filters so the images are blurred at the edges to properly connote decadence and aristocratic dissipation.

And there's no shortage of aristocratic emblems, either, with dazzling shots of the sweeping Biarritz golf course, Stavisky's clotheshore wife elegantly but emptily played by Anny Duporey, glittering Art Deco jewellery and silver Hispano-Suizas and roomfuls of delicately long-stemmed flowers.

But these are only symbols and Resnais prefers to toy prettily with them rather than digging deeper to examine how Stavisky could get as far as he did or how his actions had the repercussions which left France weak and unprepared for the Second World War.

Still, in parts it is a mesmerizing movie because Resnais is still a master craftsman who can turn out better second-rate-stuff than most Hollywood directors can when they're trying.

Take Stavisky over The Towering Inferno because of Boyer's performance and because the Varsity, an independent movie house, is only charging $3, which is half a buck cheaper than other places.

But let's hope in the future Resnais will leave the commercial and the nostalgic — even the aristocratic nostalgic — to all those Hollywood hacks who can do it so well simply because they can do nothing better.

In Resnais' case, he's just wasting himself and disappointing others who are expecting a lot more from him.

It is the addition of strangeness to beauty, that constitutes the romantic character in art; and the desire of beauty being a fixed element in every artistic organisation, it is the addition of curiosity to this desire of beauty, that constitutes the romantic temper. When one's curiosity is deficient, when one is not eager enough for new impressions, and new pleasures, one is liable to value mere academical proprieties too highly.

For money value in films this weekend you won't beat the double bill of The Front Page and His Girl Friday playing at The College Cinema tonight through Sunday.

His Girl Friday (1940) is a sizzling remake of Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur's The Front Page, but with Rosalind Russell playing the part of reporter Hildy Johnson instead of a male. With Cary Grant convincingly occupying the role of the tough, hard-boiled city editor and Ralph Bellamy as the dingbat Russell wants to wed, and directed by Howard Hawks, it's possibly the best comedy of the 40's.

Certainly it's far superior to that slick, soulless, opportunistic Front Page that Billy Wilder disgorged recently.

The Front Page on the College doublebill is the 1931 Lewis Milestone version with Adolphe Menjou and Pat O'Brien, which doesn't sound like any particular recommendation in itself. Unless you're particularly hard-bitten, maybe you should just take in His Girl Friday.

The College Cinema is at 344 College St. and offers a $1 reduction to students with cards. Screenings 7:30 pm and 2 pm matinees Saturday and Sunday.

The Roxy has managed to collar some good movies that people haven't seen for awhile: Saturday it's Those Magnificent Men and Their Flying Machines (romantic comedy about great airplane race).

They have a tremendous doublebill with one of rarest and best comedies ever made, Buster Keaton's Seven Chances — about a man who advertises for a wife and the seven unlikely who answer. With another whimsical classic, Jacques Tati's Mr. Hulot's Holiday.

Thursday evening they have another superb evening scheduled with Kurosawa's Rashomon, which won the 1952 Academy Award for best foreign film. Playing with Zatoichi: The Blind Samurai and Ugetsu, a Japanese ghost legend.

Applause — and lots of it — is deserved by the Art Gallery of Ontario for embarking on an ambitious program of screening the oldest, most prolific and least appreciated strain of the cinema, the documentary.

The series has most of the best documentaries ever made and runs Saturdays and Sundays from tomorrow until May 19.

Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North (1922), a great masterpiece about Eskimo life, plays with Grass tomorrow at 3 pm. $1.50.

The UC Film Club offers a hot serving of Alain Resnais' Last Year at Marienbad, New Wave (1962) and all that. Med Sci Bldg tonight at 7 pm. Bring a book.

Sunday at Carr Hall the SMC Film Club screens Rossellini's Rise To Power Of Louis XIV (1965). Shown at 7:15 and 9:15.

coming events

art

Two new exhibitions are opening tomorrow at the AGO — upstairs in the Zacks Gallery will be selections from the Canadian historical collection and downstairs in the McLean Gallery is "Canada Ten", paintings by ten relatively new Canadian artists. Karen Wilkin, curator of the Edmonton Art Gallery, who organized the show emphasizes the variety of the individual painters but she refers to the shared fascination with the exploration of colour and surface. She also states that their similar aim is to produce great art — well we hope so. This show runs to April 6 while the current Five Printmakers Show goes to March 25.

At Hart House next Tuesday night is the opening of an exhibition of works by Tom Forrestal on loan from the Nova Scotia Museum of Fine Arts. The popular realist painter will be present at the opening which is from 8-10 pm.

The results of the University College painting and drawing competition are on display in the Laidlaw library. Victoria College students may submit entries to the Student Art Show there until Monday in room 217 at Margaret Addison Hall. The art show will hang in the New Academic Building from March 17-22.

A retrospective of Henry Moore graphics opens tomorrow at the Gallery Dresdnere as well as a Chagall exhibit at the Albert White Gallery. Just down the street on Prince Arthur at the Morris Gallery is a show of "American prints including works by Frankenthaler, Rivers and Rosenquist. gm classical

So March has arrived, gritty and cold and gloomy. If you're struggling through the annual round of essays and piled-up work, it's like trying to survive the furor at the center of some intense, dirty typhoon. This is definitely a good time to listen to Bach. There's something undeniably rejuvenating in Bach's music — and I'm not just referring to the masses, motets and Passions typically performed at this time of year. To counter terminal gloom, just play a few preludes and fugues, perhaps a partita or even a sonata. If you don't have the technical wherewithal to play an instrument, put on a record or go to a concert. It's worth it, believe me.

Tonight at Massey Hall, the TSO give forth with a safe program of Wagner, Strauss and Mozart, led by former Ozawa protegee Kazuyoki Akiyama, now a major conductor in his own right. The orchestra's fine concertmaster, Albert Pratz and violinist Stanley Solomon are the soloists. $2 rush seats if you hurry, otherwise $3-10. 8:30 pm.

Due to the illness of violinist Christian Ferras, fellow fiddler Jaime Laredo has been called in as a replacement. The concert is still at the same time and place: tomorrow night, 8:30 at Eaton Auditorium. $3.50-6.50.

One of the most technically stunning oboists in memory, Henz Holliger is also a first-class (if at times bizarre) composer, and in tomorrow night's instalment of the New Music Concerts series, he'll be the featured soloist. Also featured in the program is a new work by Harry Somers. At the EJB, 8:30, a bargain for students at $2.

Everybody's favourite small orchestra returns to Hart House Sunday night: Raffi Armenian is the guest conductor for the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada. 8:30 pm, and students fight inflation at $2.50. Presuming there are any tickets left, that is.

Two dynamite string quartets this week: the well-established Orford Quartet and the up-and-coming Tokyo Quartet appear within a day of each other. The Orford concert is free (!) at Eaton Auditorium on Monday night, but you have to have tickets to get in. Phone 925-3311, ext. 4835 to get yours. The Tokyo foursome are the toasts of the international quartet circuit. If you can't get to their Wednesday night Town Hall concert, pick up a copy of their recent DG record, featuring two damn-near flawless renditions of Haydn quartets.

Another avant-garde delight awaits the brave who'll make the long trek up to York U. for Cathy Berberian, Thursday night at 8:30 in Burton Auditorium. Shrieks, howls, and fun from the queen of the modern sopranos.

The great Viennes pianist Alfred Brendel makes an appearance at Town Hall Thursday night at 8:30, a good bet if you can find the scarce tickets.

And this week at the Faculty of Music: Sunday night, $1 gets students into a concert by the U of T Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Victor Feldbrill. Along with the U of T Choir and four soloists, they'll perform Beethoven's 9th symphony, among other things. 8:30 in the MacMillan Theatre of the EJB.

Thursday afternoon at 2:10 pm, the admission is free into another concert by Greta Kraus' Collegium Musicum ensemble; not a bad way to break up an afternoon of studying.

And, at this writing, there are over 15 student recitals lined up at Walter Hall, as many as three a day. As always, check with the box office (928-3744) to confirm who's performing. The concerts might not be as polished or professional as you'd see at one of the city's bigger halls, but tomorrow's stars are indisputably awaiting you. Support your local artists.

And don't forget to listen to some Bach, hear?

radio

Contrary to public belief, Radio Varsity is alive, well and getting healthier every day. Wiggling our way out of the political, administrative and economic chaos that we found ourselves submerged in the past couple of years, we have emerged with a broader scope. (What did Nietzsche say: 'Out of chaos comes...?') No longer satisfied with the role of Campus Juke-box, the time has come for some semi-dramatic changes. Although a rather large block of our programming will still be music ('... if music be the food of love blah blah') the scope has now been broadened to include interviews with local and not so local musicians, documentaries ranging in subject matter from an investigation into the CIA to a study on who is responsible for public taste; more campus coverage (both in terms of news stories and events); political forums; religious forums; examinations of poets and their work; more specialized music output and the reintroduction of the popular humour series "The Good Show" and "Hancock's Half-hour".

To start off with, Something Special is broadcasting twice a day.

Monday to Friday at 1 pm and then again later on in the evening. Of course there is a different program everytime. Coming up this week are:

Mon. Mar. 10

(1 pm): "Sex Without Guilt", an informative talk with Dr. Albert Ellis, father of Rational and Motive Therapy.

Tues. Mar. 11

(1 pm): "On Blues", a musical documentary tracing the development of the black man on the North American continent as expressed in his music: the blues. (8 pm): an H.P. Lovecraft Memorial - Horror Show entitled "The Lurking Fear".

Wed. Mar. 12

(8 pm): an interview with Egerton's artist of the week: Alan Gerber.

Thurs. Mar. 13

(1 pm): a re-run of the Sunnyland Slim interview for those who missed it the first time around.

Fri. Mar. 14

(1 pm): "Maude Gonne", an original dramatic performance based on the life of the actress, revolutionary and extravagant muse who haunted the poetry of William Butler Yeats from the moment they met to the end of his life.

(7 pm): a repeat broadcast of the documentary "On Blues".

Some of the other programming that we have started in the past couple of weeks include a political forum with Zeynep Owen and Katherine Rowcliffe. This week they talk with members of AMEX about their aims and objectives. In upcoming weeks, they will be examining the North American Labour Party and perhaps even some "establishment" political action groups.

A campus oriented magazine program called On Campus started this week and will be a regular feature on Tuesday and Thursday at 12noon and again at 5 pm. This show includes coverage of campus events and news stories, plus upcoming events (social, cultural, political) and concerning the campus.

The final Hart House offering opens next Thursday (13th). It's Coriolanus — Brecht's, not Shakespeare's — and there will be a colloquium on the play this week: (on the 12th and the 14th). Phone 928-7296 for details. St. Michael's will also be hosting a major event, an Irish Week, for which Theatre Mickities is preparing Juno and the Paycock. (12,13,15,16,19,20,21,22 March at 8:30 in Upper Brennan). At U.C. Playhouse there will be two more performances of A Third of the Show inspired by Brecht, Meyerhold and Artaud. (Tonight and tomorrow at 8:30)

Off campus: Nothing much to declare. New Theatre has an interesting opening this week — Picasso's Four Little Girls. (Runs 12th - 23rd). Elsewhere little has changed since last week. Question Time carries on at the St. Lawrence. Bonjour la Bonjour closes at the Tarragon on the 16th, as does Passes Muraille's Baby Blue. This may be your last chance to see Homemade Theatre's Show of Shows. It closes Sunday at Factory Lab. Endgame at the Central Library theatre is reviewed this week. (Closes 15th). Their new show will be opening on the 13th at 121 Avenue Rd. Written by Rick Salutin, it's called The False Messiah.

Theatre Second Floor's Leave It to Beaver Is Dead also fades into the void on Sunday. After the 9 pm performance. (86 Parliament St.). There's no hurry if you want to see Cosmic Jack (reviewed this week); it'll be with us till about April 14, and The Real Inspector Hound double bill at the Colonnade will be playing till the 22nd of March.

fp

If you or your group would like a mention of an event, you're doing, drop off details and times and we'll more than gladly announce it. Address all information to either John Burnes or Barb Wright, c/o On Campus, 91 St. George St., 3rd Floor. Nick Power and Anne Sherman interview leading Canadian poets about themselves and their art on Thursday at 6 pm. This week they talk with bp Nichols.

Some upcoming special shows will include an examination about food and consumerism aimed at the residence students who are the main supporters of Mr. Submarine and Harvey's; two well-known killer foods. You can eat well and cheaply and Jerry Cook will show you how.

This being the dawning of the Age of Aquarius (yawn!) we feel that a program examining the various religious sects that have cropped up in this age of "spiritual rebirth" would be in order. Each week Bob Simpson and his panel will look into religious matters with representatives of the various religious groups.

With these programs and more in the future, we feel that Radio Varsity has taken a turn for the better. Of course, most of our regular features that have worked their way into the hearts and minds of the campus will still be available. Radio Women, All Around the Black Community, Charlie Pennell's Breakdown, The Good Show Hancock's Half-hour, This Show Is About Women, The Gospel Music Hour and the French Show will still continue, enriching the lives of all who listen. Remember Radio Varsity is broadcasted over most of the campus, a few selected residences on carrier current (83.2 AM), Roger's Cable FM (96.2 FM) — take your cable and attach it onto your FM antennae, and on Graham Cable Channels 10 and 22. This is your radio station and we encourage your ideas, criticism, support, good wishes, but most of all we want your ears. Give us a close listen. You may be surprised.

FLASH ... Radio Varsity celebrates and recognizes International Women's Day, Saturday March 8, with 12 hours of women's voices, ideas, opinions, music and outlook. Happy Women's Day. Let a woman take you out to lunch.

Faculty and students critical of department chairman

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Department of Sociology-Anthropology at the Sir George Williams campus of Concordia University is in a state of uproar.

Students want the chairman fired and faculty are openly criticizing the chairman for overruling decisions made by faculty committees. Both groups seem to favor a restructuring of the department.

The dean of arts has set up a three-man inquiry to find out what went wrong and how to correct the problem.

The anthropology-sociology students' course union says that strategic non-renewal of contracts, intimidation tactics and undemocratic decision-making are destroying the department.

"Stagnation, deterioration and self-destruction—based on the events of the past few years, one might think that this is the department's program," reads a statement from the course union.

The course union wants the chairman fired as a beginning, but it concedes that the problem "is not simply a matter of personalities, but is rooted in the very structure of the department, namely, the lack of an explicit and democratically formulated point of reference in the form of a constitution."

Faculty discontent came to a head after the chairman placed an advertisement in an academic periodical to fill a vacancy which the faculty had already filled.

In November the faculty committee had voted to fill a vacant position with the lecturer already in the department. In February the position was advertised in University Affairs as being open.

Department chairman Dr. Joseph Mouldeux inserted the ad with the approval of the college dean because he thought it would encourage "healthy competition."

Dean of arts Ian Campbell, who admits to having authorized the ad, claimed that advertising vacant positions was standard procedure. When asked why it was that the faculty and students in the department were unaware of these procedures he said: "Such policies don't always percolate down to the last members of the faculty".

ATHLETIC REFERENDUM MARCH 12, 13

In order to gauge student support for the Athletics Complex the Students' Administrative Council is holding a referendum on the proposed complex on March 12, 13.

The new complex will include these facilities:

- 50 meter swimming pool
- 200 meter running-jogging track
- 10 squash courts
- 2 doubles squash courts
- 4 basketball courts — convertible for tennis
- a mat room — for wrestling, judo, karate, & exercise
- a weight-training room

Space allocation will be determined by a governing body with user control.

Accordingly, on March 12 & 13 you will be asked to vote on the following question:

1) Do you support the construction of the new Athletics Complex?

The student fee for Athletics for 1975-1976 will be $20 for both men and women. (On February 27, the Women's Athletic Association voted to raise the Women's levy from $10 to $20 to cover operating deficits and allow for further expansion of programs.)

The establishment of the athletic complex will involve an increase in the operating costs of the new athletic program. A portion of this increase may have to be covered by the students through an increased athletic fee.

Therefore we ask you to express to what extent, if any, you are willing to increase the funding of the athletics program at the University of Toronto.

Accordingly, on March 12 & 13 you will also be asked to vote on the following question:

2) Check one only:

- I am not prepared to pay a higher athletics fee than I am presently paying.
- I am prepared to pay up to, but not more than $30 per annum (i.e., a further increase of $10) from the date the building opens to help defray the operating costs of the new athletics facilities and programme.
- I am prepared to pay up to but not more than $40 per annum (i.e., a further increase of $20) from the date the building opens to help defray the operating costs of the new athletics facilities and programme.

Academic freedom the issue at McGill, Waterloo campuses

Faculty firings challenged

WATERLOO (CUP) — Renison College is an Anglican church college affiliated to the University of Waterloo (UW). It is separated from the main campus by a small creek, and prior to Oct. 31, 1974 few students knew much about it. On that day two professors were fired and another banned from teaching at the college.

Those fired were academic dean Hugh Miller and social science professor Jeffrey Forest. Professor Marsha Forest of UW's human relations department was barred from the college, but continued to teach as a guest speaker at the invitation of the students. Miller's contract was terminated Dec. 20, 1974. Forest's will end April 30, 1975.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) has a clear set of procedures for firings in cases like this: The faculty should be given notice of intended firings and be allowed to defend themselves.

Renison principal John Towler and the board of governors ignored these procedures on the grounds that the college had no firings procedures within its constitution, and that legally it was under no obligation to explain its actions.

Most of the students taking courses at the college formed the Renison Academic Assembly to protest the firings and fight for more student representation on the student-faculty council.

The academic and tenure committee of UW faculty association investigated the firings and concluded Dec. 9, 1974 that they had been politically motivated. The committee argued that for Renison to claim the legal right to fire the professors was not enough. They argued that the academic community had to know why the college exercised that right—were Miller and Forest fired for cause or because of their politics?

CAUT entered the dispute in January and since then has been trying to bring Renison to binding arbitration, the accepted means of settling this kind of dispute.

Much pressure has been brought to bear on the college in an attempt to make it put its case to this test. Motions to this effect have been passed by the UW Faculty Association, UW Art's Faculty Council, UW Senate, the Committee of Socialist Scholars and the Council of York University's School of Social Work.

Corporate gifts questioned

MONTREAL (CUP) — Donations from private corporations to McGill University to establish a Centre for the Study of Regulated Industry has touched off a controversy as to who's in control of academic programs—the corporations or the academic community.

Last summer, the McGill administration accepted and cashed $750,000 in cheques from Bell Canada, Canadian Pacific and Northern Electric with the understanding the funds were exclusively for use in setting up the centre.

But all this took place without the knowledge or approval of the university senate, which must legally approve all new academic programs or research institutes.

Vice-president of planning Dale Thompson now says accepting the funds without approval from the senate or discussion with the academic faculties has "caused a very embarrassing situation for the administration."

Initiative for establishing the centre came from Bell telephone president Jeanne de Grandpre, who is also a member of the McGill board of governors. Canadian Pacific rejected the first proposal for the centre on the grounds it would not be of benefit to CP, but accepted a modified proposal later prepared by professor Walter Balke.

According to graduate studies dean Walter Hirschfeld, the purpose of the centre is to "try to establish a rational mode of relationship between government and industry."

He said that the centre would engage in investigating how industries could increase their profit margins to keep them from becoming dependent on government—something he feels could lead to nationalization. The basic premise of the centre seems to be then public ownership is something to be avoided.

Hirschfeld hopes that future demonstrated success of the centre in its work could eventually result in government funding being made available to the Centre.

But even if the centre received approval through the regular academic channels, the question of control over what research is undertaken is still in question.

Thompson denied that the corporations would be in control. He said that an advisory board consisting of government, industry and academic representatives would be established to provide direction for the program.

Students called low priority

BRANDON (CUP) — NDP Manitoba Premier Ed Schreyer had adopted an attitude toward student aid which runs counter to that of the federal NDP.

People want water treatment plants and other things, not a better financial deal for students, he told a press conference in Brandon last week.

He said the idea of eliminating or even lowering tuition fees was hard to justify as a government priority.

He cited water treatment plants, as an example of a higher priority.

Schreyer also expressed a negative view of any changes in student aid regulations which would make funds available to students whose parents refused to support their education.

"If a parent who has the means is not interested in financing the education of his (her) children or ex-dependents, then I do not know why his(her) neighbor should be expected to finance it," Schreyer said.

Table tennis Blues bounce over York

By EUGENE KRIKSIUNAS

The excitement around the campus was due not only to the Blues' hockey triumph over York last Saturday but also to the OUAA table tennis tournament. In the main gym at Hart House, not close enough for shiny buffs to hear, the clacks of spinning ping-pong balls continued until evening when a final forehand smash by Alain Thomas, captain of the Varsity table tennis team iced a victory over McMaster.

It gave Varsity an unblemished record of six victories and one tie (vs. York) and signified a double victory for Toronto over the Yeomen. (hockey and table tennis).

The event was the third annual Ontario Universities' Table Tennis Tournament. Seven universities registered to compete in the round-robin series of matches on eight tables provided by the Ontario Table Tennis Association. Defending OUAA Tournament champion and two-time winner Ryerson wasn't represented this year, so the strongest challenges to Toronto came from McMaster and Guelph who finished second and third. The other schools in order of finish were: University of Western Ontario, Queen's, and Waterloo.

The Varsity foursome of Alain Thomas, Frank Chow, Orlando She and Peter Wong won a total of thirty-five matches out of fifty, with Thomas personally accounting for more than half of those victories.

Thomas was involved in twenty-three straight victories without a single defeat! Second among the individual players was Ken Ho of Western, followed by Balip Mahabir of McMaster. Frank Chow was the doubles' partner for Alain Thomas and each received trophies for their performances.

The tournament was hosted by the Hart House Table Tennis club who are awaiting sanction for the tournament as an annual event. The table tennis club is seeking the support of athletic departments in all universities. The success of this year's tournament was due in large part to the collaboration of the Athletic Director's office with the Hart House Table Tennis Club Committee and, of course, to the high degree of excellence of the University of Toronto team.

Varsity hosts first boxing match of year at Hart House

By BOB ALGIE

Wednesday night at Hart House, the boxing club staged an excellent card of boxing. Practically all the bouts were evenly matched. All the fights went the limit, except for the first match which was stopped because of a bloody nose.

Tony Canzano, coach to the boxing club, was full of superlatives after the meet, especially for fighters Jason Lo and Steve Kent.

Since the meet was of an exhibition nature (and so that Canzano could evaluate his charges), there were no decisions in any of the fights.

The only data that is available is the boxing card:

Joe Pires (J.J. McGrand) vs Tony Corak (J.J. McGrand)
Jason Lo (Eng) vs Fred Robb (Orangeville)

Juri Tamm vs Bob Wright (Vic).
Steve Kent (For) vs Dave Courtney (Orangeville).

Dan Doyle (Scar) vs Martin Diegl (UC)

Terry Branch (Elect) vs Joe Shillola (York)

Tom DeWolf (Trin) vs Allan Anderson (Orangeville)

Bob Algie (Trin) vs Peter Jerome (Vic)

Joe Di Fonza (UC) vs Martin Diegl (UC)

Tim Barbetta (Med) vs Steve Wax (PHE)

Peter Smith (PHE) vs Richard Wright (Tor)

With all the good fights during the meet, coach Canzano will have a tough time deciding which boxers will travel to a meet at Westchester.

The real test for this group of boxers will be at Westchester State next weekend. If the trip is successful perhaps Varsity will return to the days when a boxing team was sent to Harvard, Westpoint, and Annapolis.

Wrestling tournament

This weekend the University of Toronto is hosting the Ontario Provincial freestyle wrestling championship at the Benson Building.

The meet will take place all day Saturday and Sunday, and for wrestling fans will be all the wrestling they can handle as six bouts will take place simultaneously during the entire meet.

Winners from the tournament will qualify for the Canadian Open Tournament to be held in Vancouver on the following weekend.

The meet is expected to draw all the top wrestlers in Ontario and the card will include several members of the Varsity Blues' team.

There will be a small charge of 50c for admission but what is money to a real wrestling fan?

Want to be more of a jock?

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Even though the academic year is drawing to a close, the Hart House fitness appraisal centre will continue its service to the students and university community as long as a need is expressed.

The fitness testing at Hart House is done by qualified physical education students under the direction of Joe Rabel. And even better, it's free (although it'll cost you at least $35 anywhere else).

The tests are simple enough and only take 20 minutes. One test involved pedalling a stationary bicycle to measure the physical work capacity while the other is a caliper measurement of the percentage of body fat to body weight. (There's no question about physically surviving—even this writer lived through the tests and lived to tell about them.)

After the tests finish, the results are tabulated by a Rapidman pocket calculator and you are told how you compare with others of your age group. The students in charge can also answer other related questions and suggest what sort of program you can follow to best suit your needs.

Rabel suggested students might get tested now and then work out over the summer. Then in the fall, they could be retested and see how they improved.

Asked how the program got started, Rabel said that there had been "a felt need around Hart House" to do something along these lines. Weight-lifting didn't attract a great number of people in the fall and so an experimental fitness test centre was set up.

"People aren't sold on strength alone these days," said Rabel. "But they do know that general fitness based on cardio-vascular activity is a good thing. We're trying to appeal to the average person with this program and motivate them to improve their fitness."

If you want to take advantage of this service, see Joe Rabel in room 211, Hart House or Robin Cambell. All members of the university community, both male and female, are welcome.

PHE upset Pharmacy in interfac playoffs

By MIKE FRIEND

In interfac hockey playoff action, SMC B downed UC II 5-1 in an afternoon encounter, while later that night Scar lost 2-0 to For A, Erindale edged PHE 2-1 in overtime, and in the Law 1-Dent's game, it was Monroe 2 and Law 1.

The Scar-For game was but another chapter in the violence story that has permeated the league this year. Jim Jarvo of Scar was handed a match penalty at the four-minute mark of the game for butt-ending.

After the major penalty, the game settled down to steady checking until Ferguson notched the first and winning goal for the trees. The second goal for the axemen was credited to Vincent.

Erindale's victory over PHE was not as easy as the boys from Pastoral College thought it would be. Until late in the second period, Erin seemed to be playing in reverse gear. During this period PHE missed numerous chances to salt the game away.

The first goal of the game came from the stick of Mark Ackley (PHE) while the jocks were shorthanded. There was no more scoring until late in the second period when Morris tallied for Erindale, sending the game into overtime.

Morris again scored for Erindale early into the overtime to give the westenders the right to advance to the quarter-finals.

The whole difference between Law and Dents was the presence of ex-Blue Bob Monroe who scored both the Dents' goals unassisted. Monroe could have scored several more goals but either lost control of the puck at the last minute or fired wide of the net.

Law's lone marker was scored by John Wright after a goal mouth scramble.

One must recognize the work of the referees Tuesday night, who kept the games in hand. However, there is one non-supporter of officials in the Scarborough camp. Scar's coach felt the game time had been shortened and in response, someone in the Scar dressing room destroyed the clipboard that held the scoresheet.

In Wednesday night action, PHE II stunned the 300-odd spectators at the arena with an upset over Pharmacy by the score of 2-1, while Vic I finally displayed the form that carried them to a first place finish in the regular season when they downed Grad 1 3-0.

The Pharmacy game started slow and sloppy as the jocks tried to knock the druggists out of the rink bodily. When this tactic failed, physed turned their attention to playing hockey. This tactic also failed as Pharm scored the first goal. PHE later tied the game forcing the game into overtime.

With less than a minute gone in the overtime period, PHE struck with another goal eliminating Pharm from the playdowns.

In the replay of the Vic-Grad game, (regular readers will recall that the first game ended in a tie even after two overtime periods) both goalies, Doug Carter for Vic and John Haines for the Grads, took up where they left off Monday.

The first period was scoreless but Vic finally broke the ice when McWarter broke alone in on Haines and deposited the puck in the net. Shortly thereafter, Findlay notched two more quickies for Vic to make the final score 3-0.

Like the first game this one was a fast, exciting contest with excellent goaltending. Both Carter and Haines showed why they were picked to the all-star teams in February.

The Vic-Grad game also featured an example of butt-ending. The infraction of the rules this time was perpetrated by John Richmond who received his just desserts in the form of a match penalty.

Varsity staff notice

The Varsity staff advises anyone interested in running for the position of Editor of The Varsity to submit an application immediately, and by noon Wednesday at the latest.

At noon Wednesday, in The Varsity office, the staff will screen declared candidates. All staff are urged to attend the open screening, as are members of The Varsity board of directors.

On Thursday, and for as many subsequent days as necessary, ballots will be held until the staff is able to come to a choice. The staff's recommendation will then be forwarded to the board for approval.

Conference sets up war chest for future candidates

A weekend conference at Brock University on cutbacks in post-secondary education has agreed to establish a war chest "to help finance campaigns of candidates who support policies endorsed by this conference."

The conference — 25 of whose 250 delegates were from U of T — also passed motions calling for a demonstration at Queen's Park, province-wide media campaigns and a "united front" between students, communities and unions to prevent "the shifting of the economic burden onto the backs of working people."

A workshop on student aid recommended as principles a reduction and elimination of the loan portion of student assistance and a reduction and abolition of tuition fees.

It specifically encouraged an immediate $15 retroactive payment to offset cost of living increases.

indexing awards to the cost of living; reducing students' liability for educational debt by reducing the OSAP loan ceiling; subsidizing interest rates so students pay no more than six percent interest on loans; basing parental contributions on actual support; and including part-time students under OSAP.

The conference also supported moves by faculty and support staff to organize themselves into unions and unconditionally opposed "any attempts by university and college administrations to lay off faculty or support staff or economic reasons."

Financing for post-secondary education should be shifted onto the backs of the corporations, the conference agreed, and should be based on the need of each individual institution rather than on the basis of BIU's or individual student enrolment.

York U pres race rages

While U of T's student council elections are running smoothly with two contesting slates of candidates, York University's elections are racked with accusations of improper procedures and counter-charges of miscarriage of justice.

York University's United Left Slate student council candidates were both disqualified from running Friday but popular support moved the ULS to decide yesterday it would run another candidate with the same platform in this week's Wednesday and Thursday York elections.

Former presidential candidate Dale Ritch and his running mate Frank Giorno were disqualified from the election race for allegedly starting to campaign four days too early.

The decision was reached by an election tribunal composed of the York Student Federation speaker, the chief returning officer and a student representative and is to be announced officially today.

However, the controversy swept the campus last week with many York students arguing the tribunal's verdict was unfair.

The election dates were changed to March 12 and 13 from March 10 and 11, thus moving nomination closings and campaign starting dates to Feb. 28 from Feb. 24. In the confusion of the date changes, the ULS started campaigning on the originally announced Feb. 24 date.

In response to the tribunal's suspending the campaigning of all 20 ULS campus candidates from last Tuesday to Friday, the slate last week formed a non-partisan organization called the Committee for Free Elections to publicize what it felt was unfair treatment to the ULS.

The committee published a leaflet distributed across the York campus which was signed by ULS election opponents as well as Ritch and Giorno.

At a meeting yesterday the ULS, the front-running slate in this week's York elections, decided to put up J.J. (John) Koornstra as a surrogate candidate on the same platform.

However, Koornstra admits Ritch is the better candidate and says he will resign if elected as president two weeks after he is in office. In that case an interim president would be appointed over the summer — which the ULS hopes would be one of its own — and new elections would be held in September, with Ritch hoping to run again.

Ten candidates are vying for the York Student Federation presidency — the greatest number of presidential hopefuls in the council's history.

Only two slates are running in the U of T SAC elections this Wednesday and Thursday.

Proposed loan ceiling hike criticized

Student loan ceilings will be increased to $1,800 from $1,400 as of July 1 under the Canada Student Loans Plan (CSLP) if Parliament approves the proposal of Finance Minister John Turner.

However, the loan ceiling in Ontario is presently $800 and "there's no reason why the Ontario government should increase the ceiling," SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said last night.

Kanowitch, who attended the week-end Brock University Ontario Students' Action Conference on post-secondary cutbacks, stressed that reaction there was most unfavorable to loan ceiling increases.

"It means students will have to take more of a loan to get a grant," Kanowitch noted. "Students would be forced to go further into debt than they are now."

Both the National Union of Students and the Ontario Federation of Students have been lobbying the government to revise the CSLP and institute grant forms of financial aid.

"It's a question of accessibility," Kanowitch said. "How many poorer people will come to the university if they know they'll incur a huge debt afterwards?"

Kanowitch termed the proposed $400 loan ceiling increase "typical government PR. It makes it look as if students are getting a good deal."

The boost in the annual maximum was proposed as a result of higher living and education costs facing students, Turner said.

To qualify for assistance, students must be enrolled in full-time study at a post-secondary institution and must demonstrate need for financial aid.

The provincial government must approve the loans, which are made to students by chartered banks and other lenders such as credit unions.

The federal government pays the interest on these loans to the lending institutions while the borrower is a full-time student and for six months thereafter. The student is then responsible for repayment and the ensuing interest charges and has a maximum nine and a half year period to complete repayment.

The maximum total borrowing by any one student under the proposed increased loan limit would still remain at $9,800, Turner said.

McReavy meets Mettrick today over firing

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Fired zoology storekeeper Paul McReavy continues his fight to be reinstated when he meets with zoology associate chairman D.F. Mettrick today.

McReavy, a five-year employee at the Ramsay Wright Zoological building, was fired by the zoology administration in January for what he says was union activity.

Today's 2 pm meeting will be the second stage of the university grievance procedure which McReavy has been advised to follow by the administration.

The first stage of the university grievance procedure unfolded last Wednesday when McReavy met with his immediate supervisor Bill Smith to see if differences between the two sides could be settled.

McReavy, as he expected, wasn't reinstated, but he admitted the meeting went better than he had expected.

"From my observation of the discussion, the consensus appeared to be that my grievance had a strong basis," he said.

"All participants appeared to me to be favorable to my reinstatement, but there was some question — raised by myself — about the power of this first grievance stage to effect my reinstatement."

The university grievance procedure McReavy is following under Policy 501-9 states: "He should first discuss the matter informally with his supervisor. Failing a satisfactory settlement, he can appeal to his department head."

McReavy said that the wording implied if a settlement were reached at the first stage, then he could have been reinstated at that time.

But McReavy said Smith told him he doubted his ability to reinstate him at that stage should he have wanted to.

McReavy sent a letter the same day to R.F. Brown, the university's personnel director, asking him to clarify the situation.

In the letter, McReavy said that should he be reinstated, he would like a discussion on:

- no loss of pay or benefits for the period of time since his firing in early January;

- procedures for securing time off work if it should be necessary for possible further court proceedings.

This is no academic point because McReavy still faces a union-management grievance procedure before the Ontario Labor Board. This is entirely separate from the university grievance procedure.

McReavy is scheduled to appear before the labor board March 20 where his grievance will be reviewed by a three-member board.

The labor board recently handed down a decision that the storekeepers were indeed employees of the university.

The university had argued unsuccessfully that the storekeepers, like McReavy, were employed by the zoology department. Therefore, the employees would not have been the concern of the university, nor would they have been considered to be unionized under the terms of a collective agreement signed Sept. 5 last year which said university storekeepers were unionized.

Barnes slate wants to 'return SAC to students'

By BOB BETTSON

SAC university commissioner Gord Barnes is heavily favored by most observers to win next Thursday's SAC presidential elections, but his slate is campaigning hard in its bid to "return SAC to the students."

Although Barnes has been active in SAC for three years, first as a Vic SAC rep, then as an executive member, his vice-presidential running mates, second year Erindale student Sa'ad Sajdullah and first year medical student Michelle Harvey, say they will bring fresh ideas into the SAC office.

Their program is the traditional "left-liberal" blend of services and political action. But Barnes wants SAC to involve more students.

"We spend too much time in the office. I plan on having all the executive meetings at different colleges and faculties so afterward we can listen to council's concerns," he said.

The Barnes slate also says it will take a different approach, to campus-wide campaigns such as this year's efforts to gain student-faculty parity on tenure committees.

"We will try to meet with those students who are affected and work with them. . . . You can't take the leadership too far ahead of the students."

But the slate feels the important political issues SAC should concern itself with are the same, the U of T act, parity on tenure committees, educational cutbacks and open budgeting procedures.

On discipline Barnes hedges. "We will have to ask people's opinion," he explained.

"There is a large unresolved question whether non-academic discipline should be handled in the civil courts or by some university tribunal."

He said this was not already covered by massive student reaction last year opposing the Conway-Cadario code.

Sajdullah, who has no experience in campus politics, said he got involved because he was concerned about the issues, particularly the attempts to lower quotas on foreign visa students. He is a visa student from India studying Commerce and Finance.

He feels racism is an important issue on campus although he has not personally experienced discrimination.

But he says complaints should go through U of T human rights advisor Dan Hill instead of clouding the issues with charges and countercharges.

Sajdullah says the issue of quotas is a difficult one because Canadians have a "legitimate concern for the cost of educating non-Canadians." But he says existing quotas such as those in engineering should not be lowered.

The other vice-presidential candidate, Michelle Harvey, adds experience to the ticket having been Victoria finance commissioner and involved in the medical society this year. She feels she would bring considerable enthusiasm to the job.

Harvey is one of the few women in recent years to run for a top SAC spot with a good chance of getting elected, but says she is not only concerned with women's issues.

She believes U of T has a wide diversity of women students who are interested in different things and SAC women's commission should be attempting to make appeals to different groups, not just stressing political activities.

Harvey is especially concerned with having SAC become "something students can relate to." She says professional students don't oppose the present SAC, they just are not as concerned as they could be.

"It's a two-way street. We should communicate more with them and it's up to them to let SAC know what they feel," she said.

On services, the Barnes slate places top priority on getting the Campus as Campus Centre with a non-profit student-run pub, as well as a games room on campus.

Barnes says he supports the athletic complex and would also like to see Radio Varsity get an FM license.

"The SAC decision last week challenges the radio people to go out and find funding outside SAC."

He says SAC should continue funding college papers with campus wide distribution to improve communication.

He had no major criticisms of The Varsity but feels that like SAC, more people should be involved.

Harvey would like to see SAC spend more time telling students where their money is going and the SAC logo appearing on all SAC sponsored events is a start.

The slate supports reorganizing SAC from its present commission structure into ad-hoc committees and working groups which would involve SAC representatives and other interested students.

They feel issues such as the teaching quality and tenure campaign could be dealt with better because on a huge campus like U of T there is such a wide variation of quality.

"In some departments teaching quality is obviously a prime consideration in tenure decisions," Barnes said.

He feels a university-wide committee on teaching evaluation should be the most important report since the New Program in 1969.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

A pensive Gord Barnes muses on a SAC returned to students.

Malta wants a more democratically-run university

The Varsity — Adrian Bradford

Henry Malta will smile more when U of T is democratized.

The major change which SAC presidential candidate Henry Malta would like to see is a university run democratically in the interests of students, faculty, workers and the community.

Right now, Malta says, the university is being run by the corporations, and since corporations don't need much labor at the moment, they are imposing cutbacks on education through the government.

Malta cites the phenomenon of community colleges as the work of corporations which he says are training people simply to be workers.

He views present cutbacks in the humanities with the same alarm.

The crisis of the universities, Malta feels, is part of a larger social crisis of an economic system that "can't meet people's needs."

This crisis, Malta predicts, is going to get much worse, since it is a problem of capitalism.

Malta, a fourth year special student in anthropology, heads the Young Socialist-backed Student Militant Caucus ticket, along with Michael Franklin, a Scarborough College Student.

Lynette Batson, a food sciences student from the Black Student Union, withdrew from the ticket last week after the BSU decided it wanted broader support for its concerns. However, the rest of the ticket will go ahead anyway.

The leading edge of the educational cutbacks, Malta feels, is represented by increasing attacks — racist attacks — on foreign students.

He feels it important to fight the cutbacks by protecting foreign students' rights. As examples of racist attacks, he cites the attempts to deport Black leader Rosie Douglas, the threatened deportation of 1,500 Haitians, remarks about Chinese students by Canadian Medical Association president Bette Stephenson and attempts to cut back quotas on foreign engineering students.

The Student Militant Caucus would like to see the abolition of tuition fees, and the payment of a living wage to students.

In essence, Malta says, his slate supports the program recently put forward by the Ontario Federation of Students, and would like to see those demands implemented, not by lobbying, but by a "massive campaign."

For this campaign which would have to go out into the community, "militant" leadership such as he is willing to provide is needed.

Corporations, not students, should pay for the costs of education, because they derive the benefit from it, Malta says.

Malta criticizes the Barnes slate on the issue of cutbacks, saying Barnes' stand is "totally inadequate," not offering a strategy but rather "status quo" leadership.

Other issues which the militant slate feels important include women's rights — specifically, abortion on demand and better daycare; and student rights — the slate calls for firm rejection of the discipline code and a reinstatement of convicted Caput conspirators Tony Leah and Bill Schabas.

Malta also feels strongly that support should be given to the United Farm Workers, the Graduate Assistants Association and to dismissed zoology storekeeper Paul McReavy, who should be reinstated.

Malta feels SAC must take many more initiatives than it has done previously, saying the present SAC is not sufficiently motivated to change the university and does not move until presented with a sufficiently widely-backed proposal until it feels safe.

If he were running SAC, Malta says, he would be more democratic, taking debates to students, and holding mass meetings.

Malta also feels it important for the university to teach more about the nature of imperialism — to expose the nature of military research, for example, and to integrate popular non-credit courses such as those offered by the Marxist institute with the mainstream of the curriculum.

On present university issues, Malta is much vaguer. He is unsure, for example, about the implications of the colleges agreement, under which colleges will lose control over hiring and firing in departments in return for decentralized teaching, saying only that if the students want it, he is for it.

He feels the same way about the proposed athletics complex: if students are for it, he is for it, although he doesn't feel they should have to pay for the construction of the service.

Student representation, Malta feels, is not as important as some have made out. Whereas he is for increased student representation rather than against it, he doesn't feel having more students on committees will change the world.

"My party, Social Credit, has yet to take a stand on the issue."
John Evans,
On educational cutbacks

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

On balance, the choice is Barnes

Next year's SAC executive will bear a heavy responsibility. On the one hand, strong, decisive leadership is needed in order to fight the provincial government cutbacks, cutbacks which will inevitably lead to a decline in the quality and opportunity of higher education. On the other hand, in order for the fight to be successful, it is important SAC be responsive to its constituents, and understand their problems. Only with strong student backing can the fight be successful.

On the first count, the Student Militant Caucus slate headed by Henry Malta has developed a strong analysis and a clearly defined point of view. It goes right to the heart of the central problems of the university, and makes explicit its desire for an open educational system, run by and for the people.

On the other hand, it is doubtful the type of leadership necessary for the SAC presidency can be provided by this slate. It is not one the majority of students are likely to place much faith in, and may end up reduced to ineffectiveness for lack of support. Moreover, Malta himself has very little knowledge of the university, and campus issues, a knowledge which is important to do the job effectively.

The Gord Barnes slate, by comparison, has bent over backwards to stress its concern for keeping in touch with students, and for paying attention to everyday campus issues. Barnes has an encyclopedic knowledge of the campus which will pay off in taking care of the nuts and bolts of the job effectively.

However, we are unable to find in the Barnes literature any clear, urgent statement of the need to fight the cutbacks. Barnes says he stands for a "reformed student aid program" without saying how he wants to reform it. He says "SAC must direct its efforts towards ensuring that post secondary education is a priority of the provincial government," but doesn't outline how he proposes to do it; instead, he deals with the effect of the cutbacks on undergraduate programs.

On balance, the Barnes slate is the better choice. Yet if Barnes is to be a good SAC president, he must start to show a better fighting spirit and start to indicate he is prepared to lead students into open warfare with the government. Otherwise, SAC will degenerate into a parochialism which, in the long run, will hurt its credibility as much as its oft-touted unresponsiveness.

Gord Barnes: strong on responsiveness, weak on leadership.

Sabia gets too much attention

I would like to congratulate my sainted Governing Council election opponent, Mr. Michael Sabia, on his latest resounding success in his never-ending battle to create a better world for University of Toronto students.

As noted in Friday's Varsity (right on the top of page one, beside the modest two-column by 4" photo of the handsome Mr. Sabia) this learned gentleman, in his capacity as SAC communications commissioner, managed to convince the acute legislative minds of the U of T SAC to approve in principle the use of SAC funds to partially finance an imaginary non-profit U of T FM radio station.

This is indeed a feat deserving of front-page treatment by The Varsity, and I'm proud of my virtuous opponent for being not only the author but the prime force behind the approval in principle of this crucial piece of campus legislation. A real man of action and realistic vision is our beloved communications commissioner.

In point of fact, I think it's clear that he's doing such a fine job at this present occupation that it would be a shame to see Mr. Sabia have to leave his honored SAC post next year to sit on Governing Council, where he'd have to endure dull, boring meetings, deciding on such mundane issues as how to operate a university which is running a seven-figure deficit, how to decide how and where to cut costs, which courses might have to be discontinued, etc.

John Parker,
Governing Council Candidate

Editorial a pile of cheap rhetoric

There is a saying that people who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones. The editorial of Wed. Feb. 26, SAC needs strong president next year, threw a complete barrage.

The editorial refers to a "complete vacuum in the quality of leadership in the college and suburban councils." It fails to outline this vacuum is evident in SAC as a whole and in that tower of virtue, the Varsity building.

Yes, there is a problem on campus but a frothing pile of rhetoric is not going to solve any problems. What is needed is a more thorough analysis than was found in your editorial.

For instance, what is a "left-liberal"? Is it a middle of the road wishy-washy compromiser? Is it the personification of truth and justice.

And no matter what cosy definition you may have, how does the candidate of your choice, Tim Buckley fit that definition? This is never said.

Why, for instance, does the Young Socialist slate not fit the bill — is it because one of them is black? Or perhaps 'Communist' is the secret word.

And how is Peter Bauman "a joke"? I'm sure the people who voted for him last year would like to know.

Name-calling is no substitute for responsible analysis, and in fact becomes the opposite. A cursory glance at the political history of the National Socialist Party in Germany would reveal similar tactics.

Did not Hitler call for strong leadership in the face of the communist "threat"?

The so-called "news" story on the following Monday that announced the candidacy of Gord (Wally) Barnes takes us right back to the same old label-mongering.

You even mention that Barnes will be the "successor" to Seymour Kanowitch. Do you mean the heir-apparent? You say that Barnes is "heavily favored" but you don't say by whom, when or why.

This allusion to a steady progression of left-liberals in the SAC office brings to mind a better definition.

Because in the past two years the vice-presidential candidate representing the suburban campus has deserted the office for parts unknown, is this perhaps the liberal who left? Who's leaving this year?

Good journalism and editorial analysis is the natural product of sticking to the facts — the who, what, when, where and why.

This is an ancient newspaper rule. Let the facts reveal your bias, but never ask the reader to accept your prejudice, even if you do know it all.

Only racism at immigration forum

We were quite angered to find that the Trinity College seminar "Immigration and Population Growth" has been organized to give a forum to those who are so loudly pushing racism in regard to immigration policy, while its list of speakers includes no one of the many people who are attempting to combat racism.

It is farcical to hold a seminar entitled "Three Views on Immigration Policy" without a representative of the view that the government is using the immigration "debate" to dishonestly cover up its economic failures. This view is held by a large number of people, including the hundreds of people associated with the Committee Against Racism.

Trinity College should give at least equal time to this view, and we insist that it re-organize its program to accommodate it.

We also wonder why Trinity College is charging $7.50 for admission to the seminar. Is it Trinity's intention to prevent the large number of immigrants who are being directly hurt by such "seminars" from attending?

The organization of the kind of seminar Trinity College has designed, does, in our view, raise questions that should be investigated by the "Preliminary Inquiry into Racism at U of T."

SAC wastes money

What are they afraid of? This is a good question to ask not of the Governing Council, but of SAC. Why do they find it necessary to spew out large volumes of propaganda to convince those who pay for it of SAC's party line?

Seymour Kanowitch commented on his responsibility of spending the students' money as they would want it spent shortly after SAC refused the grape freaks money, but I wonder how many students want their money spent on posters, buttons, and a rag cleverly disguised to look like a Toike from a distance.

SAC is like the government: we can vote for a particular party to waste our money, but none of them will stop the waste. Perhaps this is why SAC's elections and other campaigns attract 10 percent turnout at best. Perhaps the 90 percent is who the propaganda is aimed at.

What really bugs me is the waste of trees to pay tribute to SAC.

'Do you support the construction of the new athletics complex'

The Athletics Complex

On Wednesday and Thursday, students vote on whether they support construction of the proposed athletics complex.

We asked Mike Friend, of the men's intramural sports committee, and Allan McAllister, of the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association, to give us their opinions

Present facilities full

Why do we need a new athletic complex at U of T? If you are one of the 28,000 full-time undergraduate students who wishes to participate in some form of athletic endeavor, be it recreational or competitive, the answer is evident — overcrowding of facilities.

A quick survey of athletic floor space per student in Canada shows: Laval with 24 square feet per student; Alberta with 16 square feet; Waterloo with 14 square feet; and U of T with a pitiful four square feet per student. (This includes changing facilities as well as activity space.)

According to intramural figures, approximately 10 square feet per student would provide adequate space. The construction of the new complex, in its present design, would increase the floor space to 11 square feet per student. These figures only take into account full-time undergraduate students. They do not even consider part-time students, graduate students, staff, or support staff, who as members of the university community should have a right to use the new facilities if they so desire.

Those who feel that the new building is not necessary should talk to the 15,000 full-time undergraduate students who pay athletic fees but are unable to use the overcrowded facilities.

The new complex would allow any student to enjoy the new building, since the increased area would provide the necessary space to accommodate an expanded program. One must understand that the complex as it is now planned will only meet the present needs of athletics on the campus. If, in future years, the student body of U of T increases, the same situation that we face now would reappear, even with the new building, but it might not be as critical.

Without the new building, there will be no expansion of intramural sports or of existing programs. Future students who are interested in some form of athletic endeavor might decide that there is no use going to a university that does not have proper athletic facilities to accommodate its students. These would be the same students who would be faced with paying athletic fees and not being able to make use of the facilities due to overcrowding.

Critics of the complex do not see any real need for the complex, they feel that the exterior design would detract from the neighborhood, and they oppose the destruction of houses to provide the required space for the complex. Yet the critics come up with no feasible alternative for the needed facility.

The area ratepayers feel that decentralization of the facilities would end the need for the new complex, but when one looks at the cost of decentralization, the cost negates its value. A prime example would be squash courts: you need space for the courts, change rooms, showers and staff to maintain the area; then costs soar.

In my opinion, the aforementioned complaints are invalid when one realizes that the houses slated for demolition are not used for residential purposes but for U of T offices. Also, the exterior design of the complex, contrary to popular belief, is not bleak and barren. It will fit in quite nicely with the buildings around it: the Benson Building and New College. There will be landscaped areas around the complex where people can sit quietly and watch the world go by. Another point to consider is that the main construction area, the parking lot on the west side of the Benson Building, is a present day eyesore.

It is quite evident that the critics of the proposed athletics complex do not understand the facts, or the need for its construction, or they would not be so opposed to it. We, as students, realize the need for more facilities and must show this by voting in favor of the complex March 12 and 13.

Let's give the new complex our full support.

Mike Friend, Member,
Men's Intramural Sports Committee

Referendum meaningless

The SAC referendum to be held this week is a meaningless exercise calculated to re-enforce the position which has been adopted already by SAC.

The manner in which the first question is put leaves no room for those who may want improved athletic facilities but do not approve of the present design of the athletic complex. The referendum is in the spirit of the "all or nothing", no compromise attitude of the administration and the physical education faculty. The implied threat is that if students do not approve the complex as presently designed they will get no new athletic facilities.

This attitude is not only childish, it is unrealistic given the financial and political situation in which the university must operate for the next few years and, probably, for the coming decade.

Community residents have not adopted such a no compromise attitude. Throughout the controversy over the athletic complex, we have never maintained that athletic facilities should not be built. Our position has been that if the facilities are built they should be compatible with the surrounding neighbourhoods and should not have a negative effect on the community.

Community residents have sought to preserve the existing houses on the site of the complex because we feel that they are important as a buffer zone between the university and the community. This idea of a "soft edge" for the university is endorsed in the Campus as Campus Centre Report in which the aim is expressed to "suture the frayed edges of the university into an urban context."

Presently, the west side of the campus is a sterile and oppressive environment. Instead of enhancing that environment, this building is yet another bad example of university planning and architecture. Even the most staunch proponents of the complex have publicly admitted that the building is ugly.

Besides the aesthetics of the building, there is the issue of its environmental impact. Because it is out of scale with the residential neighbourhoods, it will exacerbate the wind conditions and block out the sun on the north side of Harbord. Because of the presence of spectator facilities, the complex promises more traffic congestion and parking problems for an already overburdened area.

"Community use" was a slogan that surrounded the initial presentations of this project to the community. But the university seems to have backtracked on the issue, if Bruce Kidd's letter of February 8, 1975 to the Building and Development Committee of the City is any indication:

"It should be made perfectly clear that this building was never intended to serve in a significant way the recreational needs of Ward 6 and the City of Toronto. If the university created that expectation, then it was a mistake."

Community issues are not the only issues which argue against the athletic complex as presently designed. The complex promises to be a drain on university resources at a time when its financial prospects look very bleak. It is incongruous to have such a major capital expenditure planned at a time when president Evans is complaining of the university's projected deficit, when such programs as the writer in residence program, interdisciplinary studies, etc. are being cut back, and when book acquisitions have been reduced and library hours will probably have to be shortened.

The university has little more than half of the capital costs of the building. The rest of the money will have to come from private donors and from the Province. The Province is very unsympathetic to university building projects and cannot be relied upon to pick up the inevitable cost overrun of the building. And it is doubtful whether private donors will be willing to give money for a complex which is so unpopular in the community, and which may not ever get built.

The complex may not ever get built because it does not conform to the existing zoning for the site. The university was able to wriggle out of the height by-law by private lobbying and pressure tactics. But to get a zoning by-law change, the university must operate more openly and submit to a political judgment. Given the amount of opposition to this complex, it cannot be assumed that the outcome of that judgment will be in the university's favour.

From the university's own standpoint, financial and political considerations argue in favor of compromise, of scaling-down the complex to something which is acceptable to the community. But what role can students play in making the decision on the complex?

Throughout this project, students have had no more role than community residents. Students have been presented with finished plans and asked to approve them or face the prospect of not getting new facilities. The administration assumes that students will accept what it gives them and not ask questions.

SAC has fallen into the trap and now asks the student population as a whole to join it.

Women's Conference at City Hall: Provincial and Federal governments strongly criticized

By ELAINE ROLFE

Both the provincial and federal governments came under strong criticism from their handling of International Women's Year at an all-day women's conference Saturday at City Hall.

Over 700 people attended the series of nine workshops dealing with issues such as women in the work force, women's sexuality and the criminal law, housework and the economy.

The conference was sponsored by community groups and labor unions, not the government.

Toronto Star staff writer Margaret Daley attacked "hypocritical" attempts made by federal and provincial governments to "spoonfeed" their own plans for International Women's Year to the public while rejecting protests as examples of womanly fickleness.

To make sure International Women's Year is more than a government placebo, Daley stressed the conference was an opportunity for groups unite in order to "start telling the government what we want."

To ensure action will continue a general assembly chaired by Kay MacPherson concluded the conference with voting on the resolution.

The workshop dealing with Justice in Marriage—Family Property Law had on an unusual focus. Chairperson Lynne King stressed most discussions on this subject dealt with the problems faced by middle or upper income families in a marriage breakup.

This workshop had four women concerned with the problems of the lower income woman.

Celeste Frame, assistant director of the Education department of the Ontario Metis and Non-Status Indian Association, (OMNSIA) underlined some of the problems faced by native women who see themselves as Indians, but who have no native rights because of their mixed blood or intermarriage with non-Indians.

She described the double problem these women face in a marriage breakup. They must cope not only with the difficult role of the sole parent but also deal with this situation without the medical and dental care available to status native women.

Frame gave several examples of the significant historical roles played by native women. She said within the sixty locals of OMSIA, women provide much of the leadership.

In Northwestern Ontario, 60 to 70 percent of local presidents are women.

Frame described how OMSIA deals with improving conditions for Metis and non-status natives through fund-seeking for scholarships and bursaries for native students and through establishing community programs in isolated areas.

She said 80 percent of students remaining in educational courses, who had received financial assistance, are women.

Mary Hogan, Parkdale Legal Services worker said beside the emotional problems faced by a middle or upper class woman in a marriage breakup, the lower class woman is often faced with the problem of bare survival.

When the husband has deserted, the lower income woman is often faced with no money to pay for food, rent or legal assistance.

Hogan attacked the humiliating run-around such women face when applying for welfare.

She said more hostels such as Nellie's, Interval House and Women in Transition be set up and funded for women in desperate straits who need shelter and moral support.

She stressed the need for educational rehabilitation for women who are often unable to immediately enter the work force and daycare facilities for their children while they are retraining.

Rita Milfin a YWCA social worker, said lower income women find the ritual of applying for welfare a "totally demoralizing process."

She added women are actually discouraged from retraining by the existing legal aid system.

Milfin charged that for women to enrol in courses, they must switch from family benefits, which provide health care and drug coverage to manpower payments which do not provide these benefits, which are vital to the single mother.

Milfin said making the choice between added security and retraining is unfair to demand of a person who has recently undergone the trauma of a marriage breakdown.

She said the issue should be brought to the political level.

Anne Albergo said many of these women are persuaded to immigrate with their children from third world countries by travel agents who promise them legal status and good work on arrival.

These women are often forced to take demeaning jobs at low wages with no legal recourse for change.

Under constant threat of exposure and deportation, they are unable to send their children to school, Albergo said. The Green Paper was criticized by audience members for its prejudice against emigrants from non-European countries.

McMaster University now has a third option for students interested in proceeding to a Master of Business Administration degree: a co-operative option, whereby students alternate four-month periods of study and relevant work experience. A limited number of applications will be accepted for the semester beginning in September, 1975.

An MBA degree from McMaster could help you to achieve your career objectives in the areas of management, administration, and education because the McMaster MBA program offers a wide range of optional courses (that can be selected to your needs) as well as providing a core of basic knowledge and skills. Although admission is restricted to those who have proven that they have the potential and commitment required to complete a demanding program, graduates in any discipline may be accepted.

Academic standing is not the only entry criterion but, as a general rule, you can have a reasonable expectation of completing the McMaster MBA program if you have maintained at least a second-class standing in the last two years of your undergraduate program and if you can achieve a satisfactory test score in the Admission Test for Graduate Study in Business.

Applicants for the McMaster MBA who have taken relevant course work may be granted advanced standing in our program. If you are interested in exploring this challenging opportunity further, fill in and mail this form.

Delegates learn how cutbacks affect other universities

One of the more modest hopes of this weekend's conference in St. Catharines was that students would take the opportunity to find out how the provincial cutbacks are being felt at other campuses across the province.

As far as different universities and colleges are facing the same problems, it could also be determined which strategies for organizing opposition to the cutbacks have been most successful, and, equally important, why some strategies have failed.

What follows is a series of very brief reports of developments across the province, based on information presented by the delegates of the 17 Ontario post-secondary institutions in attendance at the conference.

A Common Front for the Preservation of Education has been formed in Ottawa. The Common Front came into existence when a coalition of students, campus workers and faculty members at Carleton University began to work together with similar coalition groups formed at Ottawa University and Algonquin College.

A rally in support of the Common Front held at an Ottawa high school March 6 attracted about 150 supporters.

This type of organization avoids the problems which arise when the demands of students, support staff and faculty are played against each other.

A day of study of the implications of the cutbacks was held at York University in December, but it led to "no concrete action", a York delegate reported.

Students, campus workers, faculty members and administrators attended, and attempts have been made since then to organize a common front.

The United Left Slate, running in this month's student council elections at York, has stressed the cutbacks as a campaign issue, and has called for increased taxation on corporate profits to support education.

Meanwhile, the present York student council has been organizing a letter-writing campaign to put pressure on ever-absent provincial colleges and universities minister James Auld.

A representative of the part-time students from Atkinson College at York lamented that part-time students have not been able to work together with similar groups at different campuses.

She suggested this kind of organization was necessary because university student councils look on part-time students as just "an extra source of revenue" and are not willing to deal with the particular problems facing part-time students.

Glendon College delegates emphasized their difficulties in maintaining bilingual education programs.

A Glendon delegate charged the provincial government with a "hypocritical attitude", supporting bilingualism in theory while cutting back support for bilingual courses.

A result is that, while over 50 percent of Glendon students are registered in the bilingual program, only seven percent of all courses at Glendon are now being taught in French.

A delegate from Laurentian University in Sudbury painted a bleak picture of an institution which has a large proportion of part-time students, is attempting to teach in both French and English, and tries to offer courses to people in an area covering thousands of square miles.

Last year, students worked together to prevent the university counselling service from being completely eliminated, and there has been some common action this year in the face of a sixteen percent increase in residence fees.

The increase was limited to eight percent, but differences between French-speaking and English-speaking students have led to a split in the student council.

"There hasn't been too much we can get together on," he reported.

Students at Lakehead University in Thunder Bay organized a study day two weeks ago. One result of the study session was the preparation of a questionnaire about living expenses which was distributed to university students, high school students and others throughout the community.

They have, mirabile dictu, not been successful in getting James Auld to come and speak to them about his government's education policies.

St. Patrick's College in Ottawa stands to lose its independent existence and be completely assimilated within Carleton University, with which it is at present affiliated.

Students have been appealing to alumni for financial support as a result of a 75 percent decline in student service budgets.

Fifteen sessional lecturers will not have their contracts renewed and the college's library has been closed and changed into a reading room.

Attempts to develop innovative programs in interdisciplinary studies have little chance of getting off the ground in the present circumstances.

The McMaster campus in Hamilton was described as "typically apathetic."

Course unions are working for themselves within individual academic departments, but "as a unified front we don't have anything."

At Queen's in Kingston, effects have already been felt in library service, in deteriorating equipment for science courses and in increased class sizes. Since many Queen's students are not from Kingston, they are worried about the cost and availability of adequate housing.

The response to these problems was described as "somewhat apathetic at the moment."

Student representatives are sitting on a president's committee to look into ways of cutting costs and increasing revenues.

A student committee has been set up to provide alternatives to the recommendations of the president's committee, and this group is preparing a brief to present to the provincial cabinet when it meets in Kingston in April.

The problems facing Ryerson are specifically those of a technical institution where it is important that modern equipment be available, which requires heavy capital expenditures.

The Ryerson delegate complained of an inadequate library, outdated laboratories and poor athletic facilities.

Another problem at Ryerson is that of space. Classroom space is at such a premium that classes are regularly held in student lounges, and expensive equipment sits gathering dust for lack of teaching and working space.

Rooms in residence are available for only one-half of one percent of all Ryerson students.

A group from the University of Waterloo represented the Ad Hoc Committee to Form a Popular Student Front.

A speaker representing the group identified two general areas in which the cutbacks are being felt; the standard of living of students and the quality of the education they receive.

The committee has been working on propaganda, research, and has produced mailouts to send to high schools.

They also supported a slate in a recent student council election which focussed on the problems of the provincial cutbacks.

At Fanshawe College in London, students have organized a unified front with faculty members in dealing with the administration and have organized ad hoc committees to come up with strategies for dealing with specific problems.

Students at Trent University are facing a situation in which "student politicians have lost the support of the base" by putting their energies exclusively into committee work with representatives of the university administration.

Teaching loads have increased, secretaries and library workers are being overworked and the library is understocked with books.

While the student opposition to the administration is "fragmented", some groups are encouraging attempts to form unions on the part of campus workers and teaching staff.

A Trent delegate also suggested that students should organize beyond the university with workers in the public sector, and particularly with the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE).

A representative of the Ontario Secondary School Students' Union (OSSSU) explained how a network of high school newspapers in Ontario has developed, and suggested that university students could gain support in their campaigns in high schools.

At the University of Western Ontario, administrators have predicted a $1.75 million deficit.

Good academics are leaving the university or are not being offered permanent positions, quotas have been established in the professional faculties, and student services cannot be expanded.

Furthermore, student governments are being affected by being required to pay increased occupancy charges.

A committee has been set up to give students information about the Ontario Student Awards Plan (OSAP).

INTRODUCING THE LATEST, MOST ADVANCED ELECTRONIC CALCULATORS AVAILABLE AT:

MODEL SR 1400
... a member of the Commodore family of fine SLIDE-RULE CALCULATORS that think in "People Logic"

What is "people logic"? — This instrument was designed to speak "YOU" language. It has a built-in preference to express itself in non-scientific notation, rather than scientific notation. (Of course if you are in a hurry to do a complex, the SR-1400 will automatically insert scientific notation [expression in exponent form] if necessary to display a complete and accurate answer. Combine this preference with the many "Common sense" function keys and features listed below, add a "common sense" algebraic logic, and you have a sophisticated slide rule calculator that puts you in command immediately. That's "People Logic", not "computer control".

Operation is simplified by separate numeric and function keys, including "working parentheses"

Look At These "Exclusive" COMMODORE Features:

- 14 Character Display — shows a 10-digit mantissa plus a two-digit exponent. You can figure quantities ranging from 10⁻¹⁰ to 10¹⁰
- Full Memory Storage
- RECHARGEABLE Nickel-Cad batteries and Recharger/AC Adapter (included)
- Automatic Floating Decimal
- Shirt-Pocket Size — 6" x 1 1/4" x 3"
- Overflow/Underflow Indicators
- Low Battery Signal Indicator
- Zero Suppression • Clear/Exit Key
- Easy To Read, Boldly lit Readout
- Fully Deceased Keyboard For Easy Finger Use
- 12 month warranty on material and workmanship
- Special PARENTHESES KEYS — Since the use of parentheses is so commonplace in multilevel computations, the SR-1400's "common sense" logic includes them. It's the ONLY portable that does!!
- Radial/Degree Mode Selection Key — Determines whether the SR-1400 interprets the displayed angle in degrees or radians.
- EXPONENT KEY — To display the exponent of a number
- CHANGE SIGN KEY — Changes sign of mantissa or exponent in the display
- RECIPROCAL KEY — Finds reciprocal of number displayed
- X Key — finds square of number displayed
- SQUARE ROOT KEY — Finds square root of number displayed
- Y Key — Enter the value of pi
- Trig Function Keys • Sine Key • Cosine Key
- Tangent Key • Arc Key (instead of a prefix to a trig function key it inverts a sought!)
- Y Key — Raises a number to the power of another
- X Key — An exchange key that enables factor reversal
- Q Key — Commands the calculator to raise the value of a to the displayed power
- Log Functions • Common Log Key — to determine the common log
- Natural Log Key — to determine the natural log
- Common Antilog — Use Y key to determine the common antilog
- Natural Antilog — Use X key to determine the natural antilog

ATHLETICS REFERENDUM MARCH 12, 13

The Students' Administrative Council will be conducting a referendum on the proposed NEW ATHLETICS COMPLEX, at the same time as the forthcoming SAC PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS. Students will be asked to vote on the following questions:

PLEASE ANSWER BOTH QUESTIONS.

1) Do you support the construction of the new Athletics Complex?

YES NO ABSTENTION

The present student fee toward the operating costs of the existing athletics facilities and programme is $20 for men and $10 for women. When the men's and women's athletic programs are amalgamated, the fee will be $20 for both.

The construction of the new Athletics Complex will involve an increase in operating costs. Knowing that an increase in the operating fee might be a co-requisite for the construction of the new complex, please check only one of the following:

I am not prepared to pay a higher athletics fee than I am presently paying.

I am prepared to pay up to, but not more than $30 per annum (i.e., a further increase of $10) from the date the building opens to help defray the operating costs of the new athletics facilities and programme.

I am prepared to pay up to but not more than $40 per annum (i.e., a further increase of $20) from the date the building opens to help defray the operating costs of the new athletics facilities and programme.

SAC PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

MARCH 12, 13

The following statements have been submitted by the two slates in the SAC Presidential Election:

Gord Barnes - Vic. (Pres.) Michelle Harvey - Med.
(Vice Pres.) Sa'ad Saidullah - Erin. (Vice-Pres.)

YOU CAN VOTE FOR EXPERIENCE AND NEW IDEAS A VOTE FOR BARNES, HARVEY, SAIDULLAH IS A VOTE FOR AN APPROACHABLE STUDENTS' COUNCIL

We believe SAC should work on several areas in 1975-76:

-  a reformed and improved student aid program
-  SAC cannot ignore the effect of budget reductions on the quality of the undergraduate programs
-  an integrated program of student services
-  SAC's own program of social activities should be diverse and ambitious
-  your students' council needs a continued mandate to work for equal student/faculty representation on the Governing Council and to lobby the government to appoint members who actually represent the public interest.

Gord Barnes is a fourth year Arts and Science student.

- He has the experience:
 - 1972-73 President of the Victoria University Students' Administrative Council.
 - 1973-74 elected member of the governing Council and a member of the SAC executive.
 - 1974-75 a VIC SAC Rep and member of the SAC executive.

Michelle Harvey a first year Meds student has not been involved with SAC. Her concern is that the students' council is active, responsible and representative.

Sa'ad Saidullah is a second year student at Erindale college studying Commerce and Finance. His goal is to increase the confidence students have in SAC as their students' council.

Henry Malta A&S (Pres.) Lynette Batson - Food Sci.

STUDENT MILITANT CAUCUS STATEMENT

"Unfortunately the quality of student leadership on the campus has deteriorated during the past years."

With its Feb. 26 editorial the Varsity pushed the panic button on this year's presidential elections by bemoaning the fact that a "credible leadership" had not come forward. It indicated that it would give its support to any "left-liberal" coalition should be it formed.

The March 3 Varsity article announcing the formation of two opposing slates in the SAC presidential elections points out that the Barnes slate "is the apparent successor to the left-liberal Kanowitch slate which was elected last year." It is clear then that the "Left-liberal" alternative in the elections really means nothing but more of the same.

But more of the same is not enough. Immigrants, students, working people, women — in fact, the vast majority in society, are under attack! We are under attack by inflation, unemployment, education cutbacks, social service cutbacks, sexism, and racial bigotry. We are under attack by a system of corporate profit-gouging that perpetrates war, starvation, and oppression.

We need action on the big issues that affect our lives. There has been no action in the past on these issues by the so-called "left-liberal" alternative. The Student Militant Caucus is offering a different kind of alternative. The slate is composed of militants who have a problem of how to change the university and the society.

The Varsity sums up the approach of the Student Militant Caucus by saying that we put the major emphasis on "off-campus" issues. What is this booby about "off-campus" issues?

Is racism an "off-campus" issue? Belle Stephenson, the president of the Canadian Medical Association, claims there are too many Chinese students in the Medical faculty. Attempts are being made to impose stricter quotas on foreign students. The deportation of Haitian workers and the attempted deportation of Rosie Douglas is a direct threat against the status of all foreign and Third World students.

Is women's liberation an "off-campus" issue? Abortion, day care and streaming are of obvious concern to women on the campus. In fact, it was campus women who were the first to move out to demand their rights.

Inflation and unemployment can hardly be termed "off-campus" issues. Even the Ontario Federation of Students recognizes the economic insecurity students face due to inflation and unemployment and have made attempts to mount a campaign for better student aid. Active support to the struggles of working people for higher wages and job security is a critical part of any strategy to meet the assault of inflation.

The record of SAC on issues such as the fight against racist attacks needs hardly to be mentioned. Precious little, if anything has been done — what can we expect from their successors in the Barnes slate?

What has been done on the so-called "on-campus" issues like the Discipline Code and the cutbacks. Action on the cutbacks has consisted of nothing more than backroom negotiations, a petition campaign and some pious words of opposition.

By its orchestration of the whole Banfield affair the administration succeeded in passing part of the new Discipline Code and is driving ahead to implement the rest. This is a serious threat to student rights on the campus. SAC has mobilized no opposition whatsoever to the Code. SAC has refused to back the reinstating of Bill Schabas and Tony Leah (students expelled for their role in opposing the visit of the racist Banfield to U. of T. last year).

With its resources SAC could have mounted massive campaigns to oppose the cutbacks and the Discipline Code. Even on the "on-campus" issues SAC's record is seriously lacking. Can we expect that their successors are going to be any better?

The Student Militant Caucus will fight the cutbacks — but we propose a way of doing this. We will do this by first defending the students most victimized — the foreign students.

We think that education is a right and that tuition fees should be abolished and students given a living wage. As a way to begin that struggle we support the demands of the Ontario Federation of Students on improving the student loan scheme (for cost of living adjustments, lowering loan ceiling, etc.) and propose a campaign aimed at mobilizing students in action to win them. The Quebec Cegep students who went on strike 100,000 strong against their government's inadequate student aid scheme show the way.

We propose a strong campaign to repeal the Discipline Code. We intend to fight for full rights for foreign students — financial, political, and civil rights.

The present racist attacks of the government on immigrants through the deportation of Haitian workers and the continual deportations of other Third World people is the leading edge of the attacks on all of the oppressed. It must be met by the majority of students who have shown in the past their ability to have an immense impact when mobilized in action.

The whole role of the Governing Council as a representative of the big business interests has to be challenged. These are the same interests which plunder the Third World; which are trying to shift the burden of their problems onto the oppressed majority in this country. They are the interests which are attempting to make the immigrant into the scapegoat to divert the growing dissatisfaction with their system.

The Student Militant Caucus aims to use the resources of SAC to mobilize students in militant action to turn this university around — from one serving the corporate elite to an organizing center for the big social issues of the day.

That's a tall order but it's one that must be filled!

The Learning Machine

At its meeting Thursday night, SAC decided to spend $7,000 to take its campaign against educational cutbacks to the people. And where else, fearless reader, do the people congregate than on the pages of the Toronto Star. That's right, it looks like Beland Honderich will be going home a little fatter next week.

So the next time you flip through the Metro news and think you see an ad from the Citizens' Coalition, look again: it could be SAC.

meeting will have approached the executives of their organizations for endorsement of the idea of closing the university for a day to hold a study session on the cutbacks in provincial support for U of T.

Similar united-front groups representing students, campus workers, and faculty have been established at other campuses in the province.

Convicted Watergate conspirator Jeb Stuart Magruder won't be coming to speak at the university with SAC endorsement after all. At their meeting Thursday, our peerless leaders decided they would sooner spend their money on full page ads in the Toronto Star.

Tsk, tsk, Globe and Mail. You wrote an editorial Friday morning saying SAC shouldn't be inviting him, after they'd already decided not to.

The Varsity — Adrian Beakford

Urbanization slowing down Prof says growth fears untrue

Alderman Bill Kilbourn (left) adopts zen attitude to urbanity conference.

Statements that the current rate of urbanization is unprecedented represent a complete myth, urban and regional planning professor Hans Blumenfeld said Saturday.

Blumenfeld was speaking to a University College Alumnae symposium entitled The Satisfactory City: The Survival of Urbanity.

Calling fears about the continued expansion of the megalopolis a "complete fantasy", Blumenfeld said three indicators of growth — population growth, immigration and migration — were all slowing down to a rate lower than that of the early 20th century.

Blumenfeld said Canadians currently had an "obsession with growth" — coming from legitimate concerns about the limits to worldwide growth — but exaggerated their worries.

Germany, for example, was far more densely populated than Southern Ontario, and no one said Germany was overpopulated, he said.

Going one step further,

Blumenfeld said urbanization actually slows down the rate of growth, since high density development consumes less land than widespread growth.

Blumenfeld attacked the 'ethics' of growth and 'anti-growth', saying the growth ethic represented "more pockets to pick," while the anti-growth ethic represented "I am on board — draw up the ladder" thinking.

Finally, Blumenfeld noted, if a city is to be livable, it must be attractive, and hence will inevitably attract new people to live there. The only way to stabilize a city's growth would be to make it unattractive.

Engineering professor Richard Soberman, author of the Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Plan Review, said he felt Toronto was presently a very "satisfactory city", although the problem was keeping it that way.

The fact that the city was becoming more dependent on external funding was becoming a threat, Soberman said, because "very well-meaning people who don't even know what they don't know" were making decisions.

Soberman said there were few things an individual could do to help improve the city, although the most important was to keep well informed.

He also suggested city politicians be elected to longer terms of office, since they tended to act like "short-term maximizers."

Architect Raymond Moriyama addressed the need for a new perception from which the satisfactory city would flow.

This perception, Moriyama said, must be based on a concern for quality, process, responsibility and cooperation, and an awareness that the city to some is in part an extension of the organic nature of man.

The crucial questions with regard to the future of the city, Moriyama said, are what should be the rate of change, the management of that change and the means by which it can be made most human.

The attempt to form a united front of campus workers, students and faculty members, which got off to an encouraging start at a meeting last week, will be continued at a meeting Tuesday afternoon.

The meeting will be held in the auditorium of the Faculty of Library Science (the north wing of the Robarts) at 5:15 pm, Tuesday, March 11.

WILL YOU BE WEARING THIS BUTTON WHEN YOU GRADUATE THIS SPRING?

Canada has one of the finest educational systems in the world. But many Canadian employers unjustifiably underpay some very well-educated graduates of that system. Women.

A 24-year-old male, leaving university with a degree, earns on the average 19 per cent more in his first job than a woman of the same age with the same degree. A male high-school graduate can expect an average 34.2 per cent more than the equivalent female graduate. It just isn't right.

It just isn't right, either, that long before graduation, some schools still insist on channelling girls into home economics classes and boys into industrial arts.

Some girls make excellent mechanics and engineers. Some boys make excellent designers and chefs. Why curb their natural talents?

There is no logical reason why we should. Equal educational opportunities are guaranteed us under law, but there are prejudices and precedents. Society expects women to cook and sew because it expects them to get married one day. Don't men get married too? Maybe they should learn household skills as well.

When it comes to employment, the same kind of archaic thinking brings us less pay and recognition. Certainly women get married, but many keep on working. Of some three million women working in Canada today, more than 50 per cent are married. Why are they being paid less than their husbands? Because they are married? How about a single working woman? It costs her as much to live as a single working man. So why is she also being forced to live on less? Particularly when 50.0 per cent of all Canadian women in the labour force, having completed their high-school education, have gone on to take post-secondary training, compared to 39.3 per cent of the men. So no one can use the excuse that working women are less qualified.

The entire situation must change. But if it is to change, we have to start thinking of ourselves as equals. And demanding that others do, too. We have to teach our children to think differently. Because they are the next generation of educators and homemakers, employers and employees. We must break down the barriers of prejudice for ourselves and remove them entirely for our children.

Vic wins interfac ski meet at Collingwood

By PAUL GORDON

On Friday, Vic A won the interfaculty ski race for the second year in a row. Vic was followed closely by Eng. A in second place. There were fifteen teams entered in the two run giant slalom ski races held at Georgian Peaks in Collingwood.

Mike Bulger of Dent A took the first place individual honours, followed by John Trist of Eng. A in second place, while Peter Jensen of Vic A took third place. Both Mike Bulger and John Trist skied for the Varsity intercollegiate ski team in past years but due to unfortunate accidents, they were unable to race for the team this season.

Eighty-two racers raced on Friday. Several inches of snow fell during the day so the course held up well, but the visibility was poor.

The members of the winning team from Vic were Peter Jensen, Paul Hill, Chris Baines, Dave Rabjohn, Malcolm McConachie, and Tom Ujesjski.

On Mar. 12, the Varsity intercollegiate ski team leaves for Sunday River ski resort in Maine for the final races of the season in the Can-Am Alpine Ski Series. Since the U of T team finished third overall in the OUA A ski series, Toronto earned an invitation to the second Can-Am meet which includes a downhill, giant slalom, and a slalom. Carleton, and Queen's will also be invited from Southern Ontario, and there will be several Quebec teams, as well as many American racing teams. It should be an excellent ski meet, with fierce competition from both countries.

This skier is trying to catch snowflakes with his bare teeth.

Blues explode to take series

HALIFAX (Last minute flash) — The Blues exploded with four unanswered goals in the last four minutes of the third period last night to take the best-of-three CIAU semi-final series two games to one from the St. Mary's Huskies.

Blues trailed the Huskies 3-1 late in the third period when Don Pagnutti began the comeback with a goal around the 14 minute mark.

Then within a minute and a half Pagnello, Hampton, and Fifield scored giving the Blues a 3-3 lead.

With three minutes left, St. Mary's pulled the goaltender allowing Ivan McFarlane to score into the open net. The final score was 6-3.

Blues now travel to Edmonton for the CIA final against the University of Alberta Golden Bears.

Interfac hockey semi-final: Dents and Jr Eng win

By MIKE FRIEND

On Wednesday night the first interfac hockey semi-final series began with Dents downing Erindale 3-2 in the first game of the two-game total point series.

As in previous games, Pastoral College were unable to get untracked before being down by two goals. As the game progressed Erindale seemed to return to the form evident during the season and tied the game on a goal by Peter Breuer late in the second period.

Bruce Clarke found the mark again for the tooth pullers in the third period to give Dents the 3-2 win.

With this victory Dents carry a one goal advantage into the second game. It appears that Erindale has forgotten how to play hockey now that playoffs are here. Dents won the game without the services of Bob Monroe who will be back for the second game giving Dents an added plus.

Friday night's action saw Jr Eng down For A 4-2, and SMC B tie PHE B 2-2.

The skule-For game set the tone for the night as both teams decided to lay on the body and the lumber. What resulted was a good rough hockey game with an abundance of penalties.

Jim Boulton scored after 35 seconds to give Jr Eng a 1-0 lead. Tom Halpenny and Peter McDonald made the score 3-0 before Ferguson notched the first marker for the trees.

At times it seemed as though both teams were trying to run each other out of the rink. There were 21 penalties during the game.

In the final period, Dan Blocka scored the fourth Eng goal while Louis-Watts replied with the second For goal.

The SMC-PHE game followed a similar pattern. Mike Hamilton and Terry Dineen gave SMC B a two goal lead only to have Downs and Blainey tie the score for PHE later in the game.

Heavy hitting and chippiness were the order of the night resulting in 20 penalties. Most were of the stupid variety.

St. Mikes played extremely well in short-handed situations as twice during the early stages of the game the jocks had a two man advantage and failed to score. However, the fathers tired in the third period and allowed Phys-Ed to tie the score.

It is expected that the next game in this series will be brutal.

Hockey Blues tie series with overtime goal

By DAVE STUART

An overtime goal by Larry Hopkins gave the Varsity Blues a 2-1 victory over St. Mary's Huskies Saturday night in Halifax to tie the best-of-three CIAU semi-final series 1-1.

Huskies won the first game of the series 4-2 Friday night. The third and deciding game was scheduled for Sunday night.

Out on the prairies in the other semi-final series, University of Alberta Golden Bears defeated Loyola Warriors in two straight games 2-0 and 4-3 to earn a berth in the CIAU final which will be played at Edmonton next weekend.

Waterloo Warriors dumped St. Mary's Huskies 70-46 in basketball to earn the right to meet Manitoba Bisons for the CIAU championship. Bisons defeated Acadia University 73-71 to qualify for the national final.

U of T to close for talks

By GENE ALLEN

U of T will close for a half-day to discuss provincial cutbacks in university financing and strategies to fight them, the Common Front decided last night.

Representatives of campus workers, faculty members and students reported their organizations have endorsed the proposal for a study session made at last week's meeting. The study session is scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, March 26.

University president John Evans will be approached Thursday by representatives of the coalition for a complete shutdown of the university, so that non-academic staff will be able to attend. Non-academic staff should be paid as usual for the day of the study session, the meeting decided.

The group also agreed it needs a unified program of common aims. Delegates reached a tentative list of demands, including the following points:

- student aid should be increased, and a greater proportion of student aid should be in the form of direct grants, rather than loans;
- recent decisions imposing quotas on the number of foreign students should be reversed, and no new quotas should be set;
- no staff cutbacks, either non-academic or academic;
- no increases in class sizes;
- retroactive cost-of-living increases, and indexing of wages and student grants to keep up with further increases in the cost of living;

- particular priority in wage increases should be given to lower-paid staff;

- no tuition increases, and the eventual abolition of all tuition fees;

- the decisions and priorities of the university budget committee should be open to observation and discussion.

The coalition is growing. Last night, representatives of the U of T Staff Association (UTSA), faculty of forestry students, faculty of education students, the Committee Against Racism and the Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS), joined the groups who attended last week's meeting: Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 1230, the organizing committee for the non-unionized workers at 215 Huron St., the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA), the Students' Administrative Council (SAC), the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA), the Arts and Science Students' Union (ASSU), the Graduate Students' Union (GSU), the Faculty Reform Caucus, and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

A steering committee with one representative from each organization will draw up detailed plans for the study session.

The sense of the meeting was, as

CUPE 1230 president Judy Darcy said, "to form an ongoing coalition."

Darcy admitted "there will be difficulties in coming to agreement on common demands, but we'll try to hammer them out."

ASU president Frank McIntyre suggested "the squeeze will be on for at least five years," given the plans of the Conservative government.

"We should think about approaching groups outside the university," McIntyre said. "Day care workers, school teachers and civil servants are all facing the same problems. We should make links wherever we possibly can."

Because the coalition didn't begin until late in the year, preparations are moving rapidly.

Certain groups, particularly the Service Employees Union, and other smaller unions on campus, along with college and faculty student councils, have not yet responded to the coalition's overtures.

The coalition meets again next Tuesday, when the steering committee will present its plans for the study session.

Groups that are not yet involved with the coalition are urged to attend so they can evaluate the suggestions of the steering committee and advance their own proposals.

UTFA president Bill Nelson said it was important to come up with a theme for the study session.

He suggested that a theme of fighting government demands for increased productivity would probably be acceptable.

Issue in sociology dept is quality of teaching, says grad student

By BOB BETTSON

The dispute between radical and conservative sociology department faculty members over the structure and powers of the department's parity faculty-student assembly is a "red herring," said graduate sociology student spokesperson Vicki Grabb.

Grabb, who is a teaching assistant for SOC chairman Irving Zeitlin, said the real issue is the quality of teaching. And although students support parity, the focus of the present split within the department isn't facing the real issues, Grabb said.

Sociology students are planning a general meeting again Friday to consider an alternative report done by a student assessment committee. The committee was set up after sociology faculty members set up a committee to evaluate the department's governing structure.

Fourteen faculty members dissented from an unofficial faculty decision made two weeks ago to accept a recommendation from former chairman S.D. Clark calling for the radical reduction of the powers of the parity assembly and more power for the chairman.

Grabb said the governing structure issue is preventing much needed debate on how teaching quality can be improved.

She said graduate students in the department feel there is a real lack of consideration of teaching quality, even in tenure decisions.

Graduate students are forced to spend most of their time working to earn their tuition in addition to doing a full course load, she said.

Another indication of the low priority given to graduate students is the PhD program which requires all PhD courses to be taken in the first year along with comprehensives and a thesis proposal.

Grabb says animosity in the department among faculty members is so great "it's a problem getting some people to speak to each other." She added many people will not sit on committees with their adversaries.

The students feel the Advisory Committee for Academic Planning (ACAP) report was right in many of its criticisms of the graduate program. The report recommended the program be reviewed.

Grabb said parity has also been overrated as a means of change within the department.

"If there isn't parity throughout the whole university then the students will be listened to only as long as they agree with faculty," she said. "After that someone higher up can interfere."

Sociology is presently the only arts and science department to have equal staff-student representation on governing bodies.

The primary thing the graduate students want is for Zeitlin to be held accountable to the department and ask for student and faculty opinion on any decisions made, Grabb said.

Students plan province-wide action

By BOB BETTSON

The beginnings for a province-wide movement of university and college students were made at a conference at Brock University last weekend.

The 250 delegates decided to adopt a wide-ranging set of demands to take to Queen's Park and confront Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld.

The main aim of the students' efforts will be to form a "united front" of Ontario's 200,000 college and university students, and take their demands to the public stressing the drastic effects of provincial cutbacks in education on the quality of education and accessibility to all economic and social classes.

Resolutions were passed on Sunday after strategy sessions which called for a projected fall demonstration at Queen's Park against the cutbacks, similar to the teachers' demonstration of December, 1973.

A provincial steering committee will be set up to coordinate on activities working with the 110,000 member Ontario Federation of Students and composed of representatives from cutbacks action groups on each campus.

The efforts of students will increasingly be directed at other victims of provincial cutbacks such as Ontario teachers, the Ontario Federation of Labor, hospital workers, civil servants, high school students and community groups.

Tactics adopted by the conference stress communication with the general public to get across the message of adverse effects of the cutbacks and mobilization of support for the student position. U of T's SAC has already agreed to spend $7,000 on a media campaign to inform Toronto residents of the facts about the cutbacks, something they feel has been made impossible because of media support for higher tuition and lower priority for post-secondary funding.

University of Western Ontario fieldworker Paul Johnston called the demonstration "just another way of getting our message across to the government... the same as the letter campaign (which the conference is urging students to begin)."

The Brock conference on student financing did not support a resolution which called for setting up a war chest for opposition candidates in the next provincial election.

The Varsity regrets the headline and story in Monday's special SAC election issue which said this resolution was passed. In fact it was overwhelmingly defeated.

The mistake was made in the hustle and bustle of a busy newsroom.

In recent months student opinion across the province has hardened, with demands for major reforms in student aid programs and increases in university funding backed up by thousands of signatures on petitions.

The conference was moderately successful in terms of results expected with good participation.

But procedural wrangling over policy resolutions wasted much of Saturday. Then delegates decided to scrap policy in favor of strategy.

The Ontario Federation of Students already has a comprehensive policy on university financing and cutbacks which will serve as the basis for the student campaign.

The conference approved the formation of "common front" groups at each campus similar to one formed recently at U of T. These will have provincial input through OFS.

Delegates also placed a major priority on gaining the active support of labor and stressing the issue of accessibility for working class students.

Labor veteran Michael Bosnich from the United Electrical Workers told cheering delegates it wasn't up to the universities to cut back because the Tory government can find the money if it wants to.

"There was no shortage of money when the Davis government gave a gift of $400 million to Syncrude for an oil ripoff. There was no shortage when the federal government spent $200 million on the Avro Arrow," he charged.

"They can find it if they want to," he concluded. "You are beaten from the start if you argue at the size of the cutbacks, you have to mobilize students to throw out the government."

The conference vetoed a war chest for opposition candidates but decided to work actively to raise the issue of educational cutbacks in the campaign. Many favored the NDP but an official endorsement was rejected.

The use of the media is the new focus for a public campaign through letters to the editor, human interest stories, radio shorts, press conferences and other methods to gain attention.

Aid given

Don't say The Varsity never did anything for International Women's Year!

Last week, a poor harassed administrator from the federal Secretary of State department visited us, hearing we had 3,000 buttons which demanded, "Why Not?"

The fire-engine red buttons are part of a $1 million advertising campaign created by an all-male ad agency to publicize International Women's Year (shudder).

"Please, please give me some buttons," she pleaded. "Our office has ordered them but they haven't come, and we feel so foolish."

"Arise, woman," we admonished the sobbing, crumpled figure, "and weep no more. Here's a handful of buttons and a TTC token to get you back to your office."

If any of you want some of the horrendous things, visit us at 91 St. George St. No tokens given, though — we're hoarding.

When SAC election is boring, not even the political fringe shows up

By EDWARD LARY

The SAC presidential all-candidates meeting failed even to attract the usual numbers of hanger on to Sid Smith foyer yesterday as the candidates tried to rouse support in what is turning out to be a dull SAC election.

The balloting will be today and tomorrow and SAC is banking on a heavy turnout for the athletics referendum to beef up the number voting in the lacklustre presidential elections.

SAC presidential hopeful Gord Barnes told the handful of students gathered for the meeting he would work toward making SAC "more approachable" to students.

"I don't see the value in a students' council existing that isn't supported by students," Barnes said.

Michael Franklin, SAC vice-presidential candidate representing the Student Militant Caucus slate headed by Henry Malta, said the university should be used "as a centre for organizing social change".

He called for "a student council that will fight racism . . . cut backs . . . (and) big business control of the university."

Barnes centred his comments on campus-related issues, stressing primarily the importance of maintaining quality academic programs and adequate student services in the face of financial cutbacks by the provincial government.

But he said he didn't feel there was much point "for me to stand up here and simply say I will fight cutbacks."

Barnes said there would have to be a good deal of discussion with students through faculty and college councils "to find out where budget cuts will hurt students the most" as part of a campaign "to remind the provincial government of its responsibility to the university."

Franklin countered that SAC had done little to fight cutbacks this year and that U of T students could best follow the example of their Quebec counterparts with "massive visible protests in the street in defence of their rights to a quality education."

He said the proper response to financial cutbacks consisted of "having program and strategy that has been shown to work as well as the desire to implement that strategy."

Other issues discussed by the candidates included quotas on foreign students, the Leah Schabas suspension and the athletics complex.

Barnes said he was in favor of some quota system for foreign students attending U of T on student visas, although he felt the percentage of foreign students allowed should be higher than that established by some university departments.

He stressed he was "not prepared to call everyone who is interested in establishing some kind of quota system a racist."

Franklin said any and all quota systems "smack of racism."

There is "no reason for any kind of restrictions on the amount or type of people allowed into our university," he said.

Franklin said Tony Leah and Bill Schabas should be reinstated. The two are members of the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), suspended from the university last year for their part in the "Banfield incident" where SDS members prevented American sociologist Edward Banfield from addressing a university audience.

But Barnes agreed with the suspension of Leah and Schabas although he felt the so-called "black marks" placed on their academic records by the university should be removed.

He also questioned the authority of the Caput, the university body which passed sentence on the two students, saying it had no student representation and used procedures which would be questionable in a court of law.

Both candidates expressed their support for the athletics complex, citing the need for improved athletic facilities at U of T.

But Franklin stressed there should be no increase in incidental fees to students while Barnes said he would support a $10 student levy on today's athletics complex referendum.

Speech from the throne an awful drone

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Despite the province's renowned reputation as 'a place to stand,' yesterday's Speech from the Throne came down asserting "Ontario cannot stand still," and called for the province to fulfill its role in the Canadian nation as "a progressive, compassionate and innovative society."

The speech was distinguished chiefly for its brevity, providing the usual lack of specifics in substantially fewer words.

Delivered by Lieutenant Governor Pauline McGibbon who opened the fifth session of Ontario's 29th parliament, the speech ran to only six pages, briefly referring to about five broad issues.

"From the people, we must have moderation and restraint in the pricing of goods and services and in wage contract negotiations," the speech said, but assured us, "Investor confidence in Ontario today remains strong," and that in its financial transactions abroad, the province has "the highest credit rating available."

On the governments' side, "ministers will both practise and urge restraint," the speech noted, but "they do not intend to follow a policy of retrenchment."

With respect to immigration, the speech cited the fact that 75 percent of all immigrants choose Ontario as their first choice of destination.

These new Canadians seek the major characteristics of life in Ontario, "security and opportunity," the speech observed.

As an area of federal responsibility, Ontario has no jurisdiction over immigration policy.

According to the speech, it is the government's aim to "maintain Ontario's leadership in the field of education to ensure that our youth have access to our training and learning institutions to allow them the fullest possible development of their potential."

Recognizing discrimination in career opportunities for women, the speech stated, "It will be the deliberate policy of the government of Ontario to find greater opportunities for women within its public service."

The government tabled legislation in the last session to prohibit sex discrimination in employment practices, but the bill never received reading.

It is the intention of the government to establish the office of "ombudsman — or ombudsperson," the speech said, "to ensure the protection of our citizens against arbitrary judgment."

The speech also mentions a continuing need to keep our cities safe, calling for "cooperation of law enforcement agencies and the general public," and cites a commitment to encouraging more home ownership.

Commenting on the speech to the press, Premier Bill Davis called it "rather a different approach," saying, "Some people may describe it as more of a philosophical document — I don't know."

Davis said it was decided to identify four or five major areas of interest, rather than putting forth a "fruit salad of 50 different propositions."

Sesquicentennial: trouble and secrecy

By LAWRENCE GOLDSTEIN

A massive fund-raising campaign planned by the university for its sesquicentennial (150th anniversary) celebrations may be in trouble, but top U of T administrators continued to maintain complete secrecy about the project.

Two of the last three meetings of Governing Council's external affairs committee, which discusses plans for the campaign, have been cancelled. The meetings are normally held monthly during the academic year.

No mention of the fund-raising campaign has been made in the reports of the external affairs committee to Governing Council since October.

"We've been left with the impression the university overestimated the amount of money it could raise through the (sesquicentennial) campaign and that now, that estimation is falling," SAC services commissioner John Tuzyk told The Varsity.

Other SAC spokesmen said at one time last year, figures as high as $50 million were mentioned as the campaign's fund-raising potential.

Asked about the $50 million figure, external affairs vice-president Norman James, in charge of plans for the fund raising drive, said the university has released no official campaign goal.

James said when he assumed the external affairs post last June he heard "every figure under the sun from five to 50 million dollars" in connection with the campaign, but actually a financial goal "has not been established."

James added the university did have a general figure in mind for the campaign, but he didn't want it made public. "We'll let you know," he said.

The September report of the external affairs committee to Governing Council does mention "a fund raising campaign . . . of about $25 million."

According to the report, Stevenson & Kellogg, a management consultant firm, determined "the university did not have adequate resources to undertake such a project."

James said the report was incorrect and that no such study was made by Stevenson & Kellogg.

The Governing Council external affairs committee reports are prepared by the Governing Council secretariat which is run by the university. The reports are usually used as the basis for voting on motions at meetings.

The report also stated last summer U of T hired the Ryerson Group Ltd., professional fund-raising consultants, "to develop a picture of the University of Toronto in the context of a major campaign for funds."

The Ryerson Group was to question and interview "probably 70 or 80 prominent individuals across Canada, nearly all of whom would be potentially major donors to the sesquicentennial fund-raising campaign."

Near the end of October, the report continued, "they (the Ryerson Group) will be in a position to advise firstly, on the feasibility of launching a campaign and secondly, on how it should be conducted."

"This second consideration would include factors such as appropriate timing, an assessment of the receptivity of the marketplace and an upper and lower figure to be established for the campaign," the report stated.

While the results of the Ryerson Group survey have not been made public, there are indications the picture the fund-raising consultants eventually painted for the university was less than rosy.

The September report went on to state, "Mr. James communicated to the (external affairs) committee the concern that both he and the Ryerson Group felt about the failure of the university to maintain contact with its major donors in Canada since the last national campaign fifteen years ago."

"Mr. James pointed out the uncertain and troubled economic situation prevalent in Canada and throughout the world meant the fund-raising campaign would meet with much greater difficulties than it would have during the last 10 years."

The October report of the external affairs committee to Governing Council is even less encouraging.

According to that report, Arthur Maybee, president of the Ryerson Group, addressed the committee and "indicated the principle problem encountered in assessing the university's situation as regards a major fund-raising campaign was that for an institution of its size and age it had very few existing donors."

But in spite of the potential problems, Maybee was reported as saying he "felt there was no doubt about the validity of launching the campaign and anticipated solicitations would probably begin in the spring of 1975 and continue for about a calendar year."

Asked when the campaign drive was scheduled to begin, James told The Varsity it would probably commence "this (coming) fall" and the spring reference in the external affairs report probably referred to the organizational work involved.

"It's not that the thing (the campaign) is languishing," James said. "We just want to make damn sure it's done properly."

James added the university was still considering "what shape our drive for funds will take." He said there were several ways of approaching a campaign drive. For example, the drive could be concentrated in one year or spread out over several years.

Calls to several other individuals connected with the planned campaign drive produced responses such as "no comment," "There's nothing definite yet," "What did Mr. James tell you?" and "You'd better talk to Mr. James."

In the September report of the external affairs committee to Governing Council, James is reported as saying he was "confident that the university should go ahead with the campaign and would achieve a major success with it."

James said his statement was reported accurately and he still agrees with it.

Radio Varsity faces many problems before FM licence

By PAUL RAYNOR

"Radio Varsity has been isolationist for too long. The SAC approval of the FM move in principle is encouraging because it's high time that U of T radio moved out into the community," said Radio Varsity station manager Brad Reed.

He was responding to the SAC approval in principle last Thursday for Radio Varsity seeking an FM licence.

"I think SAC Communications Commissioner Mike Sabia is overestimating the problem when he says it's a Herculean task to produce programming that is relevant both to the campus and to the community," Reed said.

Reed does, however, see deficiencies in the SAC recommendations. "They have allotted no funds at all for the badly needed renovations for one control room in particular and our entire third floor is generally physically falling apart."

Despite the small summer budget of $3,800 given Radio Varsity by SAC, Reed was optimistic about the station's ability to raise the necessary $50,000 from sponsors — mainly corporate — in the community.

Reed also said "the SAC recommendations have given many people the misconception we are going off the air immediately but that is not the case. The whole matter depends on the decision of the Board of Directors."

Reed finds greatest fault in the SAC recommendations with the proposal to operate on a core staff of about 15 persons during the summer.

"If our broadcasting is discontinued for the summer," said Reed, "we will lose a lot of staff whose incentive to come in was the opportunity to be on the air."

Radio Varsity advertising manager Paul Cutler added that "the loss of trained staff may seriously affect our ability to return to the air next fall."

"In any year," Cutler said, "Radio Varsity should be fully operational and ready to go by August, but this will be impossible next year since we must await the SAC decision to continue our funding and because of the large number of trained personnel we will have lost over the non-broadcasting summer months."

"The unstated assumptions in the recommendations seems to be that we will be able to increase the quality of our programming without a corresponding expansion of production facilities," said Cutler. "It makes sense that one can't be properly done without the other."

"By September Radio Varsity will be shut down and SAC will have to debate the issue of opening us up again. That leaves us in a rather precarious position," said Cutler.

The road to Radio Varsity attaining an FM license is strewn with several hurdles. One of them is finding a potential location for a transmission tower.

A consultant hired by Radio Varsity has suggested it be placed on top of the Roberts Library, the tallest building on campus.

But Howard Milne, Manager of Engineering and Design for U of T Physical Plant, doesn't think it is feasible. "It would seem that a mass of concrete like that could support anything, but unfortunately that's not true."

"We haven't been told definitely yet what height the proposed tower is or whether or not space will be required for maintenance equipment," explained Milne.

"It seems pretty clear that any tower on top of the Roberts Library would require extensive structural alterations to the roof of the library," said Milne, "but there are still a lot of problems to be sorted out before a final decision can be reached."

The greatest difficulty for Radio Varsity will be getting the CRT's approval for an FM licence.

Sjef Frenken, chief of the radio division of the broadcast programmes branch of the CRT, stressed "while the Commission likes to see campus involvement in the broadcasting field, stations such as Radio Varsity are expected to more than fulfill the minimum on standards required of FM broadcasters if they hope to obtain a licence."

Frenken admitted "the Commission has approved the application for an FM licence by Laval University's CKRL-FM, but the requirements that have to be met are very high."

"In addition," continued Frenken, "once an application is accepted for consideration by the Commission it can take anywhere from days to months before it is approved, assuming that it is."

"Well, to use my John Evans impression, 'I think if we pursue this matter in an affirmative fashion then I think that it's reasonably safe to assume that at some later stage we'll have found that we have progressed in such a degree that will yield to positive results in pursuit of our end goals!'"

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprises. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Fees question suspicious

The Varsity has already stated editorially it supports the construction of the proposed athletics complex. However, we are concerned about the second question on today's athletics referendum; namely, the scale of fees which students would be prepared to pay.

We see no reason why students should be asked to commit themselves, even in principle, to a fee scale when no budget for the proposed building has been drawn up, let alone the fact that the building may still not be built.

Students should not have to pay any hefty increase in user fees until they have a chance to consider a projected operating budget.

The administration should make every attempt to fund the building's completion and operation; only when all else fails should it come to students.

sweeping condemnation of an organization we suspect he knows little about.

CUSO responds to specific manpower requests from overseas governments. CUSO personnel are hired by, paid by, and responsible to the government of the country they work in. By operating in this way we hope to increase the real value of the services we provide to participating countries.

In the case of our Caribbean program, job requests are dwindling in number and at the same time becoming more specialized as more trained West Indians become available to work. In the Caribbean CUSO is adopting a "project approach" which considers far more than the placement of a single body.

An example is the Remedial Reading Project in Jamaica. CUSO is supplying over 30 teachers of Remedial Reading and is also funding the training of Jamaicans as specialists in this field. Caribbean staff works closely with the Jamaican Ministry of Education in this project.

It is difficult to reply to Mr. Campbell's specific charge of cultural imperialism. Certainly we are aware of the problems involved in development work and we realize that the Caribbean is a particularly sensitive area where Canadian involvement is concerned.

To help alleviate this problem of cultural insensitivity, all CUSO personnel go through some kind of pre-orientation program designed to heighten their awareness of cross-cultural problems. Wherever possible we utilize nationals from the countries we work in to aid us in this educational process.

We feel that our record is a good one and that this is largely due to our highly qualified overseas personnel and to our insistence that the overseas government request our services and prove that they are needed.

Unpleasant situations inevitably occur overseas but we feel that the value of the services we provide outweighs these and we think that the countries we cooperate with would agree.

SAC tenure tab had slimy tricks

I have some comments on SAC's special edition on Tenure Committees. I am writing because it is important for SAC to realize that Faculty are not going to be cowed into silence when an attempt is made publicly to destroy and humiliate some of our members.

For you are trying to destroy those whom you cite as unsatisfactory teachers — and on totally inadequate grounds. If an instructor is said to be "boring" and "disorganized", is this really a reflection on him, or could it be that the students are unperceptive or "unmotivated" — to avoid less flattering adjectives.

The chances seem exactly even, unless we go into the classroom, and listen to the instructor teach, and unless we find out a good deal more about the students in his class.

Then, five-sevenths of professor X's class found him generally inadequate. Why aren't we told about the rest, who presumably do not find him inadequate?

Finally professor Weissleder. In his case, your bias is blatant. After a catalogue of his shortcomings, you then admit that "many students found his lectures interesting," without having the fairness to quote any favorable comments. You damn his course by saying that attendance at lectures fell off in the second term, so it can't have been any good.

Nonsense! Attendance at most lectures drops off in the second term, for sufficiently obvious reasons. One may keep people coming by threatening an April exam. But that is not pedagogical excellence. Just low cunning.

I should not merely be afraid, but absolutely terrified to have the author of these columns on a Tenure Committee, since his method of handling evidence is so crude, so prejudiced and so malicious. Happily, I know that he is not representative of the student body, else he would constitute, in his own person, a powerful argument against SAC's case.

Varg elections not democratic

Those of us who are discouraged by the seeming lack of progress toward the achievement of a significant student voice in tenure committees may take consolation from the fact that excellence can be achieved by other than a democratic process. We have the sterling example of our student newspaper.

The Varsity manages very nicely, thank you, simply by having the editor chosen by those whose six or eight or more articles the editor has been fit to publish over the year. And who would deny that, what's good enough every year for The Varsity staff, is also quite good enough for the rest of us?

Robert D. Wells,
 Vic III

The Varsity staff, like every other university newspaper in Canada, operates democratically in selecting an editor. Any U of T student can write for the paper. We would invite Mr. Wells to drop in to our newsroom and take a story assignment of his choice.

FM Radio Varsity not worth money

Last Thursday SAC passed, in principle, a motion proposing to grant $50,000 a year to Radio Varsity, provided it receives an FM licence and can develop a program.

What disturbed me most about the meeting was the complete lack of debate about the rationale behind supporting an FM station. What notion there was was couched in vague terms of "serving the community's interest."

The question is whose interest? Certainly not that of the campus. By Radio Varsity's own admission, foreground programming (news) is impossible in common rooms. Background programming (music) could be provided just as and the intellectual leadership of the community.

The image of "Radio Free Varsity" springs to mind, broadcasting truth, decency, and the academic way into the heartland of Canadian corporate capitalism and Tory conservatism.

This is patently absurd. Shell Oil is not going to take kindly to lectures on Marxist political economics, nor is Bill Davis. There go the grants, and SAC is once more left holding the bag.

The more moderate idea of the RV-FM supporters, that of providing "education over the airwaves" is just as questionable, if for different reasons:

Education is no less subject to the dictates of consumer capitalism than electric toothbrushes, and the RV-FM proposal smacks of producing for false demands.

The question of the professionalism of the proposed RV-FM also disturbs me, because in according to it SAC lost sight of its raison d'être — serving the students.

The proposed RV-FM budget calls for salaries of $15,000 and easily, and much more cheaply, by "piping in" a commercial radio station like CHUM-FM or CBC.

It would be impossible to serve the general community, at least as far as entertainment is concerned. For if the plethora of radio stations in Toronto proves anything, it is that a station cannot mix its programming. Country and Western fans want C&W, not rock and roll. Hip intellectuals want progressive rock or classical, not "bubble gum". People aren't going to listen to a radio station that only plays some of their music some of the time.

No audience means no advertising revenue.

This doesn't concern the RV-FM people because they hope to operate on a substantial grant from SAC, together with grants from the government and public spirited corporations.

RV-FM will justify their grants by conducting an "Open University" type programming. There is a confusion of two contradictory interests here.

On SAC's part, there is the semi-conscious idea of having RV provide SAC both with access to the broader community that the student movement now lacks.

$10,000. Indeed, more than half the proposed budget of $120,000 will go to salaries. The RV-FM supporters rationalized this by arguing that they wanted a professional operation.

The professionals of the proposed RV-FM would not be dedicated to the student movement. Indeed, the proposed RV Board would be stacked with industry people to serve as a "corrective" to the "novice" SAC appointees.

Not only will the proposed Radio Varsity not serve the students' interests, it will harm them.

If SAC commits itself to Radio Varsity, it will entail an additional drain on its budget of $30,000 to $50,000 a year.

This can only weaken SAC ability to provide student services and to conduct campaigns such as the OSAP petition. Besides, if SAC can afford to spend that much money, it would be far better spent on things that have more relevance to students, such as the Campus as Campus Centre.

Certainly, Radio Varsity needs us. The question is, do we need Radio Varsity?

Levitt inflates his importance

We are most interested to learn from the election statements of Mr. Howard Levitt, student candidate for Governing Council of Constituency II, that he is the author of a "Working paper — non-Academic Females". Readers might gain the impression that this is a document of some importance. It is, however, only one of the many papers submitted by each member of the Task Force on Non-Academic Women as internal working documents.

Indeed, as members of this Task Force, we are somewhat amused to find Mr. Levitt's contribution, unclouded as it is by knowledge of the working conditions of non-academic staff, elevated to a position of prominence in his curriculum vitae. We should perhaps point out to the Constituency II electorate that our sense of responsibility to our non-academic colleagues and to the university has not made it possible for us to include in our forthcoming report Mr. Levitt's rosy-tinted and unrealistic suggestions.

We do not wish to comment on Mr. Levitt's suitability as a student candidate for Governing Council, as we are not members of Constituency II. But as he makes his participation in the Task Force part of his election platform, we feel compelled to note that our hopes for valuable student perspectives on non-academic personnel matters have not been fulfilled by Mr. Levitt's membership on the Task Force.

Seven want seats in Arts and Science

Sabia worries about gov't cutbacks

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia says he's running for an undergraduate arts and science seat on Governing Council because he's worried about government educational cutbacks.

"Students will suffer most," says Sabia, adding he is worried about the possibility that either the government or the university will move to raise tuition fees next year.

Fees, said Sabia, are "clearly the biggest issue" next year's council will face.

Sabia criticizes Governing Council for accepting a deficit budget this year, saying the university could easily liquidate some of its capital assets to cover overspending.

Moreover, Sabia says, administrative departments — such as the president's office and the Governing Council office — received budget increases while federated colleges received grants much lower than they expected.

Areas that do the "least screaming" are also likely to be cut back, Sabia says, which to him means campus services such as the housing and placement centres, services which he feels the university desperately needs.

Sabia hedges on what constitutes the ideal higher education system.

Although he says it would be "irresponsible" for the government not to place high priority on higher education, he believes students should pay fees to a level which would not erect a barrier to entry of those academically qualified.

The Ontario and Canada student awards plans must change, radically Sabia believes.

One issue Sabia feels will be important next year is grade distribution. Plans are being made to normalize grades, Sabia says, without consulting students, which he feels is essential.

Sabia feels the function of Governing Council is to "bring together the estates" of the university and develop policies, although he doesn't believe students yet have an adequate role (parity with faculty).

He also believes the council tends to approve "what Simcoe Hall has already decided."

The present student representatives, Sabia believes, are doing "as good a job as can be expected."

Sabia is leery about the current attempts to form a 'united front' of students, faculty and workers, saying it could represent "gangland politics" operating to the detriment of the administration and the community.

He is also against efforts to unionize faculty members on the grounds this will put them in a much stronger position than students, who claim to be unionized themselves but do not have much collective strength.

Sabia thinks the institution of tenure should be preserved, despite suggestions of short-term appointments to get around government cutbacks.

But, he feels a strong review procedure is necessary after tenure is granted, along with more student input at all levels of decision making.

Sabia supports construction of the athletics complex, and feels the university should push ahead with the Campus as Campus Centre proposal since it would be "commercially viable."

He is upset many other candidates running against him have not put forward concrete proposals like his.

As SAC communications commissioner, Sabia was responsible for implementing proposals for the future of Radio Varsity.

The Varsity — Bob White

Mike Sabia thinks cutbacks will hurt students most.

Nixon wants to preserve quality

Political economy student Brad Nixon says he's running for a seat on Governing Council in the undergraduate II constituency to do his best to protect the quality of education at the university.

Once elected to Governing Council, Nixon says he will fight to maintain academic quality in the face of cutbacks which he feels the administration is "bound to attempt."

He cites cutbacks in the library services and purchasing budgets as prime examples.

The administration, Nixon says, is going along meekly with provincial decisions to cut university budgets, instead of holding the line on quality.

To run a deficit is not irresponsible, Nixon feels: It will force government to realize its responsibilities.

Nixon, who was previously an architecture student and who worked for a large corporation before returning to university, is presently co-chairman of the working group which is investigating the question of non-academic discipline.

He is also a co-opted member of the curriculum and standards subcommittee of Governing Council's academic affairs committee, which is working on a report on grading practices.

Nixon says the discipline working group's present terms of reference — the 'Conway-Cadario' discipline code — are too narrow to allow discussion of the substantive issues involved in non-academic discipline, and that the full range of issues should be discussed again next fall.

Nixon says he is concerned that Governing Council has lost its initiative in long-term policy making, to the administration, in particular the president.

As an example, he cites a recent speech by U of T president John Evans saying provincial cutbacks would lead to economies in the humanities.

No such decision has ever been made by Governing Council, Nixon says.

The present calibre of student leadership, Nixon believes, is disappointing, in that student reps are over-extending themselves and not always aware of the issues.

He also feels many of the candidates he is running against have no clearly stated campaign platforms.

Nixon also feels it of the utmost importance to fight any attempts in the university to raise student fees.

But, he says it is necessary to form a united front to fight provincial educational cutbacks, because students will be unlikely to win the battle alone.

Nixon urges the "opening up" of higher education, saying the recent federal government decision to raise the ceilings on student loans is a "clever use" to make government look generous, when in reality students will be paying more.

In the long term, Nixon advocates the abolition of tuition fees on the basis that education is a right, not a privilege.

Another area about which Nixon feels strongly is student services, maintaining the administration not only fails to consider the quality of the student environment, but also poorly administers the services it runs.

He would like to see services run by a student corporation, such as a non-profit campus pub and better food catering.

He says the administration "destroyed the concept" of the original 1971 Campus as Campus Centre report by implementing only a few of its proposals, and conducted "almost a scandal" in its efforts to have the new athletics building constructed, without properly consulting residents' groups.

Nixon also says he supports a Scarborough and Erindale College student constituency.

The Varsity — Bob White

Brad Nixon is disappointed with quality of present reps.

Today The Varsity presents interviews with three of the seven students running for the two full-time undergraduate seats on Governing Council. Interviews of the remaining four candidates will be in Friday's paper.

Balloting for Governing Council seats will be conducted by mail beginning March 14, and closes noon March 27. Results are to be announced March 28.

Ellis takes free speech hard line

By BOB BETTSON

Running for the right-wing on campus in the Governing Council election in undergraduate arts and science is Trinity College first year student Raycroft Ellis who says he is "loosely affiliate with the Campus Alternative."

The Alternative is a tiny far right faction on campus dedicated to opposing women's liberation and "radicals and revolutionaries who control student groups on campus."

Ellis admits he has no experience in student government but feels he presents an alternative. He calls party a "phony issue" and supports the discipline code with a few minor objections.

He also takes a hard line on the Banfield affair. He said Metro police should have been called as soon as Tony Leah and Bill Schabas prevented Edward Banfield from speaking last March and the students and their supporters should have been arrested.

Ellis believes in a pragmatic approach to issues. He feels SAC has mishandled both tenure and discipline campaigns.

"Last year SAC tried to say the majority of students on campus opposed the Conway-Cadario discipline code but there was nothing to indicate that," he said.

Over 3,500 students who signed petitions and every major student organization on campus including SAC, the Graduate Students' Union and the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students opposed the code.

Ellis also believes racism is not an issue which can be dealt with on campus. He feels nothing could be done about discrimination in hiring and admission standards.

"I am not a racist but these can be dealt with by other levels of government," he said. "It would be irresponsible to spend public funds on an inquiry into racism."

Ellis also opposes increases in student aid and lowering of tuition because he feels corporations and individuals are already paying too much income taxes.

"You can't create equality of opportunity by redistribution of income," he claimed.

Ellis says the people who pay for university should make the decisions, which means taxpayers who make up 75 percent of university funding should have 75 percent of Governing Council seats.

He says his political stance is "small 'l' libertarian" which means "anyone should have the freedom to do anything as long as it doesn't infringe on the freedom of someone else."

In order to gauge student support for the Athletics Complex, you will also be asked to vote on the following questions:

1) Do you support the construction of the new Athletics Complex?

YES NO ABSTENTION

2) The present student fee toward the operating costs of the existing athletics facilities and programme is $20 for men and $10 for women. When the men's and women's athletic programs are amalgamated, the fee will be $20 for both.

The construction of the new Athletics Complex will involve an increase in operating costs. Knowing that an increase in the operating fee might be a co-requisite for the construction of the new complex, please check only one of the following:

- I am not prepared to pay a higher athletics fee than I am presently paying.
- I am prepared to pay up to, but not more than $30 per annum (i.e., a further increase of $10) from the date the building opens to help defray the operating costs of the new athletics facilities and programme.
- I am prepared to pay up to but not more than $40 per annum (i.e., a further increase of $20) from the date the building opens to help defray the operating costs of the new athletics facilities and programme.

Administration will inform McReavy today whether he will be rehired

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
Fired storekeeper Paul McReavy will learn from the zoology administration today whether he will be reinstated.
McReavy will go to associate chairman D.F. Mettrick's office at 4:45 pm and pick up an envelope containing the decision.
Mettrick will make his decision on McReavy's reinstatement after conferring with zoology professor George Hotelet.
McReavy, a five-year storeroom employee at the Ramsay Wright zoological building, was suddenly fired in early January for what he says was union activity.

At a two hour Monday meeting between McReavy and Mettrick, the dismissed storekeeper presented a list of grievances to Mettrick.
McReavy argued he was wrongfully dismissed for union activity; that he was already a union member, which the university denies, under the terms of a collective agreement; that he was victimized by zoology professor Jacques Berger's vindictiveness; that the zoology storeroom was understaffed and that the working conditions there were unhealthy.
Mettrick was unavailable for comment on these charges yesterday.

"Monday's grievance meeting between us was a difficult situation," said McReavy, "but Dr. Mettrick handled it quite well."
"I'm confident that the zoology administration will not allow administrative expediency to supercede matters of personal conscience — I'm expecting a favorable decision today," he said.
"Among other things, I put forward the suggestion that, to clear the air, they throw open the question of unionization in zoology," McReavy said.
"They could hold a series of open meetings of the non-academic staff and allow both sides of the question to be aired, rather than subjecting zoology support staff to one-sided monologues against unionization as has happened in the past," he said.

McReavy said he also told Mettrick that "it was quite possible this whole situation has been a problem of bad communications and I offered him some suggestions for improving them in zoology."
"My questions on the relevance of my union interest to my dismissal were not meant to attack the department or individuals concerned, with whom I have no quarrel, but only to satisfy my own curiosity about the rather strange proceedings."

McReavy said he asked whether Berger had called for his dismissal, but "was met with evasion and silence."
It was Berger's alleged complaints that may have led to McReavy's dismissal.

Students need appeals too

Students and non-tenured faculty should be allowed to use the same appeal procedure as tenured faculty in the event of their expulsion, a joint student-faculty working group on discipline agreed yesterday.
The committee, chaired by psychology professor Joan Foley and political economy student Brad Nixon, is examining the feasibility of implementing the proposed non-academic code of behavior, known as the "Conway-Cadario Code."
Sections of the code dealing with academic offenses have already been approved by Governing Council.
Yesterday's agreement followed objections by committee member and SAC president Seymour Kanowitch that while tenured faculty members, under the terms of their employment, were allowed to appeal to a faculty-administration committee meeting in closed session, students and non-tenured faculty would be allowed only an open hearing with no appeal, under the Conway-Cadario Code.
The issue, Kanowitch said, was not whether students and faculty should receive equal penalty, but that they receive equal treatment.
It was simply not fair, Kanowitch maintained, for students to have an open hearing and faculty to have a closed hearing.
"We can't afford to have one system of discipline that works behind closed doors and another that works for students," Kanowitch said.
The composition of the review committee and the question of suitable penalties for non-academic offences have yet to be agreed upon by committee members.
Should the committee not be able to reach agreement on the question of equal treatment, it is likely to be unable to reach any overall agreement. Discussions on the non-academic section of the Conway-Cadario code were postponed from last spring to this January after strong student opposition last year.
Students claimed the code would place undue power in the hands of the university administration, and would subject students to double jeopardy — trial by the civil courts and trial by the university.
The question of discipline has had a long history at the university. It goes back at least as far as the Campbell Report of 1969, which recommended disruptions be dealt with on the basis of the substantive issue raised.
Last June, SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas were disciplined by the all-faculty Caput for their part in the Banfield affair.

APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR

The Varsity Board of Directors invites application for the position of the Board to be appointed by the fourteen incumbent Directors, for a two year term beginning July 1, 1975.

The Board represents the various estates in the university community and is responsible for the editorial integrity and the financial and business management of The Varsity.

Written applications should be addressed to Bruce Couchman, Chairman, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St., Toronto M5S 2E8. Applicants will be interviewed and a selection made at the Board's annual meeting on March 19.

Deadline for applications is 5 p.m., Friday, March 14, 1975.

WOMEN'S WORK IN ONTARIO THE HIS

Who were the "working girls" of Ontario in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries?

Between 1850 and 1930 Canadian women found new occupations in factories, social service agencies and offices in addition to their traditional work as farm wives, domestics, and prostitutes.

The domestic roles of nurse and teacher were transformed into occupations for working class women and eventually into middle class "professions".

In statistical terms the percentage of women in the labor force grew from 11 percent in 1891 to 17 percent by 1931. In the 40 year period 1931-1971 the percentage of women in the labor force has nearly doubled to 33.3 percent.

What was the daily life of the working woman like and how did participation in waged work effect her image of herself?

Certainly we cannot assume that increased participation in an industrial economy brought a clear-cut improvement in women's status. The position of the working woman has to be examined in the light of the influence of domestic roles.

In the past, women have grappled with the problem of the dual identity of woman and worker and they have sporadically succeeded in defining themselves as workers. However, the woman worker has generally subordinated the latter identity to the former or defined her work as an extension of her female role.

She has been forced to content with the prevailing biological, social and cultural stereotypes which have roots in the economic structure of nineteenth and twentieth century Canada.

The excerpts below from Women at Work: Ontario, 1850-1930 reveal the conditions under which women worked, and the responses of women to these conditions.

Domestic Service and Prostitution

I am a woman, a daughter of Martha, one of those whose business it is to smooth the paths of others. My day's work begins at six in the morning and ends any time before twelve at night. All day long I serve and scrub and bake and then wash dishes, polish silver, press clothes until well into the night. I wear a frilly head band that seems like a lead weight on my throbbing temples. My shoes are felt soled and light as gossamer but at times they feel like cast iron. I say "Yes sir," and "Yes madame" with a pleasant smile, when I feel like screaming and telling the whole shooting match to go to hades . . . I am tender with little children and I humor their childish whims; my own are in a foster home and indifferently cared for. But I do it all gladly, and I am well satisfied that my meagre wage is enough to pay for the bite that keeps my children alive.

— From a letter by Florence Worthington to the Mail & Empire, Jan. 14, 1934.

The most common servant, however, was the general. She did the work of all other servants combined, but her ability to perform a wide range of tasks did not bring her a higher wage, or enhance her value in the eyes of her employer.

Outside the home, skilled work was increasingly associated with specialization and a clear job definition. This conception of skill was carried over to the home, where a house-parlormaid might be better paid than a general, though her duties were fewer.

Society held a very ambivalent attitude towards domestic skills.

On the one hand, employers were extremely vocal in their demands for experienced domestic help. They often perceived a gap between their ideal of home life and the reality of their own ill-functioning households. A pervasive feeling was that standards and skills were deteriorating — "You can't get good help nowadays."

On the other hand, employers had little real respect for domestic skills, especially when it suited their pocketbooks. Domestic skills were very familiar, and easy to ignore.

Most working-class women had some experience in housework and childcare, simply because of their female upbringing. This background was not sufficient preparation for service in a middle-class home (hence the demand for "good" help) but it went a long way.

The only large group of workers to be given extensive training before recruitment into domestic service were the orphan children who had missed the normal socialization process.

An amazing amount of learning was needed to perform the simplest cooking task, but as long as cooking was considered a natural function of womanhood, the learning and skill involved could be ignored. An application for a "Scotch servant girl" in 1907 stated:

The duties required are simply those of a quiet home, prepare meals, sweep and dust etc. etc. such work as can be done by any girl of 14 or 15 years . . .

This ambivalent attitude towards the domestic's skills went hand-in-hand with a vague definition of her work. As Jean Scott pointed out, "The work of a girl in a factory or shop is definite and soon learned, while the work of a domestic, especially of a 'general', is more indefinite and varied."

This indefiniteness was inevitable because of the servant's workplace. It was impossible to standardize housework, because each household was unique.

The domestic did not so much take a job as enter a "situation" which was different from any other. Whereas the trend in industry was to minimize variables in order to maximize efficiency, a complicated mixture of variables determined the domestic's work.

The amorphous nature of the servant's work was one reason her mistress felt compelled to investigate her character before hiring her. A domestic was not hired for specific services, but for general availability; above all, a servant had to take orders well.

Many domestic skills were moral skills, or skills of deference, and this is another reason employers looked for certain qualities of personality in their servants. A servant's "character" was her most important possession, as losing it could mean economic ruin.

A good servant was clean, celibate, obedient, respectable, hard-working, and an early riser.

From Domestic Service to Prostitution

Why was there such a strong connection between domestic service and prostitution? What factors encouraged domestics to fake up work as prostitutes?

Women working as domestics in Ontario during this period earned wages that were relatively high compared to those earned by other unskilled women workers. Domestic service offered fairly steady employment as well as training and experience in housework and childcare.

However, this occupation was poorly regarded by other working women. While the factory worker was forced to sell her labor power for a specified number of hours per week in order to survive, at least the remaining time was her own. The domestic, on the other hand, usually had to work very long hours with no fixed time off each week.

Forced to live under the same roof as her employer, she was constantly at his her disposal. Because of this, she had very little privacy or opportunity to socialize. Thus domestic service was regarded by most working people as a degrading, and therefore, low prestige occupation.

Prostitution, by virtue of its illegality and sexual "immorality," was considered to be the least attractive type of work open to women.

Since domestic service was closest to prostitution in the social scale of female occupations, it was likely that an unemployed domestic, unable to find a "situation", would move one notch down the scale by accepting work as a prostitute.

Because the movement from domestic service to prostitution involved less downward mobility than a movement from factory or office work to prostitution, it occurred with greater frequency.

The nature of domestic work in private homes partially explains the entry of domestics into prostitution. When these women were tired or let go by their employer, they suffered greater insecurity than did factory or office workers in similar circumstances.

They lost not only their means of earning a livelihood, but also their home and the roof over their heads. Because domestics lived at their place of employment, they were likely to have fewer social connections than other women workers.

Thus the insecurity, isolation and loneliness which characterized domestic service made unemployed domestics particularly vulnerable to the recruitment efforts of madames and pimps.

Local News Servant Girls Should Avoid It

When Mrs. Maria Clayton, who keeps a so-called registry office for servants at 32 and 34 Adelaide Street West, was charged before the County Judge yesterday with stealing a trunk from Ellen Donnelly, a woman well up in years, the plaintiff stated to the judge that she had lived with Clayton for a week, and that this "registry office for servants" was in fact a house of ill-fame. Mrs. Donnelly said she could prove this statement. A GLOBE reporter enquired of the police last night as to the place, and every constable spoken to agreed that if a respectable girl had the misfortune to go to this place to look for a situation, she would be told that there was no opening just then, but if she would stop with Mrs. Clayton for a few days a situation would no doubt be found. Before the poor girl had stopped out her few days she was generally allured from virtue by the hoodlums lurking about the premises. The place is becoming notorious, and the authorities should lose no time in suppressing it. It should be avoided by all respectable servant girls; nor should any respectable citizen be deluded in going to this place to look for a servant.

— Toronto GLOBE
June 8, 1883.

But the Social Survey Commission linked prostitution to poverty in a more direct manner. Of the thirty-seven prostitutes interviewed by the Commission regarding their reasons for entering the "profession", nineteen stated that they could not live on the wages they were earning.

Of these nineteen, four were full-time prostitutes and fifteen were part-time prostitutes currently working at other jobs.

At this time, wages for women were set on the assumption that the woman was living at home, either with her parents or her husband. The woman was not usually considered the chief bread-winner in these households; her earnings were seen as a secondary source of family income.

Thus, single women living on their own in boarding-houses found it difficult to survive on the low wages they received and, consequently, sometimes turned to prostitution.

The Commission recommended the passage of a minimum wage law to help reduce the economic pressure which evidently drove some women into brothels or streetwalking.

NTARIO: STORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Registration: The Struggle to Become a Profession

Originally, Canadian nurses were organized into the Canadian National Association of Trained Nurses not by their own leadership but by the Canadian Nursing Superintendents Society for the purpose of affiliation with the International Council of Nurses (founded in 1899).

In 1912, the CNATN agreed upon a constitution and formulated their main goal: to elevate the educational standards of the profession. Although this was a laudable goal, the formation of the CNATN did recall Nightingale's desire to rescue her "girls" from the stigma of the early working-class nurse.

For the first ten years of its existence, the organization was largely occupied by the struggle to obtain legislation regulating the registration of nurses.

It did not attack hospitals, governments or the medical profession with the vigour warranted by their abysmal working conditions because of pressures exerted on the nurses' organization which directed its development along conservative lines.

Registration was a crucial issue in establishing the skilled nature of nursing and was clearly intended to limit the title "trained nurse" to those who had the requisite education. Its adherents could be accused of falling prey to that characteristic instinct of professionals, the desire to assert a monopoly in a field.

indeed, a number of articles and letters in Canadian Nurse indicate that some graduate nurses desired to rid themselves of the untrained women were were competing for jobs in private nursing.

However non-militant the registration struggle, it was also comparable to the struggles of unions for closed-shop rights which were going on in the same period. Nurses were arguing from a powerless position for protection against the "practical" nurses who were forced to accept even lower pay and the broadest range of domestic duties in order to survive.

Unfortunately (as was the case with many unions), nurses did not combat the problem by including these unorganized women within a registration scheme which could have recognized different levels of nursing. As it was, the exploitation of this cheap source of labor continued to plague the nursing associations into the 1940s and even later.

Within the health care structure the nurse, despite her attempts to define the profession, remained subordinate to the largely male medical profession. The authoritarianism inherent in the ideology of medical professionalism was necessary to impress upon nurses their own position in the medical hierarchy, in relation to the doctors, different classes of patients and the rest of the hospital staff.

The Canadian Nurse abounds with lectures on appropriate behavior:

She owes to the attending physicians absolute silence regarding their professional demerits or blundering. No nurse who has not learned the lesson of implicit obedience to authority and practised it until it has become a habit of life, is fitted to command others.

As women, nurses were socialized to be subordinate to male doctors, but as graduates of nursing programs, they were taught to feel superior to aides and practical nurses.

Yet the gap between the professional rhetoric of nursing and the objective realities was huge. Work in the hospitals closely resembled industrial conditions in a number of important aspects, especially when the divisions of labor grew more complicated.

In industry, increasing specialization led to the alienation of workers from the product of their labor. Specialization in health care began with the rise of the modern medical profession and the irrevocable split between "curing" and "caring".

The nurse's activities, for a large part of the period, were difficult to distinguish from those of a servant's. Later "caring" was further compartmentalized, creating a complex of technicians, aides, maids, cooks, clerks and cleaners, all of whose work was essential, but who were, and continue to be, accorded no power or credit.

All credit for patient recovery went to the doctor since it was supposedly only he who participated in the science of "curing". As in industry, wages were very low and there was no chance of upward mobility, from maid to nurse or nurse to doctor.

Nevertheless, nurses and other allied health "professionals" remained workers who did not see themselves as workers.

The belief that all jobs were valued equally in a cooperative humanitarian effort, obscured the great variation that existed in work conditions, wages and status among the hospital staff.

Alienating, hierarchical situations were offset by the "team" notion of professional work. Solidarity with other staff over common grievances was largely sacrificed to a primary institutional and professional loyalty.

SAC says no to Magruder: no money to 'petty crook'

By AMANDA HANSON
SAC voted 28-1 last Thursday to turn down a proposal to invite Jeb Stuart Magruder, convicted Watergate felon, to speak at U of T's Convocation Hall.

"There's no reason for us to pay to hear Magruder talk about how he cheated the government," explained SAC president Seymour Kanowitch.

Magruder was the former deputy director of former U.S. president Richard Nixon's 1972 re-election committee. He admitted to lying to various grand juries, prosecutors and at the original Watergate trial, but eventually cooperated with the Ervin Committee, Judge John Sirica and the special prosecutor in the course of the Watergate investigations.

Magruder was freed from jail Jan. 8 after serving seven months of his 10-month to four-year term.

SAC has never had any intention of booking Magruder, Kanowitch said. "He was and still is nothing more than a petty crook and the motion was turned down by more than a substantial majority."

Mike Seidon, a private promoter who was going to pay Magruder's speaking fee of $1,500 and the cost of advertising, said he would "take all the risk" if SAC provided Convocation Hall.

Seidon noted the motion was accepted at the March 4 SAC executive meeting and "Seymour was the only one I can remember who objected."

Seidon said he was told to "be ready to sign contracts in a couple of days."

"All this talk about supporting a convicted felon is nonsense. Magruder has served his time. His name's been ruined. What more do people want?"

"He can warn us what can happen through blind ambition. It takes a lot of guts to stand up and say where you went wrong. It's like talking about divorce," Seidon said.

"A lot of things have been brought to the campus by SAC, like Deep Throat, and what kind of morality is that supposed to show?"

"Angela Davis has come to Convocation Hall and she's been charged by the U.S. government," Seidon added.

Seidon says SAC is "backward". What are they going to do? Ban all books on Watergate from the bookstores? Magruder is part of recent history.

Seidon is aware that there has been considerable backlash in the press about supporting "criminals like Dean and Magruder."

He originally thought of inviting two "good guys" in the Watergate affair, Robert Woodward and

Charles Bernstein, Washington Post reporters and authors of All the President's Men, "but they wanted $2,500 each to come and talk and $5,000 is too much of a gamble for me."

Dave Shindman, the only SAC member to support the motion to invite Magruder, said he "couldn't understand why the council voted that way."

"I'm down in the record as saying I don't discriminate against ex-convicts and just because he's an ex-convict is no reason to not invite him," Shindman said.

Seidon said, "SAC is basically closed-minded because Magruder is touring to pay his legal fees."

"If he's making some money, so what, everybody's interested in making money somewhere along the line."

If Magruder had been invited, Seidon said, prices would have been $1 with an ATL card and $4 without. Seidon says he's going to try again next year by inviting Judge John Sirica.

The Varsity — Bob Betson

Auld to visit U of T soon

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Queen's Park Tories got a roasting at the rally for the Common Front for the Preservation of Education held here March 6, despite an announcement that Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld planned to visit every Ontario campus in the near future.

The Common Front, a coalition of students, faculty and staff from Ottawa's three post-secondary institutions, invited local PC MPP Claude Bennet to speak to the rally. Instead of Bennet, the PCs sent one of his assistants, John McDermid. When called upon to speak he rose and stated, "I'm not here to speak. I'm here to listen and report back to my minister."

The audience of over 200 responded with an outburst of hisses and cat-calls.

McDermid continued to say that he had been authorized to say on behalf of the colleges and universities Minister that, "Auld will be visiting every campus in the province to discuss the situation with students, faculty and staff in the near future."

McDermid then sat down. The chairman of the meeting expressed surprise that no one was there to speak on behalf of the government, and asked McDermid to reconsider. McDermid refused despite another round of shouts of, "Speak! Speak!"

During the question period that followed speakers from the floor made reference to the coincidence between Auld's decision to tour the campuses and the upcoming provincial election. Also noted was the coincidence between the planned tour and final exams — meaning that few students would be able to participate in Auld's discussion.

After the rally, McDermid conceded that the timing of the tour may not be the best, but he said planning was just going on, and all factors would have to be taken into account by the planning group.

McDermid's first reaction to the roster of speakers condemning the Davis government's educational policies was, "We've heard it all before."

He then added, "The government is concerned. Everybody makes us out to be some kind of unthinking machine. But we aren't."

When his "We've heard it all before" statement was read back to him, McDermid said, "It probably wasn't a good thing to say."

The day after the rally, Auld's executive assistant Clair Hoy confirmed the plan to visit the campuses across the province. He said Auld had the tour in mind earlier in the week and that the minister thought the time was right for such a visit.

Auld has been minister of colleges and universities for a year," he said, "and he hasn't had a chance to visit all the campuses yet. Now that we've settled the operating grants and the financing matters he has a chance to get out to talk to people."

Hoy was asked if such a tour might be more useful in the fall when examination schedules are not pressing on students and faculty, and before the next year's budget is decided. But Hoy said as far as he knew Auld intended to make the tour this spring.

Hoy also argued that the government wasn't being given an adequate opportunity to attend the current round of discussions and forums being held around the province.

"We have a message to get across. There's been a lot of criticism of our financing policies but our reasons haven't been getting across as well as we'd like."

Hoy said that he has "some suspicions about the way some of these meetings have been organized." Using the forum on financing at Brock University held March 7 as an example, Hoy said Auld's office hadn't heard about it until two days before.

He said the government was unfairly condemned by the press over its failure to attend the Laurentian symposium held early last month. The press reported that Auld had not even replied to his invitation to speak, but Hoy says a telephone and written reply was sent.

"We've been getting insufficient notice to attend these meetings while the other guys (Liberal and NDP speakers) are receiving lots of time and notice," Hoy said.

Specific details of Auld's tour should be available by late next week, Hoy said.

Not even a bedtime prayer can solve James Auld's worries.

Law unfair to married woman, lawyer says

By ELAINE ROLFE
Family law discriminates against married women, charged prominent Toronto lawyer Rosalie Abbella, Monday. She was speaking to a group of 35 persons at Hart House as part of the SAC International Women's Year Festival.
"We don't question the laws until we find ourselves walking away from a 30-year marriage with just a toothbrush in our hands," she said.
Criticizing the existing Separate Property Act, Abbella said many women who enter marriage with independent incomes are pressured by society to eventually give up their jobs to become mothers and homemakers.
Others continue to work part-time, buying groceries while their husband's salaries are used to purchase material assets, she said.

Abbella said such women suffer under the Separate Property Act when the marriage breaks up because their contribution to the marriage is incalculable.
"Unless a wife shows she has made direct contribution to acquiring an asset, she is not entitled to any part of the asset," she said.
Abbella said marriage contracts are presently illegal in Ontario.
Because marriage is considered "a lifelong relationship," it is illegal to add any clauses to the contract which would "violate the inviolable institution of marriage," she added.
Marriage and divorce laws change slowly because of a lack of communication between lawmakers and women who are unaware of their rights, Abbella said. She argued laws are made by men who want to stay in power, noting women who wish to see these laws changed must persuade the government it would be mutually advantageous to establish fairer laws.

She criticized the Ontario Employment Standards Act and the Ontario Human Rights Code for arbitrariness and ambiguity of language and discriminating against working women.
She said employers can avoid paying a woman "equal pay for equal work" according to Employment Standards Act by claiming that a man who is paid more for an identical job has "seniority" or "better qualifications."

Commitments made during weekend women's celebration

By LISA ANNE VOLKOV

Two days of exhilarating celebration culminating in determined commitments to action marked International Women's Day in Toronto Saturday.

Over 50 community groups, including women's, ethnic and labor, co-operated with the Status of Women Commission to commemorate working women's struggles this year, which the UN declared International Women's Year.

Speeches and festivities at U of T's Convocation Hall Friday evening were followed by an all-day action conference at City Hall Saturday which over 700 people attended.

The problem which produced the conference has been summed up by Laura Sabia, chairperson of the Status of Women Commission: "In the past, women have been idolized, patronized and exploited. It is time they were humanized, utilized and recognized."

Sandy Steineker, speaking for the organizing committee, reminded the audience the recognition of women's issues is a recent phenomenon.

Steineker referred to the Liberal government's "Why Not?" campaign as an attempt to "cool out, mystify and co-opt the movement."

She also condemned the advertisements themselves for referring to women's problems as "attitudinal."

"It's not in our heads, it's in the structure which won't accommodate our demands," Steineker insisted. But Revolutionary feminists are not only a modern phenomenon.

Red Light Theater actress Diana Grant read selections from In Times Like These by Nellie McClung, Manitoba suffragette writer and UN delegate for Canada.

Not all the speakers advocated exclusively female movements. Evelyn Armstrong, national representative of the United Electrical Workers, stressed the need for women to co-operate with men in the unions.

"Women are used as a source of cheap labor, a tactic which keeps both men and women at the mercy of the employer," Armstrong charged. She admitted, however, the traditionally male-dominated unions must "re-evaluate their priorities in collective bargaining to include equal pay demands."

Gloria Montero, director of the Canadian Committee for a Democratic Spain, said in response to those skeptical about the liberation of women through socialist revolution: "Women who risk their lives for freedom will not stop until they achieve freedom on every level."

Montero stressed, however, "We must change both the attitudes and the laws — but the attitudes are the hardest to change."

The objective of Saturday's conference was formulation of concrete demands. Two sets, morning and afternoon, of five two-hour workshops on themes concerning women were held.

Each workshop featured a panel of 'experts' whose opening remarks were followed by general discussion.

Towards the end of the period concrete resolutions were formulated and voted upon by those present.

Passed proposals were to be presented at the concluding session for the endorsement of the general audience, after which they would be collected for immediate submission to the federal and provincial governments as demands arising out of the conference.

Morning workshop topics were: Women's Sexuality and Criminal Law; Daycare; Marriage and Property Law; Housework and the Economy.

In the afternoon the problems of working women were discussed in Houseworkers especially "must exert pressure by selective buying and the respecting of boycotts," she concluded.

An especially controversial issue was the question of 'wages for housework' a demand originally formulated by feminist Selma James.

"Society views marriage as a labor of love," said one participant. "But housekeeping is a full-time job. If women go out to work, they are doing two jobs. The structure is maintained, and women are carrying the extra burden for the society. They should be reimbursed."

The voices of opposition to the demand were equally strong. A representative of the Congress of Canadian Women said: "The ideal of the intelligent woman is involvement with the world and this (the demand for wages for housework) will discourage it."

Cooperative facilities and a guaranteed minimum wage for all people were suggested as alternatives to the wages for housework proposal.

An afternoon workshop on women in the labor reserve featured the assertion that "the working poor are almost all women. They are used to keep other women in a cycle of poverty."

Family and welfare benefits are "ridiculously low," she added.

Proposals were made advocating the elimination of the discrepancy between benefits awarded full-time and part-time workers, and child care deductions made between men and women.

The exploitation of temporary workers, such as the extreme case of Haitian domestic workers about to be deported rather than re-trained, was condemned.

At the final plenary session Saturday popular resolutions upheld by several of the workshops were passed.

These included:
1) Immediate and unconditional implementation of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women;

2) The right of all to universal parent-participating, 24-hour non-profit daycare subsidized by corporate taxes;

3) Equal pay for work of equal value;

4) A living wage for re-training, as well as equal access for women (present priorities make male heads of families first in line);

5) Support for the May 10 national demonstration being planned in support of the immediate implementation of the Status of Women recommendations.

Specific demands arising out of the workshops included:
o Support of the woman's right to choose abortion;

o The substitution of a charge of common assault for rape charges (sparing the rape victim the humiliation and vindictiveness attached to current court procedure with regard to rape);

o Inclusion of sexual orientation freedom in the human rights' code;

o Compulsory education on marriage law;

o Equality of credit rating before and after marriage;

o Equal seniority, training, promotion and transfer rights;

o Prohibition of separate employment classification;

o Bringing domestic workers up to minimum wage standards;

o Establishment of legal quotas of competent, qualified women;

Hoffman says women in sport ignored by women's movement

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Olympic runner Abby Hoffman yesterday criticized the women's movement for "virtually saying nothing about women in sport."

Hoffman, who teaches political science at the University of Guelph, was speaking at a panel discussion on Women and Sports at U of T's Benson Building as part of SAC's International Women's Year festival.

Hoffman said the women's movement has stressed areas of physical activity such as self-defence while totally ignoring "the fitness and sport" aspects of female athletics.

About 20 people attended the talk, which featured U of T Women's Athletic Association (WAA) secretary-treasurer Iris Bliss, undergraduate physical and health education chairperson Maureen O'Bryan and Canadian Net Ball Association historian Lois Baron.

Hoffman also blamed the media for creating "a paradox in Canada" saying the media "focus on women athletes and not on women's athletics. There's a big difference."

She said only a few athletic stars of the Karen Magnussen-Elaine Tanner calibre receive a great deal of media coverage creating "the appearance that women athletes are getting a lot of publicity."

"They forget completely the thousands of women" intensively involved in sports "behind those few athletic stars," she added.

Baron, who also is working with the National Film Board in assessing audience needs and uses of film in Canadian amateur sports, expressed concern about the traditional stereotyping of women athletes as "dumb jockettes" or

"masculinized females."

She said many of the myths and stereotypes are reinforced in the home and by the mass media.

She recommended "de-conditioning" men and women to stop believing in everything that has traditionally been attached to women in sports.

"The mass media is one important area where this de-conditioning has to take place," she added.

O'Bryan said the liberation of women athletes in New Zealand and Australia was further advanced than in Canada, citing track and field and field hockey as two sports where women have formed their own organizations.

She also cited the Soviet Union "where women are in fact highly recognized" in their particular sports.

Baron criticized the idea of an International Women's Year as a gesture of tokenism by governments toward women.

She said the attitude of the government toward IWY seemed to be a paternalistic "make the best of it, sweetheart, but don't ask for too much."

"One year will not make a difference," Baron said.

The panelists supported a larger role of women in administrative, coaching and leadership areas of the athletic world.

Hoffman expressed doubt, however, about whether Canadian women athletes are sufficiently liberated to have overcome their stereotypical views of women in such roles as coaching and administration.

Varsity golf tip number ten: putting continued

By BILL WHITCOMBE
Par on the putting green is two putts per green

If you would land on the greens in regulation figures and make two putts per green, you would have an even par round of golf. We always strive for one-putt greens, of course, and conversely, three-putt greens are a sin.

If you are having difficulty judging how hard to hit the ball to make it stop near the hole, a good practice is to putt to a line rather than to a hole when practicing. A piece of string stretched across a portion of a practice green will serve as a marker, and you can practice stroking the ball to a spot near the string, much the same as you used to do when you pitched pennies to a crack in the sidewalk. As you gain better feel in putting for distance, you can then return to putting to a hole and your results should improve.

Putting greens consist of a fine blade grass, mostly bent, and they require constant care and treatment to keep them in good condition. It is your responsibility as a golfer to help maintain the condition of the greens, being careful not to step on the edge of the cup, never knocking the ball off the green with a club in a fit of temper, and never laying clubs down on the green, or running golf carts over them. Abstinence by all players from such acts will be most helpful in keeping the greens in nice condition.

Ball marks in greens are depressions made in soft greens by longshots landing on the green with backspin. These may easily be repaired by utilizing a long tee or a little metal fork designed for the job to stick down into the turf around the depression and gently lifting the depression upwards with a prying motion. You can then tap it down with your putter head or with your toe and it will be smooth enough to not hamper following players when they reach the green and commence putting.

SMC B makes division II b-ball finals

By DAVE STUART

Interac basketball playoffs at Hart House are in full swing. In division I quarter-final action, Sr Eng downed Pac Ed 67-48 last Thursday, Vic I defeated New I 80-66 also on Thursday, Erindale swamped PHE A 83-58, and Med A pulled away in the second half to clobber Dent A 85-54. The latter two games were also played last Thursday.

Only one game has been played in each of the semi-final series. Sr Eng edged Vic I last Friday 67-64, and right after, Erindale stuck it to Med A 69-47. The semi-final series are a best-of-three affair. The second game in each series is scheduled for tonight. Sr Eng and Vic square off at 7:00 pm followed at 9:00 pm by the Erindale-Meds contest. Both Sr Eng and Erindale could be in the finals with a win tonight.

The quarter-final action in division II has also been completed. Pharm A notched a win over Arch 69-51 while Dev Hise succumbed to SMC 58-67. Jr Eng followed the example of their big brothers by defeating For A 95-58 and Innis I were on the short end of a 70-47 score against Knox I. All games were played last Monday.

Pharm and SMC B then advanced to the semi-final round. Pharm won the opening game played Tuesday 60-57 but lost 51-57 to the Mikes in the second game. The series was based on total points for the two games, therefore SMC moves to the finals with a 114-111 series win.

The other semi-final series pits Jr Eng against Knox I but no games have as yet been played. (by press time - ed.)

The finals are slated for the black hole of Hart House on March 18 and 19, and March 25. The final is a best-of-three series.

Not to discriminate every moment some passionate attitude in those about us, and in the very brilliancy of their gifts some tragic dividing of forces on their ways, is, on this short day of frost and sun, to sleep before evening. Rough play continues as Dents edge Erindale from finals

By MIKE FRIEND

Monday, Mar. 10 saw two semi-final interfac hockey games at the arena. In the first game SMC A defeated Vic 1 by a score of 2-1 to take a one goal lead in to the second game of the two-game total-point series. The other game was an upset of sorts as Dents, who had a one goal advantage going into the game, scored in overtime to defeat Erindale 8-7 on the round.

The Vic-SMC game saw the fathers carry the play to Vic only to find themselves down 1-0 on a goal by Jamie Carroll with three seconds left in the first period.

The early part of the second period was dominated by Vic but no goal resulted. As the period progressed the momentum slowly swung back to SMC. Again no goal resulted.

In the third period, SMC came out flying and quickly tied the score on a goal by Borsack. Throughout the period the fathers continued to buzz around the Vic net until Flynn beat Doug Carter, the Vic netminder, for the winning goal.

One gets the impression that Vic would not have been in the game at all had it not been for the heroics of Carter in the Vic net. He made numerous key saves to keep Vic in the series.

The Dents-Erin game started out with Dents leading the series with a one goal margin by virtue of the 3-2 defeat earlier.

Pastoral College seemed like it had come to play hockey as two quick goals by Joe Sikorski and Roman Knignizky gave Erindale a 2-0 lead and a 4-3 lead for the round. As the period progressed their winning desire waned and the tooth pullers were able to capitalize on Erindale's sloppy play with goals from Dennis

The Varsity — Eugene Shaw-Colyer

The classic one-on-one situation on the SMC net. SMC downed Vic 2-1 in semis.

Page, Bob Monroe, and Peter Rahan to vault into a 6-4 lead on the round by the end of the second period.

Knignizky's second goal of the game, early in the third period, gave the Erindale attack new life. Goals by Bob Lewzuk and Bruce Norris put Erindale back into the lead.

From that point on the game degenerated into the rough, chippy variety with both teams resorting to dirty tactics.

The final goal of regulation time came from the stick of Monroe just after one of his several visits to the sin bin. The goal came with two minutes left in the third.

At the end of regulation time, the total goals for the semi-final series was tied 7-7 even though Erindale won the game 5-4. Hence it was necessary to play overtime to decide the series.

The overtime period continued in the same brutal fashion as the third period with a rash of penalties including a major for highsticking to Dents and a match penalty to Erindale for head butting. As a result there were at least two players and sometimes more in the penalty box.

John Jarema's goal finally ended the season for the westenders and put Dents in the division I finals.

Wrestling Blues qualify five for the national finals in Vancouver

By EUGENE-SHAW-COLYER

In marked contrast to the forbidding dark shadows and confining dreariness of Hart House, the modern, spacious, brightly illuminated main gym of the Benson Building comfortably accommodated more than 200 seasoned wrestlers from all parts of the province for the Ontario championships Saturday and Sunday.

With wrestling on six individual mats taking place simultaneously, the several matmen offered the most skillful and exciting competition seen this season.

From the U of T Wrestling Team, John Park (132) won a junior championship while Kirk Osadetz (132), after six hard fought matches, gained a second. George Multamaki (143), persevering valiantly late into the afternoon, also reached second place.

In the senior division, wily Rob Moore (136), fighting the most spectacular series of matches in his career, soundly defeated all opposition for an early championship in his weight class. The most strenuous effort of the day was exerted by technician Luciano Luciano (149.5), who after a tough fight, managed to conquer 38-year-old Werner Eder, a veteran of 20 years wrestling experience.

Toronto champions Park, Osadetz, Multamaki, Moore, and Luciano will travel to Vancouver for the Canadian freestyle titles later this spring. Greco-Roman champions Chris Preobrazenski and Mike Stanley will represent U of T at Canadian Greco-Roman finals next Sunday afternoon.

Vol. 95, No. 62
Fri. March 14, 1975

Don't forget The Varsity staff meeting 1 pm today, at which several important matters will be discussed, including how to conduct our desk staff elections. Added plus: meet the staff choice for editor. No flowers, please.

Today, we are saddened to announce the last Friday issue of the year. So it goes. However, there will be two more papers — one next Wednesday, and one the Wednesday after that. Still time for you to enter the pages of history, brothers and sisters.

And remember, the advertising deadline for a Wednesday paper is Friday at noon, so if you want to advertise next Wednesday, drop what you're doing and hustle over to The Varsity office tout de suite.

Barnes takes predicted SAC victory

By BOB BETTSON

SAC university commissioner Gord Barnes romped home to a 2,500 vote victory over his only rival Henry Malta in yesterday's SAC presidential elections, sweeping almost all colleges and faculties in the largest voter turnout in four years.

It was also an easy victory in what turned out to be a massive vote of support for the planned athletics complex.

At press time 5,745 students had voted in favor of the complex with only 700 opposed. 312 voters abstained.

However, students were split on the question of an athletics fee increase. 1,741 voted against any fee increase to cover operating costs, while 3,426 voted in favor of a $10 increase and 1,663 in favor of a $20 increase.

The referendum is binding on SAC because it gained more than the 25 percent turnout required from the almost 20,000 downtown SAC fees paying students, the main users of the building.

The turnout of just over 7,000 in the SAC presidential election was largely sparked by the athletics referendum.

But it was apparent the large abstention of 2,177 in the presidential race, compared to the Barnes-Harvey-Saidullah slates' 3,589 votes was caused by a lack of interest in the SAC election on the part of some supporters of the athletic complex. The turnout was the largest since the 1972 SAC elections when conservative engineer Eric Miglin defeated left-liberal incumbent Bob Spencer in a bitter election which attracted a record turnout of 10,000.

The Barnes slate was regarded by most observers as the successor to the left-liberal Kanowitch-Buckley ticket which won last year's election. But Barnes feels the absence of conservative opposition made the campaign result a foregone conclusion.

Vice-president-elect Michelle Harvey said it was hard to get people interested in the election because everyone thought the Barnes slate would have a certain victory.

Harvey felt the most important factor in the election was the slate's overall program which stressed political action on campus issues and strong services.

Barnes said the immediate top priorities will be lobbying for changes in the U of T act, getting the athletics complex going, and action on university cutbacks. He is the SAC representative on the Common Front of workers students, and faculty.

Vice-president elect S'ad Saidullah said the low turnout at Erindale was average and SAC would have to do more work on suburban campuses to involve students. He pointed out the two previous suburban vice-presidents had not served out their terms in office.

Barnes sees no major changes in the SAC budget for 1975-76 which will be presented at the joint meeting of incoming and outgoing councils on Wednesday March 26.

The same meeting will elect the SAC executive and Barnes says there will be a lot of "healthy competition" for executive posts, especially the prestigious university, communications and finance commissioners.

The slate was not discouraged by the high rate of abstention. "The lack of a large number of candidates was a large part of it," Barnes said.

Actually, his 3,589 votes made up 52 percent of votes cast compared to Seymour Kanowitch's 1,744 votes for 36 percent of the 3,100 votes, cast in last year's elections.

Barnes stressed teaching quality and opposition to university budget cutbacks but specified little in the way of action. He said last night he hopes SAC will start immediately planning policy and action proposals for next year's political campaigns.

Common front opposes gov't cutbacks policies

A mass meeting of campus workers, students and faculty members will be held on Wednesday, March 26, from noon until 2 pm, the Common Front decided last night.

The meeting will focus opposition against the provincial government's policies on university financing.

The Common Front — a coalition of campus workers, students and faculty members — decided Tuesday to shut down the university for an entire afternoon. However, after Common Front representatives spoke to President John Evans yesterday afternoon, they agreed a two-hour meeting would be acceptable.

Evans said he doesn't have the power to cancel classes, nor to completely close down the library and other campus services. But he is prepared to strongly recommend the involvement of faculty members and students.

Campus services can be cut back to minimal levels, he said, so that most, but not all, non-academic staff can attend the meeting.

The two-hour meeting will not have the public impact of closing the university, the Common Front realized, and it will restrict the amount of detailed discussion that can take place. But members of the steering committee agreed, in the words of one representative, "We don't want to focus on fighting Evans."

The different groups involved in the coalition agreed on a unified approach in planning the meeting. The meeting will focus on the adverse effects of the government's changing policies toward higher education.

First, the effects of the cutbacks on the quality of university education will be emphasized. These include larger class sizes, cutbacks of academic and non-academic staff, deterioration of scientific and lab equipment, deterioration of the university physical plant, and shortages of supplies.

A second area of concern is accessibility to university education.

Unless the provincial government spends more money on student aid, and more of that in the form of direct grants rather than loans, university education will continue to be available only to rich children.

At present, students relying on the Ontario Student Awards Plan (OSAP) are expected to survive on $32 a week.

Third, the meeting will focus on the necessity for equitable treatment of university staff, particularly in regard to wage increase. University staff are at present being paid substantially less than similar workers in commerce and industry. The Common Front also opposes increased workloads for university staff, many of whom are already overworked.

The Common Front stressed the importance of following up the meeting with practical programs to eliminate the above problems.

Soc students want to keep parity

By MARINA STRAUSS

The sociology department should work towards increased effectiveness of its present party governing structure rather than doing away with it, a sociology students' assessment committee report maintains.

The report is to be presented for approval to a meeting of sociology students today and submitted later this month to the department's legislative assembly.

The students' assessment committee was set up last month after department faculty members established a similar committee to review the present department structure.

Allen Listiak, Graduate Sociology Students' Association co-chairman and one of the eight graduate and undergraduate students on the committee, stressed the department must move in the opposite direction to that now being proposed by such soc professors as S. D. Clark.

Clark spearheaded the faculty reassessment committee's minority report — supported in a straw vote by faculty members — which proposes centralization of decision-making to the chairman and eliminating present legislative functions of the assembly. The majority report recommended retaining the legislative assembly's present form.

Listiak said it is imperative the department allow equal student-faculty representation as a means of achieving important goals.

These goals, Listiak said, include improving quality of curriculum and teaching, more student financing, better allocation and role of teaching assistants, improvement in first year introductory courses, and more space for students in the sociology Borden Building.

"The assembly must maintain its role as the chief decision-making body of the department," Listiak said. "Modifications, such as ways people are represented and increasing feedback to constituents to make it more representative, must also be investigated."

Listiak stressed that although parity was very important to students active in the department in achieving their goals, many feel some professors are now trying to channel energy away from pressing department problems by only discussing the parity issue.

Listiak noted, for example, the department needs to restructure its financial arrangements to eliminate present disparities.

"Many soc students, he noted, don't have the freedom to pursue their program without having to go outside the department to find support.

"Communication must be more open at both ends," Listiak emphasized, "especially at the top."

Bob Bryn, former Graduate Sociology Students' Association chairman and presently on the department's executive committee, also stressed the "problem of communication."

"There isn't a sufficient degree of democracy in the department," Bryn said. "It's a problem of democracy and of publicity."

Bryn cited the "communication gap" between the department's undergraduate curriculum committee and its staffing committee as a key example.

The curriculum committee, Bryn pointed out, has recommended more undergraduate courses in both family and educational sociology for the past two years because of increasing student demand for such courses.

However, the staffing selection committee, whose hiring choices are usually accepted by the chairman, has hired no new faculty members specializing in these areas, Bryn added.

Bryn said the department has had to import professors from the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and this year someone from Halifax to teach.

"The staffing committee should abide by curriculum committee recommendations," Bryn said.

He added a number of courses are retained year after year although there's no "groundswell" demand for them.

Bryn felt students would participate more in the department's governing structure "if the assembly was a really effective decision-making body. If its status was increased, students would want to participate."

Bryn said an "anticipatory fear" exists on the part of students that "if any major decisions are made, students wouldn't have a lot of say in them."

In theory, the department chairman has the power to overrule any decision made by the legislative assembly.

Sociology chairman Irving Zeitlin came under heavy fire last fall after it was revealed he had vetoed a department staffing selection committee's decision that Canadian sociologist John Seeley be hired.

Some department members argued Zeitlin's veto undermined the department's parity structure.

Bryn felt the department's decision on whether or not to retain the status quo legislative functions of the present assembly government will be "the real test of parity."

The Learning Machine

Members of the SAC executive met with U of T president John Evans Monday to try and persuade him of the need for a more open budgeting system in the university. But all they got was a promise that he would raise it at the next meeting of university deans and directors.

The administration has come under fire in recent years for keeping its budgeting process under needless secrecy, a practice The Varsity has fearlessly fought by publishing the budget before its declassification.

SAC president Seymour Kanowich said he felt it was important for budgeting to become open because "those affected by educational cutbacks — students — should have a say."

Chris Driscoll topped the polls by a landslide as he defeated fellow St. Michael's College student Elliott Milstein for president of the student union as he captured 402 of 533 votes cast.

With a turnout of slightly less than 25 percent of SMC students SAC services commissioner John Tuzyk and SAC rep Remus Mecius were re-elected to SAC with newcomers Maurice Daniels, Yves Robinson and John Brown also elected. The only loser was Marjan Glavak.

Tuzyk topped the polls with 268 votes in the election for the five SAC council positions. He is a betting favorite to return to the SAC executive and is rumored to have the inside track on the communications commission.

Driscoll ran for president last year but was defeated by Jim Maycock. The vice-president, Ellen Kaas, was acclaimed.

In the Scarborough College Student Council elections held last week, Russell Henderson defeated Scott Cavalier to become council president.

In other positions, Bruce Edwards won the vice-presidency while Jay Madsen captured the vice-presidency for part-time students.

The representatives are:
 o Second year — Dave Coggins and Brad Hinton (acclaimed).
 o Third year — Bill Warburton and Paul Caldwell.
 o Fourth year — Louie Quenet and J.A. Brehner (acclaimed).

The seven SAC reps are: Dave Watkinson, Bill Deneault, Bob Gibson, Marion Miles, Frances Olinann, Tom Clark and Lynne Farrell.

The part-time SAC reps are: Connie Zboch, Jay Madsen and Joy McNall.

McReavy not offered reinstatement

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Fired storekeeper Paul McReavy was offered a job in the zoology building, but he was refused reinstatement to his old job by zoology associate chairman D.F. Metrick yesterday.

Metrick's decision came after he and McReavy had met several times this week to see if differences between the two sides could be ironed out.

McReavy, a five-year employee at the Ramsay Wright zoological building, was fired in early January for what he said was union activity.

"I am disappointed by this offer and will refuse it, continuing to fight for my full reinstatement to the storeroom," the unemployed worker said.

"The job offer is a pretty obvious move to shunt me aside and to continue their opposition to storeroom unionization."

"It's an old game, and they keep making the same old moves. What they plan to do is use the job offer against me in arbitration so they can say I was just trying to cause trouble," McReavy said.

"I wasn't prepared to reinstate him because I felt the dismissal was justified," Metrick said.

Saying the department had "a file two inches thick on him," Metrick listed the reasons why he thought McReavy was justifiably dismissed: lack of communication with his superiors, "abysmal" attendance, poor time-keeping, and a lack of application to his work.

"I made Mr. McReavy this other offer because I thought he had to be put in a new environment where he could get a fresh start and grudges could be buried," Metrick said.

"I also feel there was a genuine chance he has been misled by the union as to precisely what being in the union meant," Metrick said.

A worker could be in the union and yet not be part of the collective agreement signed last September between the Service Employees Union, Local 1204 and the university, Metrick explained.

Metrick said it was a misunderstanding about unionization in the zoology building. He said he was not against it himself — "in many ways, it would simplify work with people here because then people would know where they stand."

He also said many of the zoology support staff, such as the animal care workers, were already unionized.

"I'm not in a position to say whether the storekeepers are unionized or not, as McReavy claims. That's up to the Ontario Labor Board to decide," Metrick said.

He denied that McReavy was fired for union activity, and that if he accepted the new position, he could still continue with his union involvement.

Metrick criticized McReavy for going outside proper channels, saying that if he hadn't, "McReavy would have been in my office Jan. 10 instead of only yesterday."

McReavy also charged that Metrick had learned from a support staff member that Metrick had held a special meeting of the section leaders yesterday to explain the department's view of the case.

McReavy said he could easily go back to work in the zoology storeroom although Metrick said he couldn't.

McReavy said his lawyer had checked with the Labor Board and found out that the job being offered was a unionized one in the zoology building.

"That would presumably be a job as caretaker or animal care worker. There's nothing wrong with these jobs, but what do they take me for — a quivering fool with Pavlovian responses to the carrot and the stick?"

"I refuse to clean cages or sweep floors just because the administration is in a jam: I just want my old job back. I don't want to be bought off," McReavy said.

McReavy said he will be following the next two steps in the university's grievance procedure, although it's possible they will merely lead to "procedural oblivion."

Residents still fight athletics building

By BOB BETTSON

While student, faculty and administration backers of the athletic complex celebrated their overwhelming victory last night in the athletics referendum, residents groups have vowed to continue the fight for changes in the massive building.

Sussex-Ulster ratepayers spokesman Martin Myers said the vote was "not surprising" but added residents' groups still hoped to scale down the building through the use of the density bylaw which restricts coverage on the site.

Myers said it would be "unfortunate" to build the complex as it is now because the scale of facilities proposed is not needed for student recreation, but for athletic competition.

Jack Dimond, special assistant to vice-president Jill Conway, said the vote was "encouraging." "The people have spoken," he proclaimed.

Dimond said the university would still have to get an exemption from City Council and gain approval of U of T president John Evans to get working drawings before putting out construction tenders in September.

Dimond said construction could start at the earliest in December of this year and open in the fall of 1977. This is based on the assumption there are no further delays in the process.

Dimond was also pleased about the student vote in favor of a fee increase. He said the administration can't tell how much and when any fee increase would take place for the operating budget of the new complex.

He said residents' groups were "not realistic" in demanding changes in the design of the complex because the maintenance of the major facilities is necessary.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley was jubilant. "We've got a binding referendum which shows tremendous support for the complex."

"It's now up to SAC to go all out to get the building built as soon as possible," Buckley said. "The university knows students believe in the complex."

"We're asking the university to put in (in funding) at least what students are putting in," he added.

SAC plans to make a brief in favor of the university's exemption from the zoning bylaw covering the site density.

Buckley pointed out any fee increases supported by students would not be implemented until after a proposed budget went before the new athletic directorate which has a student majority.

Newly elected SAC president Gord Barnes was also happy with the results. He said any design changes would probably have to be resolved between the university and the city.

PROFS HOLD UNION WORKSHOP

Do university professors need a union to represent them? Do they want one?

These questions will be discussed at a meeting sponsored by the Faculty Reform Caucus Wednesday.

The meeting, entitled Professors' Unions: How, Why — and Whether, will be held at 3:10 pm at Sydney Smith Hall, Room 2110. The caucus invites all U of T faculty members to attend.

Several individuals will be on hand to act as resource people for the discussion, including:

o Jill Vickers, president of the academic staff association at Carleton University where a campaign for union certification is currently under way;

o Ross Rachar, master of Fanshawe College in London and chairman of the negotiating team representing unionized teachers at Ontario's colleges of applied arts and technology;

o Ken Bryden, U of T political economy professor and a member of the U of T Faculty Association committee looking into the question of collective bargaining.

Boo!

Council needs strong student reps

Folklore has it that candidates in an election who receive a Varsity endorsement get the kiss of death, which should be some sort of mild incentive for us to stop playing favorites.

However, it is imperative that the best possible student representatives be elected to the Governing Council this year, a year of educational cutbacks in which students' interests are more likely to be threatened than ever before. Therefore, we urge our readers to take their vote in the Governing Council elections most seriously, and to pick strong candidates who will fight hard to protect academic quality and student services, and prevent any attempts to raise student fees.

In the arts and science constituency, two candidates — Brad Nixon and Michael Sabia — stand head and shoulders above the others.

Brad Nixon has taken a firm stand on all the relevant issues, and has demonstrated his capability both as chairman of the working group on non-academic discipline, and as a member of the important Governing Council curriculum and standards subcommittee. We give him our unqualified support.

Michael Sabia, this year's SAC communications commissioner, is a skilled politician who can handle himself well in debate, and who has a clear understanding of what the issues are and how to achieve results. However, we feel some of his statements about the Common Front representing "gangland politics" should not go unchallenged. But while he displays a suspicious streak of conservatism, he is clearly worthy of a seat.

Of the other five candidates in this constituency, three we just cannot take seriously. Raycroft Ellis, Irving Handler and John Parker are either so uninformed or so out to lunch on all the important issues that it would be simply irresponsible to vote for any of them. Of the two others, it may be all very well for Tim Bermingham to mouth platitudes about "rationality and compromise", but that is exactly what is not needed next year. If students are to be screwed, it makes no difference whether it is done by gentlemen or by rogues. They need a firm voice which will not be seduced by whispers of "come and be rational with us."

To an extent, the same holds true for Scarborough president John O'Donohue, who leaves behind him a student council strewn with as many bodies as the battlefield set from an Errol Flynn movie. O'Donohue says he will lobby, and cut through the red tape, but we think he is seriously overestimating his capabilities. Moreover, he displays very little concern for the preservation of campus services, and concentrates too heavily on the issue of academic grading.

In the professional constituency, The Varsity endorses Tim Buckley and Howie Levitt.

SAC vice-president and engineering rep Tim Buckley is clearly worthy of a seat (having decided not to seek the SAC presidency). He has worked capably and conscientiously in the area of student services this year, and is well aware of the dimensions of the financial problems the university faces. He also receives our unqualified support.

Law student Howie Levitt sat on the Governing Council last year, and his experience with the machinations of council, plus his consistently progressive stand make him preferable to the other three candidates in the constituency, although we would prefer to see a new face if there were one we would support.

Medical student John Floras appears to be talking tough on the major issues, but takes a very wishy-washy stand on the major issues of educational reform. The two other candidates, Robert Skolnick and Doug Gerhart, have really not put forward any platform on the important issues, and can't be seriously considered.

Discussions of part time and graduate students are mostly academic, since both part-time candidates and one graduate rep have been acclaimed; and choosing between Kurt Loeb and Byron Wall for the remaining graduate seat seems to us like a choice between blandness and mediocrity.

In the faculty constituencies, the usual dismal crop is brightened by the presence of political economy professor Meyer Brownstone and medical professor Jeremy Carver, both of whom display a strong sense of the need for educational reform, and of the university's responsibility to the community. They deserve to be elected to clear the air of the musty smell of the corpses who presently grace the faculty seats.

All in all, some important choices to be made, and some good candidates to be elected. We urge our readers to elect candidates who are going to take a strong stand to protect student rights. Otherwise, students will soon find cheap and accessible education itself becoming folklore.

Prof's attitude
'terrifying'

For Prof. Boddington recommends first that "we" by which she plainly means the faculty — listen to the instructor teach. A spot check by a colleague will thus establish the "real" nature of the experience which has perhaps been misperceived by those large numbers of students who have undergone it for so long.

Secondly, Prof. Boddington recommends that the students themselves be investigated. Apparently each person in the class will be scrutinized for evidence of his/her motivation and perceptiveness. Meanwhile nobody is scrutinizing the faculty for evidence of their perceptiveness or the purity of their motives.

Prof. Boddington is surely clutching at statistical straws when she writes, "Five-sevenths of professor X's class found him generally inadequate. Why aren't we told about the rest, who presumably did not find him inadequate?"

All evidence indicates that, when it comes right down to paper, students are extremely reluctant to designate their professors as anything less than "adequate". Professors are accredited as intelligent; they hold positions of status and authority; they are therefore given the benefit of the doubt by students who, on the whole, grade in a middle zone and avoid extremes.

My own experience, here has borne this out. Having taught university at all levels, I am spending this year, for a change of field, being taught. Most of my classes have been good; some have been excellent; one was abysmal. I was amazed at the patience of the students in that class, and at their reluctance to express more than tired disillusionment when what the situation called for was something like outrage.

It is this kind of student that is representative of the student body, not (as Prof. Boddington realizes) the militant author of the SAC article. So when five-sevenths of a class made up of this kind of student condemns professor X as inadequate, it is time to sit up and take notice.

Prof. Boddington says she would be "terrified" to have anyone like the SAC author on a tenure committee.

I think she's fairly terrifying herself.

Students support Levitt's work

We find Mrs. Russell and Mrs. Jamieson's letter disputing Howard Levitt's including at the bottom of the long list of university committees on which he has served, that he wrote a working paper for the Task Force on Non-Academic Females both puzzling and objectionable.

The fact that they may consider certain of his recommendations "rosy tinted" seems to be no reason to dispute his right to mention the report. In fact, the recommendations were sufficiently serious and realistic that not only did the Globe and Mail devote one-half page of favorable comment to them but the Task Force itself has adopted about three-quarters of these recommendations.

Their letter did not contribute to any of the substantive issues which have been raised by Mr. Levitt, the Globe and Mail and The Varsity in response to the Committee's activities.

One should have suspected that, as members of the committee, Mrs. Russell and Mrs. Jamieson would be pleased to receive voluntary and extensive reports on the problems of non-academic women in the University, despite their personal reactions to the recommendations.

Learn from Innis on tenure issue

Harold Innis noted that institutions of civilization exhibit a bias either towards duration in time or towards extension in space.

The bias towards either time or space influences the values and concerns of the institutions. Institutions with a linear temporal bias emphasize tradition, authority and cohesion to secure duration. Institutions with a spatial bias concentrate on effectiveness, innovation and the use of coercion to secure influence.

The danger of temporal bias is stagnation, while the danger of spatial bias is a neglect of duration. It is apparent that a balancing of biases must occur if a civilization is to maintain its vitality and creativity.

The institution of tenure is temporal in its bias. It emphasizes tradition, authority and cohesion. To claim that tenure encourages innovative or creative thought is to disregard the lessons of history.

There is no question that tenure stifles creativity. There is a question as to whether the members of the Governing Council will ever realize that their thoughts are contaminated by the growing temporal imbalance of our culture.

Professor Harold Innis spent his professional career here at the University of Toronto. Will the university choose not to apply the results of his work?

1975-76 Chairman,

Need academics, not athletics

It is most ironic that amidst the constrained financial situation we find ourselves in today, amidst the gloom caused by government cutbacks and dwindling funds, the students were yesterday asked to give their show of support for a multi-million dollar athletic complex.

"Ah yes," you retort, "but Toronto has the fewest number of square feet of athletic facilities per person of any Ontario university." Granted, this new complex would provide a much needed service to the campus — as well as to "the community."

However, my fellow collegians, we must be reminded of the importance of priorities. In this era of fewer resources, of more expensive programmes, we are all going to have to make more difficult choices as to what we can and cannot afford.

Either we choose between the shortest line-ups at the "Reserve Book" counter, or the shortest line-ups for the Squash Courts. But we cannot expect an already burdened taxpayer and an already strapped university administration to cater to all our needs and tastes. Living today consists of making choices — admittedly tough ones — between alternative ends.

Will our new Students' Administrative Council forfeit some of its popularity to make these tough choices between policy pursuits and program proposals? Or shall it continue to clamour for a bigger share of the pie, along with other sectors of society? The coming year is their's to determine.

More Governing Council hopefuls for your viewing pleasure

Birmingham says he sees both sides

Third year humanities student Tim Birmingham says he has a lot to offer students in his fight for a Governing Council seat in the arts and science constituency, and he aims to improve the credibility of students on council.

Birmingham says he is anxious to see both sides of the issues, and wants to make sure all issues are discussed with reason, and no more. He thinks, for example, the United Front between students, faculty and workers to fight university budget cutbacks is "a step backwards" since he sees the possibility of it degenerating into conflict.

Birmingham says he doesn't "think anything is worth fighting for," and disputes the claim that students achieved access to the stacks of the Robarts library only by occupying Simcoe Hall. He says he will stick to the use of reason.

Birmingham says he "can't condone a rise in student fees," and thinks it would be a "terrific victory to keep fees at their present level, and a 'satisfactory achievement' to keep them in line with the cost of living."

However, Birmingham says he would like to see a "more rigorous policing of OSAP" and does not support the eventual abolition of tuition fees.

Birmingham says it is important to keep the flow of money to campus services in the face of the cutbacks, and thinks several wasteful expenditures — such as the media centre and the high school liaison program — should be cut out.

He suggests more use of the semester system and of the part-time students' Woodsworth College to alleviate the problem of budget cutbacks.

It would be a mistake, Birmingham believes, to pass on a high deficit to next year's inexperienced Governing Council, which has already degenerated to a "reaction to Simcoe Hall policies."

Birmingham believes there is a need for a non-academic discipline code, although he doesn't like the appearance of double jeopardy under the present code, and says it is important to treat faculty and students equally.

On the issue of tenure, he feels the whole process of tenure is not really necessary, and sees the dispute about student representation being resolved by the proposal to seat a non-voting observer.

The Varsity — Bob White

Candidate Birmingham says nothing is worth fighting for

Parker offers 'realistic attitude'

Victoria College student John Parker says he's offering students a "realistic attitude to the problems" the university faces, in his fight for a Governing Council seat in the arts and science constituency.

Parker says the university is getting a "more realistic level" of funding now from the provincial government, and that provincial grants in the 1960s represented a "spending delirium." Accordingly, he doesn't see much point in the university expecting to get more money from the provincial government.

In fact, says Parker, the budget cuts represent a "blessing in disguise", since the university will now be able to get rid of

"trivious" courses such as those on the science fiction novel or on film.

The university, Parker believes, is a place for professional faculties and traditional arts and science disciplines.

Parker, business manager for the engineering newspaper, The Toike Oike, says he feels the university is letting in too many people who aren't qualified to be here, which is "a crime to those who are here to work."

The second year student says cutbacks could be made in "non-critical" areas, and says he would investigate the possibility of longer class hours and higher loads for professors.

Parker says he wouldn't object to an increase in student fees, but that he "couldn't give a straight answer" on the level to which they should be raised.

He also says those who can afford to pay for their education should pay for it, although he "doesn't know how severely hurt most students are" by the current levels of student aid.

The Common Front between students, faculty and workers to fight university cutbacks is "counterproductive", since it represents "poor psychology" and will raise antagonism, Parker maintains.

The biggest problem the university faces internally, Parker believes, is a "lack of esprit", which he doesn't know how to bring about.

Does smiling John Parker sense political victory?

Handler says issue is cutbacks

Commerce and finance second year student Irving Handler says he's running for a Governing Council seat to "represent the majority of students" and to "present a sane alternative" to the left and right wing.

However, he won't say who the left and right wing candidates are, or what stances represent left and right wing positions.

Handler thinks the main issue in the campaign is budget cuts, and says it's his job to make sure students' share of a shrinking budget is protected.

The provincial government, he says, should increase its previous level of funding by the rate of inflation, but he doesn't think the taxpayers would stand for any higher grants.

Teaching quality and academic standards, Handler maintains, must be protected, but not by limiting enrollment. "Something's got to give," he says.

The Varsity — Bob Beitson

Irving Handler says he's a sane alternative to extremes.

O'Donohue wants better student deal

Scarborough College Student Council president John O'Donohue says he's running for an arts and science seat on Governing Council to give students a better deal academically.

O'Donohue says he is concerned there are discrepancies between the marks students are getting in different courses, and feels it important to fight attempts to normalize the average grade as a C.

U of T students, O'Donohue says, are academically superior to students in other universities, and deserve the As and Bs they are awarded. They should also receive preferential treatment in admission to U of T professional schools, he believes.

O'Donohue says he will "cut through the red tape" of Governing Council by doing a lot of lobbying before meetings and "really hustle" for student interests.

O'Donohue says the present budget cuts are a bad thing, but feels they are inevitable. He wants to prevent increases in staff-student ratio — in fact, he wants to decrease the ratio, although he has no idea how — and he would support cuts in the maintenance budget and the laying off of support staff.

Another area O'Donohue would support is the proposed Phase III construction at Scarborough College, which he says is in dire need of proper library facilities. The administration, says O'Donohue, has been "grossly negligent" in this regard.

O'Donohue feels there has been "poor quality" student representation up to now, due to the excessive bureaucracy which prevents the achievement of results.

Discipline, O'Donohue feels, should not be one of his priorities, nor should parity. In fact, he says, it would be "irresponsible" to fight for parity since it doesn't mean that much to the student body.

As for tenure, O'Donohue says, "Abolish it", and advocates the signing of limited-term contracts.

Services, O'Donohue feels, are "not a big issue," although he does support construction of the athletics complex and improved food service. O'Donohue says he is "the best man" for Governing Council. "I'm a safe bet," he adds.

O'Donohue criticized The Varsity for its coverage of Scarborough College this year, saying it has concentrated on responding to the "lunatic fringe."

U of T scholars deserve their high marks, O'Donohue believes.

Toronto Citizen to publish again

The Toronto Citizen, a small but important bi-weekly newspaper which advocated citizen participation in city politics, may be publishing again by September.

The paper folded late in September, 1974 after a bitter labor-management dispute involving the Citizen's staff and the paper's board of directors headed by Ward 7 alderman John Sewell.

In December, the Citizen was sold for $7,500 by the board to a partnership headed by Toronto lawyer and former Ward 7 alderman Karl Jaffary.

Since then, Jaffary has been attempting to raise about a quarter of a million dollars to establish a firm financial base for a new, weekly Citizen.

The Metro Labor Council and "a large group of Toronto businessmen and developers" have been approached as potential funders for the paper, according to members of the present partnership contacted by The Varsity.

Jaffary is out of town until late March, and will be reporting to the partnership on the financial status of the paper at the end of the month.

"We're still hopeful, although things haven't come together as quickly as we had expected," said Ellen Moorhouse, former Citizen editor and member of the current partnership.

But Arnold Amber, another member of the partnership, said, "If Jaffary doesn't come up with the money . . . strenuous efforts will be made to get the paper going again by September."

Greenpeace committee against world whale killing

Toronto Greenpeace Committee spokesman Paul Evitts has strong feelings about the massacre of the world's remaining whales by Japanese and Russian whaling fleets.

"We believe whales are a form of life with the same level of intelligence as human beings," Evitts told The Varsity. "Killing them off amounts to mass murder, it amounts to genocide."

The committee will be sponsoring a benefit at A Space, 85 St. Nicholas St. on Sunday at 8:30 pm to support the Greenpeace V Save the Whales campaign. Admission will be $2 for students.

This summer, Greenpeace V will launch a boat from Vancouver in an attempt to disrupt the activities of Japanese and Russian whaling fleets off the Aleutian islands.

Volunteers manning small rubberized craft will interfere with the catch, putting themselves between the factory ships and the whales.

Simultaneously, other members of the Greenpeace project will be at the International Whaling Commission's meetings in London, England, trying to build support for the 10-year moratorium on whale slaughter, supported by the 1972 UN conference on the human environment.

Summer school to research peace

Interested in world peace?

The Canadian Peace Research Institute (CPRI) is offering two summer school courses, June 14 to July 4 and Aug. 2-22, focussing on peace and the world community.

Students will consider such topics as the relations between behavior, ideology and personality, theories and practices of resistance and revolution, world government, and moral development and non-violence.

Resource people for the sessions include Canadian and American academics, CPRI members and military spokespeople.

The programs will take place on Grindstone Island in rural Ontario, about 50 miles from Ottawa, on a "secluded and quiet forested island with no roads or vehicles, abundant wildlife and aquatic life and accessible only to summer school participants," the institute says in a press release.

Cost for the course is $252.

Spadina expressway foes fight construction move

By MATHILDE VERHULST

Anti-Spadina Expressway forces are again mounting an intensive campaign in reaction to last month's Metro Council decision to begin construction of the disputed Spadina Expressway and Highway 400.

The Citizen's Transportation Coalition, formed immediately after council ratified the motion to complete the building of the expressways, is holding its first of several fund-raising rallies next Thursday at Convocation Hall.

The CTC was formed three weeks ago when the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Association (CORRA) and other residents and ratepayers' groups in the city and the west end agreed to organize the new Stop the Expressway campaign. U of T urban sociologist Alan Powell, who chaired the first Stop the Spadina Expressway Committee in 1969-1970, said the rally at Con Hall will be "a hybrid concert and benefit" to raise campaign money.

Canadian author and urban critic Jane Jacobs and Ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughn are slated to join Powell as speakers at the benefit.

Powell criticized the completion of the Spadina Expressway, saying it was "based on completely thoughtless land-use planning."

"It's the most expensive, destructive, most unjust and most environmentally unsound way of moving people around the city during rush hours," he said.

"The long-range consequence of a commitment to car-centred planning is a city like Los Angeles," he added.

Powell said the "most tragic form of destruction" the expressways would bring "is the destruction of the urban community and economic networks that sustain city life."

Powell, advocating diversified city planning, said this de-centralizing means a planning of other "cores within the Metro area," in areas such as Scarborough and Mississauga.

He said the oldest forms of public transportation, such as streetcars, are the "best and the least expensive."

"All the hardware is already here," he said, we only "need new types of social arrangements."

Powell cited "attractive staggered working hours" as a means of relieving the city core of rush hour congestion, adding employees' freedom to choose their own work hours should be part of the employment statutes.

He also said making drivers pay to use Toronto roads during rush hour period and encouraging car-pools would help to keep congestion during these peak periods at a minimum.

Calling the TTC decision to raise fares "absolute lunacy" Powell said the public transit should be viewed as "a public utility, not as a profit-making corporate capitalist enterprise."

He said the capital to pay for public transit "should come directly from the public tax purse."

He added these social arrangements "alone can be rapidly implemented" and expressed confidence they would be "widely accepted by the public."

Construction of the Spadina Expressway, Powell said, would detrimentally effect the university cutting it off from the residential areas west of Spadina Avenue and turning it into an "inaccessible ghetto."

"It's no surprise that the latest anti-expressway movement has gained strong support from campus groups," he said.

Next Thursday evening's "Stop Spadina Benefit" begins at 8 pm at Con Hall and includes entertainment provided by the Open Circle Theatre and the Stringband under the $2 entrance fee.

Tom Forestall at Hart House - it's really realism

In spite of revolution upon revolution in art, even today realism still creates the broadest basis for appeal. Andrew Wyeth, who led the resurgence of this style is by far the most popular living painter in America today. Paul Deval's book "High Realism in Canada" continues to be one of the best-selling books of Canadian art.

Familiar images have an intrinsic appeal — they immediately allow for sympathetic identification with the subject matter. Where this tends towards nostalgia and sentimentality, realism has undergone heavy criticism by formal purists, who deny the inexhaustible vitality of representative painting and the ability of the artist to create dynamic and exciting compositions from real subject matter.

Even so, realism has suffered in this century from the high priests of the art world who have chosen abstract art as the point to which all progressive development necessarily lends. During the years when to be avant-garde was essential to recognition, realism was regarded as an impediment and a mark of inferior conception.

What seems to be true of the realism which has claimed so much recent attention is how often it incorporates an almost visionary quality which adds a significant dimension to the mere surface rendering of nature. After all, although a convincing representation of reality in painting is a marvellous accomplishment, for well over a century the discovery of photography has led artists further and further away from realism to experiment with radically new possibilities.

Contemporary realism is often referred to as 'magic realism'. Unlike the surrealism of Magritte and Dalí which uses illusionism to portray the fantastic, 'magic realism' depicts plausible, even familiar, scenes but in such a way as to make them appear extraordinary and sometimes startling.

The work of Tom Forestall now on display in the Hart House gallery is part of the new realism. Forestall is a Nova Scotia painter who was once the pupil of Alex Colville, perhaps the most well-known of the Canadian realists. Forestall's work was ignored for some years when abstract and pop art held all the attention of galleries and critics, but in the last ten years he has achieved wide recognition and has been able to devote himself to painting full time.

The egg tempera technique he uses to achieve the characteristic precision and luminosity is meticulous and time consuming.

No one need have any doubt about a child's ability to imitate Tom Forestall's work. Long hours of observation and detailed labour have obviously gone into these paintings. The paintings are accompanied by preliminary sketches and watercolours which provide some understanding of the development behind the finished product. They also show the painter's rapt absorption with his subject matter and his love of nature. One wonders how conscious he was at the time of recording his pencilled comments for posterity, but at any rate they are there and give an exciting insight into the creative process.

The artist expresses his excitement coming upon a frozen pool in the forest in which leaves and twigs were caught beneath the ice. He writes on his sketch that this is "something I can never say in words and can only try to say in paint in the studio." The final painting "Frozen Under" expresses the magic of his discovery in carefully rendered realistic detail.

Forestall's paintings are almost exclusively done on white gessoed panels of different shapes — triangles, rhomboids, quadrate, trifolds and ovals, all of which are cut from masonry. He prefers the challenge of working with these shapes, though he sees them not as avant-garde but as coming out of a long tradition, particularly that of Medieval and Renaissance church altarpieces.

Additional interest is provided by the actual bends in the canvases. The most successful example of this occurs in "Open Door" where the opening door is painted on an actual receding angle in the canvas and the frontal view shows a boy outside sitting on the step. This is spatially absorbing, just as traditional illusionistic depth perspective was used to draw the viewer into the world of the canvas and it is an interesting comment on the world of illusions as well. "Open Door" is a beautiful example of how realism is able to illuminate a familiar scene and make it magical.

The Orchestral Music of Debussy (Angel S-37064) with the French National Radio Orchestra under the direction of Jean Martinon is the first in a series devoted to Debussy's orchestral works.

The record's emphasis is on those Debussy piano pieces, transcribed for orchestra which have been "unaccountably neglected": 'Children's Corner', a suite written for his daughter in 1908, 'La Plus Que Lente', a waltz for orchestra written in 1910, 'Petite Suite', originally a piano duet completed in 1889, 'Danse', written in 1890, and finally, 'Berceuse Historique', written in 1915 in the middle of World War I and at a time when Debussy was having severe health problems.

The quality of the recording is fair but the sound produced is a little too expansive and enveloping. In several of the selections, one could hear pages being turned.

Debussy's music is revolutionary in that he assimilated the whole body of Western music that had preceded him, making the whole tone scale integral to the melody. His harmony was also novel (unresolved ninths and sevenths, use of eleventh and thirteenth chords etc.)

Debussy felt the intense need to create a musical idiom of his own opposed to that of Wagner, who was very much in vogue in the Paris of the 1880's. He did this as much through his novel conceptions of harmony and melody as through his exploitation of the peculiar tone qualities of each individual instrument.

But I found it very hard at first to accept the peculiar tone colour of the French orchestra in this recording; the strings and woodwinds have an incredibly muted quality about them. There seems to be an overall blurring of the individual instruments' tone colour and consequently, a muddy sound and lack of vitality or crispness on the part of the orchestra. After listening to the record a few times however, I came to the conclusion that this "velvet" sound is very appropriate to an interpretation of a composer as lyrical as Debussy. But it does fall short in those moments of great musical intensity where a sense of dynamism is needed. The record is at its best when the lethargy of the selection matches the lethargy of the orchestra, as in 'Jimbo's Lullaby', a lullaby for an elephant contained in the 'Children's Corner' suite.

In 'Golliwog's Cake-Walk', a piece based on the exuberant rhythms of the cake-walk, a pre-fragtime dance, the orchestra flounders miserably with the percussion section failing to convey any sense of precise, neat vitality.

The record is sadly lacking in both vitality and subtlety.

No!

new dance technique

An innovative presentation at St. Mike's Woman's Day last Friday was Nadia Pavlychenko's Dance and Mind-Body Efficiency Workshop.

Pavlychenko has studied physical education (at McGill) and Martha Graham's modern dance technique (at York), doing meditation on the side. The culmination of all this training has resulted in the development of a new "energy technique."

Pavlychenko stresses the idea that if ballet dancers can change their bodies to the degree they do, why cannot all people alter their body to achieve higher awareness and thus gain optimal use of their individual intelligence. She believes that training dancers to "pull up",

"pull in", "tighten" or "hold in" the stomach to achieve classical lines in the body is unnecessary.

Nadia's technique involves attaining a centre for movement in the body by drawing energy stored as tension from the muscles and raising it up the spine into the central nervous system. By letting go of as much physical tension as possible the body relaxes and falls with gravity.

Only the neck is pulled up or lifted off the spine. As a result of the relaxation of vital internal organs the dancer is much more versatile and flexible. The face remains relaxed, endurance is prolonged considerably and generally spontaneity and clarity of movement characterizes the dance style along with perfect classical alignment.

If comments following the workshop were any indication — "it makes a lot of sense", "quite a together woman", "she can't be more than twenty-three", "wish I had come earlier" — the premiere performance of Pavlychenko's company in June here in Toronto should be quite a success.

Is modern dancing dead and dull? worries reviewer

After yawning my way through both the Toronto Dance Theatre (TDT), and the Anna Wyman Dance Theatre, the question came to mind — is there any intelligent life left in modern dance?

The recent TDT show consisted of two older works, "Starscape" and "Phapsody in the Late Afternoon", and two equally disappointing new ones — "Field of Dreams" and "L'Assassin Menace."

"Starscape" relied on one gag — Peter Randazzo hooked to the fly floor above by four white cords — which was 'far out', but dull after the first two minutes.

"Rhapsody," to quote an audience member, was "just so tacky," a theatrical term that is all the vogue these days (meaning the green carpets, were dirty and stage hands could be seen and heard during the blackout).

Susan MacPherson and Patricia Beatty (the choreographer of the piece) danced well in their limited roles.

The tangerine costumes, attributed to MacPherson, were the best part of the dance.

"Field of Dreams" supposedly dealt with the sexual fantasies of women when their men are at war. The visual texture of this dance relied on elaborate use of scrims, with front and back lighting.

But, as usual, the dancing left much to be desired.

The stage illusions were thrown in for some reason which escaped even the devoutest of fans. But without practice, the dancers' hands were much slower than the audience's eyes, and the truth behind the magic stared us in the face. We watched in embarrassment.

"L'Assassin Menace,"

Randazzo's new surrealist work, gave the story behind a Rene Magritte painting of the same name.

"L'Assassin" is the best example of the TDT's self-destructive tendency to play to a clique of friends, relying on inside jokes that depend on personal knowledge of the company members for their punch.

Merle Salsberg (who 'got her hair cut!') was terrific as the victim, especially in her final frug as the angel. Here is a dancer!

The spontaneity and humour of her performance were equaled by only one dancer of the Anna Wyman troupe — this time the hairiest one (the dancers were not identified in their separate roles).

In "Dance is this . . . and this . . . and this," we laughed as he pitched ball, skipped rope and boxed.

The rest of the company might as well have been robots for all the human qualities evoked by their dancing.

Don't get me wrong, the dancers were slick technicians. The dances repeated in both evenings were identical to a step (if a bit wobbly on the second evening).

Contact with the audience, was completely missing. After giving such a tense performance, these people could benefit from Pavlychenko's new approach to dance.

The company also relied far too much on lighting, projected images and fancy costumes — silver boxes and cones, with dancers inside or twirling around in armless clown suits.

After a number was finished, it took all my concentration to remember what had just happened, since the electronic scores and choreography had such little relevance to anything.

Running around in circles, and doing second position plies and head swings are all fine exercises, but, like Laban efforts, just the dullest stuff to watch.

Much like modern art, modern dance does more to alienate its audience than to please it.

What ever happened to the idea of dance as a release of tension, the pleasure of moving to a rhythm?

These dancers have had any real dancing talent beaten out of them, until they no longer know what a down beat is, or what fun it is to land on one for a change.

The final say on the dismal state of dance came from the Wyman dancers, as they stared blankly at the audience in both curtain calls.

They seemed as bored with the whole scene as I was. As I am.

How much should you drink?

Everyone has a limit, and overindulgence of any sort — in work or play, food or drink — does nothing good for you.

Fortunately, most Canadians aren't interested in proving anything when it comes to beverage alcohol. They look on their favorite drink not as a challenge, but as a pleasure to be enjoyed in moderation.

How much should you drink? To most people that's no problem. But if it is a problem to someone you know, why not urge that person to see a physician. You may well be doing him or her a favor.

A Vision of Poetry
Early in the New Year

If, one winter someday, I compare my love

To a glinting silver dish
Containing filets of decaying fish flesh,

Excrements and mirror shards
Floating in blood, piss and nothingness;
You shall know me contrast-ascendant,
A self opaque as ice, a reality-poet,
A mincing touch-proper with torture's lush dove,

Who's torn her gentle entrails in regard to the bourgeoisie

And flutters, blind with pain, dying,
Spilling herself on lifeless streets
Warming the snow with stains of guilt and ease.

the first four poems are from The U.C. Review, the fifth from The Trinity University Review, (last year's issue), the last one from the first issue of this year's Acta Victoriana

we got literary reviews!

The most common act between consenting adults is literature, as one wit said recently. And the most common product of that act is the literary journal: certainly that seems to be the case on the U of T campus. Acta Victoriana, Writ, Rune, The Trinity
University Review, The U.C.
Review, all attest to the love of some individuals for literature and petty bureaucracy and the thrill ("unforgettable, unforgotten") of never really knowing if you have enough money to get your next issue off the ground.

A.J. Smith wrote once that "if you write apparently of the far north and the wild west and the picturesque east, reasonably well with allusions to the Canada
Goose, fir trees, maple leaves, snowshoes, northern lights, etc., the public grasps the fact that you are a Canadian poet, whose works are to be bought from the same patriotic motive that prompts the purchase of Eddy's matches or a Massey-Harris farm implement, and read along with Ralph Connor and Eaton's catalogues."

In like manner, literary journals — and the works they contain, on Loss of Virginity and Loss of Faith, chiefly, with references to sibling rivalries, mythological figures, other poets, and one's own joy, or despair, in living — are regarded as, if not an essential part of the university experience, at least a natural part, and they are tolerated as such.

Opinions differ about how valid a function they perform. (See review.) But even if they only show a lot of people that they are not poets but listeners and readers and appreciators, surely that is to be commended. And there are of course, the few writers who make it all seem worthwhile, from any point of view.

Acta Victoriana has already appeared once this year. (See review.) Another issue will appear in early April. It is left around Victoria College in open boxes, to be picked up by whoever wants it.

Two issues of the Trinity University Review will be appearing concurrently before the end of the month. C.P. Snow and Jacob Bronowski cast their shadows over the issue edited by Richard Lawrence: it is a diverse collection of articles by faculty and students on the relationship between the sciences and the arts. The other issue, edited by Ruta Paulaitis, is given over to poetry and graphics ("and maybe some prose"). It was originally centered on the theme of "The Faces of Love" but apparently this approach has been discarded.

It is distributed "within the college".

Very few copies of Innis
College's annual journal Writ (see review) are likely to be still available — unless you want to pay. There are a few copies at SCM for $1.25. Some copies were returned to SAC in recognition of its financial support and these were distributed free but are now long gone.

University College has given birth this year to an annual journal, The U.C. Review. Edited by Ian Dennis, Bob Cooper, Barb White and Randy Robertson, it's more obviously a student journal than some of the others — none of your Coach House Press
legerdemain here. See review.
It's being distributed free after this weekend at the UC Registrar's.

Rune, at St. Mike's, will be available in ten days or so, Sam Solecki, one of the editors told me. Rune is "an occasional journal", not committed to any definite publishing schedule. The upcoming issue will contain articles by Eli Mandel and Marshall McLuhan and an interview with Michael Ondaatje as well as a number of poems by U of T students and staff, and unknown poets from across Canada.

Descant, loosely based at St.
Mike's, is like Rune except that it appears regularly three times a year and it has pretensions. rr

we review literary r

I'm so little familiar with the writing community at this university that I fondly think there is one, just as there was in the past.

These days, it's mostly poetry that the small magazines publish; and in the things that are written and published today, the critic has been given no consideration. He is excessively vulnerable to a rejoinder of the artist that the critic has failed to understand the artist. Any evaluation from a critic inevitably exposes the man's own tastes, which he presents as reasonable, though not necessarily of universal validity.

So my opinion of the poems found here is not based on my personal preference for formalism, but by a subjective appreciation of their varying degrees of elegance of ideas and intensity of statement. In a vaguely sullen way all poetry is an advertisement for personality; and in return for bestowing my rapt attention on the poem, I bloody well expect the poet to match my ante.

Regrettably, much of the Acta poetry which is not outrightly inaccessible to the reader is mere marshmallow thinking disguised as words dramatically set apart from one another. Very little vigour of thought or brilliance of conceit is shown to us. No doubt if you were an undergraduate of Vic, you'd feel that you had received your money's worth.

The magazine is glossy, with several striking photographs and great expanses of white paper inside. This is not too satisfactory, considering the paucity of good material amongst the paucity of poems. Just a difference of paper-watcher's preference, that; but display is for the novel or the beautiful.
Even the type face is too airy for the sodden passions of the earthbound writing.

And what have we found to write about? It becomes tedious to find cosmic intensities in feeble orgasms. Rarely in the love poems presented here does any author explore the implications of his her relationship or the passions of the mind which are generated by the connection of bodies. Elegance of thought is lacking and a sabot-shod diction is constantly visible.
Two exceptions come to mind, both concerned with the observation of nature; one a serene translation from the Chinese, the other a piece by Olaf Pollman.

The second complaint is directed toward the lack of prose writing, perhaps due to space considerations. But the one short prose piece which is presented is easily one of the least inspired investigations into female behavior to be found this side of

The Place of the Skull

"On your left, ladies and gentlemen, Golgotha,"
There were, as they have said,
Few remains to be gathered:
A few telltale chips of rock,
Tattered pieces of cloth,
And a small wooden peg.
It seems this hallowed ground
Is quite ordinary.
Nothing to betray the details we expected.

Oh yes, there was the mountain
And, of course, the crack in the earth;
But did we come, with our shopping baskets,
Merely to take pictures
Merely to buy souvenirs
Merely to grovel in the dirt
Trying to search out and capture
Real crumbs of a miracle?
Sometimes I wonder
If, perhaps, the advertisements were wrong;
That the loud coarse voices of my fellow tourists
Were somehow in the wrong place
Obscuring some deeper mystery.
I had my picture taken
With some woman and her son from Nanterre
But when I looked at it
I determined
I was out of place.
I was so shaken with what I had found
That I felt guilty in the sun.
My fellow travellers had found
An assortment of items:
A suggestive splinter
Several unusual silver coins
The remains of a paper cup
And reassurance.
All I had found were clumps of red earth
And starving dirty beggars;
Nothing to grasp hold of like silver and gold.
No, it was not what I expected.
The special lights
The slick guides
The neon signs . . .
It was too much like home to be
This place, this — this place.
As I returned to the bus
Silently I pondered my dismay
Hearing an anguished voice murmuring;
"Eli, eli lama sabachthani."

reviews!

Pamela. Acta's first issue of the year makes only miniscule points and its voices are too often strident.

By comparison, Writ Six is filled with meaty writing, although it draws heavily on out-of-town writers. The most compelling work in this thicker, prose-loaded magazine is a story out of San Fran about a lonely 37-year-old woman's thoughts on resignation. To enjoy a contemporary, jocular, and genuine work (though not of art) read McGoogan's "Doing It", in which Our Hero is shown trekking out west with zero dollars and then returning to the squalid realities of living in a suburban highrise. For the more squeamish, there is a fine poem about the Robarts Complex.

Writ Six is jammed with good writing, things that are less easy to reject out of hand than the delicate exoskeletal poetry of Acta. No twenty-minute fly-past will complete your understanding of it.

And now for a word from Dr. Johnson's coffee-house London. Hot off the press, still in unbound sheets when I saw it, is the U.C. Review. This looks like a very college-y sort of paper, with photos and graphics of the local landscape, but its content escapes the sappiness that its format suggests. The emphasis has been equally divided between prose and verse, and as well one of the editors had the courage to add an introduction that is part editorial, part apologia pro vita sua. He draws the useful distinction between amateur and serious writers; but also makes the invidious distinction that Visions of Self are not as trustworthy as Realities of Self. In some sense his words are a warning of what a poorly-edited journal can become but his poetry and prose far outweigh his critical judgements, and are what give him the right to make criticism. (How far this puts me out on my limb, I'm quite aware. But I don't like that put-down implied in the phrase 'legitimate writer!')

The U.C. Review has announced its intention of continuing as a forum for the budding stable of writers at U.C. Such a course seems justified. I found in this paper enough lyricism to keep me warm for several weeks. (Not that there aren't emotional cripples prowling its pages, and enough pretensions to staff most academic common rooms.)

In particular I respect the poetry of Janice Kulyk-Keefe. Striking images and well-chosen words are profusely found. Her technique seems to be to use familiar words to describe ordinary but significant events, in such a way that the expected word never materializes but is contrasted to the description actually used, producing a taut newness of perception. In such writing, each word glides forth to be independently savoured.

Ian Dennis, who also exercised an editorial function, has several thought-provoking poems which function through allusions to other types of poetry than those he intends to write. And Olaf Pollman provides further examples of his short-line meditations.

The prose section might as well be subtitled, "How We First Lay Together", since all the heroes/heroines seem to undergo some ritual of passage. Dennis' interlude "Romance of the Plastic Rose" is one of the most satisfying narrative erotic pieces I've recently seen, unabashed by its own tenderness. But for contrast there is an interesting though slackly-written put-down of student activists on a campus that must have heard of the Banfield Incident.

One last, interesting thing: from comparing all three of these magazines, some of these people may write only because they're bored; but at least some are in earnest about the act of writing as a conscious art. Some writers appear on this circuit regularly, polishing themselves before breaking into what we consider the bigger leagues, Canadian Forum and the like. Student magazines on campus are not bad reading, are at times inspiring. Still, I sometimes have my doubts as to how many of these writers will be part of our future literary life, or rather, whether the sort of writing they will be attempting in a few years will be worth doing.

U.C. REVIEW

theatre

Noel Coward in Two Keys
O'Keefe Centre

It was a fascinating anthropological experience to sit in the front stalls of the O'Keefe for Noel Coward in Two Keys. Rank upon rank of black jersey silk we sat, giving off the distinctive tribal odour of Chanel No. 5, ready and willing to be amused. And we were — at least for a while. Nice sets, each a "suite in a luxurious Swiss hotel" — just like home in the Manulife Centre, nice characters — just like us only a trifle richer, wittier and more be-titled, nice jokes, nice costumes (mostly jersey silk) and nice actors, experienced, at ease with us, almost casual on stage.

Then suddenly, half way through the second play after a lengthy meal during which several glasses of what looked suspiciously like cold tea were duly swallowed, this chap Perry was mentioned. Horror of horrors, Noel Coward was getting serious! A stoney silence descended on the faithful as these very competent actors did their best with a lumpy aberration.

Just a Song at Twilight is an odd play. It breathes sincerity; in fact, I suspect that the first little bit of fluff was turned out merely as a means of controlling the feelings released in the second play. But except for the fact that the protagonist is homosexual, the plot is utterly old-fashioned, pure Pinero-style problem play. Embittered former mistress threatens to publish eminent author's seamy past but is dissuaded in an eloquent appeal by author's remarkably loyal wife. It is rather sad to witness a playwright who has a totally distinctive comic style tumble into a cliché-infested slough as soon as he attempts another genre.

After a considerable time (Twilight was twice as long as the curtain raiser), the play ground to its climax. Hugo, clutching his love letters to Perry, held his breath in the throes of remorse, and turned such a violent crimson that I was sure he'd explode and end it all. It was a nice little touch of physical dexterity, but I think most of the faithful missed it. The nice old gentleman sitting beside me was fast asleep anyway.

The Real Inspector Hound
Black Comedy
Colonnade Theatre
Toronto Truck Theatre

Let me make it quite clear at the beginning that I like The Real Inspector Hound, but I'm not so keen on Black Comedy. The joke just goes on too damn long, like those awful Carry On films. Once you've got the point that dark is light and light is dark, and that no one can "see" anyone else on stage and once the whole thing is boiling away like a Feydeau farce in a busy railway station, well, it all gets pretty silly. "Drearypegs", to quote the bright young thing in the play with the Boyfriend voice.

Having got that straight, let me say that the Truck Theatre's production does have its moments, mostly in the first play. Tim Forte's nasal snigger was one of the choicest nasal sniggers yet to slither across the boards. Virginia Reh also gave a nicely mannered performance as the ghastly Felicity. Like the rest of the cast, she seemed happier in a totally unrealistic role. The second play treats very dicey ground between farce and situation comedy. The characters have to be a teensy bit believable, and in this production they looked and sounded all wrong.

Now, I know this is Truck Theatre, and I don't want to demand the impossible, but the company does present itself in a professional-looking theatre, with professional-looking biographies in the programme, and it certainly charges professional prices to get in, so I don't think one should have to make allowances for a relentlessly shabby set, and amateur sloppiness from the performers. I found it virtually impossible to hear some of the actors, and it is irritating to miss one's favourite lines.

As Birdboot might say, The Truck Theatre exists. It produces plays at the Colonnade. That is undeniable. "Je suis" it announces to the Toronto public — "ergo sum". But is that enough? I think we are entitled to ask...

Hewlett-Packard introduces a smaller uncompromising calculator: the HP-21 Scientific.

$159.00*

Now $159.00* buys:

More power than our HP-35. 32 pre-programmed functions and operations vs. 22 for our HP-35. The HP-21 performs all log and trig functions, the latter in radians or degrees. It's our only calculator short of the HP-45 that lets you:

- convert polar to rectangular coordinates, and back again ($\rightarrow P, \rightarrow R$);
- do full register arithmetic ($M+, M-, M \times, M \div$);
- calculate a common antilog (10^x) with a single keystroke.

The HP-21 also performs all basic data manipulations ($1/x, y^x, \sqrt{x}, \pi$) and executes all pre-programmed functions in one second or less. In sum, it's designed to solve tomorrow's problems as well as today's.

Smaller size. 6 ounces vs. 9 ounces for our HP-35.

Full display formatting. The display key (DSP) lets you choose between fixed decimal and scientific notation and lets you control the number of places displayed. (The HP-21 always uses all 10 digits internally.)

If a number is too large or small for fixed decimal display, the HP-21 switches automatically to scientific. It never confuses a smaller number with zero.

Finally, if you give the HP-21 an impossible instruction, the Display spells E-r-r-o-r.

RPN logic system. Here's what this unique logic system means for you:

- You can evaluate any expression without copying parentheses, worrying about hierarchies or re-structuring beforehand.
- You can solve all problems your way—the way you now use when you use a slide rule.
- You solve all problems—no matter how complex—one step at a time. You never work with more than two numbers at once.
- You see all intermediate answers immediately. The HP-21 executes each function immediately after you press the function key.
- You can easily backtrack when you err. The HP-21 performs all operations sequentially.

- You can re-use numbers without re-entering them. The HP-21 becomes your scratch pad.

HP quality craftsmanship. One reason Nobel Prize winners, astronauts, conquerors of Everest, America's Cup navigators and over 500,000 other professionals own H-P calculators.

Your bookstore will give you a demonstration today. Challenge our new HP-21 with your problems. See for yourself how much performance $159.00* can buy. If your bookstore doesn't have the HP-21 yet, call your local Hewlett-Packard sales office for the name of a dealer who does.

In Celebration fine study of family

It is perhaps indicative of the political and cultural changes taking place in Britain that a film like 'In Celebration', a sensitive and compassionate portrait of the ambiguity and agony inherent in the life of a British working-class family, can presumably find a mass audience.

Lindsay Anderson and David Storey offer a film of a family which for years has secretly buried its anxieties and frustrations.

And, then, coming together for the parents' 40th wedding anniversary, they allow this hidden undercurrent of anxiety to grow into an open, violent tension as the family emotionally tears itself apart.

Storey has said that the deepest concern of his work centers on "the man who finds himself cut off from his environment." In the case of "In Celebration", we are presented with three brothers who are cut off from their environment, the life of the working-class.

The brothers, one a smug, sexually insecure corporation negotiator, another an artist who is "not interested in art" and the last a deeply disturbed teacher who writes unfinished novels about the evils of "modern life", represent the tragic result of the illusion of the Western working-class that it is possible for their children to "make it", to escape a "life lived in little cells like goats."

"In Celebration" explores a theme which has been rarely approached; it explores the human cost of this attempt to escape one's class even when the opportunities for economic success are present.

The burden of exposing the illusions and lies that the family has been living falls to Andrew, a role played brilliantly by Alan Bates who captures that ironic flippancy which often serves to mask a deeply wounded psyche.

Andrew unrelentingly probes the lost memories and desires of his family in order to force them to look clearly at their situation.

Andrew's familial isolation as a young child is symbolic of his forced exile from the reality of his environment, that is, from the working-class, which gives rise to this highly educated man saying that he is "equipped only to be a worker in the pits."

Andrew spitefully tears at his mother, a former student of "human hygiene", who "whole and clear" attempts to raise her children in a white, cleansed world of bourgeois myth and illusion.

Andrew's unbearable frustration explodes as he blames his parents for bringing him into "a world that they didn't understand, into a society which existed only in their imagination."

This brilliant exploration of working-class life is flawed by a needless playing with metaphysical themes.

The three brothers are intended to represent three aspects of the "human soul" or some such.

And that Lindsay can only see social change coming in the form of mindless destruction ignores that it is possible to destroy the rotten and simultaneously create and build.

But this is no surprise as Anderson's other films, notably "If" and "O, Lucky Man!" are gravely marred by his same rebellious nihilism.

But whatever one thinks of this excess metaphysical baggage, the remarkable portrait of the agony and dignity of the working-class remains.

The working-class student here at the university will undoubtedly find the film utterly absorbing and his or her experience profoundly reflected.

Markson film full of bathos

"There is a pleasure sure
In being mad, which none but madmen know."
— Dryden:

Monkeys in the Attic is not for public consumption; it's a private film with its own secret madness.

Because of government funding, Morely Markson was able to make a film with objectives other than just box-office receipts. Government funding can give a filmmaker great artistic freedom, but it also allows him to ignore the public and make a film for his own self-satisfaction.

It may be true that most great art is created by people who ignore the public and work simply for personal satisfaction. But in other art forms we have learned how to appreciate an artist's ignorance of his public.

Film, on the other hand, because it is such an expensive medium to work in, must always make commercial compromises. People are willing to give filmmakers money only if they make films that other people will pay money to see.

We are exposed to films that follow certain common patterns and trends so that they may be commercially successful. Our entire understanding of film, is therefore shaped by such cinema.

When a director is able to ignore financial aspects of film and makes one like Monkeys in the Attic, his work is therefore destined to be misunderstood.

Nevertheless, even though one may recognize this film for its artistic aspects, one cannot help hating it.

Markson presents us with two couples (Jackie Burroughs - Victor Garber and Jess Walton - Louis del Grande) living in a townhouse somewhere in Toronto.

For an hour and a half, Markson treats us with their dressing up in bizarre costumes, grunting, rapping, whining, screaming, squeeling, fighting and dreaming. Occasionally we are offered a few snatches of dialogue.

We never think that these characters are real and reject them deciding that Markson is only being what some would call 'artsy'.

Suddenly near the middle of the film, the outside world arrives in the form of Gus the pizza-boy (Jim Henshaw). Gus is 'normal' and we realize these unbelievable people are real within the film.

Gus is seduced, conned out of all his pizzas, flung down the stairs, beaten up, thrown into the pool, fished out, seduced again and finally is confronted by one of the men in drag.

In a film that would otherwise be unbearably tedious, Henshaw is the only source of humour and relief as the 'seduced delivery boy' stereotype.

Although this film has excellent performances by Jackie Burroughs and is well crafted, it nevertheless remains pointless and exhausting. Monkeys in the Attic passes with the impact of a shadow. Markson doesn't tell us who, why and what these people are.

At the beginning of the film one watches the couples' bizarre behaviour and wants to scream out, "Who in the hell are these people?"

By the end of the film, one can only whimper, "who cares."

Porn star interviewed Can Linda Lovelace really be 'just the girl next door?'

Deep Throat in deep thought at the Hyatt Regency.

When you interview Linda Lovelace, leave your assumptions behind or you'll end up feeling as foolish as I did last week.

Lovelace, the star of the porn film Deep Throat, was in town to promote her new $1 million movie, Linda Lovelace For President.

With the privilege of interviewing her alone — "for about 20 minutes" — I came equipped only with a female chaperone, two notebooks, a press camera, a Radio Varsity tape recorder, a list of prepared questions and an extensive knowledge of the Banfield affair.

I had a case of nerves too, but they went away quickly. All I did was knock on the door and when it opened, say, "Hi, is Miss Hollander in?"

Her secretary managed to take no offence, sat us down in the palatial surroundings, poured us some Mumm's champagne in delicate long-stemmed crystal glasses and let us be suitably impressed.

After the proper delay, Lovelace herself made a regal entrance and greeted us with a cool elegance.

I was stunned because after having seen two screenings of Deep Throat and countless press pictures, I thought I had a thorough knowledge of her anatomy.

Pictures unfair to her

But she's much better-looking than her pictures — because of a serious car accident which left her badly scarred, none of the Deep Throat footage ever showed her stomach, so you got the impression she was short and chunky.

Lovelace is instead lissome, with not a spare ounce of sunburned flesh draped over her body; her limbs are long and lean while her voice is a soft, modulated whisper that would not make one off-color remark during the entire interview.

This was unexpected, because in other interviews in Screw magazine and Playboy she was graphic:

Screw: "Do you come even though your clit isn't being worked on?"

Lovelace: "Yeah, I do. I have an orgasm every time I get screwed in the throat. Or I like somebody in my throat and someone in my cunt at the same time."

And Lovelace quoted in Playboy: "I really do dig getting it in the throat. Everything turns me on but right now I like 'throat, ass, cunt, one, two, three, in that order."

I had my list of questions — specially designed after reading these other interviews — to produce good copy.

"Do you find interviewing 20 men a day any more draining than nothing to say to the Pope. What would you say to him?"

Nothing, I don't have anything to say to him either. More strained silence.

By now both Lovelace and I had discovered it was also too dark for photographs and that I couldn't run the tape recorder.

"Just put the mike in front of her face," the Radio Varsity boys had explained, "and get her to say, 'Hi, I'm Linda Lovelace and I listen to Radio Varsity.'"

New tack taken

Feeling confused and foolish, I abandoned the leading questions, the camera and the tape recorder and we began to talk about the topics you expect would interest a 25 year old porn star; pollution, Canadian life, the American presidency, Californian politics, the Martin Luther King assassination, the martial arts, the Banff Springs Hotel and organic farming.

As we relaxed and the now-extended interview became more of a chat, we eventually got back to porn movies again.

"I don't like x-rated movies myself," she laughed. "I fell asleep in the first reel of Behind The Green Door (a stylish hard core classic) and I've only seen Deep Throat once."

Lovelace didn't like the hypocrisy of simulated sex in films, such as in Bertolucci's celebrated Last Tango in Paris. "The sex was so obviously faked it was stupid."

Deep Throat not pornographic

She also thought Deep Throat wasn't pornographic compared to movies that emphasize violence.

Lovelace takes pet mouth out for a walk with her manager.

Linda Lovelace: regal, cool and exciting. But why do people still ask her about that dog?

Lovelace said that previous to Deep Throat, she had run a boutique in New York, and had never appeared in a film before. I didn't push the point, but this is true. She appeared in at least nine stag films, all hot on the underground circuit these days, especially two of them entitled Dog I and Dog II, where she has sex with dogs. Lovelace has tried to deny these early enthusiasms, which are unacceptable to even her peers, but everyone, especially Penthouse magazine (see cartoon), has rehased it for obvious reasons.

An eight-day wonder

She explained how Deep Throat had been made by porno filmmaker Gerry Danaimo for $28,000 in eight days in Miami. She got only $1,250. "Anyway, it set me up for better things," — like her present movie where she'll earn a fat percentage fee.

Lovelace supposedly has other movies in the works, including a serious dramatic lead. She said she is serious about acting, having taken lessons for three years now.

"There's no reason why I can't be serious about acting. Lots of other famous stars started in porn movies because there was no other work for them.

"There's nothing wrong with that, but when they made it legitimately, they bought up their old movies. Now they pretend they didn't make them.

"Well, I think that's hypocritical. I'm not ashamed of what I've done — you can't put down what you started with."

Politically opinionated

Lovelace seemed fairly opinionated about politics. "In the U.S., 85 percent of the population is under 35 and yet the ones who run the country are all so old. They don't represent anyone.

"As soon as you get someone who really represents the American people — like Martin Luther King or Bobby Kennedy — then they shoot him. I just hope Ted Kennedy doesn't run ..."

Lovelace preferred to talk about specific cases that angered her such as former California governor Ronald Reagan, a rigged electoral vote in Florida and the U.S. milk price-fixing scandal.

"Linda doesn't usually get into political discussions any more," her travel coordinator Larry Marciano explained when I asked why she never spoke out on these things.

"We just don't trust the media, we have had some really bad experiences with them and we have to be careful.

"It's been a long time since we sat down and just rapped with people our age like you," he said.

"What you really have to understand about Linda," Marciano said as he snuggled up to her on the sofa, "is that she really is the girl next door, but people don't know that."

Pollution worsening

Lovelace likes Canada, especially Banff where she had just visited, but she thinks it is getting just as polluted as the U.S.

"Look out there!" she exclaimed, pointing from our 29th floor window to the street below, where the Avenue Road rush hour pollution hovered like a dirty veil.

"Toronto's air isn't that much better than New York City or Chicago. And they could clean it up just like that (snapping her fingers) if they wanted to!"

When prodded, Lovelace agreed that she didn't think anyone would bother doing anything about it. "In five years children will be dying from this air, but no one cares."

Lovelace said she thought it was almost worthless for political radicals to try to persuade anyone to try to change these conditions.

"I don't think so, anyway. I'd like to buy a farm soon either in the U.S. or in Scandinavia. Then I'd like to learn how to farm just for survival, not to make money or anything.

"It's people who do this who are going to have a chance to go on living when something does go wrong."

In the meantime, Lovelace agreed with a laugh she was going to be as lazy as the rest of us and live the good life while it lasts ... The historic hour and a half confrontation between Linda Lovelace and the Varsity Review ended when she gave me a bottle of French red wine in return for a copy of The Varsity (Friday edition).

After all, even as the world collapses around us, student journalists have to get drunk and hard core pornographic film actresses have to keep well-informed, don't they?

Lawrence Clarke

X - rated

The film Linda Lovelace For President will probably make its star a rich woman, but it won't confirm that she has any other discernible talents except ones that gladden the hearts of porn lovers everywhere.

Not that you're going to see her tricks in this piece of mind-numbing trash, because it's supposed to be a political satire with little sex, certainly none of it hard core (unsimulated).

Written, if that's the word, by former Laugh-In scriptwriter Jack Margolis (may his opportunistic commercial soul burn in Hell), the film is the worst of the year, so bad you can't even be snide about it.

The film combines the worst in everything — writing, casting, acting, producing and directing. About all we can hope is that the distributors are incompetent, but no such luck.

Deep Throat, whatever else it was, was not exploitation because everyone from the stars to the audiences knew and wanted what they were getting.

But Linda Lovelace For President is exploitation of the worst kind, because it will draw in crowds hoping to see the star of Deep Throat perform her famous feats of fellatio.

The suckers won't, of course, but not until someone's made money. The movie and the motivation behind it is just a dishonest con job, which in my book is a lot worse than an honest blow job.

Give me back Deep Throat — even if it's illegal, it's not immoral.

SAC elections, FM Reports, $50,000 and an empty summer not withstanding, Radio Varsity is continuing onwards and upwards, as Mort Sahl used to say. Coming up this week-end, of course are the CIAU championship games in Edmonton, Alberta, between the victorious U of T Blues and the U of A Golden Bears. Our own jock-in-residence Archie Hunter and Jon Fried will be providing live play-by-play coverage from Edmonton on Friday night at 10:00, Saturday night at 10:00 and if need be Sunday afternoon at 4:30. Hunter has expressed concern that a number of students and supporters of the Blues are unaware of the possibility of hearing the games in the privacy of their homes. 1 pm:

The I.P. Lovecraft Memorial Horror Show: "The Lurking Fear". For those of you with a political bent, there being a lot of bent politics, Zeynep Owen and Katherine Rowcliffe confront representatives of the North American Labour Party on Tuesday at 8 pm. This program will be re-broadcast on Friday at 1 pm.

In the world of the poet, Anne Sherman talks with John Robert Columbo, poet, anthologist and compiler of Columbo's Canadian Quotations on Thursday at 1 pm repeated Saturday at 2 pm.

So along with our regular features, a relatively busy week is ahead. If studying is starting to get you down, a reminder that you can laugh the world away on Tuesday nights at 9 pm and again on Fridays at 8 pm when we present Hancock's Half Hour and the ever-popular Gong Shows. It could help to take the load off your head. Remember: smile and the world smiles with you; cry and you end up on a SAC committee. br

movies

Because — I like that word, it's so formidable — because The Review won't publish again until our last issue, Wed., 26 March, you'll have to get a long, long list of movies to last you.

And I know you're going to appreciate it, what with no school work, essays or exams left to prepare for. After all, if you're trying for law or med school, it's pretty well in Fate's hands, isn't it? And if you're not, who cares?

Glad you agree. Now the rest is up to you — just try for two movies a day and you should be all right.

The Roxy presents Bunuel's early short, Un Chien Andalou, for slashed eyeball aficionados, along with Lon Chaney's beauty, Phantom Of The Opera, far superior to that trashy remake, Phantom Of The Paradise. Monday for 99 cents.

The Ontario College of Art Film Series unwinds Sternberg's the Blue

Angel (1930), the then chubby Marlene Dietrich's first film along with two other German shorts. Monday, March 17, 7 pm, O.C.A. auditorium. Free.

March 24 you get the gascinating Nazi art film by Riefenstahl, Triumph Of The Will (1934).

The little-publicized Poor Alex Film Festival begins Sunday, March 16, with Charlie Chaplin's masterpiece, City Lights; a week later it's another Chaplin, Modern Times. 296 Brunswick St., 7:30 pm, $2.

The UC Film Club closes its year with Buster Keaton's beautifully crafted silent comedy, The General tonight. Med Sci Fiction Building. Probably 7 and 9 pm but you'd better look at their Varsity ad or the Here and Now. $1.

Treatment of Women in the Movies film series continues at the Palmerston Library, 560 Palmerston Blvd. 7:30 pm Saturdays, $2.

This Saturday Manhandled with Gloria Swanson and Pandora's Box with Louis Brooks. Following Saturday, Frank Capra's That Certain Thing and also The Coming of Amos.

The busy Palmerston Library also has a Saturday afternoon screening of yesterday's great and not often-seen movies.

This Saturday at 2 pm the librarians will horrify you with the earliest Phantom Of The Opera (1921) starring Claude Rains and Curse Of The Demon (1957) with Dana Andrews, the heart attack victim in Airport '75.

Rumors that Cinema Lumiere is opening again. Welcome back, I really needed another place to consolidate my poverty in lc

theatre

On Campus: It must be exam time or something because the only openings this week are Juno and the Paycock, at St. Mike's (12, 13, 15, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22 March at 8:30 in Upper Brennan), and Brecht's Coriolanus at Hart House — (Runs till 22nd March).

Off Campus: Pick of the week could be Picasso's Four Little Girls at the New Theatre on Bathurst St. — if only as a theatrical curiosity, it's a play written by the artist in 1948, and the subject according to the PR man is capital W Woman. Two other openings this week; Heat at the Free Theatre (begins 25th March) and Forget Me Not Lane, a story of "Britain at War" at the Firehall, home of those "gallant ladies", the University Alumnae, (as Whittaker always says). Rick Salutin's latest play for Passe Muraille opened March 13 at 121 Avenue Rd. It's called The False Messiah and looks promising. Elsewhere, most shows seem to be in their dying stages. Question Time coily fades away on the 22nd at the St. Lawrence. Tremblay's Bonjour la Bonjour says bye bye for ever on the 16th. Endgame vanishes into the void on the 15th. The Real Insector Hound and Black Comedy has its final black out at the Colonnade on the 22nd. And the Captain of Kopernick marches off into the sunset on the 22nd at TWP. All, all its decay and dissolution, and all the players merely men and women who have to strut off between engagements. Ahh well fp Irish Week at St. Mike's colour me green

Traditionally, the feast of St. Patrick's Day, (March 17) has been little more than a grand excuse to tip the jar, spread the blarney and forget about mid-term essay deadlines.

St. Michael's College, in keeping with this tradition, willingly opens its doors and its pub to all comers, regardless of Sinn Fein sympathies, in an attempt to revitalize the mythic representation of the Irish as celebrators of spiritual intoxication.

This year, however, St. Michael's is offering students a greater cause for celebration, although the fare is more intellectual than sensual, and more substantial certainly than the customary green beer and pretzels shaped like leprechauns. The duration of the revelry has also been extended as St. Michael's celebrates Irish Week March 14-21.

Although a student production of Juno and the Paycock is included in the festivities (opened Wednesday night, plays Saturday, Sunday and next Wednesday through Saturday, 8:30 pm) the week will not deal chiefly with the practical realities of politics in Ireland as examined in O'Casey's play. On the contrary, the week is dedicated to an exploration of the mythic and mystical elements of the Irish culture, with lectures centering on such topics as heroes, unicorns and playboys.

St. Michael's Student Union has acquired for this purpose perhaps the most interesting authority on the subject, and a mystic in her own right, P.L. Travers, better known perhaps as the creator of Mary Poppins, that Juno of the English nursery. The title of her lecture will be "In Search of the Hero: Myth and Fairy Tale," and students will be able to hear her March 21, at 4:30 pm in Upper Brennan Hall, St. Michael's.

What more appropriate human being is there to speak about myth than one who has created a myth herself, (traded though that was by Walt Disney), or rather as she would maintain, one who has been the medium through which a myth has been released into the world.

P.L. Travers is as well considered to be the only surviving link to the Celtic revival, initiated by Yeats and AE (George Russell) and her investiture in this spiritual clan makes her an invaluable source of information for anyone interested in discovering a tradition which opposes modern materialism, and runs counter to our common, linear approach to life.

(Travers presently resides in London, in an old Chelsea house, where her time is taken up mainly with writing. Her latest book based on a Hindu myth, is entitled Friend, Monkey, and demonstrates that her interest in myth, extends far beyond the boundaries of Ireland, although it was this land which nurtured her beliefs and is the country in which the universality of her themes is localized.)

Gathering with P.L. Travers in the celebration of Irish myth will be other luminaries, each uniquely qualified in the field through their varied interests and occupations.

Starting off the week will be Ian Fletcher, with a discussion of Synge's Playboy of the Western World, (at 2 pm on March 14th).

Fletcher is an English poet, renowned for his brilliance and wit on the lecture circuit. He will speak generally about the artist, society's creation of the artist, and its rejection of him once he attempts to bring imagination into actuality, all in relation to Synge's play.

On Monday, March 17, at 2 pm Alec Reid will speak on Samuel Beckett. Reid's insights into Beckett should be all the more interesting because he is a personal friend of the playwright; his talk will be peppered with anecdotes, as well as critical opinions on the great Irish author's work.

Later that same evening, at 8:30 pm, a special lecture recital will be given by Treasa O'Driscoll, dealing with "The Traditional Music of Ireland." O'Driscoll will explore the origins and developments of Irish traditional music, its links with the east, and its instrumentation and style. Her lecture will be illustrated with songs in both Irish and English, and for those who have never encountered the traditional music of Ireland, be assured that it is a very rare experience indeed.

Wednesday's lecture at 4:30 pm will introduce U of T students to playwright Denis Johnston, who is coming to the Drama Centre next year to direct one of his own plays, The Scythe and the Sunset, at Hart House Theatre.

This time around, however, Johnston is delivering a lecture on "Unicorns; The Lore of the Non-Existent."

All the lectures are free. Juno and the Paycock is $1 for students, $2 for non-students.

Irish week has been organized to interest those not even remotely connected either by descent or inclination, to the Emerald Isle.

Its focus is to explore those roots, myths, and traditions of one culture which exists in different forms in all other cultures inhabiting the earth. The great Irish visionary AE wrote about the common affiliation which we all share:

"I feel I belong to a spiritual clan whose members are scattered all over the world, and these are my kinsmen, and I would sacrifice any nation, my own quite readily to promote the interests of that spiritual clan: 'We are children less of this clime'

"Than of some nation yet unborn,
"Or empire in the womb of Time."

Perhaps in moments of aesthetic appreciation, at occasions of intellectual challenge and debate, (at occasions like St. Mike's Irish Week . . .) we come as close as Time, as close as the present time, at least, will allow, to that vision of universal unity.

Native peoples attack gov't immigration policy

By PAUL RAYNOR

Toronto Warrior Society (TWS) spokesman Vern Harper told 100 people at an Open Forum on Native People's Struggle that "if our ancestors had a tougher immigration policy a lot of people in government wouldn't be where they are today."

Harper was referring to the government's Green Paper on Immigration but the main focus of the forum was on the struggle for the liberation of native peoples.

TWS member Grace Coty opened the forum with a statement of the native peoples' manifesto.

"The aim of the society is to protect and serve the native peoples' community in times of war and oppression. These are times of severe oppression for native peoples," Coty said.

"This history of oppression is manifested today in the government's bureaucratic and legal war to slowly end the life of native peoples."

The Society hopes to return the "natural and hereditary rights to the native peoples of Canada," if necessary by social revolution.

The manifesto states, "The racism of the government is not so accident, it is a political policy, designed to oppress and eventually destroy the native peoples."

"We as native peoples do not want to assimilate into the white patriarchy. We want the energy of our people to be our main supporting fibre and consequently will not accept the government's guilt money to ensure our existence."

"The Toronto Warrior Society is financed," Harper later explained, "by the contributions of many Canadian groups which come with no strings attached."

The forum focussed on last summer's Kenora Indian uprising, the Cash Creek incident, the native caravan and the demonstration on Parliament Hill last fall as evidence of native people's rising pride and willingness to fight for their rights.

Acting co-chairman of the Ojibway War Society Louis Cameron discussed the long history of oppression of native peoples.

Cameron charged "The government has a design of economic dictatorship on the lives of native peoples."

Cameron explained the reservations, with no supporting economy, with poor housing, and high disease and death rates, are a capitalist tool to keep native peoples divided. He sees them as little more than "concentration camps."

Complaining of the total lack of control native peoples have over their own lives, Cameron charged, "The Band Councils can't do anything without the approval of the department of Indian affairs who the Indians didn't elect and which operates under an Indian act that they had no part in writing."

"As evidence of the terrible reservation conditions, Cameron pointed to the expected life span of 35 years for the average native person."

"It is hard to put your finger on the cause of early death," Cameron admitted, "but the way in which things are governed from the top, the native people die on the bottom."

The road block set up on Hwy. 12 at Cash Creek by reservation Indians last year was to draw attention to this sort of bureaucratic strangulation, Cameron noted.

"It was a direct result of the government's failure to recognize the inadequate housing for native peoples," Coty explained.

The Indians at Cash Creek had requested money to replace an ailing Indian's house which had burned down in his absence.

"We were told the budget for reservation housing had already been spent and nothing could be done," Coty said, "but the department of Indian affairs had spent $24 million that year to run its Vancouver office."

Coping with emotion which made speaking difficult, Coty said, "The things that native peoples are subjected to are truly inhuman and we appeal to your support to liberate all native peoples."

Harper said the Native Peoples' Caravan and its culmination in the march on Parliament Hill last fall was "an historic event signaling the increasing solidarity among native peoples."

"The government sent out the RCMP riot squad in the hopes of intimidating us and alienating us from the people back on the reservations," he noted.

"But instead of breaking the Indian spirit they increased our solidarity and the support for native peoples among the non-native people of Canada."

Roam around Europe all summer for $180.

A Student-Railpass gives you two months of unlimited Second Class rail travel through 13 European countries.

Buy one, we'll give you a map, and where you go next is your own business.

All we'll say is that European trains are a sensational way to get there, be it Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden or Switzerland.

100,000 miles of track link cities, towns and historic, scenic and social attractions. Our trains are fast, modern, convenient, clean and comfortable.

And you'll discover there's very little second class about Second Class. You can sleep in a couchette for only $6.00 a night. And if you want to eat on a budget, inexpensive snacks are often available.

You can even take a cruise on the Rhine, if you like. Eurailpass is valid on many European ferries, river and lake steamers and hydrofoils. It also offers you substantially reduced fares on many side excursions you might want to take by motor coach.

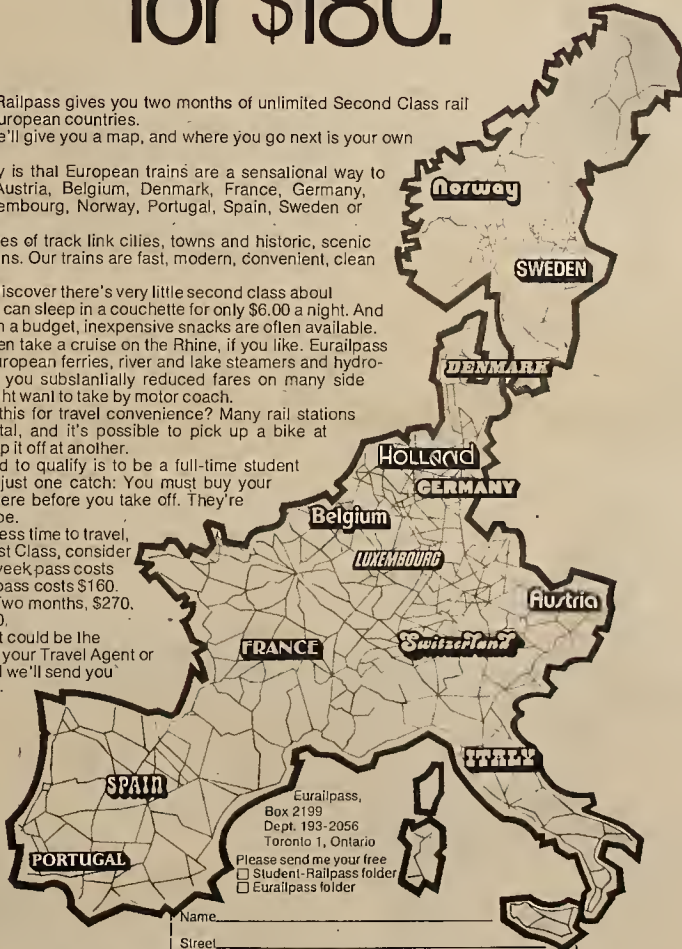

And how's this for travel convenience? Many rail stations offer bikes for rental, and it's possible to pick up a bike at one station and drop it off at another.

All you need to qualify is to be a full-time student under 26. There's just one catch: You must buy your Student-Railpass here before you take off. They're not for sale in Europe.

If you have less time to travel, or want to travel First Class, consider Eurailpass. A two-week pass costs $130. Three-week pass costs $160. One month, $200. Two months, $270. Three months, $330.

Don't wait. It could be the trip of your life. See your Travel Agent or clip the coupon and we'll send you all the facts.

Prices subject to change.

P.Q. colleges organize

MONTREAL (CUP) — Delegates representing 43 Quebec CEGEPs and universities formally founded L'Association des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ) at a conference following acceptance of a constitution which provided for a temporary executive and central council.

The goals of ANEQ are:

- to promote, protect and develop in all ways possible material, intellectual, professional, cultural and social interests of all Quebec students;
- to help relations between diverse association members and non-member students;
- to provide students with accurate information on all issues which concern them directly.

ANEQ's most immediate concern is with the Quebec loans and bursaries system. A motion to issue a press release which publicly denounces the Quebec ministry of education was widely accepted by the conference's delegates.

The motion protests the proposed living adjustments of only 12 percent and the discrepancies between the $46 weekly allotments to CEGEP students for living expenses, while university students receive $50 weekly. The release also calls for an increase in the established loan ceiling. Another proposal which calls for the establishment of a special committee of seven to work on the loans and bursaries issue was accepted. This committee will present ANEQ demands to the ministry and make clear in a priority order the demands to be negotiated.

Last December 100,000 Quebec students went on strike in protest of inadequate loans and bursaries. Minister of Education Francois Cloutier negotiated with students and made promises which have yet to become a reality. Bursaries were to be sent out before Feb. 28 but they have not yet been received.

ANEQ plans to deal directly and immediately with these issues and feels that the support of all post-secondary institutions will help promote these causes.

U of T outspends GAA in drive

U of T is spending big money over the Graduate Assistant Association's (GAA) bid to unionize the 2,100 teaching assistants at U of T's downtown campus, according to a story contained in the current edition of the Grad Post.

The GAA has been attempting to organize teaching assistants since June, 1973. Their efforts are currently stalled while the GAA and university administrators debate who does and who doesn't qualify as part of the bargaining unit.

During that time, both sides spent large amounts of money on the unionization bid.

According to estimates compiled by The Post, the university has spent about $70-$75,000 annually on such items compared to $20,000 for the GAA.

The estimate includes salaries for personnel department administrators and clerical staff involved in compiling a "master list" of teaching assistants, stationary and office expenses connected with distributing the list and legal fees.

Students in the U.K. want a better deal on student aid

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students in the United Kingdom held a "Week of Action on Grants and Education Cuts" Feb. 24 to 28.

The action included "occupations, canteen boycotts, strikes, public meetings and pickets of Local Education Authorities (LEA) offices," according to a press release from the National Union of Students of the United Kingdom (NUS-UK).

The finale to the action week was a planned demonstration in London marching from Belvedere Road to a rally in Hyde Park.

The stated objective is to lobby the British Parliament for an end to "discretionary student awards."

According to a spokesman for the British High Commission here in Ottawa, the students are objecting to the present award system which ties student awards to parental income, similar to the Canadian aid system.

The students want a system where all students receive a grant covering all educational and living costs, with no "means test" tied to parental income being applied.

About 90 percent of all undergraduate students in the U.K. receive a full or partial grant to help pay for their education, said the spokesman.

In Canada, less than 50 percent of the total undergraduate population received any financial assistance. A major difference between the student aid systems in the two countries is that U.K. students who get awards receive the full amount in the form of a grant, with no loans to repay out of future earnings.

Tuition fees in the U.K. are also substantially lower. While Canadian students pay about $650 annually, U.K. students pay only about $180.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ELECTION

Ballots have been mailed to the eligible voters for this year's Governing Council election of new staff and student members.

Any eligible voter who has received an incorrect ballot, or no ballot due to an error in records may contact the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160 in order to obtain the correct ballot.

The following are excerpts regarding balloting from the Election Guidelines 1975, a document outlining the procedures used in this election. Copies of the complete document may be obtained from the Office of the Governing Council.

Balloting:

i) Method

—ballots will be mailed to each voter at his sessional home address as recorded in the University's record system;

—each ballot will be accompanied by a small secrecy envelope into which the marked ballot should be sealed;

—also provided will be a return-address envelope into which the small secrecy envelope should be sealed;

—voters will be required to provide, on the upper left-hand corner of the return envelope, information sufficient to allow verification of their ballot return;

—each ballot will also be accompanied by an information sheet containing candidates' statements, information on the correct method to return the ballot, information on eligibility to use that particular ballot, and a short description of the powers and duties of the Governing Council.

—persons who receive an incorrect ballot due to an error in records will be advised in the information sheets how to obtain the correct ballot;

—persons who receive no ballot due to an error in records will be advised, through advertisements in the campus media, how to obtain a ballot;

—all eligible voters are entitled to vote using one ballot;

—members of the teaching staff who hold a non-academic appointment will vote in the appropriate teaching staff constituency;

—full-time students who are employed by the University as teaching assistants, research assistants, temporary library help, or in any other way will vote in the appropriate student constituency;

—part-time students who are employees of the University may vote in the appropriate student constituency or in the administrative staff constituency, but not in both constituencies;

—in the case of two or more ballots being received from any one voter, both being ballots for a constituency in which the voter is entitled to vote, only the first ballot received by the Governing Council Secretariat will be considered valid.

ii) Voting in multiple seat constituencies

A voter may vote for up to the number of seats vacant in his constituency.

iii) Balloting by absent voters

It is suggested that voters who will be absent from their recorded address during the balloting period arrange to have their ballot forwarded to them. Twelve days are allowed for return of ballots.

iv) Returning ballots

Ballots may be returned through either Canada Post or University Delivery.

For the convenience of voters who do not wish to return their ballots through the mail, ballots may be handed in at the Information Desk, Simcoe Hall, or at locations to be announced at Scarborough College and Erindale College.

v) Ballot mailing lists

A list will be available shortly prior to and during balloting for inspection by any person at the Governing Council Secretariat during normal business hours.

Further to the above regulations, completed ballots should be returned by CANADA POST, CAMPUS MAIL or personal delivery to the Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall prior to 12:00 noon on March 27th, 1975, to be valid. Also, for the convenience of voters who may wish to deposit their ballots on campus, ballot boxes are placed in the following locations

Erindale College — Library
Scarborough College — Library
Simcoe Hall — Information Desk

The above locations will be open until March 27th, 1975, at 12:00 noon. Both library locations are open during regular library hours, and the Simcoe Hall location, during regular business hours.

Enquiries regarding the election may be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

Writing course available for women who want to develop their writing, poetry skills

By SARAH GERRY

With the celebration of International Women's Day still in our minds, it is appropriate to introduce a group of Toronto women who have been exploring their skills as writers in the past few months.

A seven week course offered by the WYCA has encouraged the women to develop their abilities in the writing of poetry, fiction, journals and articles, and has given them more outlets for self expression.

There were three groups of approximately 10 women of various ages and occupations with a wide range of writing experience. The flexible structure and differing expectations within the groups enhanced the discussion about their work and themselves.

Writing has become of primary concern for the women in the course and with new friends and some encouraging criticism they have begun to talk openly and think seriously about their writing.

Because of the interest shown by many other women, the course is being given again. Cost is $15, and sessions will start in April. For further information, call Betsy Van Horn at the YWCA, 487-7151.

Manitoba students fight cutbacks

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Two hundred University of Manitoba students, angry with government underfunding, demonstrated at the Manitoba Legislature March 4.

The students left the opening session of the legislature shortly after Public Works Minister Russel Doern announced that a meeting had been arranged between Education Minister Ben Hanuschak and U of M Student Union president Bob Setters.

Setters revealed March 5 the meeting had already been arranged last Friday (Feb. 28). He said the demonstration was still necessary to show the provincial government that students supported the student union in its demands for increased university funding.

Setters will also meet with newly-elected Liberal leader Charles Huband and Conservative MLA Bud Sherman, after the meeting with Hanuschak later this week.

The student union academic affairs commissioner Paul Graham said UMSU will be asking for an "increase in the operating grant and money to get some buildings built."

Setters said the demonstration had been "very successful", and added the MLAs "know how much support this has."

Students arrived at the legislature around 1 pm and began marching in front of the legislature shouting slogans and waving placards. This lasted nearly an hour before the students entered the building.

Once inside the students continued to chant, "We want space." They remained in the lobby and competed with the brass band assembled for the opening of the legislature.

The lieutenant-governor and some invited guests were escorted through the chanting crowd of students. The Winnipeg media reported the lieutenant-governor's action as "jostled through" and "battled through."

Doern eventually appeared and asked students to leave since a meeting had been arranged and the students "had made their point."

Many students wanted to stay and a quiet discussion among the remaining students was held on one side of the lobby.

The Action Committee for Defence Against Cutbacks (ACDC) asked why UMSU was siding with the university administration and not with the faculty and support staff.

Spanish unionists continue fight against facism

By WILLIAM MOORE

Within the past year the Iberian peninsula has captured the attention and, at times, even the imagination of the entire world as it enters upon the difficult road of creating the conditions for a genuinely democratic society.

The dramatic changes began last April when the Portuguese people freed their country from facism after a legacy of some 40 years of repression and brutality; and now in Spain, the last fascist regime in all of Europe is visibly and obviously collapsing.

Two Spanish trade-unionists, who are currently on a Canada-wide speaking tour, offered in a special interview to The Varsity an insider's view of the utterly fascinating dynamic of the process of undermining a fascist dictatorship.

Speaking unrhethorically and with an assurance which comes through years of intense struggle, Angela Lopez, a young woman who for the past eight years has been an organizer for the workers' movement, and Cesar Fernandez, an auto-worker who is a member of the coordinating committee of the Workers' Commission of all Spain, traced in concrete detail the evolution of the Spanish Workers' Commissions.

Spain, even today, evokes special connotations, of mechanized fascist terror, of Franco, of a resistance of a heroic people. The Spanish people suffer still from the effects of their defeat in the war against facism.

"The Spanish Civil War represented a fundamentally different case than any other civil war," said Fernandez.

"Ours was not a battle of the Left against the Right; but it was a case of the army fighting essentially the entire Spanish people.

This meant the absolute destruction of all organizations, such as unions and political parties, of both the Left and Right," he said. During the period after the Civil War, facism took the lives of an estimated 400,000 persons.

With no organizations left intact, its best leaders dead or in exile, the Spanish people were left utterly defenseless; any form of resistance was rendered impossible.

"You must remember that the situation, after the war, was much like it is today in Chile but even more severe. That was the time of Hitler and Mussolini, and anything, was possible," Fernandez said.

All trade unions were, of course, dissolved by the fascists. To contain and watch over the natural activities of the workers, Franco created, in 1942, the "vertical syndicate".

It was "set up only to promote the politics and interests of the state; and it goes without saying that the syndicate allowed for no possible movement of the workers within it."

Workers were left unarmed in that "the atmosphere of fear created by the fascists prevented even a father from speaking to his children about his experiences during the war," Lopez said.

Around 1959, however, new forces in Spanish life began to emerge as a new generation who had not lived through the war gradually become restive.

This unrest coupled with fundamental changes in the productive forces (rapid industrial expansion) and a change in the ruling circles from feudal interests to new technocratic interest made it necessary for the ruling class to allow the institution of collective bargaining.

"Collective bargaining represented a good moment for the beginning of a new movement, a mass movement. Collective bargaining means that among the workers meeting together to discuss specific demands and to appoint their representatives becomes necessary," said Fernandez.

"This was the beginning of the Workers' Commissions. No one consciously created them. They grew spontaneously from the concrete needs of the life of the working class. "The political parties were still absolutely repressed; but because nobody knew, at the time, what the Workers' Commissions meant and because they were necessary, they had to be tolerated by the fascists," he said.

By 1964, consciousness of the true significance of the Workers' Commissions gradually began to grow; and the movement overflowed the limits of the workplace as 15,000 workers in Madrid openly demonstrated for their demands.

"This was a great victory for us as workers all over Spain realized that it was possible to be open about their demands; it was possible to fight and win. Commissions were soon everywhere in Spain," Lopez said.

The fascists, of course, quickly learned their vertical syndicate would be unable to contain the ever-growing workers' movement; and by 1966 a new wave of terror began.

But history had bypassed the fascists; a united working class was too strong.

"The Workers' Commissions were able to bring together all political and religious views into a true mass, global movement as students and professionals joined with the workers.

"Soon, it was possible to meet even in churches! This kind of broad, mass support makes it very difficult for the fascists.

Events had been going badly in Spain for the fascists for quite some time but the revolution in Portugal sent violent shock waves into the circles of the dominant class.

"The Left claims there was no way for facism to evolve into democracy appeared to be born out.

"It suddenly dawned on the fascists that its regime could go tomorrow. In Spain, they knew that it wasn't the army that they had to worry about but popular, mass pressure and action.

They were thrown into a panic as they realized that they were faced with a powerful, well organized Communist Party and a working class which was the strongest, the most organized, and the most politically conscious in the world.

Everyone now knows that, in Spain, change will come soon," Fernandez said.

At the time of life, tinged with disenchantment, when a man can content himself with being in love for the pleasure of loving without expecting too much in return, this linking of hearts, if it is no longer, as in early youth, the goal towards which love, of necessity, tends, still is bound to love by so strong an association of ideas that it may well become the cause of love if it presents itself first. In his younger days a man dreams of possessing the heart of the woman whom he loves; later, the feeling that he possesses the heart of a woman may be enough to make him fall in love with her.

Faculty seeks parity in snow rugby league

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Lone faculty member is surrounded by students and slugged in the head.

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
 U of T's snow rugby league is in trouble — and not because there's been no snow lately. Everybody admits that's a problem, but what's raising tempers to the boiling point is a long-simmering feud between the different snow rugby teams.

Like many other disputes around campus, this one can be reduced to two sides — faculty against students. And strangely enough, the quarrel is about parity, only this time it's the faculty who want it, not the students.

When the men's intramural sports committee set up snow rugby as an interfaculty winter sport this January, they allowed 10 teams to register — five of them faculty and the other five students.

The rules seemed quite clear: the two sides would try to carry a rugby football over the opposing goal line to score three points. The game would be played on the back campus and because snow would supposedly cushion the contact, robust physical play would be encouraged.

What angered the faculty, though, was that the all-student sports committee allowed the student teams to have 29 players while the faculty sides were only allowed three — with no substitutions.

The faculty — admittedly a small, radical faction — have been howling ever since.

"It's not fair to have three of us against all them. They beat the stuffing out of us — kicking, punching and elbowing us," said faculty snow rugby player Harold Slodder, who also teaches political science.

"Because we haven't had any snow lately, the intramural sports committee moved the snow rugby inside to the Hart House gym.

"Christ! The last time our team played, I got 18 bruises just from having those guys gang-tackle me on the hardwood floor. I think it was deliberate, too," he said.

"What we really need is to get parity on that committee so we can get some fair rules," said geology professor Joseph Badork, who sported a cauliflower ear from a recent match.

"Look," explained intramural sports committee member Mike Friend, "I don't understand what's wrong with these faculty anyway. I think they're just trying to make trouble.

"There's no way we're going to allow these professors to have parity. They don't know how to run a snow rugby league, and they should stick to their books and education," he said.

"It's bad enough that we gave in and let them have entrance to our facilities at Hart House, but now they want to take the place over," student member George Slough added.

"The rules are democratic — there are 25 times as many students on campus as professors and that's the ratio we set up in the team rosters," said Slough.

"I think they're complaining because they just can't take it. Put these troublemakers out in the real world for awhile — then they'll find out that life isn't all snow rugby and drinking parties at the faculty club," he said.

"Discipline, that's what the faculty need," Slough said.

"That's why the intramural sports committee is trying to pass the non-athletic section of the discipline code."

The code, which is being discussed before the committee, sets up stiff penalties for the non-athletic members of the university.

The tough new code has come under fire from the faculty because they say being non-athletic, they will be discriminated against.

Good hockey marks interfac hockey playoffs

By MIKE FRIEND

PHE B defeated SMC B 5-3, and now will play Jr Engineering for the Division II Championships.

The B, with a first game tie of 2-2, needed the win to take the series 7-5. Jr Eng gained the other berth 7-6, by beating Forestry 4-2, even though they lost the second game 4-3.

The Jr Eng-For game ranks with the PHE-SNC game as the best hockey this year in Division II play.

Both teams stuck to the game and avoided the silly penalties that marred earlier encounters.

The Trees quickly negated the Plumber's two goal advantage as Hector Vincent and Ian Ferguson, shorthanded, scored.

Dan Blocka gave the Junior Skulemen the series lead 5-4 by the end of the first period.

As in the first period, Rod Smith and Paul Hosick gave the Trees an early lead in the game, 4-1, and the series 6-5, but Ken Raven evened the series score before the period ended.

The only goal of the third period came from the stick of Tom Halpenny which gave the Skulemen a 7-6 series victory and the right to advance to the finals.

The referees, Mike Brown and Terry Hamm, must be congratulated for an excellently called game. Smith, of the Foresters, set an example of good sportsmanship by thanking the refs for a good game.

The PHE B-SMC B game was one of the better physical games that has been seen at Varsity in many years of interfac hockey. The hitting was hard and clean for a pleasant change.

The first period saw Tom Bulko score to give PHE an early lead, only to have Doug Zuliani score two goals and give the fathers the lead by its end.

The second period was a series of end-to-end rushes with the only goals going to PHE's John McEchean and Bulko (it was actually put in the net by an SMC player), giving the Jocks a 3-2 lead in the game and 5-4 in the series.

Early in the third period Zuliani completed his hat-trick to knot up the series 5-5, but victory was not to be for the Fathers, because John Blany and Neil Downs scored for PHE, making the final score 5-3 and the series score 7-5.

The Baby Jocks tried to give the game away in the latter stages of the game as they took a couple of pointless penalties but they were able to hold off the Fathers to gain a place in the Division II finals.

In a game played Wednesday night, Vic I finally displayed their scoring power as they annihilated SMC 8-1.

SMC came into the game with a one goal lead but saw it vanish quickly as Nat Findlay scored early for Vic.

The Fathers took the lead for the last time when Guido Mazza scored a short-handed goal on an excellent individual effort.

Vic got goals from Peter McWhirter (3), Mike Johnson (2), Bob Isles and Jamie Carroll.

The play of the game was fast and interesting in spite of the lopsided score with some excellent hitting.

One of the best hits of the year was given out by sometime Blue John Richmond who levelled one of the Fathers at centre ice.

The series victory gives Vic the right to play Dents in the Division I Finals, which should produce some superior hockey.

For those who appreciate good hockey, come to the Arena tonight at 8 pm to watch the 4th Annual Innis Nummies Game.

Love is strange in interfac hockey

This is the real world of sports?

Highest catch
 Joe Spring, a player for the San Francisco Seals, Pacific Coast League, caught a baseball on his fifth attempt, which was dropped from an airship at about 1,000 feet over Treasure Island in San Francisco Bay in 1939.
 The force of catching the ball broke his jaw.

Go-kart, young man
 The only recorded instance of a go-kart being driven around the world was a circumnavigation by Stan Mott, of New York.

He drove a Lambretta-engined 175cc Italkart 23,300 land miles through 28 countries from Feb. 15, 1961 to June 5, 1964, starting and finishing in New York.

The kart he drove had a ground clearance of two inches.

Score one
 The most points scored in a single basketball game of regulation length was in England, when a team called Bestwood beat Meadow Jets 242-20 at Nottingham Jan. 20, 1972.

Bowling 707
 The greatest altitude at which a bowling game has been played was at 25,000 feet when Dick Weber played Sylvia Wene in a Boeing 707 Starstream Astrojet freighter of American Airlines Jan. 7, 1964.

Long and short
 The longest recorded boxing match with gloves was between Andy Bowen and Jackie Burke in New Orleans on April 6-7, 1893.

The fight lasted 110 rounds or seven hours, 19 minutes, but was declared no contest when both men were unable to continue.

The fastest knockout was 10½ seconds (which included the 10 second count) on Sept. 29, 1946 when Al Couture struck Ralph Walton who was adjusting a gum shield in his corner at Lewiston, Maine.

Big money
 The greatest fortune amassed by an individual in sport is an estimated $47,500,000 each for Joe Fraser and Muhammed Ali (nee Cassius Clay) in their world heavyweight figure skating champion (1928-36) as a professional ice skating promoter starring in her own ice shows and 11 films.

The most earned in a single event is the reported "$2,500,000 each" for Joe Fraser and Muhammed Ali (nee Cassius Clay) in their world heavyweight boxing title fight in Madison Square Gardens, on March 8, 1971.

Will students finally be given the key to tenure committees?

OSAP living allowance increased

The board and lodging allowance under the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) will be increased to $40 a week from $32 a week, colleges and universities minister James Auld announced yesterday.

In a speech to the Legislature, Auld said he expected the increase "should enable students to enjoy a modestly improved standard of living despite the pressure of inflation."

However, statistics released last fall by the U of T housing service suggest the minimum a student will be able to pay for board and lodging next year will be $46.50 — $6.50 a week more than Auld's total.

A U of T student aid committee's petition — signed by over 5,000 people — has called on the government to raise the board and lodging allowance to $47.

This has also been supported by the admissions and awards committee of Governing Council.

The present allowance of $32 is well below the presently estimated minimum living standard of $37, as compiled by the housing service.

In pegging the present level, Auld ignored recommendations from provincial student award officers that the allowance go as high as $40.

Auld yesterday also announced small increases in the miscellaneous expenses allowances — up to $11.50 from between $9.80 and $11.50 — and local transportation allowance — which goes up to between $3 and $6 from between $2.50 and $5.

However, Auld did renew his pledge not to increase student fees for next year, and said he would maintain the present provincial student loan ceiling at $800, despite federal provisions which would allow a raise of as much as $400.

Auld also announced two other new programs.

The Ontario Student Loans Plan will provide loans of up to $1,400 for part-time students and those taking upgrading programs; and the Ontario Special Bursary Program will provide a kitty of $500,000 to help "the most needy part-time students" — those unemployed, receiving social assistance or on low family income.

Other changes in the OSAP program include an increase in expected summer earnings, proportional to increases in the minimum wage; the assessment of parental contributions on actual rather than expected income; and the option of applying for only a loan.

Common Front agrees on meet plan

The Common Front — a coalition of campus workers, students and faculty members, agreed last night on arrangements for next Wednesday's mass meeting to protest the province's cutbacks in university financing.

The meeting, to be held from 12-2 pm at the Medical Sciences auditorium, will mean a partial closedown of all campus services.

The move of students, faculty and university staff members to unite with a common goal is unprecedented in U of T history.

Representatives of students and the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) will each speak for 10 minutes, outlining how cutbacks have affected those groups.

The Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA), the U of T Staff Association, and CUPE local 1230, will each speak for five minutes. A provincial government representative will be allowed 10 to 15 minutes to speak.

The Common Front agreed to send the government representative a list of specific areas to cover in his remarks to prevent him from evading the questions by pleading unpreparedness.

After the speakers make their remarks, the meeting will be open to questions from the floor. Because of time restrictions, the coalition agreed to limit each question and answer to two minutes in length.

Last night's Common Front meeting decided to approach the administration to see if a bus can be provided so that employees at the Institute for Aerospace Studies can attend the meeting. About 30 employees have expressed interest in attending.

Students and staff from Scarborough and Erindale College were also urged to attend the meeting. Plans are being made to organize a separate study session at Scarborough.

U of T president John Evans has agreed to write to faculty and others urging their attendance.

Tenure decision will be made by council

By BOB BETTSON

Students will make their last ditch attempt at tomorrow's Governing Council meeting to win student parity on tenure committees, in order to increase the quality of teaching at U of T.

SAC, The Graduate Students' Union and the Association of Part-time Students are all trying to get a big student turnout for the meeting, which will make the final decision of the recommendations of the Forster task force on appointments policy.

However, the model for representation the council will be debating does not include student members — only an observer who would not necessarily be a student.

The vote at tomorrow's meeting will be the culmination of two years of debate and discussion on whether students should have a parity voice on tenure committees.

The controversy began after a task force, headed by U of T Provost Don Forster, recommended no student representation on tenure committees in June, 1973.

SAC organized October, 1973 a referendum which resulted in a resounding vote by students in all faculties in favor of both parity representation and the principle of representation.

Despite the referendum results and subsequent SAC campaigns for representation on tenure committees this fall, faculty and administration Governing council members defeated any attempts to even seat one student on every tenure committee.

Some faculty members have even opposed having a student represented as an observer.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said yesterday students must show up in large numbers because the council only listens when students actively demonstrate their concern.

"Last year most of the council members were in favor of the Conway-Cadario code but when 200 students showed up at several meetings, it was delayed," said Kanowitch.

Kanowitch said student governors should not be content with an observer member who would not have any power over the actual decision.

The meeting has limited seating so students should pick up tickets in the foyer at Simcoe Hall or at the SAC office as early Thursday morning as possible.

Full-time enrolment freeze asked

Full-time undergraduate enrolment at all three U of T campuses will be frozen next year, if a recommendation of the executive committee is adopted by Governing Council tomorrow.

A report on enrolment policy, prepared by council's planning and resources committee and approved by the executive committee, states that because the university's operating income is based on grants related to student numbers, student enrolment policy "must form the cornerstone of all strategic planning for the university."

Moreover, the report concludes, facilities at the St. George campus are overtaxed already, and Scarborough and Erindale Colleges will be unable to expand without additional provincial support for capital development.

The report states, "There should be no general growth in full-time enrolment on the St. George campus" because there is growth capacity in other provincial universities and "potential capacity" at Scarborough and Erindale. Moreover, the report states:

"The City of Toronto has shown that it wishes to restrain institutional growth in the core area of the city.

"Any major growth on the St. George campus would increase pressure on housing in the core area, on the transportation system and on traffic capacity, and would clearly be unwelcome to civic legislators and the university's neighbors."

The site of the St. George campus has remained relatively constant in recent years. But the surprise in the report is the control of enrolment at the suburban campuses, both of which have a current enrolment level of about 3,600, and a planned growth capacity of 5,000.

Additional undergraduate growth has in recent years been funnelled out to the suburban campuses.

At its Christmas meeting with the Ontario Council of University Affairs (the government university liaison body) the university urged increased capital support for Scarborough and Erindale, and warned enrolment controls were likely if money was not provided.

Despite government claims that open access must be encouraged universities across the province have warned they will restrict enrolment unless the government increases the level of its support for universities.

The provincial government's basic income unit — essentially, a per student grant — was raised only 7.4 percent this year.

Should this pattern of funding continue for three years, U of T president John Evans has warned the university budget, 80 percent of which is staff salaries, will have to be cut 10 percent.

Already, several departments have experienced budget cuts, and a freeze on new appointments has been declared.

The planning and resources committee report cautions divisions not to underestimate their enrolments, and also says although enrolment totals may be exceeded by as much as four percent, no increased financial commitment will necessarily be made.

The report does not recommend any establishment of controls for part-time students, and anticipates that graduate enrolment will stabilize of its own accord.

It says, however, "The institution of new graduate programs should take place only where there is clearly identifiable need," and calls for a full-time graduate ceiling of 4,500.

Auld visits U of T Monday

Colleges and Universities minister James Auld will visit U of T Monday, only two days before a university-wide meeting on educational cutbacks to which he had been invited.

Auld is being brought here by the U of T Young Progressive Conservatives, and yesterday according to spokesman John Tory, was unavailable to come to the university Wednesday.

However, on Monday, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said Auld had said his free days included both the Monday and the Wednesday.

Auld will be speaking in the debates room in Hart House, and is expected to make a short speech to answer questions from the floor at 3 pm.

See page 21 for more details of Auld's province-wide tour.

The Varsity will publish a special issue Monday, dealing with the campaign to fight educational cutbacks and the Common Front meeting on Wednesday, during which the university will be partially closed for two hours.

No advertising will be accepted. Any Varsity-staff members still having time to do some work are asked to drop by today and volunteer to help put the thing on the streets.

Complex may compromise for exemption, says Sparrow

By BARBARA NICHOL

Despite the overwhelming support for the athletic complex demonstrated by the student referendum last week, obstacles to its construction still remain.

U of T undergraduates voted 5,745 to 700 in favor of constructing the proposed new athletic facilities during last week's SAC presidential elections.

But Ward six alderman Alan Sparrow says U of T will probably have a hard time getting an exemption from City Council on the building's density requirements.

Sparrow says the council's previous exemption should not give U of T the impression it will now get an easy exemption because "we will fight to make sure the complex stays within density requirements."

Sparrow is optimistic the building will have to be redesigned to live up to city zoning criteria, thus answering resident groups' demands for a scaling down of the plans.

Formerly the holding bylaw was easily bent for the university, but now the regulations are being adhered to far more closely, Sparrow said.

Jack Dimond, special assistant to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway and responsible for the complex, said this would not prove to be a major obstacle.

He sees the previous non-application of expansion and height restriction bylaws to the university as an indication that City Hall will remain sympathetic to the university's present request.

Another problem, Dimond said, lies in the area of funding. Architects are looking at "possible economies which would avoid sacrificing the major user spaces." Dimond said that areas such as the pool, field house, track and squash courts would be designed according to plan.

Mike Friend, an intramural sports committee member, is still optimistic about the future of the complex.

Friend underlined the importance of the project, pointing out the advantages which the improved facilities would offer students.

Friend also cited funding as an obstacle adding, however, he is certain the money will be obtained.

Bruce Kidd, physical education professor, said possible complications with City Hall over the bylaw struggle would probably be only "a minor problem." He added he is assured of sufficient votes on city council to pass the resolution.

Kidd sees Simcoe Hall as a possible hindrance. Despite the continual assurance of the administration "that the plans would be in motion soon," Kidd said he would like Evans to demonstrate his commitment by authorizing the commencement of the working drawings.

Kidd emphasized, however, that he is not suspicious of the administration's motives.

Alan McAllister, Huron-Sussex Residents' Association president, remarked that the residents surrounding the proposed complex will continue to oppose the building as it is planned.

He feels the public hearings regarding the density bylaw will be a useful forum for the expression of the residents' concerns.

DUE TO RECENT RISES IN CONSTRUCTION COSTS, IT HAS BEEN NECESSARY TO MAKE SLIGHT CHANGES IN OUR PLANS FOR THE NEW ATHLETICS FACILITIES ...

Erin editor tries to take over

By BOB BETTSON

Erindale student newspaper editor Gregg Troy is trying to take over as student council president by using his own paper to win the election.

Erindale's elections are next Monday. Although Troy resigned as editor of Medium II last week, the election edition of Medium II, published Thursday, carried a front page story on the resignation which carried a substantial part of Troy's platform for student president, without even mentioning the other candidates.

Troy's opponents Brian MacInnis and Robert Callaghan were only allowed space in the centrespread on the election.

Troy's main campaign plank is unionization, advocating direct participation of students in a revamped student union. The plan would also include bloc use of student seats on Erindale College council, which the present student council has boycotted because it is weak and the principal has the real power.

His opponents both charge the "unionization" platform of the Medium II slate running for council is merely changing the name and wouldn't mean anything.

Troy, however, claims the present council is "cliquish". He opponents, MacInnis and Callaghan, have charged the opposite, that a Medium II clique is trying to take over the council.

The MacInnis ticket is running on a platform of services. Vice-presidential running mates Ray Pidzamecky and SAC rep Peter Thomas both have experience with the student council.

They have promised student course evaluations, an employment centre and a free concert series.

Callaghan is running on a platform which includes beefing up student representation on a more powerful college council, student control of all services, and more services such as banks and a grocery store.

Medium II not only ran the front page story on Troy but also a front page lead story on the resignation of vice-presidential candidate Pidzamecky as a bartender at the pub because of a new ruling that council executive members cannot work at the pub.

The Learning Machine

If your professor seems to be developing an inferiority complex, don't laugh at him — he's got good reason.

Ontario's 5,990 community college teachers were handed a two-year 26.3 percent salary increase Monday while president John Evans only offered the U of T faculty a 12 percent hike at a Feb. 27 Governing Council meeting.

The U of T faculty started with a 25 percent raise, and later whittled it down to 18 percent.

At the time, U of T Faculty Association Bill Nelson said he was "not satisfied" with the increase and thought the faculty would probably consider the raise unacceptable.

Nelson was unavailable for comment last night. UFTA member and political economy professor Ken Bryden also refused to comment on the community college teachers' raise.

Not only did the arbitrators unanimously vote to give the teachers the 26.3 percent raise over two years, they also called for the negotiators from both sides to significantly reduce the teachers' workload.

The U of T faculty enjoyed no such luck, but Evans did hold them out one plum: a "career advancement fund for merit" equivalent to three percent of the individual professor's salary. Sounds irresistible.

The feature that appeared in Wednesday's paper was composed of excerpts from the new book, Women at Work: Ontario, 1850-1930 (Toronto: Canadian Women's Educational Press, 1974). The picture appeared courtesy the Archives of Eaton's, Canada, Ltd.

Would you enjoy listening to papers on French haute cuisine, Harlequin romances, or Hindu mythology? Do you perhaps have a secret desire to give a talk on witchcraft in Etobicoke or Inuit art?

Then perhaps you should belong to the University of Toronto Historical Society. It is a small group of people comprising students from arts and science and the professional faculties who get together a number of times during the year to hear papers given by members of the Society and to discuss them, as well as simply to have a good time.

"Historical" is an anachronism referring to the days when the Society was sponsored by the History department; it is now an independent club comprised of and organized by undergraduate students with all sorts of interests that may not be history-oriented.

If you would like to apply for membership (which lasts two years) please enclose a curriculum vitae, or if you would like more information, write to Anders Bondrup Nielsen, R.R. No. 1, Schomberg, Ont. or telephone 859-3968.

The U of T City Liaison committee decided last night to give the long-awaited Campus as Campus Centre project the green light.

The committee decided also to allow the university to take over Huron and Willcocks streets for the projects planned pedestrian malls, bank, pub and other services.

The $1.4 million project has been in the works for 20 years and countless plans have been made but it now appears close to realization. The funding has been granted and the university and the city have been given the go-ahead.

Trent U students win tenure seats

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — The Trent University Senate voted 25-12 last month to seat students on a university committee dealing with hiring, firing and promotion of faculty.

But the next day a disgruntled faculty member told a meeting of the university Board of Governors, which has no student representation, that "a good number of faculty are not only concerned but quite frankly appalled" at the Senate decision.

The decision was to seat three students on the Committee On Academic Personnel (COAP), a body which makes decisions about hiring, firing and promotion of faculty. The students are to be appointed by the student council.

The next day professor Bob Chambers, who has spoken against student representation on COAP at the Senate meeting, reported to a meeting of the Board of Governors that faculty members were appalled at the decision, and the faculty association might make "some sort of initiative to reverse the decision."

The university president said he doesn't know what would happen if some faculty member were to tell the university that he does not want his personnel decisions made by students — which Chambers predicted would happen.

Despite being treated to a chilling description of what could go wrong when students participate, the board took no action to overturn the Senate decision.

Second last Varg meeting!

Don't forget, Varsity staff, there will be a staff meeting Friday — the second last of the year — at which we will discuss our plans for our mammoth final issue next Wednesday.

Already, plans are underway to reprint the first five volumes of Toynbee's History of Western Civilization, as well as all the 'C' entries in the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Other than that, there will be several important 'summary' stories to do, as well as regular news stories, and the management humbly pleads that every Varg staffer attempt to do at least one story for the final issue.

Last chance for student tenure position

Tomorrow, the Governing Council will make a decision on a major issue — the process of granting tenure. Most importantly, it will decide to what extent, if at all, students will be involved in the tenure process.

During the fall, tenure was the major issue on campus. Since then, it seems to have been overshadowed by the portent of government cutbacks, which, some some say, will obviate entirely the need for granting tenure.

True, the cutbacks are a crucial issue, and equally true, unless they are fought successfully, there may not be much tenure left to grant (John Evans has already proposed limited-term appointments).

But that should not detract from the fact that a lot of work has gone into the proposals, and the final decision tomorrow will either include or exclude students, depending on how strongly they make their case.

As it stands now, the proposal which goes before the Governing Council recommends an all-faculty tenure committee, with an observer who may be a student, alumnus, or lay member of the Governing Council. There is a further provision for a university tenure committee which would review all tenure decisions made during a given year. However, the powers conferred on the committee appear quite limited.

That is clearly not good enough. Nor is it good enough, as some student governors propose, to make the tenure committee observer necessarily a student. Students must be given a statutory place on tenure committees.

Students are a vital element in the learning process. To let them watch, but not to let them formally participate, is to treat them as though they were incapable of making informed judgments, in which case they shouldn't even be at university.

Tenure is a heavy responsibility: just because of that, it is important not to limit the decision to a small group of senior, tenured faculty, even though the criteria for granting tenure are explicitly defined.

Tomorrow represents the last chance students will have to fight for representation on tenure committees. The meeting is at 4:30 pm, in the Council Chamber at Simcoe Hall.

Torture also in mental hospitals

I would like to commend The Varsity on its presentation of an expose of official torture in its Friday, Feb. 28 issue. The account is dramatic enough to just straddle the borderline between horror and sensationalism. If only, as the author noted, the recommendations for action were proportionate in weight to that of the account!

Torture occurs here on a regular basis in many institutions, besides those occasions when it takes place in an explicitly political context (the FLQ crisis, for example). Prisons and mental treatment facilities are the most obvious instances of these. In jails, the occasional revelation of torture is excused to the public as a 'random occurrence', as a single instance of 'individual abuse of the system'. There is increasing evidence to indicate that such 'lapses' are manifestations of the application of the logical extension of a policy of repression and dehumanization.

In mental hospitals, 'behavioral incidents are punished by being drugged, subjected to electroshock and insulin shock therapy, psychological coercion and psychological and physical brutality.

In both institutions human rights, including the right to dignity, are virtually suspended. In mental hospitals, the individual's human status is actually invalidated, and even communication and the right to appeal becomes impossible. The torture inflicted by such procedures of isolation, ostracism and invalidation are hard to fathom. It is considerable.

Any person of insight, conscience or sensitivity existing under the conditions described would be exceedingly masochistic and slavish not to advocate militant opposition to a regime of such repression and terror. Innocence under such circumstances is at best no virtue, representing ignorance or intimidation. At worst it is irresponsible indifference.

Should those who decide to take action be necessarily abandoned?

Scar students praise O'Donohue

We would like to exhort Scarborough College students to vote for their own interests in the forthcoming Governing Council elections. Scarborough, we are sure, will have nothing to lose and everything to gain by voting O'Donohue on this body. Finesse, collegiability and dedication are among the attributes we would ascribe to O'Donohue.

As far as diplomacy is concerned, he has been second to no other president. The disappearance of the word probation from transcripts, the task force on the study of space allocation and the formation of the library committee were the outcomes of courting the administration's support on the one hand and maintaining a good rapport with S.C.S.C. on the other.

While it would be sheer adulation on our part to attribute all the success of this year's council to O'Donohue, we are convinced that some of the contributions by other members were due to his collegiability. The publication of the student brochure by Debbie Barkhouse and the willingness of Don Allen to share administrative responsibility are but two of the examples we will cite.

The bad press received by O'Donohue in The Varsity and at the recent election forums of S.C.S.C. reflect inaccurate research and empty platitudes from inept student politicians respectively. Far from being manacled by the shackles of conflicting personalities, we are sure that the present council will leave a mark of excellence and competence when it will usher in the new council.

Indeed, it would be unfair not to elaborate on the most discernible of O'Donohue's repertoires, his dedication. He revised the S.C.S.C. constitution, which although not completely watertight is a marked improvement from its previous non-peccability. Lastly, we would like to commend him for his persistence at getting the stables at the college. What was his pastime as a S.A.C. rep in the 1973-74 school year became one of his greatest achievements in the realm of social life both at this college and at St. George.

We sincerely hope that O'Donohue does get his deserved support from all Scarborough students as a reward for his accomplishments and as setting a precedent for having college representation on Governing Council. And for apathetic students, we urge them to remember what Dumas the French Philosopher said in 1911: "The people get the government they deserve."

Barnes should ban termpaper ads

An open letter to Gordon Barnes:
 As I write, you have just been elected President of SAC. Judging from the year during which we were fellow members of the academic affairs committee, I am confident that SAC will have a president who is not only able, but devoted to the best interests of the students and also to high academic standards in the university. I believe this even though we voted on opposite sides on probably 75 percent of the issues which came before academic affairs.

This letter is prompted by an experience I had while sitting in the New College cafeteria discussing with one of my students his term essay. The background noise was (I was told) Radio Varsity, which was broadcasting a long commercial for students to write essays — at $5 to $10 an hour — for one of the plagiarism "services" now plaguing our campus. Such ads, both for essay-writers and essay-buyers are also carried by The Varsity.

In the years that this cancer has been gnawing at student-faculty relationships, I have waited and waited for some student protest against it. It is a development which injects deleterious suspicion and deception into teacher-student relationships and also one which deprives the student of the educational benefit he expects from university attendance; and additionally, a development which cheats the taxpayer, who, though neither he nor his children may ever attend or teach at a university, contributes heavily to the maintenance of those who do.

I ask you therefore: When you denounce in public or reflect in private on the reluctance of most faculty members to include students on tenure committees, have you considered the fact that the faculty has seen no student initiative to oppose these essay-writing "services"? Are you willing, as president of SAC to oppose them? As a first step, to refuse their advertising in SAC-sponsored publications and broadcasts? As a further step, will you work to create a moral climate among students which would make the use of such commercial academic dishonesty as repellent as the eating of non-union or wrong-union California grapes?

I think you can do it, because I believe that you would have the support of the majority of students who realize how debasing these shoddy enterprises are.

Zoo support staff knock McReavy

The dismissal of Mr. Paul McReavy from the stores in the Zoology Department has so far received a rather one-sided treatment in Varsity. Several statements are either contradictions of fact or deliberately slanted.

As members of the support staff we would like to indicate that both

Mr. Temple and Dr. Mettrick have always treated personnel questions and individual difficulties with understanding and fairness. It seems that Mr. Temple particularly has often been "bending over backwards" to resolve any staff problems. The various charges Mr. McReavy now brings to bear have very little to do with his dismissal.

We suggest that Mr. McReavy examine his statements and relate accurately what is involved. Dr. Mettrick's offer to reinstate Mr. McReavy to a different section of the Department and Mr. McReavy's attitude in response to this, indicates that he is not interested in solving a problem but to create more.

Birmingham says Varg incapable

I quite sympathize with The Varsity's current shortage of writers, but I do wish someone more capable than the editor could have been found to interview me as a Governing Council candidate.

At least three times I qualified my claim that "nothing is worth fighting for" by insisting that there are however, several things which are worth working very hard to accomplish.

We need better student services, especially at Scarborough and Erindale. The preservation of individual college identities should be ensured at a time when the university is going to have to pool all its resources. I would not have worked with SAC if I did not feel strong representation of student concerns to be essential. But I am convinced that we will accomplish much more through compromise and reason than we will through belligerent hostility and self interest.

At no time did I say that the High School liaison program should be abolished. What I did suggest was a more equitable delegation of the financial responsibility for this project.

Lastly, I can assure The Varsity that I will not "be seduced by soft whispers," but I do thank them for their concern.

Tim Bermingham,
 Governing Council Candidate

There's an old saying that you can fool some of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time. Whom was The Varsity trying to kid when it endorsed the Barnes slate?

For those who frequently read The Varsity's editorials, The Varsity's support for the Barnes slate must have at least seemed contradictory. On the most important issues raised in the election, the Barnes slate took positions that past Varsity editorials have opposed. Thus The Varsity's support of the Barnes slate has to be viewed as totally unprincipled.

On the key question of educational cutbacks and the totally inadequate student aid program, The Varsity pointed out the Barnes slate's mild call for a "reformed student aid program" without saying how he wants to reform it." (March 10, 1975).

The Varsity (Feb. 12, 1975) supported free tuition, a living stipend for students and the concept that education is a right. The editorial also called for taxing the corporations in order to pay for these extra costs.

On March 7, 1975, the editorial pointed out the need for a coalition of "students, faculty and non-academic staff" to fight the cutbacks. The Barnes slate opposes these ideas and has no strategy or intention to seriously fight the cutbacks.

The Student Militant Caucus advanced a program which includes the demands raised by The Varsity. However this isn't enough. The struggle against the cutbacks will not be won by backroom negotiations with the government but through the mobilization of students in the form of strikes and protests.

In fact The Varsity (March 19, 1975) admits that the Student Militant Caucus "has developed a strong analysis and a clearly defined point of view. It goes right to the heart of the central problems of the university, and makes explicit its desire for an open educational system, run by and for the people."

In The Varsity's Feb. 14, 1975 editorial, it supported the enquiry into racism at U of T. It said, "Racism is a serious issue which must be confronted. If it exists at U of T which seems evident, it must be eradicated."

At the election rally, Barnes supported the racist 10 percent quota on foreign students. Regarding Bette Stevenson's comments about too many Chinese students in medicine, Barnes tried to avoid the issue.

The Student Militant Caucus sees these racist attacks as an important part of its platform. It opposes the quotas on foreign students, the government's refusal to issue them summer work permits and limited financial aid. The slate has also condemned the racist deportations of 1,500 Haitians. The Varsity editorial, March 3, 1975, called for the overturn of the "extraordinary harsh sentences" given Leah and Schabas over the Banfield Affair. What did Barnes have to say? He felt that in spite of the unfair and questionable authority of the Caput, the sentences were justified. The Student Militant Caucus called for the reinstatement of Leah and Schabas as well opposing any form of discipline code.

On Jan. 27, 1975, The Varsity opposed the firing of zoology department worker Paul McReavy for union activity. The Barnes slate had nothing to say about this. The S.M.C. supported McReavy.

In an editorial on Oct. 9, 1974, The Varsity exposed big business influence at the university. "U of T John Evans sits on the Dofasco board of governors; Governing Council Keith Hendrick president of Noranda sales corporation". Barnes says nothing and the Student Militant Caucus acknowledges this as additional proof of the fact that big business controls and uses the university to suit its own needs. The S.M.C. proposes the need for student-staff control of the university to forward their interests.

So why has The Varsity endorsed the Barnes slate? It raised some weak arguments about the S.M.C.'s concern for "off campus" issues. The campus is not an ivory tower divorced from the rest of society. The program of the caucus covered important social issues not restricted to the campus and also those directly related to the university.

The argument that the Student Militant Caucus may not be familiar with certain campus issues is shallow. What is key, are the politics of the two slates, and it is on this basis that they should be evaluated.

In short, in outright contradiction to its past expressed positions, The Varsity has signed its name to the Barnes slate which offers no leadership to fight the cutbacks, the discipline code and the racist attacks. The Varsity also rejected the slate which intended to do these things. Thus The Varsity is partially responsible for the Barnes victory.

David Johnson, Young Socialists

(The Varsity endorsed the Barnes slate because it felt "it is doubtful the type of leadership necessary for the SAC presidency" could be provided by the Young Socialists and that it could be prodded into taking a leadership role — ed.)

Some want Buckley

We, the undersigned, endorse the candidacy of Tim Buckley and John Floras for the positions of Governing Council reps in Constituency II.

Next year will be a crucial period for the professional faculties within the university as the effect of the budget cuts become apparent. Experienced and responsible representation is needed to ensure that the quality of our education is not adversely affected by these cuts. At the same time, inroads must be made to improve the campus services available to students such as the Athletics Complex and the Campus as Campus Centre.

John Floras, with his experience in affairs within the Medical Faculty, and his proven willingness to work diligently, presents a clear and responsible platform for the Governing Council.

Tim Buckley will provide the necessary experience to argue for the professional faculties. His position as Vice-President of the Students' Administrative Council and his work on the Engineering Faculty Council provide him with a unique overview of the professional faculties.

We feel the election of these two students to the Governing Council will provide both responsible and receptive representation.

Varsity ignored editorial stand

Radio Varg 'unique, exciting and relevant'

It may strike you, the reader, as strange that while these headlines appeared in The Varsity, "Reaction Cool to Radio Varg FM Licence Study" and "FM Radio Varsity not worth money," SAC, after careful consideration, saw fit to approve the allocation to the FM concept of $70,000 in capital grants and $50,000 in annual operating funds.

It may seem even stranger in light of the fact that SAC approval was unanimous (less the vote and proxy vote wielded by the author of The Varsity report under the last mentioned headline, i.e. Gus Richardson).

As an author of the FM proposal (and Law SAC rep) let me assure you that "Campus: Community Radio" is not only a uniquely exciting project, it is exceptionally relevant to the university and the university experience. The recommending report's only major shortcoming was its limited circulation.

The firsthand experience of present SAC reps with the existing radio station qualified them as, at least, the most justified sceptics of the feasibility of any FM station based here. Their turnaround is testimony to the worthiness and potential of the plan.

The aim, simply put, is to involve all members of the university and the community interested in active communication with and about each other. The only way to do that successfully is to provide them with the structure that frees them to concentrate on just that.

Routine work, continuity of operations, organization, and the maintenance of physical plant will all be handled by professionals (a total of four) . . .

Under the superstructure are nine key positions involving paid part-time and summer commitment. Operators, producers, announcers, and researchers will, for the most part, be volunteers functioning in the station with professional guidance in the acquisition of the requisite radio skills.

Policy will be set by the Board of Directors soon to be constituted of representatives chosen by SAC, the faculty, the president, the station and community membership and the Board itself. They, not the professionals, will be responsible to us and the CRTC for station direction.

The ultimate program outlook is becoming clear. Variety will be the keynote; yet four main focuses stand out.

Entertainment will include nightly drama, poetry, and short stories as performed by a station troupe of actors and existing Toronto theatre groups. Music will canvass many tastes with the emphasis being on the two hour wholly integrated show.

The weekly Folk show, for instance, might combine an intimate interview of a local singer with an exclusive in-studio concert. The Quebecois show could introduce us not only to Quebec music and culture but to its politics and spokesmen. The Classical show would regularly present the best of current Edward Johnson Building recitals.

Academic Educational programming provides the greatest opportunity for a distinctive station stamp. A network of Advisory Boards set up along interdisciplinary, interdisciplinary, and non-academic lines will act as a set of resources for topical special interest programming.

The Economics Advisory Board, for example, would be made up of interested professors from U of T and York as well as noted Toronto economists and would convene once a month to suggest programming possibilities for their field. Individually and collectively they would put us onto exciting developments in the field, eminent speakers about to arrive in the area, and good personalities for 'reactions' to daily issues. They would encourage their contacts to develop program ideas and, importantly, aid in the preparation by station producers of monthly one hour in-studio conferences on current concerns.

Information programming plans call for a weekly show on the law (hosted by U of T and Osgoode law students), a show on objective analysis of religions, and one on Toronto services explored. Others include concentrations on the mass media and communications, Hart House debates, special lectures, and Toronto-based conferences.

We hope to be able to experiment successfully with two types of limited 'open access' programming. One mode would involve granting groups 15 minutes to a half hour of air time. The second would mean inviting anyone interested to invite in their own preplanned 3-5 minute show (the best would get on the air). The limited times would tend to force the participants to be concise and interesting.

Canada wants conservatism: Horner

By ROB PRITCHARD
 "Canada is crying out for conservative principles and philosophies," Progressive Conservative (PC) MP Jack Horner told an audience of 50 at Hart House Tuesday afternoon.

Horner, MP for Crowfoot, Alberta, blamed a departure from these principles on "the desire among the people to lean on governments to bail them out," a desire which he said prevails in Canada.

Horner attributed three basic policies to conservatism. First, "We are all individuals . . . and society should reward individuals for striving harder."

Second, he said, "A country with such vast natural resources . . . should be conserving them."

"We are only trustees on this land. We must guard our ecology against pollution."

Third, "The least government necessary is probably the best government."

When asked why, with such a need for conservative principles, the PCs were defeated in last July's federal election, Horner replied, "The party in the last number of years hasn't paid enough attention" to these principles.

Horner put the blame for this corruption on "the gang around Mr. Stanfield (Robert; PC leader), and including Mr. Stanfield."

"The party hasn't been guided by conservative philosophy. It's been guided by advertising men who really don't care about people."

As examples of mistaken PC policies in recent years, Horner pointed to the "deux nations" policy of 1968 and the attempted guaranteed annual income policy that "the caucus never at any time understood."

He referred to the argument for guaranteed annual income that a Toronto PC put to him at a policy conference in 1969. "He told me: 'It's coming.' So's death," Horner quipped.

Despite being against such an income program, Horner said, "The Conservative party can be just as generous as socialist parties."

Horner felt it was right to "take care of all those people generously who cannot take care of themselves."

When asked about bilingualism and biculturalism, Horner replied, "The bill should not limit a person's ability to advance in his job if he expresses an unwillingness to learn the other language."

"Canada wasn't a bilingual country in 1969," Horner said, "and still isn't."

Horner, asked about the leadership possibilities of Quebec MP Claude Wagner, said "Quebec people love money and they love power . . . as we all do."

The PCs have chances in Quebec, Horner said, but he felt that Wagner, who would organize a Quebec wing of the federal party, would not help the party.

Horner was also asked his opinions on the government's resolution to recommend converting to the metric system.

"It will hurt the little guy," Horner claimed. "He will be faced with 1,000 new competitors" from countries such as Germany and Japan already using the metric system who will really push their exports."

When asked if he intended to seek party leadership, Horner said, "Before I become a candidate I'd make sure it was a fair race."

French dep't attempts to end 'bunching marks around B level'

By MARINA STRAUSS
Instructors in French courses across campus will be attempting to give the full range of grades from A to F to their students as a means of lowering students' average marks to 70 percent.

In accordance with a Faculty of Arts and Science report, the Combined Department of French agreed marks have been too high and decided earlier this year students' averages should be lowered over the next two years to 70 from the 73 percent average over the past two years.

At a combined department's general meeting Feb. 26, student Michael Wood proposed the successful motion that to achieve the new mean, "the full range of grades from A to F should be considered, rather than lowering all marks by a set percentage."

Woodbridge, Wood's motion says: "Regular class participation and contribution throughout the year should be considered in evaluation, as well as students' performance on individual assignments."

Combined French department secretary T. R. Woodbridge noted the last part of the motion was a "motherhood issue. The way instructors evaluate students can vary enormously."

Woodbridge said spreading out marks should avoid the present trend of "bunching marks around the B level."

"There's a feeling now that if a student gets a mark below B, he's really failed," he noted.

Woodbridge said marks have gone up recently because of pressures to enter the Faculty of Education and the need to get a minimum of 70 percent in seven out of ten French courses for specialization, and in five out of seven courses for co-specialization.

At the same general meeting, however, the department shied away from adopting the Faculty of Arts and Sciences report's proposed redefinition of what letter grades — specifically a C grade — should signify.

Woodbridge noted the faculty's study on grade normalization was "a question still very much in a state of flux" and the French department preferred, before setting its own policies, to wait until the arts and science faculty instituted definite guidelines on marking.

The report, issued in November, recommends a C should indicate "average performance" and a B "above-average" achievement.

The report, drawn up by the academic standards subcommittee of the arts and science faculty, maintains too many Bs and not enough Cs are given in arts and science courses.

David Smith, who has been appointed the first chairman of the newly-structure centralized university French department next academic year, said he preferred to wait until the arts and science faculty decided on the matter of grade normalization.

Commenting on his new position, Smith said centralizing the present college French departments "will not have a dramatic effect upon the relation of students to their colleges or students' choice of where they will take a particular course."

Smith, chairman of the Victoria College French department for the past three years, said there were no immediate plans for a new central location of the re-structured French department.

The main change for students will be that Smith, rather than the present individual college department heads, will be the "last court of appeal," Smith said, "and this pertains only to "exceptional cases."

U of T president John Evans' Memorandum of Agreement on the Colleges outlines that all present "college subjects" being taught at individual colleges should be centralized into new, single university departments. Such courses include French, English, German, Near Eastern studies, philosophy and religious studies.

Creation of the centralized university departments will mean that instead of separate college departments in these courses, one university department will co-ordinate courses taught in all the colleges.

Smith noted that one effect not of the new structure but of financial cutbacks will be a reduction in the number of sections in some course offerings next year to eliminate some present duplication of course offerings among the colleges.

Smith added as a result the number of students per class will likely go up, but he stressed the French department, because it is teaching a foreign language, "demands that students should contribute in classes." Class sizes won't increase very much because "there's a need for smaller numbers in French classes," Smith said.

Soc students disagree over dep't revisions

Reacting to what was seen as a potential loss of power, Sociology students decided Friday to send back the interim report of the Student Assessment Committee.

Formed to review the operation of the sociology department, the committee had recommended changes in the present operating structure.

The chief objection to the preliminary report was its recommendation that as well as electing students to the department assembly, students also elect their own representatives to department committees.

At present, students elect members to the department assembly, which contains equal student and faculty representation, but committee members are selected by the assembly as a whole.

Soc department executive committee member Bob Brym argued that under the present structure, students and faculty members can band together to block unfavourable appointments to committees.

Under the proposed student changes, senior faculty members would dominate in the election of faculty members to committees, Brym noted.

Graduate Sociology Students' Association chairman and assessment committee member Henry Macleod said another report is being drafted, and hopes that it will be issued this week for student approval. Students will hopefully be able to discuss the revised report within two weeks.

After being approved by students, the assessments committee report will be forwarded to the department assembly for consideration. Before being voted on, the report must be given notice.

YOU DON'T HAVE TO MAKE A CAREER OUT OF A SUMMER JOB.

Once upon a time there was a student who selected her self out of a summer job. (Oh no, we're not just picking on girls. We've seen guys do it, too.) She wanted to be an architect, this kid. So she held out for a job that had something to do with architecture. None came along that year, and by the time she decided to settle for something else, it was too late. All the jobs were gone. So was her first year's tuition.

Moral: Don't hold out for the impossible dream.

Election controversy continues at York

By LAWRENCE GOLDSTEIN
 While student elections at U of T proceed with all the fiery enthusiasm of a wet blanket, the smoke still hasn't cleared from York University's bitter and confused student council elections held last Wednesday and Thursday.

In the voting for student council president, John Koornstra, a member of York University's United Left Slate (ULS) emerged an easy winner.

Koornstra polled almost half (635) of the 1,300-odd votes cast in the presidential election. He was running in a field of 10 presidential candidates, the most in council's history.

About 7,000 students were eligible to vote in the presidential election.

The ULS, a student activist party concerned primarily with building a united front of students, campus workers and faculty against provincial government education cutbacks, took 14 of 22 available seats on York's student council.

But the solid ULS victory has been marred by an election racked with accusations of improper procedures and miscarriages of justice.

Koornstra's status as president-elect has been challenged by York's present student council with a new election planned for March 24-25.

The basis of the challenge is an opinion poll conducted in conjunction with the presidential balloting asking York students if they felt a second election should be held because of confusion surrounding the first.

The vote on this poll was 657 in favor, 596 against with 52 abstentions and 11 spoiled ballots.

But Koornstra charged the poll was a deliberate last-minute attempt by the executive of the student council, to mislead student voters and to discredit the results of the election.

The opinion poll was introduced by the student council executive last Monday and given "official" status at a late-night meeting of York's student council Wednesday, one day into the presidential balloting.

By giving the poll binding status, the council violated its own constitution, which provides for a two-week waiting period when issues are put to a referendum.

"A lot of ULS supporters probably voted in favor of a new election as a protest against the way things were being run," Koornstra said. "They didn't think the election was fair to the ULS."

However, Koornstra said the ULS was prepared to "accept the results of the election even though we did have to put up with some rather underhanded tactics."

Koornstra was himself a surrogate candidate for ULS member Dale Ritch, disqualified from running in the presidential election by an election tribunal composed of the York student federation speaker, the chief election returning officer and a student representative.

The tribunal ordered Ritch and a running mate, Frank Giorno, disqualified, along with a three-day suspension of all ULS campaigning, because, it was maintained by the tribunal, the ULS started campaigning four days too early.

But many observers argued the tribunal's verdict was unfair and that confusion arose when the student council changed the election dates to March 12 and 13 from March 10 and 11, thus moving nomination closings and campaign starting dates from Feb. 24 to Feb. 23.

The ULS started campaigning on the originally announced Feb. 24 date.

York student council president Ann Scotton admitted things were "definitely unclear" at the council meeting that decided the election dates.

But she said since no one asked for clarification of the dates, none was given.

Scotton also said no action would be taken against a group of students who put up posters designed to discredit the ULS campaign late Tuesday night and Wednesday, again in violation of the council's constitution.

University lambasted over foreign student visa admissions policies

By BOB COLLIER

The university policies on visa student admission quotas were severely criticized at yesterday's meeting of the Governing Council subcommittee on admissions and awards.

Student member Howard Stein described the foreign student admissions policy of the faculty of nursing as "reprehensible and at best, tokenism."

Social science professor L. Tarshis added he was concerned over the university's responsibilities to the third world, especially in nursing.

The issue arose when a nursing spokesman admitted only two students of 80 were visa holders. But nearly 700 students applied for the 80 nursing places last year. Twenty-nine of the applicants were foreign.

The director of admissions, William Kent, added visa students are "actively discouraged" by his office. "The chance of them being admitted is virtually nil," he said.

Several subcommittee members pushed for a review of university admission policies and will consult the academic affairs committee on the matter.

The faculty of medicine won approval to limit the number of students with two years of university to 50 percent of the first year class. Meds professor Steiner was concerned that two-thirds of students admitted into medicine last year had only two years of undergraduate work, and this was "too little time to judge a student's potential properly."

Medical professor Thomas pointed out that "all the dice are loaded against a student" after second year because courses are harder, marks lower and applicants more numerous.

Professor Thomas added as long as a student has the basic prerequisites, organic chemistry and high school science, they would consider him.

"A straight A music student is given as much consideration as a straight A biologist," he said.

Admissions are based almost entirely on academic records, Thomas admitted, but consideration is given for a poor year. "It is inhumane to deny a profession to a student for the rest of his life just because he fell in love in first year," Thomas said.

Trinity professor Gordon Watson was "relieved to recommend" medical students be given first aid training in first year unless they are already qualified.

The engineering faculty will revise its English requirements for new students next year. The faculty has been severely criticized by employers because some graduating engineers were poor at speaking and writing English.

An engineering professor said some foreign students are able to specialize.

Hart House Board of Stewards (SAC President-elect)
Men's Athletic Directorate (SAC President-elect)
Women's Athletic Directorate (SAC President-elect)
Scarborough Stables Board of Directors (Services Commissioner-elect)
Varsity Board of Directors (Communications Commissioner-elect)
Radio Varsity Board of Directors (Communications Commissioner-elect)

In addition, SAC makes recommendations for appointments to the following:

The Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council (University Government Commissioner-elect)

Subcommittees of the Academic Affairs Committee:
Admissions and Awards (University Government Commissioner-elect)
Library (University Government Commissioner-elect)
Academic Appeals (University Government Commissioner-elect)
Curriculum standards (University Government Commissioner-elect)

Subcommittees of the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council:
Planning (University Government Commissioner-elect)
Resources (University Government Commissioner-elect)

Presidential Day Care Advisory Committee (Services Commissioner-elect)

Presidential Sesquicentennial Committee (Services Commissioner-elect)

All those interested in serving on any of these may apply by submitting an indication of their willingness to serve and a cucciculum citae.

Applications can be sent to the appropriate SAC official as indicated above, SAC Office, 12 Hart House Circle, University of Toronto.

Churches meet Falconbridge today

Liberation group exposes spy

By BOB BETTSON

A man who author Marc Zwelling called one of the "most mysterious figures in Canadian labor-management relations" has been expelled from the Toronto Committee to Liberate Southern Africa (TCLSAC) after the group found out his true identity, The Varsity has learned.

TCLSAC decided at its February 25 general meeting to expel a man calling himself "Hugh Stevenson," who members of the organization found out was really industrial spy Brian Gallagher.

Today officials of several church groups involved with TCLSAC are meeting with officials of Falconbridge, a Canadian corporation operating in Southern Africa to confront them with the evidence of Gallagher's activity and question them as to possible involvement.

Falconbridge, a giant Canadian multinational corporation, has operations in Namibia which bring it considerable profit by exploiting African laborers. The average pay for African workers is less than the poverty level at $40 per month.

Falconbridge has also defied United Nations sanctions against operating in Namibia, which South Africa illegally seized after it ceased being a UN trust territory.

TCLSAC spokesperson and U of T political science professor Johnathan Barker told The Varsity there was no concrete evidence linking Gallagher with any Canadian corporations, only inferences from Zwelling's 1972 report and other indications during Gallagher's dealings with TCLSAC.

Barker said the infiltration was the only one he had heard of under similar circumstances. "We are an open group. We can't investigate everyone's past," he said.

TCLSAC is a Toronto group which has specialized in research, education and lobbying on the situation in Southern Africa focussing attention on Canadian corporate involvement in the oppression of black people by racist regimes.

The history of Gallagher's activity in TCLSAC until his expulsion is outlined in a confidential report circulated to TCLSAC members. The report says Gallagher's involvement with the organization then The Toronto Committee to Liberate Portugal's African Colonies began in summer 1973 when a man came into the Education Centre looking for information on Portugal's African colonies.

TCLPAC was then involved mainly with the support of liberation groups in the then Portuguese colonies of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea Bissau. DEC referred him to TCLSAC member Judith Marshall who was fascinated by his detailed knowledge of Port Tupper and the Gulf refinery there, as well as the Gulf Boycott coalition in the US.

The man called himself Brian Stevenson and gave DEC the number of a Toronto postal box for its mailing list, later visiting three times in a six-month period, buying pamphlets DEC produced and distributed.

Earlier that spring TCLPAC had decided to observe at the Gulf annual meeting to gain information on Oil operations with Angola, then in Portuguese hands. A transcript of information learned was sent out only to members who attended a May general meeting although it was on sale at a Cinema of Solidarity book table that spring.

Gallagher joins TCLPAC

July 5, 1973 Gallagher became a member of TCLPAC under the name Hugh Stevenson, entitling himself to regular mailings which were sent to a Toronto postal box.

The first meeting he attended, coincidentally, was the strategy session making plans for the Gulf Annual meeting in 1974, held on March 14, 1974. His wife came with him to the meeting.

The report says the meeting discussed other groups TCLPAC could talk to including the Union of Oil Chemical and allied workers who Zwelling says Gallagher bugged in 1965.

Gallagher was not seen again until mid-summer, 1974 when he started coming into the TCLPAC office to do volunteer work. The report states there were "remarkable" coincidences in timing of this volunteer work, which involved stuffing envelopes, etc.

In mid-July, for example, there was a high level meeting with the Tanzanian high commissioner. Gallagher dropped in to volunteer some work and stayed while the meeting went on. Only executive members had been informed of the meeting.

Another incident involved a strategy session between members of TCLPAC and the African Liberation Support Committee, who were anxious to get involved. Some executive members missed the meeting and Gallagher showed up when they were able to hear a report on it, also unannounced to the general membership.

TCLSAC focuses on Falconbridge

At a fall general meeting, during which Gallagher was present, it was decided to focus on Southern Africa and tactics to explore Canadian corporate involvement through such corporations as Falconbridge and Noranda. Sub-committees of TCLPAC were delegated to work in this area.

After the summer "coincidences" several TCLPAC members expressed suspicions about Gallagher's interest in TCLPAC. He had even offered to use his van for transportation for the groups "Cinema of Solidarity" series if the organization gave him a key to the office.

The report says his biggest contribution was bartending at Guinea Bissau independence dance in September, 1974, where he chatted with foreign students asking questions about their countries and their activities in Canada.

Gallagher — "the most successful industrial spy."

TCLPAC members were increasingly curious about his seemingly endless family problems, used as excuses for not attending some functions.

Gallagher makes first mistakes
Gallagher was very interested in attending leverage committee meetings, which dealt with strategy in dealing with Canadian corporate involvement in Southern Africa. But chairperson John Saul always forgot to phone him about meetings, which made him complain to other members.

He told TCLPAC members he had contacts in Falconbridge.

In mid-November Gallagher phoned up DEC to order a large sampling of Third World literature, supposedly for the TCLPAC literature table. Since it was so large DEC checked with TCLPAC co-ordinator Mike Carr who said the order was not authorized. Gallagher offered to pay for it out of his own pocket, saying he had "interested readers."

Finally TCLPAC got the break it needed which enabled it to find out "Stevenson" was actually Gallagher. The license number of his car was traced to Mary Lyn Gallagher who lived at 21 Nanton, Toronto, the address of labor spy Brian Gallagher and his wife Marilyn Joyce.

Then the organization tried to find out what work was being done by Gallagher and for whom. In early 1975 Marshall called up Gallagher asking for information about his Falconbridge contacts.

Gallagher told her he would take a list of questions to his friend, "a yachting buddy". The list was prepared and given to him on January 25, 1975.

On February 13 Gallagher came to St. Paul's, where DEC's offices were located, looking for Swift. He joined a leverage meeting in progress and again offered to supply inside information by getting friends to borrow fields.

He also urged action against Noranda, a Canadian corporation with substantial investments in Namibia, which is now under South African control.

Executive recommends expulsion

On February 16, the executive recommended expulsion, based on evidence Hugh Stevenson was Gallagher. He was informed there would be an important meeting on Falconbridge on February 20 which he attended.

At the beginning of the meeting St. Paul's minister Murray MacInnes, the chairperson, asked him to leave, informing the meeting of the executive decision.

Gallagher's only reaction was: "Murray, I can't accept that." He said he had borrowed Mrs. Gallagher's car and admitted he couldn't produce identification to prove he was Hugh Stevenson.

This time he left.

Earlier in the summer he made enquiries at the Latin American Working Group office. LAWG was working jointly with DEC and others on a book on Falconbridge's involvement in Southern Africa.

This time Gallagher claimed he was a partner in an electronics firm interested in "radical things" who had friends who worked for Falconbridge willing to divulge confidential information.

Former RCMP man eavesdropped on unions

United Steelworkers organizer Marc Zwelling previously exposed Hugh Brian Gallagher in his report, "The Strike Breakers", written for the Ontario Federation of Labor in 1972.

Zwelling calls him "one of the most mysterious figures in Canadian labor-management relations. He is one of the most successful industrial spies in the country, mercenary enough to work for both management, and on one occasion, a union bureaucrat."

Gallagher, 43, began his career in industrial espionage after seven years with the RCMP. Then he rejoined them in 1960. Much of his work with the RCMP, according to Zwelling's research, was tailing union activists. Including members of the Seafarers International Union.

Gallagher again resigned from the RCMP in 1965 and began work for William McDougall associates, Zwelling says, as an industrial spy. Many in the union movement still believe he was working for the RCMP and did not resign.

During his employment with McDougall, Gallagher was listed as a "salesman" but whatever he did it only lasted six months before he went freelance.

Zwelling says Gallagher's past is littered with various "intrigues" involving tip-offs to police and work for Russ Tolley and Associates, a company managing welfare and pension plans for many unions, which would put him in contact with many useful lists of workers.

Gallagher's sordid past has made even most long-time friends and associates unwilling to talk about their association with him, Zwelling says.

In Port Credit he "popped up" during an investigation of electronic eavesdropping equipment discovered in the office next to the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International headquarters in 1965 during the B.A. strike.

Zwelling recounts there was a microphone embedded in the concrete wall and proof the telephone had been tapped. Port Credit police removed the equipment but then it mysteriously disappeared.

Two people posing as private investigators offered to sell the union tapes, allegedly made by the bugs.

These men were identified from photographs as Edwin MacDonald and Bill Sims, both friends of Brian Gallagher. Sims subsequently confessed he, MacDonald and Gallagher were involved in the bugging.

In 1967 Gallagher reappeared as a staff representative of the Teamsters, Zwelling says, on the personal staff of the director I. M. Dodds.

"His job appears to have been crushing dissidents and opponents in the Teamster's southern Ontario operations," Zwelling says. Gallagher and his friend MacDonald set a trap for the dissidents by offering to kill Dodds in return for $25,000. The offer wasn't accepted.

A deluge of mail criticizing the dissidents began arriving at Teamster headquarters, "red-baiting" many opposition officials within the union. The postage metre on the envelopes was traced to Russ Tolley and associates "at a time when Brian Gallagher had access to the premises."

Another incident Zwelling recounts is one in 1970 when Zwelling checked into a Post Hastings motel room, insisting on a room above or below a room held by union representatives organizing a drive in a Canadian General Electric Plant in the area.

The RCMP investigated and told the union Gallagher was bugging the union, but couldn't be arrested because until 1974 bugging was legal.

A motel official confirmed the RCMP investigation telling union officials he had seen the eavesdropping equipment in Gallagher's room.

Before this incident, Zwelling says, a union official at Toronto negotiations with the Oil industry's leader Gulf was registered at the Royal York.

Gallagher, going under the name "Gate" got a room next to the officials and tampered with the baseboard. This time a receipt for electronic listening equipment was found on the floor after Gallagher left the room.

Zwelling says Gallagher's 1972 activity centred on the construction trades industry, building up contacts with building trades unions.

At this point the story ends because Zwelling's book was published in 1972. Gallagher was not to reappear until his membership in the Toronto Committee to Liberate South Africa, TCLSAC.

THE CITIZEN'S COALITION

Corporate Interests Behind Coalition

Gordon Charles of the Consumer Affairs' Misleading Advertising Section said the department would be writing a letter to the group questioning their right to call themselves incorporated. Nothing else could be done, he said, because his section could only take action against advertisements for a product or for a commercial business.

"By some stretch of the imagination," he said, "it might be possible to make the case that the ad had a commercial purpose if the people promoting the ad were also promoting a commercial interest through the ad."

The ad opposes government insurance. Colin Brown works for London Life, a private insurance firm. Several other insurance firms are also represented on the group's advisory board.

The ad also says that CP Air is better than Air Canada. Ernest Manning, former Alberta premier and a director of CP Air, is also on the Coalition advisory board.

Coalition Vice-President Sarah Band confirmed from the Toronto headquarters of the group that the advisory board decides on ads to be used across the country. Coincidence of business and political interests of members of the group that would give Stanley a reason to act will be tested only if Stanley receives a formal complaint.

The Coalition lawyer R.B. Matthews admitted the claim to be incorporated in the ad was "technically wrong" and admitted he was "embarrassed" that the group had run incorrect information.

He said that he had contacted Consumer Affairs two weeks ago and had been told the incorporation had gone through but could not remember who he had spoken to. He stressed he did not see the problem as being particularly important.

Some people did see misleading statements in the Coalition ad as important. One was Richard Mackie, the business editor of the Ottawa Citizen. He said the ad "was written in a flippant tone more suited to an immature article in a high school newspaper than to a supposedly nation-wide comment on a serious labour dispute."

"The advertisement used exaggerations and misleading statements to attack the government and the strikers . . . It presented easy over-simplified solutions to a complex problem that faces the governments of many countries, not just Canada."

Mackie concluded "The Canadian business community has enough problems putting across its viewpoint on various issues without appearing to be reactionary and inevitably anti-government."

"An advertisement such as this can only lead the public to believe that thinking in the Canadian business community is 100 years behind the times . . ."

The General Labour and Trades Group did not feel the Coalition had acted responsibly, and questioned why they were fighting so hard to

By KEITH REYNOLDS

Representatives of some of Canada's wealthiest corporations are behind an organization which has just spent $18,000 on newspaper advertising opposing a union which is presently on strike in the Post Office.

The union, the General Labour and Trades group of the Public Service Alliance, is presently staging rotating strikes to back up their demands to be paid 90 per cent of what similar workers outside the government receive. Ten years ago they received the same wages.

The organization opposing them is the Citizens' Coalition, the brainchild of Colin Brown, an executive of London Life Insurance.

The ads they bought listed "10 things we could do about the strike at the Post Office," which included making strikes illegal, turning the operation over to private enterprise and suing the Post Office for false advertising for their latest ad campaign which states we have one of the best postal systems in the world.

But some questions have been raised about possible false advertising by the Coalition itself. In their ad the Coalition calls itself the "National Citizens' Coalition . . . A federal non-profit incorporation."

Glen Stanley of the Corporations Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in Ottawa, however, said "all I can say for sure is that they are not a federally incorporated body," nor were they on March 6 when the ads appeared in Canadian papers.

The group has applied for incorporation and if they are accepted the date of incorporation will be back dated to January 30, 1975.

Incorporated bodies are required to list their bylaws and directors' names with the Department of Consumer Affairs in Ottawa. While the application is only being processed this information is held as confidential by the government.

Stanley said the ad was definitely wrong, but the legal situation was unclear because nothing of this nature had ever happened before. Since the group is not yet incorporated, his section has no authority over it, he said.

Big Business Behind the "Little Guy" Crusade

keep the employees relatively worse off economically than they were 10 years ago, while trying to portray the strikers as making unreasonable demands.

Cliff Scotton, national secretary of the New Democratic Party also found parts of the ad questionable. The CBC, for example, was cited as being less profitable than the privately-owned CTV, while no mention was made that the CBC operates in less profitable markets in order to bring television to most Canadians. He said the purpose of the CBC is to provide broadcast service not to make money.

Scotton also suggested that the statement that private insurance firms gave car insurance more cheaply than government insurance was false.

The Man Behind the Coalition

If the Citizens' Coalition's ads appear to have a right wing flavour it is not surprising. Colin Brown admitted to Canadian Magazine in 1972, "You might say I'm a very far right winger." There are now so many socialists in Canada, he said during the interview, "the real revolutionaries are us right wingers." Brown's name has been in the news before the creation of the Citizens' Coalition. In London, Ontario, several years ago he tried to organize a campaign based on a program in Florida, which would anonymously provide a reward to people who might anonymously turn in a pusher of hard drugs.

Some people worried about the possibility of abuse of such a program and one United Church minister even went so far as to say "this type of spying for pay did not originate in Florida, it started in Nazi Germany." Brown started his anti-socialist crusade in the early '60s when he saw the advent of medicare as socialism's thin edge of the wedge. Some questions were raised at this time about Brown's actions since Brown handled what he said was a small amount of private medical insurance.

His next project was to oppose changes in the Income Tax Act which would have seen corporations paying a larger percentage of revenue to the public coffers. He paid for newspaper ads across the country and asked readers to support his stand. Brown says the campaign was relatively successful. He estimates that 400,000 Canadians wrote to their MP's protesting the proposed tax changes.

The Citizens' Coalition was formed to harness the kind of sentiment roused through Brown's ads, and since that time it has carried on campaigns through newspaper ads on several different subjects.

Most ads have simply opposed wage increases for employees in the public sector, but one of the most successful campaigns was against raises in salaries for members of Parliament.

During the last federal election the group also placed ads asking the leaders of the four major parties to make their positions known on several topics through ads which the Coalition intended to run later.

Their was some suggestion at the time that the questions paralleled conservative party policy, but only the New Democratic Party wrote a letter refusing to participate in the Coalition's scheme.

Brown himself has been very active in the Conservative Party in London, along with other notable such as John Robarts, the former premier of Ontario. Robarts was also until recently on the advisory board of the Coalition. He left the board after people questioned his political role with a group that was attacking the wage requests of Ontario civil servants.

But now Brown claims that even the Conservatives are moving too far to the left. In a kit Brown sends out to prospective Coalition members, several pieces stress the glories of free enterprise, suggesting that government services which protect people from the worst aspects of a failing economy are destroying initiative.

In an article by Brown decrying the similarities between socialist Sweden and Canada (from Viking to Robot) he makes known what he thinks of two other Canadian political parties.

"The present situation in Sweden is incredibly similar to Canada's. Substitute for the Liberals the Social Democrats, who are held in power by the vote of the Communists as the Liberals are by the New Democratic Party in Canada," he says.

Brown takes pride in the fact that the money to finance the ads come from "the little guy". He claims that of all the donations received none were for over $100.

But since the Coalition releases no names or figures it is difficult to tell where the money is actually coming from. Even the Toronto Globe and Mail criticized the Coalition in 1974 for their refusal to name their supporters, arguing that democracy was partly the right to stand up and be counted.

If the Coalition members did stand up and be counted it would be found that not all the members were the little guys Brown spoke of. Brown himself sells $3-million a year worth of insurance for London Life and estimated his personal wealth in 1972 as being between $500,000 and $750,000.

In promotional material Brown sends to prospective members he also includes five replies he received from a letter he sent to 1,000 people asking each for $100 to start the Coalition.

Two of the "little guys" who replied were former chairmen of MacMillan-Bloedel and Dupont of Canada. Two other replies came from former premiers Ernest Manning of Alberta and John Robarts of Ontario.

The advisory board of the Coalition has included men who between them represent Goodyear Tire, Canadian Pacific, Brascan (a company with ties to the right wing Brazilian government and former Canadian Cabinet ministers), the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, the Bank of Montreal, the Toronto Dominion Bank, MacMillan-Bloedel, Royal Trust, Crown Trust, Canada Trust, Power Corporation, Bell Canada, Avco, Stelco, Canron, Abitibi Paper, Holiday Inns, eight insurance companies, seven advertising agencies, Trizec (Canada's largest development corporation) and 57 other corporate interests.

While the Coalition has claimed poverty in its ads and requested money from its readers, the Financial Post Survey of Industrials for 1972 indicates that the combined assets of 39 companies represented on the board came to 52 billion, 46 million and 582 thousand dollars, not counting the insurance companies. The resources of the insurance companies comes to another 12 or 13 million, according to a researcher for the newspaper Old Mole which has carried stories on the Coalition.

Many companies, Brown says, have also provided tax-deductible services to the Coalition free of charge.

In spite of the vast resources behind the Coalition, the organization is trying to give the impression of a grass roots assembly of little guys upset by government waste and spending and the reduction of incentive in Canadian society.

The ads try to get Canadian wage-earners to support programs aimed at hurting other Canadian wage-earners. In the general trades ad of the public service alliance, for example, the Coalition is attacking wage demands that would only give the workers 90 per cent of what others are earning outside the government.

But no matter how absurd or phoney the issues raised in the ads the governments in Canada may do some serious listening. A chunk of the money from corporations behind the Coalition goes to the Liberals and Conservatives in every election. And with new regulations concerning election expenses a group like the Coalition, which could advertise outside the binds of spending limits, could be very interesting indeed to a political party that was willing to listen to Brown's revolutionary right wing views.

PUNCH

STUDENT AIDS - TH

BY PETER O'MALLEY
FOR CUP.

There is a growing uneasiness and frustration in student groups these days concerning expected changes in government student aid policy.

Student organizations fear the increasing cost of post-secondary education will be placed upon the student. Tuition fees will be raised they argue, loans will be increased and grants decreased or cut off altogether.

The more optimistic predict that students will end up owing $5,000 to $6,000 upon graduation. But others, perhaps more realistic, suggest a resulting debt somewhere between $11,000 and $15,000, depending on the length and type of degree program.

Understandably, student leaders and representatives are demanding a new policy that promises a better deal. But the very structure and machinery operating behind the federal-provincial student aid program deems effective opposition a difficult task.

First of all, most Canadian students have little understanding of how important the role of the federal government is in student aid.

Because the loan scheme is administered by the provinces for the federal government, most student groups go after provincial bureaucrats and politicians when they seek change.

But it is the federal government, although usually in conjunction with the provinces, that formulates the basis student aid policy and is responsible for future amendments to the program.

There is no doubt that pressure on the provincial level is vital to the financial improvement of students. But carrying demands to the federal level could provide long-term benefits.

With that in mind it is necessary to take a closer look at the role of the federal government in the past and speculate on its future position on student aid.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

Though many students may understand the general substance of the Canada Student Loans Act (CSLP) through their own transactions, not such seems to be known of the specific provisions of this statute of Parliament or how it came about.

Passed in 1964, the Act marked the decision of the federal government to get involved financially in assisting students who otherwise would not be able to attend college or university.

The government was probably influenced by much of the writing and publicity at the time regarding the elitist nature of "higher education" in Canada. Academics, politicians, journalists, and especially parents, called for a change in public policy in post-secondary education. They wanted a system of financing student education which recognized that schooling beyond the secondary level was not a "privilege" for those whose families could afford it, but a social "right" for those who could prove the ability to attain a degree.

Increased accessibility to post-secondary education became a major political issue as the post-war "babies" came of age in the early '60s.

While it was one thing to make speeches about "universal accessibility", it's quite another to get the government to finance the proposition. Providing students with bursaries, scholarships and other forms of financial grants was consistent with the idea of education as a social right. But simply making it easier for students to borrow money to pay for their education was a cheap alternative.

As a result, the Act to Facilitate the Making of Student Loans was enacted. The federal government agreed to guarantee loans for education purposes up to a stipulated amount, and to cover the interest payments until six months after the student had finished school. Students had to be "in need" and agree to pay the money back out of future earnings.

The provinces were to administer the loan applications and authorize payments under the plan in accordance with regulations passed by the federal cabinet. These regulations concern the definition of a student, terms of repayment, default procedures and banking transactions.

Under the Act, overall responsibility for implementation of the plan rests with the Minister of Finance. Until a change in 1970, the total amount of federal loans to be authorized under the Act and the loan ceiling per student per academic year, was stipulated in the Act itself. Since then the Minister of Finance has been given a formula to allow for automatic annual increases in the total budget. The loan ceiling, though still contained in the Act, is raised periodically through a "Supplementary Estimates" vote of the House of Commons.

From a political perspective, and from the viewpoint of those interested in improving financing available for students, one of the most significant aspects of the Act is its silence on what constitutes "need" and how it is determined. Consequently, the major questions of how much "aid" is to be received, whether parental contributions should be a factor, and all other matters relating to whom the CSLP would benefit were taken out of the public forum which Parliament, to a limited extent, provides.

This decision-making vacuum was inevitably filled by a consortium of federal-provincial bureaucracies. They, rather than the politicians, have ended up quietly making vital social policy decisions about student aid.

THE DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE AND THE CANADA STUDENT LOAN PLENARY

Deep in the bowels of the federal Finance Department is the Guaranteed Loans Administration, which deals with student loans.

According to GLA Chief F. C. Passy, the interest of his unit in the CSLP extends to the administrative areas of "the repayment phase of the plan" and matters related to "lenders, repayment or collection." Larger student aid policy concerns, he says, are dealt with elsewhere.

From this it could be assumed that Passy and the members of his department are simply program administrators, responding to policy directives formulated by the politicians in consultation with other parties.

But Passy is also chairman of an almost clandestine group of federal and provincial bureaucrats called the Canada Student Loan Plenary Group. Passy says this group's function is to develop a "standard administrative criteria" to ensure that students in each province receive "the same treatment."

As chairman, he says his job consists of "obtaining a consensus among provincial views in order to arrive at recommendations (for the Minister of Finance) and to ensure the intent of federal legislation is maintained."

It is difficult to discover whether Passy's plenary group does deal only with procedure and administrative matters, or whether it actually makes decisions of a substantive policy nature. This information is unobtainable because the body meets in closed sessions and releases no minutes or records except for one — the Canada Student Loans Plan Administrative Criteria.

The first section, entitled "Basic Principles" begins: "The responsibility for the cost of post-secondary education to the individual student remains primarily with the parent (guardian or immediate family) and or the student."

This 'basic principle' is clearly not a mere administrative criterion. Rather, it is a statement of social policy which has been frequently challenged by various groups seeking a better student aid deal. It is not contained in the Act or in the Regulations passed by the politicians. It is an example of special policy formulation masquerading as mere administrative problem solving, undertaken by the civil service with the passive approval of the elected legislators.

Other than that one published document we know nothing of other policy decisions the Plenary might make. But a document recently leaked from another government body dealing with the student aid question provides us with a report of what was decided in the 1974 meeting of the Plenary.

Included in the report were references to aid for part-time students, raising of the student loan ceiling to $1,900 per year (likely to happen in 1976-77), calculation of the parental contribution tables, and hence a working definition of what constitutes "need."

Although there is no expected increase in the number of students enrolling in the upcoming years, the report states that "the actual outlay by the federal government in terms of CSL would increase sharply in 1975-76 and even more so in succeeding years." This can only mean a greater debt upon graduation for students if the loans are increased.

As chairman of the plenary, Passy takes the "provincial consensus" back to John Turner, for consideration and approval.

The critical point isn't that Turner takes advice from federal and provincial bureaucrats on how to run the CSLP, but that there are no other groups which share in this mandate. There exists no vehicle by which concerned parties can learn of, let alone comment on, proposed policy changes.

And even when the whole plan is being "modified" through administrative declaration into a scheme resulting in graduates having their income drained for years, there is no way to inform or accommodate public opinion in the decision-making process.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND THE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TASK FORCE ON STUDENT AID

The other federal department playing a role in student aid, is the Educational Support Branch of the Secretary of State.

According to Passy, it concerns itself with "matters of broader student aid significance". As far as the CSLP itself is concerned, this branch keeps a watchful eye on whether the plan is meeting its intended objectives.

And Secretary of State Hugh Faulkner, claims it isn't.

He told an audience of university administrators last November that the plan was created to provide "a mechanism capable of correcting some of the inter-regional and inter-personal inequities in educational opportunities which would otherwise prevail." In other words the CSLP was to provide poor people and those in poorer regions an opportunity for education similar to those who were rich, or from a rich region.

But because there are still pockets of disadvantaged individuals who don't make it to university, Faulkner feels the CSLP has not worked.

"It is not enough to compare the socio-economic and regional composition of the student body with the composition of the total population when we know full well there remain disadvantaged individuals who belong to groups which tend to receive the least amounts of education," he said.

According to the Secretary of State, the continued existence of social inequality in post-secondary educational opportunities must cause us to take a "sober" look at the whole CSLP. It isn't enough that the student aid system has a proven ability to make progress in lessening class and regional barriers in Canadian society; it has failed to eliminate such inequality and this is not good enough for Faulkner and the "Just Society" envisaged by his government.

For this reason Faulkner would have us "begin to examine the financial needs of students in light of what is being done for other groups in terms of income maintenance, and treat this question ... as a genuine social security pre-employment issue."

In other words, if a student and or his her parents qualify for welfare assistance then so be it. But for the vast majority of middle income students social justice dictates loan rather than grant assistance. He omitted reference to the other advantage of loans over grants — that loans are a cheap form of government aid compared with grants.

Faulkner did make reference to the current direction of federal thinking as far as setting tuition fees is concerned. "To the extent that federal support enables institutions to hold down tuition fees" he said "many relatively well-off students might be unjustifiably subsidized."

So social justice as defined might be unjustifiably subsidized.

So social justice as defined not only, means loans instead of grants for the vast majority, it also means increased tuition fees. Faulkner again declined comment on another aspect of this tenet of his theory of social justice — that increased tuition fees means the government can pass on a greater proportion of the cost of education to the individual student, thereby reducing the need for government operating assistance to institutions.

The recent discovery that a secret federal-provincial Task Force on Student Aid has been operating since last fall proves Faulkner to be a man of his word when he says his department is studying the "more broadly based concerns in the area of student loans." Co-chairman of the body is none other than R.J. Lachapelle, the director-general of Faulkner's Education Support Branch.

The terms of reference for the task force, as agreed to by the federal government and the Council of Education Ministers of the Provinces, are expansive:

"To give immediate consideration to those changes necessary in existing federal plans for student assistance in order to bring them into line with existing needs and educational patterns."

They will also examine and recommend "possibilities of coordinating and or rationalizing" the CSLP with manpower training allowances, the occupational training program and other related income maintenance manpower training schemes.

The minutes of the November meeting of this group show that one of the first items was the presentation of Faulkner's speech.

"There was some indication that the federal thinking regarding support for post-secondary education, including student aid, might take a new direction, as mentioned in the Secretary of State's address."

The membership of this federal-provincial task force consists exclusively of student aid bureaucrats. They are to continue to meet in closed session, releasing no information, until August 1975.

At that time they will deliver a report in closed session to the Council of Education Ministers. It is safe to presume that the report will likely be the outline of a coordinated federal-provincial master plan for student aid policy changes.

It is also safe to presume the final results of the long months of discussions will be a recommendation to move toward the eventual elimination of student grants except for those who can qualify for welfare; increasing tuition fees to reduce operating deficits and the need for government funding; and increasing the amount of money a student will be able to borrow to pay for a college or university education.

CONCLUSION

We know that massive changes in thinking on the funding of post-secondary education are taking place. But because of the secretiveness that surrounds all the federal decision-making bodies involved in student aid, we are left to draw our conclusions from innuendo, hints, leaked documents, and analysis of patterns of past thinking.

But most student groups conclude that things are going to get worse for the individual student in the immediate future. The frustration lies in the fact that even an organized opposition will have a difficult time pressing for a reformed student aid program when no government body will admit its powers and real involvement in the program.

Since there are no legitimate channels open to interested groups to add their input into decision making, political action has to be broadened to include a greater public support group. This should especially involve parents, high school students and anyone who will be affected by the changes in the future.

THE ALIEN ENEMY

E.R.H.

By HOWARD STEIN
Member of Admissions and Awards Sub-Committee of the Governing Council

As the war against budgetary restraints rages on, a harmless group of students are being stealthily eliminated behind the lines. Their assassins are cloaked in bureaucracy, hiding in plush offices around the university.

Striking with precision, they have directed quotas, language requirements, and residence restrictions against students of foreign origin, especially student visa holders, and newly landed immigrants.

Restrictions on foreign students are not new at the University of Toronto. There has been, however, a resurgence and intensification of the drive to limit such students. In most cases the new restrictions have been aimed at all foreign students. In some cases, however, they have been directed at specific ethnic and national groups.

MEDICINE and ENGINEERING

Perhaps the most ethnically specific, and hence most potentially volatile, restrictions on admissions have emerged in the Faculties of Medicine and Engineering.

The first overt signs of hostility towards Chinese students in medicine came to light in an article in the Toronto Star on September 24, 1974. The article, titled "Medical Schools Flooded by Foreigners, M.D. Says", quoted Bette Stephenson, president of the Canadian Medical Association, as saying:

Twenty five per cent of first year medical students at the University — which boasts the largest medical school in Canada — are Chinese mostly from Hong Kong.

According to the medical faculties own admissions figures, however, only 10 students of the 240 admitted were foreign students on visas. Considering also that there was a 10 per cent quota on out of province students, while the remainder are subject to a one year residency requirement, it becomes apparent that Dr. Stephenson was really referring to Canadian citizens and landed immigrants of Chinese origin.

In the same article quoted above, Dr. Stephenson went on to make equally questionable observations about the Chinese students:

"It is a fact that there are fewer opportunities for Canadians because we have been admitting foreign students" she added.

"Many foreign students, the Chinese for example, tend to devote themselves entirely to academic studies and they succeed. Canadians have a broader outlook.

This was to be the first in a series of attacks aimed directly or indirectly at the Medical Faculty's policy on admissions; a policy that was seen as admitting too many Chinese students.

Dr. Cathcart, professor of the Department of Family and Community Medicine, was the first to join Dr. Stephenson. In a letter to the Star he supported her arguments, adding:

"She is quite right in objecting to any preponderance of candidates for medicine of non-Canadian status — whether Chinese or any other nationality. I fully agree with her. This brings me to the experience we have had as teachers of non-Canadian Chinese students. We are finding a high proportion of these students have great difficulty in communicating with patients. Medical problems and symptoms are stored and then shared partly through talk and careful listening. Coincidental with this is the careful auditory of non-verbal sets of cultural responses and implicit complex clues. Cross cultural thought patterns differ allowing communication and interpretation gaps to appear. Intellectual capacity and academic standing should not be the exclusive guidelines for admission of any candidate to medicine. We need candidates who can relate to the attitudes, feelings and facts of patient problems in Canada."

But how is one to decide when a person is acculturated enough to be able to cross such a "cultural gap"? Are Jews or Ukrainians any less subject to tradition than Chinese students? Clearly Dr. Cathcart's ideas obscure the issues at hand.

While The Star was printing these letters, the Medical Post, the house organ of the Canadian Medical Association, was conducting its own campaign against Chinese students. John Fisher, an "avid non-medical reader", wrote a letter to the Medical Post in December, complaining that Chinese students came from Hong Kong to Canada, in preparation for the day when the Communists overran the tiny colony. "Knowing this," he concluded, "the tremendous responsibility these Chinese students have, there is little wonder they study 18 hours a day."

The Medical Post commented favourably on Mr. Fisher's letter. In its editorial that day, it lauded the letter for answering the question

Why are the Asiatics able to beat in competitive examinations students who have been educated in the Ontario high school system? The letter provides an answer that may not have occurred to any of our readers. But it also raises another question. Should we provide an escape hatch for those families who do not live under the Chinese Communist regime at the expense of our own Canadian-born students who want to get into the professions.

It was because of pressure like this that the University of Toronto's Medical school moved to remedy the situation of "too many" Chinese students. The weapon of exclusion was to be language.

Six days after the Medical Post article, the Council of the Faculty of Medicine approved a motion that had been passed in May, 1974, by the Academic Affairs Committee. The motion read:

The applicant's ability in the adequate use of the English language will be taken into consideration. Evidence of this will be derived from such tests as the verbal component of the Medical College Admissions test administered by the Committee on Admissions of the Faculty of Medicine, or interviews.

The medical faculty, however, deemed such a measure too abstract and inadequate, and therefore recommended on December 16, 1974 that the Undergraduate Admissions Committee select the applicants to be given a provisional offer of admission; that all those selected will be interviewed; that the Interview Panel be made up of members of the Undergraduate Admissions Committee or their surrogates' that when the applicants selected provisionally are deemed to have inadequate ability to communicate in English, they be given a contingent admission for one year, at which time they be reexamined and if their English is adequate they be admitted to Medicine; that if their English is still inadequate, their contingent acceptance to medicine be revoked; that an appeals mechanism quite separate from the admissions process be available to such applicants.

This recommendation is part of a series of amendments to the new Medical School calendar, which is in the process of being approved by the Governing Council.

Clearly the interviewing process will enable the Medical School to reject those it deems as having an "inadequate ability to communicate in English". The problem with such an approach is that it is subjective, and could be used in a punitive manner against Chinese students. Because it is subjective, it is also subject to public pressure, which can be even more dangerous.

The Medical School is not the only professional faculty utilizing admission standards to limit the enrollment of Chinese students.

For some time the Faculty of Engineering has had a policy of restricting the number of foreign students to 10 per cent of the total enrollment of seven hundred. Since most of the applications for admission from foreign students came from Chinese students, the Faculty added a rider that "no more than half will be accepted from any single country." Even though the total 10 per cent quota could not be filled, the Faculty refused to allow more than the 5 per cent allotted to Chinese students. Thus the actual quota on foreign students was closer to 6 per cent.

On December 4, 1974, the Executive Committee of the Faculty of Engineering decided that there were still too many foreign students, and passed a motion that cut the quota from 10 to 5 per cent of all admissions, with the same rider. Thus the quota of Chinese students was reduced further to 2½ per cent, without affecting other national groups, since they had only accounted for about 1 per cent of the admissions. In short, the reduction was aimed in a discriminatory manner at the Chinese overseas students.

In addition to quotas, the Faculty has tightened its student language requirements, aiming them at landed immigrants as well as student visa applicants. Again, this new policy is directed at least in part at those of Chinese extraction, some of whom, Prof. Jervis, Associate Dean of Engineering, has argued, are having problems with English.

The preamble to a document from the Admission's Committee of the Faculty of Engineering, dated February 6, 1974, stated:

Since the Committee on Admissions realizes the importance of English proficiency as a professional necessity of an engineer the Committee recommends that there be a stricter administration of the Faculty's stated requirements for English facility as follows:

- 1) All applicants whose mother tongue is not English who have not studied at least 2 years in Canada or have not had secondary instruction taught in English for at least this period are required to present a satisfactory standing in one of the acceptable facility tests.

The document went on to outline very strict requirements, including a standing of 85 per cent in the University of Michigan English language test.

It should be noted that these restrictions have been implemented before the faculty has determined the success of a remedial program in English that it implemented in September.

Medicine and Engineering are examples of a broad movement for restrictions of landed immigrant admissions into professional faculties in the University of Toronto. This has either taken the form of objectively racist moves against a specific nationality, as in the case of Medicine or of a more general restrictive nature against all foreign students.

For example, Dentistry is planning to increase its Ontario residency requirements from one to two years. Dental Hygiene, Pharmacy and Rehabilitation will not accept applications from students on visas unless they are sponsored by organizations such as Canadian International Development Association.

CONCLUSION

Implicit in this drive to restrict the number of foreign-origin students is the argument that such students are "stealing" positions in the professional faculties. It is also premised on the assumption that, for example, Chinese students are somehow "different" from English Canadians.

In essence, the purpose of restrictive admissions policies is to redirect frustrations stemming from the competition to get into the professional faculties. Instead of blaming budgetary constraints and the regulation of entry by professional associations we are to blame the foreign students.

Clearly, however, reducing the number of foreign students in engineering 45 to 35 will not solve the problem of a thousand applicants being turned away each year.

In short, the foreign students are being used as a scapegoat. Our attention has to be directed away from foreign students toward a government and system that is preoccupied with restricting entry into higher education, thereby continuing the elitist and class-brand professions.

Friction Over Oil

Canada and the US

reprinted from McGill Daily
by Julian Sher

The Washington meeting at the end of last year between our smiling Pierre and the unelected successor to the shaky throne of Richard Nixon did little to dampen the growing contradictions between the two countries.

Tensions have been growing between Canada and the US — each the other's largest trading partner — for months.

Differences sharpened last winter when Ottawa raised the export tax in oil. These were followed by large hikes in natural gas prices and the recent announcement that Canadian oil exports to the US will be cut from 1 million barrels a day to none by 1982.

The US responded with an Export-Import Bank refusal to finance an American firm's plans for oil work in Alberta; a public suggestion by American Ambassador of further pressures in the form of coal export cuts; and a protectionist battle still raging over beef and pork.

The situation led the Financial Times of Canada to remark that Trudeau's assurance in Washington that neither country wants a trade war was a "meaningless declaration."

And much noise has been made of late over yet another American attempt to block the sale of goods from a US subsidiary to the "enemy" island of Cuba. The flag-waving pronouncements of Industry and Trade Minister Alistair Gillespie about "sovereignty" and such would have made even Walter Gordon or Eric Kierans look pale. (Though even the Financial Times and other business organs conceded that Gillespie's spiel was just so much noise to cover up for the government's inaction).

But despite some business tensions on both sides of the "world's largest undefended border" — (a border which nonetheless has American capital and even some American troops on both sides) — the current skirmishes between Canada and the US are hardly of the same nature as the inter-imperialist competition the US now faces with its European or Japanese rivals.

Oil Control Vital

Oil — the central point in this winter's heated Washington Ottawa controversy — is a case in point.

The "Canadian" oil industry — 91 percent foreign (mainly US) controlled — is so integrated into a continental energy scheme that Canada is ironically the only oil-exporting nation which actively sides with the western powers against the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC).

Oil policy in Canada is largely designed to serve the needs of the US multinationals which run the industry, to the extent that Canada is soon expected to become a net importer of oil.

The long-standing dispute between the oil-rich province of Alberta and the central government over jurisdiction over natural resources — i.e., who was going to set the rate for the sell-out and take a bigger piece of the action — resulted mainly in a $500 billion bonus in royalty and tax changes for the oil monopolies. These monopolies have not exactly distinguished themselves with meagre profit margins, being edged out perhaps only by Ma Bell for rip-off of the year.

Thus, the current US-Canadian squabbles over oil (and over trade in general) are more a dispute over tactics — how the pie is going to be divided — than over basic strategy of a continental energy scheme. US oil giants of course are on both sides of the fence.

One indication of the basic harmony that still exists between the two ruling classes was US Treasury Secretary William Simon's statement that Ottawa's cutback scheme was "done after close consultation with us" so that it would not be "too disruptive." Some energy officials in Washington are reportedly considering an oil-swap deal in which Midwest refineries would continue to use Canadian crude oil after the impending oil cut-off, with Canada importing Alaskan oil to offset its exports to the US.

Will friction over resources cool the relationship between American and Canadian capitalism?

But it would be equally erroneous to see Canadian big business as so dominated by the American goliath so as to rule out any contradictions between them.

The actions of Canada's industrialists and financiers are determined much less by their particular feelings towards nationalism than to their objective needs to make, as the saying goes "a fair profit." And the rising heat of economic crisis which is pressuring the Canadian bourgeoisie to jockey for a better trade position can only bring more tensions with an also desperate US ruling class.

American big business has long considered Canada — the site of about a third of its direct foreign investments — as safe within its hip pocket. Indeed, in past decades, Canada's rulers have been content with having control of light industry, parts of secondary and resource industry, transport and the financial sector, leading other key sectors in US hands.

A New Epoch

But the collapse of the international monetary system in recent years is ushering in a new epoch in which riding the coat-tails of the American empire is becoming a less profitable venture. Hence, in recent months Canadian business has tried to weaken its bond with the falling American star, making a push for European ties, encouraging Japanese investment and jucing up its own imperialist deals in such places as Brazil and the Caribbean.

The pressure is mounting at home as well. The Royal Bank of Canada's new-fangled "Trendicator" is treading bad news for the boardrooms. In November, the Bank was confident that there was little chance of a "recession"; by December it said only that a "major depression" was unlikely, presumably implying that we are already in the recession although the government and business men insist we are not!

As the new year gets under way, even that prediction is wearing thin. The best economists can say is that Canada is the best off in the western capitalist worlds, which is like telling the last Christian in the arena with the lion that he has nothing to worry about — so long as the lion doesn't eat him.

Unfortunately for us, the lion of inflation and unemployment — "stagflation" they call it — which is devouring the US is beginning to roam in Canada as well. The US industry, the weak link in the decaying American chain, threatens to pull its northern branch-plants down with it. By January 8, temporary and indefinite layoffs in the Canadian trade, which exports 80 per cent of its production to the US, reached 50,000.

Thanks to the auto pact which is now shifting jobs back to the US, Canada's 1974 auto trade deficit will be a record $1 billion. Analysts predict a 1975 shortfall in our total balance of payments of 3.6 billion — and that on the heels of the worst ever recorded third quarter payments deficit last year equivalent to more than a $2 billion annual deficit.

Economists forecast increases in the present inflation rate of 12 per cent and unemployment rate of 6 per cent. And to add insult to injury, Quebec's Industry and Commerce minister Guy Saint-Pierre tells us that 1975 won't be as "good" as 1974 was.

Labour Intractable

With the economy sinking, one of the most noticeable upturns has been the sharp increase in workers' militancy. Shrinking pay checks in the face of skyrocketing profits have a tendency to anger all kinds of working people. More than 8 million worker-days were lost in the first nine months of 1974 as a record number of walkouts, many of them illegal, hit various sectors. In addition to marathon one- and two-year strikes in Quebec at United Aircraft and Canadian Gypsum respectively, militance has also come from the public sector workers at all levels of government.

Postal workers, grain inspectors, fire fighters and civil servants have all joined industrial workers at one point or another in demands for wage hikes and cost-of-living escalators in contracts. The Economist, a steady barometer of world business opinion published in London, placed Canada second to last in a list of western countries ranked by "labour stability" — outflanked only by ever-turbulent Italy. And to make matters worst for those on top, over 1 million workers have their contracts up for renewal this year.

In response to the strike wave, big business has relied more heavily on the talents of labour bureaucrats to calm the more radical rank-and-file. Ottawa has dangled the carrot of "cooperative restraint" before the reformist trade union leaders.

The stick, however, is ever present: while new racist immigration policies seek to drive a wedge between working people of different nationalities, public opinion is being prepared for an attack on labour through such means as the Cliche Commission.

Nor is it just labour that is giving Canada's ruling elite a tough time. With the widest student protests against cutbacks since 1968 and growing dissatisfaction with national inequalities, Quebec is again becoming a hot spot.

The native peoples across Canada are becoming more adamant in their demands for a full restoration of their rights. And the Canadian ruling class also faces internal conflicts, as Ottawa and the provinces battle over jurisdictions within a federal structure unable to stand the strain of American penetration.

On all fronts, then, the ruling class in settling in for a hot winter with no freeze forecast in the growing conflicts spreading across the country.

This story is an adapted version of an article which appeared in the January 8 issue of the American weekly newspaper, The Guardian.

Canada looks Seductive to U.S. oil interests.

Zoology prof denies he precipitated McReavy dismissal

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Zoology professor Jacques Berger has denied having anything to do with the zoology department's dismissal of storekeeper Paul McReavy.

McReavy was fired by the zoology administration in early January for what he says was union activity among the zoology support staff.

Two complaints by Berger to zoology administrator G.H. Temple over storeroom service were thought to have been the immediate cause for McReavy's dismissal.

"Dr. Mettrick told me my complaints had nothing to do with the dismissal," Berger said.

"If I were responsible for the dismissal I would say so. Up until now, the administration has had a ban on discussing the matter," Berger said.

The ban was apparently lifted last Thursday after zoology associate chairman D.F. Mettrick met with McReavy and offered him another job but not reinstatement to his old one.

Berger said he was responsible for teaching and supervising graduate projects but had nothing to do with hiring and firing in the department.

Berger agreed he had registered two complaints over storeroom service which he said had been very slow.

But he thought that making complaints was legitimate: "It's just like getting something in a department store that doesn't work — you make a complaint and take it back."

Berger said he was quite surprised that the complaints had anything to do with McReavy's firing, and said he had talked to McReavy recently to try and straighten it out.

"Just because the zoology administration makes an official statement clearing Berger doesn't mean it's true," McReavy said.

"Yet quite possibly it is true. Why then didn't they clear Berger's name long before — why didn't they spare him this personal embarrassment?" McReavy said.

"It's possible the administration has been holding Berger in reserve as a patsy if things went against them," McReavy said.

"Dr. Berger told me recently that Mr. Temple has had a well-known vendetta against him for eight years.

"It's possible this has been a major factor in why the administration has refused to clear Berger's name before this," he said.

McReavy said he thought it was quite legitimate for Berger to make complaints against the storeroom service, but said that poor service was not his fault.

In an earlier interview McReavy's immediate supervisor Bill Smith backed McReavy up, explaining there had been a mix-up in the delivery of packages to Berger which was not the zoology storeroom's fault.

Auld hangs sign for campus visits

OTTAWA (CUP) — James Auld's planned tour of Ontario colleges and universities, announced here March 6, will take place, but not as originally planned. Auld is scheduled to hit U of T on Monday. At the time of the first announcement it was said the minister of colleges and universities would visit each campus this spring. But Auld's executive assistant, Clair Hoy, said in an interview last Friday, Auld has decided to visit as many campuses as possible over the next few weeks, but the major portion of the tour will have to await the fall.

Reporting on his discussion with

Auld that same morning, Hoy said: "The general conclusion we came to is that visiting campuses after early April would be a waste of time as far as meeting students are concerned."

He cited student examination and essay due dates as the primary concern. The major thrust of the campus visits by the minister is to participate in "bear-pit" sessions with students and faculty.

He estimated Auld will be able to visit about seven or eight campuses over the next few weeks, but the specific campuses will not be decided until the institutions have been consulted.

According to Hoy, Auld will spend at least a few hours on each campus. He will probably meet with the university presidents and boards of governors, attend bear-pit sessions and meet with the student and outside press.

"The bear-pit sessions are the main purpose of the visit," Hoy stressed. He also emphasized that the visit provided an opportunity for members of the student press to question Auld directly about provincial education and financing policies.

Auld has received criticism in the student press not only for his policies but also for allegedly avoiding meetings with students and answering questions from the press.

In the last two weeks Auld has sent letters to the editors of the Excalibur at York University and the Charlatan at Carleton University denying he has been "elusive".

Shakespeare this play ain't

By LIZ NEAL

Bertolt Brecht's rewriting of Shakespeare's Coriolanus (Hart House Theatre, March 13-22) is a botched piece of drama.

Brecht has rewritten the second half of Shakespeare's play, but left the first virtually intact, with cuts and minor alterations.

The unevenness of the script was made all the more evident by the staging. German director Wolfgang von Stas did both Shakespeare's scenes and Brecht's in Brecht's comical style of mechanical group-movements, with character and motivation suppressed. This style obfuscated the sense of the unrevised Shakespearean scenes.

Except for Valerie Pugh as Coriolanus' mother, and professional Rex Southgate as the dissipated, crafty patrician Menenius, the supporting actors were incapable of delivering Shakespeare's complex, subtle speeches with even a minimum of grace.

Hardest done by in the forcing of Brecht's style onto Shakespeare's scenes was John Cartwright as Coriolanus. Brecht's slant on Coriolanus seems to be that the people's rise to political maturity turns a patrician mob-hater into a political anachronism, and his outbursts against the fickle mob into comic tantrums.

In the play's first scene (cut, but not otherwise altered from Shakespeare) Coriolanus quells a riot by his mere appearance before the mob. But not content with having reduced the mob to silence, von Stas's Coriolanus amuses himself by chasing them around the stage, waving his sword at them like a comic version of Errol Flynn. This could hardly have been what Shakespeare meant by disdain for the mob, nor did it particularly fit what Coriolanus was saying at the moment.

Once the play passes into what Brecht wrote himself, things go better.

Cartwright is convincing as a pushy, cantankerous politician. The six citizens, acting in the ensemble style of which their director is clearly a master, are continually entertaining.

Their two tribunes, Louis Flores and Stephen Hannaford, colorless in the first half, fill the bill nicely in Brecht's scenes.

Canada-wide speaking tour to criticize apartheid system

By WILLIAM MOORE

One of the uglier political realities in a generally ugly world is South African apartheid, the systematic exclusion of an entire people from access to the means of a life of dignity and material well-being.

Dramatic events, such as the recent massive wave of strikes by non-white workers and the shocking shooting at Carletonville, have focused world attention and concern upon this repugnant system of apartheid.

The idyllic image of genteel, leisured whites existing peacefully and in perfect harmony within a sea of carefree, contented "coloreds" is rapidly dissolving as a worldwide anti-apartheid offensive exposes the vicious reality of South African apartheid.

This same offensive has had growing success in isolating South Africa in international affairs (such as in sports) and in discrediting the African National Congress as the sole legitimate representative of the people of South Africa.

As part of this world-wide offensive against apartheid, on March 23 (8 pm) at Convocation Hall, two prominent leaders of the South African people, Josef Dadoo (Vice Chairman of the Revolutionary Council of the African National Congress) and John Gaetserve (South African Congress of Trade Unions Representative to Europe), will begin a Canada-wide speaking tour.

Among the aims of the tour will be a refutation of the latest attempt on the part of the South African government to portray itself in the best "liberal" humane light which today takes the form of the so-called policy of relaxation of "petty apartheid".

While the government undertakes such meaningless and publicity-seeking steps as the removal of separate park benches, the backbone of the severest sorts of repressions — the apartheid state structure — remains untouched.

The dismantling of the repressive, inhuman apartheid state structure would entail such things as the granting of unconditional voting franchise, the paying of equal wages for equal work to Blacks (i.e. Africans, Coloreds and Asians), allowing non-whites to form trade unions, upgrading health and educational facilities of all non-whites, abolishing the pass system and all other such laws, renouncing the Bantustan scheme (reserves for Bantu peoples) and in general abolishing racial discrimination in all forms and manifestations.

The Canadian government has adopted an ambivalent attitude towards South African apartheid. They, of course, express moral indignation and yet passively accept the trade with and the investment in South Africa by Canadian Corporations.

GOVERNING COUNCIL ELECTION

Ballots have been mailed to the eligible voters for this year's Governing Council election of new staff and student members.

Any eligible voter who has received an incorrect ballot, or no ballot due to an error in records may contact the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160 in order to obtain the correct ballot.

Completed ballots should be returned by CANADA POST, CAMPUS MAIL or personal delivery to the Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall prior to 12:00 noon on March 27th, 1975, to be valid. Also, for the convenience of voters who may wish to deposit their ballots on campus, ballot boxes are placed in the following locations:

- Erindale College - Library
- Scarborough College - Library
- Simcoe Hall - Information Desk

The above locations will be open until March 27th, 1975 at 12:00 noon. Both locations are open during regular library hours, and the Simcoe Hall location during regular business hours.

Enquiries regarding the election may be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

MR. DARKROOM

It was my original intention to outline the mechanics of developing a film and making a black and white print in this and future columns. These are, however, covered very thoroughly and simply in my Mr. Darkroom wall chart. Photographs and copy take you through the 6 easy steps to the negative and 9 stages to a finished print. These are yours for the asking, and many persons have already done so. Along with these requests came many queries: "Why should I do my own developing and printing?" This column will give you many reasons.

Darkroom work is exciting and creative. It allows you to put the finishing touch (no pun intended) on the creativity started with the exposure made in your camera. The imagination shown in printing puts your personal stamp on the work. Your darkroom technique gradually becomes an extension of your ability with a camera. For example this originality can be shown in the form of picture composition of other than the customary square or oblong format. Many examples come to mind — a sunset, cropped to full horizon width but only two or three inches high, or a slender tree printed in a vertical format no wider than is necessary to include the actual tree. I'm sure you can think of many more, and looking at the prints you have from previous shooting you will see many different cropping possibilities. Selective cropping gives impact to the subject matter by removing unnecessary detail from the finished print. This cropping is done by raising and lowering the enlarger head to obtain proper size and using the variable arms of the easel to mask the image to exactly what you want to show.

The adage "He walks best, who first learns to creep" was never more true than when applied to darkroom work. The basics that determine a successful print are not as glamorous as many techniques to produce special print effects, yet without these fundamentals, no print is really successful. There are many things you can do to gather this knowledge. First, make your source of supply a dealer knowledgeable in darkroom and interested in helping you get the most from your purchases. Second, find a camera club that majors in darkroom work and with a membership eager to assist beginners.

Third, make use of the services that we as Durst and Paterson representatives offer you in the form of help by phone or letter.

When establishing a darkroom, remember that the price tag is a reflection of what is built into the equipment you choose, and that a good enlarger can be a lifetime purchase. Dependability of alignment is of paramount importance to producing a print that has overall sharpness. Quality of components in the illumination system determine how even the lighting will be from side to side on the print. That's why I am so keen on the Durst reflex system. Light does not go straight from lamp to negative, but is deflected downwards by a mirror. Heat escapes not only through lamphouse vents but also from back of mirror. Lamp may be raised and lowered, as well as rotated to ensure precise centering with mirror. Illumination is totally even, yet retains the crispness of a condenser enlarger.

Queries and problems should be addressed to Mr. Darkroom, Braun Electric Canada Ltd, 3269 American Drive, Mississauga, L4V 1B9. When sending in a problem print, please enclose negative and as much detail as to exposure and equipment used as possible.

Sour grapes

ONLY BUY

By PETER ROWE

The United Farm Workers announced last week that 700 food stores in the province of Quebec have agreed to stop buying boycotted grapes in the 1975 season.

The decisions by the Hudson's Bay distributing group (supplying 400 stores) and the Metro Stores federation (representing 300 retailers) came less than a month after the initial move by Steinberg's supermarkets in Montreal to honour the boycott.

U.F.W. spokespersons expect similar announcements to be made by most of the Montreal retail food industry within the next few weeks. The only retailer with whom the farm workers anticipate difficulty, according to Canadian boycott director Marshall Ganz, is Dominion Stores.

"But the more retailers that line up in support of the boycott, the more untenable Dominion's position becomes. Support for the farm workers is now a legitimate position for Canadian retailers," said Ganz.

A demonstration two weeks ago resulted in the permanent removal of the grapes from the St. Lawrence Market.

Pressure will be increased until Kensington Market retailers agree to a complete ban on the sale of grapes.

To raise funds, the U of T boycott committee presents the film Cabaret, starring Liza Minelli, Thursday and Friday, March 20 and 21, at 7 pm and again at 9:30 pm, in the Med Sci Auditorium.

The donation is $1.25.

Ideas: The spark we run on

Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted, ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Theatre Mickities play excellent

The Theatre Mickities' production of Sean O'Casey's Juno and the Paycock is the only student contribution to the Irish Week now in progress at St. Mike's.

It's nice that it's so good. Student theatre groups often tackle the classics of the theatre for no other reason, if one is to judge by their productions, than that "they are there."

The result is that the only thing one can say about the productions is that "There they are": there behind one, there, thank God, to be forgotten.

That was the case to be sure, with the Theatre Mickities' School for Scandal presented last term.

I am amazed that the company that was responsible for that clumsy embarrassment is also capable of this really superb effort.

This production, directed by Tom O'Hanley, is of such a consistently high level of quality throughout that one is put in the fortunate position of being able to realize what a sound solid play O'Casey wrote more than fifty years ago, what a great achievement and a great piece of theatre it is.

Not only that but this production presents an interesting interpretation of the play. The characters do not have a vitality and dynamism that make them heroically elementally larger than life. They seem to share the same needs and inadequacies and as well they seem to insist on retreating from any real relationship with one another into being "characters". They are all despicable, really: one welcomes the series of catastrophes at the end because here at last is honesty — or damnation.

One does not feel sorry for one character over any other, nor does one feel that hope lies with one character more than another. And here, all, all, have the freedom if not to be independent of their circumstances at least to accept their responsibilities — and most of them of course try to escape facing those responsibilities.

It's a hard truth to accept and one worse to proclaim but some human beings seem to need tragedy and affliction if ever they are to rise above themselves.

The Theatre Mickities are to be commended for bringing that truth home to us so satisfyingly. It would be invidious to name names: not one person is miscast, everyone contributes significantly to a wholly rewarding presentation: This is student drama at its best.

The production continues at Upper Brennan Hall until Sunday.

Bears missed a glorious opportunity to tie the game late in the third period when team captain, Steve McKnight, had a wide open net to shoot at but shot the puck into the press box instead.

Varsity played well in the second two games but were not quite equal to the hustle and close checking of the Bears. Blues tired and were forced to use the fourth line of Bill Hews, Frank Davis, and Paul Sawyer to give the regulars a break. Sawyer, Hampton, and Davies were exceptional at killing penalties. The checking of Doug Herridge and Larry Hopkins kept Alberta on guard all series. Bob Adoranti replaced Frank Davis in the second game and played well.

This was the second national final that Toronto has come away from empty handed this year, but as they say down at the CNE, "next year — next year!"

All-star team announced at Edmonton

By DAVE STUART

Part of the pre-series activities at the CIAU finals every year is the announcement of the players picked to the All-Canadian all-star team. Only those players picked all-star in their own conference are eligible. This year both center Ivan McFarlane and defenceman Warren Anderson were OUA stars.

Both Varsity players were overlooked this year when the choices were made public during a luncheon of beet-red Alberta beef at the plush Chateau LaCombe in Edmonton.

Picked to this year's dream team are: Frank Turnbull (Man), goalie; Scott Grady (St. Mary's), defence; Ross Barros (Alta), defence; Ron Hawkshaw (Wat), wing; Doug Dunsmuir (York), wing; David Wilson, (Loy), center.

It was interesting to note how the CIAU were able to afford lunch for some 100 guests, mostly freeloading media types who couldn't care less about intercollegiate sports, while not being able to afford the expenses of more than 17 players to travel to Edmonton to participate in the finals.

It took some doing but coach Tom Watt and his team dug up the money to send all the players who had helped get the team into the finals. Rightly so! After all, this year the finals were billed as a best-of-three for the first time in order that the three games would provide extra revenue to defray travelling costs.

The CIAU, while not being able to interest the CBC in televising the series managed to wine and dine the local CBC hierarchy during the series. Only the final game of the series was televised and only by a local Edmonton station. The only live coverage of the entire series was by Radio Varsity. A disgusting situation for the national finals!

Football fans will remember that this is not the first time the CIAU has dropped the ball. The Canadian College Bowl should have been played on a Saturday afternoon not a Friday night. Want to know why? Because the CBC were committed to televising the Canadian Junior Football final from Vancouver on Saturday afternoon. So, the CIAU arranged the College Bowl for Friday night. Was it televised? NO! It was taped and shown on Friday at midnight. Midnight indeed! Who wants to watch football at that time of night.

It's about time the CIAU started promoting college sport as it is supposed to do. As the only body in Canada that can make or break college sport, it had better clean up its act.

Blues come close - but not enough

By DAVE STUART

EDMONTON — The University of Alberta Golden Bears won the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) national hockey championship for the third time in their history with a 5-2 defeat of the Varsity Blues in the third game of the best-of-three finals staged in Edmonton last weekend.

Bears defeated the Blues 5-0 Friday night in the opening game and Toronto evened the series with a 3-2 win Saturday, setting the stage for the showdown game Sunday.

Three power play goals were the difference as Bears capitalized on Blues' penalties while Varsity was plagued with the same problem it had to face all year — putting the puck in the net. Blues managed only five goals in the three games.

Blues dominated both the first and third periods and for a while in the early going of the third looked as though they might make another comeback similar to the St. Mary's series in Halifax.

Trailing 5-2, Blues buzzed all around Alberta's net but adequate netminding by Dale Henwood, together with a set of goalposts, kept the Blues at bay.

Varsity had struck quickly in the opening period. Bill Fifield won a faceoff in Bears' territory setting up Al Milnes who fired a low shot from the point beating Henwood on his glove side at 0:53.

With Gord Davies in the penalty box for slashing, Bears picked up their first power play goal by Bruce Crawford four minutes later to tie the score at 1-1.

Blues again went ahead at 7:52 of the first when Kent Ruhnke connected on his second goal of the series but All-Canadian defenceman Ross Barros tied it at 2-2 three minutes later.

In the second period, the scoring accolades all went to Alberta. Oliver Steward netted the winning goal at 0:07 when a clearing pass into Blues' zone took a funny bounce off the boards and right in front of the net. The puck hopped over Warren Anderson's stick when he tried to clear it, leaving Steward alone with a clear shot that beat goalie Mark Logan.

Two more goals by winger Jim Ofrim and Barros completed the scoring for the Bears. There were no goals in the third period.

Blues went a lot farther in the playoffs this year than many fans expected and with a few breaks might have won the national championship.

Two or three Blues came down with the flu before the first game, including Mark Logan. Logan did not play in the opening 5-0 loss being too sick. Dave Hulme replaced Logan and really cannot be faulted on any of the goals. Logan played the second and third games but was physically weak as he had not eaten since noon Friday.

Ivan McFarlane was pushed into a goalpost midway through the first period receiving a charlie horse and torn ligaments in the crash. McFarlane returned for the final two periods with his leg frozen.

Last, but by no means least, was the officiating. At the risk of sounding like sour grapes, the referee, Dick Currie, who handled the second and third games, is, without doubt, the worst referee in Canada. Holding and interference were rampant all over the ice, but no penalties called. Every time the Blues seemed to mount an offence, they were stopped by a penalty call.

The linesmen were just as bad. Have you ever seen a linesman drop the puck on the toe of a player taking a faceoff. You had to be there. Another gem occurred when a Varsity winger, inside Alberta territory, passed back to a defenceman on Blues' side of center ice. Yep, you guessed it, Varsity was called for an offside pass. Currie, in his infinite wisdom, realizing the mistake, decided the faceoff should be at center ice further penalizing the Blues.

In the opening game of the series Friday night, the close checking of the Bears kept Varsity off the scoresheet. Blues were credited with 21 shots in the game but actually the Alberta defence stopped twice that number. Blues were not allowed the skating room they have been used to and as a result trailed 2-0 at the end of two periods.

Frustration took hold of Toronto in the third period as team discipline collapsed and the Bears virtually owned the ice. Bears popped in three more goals to eventually win 5-0.

Bears opened the scoring in the first period when they had a two man advantage. Both Davies and Fifield were in the penalty box. Barros lugged the puck into the Toronto end and set up Brian Sosnowski on the edge of the crease with a perfect pass. All Sosnowski had to do was tip it in.

Clarke Jantzie picked up Bears' only goal in the second period while Ofrim got two in the third. Brian Middleton netted the fifth Bears' goal.

Varsity's four man defence crew of Warren Anderson, Rocci Pagnello, Dave Rooke, and Al Milnes repeatedly failed to chase Bears from in front of the net giving Alberta second and third chances at the rebounds. They connected often.

Brent Swanick was dressed for all three games but saw limited action as he is still recovering from a knee injury and Charlie Hughes did not see any action as he was also on the injury list. Blues' third goalie, Bob Oss, made the trip west but did not dress.

Despite the 5-0 loss, Blues came back Saturday night to tie the series with a 3-2 win.

Ruhnke and McFarlane got Varsity off on the right skate with two goals early in the first. Ruhnke scored unassisted at 9:20 when he stole the puck from a Bear defender. McFarlane took advantage of the resulting Alberta confusion when he picked up a quick lead pass from winger Ron Harris at center ice and raced into Bears' zone. He stopped at the faceoff circle and fired high catching the upper corner on the long side. Toronto led 2-0.

Twenty-three seconds later, Kevin Primeau narrowed the margin to 2-1 as he beat Logan cleanly to the glove side.

Anderson and Oliver Steward kept the scorer busy when they picked up minors for roughing at 12:20. Neither team played shorthanded though as offsetting minor penalties in the West are treated like offsetting majors in Ontario.

Steward tied the game at 2-2 with the only goal of the second period at 6:13. He was easily the most dangerous player on the ice for Alberta as he picked up two goals and four assists in the series.

In the third period the persistent forechecking of the Blues, especially the line of Hampton, Fifield, and Davies, earned Varsity the victory. Bears were harassed in their own end and finally coughed up the puck in a goal mouth scramble. Both Fifield and Davies banged at the puck, but in the end it was Hampton who backhanded it over a prone Henwood for the winning goal at 11:34.

Blues protected their one goal lead for the remainder of the game. "We forechecked harder after that third goal than at any point in the game," said coach Tom Watt after the game.

Campus groups form Common Front

Wednesday's mass meeting will be the result of more co-operation among campus workers, faculty members and students than this campus has ever seen.

That these three groups have overcome their traditional isolation to work together against the provincial government's cutbacks in university financing is itself an indication of how seriously the cutbacks are affecting each individual group.

The Common Front now consists of the following groups: Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 1230 (representing library workers); U of T Faculty Association (UTFA); Students' Administrative Council (SAC); U of T Staff Association (UTSA); non-unionized workers from U of T administration offices at 215 Huron St.; Arts & Science Students' Union (ASSU); Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA); Graduate Students' Union (GSU); Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS); and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

The idea for the Common Front came from CUPE local 1230 president Judy Darcy, who sent out letters to all campus groups.

The letter suggested a coalition could be formed to present a unified front to the provincial government.

At the coalition's first meeting March 4, Darcy clearly expressed the reason for forming such a group.

"It's becoming increasingly obvious to everyone that we won't be able to get what we want by ourselves without the support of other groups," Darcy said.

UTFA president Bill Nelson said it was important for the groups to work together to avoid what he called "the pie game."

The pie game, according to Nelson, is a favorite ploy of government bureaucrats and university administrators.

One group is played off against another with the claim that "if we give you more of the pie, we have to give somebody else less."

Nelson said the pie is not of a fixed size and the university administration can budget for a deficit if it wishes.

Nelson said the government is paring back university expenses as much as possible — "trying to find out where the fat stops and the bone begins," Nelson said.

Once the groups decided a united front in the face of the cutbacks would be to everyone's advantage, they agreed to call for a day of study at the university to discuss the cutbacks, put questions to government representatives and plan future action.

Similar study sessions have already taken place at several other campuses across the province.

In Ottawa, where Carleton University and Algonquin College have been hit particularly hard by the cutbacks, student-worker-faculty coalitions from those institutions and from Ottawa University are working together to gain broad public support for their aims.

Study sessions have also been held at York University, at Fanshawe College in London, and at Lakehead University in Thunder Bay.

The U of T coalition originally planned to close down the university for an entire afternoon to permit full discussion of the cutbacks. The coalition considered it essential non-academic staff be given time off work to attend the study session.

When the coalition presented its request to U of T president John Evans, Evans said he did not have the authority to cancel classes.

Nor was he willing to close down all campus services (library, cafeterias, offices, physical plant, etc.) for an entire afternoon.

Representatives of the Common Front reached a compromise with Evans whereby campus services would be cutback to minimal levels, so that skeleton service could still be maintained, but most campus workers would be able to attend the meeting.

Similarly, Evans said that although he could not cancel classes on his own authority, he would "strongly recommend" to faculty members they cancel their classes on that day so they and their students could attend the meeting.

The formation of the Common Front at U of T is a significant development.

It shows that campus workers, students, and faculty members can unite against a common enemy — the provincial government — on a specific issue — the budget cutbacks for 1975-76.

More important, it shows that the different groups, no matter what their past disagreements have been, have some sense of their mutual dependence.

Given provincial government's avowed policies for the future in university financing, which includes increased tuition fees, and decreasing levels of government support, the decision to stand together is just good sense. Come to the meeting Wednesday, March 26 at noon and show your support.

U of T cutbacks meeting set for Wednesday

Spokespeople for all student, faculty and staff associations on campus are urging their members to attend Wednesday's university-wide meeting on educational cutbacks.

The university will be partially shut down between noon and 2 pm to allow as many people as possible to attend the meeting.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch says he thinks students must attend the meeting since it is "important that students become aware of how the cutbacks will affect them."

Students, he points out, will suffer most from educational cutbacks which have been occurring since 1972. This trend will continue unless they do something about it, he predicts.

Kanowitch says it is important that students become more heavily involved in university budgeting, in order to protect their own interests while the budget is shrinking.

As many people as possible should attend the meeting, Kanowitch says, because the government will be watching.

If only two or three hundred attend, it will get the impression "nobody cares."

But if many people show up, the government will begin to take them seriously.

If students don't attend, Kanowitch says, then they only have themselves to blame when the cutbacks begin to affect them.

As a result of Wednesday's meeting, Kanowitch hopes a "hard-core common front" group will be formed, which will launch a lobbying campaign to help universities out of their present financial crisis.

UTFA University faculty association spokesman Michael Finlayson says the purpose of Wednesday's meeting is to present the government with a "common front," from the entire university to express the "profound dissatisfaction of the university community with the present financing policies."

The meeting is important, Finlayson says, because it is a "sign of hope" that the various estates on campus will do something they have not often done — work together, realizing their common interests.

If successful, the meeting will have some political import, Finlayson believes, although at this stage it is only a "tiny gesture."

In summary, Finlayson believes, "There is a point in doing it all together, and there is a point in everybody coming."

UTSA University staff association president Betty Connelly says the purpose of the meeting is to confirm that government cutbacks affect the university in all areas.

UTSA's concern, she says, is to make it clear the cutbacks will mean either staff layoffs or low wage increases, both of which are unacceptable.

The importance of the meeting, Connelly says, is to inform the government the staff is concerned about the university and its future, and to make it aware of how all the university groups feel about the cutbacks.

Connelly urges university staff to come and find out more about the effect of the cutbacks if they are concerned about their salaries and their jobs.

Connelly hopes the meeting will let the government know that all groups on campus — not just the administration — are concerned about the future of the university and the quality of education.

CUPE 1230

CUPE local 1230 president Judy Darcy says library workers "have very definite interests in opposing the budget cutbacks. As the funds coming into the university are cut back, so are our wages and working conditions."

Library workers, Darcy says, cannot accept a deteriorating standard of living any longer, and want to do something about it.

Problems of the university, Darcy says, are directly linked to cutbacks in provincial educational spending.

"Yes, we do think the university should demand a bigger 'pie' from the province," Darcy says.

But the question of building an ongoing coalition is a thorny one,

Darcy believes, since university spending priorities have to be changed.

GAA

Graduate Assistants' Association vice-president Jay Drydyk says the purpose of the Wednesday meeting can be to speak to all the people affected by the cutbacks at once.

The meeting is important, Drydyk believes, because all the groups affected can realize they have much in common. So far, they aren't accustomed to looking at it that way, and don't realize it.

The meeting will be able to show the university and the province there is "quite a bit of unity among students, faculty and staff", and people will be prepared to act as a result, Drydyk hopes.

Moreover, Drydyk says, the province will be forced to take the universities seriously, and stop making cuts in university budgets, or at least from doing it so high-handedly.

GSU

Graduate Students' Union president Frank MacIntyre sees the purpose of Wednesday's meeting as familiarizing the university community with the nature of the cutbacks, convincing it of its ability to reach its aims and goals.

The importance of the meeting, he believes, is to shake the government away from its long-term plan to cut back university budgets, to convince decision-makers there is "not the kind of fat they think is there."

The province must be made to realize the "heavy investment" it made in education in the 1960's will be "severely damaged," MacIntyre says.

MacIntyre hopes the meeting will achieve three things: an awareness in the university of the long-term government policy, a "community sense that we are together in this issue," and an agreement on how to take the universities' case to the public.

APUS

Part-time students' association president Norma Grindal says the purpose of Wednesday's meeting is to impress upon the government that it is not taking care of its responsibility to higher education. She urges as many people as possible to attend the meeting to make an impression on government.

215 Huron

The organizing committee for workers at 215 Huron street notes that "by attending the meeting, all the staff will have the opportunity to hear what other members of the university think of their situation, and to voice their own views."

It says "the government is trying to put students, staff and faculty against each other, saying that for one group to flourish, the others must suffer." The committee calls on university workers to stand up and fight the government like other public sector workers have already done.

SPECIAL CUTBACKS EDITION

How the cutbacks wo

One of the most serious effects of provincial cutbacks in educational spending for most students is in the area of library services. For this special issue The Varsity looks at the crisis situation which exists in Sigmund Samuel library, which is used for course reading and essays by most undergraduate arts and science students. Much of the article is based on interviews and a report done by union steward Sheila Copely and library technician Mikki Fontana.

By BOB BETTSON

"Intolerable working conditions" at the Sigmund Samuel library due to budget cutbacks and staffing shortages are causing serious problems in maintaining adequate services for students.

Twenty six unionized library staff members at the library have filed a formal grievance to U of T management labor relations man John Parker, whom they will meet with today.

The grievance, filed last week, culminates two years of growing problems in fulfilling the promised role of the library, to serve undergraduate students with a duplicate copy collection and trained staff who can help them use the library.

This was the aim when the single copy, stack collection was moved to the John P. Roberts Library in 1974, leaving Sigmund Samuel with the 200,000 volume Wallace Room collection and a number of amalgamated college and departmental collections.

Students who occupied Simcoe Hall three times demanding open access to the Roberts stacks were told they would only need to use Roberts for research. Course reading circulation would be through Sigmund Samuel.

Well, according to unionized library staff, partial success is literally overwhelming the small number of workers at Sigmund Samuel. Only thirty librarians and library technicians work full time at the library, with the help of untrained student assistants.

Yet circulation soared by over 26 per cent over last year and the library is continually growing in popularity. Circulation increases have put tremendous pressure on an already over-worked staff.

Although technicians in the five different subject areas have degrees in the fields they are in charge of, and would like to assist students, they literally never have the time. All their time is spent in taking reserves, shelving, making renewals, filing and other technical duties.

One of the arguments made when collections were amalgamated from New College, the Political Economy and History Branch Lending Services and the extension library, was that service provided to students by informed library personnel in suggesting useful sources could continue, even in a larger library.

"COMPLETE CHAOS"

But according to literature area worker Mikki Fontana what really happens is "complete chaos." She said there is never enough time or staff to do all the technical jobs and still help students.

She pointed out a huge line-up of carts with unshelved books which had just been returned, and explained before she could even tell a student if a book was in the library, she would have to ask him or her to look through all the unsorted trucks and all the sorting shelves.

Even then, the book might be out. If she put in a recall notice there would be little chance of a quick return because there is only one full-time worker on recalls. Even if that worker reached the person with the book the fines system makes it easy for a student just to ignore the request, bring the book back and pay the fine.

Both Copely and Fontana said the staff does not think the fine system is any way to make sure books are available when students need them. They suggested a computerized borrowing system which would not allow a student to take out any more books until he had returned those which were overdue.

MINIMUM WAGE

The library avoids hiring on extra full-time, trained staff by hiring unskilled students, giving them one hour's training and expecting them to do the work of a higher level technician for barely over the minimum wage of $2.40 an hour.

The union last fall suggested a staff increase of at least one third of the present size to make the library able to provide adequate service. Their requests were met with a promise of three new full-time personnel, only one of which is now working.

Another tactic of library management has been to hire workers for 24 hours a week, the maximum allowed without membership in the union and a higher wage scale.

This is one way to get around hiring full-time personnel.

The statements of workers that the library is in chaos seem readily borne out by everyday scenes of countless students waiting to check out books from the two workers on the main circulation desk or lining up to ask for renewals.

Yet students seem to complain only to the workers and the library management only hears complaints from workers.

During a recent visit to Sig Sam, a Varsity reporter observed an incident which an extremely busy worker was accosted by a student over the

At the heaviest times, sorting shelves are incapable of holding all the books and books are put in the employees' lounge at the back where they hang their coats.

Another organizational problem is the crucial shortage of staff in re-calling books. With a two week loan period on books which are often intended for classes of more than a hundred students there just aren't enough opportunities for students to do course reading if books are not recalled.

Copely would also like to see floating personnel who can fill-in during the rush periods to enable the level of service to continue. Now, even when a worker is sick there is usually no replacement.

In a March 18 brief the Sigmund Samuel staff also outlined staff shortages in the following areas:

- student assistants to shelve books
- more recall staff needed
- not enough staff to keep accurate records of fines or overdues
- not enough staff to do searches and reserves
- subject area staff are also asked to help in main desk, leaving areas understaffed
- lack of replacement of staff on sick leave
- lack of student assistants to cope with circulation

Provincial budget-j subject re-organization.

Management has refused to speak to the Varsity because of the grievance procedure going on. An interview had been Unshelved books lie wasted at Sigmund Samuel library.

In fact many libraries in Canada operate without fines, until a request is made for a book, then slap on heavy penalties which bring immediate return.

One of the effects of these problems on the staff is the complete decline in morale. Most library workers are degree holders. Yet their pay starts at $5,571 a year for a level two technician. And recent increases haven't even kept pace with the cost of living.

phone for allegedly taking the coffee break she would be entitled to, but couldn't take anyway because of the heavy workload.

The filing, according to workers, is often over three days behind and renewals and reserves are therefore very difficult. Sorting shelves are in complete disarray and even during peak borrowing periods in November and March shelf space is at a premium.

● subject area supervisors must spend time in areas doing technical work, leaving them little time for training or co-ordination

The solutions proposed would have considerable budgetary implications. The union proposes a total of seven full-time staff members in each of the five subject areas, including three student assistants, a permanent night staff and arranged with acting chief librarian David Esplin and Sigmund Samuel head librarian Sheila Laidlaw, but this was cancelled because of the filing of the grievance, which will be dealt with by Parker.

Laidlaw did say in a brief interview that the library management wanted to improve service but was prevented from doing so by budgetary limitations.

'We will have to work a great deal h continually keep top library personnel tied up in meetings so they are unable to spend time co-ordinating and supervising other staff.

The union is also very upset by the almost tacit acceptance of five straight years of budgetary cutbacks by acting chief librarian Esplin and chief librarian Robert Blackburn, who is on vacation.

In an interview after recent chopping of the library's already-strained budget, Esplin said "we will have to work a great deal harder and we can't promise any relief."

SIX-YEAR DECLINE

Calling the library "all too well practised" in making cuts, he said they have been experiencing reductions for six years.

Though the only effect to users will be longer waiting periods for books, Esplin claimed, other effects will be absorbed internally.

Earlier in the year a SAC brief charged there was a drastic need for improved library service and increased hours of library service. But with provincial spending cuts and the library management's reluctance to fight, the trend seems likely to continue towards poorer service, and shorter hours.

Another issue the workers have raised is the lack of planning during off-peak periods for the reduction of existing backlogs.

Probably the most interesting from a student point of view is the thousands of volumes in storage in the former stacks, not in circulation. Many of these have been amalgamated from smaller libraries. But staff have never been hired to reshelve and bring them into circulation.

And if a volume is in storage, chances are a worker will not have time to help a student get the book because of staff shortages.

STUDENT SUPPORT

This kind of problem has led workers to begin handing out leaflets last week to students telling them about serious staffing problems and urging them to complain about poor service.

The workers feel student support is essential to win their battle for improved working conditions and better library service for students.

There are some planned renovations to the library this summer and on into fall 1976. But these will deal with the physical layout of the building and not the staffing problems which are the key to union grievances.

Many would contend the situation of crisis proportions can only be found through a general increase in government funding to universities and more priority to libraries.

But it also seems evident that library management has always placed a premium on the image it presents in terms of monumental buildings such as the Roberts library or plush reconditioning jobs such as the face-lift given to the Sigmund Samuel library after the stacks moved to Roberts in 1974.

Management's actions on staffing shortages have contradicted their avowed concern for shortages. Copely said in a number of cases personnel vacancies have been left open when the money was already budgeted, because of management inefficiency.

Training of new staff has been poor and the students as well as workers are in a classic sense "over-worked and under-paid"

The Sigmund Samuel workers see the situation as a basic lack of follow-through by the university library system. They renovated the library and promised improved services. Now, because of budget cutbacks and a lack of a strategy to fight them, the university can't deliver to the library. And the library can't deliver to students.

Who suffers?

The workers and the students who use the library. Students are sometimes unable to keep up in their readings or adequately research essay assignments because books are not available.

As for the workers, Fontana expresses it best when she says: "We spend all our time complaining to one another. You start the day with plenty of energy, but half way through you're tired and at the end of the day you come out like a zombie."

This was the common sentiment of other workers surveyed.

Only joint pressure from workers and students will force U of T to spend more money on book acquisitions, staffing and providing better service for students and better conditions for campus workers.

And only unified pressure from within the university on the provincial government will make sure the university gets the funds it needs to maintain adequate levels of services.

Students win tenure seat

By BOB BETTSON

U of T students won a major victory Thursday when the Governing Council voted to seat one student on all university tenure committees.

The 19-15 vote overturned a decision of the council's academic affairs committee, and represents a firm rebuff to the leadership of the U of T faculty which strongly opposed any student participation in tenure decisions.

The move climaxed a two-year SAC campaign for student representation. The campaign featured a referendum in October 1973 in which students voted 8 to 1 in favor of representation on tenure committees and 2 to 1 in favor of equal staff-student representation.

The March 20 decision stipulates the student representative will be one of six voting members, with five votes required to grant tenure.

A jubilant student council president Seymour Kanowitch hailed the decision as a "tremendous victory" for the student cause.

But a tight-lipped U of T president John Evans had no comment. Provost Don Forster, who headed a task force on tenure procedures which rejected student representation, also refused comment.

A shaken academic affairs committee chairman professor John Dove also refused comment. Much of his committee's time had been occupied discussing new tenure procedures, and it had voted narrowly to recommend to Governing Council the continued exclusion of students from tenure decisions.

Faculty members of the council were visibly upset, especially during the thumping applause which greeted the decision from the 80 students in the Simcoe Hall Council chamber. All but one had opposed student representation.

Kanowitch explained the student victory by pointing to increasing public concern that the university was emphasizing research over teaching.

Student organizers had given wide publicity to existing university practice of rewarding publication records and research performance in tenure decisions, while ignoring teaching ability. Only student representation could ensure adequate consideration of teaching ability, the students argued.

Kanowitch said public concern explains why government appointees on the council and many alumni voted with students.

The decision will now be referred back to the academic affairs committee to decide how to select student members. The committee may try to sabotage meaningful student participation by insisting the student representatives be chosen by lot.

The university opened the re-examination of its tenure procedures with the Forster task force which reported in August 1973. It rejected student representation on tenure committees because it claimed no reasonable method of selection could be found.

Student organizers rejected the argument and mounted a campaign for equal staff-student representation in all staffing decisions. Although students voted massively to support the demand, the campaign faltered in the face of solid faculty opposition.

But through effective appeals in the public arena, students gained enough support for the single student proposal.

The debate in Governing Council featured several surprising statements from government appointees advocating student representation. The government representatives, mostly corporation directors and Tory favorites, usually have voted against student positions.

COU report: fee hikes, low wages

By GENE ALLEN

Ontario university workers, students and faculty members are in for tuition fee hikes, larger class sizes and lower salary increases if a confidential draft report by the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) is implemented by the Tory government.

The draft report, leaked to The Varsity by the Ontario Federation of Students, was written by a COU subcommittee which will report to the full COU in April in preparation for the spring hearings of the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA), to be held in May.

Among other things, the draft report calls for:

- increased tuition fees
- larger full-time teaching load requirements
- the possibility of trading-off some salary increase (for faculty) to avoid dismissals
- reduced enrolments for certain universities and certain study programs
- fewer course offerings.

Among the committee members are U of T president John Evans and York University president Ian MacDonald. The committee is chaired by president R. Guindon from Ottawa University.

The Council of Ontario Universities (COU) is an advisory body which attempts to "represent the university community as a whole," according to its executive director John Macdonald.

COU deals with "system problems" and "co-operative activities," Macdonald said, and gives advice to the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA), to colleges and universities ministry and to the individual institutions.

The president of each of Ontario's 15 publicly-funded universities is a member of COU.

Along with the draft report, The Varsity has received a report of a meeting of the subcommittee with colleges and universities ministry deputy minister J. G. Parr and assistant deputy minister Benson A. Wilson. The latter report includes the following comment:

Dr. Parr "was asked whether the government message was that there are too many faculty. Dr. Parr said that this may be an inevitable conclusion... He thought the universities should give some indication of the extent of faculty reductions which could be achieved without severe damage."

University-wide meeting today

Students, faculty, and campus workers are meeting today at noon to express their united opposition to the Ontario government's university financing policies.

The meeting will take place between noon and 2 pm at Convocation Hall.

Most non-academic staff will be able to attend the meeting. The university administration has argued that services will be cut back to minimal levels during the two-hour period.

U of T president John Evans said he did not have the authority to cancel classes, and has left the decision to individual students and faculty members.

However, Evans pointed out the meeting was "extremely important" in a circular letter sent to all university staff.

Representatives of students, faculty, and campus workers will speak briefly, outlining the particular problems each group is facing as a result of government financing policies.

U of T is at present faced with the prospect of a $4 million deficit for 1975-76. This is the fifth year in a row in which government funding has not kept up with inflation.

A representative of the provincial government has been invited to attend. (Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld spoke at U of T Monday to a crowd of about 50 people. Auld was invited by the campus Young Progressive Conservatives.)

At Monday's meeting Auld said he would "do his best" to have a representative of the government attend today's meeting.

After the speakers make their remarks, there will be questions from the floor.

The Common Front is a coalition of the following groups: Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 1230 (representing library workers); U of T Faculty Association (UTFA); Students' Administrative Council (SAC); U of T Staff Association (UTSA); non-unionized workers from U of T administration offices at 215 Huron St.; Arts and Science Students' Union (ASSU); Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA); Graduate Students' Union (GSU); Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS); and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

'Radical changes' proposed by COU

The Ontario Federation of Students charged yesterday that confidential documents from the Council of Ontario Universities reveal "both the government and the COU are determined to make radical changes in the universities," which would include tuition fee increases for students.

"These are not short term changes," an OFS press release said. "Davis is quoted as saying 'the thrust of the government policy is to force the universities to change their style fundamentally.'"

"Amongst the 'changes in style' mentioned are drastic staff reductions, a rise in admission standards designed to reduce the number of students, cuts in the courses offered by the universities, an extension of the school year, increased specialization of the individual institutions and a rise in tuition fees for students."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch didn't mince words in his denunciation of the Guindon report. "As far as I'm concerned," he said, "the documents represent nothing less than a blueprint for the systematic destruction of post-secondary education in Ontario."

Kanowitch singled out three areas which would be effected: tuition, quality and variety.

Tuition fees, Kanowitch warned, will be increased substantially, representing a "massive shifting of support from the provincial government to the students."

In addition, class sizes will increase and variety in course offerings will be severely limited.

Kanowitch said he was "shocked" to learn that U of T president John Evans was a member of the committee that wrote the report, adding, "He's going to have to do a lot of explaining when he gets back from vacation."

Kanowitch wondered why Evans had spent the last two months telling the staff how hard he was fighting the cutbacks, when he had been working on a committee to implement them.

York University president Ian MacDonald, a member of the committee which drafted the Council of Ontario Universities documents reprinted in today's Varsity, says the report might contain changes in emphasis to "ensure the meaning is not misunderstood."

He told the York student newspaper Excalibur he hadn't realized the documents were public. (They weren't until The Varsity received them from the Ontario Federation of Students.)

MacDonald confirmed some of the OFS suspicions, saying the sections dealing with heavier faculty teaching loads and larger class sizes are "not desirable" but they are "potential possibilities."

Prof denounces staff practices, urges student role

By MARINA STRAUSS

A Victoria College French lecturer, dismissed last year amid a burst of student protest, has for the first time come out publicly in strong criticism of U of T's staffing procedures.

In a letter to The Varsity, published on page 5, J.D. Orsoni, whose contract terminates this spring, urges the university to give students "direct access to decisions concerning releasing members from the staff."

While conceding sitting students on firing and tenure committees "would not solve all academic problems," Orsoni maintains some forms of control are needed to prevent "misguided decisions... about reasonably well-rated teachers."

In his carefully worded letter — his first public statement since the dismissal decision in December, 1973 — Orsoni notes he was highly praised in students evaluations last year.

In addition, all but two of the lecturer's 40 students from four separate classes signed a petition in November, 1973, "supporting his (Orsoni's) retention as a member of the Victoria French department."

"We protest any recommendation to release (Orsoni) from his position as being unrepresentative of student opinion. There is no doubt in our minds that he is a teacher of superior quality and that he successfully communicates his enthusiasm for and knowledge of his subject..." the petition read.

The petition was ignored by the French department's all-faculty consultative committee, which advised the department chairman that Orsoni's contract not be renewed after having commissioned a special teaching evaluation of the instructor's students. Orsoni points out these evaluations were 80 per cent favorable of his teaching.

Orsoni attacks the secrecy of the committee's procedures, comparing them to a "Medieval Inquisition." He was never even officially told why he was dismissed.

In a pointed and critical fashion, Orsoni suggests, "Non-tenured faculty members can't be easily forgiven when they propose some innovative teaching methods or programs."

"In fact, if I had to advise any non-tenured member, as well as any potential lecturer, I would recommend that they be as non-innovative as possible in their teaching," Orsoni adds.

Orsoni criticizes the consultative committee for refusing to allow him to speak to the group.

"This kind of autocratic arrogance admirably shows the danger for the academic community when faceless administrative bodies are invested with discretionary powers," he says.

Students failed in a bid in February, 1973 to be seated on the consultative committee, which in practice wields the power on all departmental staff decisions.

"In the present system of firing and releasing, there is nothing to prevent staffing committees from judging someone on their personal likes and dislikes, rather than his professional merits," Orsoni notes.

"There is no guarantee for justice." Orsoni has taught at the Vic French department for the past five years, and specializes in 18th century literature and linguistics.

In Varsity reports last year on Orsoni's firing, the lecturer preferred to have his name withheld from publication.

NDP would abolish tuition fees

By BOB COLLIER

As an alternative to James Auld's cutbacks, the NDP would entirely abolish tuition fees and provide a living stipend for Ontario university students.

When interviewed yesterday, MPP Floyd Laughren, NDP education critic emphasized the need for universal accessibility to a university education.

"The poor and working classes must be given a chance to break out of the cycle," he maintained.

The NDP plan "will cost a great deal of money, like any social reform, and it must be accompanied by massive tax changes." To implement them Laughren would increase personal corporation and resource taxes.

Laughren, MPP for Nickel Belt notes, "Changes in resources taxation last year raised $144 million, a three-fold increase." But, he pointed out, mining profits last year were "about $1.5 billion."

Personal taxes will increase, "but plenty of people are benefitting from the privilege of this society without paying the cost."

Because universities benefit everybody, education costs should be "financed by people whether they've been there or not."

He is strongly critical of Auld's contingency repayment scheme under which students would pay back their education costs in long-term instalments.

The NDP favors formula-

Stephen Lewis: he wants living stipend and no tuition fees.

financing over the Liberal "global budgeting" because it avoids "who do you know — pork barrel politics." But, Laughren says, BIUs have several major deficiencies.

The most obvious problem, he notes, is that "support hasn't coped with inflation."

Laughren said large universities suffer less hardship after cutbacks than small, growing universities because "they have more room to manoeuvre."

"Small bilingual universities are especially hard hit" by formula financing because the cost of providing courses in two languages cuts deeply into the budget of the whole university, he noted. Both Laurentian and Ottawa Universities are "under extreme pressure," he noted.

The NDP, Laughren says, is dissatisfied with the secrecy the universities employ when discussing their internal budgeting.

"There should be public participation to decide how the money is spent" and a more representative Governing Council.

For the Liberals, see page 6.

Metro consoles McGrath over loss in Varg race

Paul McGrath has been press-ganged into service as next year's Varsity editor.

A former Varsity news editor, McGrath spent this year in exile as editor of the St. Michael's College newspaper, The Mike. He was called back from obscurity by The Varsity staff who voted him in as editor last week.

McGrath is best known as "the man who challenged the Pope," a reputation he justly earned when he ran a full-page cover picture in The Mike lampooning his Highness.

This won the coveted 1975 Small Protestant Colleges' award for accuracy in religious reporting.

McGrath was chasing squirrels through Queen's Park yesterday and was unavailable for comment.

Varsity staff members are also reminded of tomorrow's screening and election of sports, features, layout, photo and review editor. Proceedings begin at 1 pm.

The draft Guindon report makes a series of proposals for dealing with the current financial situation which are based on a recognition of "the responsibility of government to determine the level of support which it will allocate to universities." Throughout the report, the COU subcommittee carefully refrains from any remarks which would indicate the government's priorities might be subject to change. Rather, these priorities are explicitly accepted as given.

The draft report suggests that increases in productivity — "more scholar per dollar," in the words of Ontario cabinet minister John White — might be a way for the university system "to deal with its problems while maintaining an educational programme of high quality."

An increase in the student-faculty ratio (that is, more students per teacher) is taken by the subcommittee to be the primary index of such productivity increases.

The draft report quotes the U.S. Carnegie Commission in claiming that student-staff ratios can rise with "no apparent adverse affect on quality." The report suggests a number of methods of achieving this aim:

- cease all hiring of new faculty
- do not replace faculty leaving the university through death, retirement, or transfer.
- hire only faculty willing to teach relatively large classes
- determine with each department the maximum feasible size of classes
- measure faculty workloads and discuss with department chairmen how many students are needed per class to balance the budget.
- establish and adhere to larger full-time teaching load requirements.
- expect larger teaching loads of faculty not actively engaged in research
- greater use of part-time faculty when qualified persons are available
- relate merit increases in salary to willingness to teach larger classes.
- review the need for courses with small enrolments
- establish large lecture classes in appropriate courses.
- consolidate basic or similar courses in different departments.
- reduce number of course offerings.

If these means are not sufficient to balance university budgets, the report adds, the following "further contributions" might be considered:

- the possibility of introducing a nine-month salary year for faculty not heavily engaged in research and not wishing to remain on campus.
- the possibility of trading off some salary increases to avoid dismissals.

Along with proposals for increasing "productivity" while maintaining "quality," the draft report suggests admissions policies should be reviewed "to ensure that they are serving the best interests of the students." What would be "in the best interests of the students," it turns out, is more rigorous admission policies.

But, the report does recognize that "the Ontario policy of accessibility needs to be honored by adapting to the needs of underprivileged and minority groups who may need compensatory assistance before qualifying for regular university work."

Ceilings on enrolment are proposed for "all universities where enrolments fill their physical capacity." The report also calls for reductions in enrolment at certain universities and in certain professional programs.

The report's final proposal is its masterpiece. Recognizing "it is important that the universities not lie fallow for five years," and also recognizing that "new innovations generally require new funding" which will not be forthcoming from the provincial government, the draft report blandly suggests that "the universities should be allowed to increase their fees." Another increase in tuition fees, in other words.

U of T wants to set its own fees

By BOB BETTSON

Despite the vehement opposition of student member Michael Sabia, the planning sub-committee of the Governing Council voted 6-1 to support a move to regain authority over tuition fee hikes for U of T.

Sabia attacked the proposal, which was made in the form of a request for an opinion by Ontario Council on University Affairs chief Stephan Dupre.

Sabia said the university would be playing into the hands of the government by taking the responsibility for fee hikes.

He cited confidential Council of Ontario Universities' documents which revealed the drastic extent of government and university administration plans for cutbacks.

However the committee passed the motion conditional on an adequate student aid scheme and a change in the present formula financing arrangements.

Faculty Governing Council member Chuck Hanly said any tuition fee increase would have to be linked to a contingency repayment scheme, usually referred to as CORASP. This would mean students in high income professions would have to pay back all the costs of their education.

University planning vice-president George Connell said the leaked COU documents were not university policy and only reflected the views of the president.

Sabia earlier tried to table discussion of the motion until the president returns from his Jamaica vacation and explains his position. The move was defeated.

Many members of the committee echoed Hanly's desire for an adequate student loan scheme.

But all favored the university trying to regain sovereignty over fees in order to have variable fees within the university depending on costs of education.

One faculty member referred to the fact that some faculties at U of T are "money makers," that is the surplus in BIU income from the government over expenditures is used to finance more costly faculties.

It is common knowledge in the university arts and science is a "money-maker" while medicine is very expensive.

MacDonald also said students may have to choose in the future between the university they want and the course they want as part of the government's rationalization program.

Evans, also a member of the drafting subcommittee for the COU report, was unavailable for comment. He is vacationing in Jamaica this week.

MacDonald concluded by saying the report "straddles the line between desirability and inevitability."

Ed Barbeau of the U of T Faculty Reform Caucus called the Guindon draft report a "deplorable document." Barbeau said the report's emphasis on "productivity" will reduce the quality of teaching.

With larger class sizes, teachers will be increasingly occupied with administrative matters and will therefore have less time to devote to teaching. An important part of a teacher's job is meeting students, Barbeau said, but this will become more difficult if class sizes are increased.

"The professors will be so busy they won't have much time to be available to students," he said.

University of Toronto Faculty Association president Bill Nelson, contacted in Texas, said he was "not surprised" about the contents of the documents.

However, he added, U of T president John Evans would have "some explaining to do" when he returns from vacation in Jamaica.

Arts and Science dean Bob Greene said the documents — which he admitted to having read only briefly — revealed provincial government representatives showed a "lamentable strain of anti-intellectualism," a "betrayal of the spirit of the spirit of the province."

The government, Greene said, was displaying an "absence of understanding of the value of higher education," particularly insofar as it continued to stress "productivity."

"Productivity, Greene said, "bears no relation to the whole process of higher education."

As for the COU report recommendations on hiring and replacement freezes, Greene said he was virtually in a position of doing that anyway, and they came as no surprise.

New College principal Andrew Baines said proposals as stated in the report to hire no new staff and not replace those leaving the university are "ridiculous."

Baines attacked the "more scholar for the dollar" approach of the provincial government, upon which the report was based.

"The university does more than just process BAS," he said.

"We did it the way Walt would have wanted it."

Varg staffer, on the last issue

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. COU not fighting the cutbacks Ontario's universities are now under the most severe attack they have ever faced, at the hands of a Tory government which is relentlessly pursuing "productivity" and "rationalization of resources" at the expense of the quality of education for students in Ontario.

Important issues are raised by the draft Guindon report, which is published in full on pages 22 and 23 of today's paper. This preliminary COU report shows how much the administrations, particularly the presidents, of Ontario's universities are collaborating with the government in its educational cutbacks.

The influential presence of U of T president John Evans on this committee indicates there is considerable weight behind the report. After all, U of T consumes almost 25 percent of Ontario's university spending, with its $188 million grant.

Evans' public pronouncements about the impending decline of the universities should the level of funding continue to slide conflict with his part in the acceptance of the cutbacks by sitting on a committee which has tacitly accepted the need for drastic measures such as heavier faculty teaching loads, class size increases and student fee increases.

The members of this Council of Ontario universities committee are in fact taking part in a process which could lead to the partial dismantling of the present system.

To put it bluntly, the government has built the system to its present level and now it is not prepared to maintain it.

The invidious invocation of such laudry cliches as "more scholar for the dollar" and more quality teaching for less cost is absurd. Yet this is what the COU cites and operates upon in its draft report.

No one disputes the fact that the era of phenomenal growth of the universities is at an end, and if the Guindon report is any indication, the province's drive towards the cutbacks will not abate within the foreseeable future.

However, faculty, students and workers at Ontario's universities have the right to reasonable treatment at the hands of a government which has created the situation which the cutbacks are allegedly trying to solve.

Faculty and non-academic workers deserve a decent standard of living, job protection and pay increases which will keep pace with inflation.

Students deserve the right to universal accessibility based on academic merit. This means an adequate student aid scheme which will support a reasonable standard of living while a student is not earning any other income, and the maintenance of reasonable academic quality.

University administrations are going to have to decide where their first loyalty lies: with the provincial government and its mechanistic cutbacks, or with their students, faculty and support staff.

The provincial government, for its part must be able to provide the guarantees referred to above.

If it fails to do so, it is demonstrating a callous disregard for the quality and accessibility of education.

Students, workers and faculty at U of T should demonstrate their concern for maintaining the quality of teaching at this institution and others today at the Common Front meeting. If they don't, there is little chance anyone else will do it for them.

Certainly not the university presidents.

Which way is John Evans really pulling?

And why are Jimmie and Bill grinning?

French prof attacks Vic tenure practices

My name has recently been mentioned in a letter addressed to The Varsity, in connection with my release from the French Department of Victoria College. As a member of this department for a few more weeks, I feel it is in order to bring some clarification on this matter that has been raised.

Until now, uncertainty about where my own interests lay had obliged me to request The Varsity to refrain from publicising my name and case, after some articles dealing with it were published in 1974. But these reasons are no longer relevant; besides, I have received a great many puzzled questions as well as marks of interest from students and colleagues alike about the reasons for this release, and I do not see why the persons responsible for this iniquitous decision should benefit any longer by the silence of the victim.

I also feel that any student concerned with fairness in practices concerning releasing staff has an interest in being informed.

In November, 1973, as the renewal of my contract was coming up for discussion, I was given to understand that the four-member consultative committee of the French Department needed special enlightenment about my teaching ability, failing which, my position would be in danger, and that they wanted a special course evaluation to be conducted about me, i.e. only for my classes.

This strange evaluation, which was to determine my future, took place only after eight weeks teaching, when many points, including marks, could not but still be unclear in students' minds. Of course, no other lecturer but me was involved, thus eliminating the risk of taking decisions about comparatively weaker evaluations.

For one of four evaluations, about eight students out of 14 were critical on various points; however much of the criticism should have been levelled against the department or the course, instead of against me. For instance, more than 25 percent of all comments concerned the lack of formal grammar teaching, whereas the FRE 371 program explicitly excluded such teaching; there were also discrepant expectations from the students who wanted to become specialists and those attending FRE 371 as an interest course.

Later, several students declared to me that they were misled on many counts and I was unduly charged with various insufficiencies. There was subsequently no problem in clearing up these misunderstandings; the final regular evaluation showed that I fared better, for FRE 371, than two other instructors in this course, with a score of 1.81, still better than the mean for all French Vic courses. Moreover, two of the "critical students" of FRE 371 chose to take another course with me this year.

As for the other three evaluations, FRE 271, 300 and 441, false modesty would now be pointless: the students wrote up excellent evaluations, as shown by the anonymous copies I hold. Altogether, considering the number of students, I emerged from this risky evaluation with an 80 percent favorable record.

How did the consultative committee react to these results? It quickly recommended that I be released from the staff. Since a special teaching evaluation had been deemed necessary in my classes, it was obvious that the decision to keep me on the staff was supposed to depend on my teaching ability. But the consultative committee chose in fact to attach special importance to some critical aspects, and, by virtue of a special arithmetic, to give them greater weight than the 80 percent laudative comments. I was discovering fairness consultative committee-style.

The most curious aspect of this adventure is still to be mentioned: How did the consultative committee reach its decision? No one knows, and I am not supposed to know either. No what grounds was I released? No one seems to know, and more than one year after I have still not been given a clue about these reasons. All I got as official information was that the consultative committee was not legally obliged to tell anything.

The consultative committee was not obliged either to take advantage of such discretionary powers, but it obviously found it convenient not to provide any justification, and keep its reasons remarkably well hidden.

This type of reaction, abhorrent to any concept of democracy and justice, bears in fact a striking similarity to the practices of the Mediaeval Inquisition. I am using "Inquisition" in its original meaning: a rule of complete secrecy in trials, with the accused never knowing what he is accused of, never being informed of the grounds against him, and never even being granted a hearing.

This inquisitorial procedure was by no means an accident: it was deliberate. A few days later, 95 percent of my students signed a petition stating: "We protest any recommendation to release (Mr. Orsoni) from his position as being unrepresentative of student opinion. There is no doubt in our minds that he is a teacher of superior quality and that he successfully communicates his enthusiasm for and knowledge of his subject, making his lectures stimulating and valuable for the student as learning experience. He is generous with his time and shows an interest in each student and his individual problems. . . . His departure would be a loss to his students, both present and prospective."

This petition was entirely disregarded by the consultative committee, which kept an even tighter silence than before. A number of students managed to visit the chairman or the president about this, but not the members of the consultative committee, who refused.

As for me, I contacted one of the "judges", at the time of the "trial", and offered to provide various elements of information, but the committee was uninterested, and did not even deign to acknowledge my wish.

This kind of autocratic arrogance admirably shows the danger for the academic community when faceless administrative bodies are invested with discretionary powers.

However, the above happenings throw some indirect light on the reasons for my release. It would have been too hard to substantiate believable charges about my teaching ability, and failure to publish is not relevant to lecturers.

A more plausible reason, on the other hand, may be that non-tenured faculty members can't be easily forgiven when they propose some innovative teaching methods or programs. When the students like them, it is even more unacceptable, and when they appear to have a chance of being accepted at the departmental level, this challenge to pedagogical routines simply cannot be tolerated. The procedure to eradicate this danger may start as some kind of vicious, passionate attack, during committee work, from someone who will later sit as a judge.

In fact, if I had to advise any non-tenured member, as well as any potential lecturer, I would recommend that they be as non-innovative as possible in their teaching.

A non-tenured member should acknowledge the immense superiority of the leading tenured members of the staff — the five or six professors euphemistically called "The Club" by those members not yet considered as "clubbable"; they should "get along" with the members of the Club (read: show humility, occasionally bow and scrape to them, and of course, approve of their ideas and decisions). He should not be too good at what he is doing. He should be as discreet, simple-minded and colorless as possible. Providing which, he shall have some chance to make his way, after four or five years' patience, to the kingdom of tenure.

In the present system of firing and releasing, there is nothing to prevent staffing committee members from judging someone on their personal likes and dislikes, rather than on the candidate's professional merits. There is no guarantee of justice.

This is even more obvious when we realize that unfair decisions are not likely to arouse other members of the staff; in fact, except by chance they are never informed of such decisions, and feel helpless, though they will later privately express their disapproval.

And as for the chances of success of appeals, they appear virtually nonexistent.

It is in the interest of students that misguided decisions not be made about reasonably well-rated teachers. But at the present time, it is a fact that students' wishes and protests are simply ignored.

Other forms of control are needed.

The presence of students on staffing committees would not solve all academic problems, and much depends, as always, on the qualities and the fairness of the individuals; but any untenured faculty member, like the already long list of professors who have recently been ostracized, could feel more confident about justice if at least some students sat on such committees.

There are not many other conceivable solutions, and this is why it is immensely desirable that students have direct access to decisions concerning the release of staff members.

Council praised

Last week, two events occurred of particular importance to non-academic staff. The Task Force on the Status of Non-Academic Women published an interim report and Governing Council approved the appointment of a university ombudsman. Both are responses to a major problem within the university: policies approved by Governing Council or Simcoe Hall are not being satisfactorily implemented.

The Women's Task Force reveals that, despite a policy of uniform treatment of all non-academic staff, women are paid less than men for similar work. They also find differential treatment beyond that attributable to sex. Persons in similar jobs and having similar qualifications and length of service receive dissimilar salaries; employees paid from research grants are paid less than those hired from university funds.

The Personnel Department is charged with overseeing adherence to personnel policies. Yet to lay the blame for ineffective administration of these policies solely on their shoulders is to overlook the difficult situation in which they must function. How can a Personnel Department review the activities of some 200 semi-autonomous academic departments? How can employees be treated uniformly in an organization too fragmented to permit central control?

The Task Force has made a number of recommendations to correct disparities in treatment of non-academic staff. They recommend that all job classifications be reviewed under the supervision of a consultant from outside the university. They suggest that employees be paid at the top of their salary range after a maximum of five years. They call for a revised grievance procedure to handle job classification appeals.

Implementation of these recommendations will improve treatment of non-academic staff. However, until the number of the university's administrative units is reduced, undue emphasis will continue to be placed on correcting anomalies which could have been avoided in a more streamlined organization.

The Task Force's most important recommendation is a continuing mechanism to handle non-academic employment problems. They suggest the establishment of an on-going Governing Council subcommittee to provide a channel through which members of the Personnel Department and non-academic staff could, together and in consultation, develop and oversee the implementation of sensible personnel policies. The Task Force suggests that this subcommittee be charged as a first priority with investigation of the status of grant paid employees and the development of a grievance procedure whose final stage of appeal lies outside the university administration.

While the Governing Council is considering these recommendations, the ombudsman will provide an immediate channel for correcting non-academic staff problems. Until a revised grievance procedure is implemented, this impartial official will offer a means for redressing individual complaints of nonadherence to university policy. This person can also handle allegations of bias in the job classification and grievance systems as well as arranging solution of problems for which there are no established mechanisms for relief.

The Governing Council is to be praised for recognizing the university's administrative difficulties through appointment of the Women's Task Force and creation of the office of an ombudsman. It has identified problems and provided a mechanism to help in their correction. Let us hope that Council will now provide the policy guidance necessary to overcome the organizational barriers to efficient administration of the university, so that, in future, fewer anomalies in the implementation of policy will arise.

Varg desperate

The Varsity must be getting desperate for both interviewees and interviewees, for when Lawrence Clarke teamed up with Linda Lovelace to produce "Can Linda Lovelace really be 'just the girl next door?'" that worthy tabloid was brought very low indeed.

Time was when the interview had a more or less restricted admission. An interviewee was chosen for the originality of his ideas, for distinction in some reputable field, for engaging in projects of social benefit, and so on. If his character were blemished, or he were otherwise marked by embarrassing deficiencies, the plaster and paint were promptly pulled out, a mask constructed or a quick touchup job applied.

But times have changed, so the story has it. The plaster and paint have been consigned to the shelf while what they once covered up now bursts forth into fully-stunted bloom. In the present case, this involved meeting a warm, vibrant personality ("... Lovelace made a regal entrance and greeted us with a cool elegance.") an astute political observer ("As soon as you get someone who really represents the American people like ... Bobby Kennedy, they shoot him"); a staunch realist in matters of ecology ("Toronto's air isn't that much better than New York City or Chicago. And they could clean it up just like that (snapping her fingers) if they wanted to!"); and one who cohabits with dogs.

After this, one is tempted to heed those spectral voices who would woo us back to the days of plaster, paint, and restricted admission. But rather than take one step backward, we may as well take a step forward. A synthesis is needed, and St. Paul provides us with a partial basis for getting it when he says: "Finally, brethren, . . . whatsoever things are honest, . . . whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue,

SMC review poor

I am writing in response to Randy Robertson's review of the St. Michael's College production of Sean O'Casey's Juno and the Paycock, as it appeared in your March 19 issue, under the title Theatre Mikities play excellent.

Since this criticism (and I use the term loosely) is far from perjorative, it should be clear to you that this response to a Varsity review is not formulated as a "sour grapes" apology for a critic's axe-job.

The tone of the review was exceptionally well-received but it is obvious from the content of Mr. Robertson's piece that his method of critical writing leaves much to be desired. He writes, ad nauseum, concerning the theme of the play and neglects any specific mention of form, technique, staging, or production. In short, his praise is without proper substantiation.

Other minor inaccuracies in Mr. Robertson's rather sloppy diatribe include an error which instructs will readers that the show will be presented Sunday night (which it will not) and a heading misspelling our theatre group's name as "Mikities", — when most of Toronto is familiar with the proper spelling, Mickities.

In my opinion, Randy's article will probably be useful in attracting large audiences but does precious little to further the working of good, effective, and responsible drama criticism by The Varsity.

The Learning Machine

Yes, a C is really a B

The Faculty of Arts and Science has come up with a draft set of recommendations which appear to suggest that more Cs will be awarded than in the past.

A student with a grade of C, says the report, is "intellectually adequate" and is "profiting from his university experience."

"The grade indicates an understanding of the subject matter and an ability to develop solutions to simple problems found in the material."

"It should be made clear that a grade of C is an acceptable and respectable one, counting fully for credit towards the degree," the report says.

A grade of B, however, would represent "good performance with evidence of a grasp of the subject matter, some evidence of critical capacity and analytic ability and reasonable understanding of the relevant issues under examination; evidence of familiarity with the literature."

Graduate school should continue to require a B grade, the report recommends.

The report also recommends indicating on a student's transcript the docile rafter he or she attains; that whether he or she stood in the top 10 percent, 20 percent, 30 percent and so on, as well as the number of students in the class.

The report says that during the first week of classes, students should be told the method of evaluation to be used in the course and that "it should be general practice for the faculty member to invite discussion in the classroom with respect to a possible improvement of the proposed method of evaluation."

Final examinations should be employed in all courses, and should count for one-third of the mark, the report states, but exemptions may be granted where there is "personal contact with and knowledge of the students in the class."

The use of bell curves to align grades is "generally discouraged," the report notes.

No vacancies

The Arts and Science General Committee once more held its elections and once again there were vacancies galore in both student and faculty seats.

The 200 member committee, where students are outnumbered three to one by faculty and ex-officio administrators, is supposedly the top decision-making body in the faculty.

But this year one of the most contentious items was the issue tributes to deceased members.

The power has gravitated to the deans and department chairmen in the faculty, away from student scrutiny.

Students lost interest in the committee after they lost a bitter battle for parity in 1971 which included an occupation of Sidney Smith Hall and an abortive fees strike.

There are 21 vacancies in the 50 student seats.

Real-life drama

A new University College Program in Drama is projected for 1975-76. It was passed by the University College Council in February and still awaits final approval from the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The program will consist of already existing drama courses in English, languages, classics, music and East Asian departments, as well as several new courses in theatre history, theory and practical work.

The student will be required to take 10 drama courses (one history theory, five dramatic literature, and two practical) out of a 20-course four-year program for a specialist degree, and six courses for a minor degree.

For all those interested there will be an information and discussion meeting at noon Thursday, April 2 at the UC Playhouse. Further information will be available at the UC registrar's office during the pre-registration period.

Ombudsman on tap

The University of Toronto will finally have an ombudsman, the Governing Council agreed Thursday.

"The ombudsman is described as a 'catalytic agent, a mediator with the ability to hear out and resolve both simple and difficult situations in the university community.'"

The ombudsman will be chosen by a seven-member committee, chaired by Governing Council member Sydney Hermant, late of last year's Imperial Optical scandal.

The initial appointment will be for 18 months.

Freeze, you guys

Governing Council approved Thursday an enrolment freeze for U of T, which had been approved earlier by the planning and resources committee, therefore halting undergraduate enrolment growth at Scarborough, Erindale and St. George campuses.

Several notables were also named by U of T president John Evans to be co-chairmen of the new university disciplinary tribunal; namely, Owen Shime, Rosalie Abella and Karl Jaffray for three-year terms, and John Spinko and Irena Ungar for two-year terms. John Laskin will be prosecutor for the university.

Shime is a labor arbitrator, Jaffray is a former Toronto reform alderman and Abella is a lawyer.

Bog monsters loose

The internal affairs working group on non-academic discipline, only one meeting away from its final report, is still bogged down.

Yesterday, the committee spent its time on the issue of whether the university should prosecute individuals who also face criminal prosecution — double jeopardy, in other words. The group has yet to face the mammoth question of the role of dissent in the academic community.

Noting "the committee was hamstrung before it began" by its narrow terms of reference, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch predicted another, more wide-ranging working group to discuss discipline in the fall.

The committee was set up in order to determine whether it was possible to implement the non-academic portions of the Conway-Cadario code of behavior which were overwhelmingly rejected by students last year.

Academic sections have already been passed and appointments to a university tribunal made.

Big seat to fill

A governing Council by-election will be held for the seat left vacant after the death of OISE student and Toronto trust Vern Copeland.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch, who was acclaimed to the seat for next year's council, which takes office on July 1, says he will be running for the seat so he can be a voting member at the May and June Governing Council meetings. Nominations are open. An ad in today's Varsity describes nomination procedures.

ZAB — xy=no job

Dismissed Math professor Stephen Salaff has been told he is unlikely to get a job teaching a pre-university mathematics course.

Salaff, whose dismissal by Math department chairman George Duff in 1973 sparked a student occupation, is still appealing his case to president John Evans, who has yet to lay out a satisfactory appeal procedure.

In a letter to Salaff March 5, Woodsworth College principal Art Kruger says his college "can mount the required program . . . by using personnel connected with the university."

"We are unlikely to go outside the university as long as we can staff these courses by utilizing competent instructors currently associated with the university."

Kruger said he acted on the recommendation of Duff, who fired Salaff in the first place. Duff's role as chairman of the math department has been taken over by three faculty members.

In a Feb. 28 letter to Kruger, Salaff says "there are a number of serious issues involved in my case, including the possibility that academically unethical behavior has blocked my teaching career."

Salaff notes he had successfully taught pre-university mathematics in 1971-73.

Spanish union zoomin'

The Hispanic Studies Course Union has just won a major victory in getting results of the course evaluations published in a complete form.

The Spanish department had already decided to go ahead with its own evaluations which were not intended for publishing in the fall.

However, a student-staff advisory committee was set up to discuss the problem. A parity committee took the questionnaires of both staff and students and combined them into one questionnaire, commonly acceptable.

The march departmental meeting decided to completely publish the evaluations.

If they had not agreed students might have been forced to go ahead with their own. However, there is now more co-operation between staff and students.

And prospective course union members can contact Shelley Rothman for information.

Born to raise Hell

(Hart House—Special to The Varsity) Tomorrow night's showdown may be a classic in the annals of basketball history as the Varsity staff take on Strachan's Follies.

Tip off is at 9 pm in the lower gym, Hart House.

The Follies, fresh from another record of no wins and five losses in the intermediate division of the interfaculty basketball league, have agreed to take on the press titans.

However The Varsity squad has not previously revealed its plans. Inside sources say however, the offence will rely on sharpshooter David Simmonds, jumpin' Gene Allen, "century" Bob Bettson and "Tai Chi master" Lawrence Clarke.

Other Varsity stars might include Jennifer Wong, fearless Laurie Goldstein, and "Scoop" Strauss.

Stars for the Follies include "Will the Stub" Hurka, "Kareem Abdul" Ferguson, "Tuxedo" O'Brien and a masked player who has not yet revealed his identity.

Libs pledge new deal

By BOB COLLIER
Formula financing would be discarded by an Ontario Liberal government, Liberal education critic Donald Deacon pledged in an interview yesterday.

He was describing major revisions in education policies that his party would like to enact.

Formula financing, by which universities are paid for according to the number of students, has caused "undesirable enrolment drives by some universities," Deacon claimed.

The Liberals would create an independent post-secondary grants commission to allocate money to universities "according to proven needs," Deacon said.

University presidents, faculty associations and the general public, Deacon added, would sit on this commission.

Deacon hoped that "global budgeting and a five-year financial commitment, with annual revisions," would solve the present problems.

To reduce costs, the Liberals would combine the colleges and universities ministry and the education ministry and thereby pass much of the paperwork on to the universities concerned.

Deacon estimated that $11.5 million is spent by the present colleges and universities ministry for internal administrative costs alone. "The money could be better spent by the universities," Deacon claimed.

A breakdown of the $11.5 million shows that $1 million was spent on handling student support plans, and over $5 million each to administer community colleges and universities.

The much criticized OSAP and OGS plans will be "better handled by the universities," Deacon predicts, but he doesn't know whether more public money could be raised for student support.

Deacon hopes that savings in administrative costs at the government level will release more funds for student aid programs.

If the OSAP program was university-administered, Deacon said, "smart kids who try to beat the system" will no longer receive low interest loans at the expense of students who really need the money.

Decisions on tuition increases, student-staff ratios and course restrictions would be left to the university, he said.

"They know how much money can be spent and where cutbacks can be made," he pointed out.

Deacon was highly critical of the strategy surrounding university budget meetings. "Open meetings would eliminate the present suspicion" of the administration by support staff and students.

McReavy accepts offer

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Paul McReavy accepted a temporary appointment as a groundskeeper last Thursday in a compromise solution reached between him and the university.

The compromise was arrived at moments before a scheduled meeting at the provincial Labor Relations Board which was to hear McReavy's grievance over his dismissal.

McReavy, a five-year employee in the Ramsay Wright zoological storeroom, was fired in early January by the zoology administration for what he said was union activity.

The Labor Relations Board accepted the temporary solution, and McReavy's case will be decided after the board passes on a related grievance lodged by the Service Employees Union, Local 204.

Until then McReavy will be working as a groundskeeper at a higher rate of pay than he earned as a storekeeper.

"This job as groundskeeper is all right for now, but it is temporary," McReavy said. "I fully intend to get back into that zoology storeroom."

Otherwise, McReavy said he was pleased by the settlement, saying it showed his cause had some justice.

Zoology department chairman D. F. Mettrick said the settlement was "satisfactory" and "fair to all sides."

Neither McReavy nor Mettrick would elaborate on the settlement, saying one of the stipulations agreed on by each side's lawyers was that little would be said publicly.

McReavy did charge Mettrick with breaking that agreement, however, because the latter circulated a memo explaining the settlement to all zoology academic and support staff and graduate students.

Varg heavies take -30-

By WALTER BURNS

Many of The Varsity's staff will be leaving this year for concerns ranging from environmental activism to professional newspaper work.

Varsity editor David Simmonds will be pursuing his interest in environmentalism as a corporate fund-raiser for Pollution Probe.

He also plans to relax from the exhausting year at his Indian Rd. home by baking more of his inimitable organic carrot cake for needy tap-dancers.

"The Varsity staff won't have Bob Bettson to kick around anymore — CUP will!" said assignments editor Bob Bettson.

Ending a prolific four-year Varsity career — last year he wrote over 100 stories while a full-time student — Bettson takes up the reins as Canadian University Press vice-president in Ottawa.

Marina Strauss, The Varsity's Scarlett O'Hara, will be burning her bridges behind her as she returns to the Montreal Gazette newspaper where she worked last summer.

A four-year Varsity veteran and this year's overworked news editor, Strauss's investigative journalism on stories like the Seelye affair have elicited more angry "No comments" than the rest of the staff combined.

Dave Stuart, this year's hard-boiled sports editor, is as elusive as Howard Hughes about his future.

"I'm thinking of quarterbacking the NFL's Minnesota Vikings. If that doesn't work, I'll just put in some time as an oil tycoon or shipping magnate until something better turns up."

Layout editor Gilda Oran ends a busy two-year Varsity career doing interlocking layout, Russian and knitting simultaneously. She abandons us to pursue an MA degree in child education either in Atlanta or Miami.

Advertising manager Pat Wickson, who gave The Varsity its highest advertising revenue ever in her two years here, moves on to a well-deserved vacation and then, she hopes, public relations work with a charitable organization.

The nefarious multinational Clarke syndicate grudgingly surrenders its vice-like grip on the paper which began last year.

Lawrence Clarke, last year's sports editor and this year's copy editor and film editor, flees to a Newfoundland outpost to teach Tai Chi to the natives, while Janet Clarke (review production and dance editor) returns home to N.B. to attend pottery school.

In short: Features editor Gus Richardson will postpone law school for a year to take a breather . . . veteran writer Paul Carson (15 years in the wars) is now writing for The Bulletin . . . proofreader Frank Cockram will freelance again for MacLean-Hunter and do radio work.

Daycare's more fun when your leader's a 3-foot midget.

SAC wants TTC to give lower fares for U of T students

By JENNIFER WONG
SAC has urged the Toronto Transit Commission (TTC) to implement special rates for students, arguing that the forthcoming fare increase will drive students even deeper into poverty.
The TTC will raise adult fares to three tokens for $1 from four for $1 sometime in April.
Hardest hit will be students on OSAP grants. The grants give only token recognition to the fare increase, said Rick Gregory, Arts and Science Students' Union fieldworker. OSAP allocation for student transportation costs next year has been raised from $2.50 to $3.

"If you average about three trips per day — that would include evening and weekend trips to the library — it's obvious that the allowance comes nowhere near covering the TTC fare increase," Gregory said.
At the new rates, students on OSAP grants will be short at least $1.50 per week for transportation.
All low-income people, those receiving social benefits and students should receive a discount, maintained Ward 6 alderman Alan Sparrow.
"But there should be a thorough investigation of the whole economic aspect of running a public transportation facility," he said,

"instead of stop-gap action, which is like trying to pull rabbits out of a top hat."
"Funds could come from a general tax — some kind of scheme geared to income," said Sparrow.
"Through a new tax structure based on income, transit fares have been cut back in Cincinnati, Los Angeles and Atlanta. There's no reason why Toronto can't go the same way," said Lee Zaflosky, member of Ward 6 community organization transportation committee and past chairman of the Stop the TTC Fare Increase Committee.
Transport should be a public utility, and paid for the same way as other utilities, he emphasized.

"Unfortunately, Zaflosky added, "the disastrous philosophy current at the TTC is lumping the financial burden onto the wrong sectors." "As if that's what's responsible!"
"The federal government's subsidy towards TTC capital costs is completely unbalanced."

President elected at York

By LAWRENCE GOLDSTEIN
United Left Slate (ULS) candidate Dale Ritch emerged the winner from York University's bitter and confused student council presidential elections held last Monday and Tuesday.
Ritch polled 631 votes compared to 436 for his nearest opponent, York Party member Paul Higeli.
About 1,200 ballots were cast in the election with some 7,000 students eligible to vote.
The ULS, a student activist party, concerned with building a united front of campus workers, faculty and students against education cutbacks, took 14 of 22 available seats on York's student council in other elections held last week.
Actually this is the second time the ULS has won the presidential balloting. Last Thursday, ULS member John Koonstra acting as a surrogate candidate for Ritch, won out over a field of nine other candidates running for student council president.
But Koonstra's status as president-elect was challenged by York's present student council.

Graduate study finds cutbacks have reached 'crisis level'

By BOB COLLIER
A commission studying U of T's graduate education has found that financial cutbacks have reached "crisis levels," according to GSU president Frank McIntyre, the commission's chairman.

The Commission on Graduate Education (COGE), set up by the Graduate Students' Union, has prepared detailed analyses of a dozen graduate departments, a working paper on grads' use of OSAP, and is preparing a report on the quality of supervision in the humanities and social sciences.

"In some departments," McIntyre said, "five out of six graduate students drop out before finishing their thesis."

"They can't get support, so when they run out of money they have to take full-time jobs outside the university. They have to do their thesis after work or put it off completely until they can afford to come back," McIntyre said.

"Jobs are so scarce," McIntyre complained, that "students have to grab suitable work when it comes and leave the university."

COGE is finding that graduate supervision is often very poor, especially in the humanities and social sciences.

"Often a student will only see his supervisor once every few months," McIntyre said, "and then the meeting isn't meaningful because the supervisor is working in a different field and can't help the student."
COGE also acts as a resource group to solve the problems of departmental unions:

GOVERNING COUNCIL ELECTION

Ballots have been mailed to the eligible voters for this year's Governing Council election of new staff and student members.

Any eligible voter who has received an incorrect ballot, or no ballot due to an error in records may contact the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160 in order to obtain the correct ballot.

Completed ballots should be returned by CANADA POST, CAMPUS MAIL or personal delivery to the Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall prior to 12:00 noon on March 27th, 1975, to be valid. Also, for the convenience of voters who may wish to deposit their ballots on campus, ballot boxes are placed in the following locations:

- Erindale College - Library
- Scarborough College - Library
- Simcoe Hall - Information Desk

The above locations will be open until March 27th, 1975 at 12:00 noon. Both locations are open during regular library hours, and the Simcoe Hall location during regular business hours.

Enquiries regarding the election may be directed to the Office of the Governing Council at 928-2160.

Campus pubs hard-hit by new LCBO edict

By LAWRENCE GOLDSTEIN
Do you occasionally enjoy a relaxing drink at one of U of T's many campus-run pubs or numerous social events?

Too bad, says the Government of Ontario through its Liquor Licensing Board.

Last month, the board stopped handing out special occasion permits to both U of T and the federated colleges.

These were the temporary liquor permits through which most campus pubs were permitted to operate. The permits also allowed alcohol to be served at less frequent social gatherings or events.

Now the board will only be issuing permanent licences to universities and, according to Morrey Ewing, head of Trinity College, these will be far more difficult and costly to obtain.

"The much stricter regulations which accompany a permanent licence will entail heavy capital expenditures for fire exits, washroom and bar facilities," Ewing told The Varsity.

Ewing also said the move to permanent licences will result in higher operating costs and procedures with a reduction in the number of social events because fewer rooms will qualify under the new regulations.

Ewing said the only people who could possibly benefit from the change in licensing procedures will be the off-campus pubs that surround the university.

And when it came to the off-campus pubs, the Ontario government was apparently ready and willing to listen with open ears.

Grindal criticizes gov't cutbacks

By PAUL RAYNOR

"We could streak or set ourselves afire in the middle of campus, but I don't think the government wants to understand our problems," said APUS president Norma Grindal in an interview yesterday.

Grindal, representing the Association of Part-time University Students, is understandably upset over the substantial cutbacks suffered by Wordsworth College in the latest university budget.

"As soon as Wordsworth gets a cutback it means many night courses can no longer be offered," Grindal explained. "The first courses to go are the lower enrolment courses and the part-time students are the most seriously affected."

"In the last few weeks a lot of students are complaining that they can't get courses they want in areas like Islamic studies or mathematics," Grindal noted. "Without these courses students are unable to get the necessary prerequisites in order to specialize later in day courses."

Grindal said that it will be the daytime arts and science faculty which will eventually suffer as fewer part-time students are able to gain admission to courses with prerequisites.

Grindal says both she and Wordsworth College principal Arthur Kruger have reached an agreement on a course of action to be taken.

"We feel that because the budget has already been passed and the Ontario government supports it there is little that can be done at the moment."

"But, Grindal says, "as soon as the next budget committee meetings start, APUS and Wordsworth College will work together to educate them about the terrific problems we are facing."

"We are," admits Grindal, "feeling a little guilty about the fact that we are lying low at the moment. We fully appreciate the job that SAC and others are doing."

Grindal stresses APUS' ultimate concern is the long-term effects which cutbacks will have on part-time students.

She feels hope lies with the education of the administration about the special concerns and needs of part-time students.

Council wants proxy vote body

Overturning recommendations from both its business affairs and executive committees, the Governing Council narrowly voted Thursday against leaving the university's policy on proxy share voting unchanged.

By implication, the council adopted the recommendations of a task force set up to investigate the university's present policy of not voting company shares it holds at annual meetings.

The task force was formed after political economy professor Cranford Pratt urged council last spring to cast dissenting votes at the annual Exxon shareholders meeting, in protest against the company's behavior in the then Portuguese African colonies.

Although the task force recommended the university set up a committee to deal with complaints that may arise about its shareholding policy, the business affairs committee voted to leave the status quo.

Staunchly supporting the status quo was government appointee John Tory, who argued the university should not take stands on "social and moral issues which do not affect the university."

Tory also wondered whether the Governing Council could speak on behalf of the university, whether it would have sufficient information at its disposal, whether it would have the time and energy to deal with the issue effectively, and whether investment decisions should be made on the basis of social and moral issues.

Tory's views were ridiculed by several council members, including Marnie Paikin, who said if the university wasn't already making ethical decisions about its investments it would be involved in high-yield enterprises like prostitution and drug trafficking.

The council's decision now goes back to the business affairs committee, which will find a way to implement the task force report.

The task force recommended "that a representative committee ... be established to receive and consider complaints from the university community regarding practices and policies, having questionable social or moral implications, which are being followed by corporations in which the university holds shares."

"The complainant is expected to produce evidence to substantiate the investigation. Only if the claim can be verified and is considered sufficiently serious should the committee's report recommending appropriate action proceed."

Evans ready to take the plunge for Social Credit

By CLAUDE HAWPER
A University of Toronto president, John Evans, will shortly announce his nomination as a Social Credit candidate in the forthcoming provincial election, The Varsity has learned.

Social Credit presently has no seats in the Legislature.

The move within the party to push a "name" candidate has become apparent with the simultaneous publication of an open letter by Ontario Social Credit Party Leader Sid Hamelin, inviting membership in the party, and a public declaration by Evans Feb. 24 that "my party, Social Credit, has yet to take a stand on the issue" (of educational cutbacks).

Evans' political leanings were gleaned during a hard-hitting Varsity interview last September, when he grudgingly admitted he had always admired federal Social Credit leader Real Caouette.

Caouette sells Pontiacs. Hamelin's letter, addressed to all members of the Ontario Legislature, claims, "The time is right for the introduction of fresh, new ideas and a team of bright, young politicians into Ontario's affairs. It is entirely possible that 1975 could be the year of Social Credit."

"We are ready to accept that challenge. A set of policies based on Social Credit principles has been approved, and we have the beginnings of the largest and most youthful team of candidates ever to be gathered under the Social Credit banner."

After The Varsity had learned of Evans' candidacy, it immediately received ten copies of the Intelligence Creditor, the national Social Credit magazine.

The magazine proclaims it exists to promote "economic reform, individual rights and competitive free enterprise."

The magazine reprints a declaration made to the Varsity in an interview with Evans that the man he most admires is Real Caouette. The interview is set beside a picture of Evans (this is not a joke, it's true).

Evans is a former vegetarian.

Social Credit: the party for the thinking man.

Auld says universities must readjust their expectations

By PAUL RAYNOR

"Since there is no foreseeable change in the present economic situation, we must readjust our expectations," James Auld, Ontario's Minister of Colleges and University Affairs, told a group of 50 people at Hart House Monday.

The meeting was poorly attended because of poor publicity given by the U of T Young Progressive Conservatives.

A press release from the Students' Administrative Council challenges Auld to appear again on campus on Wednesday at the Common Front meeting at noon.

SAC accuses Auld of avoiding the Wednesday appearance by speaking at the YPC meeting Monday on only two days notice. A larger audience is expected for the Wednesday meeting, when the university will be partially shut down.

"It is important to view the situation in terms of resource availability. There simply is not enough money to meet everyone's demands," Auld claimed.

While voicing sympathy with the growing discontent among university students over inadequate government funding, Auld claimed, "You can't plan on a continuation of the trend of rising government financing for post-secondary education that we have become used to in the past."

Auld opened his remarks with a short history of post-secondary education, designed to demonstrate how lucky Ontario university students are.

Citing figures of income percentages spent on post-secondary education, Auld claimed, "Ontario spends a greater proportion of its income on colleges and universities than most other countries in the world."

He admitted the cutbacks, or "shortfalls," as he preferred to call them, will mean a reduction in university services, but he suggested ways of minimizing the negative affects.

"Individual institutions could save money and be strengthened by role specialization," Auld said, recommending certain schools specialize in fewer areas than they are attempting to at present.

Such role specialization, particularly in the applied sciences and partly in the liberal arts, would, Auld argued, be economically more feasible and would not prevent students studying what they wanted to at some institution.

Auld pointed out tighter financing has even affected his own department. He has dropped one employee from his staff of 51.

When asked if cutbacks would affect the faculty, Auld said, "The recommendation is for maintaining 80 percent of faculty and support staff. This will mean less faculty unless greater revenues are forthcoming, which I don't anticipate will happen."

Auld said it was impossible to say whether or not the flow of revenue to the universities, in terms of constant dollars, would be maintained at its present levels.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch pointed out to the minister that although the 1975-76 budget of $46.55 million for OSAP was an increase of 16.9 percent over last year it was still well below 1972 levels, despite a 30 percent increase in students.

Auld conceded the point and Kanowitch presented him with the 5,000-name petition expressing U of T students' grievances with the OSAP program. "Hopefully this will lead to more meaningful changes concerning OSAP," Kanowitch said. Graduate students picked their particular bone, charging OSAP is not a meaningful support of graduate studies.

"Since 1969, government-supported graduate students have dropped from 2,700 to 900 students while the number of graduate students has increased from 10 to 14 thousand," one graduate student pointed out.

Auld argued that to meet all the student demands for OSAP reform it would cost the government nearly $300 million a year. "I don't think that such a 40 percent increase in university funding is likely to happen," he said.

Several people charged that the working classes were not adequately represented in post-secondary institutions, especially in the professional faculties, because of financial barriers to access.

In response, Auld said, "We have as good a system in terms of accessibility as anywhere else in North America."

Auld defined accessibility as no "severe" financial barriers to entry and the maintenance of "reasonable academic standards." He disagreed with the notion that until university enrolment fairly reflected the socio-economic make-up of society there will still be financial barriers to entry.

The Varsity — Brian Pei

From his experience "as a politician of 21 years," Auld felt certain socio-economic classes place less emphasis on a university education than others.

However, a report cited by one graduate student present claimed "lower socio-economic classes place as high a degree of importance on post-secondary education as do wealthier groups."

The cutbacks have spurred government recommendations that certain "unnecessary" courses be cut from the university curriculum.

This, it was charged, suggests a dangerous trend towards direct government control over all facets of the university, including curriculum.

Auld admitted, "When the provincial government funds up to 90 percent of post-secondary education there is a delicate relationship between university autonomy and government control." But he felt this would not become a serious problem in Ontario.

In relation to the central issue of declining quality of education as a result of the cutbacks, Auld argued, "the two percent difference between what the universities want and what is available won't affect the quality of education that much."

Auld saw the trend towards larger class sizes as an "undesirable but largely short-term problem" and he hedged around the charge that because of the rising costs the government's "shortfalls" in funding were actually sizeable cutbacks.

Racism inquiry says 'emergency measures' needed

By TOM GERRY

The university must take "emergency measures to alleviate the most pressing aspects of racism," the Committee of Inquiry into Racism at U of T recommends in its report released yesterday.

U of T's Governing Council should "immediately rescind all the greater restrictions on foreign-born applicants that have been implemented in the past two years," the report says.

These restrictions are linked by the committee to Dr. Bette Stephenson, a lecturer at U of T and president of the Canadian Medical Association, who has alleged "there are fewer opportunities for Canadians because we have been admitting foreign students" to Canadian medical schools.

"The lowering of quotas for student-visa applicants appears to have been done hastily, with little consideration in public on the role U of T should play in an increasingly smaller world, particularly the Third World," the committee concludes.

Further, the restrictions "are open to charges of racial discrimination."

The committee was set up in February in the wake of last year's "Banfield incident," charges of racism by members of the U of T community, the appointment of a university human rights advisor and a general tightening of admissions policy respecting foreign-born students.

The ethnic group most seriously discriminated against, the committee reports, is the Chinese. "The Faculty of Medicine must not be permitted to know the ethnic backgrounds of its applicants," the committee recommends.

The committee also recommends as a third emergency measure that "the editor of the Toike Oike be immediately informed by the administration that printing of racist 'jokes' is 'conduct prejudicial to the interests of the university'."

Finally, the committee demands "a full-scale properly funded inquiry into racism at U of T should be set up as soon as possible."

Members of the ad hoc committee are Tom Bribrisco, negotiating committee chairperson, CUPE local 1230 (U of T library); Ed Clarke, National Black Coalition chairperson; Peter Fitting, St. Michael's College French professor; Rev. Eilert Frerichs, United Church chaplain to U of T; Betty Ho, U of T law student; Peter Jarrett, student member of U of T Governing Council; Frank McIntyre, president, U of T Graduate Students' Union;

Charles Roach, lawyer; Peter Rosenthal, U of T mathematics professor; and sociology professor, Janet Salaif.

SDS sentences cut to two years after appeal

By BOB BETTSON

The suspensions of two former U of T students, Bill Schabas and Tony Leah, have been reduced to two years on their conviction by the Caput for disrupting alleged racist urbanologist Edward Banfield's lecture last March.

The two Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) members were originally sentenced to suspensions of three and four years after last summer's six week long trial. Black marks were to be placed on their transcripts for two years.

The ruling of an appeal board chaired by Sydney Robbins, treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada, was that the actions of the two students were illegal and "without moral justification," but the longer suspensions were tantamount to expulsions, and therefore should be reduced.

Leah charged in an interview that the appeal decision was "outrageous, particularly in light of the administration's continuing refusal to do anything about racism at the U of T."

"It doesn't deal with the basic issues we raised in our defence," Leah said.

The suspension is still the toughest one given at any North American university for a similar action. Students who stopped Banfield at the University of Chicago got suspended sentences.

Leah also charged the decision was "a rush job". The judgment from the executive committee of Governing Council chaired by Robbins came down only two weeks after the hearing was held on the two former students' appeal.

The ruling will allow the two to re-enroll at UofT in July, 1976, but Leah is already making a bid for a comeback. He is attempting to run for president of the Graduate Students' Union, with racism and disciplinary procedures as his main platform planks.

The GSU has refused to accept the legitimacy of the Caput decision because it has no student membership.

The appeal judgment strongly condemned the two former students for their "coercion, obstruction, harassment and intimidation." They saw the action as "a grave offence against the University of Toronto."

The two students argued in their defence that the sentence was unduly harsh and Caput acted beyond its jurisdiction in ordering the black marks on their transcripts.

However the judgment of the appeal board was that the students could not justify the use of "stormtrooper tactics" no matter what their beliefs about the speaker were.

The judgment also said the issue of racism was not involved in the determination of the guilt or innocence of the two SDS members.

The case will serve as a precedent, being the first of its kind at U of T, and the judgment said part of the reason for the suspension was for a deterrent for other students who might consider similar actions.

However, the Caput may no longer exist if a similar case comes up again, because new non-academic disciplinary procedures are now being debated by a parity committee, which will report to Governing Council, probably next fall.

Leah is now supply teaching in Toronto and Schabas has been writing for Montreal musical trade journals.

The Varsity — Eric Mills

Racism inquiry member Charles Roach testifies at SDS appeal.

Student expelled for his ethnic background: prof

A Canadian citizen of Chinese origin was expelled from U of T's Faculty of Medicine in his final year of study because of his ethnic background, a member of the Committee Against Racism said at a press conference yesterday.

Mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal said the dismissal of the student from the medical faculty last December in his final year of study was unprecedented in that department's history.

Rosenthal did not elaborate on the case, saying the student had asked not to be identified. But Rosenthal said he wanted to publicize the incident to encourage other students who felt they were victims of racism to come forward.

The dismissal is currently under appeal before Governing Council.

Mercury poisoning alarms doctors, environmentalists

By ELAINE ROLFE

Leading doctors and environmentalists are alarmed by recent studies which indicate the damaging effects of mercury poisoning on the native population of northwestern Ontario.

Despite government reluctance to divulge information about industrial dumping, numerous concerned professionals have united with native leaders and interest groups to bring this issue to public attention.

In November, 1974, the CBC program As It Happens ran a two-part documentary on mercury poisoning. Similarities were noted between the situations at Kenora, Ontario and Minamata, Japan, where a catastrophic breakout of mercury poisoning occurred in 1953. On March 14, a conference heard Ed and Peter Newberry, speak on the effects of mercury poisoning on the health and lifestyle of the White Dog and Grassy Narrows Indian Communities.

A resolution, drafted by Pollution Probe for submission to provincial and federal governments, was passed by the audience.

It demanded:
 • that the provincial government forbid further expansion in the pulp and paper industry at Dryden until the question of industrial mercury poisoning in the area is resolved.

• That the federal government compensate the native people in the area affected by mercury poisoning for loss of health and livelihood;

• That both levels of government "join in total prohibition of mercury dumping."

Over 200 persons turned out at another conference Sunday to hear reports from Japanese experts who have analyzed the situations at Minamata and at the Grassy Narrows and White Dog reservations.

Jun Ui, professor of urban and sanitary engineering at the University of Tokyo, warned of the delay between eating fish from contaminated waters and the occurrence of damage to the central nervous system.

It normally takes about 15 years for signs of "Minamata disease" to become evident.

Ui noticed early signs of mercury poisoning in residents of the two reservations. These included loss of coordination, eyesight tremors and convulsions.

Ui said between 1956 and 1968 medical experts and researchers at Kumamoto University had vainly warned the Japanese government about the dangers connected with industrial mercury dumping by the Chisso Chemical Company.

He described a four-step process which blocked their positive action. After the original discovery and publicization of the truth about Minamata disease, came contradictions by the companies involved.

The conflicting claims neutralized each other and as a result nothing was done.

The impasse was finally broken when victims filed and won a case against the company in civil court and were awarded damages.

Ui said Canadians are also faced with government indifference towards stopping mercury pollution. "Something must be done, not by the government but by yourselves," he said.

Ui stressed the need for immediate public action. "If you don't start the action, you will get more serious reaction," he charged, referring to the possibility of a more serious breakout of Minamata disease in Canada.

Masazumi Harada, neurological psychiatrist at the University of Kumamoto, stressed the need for preventative measures in order to avoid a Canadian catastrophe. "Please don't repeat our mistake," he urged.

Harada showed two film strips taken at Minamata and at the Grassy Narrows reservation. Both films showed remarkable similarities between the physical conditions of both peoples.

Harada said in both cases poor people were the hardest hit. He said they are not at fault for continuing to eat the fish after being warned because alternative sources of protein are not available.

Chief Ron McDonald of the Isglton band spoke of the deterioration of the native community life since mercury contamination.

Then he belonged to that class of intelligent men who have led a life of idleness, and who seek consolation and, perhaps, an excuse in the idea, which their idleness offers to their intelligence, of objects as worthy of their interest as any that could be attained by art or learning, the idea that "Life" contains situations more interesting and more romantic than all the romances ever written.

Final non-academic women task force report released

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

After a year of investigation, the Task Force to Study the Status of Non-academic Women at the University of Toronto released its preliminary report last Tuesday.

Established to examine personnel policy issues as they affected the status of non-academic women, the Task Force held three open forum meetings on campus, received written and oral submissions and held discussions with non-academic staff, personnel department members and other familiar with problems being studied.

While stating its evidence "lends itself to subjective interpretation", the report says "it nevertheless seems fair to say that the University's policy of non-discrimination has been less than effective" and calls for remedial measures.

"These measures should amount to more than a restatement of existing policies or a tightening of possible loopholes."

The report concentrates on four areas of concern: career development, salary procedures, standing sub-committee on personnel policy, and ancillary considerations and makes recommendations in regard to each.

Citing "The deepening discontent of women with the role traditionally assigned to them by society" and "salary anomalies closely related to sex", the report makes 12 recommendations to further career development including: the establishment of "career ladders" outlining the paths of job progression, the offering of career counselling, that lateral transfers for employees be accepted for whatever reason, that female employees be sought out when few are forthcoming in areas of under representation and that a weekly flier be published listing all job opportunities currently open in the university.

In regards to salary procedures, the report says progression through the salary range "is not occurring, generally to the detriment of female staff."

It recommends the introduction of an automatic progression through the salary range, under which most secondary school teachers now operate.

Pointing out that the personnel department's policy is not now studied or reviewed systematically except by the business affairs committee, the Task Force recommends the establishment of a standing sub-committee on personnel policy.

Consisting of four Governing Council members, four non-academic staff and the personnel director, the committee would be responsible for reviewing existing personnel policy, anticipating new directions in policy and for bringing personnel matters to the attention of the whole University.

Particular attention should be paid to employees paid by grants, generally at a lower rate, and the grievance procedure, where the final arbiter in the procedure now rests with the personnel department.

Concern for ancillary considerations is raised, though unaccompanied by recommendations, "so that the university may be aware of them." Noting accessibility for female non-academic staff to senior positions, the Task Force says "selection procedures for these jobs do not appear to be clearly defined or uniformly applied," and suggests that potential job candidates be made aware of openings.

Part-time employees, the report suggests, should be able to share the same benefits as full-time workers on a pro-rated basis.

Task Force chairman professor Gary Thaler said he thought initial reaction to the report was very favorable. Some of the concerns of the Task Force had been "simmering away" for years and were being aired for the first time, he said.

Thaler said he didn't feel the report had encroached on the responsibility of the personnel department.

Barrett says students selfish

VANCOUVER (CUP) — British Columbia premier Dave Barrett told a crowd of 1,200 at the University of British Columbia March 11, the university system produces students who "want 'X' price for their skills with no thought of sharing."

Barrett was responding to a student questioner who cited the huge amount of talent available among university students and suggested an "idea foundation" to make use of the talent for social concerns.

Barrett's response was similar to an answer he gave to another student questioner March 5 at the annual commerce dinner at the UBC faculty club.

There, he told students they are a privileged group with a responsibility to provide a return to a community that doesn't necessarily support the vast amount of money spent on them.

He said there is grass roots opposition to spending large amounts of money on "airy-fairy education."

At that dinner Barrett told about 400 people students must examine what they give back to the community that has subsidized them once they graduate.

"There are hard-nosed businessmen questioning whether they are getting their money's worth," he said.

"You do have a privilege of going to university. Tragically, it is not a right in North America."

This time the premier pointed his finger at "the system" that produces money-oriented students with no social conscience.

Barrett said he could show them Indian reservations only 150 miles from Vancouver where raw sewage runs down village streets.

But if the UBC medical school were to require students to work in such places as part of its requirements, "the first place to resist would be the university," he said.

"Take the school of social work," Barrett, a former social worker, said. "It's out here. But the people who apply for welfare are down in the guts and bowels of the city. That's where the school of social work should be."

It was the first time in over a decade that a premier had chosen to speak in an open meeting at UBC. The last time was in 1958 when W.A.C. Bennett was pelted with lunch bags and apple cores and was booed.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ELECTIONS

The following is the complete text of the statement submitted on a voluntary basis by Mr. Nixon, to appear on the information accompanying the ballots concerning his candidacy for a full-time undergraduate student Arts & Science seat on the Governing Council:

J. Bradford Nixon—

1967-69 Architecture Student

1969-72 Work—Travel

1972-75 Arts and Science student—Political Economy

Member Governing Council Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee.

Co-Chairman Non-Academic Code Revision Committee.

I'll work for: NO INCREASE IN STUDENT FEES. NO CUTS IN ACADEMIC QUALITY . . . Stop cuts in library service, book purchases. Reasonable athletic facilities. Student controlled student service (pubs, catering). No repressive discipline code. Separate Scarborough and Erindale Governing Council seats. University responsiveness to community needs. Student Representation on tenure committees.

The Chief Returning Officer regrets any inconvenience that the publication of an incomplete version of the statement may have caused Mr. Nixon.

ONLY THE SERIOUS GRADUATING STUDENT NEED READ THIS

The Consultant's Report to the Advisory Committee on Academic Planning — Ontario Council on Graduate Studies concluded that:

The SHORT Canadian school year poses a peculiar problem not recognized explicitly in designing Canadian management programs. It is obvious that an annual academic calendar designed to meet the needs of an earlier agricultural community is not suitable for management programs.

Last year the University of Windsor recognized this problem and introduced a unique M.B.A. program accomplished in three stages:

- Stage I Basic foundation courses
- Stage II Intermediate courses in desired areas of study
- Stage III Advanced courses.

Stages I and II consist of prerequisite courses designed to give the student equivalency to an undergraduate honours degree in Business Administration. The length of study for the prerequisite courses is based on the individual student's background as evaluated by the Faculty of Business Administration. Students who included such courses such as Economics, Mathematics, Statistics and other Business-related courses will normally require two semesters for the prerequisite courses. Students without such background will additionally require the summer term of study.

Stage III courses are taken in the M.B.A. candidate year. These courses require two semesters for completion. These advanced courses permit a student to study in depth in a minimum of two areas of Business Administration. Up to two one-semester graduate courses may be included from other Faculties within the University with the approval of the Dean of the Faculty of Business Administration. Course electives in Stage II and III provide an opportunity for either specialization or broadening of subject exposure in the following areas: Accounting, Administrative Studies, Finance, Management Science, Marketing and International Business.

In addition to course requirements, the candidate is required to prepare and defend a major paper.

If you have a "B" average, apply today for acceptance to a program that will open many "Opportunity Doors."

WANTED . . . THIS STUDENT!

- This student is approaching graduation and has already shown competence and is eager to take up the challenges of our day.
- This student seeks an opportunity of making a contribution to society not possible to most.
- This student has the potential for excellence and will unlock doors for the benefit of others.
- This student seeks to become a scholar in the business disciplines in order to keep growing.

If you are a young man or woman who fits this description the Faculty of Business Administration has an opening for you in the following programs.

● BACHELOR OF COMMERCE FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES
A calendar year (three semester) program for graduates with a "C" or better overall average who wish to obtain a Bachelor of Commerce Degree in Honours Business Administration. (Entry into this program may be made in May or September.)

● MASTER OF BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION
A "B" average on the above program and an acceptable score on the ATGSB test will gain your admission to stage III of the M.B.A. program.

Vaughan says Spadina construction will create chaos

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughan charged last Thursday completion of the Spadina Expressway would "push us straight back into the 1950's" as far as road construction policy is concerned.
Vaughan was speaking to more Expressway down to Eglinton Ave. and Highway 400 down to St. Clair Ave., the CTC is launching a series of fund-raising activities.

Last Thursday's benefit also featured Canadian author and urban critic Jane Jacobs and T urban sociology professor Alan Powell.
Entertainment was provided by String-Band, the Open Circle Theatre, pianist Anton Kuerti and cellist Kristine Bogyo.

Jacobs said expressways and arterial roads "act differently."
"Expressway traffic," she said, "goes off in great swatches and bunches."
"What's more," she added, "a four-lane arterial road is an expressway and calling an expressway an arterial road is an hypocrisy."

Jacobs criticized Metro Council saying, "Calling things by their wrong name goes hand in hand with mismanagement in government."
She added that Council's determination to build the Spadina Extension and Highway 400 "is a symptom that Metro government has gone sour."
Jacobs also charged that the TTC fare increase is "a concept of fares that's the worst of both worlds." She was referring to the "ever-rising fares" and "ever-decreasing use" Toronto would likely experience in public transit.

Vaughan said he was "appalled by the lack of commitment of the Transit Commission to transit."

Attacking Council's decision to build the Spadina extension down to Eglinton Ave., Vaughan said, "anyone who knows anything about road construction knows that building a four-lane expressway and then stopping it abruptly would create absolute chaos" and inevitably lead to further construction in the future.

Jane Jacobs, the author of The City and Death and Life of Great American Cities, said there was confusion between an "expressway" and an "arterial road".

Metro Council's decision was influenced by a Soberman Report's proposal that the Spadina ditch be completed as "a four-lane arterial road."

Jacobs said an arterial road is one which all other roads feed into at right angles.

She denied the Spadina Expressway was an "arterial road" "unless they get rid of all the built bridges."

The Winnipeg Ballet is coming to town

Alicia Markova was so delighted with the company she sent a complete set of Sylphides tutus to show her appreciation. Queen Elizabeth, after commanding a performance in 1951, granted them the first royal charter of her reign, allowing the use of "Royal" in their name, an honor not granted to Sadlers Wells for another three years. There are today only four "royal" ballets in the world and we should be proud that one of them is the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, and be pleased that they are coming to town for a short week of eight performances at the O'Keefe, from March 31 until April 5.

The RWB is the oldest dance company in the country, founded in 1938 by Gweneth Lloyd and her student, Betty Farrally, who named the enterprise the Winnipeg Ballet Club.

Through the efforts of Lady Tupper, wife of Sir Charles, this club became a professional company, soon beginning their continuous touring across Canada and the United States.

After a succession of imported artistic directors, Arnold Spohr a native Winnipegger, was given the job. He has remained there ever since, taking time off in the summer months to teach at the Banff School of Fine Arts.

Under his direction, the company flourished. Isolated from every major ballet company in the world, the Winnipeg decided to build up a unique repertory, leaning heavily on Canadian choreographers, like Vesak or MacDonald, and taking risks by bringing in the best of the young European men, John Neumeier being the prime example.

It was only after the RWB had danced several of his works, that dance companies in the states, and Toronto's National were willing to give him a chance.

The company is the only one to be invited to Ontario's Stratford Festival and so not surprisingly, the only ballet company to be invited back.

Long before the Touring Office of the Canada Council was established, the RWB travelled to Australia, to be greeted with approving reviews and full houses wherever they went.

It is full houses that seem to follow the Winnipeg troupe from city to city.

In spite of Hurricane Daisy, the Brisbane audience showed up. Twice the show seemed doomed to cancellation in Chicago, first because of a tremendous snow storm, and another season because of pea-soup fog — but in both cases the show went on, and to a technically full house.

I can remember their tour through New Brunswick in 1966. We waited anxiously for weeks to hear who would be the lucky few to be ushers in our theatre, since every ticket had gone in the first day. We worked the worst shows possible, to have a chance to see the Winnipeg.

The last time they came through, after resetting gels between numbers, we rushed up to the ceiling to catch as much of the show as possible.

Perhaps the Royal's highest compliments came from that group of techies, who sat, eyes glued to the stage, joining in the standing ovation that came with the final curtain.

Working backstage with the company, you begin to understand just how demanding the life is.

They arrived in a bus — the company is chamber sized, 26 members — with a semi-detached tractor trailer full of lights, lights, and more lights, pointe shoes, tutus, and sets.

The dancers worked incredibly hard, getting up at eight, travelling all day, arriving in a strange town, dumping what wasn't needed for the performance in a hotel room and rushing off to class.

Each performance is prefaced by a two hour class, with emphasis on "spacing" — getting the feel of a new and oftimes small stage.

After the reception, or failing that a large meal, the dancers retire to bed, while the tech crew strikes and packs the lights, costumes, and sets.

The whole process starts again the next morning at eight.

The company has traveled in twenty-three countries, from South America to the Soviet Union. In Canada, over 90 cities and towns have been visited, while the U.S. total is twice that.

Their stay in Toronto is slightly different from other tours.

"Usually we go into a town with a certain guarantee," explained publicity director, Maggy Morris. "A local club will offer us X amount of money, and they handle the rest of it. All we have to do is show up and dance."

"But Toronto is another matter. Here we rent the hall ourselves, and we take the chances."

Not too much of a chance!

Wasn't it only yesterday that the Royal's Ballet High, with Lighthouse, was the first engagement to sell out St. Lawrence Hall, and the first dance show to be held over because of popular demand?

This year's program should be as popular, with Agnus De Mille's classic American ballet Rodeo, on the program with Kurt Jone's Green Table, a ballet satirizing diplomacy and war, created during Hitler's rise to power.

The second evening of dance is a trilogy created by John Neumeier, whose Don Juan was the highlight of the National's spring season.

Three shorter dances make up Pictures, a collage that represents our fast moving, technically oriented world. The music — Scriabin, Cornyshe, Mahler, Simon and Garfunkel, and Emmerson, Lake and Palmer's rendition of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

If money is an object, there are matinees Wednesday and Saturday, with tickets as low as $2.50. Now that's cheaper than a movie!

Orunken Poem

Afternoon is invading my eyes.
Between here and the barn
the lallen leaves lie untouched.
I never rake the lawn, I never clean the car. The children squabble all round me as the day darkens and beer darkens my brain and the thought of you and a thousand confusions darken my heart, and I find a photograph on the table of a newborn child. My child. I think, my Kate who now stands near me, grown, difficult, beloved, and I find the threat of tears invading my eyes.

On sentimental absurd man, who can you think you are, writing this something, aching, drunken words that solve nothing and say nothing, only I know nothing and that the earth is the body of a god and you and I are the body of a god.

The children laugh, I remember the night that Kate was born.
All afternoon I have said to myself that love is too simple, is only an easy death, I think of the men and women who are puzzled at me and what they have heard me say.

I am the eyes of god, I am the tongue of god and so are you and you and you, even dying, even healing the world, to death.

Rhetoric, beer rhetoric, I have nothing to claim but a willingness to lose.

I wear a child's Indian Headdress.
I write with a ball-point pen.
My brain is addled by beer,
by the coming of dark, by the love of death, by you, by all the times that I didn't know what I was doing.

The trees are black against the blue air as the paper boy does his rounds and the day becomes gone. Time, death, loving; we can only live by being in love with loss, with disaster.

There is no conclusion to this poem. Ever.

The following is a transcript of an interview with writer David Helwig by Varsity staffers Nick Power and Anne Sherman.

Helwig is reading with Joe Rosenblatt today at 12:30 pm in room 28 of the Science and Medicine Library.

AS: You started as a poet with Figures in a Landscape and since then you have written a novel and a number of poetic dramas, you have edited a collection of prison documentaries, and now you are selecting plays for the CBC. Which one of these experiences has been most meaningful to you?

DH: I don't know if meaningful is a word I would really want to use. What I am concerned with is what I have enjoyed most. Obviously, I have enjoyed most some of the writing. Nobody enjoys writing a whole novel. Because it goes on and on. Sometimes we have a few good minutes, a good page. But then you have to keep on writing for two hundred pages.

Writing a poem is a single unit of experience. It's the kind of thing that you do and it's all over so that's more obviously and totally pleasurable.

AS: Is it more fulfilling than editing other people's work, however much you may like those people?

DH: Well, it depends. I mean, there can be an element of creative enjoyment in some editing. To take the stories that I have edited there's a lot of time spent reading things that are not going to get used.

In a way it's a boring way to spend your time to read things that you don't like. So that there is more time spent doing things close to drudgery, I suppose. But one can also find a kind of creative excitement when one is talking to someone and says "what if . . ." and they say, "no, but what if this . . ." and there is a sort of pleasant interchange.

AS: Is it more like putting the pieces of a puzzle together?

DH: A little bit, and it's more gregarious, it's company.

NP: It interests me that you find yourself very much alone when you are writing poetry.

DH: I don't necessarily walk off and lock myself in a room.

I have written poetry when my kids were running around, knocking things over and I have written poetry in buses and trains and planes. It used to be in particular when I used to write a lot of poetry, and it started pouring out, it was there. And if it was there, you wrote it.

NP: The character in The Day Before Tomorrow always has a little red notebook with him.

DH: I used to be absolutely obsessive about having paper and a pen with me. I started carrying a knapsack at one point, which was fairly useful because I could always keep a hardbound notebook and a pen in it all the time. I also found in writing poetry that once the idea was there and I had recorded it I could go back when I had the time and write it.

You could scrawl five or six lines that no one else could understand at all and go back, when you had some leisure. Essentially for me the poem would remain there. I could write it when I got back to it.

NP: But would you subscribe to the school of poetry that holds that the initial scrawl is all that there is to the poem?

DH: I don't think anybody would believe that.

Some poems come very quickly. There is a poem which is very short that I think I must have written in thirty seconds. I had written it sitting around the house, alone with my kids. I had about three ideas for a poem that day and the third one, the best of them just came, and I just wrote it. I practically never made any changes to the poem whereas other things take for ever.

NP: With some writers like Cohen and Layton, their own ego seems totally identified with the person in the poem. But your own poetry is about other people, about observations. The reader is not constantly confronted with your personality.

DH: I don't have a very defined persona in the way that Layton or Cohen do. I have written a fair number of poems which are completely autobiographical and very factual. But in fact, odd as it may seem, the persona in them is probably, as you are saying, fairly transparent. I was there and those things that I am telling you about happened. But sometimes at least there's a sense that what was happening is more important than the persona of the observer.

I am essentially undramatic. But there's one thing I like about experience or about poetry and it is not to be there. There is a quotation from Andrew Wyeth which is the epigraph of a poem I wrote called "For Andrew Wyeth":

When I am alone
I want to forget about myself
I don't want to exist.
and probably in some of the poems of mine that I like there's this kind of

An interview ...everything transparent quality. The things are all there.

Not being there myself is nice. There is something very refreshing about not being there.

AS: Why is it nice to be absent?

DH: I don't know. It's a pleasant experience. It's not that you are totally absent, but the things in themselves are so totally delightful. It's like being part of the whole delight of the world and not having any will or conscious choice, or consciousness.

You are there, it's like being stoned.

NP: I feel you are striving in your poem to feel that wholeness of things, to feel that we all have a place in something that is greater than each individual.

DH: It's certainly in some of them anyway.

NP: Do you consciously struggle to portray a particular philosophy, or belief?

DH: No. It's something I could not have articulated before the poems were written. Not something I had there that I had to say. It's an interesting point. Everybody has a wide variety of experiences. Different writers make different choices about which of those experiences are the material for poetry. And therefore the person whose poetry is obviously less argumentative or passionate is not necessarily a less argumentative or passionate person. It may be a person who happens to respond to a different part of himself.

You can't assume that what the writer happens to be excited about and writes down is all that there is of it. You are not totally in control of what happens and how it happens.

AS: In terms of your reading experience, which writers do you compare yourself with, which ones do you read most often?

DH: I think that the people who affect you most are the ones you read early. I am not sure that the writers I read now have very much effect on me. Although gradually they do.

The people that affected me most are probably odd ones, at odd times. One of the enormous influences has been Hemingway. And if you look at what I have been saying about the things in themselves, and about the clarity of things and at some of the narrative writings of Hemingway's in which you get that incredible clarity of things, at some of the stories, at the description of fishing in The Sun also Rises, there is an enormous amount of occasions when the things do take on a life of their own. And this kind of lyrical element was extremely influential.

Another writer in whom you also find that, to some extent, is Williams Carlos Williams, especially in his early stuff.

AS: How old were you when you read these writers?

DH: Hemingway . . . I was fifteen or sixteen. I read him constantly between fourteen and eighteen. Williams I read . . . probably when I was in University. Bits and pieces of James Reaney. I never read a whole book by him. But those bits and pieces vitalized the Ontario landscape—the way he took it seriously and mythologized it.

I read Layton. Certainly he was the first of the Canadian poets that I read extensively, although I don't think he had a lot of influence on me.

I never started to read Yeats 'til I was in university, when I started teaching. At that point he had some influence on me.

Another writer whom I admire and who, in my mind is associated with Hemingway, is D. H. Lawrence.

NP: Yes, there is no fear there of the secular universe as it is.

DH: Yes, in Hemingway and Lawrence there's a real delight in the physical universe as it is. And this is absolutely central to what my early poems were about.

The following is a document reporting a meeting between representatives of the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) and the Ontario government Ministry of Colleges and Universities, held on January 31, 1975. The report is particularly instructive both because it gives as clear an indication of government plans as is likely to be given; and it also shows the limited extent to which the COU is willing to challenge these priorities to protect the universities.

How COU fights (sic) provincial government spending priorities

Notes of Fourth Meeting of Special Committee to Assess University Policies and Plans (January 31, 1975)

Mr. Wilson and Dr. Parr from the Ministry were present by invitation to answer questions concerning government policies as they will affect the future of the university system. Mr. Wilson began by stating that he was encouraged that the universities are taking a positive attitude towards planning ahead and seeking to adapt to realities. The discussion which followed can be summarized under the broad headings: financing, accessibility, rationalization and productivity, and faculty numbers.

Financing. On the question of financing, Mr. Wilson first indicated that there is not much likelihood of significant additional funding for the expansion of facilities, given enrolment projections. The present magnitude of government funding brings the university system under much closer attention than was the case say ten years ago. The prospect of the universities obtaining funding in excess of the government's growth in revenue is dismal. It will be a struggle to hold the present share. This may require significant changes in the ways of doing things in the universities. Members asked whether it would be reasonable to plan for the same percentage share of government revenue, or a decline. Dr. Parr felt it was fair to plan to hold the present share, but that the share might decline. It certainly will not go up.

Later in the meeting the discussion turned to the need of the universities for a financial basis for planning. The problem is that in order to adjust, the universities need a considerable time horizon, whereas as the government's horizon tends to be shorter. The Ministry representatives agreed with the need of the universities to know their funding much sooner, and expressed the opinion that the next few months is perhaps the best opportunity over recent years to present to government a multi-year plan. If the universities can indicate that they are able to make certain adjustments if given predictable financing, there may be a reasonable chance of the government agreeing to this. Such a plan would be needed by the beginning of the summer.

Accessibility. Members wondered whether the government would be willing to state the number of students it was willing to fund. Mr. Wilson felt that the government would not be prepared to be that explicit. The government might say that the universities should do the best they can with the available funding, but the message would come through indirect signals. The universities can interpret the change to environment through such signals of recent years as Mr. White's "more scholar for the dollar"; the capital funding moratorium; the imposition of the embargo on new graduate programmes and the necessity of the ACAP process; the cut-backs in funding for graduate student support and the imposition of the third term fee. The political reality is that the universities cannot expect more explicit signals than this.

The Ministry representatives were asked whether the capital moratorium might be seen as a mechanism to redistribute students. Dr. Parr agreed with this.

Members thought that the government would hope that students would redistribute themselves in relation to available facilities, but if this did not occur, the political pressure might build up for expansion in certain locations. (e.g. Erindale College because of demographic factors). Mr. Wilson and Dr. Parr thought that the possible need for redefinition of the concept of accessibility needed to be faced jointly by the universities and the government. The government itself has not faced the question as yet. Should the Arts and Science student have the freedom to go where he wants and the right to obtain a full range of options in every university? Perhaps accessibility may need to be redefined in terms of equality of financial access to a limited number of places. This is already the case in professional programmes. If programmes are increasingly limited in enrolment, acceptable standards certainly need to be established. Should these be exclusively academic or should other criteria be used? The universities need to ask themselves, in terms of educational goals, whether it is necessary for undergraduates to be given the same range of course offerings as at present. Perhaps there are far too many courses resulting from faculty specialists "doing their own thing". Is this the best education? Should every institution offer everything, or should specialized roles be defined for institutions? Will the public accept this? Such questions lead inevitably to looking at the role of the faculty member. Should all institutions have a pattern of faculty effort along the Northeastern United States research institution model, or is there room for the pure teacher within the university system? Mr. Wilson felt that this sort of re-examination of accessibility and institutional roles was necessary at the present time. There should be initiative by the universities and dialogue with the government.

More and more institutions are limiting enrolment in at least certain programmes but not all. York, for instance, is going all out for growth without increasing faculty numbers. Some members were worried about the effect of differential growth. Since every institution would have to face either increasing enrolment or reducing establishment (or both), this might heighten competition for certain categories of students. It is also a good question as to what extent students will move to available opportunities. The effects of demography of the high school population need to be taken into an examination of the differential rates of growth which can be expected. Mr. Wilson felt that the universities should re-examine their levels of academic qualification for admission. The universities have been taking in an increasing percentage of the high school leaving population. The system has been through a period of rapid expansion, and there is a need to correct, but it would be unwise to overshoot in the other direction, and become too restrictive.

Members were concerned about the effects of reducing the range of options available to the students. It was noted that those graduating from the secondary school system have been exposed to a wide range of options, and it would be difficult to face them with a restricted range of choice in university. Some thought that it was the students rather than the professors who are the primary pressure leading to the multiplication of course options.

Mr. Wilson suggested that the universities look at the best job they can do with the likely level of revenue, in terms of accepting up to the full number of students at present levels of accessibility. The alternatives could be spelled out as a basis for dialogue with government.

Rationalization and productivity. There was some discussion of the need for attention to the question of duplication amongst institutions, and the development for greater specialization. Members wondered whether the government message was primarily more productivity or lesser growth. Are we to maintain the present kind of universities or go to an entirely different model? Dr. Parr commented that this was not an either/or choice, but that redeployment was needed. The government would hope for a mix of institutions, and that the adjustments would take place in a gentle way. Some members were concerned about the effects of reducing the range of programmes in some institutions, possibly creating a situation which could be interpreted as first and second class institutions. Dr. Parr thought that this was not necessary, but there might well be need for a smaller number of certain programmes throughout the province than at present. Members commented on the inter-relationship of changes in productivity to growth. If we follow the present pattern, there may be 3 per cent growth per annum over the next five years. If this can be achieved without increasing resources, there would be a 15 per cent productivity increase in five years. If growth were cut to half of this rate, the increase in productivity would be less. The ministry representatives were asked whether the primary concern of government was a productivity increase or to limit the increase in total funds. Dr. Parr said that he was not really sure, but that he would guess that the government was looking for both. Members thought that the report of the meeting of the Board chairman with the Premier indicated that the government was interested in both.

Members recognized the need of the Minister for success stories to help in being the advocate of the universities. These really could only be found by showing a demonstrable improvement in the efficiency.

Faculty numbers. There was some discussion on the problem of differential growth in various programs. Certain areas (fine arts at York University was given as an example) are in the developmental stage. With a fixed amount of resources, growth of these programs will mean phasing down others, and this means reducing the number of faculty positions. Also, if productivity increases must be shown, and there is a reduction in growth, there is more pressure on the dismissal of faculty. Members felt that it was easy to rationalize in the long term, but in the short term, one is up against the faculty redundancy problem. Normal attrition in the system is likely to average around .7 to .8 percent per annum over the next five years, i.e. 100 faculty members out of 11,000 per year. The Ministry representatives were asked whether the government was aware that drastic steps might need to be taken to reduce faculty numbers. Dr. Parr said that the government cannot be unaware of this. He thought the universities should give some indication of the extent of faculty reductions which could be achieved without severe damage. He was asked whether the government message was that there are too many faculty. Dr. Parr said that this may be an inevitable conclusion, since this is the one budget area which has not really been touched as yet, in adjusting to more limited funding. Members were concerned that the cut out might be a discrimination against non-tenured staff, who are very much needed as new blood in the system.

There was some discussion on the inter-changeability of either staff or educational experience. The universities could perhaps do more in shifting faculty around and trying to utilize them in different way, but there are limits. There are certain disciplines (largely in the humanities) where there has been a steady decline in teaching load for a period of years. Despite all of the adjustments which the universities have made, there is still a significant number of excess faculty, and the prospect is for the trend to continue. It takes considerable time to adjust to these problems. The worry was expressed that by the time the universities reached the point of dismissing faculty members, a lot of damage has been done in a lot of other areas of the budget. Also, significant reductions in faculty will have very serious morale effects within the universities. It may be the best people who are lost, and interpersonal relationships within the institutions can be severely damaged.

Mr. Wilson felt that the question of dismissals did need to be faced. He thought that all sectors of society will be into this before long. Perhaps the universities will be first, but the effects will soon be seen in other sectors such as hospitals and secondary schools. The whole society must learn to live with a steady state situation, and this will require some change in philosophy.

Special Committee to Assess University Policies and Plans Draft Report
SUB COMMITTEE OF COU
Chairman: R. Guindon [Ottawa]

Introduction

The terms of reference for the Special Committee were:

To assess the goals, policies and plans of the Ontario university system for the remainder of the 1970's and the 1980's in the light of the compelling governmental priorities, possible financial prospects and the anticipated numbers of qualified students.

The Committee initially exposed a very wide range of issues but decided that it would be impractical to deal with them all and produce a Report which could be helpful to COU and the universities in the spring and round of discussions with OCUA. Accordingly, the Special Committee decided to limit itself to matters of high priority requiring province-wide policies. This decision leaves a host of additional issues unresolved. A list is provided in Appendix 1. Many of these issues will require attention by COU and OCUA during the remainder of the Seventies. Others are matters which deserve the attention of individual universities.

From Golden Age to Time of Troubles

The Carnegie Commission has observed that higher education has passed from "Golden Age to Time of troubles". Though the Commission was looking at higher education in the U.S. its observation fits Ontario's universities. The reasons are not identical but the description is apt. For the universities the late Fifties and the Sixties were a time of boundless enthusiasm and great expectations. The post-war babies were advancing like a tidal wave. Sputnik focused public attention on the accomplishments and potential of science and technology. Economists saw university education as an investment with prospects of handsome public and private returns, and educational leaders held out the promise that universities would provide solutions to the major problems that beset society. In Ontario the government and the universities entered an expansionary partnership which created new universities and enlarged old ones. Enrolment quadrupled; graduate schools developed rapidly; new programmes multiplied and faculty were engaged by the thousands. Each year for more than a decade total grants to universities grew at a faster rate than provincial revenues. Inevitably such an extraordinary growth rate had to come to an end. The end was signalled by two events, the first being the sudden and unexpected drop in the rate of increase in enrolment, and the second the sharp decrease in the growth rate of the BIU value. At one point (1972-73) the BIU was increased by only 2% though the Consumer Cost Price Index in the year increased by 6.8%. Each year since has seen the BIU increase fall short of inflation by several percentage points. For many reasons the level of financial support has been restricted during the Seventies. Other priorities have been in competition for government support. Some public disillusionment has followed the extravagant claims of the Sixties. Universities no longer are seen as offering instant magical solutions to society's problems. Campus confrontations and new forms of government have raised questions about the ability of universities to manage their affairs. Perceptions of the academic as a person teaching eight or nine hours a week for seven months a year have led to the conviction that universities are too generously supported. All of these factors and others account for the financial squeeze which the universities have faced for four years and will no doubt continue to face into the future.

The Government's Message

The question has been raised, "What does the government want?" The signals in fact have been persistent and clear. The Premier, when he was Minister of University Affairs, raised questions about a longer academic year and heavier teaching loads. Recently he has expressed the view that government cannot afford to support the current very large university establishment to a level which will permit universities to continue their traditional practices in the same way they have in the past. The transition from the small university system of the past to today's mass enrolments requires that universities examine their practices and find alternative approaches which, in the words of the Hon. John White, will result in "more scholar for the dollar". The Premier, in a similar vein, observed that the efforts of the universities to coordinate their activities have been useful but insufficient. Elaborating, the Hon. Mr. Auld said that he thought "the universities could get together to work out a system whereby additional students could be accepted in institutions that currently have under-utilized capacity. More students than at present may not be able to attend the institution of their first choice but the anticipated growth could be accommodated without hiring additional faculty or staff...". The government has been firm in specifying its commitment to accessibility but has always added that it supports access for qualified students. Again, quoting the Hon. Minister of Colleges and Universities, he said, "There are indications that the universities' desire to attract increased enrolment has resulted in current admission standards being less stringent than in the past. While the government intends to ensure that there are university places for all qualified students, I believe the universities' admission practices might well be reviewed."

The government's intentions and expectations have been further clarified by a series of moves in recent years, in addition to severe limits on operating grants. These include the moratorium on capital projects, the embargo on new graduate programmes and a series of actions designed to limit graduate enrolment — reduction in the amount of OGF support, a third term fee.

The messages can be summarized as follows:

- 1) Operating grants will not be sufficient to continue university programmes as in the past.
- 2) The government is seeking improvements in "productivity" and its index of productivity is the BIU/FTE faculty ratio.
- 3) The government will maintain a policy of accessibility for qualified students but wishes to see a more rigorous interpretation of "qualified".
- 4) The government would welcome a cessation of growth in the established universities in order to steer students to institutions with unused capacity.
- 5) The government is expecting a greater level of system-wide planning and coordination.

Proposals

The Special Committee wishes to make a number of proposals to cope with the new environment. These proposals recognize the responsibility of government to determine the level of support which it will allocate to universities. They recognize also that the sum allocated is now very large and that the universities have a responsibility to the people of Ontario to maintain a university system of high quality. The Special Committee believes this can be done, given time to adjust, but that its accomplishment will demand courageous decisions and greater attention to the quality of curricula, faculty, students and administration.

The first proposal is that:

1) The universities acknowledge the necessity of maintaining and improving the quality of teaching at a lower cost (in constant dollars) than at the present time.

This proposal recognizes the government's concern with "productivity" in teaching. The government's index of improvement however is BIU/FTE faculty ratios. If the ratio rises, the "productivity" rises. The ratio however is an oversimplified proxy for the real requirement which is more teaching for less money. There are alternative approaches to achieving this objective and, given reasonable time, they do not need to involve either mass dismissals of competent faculty or a scramble for more students to be taught by the current faculty. It will be up to each university to identify and choose the solutions which will serve best to deal with its problems while maintaining an educational programme of high quality.

The Special Committee notes however that many universities in other places have had to make such adjustments and have done so without diminishing quality. The Carnegie Commission found that student/staff ratios rose in most kinds of institutions in recent years with "no apparent adverse effect on quality". As observed by Alvin Eurlich, "the number of students sitting before a faculty member in a classroom has little to do with the quality of educational results achieved. Educational quality depends upon the availability of top-notch students and teachers, and the use of excellent instructional methods; upon the efforts and interests of students; and upon the constant interaction of students with faculty members."

Possible solution (or contributions to solutions) include the following:

- a) Cease all hiring of new faculty.
- b) Do not replace faculty leaving the university through death, retirement or transfer.
- c) Hire only faculty willing to teach relatively large classes.
- d) Determine with each department the maximum feasible size of classes.
- e) Measure faculty workloads and discuss with department chairmen how many students are needed per class in order to balance the budget.
- f) Establish and adhere to larger full-time teaching load requirements.
- g) Expect larger teaching loads of faculty not actively engaged in research.
- h) Greater merit increases in salary to willingness to teach larger classes.
- i) Review the need for courses with small enrolments. Offer essential courses in this category in alternate years.
- k) Establish large lecture classes in appropriate courses.
- l) Consolidate basic or similar courses offered in different departments.
- m) Reduce number of course offerings.
- n) Establish and use intensively learning centers and laboratories.

If sufficient change to balance budgets cannot be accomplished by such means as the above without the necessity of numerous dismissals of competent faculty, universities might consider as further contributions:

- a) the possibility of introducing a nine month salary year for faculty not heavily engaged in research and not wishing to remain on campus,
- b) the possibility of trading-off some salary increase to avoid dismissals.

Since in our financial proposals (below) the rate of adjustment would be controlled, we believe that universities can make the changes they choose without unbearable hardship.

2. The universities must open channels of communications with the government, the legislature and the public to broaden perceptions of the universities' role.

The Special Committee believes that the enthusiasm of the Sixties for universities has been replaced by apathy. Universities are being looked upon more and more as simply an extension of education. The fact that their role is much broader needs to be much better understood. The role of universities in research is vital to society. There is virtually no aspect of a complex modern society that has not depended heavily on the findings of research in universities. This is true in such diverse fields as environmental problems, transportation, urban planning, health care, communication systems, agriculture, energy, resource management, legal systems and justice. Most of the significant advances in all toe the government's line

these areas originate in universities or with university-trained people. These facts need to be illustrated and interpreted in a continuing effort to ensure that the public understands the university enterprise. Similarly, more needs to be said about the universities' role in interpreting the history and cultural development of our society and in generating ideas and challenges to conventional wisdom. This is not a teaching function (though better teaching is a by-product). It is the function of scholarship. Likewise the commitment of universities to external service to the community is a very important, time-consuming drain on the resources of the institutions. The idea of "moonlighting" receives criticism, perhaps in some cases with justification in so far as arrangements are concerned. However the service which is provided to governments at all levels, to business and industry, to commerce and finance, and to the arts is very large. Most sophisticated tasks facing society need the skills and knowledge of highly qualified specialists whose home is in the universities. It would be illuminating for example to learn how many academics have provided services to the government of Ontario and in how wide a spectrum of specialized fields.

All of these activities and more represent "products" of the university enterprise. Any discussion of productivity must place a realistic value on these "products". The universities must do much more to make this evident.

3. The universities individually and through the Ontario Council on University Admissions should review admissions policy and practices to ensure that they are serving the best interests of the students.

The belief is widely held that some universities have lowered their admission requirements in order to attract sufficient students that the additional accompanying BIU's would compensate for the shortfall in its value. It is not known whether this has happened but it should be examined and universities should be careful to make their selections on the basis of qualifications which can be associated with reasonable prospects of success in university. At the same time the Ontario policy of accessibility needs to be honoured by adapting to the needs of underprivileged and minority groups who may need compensatory assistance before qualifying for regular university work. Special programmes devised for this purpose should qualify for special funding.

4. A ceiling on enrolment should be placed on all universities where enrolments fill their physical capacity.

The purpose of this proposal is to direct enrolment growth to those institutions having the physical resources rather than creating a further pressure for capital expansion in universities where the facilities are fully used. The Special Committee views this proposal as a short-term arrangement which may help to redistribute students to institutions with unused resources. We do not however believe that it would be realistic to continue such a policy in the face of substantial increases in regional are not going to accept a policy of forcing students to move away from home to attend university if there is a large unmet local demand for places.

We believe the policy can be refined to identify not only universities but also professional programmes in which no further growth will be recognized. These may or may not be in the same universities with overall ceilings. It may also be necessary to recognize growth of certain professional schools in universities which otherwise have a ceiling on enrolment.

Some programmes across the province are currently over-enrolled in relation to faculty resources. This problem could be dealt with either by adding staff or reducing future enrolments. Since the total operating grants to universities is not responsive to current enrolments, according to present policies or according to our financial proposals it would be desirable for universities with over-enrolled programmes to reduce enrolments rather than to add staff, so that students would turn to institutions with unused resources.

5. A new system of financing universities should be introduced for 1976-77 according to the following principles.

a) On the advice of OCUA the government should determine the global grants for the university system. This sum ideally should increase proportionally to the increase in provincial revenues. In no case should it be less than maintaining constant dollars for the system.

b) On the advice of OCUA certain universities and certain professional programmes should be identified which are not eligible for BIU income in relation to growth.

c) Ninety-nine percent of the global sum (less supplementary grants) should be allocated to the universities according to their 1974-75 BIU entitlement.

d) The remaining 1% should be distributed in relation to those universities and professional programmes eligible for growth income according to their 1975-76 BIU entitlement subject to the limitation that the BIU value for growth should not be more than 0.7% of the base BIU value or less than 0.5% of the base BIU value.

e) The average BIU's per FTE student should not be less than in any university.

f) Any supplementary grants should recognize only (a) unavoidable costs attributable to small scale, (b) unique costs attributable to geographic circumstances, special programmes such as bilingualism, and special circumstances such as transitional costs of integrating educational programmes.

These financial principles would have several important effects. The first would be that each university each year would be required to achieve a 1% improvement in overall productivity. (We believe such a set of policies might remain in force for five years.) By using the 1% holdback for growth the government's policy of accessibility could be maintained but the financial incentive for growth would be removed. The limited value of the growth BIU would be sufficient to cover additional costs but would not in itself encourage growth. In fact, the growing universities would maximize the value of the growth BIU by limiting total system growth to about 1.4%. This figure compares with total growth currently estimated by the universities of 1.9% in 1975-76, 2.1% in 1976-77, 1.6% in 1977-78 and 1.4% in 1978-79. Given some care with admissions and given that many of these students would not be able to attend the university of their choice, the figure seems reasonable.

The system would deliberately shift the growth to those institutions with capacity. It would allow the universities to argue for maximizing the global grant while ensuring for government that whatever the figure, provided it did not shrink in constant dollars, there would be a commitment to both better productivity and accessibility. The policies would give the universities the necessary time to make academic changes to accompany the extensive economies that have been made already in the past four years. For example, attrition is expected to be about .7% to .8% a year. Therefore much of the adjustment might be possible through attrition.

The rate of change in productivity would represent not only that accomplished through the 1% holdback but by the fact that no additional funds for growth would be involved. Assuming, for example, the minimum of constant dollar support for five years and an average growth of 1.4% per year, the increase in productivity would be $(5 \times 1) + (5 \times 1.4) = 12\%$. Finally, the system would give each university a much better appreciation of its financial prospects and a reasonable time scale to make adjustments.

6. COU and the universities should commit themselves to greater efforts in planning and coordination and should receive financial support from the government to assist these efforts.

A number of areas could benefit from greater attention. The following are possibilities:

a) COU could explore the value of extending the services of the Application Center to additional professional schools subject to receiving start-up grants from the Minister.

b) The various programmes of library coordination could be accelerated and extended if start-up funds were provided.

c) The possibility of new initiatives in respect of computer coordination should be discussed with OCUA.

d) The Program for Instructional Development should be expanded or modified depending on the results of the evaluation which is to take place this summer (1975).

e) Planning studies such as the current study of architectural education could be undertaken in other professional fields subject to government support.

f) The Council of Deans of Arts and Science could be asked to review opportunities for coordination of undergraduate programmes, for example, a system of cross-credits in costly fields.

7. In order not to entirely prevent innovation during a period of retrenchment, a) the universities should be allowed to increase their fees without compensating reduction in government grants, b) OCUA should consider and advise government on the possibility of a central Ministerial fund for innovation distributed on advice of OCUA in response to applications.

The task facing the universities is not one which is likely to encourage imaginative new developments to meet changing needs. New innovations generally require new funding and would find themselves in competition with urgent ongoing commitments. Yet it is important that the universities not lie fallow for five years, that they be able to respond to important new circumstances and new initiatives. Some freedom to change fees without penalty, perhaps on the advice of OCUA to government would be helpful. Another possibility which is not without its administrative difficulties, would be the establishment of a central fund for innovation. Its practicality would need to be examined by OCUA.

"Fundamental change" needed, Davis says

NOTES ON MEETING OF GROUP OF UNIVERSITY BOARD CHAIRMEN WITH PREMIER DAVIS AND THE MINISTER OF COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES — TUES. DECEMBER 17, 1974.

Premier Davis
Minister of Colleges and Universities — James Auld Executive Asst. to the Premier — E. Stewart

Messrs.
Gibson (Chairman of Group)
Desmarais
Harding Pollock
Ivey
MacIntosh

The meeting began at 11.45 a.m. and terminated at 1.15 p.m.

Mr. Gibson opened with a general statement in which he asked the Premier as to the longer term intentions of the Government, stressed the need to maintain and support quality in the system which Mr. Davis had himself played such a large part in building. He reflected the concern of all Universities that the inadequate increase in grants would cause grave difficulties not only in the next fiscal year but in planning for the next several years. He pointed out that 5 of the 6 Universities represented at the meeting would have accumulated operating deficits by April 1976, including some which had small accumulated operating surpluses at present. He invited Mr. Davis to indicate the government's priorities.

In general it could be said that Mr. Davis and perhaps even more so, Mr. Auld and Mr. Stewart, talked a hard line, although his last priority would be to cut down on enrolment. He said that even if the universities did this by raising admission standards, the secondary schools would adjust their standards accordingly. He said, that while he appreciated the modest efforts which had been made to rationalize programs, much more needed to be done.

The Premier followed two general themes regarding productivity. The first was that universities should make really serious efforts to eliminate unnecessary duplication, both within themselves and as between universities. The Minister cited the calendar of one university to suggest an excessive number of courses in Women's Rights as an example. Mr. Auld had been examining calendars and suggested that in one faculty of one university there were 114 listed teachers but only 14 actual courses in evidence. He said that the ration of faculty to students had changed by only a small fraction in the last four years. The Premier followed this up by saying that faculties displayed an understandable human tendency to expand the number of courses and programs with the growth in student enrolment. He tended to confirm Mr. Auld's view that the universities had not yet seriously tackled the problem of eliminating unnecessary duplication and critically examining new courses.

Secondly, the Premier drew on his own personal experience regarding the length of the college year. He said that the traditional lengthy summer break was no longer appropriate for the society we live in. He mentioned specifically the length of the college year of one of his own children, and also the faculty members he sees at summer cottages for several months. He implied that the universities would have to change fundamentally. He said he felt courses were unduly long and mentioned one specific law course which he felt could be shortened by a year. The discussion did not get deeply into the present use of facilities in summer but it was mentioned, and also the unfavourable impact on the job market for the new crop of young university teachers. Essentially he brushed these points aside, while acknowledging that there would be difficult personal problems in eliminating redundant programs.

In short, the Premier definitely conveyed the impression that the thrust of government policy was to force the universities to change their style fundamentally. The issue was not just immediate fiscal pressure. Mr. Gibson and other chairmen stressed the great difficulty in reducing staff over the short haul. The low rate of attrition was mentioned, and also the great difficulties with tenure. However the Premier gave little indication that the government saw the problem as transitory. He said that the most depressing meetings of Cabinet were those concerned with the 5-year plan. He said that everywhere he found demands which could not be met, and by implication gave no assurance about future years.

It was pointed out by the chairmen that it would be unfortunate if unduly stringent financial policies towards the universities were to encourage militant elements on campus and it was noted that symptoms of this were already to be found. While the Premier agreed with Mr. Gibson that such a development would be highly undesirable, he said that he was already faced with this problem with respect to his own civil service and he would have to deal with it as it came up. He offered the chairmen jobs as snowplow drivers in the near future.

In the final part of the interview the Premier said that when Dr. Stefan

Dupre had finished his hearings with the universities he would be preparing a report on the whole situation. The Premier expressed that Dr. Dupre would have some constructive suggestions. The Premier then proposed that another meeting be arranged after OCUA had made its report, perhaps with all chairmen and all presidents together, possibly in January.

There was possibly a slight implication that, if Dr. Dupre's report indicated that the universities would still fall short of their needs even after having carried out whatever rationalization policies he proposed, then the situation could be looked at again. However, not to much hope should be given to this closing proposal, as it seemed more in the way of a courtesy in terminating the interview than anything else.

Ontario Premier Bill "laff-a-minute" Davis lightheartedly suggests to university board chairmen that they can always get work driving snowplows.

with David Helwig g vanishes but words, all but the poems

NP: What worried me when I read your poems was that I was beginning to feel closeted; I was reading responsive poetry about Ontario, about down-to-earth things that I know; I am not used to that in reading poetry, never having been to Europe—when someone writes about the sparkling waters of the Mediterranean, or the Greek islands, there is something magical, spiritual, grand about that.

And it is a real question I had to ask myself. Was your poetry going to go somewhere because it was so much involved with things I was familiar with? Could I let myself go and experience that?

DH: That's an interesting response. This is what I was trying to say about Reaney. I am not much like him, but he made a big imaginative leap in Stratford, Ontario, somehow saying; this is a whole universe. That imaginative leap was very helpful, although I am not sure whether it directly affected a single one of my poems.

AS: Was he the only Canadian writer who had that effect on you?

DH: He was certainly the one who did it in a way that was real and possible for me. He was the one who did something that clicked in my mind.

NP: Do you see a tradition developing? Could you mention other writers on the Canadian scene who have been affected in their writings, the same way?

DH: In someone like Al Purdy, you have a very different and yet somehow very parallel mythologizing of his own experience, of his own landscape. Now what happens there is that you have a very strong persona, so that his poems are dramatic. There is one character who is going through a sequence of experiences that are accumulating something on the way through the poem. He is reflecting a world that is Ameliasburg, Eastern Ontario.

AS: Reading your short stories, I thought of a remark that Dave Godfrey made around 1968: "I am tired of plots and stories, and yet what form has more potential than the short story right now?"

DH: I am puzzled by short stories. Maybe I have finally discovered, in my middle thirties that I am not a story writer, although I have written some stories I am very fond of. It's curious, it's as if short stories happened to me occasionally. But when I look at them, I am not sure they happened at all.

My opinion of them is very diosyncratic. But, no I am not tired of plots and stories. I like plots. I am not very good at constructing them. One of the problems I have as a fiction writer is certainly that I am a busy plot constructor. But I like stories in which things happen. Even though I don't have any smart ideas about short stories.

AS: Do you feel bored by the new developments that have taken place within the novel form? How familiar are you with the "new novel" as a form?

DH: I have avoided being bored by them because I have never read them.

AS: Did you carefully ignore them?

DH: I have a streak of the philistine in me, a tendency to distrust art. At one point I had to make up my mind to decide whether I was going to read or write. I decided to write. Between the time I spent writing and teaching and the time doing all the interesting things there are to do, I am not very well read; I am not up on things.

When I had a year in England working on my novel, I spent most of my reading time on Russian novels or 19th century English novels. If I had a lot of time to read... I had then read the Bible or War and Peace or Dostoevsky. I don't feel a strong need to be up-to-date.

NP: In your short stories you show great deal of concern for particular individuals, for what happened to those people for the way in which they are treated. You mentioned the Bible and Dostoevsky, writers who are very concerned with values with how society is shaped, and how it can be changed.

DH: I am an unregenerate Puritan Moralistic. My background is Yorkshire Methodist chapel-goers, German anabaptist. I am certainly a Puritan, which does not mean a prude. There is a distinction between the two.

That moral energy of Puritanism is very important. One of the 20th century writers that fascinates me is Joyce Carey, he talked a lot about that moral energy, that Puritan energy.

NP: Do you feel that literature has an effect on people's values? How does literature leave the loaf?

DH: I don't know if it does.

AS: You must think that it does if you are writing.

DH: I hope that it does.

I don't write with the hope of altering anybody. I write because I enjoy writing. It's nice to write, to drink, to eat, to make love. They are almost similar pleasures. There is also in you a moral energy, a desire to watch, to shake the world, to have some kind of energetic contact with the world.

AS: Why did you go to Kingston, to the penitentiary, after the riots?

DH: I did not go there, I lived there. I had been in and around the prison before the riots. I had been doing some teaching in Collins Bay since 1966. Sometimes it occurs to me that I know more people who have done time than I know people who have not. Kingston pen was close to my house.

NP: Can you talk about your work there, in the prisons, as a catalyst?

DH: The first year was very exciting. The little group I ended up with had two or three very bright people. I just went in and talked about books. It was the most exciting teaching I had ever done. They were in the class because they enjoyed being there. They had an immense energy, being locked up all day, and no other outlet.

I have got to the point where I have been involved with prisons and with people inside enough to not want to talk about them. I tend to get angry, angry at liberals, or at anyone else. I have thought about it too much. My ideas are very fixed. They are complex, but fixed.

AS: You don't think there should be any jails, do you?

DH: That's not true. That's one of the problems. There is a streak of an anarchist in me who says, yes you can do away with all the jails and tolerate all the disorders in society. To a point we would. But there are people who are dangerous. I don't for a minute sentimentalize about all the people who are in jail. Many are simply inadequate, they can't function. There are some who are dangerous. People who kill children. It seems that the only way we can deal with them is to keep them away from the people they are going to damage.

On the other hand there could be a saner kind of society that could learn to deal with disorder. There are people in jail who are in there for adventure, they are the most professional criminals. They are there for example because they decided to rob a bank. It was as cool and rational a decision as anyone of us makes. One way of dealing with that kind of thing is to have a society that allows people to be more adventurous somehow.

AS: After entering the prisons of the soul in Niagara-on-the-Lake, in downtown Toronto, or those of the body with your work in Kingston, it seems as if you now plunge into the ocean of myth with an Atlantic Crossings (Oberon Press). Do you see the book as a pilgrimage to the roots of your ancestry?

DH: Obviously there is some kind of attempt to understand the meaning of the voyage across the Atlantic. In grade five or six we used to study the explorers. I ate it all up. They were magical people. Everybody remembers them I think. These guys just got in their boat, they set out, and they came here.

It has its roots there, in all those magical people that I heard about in my childhood. That excited me. For years in a vague sort of way I had thought of doing something with them. That's really what the roots are.

AS: Do you feel you are pursuing a significant direction, this myth making?

DH: I am not like Al Purdy or Layton, a dramatic poet and a lyrical poet at the same time. I don't have a persona that is very interesting. To write dramatic stuff I have to invent characters who are more interesting than I am, put them in situations and see what happens... which is more like fiction writing, and can be immensely exciting. It opens up new responsibilities, gets you out of the restrictions of your own experiences. You can just make it up.

AS: Your male characters seem very cruel, especially in "The Middle Passage".

DH: I do not know how to respond to that. One of the poems in Atlantic Crossings has a great deal of sadistic violence to it. I was quite upset by this when I was writing it, thinking where is this coming from? Things come from places you do not entirely know. The book is about imperialism. Then you come out and conquer a country that already has people in it you are an imperialist. The poems vary to the extent to which they dramatize that. "The Middle Passage" is a dramatization of emotional imperialism. At one point he looks at the woman and says: her body is like a map of a new country. It is a study of the emptiness of soul, coldness of mind that allows a totally exploitative attitude to take place.

In the Viking poems they turn back, they are faced with people they are going to have to fight with constantly, and possibly destroy. But rather than destroy them they turn back.

NP: Is the end of "The Viking Saga" (Part IV of Atlantic Crossings) the beginning of another story, of another long poem?

DH: Not at all. The last image of Atlantic Crossings which I am very fond of is the house where her son was born, as they are leaving it, it is bright and empty. The meaning is absolute and in the thing itself.

NP: I am looking for someone to write the story of Canada in poetry. You have brought us to the shores of Canada. I was wondering if that was a goal of yours at all.

DH: No. I have hardly written any poetry since I finished Atlantic Crossings. I felt I had done what I could do in poetry. Atlantic Crossings is one poem, not four. It is highly organized. Partly because of that I have not felt like writing poetry since. I have cured myself of the need. I am mad keen on writing fiction. I just finished revisions on one novel which is the first psychological novel I have written.

AS: Do you have a title for your new novel?

DH: It is called Two Times One. It's a story about two people. It's a love story.

Great Hall portraits: tradition and community

My father ate in Hart House's Great Hall once. He said the food tasted musty, tainted. Dead men's eyes watched him all the time. He never ate there again. So much for tradition.

The eyes that gazed from the portraits on the walls, just above the lines from Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress above the wainscoting that belong to various university dignitaries and beneficiaries, including Vincent Massey and Hart Massey himself.

Along the West Mall, hang more recent additions to the grave, namely the five wardens who have served Hart House since it opened in 1919.

Jean Langouis, the present warden, says he does not stand in the Great Hall and imagine the spot where he will hang.

In fact, he wouldn't be caught dead up there, he says. But a Hart House source told me that few wardens at Lanouis' point in tenure think about death and subsequent immortality, and that it would be a shame if the tradition was broken and his portrait wasn't hung.

But some people safely take pot shots at tradition. One familiar of the Great Hall with nothing better to do, and probably one of the best shots in the University community, has wounded Warden Nicholas Ignatieff seriously, just below the right lung.

With tradition in mind, I talked to Stella Grier and Cleve Horne, who have painted some of the works hanging in the Great Hall.

They paint the men and therefore the tradition. The men they painted are dead; they are still alive. But even though Horne and Grier work and mould our history they are not dewy-eyed philosophers, they are realists and business people. When asked about sensitive topics like their conceptions and views of reality and history and art, they relate anecdotes, they talk in terms of the business relationship between painter and sitter.

Stella Grier is 77 years old. She was born with oils and pastels in her blood. "I was actually born in my father's studio. It was just kitty corner from where the O'Keefe is on Front St. . . ."

Her father was Sir Wyley Grier, a name portrait painter in the Toronto of fifty years ago.

Seconds into the interview she mentioned him so I asked her if he influenced her more than anyone else.

"Yes he did. He was a good, stern teacher too. He told me to get everything going at once, not to concentrate on one eye or some feature, but to paint the work as a whole.

"He never really gave me any praise and when he died he still called me a promising young artist! I was over 50 then . . ."

"He never wanted me to become a painter because he knew how hard it was. He worked all the time."

Grier is extremely unpretentious and sits forward on the chesterfield with her hands wrapped around her knees.

She still paints for a living even though she has arthritis and phlebitis in one leg. I asked her if she was a struggling artist in her youth: "Oh heavens, yes, I still am."

Grier painted Walter Bowles, the first Warden, but added she was not "totally pleased with the finished portrait. You see, I had to paint it from a photograph and I could not capture his true spirit."

We sat down to tea and ginger cake and Grier continued, "He was quite a character, you wouldn't remember him but your parents would. He was a radio commentator. He was Warden for only two years.

"Take some cake. There was some problem with Vincent Massey, and he left, but don't put that down, I wouldn't want you or your paper to get into trouble."

That phrase "don't put that down" came up often in the course of the conversation. Grier said she didn't like unkind stories and stopped several delightful anecdotes in mid-stream.

I asked Lanouis later about Bowles. He said he knew nothing.

Stella Grier knows the truth, that there is a truth to know, but she would only say, "All the wardens of Hart House have their portraits up in the Great Hall, but they wouldn't put Walter Bowles' up until after Mrs. Massey died.

Grier took out a box filled with photographs. She showed me snapshots of her more recent portraits and continued telling me about how she started to paint professionally.

"I was 4½ years old when I did my first portrait, sitting on my father's knee. It must have been awful. Then I did my first portrait for money when I was 12 and it was ludicrous. The man I painted was extremely ugly and the funny thing was, he kept falling asleep, so my father told me to whistle, or sing, or stomp to keep him upright. The man was very happy with the portrait when it was finished though."

Grier had an English governess when she was young. In 1913, she went to the Margaret Eaton School of Literature. "I wanted to get away from my father and his influence", she confided: she then studied art in New York with Vincent Dumont, for a year.

"I never dreamt of going to university", she said modestly, "a different sort of person seems to go to university."

Of course in 1918 the University itself was different. Stella Grier would not be admitted into Hart House where her work is now a permanent fixture. And in keeping with her upbringing perhaps she seems modest about any intellectual inclinations. She seems quite conscious of the necessity to keep out of a "man's world".

"You asked me what my point of view is when I paint, how I see the sitter. I don't really ask intellectual questions. I paint people as I see them.

"I've never really had any problem with people about the finished picture.

"I like to paint my friends and I have to like the person I'm painting, because it will come through if I don't."

On the wall Grier pointed out a charcoal etching of her mother that her father had done. "I don't really work in charcoals the way my father did. And you know in pastels, when people say it must be so much fun to just use your thumb and smudge, I get so mad. You do not smudge a picture. I can't stand the thought.

Cleve Horne is 63 years old, tall and thin with a confident, self-sufficient manner. A bit like David Niven. A bit like Ayn Rand's conception of the artist, too.

He is an established Canadian portrait painter who has filled many commissions from industry, banking and education. He painted the portraits of wardens Nicholas Ignatieff (brother of George, incumbent Trinity College provost) and Arnold Wilkinson.

Horne lives in a very big North Toronto home. He, certainly, is no struggling artist.

I asked Horne how he sees the sitter and how he paints him.

"The basic aim of the picture is to work as a painting. It is not a likeness, it is partly characterization and partly a portrait, a work of art."

Immediately, I started taking notes, he stopped, said "Excuse me", raised his finger to get my attention and continued. I pinned my eyes to his and felt rather apologetic.

"The sitter has no control. The portrait is a work of his character as I see it.

"I don't work on a commission basis. If I'm not satisfied with the painting, they don't get it. If they're not satisfied with the picture, they don't get it. That way I get complete freedom.

"It is important to interpret the sitter's personality because the work must be 50 percent painting and 50 character. I have to meet the sitter before I start to paint him and just chat to make sure there is some contact between us. If I don't like him, it will come through in the final work. You might go and see how successful Horne and Grier have been.

"My wife, Jean, you just met her, she's a steel welder, well anyway she comes down here to the studio and just talks to the sitter and that way I can see inside him. As they talk he loses his self-consciousness and I can start to understand him."

"The important thing is to make the sitter feel at ease and just find out what his mannerisms are . . . The way you're sitting now and crumpling that paper — I bet that's something you do often."

I started to feel more self-conscious.

"You have to find a person's style because that's his signature . . . Just to see how the folds in the jacket lie. I'm not painting some stuffed figure.

"I don't pose people. I painted this one executive with his feet up on his desk, leaning back in the chair. Just a typical pose.

"I paint people as I feel they are and I have fun. I enjoy my work. You can't do anything well you really don't enjoy.

"Originally, I planned to go into architecture. I designed this studio after the war. Behind the curtain, that's all glass, and there's a window over your shoulder and there's also the sky light on the ceiling. I decided you can never have enough light. You can close it off if you want to, but you have to have it first."

I wanted to know about influences on his life and work, who helped to develop his style. He admired Harold Towne. He said he went to the Ontario College of Art in the 30's and then started to talk about the depression.

"Anyone would work at anything and you can always get work if you're good at something, even just digging ditches. If you're the best ditch-digger around, you'll always get a job.

"I'm afraid with welfare, people are just going to sit back and not do anything".

"Creative men do work better under pressure; their minds are more active. They just have to be more inventive than during times of affluency.

Cleve Horne seems to be a living example of the "power of positive thinking". I asked if he ever worries in the middle of the night, "Will I lose it, my talent, my strength, my livelihood?"

He didn't seem to understand what I meant but then he said, "Yes, I suppose I do. You never really stop worrying about yourself or your abilities. No matter how successful you are you worry. And the older you get, the worse the doubting gets. But the important thing is to keep working.

Can one speak or write at any great length about tradition at the U of T? Is the word simply a catch-all, a slogan, just one word in a litany of cant words? Certainly Stella Grier and Cleve Horne had very little to say about any special awareness they had of the U of T. But one thing I think they do emphasize is the diversity, the fecundity, the richness of experience, the U of T represents. When I thought about the portraits, if I thought about them at all, I saw them simply as portraits — adding something to the atmosphere perhaps but not much more. But they are portraits of people to whom the U of T has meant a lot, and to which they have given a lot, and painted by other people who have come into at least peripheral contact with the university. It is very easy to become blinkered by one's worries as an undergraduate, it is very easy to become too involved in the bureaucracy of the pedagogy of the university and so fail to stand back and see the institution as a whole. But if we look around us — at the gargoyles at UC, at the books in the library, so many of which have come to it from the estates of professors and graduates, at the Varsity even, — then one does get a sense of tradition, an awareness of a unique community that exists not only over a certain extent of space but over a long period of time as well, and in the minds of so many people of different ages and backgrounds.

It's always a surprise to discover that tradition — but an even greater surprise is one's response to it.

Bogdonovitch meets the press

Here in the plush Hyatt Regency was Peter Bogdonovitch himself, and the crowd of university journalists couldn't get enough of him.

Bogdonovitch, one of Hollywood's hottest properties with five movies to his credit — Targets, The Last Picture Show, What's Up Doc, Paper Moon and Daisy Miller — was in town to promote his latest movie, a $6 million dollar production of Cole Porter's At Long Last Love.

Written, directed and produced by Bogdonovitch, the film stars Burt Reynolds and Cybill Shepherd. When it opened recently in New York's Radio City Music Hall, the N.Y. critics led by Rex Reed tore it to shreds.

But Bogdonovitch's audience this evening was an appreciative one drawn from Toronto-area student newspapers, radio stations, and film-making courses.

Bogdonovitch took no offence at being asked the same artless fan magazine questions he has been asked thousands of times before, such as "Why did you shoot The Last Picture Show in black and white? What's it like working with Barbra Streisand? When is that movie with you and Orson Welles going to be released?"

Instead he seemed to enjoy them coming from the naive and unjaded students, probably because when you're on an international promotional tour, you extract small pleasures from the grind when you can.

Dressed to the nines in an elegant suit and puffing away at a $2 Monte Cristo No. 1 Cuban cigar, he was being treated with the sort of reverence not forthcoming from the film critics, and felt free to ham the stupid questions up.

"Why did I shoot The Last Picture Show in black and white? Because I'm color blind." (Laughter.)

What about his new musical? "Well, it's partially a spoof on the musical form as well as a celebration of it, an intention that was totally missed by the New York film critics," Bogdonovitch says.

"The crowds — 43,000 in four days — at Radio City loved the movie, and that's what really counts."

"Most of my movies have got bad reviews, but have done well. What's Up Doc got scorched by the critics and grossed over $40 million."

But you were a film critic for Esquire magazine — has your opinion of the occupation changed?

"The only movies that need the critics' benedictions are the small art movies that are struggling, like The Last Picture Show."

Good reviews won't necessarily help them though, Bogdonovitch says. "Look at Coppola's The Conversation. A movie couldn't have got better reviews and it flopped."

"I have a low opinion of the occupation of critic, be it film or whatever. It's a good job when you're young because you learn a lot but you shouldn't stay at it."

What words of wisdom did he have for the student film-maker? "If you believe you are a film-maker you are. It doesn't take long to learn — that's just a big Hollywood myth."

Bogdonovitch admits film as an art form depends more on economics than the others, but says you have to pick your audience. "You don't have to make 35 mm films with 400 people in them. You could use 8 mm and just do it for your friends."

"Anyway, I'm convinced adversity doesn't stop great talent."

Bogdonovitch denies, as he probably has in any interview he's ever had, Rex Reed's charge that he's only doing homages to old directors and old genres, and has nothing original to offer.

"I just do what interests me, I'm not paying homages," he says with a sigh.

"I just try to do what's challenging, and I turn down what doesn't interest me," Bogdonovitch says, mentioning the offers he had to direct The Exorcist, Chinatown, The Last Detail, The Way We Were, The Great Gatsby and even a sequel to Paper Moon which would have made him a millionaire.

"It's only if I'm not sure I can do a project that I start getting interested. It's a waste of my time to do something I know I can do."

"That should be reserved for when I can't do anything else, either because I'm too old or because I've had some flops and I need the money. But right now it's a little too early to be doing sequels to Paper Moon."

summer film preview:

In the spring and summer while The Varsity suspends publication, a number of interesting films might be opening in Toronto.

These films are worth mentioning for a number of reasons, but because I haven't seen any of them, quality is an area where I reserve comment. At most, these films have 'potential'.

New Canadian films

Any English-track feature film in Canada is worth noting; it's becoming a rapidly extinct phenomenon. It seems that the feature film industry has almost ground to a halt.

Although very few new films are being started, a number of films are being finished or already are finished and await distribution.

Lies My Father Told Me is a long-awaited film. Directed by Jan Kadar and written by Ted Allan, the film deals with immigrants in Montreal during the 1920's.

Jan Kadar was a fairly important Polish director (he made Shop on Main Street). It may be interesting to see what his work might look like in Canada; Polish directors are known for very tight and precise films (because of a post-war film shortage in Poland.)

125 Rooms of Comfort is a film that seems will never get released.

It's directed by Patrick Loubert and is supposed to be unusual. The film covers twenty-four hours in the Grand Hotel in St. Thomas, Ontario.

The owner dies but can't leave the hotel to his son because the latter is insane. The business manager takes over; Americans try to buy out the hotel.

The film features Jackie Burroughs with Henri Fiks as cinematographer. (Fiks was brilliant as the cameraman for Monkeys in the Attic.)

Alien Thunder might be worth watching — or watching for. The film is the story of a Cree Indian being chased by a Mountie in the 1890's. It's directed by Claude Fournier and stars Chief Dan George and Donald Sutherland.

Joyce Wieland, who has been doing a lot of experimental film, is now finishing off The Far Shore. The film is based on Group of Seven member Tom Thomson, whose death in 1917 remains a mystery and it features Stuart Gillard (Why Rock the Boat?).

For those who might have seen and liked Leonard Yakir's Mainstreet Soldier, note he has made his first feature — Mourning Suit. Henri Fiks was the cinematographer on this one also.

Another Canadian features that I have heard of but know little detail about are: Me, by John Palmer; It Seemed Like A Good Idea At The Time, a comedy by John Trent (Homer); and Peter Bryant's Supreme Kid.

Undoubtedly I have missed a number of films and of course I didn't even touch at the final of film coming from Quebec. Finally, believe it or not, there is a Canadian feature film made in Ukrainian — Marichka.

United States

What one hopes for the most is relief from the torrent of disaster films and police stories. A number of films may offer promise for variety and have either just opened a few days ago or will open shortly.

Shampoo is a film directed by Hal Ashby (The Last Detail) and written by Robert Towne (Last Detail, Chinatown) and Warren Beatty. With a director/writer team such as this, the film should have a lot to offer.

Peter Bogdonovitch, a film critic turned director, has been trying revivals. His What's Up Doc? was an attempted revival of the old screwball comedies; At Long Last Love is an attempt at the Hollywood musicals.

Judging by the appeal of That's Entertainment! he may succeed. The film features music by Cole Porter and stars, to nobody's surprise, Cybil Shepherd with Burt Reynolds and Madeline Kahn. The Prisoner of Second Avenue is another Neil Simon play made into film. It stars Jack Lemmon and Anne Bancroft with Mel Fraok (A Touch of Class) directing.

Opening later in the year is Robert Altman's latest film, Nashville. As the title suggests, the film deals with singers in that town.

Altman is known for films like MASH, McCabe and Mrs. Miller, California Split. This film has been acclaimed as "the ultimate Altman movie."

Nashville had to be produced independently because no studio would finance it; a good sign for a film.

Arthur Penn, who directed Bonnie and Clyde, Alice's Restaurant, and who has been quiet since Little Big Man, has made The Dark Tower with Gene Hackman. Ingmar Bergman called Penn, "one of the greatest directors in the world."

Martin Scorsese (Mean Streets) has made Taxi Driver with Robert Di Nero (Young Don Corleone in Godfather II).

England

For those who liked Richard Lester's The Three Musketeers, the second half of that film, The Four Musketeers has just opened in Toronto.

The only other promising film from England is Barry Lyndon. This film by Stanley Kubrick (2001 and A Clockwork Orange) is based on William Thackeray's 19th century novel.

Because Kubrick wanted to make the film as natural as possible, the only lighting used was candlelight, and a special lens had to be designed to do it.

The film took three years to make and stars Ryan O'Neal and Marisa Berenson.

France

Two films have arrived from France: Viолons du Bal and Black Thursday. Both deal with French war experiences and are in The Sorrow and the Pity Lacombe, Lucien genre.

Many distinguished filmmakers of France, some nouvelle vague, have films that have been released recently or will be in the near future. Resnais' Stavisky has already played in Toronto, and one hopes the other films might arrive in North America soon.

Films have been recently made by Jacques Demy, Claude Chabrol, Jacques Rivette, Robert Bresson and Georges Franju.

Ken Russell: a Walt Disney for jaded teenyboppers

It is not hard to perceive the flavour of another place, another time, in an oldie but goldie film on the repertory circuit. But there are rare moments — but moments as intense as they are rare — when one immediately perceives one's own time as something distinct, distant from oneself in a newly released film. It is not a feeling of deja vu but it is like that sense of double perception; it is a sense that things are as they are, yes, and that they will change; a sense that things are encompassed on one's first encounter with them; a sense that one's first encounter is one's last, a sense that the future is as solid and as inevitable, though not yet known, as the present.

This is certainly the feeling that one gets with Tommy, the star-studded film of the Who's 'rock opera'. It looms up before one fullblown to be welcomed, and comprehended instantaneously and then let go.

It's a feeling that has certain strange beauty.

Tommy was given a gala premiere last Friday at the Varsity Cinemas in the Manulife Centre. Floodlights outside, and a long and wide red carpet leading inside. ("Oh no!" I said.) The house was packed. The invitation only audience was dressed to the gills. They applauded the film warmly; the appearances of Tina Turner, Eric Clapton, Elton John, in particular. Their applause of course was the reverse side of the film's "datedness". The audience was celebrating its own up-to-dateness (and yet at the same time ensuring how out-of-date this film would soon be).

More particularly and perhaps more significantly Tommy makes one aware of the limitations of its director, the notorious obnoxious preposterous Ken Russell, that enfant terrible of British cinema.

Russell, who has directed such films as Women in Love, The Music Lovers, The Savage Messiah, The Boyfriend, and Mahler, has had free rein here. Naturally, he not only directed, he also co-produced the film and wrote the screenplay. Russell has a tremendous energy and vitality, but to no apparent end. It's interesting of course, since the music and the story line are so well known, to see precisely how someone would visualize them. Russell is willing to present any kind of film trickery, any number of images, (including some of the hoariest in the book). But so what? His films are ultimately only cavalcades of images. Images unanalyzed, unmotivated that are simply flung at us. Russell seems to be a Walt Disney (a rather humourless one too) for jaded teenyboppers.

Women in Love is generally agreed to be Russell's best film. It is a relatively early work. And he is confined in it to his benefit more strictly than usual though still loosely enough within the confines of someone else's work. Yet it is natural that that someone else should be D.H. Lawrence. Both men are similarly obsession-ridden, similarly arrogant. And there are times too when one feels that Lawrence is someone one discards in one's maturity.

John Simon, the notorious obnoxious preposterous film critic, has suggested that Russell uses his medium as "a poor man's surrogate for material and social emoluments, his art having to be, in Brecht's phrase, as lavish as only beggars could conceive it." (Russell, who comes from a lower-middle class background, apparently feels aggrieved and jealous.) "But the imagined lavishness of beggars has always something spurious about it — in Russell's case, a meaningless superabundance of showy display." In Tommy, in the process of all that showy display, Russell lightly casts aside too much talent; in particular that of Tina Turner, and Ann-Margaret (yes!).

Russell is doing exactly what he wants to: "Fiddling about Fiddling about Fiddle about." But his self-indulgence does not rate such public attention. He is like the man on the street corner who offers you salvation and becomes testy when you aren't interested. But the problem isn't that you don't understand or sympathize — rather that he presents salvation on such a simplistic yet pseudo-profound level. He exacts tolerance.

Crombie: Tory upper middle class

The Tiny Perfect Mayor
Jon Caulfield
James Lorimer

There has long been an absence of first rate analysis and commentary on the urban political scene in Canada. Too often journalists have preferred to write about the larger issues and personalities in national and international politics.

However, John Caulfield's Tiny Perfect Mayor issued before the municipal elections in Toronto last year, may be an indication that this is changing. Together with books already written by Toronto reform alderman John Sewell and publisher Jim Lorimer, Caulfield's work contributes to a growing literature which looks at the movements for reform in Canada's urban centres.

Tiny Perfect Mayor is of course built around an analysis of the political phenomenon of Toronto "reform" mayor David Crombie. Caulfield's main thesis is that Crombie is not a reformer but a wily politician elected to preserve privileged neighbourhoods, not to provide housing for lower income people and stop development in Toronto.

Caulfield starts his narrative with the reform movement before the election, traces the 1972 election campaign when a group of reformers were swept into office on a tide of anti-development sentiment, then spends the large part of the book analysing the first two years of the "reformers" in power.

The truth is, as Caulfield demonstrates, the reformers are really divided between moderates (which Crombie is), soft reformers (Bill Kilbourn), and hard core reformers (such as John Sewell). He buttresses this with comprehensive voting records on various issues such as housing, massive developments (such as Metro Centre) and transportation.

Caulfield was criticized in the established press reviews for holding Crombie in too much contempt, but surely he has been misinterpreted. Caulfield is merely arguing Crombie must be seen as a Tory upper middle class candidate elected by middle class people. Since he took office City Hall has consistently failed to stop developers in the crunch, on Metro Centre, on the Eaton Centre, on Quebec Gothic, on South St. James Town and with the 45 foot height bylaw.

Crombie has also developed a presidential approach to problem solving. With a large personal staff, he has several times entered personal negotiations with developers to make compromises, usually with great fanfare.

Caulfield is a Toronto journalist, who worked for the now defunct Toronto Citizen, as city hall columnist. He is widely respected as one of the most capable city hall reporters and Toronto readers should look forward to more of his incisive analysis, especially if the Citizen is revived this fall.

This country: the country held the show together

Peter Gzowski's
This Country in the Morning
Hurtig

When I grow up I want to be Paul Hiebert", says Peter Gzowski at the beginning of his book about This Country in the Morning. It is a good, vintage Gzowski opening: whimsical, self-deprecating, subtly jingo, a little defeatist. (Hiebert is the creator of Sara Binks.) On the This Country programme and in its printed distillation, Gzowski combined his perennial editorial skill, his not inconsequential ability as a writer and his own personal, bourgeois ordinariness. The result was unique: a kind of educated humility and just as rare, or even rarer, a national sounding voice.

I first met Gzowski in the late sixties when he was editor of the Star Weekly and then of Maclean's. That was the era of the personal journalist and the engage, with Mailer, Wolfe, Sontag and Didion riding the crest. Gzowski acknowledged and approved the style (most editors didn't), but he never really pulled it off himself. Harry Bruce was the great Canadian magazine writer, Gzowski his editor.

During his brief tenure at Maclean's, I handed Gzowski a piece about a friend who climbed up the CBC tower one lunch break and got arrested for attempted suicide and then held in mental hospital for five days. I used a straight, fact by fact, unbiased narrative approach, except for one italicized paragraph in which I wrote, "Sweet God — excuse me this one editorial comment — the cops ask a man if he was attempting suicide and he says no, and they book him for attempted suicide; and he says don't push me so they push him harder; they kneed him and punch him and he asks for a doctor and the doctor arrives with the man who kneed and punched him; and a psychiatrist asks him if he heard voices, and he says no, and so he gets committed to a mental hospital; and then THEY say that HE is acting strangely!"

Gzowski particularly liked that paragraph, saying it was the kind of thing he would love to write but couldn't. With This Country, he found himself for the first time free of some of those encumbrances. More fell away because the era changed. In the sixties one didn't admit caring as much about minor hockey as about the poor. In the Seventies one did, and Gzowski, who knew and cared about both, equally I think, wailed with it, soloed on his own concerns. His real, personal style shone out of the CBC like a single clod of earth in a mountain of pearls. It attracted the listenership and the contributors — two largely overlapping groups — that sustained Gzowski's and producer Alex Frame's radio magazine. Dumb riddles, local legends, analyses, songs, issues of moment and unclassifiables like one listener's distressed description of the death of a wild stallion all came pouring in at the bidding of Gzowski's non-announcer's voice. (Recently Gzowski was hired by CBC to give a course for announcers in how to talk like people.)

I understand that a copy of Peter Gzowski's Book About This Country in the Morning, as it is called, found its way to an English critic who couldn't make head or tail of it. It was not as funny as a Monty Python book, and while the interviews with Prime Ministers seemed real, what were they doing being bordered by limericks about someone named "Justin"?

Of course the English critic didn't get it, couldn't get it, because, as the saying goes, you had to be there. That is, here. Not listening to the original programme: on the air This Country kept up its quota of weekly turkeys. But here in Canada, for This Country is a truly populist work. The show didn't try to hold the country together — a job for which, Alex Frame once said, a rope would be better than a radio programme — but the country held the show together.

In concrete and ineffable ways we could feel what the concerns were, where the nonsense sprang from. The best of This Country, which the book reproduces, is among the best of this country. The combination of Gzowski, Frame, their staff and the times released it as no one was quite able to do before. That Gzowski will never be Paul Hiebert turns out to be for the best. We didn't need a second Hiebert but we had definite use for an unnumbered Gzowski.

the result defeats the purpose putting it together

Blackout
Hubert Aquin
Anansi

French-Canadian authors have a reputation for acute introspection. In their search for a distinct identity (distinct, that is, from their English-speaking co-nationals) the individual or family unit is painstakingly explored. The result often defeats its purpose; there is something annoying about this constant self-analysis which turns away the very audience to which it is directed.

Hubert Aquin's Blackout (House of Anansi, 1974), while containing elements of murder, mystery and foreign intrigue, essentially conforms to this model. Pierre X. Magnant, a 33-year-old French-Canadian pharmacist and revolutionary, poisons and strangles his girlfriend, an Anglaise named Joan Ruskin. More than half the book is concerned with Magnant's harrowing self-analytic dissertation, the spiritual disrobing of an acutely insecure drug addict, sexual aberrant and ultimate suicide case.

These 100 pages in fact comprise portions of his private memoirs, posthumously edited by a friend. Magnant's reputation as a revolutionary separatist, and his feeling of inadequacy in this capacity, are an important motive for his killing Joan, but is not of great significance to the novel as a whole. Blackout is not primarily a political or social work, much less a separatist mouthpiece. Aquin's concern is with the individual psyche. Thus, only those events which bear a direct relation to the mental peculiarities of the characters are brought to light.

The editor's self-conscious comments, interspersed throughout the narrative in the form of footnotes and short explanatory chapters, exemplify the agonized, almost hysterical, humour most clearly associated with Marie-Claire Blais. In the last 60 pages of the novel, the editor emerges from the wings to become one of the antagonists in a battle for control of the book. Each accuses the other of fraud and both remain nameless until the last chapter. Herein lies the mystery.

In the end, the reader is abandoned on a note of paradox and ambiguity. Chronology, an important clue to the unravelling of the mystery, is confused and, in places, deliberately contradictory. Months after Magnant is said to have committed suicide, he turns up in Geneva and rapes Joan's sister. While the editor is given a name, his identity remains unsolved. His combatant, known throughout as 'RR', is eventually named but her relationship to Magnant is never clarified, the reason being that she is the one who suffers from a 'blackout' (or 'trou de memoire', the original, and more satisfactory, title of the work) such that she cannot remember the exact events leading up to the rape. Both the editor and 'RR' are ultimately guilty of fraud. Nor is a clear connection established between Magnant and the editor.

Aquin's talent lies in his ability to convincingly assume a wide array of masks. Assuming that literature is written in order to be read, this ability may in fact be a liability. His almost violent penetration of the spiritual sanctity of his characters engenders in the reader a feeling of acute discomfort. Magnant's diary, initially impressive as a fascinating tangle of ideas, becomes painful when a pattern emerges and the whole obscures the parts. It is too protracted and interest wanes before the more interesting aspects of the plot are revealed.

equality of geographic and age distribution, the fundamental stipulation for submitting entries to the book being that the artist has exhibited during that year.

Burnett is willing to comply with artists' demands that a jury be chosen to make the final selection from work submitted — provided they are willing to get together and figure out how it could be done. "The artists complain," he says, "but they are not organized in such a way that they could ever work things out."

Although the first book has only sold 40 percent of the original edition, the second book sold 30 percent of 5,000 copies in the first eight weeks. Burnett is currently working on projects to get the book into schools and libraries across the country, largely through provincial funding and company donations towards purchase programs.

Roundstone was originally funded by a LIP grant and is now operating on bank loans and extended credit although it is currently applying for a Canada Council grant. Up until now all the energy has been put into producing the books but plans for the future include a number of pilot projects and the development of teaching programs — all connected to its aim "to encourage and promote public interest in the arts in every way possible."

extraordinarily good and impossible to find

Chimera
John Barthes
Faucet
Laughable Loves
Milan Kundera
Random House

Magazines have, however, led me to the few books I have read and liked over the last couple of years: The New Yorker to Pauline Kael, at her best in Deeper Into Movies and to Penelope Gilliat's Unholy Fools; Esquire to two collections of short stories John Barth's Chimera and Milan Kundera's Laughable Loves.

Chimera may appeal only to those of my particular acidic taste. At least something has to explain its total disappearance. It won a National Book award, a bath of critical praise and it was released in paperback. But try to find it.

It may have been too, well, tricky.

Witness the first story: Scheherazade, the most promising undergraduate at the University of Arabia, quits school to research ways to stop King Shryar from raping and murdering a virgin each night. Political Science and Psychology prove fruitless, so she turns to literature and while considering the nature of fiction—in which all endings are possible—she pens the motif, "the key to the treasure is the treasure." At which a genie, fortyish, balding and bespectacled, appears. The genie explains that he too had been puzzling through the story-teller's craft (in his study in far-away Maryland) and had arrived at the same magical phrases.

The genie congratulates Scheherazade on her One Thousand and One Night's tales, the unsurpassed masterwork of the story teller's art and the profoundest image of the story teller's situation. Scheherazade knows nothing of any of this, having not told a story since childhood, and then only the stock ones. So the genie arranges to meet her daily to reveal the stories with which she will engross the king and succeeding generations down to the genie himself.

If that sounds reticular, that is just the half of it, as the character and the author trace the most elaborate arabesques of tales within tales. Barth confesses to awe at the possibility of a story framed from within, a story about a story teller told by a character in the story he tells. I think he has done it, although I am too long away from my algebra to check out the exact symmetry. In any case he has my awe and, given that the key to the treasure is the treasure, it is treasure enough.

Milan Kundera's Laughable Loves is another rare book: extraordinarily good and almost impossible to find. It is not even in paperback. Nor is it likely to be. Pity.

Kundera is a Czech and yet another demonstrator of the particular ability of Czech artists to observe men and women with compassion, humour and uncanny exactitude. To which Kundera adds a more individual streak of cynicism. When a holidaying couple begin to play a hitch-hiking game—she the hitch-hiker, he a womanizing sports car driver—the game takes over their holiday and, in its residue, their lives. Kundera fills in the framework so richly, draws the characterizations so unerringly out of the characters, that there is no moment of transition, just people helplessly choosing their own destinies.

Kundera reminds me of the famous cartoon of a sainted Shaw manipulating human puppets from above a cloud. The Czech writer is so unerring in his motions, and so unclumsy with his devices, that the characters seem to direct themselves. Their concerns and thoughts are embarrassingly familiar.

While all these stories are about love, or at least seduction, or at least feigned seduction, there is no shortage of strings to Kundera's bow. These are the couplings and fantasies of young, middle-aged and old persons, of the happily married, the roue, the pensive, the arrogant.

It is odd that Milan Kundera, who writes so universally on such personal matters, is one of the banned writers of Czechoslovakia. Perhaps the Party censors have become so lost in their own power that they can no longer distinguish personal insight from political. Or, perhaps theirs is a longer term wisdom. For, once one has read some Kundera, one wants to read more, and at some point that has to endanger the bureaucrat and the censor.

The Waterloo Programme in Management Sciences is designed to serve ambitious individuals in advancing their careers.

We cater to those who can qualify for entry into an Applied Science Graduate Faculty, including graduates in engineering, mathematics, the sciences, and similar fields. Since our formation in 1969, we have graduated over 150 masters' and numerous doctorate candidates.

We stress the preparation of graduates to fully professional depth in a set of fundamental skills, thereby helping them to transform future unforeseen career demands into new career opportunities throughout their professional lifetimes.

Our approach is readily distinguishable from, and complementary to traditional MBA programmes, which expose their students to a wide spectrum of current successful management practices via "case study" methods and the use of advanced management terminology. Typically, their goal is early placement of the graduate in line management. By contrast, our goal is the development of professional self. Because of his skill in quantitative and qualitative management problem solving, our graduate may work in staff positions at any level of the enterprise. By concentrating in depth on Applied Economics, Operational Research, and Organizational Behaviour (normally specializing in one of these areas), our graduate is well prepared for analytical and advisory work in a broad range of positions and occupational settings.

Studies focus on the use of mathematical and statistical models and the communication of their implications to executives, rather than on familiarity with current managerial language and institutional practice.

Our graduates have obtained positions both inside and outside Canada with major private corporations, with prominent consultants to private and public clients, and with governments.

Our programme has been recognized in "The Ring of Iron" as one of the very few Centres of Excellence in Ontario graduate education in Applied Science (1970). Noteworthy also is the recent report of independent consultants to "ACAP", which stated:

... "there has been a concentrated attention on areas congenial to engineering. A high quality programme concentrating on depth rather than breadth has resulted..."

Analysis of career patterns has revealed that over one half of the graduates in engineering are employed in an exclusively technical capacity for only a fraction of their careers. On less adequate data, such a pattern is visible also for graduates in other fields. For these individuals, management functions become increasingly important throughout the major part of their careers. In a related finding, over two thirds of those who continued technical work, were found, 15 years later, in occupations requiring activities considerable different from those related to their degrees. Such high mobility, often containing an upward, supervisory component, has been available to the typical successful engineer, and to many others. In modern conditions, preparation for such mobility, through the acquisition of skills in managerial thinking, appears to be increasingly important. Our areas of study have been selected with this trend in mind.

Faculty research activities are emphasized heavily in our department, providing students with diverse opportunities for their required project or thesis work. We believe that contact with, and participation in some management sciences research activity is highly beneficial to the student. Current research topics include inventory and production scheduling problems under uncertainty, the economics of public enterprises, capital market problems and portfolio management, the design of information systems, and studies of worker motivation.

Detailed information regarding course offerings, areas of study, faculty members, time requirements, fees, and financial support is available from:

survival: bookstore dilemma too!

The Nth Hand Bookstore at Harbord and Spadina is one of those sadly neglected, almost invisible intellectual establishments for which one wishes grander fortunes.

If this city were Paris in the 20s, U of T its Left Bank and we budding Hemingways and Millers wrestling to bring novels to birth, then the university's neighboring secondhand bookstores such as Nth Hand, Fifth Kingdom and Volume Two would be richly flourishing.

But this is Toronto, 1975, U of T is, well, U of T and our most creative writing is done for essays and the Law School Admission Test.

Rather than being the equivalents to the famous Paris secondhand bookstore, Shakespeare & Co., our small bookstores struggle on with little money, a small but loyal clientele and quiet but nevertheless tenacious hopes for better things.

Take the Nth Hand Bookstore for example. It's a sleepy, almost invisible store at 102 Harbord which Paul Stuewe opened for $500 in September to underwrite his writing ambitions.

"To support myself as a writer, I've had to write things which I'm not proud of for magazines like Reader's Digest. But the store seems to have worked out — now I'm writing what I want rather than what I have to," Stuewe says.

Serious literary magazines like Books In Canada, Quill and Quire and Canada Fiction Guide pay next to nothing, leaving Stuewe to depend on the bookstore's income.

"When it first opened in September we had a real rush. But October was terrible. All the university students had their books and we had practically no steady customers," he recounts.

Now Stuewe says he has a clientele that will come in once a month to pick up books and the Nth Hand is at least holding its own.

"I want the store to be for the generally literate. I'm not catering to the specialist. This place reflects what I am — eclectic," he explains.

Eclectic it is too, with sections on history, "inspired" journalism, religion, philosophy, sci fiction and children's books.

Stuewe says he's fairly selective and as he gets a sounder financial footing, he'll eventually be able to refuse the sure sellers like Hailey, Susann and Gibran.

The books come from all over — trade-ins, Church rummage sales and trades with other dealers.

Stuewe says the second hand book market is "not very competitive. I'm friendly with Fifth Kingdom and Volume One. They helped me when I first got started."

"The more bookstores you have in a neighborhood the better it is for browsing. The ideal would be like Fourth Avenue in New York where every second building is a bookstore."

The secondhand book business is the easiest small business to operate, Stuewe says. "Nobody of knowledge is needed, no 'Type B' certificate."

A couple of days of serious effort and a few hundred dollars are what you need to start, says Stuewe. It also helps to love books.

"There is only a handful of really good secondhand stores in Toronto. The rest are in it not because they love books but because it's a business, like selling shoes or ball-bearings."

The other problems with opening a secondhand bookstore like the Nth Hand are "picky but psychically significant — like people breaking the backs of your books while browsing or telling you your stuff is no good."

The bookstore also has a growing collection of Canadian books which Stuewe says are "terribly neglected."

"I have a lot of Canadian writers like Lawrence Garber and Marcel Horne which I think are as good as the big sellers here like Burroughs or Kerouac."

Pretzels Theatre in The Dell

For the past few years, The Theatre in The Dell has specialized in presenting musical revues such as "Oh Coward" and "The Dell Pickle", in the tiny cabaret style theatre.

Now, following the highly successful seven-month run of "What's A Nice Country Like You Doing In A State Like This?", The Dell is serving up a new treat called Pretzels.

Much of this show's success is due to the jaunty music and clever lyrics of John Forster. The tunes are simplistic, yet they have remarkably intricate rhythms that match perfectly the satiric lyrics.

One of the best numbers is a lengthy, operatic style sequence titled "The Reunion". Three reunited classmates discuss, in song, the misfortunes of their adult lives — including sex, marriage, divorce and careers. The singers punch out the snappy gag lyrics.

Unfortunately, the skits cannot always maintain this crisp breezy pace, and the show tends to drag in some of the non-musical sequences.

In these scenes it is the high-spirited performances, by the tiny cast, that save the show from grinding to a halt. Fiona Reid plays all of her many roles in a pleasant though basically unchanging style. Her throaty voice is used to good effect in her musical numbers.

Victor Young displays a fine singing voice, though his style seems just a bit too slick.

The third member of the tiny cast, Jayne Eastwood, is no newcomer to this theatre form, having played in the original Toronto Godspell and with Second City. She is sheer joy to watch in her many different roles in Pretzels, her charm and vivacity present at every moment. She slides with such ease from character to character, playing a Jewish mother, a fiery Spanish actress, a forceful cosmetician or a quiet subdued oddball who performs Shakespearean plays with her tropical fish. Each character exists, if only for a few moments, as a funny, touching, real person.

The fourth performer in Pretzels, Stephen Woodjetts, spends most of the show as accompanist, seated at the piano. For one sequence however, he enters dressed as Mozart, bemoaning the trials of composing a top 10 tune, in the hilarious "Classical Music".

Pat Carmichael has staged the show with a brisk, easy style that usually manages to fill The Dell's tiny stage.

Playing for an indefinite run, Pretzels is a perfect after-dinner snack — bright, fresh and a joy to digest.

Pretzels anyone?

The False Messiah
Theatre Passe Muraille

The False Messiah, currently appearing at the St. Paul's Centre branch of the Theatre Passe Muraille complex, seems to me to be a waste of talent. The trouble lies with Rick Salutin's flaccid script, unfocused, undramatic and uninteresting. The story, the emergence of a 17th century Jewish Messiah in Turkey, his gathering of support and his eventual conversion to Islam under pressure from the Sultan ("turning turkey", as one of the innumerable bad jokes of the play would have it), the story seems rich in dramatic potential. But out of this exciting historical material, the production manages to pull off only a few moments of theatre. The most engaging moment of the play is the Jewish liturgical chant in the first act, the most entertaining, the mimed sequence in which the Jews triumph over the Germans, the Russians and the Pope in turn — and for the one we can thank tradition, for the other, the tradition, John Palmer.

The acting is first-rate. Saul Rubinek is continually entertaining in his double role of jailer and Sultan. The scene between him and David Fox, the false messiah himself, in which the Sultan offers Shabtai Zvi the choice of death or the turban, has a sly humour about it that, for once, holds the audience's attention.

But the audience spends the intermission trying to decipher the programme, to decide which one of the actors playing which role does which of their favorite bits of business. It seems somehow symbolic of the chaotic and self-indulgent nature of the script that you can't tell the players, even with a programme.

year end wrap-up: hits & misses

Ignoring the obvious state of the economy, the record companies are still filling the store shelves with rafts of classical record product, some of it very elaborate indeed. In among all this onslaught, there's bound to be both gold and dross. Here's a highly prejudiced selection.

It's never unpleasant to see a hometown kid make good, and it's doubly pleasant when that musician is a graduate of our own Faculty of Music. Liona Boyd's name and fine guitar playing are well-known in Toronto concert circles, but now with the issue of her first album, she makes a bid for the wider audience. There have been precious few classical guitar albums issued in Canada; in fact this is the first I've had a chance to review. Boyd devotes one side to Spanish composers, the other to Europeans of the Baroque era — with one fine diversion into Impressionism. All the works on the disc are competently performed, but the hauntingly beautiful "Fille aux Cheveux de Lin" by Debussy is treated with extra care — and it shows.

The album is another feather in the cap of Elanor Sniderman, producer of the "Boot Master Concert" series. Boot records, label of Stompin' Tom Connors, is also preparing to issue Anton Kuerti's complete Beethoven Sonata series on record, and what a music event that'll be! At any rate, guitar buffs will love this record. Boyd does her alma mater proud. (Boot BMC3002).

I can't say I'm as happy about two other recordings that have come my way recently, both in the over-recorded "warhorse" category. Schumann's A-minor piano concerto must be one of the world's most popular, and I'm sure that veteran German pianist Wilhelm Kempff has recorded it more times than most of us have even listened to it. On a new DG recording of the music, along with Rafael Kubelik and the Bavarian Symphony Radio Orchestra, his performance sounds tired and joyless. Certainly all the notes are there — Kempff is nothing if not technically fastidious — but the spirit isn't. (DG 2530 484).

Just as often-recorded is Tchaikovsky's 4th symphony. Over and over and over it turns up. One would think that a Russian might have a different, perhaps more authentic interpretation to give the music, but Moscow Radio Symphony conductor Gennady Rozhdestvensky seems unable to reproduce here the success he had with the composer's first three symphonies earlier this year.

It's a leaden performance, not helped to any large degree by the stuffy recorded sound. A miss, sad to say, from this usually reliable performer. (Angel Melodya SR-40264).

A couple of piano dazzlers: the four Chopin Scherzos, played by Garrick Ohlsson (Angel S-37017), and Prokofiev's 3rd and 5th Piano concertos, performed by Michel Beroff (Angel S-37084). These two musicians are relatively young, and fresh faces on the recording scene. The Chopin pieces are rather difficult, and present all the usual interpretative difficulties found with the composer's style. Ohlsson has obviously spent considerable time trying to balance the equation of virtuosity and sentiment, and for the most part, he charges straight down the centre.

Beroff's Prokofiev isn't as deep or thought out as the Chopin, but to a degree that's in the nature of the music. There's more flash and fire in these concertos than glorious melody, but there's also a degree of dry wit that Beroff negotiates splendidly. Both discs are highly recommended.

As noted a couple of weeks ago, this seems to be the season for Bach. The St. Matthew Passion, several cantatas and masses have been performed in Toronto, including, of course, the great "Mass in B Minor." This is possibly the greatest work in the Mass form, written, curiously enough, by a devout Lutheran.

Music of this calibre (and most of Bach, in fact) needs the services of interpreters graced with maturity, intelligence and considerable technical skill. There have been many fine recordings of the music over the years, and virtually every great conductor has had a go at its pages. Most recent is Herbert von Karajan, who is rapidly approaching the day when he will have recorded everything worth recording. His new reading of the Mass is highly personal, caught up in a wave of lyrical feeling. Not for him the more sterile, just-the-notes-please approach of Harnoncourt or Richter.

Karajan's cast of performers carries out his wishes with admirable skill and with obvious love for the music. Vocal soloists include Christa Ludwig and Peter Schreier, among others, and the all-important chorus role is taken care of by the Wiener Singverein. Five stars for this one (DG 2740112).

One of the recent crazes in classical music has been for Renaissance music. This pre-Baroque field has come out of the closets and into the concert halls, to coin a phrase, and a great deal of the credit must go to David Mumrow and his Early Music Consort of London. For close to 8 years, they have delighted and educated the concert world with music from the royal courts of Henry VIII, Elizabeth and others; if you saw the film "Henry VIII and His Six Wives" then you heard the music of this group.

Their third album on Angel concentrates on the prolific and unknown (of the many prolific and unknown Renaissance composers) Michael Praetorius. He's best known for a large collection of dances called "Terpsichore", selections from which make up side one. The instruments sound, to orchestra-jaded ears, like a new world of timbre, and the dances are played with an infectious sense of fun and bounce that makes trying out a jig of your own all but irresistible.

Side two features motets from the other great part off Praetorius' work: "Muses of Zion" was a huge amalgam of vocal music, and the singers of the Consort give us over a half-hour's worth. From every standpoint, this disc of all-but-unknown music is a pleasure. (Angel S-37091).

The Prisoner of Second Avenue

Take a man having a nervous breakdown in the middle of New York City and you have the basic plot of almost any Neil Simon play.

The Prisoner of Second Avenue starring Jack Lemmon and Anne Bancroft, is yet another in his series of popular plays and movies.

The plot is predictable and Jack Lemmon plays the same loud and uncontrolled clown he's played in every movie since Some Like It Hot. Anne Bancroft is the one saving feature of the movie, her quiet and smooth voice tempers the dialogue slightly.

But there is a lot of talking, long drawn-out speeches on birth, death and taxes.

Jack Lemmon loses his job after 22 years, and has a nervous breakdown. Anne Bancroft, his wife, goes to work to pay for his psychiatrist and valium pills, and has a nervous breakdown herself.

The musical accompaniment is a very poor man's "Rhapsody in Blue", always frantic with little variation.

The camera work is interesting, showing New York as ugly and dirty and its occupants looking hot and greasy.

Everyone in the city hates each other and Bancroft and Lemmon sit down in the final frame to parody

Wood's American Gothic, a cliché left over from Green Acres, the National Lampoon and the sales bin at Crazy David's. The theme is an old one. Our society is collapsing, cracked at the bottom of each skyscraper; nothing lasts and no one is secure.

It's an old, old theme.

Stardust

It's about time some film-maker assayed the world of rock music and produced something more than just servile fawning.

Rock has been glorified for its good points (Woodstock, Monterey Pop); rock has been glorified for its bad points (Gimme Shelter, Performance) but no one has really dismantled the subject on film in a way that's worth serious consideration.

For the first quarter of an hour you think Stardust is going to venture an attempt at it. Those opening minutes have a gritty, unpretentious realism about them, not that good but much more than you have a right to expect.

The early career of the horrible Liverpool rock band, The Stray Cats, unwinds before your eyes. You see, and can't help but like, the film for showing the Stray Cats for exactly what they are—a talentless group of young working-class Neanderthals who bounce from gig to groupie to gig with no thought of the future.

But producers David Puttnam and Sandy Lieberson are not content to examine the fate of the group under this limited and provably completely typical environment.

Instead the band takes off to international prominence as managers change, deals are made and individuals are manipulated. The dizzying rise ends in death by drugs of the lead singer, Jim MacLaine and so ends the movie.

Lost are all the subtle and enduring effects of the first 15 minutes as director Michael Apted fills the screen with the big Rolling Stone cliché that innocent rock stars are manipulated by scheming managers until they are driven into seclusion or overwork, which in turn ends with a martyr's death by drugs.

The rock fans have all heard it before, but they love to hear it again. They'll also get to play parlor games like whether the Stray Cats represent the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, The Doors, the acid-driven Banjo Pluckers or whatever.

As the publicity material says, playing it both ways, "The temptation exists to draw parallels, but as far as director Michael Apted and writer Ray Connolly are concerned, moviegoers are sophisticated enough to draw their own conclusions.

Sure. But just in case they aren't, Stardust is stocked with enough real life rock-life to give the less intellectually nimble rock fans something to gape at: David Essex (Godspell, That'll Be The Day, British Record Industries' "Brightest Hope For '74") cast as the ill-fated lead singer; early rock 'n' roller Adam Faith playing the group's first manager; Keith Moon (drummer for The Who); Marty Wilde (one of Faith's former rivals, now looking pretty fat) and Paul Nicholas (another leading British pop star).

Although picked for obvious commercial reasons, these characters perform fairly well, especially Faith who looks like a young Christopher Plummer playing Hamlet.

Stardust has a certain watchability even after betraying its early rich promise.

Yet when you leave, you are still sadly waiting for the movie that will say the hell with rock fans and give this social phenomenon the intelligent and probably unpalatable treatment it deserves.

Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore

Martin Scorsese's film, Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore, poses questions. Questions about how you survive and live with some dignity in a man's world when you're 35, a recent widow, flat broke, have a demanding 12 year old son to support, and possess no outstanding talents — only guts and a dream.

The questions are explored in a complex, sensitive and perversely funny movie which acutely probes the conflicts and relationships of Alice Hyatt as she attempts to reshape her life, determined to make it as a singer. She takes off with her son and heads towards her symbolically golden city of Monterey.

With painstaking clarity Scorsese's camera exposes the raw reality of the sleazy, violent and low-paying world of Arizona roadhouse taverns where Alice bravely thrusts herself, looking for work, battling-cruel ass-pinching men who prefer raunchy cowboy music to her soft sentimental sound.

When Alice sings, it is Ellen Burstyn's own unspectacular but pleasant voice and it adds a necessary touch of vulnerability.

Ellen Burstyn invests the engaging role of Alice with some improvised scenes based on events from her own experiences. And the funny bantering dialogue between Alice and her precocious son Tommy, (Alfred Lutter), alternately her source of joy and her reality-based companion, is spurred on by Burstyn's own real-life rapport with Lutter.

Scorsese gets strong performances from Diane Ladd as the raunchy, foul-mouthed but good-natured waitress Flo who befriends Alice, and Harvey Keitel as Ben, an obsequiously persistent stud who has an affair with Alice and turns out to be married, a wife-beater and a violent psychotic.

Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore can't easily resolve some of the questions and issues it explores. Ambivalences arise when the charming divorced rancher (Kris Kristofferson) offers Alice and Tommy love and security on his comfortable Arizona farm.

Alice must decide if she can handle her dream and an 'almost-perfect' man; he must seriously accept her desire to become a singer.

Both characters are caught in the flux of changing mores and seem torn between decisions, as no double was Martin Scorsese because the original script ending was changed a number of times before it concluded on a mixed note of ambiguity and hope.

It's satisfying, or not, depending on how credible you find the main characters and their dilemma. By avoiding a pat stereotyped ending, Scorsese gives Alice a chance.

She makes an honest attempt to advance her life. She no longer dwells in her old self-made prison. At least Alice doesn't live there anymore.

Report to the Commissioner

This is not a hard and fast scientific principle but it may have some merit: Any movie advertised on television is not worth seeing.

Report to the Commissioner has been advertised on television — extensively, and it is definitely not worth seeing.

The only point to the whole exercise appears to be the cynical conviction that the New York Police Department is beyond redemption.

It is shown as a corrupt assortment of law and order fanatics who would rather bully criminals than book them.

But that point of view is not so unusual and certainly this film has no other redeeming social values to justify its big build-up on the screen.

We are shown an ineffectual boy who appears to be part of a new-style cop, the kind who uses the soft-sell to ensure a quiet beat.

Michael Moriarty is thrown into this role and fails to portray any depth of character.

He is the innocent victim of a system he cannot understand and refuses to acknowledge its existence. Thus he is destroyed.

But the TV ads play up the role of Susan Blakely as an undercover cop who ends up shot. (Blakely took bad acting to a new high as the wife of bad-guy Richard Chamberlain in the Towering Inferno.)

In Report to the Commissioner, Blakely has only to parade her body and her acting infirmities are disguised.

The absurd situation of her pretending to be a speed freak groupie friend of a high-up drug pusher tends to make the whole story more of a fairy tale.

Another feature of a bad dramatic film is the over reliance on long or gimmicky chase scenes.

Bullit, French Connection and many other such films have reached international acclaim simply because of long and overly involved chase sequences accompanied by very loud music.

In Report to the Commissioner we are treated to two very gimmicky chase scenes, and the music is deafening.

In one scene we have the so-called bad guy dope-pusher being chased into Saks Fifth Avenue by the non-hero hippie cop.

Unusual because the crook is dressed only in white boxer shorts, which is in itself unusual since he was supposed to cavorting with Susan Blakely who, at the time, had nothing on.

The other chase scene involves a cripple-beggar confined to a four-wheel push cart — which he has to push around with his hands.

In his pursuit of a suspect he ends up hanging onto the bumper of a taxi twisting and turning in the busy New York evening traffic.

Again the music begins to deafen and the camera turns to subjective shots of car wheels turning and people rushing by from a low angle perspective. But why the man bothers we never know.

In all, the audience is left with a seedy view of New York where the cops shoot each other without remorse and are willing to throw each other to the wolves in the event of any scandals.

That's life? No, that's slick "gutsy" commercialism.

keith jarrett

Keith Jarrett, whose keyboard genius has been sprinkled through the music of jazz greats, Miles Davis, Charles Lloyd, and Roland Kirk in recent years, came to Convocation Hall alone last Friday evening. The solo concert, performed before an audience of more than 1,000 people, was largely reminiscent of the music of his triumphant European solo tour, so beautifully captured on his triple album, "Solo Concerts".

Unlike most concerts in recent memory, this one seemed to be completely free of theatrical and electronic hoopla and especially free of over-indulgence from an all too easily pleased audience. Jarrett had simply come to play, and his audience to listen.

Jarrett began and concluded his first piece with a rhythmic bass figure. From it flourished all manner of accompanying chords, harmonics and counterpoint, that complimented and extended his simple introduction. It lasted for one hour, an ordeal for almost any listener, but in this case, met with near unanimous appeal and interest until the end.

elliott cartér

Incredible! Hardly an adequate adjective but accurate in describing the performance last Thursday night of the three Elliott Carter String Quartets by the composer's String Quartet.

Elliott Carter is a relatively unknown American composer who has been called "everything from the greatest composer America has produced to the most important composer living in the United States today".

I went to the concert quite frankly prepared to be bored and instead came out overwhelmed both by the almost flawless technique and unity of the performers and by the quartets themselves.

The First String Quartet was written in 1951. At that time, Carter was consciously trying to avoid what so many other composers were doing — using special tone effects for their own sake. Here, each instrument is given a theme, a scherzo ensues and then there is a return to the beginning. Carter likes to 'pit' solo instruments against the others and this tendency was displayed in the Fantasia section where the lyrical viola seems to struggle for existence against the attacks of the other three instruments.

In the Second String Quartet, written in 1959, Carter gives to each instrument an individual rhythm and style so that the listener's attention can be focused on the separate instruments as opposed to the traditional notion of listening to a homogenous quartet. Each player dominates a movement while the others mimic it and in between the movements, there are solo cadenzas for first violin, cello and viola where the other instruments oppose the cadenza player as if "disenchanted" by his actions.

The third and most recent quartet, written in 1971, divides the quartet into two "teams": Duo I — consisting of cello and first violin — and Duo II, second violin and viola. Duo I is allowed a quasi rubato rhythm whereas Duo II more or less keeps a strict rhythm. The performers are seated more widely apart than normal and one is consequently left with the disconcerting decision of which instrument to follow, a decision hard to make for one accustomed to listening to a piece as a whole. Carter developed the concept of 'metric modulation', a form of precise note writing which enables some players to speed up, some to slow down etc. and yet still remain united at the end. This allows for astonishing departures in rhythm, as the fact that Duo I has four movements to cover and Duo II has six, shows. The performers all wore earplugs during this quartet so that each duo could hear the tempo that they were supposed to be playing at, a device which left them free to concentrate on the music.

Phoebe Snow

Phoebe Snow in her first recording displays such a maturity both in her composition and performance that it's almost impossible to believe she was only 21 at the time of the album's completion last summer. Her artistic experience has grown well beyond the traditional rock and folk heroes of her generation so that in her songs you are just as likely to hear the influence of Billie Holiday as you are Joni Mitchell. And as with both of these truly gifted musicians, Snow's voice is not merely a pleasant mouthpiece for her sensitive lyrics, but a truly stylish instrument of song that reveals in its own ability to fly with her every emotional whim.

The album opens with Snow's unparalleled version of the 1956 hit, "Let the Good Times Roll". So original is this arrangement that it bears no other similarity to the original than its recurring use of the song title throughout the rewritten lyric. The number's incredible vibrance and rhythm is truly enhanced by Snow's stylish guitar work and the Persuasions inspired performance on background vocals.

On the next three cuts, "Harpo's Blues", "Poetry Man", and "Either or Both", (all originals) Snow unleashes her luscious voice with a trance-like improvisational freedom that is answered beautifully by the fills of noted sidemen Zoot Sims on Sax, David Bromberg on Guitar and Dobro, and Teddy Wilson of Benny Goodman fame, on Piano.

"San Francisco Bay Blues" receives its best performance ever in a simple acoustic version, featuring Snow on guitars and Chuck Israels on acoustic bass, an arrangement that any singer of lesser vocal ability could never play with.

Side Two contains four more sensitively written songs exposing Snow as someone feeling everything from the very new perspective of womanhood. Her themes run from a lost love of womanhood to the death of an adolescent sweetheart, Charlie Parker, whose smiling picture graces the record sleeve.

In all, the artistry of Phoebe Snow is both refreshingly sincere and profoundly original. Her songs are so very much her own, but still so very much belonging to the experience of us all. As my first great female discovery of this International Year of Women, I heartily recommend that you give her a try: I mean "Why Not!"

Don't cha Love it The Miracles

It seems unbelievable but the Miracles have been around, as a band, for over seventeen years and despite changes in personnel and the departure of Smokey Robinson they still turn out first class material. They struck gold with their last single, "Do It Baby", and should have no problems getting another gold disc from their latest lp, "Don't cha Love it". The single and the lp, prove that the Miracles can rock with the best soul bands around today and come out on top.

The band masterfully combines and uses a back-up band and an orchestra to blend in with their vocal wizardry, allowing each tune to stand up as clearly as possible without sounding repetitious or overcrowded. From the opening cut, "Keep on keepin' on", right through to the last the band features good songs with interesting lyrics, but they never distract from the music which in turn blends in with the vocals.

Side one contains five songs and each one is worthy of mention, but the outstanding cut "Don't cha Love it" is in a class of its own. The vocals are intricately worked around, over, under and in-between the music, building up to a climax that dares the listener to remain seated past the first opening bars. Each of the other cuts, "Keep on Keepin' On", "Sweet Sweet Lovin'", "A Little Piece of Heaven" and "Got Me Goin'", are infectious in the sense that they are made for dancing and while the rhythm or mood might change the urge to get on up remains throughout the side.

Side two is much slower with three ballads, "Broken hearted Girl-Broken hearted Boy", which tends to drag a bit, "Gonna tell the World" and "You are Love". The last two are showcases for the singing ability of the band and they handle it with precision and feeling, without becoming overly lush or drippy. The fast tune on this side is "Gemini", featuring some great instrumental work from the band. But the real find on the lp is "Take it All" which has to be released as the next single if not for its rhythm, a soul cha-cha, then for the slinky vocals that seem to glow with passion. It is simply irresistible.

Bobby Rogers, Ron White, Peter Moore and William Griffin are the Miracles, and, although there's rumors that Smokey Robinson might rejoin them in the future, on "Don't Cha Love It" they prove that they are quite capable of taking care of themselves and doing it with style and quality.

Happy People The Temptations

The Temptations have been around as a band since 1960 and in that time they developed from being the Primes, with its sister band, The Primettes, later known as the Supremes, to a band which is imitable. Despite changes in personnel, David Ruffin and Eddie Kendricks being but two graduates, they have managed to retain a basic sound which has not changed. That is not to say that all their songs sound the same, but there is a quality in the vocals and in the music which is unmistakably part of the Temps.

Their latest lp opens with "Happy People", a solid hit all across the continent and features a good use of horns to set the rhythm and pace of the tune. The vocals and the music show some debts most soul bands have to Sly Stone, at times it is quite easy to imagine Sly as being part of the band. But that is not to say that the Temptations are copies of Sly, in fact they had a similar sound a few years back with "psychedelic Shack" and "Ball of Confusion", and have just gone back to it. Side one continues with "Glahouse" a fast song with tricky lyrics and a moral to it, "Shakey Ground", "The Prophet" and an instrumental version of "Happy People."

Side one has a good collection of fast moving tunes which allow both the singers and the musicians to perform at their best. Each song has consistency and as such hold quite well together as a unit. Unfortunately this is not so with side two. It opens with Leon Russell's "A Song for You", which is slow and plodding and the lead singer tries but just fails in his approach. There is feeling in the song but it is awkward and in truth never amounted to much as far as songs go. "Memories" is a very dramatic ballad about a lost love and gives the lead singer a chance to show his best with a full orchestra backing him up.

Candidates may be required to sign this list. Persons not possessing a University of Toronto registration card may not vote.

The registration card will be marked with an "X" and returned with a ballot to the voter.

The voter may mark the ballot and place it in the ballot box.

coming events

classical

Last of the year, eh...? What lies in store for the plucky hordes of classical music fans this summer? I can't begin to cover the events that will fill the concert halls and outdoor venues in the coming months, but watch out for these:

Ontario Place: The TSO will be moving in from another long run of low brows and high spirits. The music isn't of the same degree of complexity that you'd hear in Massey Hall, but just settle back on the grass and enjoy it. It's a great place to take kids who have never seen the spectacle of 110 musicians in full flight. And it's cheap.

Canadian Opera: The COC will be in full swing by the time school starts in the fall, so why mention it now? A rude reminder of the Company's popularity will pop through your mailbox any day now with an urgent plea for your bucks. That's right, it's subscription time again. Do give it a thought. If you can't wait for the fall lineup, you can slake your thirst on this goody: Puccini's Madame Butterfly, conducted by Herbert von Karajan on London Records, with an all-star cast including Mirella Freni and Luciano Pavarotti. "Butterfly" is on the menu for next fall at O'Keefe.

Faculty of Music: Just because the classes will be over doesn't mean that the halls will be silent. Watch out for the National Youth Orchestra and other special attractions.

Mozart's Così fan Tutte will be presented (in English) by the Opera Department in the MacMillan Theatre April 4, 5, 11, 12, 8 p.m. $3.50. Students $2.

CBC: Here's another year-round culture venture. Pack your trusty FM when travelling, and you're likely to run into things worth hearing. Stay 'way from their epicurean TV muck, though.

As hardy veterans of the music scene, I expect all you trusty readers to track down your own, too. Just for the rest of this month, though, here are some hints: Tomorrow afternoon at the EJB, the Faculty of Music is hosting a Jazz workshop, free of charge, and throughout the remainder of this month and all of next, there are student recitals, a sure way to beat exam blues.

Tomorrow night, piano fanciers have a choice of two fine concerts: Antonin Kubalek wraps up his four-concert series of Mozart Sonatas, 8:30 pm, at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Rd.

At Town Hall, Rumanian-born Radu Lupu makes a return visit. 8:30 pm $4 and $5.

"In most books, the I, or first person, is omitted; in this it will be retained; that, in respect to egotism, is the main difference. We commonly do not remember that it is, after all, always the first person that is speaking." Thoreau, Walden.

This is my one chance to come out from behind my byline and speak in — what? "the meaningful first person" — to thank those who have worked on the Review section this year. They know me, and I hope they at least know I am grateful for and appreciative of the work and time that they have given the paper.

The concert lineup between now and the end of April has really very little to get excited about. Tonight for example, April Wine and Moonquake will try to distinguish themselves before a relatively small crowd at Massey Hall.

Monday night picks up though with the tasty folk lineup of John Hartford, the legendary Leon Redbone, and Stringband, all together at Massey Hall. April 3 brings Johnny Winter to the Gardens for the umpteenth time, and will likely attract the same group of young crazies that seem to surface for his shows.

April 6 has Sparks at Massey Hall, followed the next night by Babe Ruth. April 13 represents a recovery of sorts as B.B. King is featured for two shows at Con Hall. Back at Massey Hall, Supertramp is featured April 17 and Buffy Saint-Marie on the 18th. April 28 brings us to Lou Reed at Massey Hall, for his Rock n Roll Animal show. Somehow Toronto promoters missed out on Maria Muldaur who's in Buffalo on April 8.

Heading the lineups at the clubs is the immortal Cambridge cavalier Tom Rush, closing tonight at the El Mocambo. Next week the Good Brothers will be there. Mickey Clark is featured at the Riverboat, tomorrow through Saturday. The Chimney seems to be getting some sense again, as it offers Perth County Conspiracy all this week, and Ray Materick and Jesse Winchester in the next two weeks. Myles and Lenny headline at the Colonial this week, with Ecstasy, Pain & Pleasure replacing them next week. Egerton's which features its name talent only Thursday thru Saturdays now, has Colleen Peterson this week, followed in weeks to come by Dam Mitchell, Stringband, & Luke Gibson.

Beaver's, in Wymilwood at Victoria College, reopens April 4 for its last presentation of the school year, with Stringband, who'll be celebrating the release of their new album.

movies

"Post coitum omne animal triste est..." a Varsity staffer despondent about termination of publication.

Cinema Lumiere was closed this winter after the management decided not to renew the lease. Now this valuable repertory theatre has reopened its doors, however, with a decidedly less commercial new management. They have a Truffaut, Godard and Resnais selection of films running in repertory until Sunday, April 6, including Pierrot Le Fou, Hiroshima Mon Amour, and Domicile Conjugal.

All screenings of these French New Wave films are at 8:30 pm. Admission $2 but you get to see a lot of arty people.

If you're producing a film and hankering for recognition, keep the Seventh Canadian Student Film Festival in mind.

The film festival runs from Sept. 24-28 at Sir George Williams University and offers a $1,000 cash prize for the winner as well as cash awards for four divisions.

Info available at Famous Players Theatres or write Seventh Canadian Student Film Festiva, H-109, 1455 de Maisonneuve Blvd. West, Montreal 107, P.Q. (No Canadian versions of Deep Throat, please.).

The Revue Repertory Cinema three blocks south of Bloor and Dundas is worth remembering this spring and summer. Friday through Monday The Seduction of Mimi (1973) is showing, a comedy about Italian sexual politics.

Look for Lacombe Lucien, Five Easy Pieces, The Last Detail, Mon Oncle Antoine, The Little Theatre of Jean Renoir and The Last Tango in Paris during April. An ambient German cafe resides next door if you get there early...

The unheralded Poor Alex Film Festival runs Sundays at 7:30 pm. For $2 you get Chaplin's The Great Dictator (March 30); Vincente Minnelli's fine musical The Band Wagon (April 6); The Loved One (April 13) and John Ford's classic Steinbeck adaptation, The Grapes of Wrath (April 20).

The Treatment of Women in The Moives, a film series at the Palmerston Library, continues Saturday, March 29 with Haxan, the woman as witch, and Dreyer's Vampyr, the woman as predator. Sounds like a chummy way to spend an evening with your true love.

Palmerston Library is at 560 Palmerston, movies show at 7:30 pm. Admission $2 in return for all the male chauvinism you can handle.

It's a long summer to spend, so do try out some of those smaller neighborhood theatres that can't afford much advertising like The Orpheum, The Centre, The Studio, The College, OISE, the Kingsway and the Kum-C. Call them up for what's playing — they change often and the price is cheap.

Well, partings are always sad, so let's just leave it at that...

books

Is this the time for editorial reflections and pontifications. Of course not.

The Alexander Lectures are on this week at the Medical Sciences Auditorium. Richard Ellmann speaks on the consciousness of James Joyce today and tomorrow, 4:30 pm.

David Helwig and Joe Rosenblatt read at the Med-Sci Library, (beside Sidney Smith Library), at 12:30 pm today. Room 28.

Two corrections: In the centre spread on John Berger and Kenneth Clark, a while back, I said that it would cost you 99c to see the DEC sponsored showing of Berger's Ways of Seeing at St. Paul's on Avenue Road, on May 5th. I was wrong. It's free.

I transcribed Ian Dennis' poem "A Vision of Poetry Early in the New Year" incorrectly in the last Friday issue.

"If, one winter someday I compare my love.

To a glistening silver dish
Containing fillets of decaying fish flesh,..."

Omit the word 'fish'.
I've received a press release from the Hart House Library Committee re: their International Festival of Poetry next October 26th through November 1. Among those committed to it are Thom Gunn, Earle Birney, Tom Wayman, Seamus Heaney, Robert Creeley, Raoul Duguay, Irving Layton, Alec Hope, D. J. Enright, Al Purdy, Bill Bisset, Peter Porter, Octavio Paz, Guillevic, Yehuda Amichai and Michael Ondaatje. The list is not yet complete. Hopefully a number of women poets will accept the invitations that have been extended to them.

The festival format: Three poets will read a wide selection of their work each night in the Hart House Theatre. These formal readings will be followed by social gatherings. The poets who read one evening will return the subsequent afternoon to discuss and defend their craft in a workshop chaired by another poet or by an appropriate member of the university community.

The committee also hopes to arrange short noontime readings by young Toronto-based poets, a Saturday afternoon reading specifically for young children and a concluding "marathon" reading on the evening of November 1st.

Tickets for the evening readings are free and available to the general public. A limited number of ticket bookings will be accepted during the summer months and the rest released after school begins again.

Write the International Festival of Poetry for its Advance Brochure, (available once the program has been finalized) at Hart House, U of T, M5S 1A1.

If you want to read in the noontime readings submit samples of your work to the same address. Mark your envelope "Noontime Readings."

It's something to look forward to. The summer will go quickly enough anyway.

radio

This may be the last Review issue for the year but it is definitely not the Last of Radio Varsity. The summer will be just brimming with activity... activity that is crying for your participation. We will not be broadcasting but we will be working. As we try to gear ourselves up for an FM license, the summer will be spent putting together programs that will cover a large area as possible. The scope will be broadened and we need your help to pull it off.

If you feel you possess some talent for writing, interviewing, announcing, playing music, putting tapes together or just hanging around: we want you. If you have any ideas in the areas of music, art, films, Canadian singers and songwriters, poetry, the media, academia, or even thoughts about the direction of radio and your radio in particular: we need your help.

Radio Varsity is your radio station, you pay for it and are the reason for its existence. So naturally, what we broadcast should be what you want. And the only way we know what you want is for you to tell us or, better still, for you to be involved in what we put out.

Campus radio is beneficial in two ways: you inform people about topics and viewpoints that they may not come in contact with and, secondly, you get the opportunity to secure information from the sources rather than the media which only tell you what they think you should know.

Chances are that you are like most of the campus in that you tend to think of Radio Varsity as a joke. Well, maybe you're right. But without student involvement and feedback, we cannot provide what you want and what you deserve. We need your help to change.

Drop in at 91 St. George, third floor and commit yourself to something that could be very exciting.

While you're deciding to make that commitment, give us a listen. Some of our highlights for these last weeks of broadcasting (the station goes off the air Friday, 11 April) are:

Wed. Mar. 26th (1 pm): Adventures of a Dope Smuggler; an interview with Larry Kamstra, a dope smuggler for ten years who, from his exploits smuggling, wrote the book Weed. He talks about the social structure of Mexico, who smuggles and why, how to stay alive and read selections from his book.

Fri. Mar. 28th (7 pm): The Miracles "Live" at the O'Keefe; a music interview with the Miracles by Norman Richmond and Paul Soni with the music of the Miracles as performed at the O'Keefe Centre.

Sat. Mar. 29th (3 pm): D. H. Lawrence; A Profile.

Tues. Mar. 31st (8 pm): Political Forum: this week Seynop Owen and Katherine Rowell talk with members of The Mayor's Task Force on Women.

That is, of course, just a small sampling. Other things to look out for are The Poetry Show with interviews with leading Canadian poets about themselves and their art; The French Show; Gospel Music Hour; On Campus (campus news) with John Bures and Barb Wright on Tues. and Thurs. at 12 noon and again at 5 pm; the usual rock 'n roll and just about anything else that crops up. And, of course, on Sun. nights from 11 pm to 2 a.m. we present (against our better instincts) Kilgore Trout, our Nocturnal Know-it-all.

FLASH... Radio Varsity will broadcast live the Cutbacks Study Session on Wed. Mar. 26 from 12 noon until 2 pm. It's to be held at Convocation Hall so, if you can't make it in person, catch it all on a lounge speaker. br

Shocking survey discloses religion's uncertain future

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Over 58 percent of U of T students polled in a recent campus survey believe in a "God who is both infinite and personal."

This and other conclusions were revealed in a two-year survey of students conducted by the Campus Crusade for Christ, a U of T student religious organization.

Group members say they have distributed the 16-question religious questionnaire to 1,620 students in the past two years as a way of increasing communication with students.

Although 58 percent of the polled students said they believed in a personal God, 30 percent replied they didn't and another 12 percent considered themselves "unsure".

Christ was tabbed as a "teacher, prophet, philosopher but not God" by 44 percent while 32 percent opted for calling him "the son of God."

Four percent registered the iconoclastic view that Christ was simply a "myth", which still left 20 percent scratching their heads in uncertainty about the matter.

Asked if "you could know there was a God, and know him personally, would you want to?" 80 percent decided to be sociable while 12 percent said they wouldn't include the deity on their list of people they'd like to know better.

Eight percent of the students said they were "unsure" whether they would like to know God more personally, but no one thought that if God moved in next door He would lower the property value.

Moving onto surer ground, 41 percent stated they had a "well thought-out philosophy of life." Unequipped with such a philosophy were 33 percent, and as usual, a lot felt muddled (26 percent).

The students got down to the nitty-gritty with the next question: "What is the basic problem of man?"

The results expressed in percentages were as follows: self-centredness (16), greed and materialism (11), lack of communication (10), lack of purpose (9), spiritual lack (6) and last and not least, war and violence (2).

The students were then asked whether their "philosophy of life offered an adequate solution to the problem."

Forty percent crowed their philosophy did; 58 percent had to admit their's didn't and 2 percent hadn't the foggiest.

Reprints of this inspirational message may be obtained for $4.50 a copy. Send requests to Pastor Lawrence Clarke, 91 St. George St. (No dealers, please.)

Name the "What's-Its-Name" and you could win* fame, glory and a place in history.

(If that's not enough, we'll throw in $1,000.00!)

It's hard enough trying to relate to the world these days, but it's really awful when you don't even have a name to do it with. So please help with our identity crisis. All you have to do is give our tough, racy, charming new little fun car a name that fits its unique, endearing personality and you may win $1,000.00 cash.

Things you should know about "What's-Its-Name".

It's big on the inside. There's enough space for a wide assortment of adults, children, pets, students, musical instruments and whatever else you might want to stash. On the outside, it's so small, you can take it home with you on the bus if you don't want to buy the gas, which you don't have to do too often anyway, considering it gets about 45 miles to the gallon. Also, it has front-wheel drive, so it won't get stuck in snow and will go up steps in case you're late for class.

So okay, the "What's-Its-Name" is pretty, sexy, economical, comfortable and a ball to drive. But how's it built? We'll tell you: It's built like a brick powder room.

By the way, the names "Eldorado" and "Silver Ghost" are already taken. But that's all the help we can give you. From here on in, you're on your own. So let's get on the stick (four-speed synchro, of course!) and come up with the winning name for this grand little newcomer in town who wants only to carry your name and win your heart. It's worth a grand!

Davies and Adams win

By DAVE STUART

The Thomas R. Loudon Award for outstanding services in the advancement of athletics was presented to co-winners Gord Davies and Jim Adams at the annual awards banquet in Hart House last Thursday.

Davies, a graduate student in Engineering, was captain of the hockey Blues this year and was chosen the most valuable player for the Blues. During his five year career with the team, Davies was an OUA all-star winger, and was not only captain of the CIAU championship winning team in 1973 but was also named most valuable player when he scored the winning goal against St. Mary's.

Adams, a graduate student in Latin American Studies, was named Canadian College Swimmer in 1973 and 1974. During the past year he set a Canadian Open Record of 1:42.8 in the 200-yard freestyle. He also holds no less than eight separate team records.

Glenn Scott won the Biggs trophy awarded to the undergraduate who has contributed most to University athletics in terms of leadership, sportsmanship, and performance. Scott was also named most valuable player on the basketball team this year.

Other individual awards presented at the banquet were: football - Brent Eisey (Med); soccer - Geof Crewe (New); swimming - Shawn Laari (PHE) and David Wilkin (Eng); water polo - George Gross (Scar); wrestling - Bob Moore (New); intra-murals - Juris Balins (Eng).

Intra-murals also bestowed a Referee-of-the-Year award which went to Terry Hamm of PHE.

Netball comes to Benson

During April 11-14 there will be a lot of activity on at the Benson Building.

Netball is the centre of attraction over the four days. On Friday April 11, the School of Physical and Health Education is holding a special workshop for physical education teachers who have recently introduced this sport into their programs or wish to do so. Margaret Pewtress, an international netball coach and physical educator from Australia will be the key resource person.

On Saturday and Sunday the First Canadian National Netball Tournament is scheduled with matches commencing at 10:00 am on Saturday in the sports gymnasium.

On Monday, a coaching workshop is being held and physical education leaders and other interested people are invited to attend.

Western conference questions inter-collegiate emphasis in university sports

CUP) — Sports programs at universities in Western Canada were strongly criticized for a misplaced emphasis on inter-collegiate competition at the expense of recreational and intra-mural programs at a recent conference in Saskatoon.

Student union executives met March 8 for a services conference and presidents from the universities of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Regina and Manitoba spent a morning session on university athletics.

They found most universities spend large amounts of money on inter-collegiate (also called inter-varsity) programs, especially for travel to and from games, because administrations want the public relations value of having a winning team.

At the University of B.C. a $5 levy is taken from student fees to support inter-varsity programs. Students have to pay extra to join intra-mural programs and still more for access to gyms to work out.

At UBC 65 percent of the inter-varsity budget is spent for travel. The home games, according to incoming president Jake van der Kamp, are poorly attended. The only thing most students get for their money, he said, is "the honour and glory of UBC."

At the University of Alberta "the philosophy of winning is prevalent," student president Graeme Leadbeater said. A $15 levy pays for both intra-mural and inter-varsity sports. The athletics board, which runs both, does not give priority to intra-murals. Perpetual complaints of rundown intra-mural equipment, he charged, tend to go unheeded.

Leadbeater could not give a comparison of expenditures in two areas because there is "no broken down accounting" done.

At the U of Sask. in Saskatoon, a $13 levy covers both intra-mural and inter-varsity. Student president Keith Hanson explained five years ago the student union both collected and administered the athletics fund, but a referendum was passed to transfer these responsibilities to the university.

Because of a "mix-up in wording," the student union now collects the money and the university disburses it. The situation for intra-murals is not good here either. "Money, equipment and time" Hanson said, are difficult to obtain for intra-murals.

At the University of Regina, athletics has been an issue for several years. The student union has always maintained that participatory sports should be given priority over spectator sports.

The student union did have parity on an athletics council that set the budgets every year, but intra-mural money has been consistently under-spent and channeled into inter-varsity budget.

The student union at the University of Manitoba has almost nothing to do with athletics on campus. All programs are run by the university. President Bob Setters didn't have the figures for the breakdown.

But while the University of Manitoba faces an $8 million deficit, it has approved the building of a multi-million dollar sports complex to be paid for mostly by contributions from outside. Setters thought that turning athletics over to a university was good, "as long as they fund it."

Gray disagreed. He worried that "because of priorities these people have," intra-murals could easily be ignored unless students were continually alert, something which is difficult with a yearly turnover of executive.

When the Regina Student Union was approached this year to cover over-expenditures in the inter-varsity budget they refused. The university however, came through with a $3,000 grant.

"They've got to sell the University of Regina," Gray said, while they "cut back professors and lack classroom space. They spend thousands on inter-varsity because 'winning makes headlines.'"

Van der Kamp also cited the inequity in funding for men's and women's teams. The UBC athletic levy of $4.20 goes to men's activities and 80 cents goes to women. This, he admitted, is partially because there are fewer women's teams. But the way sports is handled by the university and by society is a major cause, he added.

"Treat sports like miniature wars," he said, "and women will be discouraged from participation."

Administrations and student unions have become more active in trying to shape athletics policy, usually with opposing priorities.

The Association of University and Colleges in Canada (AUCC), which consists of top-level administrators from post-secondary institutions, issued a report last fall on athletics. It urged universities to institute athletic boards to administer the whole range of sports on each campus — inter-varsity, intra-mural and recreation.

It suggests students, faculty, and administrative input for the board, and financing from general operating funds.

Gray pointed to a recent example at the University of Regina which suggested how these high sounding goals could be perverted. A Regina physical education director recently proposed an athletics council for the university but the proposal limits student input to an "advisory board."

"A university stands for elitism and the pursuit of excellence..." this brief states.

"The emphasis now is on competitive sports," Gray said. "And people with a competitive mentality will keep pushing for inter-varsity sports."

At the University of Saskatchewan an advisory board is planned with "good student input" according to Hanson.

While no resolutions were made at the conference, most presidents indicated they would look more closely into athletics on their campus.

Van der Kamp argued that collectively "we pack quite a punch" and "a lot can come out of it."

Something to "cheers" about:

Now the glorious beer of Copenhagen is brewed right here in Canada. It comes to you fresh from the brewery. So it tastes even better than ever. And Carlsberg is sold at regular prices.

So let's hear it, Carlsberg lovers. "One, two, three... Cheers!"

Women's Athletic Association awards

A girl who participated on two major teams throughout her four years at university has been awarded the highest athletic award given to women on this campus.

The Benson Award is granted "to a student in her graduating year, selected for outstanding ability in athletics and scholarship".

Sue Scott, fourth year Physical and Health Education student, was virtually the unanimous choice of the Women's Athletic Association Directorate for the award in 1974-75.

Scott played on the senior basketball and senior field hockey teams. In basketball she is a strong forward but in field hockey she found her niche. From the university participation, Sue was chosen for the Ontario Junior team to compete in the Canadian Summer Games team that competed in the Canadian National Championships.

She competed in 19 interfaculty sports. She was a curator in 1972 and 1974 and in her graduating year is President of the Physical and Health Education Women's Undergraduate Association. During her years at University of Toronto she has been awarded a second colours Intercollegiate "T", 1st colours University "T" and two silver awards.

Janice McKellar, a 4th year Victoria student, has been awarded the Hill-Powell Administration Award for the WAA. This award is granted to a student who has been a strong supporter of the WAA "behind the scenes".

Not an outstanding athlete, she has none the less participated in innumerable interfaculty competitions for Victoria College. She has been manager of the senior basketball team for the past three years and has received a WAA award for the last three years indicating service in an administrative capacity. In 1974-75 she has been Women's Athletic President for Victoria and as such served as a strong member of the Women's Athletic Directorate.

Farewell to familiar faces

By DAVE STUART

There is an old saying that behind every successful man there is a woman. In this case, behind a successful athletics program at U of T are two women: Phyllis Lea in the intercollegiate office and Kay Boyd in the intramurals office.

Both ladies have spent almost four decades working for the University of Toronto Athletic Association. Both are retiring at the end of this school year.

Phyllis Lea came to work for the UTAA in 1938 and, as well as being secretary to Athletic Director Dalton White, has handled all the clerical duties involved with keeping some 20 Varsity teams in the field. Phyllis often did a lot of the public relations work as well. She took her teams to heart and could often be found in the stands watching a hockey or football match.

Kay Boyd started with the intramurals office in 1936 when the intramural program was initiated. Kay has always been responsible for scheduling and records of all intramural sports, a job which has become immense in the last few years with the tremendous increase in participation. Kay is especially known for her ability to keep minutes, a function she has done for the Intramural Sports Committee since its inception.

Both Phyllis and Kay are avid travellers and expect to travel quite a bit in the near future. Kay is also an accomplished bridge player.

Both ladies will be missed by the Varsity Sports department which appreciates the willingness and friendliness which both Phyllis and Kay always extended when dealing with us.

To Phyllis and Kay, our best wishes for the future.

Phyllis Lea, Intercollegiate office.

Preobrazenski will dance to Tokyo

By LAWRENCE GOLDSTEIN
Chris Preobrazenski needs your help.

Chris is a graduate student at U of T and one of Canada's bright hopes for an Olympic medal in Judo at the 1976 games in Montreal.

His athletic credentials are impressive. Captain of U of T's judo team for the past three years, he is currently Canada's national champion. In 1974 he placed third in the British Open judo championships and fourth in the German Open.

But as Chris himself admits, he needs all the expert training he can get between now and July, 1976 if he is to dance to Tokyo and to help get Chris to Tokyo, and to Montreal in 1976, there will be a benefit dance at Hart House sponsored by U of T's judo club Saturday, April 5th, at 8:00 pm (details in the advertisement elsewhere in today's Varsity).

Some of that expert training could come from a gentleman named Okano, Japan's national judo coach. Chris is hoping to train under Okano for three months in Tokyo, Japan, later this year.

To help get Chris to Tokyo, and to Montreal in 1976, there will be a benefit dance at Hart House sponsored by U of T's judo club Saturday, April 5th, at 8:00 pm (details in the advertisement elsewhere in today's Varsity).

So why not come out, lend one of Canada's good athletes a helping hand.

Varsity wrestlers do well in nationals

By EUGENE SHAW-COLYER

Returning from the Canadian National wrestling championships in Vancouver Mar. 15 and 16, three U of T grapplers distinguished themselves in performances which gained estimable recognition for the University.

Fighting through a highly competitive two-day tournament, Len Gang (105 lb) emerged Canadian National Greco-Roman champion in his weight class; he achieved the additional distinction of second place in the free style competition.

Rob Moore (136 lb), facing extremely challenging opposition, managed fifth place, while Chris Preobrazenski (220 lbs) successfully overcame several aggressive veterans to capture third in the Greco-Roman division.

In the Wrestling Club, both Mike Stanley (180 lb) and John McPhedron (149 lb) won second places in the junior Greco-Roman competition; John Park earned second in the free style category.

Wrestlers Gang, Preobrazenski, Stanley and Park are all under consideration for the Greco-Roman team competing in the Pan American Games in Mexico next October.

Erindale wins B-ball finals; hockey in finals

By DAVE STUART

Erindale won the first division basketball crown by downing Sr Eng two games to one in the final three games series. Erin won the first game 75-71 but skule came back in the second game to even the series with a 69-66 win. The deciding game went to Erindale 63-57. The division II title is still up for grabs. SMC B leads the series with a 80-70 win but the final two games are Mar 26 and 27.

PHE won the division I waterpolo championship in two straight 10-7 and 8-5 while Trin defeated Eng 6-4 in overtime for the division II title. Law A have won the squash championship defeating Trin for the honours while SMC B cornered the silverware in the broomball department. The indoor trackmeet held through the spring term was won by the Vic team with 32 total points. New followed closely with 28 points.

In division II hockey, PHE got the best of Jr Eng in the three game finals. PHE won two games 5-3 and 5-2 but tied the plumbers 2-2 in the first game. The final series in division I is deadlocked as Dent A and Vic have each won once. Dent won the first game 6-3 while Vic won 3-2. The final game is slated for tonight at 7:00 pm at the Bloor Street Ice Palace.

SIDEHILL SHOTS

USE SHORT GRIP STAND CLOSE TO BALL
DON'T USE BASEBALL SWING
AS WITH MOST SHOTS OF THIS KIND THE TENDENCY IS TO PULL THE BALL TO THE LEFT, AID TO THE RIGHT. IT'S WISE TO PLAY THE BALL BACK A LITTLE TO MAKE SURE TO HIT THE BALL FIRST AND NOT THE TURTLE.
TAKE YOUR TIME - NOT AN EASY SHOT TO PLAY

SIDEHILL SHOTS

FEET APART FOR GOOD BALANCE
GRIP CLUD AT VERY END / SIDEHILL LIES ARE REALLY TRUFF EVEN FOR THE EXPERT FLEX THE KNEES, SO AS TO GET DOWN TO THE BALL - AVOID LEANING. ITS BEST TO USE A LOFTED CLUB, AND NOT TAKE TOO MANY CHANGES, OR NOT GETTING SOME YARDAFF

DOWNHILL SHOTS

SPREAD FEET PLAY BALL BACK TO CATCH IT ON DOWNSLUNG
A TRUFF SHOT TO PLAY
THE IDEA IS TO PLAY THE BALL BACK WITH A LOFTED IRON, SO AS NOT TO HIT INTO THE HILL ON THE DOWNSLUNG. EVER WITH A LOFTED CLUB ONE WILL GET PLENTY OF DISTANCE.

UPHILL SHOTS

USE A STRAIGHT FACE CLUB AS THE SHOT TENDS TO GO HIGH A VERY EASY SHOT TO PLAY
DON'T RUSH THIS SHOT - TAKE TIME TO GET SET. PLAY THE BALL OPPOSITE TO THE LEFT FOOT - LET THE CLUB FOLLOW THE CONTOUR OF THE HILL. ANY CLUB WILL DO AS IT VIRTUALLY LIFTS THE BALL UP
