B: Anybody who's handled any tape knows just how much work that is.

P: But that was just one part, one particularly small part of this production. So, he does know how to handle these things, and is infatuated with the handling of tape. He's an artist in his own right in that particular enterprise. I have to say that for my own part, I haven't yet learned to appreciate Gould's radio dramas. I may never; I think they're based on a false premise, a premise that he's uttered many times, namely that we don't use all the inputs that the human mind is capable of handling, simultaneously. If we only knew how, people could be listening to radio on four, five or six channels with different kinds of information coming over each at the same time. Now, there can be no question that Gould can handle that kind of input, but he's wrong in assuming that everybody else can.

B: It's his own special gift.

P: It certainly is, as manifested in the contrapuntal clarity of his Bach playing, and of his Gibbons, and his Byrd and so on, and in his insistence in rendering things in Mozart as contrapuntal which are not. He rewrites Mozart to achieve this effect, and he admits this. There can be no dead air on any channel when Gould is going flat out.

B: No other artists have followed Gould's lead and given up concertizing entirely, but hasn't he had considerable influence nonetheless?

P: Well, I think that there is a Gould cult in middle Europe as there is not in North America, among emerging artists of considerable stature. Every artist has had to give attention to his microphone technique in ways that he would not have had to do if Gould had not done what he did and said what he said. Gould made it perfectly clear that recording an event, such as a certain great artist, before a certain audience on a given day at a given place, performing a given thing—and then the microphone eavesdropping on this as a record, rather as you might take a photograph or a family picture, or something like this, was the standard way of looking at recording music until his time. Gould showed that there was an alternative to this: face the advantages and disadvantages of the recording studio, and he exploited those advantages to the utmost!

B: That's almost exactly the technique used in studio pop recordings. Rock, jazz, and so on haven't been saddled with the historical recording-of-a-moment approach, except in live concert recordings.

P: I suppose this has always been the case in the pop field. It's a sad fact that some of the best prose that you read in the daily paper is on the sports page. The topic itself may not be of the very greatest earth-shaking significance, but the sportswriters themselves know that they have to write interesting, active, aggressive, engaging prose to get readers, otherwise they won't hold onto their desks as newspaper columnists. Now, in other kinds of reporting in newspapers, this is considerably less true. And it doesn't seem to matter a whole lot, because who reads the music criticism and the drama criticism anyway? So that by and large, the quality of writing, the editorial content is not as good. In the "classical" areas as in the "popular" ranges; I use the example of the sports page. But I think it would be true if there were specialist writers for pop music (as in most papers there are not) and you could count on there being a more lively kind of prose and by and large a better informed kind of prose because it's a more competitive kind of writing, simply because there are more readers! From the editorial standpoint it's often a question of prestige: will we have a good music critic? a good drama critic?

B: That kind of choice just isn't open in the sportswriter field. A paper can't survive without a good writer in that area.

P: And there are quite a few music critics who've found their way up by way of the sports desk—John Kraglund of the Globe is one, and Harold C. Schonberg of the New York Times is another.

B: Just a fast question about Glenn Gould: by all accounts he's unpredictable, and he's surprised his critics more than once in the past by striking out on unforeseen paths. Suppose, for the moment, that he were to renege on his widely-publicized oath and stage a single return concert. Would there be the response due such a great artist, in the light of his long absence from the public scene?

P: Well, despite his absence from the stage, Gould has hardly been out of the public eye. Just on the public record, there have been over 50 recordings, more than 100 "writings": broadcasts, telecasts, liner notes, articles, and of course there are interviews with him and by him, his own fictions... so he's been present, often in the popular press. But I don't like to make predictions. He's said, most recently in his interview with Artur Rubenstein, "If you are betting that I will again appear in public, you will lose," so I think there is really no doubt about that. But in answer to your question, a properly publicized Gould concert, in one of the great concert halls of the world, would be a sellout. You could fill it even at three hundred dollars a seat, and I don't think that's any exaggeration. The scaling would be on majestic proportions. Perhaps only some sort of foundation grant could cover it. Gould, in his teens, was charging a very, very large fee; Gould now could charge the national debt! My guess is that if Gould were ever to perform it would not be for the money. He tends to do things as he wants, and I doubt he could ever be persuaded to return.

B: Professor Payzant, thank you.

Yet another documentary—and a good one

The ascendancy of New York in the art world got underway in the forties when the former capital, Paris, fell to the Nazis and the United States became an active international leader.

At this time many of those now referred to as members of the "New York School" were working unknown in attics and loft studios and really did deserve to be called "struggling artists". In a few decades they became establishment figures commanding unprecedented high prices for their work.

The emergence of a new and dynamic school of painting by a group of highly individualistic and even eccentric artists is the focus of Emile de Antonio's new film, Painters Painting. The film amply justifies the resurgence of interest in the documentary. Through a series of interviews with artists, critics and dealers filmed in black and white, punctuated by brilliant colour shots of the art works themselves, de Antonio captures the vitality and sense of this creative movement.

Among the cast are Willem de Kooning, Barnett Newman, Clement Greenberg, Robert Rauschenberg, Jackson Pollock, Jasper Johns, Frank Stella and Andy Warhol. The interviews generally take place in the artist's studio or amidst his work and are conducted with a humorous and informal ease. For the most part the artists are articulate and engaging personalities and this approach suits the individual genius.

Many terms such as abstract expressionism, neo-dada, hard edge and pop art are bandied about with some degree of skill; however the essence of the film is not academic. The emphasis is on appreciating and enjoying. Shrugging his shoulders at the critics Barnett Newman replied, "Aesthetics for me is like ornithology must be for the birds".

Some very funny moments were provided by Andy Warhol (whose mirror reflection alone was filmed to give an added twist to an already zany situation). Almost as odd were the wealthy art collectors such as the Sculls who were filmed beside the full-size body replicas which were cast of them by George Segal several years ago.

Although most of the artists came across as very sincere, jokes or attacks upon conventional attitudes to art are still part of the arsenal of the avant-garde. When Jasper Johns became successful an opponent challenged him saying, "that son of a bitch could through two beer cans together and he'd sell them." Naturally Johns did just that, mounting the cans in bronze — and Scull paid thousands for them.

For anyone interested or intrigued by modern art this is an entertaining and provocative film. "Painters Painting" can be seen Saturday and Sunday in the Lecture Hall of the Art Gallery of Ontario at 3 pm. Admission $2.

The Lark in the Clear Air
Dennis T. Patrick Sears
McClelland and Stewart

Lyrical and exciting, graphic and intense, "The Lark in the Clear Air" is a horse-race novel — and you'll be on your feet the whole time.

Sixteen year old Danny-Boy Mulchay, the narrator, has left his Alberta family homestead after the suicide of his father. When Con Mulchay had "caught Mother and her paramour in a situation too flagrant for even a woman's capacity to lie out of, he slammed a clip of .44.40's into her vital organs and went on the hunt for Jack Sturdivant who had leaped out of the window and into the buffalo brush without his pants." Con didn't catch him and blew his own head off.

Advised by an uncle to head for his great-uncle's farm in Ontario, Danny-Boy works his way east shovelling horse manure from a freight car.

The heart of this novel begins with his arrival and acceptance by the "Mad Mulchay" himself 65 year old great uncle Mick.

The spirited, often wisely self-educated Mick Mulchay is a character of Zorba dimensions. He's travelled, even been to college, yet he lives in the frog pond that is Brule Township where the memories are as thick as the dust in the back rooms and the local customs cling like cobwebs. Mick doesn't hesitate to wrestle with these and more burly confinements. His astounding energy provides the excitement of his character.

"The only thing I got out of being Irish was a dedication to the national occupational hazard — whiskey."

"A brief flare of lightning scuttled across the sky — low and faraway. It lit, for a moment my uncle's face: dark and sad and shadowed with melancholy

... Mick hit a thoughtful lick on the banjo strings.

"I can't hear the thunder I can't hear the rain, Away down in this prison ..."

The prison that is the Brule 'society' is ably described through haying time, a wake, a shindig, the general store and an amazing series of individual portraits for such a short novel.

Sears presents us with the limits of his book by giving the map of the mythical township at the beginning. Within those boundaries it sings, saunters, soars, and skeddaddles

Tales from the Smokehouse
Herbert T. Schwartz
$8.95

It's not often you get two reviews for the price of one. In fact, it's not often you'd want two reviews of any one book; one should do. To go further, "Tales from the Smokehouse" — whether judged by size (102 pages) or content (erotic stories of Canadian Indians) — wouldn't seem to lend itself to in-depth scrutiny by anybody. It appears to be a "fun"-type book for the socially "aware".

But there are two of us sharing the arm-chair at our place. And one of us is pure Aztec, having deeply-felt beliefs and feelings about "native" or "original" cultures in general, and American aboriginal societies in particular.

So, now that we've both read the book; and after I've listened to a fair amount of forceful speech — finding myself agreeing more often than not — "Tales from the Smokehouse" get's both barrels; one with a broad spread, the other choked down.

In this introduction, Herbert T. Schwartz says of his collection of erotica that it is "based on personal experiences with Indian in various parts of Canada and is not meant to be a scholarly book." But then neither is it simply a collection of tavern stories. If it were just that this book would be nothing more than a well-introduced example of mild, ethnic pornography.

Like most scatology, "Tales from the Smokehouse," deals with the behavioral aspects of acts which should not be ends in themselves, but launching pads.

... And we've got to get back to the Garden". Yes. And — with a lot of others who realize that a European heritage is, at best, a mixed blessing — perhaps I look too much to this country's native people to provide a better over-all answer to the problem of finding the best way of living. I keep hoping that the Indian view (or manner) of life, having less cultural garbage to dig out from under than mine, will be closer to the original idea. I don't mean naturalism, or Hardy's "magnificent savage" sort of thing at all. I'm looking for a philosophy that's pure, all-pervasive, non-manipulative.

And I get obscene stories. I use the term "obscene" in the same way that Marshall McLuhan used it last year during an evening talk and discussion sponsored by Hart House. That is "from or away from the Whole," to use the sense of the original latin. That which is obscene focuses only on a segment of any fact or philosophy.

Don't get me wrong. There are some forms of pornography I find really delightful — for any number of good reasons. Sexual jokes are the tools most people use to destroy a truly obscene Judeo-Christian taboo; without them, a great many people would simply explode.

But this is my society talking. And I know that my society is only in the early stages of self-prescribed and self-administered depth psycho-analysis and psychotherapy. And I look to the Iroquois, the Navajos, the Mayans, the Incas, the Aztecs for help.

So Schwartz gives me obscene stories.

To get down, however, to other very personal, basic views, ... What got my friend's back up was, firstly, the presentation: "The book destroys the face and the soul of the Indians". Show an Indian Odjig's grotesque rather than sensual illustrations and ask for the serious opinion. Secondly — and speaking of Indian sexuality — the attitudes were simply not the name of the game at all ("It destroys the mystic beauty of the purity of the culture").

The lady reminded me, over and over, that sex was (at least to her culture) simply an intergal part of the larger "whole" of living — a part which, because of her people's freedom of personal expression, has never had to rate any kind of clinical attention or ribald psychotherapy. Further, the act — because of its mystic nature — was one which was considered to be a part of a function that transcended the capabilities of mere human contemplation. She used the term, "the white mind of the Indian" to describe both the overall approach (non-manipulative) to sex, and the psychological state during the act.

But Schwartz only offers obscene stories.

"Tales from the Smokehouse" is the perfect gift for the more simple-minded sexual sophisticate. It even offers useful concepts: that the simple giving of sexual release to another is not wrong; that the man or woman who waits for or depends on a piece of paper for the right to love is lost. The "swingers" may put it out on their coffee tables before their cocktail parties start — you know, as a conversation piece.

But I'm damned if we will. frank cockrain

The film, Painters Painting, by Emile de Antonio (director of Milhouse: A White Comedy) will be shown Saturday and Sunday at 3:00 in the Lecture Hall at the Art Gallery of Ontario. De Antonio interviews and films such artists as de Kooning, Warhol, Motherwell, Stella and Rauschenberg at work in their studios in an attempt to capture the extraordinary vitality of painting in New York from 1940-1970. Admission $2, probably less with a student card.

On campus, Victoria College has an exhibit of 19th century Japanese woodblock prints from various private collections hanging in the New Academic building until Jan. 24. The large colourful paintings of Earla Alexander are up in Scarborough College's Meeting Place until Jan. 27.

Several watercolour exhibitions are on now. The watercolours by Toni Onley at the Pascal Gallery until Jan. 29, were inspired by his summer voyage to the Eastern Canadian Arctic and to northern Greenland. The Merton Gallery is showing the more picturesque scenes of Julius Griffith alongside the abstract work of John Bennett until Jan. 18.

If you can't take your theatre neat, you're in luck this week because there are large numbers of eat-and-look-type cabaret shows in town. But if you actually like it straight, there's not a lot on. Artaud's Jet of Blood and Russell's Penetration open at the Glen Morris St. Theatre, January 14-18 at 8:30. Free Theatre is also opening a new show, The Pits. Previews run January 15-21, and until the 19th it's free. Toronto Workshop is now back in Alexander St. none the worse for wear. The latest play by their resident dramatist Jack Winters opened last week — You Can't Get Here from There — a bitter indictment of Canada's role in the Chilean coup. Otherwise it's last chance week: for Raisin at the O'Keefe (closed January 11), The Donnellis Part Two at the Tarragon (closed January 12) and Hurrah for Jonny Canuck at Factory Theatre Lab (closed January 19).

Welcome back, O nubbies, dimbults and assorted masochists. Back for more of the same soul-bending, mind-warping nonsense? Well, you deserve whatcha get. But once yer classes are over for the day, don't waste your time on such paltries as studying or assignments! Instead, waste your time on some of these . . .

Next Tuesday and Wednesday, fiddle whizkid (actually, not so much of a kid any more) Pinchas Zukerman makes an appearance with the Toronto Symphony, in a dual role — violinist and conductor. Although he's played here many times before, this is the first time he's taken on the double assignment with the Massey Hall gang. It's an interesting program, out of the usual TSO concert mold: Hindemith's concerto for Trumpet, Bassoon and Strings leads off, followed by an arrangement of Verdi's String Quartet for orchestra. The program ends with Mozart's Haffner Serenade. Good stuff, $2 rush tickets at 7 on the night of the concert.

Got kids in tow? Culturize 'em a bit tomorrow afternoon at Massey Hall as the Manipulife Insurance Co. hosts a kids' day at the TSO. The program is a cut above the usual children's programs, including Bernstein's "Candide" overture and the Barn Dance from John Weinzweig's "Red Ear of Corn". Tickets are just $2.50, and the Canadian Opera Children's Chorus is featured on a couple of numbers.

Down at the St. Lawrence, the music rolls on: next thursday, mezzo Marie Laferriere gives a recital of Mozart, Schumann and others, and the next night you won't be able to see the Orford Quartet in concert at 8:30 pm. That's because all the tickets are long gone. Still, if you hustle on down now there may be cancellations to be had. $5.50 and $4.50, if you can get 'em.

Back to the sublime at Hart House this Sunday afternoon, as Anton Kuerti plays the seventh in his magnificent Beethoven Sonata series. This week, Maestro Kuerti will be talking about and playing nos. 27, 10 and 29, the "Hammerklavier" sonata. This, gang, is the biggie, the toughest in the Beethoven canon. I don't know about you, but I'm practising already—with a score, that is. Come early if you want a seat. 3 pm in the Great Hall.

Contest fans: hold on . . . the super contest starts next week, with 5 big prizes, including the complete Ring of the Nibelung on 18 LP records, conducted by Wilhelm Furtwangler. Runner-up prizes look good too. Why am I so good to you schlubs?

Jazz fans should make it a point to be at the Ontario Science Centre Monday night, when guitarist Ed Bickert and trio make an appearance. The show is free — there isn't even an admission charge to the Science Centre on that evening.

The Unisingers of Toronto are a vocal group specializing in the Baroque; and their Christmas concert had to be postponed. However, if you're still in that time frame, you can catch what looks to be a fine program of Bach, Buxtehude and Schutz. It's at the Unitarian Congregation at 175 St. Clair W., Sunday afternoon at 3 — and it's just $1.50 for students.

Five Mozart sonatas are on the program as pianist Antonin Kubalek presents the second of his Mozart series (a good year for piano sonatas, this!) next Thursday eve at 8:30, at 121 Avenue Rd. (St. Paul's Church). A student bargain at $2 — if there are any seats left to be had.

Busy, busy . . . quite a week! Vienna Choir boys make an appearance Thursday night at Massey (they're the unsung stars of The Funtunke's fabulous Bach Cantata series, by the way). $2.50 — $6.50 . . . At the EJB the same night, another in the scholarship series is lined up, with Christopher Weait, Gene Rittich and George Brough giving a Bassoon-horn-harpischord recital. $2 for students . . .

And if you haven't read the interview elsewhere in this issue, take note of Geoffrey Payzant's evening at Hart House this coming Wednesday at 8. The subject? In and around the mind of Glenn Gould. Payzant will keep you mentally on your toes; he's highly articulate, very entertaining and well worth going to see.

Whew. Quite a week. I'm tired just writing about it.

Tonight through Sunday at the Revue is Denys Arcand's Rejeanne Padvoni, a Quebec offering shot in 1973 for $150,000 in 2½ days to save costs. Like Chabrol and Bunuel, Arcand uses a banquet table and its guests as a microcosm of society. Playing with Le Temps D'Une Chasse.

Later in the week at the Revue, Resnais' Je T'aime, Je T'Aime and Lelouche's La Bonne Annee.

The usual drab smorgasbord of tired cult movies are entrenched at the Roxy. Avoid at all costs their

Interfac hockey on the move again

The horrible hordes of helmeted hockey hags got back at it at the arena Monday. Monday's hockey card, put together by hockey entrepreneur, Miss Boyd, featured three first division games.
In the A section Vic I took over sole possession of first place with a 4-0 whitewash over Sr. Eng. Grand, Isles, Richmond, and Johnson tallied for the red and gold.

Phys-Ed again demonstrated that clean living and good physical conditioning has nothing to do with interfac hockey as they managed to lose to Pastoral College 6-3. Wilson, Jarebek, and Hurley scored singles while Kniginzky picked up a hat trick for Erin, Walters, Scarlan, and Hauss replied for the jocks.

Inevitable showdown. It was a close contest but New finally defaulted when only two players showed up.
In other non-action Tuesday, SMC A ended Vic I's claim to first place with a 5-3 thrashing of Law I.

On Wednesday, Innis I was squashed deeper into the bowels of division IIA. Jr. Eng. ravaged the Innies with a veritable orgy of goals. Head rapist was McDonald with a hat trick, followed by Troscic and Large with two goals. Blocka also tallied for Skule. Nobody scored for Innis.

Zenusatis got a hat trick and lead SMC B 5-4 over Vic II. Hamilton and Kineen also scored for St. Mikes. Hoyle, Hughes, and Owiaski found the mark for Vic.

Pharm A slipped some sleeping pills into New II's game meal and then tip-toed 10 goals past them for a 10-2 win.

Scar II kept up with Pharm's pace and remain locked in a first place tie. Scar. II dumped Law II 4-2. Hotshots for the eastenders were Rochford, Churchill, Palmer, Singer tallied for Law.

In the epic clash of the interfac season Music I dropped a tough one to Emmanuel 4-1. The divines got markers from Ripley, Hancock, McMullen, and Pendbury.

The only game in intramural's version of the WHA was a one-sided clash between Med C and Pharm B. The doctors won 7-1. Mann picked up four goals for Meds.

To the chant of "we're number one" the victorious members of the Hart House Chess Club returned home from Louisville Kentucky lugging their trophy emblematic of the first place team in the Pan American Chess Team Championship.
Varsity's six-man contingent to the tournament consisted of Bob Wachtel, Steve Boyd, Bob Joyn, Ray Stone, Dave MacLeod, and Doug Hoover.

Interfac basketball on the homestretch to playoffs

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
As the second half of the interfaculty basketball season got underway Monday, several teams had emerged as strong playoff contenders in Division I A & B and Division II A & B.

Sr. Eng, who scored an upset win over Meds in last year's championship, are the class of Division I A so far. They have won all five of their games, outscoring their opponents 419-290.

Erin and Vic I are only the width of a razor blade behind the Engineers, though, each team winning four games and losing one to frontrunners.

The final two playoff spots in Div.

I A are shakily occupied by Med A (3-2) and PHE A (2-3).

Neither team can feel secure here, because with all teams having nine matches to play, a winning streak by SMC A, Law A or SGS, all of whom have only won one game, could quickly change the standings.

DIVISION I B

Dents leads the other five Div I B teams in the race for the three open playoff spots. Dent won all four fall semester games, with only Fac Ed managing to come within five points of them in a game.

New I and UC I are only a victory away from the tooth doctors, both enjoying 3-1 records. Dents were responsible for each team's single loss, dropping New 68-59 and UC 70-58. All three frontrunners have eight games remaining.

Scar I and Fac Ed (both 1-3) and Trin (winless in four starts) are still scuba diving in the depths, and may soon run out of oxygen in their struggle to reach the surface.

DIVISION II A & B

Division II A & B is a separate league from Division I, with their own playoffs. Div. II A & B both play 10 games but A section sends five teams to the playoffs while only three represent B section.

Div. II A is a tightly clenched section, with 10 teams vying for five playoff slots. Pharm looks assured of one laurel, romping through six games undefeated last term.

With two games in hand over Pharm, For A, SMC B and Jr. Eng all have records of 3-1 with eight games remaining to sort out who won't make this year's playoffs.

Trailing behind, with identical records of one win and three losses are PHE B, Med B, Mgt. Studies and Dents B. Trailing is UC II (0-4).

In Div. II B, with three playoff spots open and six games left, several teams enjoy good position for that last stretch run.

Knox crests the standings with four victories and no defeats. Devonshire House also grabbed four wins, but dropped a 26-40 match to Knox to give them a game in hand.

Five other teams, by either a large or a little stretch of the imagination, still have a chance for that last playoff roost—PHE (3-1), Arch (2-2), Law B (2-3), New II (1-3) and Trin B (1-3). Dent C with four losses in four games are groping.

It took two players to make a basket for Laurier at the Yawnus Maximus Wednesday

B-Ball Blues dump Laurier 87-60

By DAVE STUART
On Wednesday night at the Benson Building, that on-campus bastion of female supremacy, the basketball Blues stuffed the Laurier Golden Hawks into one of the cracks between the floorboards.

The game was little more than a practice session for the Blues as they waltzed to a 45-14 half-time lead and finally won the game 87-60.

The score flatters both teams, actually, since the Varsity eagles could easily have run up 100 points with some shooting accuracy. Laurier, on the other hand, were forced to shoot from a long way out using binoculars to see the hoop.

Varsity's very tight 2-3 defence allowed very few drives to the basket and caused Laurier to waste a lot of time passing around the outside. Blues intercepted many of the passes and staged innumerable steals to take the offensive.

The Golden Hawk defence was sluggish allowing the Blues several two-on-one breaks, as well as four lane super highways to the net.

The game featured two innovations for this season. Varsity coach, John McManus, platooned his troops into two five-man squads which he alternated on the floor almost as often as the hockey team substitutes. The second new wrinkle of the night was the introduction of Peter Oolup into the lineup. Oolup, unfortunately, was the only Blues' player not to score a point.

Speaking of points, Tim McChie and Glenn Scott led the barrage with 14 and 14 respectively. McChie contributed six baskets from the floor and three foul shots while Scott was accurate for 58 percent of his floor shots.

The contest, alas, was only an exhibition encounter but on Saturday night at 8:15, the sacrificial Rams (from Ryerson) will provide the proverbial fodder for the Blue machine in a league bout.

Fitness centre needs fat flabby subjects

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
You had a good Christmas—ate like a pig, watched the tube a lot and didn't walk much further than the living room sofa—now, what are you going to do to get in shape?

For starters, you could amble over to room 107 in Hart-House and sign up for a free fitness test. (Overcome your natural inertia to not go by telling yourself you're saving $40 over what it costs anywhere else.)

The test runs about half an hour, and mostly involves pedalling a stationary bicycle and having the results computed. No sweat.

The phys ed students who conduct the tests will answer all your questions (except how to get into law school, they won't tell you that unless you really press them.)

They'll also suggest how you could get into better shape by following specific programs.

All men and women of the university community are welcome to attend.

Even Karen Magnussen enjoyed having her fitness tested

Radio Varsity manager resigns

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
Radio Varsity managing director Paul Murton announced his resignation last Thursday during a meeting with SAC's communication commission.

Murton's action followed the report of the commission of inquiry into Radio Varsity which recommended he be dismissed.

In a letter to communications commissioner Michael Sabia Jan. 8, Murton said: "I feel that the recommendation calling for my dismissal is unfair. But, in the interest of Radio Varsity's good, I have submitted my resignation realizing that the current situation at the station makes my continuing as manager difficult for all concerned."

Referring to Murton's letter of resignation, Sabia said, "We received it, but we haven't accepted it or rejected it." The matter will be brought forward at a SAC general meeting Wednesday, he said.

Sabia said SAC's options regarding Radio Varsity at present are either to shut down the station until March or find a way to correct the present situation.

If SAC decides to continue the station's operation, one suggestion is to set up an interim board of directors to manage the station with a model to be determined, Sabia said.

The commission of inquiry report, issued last week, calls for the permanent establishment of an independent seven-person board of directors to provide a continuous overview of the station.

"There's a fairly wide consensus that we're not going to let the station remain as it is," Sabia said.

Murton said yesterday he didn't know what he would do if his resignation was rejected, adding he would have to await the outcome of the SAC meeting Wednesday.

The three-person commission of inquiry into the station was named by SAC in November, following complaints by staff members and the resignation of news director Frank Cockram.

The report by Commission members Paul Carson, Rick Outerbridge and John Tory, made 21 recommendations, including a call for dismissal of Murton, establishment of a board of directors and a restructuring of the executive.

Despite the release of the commission's report, controversy continues to plague Radio Varsity.

In a letter posted in the station's offices, commission member Carson condemns what he termed rumors of his motives in serving on the SAC commission.

The letter said: "Should Mr. Murton be dismissed, I will not apply, and I never have had any intention of applying, for either the interim or permanent directorship. In the unlikely event that either position is offered to me, I shall refuse to accept it."

Carson resigned his position as executive assistant to Scarborough College's students' council claiming mismanagement of council business, and he is now unemployed.

The other inquiry commission members, Tory and Outerbridge, said they had seen no evidence of any self-interest on Carson's part. Tory said when he once made a joking reference to proposing Carson for the position, Carson immediately replied that he could not consider it.

All three commission members also denied the rumor that the report had been rewritten after Tory had viewed the final draft.

Tory said there had been some "twisting of words" in the final report but added he was generally satisfied with it. He said he was only able to view the finished report briefly Monday morning before its release. Sabia said some disagreement between the commission members when they appeared before the communications commission Thursday evening "gave my commission some cause for concern".

Tory said his chief reservation was that Murton be given a chance to defend himself before he was dismissed.

The third recommendation of the report said "If SAC concurs with this recommendation (that Murton be dismissed), Mr. Murton should be offered both four weeks' severance pay and the opportunity to defend himself at a public SAC meeting if he so desires."

"I thought he should have been fired, but with a chance to have a public hearing before," Tory said. Tory also said he had some reservations concerning the report's recommendation that neither Murton or staff members Ricard Morochov and Paul Cutler be able to apply for the position on the executive or as manager until March, 1976. Tory said he felt this penalty was a bit harsh.

Architecture-engineering union proposal scrapped

By MARINA STRAUSS

Plans to restructure the Faculty of Architecture will not include a link between that faculty's architecture department and the Faculty of Engineering, U of T provost Don Forster assured yesterday.

Forster's assurance follows heavy criticism last term of his proposal to associate the architecture department with the engineering faculty, a move architecture students and staff members claimed would impinge on their autonomy.

Forster recommended last September dissolving and restructuring the Faculty of Architecture, which now consists of the architecture, landscape architecture and urban and regional planning departments.

The Faculty of Architecture's initial goal when set up in 1967 to become a centre or focus for the development of general environmental studies in the university, has not been achieved, Forster has explained as reason for the restructuring.

Although Forster did not yet want to reveal his present plans for the architecture faculty, he told an academic affairs meeting Thursday his September proposals for the landscape architecture and urban planning departments will likely stand, according to academic affairs member Gord Barnes.

Forster has proposed that, effective July 1, landscape join the Faculty of Forestry in a renamed faculty and that urban planning, a graduate program, move to the School for Graduate Studies.

Forster told academic affairs he will recommend that the architecture department become "a free standing department to report to one of the vice-provosts, according to Barnes.

Forster said yesterday he did not want to specify his plans until he speaks with Faculty of Architecture's acting chairman and three department chairmen next Monday.

After that meeting, Forster added, his proposals will go to academic affairs for approval and finally to the university's Governing Council.

Forster noted he drew up his proposals from the consensus he found in the over 100 letters and opinions he received in the fall from architecture students, staff and members of the profession, among others, in reply to the September recommendations.

Two York university students say they were victims of a rip-off on a Christmas holiday ski trip run by Larry Kleinmintz of the Summit Ski Group, Associated Travel Services.

The students were part of a group of 400 who went on an excursion run by Kleinmintz to ski at Mont Sainte Anne, Quebec.

Wayne Krangle and Jane Stern recounted their experiences in letters to several newspapers. There were also complaints by others on the trip to the Better Business Bureau. Kleinmintz is being sued by one unhappy customer in small claims court.

The problems began with the bus trip to Quebec when the buses made numerous time-consuming stops. According to the students, the itinerary was inaccurate, even allowing for bad weather conditions, because travel time to Quebec is at least nine hours, not six.

Wayne and Jane also asked Kleinmintz where they should put their luggage and he said to put it on any bus. Later when it went to the wrong hotel Kleinmintz denied responsibility, saying they were only two in 400.

Their baggage finally arrived at 11 pm, four hours late.

Another complaint is that Kleinmintz sold tickets for a New Year's Eve party at $5 a couple when the party was advertised in the brochure as free.

Krangle and Stern also said the buses always left late in the morning for the slopes but departed exactly on time, shortening their skiing time.

Another mix-up was with the hotel, the Quebec Hilton, where they were the only guests on a floor. On the second last day they were told the hotel was not aware they were there. Finally they were moved.

The last complaint was the trip home. The itinerary said they would arrive at the Yorkdale shopping centre at 12:30 am but they arrived much later, leaving parents and friends with a long wait.

Apparently the itinerary again set an impossible time for the return trip of seven and a half hours when the minimum time in good weather would be nine hours.

Kleinmintz denied all the charges in an interview. He said that even though the itinerary has set down times, they can vary with weather, driver fatigue and boarding time.

Kleinmintz also blamed some of the problems on the arrangement Krangle and Stern made to extend the trip two days by combining two trips. He said this would no longer be allowed because of their complaints.

Kleinmintz avoided the luggage question, saying that applications state people are responsible for their own luggage. He said he personally delivered their luggage to the correct hotel even though he wasn't required to.

The ski entrepreneur also claimed that the brochure only advertised free entertainment, not a free New Year's Party as Krangle and Stern expected.

He called their room mix-up "a hotel problem" which he had no responsibility for. He said they had their choice of hotel.

Kleinmintz said the buses left on time most days, but were dependent on how quickly people boarded. He said the return trip arrival time was approximate and was only late because of a snowstorm on the way back and a two-hour delay in leaving.

The tour operator also said the cost was only $86 which made it one of the cheapest tours.

Stern said Kleinmintz' explanations were "pretty feeble. We didn't care how long the buses took as long as the schedule was realistic," she said.

She said they had taken the trip the year before and had no complaints, but this year everything seemed to go wrong.

Another inaccuracy was the cost, Stern said. She and Krangle each paid $160 and the $86 was only for those who would sleep four to a room.

'Body landscaping' new nutty fad

SAN FRANCISCO (EARTH NEWS) — Fads come and go at an astonishing rate in San Francisco, but the latest craze is by far the most bizarre in some years.

It's sometimes known as "body landscaping" or, in blunter terms, getting a body-haircut.

Hairstylists who specialize in trimming and dyeing body hair are popping up at some of the city's most respectable hotels. Naturally, most of their clients are men—but not all.

Primarily what these non-torsorial specialists are doing is working designs into chest hair—sort of like a hairy tattoo. The most popular, they say, is the heart shape. But also in demand are peace signs, crosses, stars of David, and for one Irish-born customer, a shamrock.

Kanowitch denounces discipline study

The non-academic code is coming up for discussion today at Governing Council's internal affairs meeting. Internal affairs already decided last Thursday to set up a sub-committee to look into the code.

Because of heavy student opposition last year to the non-academic section of the university's new discipline code, Governing Council passed only the academic section leaving the rest for approval this January.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch has come out firmly opposed to the new body to look into the proposed non-academic code, which was devised two years ago by then Governing Council member Paul Cadario and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, and has since been dubbed the Conway-Cadario code.

"The sub-committee is starting out with a code that students overwhelmingly rejected last year," Kanowitch charged. "Because of the terms of reference, there's no possible way a consensus will be reached on something that already has been rejected."

Kanowitch denounced the fact that the sub-committee, to be composed of four students, two faculty members and two administrators, is not to study the "feasibility of a non-academic code at this time" or the need to design a new code. "Instead, the terms of reference are the Conway-Cadario code," Kanowitch said. "Internal affairs doesn't care what the end result of the sub-committee is." The sub-committee is to report back to internal affairs within six weeks, although the code will be discussed this month by Governing Council.

Discipline issue last year brought occupation of Governing Council meeting.

Reformers set up steering committee

By BOB BETTSON

Toronto's reform movement made its first strides towards forming a permanent city-wide structure last Thursday night.

A meeting of 100 people at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute decided to set up a steering committee for the reform movement to be made up of two representatives from each ward, picked from reform organizations within the ward.

There was substantial debate on the size and composition of the steering committee. It was decided not to have any city-wide groups given separate representation. Educational representation was also not specified.

Two action committees were set up to plan immediate battles for the 45-foot height bylaw and against the mammoth Metro Centre development.

The group will operate in close cooperation with the new caucus formed at City Council consisting of Dan Heap, Allan Sparrow, John Sewell, Michael Darcy Goldrick, Janet Howard and Dorothy Thomas.

The caucus was formed at the first city-wide reform meeting in December, and the six aldermen have resolved to work together for a reform program and concentrate their strength in a co-ordinated effort to influence the direction of city politics.

Aldermen Bill Kilbourn, Anne Johnston and Ying Hope were approached to join the caucus but refused. They would not submit to caucus discipline.

The priorities of the new movement include tenants' rights, health care, environmental pollution, housing, Metro Centre, educational concerns, transportation, and land-use planning.

It is the first attempt to set up an ongoing city wide reform group since CO'72, which was an attempt to co-ordinate reform action before the 1972 city elections.

The group is expected to co-ordinate city-wide actions in cooperation with ward organizations. At present there are only two ward councils in Ward Six and Ward Four, but there are many groups active in other wards.

U of T rejects air-supported structure

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

A $40,000 study into the feasibility of saving at least $6 million by using an air-supported structure to house the proposed new athletic complex has been rejected by U of T.

A Toronto company, Airt Research and Design, which specializes in constructing air supported structures, said earlier this year that U of T might be able to shave half of its $10-$12 million budget for the proposed new athletic complex by switching from their conventional plan for a concrete and steel structure.

The Airt structure would include the Benson Building as well as new facilities which would be built on the Benson Building roof, all of which would be covered by a huge, thin-skinned 90 percent transparent silicone roof.

Airt president Harry Pasternak suggested the athletic complex, which will include men's and women's athletic facilities, Olympic pool and diving tower, running tracks, playing space, laboratories, classrooms and offices, could be contained under such an air-supported structure, which would cost only $4.6-6 million.

Pasternak, former Humber college athletic director, said he coordinates a team of various experts in design and construction which have helped build more than $760-million worth of air-supported structures, such as domed stadiums, sports complexes, and other business and cultural centres in the U.S., Canada, Europe and Japan.

Pasternak said yesterday Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway had sent him a letter, saying the university had decided against a feasibility study, without citing good reasons.

Conway confirmed that her office had sent a rejection letter to Pasternak, but refused to comment further on the reasons. She did say, however, that those who advised her on the athletic structure complex were against an air-supported structure.

Earlier, Pasternak said his company had been retained by the university to consult at $360 a day, and had been given a list of questions on the air-supported structure concerning fire regulations, costs, aesthetic considerations, durability and other questions drawn up by the athletic staff, Physical Plant, the administration and the architects.

After his company had submitted answers to these questions, the university then rejected outright any further study, said Pasternak. He added Conway's letter was short and gave almost no reasons for the rejection.

"One reason they did cite was that it was against fire regulations. Well, I called the fire marshal's office and they told me they had never had anyone come around from the university to check on this. I don't know the real reasons for its rejection, although I have my own personal feelings about it," said Pasternak.

"I think the attitude is, they want a $12-million monument and don't care what anyone says against it. It's just unfortunate that a building like this is looked upon as a monument.

"People like Bruce Kidd go around complaining that there's no money for amateur sport and then slip by quietly while millions of dollars are frozen into a building," Pasternak commented.

"The problem is attitudinal; they look on it like a sports competition. The University of Montreal just got a $12-million complex so they want one too.

"I don't think the Government of Ontario is against an air-support structure, because they (and the students) have to pay for the complex. They were the ones who suggested our company to the university in the first place," he added.

Jack Dimond, Conway's administrative assistant, said "It wasn't worth $40,000 to get told what we already know about such a structure—that it's unsuited to the Benson Building site.

He added, "we turned it down after very careful discussion with Physical plant, the athletic department and the architects.

"We found out there wouldn't have been the savings Pasternak was talking about, although the structure could probably have been built. They have been before."

"Pasternak admitted to us he wasn't sure if the structure was feasible, and we decided internally that chances of it were slim," Dimond said.

"We're not against air-support structures, but they're only good for certain purposes. We'd need a site a lot bigger than the Benson Building, like the whole back campus, for it to be feasible."

"I'd also be extremely skeptical if the saving of such a structure were as high as Pasternak is talking about," Dimond said.

"I can't comment on the university not checking with the fire marshal about fire regulations. I don't know how he'd be able to find out anyway, and besides, we have the fire regulations building code, we can read it ourselves," Dimond said.

"Technology on this sort of stuff hasn't been around long enough to judge a lot of the claims he's making for it. Supposing a lot of things weren't as he said, and we had to replace the air-support roof a lot sooner than he's claiming," Dimond concluded.

Both Pasternak and Dimond said the matter is finished, although Pasternak said he would like a chance to explain an air-supported structure to students "because they will be the ones who have to pay for whatever the university chooses."

Government grant cuts bar Loyola book buying

MONTREAL (CUP) — Loyola's College's Vanier library will not be able to buy any new books this year due to a massive cut in its operating budget from 1973-1974.

The library will not be able to expand its collection nor will it be able to buy any new books published this year.

The library's collection satisfactorily covers courses which have formed the traditional education base on the Loyola campus, such as History and English Literature, but is inadequate for programmes like Fine Arts which have just been introduced.

The library's budget for this year was cut by approximately $110,000 leaving it with $170,000 to operate with for the coming year.

According to Concordia

Associate Director of Libraries Joseph Prinz, this is just enough money to keep up periodical subscriptions and to pay off orders made last year.

He had originally asked for $230,000 for the year which "just barely" reaches minimum standards. It would allow us to keep up with the most important new books published this year."

The library's budget for this year accounts for only six per cent on the total Loyola budget. Most Canadian universities receive an average of eight to ten per cent of the operating budget.

The Vice-President administration said that the Library received such a low percentage for this year because the province has handed out "unusually stingy" grants.

Consider the food that many people eat every day; toast and cereal for breakfast, coffee and a donut during morning break; for lunch, vending machine sandwiches made of cheese slices; for supper a package of frozen fish and chips and canned peas, with ice cream and cake for dessert. Along with this goes the usual assortment of snacks, a can of coke and potato chips and delivery pizza while watching TV.

Food has changed a lot over the past few years. It is no longer just a matter of preparing meat, potatoes and a vegetable. The consumer is now offered an overwhelming array of pre-packaged and highly processed foods. The food corporations continually extol the virtue of their wonderous, new improved products. According to their public relations people these products save us countless hours of slaving over a hot stove; they are supposed to be safer, more convenient, more nutritious and better tasting than ever before. Yet it doesn't entirely fit. It is true that bread stays fresh forever but when was the last time that you really enjoyed a slice of bread? It is true that oranges are a nice orange colour but what happened to the juice and taste?

There is a great deal about food that we do not understand. The primary purpose of eating is to supply the nutrients necessary to sustain life, yet a study done for the department of Health and Welfare, Nutrition Canada, has shown that many people do not gain all that they should from their food. They discovered that 44 percent of Canadians have an iron deficiency, over 60 percent receive an inadequate amount of vitamin D, while 26 percent get an insufficient amount of calcium.

We are led to believe that we are one of the best fed nations yet many people are unable to eat properly. It is not simply a lack of money, (although of course it is easier to feed a family on $15,000 a year than on $6,000) for these deficiencies are evident in all income groups. Nor is it simply a question of education although that is a necessary first step. The problem with food in Canada is quite fundamental and we must begin to examine the reasons why we have become a nation which is overfed yet under-nourished.

As Canada became more industrialized the entire nature of the food industry was changed. Agriculture came to be regarded as just another field for economic activity and if a businessman were to invest a sum of money in any level of agricultural production, then he would expect what he considered to be a reasonable return of his dollar. As a result food became just another potential money maker. It made little difference to the businessman, or corporation, whether their money was invested in the auto industry or the food industry; the main criteria was profitability. The fact that it was profitable can be seen by the size and well-being of such corporations as General Foods, Zehrs, Kraft and Canada Packers.

The food industry has found it difficult to meet the twin goals of nutritional quality and profit. With only their conscience to guide them it is not difficult to figure which one they would choose. This has had obvious ramifications on our eating habits. The more processing which goes into a food the greater the opportunities for taking a profit. If a processor takes some peas, cooks them slightly and cans them, a small profit can be made. If those same peas are added to some french fries and a few chunks of meat then a much larger profit can be made by selling a "complete dinner".

The consumer ends up paying for the convenience of this way of eating in two ways. First, the cost per person is often double that of a cook-it-yourself meal.

Secondly, the increased processing has destroyed more of the nutrients in the food. The value of your food dollar must be measured in terms of the nutrition that you get for it. Extremes of heat and cold, crushing, slicing, exposure to heat and cold all take a toll on the nutrients in the food. However, there is no incentive for the processor to develop manufacturing methods which would reduce the nutritional loss. His prime concern is increased efficiency through the reduction of cost.

THE FOOD INDUSTRY

The food industry is a multi-million dollar business complete with misinformation, government complacency, and high pressured advertising. The general trend towards highly processed foods has been aided by large advertising budgets which dictate new eating habits.

The food industry provides the radio and television industries with 27 percent of its total revenue. The amount spent in just one month (August 73) was over three and a half million dollars with another $878,000 spent in the press. These totals do not include any of the indirect expenses associated with advertising, including the cost of the ad agencies or the internal advertising costs within the companies themselves. Added onto this is the cost of all the giveaways and special promotions.

The consumer pays for all of these expenses when he or she buys a given food product.

The advertising is primarily focused on the highly processed and convenience foods; so price goes up while food value goes down. Breakfast cereals provide a good example. Up to 19 percent of the sales dollar is used to cover the cost of advertising yet these cereals are little diseases; however even minor deficiencies can cause problems. If one nutrient is lacking then the chances are that some of the others are also deficient. The effect of these deficiencies can be extremely subtle. Anyone could go for years with a deficient diet without suffering from any apparent harm but there would be a gradual decline in the state of health as the effects of the various deficiencies began to accumulate. It helps to think of the body as an ecological system where everything must be kept in careful balance. Once that balance is thrown off the effects are rather widespread.

It is difficult to trace back assorted aches and pains or a general lack of well-being to a dietary lack since it becomes so complex as the side-effects begin to multiply. Medical doctors do not have the training necessary to understand the role nutrition plays in health.

A proper diet is a necessary first step in ensuring a long and healthy life. There is a myth in Canada that we are a nation of healthy people; the statistics simply do not bear this out. Half the population has some kind of continuous illness—heart trouble, high blood pressure, digestive difficulties, poor resistance to infections and so on. It is not uncommon now to hear of people in their thirties and forties dying from heart attacks and cancer. Even children do not seem to be immune as the incidence of leukemia continues to climb.

Health, however, cannot be measured by statistics. Nor is health simply the absence of disease. Large numbers of people feel that there must be something wrong with them; however, since there is no visible evidence of disease the doctors tell them that they're okay. That does little to reassure anyone who finds it an effort to get through the day.

There are many factors which have contributed to the decline in our standard of health; air and water pollution, the lack of exercise, the stress which come from our pace of living and so on. Yet much of this health problem can be linked to our diet in terms of what we do and do not eat.

There is no question that much of our food supply contains traces of poisonous pesticides. Farmers are spraying increasingly large amounts of these pesticides on their crops and residues remain on much of the food we eat. The nature of farming today makes it necessary to use intensive agricultural techniques and spraying is the most efficient way of controlling the various insects, weeds, and fungi that threaten the crops. Yet ironically these same intensive techniques only make the matter worse. Pest control could be simplified by better crop rotation, by better soil management, or by relying to a greater extent on mechanical or biological means to control the various types of pests.

FOR A FEW DOLLARS MORE

The poisons in our food are not limited to contamination on the farm. There are over 3,000 chemical additives currently in use. They have a wide range of uses: dyes to make the food look better, texturizers to give drinks a better mouth feel, flavours and flavour enhancers to give the food some taste, preservatives to keep the food from spoiling, emulsifiers to make a product smooth and creamy. Canadian law states that it is illegal to use any additive whose sole purpose is to deceive the consumer, yet there is little doubt that most of these chemicals serve no other purpose.

SOME SOLUTIONS

The best way of ensuring a more adequate diet is to avoid highly processed and take-out foods. To quote from Chemical and Engineering News, a trade journal, convenience foods are "prepared under severe conditions of temperature, pressure or agitation. Therefore they may require special flavourings, flavour enhancers, colours and additives to make up for a partial loss of flavour, colour, texture, and other properties caused by processing." These foods are of small nutritive value to your body.

Diet is often just a question of time and energy. In many homes both parents have to go to work to support a family and there is little time to prepare meals from the more basic food-stuffs. A wide variety of foods however, such as vegetables, beans, meat, potatoes, can be prepared in a few minutes using a pressure cooker. Salads are quickly and easily prepared and are a good source of nutrition. Soups and bean dishes can be prepared on the weekend for use during the week.

Baking your own bread offers another real alternative to the food industry. This is neither as difficult nor as time consuming as it may seem. Less than an hour of actual labour time will supply the average family with enough bread for a week. Any member of the family who can cook at all could probably find satisfaction in making good tasting, nutritious bread. Find a good recipe, some whole wheat flour, preferably stone ground and try it for a month. Chances are you will never go back to eating store bread again.

Need innovative programs

Friday's news that the department of interdisciplinary studies can expect a substantial budget cutback is saddening. Not that any department should necessarily be immune from reductions in the face of stringency, but this particular department, with no entrenched faculty to fight back, always seems the first to come under the gun.

We should be wary of attacks on innovative programs under this guise of fiscal necessity. U of T has formally committed itself (in principle) to a strong program of interdisciplinary studies, but the department has still had to brave attacks on its standing.

It would be particularly sad to see this department diminished when times are certain to get tough, and when creative approaches to the future are going to become a necessity.

We may not be in the sixties any longer, but students still expect and deserve as progressive an education as possible at a university.

Students and faculty in the department should put their heads together and come up with a strategy to preserve one of U of T's more valuable assets.

Teach or research?

necessary to society, unless our aim is stagnation, to develop, clarify. But a research institution is not compatible with the large undergraduate programme in the modern university (except at the graduate level), which requires trained teachers.

Teachers rather than researchers are required because it is unfair to expect a researcher necessarily to be able to teach the relatively basic material of his discipline, although he should be able to pass on his own and other relatively contemporary research.

In light of this I would suggest that ideally the undergraduate level should be divorced from the research institute. This would create a new intermediate level of educational body for the undergraduate programme, staffed by teachers rather than researchers.

To achieve this one must provide a teaching oriented undergraduate program within the university. But can this not be done with the presently constituted faculty? This question clearly leads into the issue of teaching ability.

I said that it is unreasonable to expect researchers to be necessarily good teachers; but the present faculty members have been teaching for years. Why, then, do they not qualify to fill the role of teachers as well as researchers, especially since teaching is apparently one of the criteria for hiring?

The problem is that the quality of teaching is apparently low. I was myself struck by the contrast between the quality of teaching Grade XIII and first year. This contrast is not surprising considering the inconsistency of society's attitude to teaching.

An elementary school teacher requires a certain level of academic qualifications and certain teacher training. A high school teacher requires higher academic qualifications and more teacher training. A university teacher, on the other hand, requires considerably higher academic qualifications but no teacher training.

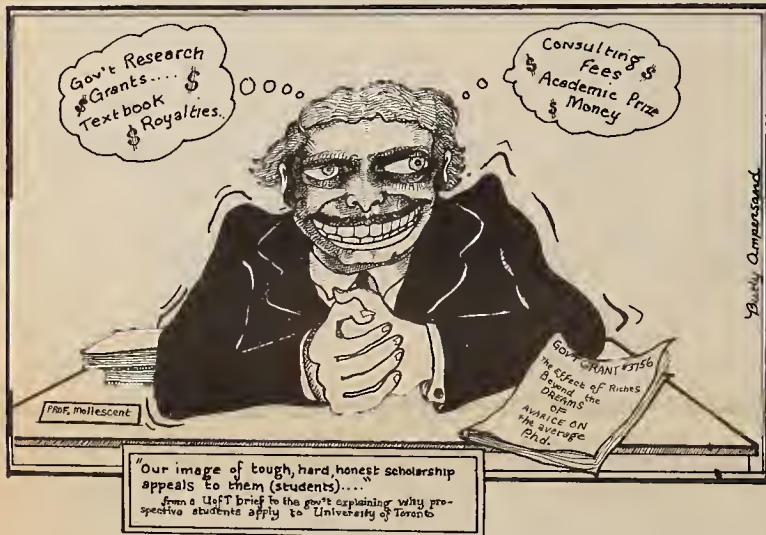

Indeed, the nearest thing to university teacher training is experience as a teaching assistant; however, this is acquired without supervision or evaluation by anyone with more formal teacher training.

I do believe that, to a certain extent, one either has teaching ability or one does not regardless of training. Nevertheless, teacher training is valuable just as a music school is available for those with musical ability. Thus it is to be expected that university teacher training would have definite value.

Ideally, then, the University would require all present and prospective faculty members to take teacher training. This is, of course clearly impracticable, since this university could hardly require applicants to have teacher training when no other university does, nor could one require faculty members of some years standing to take teacher training.

I suggest, therefore, that the university make a teacher training program available to faculty members and that they should be encouraged to enrol.

 from a UofT brief to the gov't explaining why prospective students apply to University of Toronto

Universities still inefficient

The Ontario government's recent decision to restrict its expenditures on universities seems reasonable but its methods not so. The government has decided to hold tuition fees at their current levels and give universities a relatively small increase in grants for 1975-76. The small increase in grants in real terms depending on the rate of inflation.

As a student I feel universities are suffering from serious inefficiencies. Too many of our current faculty gained their positions in the frantic expansion of universities in the 1960's. Generally, faculty acquisition at that time was of mediocre calibre. Taxpayers and students are now faced with paying their salaries for the next 30 years because of tenure. Faculty workloads are not as burdensome as they would have us believe, nor are the expected standards of teaching and research especially high. If one considers their 'summer holidays' their sabbaticals and their relatively low number of teaching hours, then it may be that faculty have one of the highest hourly wage occupations. And since research activities are forced on all faculty whether competent or not, much of the research is of dubious value. For all faculty to receive generous compensation for this research seems ridiculous.

But not just the faculty should be downgraded. Students are happy that their fees will not rise next year, but unhappy with the government's student aid program. Students, of course, have a vested interest while in university — they wish to maximize the amount of 'free' money they receive. Upon leaving university, it would be interesting to see how their attitudes change.

Rich people are disproportionately represented at our universities. The combination of relatively low tuitions and student aid has done little to increase significantly the poor people attending universities. One should expect this. The desire to go to university and the attainment of the necessary marks to qualify depend, to some extent, on the type of schooling received from ages 4 to 18. Typically, poor children go to schools where their teachers have little expectation of or interest in seeing them go to university.

Why should young adults deciding to go to university be so heavily subsidized for this investment when other young adults not going to university must borrow funds at going market prices to invest in, say, a small business. Why should the vast majority of taxpayers whose children never attend university subsidize the relatively few but mainly middle and upper income children who do? The social benefits stemming from university education surely do not justify the degree of subsidization we have now.

The people who do go to university are more likely to be well off in the future than their non-university counterparts. If they cannot pay for their university education now why not require them to pay for it in the future? Advantages would flow not only to taxpayers but also to students. Students wanting to have, for example, Professor Seeley as their teacher could go out and hire him on their own. Students would gain greater control of course content, requirements for degrees and so on. A professor's salary could become dependent, in part, on his or her ability to teach as student assessments in this area could now carry some weight.

Monies saved by the government could be transferred to the lower levels of education. This may or may not improve the likelihood of poor children attending university, but at least it may improve the dreadful experience forced upon so many of our own children at the elementary and secondary schools.

George Gross, a transfer from Yale University, led the Varsity swim Blues to a 67-46 victory over the University of Western Ontario in the Blues' first dual meet of the season at the Benson Building Saturday.

Gross placed first in the 200 yard freestyle with a time of 1:52 and first in the 200 yard backstroke with a time of 2:05.

Freshman Juri Daniel was named swimmer of the meet for the Blues for his blistering 1:02:3 in the breaststroke leg of the 400 yard medley relay.

The Lady Blues Intercollegiate hockey team played host to Seneca College at the arena Thursday and came away with a 3-3 tie. Margi Goldsmith scored all three goals for the ladies.

Over the weekend the team is scheduled for a four school tournament in Montreal.

The wrestling team split their troops to participate in the Queen's Invitational and the Montreal Open over the weekend.

At Queen's the team turned in a mediocre performance. One highlight was Leonard Gang's first place finish in the 109 lb. class.

In Montreal, Robert Moore placed second to Tim Wenzell from Waterloo in the 134 lb. class. Wenzell and Moore actually tied in their bout but Moore had lost an earlier fight. Wenzell is a former OUA champion at 125 lb.

In a very tough category at 177 lbs., Glenn May grabbed a fourth.

In the first half of the first Can-Am Intercollegiate Alpine Ski Series, the University of Massachusetts walked off with the men's overall championship while Queen's took the ladies overall championship. Boomer Mumford took first in the Downhill and Giant Slalom for Johnson State as well as a second in the slalom.

Ginny Honeyman won the Women's overall championship for Queen's with a win in the slalom and giant slalom.

The best performances for U of T were: Britt Roberts, 12th downhill; Doug Carter, 6th, slalom; John Slaughter, 20th, giant slalom.

Blues take four points over Queen's and RMC

By ANNE LLOYD
KINGSTON — A 6-1 victory over Queen's plus a 6-3 win over RMC equals four points for the hockey Blues this weekend in Kingston.

The road trip, however, was not without its setbacks. Varsity forwards Bill Hughes and Bill Fifield will be out of action with shoulder injuries. Fifield for 2-3 weeks. Both men were injured in what was easily the scrappiest game of the season, played against the Golden Gaels.

With Ivan McFarlane sidelined with a back injury, Blues' coach Tom Watt spent his breakfast Saturday trying to juggle his remaining fourteen bodies into some semblance of lines for the RMC game Saturday afternoon.

Veteran defenceman Brent Swanick was converted into a center and played both ways against the Redmen. Responding to the opportunity to play forward with the flourish and aplomb of Tricky Dick Thornton given a chance to play quarterback, Swanick scored the first goal against RMC!

The Redmen proved to be very tenacious opponents on home ice and outscored Varsity 2-1 in the second period. Varsity came back with a strong and determined checking effort in the third period to take a surprisingly hard earned win.

It has always been easy to run-down teams like RMC and Ryerson—but after talking with the players and learning that the total student population is 600 or so, and that all entrants are selected for suitability to military life and must also meet rigid academic qualifications, it is much easier to see why their Varsity teams in any sport are well-coached but lack talent.

In both games this weekend, the Blues proved themselves to be a classy and well disciplined team. This was especially true against Queen's, and also against RMC when the Blues played a good first period, a sloppy second period, and bounced back to play a solid third period.

Swanick opened the scoring against RMC, creating his own opportunity and taking advantage of it. Swanick had taken an RMC defenceman out of the play and freed himself just in time to bang home the rebound of Rocci Pagnello's shot from the point. Diminutive defenceman, Charlie Hughes, drew a well earned assist on the play.

Hughes had an excellent afternoon against the Redmen, handing out stiff checks throughout the contest. It is unfortunate that due to the eccentricities and inefficiencies of the Mississauga Transit System, Hughes was unable to make it downtown from Erindale, and subsequently missed the team bus to Queen's Friday night.

Frank Davis made it 2-0 at 8:45 of the first and Warren Anderson notched the 3-0 marker at 14:33, firing a shot along the ice through a maze of players. Both Swanick and Anderson scored in power-play situations.

RMC came back at 17:15 to "spoil my shutout" as Blues goaltender Bob Oss was to comment later. The goal by Stanley rounded out the first period scoring, with the Blues holding a comfortable 3-1 lead.

With defenceman Al Milnes picking up a tripping penalty in the second, the Varsity penalty killing unit of Hampton, Hughes, Anderson, and Davies did a magnificent job of bottling up RMC, allowing the Redmen out of their own end only twice.

Doug Herridge made it 4-1 at 2:52 of the second, slapping the puck in along the ice from about six feet out. Holding a three-goal lead, Varsity seemed to let up quite a bit and the Redmen took full advantage of sloppy play in the Blues' end to narrow the margin to 4-2 as Stanley scored unassisted.

With Ruhnke and RMC's Chuck Barkman serving four minutes for their one runder (Ruhnke subsequently said he'd like to go 15 with Al—if Pagnutti would be his second) and Davies in for slashing, RMC's Gord Brown broke in on the right wing to score the controversial 4-3 goal. It appeared that the play was offside (in fact one official had signalled so) but the play was never called and the goal was allowed.

The Redmen played a strong game and the Blues sagged. It looked as if a major upset was in the making but Gord Davies squeaked that thought with a neatly executed goal at 24 seconds of the third to give the Blues a 5-3 lead.

Stand-out defensive play by Charlie Hughes and sterling penalty killing by Ron Harris and Doug Herridge pulled the Blues through a few tense moments in the middle of the third until Frank Davis rounded out the scoring at 16:52 to give the Blues a hard fought win.

The Friday night contest also merits the adjective "hard-fought"—but for entirely different reasons. After a very evenly played first period which featured hard hitting by both sides, Queen's resorted to slashing and an extremely scrappy style of play.

Headed by hatchetman Bob Swan and compounded by lax officiating courtesy of the OMHA officials who were constantly out of position, the game threatened to get out of hand at several points.

Coach Tom Watt said after the game that he could not understand why Queen's did not use OHA officials, as does most of the rest of the league.

Swan, in particular, was allowed to get away with murder. Watt did add, however, that the Blues showed admirable restraint in not retaliating despite considerable provocation.

As the game started out, there was ample evidence it was going to be a tough physical game. Queen's likes to hit and the rabid Gaels' fans, who were jammed into the arena in record numbers, loved that style of play—especially when the victims were the arch-rival Blues.

Varsity took an early lead on a classic goal by Gord Davies, who took a pass from Howie Hampton and scored from about five feet out at 2:57 of the first.

Queen's tied up the game at 12:02 with Earl Moulton breaking in alone on the right side to beat Hulme with a neat fake.

The first period featured good checks from both sides, a lot of hitting and some good passing, but in the second period the continual pressure of the Blues' defence eventually frustrated Queen's who had a grand total of two shots on net.

The result was several cheap shots at Varsity players, and a couple of skirmishes which failed to erupt only because of the cool, disciplined reaction of the Varsity players and certainly not because of alertness on the part of the officials.

Varsity played a tremendous period capitalizing fully on numerous Gaels' errors. Ron Harris made it 2-1 early in the period, taking a pass and putting a high shot over the Queen's goaltenders' shoulder.

Kent Ruhnke made it 3-1 on a very pretty goal, assisted by hardworking Larry Hopkins and a fine pass from Don Pagnutti who has proven to be a valuable addition to the team since his return to school.

But it was Gord Davies' second tally of the game that had even the hard-core Queen's fans shaking their heads in amazement.

Varsity continued to press in the third period and their efforts paid off, as Ruhnke scored the 5-1 marker at 42 seconds of the period.

Varsity then contented themselves with forechecking Queen's at every opportunity and continually thwarting any drives the Gaels were able to put together. Warren Anderson in particular, made several neat but punishing checks.

The "main event" of the evening got underway at 12:48 with Anderson and Swan squaring off. Swan and Anderson drew minors for their efforts.

The game cooled down somewhat after that, with Queen's unable to beat Hulme on several good chances. Ron Harris rounded out the scoring dumping the puck in on a power play with ex-Blue Dave McDowall in the sin bin.

Hampton had an outstanding weekend in terms of plays made and effort. Harris, one of the most underrated players on the team had two goals against Queen's and has had an all-round strong season this year.

The Blues are rounding rapidly into top form. The recovery of the various Varsity players from their assorted injuries will play a key role as the Blues have another tough weekend ahead of them.

Playing two games on Friday and Saturday at the Sir George Williams Tournament, they return late Saturday to prepare for what will probably be the game of the year against the Waterloo Warriors Sunday night.

Blues' next home game will be no easy contest either as they face the Big Red of Cornell at Varsity on Wednesday Jan. 22. Don't miss it—it should be a good one.

Basketball Blues were sloppy but beat Ryerson Rams 81-67

By DAVE STUART

There were many heart-stopping moments at the Benson Building Saturday night before the Blues were finally able to squeeze ahead of a game Ryerson Ram squad to take a close 81-67 win in OUA basketball action.

Blues started the first half with two quick baskets but soon fell behind and played catch up ball for the rest of the half. Ryerson actually led at half time 30-28.

The Blues appeared to be guilty of over-confidence going into the game. They continually passed without looking and as a result gave up the ball on many occasions to an alert Ram player.

Ryerson on the other hand, took advantage of almost every opportunity that the Blues handed them to put points on the board.

Roman Berehulka, a mighty midget, led the Rams with 17 points hitting the basket from outside, inside and anywhere else he chose to shoot from.

The Blues, unfortunately, couldn't hit a cow in the ass with a shovel for the first half at least. When they did shoot, on rare occasions, the shots weren't even close.

Actually the Ryerson defence forced the Blues into a 'let's play catch around the outside' type of offence which usually continued until a bad Blues' pass resulted in a Ryerson break for the Toronto net.

Coach McManus again started the game with the five man squad layout that worked well against Laurier but soon had to abandon the method in order to keep the big guns on the floor.

The second half went much better for the Blues who came out trying after what one presumes was a torrid half time talk from coach McManus.

The Blues ceased their give away offence and began to take advantage of Ryerson's errors. Brian Skyvington began to assert his height advantage to take control in the front areas but offensive rebounding for the Blues is still a weak point.

Skyvington was able to sink several breaks towards the end of the game to edge Glenn Scott for the top scorer honours. Skyvington ran up 24 points while Scott managed 23.

Blues' shooting from the foul line was abominable. Only 17 out of 31 attempts counted. That is 14 easy points lost.

Ryerson lost by a wide margin to the Blues earlier in the season but were full value for the close game Saturday. Blues are going to have to tighten up considerably before meeting some of the better teams in the OUA.

Toronto's next game is Friday Jan. 17 at Ottawa when the Ottawa Gee-Gees are hosts.

The Varsity—Swift Beisy

Over the weekend, the Benson Building staged an invitational basketball tourney. Toronto won over Waterloo, Laurier, Queen's, York Raiders and Hamilton.

Administration zeroes in on discipline

NOW

By BOB ADOURIAN

Governing Council's internal affairs committee decided Monday to appoint a working group to examine the proposed non-academic discipline code in effect meaning the administration is going to move ahead on the discipline issue despite student objections.

The original intention was to have students, faculty and administration in equal numbers involved in the working group. However, the U of T Faculty Association has declined to take part, claiming that it is an issue between students and administration.

Hence the three faculty members on the group will be from the Governing Council, chosen by internal affairs chairman Bill Whelton.

There will also be two administrators and five students on the group.

The Students' Administrative Council and the Association of Part-Time University Students are to choose the students on the group.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch, who attended the Monday meeting, objected to the use of the 'Conway-Caderio' code as a frame of reference.

He said the administration had forced internal affairs to start with the code although student consensus has condemned it as overly punitive.

Kanowitch maintained the code would "make minor offences, such as returning a library book late, into a criminal offence," and "safeguard the decision-making process" in the hands of the administration.

He said the right way to approach the issue would be to admit that "we are no farther along the way to settling the discipline issue than we were in 1967."

Kanowitch's comment that the discipline code must deal with the reasons for broad-based dissent was buried in the subsequent discussion.

Ian Tate, a Governing Council alumni representative who voted against the formation of the working group, told the meeting: "If we accept these terms of reference and SAC doesn't approve of them, it will be a waste of time."

The group will report on its progress to the next internal affairs committee meeting Feb. 19.

Would horse (bottom) and policeman (top) be called on campus under new discipline code?

PREVIOUSLY

By BOB BETTSON

The U of T administration is trying to bring back a tough non-academic code of behavior which was delayed last year because of massive student opposition.

The committee to study the question of non-academic discipline will begin with consideration of the non-academic code which was rejected last year.

The discipline issue has been a subject of controversy since 1968. Inspired by the demonstrations and disruptions of the late 60s in the United States, U of T administrators started agitating for discipline procedures to contain dissent.

It was recognized the Caput, which included only administrators and no students or faculty members, was illegitimate in the eyes of most students as the campus disciplinary body.

The response to the first discipline 'crisis' in 1969 was the setting up of a parity committee which produced a liberal document called the Campbell report.

The Campbell report recommended non-violent but disruptive demonstrations be recognized and that substantive demands be dealt with in negotiations.

It also saw increased student participation in university decision-making and operational agreement between students and professors in the classrooms as prerequisites for an adequate disciplinary system.

The report was scuttled by conservative faculty members because of its radical implications.

In 1972 the question was revived after the successful occupation by a large number of students of the Simcoe Hall administration building to demand free stack access to the new Roberts library.

A student was enlisted to help bring in harsh new procedures and the Conway-Cadario code was drafted, named after engineer student Paul Cadario and U of T vice-president Jill Conway.

The new code's academic recommendations were generally accepted, but the non-academic code dealt with numerous offences which are legal under civil law as well as banning disruptive demonstrations.

Among the alarming offenses were:

- furnishing false information to the university;
- use the university name without permission;
- breaking library regulations;
- damaging any university documents;
- selling a term paper
- disobeying a lawful order from a university body or officer;
- conspiring to commit any offence under the code.

Students were also upset at the potential for selective prosecution because the prosecution would be administration controlled. The spectre of double jeopardy with offences under the criminal code was also raised.

Although both academic and non-academic sections of the code were passed in June, 1973 while students were away, opposition from all student organizations finally pressured the Governing Council to delay implementation.

A number of bitter Governing Council meetings were held to discuss the code and administrators gradually backed down from implementation. Over 3,000 students signed petitions opposing the code and every student society on campus joined in opposition to it.

Negotiations began in January and working agreement was made on a non-academic code. But the non-academic code remained a subject of bitter debate.

U of T administrators and faculty members supported the code because of its potential use to stifle dissent. The "law and order" adherents were the first to call for the code after the 'Banfield incident' in March when members of the Students for a Democratic Society stopped Professor Edward Banfield from speaking on campus because of his "racism."

The two SOS students blamed for the disruption were tried by the Caput which revealed its obsolescence under the glaring lights of television. The six-week trial was a circus with all the cards stacked against the defendants; the convictions were a foregone conclusion.

Food prices up at Hart House

By GILLIAN MacKAY

Coffee, milk and donuts took a five cent price jump at Hart House this month but the Hart House management says it anticipates no further increases until the summer.

Coffee is up to 20 from 15 cents while milk and donuts have gone to 25 from 20 cents.

"These seemed to be the things which hadn't had an increase in a long time," Hart House food services director Rosemary Bolitho explained.

Higher labor costs have affected Hart House as the food staff received a 20 per cent increase in salary from July to November of last year. Supplies — cream, cups, sticks and sugar, in particular — are also now costing more to obtain, Bolitho pointed out.

"We have not noticed any great customer resistance at all," Bolitho said. "In a way it's sad, but the situation is inevitable and people know they have to go along with it."

Prices went into effect Jan. 2 at Hart House's Harbour Room, Tuck Shop and Great Hall.

Other university cafeterias reflect the same pattern. At the Trinity College Buttery, coffee and tea went up to 20 cents this week, while at St. Michael's College they have been at that price since last September. "Sweet nectar, never again shalt thou touch my lips". But I can't be impoverished divinity student dash his empty cup to the ground and cry, "Sweet nectar, never again shalt thou touch my lips". But I can't be thought I saw an impassioned and sure.)

Frankly, Hart House food prices are heating up.

This is a hard one to swallow

GLENWOOD, Iowa (CUP) — Shades of Solzhenitsyn! What aren't prisoners in the U.S. doing today to get attention.

Seems a 24-year-old prisoner here made a sword from the steel arch support in the sole of his shoe and swallowed it when he was caught attempting to escape.

Dr. Rafael Foure, Mills County medical examiner, said the blade had passed through the young man's stomach and was still moving through his 28 feet of intestines into the large bowel when doctors were contacted.

Jack Levendowsky was being held for possession of a stolen car when he attempted his desperate escape act.

Local Sheriff Mel Brown's only comment was: "I can't imagine why he tried to swallow it."

Humanities, social sciences urged for environment institute

By MATHILDE VERHULST
More effective involvement of the social sciences and humanities in U of T's environmental studies programs is strongly recommended by an Advisory Committee on Academic Planning (ACAP) report published last month.

The report, one of a series of disciplinary planning studies carried out by ACAP for the Council of Ontario Universities (COU), proposes U of T's Institute of Environmental Studies continue to develop "an integrated master's degree program" in environmental studies.

The report supports the development of the program "provided... there is a substantial admixture of social science, and if possible, humanities, components."

Last year the institute changed its name from the Institute for Environmental Sciences and Engineering to the Institute for Environmental Studies (IESE) because closer relations were established with a number of faculties and departments in the social sciences.

IESE chairman Kenneth Hare said, however, he has encountered difficulties in initiating more active involvement of social scientists and humanities professors within the university.

He stressed the importance of cooperation between the various disciplines in environmental research studies.

"I'm getting to know better the key figures in the social sciences, identifying the problems of common concern and suggesting cooperation" between departments, he said.

The institute has also set up a study group called the Environmental Impact Appraisal group to attract the interest of the social sciences and humanities.

The study group, whose meetings are open to undergraduate and graduate students as well as professional civil servants and others interested in environmental problems, is set up jointly with York University's Faculty of Environmental Studies.

York's environmental programs, Hare noted, are "more social science oriented" than U of T's.

Another step Hare said he has taken to involve the social sciences and humanities is to set up more in-depth studies into "environmental and resource policy." This facet of environmental research, he added, should be of particular interest because "social scientists are interested in public policy."

Hare said one resource problem in discussion at IESE is world food scarcities. He has written to faculty members in various departments to "find out who in the university is involved in these areas."

The study of the environment and natural resources, Hare pointed out, "does not fall into any one discipline, it includes the social sciences too."

In relation to the world food problem Hare said, research "involves economists, psychiatrists, sociologists, chemists, anthropologists and geographers at one time or another."

The master's program, still only under preliminary formulation, has met opposition from some corners of the university, Hare said.

One reason for opposing the program, Hare said, was the opinion that master's degrees should be handled by departments only, and that the institute itself should not confer degrees.

Another reason, he said, was "the anxiety" felt in some university quarters over "whether there is a job market" in Canada for environmentalists with MAs.

Hare called this a good reason for opposing the program at IESE, but added, "There are literally hundreds of civil servants, people in industry, media people in mature life" who are returning to university to pursue environmental studies at the graduate level.

Hare supports the development of a master's degree program at IESE for mature students "who already have specialist training." But, he said, "it shouldn't be restricted to mature students only."

He added, however, "the unemployable graduate student is a sad sight".

The job market situation "of this kind is much better in the United States," he said, referring to an "environmental appraisal policy" attached to every large government project in the U.S. (This has created many employment opportunities for environmental specialists there.)

If Canada "adopts the same law," Hare said, "a market will emerge."

IESE is not a separate department of U of T. "It is," Hare said, "an interdisciplinary research institute" and hopes to maintain this form because "the people needed (in environmental research) are different for every problem." Hare stressed the need, therefore of "a loose structure."

When asked what financial commitments U of T is making to the institute, Hare said it has received a $100,000 budget increase over last year.

He said IESE is currently operating on a budget of $425,000, about $225,000 of which comes from the university and the rest from federal government research funds.

The institute's budget, Hare stressed, is considerably smaller than those other university departments operate on.

IESE was created by the School of Graduate Studies. Its teaching has up to now consisted of courses designed to prepare students trained in specialist disciplines to do interdisciplinary work on environmental problems.

The institute does not itself register students, although about 30 to 40 graduate students from various departments work regularly with the institute.

Institute director Kenneth Hare faces problems expanding program.

Metro council reelects Godfrey: fans go wild

By IAN MacMILLAN

In the surprise of the century, Paul Godfrey was yesterday reelected as Metro Council chairman for a second term.

The $45,000 a year post, the most important in Metro government, involves initiating and co-ordinating various projects around Metro.

In the first Metro Council meeting of the year and the new term, Godfrey won out over John Sewell, Dan Heap and Michael Goldrick, who received votes only from each other, the final vote being 32-3 for Godfrey.

In his opening remarks, Godfrey mentioned some of the expected developments of council for the coming two years such as: five new police stations and one new sports stadium; two waste recycling plants and a new Crown corporation for recycling; an incentive allowance for students returning to high school and the first "Metro Plan" for future city design.

Discussing the Toronto Transit Commission (TTC) Godfrey mentioned that City Council would have to aggressively encourage city development to keep the TTC economically viable.

Council also voted on the Metro appointment to the police commission. The nominees were former policemen Harrison and Bill Flynn and aldermen Dan Heap, and Tony O'Donoghue, back on council after his mayoral defeat two years ago.

Although O'Donoghue made firm commitments to stepping up the war on narcotics, most of council voted for the ex-cops, with Harrison winning on the second ballot.

Star employees accept management wage offer

Toronto Star employee studies the company's final contract offer Sunday evening as almost 2,000 Star workers packed into the King Edward Hotel's ball room and after heated arguments and speeches voted to accept the offer. Despite a strong minority's urging to accept the Toronto Newspaper Guild's Star unit's call for strike action, senior editorial writers Mark Gayn and Robert Nielson were in the vanguard of the speakers opposed to going out on strike.

The Toronto Citizen is withdrawing its request for a $1,000 grant from the Students Administrative Council.

The community paper, which ceased publication in September, was recently purchased by a group headed by former Toronto alderman Karl Jaffary. SAC had agreed tentatively to grant the new owners $1,000.

In a letter to SAC external affairs commissioner Susan Rich, Citizen staffer Art Moses said the new ownership has not yet had time to establish a corporate structure with guidelines for potential investors.

SAC had planned to deal with the grant at tonight's meeting, but Moses said the method of participation could not be specified so the request will be withdrawn.

The grant had caused controversy because SAC was giving money to an outside group.

The U of T library is spending $105,000 a year flashing all the lights on and off to warn students the library is closing each night.

The surge of power required for the dimming is $50 a time according to highly-placed sources. Since the lights are switched on and off six times per night, the cost would be $2,100 a week or $105,000 a year, allowing two weeks vacation.

This is enough to pay for the entire budget of the interdisciplinary studies department, threatened with extinction by budget cuts.

Someone's got his priorities screwed up somewhere.

What do you and the fat boy have in common?

Well, among other things, neither of you has ever written for The Varsity before. And seeing as how the tiny perfect master is just up to his halo in speaking engagements, portfolio investments and communion with the almighty, it looks like it's up to you to saunter into our offices and take up the cudgel of the people's right to know. That's right, you can become a perfect master of the divine art of news writing, as practised by an obscure sect of cynics in the twentieth century. It'll bliss you right out.

All you have to do to get involved is send a certified cheque for $100 to cover expenses to our 91 St. George St, 2nd floor temple of truth. Better still, if you show up here in person, you don't even have to bring the money. Just lay your soul on the line. Sinking ship theorists stink

It was Karl Marx who suggested to us that ideas had their origins in class conflict. It is not surprising, then, to read that a group of American scientists has explicitly represented the status quo by advancing the idea that a life saved in the Third World is a reduction of the living standard of a life in the advanced capitalist countries. (Front page, Toronto Star, Jan. 11, '75). Foreign aid, this group suggests, must be reduced or stopped.
 First of all, foreign aid has never been given by the government corporations of one country to the governments/corporations of another as an unattached, humanitarian investment. Aid is given by governments in order to secure economic returns and in order to penetrate strategic areas. This aid is also offered after centuries of colonialization in which the wealth of many Third World countries was plundered by the very nations which now offer this assistance.

Professor Hardin of California, a member of this group of scientists which compares America to a sinking ship, has stated that the U.S. was motivated by strategic considerations in increasing its aid to Syria and decreasing its aid to India. Canada's participation in the blockade of Chile during the Allende years is an indication of our own government's dirty hands. This, and involvement in Vietnam, South Africa, the Caribbean (already documented in the Varsity and other journals.)

In short, the process of transferring wealth from the hinterland to the metropolis — often under the guise of aid — is the historical pattern of Third World underdevelopment. One must ask why it is that for every dollar the capitalist world sinks into the Third World, the former receives substantial returns. Hence, underdeveloped in the latter.

For their own reasons, Hardin and his colleagues do not discuss the liberating potential of science and technology in the Third World. They are interested in a science which — in answer to movements against the repressive regimes of the Third World — will "find operational answers to terrorism" (Hardin: The Star, Jan. 11 '75).

It is not difficult, in this time of repression, to see the correlation between a failing economy and its prevalent ideologies. Again, working people are being injected with the old myth that the immigrants are to blame for recession. Mysticism and cultism — the cultivation of alienation — have taken an upward swing.

Hardin has formulated his theory on the premise that life in the Third World is cheap and that there is too much of it. As university students, we must counter with the argument that it is essentially a problem of the distribution of the world's resources that we face. Not only must we recognize the nature of government aid, but question inequality itself. The result of allowing the legitimating ideologies of inequality to go unchallenged is summed up well by the French student movement of 1968:

"The incoherence of the criticism is the basis of the coherence of the repression."

Finally it was Brecht who told us that no one stands above politics.

Civil service exam was sexist

We would like to bring attention to the blatant sexism recently demonstrated by the Canadian Civil Service in its annual recruitment examination held in Toronto.

A section comprising approximately more than 20 percent of the examination of 155 questions was devoted to a memory-testing exercise of which the format was quite routine for this type of examination: the applicant was to concentrate on a passage of four small paragraphs for twelve minutes, attempting to memorize all the minute details. Then, after completing another unrelated section of the exam, the potential recruit was to fill in some thirty odd blanks for words and numbers deleted from the memory passage.

There was one hitch: the passage recounted in tedious detail a particular day in the military life of a Canadian division (or was it a brigade?) during the WWI campaign preceding Passchendaele. The characters involved were a Major-General (?) MacBrien, General (?) Currie, another General (or something) Plumer, not to mention the 3rd Division, the 465th Brigade (?), the 7th and 8th Brigades, flanks of this and battalions of that. It sounds muddled — and indeed was so in my mind and others' minds also — not so much because of a bad memory as a very fuzzy idea of what all this military jargon represented.

It is our opinion that even a very general acquaintance with military terminology might have helped in retaining some of the details of that passage, where memory failed, common sense would have sufficed.

We feel that perhaps one particular segment of society might have had one less hurdle to overcome in tackling that glorious day of military exploit and committing it to memory . . .

Toronto exiles stay put, despite clemency program

By BOB COLLIER

Only two weeks remain for draft dodgers to apply for President Gerald Ford's clemency program, but nobody is packing.

In spite of a mass publicity campaign in the United States urging draft evaders and deserters to turn themselves in, less than 2 percent of those involved are taking up Ford's offer.

"The overwhelming majority of draft dodgers in Toronto support our boycott," said Gerry Condon of Amex, a Toronto organization which counsels draft resisters and publishes Amex Magazine.

Condon said the clemency program is punitive and refuses to settle for anything less than complete and unconditional amnesty.

Spokesmen for the other two Metro draft resister counselling organizations, Toronto American Exiles and the Toronto Anti-Draft Program, support Condon wholeheartedly.

Apparently, less than 1,000 draft dodgers and deserters have applied for clemency, even though more than 200,000 men have been charged with violations of various sorts and thousands more expect to be. About 25,000 of them live in Canada.

Condon estimated about 200,000 violators are underground in the U.S. and several thousand more hide from Canadian immigration authorities. They can't hold a job for long without being caught, so they drift about working at odd jobs when they can.

Sweden is now closed to these draft evaders and the new Canadian immigration laws force all negotiations for landed immigrant status to be made from within the States, which is exceedingly difficult.

If the evaders decide to turn themselves in, they must return to their home district, sign a loyalty oath and admit their guilt. This waives all rights to a trial.

Then, they pledge to do the two years of alternative service which is the fundamental part of the clemency program. The offender can find his own job and submit it for approval, but it must satisfy three strenuous requirements:

- The job must not be competitive.
- In a country with its present unemployment rate, this is a laughable demand," Condon says.

- The job must be in the national service. This can lead to any number of interpretations.

- The offender must take the lowest legal pay, $2.25 an hour, however difficult or unpleasant the job and even if he is married with children.

When the alternative service has been completed, a clemency discharge is awarded. Condon notes that this is equivalent to a life sentence since no veteran benefits are given and the stigma can prevent the man from ever obtaining a decent job.

Concessions are made for mitigating circumstances but experience has shown that conscientious objection evokes no sympathy. Medals and wounds are rewarded but only a deserter from active service could qualify.

If a draft evader feels that he must return, Condon advises, he would fare better to ignore Ford's program.

Lewis rejects post of Concordia vice-rector

MONTREAL (CUP) — Former NDP leader David Lewis has declined an offer to become vice-rector of Concordia University in Montreal.

Lewis, contacted at his office at Carleton University in Ottawa, said that he was telephoned "a couple of times" by someone on the search committee but declined to say who it was.

"I told them I'm sorry but I couldn't consider it," Lewis said. Assistant to the rector and secretary of the search committee Michael Sheldon said that he would make "absolutely no comment on something which I know nothing about."

Jack Bordan, the present vice-rector whose term will end in June is planning to stand for re-appointment.

Lewis is a visiting fellow in the Institute of Canadian Studies at Carleton University and is also teaching and giving seminars in the political science department.

THE BUDGET AND

By GENE ALLEN

"No one is talking about reduction in quality. I reject that categorically. I think we all have to be satisfied that there are ways and means within the constraints of achieving the same objective. I think in fairness the universities have made substantial progress. Perhaps there are some further things that they might do internally. I don't know." (Bill Davis, in the Ontario Legislature, Nov. 22, 1974.)

and managerial training universities could provide. The university system remains a vital link in the economic system, but unfortunately — as executives of General Motors would be the first to point out — these days our good old self-regulating economy is suffering from a serious case of irregularity.

As the economic situation deteriorates, and business expansion comes to a halt, there is both declining demand for new trained personnel, and less money available to invest in such Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, a 1 percent increase).

The budget did not take academic and non-academic salary increases into account; but by leaving a surplus of $8 million, it ensured that any salary increases of over 7 percent would require the university to incur a deficit. All these problems were compounded when the provincial government increased support to Ontario universities by only 7.4 per cent and not by 9 percent as the university had assumed. Faced with the prospect of an immediate deficit, the university recalled the divisional budgets (which had already been recommended for approval by the Budget Committee) in order to effect further economies.

These final, revised budgets have not yet been completed, so detailed information about just what cutbacks will be made is not available. Divisional heads, however, agree on a number of areas in which it is highly probable that budget restrictions will affect teaching and research.

"The Provincial Treasurer said last Thursday that he would prefer the universities not to incur deficits. Our only alternatives for 1975-76 are: dismissal of staff, or very low salary increases."

(U of T President John Evans in a speech to the Canadian Club, Dec. 2, 1974).

Perhaps most obvious will be the effects on laboratory-oriented courses in medicine, engineering, and science.

MEDICINE

Dr. Jan Steiner, who is responsible for planning in the U of T medical school, said that if the financial problems continue for several years, "the effects will be so far-reaching as to be incalculable". The immediate effects in 1976-76 will be "subtle", he said, but will have a "domino effect on the quality of undergraduate education."

The faculty of medicine, faced with a budget cut of $247,000, must obviously reduce expenses. The priorities it has set for doing so are typical of those established by other academic divisions.

Academic programs and teaching staff are to be left untouched as far as possible. Non-academic staff and physical plant expenses will in all cases be cut first.

"Next year we will be faced with a reduction in support rather than a reduction in programs", Steiner said. "But this will have a definite effect on academic undertakings. For example, the faculty will reduce its support for animal services. This means that costs which were previously borne by the faculty of medicine will have to be paid by the researcher. Researchers will need more money. If the extra money they need is not forthcoming, research will have to be curtailed."

In the past, costs of audio-visual programs and reprints of syllabus material were paid for in part out of the dean's supplies budgets. These budgets will be cut and services such as self-study laboratories will suffer. "If the supplies budget is cut from $30,000 to $20,000, we'll just have to turn down one-third of the requests for audio-visual shows and reprints we get", Steiner said.

But Steiner's greatest concern is that there will have to be reductions in course offerings and teaching appointments if the present trend continues over a period of several years.

"We'll have to do everything we can to avoid dropping courses. Increasing the staff-student ratio is also undesirable. I just don't know the answer. How do you maintain quality with a reduced budget?"

ENGINEERING

Similar problems are being felt elsewhere. Ben Etkin, dean of the engineering school, said "There will be a reduction in total academic and non-academic staff. Positions that fall empty due to resignations and retirements will stay empty. Normally, anyone who resigned or retired would be replaced. There will also be a reduction in support staff—secretaries, lab technicians, and workshop technicians. This is bound to have an adverse effect on undergraduate engineers."

Class sizes may double in some cases, Etkin said, where a course previously divided into two sections is reduced to one section. The increased teaching load will make it more difficult for instructors to supervise individual projects undertaken by students in upper years.

The budget restrictions will also be felt in the area of supplies and equipment. "The ability to give students hands-on experience with up-to-date,

A pensive premier ponders the fate of culture . . .

When sales of color televisions and Cadillacs decline, the education industry follows close behind. The university budget for 1975-76 is tighter at the seams than a two-quart wineskin filled with three quarts of wine. The effects of the budget situation will be more obvious in some areas and more subtle in others, but everyone will be affected in one way or another.

Engineering and science students will be faced with visible shortages and inadequacies in supplies and equipment. Arts students will find larger classes and a reduction in available courses. Researchers will be expected to come up with money to pay for services previously provided by the university. Campus workers will have a hard time convincing the administration to give them decent wage increases. There may be layoffs of non-academic staff.

Large quantities of spleen have recently been vented on the provincial government, which, since it supplies universities with about eighty per cent of their revenue, is held responsible for the current problems. But accusing the provincial government of philistinism, of a Scrooge's penny-pinching inability to appreciate the Finer Things involved in higher education, is missing the point. The university's financial problems exist in the context of a general economic malaise.

The enormous growth of government support for post-secondary education during the 1960's was the expression of a conscious policy. In a time of economic expansion, commerce and industry needed people with the kind of technical training. The present situation has been developing since 1971. U of T's budget has not increased since then (if inflation and enrolment increases are taken into account). But 1975-76 is the first time a deficit is expected, variously estimated at between one and three million dollars.

"I don't think deficits are the answer in the university community. I think the answer lies in increasing the staff-student ratio, as indeed the Premier pleaded with them to do six or eight years ago. At that time the staff-student ratio was one to 14. When I took over that Ministry, it was one to 12.9. That's not my idea of progress in that area." (Ontario Treasurer John White, in the legislature, Nov. 28, 1974).

Everyone had been aware that 1975-76 would be a year in which inflation would continue to affect prices and wages, and also that provincial austerity was certain to continue. The powerful university Budget Committee (which continues to deliberate in secret, and keeps its reports on the university's finances confidential) recommended a tight budget based on the assumption that government support would increase by 9 percent. This budget recommended substantial reductions in some divisional budgets (a $200,000 cut for the Faculty of Medicine, a $150,000 cut for the Faculty of Education) and otherwise increases which were insufficient to keep up with an 11.6 percent inflation rate (Faculty of Arts & Science, a 1.2 percent increase; technologically—current equipment is essential to a quality education," Etkin said. "But with the present situation we are unable even to maintain the equipment we now have, much less keep up with new developments. Our budget only provides one-third of the amount we need for repair and replacement of equipment."

Furthermore, Etkin believes there may be cutbacks in innovative programs of instruction within the engineering school. A program undertaken in co-operation with the geology department in geological engineering will not be able to develop as planned since there is no money to make necessary staff appointments. An evening course allowing practising engineers to work toward the Master of Engineering degree, which Etkin described as a "growing and significant program," will be reduced in size.

Some engineering departments already face shortages in basic and essential supplies which will only become more acute next year. W. F.

Graydon, head of chemical engineering, said "We are caught in a cost squeeze that has a particularly bad effect on laboratory courses. You have to have money to buy supplies." Graydon explained that the cost of specialty items such as sulphuric acid, a staple of chemical engineering lab work, is rising much faster than the 10-12 percent annual rate of inflation. "This year we've already had to pay much higher prices than we estimated in this year's budget." While admitting that some economies can be made — such as "modifying experiments so as to avoid the more costly ones" — Graydon emphasizes that "no matter how ingenious you are, you have to have supplies, and you have to have adequate equipment. Many years of this sort of thing can't be withstood."

"We're giving a damned fine education," Etkin concluded. "But it's becoming increasingly difficult to maintain standards. This financial pressure is eroding our standards, there's no doubt about it."

"... post-secondary education institutions within the province... have very little effective control over the financial plight in which they find themselves." (J. R. Breithaupt, in the Ontario Legislature, Nov. 28, 1974).

ARTS

Bob Greene, dean of the faculty of arts and science, identified similar problems. "Taking inflation into account, this is the sixth successive budget cut for the faculty," Greene said. Teaching positions which come open through retirement and resignation will not be filled, which is effectively a cutback in teaching staff. Courses in the sciences will suffer from shortages of supplies and equipment. Non-academic staff may be reduced.

"I'm sure that the budget problems will lead to program changes in many departments," Greene said. "There will probably be a restriction in the number of courses available." Teaching loads will increase as "there is an increased likelihood that teaching at Scarborough and Erindale and Woodsworth will become part of the normal teaching undertaking."

Not only the academic divisions of the university will be affected by budget cuts. The U of T Media Centre, for example, faces a budget cut of $63,000, which is sure to affect the services it offers. Courses as diverse as film study and chemistry rely on media centre productions. All first and second-year chemistry courses, as well as many engineering courses, use videotaped instruction programs rather than demonstrators in lab work. The media centre books films, and provides projectors and other audio-visual equipment for several academic divisions. Doug Todgham, director of the centre, said that during October and November 50 percent of the requests for use of the facilities had to be turned down because demand was much greater than what could be supplied.

The media centre is in a peculiar position in that it could make more money by producing more programming for use outside the university. But given the limitations on equipment and trained personnel, doing more work outside the university will have the same effect as a reduction in service within the university. So there is likely to be a reduction in audio-visual services, but it is difficult to see how these services will be replaced. If, for example, videotaped lab demonstrations can no longer be produced, the departments will have to hire demonstrators out of their own budgets.

Todgham sees little chance of maintaining the present level of service. "We're cut to the bone already," he said,

"and even now we can't meet all our requests. Our maintenance costs can't be cut. Our only choice now is to cut service. One alternative is to increase internal rates (i.e., the rates charged by the media centre to academic divisions within the university). But this would just put a greater strain on the divisional budgets. It seems senseless to have one division of the university paying another for these services."

Despite the bland assurances of the provincial government, then, it is certain that a wide range of university activity will be adversely affected by the budget situation. The problem in the crisis, when it was realized that government support was to increase by less than the assumed level of nine percent, decisions about what steps to take were made in a series of top-level closed meetings.

These meetings were attended by President Evans, Vice-President Forster, and the heads of the academic divisions and departments involved. These meetings were not announced, nor were they reported on. There was no indication that other members of the university community — students, teaching staff, and campus workers for example, all of whom will be directly broadest sense is a result of the present economic organization of society. Since the university has accepted the role of providing expertise and personnel to serve this system, there should be no surprise felt that when the system suffers, the university suffers as well. Academics and students who feel the university should, for whatever reasons, be exempt from the problems of the society it serves fail to realize the university's essentially dependent character. The problem of economic recession in general is a problem of social organization and can only be solved at that level.

Given that, and given the assumption that it is highly unlikely that there will be a major reorganization of society before September, what immediate steps can be taken?

POWER AND BUDGET

Within the university — that is, ignoring the root of the problem — there are actions that can be taken to make the present situation more or less damaging. Budget decisions, through their effects, are in many cases decisions about academic policy. The recent report (Varsity, Jan. 10) that interdisciplinary courses in the faculty of arts and science will have their budgets cut substantially in the coming year is an excellent example of the extent to which budget decisions are actually decisions about academic priorities.

The organization of financial decision-making within the university puts a great deal of power over these decisions in the hands of a small number of administrators. More importantly, deliberations on budgetary matters remain confidential. Thus, in the recent affected — might have any suggestions, or indeed any right to make suggestions about what courses of action to take.

There has been a great deal of talk in recent years about democratizing the university. And sure enough, students have been granted increased representation on various committees (including the budget committee). But current developments indicate that significant power to make decisions effectively remains with the university administration and with the senior academics who control the divisions and departments.

When it comes to deciding what courses are to be cut, what teachers, if any, are to be fired, whether small salary increases and possible strikes are to be preferred over a deficit, we shall see where the real decision-making power rests within the university. Those responsible for budget decisions have the opportunity to show their commitment to a democratic university by actively seeking to involve everyone who will be affected in attempts to deal with the current problems. Their refusal to do so will ensure that proposed solutions will not have the widespread support which is essential if they are to be successful in dealing with the problems which we all will face next year.

"I believe that the figures that we have set for the colleges and universities will be adequate, even if it takes one or two years of deficit financing for the universities to make some of the adjustments that they would have to do, and I think they can do it without decreasing the quality of their programmes." (James Auld, Minister of Colleges and Universities, in the Ontario Legislature, Nov. 28, 1974).

NUS steps up campaign for better student loan plan

OTTAWA (CUP)—The National Union of Students (NUS) campaign for a better Canada Student Loan Plan (CSLP) is in full swing in all parts of the country.

The campaign is working on two levels. Nationally it will try to implement changes in the CSLP and provincially it will push for modifications in student funding plans.

"While NUS is striving for several main policies, the main purpose of the campaign will be to decrease students' financial liabilities by reducing the loan portion and not the grant portion of student assistance programs," said NUS national office staff member Hilda Creswick.

The NUS campaign comes at a crucial time as many provincial education ministers have been discussing increasing the loan ceilings for student aid programs. Also the federal government will be reviewing its entire relationship with CSLP next year.

Another main aim of the NUS campaign will be to push for standardized financial aid programs across the country. Since education is a provincial responsibility, each province sets its own criteria for loans and the amounts of the loans paid out.

The federal government gives out money for the loan portion of a student aid grant while the provinces look after the bursary portion.

The NUS campaign is being run at the campus level. The main policies of the campaign, financing, and timetabling—were decided at a NUS general meeting in October. The individual campus campaigns will be co-ordinated with the NUS National Office in Ottawa.

"The individual campus committees will run the student aid campaign on their campuses. We have to pressure both the federal and provincial governments over the student aid issue, and these committees will be promoting the campaign and at the same time the national Union of Students," Creswick said.

The campus campaign committees will be promoting the campaign through leaflets, posters, pamphlets and symposiums. The NUS national office has distributed posters and various slogans which can be inserted on the posters. The individual campus committees choose the slogan and print the posters.

The committees are also holding benefits to publicize the campaign and to defray the expenses involved. So far NUS has raised about $4,000 from benefits and pledges from individual campuses.

NUS committees have been formed at Simon Fraser University, Capilano College and the British Columbia Institute of Technology in British Columbia. In Alberta the University of Calgary, University of Alberta and the University of Lethbridge have agreed to push the campaign.

In Manitoba all three universities—Brandon, Winnipeg, and Manitoba—have undertaken campaigns to push for changes in the provincial aid program.

In Saskatchewan both the University of Saskatchewan and St. Thomas More have agreed to work on organizing NUS campaign committees.

In Ontario, the Ontario Federation of Students is running an extensive

Concordia sets quota on a admission of foreign students

MONTREAL (CUP)—Concordia University administrators set a quota this month on the number of foreign students admitted to the university in order to avoid the enrolment of an "undesirably large number of foreign students."

The quota represents a change in admission policy and according to Loyola Student Association co-president, Irwin Katsof, it should not have been made without consultation with the senate or student associations.

The administrators did not reveal the decision until they were confronted with a direct question at a senate meeting on Dec. 20.

The question of foreign student admissions was raised by the Loyola Arts and Sciences dean, Russel Breen, who was concerned with the problems caused when there is a "high concentration of foreign students in a class."

However, Breen denied that this was not the main consideration in making the decision.

"January admission was originally intended to take care of students finishing CEGEP in December," Breen said.

More and more foreign students have been applying at mid-year, he said, and as it was not the purpose of the program to admit these students, it is logical to restrict the number of foreign students.

He also said the high number of foreign students could cause "serious problems with the provincial government."

The province has expressed dissatisfaction with the large number of foreign students in the province as the department of education is in effect subsidizing their education. It has been suggested by the department that these students be required to pay the full cost of their education, about $2,000 a year.

The decision to limit the number of foreign students was made when it was discovered that 70 per cent of the applications for admission to Sir George Williams University and 90 per cent of the applicants for January admissions to Loyola College were foreign students.

One Concordia administrator defended the move by saying: "We have to put a limit on the number of foreign students or our capacity would be swamped. We wouldn't have January admission at all except that the CEGEPs turn people out."

"Our purpose is not to admit foreign students but to help CEGEP students," he said.

campaign on student aid programs. NUS campaign committees have also been formed at Lakehead, Carleton and the University of Toronto.

While over 100,000 CEGEP students went on strike in Quebec over the student aid program, NUS has not yet formally approached them in regard to the student aid campaign.

Several of the institutions have been sent information. Quebec does not participate in the CSLP but does receive federal money for student aid. Representatives from Quebec will be invited to the NUS May conference.

NUS plans to continue campus coordinating committees and will decide on further steps.

Downtown action gets LIP help

By LIAM LACEY

Have you been seeking information recently on your rights as a tenant, your landlord's rights, a new building project starting down the street or land title disputes?

Downtown Action, a land ownership research organization that provides information to individuals, community groups and tenants in the city area, can likely help you.

Now working at maximum capacity, the non-profit group employs eight staff plus volunteer help to supply such requested information.

The group, which obtained a Local Initiative Program funding last month, has consolidated on computer printouts the names and owners of nearly 800 private and public companies involved in Toronto's real estate business.

Downtown Action also can provide extensive historical data, information on major developments and weekly listings of property sales in Toronto.

The organization is partially supported by donations and paid research, including work for the city planning department and local television and radio stations.

Originally organized in the summer of 1971 as an Opportunities for Youth project in response to evictions in the south of St. James Town area, the group has had continuous government support until last summer.

While development pressure and the housing shortage create a demand for the group's work in Toronto, they also manage to exchange information and advice with similar organizations in other cities.

Canadian leathers.

All 10 styles of Roots use top-grain hides, finished naturally with no cosmetic cover-ups. The leather pores breathe freely. So do your feet.

Craftsmanship.

Two generations of Canadian shoemakers (a father and four sons) guide production. Good work, much of it still done by hand, is a family tradition.

Cool leather lining.

Soft skins inside give your feet just a little extra cushioning, and since few materials breathe as well as leather, a little extra coolness as well.

Built-in heel support.

A sturdy counter (hidden by the lining at the back of the shoe) helps hold your ankle and helps your Roots hold their shape.

Naturally shaped toes.

Roots' roomy uppers aren't shaped like ordinary shoes. But they are shaped like ordinary feet. Your toes will stay healthfully uncrowded.

Rocker Sole.

Body weight shifts from your heel down the outer side, across to the big toe for lift-off. Roots' sole makes each lift-off less work.

Erindale's entry into OUAA in peril

By DAVE STUART
The Athletic Directorate met in the hallowed halls of Hart House last night to squash, for the second time, Erindale's attempt to nurture support from the UTAA for its attempts to compete in the OUAA circuit.

Last year Erindale applied to the OUAA for member status as a separate entity, but without UTAA support, and with the fact that Erindale is not a degree granting institution, the OUAA declined the application.

Erindale is primarily interested in having a basketball team compete at the intercollegiate level. However, at present, Erindale's basketball team in the interfac first division is only holding second place behind the engineers.

This year, our brothers to the west suggested to Dalt White, head of athletics at U of T, that Erindale join the OUAA cager loop as a second entry representing Varsity.

Perhaps as Ann Hewitt suggested, the team could be called the Varsity Whites.

The technical problems that arise from Erindale's proposal are very complicated. First, the OUAA still does not accept non-degree granting institutions as members, and Toronto has no mechanism for selecting a second team. There are also the expenses involved in outfitting a second team as well as the travel and accommodation costs.

Any student who played for a second team would be ineligible for competition on the first Blues team. Where would the present teams get back-up players to fill in when injuries occur to Varsity players? The best example at hand is the case of the hockey team.

With Ivan McFarlane out with a back injury, Frank Davis has filled in admirably, scoring five goals in three games. If Varsity had a second team, Davis would no doubt be playing for it and would not have been able to help out the Blues.

A second hot item accepted by the directorate was the adoption of a sub-committee's report that training meals should be given last priority in budget considerations.

Only if enough money is available, will training meals be provided to Varsity teams and on an equitable basis among all Varsity teams.

Varsity golf tip no. 2--The grip

By BILL WHITCOMBE

Because it is through the grip that the player has his only contact with the golf club and its action, not enough can be said about the importance of learning and keeping a fundamentally sound grip.

The correct grip will not feel comfortable at first. The position of the hands on the club has such great influence on the direction the ball takes, however, that it is imperative that the player be ever conscious of his hand position through the early stages of learning.

After a few sessions, abetted by a nagging instructor's reminders, the grip will begin to feel natural.

There are three types of grips that are most commonly used:

- (a) the overlapping or Vardon grip;
- (b) the modified baseball or full finger grip; and
- (c) the interlocking grip.

The overlapping grip is used by the vast majority of golfers and is generally the one the beginner should learn to use.

There are many successful players that utilize the other grips, however, and physical differences may demand the use of one of them.

The bigger the hands and the stronger the player, the more reason that the overlapping grip should be used. One finger of the right hand is taken off the club in this grip and it helps to minimize the overpowering effect of a stronger right hand.

Ladies with small hands may be better suited for the interlocking or full finger grip, since it places more fingers on the grip of the club and gives them more strength and club control in the hitting area.

For the same reasons, men with short fat fingers and pudgy hands may well do better with either of the latter two grips.

The left hand should be on the club more firmly for the right-handed player and the right hand should be more firm for the left-handed performer. The fundamentals important in building a sound grip are equally important and the same in all three groups.

For the beginner, the basic position of the hands on the club calls for the back of the left hand to be towards the target and the palm of the right hand facing the target.

The left hand is a combination 'finger palm' grip, while the right hand is exclusively a 'finger' grip.

The simplest method for the beginner to assume the grip for the left hand is as follows:

Place the clubhead flat on the ground directly in front of the left side of the body with a grip of the club resting near the left pants pocket.

Allow the left arm to hang naturally straight down the left side of the body.

Grasp the club with the left hand, the thumb slightly to the right of the top of the grip. The club can then be moved back in front of the player somewhat ahead of the centre of the stance with the end of the grip pointing directly at your left hip pocket.

In placing the right hand on the club, the palm of the right hand must face towards the target, just as if the player were hitting a handball towards the target.

The right hand goes on the club in this position, the club resting exclusively in the fingers, the little finger of the right hand should fit well up on top of the left hand with the left thumb fitting naturally into the groove caused by the lifeline of the right hand.

The little crevice line formed by the thumb and index finger on each hand should point generally to the right ear, if extended in an imaginary line. This line is an important check point for you to follow throughout the learning stages.

The check points and features explained above hold true in all golf grips, with the exception of the overlapping feature of that grip.

In assuming the interlocking grip, you simply interlock the little finger of the right hand with the index finger of the left hand.

In the baseball or full finger grip, all the fingers are full on the club and there is no interlocking or overlapping of fingers.

In all of the three golf grips, however, the pressure points in the fingers are the same.

On the left hand, the last three fingers must be the firmest part of the grip throughout the swing.

In the right hand, the middle and ring fingers of the right hand exert more pressure on the club than on the other fingers.

The club should be held firmly enough in the left hand to keep the right hand from overpowering it. The hands must grip the club firmly, but not so firmly so as to restrict natural wrist action.

It has been said by many that your hands should grip the club as if you were holding a small bird—firm enough to keep it from escaping, but not so hard as to hurt it.

As an added dimension, the hands should grip the club far enough down the shaft so that about 1/4 to 1/2 inch of the grip would extend beyond the base of the palm of the heel of the left

This insures a full bearing of the hands on the grip and affords more positive control with the hands.

Generally speaking, grips fall into 'strong' or 'weak' category. The more the hands are moved to the right with the right hand moving under the grip, the stronger the grip becomes and the more conducive it is to hooked or pulled shots to the left of the target.

The more the hands are moved to the left with the left hand working under the club, the weaker the grip and the more the inclination for beginners to hit the ball to the right and to slice the shot.

Ladies generally would hold the club in a slightly stronger position than men, simply because they are not normally strong enough to hold the club in a weak position and still control it through the hitting area.

A final word of caution on the grip: Nearly all beginners grasp the club too much in the palm of the right hand and the hand creeps more underneath the grip with the palm facing up.

This is probably the most universal grip breakdown, and you are urged to constantly remind yourself of the importance of the club resting in the fingers in that hand with the palm facing towards the intended target. Imagine you are going to shake hands and you will be on the right track.

THE Varsity

TORONTO

Vol. 95, No. 42
Fri. Jan. 17, 1975

The Varsity Review Cabbage Seal of Approval laurels the beanery which takes up where Escoffier leaves off. Blue-plate winners are on pages 8 and 9.

Radio Varg reprieved

By BOB BETTSON

Radio Varsity will continue to broadcast under an interim board of directors and a temporary station co-ordinator, it was decided at the SAC general meeting Wednesday.

What was billed as a battle over the future of the radio station, which has been beset by internal feuding, turned out to be a relatively quiet debate presided over by master of ceremonies Michael Sabia, SAC communication commissioner.

Cracking jokes like an after-dinner speaker, Sabia proposed four motions which were passed almost unanimously, first to accept manager Paul Murton's resignation and then to set up an interim board with Brad Reed acting as station co-ordinator.

Murton came in for a great deal of praise from a number of sources as most speakers blamed the internal dissension at the station on problems which have accumulated during the last five years.

The villain was painted as an executive which Sabia charged was "irresponsible" and "made a conscious decision to make life difficult for Paul."

The move to put the station under an interim board until the question of the FM licence is decided was compared by Sabia to putting it into receivership.

Sabia rejected the alternative of shutting down the station because of the potential loss of staff members and service to listeners. He said there would be only a minimal saving involved in closing the station.

SAC decided Wednesday to protest the setting up of a sub-committee on discipline without representative faculty members.

The U of T Faculty Association has refused to sit on the committee.

The students' council decided to appoint two members to the committee but instructed president Seymour Kanowitch to write a letter to internal affairs chairman Bill Welton protesting the selection of faculty members by Welton.

SAC will also protest the narrow guidelines for the committee which restrict it to consideration of the 'Conway-Cadario' code which was rejected last year.

Kanowitch cautioned SAC members not to expect much of the committee.

The opposition to Sabia's motions was spearheaded by St. Michael's College SAC rep Jim O'Keefe who said the station was only benefitting a few listeners and the 100 staff members.

One SAC rep proposed more station representation on the six-member board. The board includes four SAC appointees, the station co-ordinator and a staff representative.

The board picked by SAC includes finance commissioner Craig Barnard, engineering student Martin Bain, commerce and finance student Wes Brown and Bill Somerville from the U of T Media Centre.

Station program director Bill Denning said Radio Varsity does have some good programming and a "listenership. He said closing the station would destroy what they have at present.

Rick Outerbridge, a member of the three-man commission on the station, said shutting it down would prejudice chances of getting an FM licence.

Sabia's statements on Murton were echoed by SAC president Seymour Kanowitch and commissioner Paul Carson. Both said Murton had faults but had not been given a chance to succeed by the executive.

Later a station staffer commented to The Varsity the meeting had "whitewashed" Murton.

Reed, the new station co-ordinator, will work closely with the board. He has been involved with the station for several years and has worked since October as advertisement salesman.

One commissioner, Ontario Young Progressive Conservative president John Tory, could not attend the meeting. He is in Brussels at a "leaders of Tomorrow" conference.

Erindale non-smokers can breathe easy

By MARINA STRAUSS

Students and faculty members at Erindale College can no longer smoke during classes in college lecture and seminar rooms.

The Erindale College Council voted unanimously on a motion at its Dec. 16 meeting to ban smoking in classrooms starting in the new term.

"The ban was precipitated by a half dozen genuine complaints by students to the principal," explained Lois Seppala, assistant to Erindale principal Edward Robinson.

"This year, especially in the first term, we got many complaints from students who couldn't stand the smoke during classes anymore because of their allergies," Seppala noted.

Seppala pointed to one woman student in particular who came to the principal in mid-November with "quite a serious complaint — her eyes were watering during classes and the smoke was really affecting her."

"We made some inquiries with the health centre and found it had confronted similar problem cases," Seppala said.

Although the formal motion states smoking should "not be permitted in seminar and lecture rooms," Seppala stressed. "If a person is determined to smoke, we can't force him not to — there's no penalty for smoking."

"But most people seem to be really good about it so far," she hastened to add.

She noted in a third year history course she takes with about 10 other students, most of whom smoke, by the second class of the term, when everyone was acquainted with the new rule, no one smoked.

Erindale College registrar James Rae, who is the college council secretary, wrote a letter Jan. 6 to all Erindale faculty members saying, in part:

"I was duly instructed by council to solicit your co-operation in carrying out this (no-smoking) injunction, and in most cases the absence of ashtrays and a reminder from the person in charge of the class should be sufficient.

"The primary purpose of this rule is the comfort and health of non-smokers. In two-hour sessions it is suggested that an intermission of 10 minutes be introduced so that smokers can retire to indulge their habit."

Seppala suggested the recent complaints about smoking were generated because "There's been so much publicity lately from non-smokers about the annoyance of having smoke blown into their faces. People are ready to speak out."

Meanwhile, on the main St. George campus, there have been no moves afoot to ban smoking in classrooms.

Faculty of arts and science dean Bob Greene noted: "Many of the buildings have fire regulations which ban smoking, but people don't observe these regulations."

Greene said last academic year "two or three students made very strong complaints to (assistant) dean (J. E.) Cruise about people smoking in classes, but that was the extent of our concern with the problem."

The dean added there is no central body with the power to make regulations about smoking in the main campus' arts and science faculty.

"The only channel through which people can bring it up is through those responsible for the various buildings," Greene said.

Seppala suggested that Erindale College's informal structure facilitates students to bring such complaints to those in the position of power.

"Here you can just walk into the principal's office and say: 'Look, could you do something for me,'" Seppala noted.

Unsuspecting SAC president Seymour Kanowitch — a non-smoker — when notified about the smoking ban at Erindale, said students have not approached council to urge it to campaign for no smoking in St. George Campus classes.

"Smokers would go squirrely," Kanowitch said.

Academic affairs chairman bows out 'errors of judgment'

By EDWARD LARY

Governing Council's academic affairs committee won't have John Dove to kick around much longer.

Dove is resigning from Governing Council at the conclusion of the first year of his three-year term and says he won't seek re-appointment as chairman of academic affairs next year.

Academic affairs is the committee which makes recommendations to Governing Council on such items as hiring procedure for academic staff and the composition of tenure committees.

It is comprised of seven student representatives and 11 faculty members with the remaining seven seats divided among non-academic staff (two), alumni (three) and government appointees (two).

Dove said his "two years as chairman of a Governing Council committee" (he has served in the position since July, 1973) is enough for any man and that "the time has come to go back to my academic responsibilities." He is a chemistry professor.

He added that despite the "tremendous work load" placed upon him as committee chairman, he looks forward to finishing out the year and has "no complaints with the way the committee has run so far."

But if Dove has no complaints about the committee, at least two student committee members have complaints about Dove.

Graduate student governor Vern Copeland, an academic affairs rep, said Dove has a tendency to run roughshod over proper meeting procedures in his rulings "often in favor of faculty members."

Copeland cited half a dozen instances where he felt Dove had committed "errors of judgement" in rules of order, to the detriment of student members of the committee.

The Varsity—Mike Cowger

Few student politicians seem distressed about John Dove's upcoming departure.

When asked about these occasions, Dove responded that Copeland was new to the committee and unfamiliar with the "relatively informal type of meetings" where "the chairman conducts the meeting on the assumption that everyone is fairly friendly and one doesn't always have to go by the rules."

He added that Governing Council regulations contain different rules of order than those to which Copeland, who is also a Toronto Board of Education trustee, may be accustomed.

Gord Barnes, another academic affairs student member, said he doesn't share Dove's "fairly friendly" feelings.

He believed the relationship between faculty and student members on academic affairs has polarized since an October vote when the committee narrowly accepted a recommendation that students should have no voting representation on departmental tenure committees.

Barnes' thoughts on chairman Dove?

"I don't think he takes student opinion very seriously. As he understands the university, faculty members should be running it.

Do You Know Any Outstanding Teachers???

1975 OCUFA Teaching Awards

Each year the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations identifies a number of outstanding teachers in the universities of Ontario. These teachers are presented with citations at the OCUFA spring conference. If you have had such an outstanding teacher recently, we would like to hear about it. Please note the following guidelines for submission of nominations.

CATEGORIES

Teaching, in the context of the OCUFA Awards, need not be narrowly defined. Proficiency in teaching may extend beyond the lecture hall, the seminar room, the laboratory or the faculty member's office. Activities including a number of those sometimes classified as administrative services—e.g., course design, curriculum development, organization of co-operative teaching programs, thesis supervision—and other significant forms of leadership are often important contributions to the instructional process. Those who excel in any of these are eligible for the OCUFA Teaching Awards.

NOMINATIONS

Are invited from individuals, informal groups of faculty or students, or both, and such organizations as local faculty associations, faculty or college councils, university committees concerned with teaching and learning, local student councils, departments, alumni, etc.

CRITERIA

No standard form of submission is required, but sponsors should provide as much evidence in support of the nomination as will make it clear that outstanding work deserving of recognition has been done.

PROCEDURE

Letters of nomination, with supporting documentation, should be sent to:

Dr. S.F. Gallagher
Chairman
OCUFA Committee on Teaching Awards
40 Sussex Avenue
Toronto M5S 1J7

The deadline for receipt of nominations is: March 15, 1975

Something to "cheers" about:

Now the glorious beer of Copenhagen is brewed right here in Canada. It comes to you fresh from the brewery. So it tastes even better than ever. And Carlsberg is sold at regular prices.

So let's hear it, Carlsberg lovers. "One, two, three... Cheers!"

Ethnic press reps say U of T too isolated

It was a meeting which should have ushered in 1965 rather than 1975, as top U of T administrators sat down with representatives of the "visible minority press" at Hart House Wednesday evening with eager looks of "tell us what you want" on their faces.

The meeting was called by presidential human rights adviser Daniel Hill — who explained the "visible minority press" refers to the Asian, black and native peoples media — to establish an ongoing connection between U of T and the ethnic community.

Hill, a former human rights commissioner for Ontario, was appointed last fall as a special advisor to U of T president John Evans on human rights.

Hill's appointment followed an especially embarrassing summer for the university, which received scathing treatment in the black and Italian press over the 'Banfield affair', during which two U of T graduate students were suspended for preventing visiting professor Edward Banfield from speaking at the university.

The students, Tony Leah and Bill Schabas of Students for a Democratic Society Canadian Party of Labor, claimed Banfield was a racist and had no right to speak.

A veritable potpourri of newspapers was represented, as each publisher gave a short five-minute speech describing his her paper, and articulating his her community's major concerns.

Susan Digwiche of the Ontario Native Experience urged the university to "reach out and touch" native peoples through the Indian centre on Beverley Street, to extend the use of university facilities to native people and to have a native person on staff to introduce native students to the university.

Both Morrow of the Toronto Native Times also urged more research on behalf of native people, correction of the impression of native people in university textbooks and higher enrolment of native people at the university, possibly through a native people's college.

Another major concern of speakers was the rigidity and incomprehensibility of admissions standards of the university to ethnic people, a point emphasized by Bob Chow of the Chinese Express.

V. G. Pamde, representing the Canadian India Times, and who also works for the provincial ministry of education, urged the U of T to become part of an "ethnic advisory board," comprising the university, the ministry and the ethnic community.

Although acknowledging the university itself would be likely to spend little money on setting up ethnic studies departments, Pamde noted such a board would be useful in clarifying admissions standards and improving relations. He also suggested the government would be willing to provide funding.

For the U of T representatives, it was an easy enough evening, as they were free to sit and listen without making any commitment.

Also in attendance was Canadian Party of Labor spokesman Tony Leah, suspended from the university for his part in the Banfield affair. Leah handed the press representatives a pamphlet entitled The History of Racism at the U of T.

Human rights advisor Daniel Hill organized press forum.

Support for holding bylaw grows steadily

By PAUL RAYNOR

Support for Toronto City Council's fight to overturn the Ontario Municipal Board's (OMB) rejection of the controversial 45-foot height restriction bylaw continues to grow.

Sarah Power of the Decentralization Committee of the Reform Citizens' Movement has submitted a petition of some 200 signatures to the Ontario Cabinet urging a reinstatement of the bylaw designed to bring central core development under control.

Letters have also been sent to all executive offices in the Ontario Legislature demanding their support of City Council's appeal.

Ward 7 Alderman Alan Sparrow says the OMB based their rejection of the holding bylaw on its harmful effect on downtown developers and speculators.

Sparrow points out the OMB's neglect of the increased tax burden of new programs for public transit, expressways and sewage systems that unrestricted central core development would entail.

"All polls point to citizen support of the height restriction," Sparrow says, citing the majority support among those polled in April by Mayor David Crombie as well as the strong return to office of the mayor, the man most closely linked with the holding bylaw.

This evidence failed to impress the OMB and might prove unfruitful in the Ontario Cabinet's decision on the appeal to be made in the near future.

The Decentralization Committee is organizing and giving voice to the support that exists in the city.

Petitions are still being circulated and copies will be sent to borough councils and community organizations Metro-wide.

The Decentralization Committee also plans to lobby each of the Cabinet members individually so that their stands on the matter can be made public.

Sparrow expects the Cabinet's decision will be of a strictly political nature. With provincial elections looming on the horizon, it is City Council and its supporters hope Premier William Davis will be anxious enough to maximize public support for his own government to give greater consideration to the public support of the height restrictions.

St. Mike's fails to get rebate from SAC

By BOB BETTSON

SAC decided Wednesday to continue the present split in funding between the St. Michael's College (SMC) Student Union and the Arts and Science Student Union. The two bodies have been feuding over the SAC educational rebate for several months.

At the SAC general meeting, the council also delayed for one year a move to discontinue the rebate and put the onus on local faculties to get the levy from Governing Council.

The whole problem began when the SMC student union refused to join ASSU at its formation in 1972. SMC arranged to get a partial rebate of the $2 education levy to do their own course evaluations.

But tension between the two organizations has continued and SMC came to SAC to demand $1.50 of the $2 instead of the present 90 cents.

SMC representatives demanded the increase on the basis the student union can do more for SMC students than ASSU. SMC reps have also criticized ASSU for a lack of activity.

The bitter feud will likely be ended next year when the levy is cut off and ASSU will probably have to hold a faculty-wide referendum to get a separate levy.

But SMC reps were threatening to take the dispute to a referendum of St. Mike's students if SAC did not give them the money.

ASSU fieldworker Rick Gregory opposed the immediate cut off of the levy citing the dependence of 13 arts and science course unions on ASSU for funding.

Gregory also pointed out a spring referendum this year would come during the course evaluation period.

Political Economy Course Union (PECU) chairman Nonnie Balczer made an impassioned speech about the value of course union work and was supported by other course union people present at the SAC meeting. The motion to end the levy this year was defeated 19-13 and the present arrangement will remain intact for another year.

The Learning Machine

People are forever bitching about how The Varsity fails to cover campus events. Well here is your chance to put your two cents worth in print.

THE LEARNING MACHINE wants submissions on all sorts of educational events, classroom beefs, course union meetings etc. Please submit material to the fearless Bob Bettson, 2nd floor, 91 St. George St., or phone 923-8741. Ask for Spiro.

Services commissioner John Tuzyk says U of T president John Evans has turned thumbs down on a SAC proposal for a games room.

The refusal, in a letter dated Jan. 10, says the administration can't support the games room because of space limitations and financial considerations.

Tuzyk says the administration is supporting the inclusion of a pub in the Campus as Campus Centre plans but students' need to make sure it doesn't get screwed up in committees.

SAC offered in December to pay $2,000 rent for the games room in the temporary School for Graduate Studies building but this offer was refused by Evans.

Tuzyk hopes to continue pressure on the administration for the games room, the strategy to be decided by the next SAC meeting.

The petition campaign has already reached 3,000 in favor of the pub and games room. Bread and circuses forever!

Jockeying is already beginning for the exiting SAC presidential sweepstakes although the actual race isn't until March.

Coming out of the gate first is much heralded services commissioner John Tuzyk.

Tuzyk, a St. Michael's College SAC rep, still denies he will run, but SAC heavies Michael Sabia and Tim Buckley confirmed his candidacy in exclusive interviews with The Varsity.

Sabia, man on his way to the top, has already issued a Shakespearean declaration. He says rumors of his candidacy are "a load of shit."

Buckley, an engineering student, is fence-sitting. He is touted by many as a winner because of his solid base in engineering.

A darkhorse candidate is university commissioner Gord Barnes who is maintaining a low profile these days. So low his wife hardly ever sees him.

Want to be a news photographer? The Varsity Photo Editor will hold an informal seminar on press photography Monday between noon and 2 pm.

Anyone interested in learning a few of the basics is invited to drop into our second floor executive offices at 91 St. George St.

There is no truth to the rumor that Playgirl magazine will be sending one of its green plant photographers to speak on the subject of 6 mm. lens distortion of cloud patterns on the azimuthal plane.

Veteran Varsity photographers are asked to drag the seat of their pants along, not to mention their enthusiasm.

At the pre-game team meeting today at 1 pm (right after our pre-game steak dinner), the starting lineups for tonight's basketball slugfest with SAC will be announced.

LaMarsh blasts Canadian attitude towards Israel

By GILLIAN MacKAY

Judy LaMarsh, former secretary of state, criticized Canada's indifferent attitude towards the plight of Israel in a public lecture at U of T Tuesday evening.

Following a trip to the Middle East last November, LaMarsh has become actively involved in Israel's defence.

"We have a responsibility to understand the situation," she said. "No nation will act except under self-interest and therefore the people must make it wishes known to the politicians. The government cannot act on the basis of ignorance and indifference."

"I don't believe that Canada should go to war," she added, "but we should put our money where our mouth is and give everything we have to reach a peace."

LaMarsh said she was speaking from a highly emotional point of view, noting a Canadian publication had recently rejected her article about Israel on these grounds.

"I am told that one should be dispassionate about these things," she said, "but we simply cannot allow another holocaust to occur."

The day before her arrival in Israel, Yasser Arafat, leader of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, had spoken before the United Nations.

"I have never seen a nation of people so traumatized," LaMarsh said, "as when they watched the United Nations accept this man with a standing ovation. They felt that they were alone again."

She described how people would occasionally call out to her as she passed and ask if the West was really prepared to desert the Jews.

The Jews are skeptical about the extent of Western commitment because, as Golda Meir put it, "It appears that oil is thicker than the blood of children." When U.S. Senator Teddy Kennedy spoke in Israel later on during her visit and pledged U.S. support, LaMarsh said the relief was great.

A good deal of the hour-long speech was spent describing the horrors of living under a continual state of siege and in praising the tremendous achievements the Israelis have made in building a nation out of a desert.

"One is immediately aware," she said, "that this is a nation with a sense of purpose where a feeling of striving holds them together like a family."

LaMarsh emphasized the vital importance of the Jewish people to the world and their right to build their own nation in the land of their roots. "Israel is an inspiration to the Jewish culture," she said.

"I am sure there is much to criticize about Israel," she said, "but right now all she (Israel) asks for is a recognition of her right to exist by her enemies. If the Arabs will agree on that, all things are possible."

But the system itself must be changed. It must be reviewed and overhauled by new people with new ideas—people who aren't protecting friends in sinecures, who aren't bound by the dictates of an elaborate patronage system.

Only we Liberals can do it.

RV: more ahead

SAC made the correct decision Wednesday to accept manager Paul Murton's resignation and continue the operation of Radio Varsity for two months, pending a major decision.

But there is a distinct danger the major issue which still faces the station, a bid for an FM licence, will now fade into the background.

The station is still not on a firm footing. The situation would be much worse if Brad Reed hadn't come forward to take on the role of station coordinator under the new board of directors.

We detected at the SAC meeting there are still a number of SAC reps who know little about the radio station. This situation must be rectified before any decision is made on the station's future.

Most people agree with communications commissioner Mike Sabia, the station must go FM or close down. It can't continue as it is.

But this has been the situation for a few years. And it took the internal squabbling of the Murton episode to make people aware of how crucial the situation is.

SAC is mostly to blame for the sorry state the station is in, not Paul Murton and not the power-hungry executive. And SAC must get all the information and take all necessary steps to ensure all the facts are known before a decision is made on FM.

What isn't known is crucial to the application. What listenership does the station have now and what can it expect in the future? How much advertising can be gained? Can the station mount successful public affairs and special programming to avoid the present "juke box" format?

These are important questions. No doubt there is enough talent on the U of T campus to put together a station which would outstrip any commercial outlet in Toronto. There is a vast scope for programming once you get outside the dictates of commercial radio.

But SAC must act quickly or the fears of an unidentified spectator at the SAC meeting will be warranted.

Sabia had moved that Brad Reed's term would end when a decision on FM is made. The wag piped out "he might be there forever."

Sinking ship really sinking

In his letter of January 15 (Sinking Ship Theorists Stink), Michael Fisher refutes neither the premises nor the argument of the theorists he is opposing, and instead takes great offense, along Marxist lines, at a world situation that might upon analysis prove to be quite inoffensive.

It is true that industrialized nations have never exhibited motives of disinterested altruism in their dealings with the nations of the Third World. One would need an even lower degree of sophistication than that possessed by the national leaders who institute foreign aid programs to believe that a nation aiding another expects nothing in return. (Incidentally, it can be pointed out that Third World countries are no less self-interested in this respect.)

Although this situation is an easy one to abhor in print, especially because one is attacking the rich by attacking foreign aid, it would be well to begin by understanding the idea of the function of government on which such policies are based.

A government's chief concern must be the welfare of the people under its rule. A representative government has the further obligation of effecting the people's will, within certain limits. (Thus, if people are moved to charity by some natural catastrophe in another country, the government is obligated to participate in their efforts and, if necessary, help to organize them.)

For a government to give aid without the expectation of benefit in return may be laudable if it possesses a surplus of wealth that can meet its constituents' needs both at that time and in the foreseeable future, but under other conditions it is the act of giving aid rather than that of withholding it that can more accurately be considered criminal.

People can be virtuous in self-sacrifice, but never governments; for the government has nothing of its own to give. What it has it holds in trust for its people.

If equal distribution of wealth were a solution to the world's current economic and agricultural ills, then it would be the duty of all governments to do what they could to destroy class structures, both within and between nations. (The resulting peace would alone be in the interest of the individual.)

The fact is, though, that there is not enough of anything, especially food, to go around. Even the rich and technologically advanced nations could be threatened by a single season of bad crops, and meteorologists inform us that we can look forward to such seasons in the future. With even the richest nations leading marginal existences, it is not difficult to imagine equal distribution of wealth resulting in disastrous shortages on a universal scale.

The drain on the world's resources is a function of, among other factors, population. This is particularly true in reference to food. In addition, foreign aid is given from one government to another; it is the receiving government that disburses it to the people. (Aid from the government of one nation directly to the people of another would threaten the sovereignty of the receiving nation.)

Hence it is neither selfish nor criminal to refuse to give aid to nations which do not actively advocate birth control. For a government to give such aid would be to ignore interests far broader than those of its own people.

Above all, one should not attempt to refute the lifeboat theorists without ascertaining that the lifeboat analogy to the world is not, in fact, the most realistic.

Air structure proposal absurd

I am sorry to see The Varsity give a platform to the bleatings of Harry Pasternak (U of T rejects air-supported structure, Jan. 13). Pasternak is neither architect nor engineer and nothing in his presentation indicates that he has had any direct experience with the "$760 million worth of air-supported structures" his firm claims to represent.

In its essentials his claim is absurd—that he can save us $6 million by building a different kind of roof, in a five-storey building whose total cost including architects' fees, landscaping, and services is estimated at less than $11 million.

There's been no conspiracy against Harry Pasternak—it's just that out of a combined professional staff of about 50, and a number of students involved on athletic decision-making bodies, he hasn't been able to convince a single person. All of us would like to cut the cost of the proposed new building, but we cannot do it by blowing $40,000 on Harry Pasternak's fantasies.

There seems to be a consensus of opinion among many students at the University of Toronto that the glorious days of radicalism and social concern in the 1960's have given way to the bland decade now half-over.

Surely many political agitators, especially those of a red or pinkish hue, are now wrestling with the question of how to arouse the sleeping masses or even of how to get some attention. In the interest of promoting the enlightenment of the opiate-loving proletariat, I herewith propose the following plan of action to the crusaders of the Left:

1. Consistency must be the goal of all groups calling for the destruction of capitalism. This means that the holy grape lettuce boycott is not enough. After all, the problem of which the lettuce and grape grapes are only symptoms must be attacked at its roots. The military-industrial-culinary complex is to blame for the disparity between profits and nutrition (cf. Varsity centrespread, Jan. 13, 1975).

No soldier in the struggle against the profiteers should be allowed to compromise his virtue by partaking of any of the poisonous concoctions prepared by the W.A.S.P. money-lords. Thus, only a total food boycott will work in the long run!

The more the leftists take part in such an action, the sooner this community will be improved.

2. By even remaining in a society as racist, sexist, anti-Semitic, anti-working class, and inhuman as Canada is, socialists take part in the system's oppression. (We're all collectively guilty for society's problems, aren't we?) It is time for the Revolutionary Vanguard to retreat to a purer, more humane, more natural habitat where men and women can live together in harmony, without the exploitation of any group. Now, Baffin Island has plenty of space available, and gives the leftists a chance to prove their superior acumen at making use of the means of production. Why not?

3. Since truth will ultimately win out in the dialectical process, there is one easy way of speeding up the process. By allowing right-wing extremists to spout their silly slogans and to make utter fools out of themselves, the Left could hasten the long-awaited Day. The Toronto leftists would be wise, then, to give all of their money away to the Western Guard. It would be a matter of weeks before The Day.

4. Above all, the Left must shed its aura of self-righteousness, and start making use of some humor. Now, this will not be very easy for the assorted groups to do, since it takes a certain degree of subtlety and intelligence. But, simply by acting naturally, the Marxoid-Leninoids would amuse the general public, and perhaps win enough pity from them to have some effect.

I don't suspect for a moment that the Leftists will listen to my suggestions; they're too clever to do that. But I do hope that the prisoners of starvation and the tolling masses will respond by urging the Left to follow my advice, and by bringing forth some new proposals.

Hart House doors keep sex barrier

It is now several years since Hart House officially became co-ed and welcomed the fairer sex to its hallowed halls. But alas, all is not what it appears to be for the chauvinistic spectre of founder Massey still stalks the entrances, ruthlessly barring the weak of heart and hand.

What I am referring to are the massive wooden impediments which, though unlocked, effectively rule out admittance to the majority of the weaker sex and to a substantial portion of their male counterparts. To be sure, Hart House remains a sanctuary of athletic male supremacy simply because no one else can budge those imposing doors without great peril to life and limb.

These tragedies of human sacrifice are most likely to occur at lunch-hour when weak, famished students, unable to get inside to the Great Hall, can be seen assaulting and peppering the doors with great relish in preparation for the next sandwiched victim. Indeed, it was only last week that I witnessed several eager students scrambling to the sustenance of a rather undernourished Philosophy professor who had become wedged between the twin intimidations. The poor man was so terrified he kept screaming: "Open Sesame Buns!"

Speed is of the essence; the university should act now in remedying this pressing, ill-provided-for situation before someone influential gets pinioned amidst the crusty remains of those other unfortunates who didn't make it.

Robert Osborne

Problems runs deep

U of T's desire to set up better relations with the ethnic community is a good thing, much like eating proper foods and getting regular exercise. However, the initiative comes more as atonement for past mistakes than as a bold new measure.

In the past few years the university has had bad relations with those outside its borders. Most noticeably in the immediate community, the university acquired the reputation as an ogre bent on expanding regardless of community wishes.

That situation has now been improved somewhat with the university's statement of principles about its expansion, which pledges to limit growth to the Spadina, Bloor, College, Wellesley area (and also by the provincial government cutbacks, which make it almost impossible to grow anyway).

In the ethnic community the U of T received bad press over the Banfield affair. Perhaps it was misrepresented, but the issue was indicative of the university's inability to communicate.

Recently, the university has appointed a vice-president to deal solely with external relations, and an adviser on human rights matters. They will undoubtedly help to smooth some of the louder frictions between the university and the community.

Most noticeably, the creation of an ethnic advisory board will help to encourage adaptation of admission requirements to meet the needs of the ethnic community as well as encourage more people with ethnic backgrounds to study at the university. (For example, the school of library science needs Italian, Portuguese, West Indian, Latin American, Native, Greek and Chinese students to adequately service those communities.)

However, U of T is a big institution. And big institutions inevitably create inequities, which inevitably work against the disadvantaged. Much as U of T can and should do its best in this area, it should hardly expect to remedy the proven failure of an educational system to remedy deep social inequities through the enhancement of educational opportunities.

James Auld: man of steel

In a history-making feat of endurance which has already caught the attention of doctors around the world, colleges and universities minister James Auld tenaciously clings to life following the cabinet shuffle announced this week by Premier Bill Davis.

Auld was given very little chance of living through the shuffle, as doctors had come to the conclusion he knew absolutely nothing about his job and seemed incapable of doing anything with it. Moreover, Auld had a huge portion of his anatomy taken away with the creation of the ministry of culture and recreation.

Just what gives Auld this courage to continue, despite prognostications of his condition which range from "stupid to nincompoop" (an opinion held by both SAC president Seymour Kanowitz and U of T president John Evans)? What Herculean wiles does this man tap?

Only his taxidermist knows for sure.

Events in Chile held up to clear glass window

FP: I'd like to ask a few questions about You Can't Get Here from There. To begin with, what sort of audience are you aiming at?

JW: I don't really know. TWP has a subscription audience which more or less holds the season together. I've been associated with it off and on for 12 or 13 years — that's about how long TWP has been going and I expect it's built up a certain kind of audience. This play is written as much "at" the audience as "for" it; we've not concealed our anger at the event, and part of it is directed at the lack of public anger at the time of the coup and the degree to which it has been absorbed. It's just last year's revolution and it's appalling, our ability to tolerate horrors. The stance of the play is pretty much that events in Chile largely happened at home. I don't just mean that our neutral non-action aided the junta; we took really positive action (including electing the Minister of External Affairs with a larger majority than ever before in his own riding.) We were specifically aware of events and yet we did very little as a people? I'm less interested in a specific audience than in getting a general audience to account for themselves.

FP: So you intended to agitate people?

JW: Yes — not to change policy exactly — we'd have all run for office I suppose if we'd wanted to do that — but we wanted to observe. You'll have noticed that the set is really nothing more than 8 glass windows, and the acting is very bare of loose theatrical decorations — no involved characterisations. It's entirely a stripped down thing, so clean and sparse that the subject matter is clear. We wanted to hold something up to a clear glass window — the historical events in Chile. Now, you could piss some people off who've come to be entertained, but that's a risk consciously taken.

FP: You must have done a lot of research?

JW: Yes. We also talked with people who'd done a lot of research. There are lots and lots of people in Canada who are very involved.

FP: What groups in particular did you approach?

JW: Oh, they're very obvious — the Latin-American Working Group, the United Church, who've made it their cause for the last year and a half. There's the general feeling that the Chilean thing will mean more rather than less in our history. I think I said in the discussion you were at on Sunday that it's our Czechoslovakia — that in a very real sense it cuts the ground from under our society, which is dependent on the electoral process. We've attacked our own system now publicly and internationally, and I don't know if nations recover from that.

FP: It seemed to me that there's a fair element of caricature in the play. Just what percentage would you say is fact, and what caricature?

JW: To my knowledge there's no distortion of fact, no attempt to take one aspect of a character and make that the whole person — that's what caricature is. Mrs. Ross for instance — I see her as a complete characterisation of an incomplete personality. The caricature certainly isn't in the writing or in the work of the actress. I had nine months writing the play; our intention was to tell the whole story. I think the sense of distortion comes because the events themselves were so grotesque. The sense of surprise, which I hope is there, the strangeness — it's almost a kind of ethereal strangeness — is real. The interview at the gate for instance. Those are in fact the words that were used.

It's possible for a person looking at any work of art to evade it, to resent what's there before his eyes. "There's something absurd here — it must be the play." It's absurd that a man who's served 15 years in Latin America doesn't speak Spanish (Ross) — but it's true. The bizarreness is in the relation of the fact to the real world. I hope the effect is to disturb the audience, to dislocate our way of looking at the people who serve us in Foreign Affairs.

Just for the record, I checked out Ross's ability or inability to speak Spanish with an official from the Santiago Embassy who saw the play when he was in Toronto recently. He denied absolutely that Ross cannot speak Spanish. He also disagreed (a) with the allocation of blame in the play. He felt that the play had not been nearly hard enough on the Canadian government, which, for instance, determined that the refugees were to be treated as regular applicants for immigration i.e., they had to clock up 'points', they had to have a job offer to get into Canada, etc. The official pointed out that Ross and his wife had fed around 50 people for some weeks out of their own pockets and that they had not been reimbursed by the Government.

The official also disagreed (b) with the comparison in the play of Canada's response with that of Sweden. "Sweden had more space, so of course they could take more refugees. As it turns out, Canada has taken about the same number of immigrants as any of the Western European countries."

He also disagreed (c) with the characterisations. "Some of the mannerisms were pretty close but I felt on the whole that the play was a caricature of the people when it could have dealt more with the fundamental issues of how the Government should treat the problem of accepting 'oppressed minorities.'" (the official designation for the Chilean refugees). "The split in the Embassy is complete fictional."

The official also noted, incidentally, that there are no squash courts in Santiago.

FP: George Luscombe said during the discussion that in the theatre it is not absolutely necessary to report substantive fact, that possibilities are enough. Or at least that's what I understood him to say. Do you agree?

JW: That was in relation to deals like the De Havilland one, whether there was proof that money changed hands. There were corporate exchanges, and Falconbridge is making an enormous investment in Chile right now.

FP: How did you begin work on You Can't Get Here from There?

JW: Well, theory on which my work with George is based is collaboration. During the coup, I was aware of events of course; I knew a few of the people who spoke about it in Parliament, and I took part in a couple of concerts. But the play itself didn't occur to us till last spring when we were invited to a party to welcome a Chilean actress — who turned out to be Maria Enriquez who's in the play. There was a party to introduce her and a Chilean film director to theatre people in Toronto. It was when we were talking to her and to her husband who had been in the embassy that we thought of doing a play. My regret is that the play didn't occur to us earlier to add to the pressure on the government. The previous fall would have been its better moment. But it's more profoundly researched now.

Everyone working on the play got more involved with the subject matter — more than we'd ever done before. It's ultimately self-expression. We have political stands as people; but we don't see ourselves as very different from the large number of people in the country, and the play aims to express our distress and real sense of agitation in so far as we are not a typical people.

FP: Can you discuss the play in terms of your own development?

JW: It's very difficult. My last play was Ten Lost Years and there's precious little comparison with this. The only connection may be that it was about ordinary people who probably understood as little about depressions as we do now. It was very much about how people experienced an event — and this is also about how Canada as a whole was involved with events. Whether it's an advance or a regression, I don't know. One thing, Ten Lost Years wasn't a politically dangerous play.

FP: What do you mean?

JW: I didn't mean personal danger. I mean there's cranks of all sorts — God knows who caused our fire — but really mean, dangerous, in the sense of how we're dangerous as a nation. I'm much more afraid of a government today than of Bennett's government. One's dealing with more volatile material when one's dealing with today.

FP: Are you supported financially by TWP?

JW: I'm on a salary. I was resident writer for five years from 1962 to 67. Then I went freelance and did things on my own like Party Day at the NAC. I did some plays and a lot of CBC work and a film called Selling Out which had an Academy Award Nomination. This year I had several plays at TWP — this one in the fall, a new play called Summer 76 about the Olympics and Mr. Pickwick so it made much better sense to devote my whole time to it.

I've done ten plays with George. He's ten years older, and in the beginning I think our relationship was very much that of teacher-student. I think the relationship has changed a lot over the years — I hope it has. I've gone from being 26 to being 38 and from having had no previous theatrical experience (my background's academic — I taught in university before). I've gone to being a fulltime professional writer. It would probably be better to say I started as an apprentice. I don't think I've ever worked in amateur theatre because George is determinedly professional. I think he's the same with actors and designers. With Astrid, the designer for You Can't Get Here from There, he's forcing her away from the drawing board to designing something that's beautiful in action. Its good-ness is in its use. With this set it's important that no one can see any actor without seeing his reflection 40 times over. And it works metaphorically — a border is a sheet of glass or a sheet of impenetrably steel, depending upon the motives at the person attempting to use it.

A shrill reminder

"Here" is Canada, land of the gleaming kitchen with a stainless steel image to match, "there" is Chile after Allende's assassination, and "you" are one of the hundreds of refugees who sought and were denied asylum at the Canadian embassy in Santiago. Jack Winters's play is a shrill reminder of an event which we seem to have been only too ready to ignore, our attention bought by the bread and circuses south of the border. Winter pointed out in a discussion after the Sunday performance that "We participated in an economic blockade ... that should exemplify our attitude to democracy. Chile is our Czechoslovakia: it cut the ground from under our political system;" we cannot afford to ignore it.

I am not always sure what the TWP brand of docudrama is after — sometimes nothing more than a gentle after-dinner frisson I suspect, or a sort of soft-bellied catharsis as we tootop through some twentieth century disaster. But this play is cruelly partisan and emits a proper sense of passion and outrage. The embassy staff are all-white mannish padding about in their muzak-infested all-white band box. Michael Marshall plays Ross as a clownish Pontius Pilate, a stiff-necked military man much given to washing his hands. Milo Ringham's Mrs. Ross is domineering, obsessive and utterly absurd, and Ms. Perque (Suzette Couture) the secretary is studiously elegant — and spontaneously silly. The caricature suggests the influence of Brecht, perhaps via Edward Bond's study of the empire builders in Narrow Road, but Winters has struck an individual note by combining the cartoon with pictures of reality — slides, news reels and cut-in narrated scenes of exile from a story by Pablo Neruda.

The performance on Sunday was marred by poorly synchronised effects, particularly in the opening moments when slides, a "newscast" and excerpts from Ross's telegrams coalesced into an incoherent barrage. Part of the difficulty stems from the set. Astrid Janson has designed a wonderful decorator style box of perspex screens which can be swivelled to suggest walls, windows, doors, an artist's easel, and, in a stunning scene, the witness box behind which a Brazilian couple is interviewed for immigration clearance. The set is beautiful but it does demand great clarity and projection from the actors because the screens cut the sound.

Winter's writing falls flat occasionally, for instance, in a dull dialogue between two RCMP constables and more disastrously in the closing scene. Ross has occupied our attention for too long simply to sidle off muttering into the background. But, in general, the production was slick and exciting, with lots of the usual TWP fizzle-dazzle — quick role changes, mime sequences, and so on, and it is most satisfying to see, all this energy focussed on an immediate and significant object.

Japanese 19th Century Prints
New Academic Building
Victoria College
until 24 January

Rupert Brooke wrote a poem called "The Great Lover."
"I have been so great a lover . . ."
he exults, "These I have loved:
White plates and cups, cleangleaming, Ringed with blue lines; and feathery, fairy dust;
Wet roofs, beneath the lamp-light;
the strong crust
Of friendly bread, and many-tasting food; . . ."

It's an absurd poem; it's an engaging poem.
And the level on which it approaches so many things, that is the level on which one is tempted to approach the Japanese prints now on display at Vic.

But people always expect more of Japanese prints and receive less.
They inevitably come away disappointed from an exhibition of them. We really don't know how to approach them, don't know about the movements in Japanese aesthetics, don't know about the relationship of the prints to those movements, don't know about Japanese painting, don't know about the relation of the prints to the paintings. We find it difficult to distinguish styles although we are very conscious of a style of painting very different from what we have known in Western representational art. They all seem different and they all seem alike.

People who don't like Japanese prints are usually intimidated by the magnitude of their ignorance. Those who do like them feel guilty because of the magnitude of their ignorance.

The appreciation of the Japanese prints has, inevitably, sadly, become an occupation here in the West for connoisseurs and collectors.

That is a situation not without its ironies since the prints were originally an art form for the masses. We know the names of so many of the artists and not much more — which makes the encounter with Japanese prints all the more frustrating — simply because, as people's artists they were not closely allied to the upper classes or to the academic world and biographers rarely took note of them.

There is really little that one can say about the show at Vic that will be written from or for an informed sensibility. The show is there. I did find it interesting.

Paul Bouissac, a committee of one who is responsible for the various shows hung in the corridors of the New Academic Building has adapted a rewarding attitude in regards to the displaying of the prints, hung at Vic.

Bouissac, a professor in the French department, told me he thinks the space he has in the New Academic Building is ideal for displaying works of art. The works are hung throughout the building but especially on all the landings of the open stairwell around which the building is centred. Bouissac says the result is that "you are forced to consider each picture alone." "You encounter it by itself."

The exhibitions used to be held in one room in Old Vic but when Bouissac took over he stipulated that he be allowed to hang shows throughout the New Academic Building.

"In so many shows you see the works hung dot-dot-dot in a row. But not here. There are so many perspectives, so many ways of approaching the works. And no one has to see all the works at the same time.

He can experience them over individually throughout the day and over a number of days. He experiences them; he doesn't experience the gallery.

The lighting is atrocious, especially in the third floor corridors. But it's a uniquely civilized approach to art, not at all clinical or intimidating. There are the bells, of course, which dispel any illusion that sense reigns supreme.
But hell, Vic is the only college which has regular art exhibitions, and once you're there, you do indeed encounter each work alone.

But then we're right back when we started . . . "I have been so great a Lover. These I have loved . . ."

Claudette Boulanger
Hart House
Until 31 January

I got caught at a Hart House Art Gallery opening last Tuesday evening. Usually unless I'm hungry and ready to be satisfied with wine and cheese I manage to avoid exhibition openings. But the Hart House Art Committee had not arranged a press showing earlier in the day, and deadlines meant I could not wait until the next day.

Hart House Gallery openings are like all other openings: noisy. The exhibiting artist was there, now in the background, now in the foreground, wondering all the time if she had any buyers, no doubt. And of course there were a number of people taking advantage of her predicament, and indulging, with plastic glasses full of wine in their hands, in the most supercilious and the most shallow connoisseurship.

There are certain artists you know are bought, almost as if people have decided they can afford to pay this much for that much of a contemporary art movement. (For these artists are pre-eminently bastardized editions of more significant figures). There are the artists whose works collectors buy.
And then there are the artists whose work you want to buy yourself.

Boulanger is one of them.
Which is to suggest of course that her paintings have significance to you only insofar as you do buy one — as compared to the work of a major artist and that Boulanger certainly is not) which is there, undeniably, indisputably, and which is historically important. It is through a realistic awareness of one's own unimportance — as a collector, as a patron, as a creator — and through a compensating determination to appreciate minor arts and minor artists that one enjoys Boulanger.

The show includes drawings of children alone, of children together, pictures of family pets, pictures of family occasions and activities throughout the year, pictures of weddings, of Christmas dinners, of visits to the seaside, pictures of parades, of ballet lessons, of snowball fights.

But the drawings are authentic in the way that a memory is, in the way that a forgotten and suddenly rediscovered snapshot is.

And yet they are more. What would their value be if they just like snapshots?

Peter Bogavovich has claimed that because of the historical development of photography and film, black and white is "more real" than colour. (Meyer Abrams, for that matter, notes in passing in The Milk Of Paradise that our dreams take place in a world of grey hues.)

But Boulanger's works are imbued with vibrant pastels and bright colour patterns. She has achieved remarkable effects with ordinary Krayola crayons. But the colours in truth reflect the emotional response we have to our childhood. The colours serve to demonstrate the unreality of our wistful backward looking conception of childhood.
This lyrical union of situation and colour and the attracting and repulsing effects they have . . . that's what I find interesting.

The children portrayed, as well, are all faceless, anonymous — talk about Moss Man, here is Moss Child — and their forms are simplified to such an extent that they look like bright, inquisitive turtles without their shells, and so incredibly vulnerable. Like Kurelek if on a simpler level, Boulanger displays an anthropological lyricism at once disturbing and serenely moving.

From the Opera Department : All hands hard at work on Donizetti's Elixir International Women's Year is getting off to a great start at the Opera Department of the Faculty of Music.

The First of two major operatic productions, Donizetti's L'Elisir d'Amore (The Elixir of Love), is directed by Constance Fisher, and designed by Elsie Sawchuck. Both have moved up in the world of theatre through skill and talent, and the idea of being female directors or designers never came up when I talked to them this past Wednesday. They were both simply doing their jobs, and with opening night this coming Wednesday, it was amazing they could find the time to talk at all.

Staging Donizetti's masterpiece of comic opera is no easy task. With a chorus of 30 adults, children and soldier extras, as well as a double casting of the five soloists, the undertaking seems gargantuan.

"And of course," explained Fisher, "you are working with a seventy-piece orchestra (students from the Faculty of Music). And as director you are the one who has to solve the synchronization problems.

"But the main duty of the director is to mount the stage production — to move the singers on stage, to coach them dramatically, and to iron out matters of interpretation with the musical director, in this case Maestro Ernesto Barbini."

Barbini has been with the school for 22 years, but receives more publicity in connexion for the Canadian Opera Company.

With the great strain put on voices, and young voices at that, each of the solo roles is doubled, with singers alternating with performances.

"With doubled roles, we (Fisher and assistant director Michael Evans) usually have everyone present for the initial blocking, but nearer the end, when things are starting to gel, we separate them, to avoid overtiring them.

"One of the great differences between straight theatre and Opera is the timing. In straight theatre you create your own timing. In opera you must stage to the music. It has to go the way it's written. There's no waiting around.

"And since this is a chorus opera, the doubled roles must be identically blocked, to avoid chaos."

Fisher started as a singer with the school — "way back when it was on College — the building isn't even there any more." She then sang with the COC for ten years, directed for Sadler's Wells, the COC and the opera school.

"The standards here are excellent. I enjoy working in a teaching situation where you have more time to get things going.

"We started with the soloists in mid-November, then for two weeks before Christmas, we worked with the chorus for about 2 hours a day. After the Christmas break, with everyone having forgotten all of it, the challenge was to pull it all together."

Elsie Sawchuck, the designer, was in the middle of fitting a pair of pants — too short.

"Well, try the spats. I do love spats." Still too short. The actor suggests another pair of pants, rushes off to put them on.

Before a word can be spoken, he returns in the second pair. A techie laughs and whistles at the pants which clash sharply with the vest.

"With a red carnation, and gloves — perfect. If only I had some cufflinks."

How did Sawchuck arrive at the set I had just seen — two stone houses, with porches and gingerbread trim, trees, rolling hills, and plenty of blue sky?

"Connie and I discussed the general approach we would take. The opera is set in Italy about 200 years ago.

"The original story took place in Basque country," interjects Fisher, "Donizetti moved it to Italy, and we've moved it to Canada, updating it to 1901."

A poor farm boy, who will become rich if his uncle ever dies, is in love with a wealthy, if haughty young lady. To overcome his shyness, the boy consults a travelling quack, who sells him an elixir of love, which is in fact, cheap red wine. But it gives the young man the courage he needs, and all live happily ever after.

"Since Connie and I knew nothing about Italian farming but a lot about Ontario farming, we decided on the adaptations. Besides, the translation by Ruth and Thomas Martin is quite North American and good to hang such a design to.

"From there it was a matter of remembering my grandmother's farm, taking a few drives out into the country to look at gingerbread trims, and getting reference books for detail."

A third of the costumes are being cut and sewn at the theatre. The rest are coming from Malabar's, or are on loan from Theatre Passe Muraille.

Elixir has not been seen in Toronto before. Performances are on January 22, 24, 25, 27, at the McMillan Theatre, 8 pm curtain. Student tickets are $2 if, you bring your ATL.

The Last Whole Earth Varsity Review

Guide to nutritious, cheap eating

Last Wednesday's issue carried guides to eating off and on campus during school hours. The Varsity Review saw its duty to the Reader: We thereto present, the Varsity Review Guide to Eating Out, or where to eat before, after and during cultural events.

Eating out is a pleasurable experience itself, consciously sought out. It really isn't important where you eat, or what you eat, what is important is getting out — and getting out to a variety of different places.

For be it for the Varsity to presume to prescribe or in any way limit that experience, or the potential variety of that experience. We hope that all readers aspire to eat out of all three of the Three Small Rooms, to sit around the game spit of Winston's, to mount to the splendour of the Georgetown Room, Eaton's College Street, even. But in these inflationary times, and at this stage of life, there are certain restaurants that the momentarily hesitant, upworldy-mobile would ignore at their peril.

Appreciate now on its own terms, your poverty, your studenthood, everything you will only romanticize later (on decidedly different terms).

Where in Toronto — at, say three in the afternoon — could you possibly find first-class snacks such as specially sandwiches, black forest cake, melita coffee, tea, etc., served in an indoor-garden setting to the background music of a truly first-rate cocktail/jazz pianist?

Down in the basement at 82^{1/2} Avenue Road, that's where — it's Joel Shulman's The Garden Party, offering a welcome change from the super-chic, go-to-be-seen cafes of Yorkville.

A blind expatriate from Glasgow by way of just about every modern jazz centre in the United States, Joel Shulman combines a mini-jungle entrance, indoor fountain, wrought-iron garden furniture, baby grand and electronic harpsichord with a wry, encyclopaedic line of patter on just about every pop and jazz musician or composer of any note since Gershwin wore knickers. And you'll swear the man has 20 fingers, the chords are so lush.

Everything on the menu is home-prepared by Joel's all-female staff.

It's a widely held belief around campus that if you go west of Spadina and Harbord, you fall off the edge of the world. Well, it's not true — you can go as far west as Bathurst and Harbord before you get into any real danger.

And as long as you're out there, stop in at The Garden Kitchen at 181 Harbord St. for a final hearty meal before taking that last long plunge. John Martin, who runs the place along with six others, has fed many an ill-lated adventurer a last supper of homemade soup, salad, a filling main course and an herbal tea to wash it down, all for around $1.50 — $2.

Martin serves vegetarian fare produced from materials carefully bought from organically inclined farmers at the St. Lawrence Market and other certifiably healthy sources.

The restaurant is buried in a block of nondescript houses, but once you get inside, you feel you could be in a small, countryside restaurant anywhere in North America except where the place actually is, here in Hogtown.

Seating only 20 people, The Garden Kitchen has a decidedly intimate air, further enhanced by the pungent aromas, the plants, the posters, the books, the mingling conversations.

The restaurant was opened last January 5 when Etherea Natural Foods Restaurant in Rochdale went under. Martin and friends in fact used to bake all Etherea's bread, and even now under the label of Jubilation they supply all sorts of baked goods to over 20 theatres, cinemas and health food outlets.

Martin says the restaurant is run under no particular philosophical banner — although macrobiotic and many other dietary cults could certainly co-exist with the place comfortably.

The Garden Kitchen dispenses its organic wares from 11:30 am to 8 pm Monday through Saturday.

For a more continental touch, still at rock bottom prices, your gastronomic appetite should be satisfied by the newly opened Art Den Cafe at 4 Irwin Ave. Snuggly located on a forgettable street intersecting with Yonge just North of Roly's Health Food Store, the Art Den is difficult to find and depends largely on word-of-mouth advertising. It was touch-and-go for a while, but now it looks like it's found its feet.

The journalist's lot, as Gilbert and Sullivan once put it, is not an 'appy one. Tied at the office away from his loved ones while racing against a deadline, the erstwhile defender of the public's right to know must often turn to the commercial eatery to flip off his fedora, cast off his copy book, and settle down to a hearty plate of second only to mother's.

Being a creature of habit, your industrious but humble servant has consistently eaten at three restaurants, which in his lowly opinion provide both good cheap food and a pleasant, relaxing atmosphere.

The Country Style Restaurant, 450 Bloor St. W. Bloor street sometimes seems to have more goulash joints than Yonge St. has body rub parlours—all clustered along a narrow strip between Spadina and Bathurst streets. We've all read about the big names—the Continental, the Taragato, the Blue Cellar—but some of the smaller ones go neglected. Of course, that's good for those of us who eat there, but the truth must come out eventually. So here's singing the praises of The Country Style, a cheap and friendly Hungarian restaurant to rank with the best of them.

Stepping in the door, you'd think it was a takeout pastry and coffee shop — worn men and frenzied shoppers slouched over tiny doorway tables. But in the back, there are seven dining tables, with bright red tablecloths, and one overworked but always friendly waitress.

The food is cheap, good, and plentiful. My favourite is the chintzel, overflowing the plate for $2.30. Try the lightly breaded Parisien chintzel especially; and make sure to have a palaczinka — a crepe filled with cottage cheese, poppyseeds, jam or walnuts — for dessert along with your cappuccino.

The Kosmikom. Just down the street on Markham a step north of Bloor is a dingy-looking second floor Greek restaurant that inhabits what some ten feet to the cook, who repeats it like a potent charm as he prepares your poison, or as some say portion.

The surliness you are shown varies directly according to your social status in the eyes of the waiter (and that cannot be elevated with tipping!), and to follow the waiter's classification scheme leads to revelations of material circumstances and aspirations. More so than in the past, it's keeping them

Sometimes one is struck by the coherence of mere accidents. The editor called me about this wild assignment, and at once my favourite restaurant swam into view, with singed beef and exotic garnishes; but with no expense account, it was driven from my mind. But that same night, grousing with friends about the perpetual quality of acidia, spiritual dryness that resides in residence foods, we began to explore the Bloor St. alternatives. I found myself explaining the attractions of Palmer's lunch-counter.

First of all, it is immaculately 1962 within these chrome walls. The counter and fittings are unchanged since that time, and the waiters wear white jackets and serve you water. The menu is posted outside and recalls, by its titled specials, the days when the Executive block and the University were not an estranged couple.

Your waiter, always surly, speaks more English than he will admit. The short-order cook insults everyone who goes past him down the narrow serving alley and juggles eggs to amuse himself at other times. There is a caste system worked out by the Boss, who surveys the scene from behind a cigar. The Moll works the candy-book-prescription side of the store. Blue jackets belong only to the two cashier-captains. Those who work behind the kitchen doors are less educated and seem virtually transparent since the front-of-house staff don't seem to see them.

But your waiter accepts the caste system. He also applies it. He knows the locals, and twits them somewhat. You are soon after adopting Palmer's as an occasional eating place, greeted by a sardonic nickname based on some obscure defect of character or manner which you are unknowingly trailing after you through the world. Your clerks either grunted or hog-called for some ten feet to the cook, who repeats it like a potent charm as he prepares your poison, or as some say portion.

The surliness you are shown varies directly according to your social status in the eyes of the waiter (and that cannot be elevated with tipping!), and to follow the waiter's classification scheme leads to revelations of material circumstances and aspirations. More so than in the past, it's keeping them

I sat there chewing my waxed beans. "What happened? Where has the romance in my life gone?" I asked myself. I was sitting at a table in For My Friends, this restaurant has quite a reputation for nourishing food well prepared at economical prices (dinner for two, $8-10, plus beer). And as a matter of fact, but I beans were good (not only that but I like chickpeas), the fish was crisp and hot, the salad was made with remarkably crisp greens. But the problem with a restaurant like this is that you long to take it for granted and long, indeed, for something more. There's no ethnic lure, there's no atmosphere... there's just good food.

The restaurant is a victim of ribbon development, it's way out on Bloor Street in the middle of a long line of fruit stores, storefront real estate offices, and sporting goods stores. The front window has been covered over. The walls are dark, the floor covering is dark. You don't go there to see and be seen. You go to eat. And the food is good.

But I went and I felt practical, economical, sensible. I didn't like myself very much. I didn't feel spontaneity, I didn't feel poor. I felt practical.

You come to understand the passion many have for the local Hungarian restaurant. Maybe other people from India and Poland and Hungary like to go to Harvey's or MacDonald's for a look at another culture. The food isn't much but that doesn't matter. At For My Friends the food is good but that doesn't matter.

If you are cold and hungry on a Sunday night about 10:30 why not visit Fran's Restaurant on Yonge just above Bglinton?

Why not? Well, once inside you will no longer be cold, but the hunger problem will take at least a half-hour to remedy. You will be encouraged by the large number of patrons at Fran's, but only until you notice that they are only waiting—just drinking the cold coffee.

The Husky Western is recommended for chewing practice. The cold french fries are easy to get down though, but it's keeping them only at Murray's; more haughty types there as well. But Palmer's has the less than successful middle-managerial types, the cruising ladies of the streets, and the occasional creature with a past who cannot scrape that fact off his features.

One final note, take at least $10.00 or you will still be hungry. Dave Stuart sports editor

Once accepted and having ordered, one can settle into a book or paper; but it is equally permissible to engage in lively argument. Most people, though, when faced with their food, devote their attention to it. Palmer's diners are not expensive, but then they're good quality food. At night they give you an option of the omnipresent French Fry with either mashed or boiled potatoes, and have good beef and veal. Their mushroom's are inelegant in the extreme, their core slaw pungent. Milk is served very cold and in a good-sized glass. There is always a wait, and the glass is often refilled without request.

The summer is the time of year when Palmer's is at its finest. In the heat, one comes in to have lemonade, their famous ice cream cones, and those lovely glasses of water. But even at this time of year, it's a pleasant place. If you're wandering around the campus, cold, and want to go inside for a hot meal or well-sauced, filling food.

with almonds and honey — is mandatory along with Greek coffee. When you leave, you'll just have enough strength to slide over to a poolroom for a couple of games of eight-ball overlooking scenic Homest Ed's.

The Mars. What can you say about the corner of Bathurst and College that hasn't already been said? Here is a place where short-order cookery has been raised to a fine art. Very few tables, but then you would miss a chance to sit up at the counter and marvel at the waitresses who the chefs through their passes? Watch them assemble a complete meal in 30 seconds. Although it is rumored Tommy Hunter has eaten at The Mars, I've never seen him there. Not to worry; the clientele of Cowbat in the alleyside and Spadina St. irregulars is enough to keep all but the most cynical Metro resident on his toes.

Nominally Jewish, the menu varies from day to day and features full meals such as chicken, beef and fish. Best bet, however, is the "asty corn beef hash" at $1.50, which comes with potatoes, it's a pleasant place. If you're vegetables and bread. By the time you've added homemade soup, and a huge piece of apple pie and a cup of tea, you've only spent $2.50, and had an eating experience that you could not get for $30.

After an especially depressing day, jaunt over to Homest Ed's Ice Cream Parlor. "Ed miracle?" you ask.

Yes, here is a man who can serve quality food, and not charge exorbitant prices for it. All continuing quest for a suitable of continuing The Ice Cream Parlor, corner of Bloor and Markham is stuffed with collectables as is Ed's other restaurants. Autographed publicity shots of stars who have at Ed through the years grace the walls.

And in the back is a blossoming plant store. (Arrangements of healthy plants start at 98¢, with larger plants at lower than average prices — a large spider plant is $6.99).

But it's the ice cream that keeps us coming back week after week. Hot spiced apple sundaes with chopped walnuts and fresh whipped cream come in small and large — 65¢ or 83¢. Then there's hot butterscotch, hot fudge, and Mocha Madness (for those who are not easily embarrassed in public).

The Parlor also serves sandwiches (lots of cheese, lettuce and tomato), various kinds of tea, and European coffees. Open from noon to 9 pm every day but Monday.

Rumpkin's (554 Parliament) is a great little restaurant to go to with great friends, a good appetite, and not a lot of money. It's probably one of the best spots in the city to get an interesting and delicious meal without paying atrocious prices. The restaurant is small, casual, cosy, and brimming to the ceiling with lively chatter as people pass baskets of fresh rolls and garlic butter up and down the two long wooden tables in the front room. There's also another small room with separate tables in the back, if you can't get into the front room.

The menu, which is chalked on a blackboard and changes regularly, includes scrumptious appetizers like escarrot, liver pate, avocado salad, and chef salad; succulent main courses consist of king crab or scamp in a gorgeous garlic sauce, a North African spicy stew called couscous, and stible favourites like lamb and veal. There's also a variety of their delicious crepes — their specialty being the king crab crepe. Even though you eat about two or three rolls smothered in garlic butter, chef salad, and a main dish, you simply can't refuse dessert, especially when everyone around you have ordered Rumpkin's fresh strawberry pie and exclaim "It's fantastic, have a taste!" If you do taste, there's no stopping. You must have a piece of strawberry pie.

There's no liquor license, but the most expensive item on the menu is only $4.30. What you don't pay in prices you'll spend standing in line. When it opens, there are 5:30 to 10:00 line-up of hungry Bumpkins addicts out on the street. If you get dessert (and you may have to wait about 45 minutes depending on how busy they are), you can always go into the health food store next door and do some snacking, while a friend holds your place in line. Once you get inside, if you're not frozen from the weather, the wait is really worth it!

Kege'n Cleaver is part of a chain stretching from B.C. to Texas, a successful Canadian operation. Its chain atmosphere isn't too apparent to Torontonians, since it's Eglington-Yonge location is (so far) the city's only one. The menu is standard steakhouse, the decor is slick but the food is tasty and well-prepared — restaurant is small, casual, cosy, and brimming to the ceiling with lively chatter as people pass baskets of fresh rolls and garlic butter up and down the two long wooden tables in the front room. There's also another small room with separate tables in the back, if you can't get into the front room.

At under $15 for two (well under, if you're not a drinker) Kege'n Cleaver is a happy, if conventional way to pass an evening.

be a great success. Which is a pity, because I don't like sharing this small, tastefully decorated cafe with anyone. I trust you won't go to sample their delightfully low-priced meals. A full course meal with egg drop soup or chilled juice, an entree like shrimp salad, spaghetti with meat sauce or veal scallopini with rice, and a butterscotch pudding dessert can run you as low as $1.75 and no higher than $2.45.

For that low price, you also get a truckload of atmosphere like a diffused golden light, continental tables, small fashionable paintings by Angelo Sgabellone, and inspired service by the diminutive, charming Italian waiter John Farina who could put a horde of white jacketed models at any big-name restaurant to shame.

Specials change once a week, usually on Sundays. But the low prices stay the same. The Art Den doesn't have a licence: it isn't even trying for one. It's hours are from 11:30 am to 11 pm every day except Sunday when it throws open its heavy wooden doors at 5 pm.

It's the kind of place that you want to go back to, and in return they remember who you are. When I went in to do this piece, they immediately thrust a package of cigarettes into my hands that someone I had taken there a week ago had left behind.

Probably my fav place to eat in Toronto is the MacDonald's at Yonge and Bloor. I love the way those greasy burgers and fries just slip down your throat and nestle in your stomach for the rest of the night.

Besides that is the thrill of being part of a legend. There are hundreds of identical MacDonald's restaurants from coast to coast and that can really give a person a sense of belonging.

Also at Yonge and Bloor is the fun of watching all the people lining up for the Uptown Theatre.

Give yourself a break today. Gillian Mackay art reviewer and gracious hostess the chicken-tiver-on-rye, a good du jour and tea would be a good bet anytime, but my 4 pm favourite is the "Change of Pace" sandwich (blended walnuts, oranges and dates) and a cup of melita coffee.

Two dollars and a few cents change — that's all.

Although The Garden Party's only open from 11 am to 7 pm Monday to Saturday, Joel holds a mini-concert "dialogue" between himself and one other Toronto jazz musician, every other Sunday evening. Among the recent guests have been Don Thompson, Guido Basso, Heygood Hardy and Ted Moses. Now, tickets are only $3, but the room only holds 45; and that means getting your pasteboards well in advance.

Concert coffee and goodies are on the house. Frank Crocker proof-reader, book reviewer and gentleman extraordinaire

This won't be very up-to-date, I'm afraid, as I've not been out to a restaurant in months. Anyway, my two top favourite food places are, or were, in more affluent days, or are now, on Spadina and the Ralput on Bloor at Spadina.

The Java is the only place I know serving Indonesian food, the best I've come to. It tends to westernize pretty drastically and the helpings are small, but if you go with a group you can order a good variety of meat, fish and vegetable dishes.

So long as you choose carefully — avoiding all that the Versafood nastiness of the chicken special — you can also get a good tasty meal at the Rajput. It's probably cheaper than The Java too, although — as say — I haven't checked the prices at either place in some time.

On the whole, I think if you're really keen on Indonesian or Indian cooking, the best solution is to equip yourself with Rosemary, Assens South East Asian Cookbook, and Diarmit Singh's Indian Cookbook (both Penguins) and do it yourself. Apart from certain fruits and fish you can get all the ingredients in fish stores in Toronto. Fiona Poole theatre editor

J. Alvarez del Vayo,
The March of Socialism, Doubleday

If one were inclined to be charitable, Julio Alvarez del Vayo's The March of Socialism could be dismissed as confused and foolish, as a book that should be considered a well-meant product of senility, and gently forgotten.

Certainly an attempt to cover a topic as gigantic and complex as the history of socialism is ambitious, and shortcomings are to be expected.

But charity would be misplaced in reviewing this book. Although there are some interesting anecdotes and even a few insights scattered here and there in the 400-odd pages, they are little more than frosting on the dung-heap.

Primarily, the book is a piece of rather grotesque Stalinist apologetics (but then, are there any other kind of Stalinist apologetics?) interlaced with the eclectic moderation that modern-day Stalinoids have made their trade mark.

Alvarez del Vayo himself was a leading 'fellow-traveller' in Spain during the civil war in the 1930's. Although nominally a member of the Socialist Party, he was universally considered a political adherent of the Communists. As a member of the Republican government, he participated in the fight against Franco's fascists, but on the basis—insisted on by the Communists—of currying favour with the 'progressive' bourgeoisie by attacking the working class. The result was the murderous assault on workers' organizations and the destruction of the social revolution that had occurred. It is hardly necessary to add that the will (and ability) of the Spanish workers and peasants to fight against Franco suffered as well. While their troops fought the fascists at the front, their brothers were gunned down by the Communists in the streets of Barcelona.

This makes it all the more ironic that the Spanish Communists were widely portrayed abroad as a "red menace" for every bit of revolutionary activity that occurred in Spain was resisted and undermined by the Communists and their friends—such as Alvarez del Vayo.

So perhaps it's not surprising that Alvarez del Vayo is strangely reticent about the Spanish Civil War and his role, even though he holds forth at great length about topics such as the Roman slave rebellion of Spartacus and various feudal peasant uprisings. Could it be modesty that keeps him from acknowledging his own contributions? They do deserve to be remembered, after all.

His praise of comrade Stalin deserves to be remembered as well, and it is to be hoped that it will find a place in future anthologies of black humour. If nothing else, this book should help future generations understand the depths of intellectual dishonesty to which some of the men of our time sank.

Muscle and Blood
Rachel Scott
Dutton

Muscle and Blood is a collection of horror stories. But, unlike other instances of the genre, these are not set in Gothic castles, Transylvanian forests, or on the English moors. Their setting is the factory and the mine; their theme, occupational diseases and industrial accidents.

Accidents which, the author argues, are not usually so accidental. As she states her theme: "Workers die daily in explosions and fires, are mangled by machinery, deafened by industrial clangor, and driven to the breaking point by harrassment and the command to work at a dangerous pace. Hundreds of thousands of men and women—human beings with families and hopes and bodies as sensitive to pain as any person's—are poisoned at work by fumes and solvents and suffocated by lung-filling dusts. Yet, ignorant as primitive tribesmen of the human results of a burgeoning technology, most of them die quietly, their families accepting deceptive diagnoses such as heart disease, cancer, emphysema."

The book deals entirely with the United States, where the 1972 President's Report on Occupational Safety and Health estimated that 100,000 Americans die per year from occupationally caused diseases, and that "at least 390,000 new cases of disabling occupational disease" occur each year.

muckraker, strong on vivid description and emotional outrage, but less strong on systematic presentation and analysis of underlying reasons. Nevertheless, it is a valuable and moving book.

The underlying message is loud and clear: human lives are being mutilated and destroyed for the sake of profit. This was the message when Upton Sinclair wrote The Jungle in 1906, describing conditions in a Chicago slaughterhouse; it remains just as true today.

In fact, perhaps the most frightening thing is that, in some ways, the problem has gotten worse in the intervening 68 years. While sweat-shop conditions have been alleviated somewhat and safety laws upgraded (although the improvement is not nearly as much as is often imagined) there are other dangers now that barely existed at the turn of the century. Notable examples are the proliferation of toxic chemicals and gases in industrial processes. They present a much more massive threat to human life, not only directly through 'accidents', but less obviously but more importantly in the long run as a source of pollution and disease.

The slaughter takes on an amazing variety of gruesome forms:

Disability and death from cotton dust in the lungs, a product of working in cotton mills. Blindness and deafness from pesticides. Insanity caused by carbon disulfide poisoning. Cancer and silicosis from the dust and fumes in the foundries. Men burnt, or crushed to death, in countless mine disasters. Fingers lost on the assembly line. Sterility from exposure to radiation.

Slaughter is an appropriate word. These 'accidents' are not 'acts of God', without cause and without cure. The vast majority of them are preventable. The fact that they continue, unprevented, therefore makes them acts of violence on the part of those who own the mines and factories, those who set the inhuman speeds on the assembly lines, those who fail to set or enforce adequate standards, those who impose the work discipline. A man who contracts cancer from the fibres in the air in an asbestos plant is the victim of violence from his employer as surely as if he had been shot by him. (Sometimes the direction of the violence is changed: a Detroit auto worker was recently found not guilty by reason of insanity for killing a foreman. He was sent to join the other victims of society in the asylum.)

It is doubtful; very, very doubtful, that the solution to this violence lies in appeals to those who cause it: the capitalist corporations. (Muscle and Blood, incidentally, deals almost exclusively with the most 'advanced' giant corporations, such as Ford, Anaconda, 3-M, not with small, non-unionized plants where the standards presumably are lower.) Slower speeds, more research, greater safety precautions: these would cut into profits and therefore a company's competitive position. A conscientious capitalist would likely soon find himself out of business.

The government? How many more generations should we wait for action from them? A cynical person might almost conclude that their sympathies lay with corporate profits rather than workers' lives.

Even their statistics distort the truth. A miner who dies of silicosis after spending two decades in a mine will very likely be listed as a 'natural death', not an industrial death. And a man who succumbs to alcoholism after years on a General Motors assembly line is not eligible for workmen's compensation either. The figures obscure the facts, and especially cause and effect, as much as they reveal them. A government that refuses to admit the realities is not likely to do much to change them.

Nor is this a 'problem' that is confined to industrial workers and their families. Even university students (for example) breathe the chemicals in the air and swallow the asbestos fibres in the water supply. (Meanwhile the Ontario government has raised the amount of filth in the air that is 'permissible': the levels of pollution originally established for urban industrial areas are now to be found in Algonquin Park. No doubt the 'permissible' lung cancer death-rate will be similarly revised upward soon.)

Where Muscle and Blood is weakest is in suggesting a transition from understanding the problems to solving them. It has little to offer except pious hopes.

But there are indications that anger is producing action.

In Toronto, for instance, a Union of Injured Workers has recently been formed. On the job, slowdowns and wild-cat strikes are increasing. (For example, General Electric workers in Scarborough walked out last month when a man was killed on the job because of unsafe working conditions.) Working conditions (the ubiquitous and frequently officially denigrated 'local grievances' in contract negotiations) are increasingly matters of bitter struggle on the shop floor.

The only solution to the 'problem' can be an economic system in which work is radically lessened, in which it is made safer and more human, in which its benefits are distributed equally, and in which it is controlled by those who do it.

Fat friend short on weight

London — New York — Toronto, Charles Laurence's My Fat Friend has finally turned up at Toronto's O'Keefe Centre like wayward baggage on British Airways. However, this lightweight Brit-com has travelled well. Robert Moore's direction ensures the spontaneity, pace and sparkle essential to a play about a girl who sheds 60 lbs. to win a fella, only to discover that Mr. Wonderful really likes chubby birds anyway. Heavy stuff, real heavy: an isolated speech threatens to distinguish superficial from inner beauty. Mercifully, however, these sentiments are not the province of the play, but of one of its characters — a heather-brained Scot, whose philosophizing is proportional to the singleness of his Malt.

The potentially sombre moments of the play are contained within the pleasantly farcical action. Standard stuff, like besieging the bathroom, sparring for the bouquet, and placating the drunk, alternates with verbal gaffs and double takes which are so convincing that one feels a mistake has actually been made on stage.

Fat Friend is a comedy you can laugh at — the visceral not the cerebral kind, I mean. And laugh you do, despite the fact that the humour derives only from two sources: male homosexuality and female obesity. The full repertoire of both subjects is pretty well exhausted by Laurence. More credit to the production that we continue flapping the old lower jaw appreciatively over two and a half hours of show time.

Fat Friend should have been about — if it isn't already — the ill-starred, ill-hormoned relationship of an ageing faggot and his landlady, A Higgins-Eliza Doolittle relationship is at once more and less descriptive of Vicky and Henry in Laurence's play. It's a relationship that exists more in the playing than in the writing. The ensemble acting of Lynn Redgrave and George Rose, their conspiratorial hilarity, their winks and nods, their non-verbal interchanges, transcend Charles Laurence's unsophisticated, literary creations.

Lynn Redgrave is superb. Her performance is quite seductive, completely winning and above all natural. She has a very comprehensive range and uses it to advantage. George Rose is good in those scenes when he is being paced by Redgrave. Otherwise, he is one-dimensional. Even a middle-aged, civil servant of a fag surely does not have to adopt Jack Benny's arm stance every time he wants to speak.

Moreover, Rose's vocal pitch is locked in top; seldom does he employ his lower register in this portrayal of a caricature. His character has the funniest lines, too! There are two other people in the cast.

John Lithgow plays James Anderson, who spends his time writing unsuccessful novels and evading the harmless advances of Henry. Lithgow, who apparently joined the show in New York, is an otherwise recommendable actor struggling with a simply atrocious attempt at a Scottish accent. It's enough to raise the clans and make Robert the Bruce give up spiders for good.

Finally there is Stephen C. Bradbury. He plays the North American in the piece, and you can tell because of the initial between his first and last names. Bradbury makes what he can of the thankless role as the cad. He's a stage prop in the way Americans, Canadians and Australians usually are in West End comedies.

My Fat Friend runs until January 25th. It's worth seeing for Lynn Redgrave's performance, or if you can't get enough of those funny English comedies on TV. But sit close; the play is wrongly housed in the barn-like O'Keefe.

Godfather II completes the set

The Godfather, Part II has the makings of a cheap attempt to cash in on the commercial success of Part I. There was a great amount of pre-release publicity and Paramount was pressing the film's director to finish it as soon as possible. And I expected this film to be a betrayal of its predecessor, as is often the case with most sequels.

In the hands of its director, Francis Ford Coppola, no such thing has happened. The Godfather, Part II is a brilliant conclusion and elaboration of The Godfather. Coppola, in fact, given a greater freedom in Godfather II, has made a film that is more personal and far superior to Part I. Together, these two films stand as a great epic and a major contribution to American cinema.

In Godfather II, Coppola displays a genius for Shakespearean renditions of atmosphere. In the opening scene Coppola confronts us with Michael Corleone (Al Pacino) in his seat of power. His face is hard, beneath it lurks a shadow. In the background we hear the strains of Nino Rota's waltz theme.

The evil and murky atmosphere with which Part I concluded, immediately takes hold of the viewer in Part II. Throughout the film, an ugly, suffocating air prevails.

The Corleone family is Coppola's metaphor illustrating corruption, evil, power-hunger, and the dehumanizing effects of superorganization. In Godfather II, he deals with Michael Corleone between 1958 and the early 1960's. At the same time he returns to the childhood and early life of Vito Corleone (Brando in Part I).

Robert De Niro, who portrays the young Don Vito Corleone in Part II, has an incredibly difficult task. He is required to play two characters simultaneously: Vito Corleone and Marlon Brando. De Niro is excellent in his preservation of the character that Brando created.

At the same time though, De Niro gives a fresh and greater depth to our understanding of Don Vito. The face of old Vito haunts us from Part I as we watch the young Vito Corleone come to America and rise to power in Part II.

The actors carried over from Part I and the new ones introduced in Part II, are all excellent. Along with De Niro, warranting special mention is Lee Strasberg, making his screen debut at 73 as Hyman Roth, a Meyer Lansky-like mobster.

Strasberg is one of America's most respected acting teachers and Al Pacino was at one time a pupil of his. It's interesting to watch master and former pupil performing together.

Unfortunately the editing in this film is often rather weak. Coppola was forced to do three months editing in two weeks because Paramount was anxious to release this film before Christmas. There are scenes that are abrupt and poorly cut into the film. The Cuba sequences are particularly sloppy and obscure in their editing.

The Godfather, Part II is more sparing in its violence than Part I. Yet in Part II, the characters take hold of the viewer; there is a higher sense of reality. The fewer acts of violence therefore, turn out to have a greater impact than those of Part I.

When one remembers the innocent Michael of Part I, one is immediately disturbed by his hardness and corruption in Part II. In Godfather I we sympathized with the murders Michale commits; we most cheered him on. In Part II Coppola shows us how foolish we were.

In Part I, through our acceptance of Michael's crimes, Coppola forges a unity between ourselves and Michael. Just as Michael, we too believe that certain acts of evil can be justified.

In Godfather II, we are shown the consequences of justifying evil. When we see Michael decline into the darkest depths of evil, his crimes begin to repel and horrify us.

We wonder how we could have cheered him on; is there a Michael Corleone in each one of us? This film forces a re-examination of oneself.

Motown records alive & well

While rock music seems to be going through a period of drought as far as talent is concerned, the soul music scene is alive and well. Gone are the influences of the James Brown Wilson Pickett era; the new heroes are Marvin Gaye, Stevie Wonder and Barry White. This rebirth of soul music can be linked directly to the revival in the disco scene, which serves not only to entertain but also to act as a method of exposure for new acts. And of course soul music does what all rock bands seem to have forgotten about in their quest for money — it makes the listener dance.

Of course soul music wouldn't have the image it has if it wasn't for Motown records, and this week we have three new records from them. The first is "Mark of the Beast" by singer guitar player Willie Hutch, who wrote eight of the nine songs on the record, as well as producing and arranging it. Featuring a large horn brass section, backed by an orchestra, the pace on the nine cuts never slows down while Hutch handles the vocals with poise and feeling.

Although several cuts seem very heavily influenced by Marvin Gaye, they nevertheless sound quite fresh and interesting. Although the record as a whole has no weaknesses the outstanding cuts are "Mark of the Beast", "Get ready for the get down" and "Woman you touched". Don't pass it up.

David Ruffin's new lp "Me'n Rock'n Roll are here to stay" opens with a very dramatic thunderstorm before leading into the opening tune "I saw you when you met her". From there the album just gets better and better, as Ruffin works through the next seven songs handling each one so well that you'd swear that you were listening to a quartet or trio, and not a single performer.

Ruffin has always had an excellent voice but on this album he proves that he indeed is here to stay, as he sings very gentle ballads, "Smiling faces Sometimes", and then becomes a screaming rocker on cuts like "Superstar", "Me'n Rock'n Roll are here to stay" and "I just want to Celebrate". Both sides are winners with several possible single hits, although side two has audience noise but no explanation as to whether it is a live concert side or just a frill. The man has talent and proves it.

The Caston & Majors record is different from the first two records, in the sense that it almost comes off as a soundtrack for a film or play. Keyboard player Caston wrote or co-wrote all eight tunes, although I was unable to discover who or what Majors is, he is ably assisted by the orchestral work of Jimmie Haskel and the fabulous vocals of Sylreeta. The album opens with "Child of Love", a spacey hymn-like song that sets the mood for the rest of the record. There is no silence between the tracks and after several listenings each tune emerges as a part of a theme — the cycle of life — with its ups and downs. And although there are moments when the action becomes a bit too elaborate and over-orchestrated, the over-all concept works out quite well. Not your average soul record, but then spice is the variety in life.

Kuerti's Beethoven series: Hammerklavier is a revelation

With six concerts in his Beethoven Sonata series completed, it appeared that Anton Kuerti had fulfilled the expectations its announcement had raised. With his witty, articulate and well-informed spoken preambles to the music, Kuerti established himself in the minds of his listeners as an immensely talented musician and an equally likeable person. One was impressed, to be sure, but to say that one was in awe of his talents would have been, to some extent, an overstatement.

With this in mind, last Sunday afternoon's instalment in the series was a kind of revelation. Bringing out the beauty in Beethoven is no easy task; neither is the thunder in the Waldstein sonata an easy thing to procure. But these tasks are nothing beside the Hammerklavier. It is, as Charles Rosen says in his excellent book, The Classical Style, "extreme" music, "obsessively concentrated". Far and away the most demanding sonata in the pianist's repertoire, it is a work of massive proportions; in its pages, and especially in its last movement, fugal and anguished, the pianist comes face to face with the genius of Beethoven, pushing his art as far as it could go. The music makes giant steps in harmony, in its form and structure. Parts of it sound, even to Schonberg-assaulted ears, "modern". There is no way around it; to play the Hammerklavier, the pianist has to come to terms with himself as an artist, to square himself with Beethoven.

One may, as an amateur pianist, fool about with other Beethoven sonatas, but like an intermediate skier who keeps away from the most difficult slopes, one just doesn't tackle the Hammerklavier unless one's technical abilities are of the highest order. Other Beethoven sonatas glow with beautiful melodies and easily understood form, form that "makes sense" because it follows the conventional rules. The Hammerklavier is decidedly not "pretty" music — although there are moments of transcendent beauty in it. It is one of those rare works of art, like Fyenchon's Gravity's Rainbow, that one can approach with the greatest respect, and perhaps a little fear. This is art pushed to the very limits of its creator's abilities; for the listener whose experience of Beethoven is confined to the Fifth Symphony and the Moonlight Sonata, this is an altogether different world. Even those who know other late Beethoven — like the Ninth or some of the later quartets — can't see as clearly into the composer's final thoughts without this work in their listening (or playing) experience. In this respect it's important to remember that the highly challenging, and the following Scherzo movement demands speed and a light touch near the end, where the music fades off, pianissimo, ending suspended in the air. The third movement — which takes about 25 minutes to play — is thoughtful, brooding and immense. Above all, the pianist has to have his eye on the long line, the overall structure, since the pace is so slow that the point of the movement can be obscured if the whole isn't kept in mind at all times.

The final, fugal movement is probably the most difficult in all piano literature. There are huge leaps and complex trills at every turn, and massively complex passages where the fugue reaches its most intense pitch.

Kuerti took the better part of an hour talking about the Hammerklavier, but the time almost stood still as he spoke. Though his talk was technical, there were images any layman could grasp. For instance: "If one took the first movement at the tempo marked on the page, it would be like a caricature," he said, and bashed out the first few bars at a ridiculous speed, "like a Charlie Chaplin movie with all the movements speeded up."

Watching Kuerti play this sonata was a draining experience, physically and emotionally. He's an all-stops-out performer, giving his all for the music; during the music's most compelling passages, he quite literally threw himself at the piano. After he was finished, there was little that could be said... Kuerti had said it all, in quite thrilling fashion.

If it wasn't apparent before this performance, it's clear now: Anton Kuerti is an artist of the most major proportions, and we must count ourselves very, very fortunate to have him in our midst. A musician this talented and gifted, radiating this much personal warmth, is someone to be thankful for. To attend one of his performances is to have a concert given for you. Within the intimate confines of the Great Hall, on these gloomy Sunday afternoons, Kuerti has given part of himself to all his listeners.

piano was Beethoven's instrument; he could control it totally, unlike a symphony orchestra, so the music inevitably becomes more personal, more direct, more intense.

Anto Kuerti understands this, and has the technical resources to make it come off. On Sunday afternoon, he preceded the Hammerklavier with two shorter sonatas: the op. 90 and the op. 14, no. 2 were both given polished, loving performances. Both showed off Kuerti's melodic gifts to the advantage; with his total control over that magnificent Steinway of his, he can translate his intentions perfectly. In his hands, these two sonatas were almost bursting at the seams with joyous song. Neither are particularly heavy works in the Beethoven canon, and Kuerti tossed them off with the élan they needed.

But on the subject of the Hammerklavier, the pianist's focus has to shift. Even the technical giants of the keyboard have to pause before playing it. The first movement is

Neville Marriner's latest disc: Polished musical miniatures

One of the record world's busiest artists has to be Neville Marriner — as can be seen if you check out his listing in the Schwann Catalogue. With his perpetual companions, the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, he has explored most of the standard repertoire for small orchestra and a good deal of the esoteric as well. So, when he sets out to record an album of short pieces — encore numbers and album fillers, mostly — the results should be expectedly polished examples of the musical miniature.

On a new Angel release (S37044) Marriner shows us just how polished these pieces can be. Leading off side 1 is Albinoni's Adagio in G minor, a moody, pensive melody that shows off the talents of the Academy quite well: the violin line which carries the melody is smooth and the intonation is perfect, and Marriner keeps a steady hand on the balance between the strings, the organ and the violin solo, ably played by one Iona Brown, presumably a member of the orchestra.

Following the Albinoni number are short items by Mendelssohn (the scherzo from his Octet), Handel, Mozart (a rarely-heard March) and Bach (the Sinfonia from the Christmas Oratorio). Side two opens with the classical sleeper of the decade: Pachelbel's "Canon", roughly five minutes of repeating melody over a "ground bass". This piece was first recorded (at least in a release that achieved extensive publicity, if not notoriety among serious musicologists) on the Musical Heritage Label, the New York-based classical record mail-order company. In an interview, the proprietors of this company admitted, somewhat sheepishly, that the arrangement wasn't quite genuine; in fact, it had been "adapted" by an arranger they had hired for the purpose — hence the notoriety.

Radio stations featuring classical music were soon swamped with requests for this infectious little number, and before long, everybody and his cousin had recorded it. Marriner and friends do a fine job on this piece, marked with the conductor's fine sense of control and proportion. Beethoven's lightweight Contradances follow, including a suspiciously familiar-sounding one: number 7 of these 12 dances is based on the theme that was later used in the finale movement of the "Eroica" symphony.

The Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah" is next, then Bach's well-known "Air for the G String" from the third suite for orchestra. Ending off the disc is a nifty Mozart number, the "Sleigh-Ride", actually one of Wolfgang's German Dances from his last years in Vienna.

All told, this is a pleasant, inviting disc, chock full of hummable tunes, one that would be welcome in any collection. It's well-recorded and well-manufactured, but for some reason, Capitol slips a little sheet of advertising into each copy, for Toshiba, no less! It doesn't bother me — I just throw it out — but it seems a curious thing to put in a record... well, if it subsidizes classical records to a certain extent, it can't be all bad.

My apologies for failure to show in last Friday's issue. Fortunately it was a rather uneventful week, and little was really missed, save perhaps for the Turtles' show last Monday at the El Mocambo. In the upcoming weeks though, things will be picking up again, but doubtless not to the saturation point they reached last fall.

On campus, three concerts of some significance have been planned for Con Hall within the next month. Gentle Giant on Jan. 24, Lynyrd Skynyrd on Feb. 2, and old bluesmen Sonny Terry & Brownie McGhee with guest star, the incredibly gifted David Amram, on Feb. 16. Unlike previous SAC concerts, all three will offer only one show each, so pick up tickets from the SAC office soon.

Two jazz concerts of note will be taking place at Seneca College in Fabruary. Maynard Ferguson, who fronts what I believe to be the most exciting big band anywhere, will be there on Sunday the 2nd, and Two Generations of Brubeck with guest, Gerry Mulligan lending some time on his extraordinary baritone sax, will be featured on Monday the 17th. Also a notable from the world of jazz, vibraphonist Gary Burton, is featured at the Colonial Tavern tonight and Saturday.

At Massey Hall, the promotion team of Fiedler-Finklestein has assembled three folk concerts of interest to many. John Prine, one of today's more recorded artist-composers returns to Toronto after too long an absence on Jan. 24. The poet-novelist-songster of St. Urbain, Leonard Cohen presents two shows on Jan. 31, and finally Murray McLauchlan returns to Massey Hall on Feb. 15 to celebrate his success of the past year with the fans he loves most.

Also appearing at Massey Hall are the ever-changing, always unpredictable, but seldom significant Straws, on Feb. 6.

Beaver's, Victoria College's folk club got off to a pleasantly surprising start last Friday (considering the complete lack of advertising) with guest artist David McBride, a newcomer to the business, who stole the show from featured performer Christopher Hall. Needless to say, McBride will be offered an evening on his own in the near future. Also in the next month, look for popular artists Pat Godfrey & Len Udow, and the always pleasing Stringband.

Off campus, the El Mocambo features Kelly Jay and his new band Bad Manners through Saturday and Jr. Walker & the All Stars all next week. At Egerton's, where they tell me there's no cover charge on Monday nights, you can catch Bob Gibson until Saturday and Richard Keelan from Perth County Conspiracy every night next week. Local folk-singer Dan Hill rounds out his week at the Riverboat Saturday night.

movies

Tonight through Sunday the ever elegant Revue theatre screens Fellini's Roma at 7:30 pm and Bertolucci's superb The Conformist, which Pauline Kael called "one of the most visually lush films ever made."

For the rest of the week the Revue has booked in Bergman's Three Strange Loves, Summer Interlude and Monika, alternating nightly on double bills.

Also, the UC film club presents End of a Priest by J. Skovrecky in the Med Sci Auditorium at 7 & 9 pm. Admission by membership or a fistful of dollars at the door.

Reg Hartt has fled Rochdale to 344 College St. where he has rejuvenated that crumbling theatre with a steady diet of film buff favourites. He's got Charlie Chaplin in City Lights and an Oscar-winning Katherine Hepburn in The Philadelphia Story. Both films were produced in America during the Depression. Closes Monday. The theatre, by the way, now goes by the name of The College Cinema.

Hartt is at it again with D.W. Griffith's original two hour and 45 minute roadshow version of The Birth of a Nation. The film is from his own private collection and is showing at the Palmerston Library, 560 Palmerston St., tomorrow at 2 and 7:30 pm for $4.

Nosteratu, a 1922 silent film by F.W. Murnau on the vampire motif, is Monday's offering of the Ontario College of Art film series. The film rises out of the grave at 100 McCaul St. at 7:30 pm. Admission free.

The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz and The Magic Christian is Tuesday and Wednesday's unusual doublebill for a single bill (99 cents and a penny back) at the Roxy.

Wednesday at OISE, the film of the long-running London West End stage play, Slueth, with Laurence Olivier and Michael Caine. That's at 7:30 pm, and at 10 pm it's Caine again in The Magus. No OISE films Thursday.

art

The outspoken Canadian nationalist and art critic, Barry Lord, has challenged any member of the U of T Fine Art department to a public debate on Progressive Art: Continental or Canadian. Lord is the author of the recently published History of Painting in Canada. In the book he condemns foreign and capitalist domination of Canadian culture and calls for an art which would serve to increase national and political consciousness. Lord has asked for someone with "some degree of conviction and eagerness" about the subject matter and it will be interesting to see who, if any one, takes him up on it.

Lord is a man who holds to his opinions with fierce strength and tenacity. At an AGO press conference in October he asked Henry Moore, whether it would not have been better for the art gallery to have invested in a Tom Thompson centre instead of devoting its space to him. Just like that. Just that peremptorily. Just that dogmatically. The "debate" is sponsored by SAC and the Canadian Liberation Movement and if it takes place it will take place in the Music Room at Hart House, Wednesday, January 22 at 7:30 pm.

Crayon drawings by Claudette Boulanger have been up since Tuesday in the Hart House gallery. The show of Japanese prints, at Vic continues until the 24th. See reviews in this issue.

Two exhibits open tomorrow at the AGO. One is Chairs, described by the Curator of Contemporary Art as "a serious, comic, metaphysical, feet-on-the-ground examination of the burning issue of chairness". The show looks at the chair "as a design object, as a symbol, as subject matter for artists and so on" and "contains some objects which are funny, probing, magical and feative in nature." The work of New York artist, Sol LeWitt, will also be on display in the Prints and Drawings Gallery until Feb. 16. LeWitt is described as a conceptual artist whose "drawings are the product of calculations employing the complex mathematics of form". This also means that he is difficult to appreciate and that most people don't understand what he is going.

This column appears so irregularly simply because of a lack of space. The good review editor who makes concessions to this department head does not necessarily make a good department editor himself. However, we'll try to appear more frequently even if at less length in 75.

What else is there to look forward to in 1975? It's not until next October but there it is ahead of us: The International Poetry Festival presently being organized by the Hart House Library Committee.

I quote from the draft description the committee is presently circulating in an effort to raise the necessary funds:

"The Festival will run from the afternoon of Sunday, October, 16th, through Saturday, November 1st. Between 25 and 30, poets will be invited to participate. Each participant will stay for two days."

The Festival is intended "to introduce the University of Toronto community and the public to a broad spectrum of international and Canadian talent." It is "to encourage an essentially Anglophone audience to appreciate the variety of French language poetry and to accept the English-French fact in the cultural life of the nation." It is "to provide an opportunity for young poets to meet and share a stage with their more established colleagues, and to receive recognition for their work." It is "to bring Canadian poets to the attention of the international poetry community and to show Canadians that a national poetry need not be parochial."

To these ends, poets from English Canada, from French Canada, from the United States, from England and from France have been invited.

Who will come from England is, of course, the big question. I played a guessing game with Alex Dadson, the secretary of the Library Committee. Is Philip Larkin coming? I asked. "Well, he doesn't read in public any more," Dadson says. Stephen Spender? "That would be the thing," John Betjeman? "He may be too old to make the trip across the Atlantic one more time." It finally emerged that D.J. Enright had been invited and had accepted, and that Peter Porter, and Tom Wayman, Al Purdy, Dennis Lee, Bill Bliss and Earle Birney, among the Canadians, and Robert Creeley an American had all been invited as well but had not yet been heard from.

No holds barred at boat show

There is something about the Boat Show that's especially challenging. I mean, the display of so much hardware, of so many objects, large and small, (so much more so this year than ever before with the move to the CNE Coliseum) — and all of it centred around what is essentially an experience, a memory of an experience, the prospect of it.

Perhaps that's why so many people were touching the boats, patting the sides, smoothing the already rather smooth fibreglass hulls, and going on board if they had soft-soled shoes on. You can't be satisfied with the sight of sails billowed out by fans for long.

The Boat Show, until next summer, until Sunday, 12 noon to 10:30 pm. $2.

Education can be cured! I have it on good authority that bad cases of oppressed brains can be totally relieved by judicious application of music. So take heed, and partake:

Toronto Symphony resident conductor Victor Feldbrill leads the orchestra at Massey Hall next Tuesday and Wednesday night in an interesting program: Haydn's "Drum Roll" symphony, Canadian composer Jaques Hetu's Piano Concerto, and Elgar's always-pleasing Enigma Variations. Tickets $3-9, and as usual, rush tickets are available from 7 pm the night of the concert. Soloist in the Hetu piece is pianist Robert Silverman from Montreal.

Silverman himself is giving a recital on the twenty-third at Eaton Auditorium: Liszt's B Minor and Schubert's A Minor sonatas are featured. Tickets at no charge are available if you call 925-3311, ext. 4835.

Hart House is a busy place this weekend. Sunday afternoon, Anton Kuerti gives us recital number 8 in his Beethoven Sonata series. This week he'll be playing nos. 7, 22 and 32. All the tickets are gone, but line up early and you might get a rush ticket.

The same day, the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada invades Hart House, for an 8:30 concert in the Great Hall. This one looks promising, with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll", Pergolisi's Concerto Grosso No. 2, Telemann's Viola Concerto and two other works on the program. They're all rarely-heard works (with the possible exception of the Wagner) and at $2.50 for students it's the best concert buy in the city this week. Oh yes — it's a sure sellout, so follow the Kuerti instructions if you want to get in.

Backtrack a bit (I can never get the order of items straight in this column) to Saturday night, and you can hear the Chamber Players of Toronto in a concert at the Edward Johnson Building. Leader Victor Martin takes the limelight to play Ksaya's Violin Concerto, and the remaining program of Schubert, Respighi and several others — including the faculty's own Godfrey Ridout — looks promising indeed. Students get in for $2.50, 8:30 pm.

Ah, that St. Lawrence Centre! The talented Maurizio Pollini arrives on Wednesday night to play a recital in the centre's Piano Star series. It's probably sold out already, but ardent piano buffs might scrounge up tickets at the box office. $4 and $5, if ya can get 'em.

We've got some prizewinners over at the Faculty of Music: the Orford Quartet, undoubtedly Canada's finest String Quartet. Their St. Lawrence Centre concert was a sellout, but if you want a chance to see them, tonight is a good chance. $4.50 and $5.50, no student specials, and a sure sellout. Get there now if you want a seat.

Toronto theatre arouses from its Christmas torpor this week, thank God. Beginning as usual with on-campus shows; Penetration and Jet of Blood, by L. Russell and Antoine Artaud, respectively, opened at Studio Theatre, 4 Glenn Morris Street last Tuesday. Concludes Sunday. Admission free. Martin Hunter's Frogs opens on the 23rd at Hart House, runs till February 1. Aritosophanes seems to have pulled out on the show.

Off campus, Kulture's bursting out all over. Maggie Smith is at the Alex in Noel Coward's Private Lives (January 13-February 1). Solzhenitsyn's Article 58 premieres at the St. Lawrence on the 21st. (You may know the play better as The Love Girl and the Innocent, its published title.) Passé Muraile stimulated by all those porn-till-dawn-tv show offers is Love You Baby Blue. Frogs Theatre's The Pits will be really free till the 19th; previews continue from then till the 21st at regular prices. Open Circle Theatre, one of the most interesting groups presently working in Toronto in my opinion, is opening a show at Enoch Turner House on the 23rd, (runs till March 1st). The content has been "inspired" by Gay's Beggars' Opera, the title — A Soupsong — by Mr. Chuckles. Altogether a more exciting week than we've had in a long time.

Varsity fencers fare well at York Invitational meet

By CHRIS NOKES

Over the weekend, Varsity participated at the York Invitational Fencing tournament. Toronto placed second in foil competition and third in sabre. The Blues also managed a three-way tie with Windsor and RMC for second place in epee.

Oscar Wong won 14 of his 15 bouts while Bernard Tsui won 12 and rookie Doug Crawford took 9 of 14, in foil competition. RMC won the division over Toronto by one bout.

RMC also won the sabre section while Varsity placed third. In the epee division on Sunday, Trent took first place with the Blues tied for second with Windsor and RMC.

UC II edges Emmanuel 2-1 in thriller

Chris Leven (16) scores Emmanuel's only goal early in the first period.

By DAVE STUART

"If in doubt, shoot the puck down the ice and maybe the referee won't call icing" seemed to be the pattern of play at the arena when two of the scourges of the intermediate hockey league clashed yesterday afternoon.

The strategy seemed to pay off as quite often the ref did not call the appropriate icing perhaps since he was alone and would have to skate all the way down to the end of the rink to recover the puck.

The referee was not the only one having troubles. The timekeeper was also in a quandry as he was stopping the clock with each whistle.

When asked why, he replied, "I'm not quite sure."

In any case the game was an end-to-end spectacle with first Emmanuel and then UC II putting on the pressure. Emmanuel opened the scoring on a goal by Chris Leven who was left alone in front of the UC net. The puck bounced off goaltender Wes Brown's pad and between his legs into the net.

Emmanuel then took advantage of UC's first penalty when six divines took part in the power play unbeknown to the referee. The howls of protest from the UC bench went unnoticed.

The score was evened when Emmanuel was called for an icing infraction while Bob Williams was in the sin bin for Emmanuel for interference.

UC tied the score early in the second period when Emmanuel's defence handed the puck to UC's Mike Turk in front of the net. Turk made no mistake with his shot.

Midway through the second period, UC tallied the winning goal from the stick of Paul Freedman ably assisted by Mike Turk.

The score could have been 3-1 for UC when Mike Turk had a breakaway in the final seconds but was thwarted by Phil Miller, the divine netminder.

Final score was UC 2 and Emmanuel 1.

On Tuesday the Lady Blues basketball team played their second game against Sheridan College. The ladies downed Sheridan the first game before the holidays.

In Tuesday's game the Lady's were a little slow at the start. Sheridan made good use of the fast breaks, and the Lady Blues picked up their play a little too late.

Swim Blues face two meets this weekend; should be easy wins

By PAUL CARSON

Chalk up another coup for the inventive (some might say perverse) mind of Varsity men's swimming coach Robin Campbell.

Faced with the perennial problem of finding suitable competition for his OUA and CIAU championship team, Campbell has come up with a unique solution that should produce the best display of swimming likely to be staged in Toronto this season.

Blues will face an all-star team drawn from Swimtec, North York Aquatic Club, and York University tonight at 7:00 in the Benson Building Pool.

Swimtec is coached by the experienced Nick Thierry and former Varsity backstroke champion Jim Shaw, while Bob Boadway runs NYAC and Dave Goodwin handles York.

Saturday afternoon sees a fresh opponent as Blues tackle University of Ottawa coached by Campbell's old nemesis, Fouad Kamel. As coach of McGill in 1972, Kamel handed Blues their only defeat in the past nine CIAU championships.

With a handful of top performers and the luxury of a 50-metre pool for training, Kamel should be able to supply some interesting competition. The meet is set for the somewhat claustrophobic Hart House pool starting at 12 noon.

Blues will still be without the services of captain John Sebben, sidelined with a knee injury.

His spot in the breaststroke events will be filled by rookie Juri Daniel who clocked 1:02.3 during the 400 medley relay in last week's victory over Western.

Versatile George Gross, a double winner over Western, plus veterans Dave Wilkin and Shawn Laari are also expected to be used frequently.

It's possible that Jim Adams, holder of no less than eight Varsity pool records and life-time top performances' will also be entered.

Adams, winner of eight CIAU sprint titles, is no longer eligible for OUA competition due to the five-year eligibility rule; however, he has continued training with an eye toward the 1976 Olympics and is allowed to compete as an unofficial entry during the dual meet schedule.

Adams holds every Varsity freestyle record from the 50-yard sprint to the gruelling 1,650-yard marathon and for good measure also set records in the 200 and 400-yard individual medleys last season.

Moreover, he then swam the anchor leg on two more record-breaking relay teams.

Campbell, Adams and Wilkin are in the process of returning from a week-long schedule of special meets against top U.S. competition as Campbell coached an eastern Canada all-star team to victories over Harvard (55-40), Suburban of Illinois, and Penn State.

Swim fans should recognize Jim Adams who is no longer eligible to compete for Varsity.

Women's hockey falls short

Travelling to Bishop's University last weekend, the Varsity women's ice hockey team lost the penalty-ridden championship game 4-3 to the Loyola Tommies.

To gain the championship berth, the Lady Blues blanked a determined Bishop's Polar Bear squad 5-0, behind the stalwart goaltending of Judy Reeves, a hat-trick by winger-turned-centre Betty Cook, and a two goal performance by defenceman Jay Westlake.

The Blues entered the tourney short-staffed, dressing only 11 players and not carrying any regular centres.

In the championship game, the team came out sluggishly allowing Loyola to establish an early one goal lead. Two successive goals by Maureen Mitchell, the first at 19:58 of the first period and the second, early into the next frame, gave the Blues a short-lived lead.

Loyola notched the equalizer midway through the second period. Towards the end of the second the Lady Blues ran into a rash of penalties, eventually playing only six minutes of the third period at full strength.

After Loyola scored their third goal to take the lead, the Blues, playing short-handed, pulled their goalie with three minutes to go, to see Cathy Stead pull the trigger at 18:36 of the third period.

With overtime seemingly obvious, the Blues, still short-handed, succumbed to the pressure a fourth time, in the last minute of play, to lose the match for good.

Sac cagers (ha ha) challenge Varg cagers tonight

WOW! the game of the century is tonight at Hart House at 8:00 pm when the SAC Scrungies challenge the Simmonds Sifted Scribblings to a basketball game in the upper gym.

See Smiley Seymour and Masher Sabia beaten to their knees by Canada's version of the Harlem Globe Trotters. See such stars as Scoop Strauss, Streak Simmonds, Leaping Lawrence Clarke, and Sizzling Stuart dazzle the crowd with their cager savoir-fair, on behalf of the world renowned Varsity team.

Basket Bettson and Gene 'Meadowlark' Allen will also be featured. Las Vegas odds-makers say the Varg will take SAC by at least 40 points. This is a one-time, winner-take-all match for all the marbles.

Varg b-ballers are hard at it in preparation for the big game tonight. Sac doesn't scare us.

Toronto grapplers form strong nucleus for years to come

By LORNE BASSKIN

Wednesday night, the Varsity wrestlers travelled to Waterloo to compete in a tri-meet with two of the more powerful OUA teams — Western and Waterloo.

Led by double wins by Jack Preobrazenski and Rob Moore, Toronto came within narrow margins, three and four points respectively, of defeating these two teams.

The loss is not truly indicative of Varsity's strength this year. Studies and injuries have forced coach Rabel to often leave several wrestlers off the card. As a result the team has had to forfeit points in the weight classes in which Varsity did not have a representative.

These forfeited points were the cause of Varsity's loss Wednesday night.

Toronto's chances for the finals this year look good, but fantastic for the next couple of years. Both the maturing of Toronto wrestlers and the graduation of top wrestlers from other schools make the outlook for the Blues a bright one in upcoming years.

In the early '60s, Varsity produced formidable teams, but team strength has declined recently. This could be the year to turn things around.

Toronto is led by veterans who are making a name for themselves around wrestling circuits. An arm injury has sidelined team captain Walter Cringen, but Rob Moore, Lenny Gang, and Roger Vachon have three years of competition and are having excellent seasons so far. Other veterans are Roman Preobrazenski and George Multamaki.

The key to a successful future could lie in the crop of rookies that turned up, some of whom are already placing well at the university level. This year's rookies are Glenn May, Jack Preobrazenski, Doug Duncan, Frank Sisti, Ed Rector, Kirk Osadetz, Alan Kosugi, Fred Gartner, Sam Turchiario, and Scott Smith who was forced out of competition early in the year due to knee damage.

Varsity's next meet is tonight at Hart House when Ryerson will provide the opposition. Meet time is 5:00 pm.

Fired for union action, says worker

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
Union activity may have led to the firing Friday of a storeroom worker at the Ramsay Wright zoology building.

Paul McCreavy, a five year employee at the Ramsay Wright building was called in Thursday for a "disciplinary interview" by zoology department administrator G. H. Temple.

The interview became heated, McCreavy said, after he requested the presence of a union representative to ensure his rights were being protected.

The next day McCreavy was called in by Temple again and handed a letter of dismissal.

Around Christmas, McCreavy had also been called into Temple's office following a complaint about storeroom service. McCreavy had been told then that if there was no "marked improvement" in his service by mid-January he would be fired.

Temple refused to comment yesterday on McCreavy's dismissal.

Both disciplinary interviews arose after complaints by zoology professor Jacques Berger about the length of time it took to have items delivered from the storeroom to his office.

Berger also declined to discuss the dismissal with The Varsity.

But the real reason for the dismissal, McCreavy maintains was his attempt to promote union activities among the zoology department support staff.

Previous to the disciplinary interviews, McCreavy said, he had already been researching unions and sounding out many non-academic staff members on their attitude toward unionization.

After the first complaint, which McCreavy considered "unfair and petty," he said he realized there was no recourse for a non-unionized zoology worker should he be threatened with dismissal.

McCreavy then approached the campus' Service Employees Union, local 204. This union includes all university caretakers, animal care attendants, bus drivers and other support workers.

A group of workers from the large Medical Sciences storeroom had simultaneously approached the union for membership.

Examination of the Sept. 27 contract reached between the Governing Council and the union revealed that the job of storekeeper was already on the list of unionized positions and that the 50 university storekeepers should be considered part of the union.

No effort had been made by the university to inform the storekeepers of this change, McCreavy said, or to tell them of the resulting improvements in their condition.

McCreavy said the original complaints about the storeroom service were unfair because the storeroom was understaffed.

McCreavy said he and his immediate superior, C. W. Smith, were the only two workers in the storeroom which supplies the whole Ramsay Wright building.

McCreavy said Smith, the senior storekeeper for 40 years, has been pressing the administration for an adequate number of workers to man the storeroom.

University officials have freely admitted to Smith the storeroom is understaffed but claim they lack the funds to hire more workers.

Smith was unavailable for comment on this yesterday.

Consequently, McCreavy said, the two storeroom workers responsible found themselves unable to keep up with the workload.

The storeroom workers' duties include not only shipping and receiving but also stocking shelves, pouring hazardous chemicals, delivering scientific supplies to staff and students, installing glass cylinders, phoning or typing order sheets, phoning or typing order sheets, handling waste chemicals and radioactively cleaning the storeroom as well as doing all the requisite paper work.

The many complaints against the zoology storeroom over the past few years can be reduced to a problem of insufficient manpower, McCreavy said.

Chief union steward Bob Gibson has told McCreavy grievance procedures will be initiated.

Marxist economist refused visa

Marxist economist Andre Gunder Frank has been refused a visa by the federal immigration department which would allow him to teach in Canada.

Frank, who has been offered a one year visiting professorship at the Universite du Quebec a Montreal, is appealing the decision with the support of outraged Quebec academics.

Telegrams were immediately sent by the rector of the university and the Conference of Rectors and Principals of Quebec universities protesting the denial.

The application was turned down by the immigration office in Stuttgart, Germany, where Frank now teaches. He previously taught in Canada at Sir George Williams University before going to Chile under the Marxist Allende regime.

The deputy minister of the Department of Manpower and Immigration refused to comment on the action. He said officials had obtained information about Frank through a previous application for landed immigrant status.

This information provided the basis for refusal of the visa request. The section under which Frank was prohibited excludes mentally or physically defective persons as well as criminals, spies and members of subversive organizations.

Frank spent 18 years in the United States, from 1941-59, and graduated from the University of Chicago. He has written several books on Latin American economics from a Marxist perspective, including The Development of Underdevelopment and Underdevelopment or Revolution.

Frank argued capitalist countries have distorted the economies of so called developed countries by building dependent economies and plundering natural resources.

He taught at Sir George for two years and left Canada before his application for landed immigrant status was turned down.

He fled Chile after the fascist coup in fall 1973.

Athletic complex gets height bylaw exemption

By KATHERINE ROWLCLIFFE

The proposed university athletic complex moved one step closer to reality last week but still has a long way away to go.

The proposed building was exempted from the modified 45-foot holding bylaw by Toronto's Planning Board in a report to city council Tuesday.

Construction of the 85-foot building, to be located on Harbord St. adjacent to the Benson Building, has been delayed because it violated the 45-foot height limit of the holding bylaw.

Following Ontario Municipal Board's overruling of the bylaw in December, the city established a set of interim criteria for exemptions. Tuesday's decision granted the athletic complex an exemption from these criteria.

Tom Harpur, a spokesman for the Huron-Sussex Ratepayers Association, expressed surprise when informed of the exemption.

"I thought they'd have a harder time of it," Harpur said. "What the university wants I guess the university gets."

But don't rush out with your picks and shovels to help break the sod for the building.

The provincial government's decision to cut back grants and U of T's deficit budget this year has forced the university to severely restrict major new capital expenditures.

The university now has six of the $10.5 million required for the building.

U of T administrators had been hoping for money from the provincial and federal governments, in addition to funds raised privately and a levy on student fees, to finance construction. The provincial government has promised only $300,000 for the building.

Jack Dimond, special assistant to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conaway, predicts a student referendum on a possible levy in the spring.

Dimond estimates a yearly $10

levy on user fees would, over eight or nine years, generate $1.5 to $2 million.

Physical education professor Bruce Kidd predicted last fall students would be eager to pay the levy as a protest to the Davis government.

"We're not doing Bill Davis any favors," Kidd said.

"We have a government that is so philistine, it refuses to support this sort of thing," Kidd said. "We will look after our own needs here."

That remains to be seen.

Dimond has admitted it students vote against such a levy, the proposed building would be abandoned. But he is confident students will support the tax.

In a letter to former Ward Six alderman William Archer last October, U of T president John Evans outlined the problem.

At present, Evans wrote there are 4.5 square feet of indoor athletic space per student at U of T. This compares with 42.2 square feet per student at Laval and 13 square feet at Waterloo.

Even with the new athletic complex, U of T would offer only 11.3 square feet.

The proposed building would cover a total of 240,000 square feet and would include an olympic-sized swimming pool covered by a field house.

A learn-to-swim pool has been added to the plans, in response to pressure from neighborhood groups to accommodate public needs in the complex.

Area ratepayers have presented a brief to City Council outlining their concerns about the potential parking problem, public access to the facilities and the basic design of the building itself.

"That's the ugliest block on the U of T campus — and now they want to add this abortion to it!" Harpur complained.

Dimond explained the university has assured the ratepayers they will be able to use the facilities on a regular basis.

Tenure proposals upset students

By JOHN ROBINSON

Hopes for better teaching at U of T will dim if Governing Council approves recommendations submitted earlier this month.

If an academic affairs committee report is passed, students will have no vote and possibly no seat on departmental tenure committees, despite the long student campaign to improve teaching at U of T.

According to the proposal, one non-voting observer will sit on an otherwise all-faculty tenure committee.

The observer will be chosen from the alumnae or lay members of governing council, or the student body by a method yet to be studied. Students won't even be guaranteed a seat.

Even if appointed as observer, the student would have limited powers. The right to speak and to peruse all documents would be given, but in cases of bias the student could only complain and demand a new hearing.

But major concessions have been won. For the first time, student evaluations would be obtained specifically for a tenure hearing.

The recommendations specify that "objective course evaluation methods" be used to collect information from "all types of students who have been taught or supervised" by the tenure candidate.

In addition to course evaluations, teaching ability would be assessed by the faculty members of the candidate's own department.

The method has yet to be decided but presumably it would be more rigorous than the present system of coffee-room speculation.

The "publish or perish" system will not be forgotten if this report is adopted.

One added twist, however, will be the knack of obtaining grants. In future, racehorses and professors alike may be judged by their monetary winnings.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch emphasized the importance of teaching quality, saying it would become even more important in the next few years.

"With tight money in the future, the university will be shaped less by hiring and more by tenure, because they won't be doing much hiring," Kanowitch said.

"If Governing Council passes this recommendation by academic affairs, it will be just reaffirming the way tenure has been decided around here for years — behind closed doors and leaning strongly towards research over teaching.

Student representatives from 20 universities and community colleges from across the province decided in Toronto Saturday to call study sessions on or before Jan. 29 to discuss university financial problems.

The 60 delegates held workshops at U of T to discuss strategy and tactics for both educating students and exerting pressure on the government. The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) sponsored the conference.

The delegates are requesting a meeting with Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld Jan. 31 to demand answers and present demands.

The study sessions will focus not only on the Ontario Students Award Plan (OSAP) but the general cutbacks in university funding and their implications.

The Ad Hoc U of T Committee on Student Aid is now circulating a petition for changes in OSAP. SAC external affairs commissioner Susan Rich said the committee was undecided on whether to formally request the cancellation of classes for a study session.

The financial crisis will be the main focus of a one day OFS conference in Toronto Feb. 8. Non-OFS members will also be involved.

The Third World, somebody said, is everything that's left over once you've talked about Europe, and North America.

A group of students and faculty met last Tuesday to discuss the disproportionate emphasis given to European and North American studies at the university and the corresponding lack of emphasis on courses in the Third World area — which includes Africa, the Caribbean, Latin America and Asia.

It was pointed out that because Third World studies are divided up among several departments — history, political science, economics, anthropology, geography and literature, for example — no one organized group exists to work out long-term priorities or even to deal with immediate problems such as are posed by this year's provincial budget cutbacks.

At Tuesday's meeting it was decided to hold another, better-publicized meeting, which all students and faculty interested in Third World studies are urged to attend. The purpose of the meeting is to form a general committee for Third World studies.

The committee will try to establish long-term priorities for studies in the area, and will also deal with the immediate problems that people from different departments are having in their particular areas.

The meeting will be held tomorrow at 4 pm in room 2117 of Sidney Smith Hall.

The Jewish Studies Course Union will be holding a general meeting Thursday to discuss the need for new courses and plan course evaluations. Deborah Obar, course union spokesperson says it is important for students to make known their feelings on existing offerings in Jewish studies.

The Jewish studies program includes over 300 students but does not have departmental status. The course union also provides information on Study Elsewhere programs in Israel.

The meeting takes place 3 pm Thursday in Sidney Smith Hall, room 1074.

Hispanic union gets committee

By JENNIFER WONG

Students in Spanish and Portuguese now have a forum in which to air their views on the instruction they are receiving.

Partly as new departmental policy and partly in response to agitation by the Hispanic Course Union, a staff-student advisory committee has been established. The committee is composed of seven staff members and seven students elected from the core grammar courses for each year.

Committee co-chairwomen, Shelley Rothman, a fourth year student, and Wendy Rölph, an assistant professor, both see the committee as a positive move to better interaction between the Department of Hispanic Studies and its students.

"There seems to be a new mood, and it's good," Rothman said. "Things are happening. Professors are becoming more open and approachable; suggestions by students for certain course changes are being acted upon."

A previous advisory committee was a casualty of the 1972 recession of student radicalism, and Rölph said she firmly believes in the beneficial effects of such committees.

"Students and professors sometimes have mutual problems — discussion and cooperation can turn up better solutions," she said. "Sometimes, students get wrong impressions, simply because they don't have the basic information. Here, the committee can really help," she added.

One of the first concerns of the committee will be to examine the number of courses where material is taught in Spanish and students are required to write assignments and tests in Spanish.

The recently formed Hispanic Course Union hopes the advisory committee can make effective recommendations to the department on such key issues as: publishing student evaluations of professors, standardizing half-course work loads, encouraging Spanish as the working language in all higher level courses, de-emphasizing translation work and improving the organization of grammar laboratories.

But Hispanic department acting chairman A. M. Gordon stressed the committee is an advisory body only and has no governing powers.

No student representatives sit on any policy-making bodies within the Hispanic department.

On its own initiative, the department has also undertaken course, textbook and professor evaluations. While textbook and course evaluations will be made available to the students, the results of the professors' evaluations will not be disclosed.

Symposium discusses non-violence

By DONALD COLE

The firing of three University of Waterloo social sciences professors last term illustrates the violence perpetrated by Canadian educational institutions on students, a U of W sociology professor told a seminar of a symposium on non-violence held at that university last week.

Ron Lambert told an audience of an education seminar that the three fired professors were succeeding as teachers because their students were understanding and dealing with the reality of their oppression within the authoritarian university.

Students' protests of the dismissals of Hugh Miller, Marsha Forest and Jeff Forest of U of W's Renison College indicated students' opposition to coercive normalcy, Lambert said.

The seminar — one of about six at the four-day symposium organized in commemoration of Martin Luther King's work — stressed the effectiveness of non-violent action in bringing about social change and resisting violent repression. The symposium, the first of its kind in Canada, attracted about 200 people.

Some participants also criticized academics' unwillingness to study means of generating healthy political conflict.

Speakers argued academics' avoidance of confrontation leaves only extreme forms of action and violence open to those who want substantial change.

Mennonite anthropologist Roland Fisch, who lives and works as a missionary on the Hollow Water Indian Reserve at Wanipewag, Manitoba, told a seminar on racism of his difficulties with the local hospital's all-white board of directors.

The board, Fisch said, refused to grant proportionate representation to the area's Indians. Fisch criticized the health care which the Indians received at the hospital.

Fisch also condemned the "respectability" of Canadian racism, citing restrictive customs in public places like restaurants and bars and the frequent assault and jailing of Indians for inadequate reasons.

U.S. civil rights leader Jim Lawson outlined his experiences in organizing blacks to fight the racist policies and customs in the southern U.S.

Other panels at the symposium dealt with individual and collective responses to religion and marriage and the family as breeding grounds for violence.

U of W's Conrad Grebel College, which sponsored the conference along with the university's student council, is engaged in studies of non-violent methods of conflict resolution. The college offers courses in peace studies.

Radio Waterloo, the student station, is to make available tapes of the symposium.

Meds faculty starts research unit

By MATHILDE VERHULST

U of T's Faculty of Medicine is establishing a laboratory research unit at the Toronto Western Hospital for the study of neurological diseases in general and multiple sclerosis and polyneuritis in particular.

The unit will be financed over the next 10 years by a gift made to the U of T by the late Stuart B. Playfair in 1961.

The research facility will be called the Playfair Neuroscience Centre. The Playfair Fund, established in 1961 to commemorate Playfair's wife Helen who died of Parkinson's Disease, consists of a block of stocks valued originally at $1 million, but is now worth about three times that amount.

The fund will provide for the operating costs of the unit for the research team's salaries for the next 10 years.

U of T president John Evans, announcing this at a press conference yesterday, said he was "confident that the quality of research" of the centre "will attract support" from other granting agencies for the provision of additional laboratory equipment and operating expenses.

The director of the Neuroscience Centre is Dr. Edwin H. Eylar, 40, an American biochemist and neuroscientist whose experiments in inducing nervous disorders in monkeys have shown the experimental condition can be cured by injection of a certain isolated protein from the peripheral nervous system even when the disease has reached an advanced stage and the monkeys are near death.

Eylar said the induced disease in the primates has many points of similarity to multiple sclerosis in humans.

Multiple sclerosis, like the "allergic encephalomyelitis" produced in the monkeys, are both demyelinating diseases.

Myelin is the fat-like substance that forms a major component of the sheath surrounding the body's axons or fibres.

Both diseases seem to result, Eylar has discovered, when the body's own mechanisms (what Eylar called "macrophages") start attacking and eroding the myelin sheaths of the nerves causing "short circuits" to occur and causing progressively more serious interference with nervous transmission of the brain and the rest of the body.

Eylar, a professor in the Medical University of South Carolina, said he and his colleagues (one of whom is Dr. William Sheremata of the Montreal Neurological Institute) are studying the diseases at the molecular level.

They have discovered the same molecules appearing in the animal and the human diseases. In fact, they have been able to identify and synthesize the disease-causing locations in both the primates and humans.

Eylar will join the U of T medical faculty July 1.

Treatment said politically oriented

By ANN SILVERSIDES

"We are perhaps witnessing the phenomena of a disfunctional client in a disfunctional family undergoing disfunctional therapy in a somewhat disfunctional society," Dr. J. Rankin said yesterday in the first lecture of the Clinical Institute Seminar Lecture Series at the Addiction Research Foundation Auditorium.

Rankin, medical director at the Addiction Research Foundation and associate professor of medicine at U of T, lectured on The Politics of Treatment and dealt more specifically with the politics of therapy in alcohol and drug abuse problems.

Therapy, Rankin said, is a wide range of concepts that vary in connotation for the subject, though the subject affects directly, the therapist and the community.

If the goals of therapy are to help and to change, one must ask who is to be helped, what is to be changed and how, Rankin maintained.

In the physical health analogy the physician's first responsibility is to his patient and the reasons for failure to solve a particular problem are easier to identify, Rankin said.

But the very question of defining the problem in areas related to mental health rests on the concept of normative behavior and (to a greater extent than in somatic medicine) the identification of contributing difficulties in the larger social environment of the "patient."

Thus, Rankin said, failure to solve a problem related to mental health is rarely attributed to therapy; there are many more contributing factors.

Rankin used a series of diagrams to illustrate the diversity of possible goals in therapy (those of the individual, society, the family and the therapist) and pointed out how socially acceptable goals do not necessarily meet the needs of the individual.

The scope of therapy, he said, is wide and includes intervention in many ways in many systems: the physical, psychic and spiritual system, and that of society's values.

Rankin went on to define the ideal starting point for therapy as an agreement on its goals by all concerned, and to list the characteristics of an ideal therapist which, regardless of the therapist's professional training or the methods used, were directly related to success or failure in therapy. These included empathy, respect for the individual, genuineness and self-disclosure.

This ideal, he said, is utopian precisely because it omits politics and political power. In therapy, as elsewhere, there are multiple power relationships and dynamics between all concerned.

A therapist's characteristics, Rankin maintained, are determined more by his own social upbringing than by his professional training.

Thus, he said, the ideal starting point that he proposed (agreement about the goals of therapy) is not possible realistically.

Therapists themselves have different value systems and diverse commitments; some varying combination of patient care, education, research, professional needs and standards and their personal needs. A great gap exists between the ideals and the reality of therapy because of the many forces which affect the nature and quality of care received.

When we look at the results of formal therapy compared with control groups, Rankin said, as many 'improve' with treatment as without and it has further been shown that individuals undergo more extreme changes (much better or much worse) with formal therapy than without.

Specialized institutions should not be isolated from the general system of total health care in society, he maintained.

Freedom of the press was again the winner as The Varsity basketball Frodoeters rolled up 80 points in a hard-hitting game with SAC Friday evening.

We won't mention the SAC score because it might prove a political embarrassment to the Kanowitch administration. The Simmonds Streakers dominated the game with enthusiastic shooting, rebounding and passing.

Among the leading shooters for The Varsity team were Gene "Meadowlark" Allen, "Kareem Abdul" Simmonds, Scoop Strauss, "Century" Bettson and jumpin' Jennifer Wong.

Equally poor for the embattled SAC shooters were "crazy legs" Kanowitch, "beanball" Buckley, bumbling Barnes, trembling Turzyk and "spaghetti legs" Jarrett.

The Varsity jumped off to a quick 20-point margin which it never relinquished. Admired by Coach Dave Stuart, Varsity staffers relentlessly pressed on towards superlative performance.

The next sporting encounter between the titans of the press and the SAC hackers will be a hockey match. Be sure to be there. Lawrence "Mr. Zero" Clarke will be in nets for The Varg.

The Communist to C

The following are excerpts reprinted from The Communist Threat to Canada, a pamphlet printed by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in 1947. Copies can be obtained from New Hogtown Press.

The traitorous fifth column of the Canadian Communists, who, like their fellow-conspirators in all other countries outside of the U.S.S.R., are pledged to the destruction of political and economic freedom from within and to the liquidation of the middle and upper classes, is a dangerous force threatening the free existence of the Canadian people.

A child, seeing the tip of a cobra's tail in the grass, might mistake it for a harmless earthworm. No such mistake is excusable in the political life of Canada.

The aims of the Communists, and their zeal in pursuing those aims, are so openly on the record that a man must be blind indeed to assert that the Communists in Canada are "just another political party" or that "their activities should be ignored and left unchallenged."

Actually, the evidence is complete and absolute that the Canadian Communists are the revolutionary agents of a foreign power, that their only loyalty is to Communism, that they have promised to destroy our national life by lies, strife and bloodshed, and that they have never faltered in their long-term program to make Canada another Communist State, in which our parliaments, civil service, judiciary, army officers, merchants, manufacturers, bankers, large landowners, prosperous farmers and non-Communist trade union leaders would all be exterminated by the Red dictatorship.

According to their blueprints, our land would ultimately be under a Communist dictatorship and a soviet police, and whole categories of our population would be liquidated in the course of integrating our life and economy into a Communist State.

REVOLUTION FEVERISHLY ACTIVE TO-DAY

Many Canadians are still fooled by the Communists' clever lie in pretending to disband the Communist International in May 1943. Actually, the Comintern is more active today than ever before in its history.

The spy probe at Ottawa has shown by unchallenged official documents that the "general staff" of the world revolution is still operating in Moscow, with a relay station in Paris, and that every detail of the Theses and Statutes and the Program of the Communist International is still being carried out.

In every country of the world, Communist revolutionaries are on the march. They are active in Japan and Korea. In China, their military leaders, specially trained in Moscow for the job, are waging deadly warfare against the country's recognized government.

In Viet-Nam they conduct war under the Communist Ho Chin Minh; in Malaya their partisan movement against the British was guided by radio direct from Moscow; in India they stirred up mutiny in the Royal Indian Navy in 1946 and are today exploiting every form of violence; the French colonial empire is riddled with Communist intrigue, while France itself is in mortal peril, with Communist domination of the labour unions and of key government posts, their honeycombing of the police and the armed forces, and their possession of a well-trained and well-armed private Red Army.

They are active in Italy, Germany, Holland and Belgium.

They have a dangerous grip on Cuba, Chile and Brazil.

If they win out in Asia and Europe, the United States and Canada will soon be completely isolated with over 92 percent of the world mobilized against them and a dangerous nest of Red traitors doing their best to wreck us from within.

PROPAGANDA AND THE PRESS

That all these startling facts are little known or darkly understood by the Canadian public is partly due to two groups of Canadian journalists: (a) those of the "legal press" controlled by the Communist Party, and (b) those of certain other papers that purvey Communist propaganda.

The former, rarely mentioning that they are Communist, present the Party line on all issues and seek their readers among the workingmen of Canada, especially the many of European extraction; the latter, deliberately or unwittingly, soften up and befuddle Canadian commercial, industrial and professional groups.

That these are heavily financed by the Communist Party is indicated by the fact that they are run virtually without advertising revenue, are handled by skilled revolutionary journalists, and receive a large part of their contents by free cable from Moscow, written already in each case in the appropriate language.

Thus, although there are only about 3,500 Bulgarians in all Canada, a well-edited weekly, printed in Bulgarian by Communists in Toronto, carries freshly cabled articles sent from Moscow by the Foreign Commission of the Union of Soviet Writers, whose function in a revolutionary despotism is to supply the regime with propaganda.

escort visitors through specially selected factories and residential districts, and that a worker who dared, in the presence of a foreigner, to express dissatisfaction with the regime would not live long.

One need only remember that for "breaches of labor discipline", such as grouching at one's job, the Soviet bosses have authority to expel a worker from his home and cut off his food. (Edict of December 4, 1932).

Complaining to a foreign visitor would be a vastly more serious offence.

It must be remembered that the iron curtain referred to by Winston Churchill still exists and it must be obvious to all that this curtain will not be lifted for those casual visitors who are conducted through Russia in very carefully controlled tours.

FREEDOM VERSUS TYRANNY

The menace of the Communists to our Canadian way of life is vividly evident.

In a Communist Canada, every surviving citizen would be subject to a rigidly tyrannical control of every detail of his existence.

He could not choose his job, or change his job. For grouching he could be ejected from his home. For lateness he could be sent to a slave-camp in the Yukon.

and he would never know when their knock on his door by night might be the prelude to his death, torture, or exile at forced labor, without a particle of evidence of even the formality of a trial.

Our Canadian way of life, is, perhaps the freest in human history, and our scale of living second, only to that of the United States. By comparison, Communism may be said to have solved nothing; for to shoot one's citizens or oppress them by the million in concentration camps is no real solution for a country's economic ills.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce believes that Communism is an organized and even fanatical world movement opposed to true democracy and to the freedom of the individual.

In the light of this belief, the Chamber holds that it has a responsibility to its members and to all Canadians to expose the aims of the Communists and the methods they employ, and to draw to the attention of all citizens the threat which Communism presents.

Criticism of Communism does not imply enmity to Russia nor does it brand the critic as a war-monger. While it has been necessary to make comparisons with Communist Russia as indicated in the foreword this has been done because in Russia Communism is the official system of government.

Our purpose has been to demonstrate that that system is incompatible with the democratic way of life.

Communism is subversive because it

For attempting to escape from such a Canada, he would be shot and his innocent family given five years of penal servitude. The only incentive to enterprise would be the higher wages of the faster worker in a ruthless system of speed-up at half-starved sweated labor. He could read only Communist-approved literature; listen only to Communist-approved radio programs; and vote only for a Communist-approved candidate (with no alternative). Even his leisure would be confiscated for "voluntary" work on Communist projects. Every phase of his daily life would be pried into by political police, sniffing out heresy against the Communist order, preaches the overturn of our form of government by force; it is tyrannous because it stands for the destruction of political freedom; it is treacherous because it compels obedience to a "party line", formulated outside this country, rather than to duly constituted authority. Weakness or complacency in the face of evil is not to be tolerated and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce expresses the belief that by presenting the facts it will help to develop a more informed electorate, alert to the dangers which exist. This will be our best safeguard against state regimentation and loss of individual liberty.

But there is usually one aspect of university culture that helps define the mood, ambience and emotional intellectual bent of students. It used to be spiked with nonconformity and rebellion: now the trend is toward an otherworldliness in entertainment that's filled with fantasy and mysticism, that transcends reality.

Lawrence O'Toole,

Communist menace still threatens

Today, The Varsity, fearless defender of the people's right to know, fearlessly reprints a feature on the dangers of communism, courtesy of the 1947 edition of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

We had a good laugh reading it, poring over such gems as: "A child, seeing the tip of a cobra's tail in the grass, might mistake it for a harmless earthworm. No such mistake is excusable in the political life of Canada."

Ha ha ha. Who believes that stuff nowadays? After all, this is the fearless 1970's, and boy they sure were paranoid then, not like now when we're really liberal and everything.

Well, liberal up to a point. There have to be limits, don't there, otherwise there'd be, well, anarchy. We're all for freedom of speech and everything, but we absolutely draw the line when it comes to dangerous Marxists like that German economist Andre Gunder Frank, who has the nerve to say that he wants to come and teach in our country.

We know what he's about — subverting the system, our very rights and freedoms, that's what. And just look where he's going: Quebec, where they have all those dangerous unions and separatists who probably can't even hum God Save the Queen.

Luckily, those good old boys down at the immigration department are doing just a swell job. Admirably, they refused to give the guy a visa to teach here, although they very cleverly said they weren't sure why they did it. Even immigration minister Robert Andras doesn't know why.

(Mind you, Andras has made a career of not knowing why. Remember back in 1972? He didn't know why when Hungarian Marx scholar Istvan Meszaros was supposed to come to York University to head a graduate department of political theory, and they held up his visa so long he eventually left in disgust.)

Isn't it comforting to know, even though the 1940's are long past, that we still have some stalwart defenders of our basic freedoms and liberties left in the public service? Men who are not afraid to say no to these pernicious traitors and infiltrators, not afraid to turn the other cheek to the outraged whinings of spineless academics! We say hats off to Bob Andras and his courageous boys in the department of immigration. Keep up the good fight, fellas!

Meanwhile, we're going to go back and have a second look at that feature.

Oh Canada, thank God someone at the immigration department still stands on guard for thee!

Cutback on immigrant doctors easy way out

The following article is a statement issued Jan. 10 by NDP provincial health critic Jan Duksta.

It is now obvious that the Ontario Government and the Minister of Health are not prepared to do a major restructuring of the health care system in Ontario, a restructuring which is necessary for three reasons:

1. to improve the availability and accessibility of health care;
2. to shift the focus of health care from bed-orientated to community-based ambulatory care; and
3. to cut costs.

The government has settled for cutting costs by cutting down the influx of foreign doctors. It is ironic that what (Health Minister Frank) Miller is now concerned with is what, to an unbiased observer, would look like an example of medical protectionism.

At the same time, Dr. Bette Stephenson, speaking at the Empire Club, has demanded a 14 percent increase in doctors' fees, which is perfectly ridiculous as physicians already make $41,200 net yearly on average.

If you take these two statements in conjunction as expressing a collusion between the government and organized medicine, one sees that the physicians have accepted that some cut in costs must be achieved — but it is not going to be done at their expense. By concentrating on the exclusion of foreign doctors their present incomes can be kept intact, and possibly even increased.

Who will suffer?

Mr. Miller is preoccupied with the physician-patient ratio, which he sees as adequate for this province but which is immensely misleading in actuality. The overall Ontario ratio which is now in the vicinity of one doctor for 650 patients belies the actuality of the availability of physicians in various parts of Ontario.

It may indeed be the ratio in Toronto, and it is probably higher in the suburbs — but it is not the ratio in northern or rural Ontario, where it is more likely to be one physician to 1,200 patients.

By cutting down the immigration of foreign-trained doctors we will make our medical resources scarcer, and at the same time the government will be more liable to blackmail from organized medicine which, insulated behind its protectionist barriers, will be more in demand than ever and aware of its control over health services.

Let us not shed crocodile tears over the depletion of doctors in countries outside Canada, when by stopping immigration the government is protecting the doctors' own interests here in Ontario. I refuse to recognize this action for anything more than what it is: the blatant self-serving of the medical profession masquerading as a humanitarian gesture towards the underdeveloped countries.

Still time left to fight the tenure battle

One of the most important issues the university faced last term was the question of academic tenure — the right to be given a lifelong academic appointment.

The academic affairs committee, an enormously powerful standing committee of the governing council charged with the formation of academic policy for the university, met at length and sometimes with bitterness to cope up with a proposal on the composition of tenure committees. That is, it was deciding who would be able to be 'in' on decisions to grant tenure.

The Governing Council last year formulated three explicit criteria for the granting of tenure effectiveness in research and teaching, and clear promise of future development. However, students have felt that unless they are granted a place on tenure committees — an equal place with faculty members, since they are equals in the learning process — these criteria will not necessarily be adhered to.

In particular, students are concerned about the attention paid to teaching ability. The number of good teachers pounding the lecture halls is dangerously low. Given that students have such an interest in teaching ability, it is only right they be given the opportunity to express that concern in one of its most important manifestations — the granting of tenure.

The granting of tenure is only one aspect of the campaign to improve teaching ability: the net must be cast much wider. Nevertheless, it is an important one, particularly insofar as students feel a principle is at stake. Are they to be judged as partners in the learning process? Are they to be entrusted with the capacity to make decisions?)

That did not seem to be the case last fall with the academic affairs committee, as it not only rejected a student motion to have equal membership between students and faculty on tenure committees, but also accepted one which would maintain the present faculty dominance, with no student representation.

The committee did vote in favor of an 'observer' — who could be a student or an alumnus — to oversee the tenure committee's deliberations.

In addition, the committee voted to set up a University Tenure Committee, a body which would review all tenure decisions in a given year, paying particular attention to negative decisions, or decisions where the observer felt principles were not adhered to.

This proposal now goes out to the academic divisions for comment, to be brought up at the March governing Council meeting for discussion.

Students thus have two months to decide what, if anything, they propose to do about the proposals. Two months may not seem like a long time, but if the desire to implement a more favorable mechanism for students is there, it is ample time.

There are those who say that the importance of tenure decisions will decline in an era of financial stringency, that so few tenure appointments will be made it is not worth expressing concern over the issue. That is not quite the point.

While it is true that it is imperative to maintain and enhance the government's commitment to higher education, it is equally important not to forsake fundamental university issues, such as tenure, in the process.

Cagers lose twice; gymnasts take fourth

Varsity gymnasts placed fourth with 141.9 points at the Queen's Invitational meet over the weekend. Hans Frick led the team with firsts on the parallel bars, high bar, and pommel.

Varsity Blues hockey team lost the championship, game against the University of Quebec at Three Rivers in the S. G. Williams tournament held in Montreal. The final score was 3-2.

Jacques Boucher, Yves Barette, and Michel Mimoges tallied for Quebec while Ivan McFarlane and Kent Ruhnke replied for the Blues.

The win should give Quebec top rating in this week's best ten put out by the CIAU. Last week Toronto was first followed by Quebec.

The Basketball Blues got the short end over the weekend in Ottawa as they lost 89-73 to Ottawa and 69-63 to Carleton.

Ottawa currently lead the OUA east division, and are the 'class of the league' according to Blues' coach John McManus.

The Cagers next play at the Benson Building on Tuesday night at 8:15 when the York Women are the opposition.

Interfac hockey is featuring an all-star game on Feb. 7 at 8:00 pm at the arena. Each team in division I selected five players for the game. Out this list of sixty players, coaches Kent Ruhnke and Bill Fifield will choose the best 18 for each all-star team to represent division IA and division IB.

The game likely will have three 15 minute periods.

Waterloo edges Blues 4-3

Varsity Blues lost their first game of the season to the Waterloo Warriors, the current CIAU champions 4-3.

This was the Blues' third game of gruelling hockey as they played Friday and Saturday at the Sir George Williams tournament, when they lost 3-2 in the final against Quebec.

Against Waterloo, the Blues seemed tired and guilty of numerous defensive lapses and poor passing.

If fans in Waterloo's arena can be believed, Waterloo opened the scoring at 2:14 as Bob Oss was about ten feet out of the net to stop a shot, judged it, had it come loose, and watched it poked into the net.

In the resulting jubilation nobody noticed that the referee had blown the play dead. Varsity officially opened the scoring in the first when Ivan McFarlane made a fine solo effort from his own blueline, neatly deking Warrior goalie Hnatyk, to give Varsity a 1-0 lead.

With Al Milnes in the penalty box Waterloo connected on the power play to tie the score at 10:05.

Milnes had been on the ice for 9 seconds when Pagnutti took a penalty. Sloppy defence allowed Waterloo to score the go-ahead goal on the power play.

Varsity's Doug Herridge scored the 2-2 goal at 15:25 unassisted, during a Toronto power play.

The second period featured ragged end-to-end action, horrendous defensive play, and grossly inaccurate passing. Oss was equal to any Waterloo threat as Blues preferred to play in the center ice area.

The third period started the same way but Blues soon had Waterloo bottled up in their own end. Varsity had several close chances but again displayed an inability to finish the play in front of the net.

Blues, temporarily fired up, got the puck down the ice with Herridge passing in front to McFarlane who gave the Blues a 3-2 lead.

Waterloo tied the score at 12:44 as Stinson drew the puck from the face-off and put it past Oss who never moved.

Later in the third, Barnes took the puck down the right boards and passed out to Staubitz who put the puck past Oss to give Waterloo the 4-3 margin.

Play was even until the final minute when with Oss out of the net, Blues kept the pressure on but were unable to tie.

Waterloo consistently checked the Blues throughout the game, and deftly broke up the Varsity plays. Blues missed many opportunities as they were unable to put the puck in the net when they had the pressure on.

Perhaps the Blues overestimated their endurance for the weekend by playing in the Montreal tournament. The Blues have always played a large number of exhibition games throughout the regular season to give the players experience and the fans some hockey to watch but this time the experience seems to have backfired as the blues were too tired in Waterloo.

Hockey Blues host Cornell's 'Big Red' at Varsity Arena

By PAUL CARSON

The mythical North American college hockey championship could be decided Wednesday when the Blues host Cornell University Redmen in what's likely to be the most exciting game of the year at Varsity Arena.

Both teams are highly ranked in their own conferences and could well finish the season as national champions. However, the much talked-about NCAA-CIAU "super game" is unlikely to take place in 1975, so Wednesday's game could turn into an unofficial championship.

Moreover, a fair amount of Varsity pride is at stake since Cornell is perhaps the only team in recent years that Blues have failed to beat on their home ice. The two schools have played only once at the Arena and ironically, present Cornell coach Dick Bertrand scored the winning goal as Cornell edged Blues 2-1 in January 1970.

The teams have met four times at Cornell's home rink in Ithaca, New York, with the Redmen holding a 3-1 advantage. Dogged research by the Cornell publicity department reveals that Varsity's only victory, a 10-0 shutout, came a few years ago, during the 1912-1913 season to be precise.

Cornell won the most recent game, 8-2 during the 1972-73 season.

Cornell is best-known for producing Ken Dryden, whose goaltending heroics led the Redmen to their first NCAA title in 1967. Dryden was succeeded by diminutive Brian Cropper who was in goal for the 2-1 victory over Varsity in 1970 as Cornell that year won 29 consecutive games en route to a second NCAA crown.

Last season was somewhat of a disappointment as the Redmen lost the Ivy League title for the first time since 1965.

This year's team is somewhat erratic with seven wins and a tie after ten games plus an unexpected overtime loss to Brown University. Cornell is undefeated in games against OUAA schools following an 8-4 victory over York in the season opener and a hard-fought 3-3 tie against University of Ottawa Gee-Gees, the current OUAA east division leaders.

As expected, Canadians dominate the Cornell lineup and only two American players are listed on the 25-man roster.

Four Toronto area players are included; goaltender Steve Kelleher, formerly with the St. Mike's Buzzers; center John Sands (Erindale); defencemen Fred Tomczyk (West Hill), and Jeff Schmalz (Michael Power).

Schmalz last played at Varsity three years ago in the U of T high school hockey tournament.

Leading scorers for the Redmen are Brian Campbell, a center from St. Catharines, and another center Dave Pearce from Hespeler.

Cornell's record so far this season indicates the team has not been able to maintain the tight defensive style characteristic of the earlier championship years. Opponents are getting over 35 shots per game and Redmen netminders are surrendering almost four goals per game. Blues will have two days to rest after the weekend's hectic schedule and center Bill Fifield is apparently the only doubtful starter.

Game time is 8:00 pm for what should be the best hockey of the season.

Varsity's one-legged Ed Rector is wrestled by Joe Dell'Aquila.

Swim Blues churn up two wins

By PAUL CARSON

It's not often that a team wins a hard-fought competition by finishing second in a key race but that's what happened to the men's swimming team Friday night at the Benson Building.

The record will show that Blues defeated an all-star team drawn from two top Metro clubs, Swintec and North York Aquatic Club, by just one point, 48-47, thanks to a victory in the final event.

However, the meet was actually won in the preceding race when Varsity freshman Juri Daniel chopped a phenomenal eight seconds off his previous best time to finish second in the 200-yard breaststroke with a clocking of 2:22.3. Daniel, the son of Blues' former coach and present head of U of T's phys-ed program, had never swam the 200 breast under 2:30.0 before Friday's meet.

His unexpected performance left Blues only six points behind the surprisingly strong all-stars and in the final event Varsity's powerful 400-yard freestyle relay entry handily won the seven points needed to capture the meet.

The all-stars went down fighting and actually held a slight lead after the first three legs of the final relay despite solid times by Blues' trio of Dave Wilkin, Lance Peto and George Gross. But Blues called upon veteran Jim Adams to swim the key anchor leg and he responded with a blistering 46.2 seconds and the overall time of 3:17.1 was one of five pool records set during the 11 events.

Adams broke two of his own pool records earlier in the meet with clockings of 1:45.5 in the 200-yard freestyle and 1:59.6 in the 200-yard individual medley.

The all-stars served notice that Blues weren't going to waltz through the evening with a shocking upset in the first event and set a pool record in the process with 3:41.9 in the 400-yard medley relay.

Craig Samuel followed with a solid victory in the 1,000-yard freestyle 'ahead of Blues' Shawn Laari and Jay Steele and suddenly Varsity trailed 12-4. Dual meet scoring provides five points to the winner of each event with three for second and one for third; only the top two finishers from any team are counted so the maximum point swing in any race is thus 8-1.

With defeat a very distinct possibility Blues struck back as Peto's 22.6 in the 50-yard freestyle was sandwiched between Adams' two records.

Dave Wilkin, apparently a bit tired after the gruelling U.S. tour, managed a key second place in the 50 free as Blues took a badly needed 8-1 swing.

Bill Chisholm and Jay Steele finished second and third as Ray Entmaa won the 200-yard butterfly in 2:03.4 and Peto came second to Dan Thompson in the 100-yard freestyle.

All-stars' Neil Harvey shaved one-tenth of a second off the former pool record in the 200-yard backstroke with a time of 2:01.6 but Varsity's Greg Vanular was a solid second as the all-stars took third for a 6-3 advantage in the event and a narrow 36-34 lead overall at that point.

Craig Samuel joined Adams as the meet's only double winners by taking the 500-yard freestyle but Varsity captain John Sebben grabbed second and Laari followed in third.

The 'stars led 41-38 so when Daniel took second behind Tim Dennis in the 200 breast, the visitors led 47-41 instead of the 49-39 they had hoped for.

Overall, the all-stars won seven of the eleven events and enjoyed a 27-20 points edge in the stroke races. Thanks to their final event victory, Blues dominated the freestyle events 32-16.

Since the final margin was only 48-47, seemingly unimportant third-place finishes were critical in the scoring. Mike Hibberd in the 200-free and George Gross in the 200IM contributed two points which, combined with Daniel's vital second-place in the 200-breast, added up to the narrow victory in the most exciting meet of recent years.

Blues completed a winning weekend Saturday afternoon with an 87-28 laughter over University of Ottawa in the cramped confines of the Hart House pool.

Daniel showed that his performance Friday was no fluke as he entered the 100-yard breaststroke and promptly set a new pool record of 1:02.6 erasing the former mark of 1:04 set by John Sebben last year.

Double winners were the order of the day as veteran Russ Farquhar took the 100 back and 200 IM, Greg Vanular cruised through the 100 fly and 200 back, Lance Peto captured both freestyle sprints and Jay Steele won the distance freestyle events.

Blues polished things off with a leisurely 3:28.2 in winning the freestyle relay.

Next home meet is the U of T Invitational featuring Wayne State, Niagara Falls, Guelph and Varsity, this Saturday at 2:00 pm in the Benson Building.

Wrestling Blues have strong weekend showing

By LORNE BASSKIN

It looks like weekends are the time when Varsity should be having the wrestling meets. Good showings on two weekend events provide a touch of optimism for the upcoming tournaments.

On Saturday, the RMC open provided the wrestling Blues with two silvermedals. Leonard Gang and Kirk Osadetz both finished second in their respective weight classes.

The weekend's best news was provided on Friday when the Blues refused to merely look heads with Ryerson Rams.

This time it was the other team that was forced to forfeit weight classes, and Varsity came out on top 25-15.

Ryerson, led by OUAA champion Joe Dell'Aquila, has always been represented by a first class team. Unfortunately, they were unprepared for the sudden blossoming of Varsity.

Even though Toronto had several members in the stands, there were enough wrasslers dressed to win more than half the matches.

In the first match, Varsity's Rob Moore ran into stubborn third round wrestling from Shawn Barry and had to settle for a 5-5 tie.

In other matches, Roman Preobrazenski had no trouble in disposing of Gould by pinning him in the third round.

Two of the more exciting matches were provided Varsity's Roger Vachon and Fred Gartner. In Vachon's match it was all-out wrestling for the full 9 minutes. Vachon displayed good moves and almost pinned his man twice, eventually winning 22-15.

Gartner showed real determination in his match by pinning Ryerson's Mike Barry after trailing in points, midway through the third period.

In other exhibition matches, Toronto split a pair with Moore picking up a first round pin for the Blues.

THE Varsity

Vol. 95, No. 44
Wed. Jan. 22, 1975

TORONTO

The Varsity carried a front page article in Monday's issue which implied the proposed university athletic complex had been exempted from the city's 45-foot holding bylaw. Actually, an exemption was only suggested by a report delivered to City Council.

Firing under review

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

A grievance procedure meeting will be held 10 a.m. Friday between the Service Employees Union, Local 204, and the university to begin investigating the firing of zoology support staff worker Paul McReavy.

The meeting will probably be only the first in a series between the union and the university to discuss the firing, union business representative Joe Jordan said.

Unless the university accepts the union's grievance Friday and reinstates the fired worker, he added, negotiations could be protracted, possibly ending in arbitration.

McReavy, a five-year employee at the Ramsey Wright zoology building, was dismissed last Friday by administrator G. H. Temple.

The ostensible reason for the dismissal was his sudden interest in unionizing zoology support staff workers, McReavy said.

After first showing signs of interest in unionization in early December, McReavy said he was called in for three disciplinary hearings by Temple within the space of a month, the third hearing ending in his firing.

Temple refused to comment on the dismissal.

McReavy agreed the storeroom where he worked was slow in providing service, but said the storeroom was staffed only by himself and his immediate superior, C. W. Smith, and that they could not satisfactorily serve the whole Ramsay Wright building themselves.

Smith refused to discuss the firing, saying, "The less said the better about it."

Smith, however, did agree that the storeroom was understaffed and that both he and McReavy found it difficult to get the job done.

When he first began employment at the storeroom five years ago, three men worked in the area, McReavy said, but for the past four years only two men have handled the workload.

Zoology professor Jacques Berger, whose complaints about storeroom service led to two of McReavy's three disciplinary hearings, refused to comment on the firing. He said it was an "internal departmental matter and not for outside circulation."

Acting zoology chairman David Mettrick, who reportedly ordered the firing, also refused to comment.

Zoology department chairman Donald Chant, who is away in Ottawa on a six-month sabbatical leave, also refused to comment.

Judy D'Arcy, president of Canadian Union of Public

Employees Local 1230 — library workers' union — said the firing was "one more indication of the university's attitude towards unions."

The firing was an indication "that they are worried about unions" getting into departments like zoology, she said.

D'Arcy thought McReavy's firing was being used as "a trial balloon, although it's not the first time they've tried it."

Graduate Students' Union president Frank McIntyre said he would be discussing the matter with his executive, which will possibly be offering McReavy help.

McIntyre thought the firing could have "serious implications."

"I find it hard to accept that the attitude of a 1930's sweat shop can prevail in the zoology building," one zoology support staff member said.

"If they can get away with firing McReavy then they can get away with anything!" he said.

He also confirmed a report that the Monday morning delivery of The Varsity containing the story on McReavy's dismissal had disappeared from the building almost as soon as it arrived.

One other support worker and a zoology graduate student confirmed these reports.

The Varsity — Brian Peil

Paul McReavy was fired Friday after five years of service.

Israel may be new provost

Milton Israel, a university vice-provost, has acknowledged that he is being considered by U of T president John Evans as the new provost and vice-president.

Israel would replace Don Forster, who is resigning July 1 to become president of Guelph University.

The provost, who wields a great deal of power in the university, is the administration's link with the academic divisions and faculties.

As vice-president, Forster is chairman of the university's budget committee. He is also the link between the academic divisions and Governing Council's policy-setting academic affairs committee.

Evans, however, has not officially supported course evaluations.

"They (course evaluations) have been a fairly effective critique of teaching," Israel said, "but they've been pretty erratic and undependable."

As for current government grant cutbacks, Israel predicted a variety of effects for the university.

Reducing the number of teaching staff members, increasing class sizes and reducing course offerings were among the possible responses to the financial straitjacket in which the universities find themselves, he said.

"We have to be conservative," Israel said, "but it's realistic to be pessimistic."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch felt that as a provost Israel would be "horrible," pointing to Israel's apparent indifference to the financial needs of graduate students as an example.

Kanowitch also felt Israel would not be as competent administratively as Forster has been.

Meds fees may rise

Today's meeting of the Governing Council's academic affairs committee will consider a request by the medical faculty to hike student fees $15 to pay for maintenance and replacement of students' microscopes.

The fee will be added to the present uniform and transportation fees to give medical students a hefty incidental fees bill.

The faculty decided to ask for the levy because the microscopes have been provided free for the last few years where formerly students had to provide their own, says Edward Llewellyn-Thomas, associate dean of the faculty.

Llewellyn-Thomas said that the fee would be once only for entering students. "It's the only way we can pay for it."

The associate dean explained the faculty has a budget for laboratory maintenance but not for the microscopes. "It's a miserable thing to do, but the only other way is if the university would come across with the money," he said.

The proposal has passed the medical faculty council but students have opposed the fees as a dangerous response to budget restraints.

Course evaluations praised secretly

By GEORGE PITT

A little-known study published in 1973 reports that course evaluations are reliable methods of assessing a teacher's ability.

A Guide to Teaching Evaluations was commissioned by the Ontario Federation of University Faculty Associations and written by Harry Murray of the University of Western Ontario.

Murray warned that course evaluations should be supplemented by other means of assessment but are extremely valuable for grading certain aspects of lecturing performance.

Because students see a professor over a long period, through good lectures and bad, they are well qualified to judge his or her motivation, preparedness and ability to create interest, but cannot assess the depth of knowledge or academic standards.

Course evaluations, Murray maintained, were remarkably free of bias. Professors with a reputation for strict marking received as many compliments as those who were free with their As and failing students were no harsher than those who stood at the top of the class.

Even the proximity of an exam made no difference to a teacher's rating.

Evaluations are often criticized because they cannot assess the long term value of the course, but Murray cited experiments in which alumni evaluations were compared to those of students half way through the year. Not only were ratings consistent from term to term and from year to year, but alumni of 10 years' standing had the same criticisms and praise as under graduates.

Neither the teachers' sex nor their extra-class popularity made any difference to the appreciation of the course, but teachers who were extroverted, liberal, objective, warm and good leaders fared better.

Perhaps, Murray pointed out, these are the qualities of a good teacher.

However, Murray found that a critical rating did little to improve a teacher's performance unless tenure or promotions were dependent on the results.

If supplemented by other methods, this faculty study concludes, course evaluations provide a promising and reliable assessment of a teacher's ability.

Cigar-smoking Milton Israel smiles shyly at Edward Banfield.

made any decisions about the provost's appointment.

Israel who teaches Indian and British Imperial history, has "no strong opinion" about students having representation in tenure decisions.

However, he said he cannot accept the principle of parity representation of students and faculty.

Parity doesn't turn me on," Israel said. "Parity is a political argument about power," he continued, and power plays have no function in the university.

Israel does feel that course evaluations should be improved and become substantial criteria for a professor seeking tenure. He suggested the university financially

While acknowledging the crucial questions which lie ahead as a result of poor economic conditions, Israel felt the situation offers the "opportunity to examine the real assets of the university."

"There's already been a reduction in the quality of service the university can give to students," Israel pointed out. "The quality of education will be a topic of discussion in the next few years."

As vice-provost, Israel is presently responsible for the Faculty of Arts and Science, University College, New College, Innis College, Woodsworth College and the School of Continuing Studies.

Israel also has the administrative responsibility for handling appeals from negative tenure decisions.

OSAP and its problems

OSAP head says financial assistance 'welfare'

TORONTO (CUP) — The head of the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP) has challenged press coverage of the Ontario government's handling of loans and grants and says the financial assistance program is nothing more than "welfare."

Donald Bethune said that his own children went through post-secondary schooling without any financial assistance and they didn't live at home at the time, although he paid their tuition.

Bethune made the comments in a telephone interview with the Asylum, a student newspaper at Centennial College in Toronto. The paper had called about the government's policy towards living stipends for students when Bethune launched into an attack on post-secondary students.

He said that a student earning more than $100 a week during the summer recess should be able to save a minimum of $700. He termed the period a "blowout" for some students who earn money but spend it all before returning to classes.

The director said that if a person is serious about his education he should work for money during the summer and not for a good time. When questioned about students wanting to take a vacation break he said his own holidays had been sacrificed for work.

Commenting on the director's remarks, Carolyn Kendrick, researcher for Ontario Federation of Students, (OFS) said, "We think it's great when a person makes statements like this because it exposes the government's thinking."

"It's a common attitude among taxpayer-salaried government officials that anyone who doesn't make as much as they do is morally corrupt," Kendrick added.

She says the government is applying its $32-a-week figure, which it allows students for room and board on OSAP loan applications, to the summer work period which would give Bethune his figures.

"$32 a week and I don't think Bethune lives on that," Kendrick said.

She said that it has been proven through surveys taken by various colleges and OFS that students need more money than this to live on week to week. The Student Services Department at Centennial College prepared a study that showed room and board could be purchased at an average of $26 per week in 1972. In 1974 the sum jumped to $38 and the projected average for 1975 is $47.50.

Kendrick is particularly upset at the comment about OSAP being a "welfare" scheme.

"OSAP isn't a welfare scheme at all. Students are contributing members of society and it has always been our position that education is a necessity and a social right. The government has been using the welfare posture to justify not giving students an increase in the cost of living allowance," Kendrick maintained.

Bethune also said that he thinks the university and college press coverage of the program has been very unfair.

"Everybody in the goddamned field is off their bloody rocker," he said of press coverage.

He feels many journalists are more willing to listen to the "Dr. (Morton) Shulmans" than to the sensible people who know what is happening.

In the course of conversation, Bethune said that too many British immigrants to Canada are unwilling to support their offspring in colleges and universities. He said that they are willing to come here and earn higher salaries but seem unwilling to help their children after they finish high-schools here.

"It is a socialist state which you people are bringing to us," he told the British-accented reporter who was questioning him.

F. J. Kidd, Bethune's immediate superior, of British accent himself, says, "It isn't government policy to look at the OSAP scheme as welfare. It is a student assistance program which goes to assist students."

He says that this year the government has more funds to spend on student assistance and because of concern expressed by students in the province, the board and lodging supplements will be a high priority.

As to Bethune's statements, Kidd said he couldn't comment until he had spoken to him.

Students on OSAP live below poverty line

Substantial reforms are needed throughout the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) if financial aid is ever to be distributed equitably and with a view to increasing accessibility to post-secondary education.

This is the first in a series of articles focusing on particular problems in the OSAP program.

If anyone wants further information on these questions, or if you want to help in a campaign to change OSAP, please contact the U of T Committee on Student Aid at 928-4911 (SAC) or 928-4903 (ASSU office).

If you are being supported by the Ontario Student Assistance Plan (OSAP), chances are you are living well below the federal poverty line.

The average level of support from OSAP this year is $2,500—$200 less than the federal poverty level of $2,700. The Toronto poverty line is higher because of the high cost of living.

The basis of the low support is the $32-a-week room and board allowance — far lower than the absolute minimum of $37 a week established by the U of T housing service. Government support has simply not kept pace with inflation. Food costs — expected to rise another 15 per cent this year — rose 17 per cent in 1974. But the $32 allowance level has stayed the same since 1971-72.

Accommodation rates, which are expected to rise 25 per cent in 1975, rose 23 per cent last year.

Students living in residences are particularly hard hit. Residence costs exceeding $32 a week must be appealed, and a loan received carrying an 11 per cent interest rate, repayable six months after graduation.

At New College, for example, a student would have to incur a loan of $112.20 to meet his or her $1,200 residence fee.

Students whose parents live within 25 miles of the university are similarly affected.

Although these students' level of assistance is set at $21.95 week, on the assumption that they live at home, those who live away from home and incur higher costs have to file a complicated appeal before they can be adequately supported — again, by a loan.

OSAP advice committee has met only once since summer

Despite the growing controversy over inadequacy of the Ontario Students Award Program, a committee appointed last summer to advise the province on student awards has only met once.

There have been three students appointed to the committee including York graduate student Paul Axelrod, a former Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) co-ordinator, Tim Doyle, student council president at the University of Windsor, and Centennial College student David Ryan.

The chairman will be Stephan Dupre, head of the Ontario Committee on University Affairs. Other committee members include former U of T student Joyce Denyer and Pat Phillips, U of T director of students awards.

OFS researcher Carolyn Kendrick said the committee has been meaningless so far. She said it was probably putting off meeting until government policy had already been formulated.

The Learning Machine

The Commerce Students' Association is now organizing several activities including course evaluations, sports nights, a newspaper and a formal dance.

Recently, there have been important developments in the Commerce and Finance Staff-Student Curriculum Committee, on which the Commerce Students Association has five student representatives.

The committee's purpose is to deal with contentious issues in commerce and finance.

Next year in arts and science, fees will be pegged to the number of courses you take. Since C & F students are required to take six courses, in order to get their B. Comm. in four years, this may mean that the program may become financially restrictive.

The committee thinks it is grossly unfair for the C & F program to become more expensive than others in the faculty. Representations have been made pointing this out and a petition will be circulated shortly.

Other changes have taken place. Originally the 23-course B. Comm. program had to be taken in four years. No more. Because of the new regulations concerning part-time arts and science degrees, you can now take as long as you want to get a B. Comm. In addition, the number of Ds allowed has been reduced to five from six.

Other problems are also being considered by the curriculum committee. We need input on these issues. If you are interested in anything in commerce, drop into the Commerce Students Association Office in Sidney Smith Hall, room 2005. (And don't forget Sports Night on Monday!)

Want to sip sherry with U of T president John Evans, smoke

cigars with Sidney Hermant, talk business with Malim Harding? Well this is your chance, fearless Metro residents.

The elections for the Governing Council are happening in March and nominations open Jan. 27 for about two weeks. There are eight, count 'em eight, students on U of T's top governing body.

Campus political experience is an asset but not necessary. However, students must be able to keep their cool in the presence of such bigwigs as journalist Betty Kennedy, former Imperial Oil president W. O. Twaits and prominent lawyer John Tory.

Fringe benefits include private dinner parties at Dr. John's, drinks with Betty Kennedy, carpet-bagging with Malim Harding and other thrilling experiences.

Not only that but the experience looks great on your curriculum vitae.

About 20 members of the New Democratic Party (NDP) from different Ontario and Quebec ridings met Monday evening to kick off the newly formed U of T NDP.

Discussion covered both organizational and political matters and included the initial drafting of a general statement of purpose which promised "the presentation of a serious and active political body... of benefit to both the university community and to the NDP."

Meeting organizers were pleasantly surprised at the turnout at the meeting. Plans for future public meetings and a cross-Ontario symposium on labor history were unveiled and committees set up.

The question of organizational links to the St. Andrew-St. Patrick NDP riding association was discussed but no action taken.

Greatest changes in China: Hinton

By BOB BRETTON

Bill Hinton, renowned American farmer and author, told a public meeting Sunday, progress in the last 20 years in China has seen the largest scale transformation the human race has ever made.

Hinton was speaking at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education to a packed meeting sponsored by the Canada-China Society. He has lived and worked in China and is most famous for his book, Fanshen, a detailed chronicle of revolution in a peasant village.

Hinton last visited China in 1971. He said the physical and social transformation had changed the whole landscape and the lives of the people since he left in 1953.

He said he was most struck by the changes in North China to use every available piece of land through terracing, tree planting and other land reclamation schemes.

The author also noted the large advances in literacy, health care and the status of women in China. But perhaps most important is the transformation in consciousness, he added.

Hinton said the Chinese people are extremely politically conscious, aware of ideology, and always analyzing everything. He said the former landless and outcasts of society are often in leadership positions.

But there are some remnants of anti-revolutionary classes, the landed gentry, rich peasants and other petit-bourgeois elements.

A major conservative tendency in China and the objects of turmoil such as the Cultural Revolution is the "new democratic revolutionary" who supports the revolution up to a point and then says it is over, Hinton said.

This was the main charge against deposed leaders Liu Shao Chi and Lin Biao. Hinton said most people believe the revolution will never be over. Divisions still have to be resolved between workers and peasants, urban and rural dwellers and mental and physical laborers.

The liberation of women, Hinton said, is progressing quickly, especially in urban areas. Women are often involved in more skilled work.

Hinton responded to questions on China's political progress by saying that the violent swings in political life from left to right were a reflection of popular participation and debate.

Minorities are tolerated to some extent, although homosexuality still remains a taboo and a problem the Chinese have not faced, unlike mental illness where they are far ahead of the west, Hinton said.

Harold Hinton authored famous book Fanshen, on peasant revolution in the Peoples' Republic of China.

"I agree, $32 a week for room and board is inadequate, but . . ."

On Student Aid

University treats employees shabbily

The only logical conclusion to draw from the firing of Paul McCreavy by the zoology department is that his dismissal was a direct result of his attempts to organize a union.

McCreavy was a five-year employee. It stretches the imagination beyond the bounds of belief to think that, after such a long stay, he would be dismissed for such petty crimes as "rudeness" and "refusal to talk" cited in his letter of dismissal.

No-one in the zoology department is prepared to say anything about the firing, which can only support the conclusion that it was a pretext.

More than that, however, it is alarming that the university is able to dismiss an employee of such long standing so summarily.

When he was fired, McCreavy was given two weeks pay, along with six percent of his salary since July. Had he been in the union, he would not only have had some seniority to protect him against the firing, but also a grievance procedure to resort to in the event of a dispute. Moreover, settlement terms would have been more generous.

McCreavy was making $3.80 an hour when he was fired. Had he been unionized—as he was indeed eligible—he would have been making $4.60.

Why is it, then, that the storeroom employees have been eligible for unionization, but no steps have been taken by the university to inform McCreavy and his colleagues of their eligibility?

(One might also ask the same question of the Service Employees International Union, which could have jurisdiction over storeroom workers. Why has it not attempted to organize them before? Going to bat for an employee only after he is fired isn't doing all you can for him.)

Neither the manner of McCreavy's dismissal, nor the refusal to inform his department of its union eligibility, speak highly of the university's attitude towards its support staff.

Five year's employment is no short time. An employee of the University of Toronto deserves much better treatment than this.

Discipline talks will get nowhere

One of the most problematic issues in recent U of T history has been discipline.

Last year, following stiff student opposition, the university voted to postpone implementation of the 'non-academic' section of its proposed 'Code of Behavior' until this year, on the grounds that strong consensus was required for it to be meaningful.

Now we are back where we started. A one-year postponement of the issue will have done nothing to resolve the controversy over the code, unless student leaders have either short memories or flexible principles.

Several recent developments are therefore quite disturbing.

Why does the internal affairs committee set up a working group—to be composed of five students, three faculty and two administrators—with instructions to work within the terms of the proposed code, a code which students last year almost unanimously rejected?

Why does law professor John Dove, who advises internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway on the code, insist that final recommendations from the working group on the code come to the internal affairs committee by February 12—a scant three weeks from now—in order to be approved by the Governing Council in March?

Furthermore, the refusal of the U of T faculty association to sit on the working group, and the determination by internal affairs chairman Bill Whelton to appoint faculty anyway, means that substantial consensus on the issue will be impossible to arrive at. In other words, if the faculty don't like the final product when they see it, they can scream blue murder and scuttle the whole thing.

(That happened back in 1969, when the Campbell report on discipline, which advocated the substantive issues behind campus disruptions be dealt with rather than taking a merely punitive response, was turned down by the faculty. We haven't seen it since.)

It seems as though this year's exercise in discipline is going to be as fruitless as last year's.

Glendon parity works well

The following article by the principal of Glendon College—originally a letter to the Students Administrative Council—describes the procedures for granting and denying tenure at the college, particularly in the history department, where there is student-faculty parity on the Tenure and Promotion Committee.

Parity of students and faculty was introduced into the procedures of the History Department in 1971-72, and it has been maintained ever since. The Department consists of eleven members full-time in the probationary and tenure stream.

In 1971 there were five untenured; since 1971 four files have been considered by the Tenure and Promotion Committee. Of those files, three came forward for positive recommendation. One was recommended for delay because of insufficient evidence of scholarly publication, and it has been reconsidered this year.

The departmental committee is elected annually. Faculty elect three members in vote by ballot, or simply by agreement in a departmental meeting. Students also elect three members, through a general meeting of all senior students (third and fourth year), who are majoring in History.

The departmental committee then functions annually by examining the file or files prepared by the departmental chairman on candidates coming up for tenure and/or promotion. The files are assessed on the basis of three criteria—scholarship, service to the College and University, and teaching.

Scholarship is judged by examining what the candidate has published, studying the quality as well as the quantity and form of publication, together with papers and talks which the candidate may have presented.

Students on the committee take their lead from the faculty members, but they quickly grasp the qualifications of scholarship through their experience in preparing and presenting fourth-year seminar research papers, and through the procedure of soliciting assessments from faculty both inside and outside the College. There has never been any doubt in the minds of students on the committee, that scholarship is a vital component in making the final assessment of a candidate.

Indeed, we have had one instance of a candidate being delayed because the evidence for scholarship was not sufficient, and the students were in complete agreement on the reasons for delay, though their assessment of teaching was very high indeed in this particular case.

On service to the University, the committee looks seriously at the participation of the candidate in departmental affairs, and in issues beyond the department, which sometimes involve University or College committee work, and which may well include some definition of service between the University and the community.

On teaching, which is rated as highly as scholarship and has in fact such a close relationship that it is often difficult if not impossible to distinguish between the two, the students have taken an active role in the committee. Their interest in teaching lies at the heart of their participation in the procedures. As a result, they have helped to develop methods by which candidates can be examined both by their colleagues, and by current as well as by former students.

Faculty and student members of the committee visit the classroom, and they not only observe the class with the candidate in attendance, but also solicit judgements from the students after having asked the candidate to leave the classroom. In addition, former students are asked for their judgements according to a random selection of those who have come through a class of the candidate over the past two or three years.

Such procedures as these give substance to the statement that teaching must be a most significant criterion for assessing whether or not a candidate is worthy of tenure within the College and the University.

During the time that we have had parity, I have never had occasion either as departmental chairman or as Principal of the College, to question the capacity of the students for maintaining confidentiality. Their respect for the procedures has been just as serious as that of the faculty members on the committee.

The recommendations of the departmental committee go to the chairman of the History Department, and from there to the College Committee on Tenure and Promotion. This College Committee has had a composition of parity between students and faculty since 1972-73. For the College as a whole, in other words, parity has operated for the last three years.

The College Committee consists also of three faculty and three students. Faculty members are nominated by the Nominating Committee of the Faculty Council, and elected by a secret mail ballot from within a total faculty of just over 100 members. The student members are nominated and elected by the twenty students who sit on the Faculty Council.

In the past three years this College Committee has processed approximately fifty files which have come to me as Academic Dean for my own review and letter, before I have forwarded the files to the Senate Committee. All members of the College Committee adhere to the statement on procedures and guidelines which have been clearly stated in a document from the York University Senate Committee on Tenure and Promotion, and approved by the Senate. This document says nothing specifically about parity, but leaves the character of sub-committees at the various units and divisions of York University.

Glendon College is therefore free to maintain its own procedures. While adhering to the guidelines of the Senate document, forwarding files to me, and from me to the Senate Committee, we have had no negative response on the operation of parity.

Student members have sustained the confidential character of all discussions within the Committee; they have always accepted the leadership of a faculty member as chairman; and they have kept a balanced eye on the close relationship between scholarship and effective teaching.

In effect, I am saying that as Academic Dean I have experienced no reason to cast doubt on the way in which parity operates within the College on the issue of tenure and promotion.

On the contrary, the experience of the past three years has established a genuine sense of confidence among the student body because they have a real voice in the procedures by which tenure and promotion are granted.

While Glendon History faculty is approachable

On the part of the faculty there is general satisfaction that the student voice is an accepted and vital component in the procedures.

It would be difficult for me to be convinced, after the experience of these past three years, that teaching can be evaluated in a meaningful sense without a direct communication and response from the students themselves.

Albert Tucker, Principal,
Glendon College

U of T students must exist cap-in-hand . . .

in which it was contained must first go to the Building and Development Committee of the city and then to city council. On Monday that committee deferred consideration of this report; one of the major reasons for this deferral was that more time was required to have area groups respond to that report.

The significance of the Planning Board's decision goes far beyond the athletic complex. Previously, certain criteria were established for the U of T, criteria as to the nature of developments within the campus and requirements for review and consultation with the surrounding community.

The Planning Board, however, has recommended that a blanket exemption be given to the U of T.

Area residents are indeed concerned about the implications of this decision. We were hopeful that the interim criteria would be a means for controlling university expansion.

The City would take a giant step backwards in its efforts to control development if it agreed to the recommendations of the Planning Board as they apply to the U of T.

Alan McAllister, President,
Huron-Sussex Residents' Organization

Height bylaw must apply to university

I believe your Monday, January 20 article, Athletic Complex Gets Height By-law Exemption, leaves the wrong impression of the Planning Board's decision.

The athletic complex is not yet exempt; the recommended exemption and the report as a whole

McCreavy shafted by administration

Although I do not support international (U.S.) unions, and think that the Service Employees International Union is a poor union (specifically, in the early part of 1973 when eleven physical plant workers at U of T were laid off and the union failed to have them reinstated; the SEIU has also been kicked off the campus of the University of Manitoba and out of the major hospitals in Toronto), I feel that Paul McCreavy has been shafted by the administration of the Zoology department.

The administration, in its reactionary, anti-labor stance, has held to several blatant contradictions. McCreavy was fired for failing to provide adequate services — yet it is admitted that the Zoology stores are inadequate in capacity and under-staffed, making it impossible to provide the services they expect. It also claims that it lacks sufficient funds to hire another storekeeper.

It has, however, managed to redecorate the halls of the Ramsay Wright building, refurbish the offices, provide new letterhead stationery and free coffee service.

Obviously, McCreavy should be rehired and a union brought in (preferably a militant Canadian one), to protect the workers from the whims of the administration; who should be examining their priorities and hiring the necessary workers, rather than firing those who managed to stay with them for the past five years.

Stuart Crombie,
Arts and Sciences I

Erindale wants athletic excellence

Perhaps I might be allowed to comment on Dave Stuart's accounts of the problem associated with Erindale's possible entry into the "OUAA circuit" (Varsity, January 15th).

Recently the Fisher Report addressed itself to the implementation of policy objectives for Athletics and Recreation previously adopted by the Governing Council. We are able at Erindale to provide, for the majority of students, opportunities for instruction, some competition, and recreation and physical fitness, as we must do. What we lack is the opportunity for competition at a level of excellence.

There is thus a legitimate need to improve the opportunities for athletics at Erindale to compete at this level. While students on the Erindale Campus are eligible for selection to University teams, and some have been selected, many are prevented from participation because of excessive time necessary in travelling between two campuses separated by twenty miles. This is the background to our request that the University consider the requirements of a three-campus system. Having some University teams (or second teams) located physically at Erindale is a possible solution.

E.A. Robinson,
Principal, Erindale College

LaMarsh article was one-sided

It was sad to read Gillian Mackay's one-sided reporting on Miss LaMarsh's talk after a trip to Israel. As a speaker, Miss LaMarsh was pathetic both in eloquence and objectivity.

Although the speech was sponsored by a group titled Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East, Miss LaMarsh failed dismally in contributing towards this.

ANALYSING AWAY

The following article, reprinted with permission from the author's "Academic Freedom in Action" (London: Sheed & Ward, 1976), has been dated by the decline of the "Student Movement" and dissent in general.

It serves as an important reminder, however, of one of the dangers of consensus in the Ivory Tower — the masquerade of ideology as objectivity. The professors quoted below are still with us, and despite their smug satisfaction of the students' "return to scholarship", the question of the role of the University in society — handmaiden or critic — is still a vital one.

By PAUL HOCH

The tribal quality of the radical student community was shown in the mass gatherings of 1968... tribalism also appears in the North American herd cult of the teach-in... There is no essential difference between the student leader at Columbia who sought to humiliate a dean by calling him a "mother fucker" in public, and Julius Streicher seeking to humiliate the Jews... myths like 'student power' play the same role as racial and national myths like 'student power' play the same role as racial and national myths among fascist movements.

concentrate on the ritual. At this level, it is undoubtedly a middle-class version of the delinquent solution. Bashing a policeman for Vietnam is a bourgeois surrogate for the rewards of Glasgow gang warfare.

Meanwhile, according to Professor Roy Severn, head of Britain's Bristol University's Civil Engineering Department, and Sidney Newing, Bristol Senior Lecturer in theoretical mechanics:

YAHOOHS!
WORKING-CLASS STUDENTS are ruining universities

(London Daily Mail headline, 14 March 1969)

According to the Mail (which reminds us that 'Yahoohs are "beasts in the shape of men" in Gulliver's Travels'), the two Bristol dons, appeared before the Commons Select Committee on Education, to urge that the MPs: 'Investigate the loyalty of certain members of staff, even to the extent of calling in the Special Branch. Cut back on the number of social science students and expel trouble makers'. LSE Sociologist ciliatory politics';

- (7) 'incitement and conspiracy by "Trotskyite" and other Revolutionary Socialist agitators, whom he calls 'a few neurotic fanatics';

- (8) 'also outside agitators and "professional students" joining in for the hell of it';

- (9) 'mismanagement by academic authorities... and an overall lack of wise public relations';

- (10) 'universities are too paternalistic';

- (11) 'disappointed expectations about university life, or the complete lack in some of any kind of prior expectations at all';

- (12) 'the recent tradition of demonstrations and protest marches... happy just to be mutually provocative and mutually isolating';

- (14) 'and, lastly, just plain, good old-fashioned student ambivalence to authority'.

Interestingly, for almost every item on Crick's list, some other academic has come along to propose a 'theory' leading in the opposite direction.

One 'theory', formerly associated with University of Toronto Sociology Professor Lewis Feuer in his days at Berkeley, in effect refutes Crick's whole approach. Although Feuer thinks that students are 'the new tyrants', he does not regard their latest outbursts as any great theoretical problem—it is all the old 'generational struggle'.

And he could go to great lengths explaining it in terms of 'student sexual problems'.

Professor Donald MacRae takes just the reverse view—he sees sexual liberation as a cause:

After sex, what then?... one answer may be in bargain-rate revolt.

Professor George Kennan of Princeton's Institute for Advanced Study comes up with some piercing insights into the student's mind:

Imagination, fears, hopes, desires: all these are overstimulated.

There is no strong and coherent religious faith, no firm foundation of instruction in the nature of individual man, no appreciation for the element of tragedy that unavoidably constitutes a central component of man's predicament, and no understanding for the resulting limitations of the possibilities for social and political achievement.

As a result of this complex of formative influences, the student suffers at college age from the effects of an extreme disbalance in emotional and intellectual growth.

In certain ways he is precocious and over-mature. It is from this that there flows the frantic, anxious, troubled nature of his behaviour.

It was in part from people of just this desperate and confused state of mind that Hitler recruited his supporters.

'ANAL FIXATION'

On 1 May 1969 LSE's criminology Professor Terrence Morris told the Commons Select Committee that LSE rebels exhibited mental disturbances characteristic of 'anal fixation'.

But his colleague in sociology, Professor Martin (op. cit.) claims the rebels will never succeed because they are not anally fixated:

The policeman is anal: all his functions are controlled. The student is pre-anal: his functions are spontaneous... a children's nature ramble is hardly likely to succeed.

MacRae outdoes everyone—it's all a return to primordial exoticism:

Recent events certainly contain in their animating ideas elements of primitivism and exoticism... not to mention the Freudian discovery of a primordial childhood...

Yet to me it all seems genuinely like a restoration and a return, even if we never quite return to the places we once knew, to the traditions of an earlier rebellion with which earlier generations were familiar (in Martin, p. 188).

Professor Martin thinks the regression is not to a primordial age but merely to childhood and asks:

Were these two demonstrators

Demonstrations Revealed! These early dissenters were really only sexually frustrated.

constituency of the authoritarian student activists is precisely that of the fascists: the discontented and half-educated middle-class youth, suffering from a sense of acute alienation.

—University of British Columbia Professor George Woodcock (Saturday Night, July 1969).

The university academic, like all of us, has his moments of frustration. And in recent years, sad to say, these moments have been coming with embarrassing frequency. However, unlike those of us on the lunatic fringe, he is far too couth to throw Molotov cocktails.

So after suspensions, expulsions, examinations, injunctions, grant cuts, calls to employers, bad references and the rest of his usual bag of artillery have failed, he goes back to his most tried-and-trusted weapon—the analysis:

It has been generated by a mood that set in during the 1960s and now affects a large proportion of the young... incomprehending, alienated, and inclined to be contemptuous... they have no constructive ideas or positive ideals, beyond an eclectic pacifism... the shaggy hair, the dirty jeans, the bare feet on the pavements, the sluts, male and female, making love (if that is the word for it) in the streets, the drugs, the pills, the squalor... the whole apparatus of the Dirt for Dirt's sake movement. (John Sparrow, Warden of All Souls, Oxford in Anarchy and Culture, Professor David Martin, editor 1969).

A second piercing analysis of the student movement (from the same book) was given by Cambridge fellow Dr. John Dunn:

At one level it is appropriate to think of all this the way in which an anthropologist might begin to analyse a primitive religion, to

Professor David Martin, who previously embraced the Yahoohs theory, sees the whole thing as a continuation of the Reformation:

The Protestant Reformers stood by the priesthood of all believers. Modern protesters stand by the participation of all students. The Reformers overthrew the Fathers; students overthrow their own fathers... the Reformers were against ritual and so are many of the protesters.

Sheffield Politics Professor Bernard Crick (also in Martin's delightful books) unveils a marathon list of no less than fourteen 'causes of the present discontents':

- (1) 'genuine concern and bitterness in a highly cosmopolitan environment about the Government's Rhodesian policy, leading to a spontaneous, idealistic, ignorant, ungenerous and almost completely irrelevant outburst';
- (2) 'a more general sharing in international currents of "Youth Nationalism" (more easily seen as "anti-colonialism")';

- (3) 'local grievances', including antiquated teaching, obsolete syllabuses, overcrowding, and neglect by teachers making money elsewhere or appearing on TV;
- (4) 'a generalised feeling that "Youth" is, a priori, always right... and the university is then not a place of learning, but a stage on which one must develop one's distinctive and flamboyant personality';

- (5) 'old-fashioned trade union economic protest', including complaints about the size of grants, and due mostly to the dress styles of 'extravagant exoticism of nearly all the new leaders';
- (6) 'alienation from normal con-whether our civilisation is so secure that widespread indulgence in the fantasies of childhood—maybe throughout a lifetime—is something it can withstand without breakdown...

This increased possibility of persistent infantilism is connected with the fact that a misreading of Freud has made us such timid parents that our children are under-socialised, inadequately prepared for social realities.

i.e., just blame the Vietnam protests on Dr. Spock. (The only thing this leaves unexplained is how all those old-fashioned parents of student rebels in Eastern Europe, Japan, Latin America, Africa, Korea and so forth, managed to pick up their Freud and Dr. Spock—mental telepathy?)

Dr. Dunn (op. cit.) theorises that:

The political innocence of the student body, their most obvious disability, is also their unique advantage.

In the immense intricacy of this future society only those who do not quite know why things are as they are are likely to be able to believe that they could in any important way be different?

Professor Martin agrees:

Students have no experience of life or of the precarious basis of such civilisation as we have. They are supported in conceptual luxury... And it is even odder that the most chronic moralisers should be sociologists, because their sense of outrage can only be based on an incapacity to understand any sociology. That is why they (sic!) turn sociology into ideology and justify themselves.

When the Professor speaks of 'sociology', obviously he means his sociology, a definite advance over mere ally victims of anal fixation?

'moral' considerations.

To those who think part of the problem may lie in university government, Professor Wiles replies (in complete seriousness):

In their power relations with each other, British dons do set the world a shining example . . . we shall hardly find a more perfectly governed society than a British university.

Although Professor Feuer mostly agrees, with great humility he notes of the academics at Berkeley:

In the last reckoning the problem of Berkeley is the problem of the American intellectual class itself.

But only because during the 1964 rebellion:

A cult of youth swept over faculty activists; somehow youth's idealism must have history on its side, even if it went wrong in particular instances.

One could not help remember that German professors in the nineteen thirties had apologised for their Nazi students in precisely this way . . .

Thus the old men and the middle aged men in Berkeley were curiously adrift, and failed to supply that balancing principle, that measure of experience, which was the duty of their years. (And all because they had passed a faculty resolution guaranteeing free speech on campus!)—Atlantic Monthly, September 1966.

ANALYSING THE ANALYSERS

After the preceding 'children's nature ramble', it must be clear that the most urgent problem at this moment is to discover some explanation of the academics' problem.

Where do these professors get their ideas from? According to Professor MacRae's scholarly article in the Journal of Contemporary History, the assumption that scholarly ideas may be influenced by their sociological environment is purely 'metaphysical', and 'bad sociology' into the bargain. (Whoever said these professors don't know which side their bread is buttered on!)

Fortunately, not being 'qualified' as a sociologist, I have no great desire to go into their generational fantasies and rituals (though it would be interesting). However, for the salvation of any who still think the professors have anything to say, I will go into their methods.

Their approach is in most cases just a scholarly variety of character assassination.

Only the most perfunctory effort is ever made to deal with student criticisms, particularly of their scholarship. By definition, they know more than the students, and student protests are at best 'infantile', 'innocent', etc., at worst 'neurotic', 'anal', 'compulsive', the whole bag.

There then proceeds (in the name of 'science') a lengthy ad hominem 'analysis' of the students' backgrounds, motives, fantasies, rituals, culminating in 'explanations' of 'why the students feel the need to use character assassination against us, their professors'.

Then come the thousand and one Freudian psychoanalyses agreeing that the students are just rebelling against academic fathers—it all goes back to the primordial family'. According to the background of the analyst it can be blamed on the affluent middle class, or working-class yahoos, or the Protestant Reformers, Krushchev, Dr. Spock, foreign agitators or what have you.

The academic bag of tricks suits any purpose, particularly when they are 'showing' that, 'the student lives in a closed off system of rationalisations, fantasy, and cult.'

Student sexual problems are dredged up ad infinitum to prove that it is all the result of sexual anxiety. When all the long-haired couples make this explanation seem preposterous, sociology professors begin complaining that these students are 'not alienated' and are just looking for a new kick 'after sex'.

While some claim it is because the students are not being worked hard enough, others claim it is because there are not enough coffee lounges.

The more crude attribute it to the gamut from 'conspiratorial agitators' to 'spontaneous mass anarchism'. Naturally, those who blame it on 'agitators' never bother to tell us just why the students are so ready to follow the agitators, and not their professors—perhaps the agitators are magical (the professors call it 'charisma').

A more sophisticated 'put-down' attributes it to 'feelings of impersonality in the mass society'.

In this way, the question of whether a small elite may be exercising power in society (in Britain 5 percent of the people own 75 percent of the wealth) is conveniently dropped, and the burden of guilt is put on 'the mass'.

Anytime a group of students does anything which the professors disagree, they are immediately said to be acting like a 'mob', and analysed in terms of crowd psychology.

There is also something a bit rotten about the emphasis on feelings of impersonality. It sounds too much like a psychological disease. Are people treated as commodities in this society or aren't they?

And if people are treated as commodities, can that possibly have anything to do with the fact that profits come before persons in this system?

The unkindest cut of all is when the professors, stuffed with their own importance, humbly confess that they have not given enough time to their students: 'this never would have happened if we had been able to supply that balancing principle, that measure of experience, that was the duty of our years' (Feuer). In fact, there has been quite enough paternalism and in loco parentis already.

Although most students are quite ready to discuss things with their professors (and even to give due credence to their experience), few rebels are looking for a second father, much less a rule-book, warden or self-appointed psychoanalyst.

The real question is: how do they get away with it? It is quite simple really. Academia is tailor-made for their kind of arguments.

The crucial steps are:

(1) defining the problem—thus we have the 'student' problem, the 'negro' problem, not the 'university' problem, much less the 'white' (or 'white prejudice') problem;

(2) the parcelling out of a given socio-economic-political-cultural problem into a series of competing specialities.

Thus, everyone and anyone can focus on what aspect he likes best, find a 'resemblance' to what he feels inclined to prove, without any need to make predictions about the problem's behaviour in relation to other people's fields, and everyone is quite happy (particularly when they are all trying to prove that they are right, and students are wrong).

Take Professor Woodcock's discovery of the student movement's 'disturbing resemblances to the formative stages of fascism'.

Are these members of some secret neo-fascist organization, or are they actually trying to catch flies?

He has decided to focus on the student's behaviour. He finds that students have shouted down professors. He remembers that Nazis used to shout down professors. Ipso facto, the students 'resemble' Nazis. Really.

In fact, though the young Nazis had no love for Jewish or foreign professors (just as French professors have no love for Cohn-Bendit!), they were very much in favour of authoritarian professors, preferably of their own hue.

On the contrary, today's students want to do away with the authoritarian relationship between teacher and student entirely.

If Professor Woodcock wants to give lectures in his garden or even in the Albert Hall, no one is going to get up-tight. But when he steps into the classroom, armed with the whole apparatus of examinations, references and so forth, by which to compel his authority, he should not expect that authority to go unchallenged.

Students will not inevitably swallow mythologies of academic freedom if it simply means someone else's freedom to give them orders. Unfortunately, when Woodcock 'listens' to his students, he is no better off:

On every Canadian campus the issue of the curriculum has been raised, and the authoritarian activists—like Nazi student activists—have demanded that courses be relevant to contemporary issues i.e. shaped to fit their own socio-political views (op. cit., emphasis added).

The mind boggles. If Woodcock says the courses should not be relevant, his position as professor entitles him to call that 'scholarship'.

If the students say courses should be relevant, that's just 'their own socio-political views'. (In fact, what could anyone possibly say that someone else could not label as just his own socio-political view?)

It all depends on your definitions, on what you take as 'normal'. Professor Martin, though he never says why, takes an authoritarian organisation of society as normal.

Since the students are refusing to accept this, then obviously they are 'under-socialised'. But, why is his norm for society superior to that of the students?

There are three ways of answering this. The most common is the reply, 'that's outside my field—perhaps an Industrial Relations professor could deal with that' (although in practice the latter considers only the techniques of domination, not its morality).

The second answer, common in 'value-neutral' sociology, is to admit that the norm is arbitrary, and pretend that words like 'under-socialised', 'infantile', 'abnormal', 'anal' and so forth are just 'technical terms', completely neutral, and not supposed to have any emotive content.

Finally, there is the occasional professor who is willing to discuss the rationale of the present system, but nine times out of ten he demands, 'what would you put in its place?'

In conclusion, I can do no better than to quote an essay entitled The Crisis in Sociology in which Professor Donald MacRae candidly admits of his own subject:

But there is also, unfortunately, an absence of standards of judgement that involves exposure to the dangers of mere ideology, propaganda and indoctrination.

Exactly.

Geneticists fear creation of biological bomb

By GAIL MITCHELL

The potential for misuse of knowledge has always been nightmarish. But with the recent developments in genetics, the threat of disaster has never been so real.

In fact, for the first time in the history of modern science, research workers concerned with molecular biology have called a halt to their studies.

And for the first time scientists are questioning their common, and generally unspoken assumption, that the acquisition of knowledge is always an absolute good, requiring no justification or ethical sanction.

More than 200 eminent scientists recently concluded an urgent conference at Davos, Switzerland on the immediate dangers and projected future benefits of genetic engineering.

Researchers have realized that their latest achievement — the cracking of genetic codes — has opened the way to the designing of new bacteria which are potentially more dangerous to mankind than the atomic bomb.

In 1953 at Cambridge University, Dr. James Watson and Dr. Francis Crick discovered that the pattern of all life forms is determined by a double-helical molecule of deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA). Genes are molecules of DNA, units of heredity.

Since then scientists have found ways of cutting the long molecules into shorter pieces and re-combining them. These splittings are then incorporated into bacteria to create new micro-organisms whose potential for causing disease yet unknown.

GOVERNMENT MISUSE

In 1969 when three biologists at Harvard Medical School announced to the world they had succeeded in isolating a pure gene from a bacterium, it was not without some misgivings. Although they felt their discovery could be used to cure such hereditary diseases as hemophilia, they warned of the dangers of government misuse of the technique.

They were not alone in their fears. Soon after the announcement Maurice Wilkins, 1963 winner of the Nobel Prize for medicine, warned that the isolation of the gene could lead to the development of a major germ weapon. "It is the kind of thing you cannot trust society with," he said.

Again in 1972, Australian microbiologist and Nobel laureate Sir MacFarlane Burnet said he would, if he could, stop all experimental efforts to manipulate the genes of viruses that inflict grave illness or death in people. The danger, he said, was the inadvertent creation in the laboratory of sub-species of a devastating virus against which humans would have no immunological defences.

"The possibility for good in these experiments are trivial improvements in vaccines, and not worth the risk," Burnet said.

Despite the past warnings from scientists in the field, it was not until last summer that some kind of positive action was taken to look seriously at the potential consequences of genetic engineering.

HALT EXPERIMENTS

In July of last year, 11 American researchers, including Watson, declared they were halting certain experiments in genetic manipulation of bacteria. Their reason: if they do not stop they may accidentally loose upon the world new forms of life — semisynthetic organisms that could cause epidemics, resist control by antibiotics and perhaps increase the incidence of cancer.

In a letter published in Science magazine (the magazine of the American Association for the Advancement of Science) and in Nature, the British counterpart, they urged colleagues around the world to stop experimentation with bacteria whose biological properties can not be predicted in advance.

The group, chaired by Paul Berg, chairman of the Stanford University biochemistry department, is buying time to consider hazards before rapidly developing research grows too large to be controlled. According to Berg, the embargo is "the first I know of in our field. It is also the first time I know of that anyone has had to stop and think about an experiment in terms of its social impact and potential hazard."

Many are optimistic about the embargo holding. One National Institute of Health (U.S.) scientist says, "Anyone who wants will go ahead and do it." Although, he adds, the technique requires a moderate degree of sophistication at the present, it will be a "highschool project in a couple of years."

Others are uncertain whether the ban will be observed by countries interested in the new techniques' considerable potential in biological warfare. For example, many millions of dollars were invested at the U.S. Army's biological laboratory at Fort Detrick, Maryland in trying to improve on the lethality of viruses and bacteria harmful to man.

Scientists at the University of British Columbia have gone ahead in the application of genetics to the management of insect pests, offering benefits to agricultural and public health care. Their colleagues at Sussex University in Britain have developed new strains of nitrogen-producing bacteria that could cut down the need for fertilizer.

Industry is attracted by the prospects of new processes for the synthetic production of drugs, such as insulin.

BLACK DEATH DANGER

Yet if some of the fast-producing deadly organisms were to escape from the laboratory in the course of experiments they could produce plagues that would make the Black Death of medieval Europe look trite.

And dangerous materials have been known to escape from laboratories. Only recently, smallpox escaped from Porton Down, Britain's top security laboratory concerned with micro-biological research.

Although the problems are comparable to those associated with nuclear fallout, in that its effects everyone, John Kendrew, deputy director of the British Medical Research Council's Laboratory of Molecular Biology, thinks it's worse.

"... In my opinion our present problem is even more difficult. For early nuclear research was contained within a governmental military framework while gene transfer can be done by competent people in any lab at any place. And for some of the work to be carried out behind a cloak of military or commercial secrecy would be doubly dangerous."

Ice cream cone a long way down

WASHINGTON (CPS-CUP) — Ice cream used to be one of the most nutritious foods you could buy. Today, however, that icy treat is more likely to be artificially flavoured, coloured and preserved with chemicals of dubious origin.

For example, if you like vanilla, the chances are good that the vanilla extract has been replaced by "piperonal". Piperonal, a benzene derivative, is a strong smelling substance commonly used by exterminators in the control of lice.

Another common substitute found in ice cream is benzyl acetate, used as a substitute for real strawberries. Benzyl acetate is also employed by the motion picture industry as one ingredient in the cement used to splice film.

Pineapple these days is more apt to be ethyl acetate, a cleaner used on leather and textiles.

These chemicals are used because they are cheaper and prolong the shelf life of ice cream products.

Loyola wants to hire B.C.'s Bremer

MONTREAL (CUP) — Students at Loyola College want their school to hire deposed British Columbia Education Commissioner John Bremer as a free-wheeling "teaching laureate."

Erwin Katsosf, co-president of the Loyola Students' Association, said in an interview Jan. 9, that Bremer impressed several students and professors with "innovative ideas" when he delivered a keynote convocation address last October.

"It is our hope that with his excellence and his experience and knowledge within the area of innovative education that he will be able to transmit this knowledge and set new ideas in motion," Katsosf said.

He said Bremer would be like "a poet in residence, a professor of the university not tied to any place and able to cross faculty and department lines."

Bremer would be hired and work for the college's learning and development committee, which is responsible for improving the effectiveness of teaching and course evaluations, Katsosf said.

He said the university plans to bring Bremer to Montreal for interviews late this month.

Bremer spoke at Loyola about the time he filed a writ in British Columbia Supreme Court charging Premier Dave Barrett with libel and slander. Bremer was fired by Education Minister Eileen Dailly last January shortly after Barrett called him a "bit of a flop" on a CBC television program.

Dailly appointed Bremer education commissioner in Feb. 1973.

Bremer developed a radical education channelling system to increase options and give a focus to the individual student's education. Bremer's ideas for education reform did not become public until after he was fired.

Dailly has said Bremer was fired because "he talked too much and did too little."

Women denounce PR cartoons

VERNON, B.C. (CUP) — Cartoons of scantily clad women and severe looking women librarians used to illustrate the library brochure of Okanagan College have aroused the wrath of the Status of Women committee of the British Columbia Teachers Federation.

Writing to the college council, Linda Shuto, director of the Status of Women project, expressed her dismay over the illustrations in the handbook.

She said, "It's astounding that in 1974 publications like this are still in existence, particularly in institutions dedicated to learning and the development of human potential."

She said she wants the brochure withdrawn from circulation, describing them as "an embarrassment to the educational system of British Columbia."

Colleen Pringle, a government appointed representative from Vernon on the college council agreed the illustrations which "reinforce the sexual stereotype" are in questionable taste.

Ma Parker (Bonnie?) is back

By Mrs. PARKER

Yes, sports fans, by popular request, Mrs. Parker is back to sum up last week's interfac hockey action.

Law I (Armstrong, Whyte, Wright, MacDonald (2), cf. Ronald) brazookled New 1 (McLeod, Cardinec, as in painec, Westlake) 5 to 3.

Law II (Pasternak (2)—shades of deep throat) made it a clean sweep over Gnu II (Smith, Miller, Elliott).

Graham notched one goal in UC I's 6-1 loss to Sr Eng. Scoring for skule were Halpenny, Kolanko (3), Moum, Montgomery, and then came the Showers.

PHE A squeezed GRAD I (Geriatric Diehards) by the score of 2-0. Walters tallied twice for the Showers.

Dents and Erin tied 3-3. Gibson, Hurd (as in 'my tooth hurds'), and Fox scored for the drillers, while Breuer, Morris, and Knignizyky earned the tie for pastoral U.

Emman (pendlebury—divines don't have axes so they bury pendles as a sign of good faith) lost to UC II (Freedman, Turk—when he turked the puck into the net. Taken from selected writings of Anne Lloyd; vol 39, page 672).

Innis (Bagnall, Willer—no relation to Philler Diller) were verschlaged (past tense—verschluged) by For A 6-2. Scoring for For was Smith, Ferguson (2), Stintson, Radecki, and Hosick. (Ho sick are you?)

In the best game of the week, Pharm A came from behind a one goal deficit to edge Sear II (and they have the scars to prove it) 3-2. Heatherington (how's Julie?), Felice (no that's feces you're thinking of) and Miatello (me a tello you) scored for Pharm while Lecours (Fr: the cours) and Allan replied for the other Pastoral College.

Meanwhile, Vic I (the guys who didn't make the football team) squeaked (squawked) by Scar I 1-0. Johnson squawked for Vic.

Volleyball

The women's intermediate Varsity volleyball team was successful last weekend against McMaster and Trent. Toronto defeated Trent 3-0 and McMaster 3-1.

The team has also qualified for play in the Ontario senior B women's league by winning the qualification tournament last Sunday.

The team's next competition is at Queen's University on Feb. 15. Following that the final tournament will be at Ryerson on the 22nd of February.

Basketball Blues lose to York

By PAUL CARSON

Too many fouls and too little defence were the difference as the men's basketball Blues dropped a 78-68 decision to York Yeomen last night at the Benson Building.

Blues were charged with 23 personal fouls to only 13 against York; consequently, the Yeomen spent a great deal of time at the free throw line where they sank 17 of 20 shots. Blues made good on six of their ten attempts, so the resulting 11 point difference was the decisive factor in the game.

York enjoyed the bonus situation for 12 minutes of the opening half and for seven minutes of the final half; Yeoman guard Rob Pietrobon had more free throws in the second half, 12, than did Blues for the entire game.

Pietrobon sank nine of those free throws en route to tying his team's scoring honors at 19 points with forward Ev Spence.

Spence broke a 33-33 halftime tie with eight quick points and duelled thereafter with Blues' Glenn Scott in a display of hot shooting and horrible defence.

Scott emerged as the game's top scorer with 20 points evenly divided into 10 for each half; Brian Skyvington added 14 and guard Bert Van Cook followed with 10.

Missing regulars Peter Oolup with a bad knee and Doug Fox due to a sore ankle. Blues went cold midway through the first half and didn't catch up until the final minute.

Spence's hot shooting kept York ahead during the entire second half as Blues somehow managed to throw the ball away or miss easy shots every time they came close to tying the score.

Blues shot only 30 per cent in going down to their third consecutive defeat but some scrambling defence, York errors and Scott's torrid outside shooting kept them close until a controversial three-point play gave York a comfortable 73-64 lead with two minutes remaining.

Next game is Saturday at 8:15 in the Benson Building against the Carleton Ravens who defeated Varsity last weekend in Ottawa.

Blues are now 3-4 on the season and a victory would sorely help their sagging playoff hopes.

VARSITY SCORING

Francis 4; McGhie 2, Scott 20; Kurczyk 4; Van Cook 10; Filinski 6; Skyvington 14; Fjeld 8.

The game was taped by CHCH and masochists can relive the agony Saturday afternoon at 2:00 pm.

Last weekend, Varsity fencers did battle with York and Buffalo State universities at Hart House. The Blues won the meet overall and took first place in both the saber and epee divisions.

Because of injuries, the foil team was somewhat shorthanded and had to settle for a third place spot behind first place Buffalo.

Because the Varg will never be outdone, (you will recall we reported on the exploits of the Hart House chess club) we have another hot flash: this time from the Varsity Rifle Association.

Saturday, at the Hart House rifle range, the Varsity sharpshooters sniped their counterparts from Guelph 1299 to 1180. Peets was top shooter for Toronto with 281 points followed closely by Loftin with 280.

Tonight the Blues take on the Big Red of Cornell at the arena at 8:00 pm. Cornell is a top-rated team in the NCAA hockey circuit and are the only team Varsity has not beaten on home ice. The game should be a good one and is highly recommended for excitement.

Queen's held its annual figure skating competition last Saturday. The lady Blues made their presence felt with a first (Geri Ashdown and Ron Jackson) and third (Anne Bowlby and Charles Spencer) in the novice mixed dance.

Sue Patterson and Ron Jackson notched a second-place finish in the senior mixed dance while Helen Laurent and Lynn Shapley took a second in the junior similar pairs.

In the singles competition, Ellen Sawyer and Geri Ashdown placed one-two in the novice ladies while Anne Bowlby skated to a third in the junior ladies and Sue Patterson impressed with a first in the senior ladies.

Blues' Kent Ruhnke — just an average superstar

By ANNE LLOYD

Kent Ruhnke: on the ice, a star Varsity forward, given to the prima donna flourishes of the 'ordinary' superstar; off the ice, a concerned and sincere athlete who spends his spare time coaching 8 and 9 year old minor hockey players.

Last weekend's road trip to Kingston gave me the opportunity to sit down and get to know Mr. Ruhnke a little better. One is immediately impressed by the frankness and openness which belie the bravado and brashness he displays on the ice.

When asked to comment on his superstar image, Ruhnke said that each person must set his own standards of evaluation, and that the fans are quite often looking for different skills than those by which the player himself judges his performance.

Ruhnke expressed disappointment with his performance so far this year, citing 'a lack of concentration and dedication' as the main reasons. He also noted that he missed the presence of center, Don Pagnutti, a linemate for three years. He added the quite realistic comment that he found it difficult to adapt the styles of the other center.

Ruhnke further belied his 'superstar' image by mentioning that he definitely did not approve of the 'way bodyrub parlours advertised — adding that he 'wouldn't like to take my little brother down Yonge Street.' Furthermore, if there are hockey groupies, and Ruhnke doubts the existence of anything more groupie-like than a hard-core group of fans, he certainly 'wouldn't pay much attention to them'.

Kent, who would either like to turn pro (with Detroit or in Europe) or attend FEUT in the fall, has developed maturity and leadership qualities in his four years with the Blues. Not only does he help out with the improvement of younger players with the team, but he has also helped develop a coaching program to bring up the skills' levels of minor league hockey players.

Ruhnke designed the program in collaboration with one of his fellow Varsity teammates, Bill Fifield. Its aim is to increase participation and has the added value of being able to be administered by the coach of most any team. The program has been favourably received to date, something Mr. Ruhnke can certainly be proud of.

Blues' number 12 also commented on the lack of participation on the part of the fans of hockey in general and of the Varsity Blues in particular. He expressed concern with the overall apathy that students seem to feel towards sports in general, adding that the students seem to be more interested in the social aspects of the game and have adopted a 'who cares' attitude toward intercollegiate sports.

Ruhnke contrasted this with the dedication and commitment made by many workers and villagers in Czechoslovakia, where a community often pools its labour and time to build the necessary facilities for hockey.

Ruhnke was in Czechoslovakia as part of the student national team, and noted that the team was well treated and generally well received. He spoke, however, of the 'clash of cultures' which he felt was exemplified by the stereotyped role expectations of the European fans.

He went on to explain that, although Czechoslovakians are accustomed to a rough, tough type of hockey, they look upon playing the Canadian teams as a learning experience, as they feel the Canadians play a smoother, albeit physical, game. It is only when the Canadians retaliate when outmuscled that they are called 'butchers'.

Ruhnke felt that the team added to Canada's hockey prestige abroad, but felt that, given the fact the all-star team had very little time to practise as a team, sending one whole team would be a better way of representing the calibre of student hockey in Canada.

He went on to add he felt that calibre was increasing overall, even with teams like Ryerson and Brock in the league.

In conclusion, Ruhnke had nothing but praise for Tom Watt and roles he fulfills as coach of the Blues. Kent feels that a coach has three duties: selection of the best players for the team, molding those players into a team, and finally, leading the team.

Ruhnke continued, saying that he feels honestly and respect on the part of the coach will motivate the players to develop, for themselves, responsibility towards the team. Watt, he feels, is the perfect example of this type of coach.

Ruhnke, a three-year veteran, was a top scorer last year.

That cigar-smoking man who was smiling shyly on page one of Wednesday's paper was not possible provost Milton Israel. In fact it was Allen Bloom, darling of the young conservatives, who figured highly in the Bandfield Affair. And to all those of you who called, no, it wasn't a deliberate error.

On the subject of mistakes, the editorial on page four referred to "law professor John Dove" when it should have mentioned "law professor John Swan." Well, hell, what's one word?

Math staff rebuff Duff in a huff

A group of math profs is calling for chairman Duff's resignation.

By MARINA STRAUSS
A group of 27 faculty members in the mathematics department has called for the resignation of department chairman George Duff.

Although all the faculty members contacted declined to discuss the letter they sent to Duff earlier this month calling for his resignation, or reasons for it, Duff said yesterday they cited "adamance I had taken on certain issues."

But while Duff felt the problem resolves around his recent stand to increase teacher's work loads, math professor Ed Barbeau maintained Duff was "simplifying it a bit too much."

Barbeau said the problem is not over one specific issue but "a deeper and larger problem involving the general relation of Duff and the department."

Faculty of Arts and Science dean Bob Greene is setting up a committee to "examine the facts" surrounding the friction between the department members and its chairman and recommend a governing structure.

Greene, who has not received a letter of resignation from Duff, maintained the problems stem from "a concern about administrative methods and governing structures" of the math department.

However, Barbeau confirmed disagreement exists with Duff himself and how he uses the departmental government structure.

Duff would not say whether he will resign, noting only that he has discussed it with Greene and is leaving it in the dean's hands.

Math chairman since 1968 with still two years of his second term to serve, Duff admitted the job has been "a heavy" one for him and the recent economic belt tightening in the university "is making all the administrative work more difficult. The system is under the pressure of contraction."

Duff feels his push last month to increase teaching duties—which he says should subsequently lead to additional courses and more and smaller undergraduate classes—brought strong opposition from some math faculty members.

He said while the letter calling for his resignation cited no explicit reasons, "I understood that they referred to the teaching load issue."

The Varsity was unable to obtain a copy of the letter calling for Duff's resignation, which was signed by 27 of the department's some 70 faculty members.

Duff came under fire in the spring of 1973 when students occupied the department offices to protest the chairman's refusal to renew the contracts of three popular math instructors.

Support staff launch union drive

By JOSEPH WRIGHT
An organizing campaign is being conducted at Simcoe Hall and the Physical Plant to encourage 600 non-academic technical and clerical employees to join the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE).

The employees presently belong to no union.

A group of concerned workers have formed the CUPE Organizing Committee, which has produced a leaflet outlining problems employees both buildings face.

The leaflet says, "Over the past two years our buying power has dropped eight per cent, considering an inflation rate of 12 per cent a year, and average salary increases of eight per cent per year."

"This economic upset affects not only our salaries but also job security, promotions and benefits. Unless we are organized into a professional association or union, we'll have no say in what happens to us."

"We are largely non-professional, non-academic employees and as such are in a particularly vulnerable position with regard to improving our wages and fringe benefits. But we are as necessary to the operation of the university as any other group."

The leaflet cites the 1975-1976 university budget as an example of their vulnerability.

"The province is giving the universities a basic increase of 7.4 per cent at a time when the U of T is budgeting for at least a 9 per cent increase in provincial grants."

"At a time when the rate of inflation is approximately 13 per cent, it is evident that someone must lose out."

"Conditions can only get worse," the leaflet notes, "and we have no say whatever. There is no guarantee that any salary increases will be equitable. Merit increases do not allow for a consistent substantial raise for anyone."

"We have arrived at the conclusion that the only realistic solution to our problems is the formation of a union of technical and clerical staff in the Physical Plant and Simcoe Hall."

Ontario region assistant director of CUPE Frank Kitchen said organizing efforts have now been going on for about three months.

He said he realized the university is facing budget cuts but workers' wages must be protected.

Workers at the Board of Education at 155 College Street who are represented by CUPE, now earn from $700 to $1,600 more per year than workers in the same job classifications at Simcoe Hall and the Physical Plant, Kitchen added.

CUPE now represents library workers and SAC full-time employees at U of T.

Heap assails right wing group on Metro council

By JENNIFER WONG
Alderman Dan Heap blasted the right wing elements of Metro Council at a meeting of the Ward Six Community Organization Tuesday evening.

Heap condemned the Council's "automatic" approval of Paul Godfrey as chairman, saying all debate of the issue was left to the Reform Caucus members.

Aldermen John Sewell, Michael Goldrick and Heap also contested the Metro Council chairmanship.

"But it was obvious," Heap said, "that the right wing had done a thorough job of wheeling and dealing—trading jobs and votes."

Heap said three NDP members, supported in the recent municipal elections by the Labor Council, had all voted for Karl Malotte as citizen representative to the TTC. Two of these, Carol Ruddell and Barbara Greene, received prestigious positions as chairpersons of Metro committees.

Heap also described the holders of key posts on Metro Council committees as "generally conservative, with some real reactionaries among them."

"We were wrong to try a policy of quiet diplomacy," Heap concluded. "If we had launched a big noisy campaign, we might be nearer to knowing how and why none of the people we supported were elected."

Heap opposed "Godfrey's plans for centralization with all the power being sucked into the chairman's office with a little spread around the mayors."

Godfrey has made a proposal to Metro Council for the hiring of more staff solely responsible to the chairman.

The Reform Caucus is pushing for deferment of the proposal until March.

"This will give us time to state our opposition and to polarize the Council," Heap explained. He called Godfrey "an agent for the provincial takeover of municipal affairs."

Alderman Allan Sparrow reported on efforts of the south-east Spadina steering committee to obtain certain re-zonings and coverage reductions in the area bounded by College, Spadina, McCaul and Queen Streets. City Council adopted the steering committee's recommendations Wednesday.

Having council declare its intent will help freeze out developers and land assemblers who may be operating in the area, Sparrow said.

The Ward 6 community organization endorsed a proposal to the urban renewal, housing, fire and legislation committee to explore the viability of turning Rochdale College on Bloor St. W. into a non-profit venture, owned and operated by the city.

"Rochdale was designed for mixed use and low income housing provision," Rochdale resident Kevin O'Leary told the meeting. "The city has expressed interest in this kind of project. If it could acquire the property, 540 units would immediately be available to the market."

The organization also passed a motion incorporating as part of its platform a set of guidelines for the acceptance of contributions to election campaigns and to the organization itself.

The motion called for a normal ceiling of $200 and the declaration of donations.

It also specified groups and types of individuals, such as land speculators, whose motives for donation might be suspect.

The organization's various committees are probing relevant community issues. Tenants are being organized in apartment buildings of the North Jarvis area, and the planning and transportation committee is questioning the policy of U of T concerning on-campus parking.

The environmentalists are lobbying with the Harborfront authorities for the establishment of a physical fitness facility.

Is that a CUPE organizer stalking behind the potted geraniums at Simcoe Hall?

Better start thinking now to work later say U of T job counsellors

By BOB ADOURIAN

The U of T Career Counselling and Placement Centre urges students to think ahead about seeking permanent and summer employment rather than leaving it to the last minute.

The centre is located on the fourth floor of 344 Bloor St. W. and is open weekdays from 8:45 am to 5 pm. Tuesdays it stays open until 9 pm.

Aside from having job listings, the centre offers career-oriented counselling for those who need it. Students falling into this category include those in a particular course of study who want to know where it will lead them in the job market.

Others simply don't know what they want to do, and want help in determining their occupational interests and aptitudes. For these types the centre offers counselling and occupational and vocational testing.

Centre director Rivi Frankle says that "one of the main focuses of this place is to help students help themselves."

Counsellors instruct students on the finer points of such standard job-hunting procedures as writing a resume and taking an interview.

The counsellors encourage and help students to explore the job market to see the exact scope of what is available. They train students to narrow the field of available jobs by assessing their own needs, interests, experience and aptitudes.

Counsellor Neal Mosher says people are disappointed with the range of jobs available to them, especially those with certain arts backgrounds. Mosher points out career paths tend to be flexible for these people, who tend to move from job to job for a while before settling down.

Mosher says he takes people "from where they're at politically." He is not in a position to pass judgment on their political ideals which determine the type of job they are seeking, Mosher notes. In other words, if someone refuses to consider a job with a large automobile manufacturer because of personal convictions opposed to profit-oriented capitalists, Mosher will not attempt to challenge those convictions.

The centre has an on-campus recruitment program which runs from November to the end of March, for students in their graduating year.

In addition there is a permanent job registry which students or alumni seeking immediate employment can register in, listing their background and type of job desired. The centre will then inform the student of job openings which become available in that field.

The centre has one of the most extensive job-training libraries in Canada with information on 1,200 different employers from a variety of fields.

It also has calendars from all Canadian and United Kingdom universities and 200 American schools, as well as information on European schools.

Group counselling and discussion groups for students with particular problems in common are arranged when there is sufficient interest.

The counselling staff is currently doing seminars on campus on the topic of summer employment. Watch The Varsity's Here and Now section for times and places of these seminars.

UC gets $6.5 million facelift

By LIAM LACEY

If you've been concerned about the mess around University College, it looks like no immediate relief is in sight.

Workmen are now on only the second phase of a $6.5 million five-phase plan to restore, renovate and modernize the UC building.

"We can all expect the sounds of drills and hammers for some time yet," cautioned Archie Hallett, UC principal and honorary chairman of the UC restoration fund.

If government money holds out and no difficulties arise, Hallett suggests the project will take "at least seven years."

The Ontario government and U of T have promised the college $5 million to cover the cost of strengthening walls and floors, new wiring and plumbing and meeting necessary fire regulations.

The UC restoration fund, an alumni group, hopes to raise an additional $1.5 million to preserve the unique timber and stonework.

Begun in 1974, the group plans to spend the next four years soliciting help from corporations, charitable foundations and UC graduate students.

The first stage of the project, covering the southwest corner of the building, has already been completed and the work will progress along the south and then the east faces of the building.

The original structure, built in 1859, was completed in just three years.

Camelot it's not—as old UC gets, uh, beautified.

The Learning Machine

The Learning Machine is here for student contributions on anything to do with your education at U of T. There have been some contributions but we need more.

Please drop submissions at The Varsity, 91 St. George, 2nd Floor. Ask for the courageous Bob Bettson. Or call 923-8741.

You can get involved and help play a role in bettering your education. Here is a brief rundown of recent activities:

- The Third World Studies caucus met Tuesday but came to no conclusions on the best strategy to fight for retention of courses. Some argued for working within each department separately and others argued for a unified effort.

- Although no conclusions were reached Arts and Sciences Students' Union fieldworker Rick Gregory will be working on a survey of third world students and professors with the object of possibly seeking a third world studies program at U of T.

- The Spanish Course Union is well on the way to running its own evaluations regardless of what the faculty decides.

- The History Students' Union has begun agitating for student use of the faculty meeting room, Sidney Smith room 2091. The department is holding a faculty meeting on appointments. It is not a departmental meeting because they want to exclude students who have 14 seats on the departmental council.

Thirteen active course unisexists in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

- The Undergraduate Geography Society is holding its annual elections. Nominations close today for the election next Wednesday.

- The Fine Arts department is having trouble with re-location. The university wants to move the department to Bathurst and College Streets but students want to move to the Borden building.

- Sociology students have revived the course union. Their next fight will be against an attempt by a group of senior sociology faculty members to subvert the parity sociology departmental assembly. A student newsletter will be out shortly.

- A Classics Course Union has been formed for the first time. It has elected student representatives to the departmental council. Now the problem is to find out who the new chairman is. The union is planning course evaluations.

- The Arts and Science Student Union has just purchased new gestefax and gestetner machines for the use of course unions and for course evaluations later this spring. It will hold its annual budget meeting early next month.

Proposal for university ombudsman deferred

The academic affairs committee Wednesday deferred discussion of a proposal from presidential human rights advisor Dan Hill for the creation of a university ombudsman.

The proposal—a long time in the works—was thrust in Hill's lap shortly after his appointment last fall.

Hill proposes an ombudsman, "independent of all existing administrative structures of the university," to investigate grievances within and towards the university, to report his or her findings, to serve as a "general information centre" about grievance situations, and to direct services during emergencies.

The report recommends an initial 18-month appointment by the president, chosen by a search committee "highly representative of the university community."

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway has recommended the search committee be composed of six members: three students, from SAC, GSU and APUS; one teaching staff member, one non-academic staff member, and one presidential appointee. The chairman would be a lay member of the Governing Council.

The ombudsman, says the report, should concern him or herself with discovering gaps in human rights procedures, making prompt decisions, analyzing the adequacy of decision-making procedures and honoring requests for information.

Although the ombudsman would have access to official files, he or she would have no authority to break confidences, and his or her recommendations would be merely advisory.

Conway says the ombudsman should be a "catalytic agent, a mediator with ability to hear out and resolve both simple and difficult conflict situations in the university community."

The proposal has already been approved by the internal affairs committee. After approval by both academic and internal affairs committees, it must come before the executive committee and full Governing Council for final approval.

- In other business, the committee granted a request from the medical faculty for a $15 student fee for the maintenance of microscopes. Student committee members argued such a fee would create a dangerous precedent of passing costs onto students.

- "You can charge the psychology students for every rat they use," warned Scarborough rep Gary Heighington.

- The committee also passed minor amendments to the constitution of the Scarborough College Council, pausing only to slap Scarborough Dean J. D. King on the wrists for not including "or her" to the lone possessive pronoun "his."

- Meanwhile, the Scarborough council structure—44 faculty members (about 200), 24 undergraduate students, six graduates, six alumni and six non-academic staff—went almost unobserved.

- Academic affairs also rejected a student request for representation on an all-faculty Tenure Review Committee, which is responsible for examining the procedure for appeal against negative tenure decisions.

- Students, as a bloc, have yet to win a single vote on the academic affairs committee this year.

Guelph women form federation

GUELPH (CUP) — Women students at the University of Guelph have formed a federation to "promote an awareness among women of the forms and structures of sexism within the university" and to instigate necessary political action.

The federation came into being after women at the university felt their previous mechanism for airing their grievances, a women's committee, lacked a definite structure and did not have political clout a federation would have.

The students announced the federations' formation at a meeting of the University of Guelph Central Student Association (UGCSA) and also told the association "They must begin taking responsibility for improvement and changes in women's position on campus."

The UGCSA voted to appoint the federation a standing committee on women so they can deal with issues of sexism.

Students could bear extra costs

At its meeting Wednesday, the academic affairs committee approved a request from the faculty of medicine to levy a $15 fee on its students for the use of microscopes.

Taken by itself, the request looks reasonable enough: a contract for the use of microscopes had expired, and students had been paying the cost previously.

However, we are worried not about this particular incident, but about the seeds of an idea it might spark in the minds of some of our more devious colleagues.

After all, if the medical faculty can charge for microscopes, why can't the dentistry faculty charge for toothbrushes? Or the food sciences faculty for frying pans?

It reminds us of the situation we were all told about in Economics 100. The government imposes a rent freeze, so the landlord gets around it by charging you five dollars for the front door key, ten dollars for the washing machine and so on.

In this situation, the Ontario government has virtually frozen university grants, so the university may find itself in the position of passing its extra costs on to students — were it to be so devious. Think carefully the next time they ask you to pay for a set of Xeroxed notes.

I would like to append a footnote, albeit lengthy, to Ulli Diemer's review of the book Muscles and Blood, which concerns industrial accidents and diseases.

Mining industry spokesmen at the Elliot Lake hearings of Ontario's Ham commission have argued that the Cold War mentality and rushed delivery commitments were responsible for the high dust and radiation levels in the mines prior to 1960. The explanation is more likely to be found in Ontario's dismal anti-silicosis legislative record.

The 1920's were a decade of intense scientific research into both the etiology of silicosis and the means which could be taken to prevent it. A 1926 bulletin of the U.S. Bureau of Mines summarizes the knowledge of the day about silicosis prevention as follows:

"Many methods for determining the amount of dust in the air are available. The sugar tube method, the konimeter, and the impinger are chiefly used in the mining industry in the United States... The elimination of silicosis among miners depends on preventing the formation of dust by wet mining methods — wet drilling and wetting sides, roof and bottom, muck and rock piles; the use of sprays and water blasts to lay the dust after blasting; good mechanical ventilation to replace dusty air with clean air; and physical examination of all miners before employment and periodically thereafter. All of these means of prevention must be used to insure success."

In the same year the Ontario government recognized the silicosis problem by making the disease compensable by Workmen's Compensation Board. In 1928, an amendment to the Mining Act required as a precondition of employment that all workers employed underground be checked for tuberculosis once every 12 months.

This law, however, was not universally applicable: the Chief Inspector of Mines was given the prerogative of exempting those mines which provided any "good and sufficient reason", or which, in his opinion, did not present a silicosis or tuberculosis threat.

There was absolutely no provision for the levying of fines on mine owners who chose to ignore the troublesome paperwork. Despite the U.S. Bureau of Mines' unequivocal warning that "All of these means of prevention must be used to insure success", the government chose not to enforce standards of "wet mining."

The fate of the Silicosis Act of 1929 is characteristic of the negligence — criminal negligence — of successive Ontario administrations. This piece of legislative handiwork provided workers employed in cutting, polishing, or finishing of granite with the same check-up service afforded miners by the amendment to the Mining Act. In addition, it required industry officials to provide "such masks... and other appliances as approved from time to time by the Minister of Health."

The most gaping flaw in the act — lack of provision for enforcement — was rectified as an afterthought by a 1930 amendment which made employers' non-compliance with the law punishable by a fine not less than $100 and not more than $500.

But despite the legislative sleight-of-hand, the honorable members never became too exercised about the whole business of silicosis: the Silicosis Act of 1929 was never proclaimed in force!

After the first desultory flurry of legislation, the question did not surface again until the passage in 1950 of a new Silicosis Act, roughly modelled on the 1929 edition. It provided for medical check-ups, at any interval stipulated by an undesignated Crown minister, for workers employed in industrial processes, other than mining, which required exposure to a certain level of silica dust, also to be determined by the minister.

There is no intention in the act to coerce employers to reduce the levels of silica dust in workplaces, or to provide workers with safety masks as had been prescribed by the stillborn 1929 act. Even the periodical medical checks could hardly have been taken seriously by industry officials: the penalty for employing a worker who had not undergone examination was to be between $10 and $100.

Considerable bureaucratic confusion must also have resulted from the fact that administration of the act was not assigned to a specific ministry. In any case, the lungs of workers could be damned; the Silicosis Act of 1950 did not come into force until 1952.

The laws of 1928, 1929, and 1950 also empowered responsible ministers to promulgate Cabinet regulations supplementary to the actual legislation. It is possible, of course, that such regulations were made; but the usually very thorough Labor Gazette, the journal of the federal department of labor, does not give evidence of any such regulations.

At a 1958 conference in Toronto on pulmonary diseases, R. E. Findlay, manager of Anur gold mine in Timmins, triumphantly reported "proof of progress" in the fight against silicosis. He stated that whereas in 1926 it took an average of 12.6 years for silicosis to develop, the average had risen by 1956 to 27.4 years. (During this same period, the Workmen's Compensation Board disgorged $15,798,685 from the public purse for silicotics — an outright subsidy for the continued irresponsibility of the industry and its succession of caretaker governments.)

The Elliot Lake disaster, in light of this legislative record, is no fully comprehensible. The legislative emulchs accumulated by the Ontario government over the years failed to demand enforcement of even the most minimal anti-silicosis standards.

SAC must organize rejection of code

As a close observer of the entire discipline campaign last year, I feel it necessary to clear up a few misconceptions, and attempt to explain what is going on.

Firstly there is only one discipline code, it was accepted by a full meeting of Governing Council last March. Very few students attended the meeting.

Mention of Cadario-Conway refers to the authors of a draft prepared in the spring of 1973. Some students objected to some of the clauses of the code and so the administration withdrew implementation of those clauses, subject to review. They did not withdraw the clauses entirely.

SAC president, Seymour Kanowitch, in a letter to the chairman of the committee responsible for the review, states that "the Conway-Cadario discipline code has already been overwhelmingly rejected by the students of this campus."

This is not true. Indeed it should be but the fact remains that the expression of such rejection failed to materialize.

The reason that it wasn't "overwhelmingly rejected" was that certain members of SAC felt rejection would jeopardize attempts to implement clauses in a discipline code that prevented professors from acting arbitrarily, such as assigning zeros for misbehaviour.

This position caused a basic split in the united front organized around the demand of repeal of the code, with provision for future negotiation. At that point the code was passed.

But the letter from Seymour Kanowitch to Bill Whelton, chairman of the Internal Affairs Committee, reveals more than an unexplained confusion of the facts.

It also attempts to tell the U of T faculty what is good for it. The Faculty Association refused to nominate members to the review committee. The president of SAC objects when the Governing Council co-opts faculty representatives, from its own members, to the committee. But this is the established procedure, and if anyone is to object then surely UTFA would be first. In any event if SAC wanted to support the Faculty, then refusal to participate would be the obvious action.

The attempt of SAC to accept the discipline code on the one hand and reject it on the other may seem strange, but it is not out of the ordinary. Subject to various bureaucratic ultimatums, SAC is perfectly willing to sit on the committee and review the discipline code as it stands, with or without the faculty.

I am of the opinion that the U of T student population would be victimized by such a code, that it would not, in any way serve as a check on the arbitrary action of an individual faculty member nor on the arbitrary nature of the administration.

The questions of who runs this university, in whose interest, and what role students can play are very crucial. But the question of discipline is an irrelevant and dangerous detour.

SAC should organize the massive rejection of the discipline code and not rely on the president's ability to conjure it out of a hat

University takes anti-labor policy

The firing of zoology department worker Paul McReavy last Friday can only be interpreted as one more anti-union move on the part of the U of T administration. Considering the facts as The Varsity has stated them, what other conclusions can be drawn?

An employee of the university for FIVE years, McReavy had no major disciplinary counts against his record. McReavy became a union member and took part in discussions with some other workers about the possibility of unionizing. In a short space of time, there were several disciplinary interviews about the "slowness" of his work and his "attitude" (although many acknowledge that the basic problems is under-staffing).

And then McReavy is fired. He is not given a trial period to "speed-up" his work. Not a suspension. But a firing! And with absolutely no recourse within the university's own channels. Two weeks separation pay, and six percent vacation pay are his compensation. And a five year work record is down the drain, unless an arbitration board sees fit to order his re-statement.

But to fully understand the administration's actions in this case, it is necessary to look outside the walls of the Zoology Building to the university's general policies, the history of its attitudes towards its workers, and the present situation vis-a-vis university employees.

The University of Toronto has historically fought unionizing attempts, and already-formed unions, with every means at its disposal. Some of the initial organizers of CUPE 1230 (library workers) were fired when their union activities became known. Probationary workers who have shown an active union interest have also been fired.

The Administration has stalled the GAA certification for many months off the make-up of the bargaining unit, in what seems to be an attempt to defeat the union by dragging the process out endlessly.

Both the SEIU and CUPE locals on campus, in the last round of contract negotiations, were ordered to take demands for cost-of-living clauses off the table, or negotiations would not proceed.

Union grievances filed by our local, on major and minor issues alike, are denied by management every step of the way, with the knowledge that arbitration costs ($300 to $1,000 per grievance) could bankrupt a local in no time, as well as taking 6-12 months to be heard.

And finally, witness the administration's response to recent COLA demands by the GAA and CUPE 1230. John Parker, Manager, Management Labour Relations (the "proper channel") refused to negotiate. Alex Rankin refused to meet with us and asked us to be "reasonable." And the Governing Council voted not to discuss the case, stating that it was an "administrative matter."

These are but a few examples of how the university, despite its rhetoric as a 'liberal' institution, a fair employer, and a co-operative 'community of interests,' shows itself to be no different than any other institution or employer in this society. Its purpose is to 'educate' people to carry forward the dominant ideas and values of the present political and economic system, and its internal functioning is a reflection of those same values. Financial considerations override human needs. The power relations are strictly defined and seemingly unchallengeable.

In the past, the administration has given small concessions to non-union staff on campus in an attempt to convince them that, with such a 'generous and liberal' employer, 'who needs a union?'

But the administration's ploys are not working.

Despite the attitudes of 'professionalism' fostered by the university, and the many false divisions created by endless classification categories, large groups of campus workers have begun to realize that only through organization and collective action will they have any strength. The past year has seen many new developments, and the new year will see even more.

Teaching assistants have formed a union, the first of its kind in the country. Small pockets of workers throughout the university are forming organizing committees. Librarians, and even faculty, who in the past have dismissed collective action as "unprofessional," are now forced to seriously consider the union alternative.

Our local at the library is consolidating and preparing for what will be our toughest contract fight yet next July; but we are in a much stronger position than before, partly due to the lessons of the COLA campaign before Christmas. And it is especially promising that alliances are beginning to be built among these various groups (and hopefully with students also) on the basis of common interests.

The firing of Paul McReavy must be viewed in this general context to be understood. Paul McReavy's firing should be opposed by all on campus. But it should not be seen as a sign of our inevitable defeat.

The university is worried — and with good reason — about the organizational drives developing on this campus.

It is obvious that campus workers are not going to remain silent in the upcoming crunch resulting from budget cuts.

If the work of union organizers was seen to be of little consequence, such drastic action would not have been taken. McReavy's firing is just one more reason why the momentum of organizing drives must be stepped up, and alliances must be developed.

The present situation is in fact a favorable one. It is up to us to turn a temporary setback into a victory.

President, CUPE 1230

LaMarsh ignores Palestine facts

I attended and read with disappointment excerpts of Miss LaMarsh's speech on the Middle East (Varsity, January 17).

Miss LaMarsh wants everyone in Canada to stand unconditionally for Israel. But the foundation of Israel was made possible only by the expulsion of Palestinians from their homeland. Maxime Rodinson in his book Israel, a colonial settler state? explained how Palestinians were induced to leave Palestine by deliberate acts of terror such as the massacre of hundreds of innocent villagers at Deir Yassin in 1948 by two Zionist organizations, the Irgun and the Stern Gang. In 1967, other Palestinians were made homeless. Miss LaMarsh did not mention even once the fate of the Palestinians who are at the centre of the dispute.

Miss LaMarsh stated that Israel is not interested in Arab territory but in peace. How does she then explain the Israeli conquests of 1948 and 1949 which provided more territory than the U.N. Partition Plan? In fact, through wars, culminating in 1967, Israel had grown fourfold.

The most unfortunate aspect of the speech was when Miss LaMarsh called Yasser Arafat, the Chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization, a "murderer" while remaining silent on the constant Israeli assaults and air raids on civilian Palestinian refugees living in Lebanon. Who are the terrorists? Are they not those who wage war to colonize and oppress other people?

The Palestine Liberation Organization recognized by the United Nations as having a "public body" status is an organized resistance movement within the meaning of the Geneva Convention of 1949. Article 4 of that convention confers upon organized resistance movements the right to conduct guerrilla operations in or outside their own territory.

Is it not a fact that Israel has refused to recognize the national entity of the Palestinians for over 25 years? It was Mrs. Golda Meir — whom Miss LaMarsh said she admires — who stated that the Palestinians do not exist.

Finally, Miss LaMarsh said that "the U.N. is being subverted like never before" for having invited the P.L.O. Does she yearn for the good old days when few Western countries ran the U.N. like a private club? The facts are that as the world rapidly changes so will the emphasis of the U.N. change to reflect the real world view.

Restaurant guide forgot this one

Since I usually read the Review section with interest, it was delightful last Friday to hear some of the reviewers on the more personal topic of food.

I'm writing to say you missed one after-theatre cafe and Sunday solarium that deserved mention.

The Cow Cafe (406 Dupont) is what their reader has been missing since The Cafe on St. Nicholas closed a couple of years ago. The Cow is intimate, generally quiet, with excellent and varied food and drink.

Order an authentic quiche, brioche and marmalade, one of 28 teas and you're in Paris, proofreading your poetry review on a Sunny Sunday afternoon; King City cider, a hardy soup, a low-priced sandwich and you're as Canadian as the raw greenery of the thriving plants in the window. You could also snack on 'gado-gado', an oriental peanut butter dip.

One of the chefs plays a recorder; drop by Sundays for a baroque duet. By the way, I don't work there, but I feel enough at home to write this invite.

Marxist talk controversial

By DONALD COLE

Several speakers accused prominent Marxist theorist Paul Piccone of "attacking Marxism and the working class" in the first lecture of a series sponsored by the Marxist Institute of Toronto and held in the Medical Sciences building Tuesday.

Piccone, a visiting U of T sociology professor, angered vocal members of the audience of 150 with his iconoclastic views.

"The present economic crisis is only a readjustment period" for the next development of capitalism, Piccone said.

High energy technology, such as that employed in widespread use of atomic power, will predominate in energy intensive industries, he said.

"Most of the population then will be on welfare, unemployed or engaged in marginal labour," Piccone said.

There will be "no economic consequences of the present economic crisis that will lead to revolution," he maintained.

"People are kidding themselves if they think they are suffering in Toronto," Piccone said.

However, members of the audience pointed out the decline in real wages, the housing crisis and the rise in working class militancy in the city.

"The context of perpetual scarcity" is the "ideological pillar of capitalism," Piccone argued.

He cited "commodity fetishism" as an example of the manipulation of human needs under modern oligopolistic capitalism.

"The need for social recognition or respect are not concretely met by a new car," he said.

In response to this "considerably cheapened everyday life", Piccone called for a "cultural examination" to bring about "qualitatively different social relations and lifestyles."

He also pressed the need for a "left wing ecological movement" in conjunction with a cultural revolution if we are to avoid the "apocalyptic vision of 1984."

Pay through the knows

VANCOUVER (CUP)

University students will be paying up to 20 percent more for textbooks next year says Bob Smith, manager of the University of British Columbia book store.

As usual, rising costs are the main impetus behind price increases, but in the case of textbooks the problem is more complex than other industries.

Ted Lucas, western sales manager for Gage Educational Publishing Ltd., said last week in an interview the average cost increase for all lines of Gage books has been 17 percent from last year.

Smith said because college bookstores are only 10 percent of the total market, many Canadian publishing companies are turning to selling high school textbooks.

He said printers find they can sell large quantities of a single book to a whole province and make more money than selling 10 copies of one book to one university and repeating this process throughout Canada.

Lucas said he could not understand suggestions that publishing companies are leaving the university market.

"Ten percent of millions is still a large amount," Lucas said.

Smith said a big problem for next year would be getting the books the professors order into the store.

"Every year we can count on about 20 per cent of the orders running into problems," he said.

Lucas said poor service "this particular year has been an industry wide problem."

He said because books come from outside Canada they have to be stored in warehouses. But no publisher wants to lose money by keeping a large inventory so big orders often have to come directly from England or the States.

Geoffrey Grigson, in the TLS, reports the following dialogue between the very young Auden and his tutor at Oxford:

Tutor: And what are you going to do, Mr. Auden, when you leave the university?

Auden: I am going to be a poet.
 Tutor: Well, in that case you should find it very useful to have read English.

Auden: You don't understand. I am going to be a great poet.

(Quoted in last week's New Yorker, by Hannah Arendt in her "Remembering Wystan H. Auden, who died in the night of the Twenty-Eighth of September, 1973")

You have been Warned!

Re-creating medieval customs and preparing for the millenium, two members of the Society for Creative Anachronism do their stuff.

There are those who say that the trend among students today is towards escapism and fantasy. That was the gist anyway of an Entertainment section full-front page article in last Saturday's Globe and Mail.

But two events this past week have set the Varsity Review Staff wondering. Last Friday there was a mention of a meeting of the Society for Creative Anachronism in the Here and Now. Last Wednesday there was a mention of a meeting of the War Games Society (as well as yet another mention of a meeting of the Society for Creative Anachronism).

Are one feature story and two events seeming to bear it out equal to (if not more than) my God, a TREND?

In this day and age, yes. Nevertheless, things are not as they seem, as we found out when we went to the meetings.

The Society for Creative Anachronism describes itself as a semi-feudal organization devoted to the re-creation of medieval arts and customs — such as jousting and fencing. The Toronto branch which started in November is a part of a continent-wide movement that started in Berkeley eight and a half years ago. There are four kingdoms in North America, which are subdivided in turn into baronies and shires and then cantons. The Toronto chapter calls itself the Shire of Eoforiwic (Anglo-Saxon for York).

The War Games Society is involved in conflict simulation situations — situations that can range from historical battles, through hypothetical wars such as one between Russia and China to science fiction wars. The games are played with miniature soldiers deployed on naturalistic terrain and with as board games, especially Diplomacy, a game played by mail by over 2,000 members.

All very innocent? Hah! Who would deny that the moral and religious conflicts in the novels of Tolstoy were not the prelude to the Russian Revolution? Who could say that the novels of Henty, of Kipling, of Haggard, were not a natural preparation for the First World War? Who is to say that the right-wing vigilante groups in Great Britain who are standing by, Ready, Aye, Ready, to take over the country in the event of financial ruin are escapist groups?

In the words of that great light humourist Ingmar Bergman and in the words of Paul, too, "we see through a glass darkly but soon, etc., etc."

The Society for Creative Anachronism and The War Games Society in fact represent nothing less than the move of the Left, not from the Left to the Right, but from Strategy to Tactics.

These groups practise military manoeuvres. They drill. They train. They put their wooden swords and their paper counters, and their plastic miniature figures where their mouths are. These groups are organized. They have leaders and they have followers.

Bitter experience has taught them that revolution is the opiate of the intellectuals. They have gone into disguise. But they are the Left: we are right!

Consider: they look like the much publicized Left of a few years ago: fairly innocuous. And they sound much like that Left, more interesting than they really are.

Consider: no one knows who is supporting them. But obviously some one is. The question is: Who? It's a question everyone is afraid to answer.

Consider: they are a part of a movement that recognizes men like that great realist, Khalil Gibran, a man equal only to Mao Tse-Tung in his doctrinaire ruthlessness, a man who proudly proclaims: "For what is it to die but to stand naked in the wind and to melt into the sun?"

And, finally, consider: there are so few of them.

They are the Left of a few years ago, today.

And as such, they are dedicated. They are preparing themselves. And when the time comes, they will fight.

They are ready, aye waiting, to 'selflessly' follow the immortal example of mortal Frodo.

Gather your loved ones around you. Huddle closer to the fire.

They cannot be stopped. And you have been warned.

Two squires receiving instruction in medieval martial arts.

Not just another lecturer: John Stark & Stephen Leacock

John Stark is a drifter. He might well have become a baseball player, a physical education director, or even a movie star. Instead, he chose to make a career of bringing Stephen Leacock back to life.

He has performed across Canada, and appeared on radio and television programs. Still, he is not satisfied with public awareness of Leacock, and he is determined to change the situation. Slowly, through much struggle, people are beginning to take notice. Stark will perform here at the U of T February third. (At 4 p.m. in Sid Smith, Room 2135. Admission free.)

Stark is following in the footsteps of Emlyn Williams (who has brought Charles Dickens back to life), Hal Holbrook (the second Mark Twain) and others — but with a Canadian model, for reasons which materialized after several interviews. (Of course an earlier effort to recreate the sound of Leacock was that of John Drainie, a Canadian radio personality, but Drainie lacked something that Stark brought out.)

The first time I saw Stark on stage was at the second performance of the Merry Posa Revue, part of the first Stephen Leacock Festival of Humour. Inside the old Edwardian Opera House, the audience was buckled up with laughter.

That night, though, they weren't laughing at John Stark. Somehow four bats had managed to get into the hall and were flying around at random, taking a swipe at Stark every now and then.

Stark could have done without that added distraction. He had come all the way down from his goat farm in Surrey, on the outskirts of Vancouver, to help establish a focal point for Canadian humorists. Fourteen of Canada's top comics participated, mostly for the love of it. The project was an artistic success, but nobody got rich. Yet despite a great deal of acting experience, Stark was not feeling very secure. This was his first time performing the act with a revue, and he felt out of place.

"Leacock's approach," he explained before the performance, "was that of a travelling lecturer, and the whole atmosphere and format of his presentation was different. He lectured mostly for university audiences who were generally more attentive and more ready to listen to his humour, to let it penetrate, and absorb the satire and the subtlety of it, than this type of audience would be. In this situation I have to rely on broader sketches that don't require that much attention."

"When you're doing a slick, fast, racy revue, I'm not sure how Leacock fits into that situation. Maybe it works on contrast, yet on the other hand maybe it's sort of incongruous since the style doesn't blend itself particularly to the pace of modern comedy."

"Leacock's method was an anecdotal type of humor: a situation was explained and the ramifications of the particular incident were elongated. Eventually the humour of the situation built up until the final sort of climactic punch line, unlike the fast dizzy pace of the one-liner comedies of today."

Stark's acting career was not a result of forethought, but grew from circumstances: a lifetime full of hardships, growing up without a father, drifting everywhere, similar to what Leacock experienced.

There was a University of Arizona baseball scholarship, which he lost the first year because of an injury. To finance his education, Stark took a job as a bellhop at the Sanorina Hotel, in Toosaw. The hot winter climate attracted many film companies and several well-known actors stayed at the hotel.

While serving drinks in the bar, Stark met Glenn Ford and Van Heflin, who were at work on the film 3:10 to Yuma. Stark remembers somebody asking him to come out to the set to play the role of a member of a sheriff's posse. Although he had never ridden a horse in his life, he accepted the offer. Within minutes of mounting, he was struck in the head by a branch while making a charge up a creek, and the film's director fired him instantly.

However, the $25 cheque Columbia Pictures paid him remained on his wall for years as an encouraging symbol, he recalls. Some of the actors encouraged Stark to switch his major studies from physical education, to English and theatre arts. Besides, he didn't find much difference between athletics and acting and the injury had reduced his hopes of making a career of athletics.

"There was always a sense of performance in film and television and on the stage, which I suppose you get to a certain extent in athletic endeavor. There's a certain moment of truth and delivery where you have to be precisely there — mentally and physically — as you have to be in athletics."

After university, Stark worked on a number of local dramas on CBC-TV then hitched across the country. There followed a brief spell studying acting in New York, and then it was back to Western Canada to get married.

In Vancouver he organized a repertory company, Canadian Arts Theatre, and eventually 20 actors were working for him. After seven years, financial problems forced him to reduce the company to a one-man show.

"I was determined to keep my little operation going without relying on subsidies like LIP or Canada Council grants. I was determined to keep the organization on its own two feet."

With the larger company, Stark had concentrated mainly on Canadian plays, none of which he found very exciting. However, an adaptation of a short story by the Russian novelist and dramatist Nikolai Gogol, proved successful as a monologue.

Stark, fascinated by the response, began looking for more material that could be turned into one-man shows. Eventually he discovered that Leacock had been a world lecturer — and a bit of an actor too — in much the same fashion as Mark Twain.

"In the early stages of the development of this (Leacock) monologue, I would perform almost anywhere: in a high school gymnasium, for a dinner party, and there were many engagements in smaller clubs. This was necessary for the sake of development of material and looking for audience reaction, because that is really a very important factor in the material."

"Having had mostly experience acting amongst various actors, I was suddenly in a new type of situation, where you were delivering a monologue and the equivalent of your actors on stage were your people in the audience. You had to develop this repertoire between the audience and yourself on stage, and it was a totally different feeling. It was experience along this line that I tried to get."

And it worked! Those people who once attended Leacock's lectures claim that Stark has received not only the makeup, the mannerisms, and the tone of voice, but even the wit that Canada's greatest humourist left with us thirty years ago.

What was it that Stark brought out that Drainie didn't? Stark doesn't claim to be an expert on Leacock, but he has done an extensive amount of study and research and has developed this character as he sees him, over the past two years.

"John Drainie had a quality that Leacock certainly used on a number of occasions: A dry sort of easy-going rural type of farm humour. But Leacock wasn't predominantly like that. He was very alert, very intellectual, a keen witty fellow who could put on this quality of being a little farmer caught by circumstances that were completely bewildering to him. This was the comic technique of Leacock as I see him — to portray this little man who walks into the bank, or this little man who's naive and confounded by huge insurance companies.

"But Leacock himself wasn't confounded by huge corporations; he was quite at ease with celebrities. He spoke in all great capitals of the world during the 1920's and 1930's, and was very elegant. Leacock had a brilliant sense of humour, which was completely spontaneous. This humour was not quite as lazy and as dry as John Drainie led us to believe."

Stark has a loyal and deep admiration for Leacock that shows in his performances, and in his interviews.

"How often does one find a genius that sets a style and a pattern for either prose or writing of humour? Leacock set a trend. He had a fantastic output; it would be remarkable if someone achieved what he's done for Canadian Humour. The man was a human dynamo. He used to get up at five in the morning and write for four hours, every day, week after week, year after year. It's this sort of determination and drive and sense of purpose, combined with the natural genius that the man has, which gives rise to what we have."

"His type of humour is not only entertaining, but it has a nice light satirical touch to it. It's philosophical and intellectual to some people, yet on the other hand it can be related to a very average audience that sees the broad burlesque of his humour."

Recently Stark performed at the Planetarium in Vancouver with a group of actors in an adaptation of what was perhaps Leacock's most famous work, Sunshine Sketches Of A Small Town. The show was so successful that Stark has sent the script to the Leacock Society in Orillia to be considered for inclusion in next year's Leacock Festival.

At 38, with a wife and two kids to support, one wonders why he is still very much a drifter.

"It dates back to the days when I used to play a lot of baseball; there was a lot of excitement in going from one town to another. I used to tour the professional baseball circuit for a short while before I was injured. I guess there was that same sort of vagabond instinct that developed in theatrical circles... of going out to various places, performing and meeting new people. It's that excitement about the touring lecturer I suppose that somehow coincides with the touring baseball player."

It was a shock to Stark to learn that during the winter the CBC engaged Christopher Plommer to do a special program on Leacock.

"I'm not to be outdone by this," said Stark. "Canada really hasn't changed much since Leacock's day. It was in 1907 rejection slips from Canadian publishers prompted Leacock to go abroad for acceptance. Today its the CBC for me."

After hearing of Plommer's show, Stark began investigating the idea of doing his show in England, touring the continent. Oxford University has already asked him to appear, and this appeals to him of course: Leacock was a lecturer there in 1907 and wrote down his impressions of Oxford in his famous sketch, "Oxford As I See It."

"That sketch is turning out to be quite a popular one in Canada, too," notes Stark. "... though it's been a couple of years of hard bus and trucking across the country on my own to develop the interest in it."

The Frogs: the Trinity College production in 1902: members of the 'cast' college when it was still a university and located on Queen Street.

Jana O'Hara as Wonder Woman; Michael Macina as Dionysius, Barbara Stewart as Xanthippe, and Chris Dreä as Hercules.

Aristophanes' Frogs in 1902 and in 1975

Aristophanes' frogs was presented by Trinity College in 1902. Lo and behold, here it is again, this time at Hart House this weekend through next.

Martin Hunter's production has been rumoured to be trying as hard as possible to be controversial.

Certainly it is full of a lot of undergraduate daring. It starts off with the word "Fuck" and it ends with the cast thumbing its nose at the audience. It had to happen. The resentment and the frustration have obviously been a long time a-building. But the redemption of the whole project is that Hunter has finally managed to judge from the dress rehearsal that I sat in on, to achieve such exciting results and also to get such a large number of outstanding individual performances.

And it raises in an acute form the question of who actually goes to see Hart House Theatre plays. I had concluded that the audiences were mainly university alumni, those who under the stress of the responsibilities of family and suburban life look back on their college days with a yearning eye, those who have an old fashioned concept of the university as a preserver and dispenser of Culture, of the culture that they perhaps never had the time to familiarize themselves with if they were in or professional courses.

And of course it is these people his production will most bewilder and most antagonise.

In view of relentless determination to be more than up-to-date, perhaps it is fitting that we pause for a few moments to look backwards into the past. (A review of Hunter's production will appear in Monday's Varsity.)

The 1902 production was staged in conjunction with the Jubilee celebrations of Trinity's founding. It was staged a year before the College actually became a college associated with the University of Toronto, "the State University of the Province of Ontario." It was staged in the natural amphitheatre on the Queen Street location of the College a number of years before it moved to its present site. But the college knew at that time that union, at least, was imminent, and as a result, on the occasion of the celebration of the independence of something that would so soon cease to be independent, the contemporary reaction to the production, if not the production itself, was particularly imbued with Trinity's inimitable xenophobia.

The production was staged completely in the original Greek. As a contemporary reviewer claimed, in the relevant issue of the Trinity University Review, that fact was "that feature in Jubilee Week which represented the present of the College, in a purely educational and academic way . . . The giving of a Greek play in the original language stamps Trinity as an institution that assigns to the Classics the foremost place in the general curriculum . . ."

the chorus, the stage furniture, as well as the personnel of the production, were all furnished from among ourselves, and even the witty and clever translation that appeared in the programme came from one who was for years one of the Trinity Dons.

What we have to congratulate ourselves upon as a College is the fact that everyone rose to the occasion, and in spite of difficulties, some of them occurring at the last moment, carried the Greek play through to a splendid conclusion, and a thorough success.

The difficulties referred to were the weather and a street car strike. Just when it seemed as if the play could presented out of doors (it had been raining for much of Jubilee Week), a number of the male actors were called upon on the day of performance — since they were also reserve soldiers — to help quell the rioting strikers.

However as one account puts it, "The Fates — evidently wishing to see the play at its best — waxed propitious; the strike was called off, the militia withdrawn, and the integrity of the caste (sic) restored by three pm."

There is no etymological connexion between the words "cast" and "caste". If this is simply a misprint it is an unusually revealing one . . . The actors are actors in the society as well as in the drama, the play is a political statement simply because of the nature of its production, the members of the audience are actors who fulfill their roles simply by watching the play and understanding or conniving at an understanding of the Greek. The performance of a Greek Comedy, that is, as an Upper Canada Masque.

Those days are all behind us. And yet the past makes these events and their significance much clearer and more real than events that are happening around us right now.

Ah, what historical aberrations the wonders of technology have unearthed! When stereo splashed onto the hi-fi scene, recording engineers rushed out to record jet planes swooping between their mikes or ping-pong matches in full swing. When four-channel arrived a couple of years ago the same thing happened; except that this time, the rich audiophile could hear a jet plane take off from behind him and roar off through the front of the room.

And, as I said, this same spirit has unearthed some odd historical aberrations. Would you believe a German cathedral with four organs in it? And what a coincidence... you wouldn't believe it... they're almost in a perfect quadrophonic configuration! Actually, the idea is a fascinating one. For reasons unexplained in the liner notes, the wealthy burghers of Freiburg, Germany, installed four sizeable organs in their town cathedral at various points in the building. Every rank and file of the four machines can be controlled from a single console, which allows for huge flexibility (upper keyboard plays the front right reed stops, middle keyboard plays the horns on the rear instrument, etc. — just one of millions of possible combinations.)

And who was turned loose at the wheel of this four-armed creature? Mr. Big Show himself, E. Power Biggs, who turns out cracking good performances of four famous Bach works despite his age — that is, if this is a recent recording; there's no indication.

The Toccata and Fugue in D Minor, Bach's most famous organ work, leads off the disc. The reverberation time of this cathedral is phenomenal, and while it may not have the floor-smashing bass of the St. Laurents in Alkmaar, the sense of spaciousness is a real treat for the ears. The album (Columbia M32933) is well-engineered, and the pieces are basic enough to be in anyone's collection. I'm sorry that the Columbia people didn't give a more technical description of the instruments. Had they provided a detailed breakdown of the pipes (often called a registration) I would have been a lot happier. Still, one of the sonically impressive organ records in a while.

One needn't say too much about the great Vladimir Horowitz. When he sits down to play in a recording studio, you can be very, very sure that the results will show a mastery of interpretation that many a pianist would give the world for. And when, as he did a couple of weeks ago, he deigns to play in public, the response borders on open adoration.

On a new Columbia disc (M32932) Horowitz gives us more Chopin: six mazurkas, three Etudes, a prelude, a waltz and the Military Polonaise.

The latter for the millionth time, but so what? Horowitz doesn't re-record or duplicate a recording just because it's been issued by someone else; he's an original, absolutely unique, and unquestionably one of the finest pianists of the century. No more talking... just go and listen. This record is worth rejoicing over.

Speaking of "greatest ever" musicians, the ubiquitous Herbert von Karajan has popped onto my turntable again, with a new recording of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra (Angel S-37059). Karajan may well be in the Horowitz class of musician, but it's open to doubt by many of his detractors. I don't number among the detractors, but I don't think a century that's seen Toscanini, Furtwangler, Walter, Bernstein, Klemperer or others of their ilk can have a "greatest".

Karajan does have one asset that few conductors are lucky enough to possess: the Berlin Philharmonic.

They are, without a doubt, the most accomplished orchestra in the world, having recorded literally hundreds of works from Bach and Mozart to the Complete Wagner Ring. All with Karajan. If you're record-shopping or browsing, you'll find a Karajan Berlin album in every orchestral slot you care to inspect.

When the work that these talented folks set their collective minds to is the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra, one should expect a thrilling result. After all, the Bartok is a work demanding the very highest in instrumental abilities from the musicians. More than a symphony, it forces the players to push themselves to the edge to keep up with the technical demands. And valid interpretation can only start when all the technical problems are out of the way; so you can see that this is no piece for amateurs.

Karajan has some very heavy competition on this number, particularly from Pierre Boulez' award-winning recording of this same work on Columbia last year. Boulez was a hurricane of speed and precise attack on that album, and while the Berlin Philharmonic matches it for precision, it lacks the warmth that the New York Philharmonic gave the music. Karajan's usual lyrical powers aren't absent in the slower, more pensive movements of the piece, but they seem subordinated to the fiery violence of the other movements, particularly the last one.

This isn't a bad recording by any means, and if you like your Bartok heady and violently exciting, this is certainly worth your attention. I haven't decided if it's a recording that can be lived with; at least, not without the more pensive approach that some other conductors have given it.

Of all the Baroque composers, J. S. Bach was most in touch with the human voice. Not that he was the only one who wrote for it — on the contrary, the voice was the principal musical instrument for hundreds of years previous to the Baroque era — but Bach managed to synthesize the clarity and beauty of melody in his sacred works. His Masses, Cantatas, Passions, Motets and other works were written from an intense faith, yet this shouldn't be taken to mean an exclusive religious faith. After all, his "Mass in B Minor," a work that is arguably the greatest mass ever composed for the Catholic Liturgy, is written by a staunch Lutheran. There was simply something in the liturgical form that allowed Bach to achieve a degree of feeling and emotion unmatched in his other works.

This tribute to Bach's vocal music skill doesn't apply to everything he wrote, of course. The more than two hundred cantatas were written on a one-a-week basis as part of his job as kappelmeister, and while many of them are magnificent, dozens are merely good. (Good Bach beats the finest any other Baroque composer had to offer, with some rare exceptions though).

Deutsche Gramophon has just released a new recording of Bach's

Motets on the Archiv label, which specializes in historical music. In the past, this has often meant dull interpretations, but there can be no complaint with this release. Performed by the Capella Academica Wien, an original-instrument outfit with the Regensburger Domspatzen choir the two record set presents five of Bach's greatest Motets, all written for funeral services or memorials. The choir is split into two groups (ideal for stereo... some clever baroque hi-fi thinking there!) and the orchestra often serves in an accompanying role.

These motets are plainly a singer's show, and while the writing doesn't have the zip of some of the later cantatas, there's a sense of contentment and peace in the music that is unique in all Bach. Anyone having his memory consecrated by this music would rest happily, indeed. As is usual with DG (and by now shouldn't even need mentioning) the recording is perfect. The singers are never overwhelmed by the orchestra, and conductor Hanns-Martin Schneidt has been treated well by the engineers in matters of recorded dynamics. Too often, "historical" recordings are set at one volume level... no hum. Not with this set.

Whatever contortions Lukacs had to go through to fit Solzhenitsyn into a system which has since ejected him anyway, he did pinpoint in his book the common theme of Ivan Denisovich, Gutag, and his second play Article 58 (or The Love-Girl and the Innocent): "the internment camp puts irresistibly and spontaneously its provocative, vital questions to its victims and its organizers, and forces everyone concerned to reconcile the way of life that henceforth he can and must lead with the objective possibilities of his situation and at the same time with those of his human nature."

Leon Major's production succeeds on an 'ideas' level; it does, as he says in his introduction, allow us "to recognise the prisons that confine all men"; but the painfully realistic setting in which these moral and ethical decisions of men must take place, it does not give. And this, despite the magnificent set of Murray Laufer and IATSE Local-'58!

Laufer shows himself a master of the proscenium as well as round stage: two sentry towers flank the cramped parade-ground with its crude wooden buildings and wire mesh, and the silhouetted lights receding into the terrifying whiteness of places 'East'. But as soon as people enter, something is wrong.

Although the guards look brutal, they do not sound it; although the prisoners look like will-less 'sheep', they do not sound it. There is uncertainty as to the precise temperature at the camp, the costumes becoming progressively less bundled up with increasing rank. And this criticism may be extended metaphorically: no one seems quite sure of the emotional temperature; there are two ludicrously cheerful students, and several shuffling 'Denisovich'-types; violent beatings, but little feeling of sustained resentment. All this may be perfectly in keeping with the atmosphere of moral uncertainty created by the absurd condition of these camps — but without that constant background of numbness and bare survival (so powerfully evoked in the film of Ivan

The Love Girl and the Innocent, Elizabeth Shepherd and David Fox, in Article 58.

Denisovich, the love story of Nemov and Lyuba becomes murky.

The mis-en-scene of the piece, a kind of combination of Marat Sade and M.A.S.H., would seem perfect for ensemble work and introspective playing. But Major has chosen to educate the audience, and this makes neither the actors believable nor the love-story poignant.

David Fox plays the 'Solzhenitsyn' figure of the Innocent who begins with high ideals for 'increased productivity', and ends by finding freedom and purity as foundryman in love. Elizabeth Shepherd is convincingly irrepressible (only her costume suggesting too obviously the St. Joan hidden in the whore) as his saving love.

On the 'organizers' side, James Douglas is superb as the emotionless self-serving scientist, from his first moment when he makes the politic 'gift' of his sweater to the doctor, a little too genially played by Gerard Parkes.

But the last moment of the play, as presented when Nemov is crushed by falling iron, is emblematic of so much that is wrong, with this production.

Originally, he has applied his idealism (which has shifted, in a significant way, from the political world of socialism and the Revolution to personal affairs of the heart) to Lyuba's offer — he can remain with her only if she shares her with the doctor. He has shared, and only after the accident does Lyuba turn to the doctor's infamous hospital beds. Angel, the ever-present servant (rather like Firs in The Cherry Orchard — which, by the way, along with War and Peace, is referred to in a moving way during the play) has the last word — "Hard nut to crack, isn't he?"

But in Major's production, Lyuba turns straight from Nomov's rejection of her offer to the doctor, only to reappear at the end to deliver what is supposed to be a resounding last line — "They won't crush his spirit!" In his original stage directions, Solzhenitsyn calls for a line of barbed wire and lanterns between the stage and the audience, so that the actors, like the prisoners they portray, have no public to inform. Instead of what the author has always wanted in his writing — that is, to portray people under immediate circumstances which only from a distance can be called 'political' — Major has given us a kind of inverted Red Guard Morality Play. Good will triumph, and we can all go and have a scotch at the bar.

Solzhenitsyn's play presents a predicament where our moral (conscience) and ethical (justice) values are tested and opposed most profoundly, because in the middle of a political scar he injects the oldest emotional formula of romantic love. But this production skates over the profundities and avoids even the final existential absurdity of the accidental death, in a display of noble sentiments.

But if you look hard, you will see the human truth under the trappings of the theatrical rhetoric and romantic revolution — and you may not feel like buying your scotch.

Wherein lies happiness? In that which beckons
 Our ready minds to fellowship divine,
 A fellowship with essence; 'till we shine
 Full alchemized, and free of space. Behold
 The clear religion of heaven! Fold
 A rose leaf round thy finger's laperness,
 And soothe thy lips: hush, when the airy stress
 Of music's kiss impregnates the free winds,
 And with a sympathetic touch unbinds
 Aeolian magic from their lucid wombs.

Stan Brakhage in Toronto

"'Commercial cinema' is a cheap drunk that poisons the mind rather than the liver." So Stan Brakhage claims.

Brakhage and other underground filmmakers like him, maintain that 'commercial' film is not an art because it manipulates expectations and responses that have been conditioned into the viewer. Comedy, drama, suspense, are all 'popular' simply because the filmmaker already knows what our responses will be and so deliberately appeals to them.

These underground filmmakers also claim that 'commercial films' deal with the human condition, and that since there is only so much that you can say about that, that they have become redundant. Gene Youngblood, in his rejection of commercial film in his Expanded Cinema, quotes Dylan, "How many times must a man look up before he can see the sky?"

The 'alternative' to 'commercial' film is 'synaesthetic cinema.' Film is 'synaesthetic' if its whole is greater than the sum of its individual parts. Commercial narrative film is only as strong as the weakest link in its chain-like structure and its whole is no greater than the sum of its individual parts. Synaesthetic cinema solves the problem of eliminating the chain. It is cinema purged of all elements of literature and theatre; there is no drama, no theme, no plot of any of the other devices with which commercial cinema manipulates us. And the viewer reacts only by drawing upon himself and not, through a series of stock responses.

Stan Brakhage is probably the most influential filmmaker in synaesthetic cinema. And his work was much in evidence this past week in Toronto — as was Brakhage himself. Last Saturday he introduced a Retrospective of his work, shown that day at the Art Gallery of Ontario. The following day, he introduced his newest work, Text of Light, this past Tuesday he spoke again at the showing of the same film at the Ontario Science Centre.

The Retrospective (1955-1974) wasn't as complete as Brakhage wanted it to be: the censors in Quebec had lost two of the films he wanted to show.

Some of the works included impressed me. In Fire of Waters, Brakhage films in a street at night during an electric storm. Flashes of lightning suddenly illuminate suburban scenery, producing a stark and startling effect.

In The Machine of Eden through rapid pan and tilts, Brakhage films a landscape in the same way that an impressionist would have painted it.

The films in the Retrospective are all in colour, all are without dialogue, or voice over, or musical accompaniment. And all are beautiful to look at. There is a pure, visual quality in these works which exerts an undeniable appeal.

The Sunday showing of The Text of Light was the film's Canadian premiere. The film is feature length (the film is about 70 minutes long). It was shot in one room through a crystal ashtray. Through time-lapse photography, Brakhage captures the movement of the sun and the resulting colours. For ten minutes it was stunning, for twenty it was interesting, for forty, tedious, for seventy, absurd.

Perhaps in winning enough acclaim to be able to afford to make this film, Brakhage has become too successful for his own good. His short works were all uniformly more enjoyable than this.

Text of Light, like the short works, is really not meant to be viewed in theatre-like environments. Brakhage has spoken of a day when his films can be bought for 25c and kept at home like records or books. Nevertheless, even if one could view the film the way Brakhage wishes, The Text of Light would still be far too long.

The greatest mistake that Brakhage and his fellow-underground filmmakers are committing is in presenting their work as a replacement for, or even an alternative to, 'commercial cinema.' The only common aspect of commercial and synaesthetic cinema, is that both involve the projection of light at the rate of 24 frames per second. Beyond that, it's like comparing a novel and a painting.

Synaesthetic cinema is an art form of its own. The underground filmmaker complains that his films are rejected because they are viewed in terms of 'commercial' cinema and therefore misunderstood. The problem is that by presenting his work as an alternative to 'commercial' cinema, the underground filmmaker forces us to view his films in those terms. Perhaps when synaesthetic cinema accepts itself as an independent, self-generating, self-renewing art form in its own right, irrespective of the values or demerits of commercial cinema, it will gain greater acceptance.

movies, politics, and The Towering Inferno

Before the film, The Towering Inferno came to this area, there was a spate of analytical articles that lumped it together with Earthquake and Airport 1975 in a so-called "disaster genre". But Inferno is not like the others.

Airport 1975 is indeed a disastrous film in which Ed Nelson gets wiped out trying to rescue Charleton Heston's girl friend, Karen Black. A complete waste of time, and they don't even have an airport.

In Earthquake, Ihear, Heston gets wiped out by a building. I should go just to cheer on the building.

However, these two Heston "hefforts" are meaningless spectacles. You can't blame God for earthquakes and you can't blame Dana Andrews for having a heart attack.

The Towering Inferno does have a message. Although understated, the film says that capitalism, because of the profit motive and because of indifferent corporate and political leaders, cannot build safe buildings.

At the end of the film, as Paul Newman ponders the empty skeleton of a 137-storey building, he says "We should leave it just as it is as a monument to all the bullshit!" Steve McQueen mentions the death of 200 people and both promise each other to work at preventing a recurrence.

The leftist view-point at least as expressed in the RMG newspaper, The Old Mole, ("Reruns for a Depression, Dec. 74) seems to prejudice the film and thus miss the whole point. They urge their readers to look elsewhere for entertainment while watching out for subliminal thought control.

"These films sublimate the anxieties of daily life people feel. The disaster films skillfully re-route this incredible emotional intensity into passive, impotent and therefore 'safe' forms of release."

But while the Old Mole insists on missing the point, the Toronto Star does not. On the front of the entertainment section we find a feature article devoted to attacking the anti-capitalist theme of the film ("Towering Inferno Spreads False Alarm," Jan. 11 75).

The article can only link together a list of ad hominem attacks that carefully skirt the main issue at hand.

It is important to know that in the film, the fire starts because of wiring that conforms to the building code but not to the specific requirements of the building. The film shows the fire spreading but doesn't adequately explain why. In the book, The Tower, on which most of the film is based, the fire spreads because the furnishings are not fire-proof, the glass is not strong enough, the inadequate fire stairs are too close to gas lines and the sprinkler system has not been turned on.

Sub-contractors and unscrupulous son-in-laws have been taking kick-backs and the management has been turning a blind eye to the goings-on.

In defense of all this the Star quotes a Toronto Fire Captain and the Toronto Fire Chief. They denounce the sprinkler system for not coming on, they denounce the attempt to quench the fire by blowing up the water tanks on the top floor (it wouldn't work anyway) and they denounce the absence of adequate fire exits.

In short they agree that the building is indeed unsafe but blame the movie director and screen writers for it.

"The movie borders on science fiction... it scares people unnecessarily... most multiple deaths come from one and two storey buildings."

In other attempts to return the film to the "safe form of release" described by the Old Mole, the spokesmen for the fire department contradict themselves.

"The building code in Toronto is one of the most rigid in North America. And many of the newer high-rises far exceed the minimum requirements of the code. For instance, Commerce Court recently spent just under $1 million to install sprinkler systems on every floor even though at the present time the code doesn't require it."

And one of the technical complaints is hardly of any help: "people on the top floors should have died of smoke inhalation long before they were rescued."

In spite of all these flaws in content the article is designed to keep the film out of the realm of social criticism. It is surely the task of leftists, like the Old Mole writer, to counteract this real attempt at thought control.

Interestingly, the Star covered its bets in the next weekend edition by publishing a full page on fire-prevention. This time the spokesman for the fire department was someone completely different. One wonders at his opinion of The Towering Inferno.

In spite of all the foregoing, Inferno remains a good greaseball movie and is surefire, though expensive, entertainment for the entire family, and relatives too.

Irwin Allen, the director has put a lot of care into the stunts and the set design. In such a high-tension show the underplaying of the actors works well, although one or two confuse underplaying with underacting.

Fred Astaire, pretending that he is not a good social dancer, is kinky, as is the terse remark of one of the firefighters as he watches a flaming comrade do an imitation of rocketman down an elevator shaft. "Hey that's one of our guys!"

The film is definitely realistic, and because the audience watches as greed and indifference begin to kill ordinary innocent people, there is a tendency to get deeply involved in the rescue attempts. As more and more people die, the tension builds. I ended up with a charley-horse.

I also left the theatre agreeing with the realistic portrayal of the built-in violence of American society. Fundamental change is definitely on the agenda. couple, but the film comes too here" fans just remember the building at the corner of University and College. On windy days the glass blows out. I saw it happen.

And the next day, in an article about storm damage around the province, the Globe and Mail made no mention of the danger.

The building is for Ontario Hydro and is still the subject of controversy because it is being built by a friend of Ontario premier Bill Davis — kick-backs, graft, indifference, etc. mike edwards

Bergman: evasion piled on evasions

In Scenes from a Marriage, Bergman portrays the tedium, confusion and frustration in the lives of a middle-aged, middle-class couple but the film itself comes too dangerously close to imitating its own themes. After spending three hours watching these two people struggle and gasp, still treading away furiously at the end to keep their heads above water, I felt drained of sympathy and interest.

The opening scene gives us a couple who present a model picture of domestic stability to the outside world. But the smooth surface contains telltale cracks. The husband is evasive, mechanically providing his insecure and clinging wife with the reassurance she constantly requires. Their time is mapped out by alarm clocks, the office, the children, the social engagements and the weekends with the parents.

It does not seem so much that the circumstances themselves are at fault but that we are aware by the automatic nature of their responses that they have made a deadening routine of their life together. Although the woman wishes to remain within the pattern, her husband looks for a way out.

When he finally challenges her sexual and emotional indifference saying, "Our life is full of evasions", she protests that "there are some things we shouldn't pry into". Marianne continually avoids a confrontation which would jeopardize her security; often at such crucial moments she will do something like fall asleep or run for food. Naturally she is the only one surprised when Johann suddenly announces that he is leaving in the afternoon for Paris with a young woman who has been his mistress for several years. "You never were perceptive", he tells her.

Except at the beginning, when a few minor figures appear, Johann and Marianne are the only characters. The scenes take place in small rooms and throughout the movie relatively little physical movement occurs. This sense of claustrophobia is heightened by frequent close-up shots of faces.

While this sort of restrictive boredom may be representative of their condition, the verbal duet becomes tedious and redundant. If Bergman subscribes to Johann's view that their words never get to the point, then why does he subject us to an onslaught of this kind of dialogue? After a point, too many words begin to actually obscure our sense of the characters, like trying to pull a living being from the paragraphs of a case history.

All of this might have been somewhat different if Johann and Marianne had been more interesting people to begin with. In terms of imagination or insight neither is at all remarkable and in addition they are cramped by fear and a pettiness of spirit which makes them irritating.

The characters do undergo some changes over the ten year span of the six scenes. Liberated by separation and finally divorce, Marianne becomes more vivacious and self-possessed. Johann is made more humble and compassionate by the failure of his worldly ambitions and the recognition of his need for domestic security. They marry but they also find a renewed excitement in the occasional secret rendezvous with other partners each other. Whether this constitutes progress is questionable.

Their new relationships seem to be no more fulfilling; her husband is overworked, his wife is taking a rest cure in Italy. Just as Johann falls asleep when Marianne reads him her diary, she betrays the same indifference and lack of sensitivity by insisting on describing her new sexual relationship to him.

Finally at the end of the movie there is an attempt to come to terms with what is really wrong and she questions their ability to love one another as a failure to get beyond the boundary of self-centeredness. However he tells her she is overwrought and refuses her plea for an all-night embrace on the grounds that "my leg has gone to sleep, my back feels dislocated and my arms are cold". This is given tenderly and his rueful but humorous acceptance of the limitations of romance is not inappropriate but after three hours of evasive and inconclusive rambling I found it inadequate.

The situation is obvious enough. We are back to the portraits of limited human capacity that we began with. There is still a great lack of excitement, of creativity, of communication and emotional depth in their lives but an insufficient exploration is given of why this should be so or how it could be overcome.

Johann says to Marianne at one point, "these post-mortems are boring and unnecessary". Bergman sounds the key-note of ambiguity, frustration and inconclusiveness, but with a dying fall. Too often it seems that, rather than participating in a living creation, we are witnessing the dissection of a corpse.

art

Many commercial galleries seem to go through the doldrums in January. The Albert White Gallery is opening a show called "Contemporary Paintings" tomorrow but that does not necessarily mean that it will have any more coherence than is implied by that title. The show features Canadian artists Jean Paul Riopelle and Ken Lywood, Americans Alexander Calder and Robert Natkin, Bernard Damiano of France, as well as Spanish and German painters of varying styles.

ROM has mounted a lovely collection of Florentine Baroque bronzes "and other works of art" which opened this week. The pieces are beautifully mounted so that you can get a really good look at them. They have even set up a sort of mock arcade grouping which mimics the Florentine architectural ambience. I used to find these small works of art too finicky and so obviously a part of the conventional mode of representation as to be uninspirational. This time I was struck by the exquisite workmanship and the perfect control and understanding of line and of the human form. There are a few earlier pieces characterized by Renaissance simplicity and restraint but most illustrate the exuberance of the Baroque style as it evolved in Italy. The show also contains a few later French pieces which are conceived in the same spirit. The exhibition is not, in any sense, comprehensive but the collection is impressive and well worth a trip over.

There is a show entitled '500 Years of Print' at the OISE building (on Bloor Street at the head of Devonshire). The title is its own revenge: the show is scarcely representative of 500 years or else it is adapting an incredibly patronizing attitude towards what the humble woodcut has actually been able to achieve. But what is interesting is the work of the turn of the century Canadian artists included in the show. Very imitative, very colonial, very lush, and yet very alluring.

Aleck Dadson has asked that I remind you that the Hart House Library Committee of which Dadson is chairman welcomes suggestions about books the committee should add to its collection. The committee has a budget for the year of $1500, a thousand dollars of which has been set aside for special purposes and $300 of which is being used to cancel old debts. So they don't have all that much money to throw around. But leave your suggestions for the committee at the Hall Porter's desk anyway.

(There is a suggestion box in the second-floor library but until they get a lock for it, there's not much sense in using it. I hoped one year that the committee would get the Penguin Private Eye, and I left a note to that effect in the box. Who knows if they ever got it? They certainly didn't get the book. It's interesting to see what other people suggest but then it's also too easy to use their notes or as book marks to make reminders to yourself.)

If you have any suggestions about magazines the committee should subscribe to, or cease to subscribe to, you might leave these at the Hall Porter's Desk as well.

Claude Bissell, erstwhile U of T president reads at Hart House this coming Wednesday.

Speaking about suggestion boxes, the Roberts library has one: affixed to the wall to the right as you enter the Catalogue Room on the fourth floor through the double doors at the head of the escalator.

Beside the (those locked) suggestion box is a bulletin board — "Feedback" is the word emblazoned above it — where the suggestions are posted as are, more importantly, the responses of the appropriate department heads.

The suggestions here are usually complaints, although there is an occasional request for a particular book or magazine. What are students complaining about? Other students talking, eating, smoking where they shouldn't, ("I am sick and tired of finding a hot dog used as a bookmark..."). The hum, if not the flickering, of the fluorescent lighting. The high temperature of the library which is too conducive to sleep. The failure of the library to merge the Old Catalogue with the New (with the suggestion that a few of the administrators be fired, or that gimmicky audio-visual materials be dispensed with, and cataloguers hired instead.)

Probably one of the most exciting and certainly one of the slickest magazines to appear in a long time is The New Review. Each issue features sections from novels, opinion pieces, poetry, book reviews, and articles on little magazines of the past, from the likes of A. Alvarez, Russell Davies, George Steiner, Alison Lurie, Julian Symons, Ronald Hayman, Robert Lowell, Dan Jacobson. The chief monthly glory is a profile of a particular writer by some usually less well-known writer. We've had profiles of Angus Wilson, of Roland Barthes, of Philip Larkin, of Kingsley Amis, of Claude Chabrol, of John Fowles. In the most recent issue I've seen, Doris Lessing, (who reminds me of Pauline McGibbon, who reminds me of Mary Worth) discusses her current interest in Sufism:

"I was an atheist, and progressive, and rationalistic — that was the current conviction, which I was deeply embedded in. Then I had all kinds of experiences... The thing is, this whole region has been so long put under a label. The occult, the doty, the batty; it's terribly hard to break that down; but now it's practically respectable. What's going on, I think, is a shift everywhere... in the way people think, away from this oppressive, narrow-minded... There was a whole 'complex of attitudes' which fitted into each other; people... left-wing, atheist, flatly refusing to consider the possibility that there was ever anything in religion but nonsense...

The mag is very definitely an Establishment Anti-Establishment mag. It's printed on heavy white paper, relies very much on lots of snappy photographs and even more on lots of white space, and generally manages to make Encounter look positively dowdy.

There's only one problem. It's $30 for a one year subscription and you have to subscribe. It's not available on the newstands, not here. Hart House has only the most current issue on display (since it comes freight, and not by air, and since this is January, that's the November issue.). Roberts curiously enough does not have this issue yet but it does have back issues on the shelves. (Check the subscription offer (and the address) in the last few issues; one year, and all the past New Reviews — it's been appearing since April of last year — at half price.)

Note that it's The New Review. The Review was a "bimonthly magazine of poetry and criticism" that was published between 1962 and 1972. It stopped publishing for financial reasons, apparently. British magazines have their problems too.

Which brings me to this year's Conference on Law and Contemporary Affairs. These conferences (this is the twelfth) are organized entirely by the students at the U of T law school, and are organized around some particular contemporary issue. This year it's New Directions in Canadian Nationalism. One of the seminars is about "The Future of the Canadian Magazine Industry". Panelists include Doris Anderson (Chatelaine), Edward Cowan (Saturday Night), Keith Davey, the man who won the election for the Liberals and more relevantly here the chairman of the Parliamentary Committee on the Mass Media, and Stephen LaRue, (Time Canada).

Another seminar is about "Pay Television and the Canadian Film Industry." And there are many others.

The conference begins next Friday morning. Registration is $5 for students. The Conference culminates Saturday evening in a reception given by Pauline Mary Worth McGibbon at Queen's Park and a banquet at the Four Seasons Sheraton, at which Pierre Juneau will speak.

To end where we began, with the Hart House Library Committee, nominations are now being accepted for positions on this and all of the other Hart House Committees. More info and nominations forms from the Programme Office. We'll print a list of candidates here before the elections, and next year's members after. Perhaps if we give the event enough publicity Hart House will stop those awful posters from other years and other elections that it remorselessly drags up every year.

dance

CBC is continuing its fine representation of dance with this Wednesday's 10 pm show, La Rose Malade, which features Maya Plisetskaya and the Marseille Ballet in Roland Petit's dance of that title. This film was made during the world premiere of the work at the Paris Palace of Sports. Costumes by Yves Saint-Laurent.

At Massey Hall, January 27, at the unlikely hour of 7:30 pm, Duquesne University presents Tamburitzans, an evening of eastern European folk dances and music. Tickets available at Sam's and Eaton's are $4, $5, $6. On Thursday, at 2:10, the Masked Dance of Bengal will present a concert preview at the Edward Johnson. Free. No tickets.

On its first North American tour, the dance company presents a ritualistic dance-drama in which the confrontation of good and evil takes center stage.

The dancers are masked and elaborately costumed with only the drummers showing their faces to the audience. Tickets for the evening performance at the EJB MacMillan Theatre Thursday at 8:30 are $2 with your ATL.

But the biggies are yet to come. February brings the spring season of the Toronto Dance Theatre and the National Ballet both with new works and extended performances.

movies

Yes, movies have gone up to $3.50, but, looking on the bright side, that means it can't be long before there is a 14 per cent increase in quality. Where movies were once the poor man's theatre, theatre is now the poor man's movie. There is a lot of good theatre around.

And a lot of repertoire movie houses too. Your $3.50 can go twice as far, or even more, if you check out the Revue, Roxy, Kensington, College Cinema (Monday to Thursday), Cinecity, Ontario College of Art (Mondays), Ontario Science Centre (Tuesdays and Thursdays), O.I.S.E. (Wednesdays and Thursdays), Med Sci. Building (Fridays), St. Mike's (weekends), Palmerston Library (Saturdays); and the Art Gallery, the Learning Resources Centre, the Museum and the CBC.

Sample fare: These days the Revue is running Bergman, two a night for $2. At the Roxy, tonight only, five Planet of the Apes pictures for 99¢. Saturday, at the Palmerston Library, Coteaux's Blood of a Poet and Testament of Orpheus for $2. Sunday afternoon, for free, CBC is showing a documentary on Canadian films at the Sorrento film festival. Monday to Thursday more Chaplin at the College, $1.50 students, $2.50 grown-ups. Monday night, one of the German classics at OCA for free. And there's CBC's Thursday 10 pm series of Canadian short films and documentaries, Sprockets, Etc.

Of course true art is priceless, and Bergman's Scenes from a Marriage at the Varsity 1 is a bargain at the going rate. The Varsity is, incidentally, an independent movie-house and, as such, it is having some difficulty getting films from distributors whose bread is buttered by the big chains. That may force the Varsity into an art film policy, but it could also go blue or kung fu, so vote with your feet if you are concerned. (In the Varsity II there is a documentary on Lenny Bruce culled from the many films he tried, always unsuccessfully, to make.) We haven't seen it, but we have seen that other Lenny movie which got us curious enough to want to see the real one. That other movie, the Bob Fosse, Dustin Hoffman one, is not bad but $3.50. I don't know.

No sign of Wee Georgie, Fireman's Ball, or The Projectionist.

A bit quieter this week... time to curl up with your beloved transistor radio and listen a bit... if you're a CBC fan, you're probably aware that the results of this year's talent contest are being broadcast. Next Wednesday at 7:03 pm on CBC-FM, Remi Menard, alto saxophone, plays Tomasi's Ballade for Saxophone and Orchestra, and Guy Carmichael, french horn, gives us his rendition of Mozart's concerto no. 2. If you're without an FM, don't worry: you can catch the same program Thursday night at 8:03 on CBL, 740 on the dial.

Did you ever bang those drums and shake those tambourines in your youth? I'm referring to those Orff instruments that educators went crazy over a few years back. Tomorrow and Sunday, the EJB plays host to a National conference of Orff-educators, and if kids are your special interest, then you might want to attend. Further information can be had from Prof. Doreen Hall at the Faculty of Music.

Still at the EJB, the student recital series rolls along. Spend your Monday lunch hour at the concert hall: Susan Reitman (euphonium) and Howie Baer, a fine trumpet player are giving a joint recital. Euphonium, eh... Thursday at 5:15 pm, flautist Jane Cutler takes over the hall to show her stuff. Remember, these student recitals are free, and the level of talent displayed is usually very high; they're worth a look-see.

Tonight, St. Lawrence Town Hall presents another in its Connoisseur series: Peggie Sampson and Friends play a concert of "Music up to Bach", including Monteverdi, Schutz and Telemann. Tickets, if there are any left to be had, go at $4.50 and $3.50.

Next Tuesday and Wednesday, Boris Brodt, the steelworkers' favourite, leads the TSO in a good program: "Psalms" by Glick, Haydn's Cello Concerto, "Schelomo" by Bloch and Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite. Soloist in the Haydn and Bloch works will be the talented Zara Nelsova. Tickets $3 - $9, but there are $2 rush seats if you hustle down around 7 pm. Thursday night, $2.50 will admit you to Massey Hall for another in the student concert series (mostly aimed at the high schools). On tap is Haydn's 103rd symphony, the same Bloch item, this time with cellist Paul Cheifetz, and Elgar's Enigma Variations. Victor Febrill conducts.

Of the new openings this week, Michel Tremblay's Bonjour, la, Bonjour will probably be the most interesting. It's an English version directed by Bill Glasco for the Tarragon. (Preview tonight — 24th January; opens Saturday 25th). Beckett enthusiasts should also note the production of Krapp's Last Tape at the Phoenix Theatre (390 Dupont). It's the work of a Hamilton based group, whose style owes a good deal to Grotowski. This is a sort of pilot production as the group is contemplating a move to Toronto this year. (Runs January 28-February 9). Miss Julie plays at that theatre, the Phoenix, until the 26th.

Solszhenitsyn's Article 38 opened last week at the St. Lawrence. (Reviewed this week. Run closes February 15th). Advance publicity reports that the play was greeted by riots in Berlin, any rioting in Toronto is more likely to attend Passé Muraire's fore play for the seasons, I Love You Baby Blue. Runs til 9th February, possibly longer.) At the Free Theatre, it's The Pits til 16th February. And if yer wants a touch of the old classical, School for Scandal will be at the Colonnade 'til 6th February. Two shows closing soon: My Fat Friend will be wasting away finally tomorrow night (25th January). The 25th is also last night for TWP's You Can't Get Here From There.

Now, what else looks good...? At the Ward Price Building the Experimental Study Group of the Academy of Theatre Arts (punchy, eh?) is presenting Giraudoux' Electra. Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays until February 8th. Open Circle's latest, a musical satire, A Soup Song, might be worth investigating, if you can't face the long walk to Enoch Turner School House, there's always your very own neighbourhood musical show. The Frogs at Hart House (Runs ends February 1st). And a merry brekekekex ko-ax ko-ax to you all.

Varsity's answer to Nancy Greene-Sylvi Spleiss

No snow was skiers' headache

Over the past weekend, the U of T cross-country ski team (believe it or not, it exists) entered the annual Udora cross-country ski meet.

The minimal amount of snow made the skiing on grass and twigs a rather gruelling past-time. On Saturday, only 24 out of the 35 starters finished the men's 15 km. event. Five Varsity skiers endured the test of both physical and mental fortitude.

Veli Niinimaa placed twelfth with a time of 1:05:52 and Dag Furst was fourteenth at 1:09:21. Paul Ketko, Paul Johnston, and Jeff Cooper followed slightly behind.

Skiing conditions improved considerably for Sunday, with the falling of fresh snow and sub-freezing temperature. The track actually held throughout the races to the extent that it could be skied instead of muscled through.

Matti Maki from the Canadian National team, finished the 10 km. race with a time of 24:38; good enough for first place. Varsity fared well placing Niinimaa tenth, Sutcliffe eleventh, Ketko fifteenth, Best sixteenth, and Birzens twenty-first.

In the men's 4 x 5 km. relay, Varsity finished seventh in a field of fourteen.

Sylvi Spleiss represented Varsity in the women's 5 km. event. Finishing time of 17:02 gave her fifth place. In the 3 x 2.5 km. relay, the team of Spleiss, Hanson, and Peterson took fifth spot with a total time of 27:53.

Swimming Blues host six way swim meet Saturday

By PAUL CARSON

Men's swimming coach, Robin Campbell, may have finally outdone himself. Not content with dual meets or all-star meets or even double dual meets, Campbell has arranged a U of T Invitational Meet for to-morrow afternoon at the Benson Building that features no less than six simultaneous dual meets.

Live. On Stage. One time only. Blues will host Wayne State, Niagara, and the University of Guelph in what should be some top-flight swimming and a scorekeeper's nightmare.

Each school will compete against every other entry so that there'll be at least two heats for each event with a minimum of eleven events being staged in rapid succession.

Swimming fans will get an opportunity to watch most of Blues veterans performing in events other than their speciality as Varsity hopefuls attempt to add the extra dimension of versatility that often determines who will make the final team that goes to the OUAА championships at the end of February.

It's not quite like seeing hockey scoring whiz Kent Ruhnke suddenly donning the pads to play goaltender, but these so-called "off event" meets often produce excellent times and close hard-fought races.

The meet(s) have a special importance for the freshmen and borderline swimmers since there are still about 20 regulars on the team but only 18 will be chosen for the OUAА entry. Thus, for these swimmers, outstanding times in their premier events become a necessity in order to win a place among the select eighteen.

The combination of veterans shopping around for more versatility and rookies vying for a spot on the regular team should produce a better-than-average afternoon of swimming.

It all begins at 2:00 pm and advance tickets are available in Campbell's office, room 107 in the Hart House Athletic Wing.

Hockey Blues edge Cornell 5-3

By ANNE LLOYD

The Varsity Blues' 5-3 victory over the Cornell Redmen came in one of the most exciting hockey games Toronto fans have seen in many years. In averaging Varsity's 8-2 loss in the 1973 renewal of the international rivalry, this year's edition of the Blues took what appears to be Varsity's first win over the Ivy League squad since 1912.

The near capacity crowd — one of very few this season — came expecting to see a close, hard hitting game with lots of the fast skating and fine physical checking that 'the Big Red' has been noted for in seasons past. They were not disappointed!

Although injured Varsity forward Ron Harris commented between periods that Cornell did not seem to be as fast nor to be as consistent with their forechecking game as they had been two years ago, Cornell nevertheless played a fairly open game, demonstrating throughout that they knew how to use the body well. Several Varsity forwards found themselves neatly upended as the result of solid hipchecks or adroitly lowered shoulders.

But this is not to overlook the fine efforts of the Varsity rearguard, led by some solid hitting from veteran Warren Anderson. Although the Varsity defence was rather thin in numbers by the end of the third period — Al Milnes taking a nasty cut on the face and thus joining Brent Swanick, who went out early in the game with what appeared to be a knee injury, the rookies, Pagnello and Hughes, and Anderson applied consistent pressure on the Cornell forwards throughout the game.

Anderson will long be remembered for a spectacular defensive play made against Gary Young. Anderson threw a neat hipcheck to stop the Cornell forward who had intercepted a Varsity pass in his own end of the rink and broken in alone on Varsity netminder Dave Hulme.

Hulme played one of his best games of the season, looking particularly sharp in the third period. Hulme's most spectacular save of the evening came after Warren Anderson had dumped Cornell forward Dave Peace. Peace came back on the next play to fire a blistering shot at Hulme. Hulme got a piece of the shot to keep the score at 4-2.

All of the Varsity forward lines looked effective last night. The combination of Doug Herridge and Ivan McFarlane were hot all night and both the lines of Panutti-Hopkins-Ruhnke and Davies-Davis-Hampton produced some nicely set and executed plays.

McFarlane was a constant menace around the Cornell net throughout the contest, while Hampton contented himself with being all over the ice and playing an extremely aggressive game of hockey.

However, it was Cornell that opened the scoring at the 9:23 mark of the first, with James Vaughan scoring a powerplay goal with Varsity's Dave Rooke in the penalty box for holding. Hulme made the initial save, but was cleanly beaten on the rebound.

The Blues returned the favour at 11:19 as Don Pagnutti alertly whacked the puck into the net after shots by Ruhnke and Davies, demonstrating once again the potency of the Varsity powerplay unit.

The dynamic duo of Herridge and McFarlane came very close to making it 2-1 near the end of the first as McFarlane fed a perfect pass to Herridge, whose hard shot went just off the mark.

McFarlane, who has played some of the best hockey of his career in the last two games, was not to be denied and tallied the 2-1 goal at 1:31 of the second, firing home a rebound off a shot by Doug Herridge. The play was well set up by a fine pass from Rocci Pagnello.

Varsity went ahead 3-1 at 5:46 of the second when Kent Ruhnke knocked home the rebound from Pagnutti's shot. Tenacious winger Larry Hopkins drew a well-earned assist on the play for his pinpoint accurate lead pass.

The Blues seemed really fired up at this point in the game, with Howie Hampton in particular playing an inspired game. Hampton was able to draw Fred Tomzyk into a penalty at the 11:51 mark of the second, and on the ensuing power play, the fans came perilously close to seeing a major fight break out.

Varsity forward Don Pagnutti was digging the puck out from under the sprawling arm of Cornell goaltender Dave Chrastina when two of the Cornell defenders, Messieurs Skillins and Bajinski took exception to the proceedings and retaliated. In a game in which there was as much heavy physical contact as there was in Wednesday night's encounter, it is a tribute to the cool headedness of both teams that no major fracas erupted.

Cornell came back, however, in the early going of the third period, capitalizing on an error made by one of the Varsity forwards who gave the puck away behind his own net, allowing Vaughan the opportunity to score his second goal of the game.

Veteran playmaker Gord Davies restored the Blues' two goal lead at 6:44 as banged home the rebound which had been juggled by Chrastina. The play was set up by shots from Hampton and Davis.

But it was the fifth Varsity goal

The Varsity—Bob White

Cornell knocks hell out of Varsity net in physical game.

that will have the fans talking for a long time. It was a classic set up — a beautiful drop pass by Ivan McFarlane to Pagnutti, who fired a hard shot in the direction of the Cornell net. Ruhnke was the right man in the right place at the right time and adroitly deflected the puck home to finish off one of several picture perfect plays the fans were treated to in the game.

With Varsity's Dave Rooke once again in the penalty box, Cornell rounded out the scoring on the power play, making the score 5-3 as Harper scored at 18:43 of the third.

The Blues played one of their best all-round efforts of this or any other season. It was obvious to everyone in the rink that the team was fired up and determined not to lose their third game in a row. The Varsity-Cornell combination provided the fans with some of the most exciting hockey in ages.

Let us hope that the powers that be seen to fit to make this an annual home and home event. Surely, the long-suffering Varsity fans deserve to see more of this fine calibre of hockey.

Volleyball Blues' playoff hopes dim

By REG EADIE

In weekend action at York University, Blues' chances of reaching the playoffs dimmed somewhat although they were able to win two of the three matches they played.

Blues defeated Ryerson 15-5, 15-7, 15-6 and then York 15-8, 9-15, 15-10, 15-5. In the final match of the day they played the current east division leader Laurentian University.

Laurentian is currently undefeated in league play. In the first game Varsity came back from an early 4-0 disadvantage to hold a 14-13 lead. At this point Laurentian was able to isolate their best spiker against a one man block by means of shoot sets to the tape. Blues were unable to counter this tactic and lost the game 16-14.

In the second game the Blues gained a similar 14-13 lead and again Laurentian's superior clutch play led to a 16-14 verdict. At this point Blues managed to win the next game 15-8 but were beaten 15-3 in the fourth game as Blues' starters who had been on the floor for all four games simply ran out of gas.

The match was clearly decided in the first two games. Laurentian's current team has been together at least three years whereas Varsity has only one returnee from last year's team. This extra experience paid off for the Laurentian team and enabled them to win the close games.

Blues record is now 6-3 while Queen's is second at 7-2. Varsity must now defeat Queen's in order to tie in the standings. This match is Sunday, Feb. 2 at Ryerson. In case of a tie there is a complicated series of rules which apply but it would appear that Queen's has the better chance at present.

In other weekend action Blues won a qualifying tournament on Sunday to enable them to participate in OVA Senior "A" action. By participating in this league Blues will gain valuable game experience which the short University season does not permit.

Murphy named coach of the year

Varsity football coach, Ron Murphy, has been named the Canadian college football coach of the year. The award is made annually by the Old Crow Society, an association of former football players at Carleton University in Ottawa.

The society polls college football writers and broadcasters in making the selection.

While honoured at receiving the award, Murphy feels that the team earned the reward, adding that "I really didn't do anything different this year, I just had better players".

The Blues in 1974 had their best season in recent history, losing only one game—the College Bowl. The team may lose as many as eight players from this year's roster, but Murphy still feels he will have a contender for national honours.

Interfac volleyball ends; Grads favoured in playoffs

By TOM WOODS

Action in men's interfac volleyball league play concluded on Wednesday with Erindale defeating Knox 2-1.

Division I playoffs get underway on Jan. 29 as SGS I meets Scar I and Erindale takes on the engineers. The post-season play is a double elimination affair (which means 1. Siamese twins can not participate, and 2. lose two games and you are S O L.) with the finals taking place on Feb. 12 in the main gym.

Early favourites are Grads featuring several Varsity veterans. Scar will be defending last year's title while Erin is a perennial contender, led by Atis Ozolins and Wally Seranchuk.

Engineering also, is a strong contender and still winning from last year's loss to the westenders in the semi-finals which broke a phenomenal 20 year strangle-hold on the Victoria Staff Cup. Since its inception in 1934, the skule team has reigned as volleyball champs no less than 24 times.

Division II playoffs begin Jan. 27 with eight teams fighting for our sports in the quarter-finals of the sudden death playdowns.

New, Eng. III, Pharm, and Dev Hs received byes into this round by virtue of their regular season records. All games will be played in the upper gym of Hart House with the finals moving downstairs.

Last Saturday the Lady Blues met Trent and downed them 36 to 22, in intermediate basketball.

The Ladies got off to a slow start, however, after juggling the lines the Blues went ahead to lead 22 to 10.

The Lady's defence was like a brick wall, and Trent's players could not break through. Chang Tsai made some spectacular assists, and Penny Redman was the Lady's top scorer, with 8.

The poor refing put a damper on both team's spirits, but this did not seem to bother the Blues as they ploughed through winning 36 to 22.

Vic students get parity

Vic principal resigns

Only one week after Victoria College students won a seven-year battle with the college to gain parity representation on Vic's top governing body, college principal John Robson resigned Friday.

Victoria University president Goldwyn French confirmed yesterday Robson had tendered his resignation, although it still must be accepted by Vic's board of regents next month.

Robson could not be reached for comment last night and French declined to say why the principal wants to resign, although French said "a specific reason" was cited.

However, board of regents student member Pat Remy felt Robson resigned because of his opposition to the board's narrow votes Jan. 16 to accept equal student-faculty representation on a revised top governing structure.

The parity decision came a month after the board of regents accepted another controversial proposal, presented in a report to the board, for a unicameral government, a decision which Robson also reportedly opposed.

Robson, who teaches English and specializes in John Stuart Mill's political writings, has been Vic principal for five years and, French said, has no specific term of office.

French also said Robson did not specify when he would resign.

Remy suggested Robson might have resigned because of a conflict with president French.

Remy noted that while students were granted parity representation in principle with the faculty on the new board — a decision still to be approved by the Ontario Legislature — students will only be one-fifth of the representation.

"It's only a symbolic victory," Remy said. "The students couldn't overturn a vote if they voted in a bloc."

The new unicameral governing structure would combine Victoria University's present senate and board of regents and would be responsible for all academic and other decisions.

Vic principal John Robson tendered his resignation last week.

Arbitration to decide if firing was fair

The case of fired zoology department storekeeper Paul McReavy will have to be settled by arbitration because the university refused to reinstate him at a Friday grievance procedure meeting.

The university also rejected a policy grievance from the Service Employees Union, Local 204 which argued that it has represented storekeepers since a Sept. 27 collective agreement, but that the university had never informed the workers or treated them accordingly.

Union business representative Joe Jordan hoped that both issues would be decided simultaneously by the arbitration board.

McReavy, a five year employee at the Ramsey Wright building storeroom, said he was fired 10 days ago because of his sudden interest in unionizing zoology support staff.

SAC to take stand on complex

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

The Students' Administrative Council must take an active stand on the proposed athletics complex building, SAC executive members decided during a meeting with community residents last night.

The SAC executive met with residents following the recent planning board recommendation to City Council to exempt the proposed building from the city's 45-foot holding bylaw, which will likely lead to approval of the Harbord Street complex, adjacent to the Benson Building.

"Our group's sentiment is that the university hasn't proved sufficient need for that particular building on that particular site," said Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association spokesperson Isme Bennie.

SAC representatives pointed out the university could not go ahead with the planned project until U of T students have agreed — probably through a referendum — to a levy to help finance the building.

SAC has requested that any decision to table a student referendum on a fee levy be made by Feb. 10 in order for it to be voted on in the SAC general election Mar. 14.

Bennie termed the meeting a "community education meeting for you (SAC executive members)," adding, "They (university officials) don't need us anymore but they need you."

The planning commission has recommended exemption from the holding bylaw for all proposed U of T buildings in the area bounded by Spadina, Bloor, Bay and College Streets.

Speakers at the meeting voiced considerable opposition to present plans for the athletics complex, referring to it as a "palace," a "monument" and at one point as "son of Roberts."

"Both students and community groups deal with the university in the same way," SAC vice-president Tim Buckley said. "They're given a policy and asked to comment on it."

The SAC reps told the residents SAC would meet with university administrator Jack Dimond and professor Bruce Kidd tomorrow to discuss the athletics complex. SAC reps proposed a joint meeting of SAC, administration and community representatives.

"If Kidd and Dimond have been telling you one story and us another, it is important for us all to get together in one room and sort it out," SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said.

NUS seeks larger grants

The National Union of Students (NUS) is conducting a nation-wide campaign for better student loan schemes designed to put pressure on the federal government to improve the Canada Student Loans plan.

According to NUS Ontario representative Dawn Hasset the organization is demanding a lowering of the age of independence, inclusion of part-time students, and national standardization to upgrade programs.

Hasset says the federal government may be trying to consolidate the student loans plan with the Canada manpower training program and other educational programs. This would allow more control over student programs.

In the short term Hasset thinks it is likely the government will increase the availability of loan money but not grants. It wants to either control student aid programs or pull out, she says.

The NUS national campaign is of necessity primarily a publicity campaign using media, posters, pamphlets and other educational techniques. NUS wants to familiarize students with student aid problems as well as put pressure on governments, Hasset says.

The difficulty comes in reliance of NUS on each individual student council's co-operation. However, in Ontario the campaign is coordinated with the Ontario Federation of Students' student aid campaign.

The NUS position is that student aid can be increased without raising income taxes through taxing the corporations which benefit from university education by getting a supply of trained personnel.

NUS is also working on gaining student representation on federal and provincial educational advisory bodies, Hasset noted. The union is also involved in research on housing and preparing briefs for government policy-making bodies.

For International Women's Year NUS is possibly co-sponsoring a conference with the Association of Women in Colleges and Universities (AWCU).

Ward Six alderman Allan Sparrow visits The Varsity for lunch today, and you're all invited to show up here and meet him, beginning at noon.

We're interested in talking to him about the city's holding bylaw and its problems, the relation between the university and the community, and specifically the proposed new athletic complex (which appears likely to circumvent the holding bylaw); and the future of the Reform Caucus.

Economist finally granted visa

The immigration department has reversed a previous decision denying Marxist professor Andre Gunder Frank a temporary visa to teach in Canada.

Frank, a well known author, was earlier denied admission when he applied from Germany to teach at the University of Quebec at Montreal. He formerly taught at Sir George Williams University before leaving for Chile under the Allende regime.

A spokesman for the department said the denial was "based on information that was outdated." No other reasons were given.

Frank has taught in the U.S. for 18 years and is the author of Latin America, Reform or Revolution and also The Development of Underdevelopment. His Marxist views likely resulted in the refusal of landed immigrant status when he was in Canada before.

In a similar case recently, Hungarian Marxist Istvan Meszaros was initially denied permission to emigrate to teach at York University. After pressure from the academic community he was allowed in and granted landed immigrant status.

Gentle Giant a gyp?

Gentle Giant makes one wonder. Wonder about the contradiction inherent in the name. Wonder about the mediocrity of their music and indeed wonder how they could have sold out Convocation Hall Friday evening.

Indeed, little went right for this band during its latest Toronto appearance. Hampered by problems with the sound system, concert goers were forced to stand outside in the rain until after 9 pm. Already one half hour late, the audience was allowed inside only to sit another 30 minutes smoking, drinking and waiting. The hall was hot and the air reeked.

The warm-up band of Miles & Lenny was greeted with a wall of unwarranted verbal abuse but their down home country rock music soon began to cheer up the crowd. They especially applauded the superb fiddling of Myles Cohen.

It was with the appearance of Gentle Giant that the evening really deteriorated. Every rock band nowadays must have a stage show and seeing a guitarist outfitted like a reject from an old Robin Hood script, one definitely knew what to call these five musicians. In the centre of the stage was Merlin, the lead vocalist, mumbling some unintelligible lyrics, as well as casting spells on the rest of the group. But alas, not even magic could save this music.

Song after song passed. The group hopped from guitars to violins, flutes, trumpet, organ and enough other instruments to outfit the Berlin Philharmonic. Their desperate activities only added to the confusion of the music, the audience and the evening.

As the evening ended with an encore featuring their latest (and only) FM hit, I began to understand the significance of their performance. It clearly showed how a group of slightly talented musicians can be given a mass audience by one powerful Toronto FM station. As well, it showed how a group of promoters can exploit an audience by charging $6.50 (even for a 3rd balcony wing seat) and bring it off by starting late, supplying a poor sound system and not providing enough ushers to properly control smoking and drinking regulations.

Is it not time that SAC got off its ass and did something about it? After all, these are SAC-ONROT endeavors.

If Canada is to be more than a geographical expression, her nationhood will be borne in her Universities. And if her Universities are to discover any merit or mission, then students will educate the educators into that discovery — or salvation. May they come to it before it is too late.

Canada's silence complicity in Vietnam torture

One of these days, hopefully, the Trudeau government may just show some intestinal fortitude and realize there are human beings in South Vietnam being maimed, tortured and murdered.

So far, despite all the pious platitudes belching out of Ottawa, the government has done nothing except express its deep concern over the issue and then send more aid to President Thieu who continues to imprison more than 100,000 civilians, in violation of the 1973 Paris peace accords.

Actually, Trudeau's spinelessness in dealing with this issue is nothing more than a continuation of Canadian foreign policy in Vietnam which began more than two decades ago when Canada first became a member of the ill-fated International Control Commission.

According to the Pentagon papers, Canada's ICC representative in Hanoi fed information to Washington on a regular basis.

When the war began to escalate in Vietnam 10 years ago, Canada became Lyndon Johnson's errand-boy — dutifully running American errands in North Vietnam.

Dozens of Canadian firms and American subsidiaries in Canada reaped bumper harvest of war profits outfitting the US military during the peak Vietnam war years.

A number of Crown corporations also made a killing during those years supplying the Americans with war material. And the government even distributed what Walter Stewart calls a Warmonger's Shopping Guide in the US — the Canadian Defence Commodities Catalogue — to make sure Canada didn't lose out in war profits from the Yankees.

Two years ago Mitchell Sharp almost fell over his own feet to ensure Canadian troops would be among the alleged peacekeepers after the signing of the Paris accords.

Conveniently enough, however, when US troops were withdrawn from South Vietnam, Sharp decided Canadian troops had to leave, too.

Sadly, the litany of Canada playing "me, too" politics with America in Vietnam could go on and on for hours.

The point is, it doesn't have to be that way.

The truth is, Trudeau and his cabinet seem to want it that way.

The political prisoner issue, however, is the one place where, if Trudeau wanted to, real independence of Canadian foreign policy could be established.

There is an abundance of evidence of tortures in American-built tiger cages, indiscriminate murder and a pattern of abuse so pervasive that Amnesty International says: "It seems clear that in many instances torture has become no more or less than a matter of habit."

Yet the best Canada has been able to do on — this is Mitchell Sharp's Alice in Wonderland performance of Cheshire Cat smiles and Humpty-Dumpty word games. His replacement in external affairs, Allan MacEachen, is not even equal to the word games.

When asked by an all-party deputation of MPs and Senators why Canada did not take the prisoners issue to the UN human rights commission, Sharp replied that since it would do no good, why bother. Sharp said "Loud visible and dramatic protests have not proven" to be the best way of assisting those that we wish to help in these cases."

Yet for the eight or more times Sharp approached the Thieu government behind closed doors about the prisoners issue, not one prisoner was released.

On the other hand, a loud visible public letter writing campaign has resulted in the release of a handful of prisoners, surely not much, but more than Canada as a government has done.

In fact, since the last election the Canadian government has completely clammed up about what it is doing in Vietnam.

MacEachen refused to see any deputations about prisoners, and even worse, a secret meeting of the world Bank last fall resulted in what appears to be Canadian agreement to further fund Thieu.

What happened in that October meeting has never been made official, but reliable press sources such as Le Monde, the Globe and Mail, and the New York Times report Canada sided with the U.S. in supporting a move to financially underwrite the economically ailing Thieu regime, now that the U.S. can no longer carry the load alone.

Canada, apparently, refused to side with Sweden which would have nothing to do with the scheme.

It apparently does not bother Trudeau or MacEachen's conscience that Canadian dollars would directly or indirectly aide the pouring of lime into the eyes of paralyzed tiger cage inmates.

It apparently does not bother Trudeau or MacEachen's conscience that Canada would be underwriting Thieu's violation of the Paris accords by funding a regime which imprisons the very neutralists who could bring reconciliation to that war-torn country.

Three of those neutralists, neither pro-Communist nor pro-Thieu, are touring Canada at this moment informing the Canadian people of their Third Force movement to try to bring peace to Vietnam.

All three were released political prisoners from Thieu's prisons last spring and will be in Ottawa at the end of the month to talk to government officials.

It will be interesting to see if external affairs minister MacEachen has the nerve to face the truth and talk to these three men.

Socialism review nothing but slander

Anyone seriously interested in political and cultural oddities owes it to his or her education to unlearn Ulli Diemer's review of the March del Vayo's book, The J. Alvarez of Socialism, which appeared in The Varsity Friday, January 17.

One should not, however, seek out this 'review' expecting a rational analysis of del Vayo's book; the 'review' is instead a self-indulgent slander of del Vayo and of the resistance to Fascism waged by the Spanish people.

While the Spanish Civil War is not now a burning issue, perhaps the readers of The Varsity will bear with us if we briefly attempt to examine some of the genuinely important questions which the period raises. Diemer, of course, does not concretely explore these but uses the 'review' as a soapbox from which to expound another chapter of the Trotskyite view of history as an endless series of 'sell-outs', 'betrayals', and the rest.

In this remarkable 'review', Diemer conducts the expected inquisition into del Vayo's character: is there any trace of the Trotskyite original sin — Stalinism? The answer, since del Vayo worked with the Communists (albeit Spanish) in an anti-fascist alliance, is, naturally, 'yes'.

And perhaps it is worth noting, too, that although Diemer, seemingly in possession of omnipresence, peers into the innermost soul of del Vayo, he somehow is able to claim indignantly that del Vayo "is strangely reticent about the Spanish Civil War and his role."

This is surprising from Diemer, who knows so much, as it so happens that del Vayo has written a book of some "400-odd pages" (that should impress Diemer) specifically concerning the Civil War and his role in it (Freedom's Battle, Hill & Wang).

Diemer's statement about del Vayo "reticence" is typical of his 'review', which time and time again sacrifices clarity and accuracy for polemic. The reader is told, for example, that "the book is a piece of rather grotesque Stalinist apologetics." We are not told what is particularly Stalinist about the book but rather, in the same sentence, that it is "interlarded with the eclectic modernization that modern-day Stalinoid have made their trademark."

This is just one example of how the 'review' never gives us more than muddled rhetoric to substantiate its broad and often surprising assertions about historical events.

Diemer truly outdoes himself when he attempts to recount the 'real' story of the Civil War. His view is, to understate the case, somewhat unusual. Those of us who have believed for all these years in the "red menace" of the Spanish revolution are surprised to hear that "every bit of revolutionary activity that occurred in Spain all along was resisted and undermined by the Communists and their friends — such as Alvarez del Vayo."

As proof, Diemer makes a crudely ideological reference to events in Barcelona. Well, then, one might rightly ask: what is it that happened in Barcelona?

The answer is obvious, at least to Diemer. What do Communists and their "fellow-travellers" always do? Why, of course, they "gun down" workers in the streets!

Among the things which Diemer fails to tell us about Barcelona is that, in early 1937, when the Fascists, led by German and Italian troops, were on the offensive in the north, Anarchists and Trotskyites rebelled against the anti-fascist government in Barcelona. This 'holy alliance' of Anarchists and Trotskyites presented an ultimatum to the Generalitat of Catalonia which, among other things, demanded control of almost every ministry. The effect was to open a deep schism in the anti-fascist movement.

The Fascists, of course, welcomed and encouraged such a development. German Ambassador Faupel in a letter dated May 11, 1937 wrote to Hitler: "Concerning the disorders in Barcelona, Franco has told me that the street fighting was provoked by his agents."

Diemer's 'review' contains no reference whatsoever to the real threat, as subsequent events have shown, that Fascism posed to the Spanish people and especially to the organization of the working class.

Diemer seems to claim that because the Communist Party and its "fellow-travellers" consistently carried out the very program for which they stood, the anti-fascist alliance, "the will (and ability) of the Spanish workers and peasants to fight against Franco suffered."

The clear implication that the politics of the anti-fascist alliance was somehow responsible for its defeat is manifestly ridiculous. No one would question the courage and determination of the Spanish resistance.

The War was lost because of the overwhelming advantage of the Fascists in men, material, and training. Diemer allies himself with Franco when he points to the "murderous treachery" of the anti-fascist movement as the great danger to the Spanish people.

It would certainly appear that some political groups have not yet ceased giving aid and comfort to the real butchers, to the real enemies of all peoples, the Fascists.

William W. Moore,
Bunt Ghosh Alan Hertz,

Ulli Diemer replies

So I'm a "Trotskyite", presumably because I question the devotion of the Communist Party to human liberation and socialism.

Well, I'm not really a "Trotskyite", but that's neither here nor there. What I find interesting is that persons who throw labels around as mechanically as the authors of the above letter should accuse me of basing my review on preconceptions rather than an examination of the facts.

As to the facts: This is not the place to debate them at length though I am willing to bet that the Spanish Civil War will be an issue in the next year or two, when round two breaks out upon Franco's death.) I believe that the role of the Communist Party in, yes, gunning down left-wing socialists, anarchists, and other revolutionary workers has been thoroughly documented by such authors as George Orwell, in his book Homage to Catalonia and in a number of his essays; and by Noam Chomsky in his essay "Objectivity and Liberal Scholarship." No doubt they too are "Trotskyites."

But perhaps the most important point made by both Orwell and Chomsky is that both capitalist and Communist Party propagandists have systematically attempted to obliterate the truth about Spain (and much else besides). One of the most horrifying things about Stalinist totalitarianism is the way it changes the truth from week to week to serve its political purposes. The distortion and lying engaged in by Stalinists is on a level that must make even the propagandists in the U.S. Pentagon envious.

And an important weapon in their arsenal has always been the repetition of lies and slanders, over and over again, until they come to be believed. So, for example, Trotskyites were depicted as "Trotskyite-fascists" and systematically "liquidated." Anarchists who opposed the policies of the Communists in Spain were similarly labelled "objective fascists" and wiped out. And so it goes. Anyone who opposes the Communist Party, whether from the right or the left, is tarred with the brush of fascism.

I think I can smell the same approach in the above letter. But I don't think it will work this time around.

Recession may hurt women's lib Gelber says

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Progress in the women's movement has reached the same point today that it did during the 1920s, Sylvia Gelber said last week at the University of British Columbia.

The federal labor department official warned that women's liberation also faces the same obstacle which sent that earlier struggle for equality into decline — recession.

Gelber said danger lies in the fact that economic troubles often lead to the abandonment of objectivity and society falls back on its traditional values, such as men needing jobs more than women, because they are thought of as providers.

This is often supported by married women whose husbands have become unemployed.

This is a facetious argument, Gerber said, because excluding women from the labour force does not provide jobs for an equal number of male breadwinners.

Even if it did, the exclusion of women from jobs simply because they are women denies them their right to work, a right that is the same as any man's, she said.

"In the 20s women in Canada were under the illusion they were on the march . . . but the depression ended that march. After that women never participated in society to any great extent until the Second World War."

"Even then both the women and society regarded their economic role as a temporary measure only, which was willingly surrendered when the men came home from the fighting."

She said now that women's movements in Canada and the U.S. have again reached the levels they did in the 20s, women must fight even harder than in recent years to prevent another reversal.

"We must wage a double battle. We must continue to tear down employment barriers and encourage women to take formal training in subjects which society has brainwashed them into believing will endanger their femininity," she said.

"The number of women in post-graduate programs at our universities still isn't much bigger than in the 20s," Gelber said.

"While there has been a dramatic increase in the enrolment of women in law and medicine, there are not enough women going into business administration, finance, mathematics and the sciences."

She said the education system will provide the real impetus for the women's movement in the next few years.

While attitudes are changing, the composition of the work force in Canada has not been drastically altered, she said.

More women are working than ever before — especially married women — 37 percent of whom were working in 1971 compared to 22 percent in 1961 — but they are still largely restricted to occupations always considered traditional for women, Gelber said.

She said major changes will come when women currently in the educational system begin competing in the job market.

"In times of economic distress we must strive harder than usual to prevent wasting our human resources, men as well as women, but economists often forget that one-third of these resources are women," Gelber said.

SECOND LANGUAGE MONITOR PROGRAM

Fifty Ontario post-secondary students with a good knowledge of their second official language, English or French, will receive up to $3,000 per year and up to $300 in travel expenses to participate in this federal-provincial program.

The students will study full-time in another province while working 6-8 hours per week as second language monitors. The monitors help elementary, secondary or post-secondary students to learn their second official language.

Post-secondary students from other provinces studying in Ontario may qualify to be second language monitors in Ontario.

To obtain a brochure or an application form, contact your provincial coordinator. Ontario students should contact:

Grass is greener and hash is cash

CALGARY (CUP) — Canadians would be able to pick up their marijuana and hashish in government stores if the Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association had its way.

At its quarterly meeting in Calgary the association, made up of judges, police, parole officers and other legal workers, discussed plans to drive organized crime out of the soft drug trade by legalizing its use and sales.

Bill McGrath, association president, said after the meeting that instead of making possession of "soft drugs" a lesser offence, as the government now is considering, it should be decriminalized completely.

The profit made by the government selling marijuana could be used to finance research, education and treatment in the area of alcohol abuse, he said.

"It's better than going into the coffers of organized crime," McGrath said.

Women's Work

reprinted from Western Voice

by Mordecai Briemberg and Bonnie Beckman, based on research by Dottie Wepler

"Some of them were pretty; most of them were more or less buxom, for they had been chosen with a desire to create a pleasing first impression."

On April 17, 1862 the first ship of the British Columbia Emigration Society arrived in the 'colony' with 20 young women aboard, aged mainly from 12 to 18, carefully chosen from London orphan asylums.

The reason groups of white women were first imported to B.C. was to work as servants for the rich, and to give birth to and raise future workers.

The next group of 60 came in May. To ensure their virginity, and hence 'marketability', the women were chaperoned by a clergyman and matron, and kept in isolation under extremely cramped conditions for the entire voyage.

The women were marched, amid crowds of spectators, to the Naval Barracks, where they were housed temporarily. Many were immediately sent to work as domestics for the wealthy. Soon after their arrival the majority married miners and other workers.

Women also came to B.C. overland, already married, to homestead in the interior. Some 300-400 accompanied their husbands to the gold fields. Della Murray Banks was one. She went with her husband and thirteen other miners, but only on the condition they paid for her additional labour as the cook. This spirit was not evident, however, among the majority of women.

WOMEN WORKERS

By 1891 women wage earners were 11 percent of the B.C. labour force. They were channelled into jobs that required hard physical work. But, essentially, the jobs were extensions of household duties. Women miners who worked B.C. coal seams were the exception. In 1902 the exception was eliminated when legislation barred women and children under 12 from underground work.

Women's pay was miserably low. The employers also used race discrimination to keep an abundant reserve of people desperate enough to work for even less. Chinese and Japanese workers were pitted against white women and men workers, and replaced many of them in tailor shops and as domestics.

While the trade unions of the time recognized the necessity of organizing women, they accepted racist propaganda and didn't try to organize the Chinese and Japanese. Therefore, Chinese and Japanese workers were forced to accept whatever trifling wages were offered, guaranteeing that the employers could use them to keep down the wages of other workers.

The first strike of B.C. women workers was in December 1902. Vancouver and Victoria telephone operators, linemen and repairers struck for wage increases, shorter hours and union recognition. All three demands were won. Yet the lowest paid male lineman received $60 a month, while starting wages for a woman operator was $20, rising to all of $30 after three years.

In trades where employees were dispersed, unionization took the longest and was the least successful. The Home and Domestic Employees Union wasn't established until 1913. Thirty-five "governesses, lady companions, nursemaids, cooks and others, who work in the homes of those who hire domestic help" met in the Labour Temple (still at Broadway) to decide how to achieve their goals: a nine hour day, a minimum wage, and recognition as a body of industrial workers. Only fifty of the over 2,000 domestics joined the union.

Many women were forced into prostitution because they were unable to live on their low wages. As a trade union paper commented in 1912: "If the idea of prostitution as a means of supplementing her income does not occur to her — it will most likely be suggested to her by the prospective employer — it is often done."

Work is Never Done

Marriage hardly was the way out. Women who married other workers generally were compelled because of their husbands' low wages to work outside the home (as well as in it). In any case, like miner's wives, working-class women shared the economic hardships of their husbands.

"I find your women singing 'Drive the scabs away'", complained Judge Howey in a 1913 trial of striking Nanaimo miners. "Fully 90 percent of the women rank with the men in their disregard "Solitude, quiet and sleep!"

In the dripping, humid air
I whiten the flimsy lares
That women may be fair;
I clothe my orphaned children
With the price my bare hands yield,
That the idle women may walk as fair
As lilies in the field.

"Solitude, quiet and sleep?"

To factory, shop and mill,
The feet of the working women go,
While their leisure sisters still Boast of the home they have never earned.
Of the ease we can never share
And bid us go back to the depths again,
Like Lazarus to his lair.
— The Champion,
December 1912

for property and even life." To which the women replied: If by thus beating us they think to make us give in, they are greatly mistaken, for most of us are as determined as our husbands, and will do all in our power to help our men with this great struggle."

SUFFRAGETTES

Middle class women also organized against the social and legal discrimination they suffered because of their sex. They centered their activities on winning the right to vote.

Men of property were the first of any group to vote. Predictably when men in 1873 'gave' women the vote in B.C. municipal elections, only women who owned property in their own names were eligible. As there were very few women property owners, only three women ended up voting at the polls.

The suffrage movement's demand that women have more than a token vote challenged the political status quo. But the demand itself was rooted in an extremely conservative attitude to women.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, the first and major suffrage organization, wanted women to be able to vote in order to get rid of booze. To the WCTU, women were "the fountainheads of grace, innocence and purity" and would "unite our votes to those of our worthy fathers, husbands and brothers to place in positions of trust and in the halls of legislation men who are not intellectually, but morally, capable to fill the office." This would end government corruption, labour agitation, alcoholism.

The WCTU never raised the question of what kind of a society it is that makes a woman have to depend on her husband's paycheck and which makes the husband have to depend so heavily on alcohol.

The main WCTU tactics were petitions, delegations to the legislature, court cases. All these excluded working women who could not save their jobs to "wait upon" MLA's, attend afternoon parlour meetings, sit in court, least of all pay court costs.

The WCTU's campaign to liberalize school trustee election regulations also was of little concern to working mothers whose children didn't have the luxury of attending school for any length of time.

The Political Equality League (PEL) and the University Women's Club were other suffrage organizations. Overlapping in membership with the WCTU, the PEL also centered on the vote as the means of improving women's position. The University club researched legal discrimination, particularly where it concerned middle class women, like on the ownership of property.

The PEL did argue for the minimum wage, but they patronized rather than identified with the situation of working women. They were strongly opposed to strikes and militant actions.

One woman, Helena Gutteridge, an organizer for the United Garment Workers Union, led a B.C. Women's Suffrage Society that met weekly in the evening at the Labour Temple. The other groups felt evening meetings were 'unladylike', so Gutteridge never became prominent among the 'proper' leadership.

Although working women played a minor part in the suffrage movement, the Vancouver Trades and Labour Council (TLC) supported full voting rights for men and women. Their support for female emancipation, however, was limited by strong attitudes of male domination.

"Women should vote because their vote would supplement man's and while he looked after the big things they would look after the little things", they wrote in 1909. The "little things", of course, referred to the "little children", the "little dishes" and all the "little" domestic duties of family life.

At the same time the TLC criticized the WCTU when they expressed the same attitudes. They also criticized WCTU charity projects for a few working women, because such "charity" only helped keep the majority of working women as a pool of cheap labour. The TLC emphasized unionization rather than the vote, particularly for women workers who were the first to be unemployed in the 1913 depression.

Gutteridge, starting in 1913, wrote a weekly column in the TLC paper insisting the trade union and suffrage struggles be tied more closely together.

The wives of imprisoned Nanaimo miners passed a pro-suffrage resolution that same year. They wanted to use the vote to change the laws that broke the miners strike.

PATRIOTISM

When WWI began, the suffrage movement changed tack. They turned to patriotism. The only women's paper, The Champion, stopped publication and may suffragettes made a conscious effort to "unite Canada for the welfare and progress of the Dominion."

But together with men going to war, women changed their economic position. For the first time middle class women joined the labour force. Working women did jobs that only men had done before.

In Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta women won the vote. Finally in B.C., the Conservative Party, that had been in power through the height of suffrage activity and had opposed women having the vote, began to crumble. Seeing the writing on the wall, the Liberal Party supported women's suffrage and in turn got women's support in the 1917 election. With the Liberal victory suffrage and prohibition were implemented.

Almost immediately membership in the women's political organizations drained away. Having seen suffrage as the ultimate victory, the women had no ready purpose for continuing activity. Leaders of the suffrage movement got government and Liberal Party appointments and positions. A small minority came to reap the benefits of political influence that had been won through the struggles of many.

Women "domestics" prepared and served tea at many a suffragette afternoon parlour meeting. The suffragette movement did not question that relationship and by not challenging the system that exploits labour, the movement withered away after the vote was won. Women workers', and all women's inferior position remained significantly unchanged.

B.C. working women at this time fought mainly against their exploitation as cheap labour outside the home. But there is nothing in the surviving historical record that shows they also collectively battled against their other exploitation in the home.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ELECTION ANNOUNCEMENT

The following are excerpts from Election Guidelines 1975, a document setting out the procedures for the Elections to the Governing Council discussed below. Copies of the complete Election Guidelines 1975 are available from the Governing Council Secretariat, telephone 928-2160, where any additional enquiries may also be directed.

The election shall be by mailed ballot, and information regarding balloting procedures will be published at a later date.

AUTHORITY FOR THE CONDUCT OF THE ELECTION

The election is conducted by the Governing Council under the authority of the University of Toronto Act, 1971.

In the event of any conflicts between these guidelines and the provisions of the University of Toronto Act, 1971, the provisions of the Act prevail.

These guidelines are with respect to the election of members from the University's staff and students only.

The Election Advisory Committee of the Governing Council shall appoint a Chief Returning Officer who shall be responsible for the interpretation and implementation of these guidelines.

The Chief Returning Officer shall rule upon the validity of nominations, voter eligibility, and verification and tabulation of returns, assisted by such legal counsel or Election Advisory Committee advice as he may wish to employ. His decisions, when concerned with technical matters, shall be final.

The Chief Returning Officer may prescribe forms for use in connection with the election which may contain instructional notes and informational requirements in addition to those set out in these guidelines, so long as they are not inconsistent herewith, or with procedures used in the previous Governing Council Election.

In matters of procedure not provided for in these guidelines, the procedure shall be regulated by an analogy to the procedures that were employed in the previous Governing Council Election, or, if no analogy exists, as the Chief Returning Officer directs.

A group of overseers consisting of members from the Election Advisory Committee of the Governing Council shall be appointed by the Governing Council. A majority of the overseers for the purpose of considering any appeal or matters of contention regarding validity of nominations, voter eligibility, and verification and tabulation of returns, shall constitute a quorum; and the decision of the overseers to undertake such consideration, or a majority of them, shall be final.

DESCRIPTION OF CONSTITUENCIES AND TERMS OF OFFICE

Description of Constituencies

Teaching Staff Constituencies:

"Teaching Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine, and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry.)

In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school, will his constituency be determined by another appointment.

Constituency I

6 seats — divided as follows:

Constituency 1A — 1 seat

all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments in the federated universities.

W.B. Dunphy — term expires June 30th, 1976.

Constituency 1B — 1 seat

all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges.

G.R. Thaler — term expires June 30th, 1976.

Constituency 1C — 1 seat

all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the University College, or New College Departments of Classics, English, French, German, Near Eastern Studies; or in the University Departments of East Asian Studies, Fine Art, Islamic Studies, Italian, Hispanic Studies, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Sanskrit and Indian Studies (excluding those who are members of Constituency 1B).

V.E. Graham — term expires June 30th, 1976.

Constituency 1D — 1 seat

REGULATIONSNominations:*Nomination period and deadline

Nomination forms will be available at the Governing Council Secretariat and at registrar's offices at Scarborough College and Erindale College. Nominations for seven teaching staff and eight student seats will open on Monday, January 27th, at 9:00 a.m. and remain open until Friday, February 14th at 12:00 noon. Nomination papers must be filed at the Governing Council Secretariat and nominations received elsewhere or after that time, will be invalid.

Errors or irregularities in nominations

THE ONUS IS ON THE PERSON NOMINATED FOR ELECTION TO FILE A BONA FIDE NOMINATION PAPER. Errors or irregularities in these papers constitute grounds for rejection of the nomination. Such errors or irregularities may be corrected prior to the close of nominations or during the time allotted in the verification period. The Governing Council Secretariat will attempt to notify candidates of the existence of any errors during this period, but is not bound to do so. Candidates are advised to complete and submit their nomination forms early in the nomination period.

Eligibility of nominators

All nominators must be members of the same constituency as the nominee. A nominator may not nominate more candidates for election than there are seats vacant in his constituency.

Nomination signatures

Nominations for teaching staff seats must contain the signatures of 10 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and department.

Nominations for graduate student seats must contain the signatures of 15 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and student number.

Nominations for full-time undergraduate student seats must contain the signatures of 50 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and student number.

Nominations for part-time undergraduate student seats must contain the signatures of 15 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and student number.

Citizenship

Any person nominated as a candidate must be a Canadian citizen at the time of nomination if his candidacy is to be acceptable. Documentary evidence of Canadian citizenship must be presented with each nomination form for examination in the Governing Council Secretariat. Any one of the following will be considered acceptable evidence of citizenship: certificate of birth in Canada; certificate of citizenship; certificate of naturalization; Canadian certificate of registration of birth abroad; certificate of retention of Canadian citizenship; valid Canadian passport. Failing such documentary evidence, a notarized statement to the effect that the nominee is a Canadian citizen must accompany the nomination form. The Governing Council Secretariat will make available such statements for signature and, if requested a sufficient time in advance, will arrange for their notarization.

Candidate's statements

Nominees may submit, on nomination forms, two biographical statements or other comments, up to a limit of 75 words each. Such statements are voluntary and will be made available to voters through the campus media and accompanying ballots, unless a second statement is provided, in which case, the second statement will accompany ballots, and the first statement will be distributed through campus media. Statements will not be published or distributed if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Governing Council, in consultation with the Election Advisory Committee, assisted by such legal counsel as he may wish to employ, they would render the University liable to a suit for libel. The decision of the Secretary in such instances shall be final. Candidates' statements may not be altered or amended after the close of nominations.

Candidate's signature

Nomination papers must be signed by the candidate. The signature of the candidate in the nomination form signifies his willingness to stand as a candidate, his possession of Canadian citizenship and his approval of the candidate's statements, if any, made on the form.

Verification process

Those nominations which have been received by Friday, February 14th, at 5:00 p.m. will be subject to a verification process. The eligibility of nominators will be verified as follows:

- all teaching staff constituencies in which elections are to be held printed full name and department against Personnel Department records.
- all student constituencies — printed full name and student number against records of the Office of Statistics and Records.

Certification of nomination

If the candidate is eligible for election in the constituency for which he is nominated, and the nomination form contains the minimum number of verified nominators, it will be certified as a correct nomination form by the Chief Returning Officer. Once a nomination has been certified as correct, following the close of nominations, no alteration of the nomination or appeal on other grounds is permitted.

Announcement of irregular nominations

On Monday, February 24th at 12:00 noon, the names of candidates whose papers are found to contain some error or irregularity, and whose papers have not been otherwise corrected before the close of nominations will be announced publicly by a written statement made available at the Governing Council Secretariat.

Varsity lacked scoring punch in the opening stanza and were guilty of some sloppy play in their own end allowing the Gee-Gees a wide territorial edge throughout the period. Ottawa out-shot the Blues 13-5 during the period and had the advantage in penalties 5-4.

Blues were continually on the defensive especially in the last few minutes of the period when Blues had two minor penalties. The trio of Pagnello, Davies, and Milnes did yeoman service keeping Ottawa at bay.

Al Milnes, one of very few veteran defencemen on the team, saw very little action in the second period because of a severe bruise on his hip from the night before as well as the face cut received during the Cornell game. Milnes was pressed into action midway through the third period when Dave Rooke took tripping and misconduct penalties leaving the Blues with only three defencemen.

Coach Tom Watt shuffled his lines somewhat in the second period, putting Davies and Ruhnke on the wings with center Don Pagnutti.

The moves paid off as the Blues began to assert their authority during the second, out-shooting Ottawa 12-8, but were unable to beat Ottawa net minder Bruce Reid whose snake-like left hand nabbed many of Varsity's shots leaving the score 0-0 at the end of 40 minutes of play.

The third period was all Toronto as Kent Ruhnke gave the Blues a 2-0 lead in 36 seconds of commencement of hostilities.

Ruhnke's first goal came at the 20 second mark when Pagnutti drew the puck from the face-off in Ottawa territory back to Ruhnke in the slot who fired over Reid's glove to the short side.

Ruhnke's second goal, only 16 seconds later, was set up by Don Pagnutti's excellent lead pass to put Ruhnke in the clear down the left side. Ruhnke made no mistake hitting the same spot in the twine.

At 8:58 of the third, Rooke took his tripping and misconduct penalties. While the minor was still being served by Paul Sawyer, Davies went deep to forecheck Ottawa. Davies dug the puck out of the corner and fed Pagnutti in front of the net who banged home the short-handed goal.

Ottawa was totally demoralized at this point and were confused in their own end. Doug Harris was allowed to pick up an errant Gee-Gee pass in front of the net and popped the puck behind Reid for Varsity's fourth goal. Reid appeared to be screened on the play.

Varsity next tackles the CIAU champion Waterloo Warriors in an exhibition game Wednesday night at the Bloor Street Ice Palace. Waterloo defeated Varsity 4-3 earlier in the year.

One other game over the weekend is worthy of special note: Laurier stunned Waterloo with a 6-1 decision at Waterloo.

Correction by candidate

Since it is the candidate's responsibility to file correct papers, the Governing Council Secretariat may only notify the candidate that error or irregularity exists. The Governing Council Secretariat shall not, for example, inform the candidate which nominators, nor how many, are in error. It may not discuss the nature of the error, or errors, with the candidate. Identification of the difficulty would be tantamount to correction of the papers by the Chief Returning Officer, which is prohibited. The candidate or his authorized representative must correct the papers himself.

Deadline for filing of corrected papers

On Tuesday, February 25th, those individuals whose papers for nomination were found in some way to be irregular or in error will be permitted to re-file corrected papers. Any corrected nominations filed after 5:00 p.m. on that day will be void. No new candidates may file for election during this period; only individuals who filed papers during the regular nomination period may have this privilege.

Technical invalidation

Despite the existence of the verification procedure, papers which are obviously in error or on their face are not appropriately verifiable will be automatically invalidated on technical grounds by the Chief Returning Officer. Such a decision will be final and there will be no opportunity to correct the papers under the foregoing procedure which will not apply.

Candidates may, therefore, not file knowingly incorrect papers in order to use the verification period as an extension of the regular nomination period. Consequently, wherever possible, errors in student numbers or other information must be corrected, in preference to the collection of new signatures to obtain the minimum number of correct nominators' signatures. This verification period is designed only to facilitate the correction of minor human error on nominations otherwise in good faith.

Announcement of candidates for office

On Friday, February 28th at 12:00 noon, the names of all individuals who have presented acceptable nomination papers, whether at the close of the regular nomination period or the verification period, will be announced as candidates for office.

Filing of notice to appeal decision

Those whose papers were found still to be in error may file by 5:00 p.m. on Friday, February 28th at the Governing Council Secretariat, notice of intention to appeal this decision before the Governing Council overseers, unless the error was declared to be technical in nature by the Chief Returning Officer in which case there shall be no appeal.

Appeals

Insufficient time for the correction of nominations will not be considered legitimate grounds for appeal. Appeals will be completed by 5:00 p.m. Monday, March 3rd. The decision of the Governing Council overseers is final and no further appeals will be permitted.

Announcement of additional candidates

The names of those who have successfully appealed the nomination procedure and are consequently additional candidates for office, will be announced Tuesday, March 4th, at 12:00 noon.

Names of candidates

The names of candidates nominated for election will be considered public information as they are received. The names of nominators will not be released by the Chief Returning Officer except to a candidate or his authorized representative during the verification period.

Withdrawal of nomination

A person nominated as a candidate in the election may withdraw his nomination by notarized instrument in writing received by the Governing Council Secretariat within 24 hours after the close of the verification period.

Resignation for ineligibility

A successful candidate must resign his seat at any time that he ceases to meet the eligibility requirements for election to that seat.

Other Regulations

Verification by nominee

Each candidate for election may in writing appoint a scrutineer for the tabulation of returns in his constituency, and such scrutineers may also check the completed verification of ballot returns prior to tabulation.

Equality of votes

In the case of equality of votes for a greater number of candidates than there are vacancies to be filled in any constituency, the successful candidate or candidates shall be determined by lottery conducted by the Chief Returning Officer.

Election expenses

Candidate campaign expenses will be refunded up to a limit of $50 on production of bona fide receipts at the close of election, subject to the following restrictions:

- I) If in any single-seat constituency, more than five candidates run for election, the campaign expense refund provision will apply only to those candidates who obtain at least 20% of the vote obtained by the successful candidate.
- II) If in any multiple-seat constituency more than five candidates per seat run for election, the campaign expense refund provision will apply only for those candidates who obtain at least 20% of the votes obtained by the candidate elected with the least number of votes.

Irregularities

An irregularity which does not or is not reasonably likely to affect the outcome of the election shall not invalidate the election.

Announcement of results

The number of votes received by each candidate will be announced, as will the number of spoiled ballots received.

Retention and disposal of ballots and return envelopes

All ballots received, and all return envelopes, will be held in security by the Governing Council Secretariat for a period of sixty days after the announcement of election results. If authorized by the Election Advisory Committee, a recount will be conducted on the written request of any candidate in that constituency.

Powers and Duties of the Governing Council

The University of Toronto Act

The University of Toronto Act, 1971, vests in the Governing Council the government, management and control of the University and of University College, and property, revenues, business and affairs thereof, and the powers and duties of the former Board of Governors and Senate of the University.

Committees

In view of the size and complexity of the University and the extensive duties of the Governing Council, it has delegated many of its review powers to working committees. In addition to an Executive Committee, the Council has established an Academic Affairs Committee, a Business Affairs Committee, an External Affairs Committee, an Internal Affairs Committee and a Planning and Resources Committee. Members of Council normally sit on at least one of these committees.

Women's weekend sports roundup

In the second east sectional held at Ryerson Saturday, the women's intermediate badminton team edged Queen's 31 points to 30.
Toronto was only able to tie the Queen's girls in the singles events, but picked up an extra point in the doubles to take the round-robin. Ottawa took third place with 16 points.

With Lynn Knott substituting for regular Wendy Stone, who was injured, the ladies team of Vivian Cozzarini, Leilah Edroos, Mary Fournier, Wendy MacKeigan, and Susan Cooper went on to win all of their singles matches.
The team travels to Waterloo for the west sectional on Feb. 8.

game were very exciting as Donna Walker of the Blues had three fast breaks in a row. All the girls played well and everyone contributed to the score.

Top scorers for the Blues were Sharon Kosmachuk, who contributed much to the game with her excellent rebounding, and Donna Walker.

If the ladies keep up this type of play, they should have no problems taking an important game over Queen's in two weeks. Varsity would then stand tied for first place.

The Lady Blues fencing team slashed, parried, and jabbed their way to the OWIAA finals last Saturday with wins over McMaster and Brock, at the second sectional held at McMaster.

The Varsity team of Liz Lozenko, Yoko Ode, Anne Stokes, and Vivian Zochowski downed McMaster 9-7 and Brock 13-3.

The team finals between Toronto and McMaster will be held at the Benson Building on Jan. 31. The individual finals will be held on Feb. 1 when each of the three zones will send their best eight fencers.

By FERN BRAND

On Thursday, the Lady Blues intermediate basketball team played one of its best games of the season against Ryerson to win 48-21.

This second win over Ryerson this year was an important one as it kept the girls in second place.

The pace was too fast for Ryerson as Toronto's offence whizzed by Ryerson breaking up the court to gain double the points over Ryerson in the first half.

Toronto's defence was like five scarecrows from the Wizard of Oz, keeping Ryerson out of the key. The Blues, allowing only three shots to be taken from the key, led the scoring 26-10.

The Lady Blues were anxious to hit the court after the halftime break. The last three minutes of the Basketball Blues even season with 81-69 win over Ravens

By PAUL CARSON

The basketball Blues kept their playoff hopes alive Saturday with a solid 81-69 victory over a tough and sometimes crude band of Carleton Ravens in a key OUA A eastern division game played at the Benson Building.

The result evens Blues' record at four wins and four losses, and gives the team some desperately needed confidence following a series of three consecutive defeats including a narrow 67-64 setback to Carleton last weekend.

Ravens remain two points ahead of Blues in the hectic playoff race but Varsity now has two games in hand.

Blues shot a remarkable 53 percent in the first half and spurred to a 14-point lead thanks to consistent rebounding and an explosive fast break triggered by guard Doug Fox.

However, Blues ran into foul trouble and Ravens cut their margin to 50-39 by halftime.

Varsity fans had some anxious moments after nine minutes of the second half when forward Rich Kurczyk fouled out after scoring 16 points, but Blues oft-criticized defensive play suddenly improved and they outscored Ravens 22-15 during the first fifteen minutes of the final half.

A combination of Blues' strong defence and some unlucky bounces off the rim prevented Ravens from making a serious challenge despite enjoying the bonus situation for the final ten minutes of the game.

Brian Skyington (19) and Glenn Scott (14) joined Fox and Kurczyk in supplying the core of Varsity's scoring punch while Carleton forward Paul Armstrong netted the game high of 22. However, Ravens' attack suffered from a tendency to expect Armstrong to do everything, particularly in the second half.

The closing minutes of both halves were unusually chippy as players traded elbows, hacks and some deliberate undercutting on layups that could have resulted in a serious injury. Overall, Blues were called for 26 personal fouls and Ravens for 22; consequently, the visitors had the edge at the foul line, sinking 17 of 25 freethrows to Blues' 13 of 22 but Varsity's hot shooting from the floor more than neutralized this problem.

It wasn't an evening of classic basketball, and the graceless antics of some players and spectators did no-one any credit. However, Blues did manage to keep their cool for most of the game and the victory demonstrated that the team certainly has the potential to make the playoffs.

The remaining schedule won't be easy, though, as the next home game puts Blues against division leaders, Ottawa Gee-Gees, Friday night at the Benson Building.

Six teams are still in contention for the four playoff spots, so Blues really can't afford to lose any of their four remaining games.

Blues have suffered from woefully poor fan support despite vastly improved teams in the past two years. Hopefully, the combination of free admission and an important game will produce a good attendance this weekend. If the U of T Cheerleaders return, they might even contribute more than the one perfunctory cheer that they produced last Saturday.

Varsity Scoring: Fox 12, Francis 5, McGhie 2, Scott 14, Kurczyk 16, Van Cook 6, Fiiinski 5, Skyington 19, Fjeld 2.

Carleton Scoring: Foucault 3, Bowles 2, Reid 4, Piotrowski 2, Gargay 2, Walbergs 13, Kazanowski 17, Armstrong 22, Haig 4.

Bill Francis (32) controls for Blues while Fjeld bites nails.

Swim Blues have easy time of three dual meets

By PAUL CARSON

The men's swimming team has ended any lingering doubts about its ability to retain Blues monopoly on OUA A and CIAU championships, thanks to three convincing victories at the U of T Invitational staged at the Benson Building pool.

Blues handled Wayne State 75-36, Niagara 79-32 and Guelph 83-23 as part of the six simultaneous dual meets that delighted a small but enthusiastic crowd of about 150 for three exciting hours Saturday afternoon.

In the other half of the competition, Wayne and Niagara both hammered Guelph, 84-29 and 86-27 respectively, while Wayne won the all-U.S. match-up 61-52.

Blues proved they could win big without the services of CIAU record-holder Jim Adams, now ineligible for intercollegiate competition due to the five-year rule. Varsity was also handicapped by the absence of the team's divers, who were competing in the provincial championships. Thus, Blues had to hand both American schools a 16-point headstart and conceded 10 points to Guelph.

As the meet began, it appeared that the loss of Adams and the divers might set the scene for some upsets, but Blues handily won four of the initial five events and the eventual outcome was quickly indicated.

George Gross, a veteran of NCAA competition at Yale plus the 1973 World Student Games, paced Blues with three solid victories in the 1000-yard freestyle, 200-yard individual medley and 200-yard backstroke.

Dave Wilkin recorded good times in both of Blues' winning relay teams and also added his personal best of 49.4 in taking the 100-yard freestyle.

Lance Peto established his credentials in the freestyle sprints by winning the 50-yarder in 23.0, placing second in the 100, and swimming well in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

Jay Steele won the 500-yard freestyle and was a strong second to Gross in the 1000, while Greg Vanular grabbed second behind Gross in both the 200 and 200 back.

Mike Hughes, who made the CIAU finals last year while at Waterloo, added Blues other victory in the 200-yard butterfly.

In addition to the diving, Blues lost only two events all day, and in these the margin of defeat was only one-tenth and six-tenths of a second.

Overall, the times were not particularly fast, especially once the final outcome was no longer in doubt, but Blues demonstrated a fantastic amount of bench strength and backup talent in almost every event.

The American schools were no real challenge in either relay, and Blues managed to place both first and second in five of the other nine races even though Varsity's top swimmers were not entered in all of their premier events.

For example, veteran Shawn Laari swam only in the relays, captain John Sebben entered the 200-free and 400-free relay, Juri Daniel appeared in one relay and the 200 breast, and Hughes won the only race he entered.

The lesser-known team-members also performed well as Mike Hibberd contributed a second and a fourth, Bill Chisholm a third and a fourth, Larry Lapointe a fourth, and Ami Shalit turned in two excellent times as an exhibition swimmer.

Hockey Blues dump Ottawa 4-0 and take first place

By DAVE STUART

OTTAWA — Dave Hulme posted his first shutout of the season to lead the Varsity Blues hockey squad to a 4-0 win over the first place Ottawa Gee-Gees at the new Sandy Hill arena Saturday.

The Blues have finally overcome the quirks of the OUA A schedule to take first place away from Ottawa by virtue of their two wins over Ottawa this season, despite the fact Ottawa has played two more games than the Blues.

The game went scoreless for the first two periods as the Blues' play dragged, particularly in the first period. Varsity arrived late in Ottawa at 2:30 am from Montreal after a hard game with Loyola Friday night and were visibly tired.

Blues lost the game Friday night in Montreal 3-2 to the Loyola squad.

Blues also lost the services of Ivan McFarlane who re-injured his back in the Loyola game. Bob Adoranti was quickly airlifted from Toronto to Ottawa Saturday morning to aid the injury ridden Blues.

Len Gang leads wrestlers at Guelph Open

By EUGENE SHAW-COLLIER

As of this past Saturday, the Varsity wrestlers have experienced their second international tournament of the season.

The Guelph Open, hosted by the University of Guelph, entertained at least 25 top Americans as well as one Russian. There were over 150 competitors.

The Varsity squad put on a strong showing despite the absence of Jack Preobrazenski, Wally Cringen, and Ed Rector, all suffering from injuries.

Veteran Len Gang of the 109 lb. weight class led the Blues with three decisions and pins against Guelph and Carleton, placing Gang first out of nine competitors. Roman Preobrazenski settled for a second out of 15 with four decisions and one pin. He was forced to concede the final match to Western because of a knee injury sustained in an earlier bout.

Rob Moore had some brilliant matches beating Canadian national team member Tim Wentzel 8-3. Moore lost only 5-3 to Davids from Michigan who is ranked in the top five in the U.S. Two more wins and an unlucky loss left Moore in fifth place amongst 21 wrestlers.

Kirk Osadetz (134 lb.) started off with two pins, but the trend was reversed and he was eliminated two matches later.

Glenn May (177 lb.) began his day with the Russian Victor Zilverman. May fought tough but eventually was pinned in the second round. The Russian, who placed third in the last world championships, went on to pin the rest of his competitors handily. May went on to gain a pin but later lost a decision to Waterloo.

Roger Vachon (150 lb.) was pinned by national champion Steve Martin after a very tough and determined match. Vachon went on to win two more matches before being eliminated.

Sam Turchiaro (134 lb.) began with a pin against Agincourt but lost his next two bouts. Allen Kosugi (118 lb.) started off with a loss by a pin; however, his next win wasn't good enough to keep him in the running.

Coach Joe Ravel was pleased with his team's performance and is optimistic about next weekend's venture to the Michigan Open, one of the toughest meets held in the northeast.

Non-academic women study creates stir

By MATHILDE VERHULST
Although a committee report on the status of U of T's non-academic women is still under formulation, controversy over alleged acceptance and rejection of several of the report's recommendations rages within the committee.

The Task Force to Examine the Status of Non-academic Women, a six-member committee set up last year to investigate "sexist hiring practices" and to make proposals, hopes to submit the report to Governing Council's internal and business affairs committees by next month.

Committee member and law student Howard Levitt who initiated the working report last year accused committee chairman Garry Thaler of largely ignoring and whitewashing many of the recommendations Levitt made on the basis they were too "controversial."

Levitt, former Governing Council member, called Thaler an "obstructionist" who has "viciously attacked anything progressive" in the report and "has done his best to demoralize the committee by making long delays" in decision-making.

"Thaler's got the committee psyched into accepting anything," Levitt said, referring to the committee's present proposals.

Thaler noted none of the proposals have been finally agreed upon in their final wording.

Thaler added a closed committee meeting held last night would "re-examine all of Mr. Levitt's proposals."

The main recommendation Levitt said the committee rejected was establishment of "an appeal mechanism for non-academic staff with both impartiality and decision-making power."

Levitt stipulated this mechanism "be both clearly defined and widely publicized as a final alternative when regular channels are inappropriate or inadequate."

When asked if the committee had rejected this proposal, Thaler said the establishment of grievance procedures for non-academic staff "is a developing recommendation" of the committee.

Levitt said another rejected proposal was "that all non-academic employees make a list of the functions they perform on their jobs, that this be cross-checked with personnel job description forms and that the job be reclassified accordingly."

Levitt said too often university employees, such as secretaries, perform their jobs "at a higher level" than they are actually being paid for.

He stressed it was time an investigation into job requirements and classification took place.

A third proposal Levitt said was rejected demanded "the dropping of all information on first names, sex, age and marital status from personnel files in selecting applicants for job interviews."

Thaler countered there was "no need to include this as a recommendation" in the final report because "it was announced in the last committee meeting that the personnel department has begun this process on its own initiative."

In response to the "rejected" proposal "that 50 per cent of the university job interviewers be female," Thaler said, "There is a general feeling (among committee members) that quotas as quotas are not the best method" of attacking sexual discrimination in the university's hiring practices.

But, Thaler added, this recommendation would be a "sub-part of a general proposal on quotas" in the report.

The committee supports another demand for "economically accessible" day care for non-academic staff, Levitt said, but added day care is still "prohibitively expensive" for many.

He guessed day care costs are in range from $110 to $130 monthly.

Levitt called the proposals endorsed by the committee as either "innocuous and irrelevant" or "so vague that if the university wants to circumvent them it will be very easy to do."

Radio Varsity staff wax optimistic

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Enthusiasm and optimism are in full bloom on the third floor of 91 St. George St. where only a scant two weeks ago dissension and rancor reigned.

Radio Varsity's staff and management are slowly picking up the pieces from the protracted, bitter, internal dispute culminating in a SAC-appointed investigative commission which forced station manager Paul Murton's resignation Jan. 9.

But that seems like a long time ago. Radio Varsity now has a new interim station co-ordinator, Brad Reed, a reshuffled upper management, a newly created six-person board of directors which has already met twice, an influx of new staffers and a happier group of old ones.

Apparently the only thing the station now lacks is the winning ticket on the Olympic lottery.

"I'm optimistic now," agreed Reed sitting in the clean, quiet station manager's office which no longer hums with chaos.

"Two weeks ago this station wasn't worth keeping," Reed said. "I'm really surprised SAC kept it going because of the condition it was in."

"But I think things are improving now. Morale has gone up and people are coming into the station to talk about things to do, rather than just how to get rid of Murton."

Reed said Radio Varsity's large executive was dismantled and the station was now being run "on the Four Kings Theory."

"Two of the Kings are Reed himself — as station co-ordinator and also as business and finance director until someone else can be found.

The two other Kings are chief engineer Martin Bain and program director Bill Denning. Bain, Denning and Reed (as business director) divide up all the station's functions and decentralize them even further among their staffs.

With the structure straightened out and the lines of staff-management communication clearly established, Reed hopes the station can seriously begin the task of winning an FM licence from the Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC).

"We're getting on with it," Reed said. "In light of the new CRTC regulations which have caused such a furor, we have been trying to reduce music and advertising and increase news and community service."

Although Radio Varsity is working towards an FM licence in the long run, Reed knows the efforts might be academic if SAC's FM committee reports in March that the station should be closed or limited in service.

Radio Varsity needs a much larger financial transfusion than the $20,000 SAC annually grants it if the station is going to go FM.

"We're aware of the SAC FM committee, but we just have to perform in the next two months as though it were going to report favorably," Reed said.

Frank Cockram, whose controversial resignation as news director November triggered the SAC investigation, spoke favorably of the station's progress.

"I'm not surprised at all the way the station is pulling itself together," Cockram said. "The tension release alone was just great."

"A lot of people just took a deep breath and said, 'Let's get down to business.'"

Other staffers echoed Cockram's sentiments.

"We're a lot better now," said special programs director Paul Soni. "We're even planning weeks and sometimes even months ahead."

"Our news team is getting together, we're getting our technical staff educated, programs are being formally scheduled, we advertised for staff and got a big turnout of about 25."

"Morale is up tremendously," said promotion director Michael Greason. "We're actually doing things now."

"That SAC commission report was the best thing that ever happened to this station," said staffer Paul Sadowski, "even if it did exaggerate a lot, like saying there was 'chaos.'"

"The only thing I miss now," Reed said, "is not waking up every morning to find us all over page one of The Varsity again."

Resignation confirmed

A letter sent last Thursday to Victoria College faculty members confirms college principal John Robson tendered his resignation last week because of his opposition to student-faculty parity on Vic's top governing body.

In a letter dated Jan. 23, Robson writes that the Board of Regent's decision Jan. 16 approving the principle of equal student-faculty representation in the proposed new Victoria University Act "runs directly counter to my deeply held convictions about university governments and to the repeatedly expressed will of the Victoria College Council."

The parity decision on a revised top governing structure at Vic came a month after the board of regents accepted another proposal which Robson opposed — setting up a single governing body combining Vic's present board and senate.

David Manuel, editor of Vic's student newspaper The Strand, said last night Robson's resignation came as no surprise to students involved in college politics.

Although The Varsity reported Monday that board of regents student member Pat Remy "suggested" Robson might have resigned because of a conflict with Vic president Goldwyn French, Remy in fact merely said such a rumor was floating around at the college.

The Varsity has not been able to substantiate the rumor of disagreements between French and Robson who declined to comment on his resignation yesterday.

Daycare ratios assailed

The Ontario government's own advisory council on daycare has criticized the province's move to cut back parent-child ratios in daycare centres.

In its January, 1975 report, the council notes that a reduction in parent-child ratios would probably not incur substantial savings, and would be unlikely to result in more children being served by daycare.

Social development secretary Margaret Birch ran into stiff opposition last fall when she introduced legislation to lower the parent-child ratio. Birch was accused of adapting standards to meet the needs of private daycare operators in order to avoid heavy government involvement in daycare.

The report points out staff reductions would only occur in larger centres, which would not result in serving more children, since physical capacity and location determine the extent of service.

Noting it had received a great deal of opposition to the provincial moves, the council stated there was no research available to substantiate any change in ratios.

The report urges the government to keep a low parent-child ratio, saying:

"The current literature on child development stresses the importance of the pre-school years, and emphasizes the necessity of the constancy and warmth of adult relationship during this period."

"In a full daycare situation, this relationship must be provided by staff, and there is undoubtedly a limit to the number of children any one staff member can provide with this important nurturing."

Sparrow slams U of T on complex

By JENNIFER WONG
Ward Six Alderman Allan Sparrow berated the university authorities Monday for their handling of the athletic complex controversy.

Talking with students at The Varsity offices, Sparrow said he didn't think the university had acted in good faith with the Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association which oppose the proposed athletic complex on Harbor Street on the grounds of its incompatibility with the surrounding neighborhood.

As alderman, Sparrow sees his role as ensuring that the two different parties "sit down across the table and talk out their problems in order to come up with a compromise—something which the university has never really done."

The interim criteria, soon to be passed by City Council as a bylaw, exempts the university from height restrictions, but the athletic complex is not out of the woods yet, Sparrow said.

"There is still section 35(a) of the Planning Act which governs things like ramping and access. Some people put a lot of faith in that section, although to me it's like trying to make a big stick out of a twig."

"Of course, since university funding now may be a little more precarious," he continued, "it may back down and choose a good neighbor role, but whenever the university has had money, it's as dangerous as any other developer."

Sparrow also discussed priorities of City Council's Reform Caucus.

Although it is still trying to sort out goals for concrete action, the caucus will operate on two main principles: the need for decentralization of political power and the need for a more balanced economic distribution within the city of Toronto, said Sparrow, a caucus member.

Local authorities should have more control over funding and social services, Sparrow said.

"The inefficiency of social services—now a Metro concern—stems from its operation out of a central bureaucracy," he maintained. The caucus opposes such proposals as drawing the responsibilities of the board of health under provincial control, Sparrow said.

The caucus does not want to see the city centre turned into a specialized commercial area with commuters and OHC housing isolated in the suburbs, he noted. Sparrow emphasized the role of a transportation system in preventing such over-specialization.

"Land use and transportation are issues that are closely intertwined," he said. "If you're going to create a mammoth transport terminal down by Union Station, as Bill Davis suggests, then commuters will stream into the core area, and the land there will be devoted to their office buildings."

As an alternative Sparrow envisages external and internal transportation networks linking a large variety of land uses in Toronto and its suburbs.

Sparrow condemned the Tory government for "performing a big juggling act" with the public transportation issue.

"They have to keep the big boys satisfied—the highway construction is living off the government—and yet keep the public from screaming."

"So then they spend millions studying the magnetic levitation thing which would create a Disneyland environment like Ontario Place," Sparrow said.

"They do that instead of spending considerably less to open up the existing streets to streetcars and buses, putting up special signal lights and kicking a few cars off the roads."

Sparrow also censured the recently established Roberts commission to study Metro Toronto governing structure, saying the study will probably be a "big farce."

"There's corruption in the provincial government," he said, "but $30,000 in payoffs is small peanuts compared to making Roberts a one-man commission—the man has his finger in how many corporate pies?"

Sparrow saw a similar conflict of ideology in the TTC appointment of David Rotenberg, an Old Guard candidate in the 1972 mayoral race.

"Rotenberg's locked into the free enterprise system, with no concern for transportation as a basic public utility," Sparrow charged.

Sparrow would like to see the TTC become a free public utility, but he reasons fares will almost certainly increase since the provincial government is not interested in further subsidizing without corresponding increases in city taxes.

"More money has got to come from somewhere," Sparrow said, "and if it doesn't come from inside or outside through reorganization of priority spending, then it's got to come from fare increases."

Sparrow also reviewed the present City Council make-up. He sees three groups within it: the Reform Caucus, a middle group of alderpersons susceptible to pressure from their constituents, and then five or six hard core members.

The poor performance record of the last council, Sparrow said, is exerting pressure for action.

"But I think this council may be a reactive kind," he said, "They need a planning bylaw to fill the gap left when the Ontario Municipal Board tossed out the 45-foot holding bylaw. So fearing the province may think them irresponsible for not acting quickly, the council pushes through the Interim Criteria. They need the province's support for the 45-foot holding bylaw."

The Interim Criteria, based on city planners' reports, suggests new zoning for parts of the city core, but also exempts or releases certain areas from the 45-foot holding bylaw to their original zoning.

Sparrow stressed the importance of this legislation and noted that council adopted it with virtually no public consultation.

In Sparrow's opinion, council sacrificed citizen input in attempting to prove their efficacy to the province.

Sparrow calls the new Metro Council a "lost cause" as far as city interests go. None of the city politicians obtained important chairmanship on the Metro Council committees.

The city-borough split will be more pronounced than last year, Sparrow predicted.

"There's increased representation from the boroughs and this results in a proportionate decrease in city politicians," he noted.

He said, however, that a hard line drawn by Dan Heap, Michael Goldrick and John Sewell on council may succeed in creating public awareness of Metro issues and thus influence the council.

Although Sparrow feels the future of the citizen movements is difficult to predict, he does see a continuing interest in militancy in the downtown groups.

"A really rotten council like the one in 1972 is a stimulus for citizens to organize. Now the need is still there, but the issues are much more complex."

"But obvious bad things are still going on in the core area, so the organizations in Wards 6 and 7 will probably remain relatively dynamic," Sparrow said.

Citizens' concern was evident in their choice of aldermen, he added.

Every downtown neighborhood, Sparrow said, is threatened by something, be it traffic, noise pollution or drastic redevelopment.

The Learning Machine

This month is third world education month with films, speakers and other events centring around problems of under development.

Today the Marlon Brando film, Burn, will be shown at 3:30 pm in the debates room and again at 7 pm at the International Students Centre. Its theme is colonialism in the West Indies.

On Feb. 4 a Brazilian bishop will speak at St. Michael's College at 2:30 pm on poverty. He will also speak the night before at a Star forum at St. Lawrence Centre.

Each week following there will be a seminar or event on a third world issue. The series is part of the Ten Days for World Development sponsored by the Student Christian Movement.

The Toronto University Geographical Society (TUGS) had its annual elections last week and ended up with acclamations for its six executive posts.

Elected were president Gail Bolubash, vice-president Barbara Feldberg, social covenor Mink Jereb, secretary treasurer Diana Janasik-Wronski and members at large Bill Denning and John Scott.

TUGS has not had many political issues to fight this year. The specialist program has been left almost intact with a loosening of the fourth year research paper requirement.

Students have 10 seats on the departmental council, five for undergraduates.

That noble topic Canadian Nationalism is being resurrected this weekend with the annual law and contemporary affairs conference organized by U of T law students.

Among the bigwigs given a chance to trot out their views include Walter Gordon, Jim Laxer, Abraham Rotstein, Pierre Juneau, Keith Davey, Julien Major and Dennis McDermott.

Among the subjects will be labor unions, broadcasting, foreign investment, land ownership, publishing and sports. Leading businessmen and academics will be featured.

There will be a banquet at the Four Seasons Sheraton Saturday evening before Juneau's keynote speech. A reception with Lieutenant Governor Pauline McGibbon will precede the dinner.

The price for all this is a mere $5 for students, mainly for the banquet. Tickets available at the door. All sessions will take place at the Medical Sciences Building.

The engineering faculty will lower its quota on foreign students on visas who will be accepted next year if a recommendation is accepted by its faculty council today.

Instead of 10 percent of the 700 students applying being eligible for admission, only five per cent will be, according to engineering dean Bob Jervis.

But in practice only six percent have been accepted in previous years because no more than half can come from any one country. Most applicants are from China.

Jervis says the change does not include landed immigrants who are applying. These students are treated exactly the same as Canadians. Admission is based on academic merit.

Jervis says the reduction is because many in the faculty believe that combined with the large number of landed immigrants, foreign visa students would make the non-Canadian proportion too high for the faculty.

He said these are not his personal views. The rationale behind keeping down foreign numbers is that the students often leave Canada, thus creating a shortage of engineers here.

There is no racism involved in the proposal, Jervis says.

Alderman Sparrow urged U of T officials to compromise with residents over athletic plans.

New group attacks Ontario Hydro

By ROSS MORRISON

A new citizens' group, Energy Probe, is being launched this month with the release of a free handbook critical of Ontario Hydro's long-term expansion program.

The report warns that recent rate increases and radioactive heavy water leaks are only the beginning of the enormous costs and problems which will arise from Hydro's planned $40 billion expansion over the next 12 years.

Criticizing Hydro's "archaic acceptance of traditional growth patterns," Donald Chant, Pollution Probe Foundation chairman, announced the founding of Energy Probe at a recent press conference.

In a prepared statement, he criticized the superficial approach to the energy crisis that has been adopted by Canadian governments. He stressed the need for serious energy conservation policies as well as research and development of alternative renewable forms of energy generation.

"More inflation, less agricultural and recreational land and serious risk for future generations" will intensify if Hydro keeps doubling its production every decade, the report predicts.

Hydro proposes to build 17 energy generating plants by 1993, 12 of them based on nuclear reactors.

The costs of this expansion project will be over $40 billion by 1986 alone, which Hydro plans to meet by raising its electricity rates nearly 100 percent in the next five years and by borrowing heavily from American and other foreign money markets.

Energy Probe warns this policy will only encourage further consumption and waste of energy, especially by the heavy industrial consumers who "are not paying anywhere near their share of the cost for producing electrical power."

In its report, Energy Probe urges that Hydro's nuclear power plant expansion plans should be subject to an active public debate. The risks from radioactive emissions, from the storage and disposal of long-lived radioactive wastes and the possibility of nuclear accidents must be carefully studied "by an informed general public," it claims.

Some high level radioactive wastes, particularly plutonium, are extremely hazardous for a quarter of a million years. Canada plans to build concrete waste storage buildings in some "central location" in Ontario. These buildings will require replacements every 100 years or so due to radiation damage and will need very careful monitoring for thousands of years.

"Radioactivity cannot be caught and stored again, nor can it be neutralized" cautions the report. "If for example, a storage tank leaks, the released radiation will continue to affect the environment and living things until it loses its radioactivity—sometimes a quarter of a million years later."

The report goes on to point out that even nuclear power plants are subject to human error. Another danger cited is thermal pollution—as nuclear reactors are only 30 percent efficient, the rest of the heat is released into nearby lakes in the form of hot water, which can have disastrous local ecological effects.

In its press release, Energy Probe proposes the stabilization of average per capita energy consumption in Canada. They estimate electrical needs could be cut by nearly one half through such practices as better insulation and the reduction of lighting in modern buildings, which consumes a full 25 percent of all electrical energy.

"Yes"

James Auld, answering a question from Varsity-waving Morton Schulman, who wanted to know if OSAP head Donald Bethune's charges that "everyone in the goddam field is off their bloody rocker" were true.

Robert Nixon: Man for tomorrow!

Bill Davis is on the way out. His government, wracked by scandal, is about to crumble into oblivion from senility and overuse.

The time has come for the people of Ontario to grasp a new vision. A time for workers, students, Metro residents and thousands of other honest people to link hands in solidarity and throw off the shackles of their oppressors. A time for us to overcome our alienation, to rise up and take control of our own lives.

Now is the time: the opportunity must be seized. Capitalism is on the decline. Prices soar, environmental decay chokes us, hunger grips an illiterate and underfed world — and our government falters on the brink of oblivion. Now the people must seize the chance to take power, or all will be lost.

Who can we turn to? Who will be the leader to see us through the apocalypse and into the millenium? Who has the strength of character, the force of determination, the humility, to lead us into the future? Who has tasted the blood of the people, has felt the salt of the earth?

One man, ladies and gentlemen, A liberal. Bob Nixon. Only Bob Nixon can do it. Only Bob Nixon can wrest the human spirit from its Orphean toil. Only Bob Nixon can smash the insurmountable barriers so cruelly erected by twentieth century tory capitalism.

Bob Nixon. A liberal. Only a liberal, only a man with the sheer breadth of philosophical understanding, only a man weaned on the intellectual rigor of the status quo, on the weltanschauung that is liberalism, can pull us out of our dark decay. Only liberalism provides the key to a full comprehension of the peridy of the present order. Only liberalism can build a new world. Only liberalism can mend the schisms between developed and underdeveloped, between rich and poor; can rid the world of imperialism and shift the yoke from the back of the oppressed to the oppressor. Only liberalism can have the courage to cry 'enough' to the mind-numbing ritual of work without reward, or toil for profit, of production for production's sake. Only liberalism can put power back where it belongs — in the hands of the people.

Bob Nixon. A spectacle-wearer. Only a man with spectacles can hope to see through the frame-up of tory capitalism. Only a spectacle-wearer can provide the fine lens through which to grind careful analysis into militant action. Only a spectacle-wearer can exhort us to lift our glasses to the people.

Bob Nixon. A man unafraid to let a hundred flowers bloom and contend — even within his own party. A man unafraid to take one, none or even several positions at once.

Bob Nixon. A man for tomorrow. Or perhaps next week. Or maybe he could come back next summer when we're not too busy.

To begin with, student aid in this province is not all that it is cracked up to be: James Auld, Minister of Colleges and Universities, admits it, the press know it, and we know it. Yet the government has refused to do anything about it.

Behind the glossy statements and rhetoric of the government is an increasingly apparent "don't give a damn" attitude towards education and more specifically, towards student aid. While issuing statements about universal accessibility (see the $1.6 million Commission on Post-Secondary Education) the Progressive Conservatives have let student aid in this province deteriorate to shockingly low levels. Demand for student aid is up some 30 percent, while the supply of money has been cut by the same percentage over the last three years. Further, the basic weekly living allowance has not been adjusted in over four years, despite galloping inflation which has reduced the buying power of the dollar by some 25 percent in this period.

The regulations of OSAP are themselves as equally depressing as the above figures. Many students requiring aid are not eligible under the program's provisions; those that are eligible are required to take on enormous debts at high interest rates — a factor which deters many low and medium-income students from going to school. The fact of the matter is that the Tory government, through its policies is not promoting universal accessibility, but quite the opposite — education is for those with the bucks to pay for it.

As students at U of T, we have organized ourselves into a student aid committee with the intent of reversing this trend, of throwing the doors of education open to those who want to go and who are qualified; and of seeing that the government provides student aid in amounts adequate to the needs of all students.

Among the things that we have asked for are:

- 1) an increase in the basic weekly living allowance,
- 2) provisions for continued inflation,
- 3) reductions in the loan ceiling (the amount that is required to be borrowed before the student is eligible for grants),
- 4) the basing of personal and parental contributions upon actual amounts as determined by income tax law and not upon arbitrary amounts figured automatically into the calculations, and
- 5) the provision of aid for part-time students.

We do not expect these changes to be implemented immediately. We do believe that they are fair changes worth fighting for, and that significant improvements in student aid can be won if students across the province organize themselves into an active lobby force and reach out to the public as well as to the government. With an upcoming provincial election, the Tories are already feeling the pinch of four

Suffering not Israel's fault

I am moved to reply to Hedi Mizouni's recent letter concerning Israel and the Palestinians.

I do not deny that the Palestinians have suffered because of the creation of Israel, but I do deny that Israel and Zionism bear the greatest part of the blame for this. The main reason why so many Palestinians ended up refugees and why Israel ended up in 1949 with somewhat more land than allotted it by the UN partition is because the neighbouring Arab states immediately set out on a war in which they attempted to destroy Israel.

Even after 1949 Israel's territory was less than 8,000 square miles, a significant portion of which had been purchased outright by Jews, compared to the original 45,000 of British Palestine in 1921, most of which was given in 1922 to the grandfather of the present Trans-Jordanian king, who in 1949 grabbed what is now the West Bank and the ancient part of Jerusalem.

Of the territory captured by Israel in 1967, Israel has annexed only Jerusalem, concerning which King Faisal of Saudi Arabia has said that he means to worship there before he dies, but will not go until it is in Arab hands.

But why should it be held by Arabs rather than Israel? After all, it is only the third most holy city of Islam. It is because of Arab leaders like Faisal, who seem to have a deep hatred of Israel — which, one fears, is shared by the average Arab — that peace has not been possible, and the Palestinians' problem unresolved.

An obvious solution to the Palestinian problem is the destruction of Israel, which is the aim of Yasser Arafat, whom Mizouni champions. Whether Israel or any country has a right to exist cannot be objectively determined. Everyone who first looks at history for guidance must ultimately turn to his sentiments and emotions for decision, and the most relevant emotion here is certainly compassion.

Judy LaMarsh, whom Ms. Mizouni criticizes, advocates that Canadians have compassion for Israel, without explicitly considering the situation of the Palestinians. The question is whether it is possible to show compassion to both the Israelis and the Palestinians at the same time.

I think that a solution in which the refugees from what is now Israel were re-settled in the large remainder of Palestine does give the Palestinians a fair measure of compassion, and it is not the Israelis who stand in the way of such a solution, but the Arabs who want to destroy Israel and need the Palestinian refugees as a motive.

Evaluation guide hardly a secret

The January 22 Varsity carried a report on Professor Harry Murray's Guide to Teaching Evaluation, commissioned by OCUFA and published in 1973. The report, by George Pitt, was carried beneath the headline: "Course evaluations praised secretly."

Mr. Pitt's précis of the study was reasonably accurate and fair, although I would dispute his initial description of it as "little-known." I write, however, in protest at the thoroughly unfounded assertion of your headline that the study has been concealed.

Upon publication of the study, in April 1973, a copy was sent to each and every member of the faculty association at the University of Toronto, and to their colleagues at Ontario's fourteen other universities. Some eleven thousand copies were distributed in this way. In addition, copies were provided to a number of student organizations, including the Ontario Federation of Students and the University of Toronto's Students' Administrative Council. Notices concerning the publication were also carried in a number of university newspapers.

In view of our efforts to publicize the study, your charge that its contents have been suppressed is manifestly absurd.

OCUFA has long been concerned about the weight given to teaching in the assessment of academic performance. Our interest in this matter predated the 1973 study, and has since been maintained by our programme of Teaching Awards.

Harlequin

By VICKY GRABB

Harlequin Enterprises Limited, the largest paperback publishing house in Canada, is 100 percent Canadian owned. In 1973 sales hit 5 million in Canada, 35 million in all of North America.

Harlequins are carriers of certain 'ruling class' ideas about the proper functions and interests of the lower and middle class persons who inhabit the books and seem to read them (given the confessed poverty of many of the writers to Harlequin's editorial page).

This alternate reality tends to distract the reader from the tangible (physical, material) reality in which she lives her day to day life into a more pleasant imaginary life in which dreams come true.

Such books may channel desires for change (improvement) in the physical world to vicarious satisfaction in the literary construct.

It may be possible also to arouse desires for comforts and possessions which the wealthy have.

It is probably to assuage this desire that patterns for elegant cushions are published, photo-tours of the world provided, and after all, spending for luxuries can't hurt the economy in case can it? Somebody always wins, and somebody else never knows.

My purpose here, is to observe and analyse the reality presented in Harlequin romances, not to establish social laws, but to illuminate what are taken for granted by the characters of the novels as unalterable laws of social reality.

The first character to be introduced is the well-behaved, middle class, plain-but-knows it and doesn't care girl who will be the main focus of the rest of the story. She is almost immediately juxtaposed to the man (early middle-aged, distinguished, "greying at the temples", rich, cultured, aloof, overbearing) who will eventually woo and win her despite all her resolutions to the contrary.

It is only in the last three or four pages of the book that the two major characters realize that they have both loved each other all along; for the last half of the book each has known his or her own love, but misunderstandings have prevented communication.

Their first kiss is generally the reason for the misapprehensions displayed by the protagonists, as they recoil in horror at the proximity to misbehaviour to which their "unleashed passions" have brought them.

In addition, there is always the shadow characters: the other woman in the hero's past; the alternate boyfriend in the girl's present. After rebelling at the alternate's possessiveness and proclaiming her independence, the girl manages to grow used to the almost rude dominance of the man who is destined for her, and succumbs without protest to traditional man-woman marital proposals.

The friction between girl and future husband (marriage is always the final outcome) is an essential part of the plot, since it prolongs the action for 189 or 190 pages. At times there is no rational reason derivable from the plot to explain conflict, but it occurs on the flimsiest provocation in any case.

The girl is always muddling manfully through in some respectable, but unremunerative occupation such as secretary, nurse, illustrator of children's books, or governess.

Her future true love is always independently wealthy, cultured, well-dressed, handsome in a rough, unusual sort of way. He lets the girl know that she is utterly alone in some way (usually she is orphaned) and he and she alone is interested in her — always because he needs a wife for show (there are a fair number of unconsummated or business marriages), to collect an inheritance or pique a former girl friend.

She realizing the truth (reality) of his argument, agrees. They always realize in the end that it 'really' is a love match.

The girl, plain, unexciting, wholesome, modestly dressed is always in what appears to be real competition with a beautiful, wealthy, cultured, woman who is accustomed to moving in the circles in which the man-of-dreams moves. The more attractive or secure the girl may seem, the more devastating the other woman is.

I use the words: girl, man, woman, alternate boyfriend, struggling manfully through, etc. advisedly. These people are type cast and only the names change: the ratio of relationship (prettier the girl, more wonderful other woman) is constant. The boyfriend is always a klutz, weak, improper, selfish, or just a bit too slow.

The story takes place in a foreign country, a remote county in England or in transit between the two. This removes any necessary observance of convention exterior to the story from the plot.

This day to day activities like packing a toothbrush for the trip, having clothing laundered, the price of onions in market, or any other mundane things that an ordinary person might be concerned with.

In part, this is accounted for by the limitless and omnipotent money which the major male possesses. However, some of the omissions are as important in themselves, as what is actually included or implied by the novels.

Characters and Class

Continuing the topic of omissions, we might address ourselves to the social strata which appear in Harlequin novels.

With the exception of ever scarcer and always valued long-standing, trust-worthy family servants, the characters are inevitably middle or upper class: professionals such as doctors, solicitors, publishers or landowners; secretaries, nurses, artists, designers or governesses.

Never does a working class person appear in any capacity, patient to the doctor or nurse, parent, living or dead, of one of the characters, much less in the role of one of the major characters.

There are anonymous waiters, never-mentioned people who run the ships on which the protagonists travel and local farmers in the English county-set novels — all omitted from the flow of the story either as assumed or superfluous.

The essential personnel to the continued functioning of the reality of these books are the middle and upper class fallers-in-love. The tangible realities of life are ignored, assumed to be forthcoming, irrelevant to the 'really' important aspects of interpersonal relationships.

As Mrs. Herbert Schaefer, Holliswoods, N.Y. (in a letter to the editor of Harlequin magazine) says, "... it is such a pleasure to pick up an easy-to-read book that makes one forget the world we live in!"

By failing to deal with a large portion of society (not to mention underprivileged societies — stories set in Africa deal with the white community) Harlequin publications establish an alternate reality in which different limitations, standards, problems and expectations exist.

We deal with a three-class world (upper, middle, servant) in which there is no government bureaucracy to impede one's travel, marital plans, application for a driver's licence; no realm of world affairs to date the book and clutter the plot with larger questions; no distressingly poor or uncouth people to remind one of other aspects of the 'reality' we know.

The expectations which the characters in these books have are rather limited.

"Books about nice people with decent morals"

There are two major ambitions which most or all of the characters share in one way or another: being successful in a career and being successful in 'matters of the heart'.

Sometimes a character (usually the hero) has to be made aware of his need for these goals: he has money, and usually regards himself as impervious to female wiles. The girl renouncing her own career goals, brings him to a realization of the paramount goal in life: love and happiness (assumed to be synonymous).

There are "good" goals and "bad" goals, however. It is 'good' to want to be productive and industrious, but it is 'bad' to want material rewards. In one or two books (Bride of Lucifer, Violet Winspear, and Winter Loving, Janice Gray) there appears an 'unwed mother'.

In the latter case, the girl was unfairly taken advantage of, so after eight years of ill-repute and the loss of the child through death, she is rehabilitated and married to a doctor who 'knows her story' and 'forgives' her ("mighty white" of him, I must say).

In the former case, the girl was interested in bright lights, expensive clothes, and had the 'mistaken' impression that sexual favours could precede lawful matrimony. She receives as her reward a trunkful of clothes she can't wear in the rural area to which she is retired, a child, no husband, and at best irksome pity.

The girls who are the major characters always have modest goals, have a hard time bringing themselves to accept expensive presents, and are a refreshing change to the rich men who woo them and who have been used to the loose and greedy women of the type who end up in disgrace.

The goals which these 'good' girls have centre around being efficient secretaries, pleasant nurses, having small but cosy (because of their efforts and special touch) country houses, and eventually loving wives and mothers.

Their nesting instincts only appear when they are confronted with Mr. Right.

Doubts about Mr. Right are always contrived, consciously developed, never 'heartfelt'. At this point, expectations are gradually directed away from career to personal goals.

The major male character has few unobtainable goals, because he has money and can have whatever he wants. Only 'true love' is beyond his buying power.

His delicate sensibilities have been offended by insincere, greedy women, however, and it requires the gentleness and altruism of the girl he stumbles across to reawaken his dormant emotional needs.

The hero, failing up to now to find the right girl, is withdrawn, curt of speech, polite but aloof, suspicious. He deals with his success in finally finding the right sort of girl by withdrawing even further in fear of being hurt again, of finding out that she doesn't care for him, or another such reason.

This behaviour leads the girl to the conclusion that he doesn't care for her; she in pride then behaves as though she were not interested in him in any case, furthering the vicious circle of confusion.

She also conjures up images of the antithesis of herself as the reason for her failure in winning the man she finally knows she wants.

In both cases, the disappointed one decides that he or she personally is unsuitable, inadequate or out of luck, having come along too late in the other's life (someone already having been successful in winning the desired other).

They react to final success (last three pages of the book) with incoherent attempts to tell each other when, where and how they first knew, and why they never suspected their love would be returned.

The secondary characters are more base and tend to display what one might call 'sour grapes' reactions to failure.

Both male and female losers use material arguments to persuade their object of possession to come back to them: you only want his money, I can give you, as much as he can ('I'll be making good money some day'); I am your social equal — she's gauche, she's only after your money anyway.

In all cases, economic reasons for failure are dismissed, and the blame if any is placed on personal shortcomings, incompatibility, lack of trust, the girl's negative reaction to alternate boyfriend's lack of proper decorum, or her greater respect and affection for the 'superior' or 'best' man.

In terms of position, there is an interesting and consistent distinction between the activities (economic specifically) in which men and women engage, as well as differences by social status.

Men regardless of social status tend to have more or less independent occupations: writer, impressario, landowner, doctor, company director — usually landowner for major male character; lawyer, entrepreneur (legal or con artist), doctor, or clothing designer for the alternate boyfriend.

The economic difference is apparent within male activity, but the gap between male and female activity is even wider.

Women have occupations which are dependent upon someone else (male): secretary, nurse, illustrator of children's books, nursery governess, language teacher; the wealthy women is simply a social ornament, requiring, of course, an escort.

The men in a given social category are

*Dear Harlequin,

books very much. I've been colle-had them in my special collector-library room, the "Harlequin Room"* presented as having more money than their female social equals, and as having greater personal mobility and more prospects for rising under their own steam.

Women, of course, rise or fall according to the decision of the relevant male. One is frequently reminded of what it is proper for women to do.

To drive up to the north-of-England on one's own to inspect a home one has inherited is, while not improper, unusual for a woman. One of the heroines (in Winter of Change) is not permitted to buy her own horse. When she does so in face of instructions to the contrary, she is duped, as prophesied.

Although in every case, independence is asserted by the girl in question, and a 'fierce' struggle put up to prove the point, it is always the case that valiant efforts are unsuccessful.

Someone must sell the badly chosen horse, oversee financial matters and most of all meet the emotional needs of the girl.

These emotional needs are almost always 'father fixations'. She doesn't want an equal; she wants a protector (despite her self-reliance, or perhaps came out that a Cockney olet Winspear, on becoming Harlequin writer

she is tired of being self-reliant; perhaps she confuses self-reliance with being alone).

She rejects the man her own age in preference for an older man who makes no pretence to regard her as competent. Her chronological equal was not nearly firm enough.

A corollary of this view of women and of sex roles in general, is the moral attitudes which are presented in these books.

One kiss is sufficient to arouse guilt feelings and fear as to how far the relationship will go. Both parties recoil in mutual understanding of the impossibility of letting things get out of hand.

In some cases, this is sufficient for a proposal of marriage in order to protect the girl's honour (Roman Summer). As stated before, prudish reactions to accidental kisses often lead to lack of communication which permits the book to continue to its allotted length.

There is always uncertainty as to the ability of the parties concerned to control their violent passions.

In spite of this, or perhaps because of this, we never see any 'real' sexual activity, only terrified reaction, vicarious wishful thinking as the girl shaws out and decides she liked it (but of course, HE knows that he mustn't compromise her), and the final fading-into-the-sunset kiss of the last page.

The world of Harlequin is one in which things do work out well, honesty always brings relief, virtue is rewarded and cooperation appears not to result in exploitation.

In fact, it seems that the final relationships can only appear stable because coverage of them ends with the beginning and because money is able to buy a lot of things which ease difficulties: if only in that transcontinental travel to patch up quarrels is quite possible.

Money can't buy happiness but it makes misery a little more comfortable.

This is explicitly denied in at least one book when it is remarked: "Even the rich have their problems, I suppose."

The middle class and the faithful servants always have a very protective attitude towards those unfortunate rich who aren't blessed with 'real' happiness — love.

Imperial Glory

Condescension extends downward as well, however. There is some measure of imperial glory and the white man's burden evident in these stories.

Stories set in Africa and New Zealand deal exclusively with the white communities there. People take drives out to see the natural hinterland where there is always a white-owned farm or home.

In the case of Destiny is a Flower (set in Africa), there are a few piccaninnies who do dirty work around the house and occasionally give the child (for whom the heroine is governess) a bath, BUT on no occasion for any reason whatever is the child to be left alone with them.

They (the Africans) are all lazy, careless and not to be really trusted.

Ethnic stereotyping extends to any story setting and we find 'typical' Italians: darkly good-looking, hot blooded, aggressive (they like hand-holding and attempt kisses more often than one might like).

We have one Spaniard who is not 'typical' and therefore worthy of remark by the other characters. It is noted, as a possible explanation, that he is half English.

He regains his typicality when he finds the love of a good woman, his former secretary who agreed to marry him so that he could collect his inheritance and she could let her fiance marry her sister guilt-free.

There are typically horsey people, typically ordinary people (probably the hardest one to define), typical Russian ex-ballerinas, typical heart-broken women living all their lives on memories; in fact, almost everyone in these books is typically something.

We might conclude this section by returning to the beginning, social status.

The various levels of society are easily identifiable by their 'typical' attributes. The middle class girl uses language which is not as formal as that used by the upper class man whom she will marry.

His manners will be impeccable, hers and those of her class will be only good. She will be well-behaved from a good family; he will be from old-stock and equipped with savoir faire — able to deal with waiters, clerks, ticket agents, servants in a way which will fill her with awe.

He will have a natural presence, while she will have on her side good nature and a pleasant manner.

Upper class somen are imperious and somewhat cold.

Secondary male characters are bumbling by comparison with upper class men and never manage to do the right thing at the right time. They may mean well; but they just don't have breeding and 'inborn' talent. The extra financial edge which the upper class man has is ignored.

Reader Response

The Harlequin Magazine, a collection of a variety of material provides an interesting gloss on Harlequin publications in general.

It is extremely emphatic about the nature of goals and attitudes to life, more so than the novels themselves.

In addition there is some indication of the response the editors would like to

The realists would have us believe that the skies are grey, and that men marry just to have their socks darned, and their kippers cooked. They would have us write grey and dreary books...but who would want to read them? Not you...not I.
-Violet Winspear

elicit: whether or not the letters to the 'Harlequin' are contrived or actually sent in by readers, the selection is reflective of the editorial policy.

Interspersed with these letters are lists of titles of books, which one might want to buy.

The letters themselves are from dedicated readers apparently one of whom has read 1,275 Harlequins and keeps a record by title, book number, author of each.

Most of the letter writers live in apartments so small they can't keep all the Harlequins they manage to buy, borrow or beg.

One letter is particularly in keeping with the Harlequin view of women's proper place and range of activities.

One woman, self-styled college graduate, executive secretary (the pinnacle for women in Harlequin 'reality') enjoys the books precisely because they are light and non-demanding.

In addition to a full time job, she makes dinner, looks after children and does household chores. No mention of a helpful husband. She is more liberated than the usual Harlequin woman in that she still works after taking traditional womanly roles.

One letter is especially written by an American in Toronto (shades of Hemingway)... She lauds the clean streets, mosaic of cultures, tall buildings (almost like New York), our own stock exchange and such simple pleasures as Baskin Robbins ice cream and riding on the ferry to the island.

More focus on virtue: cleanliness, simplicity; again no mention of Regent Park, the poverty among the quaint Portuguese, Chinese or other immigrant communities.

We cannot know reader response to Harlequin attitudes (except insofar as they seem to be selling well, given points made above regarding advertising and quality).

But I venture to suggest that the editors are deliberately attempting to disseminate certain ideas, and aim at low-level expectations: 'elegant' gingham or cotton cushions, non-material happiness, readers who have trouble affording the books but who read them rather like addicts, probably for vicarious pleasure — which the letters suggest, and the offer of an atlas to follow the adventures and romances seems to confirm.

These novels and especially the magazine is a vehicle of socialization with specific class biases, ethnic prejudices, and traditional sexual attitudes (in terms of roles and also morality).

The prejudices are not very blatant, nor are they violently negative: they are typically white liberal remnants of Victorian imperialism and morality.

Carleton U publishes nifty guide to career in journalism

As a regular, and, need we say, avid reader of The Varsity, you have probably been nursing a secret craving to become a journalist for quite some time now.

Well, aside from offering you the obvious invitation to come and 'show your stuff' here at the newsroom, we offer you an article called A Career in Journalism, published by no less a prestigious institution than the Carleton University School of Journalism.

We modestly think it makes us look like John Milton by comparison.

Journalists play a prominent role in modern life. By providing information they contribute significantly to the functioning of society, and a nation's economic and industrial system. They bring to the citizen the facts and background knowledge that are needed if he is to play an intelligent part in the democratic process. Journalists inform the reader, listener or viewer about his environment, whether it be his local environment or his more distant world environment. They also provide pleasure and entertainment.

The journalists who make such services possible may work in the newspaper, wire service, magazine, public relations, radio, film, television, community broadcasting (cable television), book publishing or freelance writing fields.

Journalism graduates are employed as staff writers, editors, or commentators. Some become freelance or syndicated writers, while others fill positions with public relations firms or advertising agencies. The federal and provincial governments employ a large number of graduates who keep the public informed on government activities.

In Canada, journalism is a widespread occupation employing many persons. There are more than 100 daily newspapers ranging in size from the Sioux Lookout Daily Bulletin with a circulation of about 800 to the Toronto Daily Star with more than 500,000 subscribers. Weekly newspapers number more than 1,200. News service bureaux or sub-bureaux are to be found in Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Windsor, Montreal, Quebec City, Halifax, Saint John, N.B., St. John's, London, England, New York and

consumer magazines, 60 farm magazines, about 500 business magazines and several cultural, religious or academic magazines. The Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media reported that in 1968 there were 221 independent radio and 29 television stations in addition to the public network (CBC). At conservative estimate it seems safe to assume that such units of the media offer journalism jobs to 12,000 persons, exclusive of positions involving business, advertising, promotion or mechanical department work. It is difficult to guess how many journalists are in public relations although the public relations medium is large and growing larger. Film production in Canada is also on the increase although the number of jobs available is still not large. However, the field of journalism is not a crowded one. It offers employment in all parts of Canada, although best opportunities in the television and magazine fields seem to lie in centers like Montreal and Toronto. Ottawa seems to be the most important city in Canada to the political reporter. A person properly prepared should have little difficulty in finding a job in journalism although he may not immediately get exactly the job he wants in the city in which he prefers to work.

What does a journalist do?
A journalist is essentially a skilled researcher who can go quickly from one topic after another often through an interview (by talking to others about it) and absorb himself in it to the point he can make it understandable to others. In the broad sense of the world he is a teacher who uses the mass media of communication, newspapers, radio, television, films, to get his ideas across to a larger audience than any normal classroom teacher can possibly reach. He is also in many ways the omniscient man, for in making the judgments about what is news and what is important, he must constantly choose from a myriad of sources in any given day and he must be able to evaluate the relative importance of one as against another.

There are photo journalists, whose reports take the form of pictures; and broadcasting journalists, who read the news, comment on it, and interview news and opinion sources before camera or microphone.

Usually, a reporter will either be assigned a beat (education, city hall, courts, legislature, etc.) or on general assignment. In the later (sic) case, the reporter may be assigned to attend a press conference, cover a convention or round up a story on the day's weather.

What aptitudes are needed to study journalism?

This is always a difficult question to answer; but it seems that probably those who will be successful in journalism must have an inquisitive mind, must like moving from one topic to another — finding that all kinds of things hold their interest at least for a short time. Many of them are avid readers and have a broad and varying interests (sic). On the whole they probably enjoy meeting people and listening to people of different backgrounds even though they may have to overcome a basic shyness in order to do this.

One of the needs of the journalist is a wide and, where possible, a deep background knowledge. This qualification should be associated with a passion for accuracy, a constant desire to report truths in a truthful way. He also requires a certain amount of 'gall', the nerve to be persistent in pursuit of a story. He should be persistent, not because he is rude or insensitive, but because he is aware that, as proxy for the public, he has a duty to find out certain things that the public has a right to know. He should like to write and should have a flair for words. Contrary to general belief, however, facility in writing is probably neither the main requisite of the journalist nor the best indicator of aptitude in the field, because, as the late Joseph Atkinson has said, "Reporting is not writing; it is seeing." Just the same, it is unlikely that a journalist who hopes to work with the printed word will be successful if he dislikes writing.

In addition, reasonably good health helps the journalist to withstand the pressures and strains which occasionally occur in some kinds of work he may do and which regularly occur in others.

What are the drawbacks to a career in journalism?

Journalists are not in the very highest income brackets, on the average. The excitement and the opportunities for other kinds of rewards compensate for somewhat lower salaries. But the situation is improving. Starting salaries for reporters probably range from about $80 on the small weeklies to slightly more than $120 a week on the largest metropolitan dailies. In 1971, the minimum wage for the American Newspaper Guild reporters on a large metropolitan newspaper was approximately $185 for journalists with five years experience.

Salaries in broadcasting are about equivalent to those for newspapers although unionized employees in a TV network would be slightly better paid than his newspaper counterparts.

Working conditions, particularly on newspapers, have never been ideal. Especially in earlier times, reporters worked long hours, endured fatigue and hardship, and followed irregular work patterns. The American Newspaper Guild has helped to raise standards as has Le Syndicat des Journalistes and L'Union Canadienne des Journalistes de Langue Francaise. These facts do not mean, however, that reporting has been freed of all physical risk: witness the dangers faced by war correspondents in Vietnam, for example. Nor have long hours and overtime work been completely eliminated. Happily, however, on Guild papers as a contractual right and on many other newspapers as a matter of simple justice, journalists today are given time off and given overtime pay to compensate them for their extra labor.

One of the most serious drawbacks of certain kinds of journalism is that they produce deadline pressure. Many newspaper editors, reporters and deskmen, and many radio and television newsmen face daily tensions that do not improve their health or their nerves. Persons who wish to work in such tension-filled areas of journalism should make sure they have the kind of temperament that fits them to face the pressures they are likely to encounter.

Although journalism probably does not offer as much physical excitement as it did in a simpler, more glamorous era, it can be an interest-filled occupation. In some aspects, it deals with what might be grandiosely called "living history". For the reporters of that history there is the fascination of being "in the know" when significant events are occurring. In most cases journalism is not a clock-watcher's occupation. Although it has its share of routine tasks, it can bring to many of its practitioners a variety of being found in few other fields of employment.

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal government Secretariat for International Women's Year has suspended all further planning and Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan told a farm audience he is waiting for "petticoat power" to come to Canada, in week four of International Women's Year.

The planning suspension by the secretariat follows extensive criticism of the main thrust of the intended programme of four regional and one national conference, at a cost of $250,000 each.

The conferences came under fire from spokesmen of both opposition parties and from women's organizations across the country. "We don't need another set of conferences to tell us what is wrong and what needs changing," said Conservative spokesman Gordon Fairweather.

He suggested the money would be better spent on the establishment of a Human Rights Commission, funds for day care assistance and development or allowing women equal rights under the Canada

Pension Plan.

The New Democratic Party recently passed a resolution at a Montreal conference deploring the allocation of funds for IWY as "arbitrary" and called for a turnover of some of the funds to local or provincial women's organizations for ongoing projects.

As a result of the criticism, the IWY Secretariat has decided to suspend further planning while waiting for Health and Welfare Minister Marc Lalonde to resolve the matter.

Lalonde was expected to announce "major changes" in the IWY programme at a Jan. 27 "cocktail party".

AN OPEN LETTER TO JEWISH STUDENTS

Israel lives!? Israel is struggling in both an external and internal sense with life. In the external sense, Israel is struggling for the right to live as a Jewish State. In the internal sense, Israel is struggling to give all her people the best possible life. She cannot do both alone. While the external situation may be out of her hands and our hands, the internal situation is not.

Student Mobilization for Israel was formed last November for exactly the purpose of giving what we could to Israel. Those working on the newsletter and political education strive to raise moral support and educate Jews and non-Jews alike about Israel. Those working with volunteers develop programs to encourage and prepare Jewish students our age who choose to strengthen Israel by going over in case of an emergency.

The fourth group, the SMI campaign, is what I

Many of you received an information and donation kit in the mail last week. If you got one, please return it with your donation. If you did not get one, please pick one up at Hillel House, 186 St. George St.

AM YISRAEL CHAI

am writing about in particular today. Our goal is to collect $18.00, CHAI, LIFE, from every Jewish student in Toronto; to exceed in collecting over $100,000.00.

EVERY DOLLAR WE GIVE SAYS, "I care." It is one way of showing and one way of fighting. EVERY DOLLAR WE GIVE SAYS "The Jewish people, our values, our history, our culture, our religion and now, our country, matter."

EVERY DOLLAR WE GIVE makes possible more education, medical services, housing, the building of development towns, cultural and social institutions, comfort to the old, poor, disabled and to the immigrant.

We are told we expect too much from the student community. We think not. We must accept the responsibility of following through on our demands for the right of Israel and the Jewish people to live!

Please GIVE and KEEP THE PROMISE

Thank you without the tail of the Y moving independently. While we could expose you to pages and pages of golf fundamentals, it is quite likely that any aspiring golfer, blessed with at least average motor skills, could make a reasonably effective swing at the ball within a few minutes with the proper application of the above four points.

Now you don't want to go out and bet your grandmother's portrait that you will hit a perfect golf shot the first time you try a shot. It does take time and muscle memory. Yet if you can concentrate on these listed thoughts for the first few practice sessions, you are on the road to an effective golf swing.

Interfac All-Star game on tap

By DAVE STUART
 For the first time in history Interfac hockey is staging an all-star hockey game to be played at Varsity Arena Friday Feb. 7 at 8:15 pm.

The game is expected to be an annual affair, with division IA pitting its finest against the cream of the crop from division IB. A full house should be forthcoming for this classic event and rumour has it that Miss Kay Boyd will be on hand to drop the puck in the official face-off ceremonies as well as present a player from each team with a most valuable player award.

Blues teammates Bill Fifield and Kent Ruhnke will be coaching the all-star contingents and will pick the players for their respective rosters from a pool of names submitted by all the teams in each division.

The game itself will consist of three 15 minute periods.

Free skating is scheduled for the time after the end of the game.

Depleted Blues face Waterloo

By DAVE STUART

The hockey Blues are taking that maple leaf on their jerseys too seriously when they try to emulate all the injuries that have befallen Toronto's NHL entry.

The Varsity squad is slowly but surely being decimated by mishap and bad luck.

The trouble started with a western road trip which resulted in a broken nose for center Ron Harris. He came back to Varsity for a league game only to take another shot in the honker forcing him to wear a plastic face mask. Now he is a doubtful starter for the game tomorrow night.

Another doubtful starter is the veteran Ivan McFarlane, who has had back problems through most of the season. He re-injured his back in the Loyola game last Friday night and hasn't played since. McFarlane is a team leader and is sorely missed.

Continuing the tale of woe, Bill Fifield will not play against Waterloo as he is also on the injured list. It is hoped that Fifield will be back for the Guelph game Friday night.

Al Milnes can be counted amongst the walking wounded as well. Milnes was the object of a high stick in the Cornell game and received several stitches to the face near his eye. To add insult to injury, Milnes also severely bruised a hip in the same fateful Loyola game last weekend. He only saw limited action in the 4-0 victory over Ottawa.

Last but far from least is Brent Swanick who was tripped during the Cornell game and suffered knee damage. He is expected to be out of the lineup for at least five weeks.

Fortunately for the Blues, Bob Adoranti and Frank Davis were waiting in the wings to fill in. And they filled in admirably. Davis turned out to be a goal scorer, something the Blues have needed this year. Davis turned in a hat trick the first night he filled in for Ivan McFarlane.

Facing the Waterloo Warriors, the defending national champions, with five veterans out of the lineup is not the sort of thing coach Tom Watt is apt to be too pleased about.

During the Ottawa game Watt reunited the line of Pagnutti, Ruhnke, and Davies with favourable results. The line scored three of the four goals — two by Ruhnke and one by Pagnutti. Doug Herridge (not Doug Harris) scored the other goal.

Tonight's game could be one of the hardest for the Blues all year, despite the fact it is only an exhibition game. The Blues will be betting a lot of pride on the outcome since Waterloo won the earlier contest 4-3. The loss was the first in league play for the Blues since the 6-4 upset by Western in the semi-finals last year.

Blues will have had four days rest by game time tonight and will not have to labour under the exhaustion they faced when they played Waterloo earlier (right after the Sir George Williams tournament).

Waterloo, on the other hand, have been susceptible to upset particularly by the Laurier Golden Hawks who have downed the Warriors twice; once by the narrow score of 4-3 and once by the more convincing margin of 6-1.

Tonight's game could be a preview of the OUA final.

Cross country ski team takes third at Queen's

By VELI NIINIMAA

Last Saturday, the Varsity cross-country ski team competed in an intercollegiate meet hosted by Queen's University.

For a change, enough snow was provided by mother nature (it's not nice to fool the ski team) to keep the track in decent shape. However, rain started just before the races, changing to freezing rain later on, and giving Varsity its first soaking for the day.

The second soaking was more technical — bringing racers to the starting line by bus only half an hour before the race was to begin. Even a non-skier knows that at near freezing conditions, proper waxing is impossible.

To add insult to injury, Sylvi Spleiss was forced to ski the five km. loop twice because of a lack of proper marshalling on the course.

When the nightmare was over, Queen's had won the meet with RMC narrowly edging Varsity for second place. Trent came in a distant fourth.

This coming weekend Varsity is hosting a meet in preparation for the upcoming OUA championships.

Varsity golf tip number four - waggle and swing

By BILL WHITCOMBE

The Waggle

Just prior to getting into the golf swing proper, you had best be exposed to the term "waggle". The waggle is a slight breaking of the wrists at address, moving the club slightly with a "wristy" motion back and forth in the swing path just before initiating the backswing. Its primary purpose is to minimize tension in the arms and to help set up a rhythmical motion for the takeaway of the club. Club waggles vary in style but they generally serve the same purpose for all golfers.

A simplified golf swing

And now to the crux of things! The golf swing must be thought of as one continuous movement, as opposed to a string of isolated fundamentals and positions that, when put all together, will produce an effective swing. Too many students clutter their minds with a host of little tips and thoughts that they have heard or read so that the swing falls into a situation of "paralysis by analysis".

History and a myriad of unsuccessful golfers have proven that a golfer cannot successfully run through a check-list each time he approaches the ball while on a course. The player must think of the golf swing as a single unit, must practice the swing and shotmaking religiously over a period of time, and then play from memory when on the course. "Muscle Memory" learned through work at home and on the practice tee will carry you through those anxious moments on the golf course when everything you have learned about the game seems to have departed and left your head in a vacuum.

We must start somewhere, obviously, and there must be some key thoughts for you to have in mind while learning the swing. Four key thoughts, when properly applied, will produce a simple but effective move through the ball:

1. the backswing is a turning motion,
2. the head must remain steady,
3. lead the swing with the left side,
4. swing the "Y" through the ball.

1. The backswing is a turning motion: The body simply turns around its own axis and the backswing is little more than a turning of the body to the right away from the ball and extending the hands and club up high over the right shoulder.

2. The head must remain steady: This is the single most important fundamental for a repeating golf swing. The head is just like the hub of a wheel — it remains steady while the spokes and the rim of the wheel turn, just as it must remain steady while the body and the arms swing around the hub. The head must remain behind the ball until well after impact. An often used

3. Lead the swing with the side: After arriving at the top of the backswing, the left arm and the left side lead the swing and pull the right side and the club through the ball. Dominant left-side control is essential.

4. Swing the "Y" through the ball: You must think of swinging the entire arm assembly through the ball, not just the hands. There can be no conscious snapping of the wrists or hitting actively with the hands at the moment of impact. The hands and arms must precede the clubhead through the hitting area in every successful golf shot.

In this important area, we like to think of swinging the Y through the ball. That is, the letter Y formed by the forearms and the club shaft, move through the ball as one unit

THE Varsity TORONTO

Vol. 95, No. 48
Fri. Jan. 31, 1975

All Varsity staffers are urged to come to today's 1 pm parlarama to discuss the burning question of how we live out our last days.
How do we handle our final 15 rags? What earth-shattering exposes remain to see the light of day? Do the people finally have a right to know?
Other seamy topics for discussion are expected to be the upcoming editorial race, the athletics building, the ORCUP conference, future lunchtime guests and the annual staff banquet. What more could a Metro resident want?

Students won't have to pay levy

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

There's good news for all of you athletes and fitness buffs. You will not have to pay that $10 levy for the athletic complex which the administration had earlier suggested.

You will, instead, help pay, through increased fees, for the operating costs once the building is completed.

The senior administration (the president, vice-presidents and vice-provosts) decided last Wednesday it would not be, as vice-president Jill

Conway put it, "prudent" to ask students to contribute to capital costs when it is clear the student fees will have to be increased to help meet maintenance costs of the proposed athletics complex.

The decision was made after consideration of a report estimating the costs for maintaining the proposed complex on Harbord Street.

Jack Dimond, special assistant to Conway, says it will cost at least half a million dollars to service the building.

The estimate includes costs for heating, pool maintenance and staff increases.

"There is no guarantee the needed funds would come from general university funds," Dimond said. "It is likely fees would have to be increased for operating reasons."

The big question now is, if the university is not going to ask students to contribute to the capital costs of the building, where is it going to get the needed $4 million?

SAC communications commissioner Michael Sabia maintained the university has "a tremendous source of wealth that it can tap," but admitted the location of this pot of gold is "something of a state secret."

Conway explained the university is in the process of planning a major capital fund raising campaign for the university's sesquicentennial.

It is possible some of these funds could be used for the athletic complex, although Dimond emphasized no decision has yet been made about using those funds.

The possibility of postponing parts of the building or some of the equipment is being considered to help trim the initial cost of the building.

K. A. Wipper, chairman of the tri-level athletic staff group, says the athletic staff is "very happy to cooperate in a waiting process," but is "most reluctant to talk about any alternatives" which would involve reduction of the objectives passed a year ago by Governing Council.

The objectives include "the discipline of physical education; competition, recreation and athletic instruction; and physical fitness and excellence in athletic performance."

The proposed complex includes an olympic-sized swimming pool covered by a field house.

Plans for the 85-foot building have been delayed because it violated the city's 45-foot holding bylaw, but a report recommending the building be exempted was presented to City Council two weeks ago.

This exemption would make it more difficult for the neighboring ratepayers' associations which have been opposed to the building.

Dimond says SAC has "taken the initiative to make peace between the neighborhoods and the university."

SAC will meet with both the university and ratepayers at Hart House this Sunday evening.

SAC commissioner Sabia lauded the university for its decision not to ask for a referendum on a student levy.

"The university is coming to terms with its responsibilities," Sabia said.

Both Evans and Conway stress their commitment that the building be completed.

U of T may wriggle out of height controls

By EDWARD LARY

Suppose U of T had built Ford Book in your neighborhood, then returned a couple of years later with plans for a relatively "small" athletic complex (Little Fort Jock?) down the street?

How would you feel if the city's planning board recommended Little Fort Jock be given the go-ahead before you had the chance to adequately express your concerns about the proposed development?

A Toronto planning board report currently before the city's building and development committee recommends that the entire downtown "U of T" area except the Huron-Sussex area be exempted from the city's modified core area holding by-law.

A second report includes a recommended exemption for the university's proposed athletic complex at Spadina Avenue between Classic and Howland Avenues.

Alan McAllister, president of the Huron-Sussex Residents' Organization, has strong feelings about the planning board's recommendations.

"When it comes to development the U of T arrogantly assumes that it should be a self-governing enclave within the city," McAllister said. "Now it seems that the planning board has given in to this assumption."

"I would suggest that the U of T is a very powerful entity and that the planning board (in making its recommendations) probably was aware of that fact," McAllister said.

The Huron-Sussex residents' organization and other area community groups are concerned about the impact the athletic complex will have on their community.

They point to potential parking problems, the question of community access and the scale and general appearance of the building. (The university's proposed structure would be 85 feet above grade occupying 240,000 square feet.)

McAllister charges that the planning board's recommendations amount to a "blanket exemption" for U of T from development controls.

Planning board spokesman Mark Fram denies that the board has "given in" to U of T or that the recommendations constitute a blanket exemption.

He says even if the board's recommendations are approved by the building and development committee and then by City Council, U of T would still have to contend with the city's development review powers under section 25(a) of the planning act.

Section 35(a) deals with such items as provision for adequate flood lighting, pedestrian walkways, access ramps and fencing for any proposed building.

Theoretically, the city could delay granting a building permit indefinitely, until it was "satisfied" all these conditions were met.

But Ward 6 Alderman Alan Sparrow describes the provisions of Section 35(a) as "incredibly weak and inconsequential." The legislation specifically excludes regulation of building height or density.

Even the planning board's report to the building and development committee notes that the "precise extent of development review powers are yet to be tested in practice."

The Huron-Sussex residents are disappointed with and suspicious of the planning board's recommendations.

And they feel that while U of T administrators have done a good "public relations" job of informing the community about their plans for the athletic complex, U of T has been unwilling to do anything concrete about the community's concern.

It's a criticism Jack Dimond, special assistant to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway and the man in charge of the proposed complex, rejects.

Dimond says the university has already made numerous concessions to area community groups and assured the complex's facilities will be open to the surrounding community on a regular basis.

The concessions include:

- dropping plans for a proposed Olympic ice rink suggested in the 1973 Task Force Report on Athletics;

- "stacking" the fieldhouse and pool onto a single sight (the Task Force Report called for separate site construction);

- improvements in the building's design and the addition of a learn-to-swim pool.

"The athletic building is a symbol of what people think the university will do to their community," says Dimond.

"I admit the university has had a less than admirable relationship with the surrounding communities in the past, but I refuse to accept the assertion that the university hasn't consulted community groups on this issue."

McAllister tells a different story.

"I'm not sure I know what the university means by community consultation any more. If they mean they're willing to inform people of what they're going to do then, yes, I'd say we've been consulted."

"But if they mean they're willing to sit down and talk seriously about major structural modifications (to the complex) then we haven't been consulted."

Because students may get more gov't loans and won't be spending any of it on an athletic levy, they might just attend more of SAC's gourmet luncheons.

Ceiling on loans may be raised

OTTAWA (CUP) — Documents from a federal-provincial task force on student aid indicate that an inter-provincial agreement has been reached on raising the loan maximum under the Canada Student Loan Plan (CSLP).

Under the present federal regulations the maximum student loan for an academic year is $1,400. The proposed change in loan ceilings would provide for a maximum $1,900 loan per year, allowing the provinces to reduce the grant component of student aid programs.

Provinces now set their own loan ceilings ranging from $800 to the maximum $1,400. If the agreement becomes law provinces will be able to raise loan ceilings to $1,900.

The change in the loans ceiling was submitted to the provinces last October at a plenary meeting of the Canada Student Loan Committee, and has now been referred to Finance Minister John Turner for consideration.

Under the Canada Student Loans Act, the finance minister is responsible for the plan.

The CSLP committee meets on an annual basis and consists of representatives from the federal and provincial governments. The plenary provides a forum for a consensus to emerge between the provinces and Ottawa on the operation of the CSLP, according to a federal official.

There is no student representation on the committee, its meetings are held in closed session and no record of discussions or decisions is released to the public.

But a report of what occurred at this year's meeting on Oct. 11-12, 1974, was contained in the November minutes of the federal-provincial task force on student aid.

According to those minutes: "Amongst the changes submitted to the provinces for confirmation were a 16.9 per cent increase to all allowances with accompanying changes in parental contribution tables, as well as minor amendments to and clarification of existing criteria" which were unspecified in the report.

The minutes continue, "Several items, such as modified Group A Status (i.e. provision that students be treated as independent upon completion of four years post-secondary education) increases in loan ceilings to $1,800 $900 (loan grant) from $1,400 $700 and aid to part-time students had been referred to the minister of finance for consideration."

Ontario students leave classes to protest cutbacks

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students across Ontario held study sessions, boycotted classes and held plenary sessions Wednesday in order to inform students of the effects the Ontario government cutbacks in education will have on them.

The government announced in November that it was raising support financing for universities by only 16.4 percent in 1975-76. However, because of special grants and increasing enrolments the money only amounts to 7.4 percent per student increase.

This amount will not cover the expected 1975-76 inflation rate or help universities catch up from the ravages of inflation in 1974-75.

As a result of the cutbacks some universities may have to close and all but one will face deficit financing next year. Several academic programs will be slashed and larger classes will result.

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) at a meeting earlier this month urged students to hold study sessions Jan. 29 to explain to students what the cutbacks will mean.

"We called the study sessions, which are being held not only by OFS institutions but also by other post-secondary institutions in Ontario, because it was our view that the ordinary student isn't acquainted with what effects the budget cutbacks will have," said OFS public relations officer Chris Harries.

"We also want the government to know that students are aware of the problems and won't let the government get away with things like this," he said.

At Carleton University in Ottawa the student association urged all students to boycott classes and attend the study sessions. As in the case of all Ontario institutions the Senate refused to endorse the class cancellation.

At Ryerson there was a debate between Hugh Parrott, the parliamentary assistant to Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld and Floyd Laughren, the NDP education critic.

At the University of Guelph, the student association called for a class cancellation and held a general meeting of students and unionized workers at the university. The administration was also invited to the sessions.

At Ottawa University there also was a general meeting and the student association urged that classes be cancelled.

York, Waterloo and Laurentian universities will be holding study sessions next month while Waterloo and Western held theirs last week.

At Brock University the student association called for cancellation of classes, held meetings, workshops and a general plenary. At Windsor the single residence students held a general meeting.

Many residence students are holding coincidental meetings because universities have said residence fees will rise to help meet some of their deficits.

OFS has been trying for a month to get a meeting with Auld but he has constantly put them off saying his schedule cannot be changed. He has said that he might be able to meet with them at the end of February.

However, OFS says this is too late because by then the Ontario government will have set its budget and the university financing arrangements will be locked in.

Student representatives from across the province met with members of the Liberal and NDP caucuses yesterday. They held a concentrated day of lobbying with individual members from every party.

OFS will also hold an executive meeting Feb. 1 and a general meeting Feb. 8 to work out future strategy.

"The situation is rapidly changing. The government believes that student militancy is dead and a thing of the 60s. This isn't true but the Davis government is helping ressurect militancy on campus because of its arrogant attitude. It took the Tory government to whip up controversy and they are doing it," Harries said.

U of T book price study ready soon

By PAUL RAYNOR

U of T Press Committee secretary Michael Datoe expects that the report of the presidential committee set up to investigate the operations of the U of T Press will be completed by mid-February.

The report is the first formal study of the U of T Press and its related bookstores on campus since 1946.

President John Evans commissioned the report in response to soaring costs of production, which have caused many to question the value of publishing scholarly works which are obscure and have a relatively small market.

Former U of T president Claude Bissell chairs the committee composed of people from the industry, the university's Governing Council and the teaching faculty. No students are on the committee.

At an open meeting in November briefs were presented for the committee's consideration.

The SAC brief, presented by SAC services commissioner John Tuzyk, cited two problems with the U of T Press that especially concern students.

The first and most important is the unavailability of required textbooks at certain times of the year. This problem is frequently experienced by students in courses with large enrolments.

Secondly, SAC was concerned with the price levels in the bookstores. Although SAC's own study showed that prices did not vary widely from those at other universities or private retailers in the downtown area, there was still room for improvement, SAC maintained.

On examination of financial statements SAC revealed that U of T Press charged bookstores approximately $70,000 for accounting services, $40,000 interest on loans to finance inventories and $50,000 for rent.

SAC argued in its brief that if the university dropped these charges, as have several other universities throughout the province, the bookstores' prices could decrease by about five percent and larger inventories could be kept on hand, thereby correcting to some extent students complaints against the bookstores.

Former U of T president Claude Bissell speaking at Hart House.

Bissell denies charges of contempt of students

By GILLIAN MacKAY

Former U of T president Claude Bissell denied allegations by reviewers that he was contemptuous of student movements and resentful of change at a selection of readings from his new book, Halfway Up Parnassus, which he gave at Hart House Wednesday evening.

Although movements in Canada lacked the impetus of those in the U.S. because of the absence of "great causes" by concentrating on the issues close at hand, they probably achieved more in the way of concrete student reforms, Bissell told an audience of about 50.

"I was not too happy about some of the leaders," he said, "but I never wanted to trivialize the real achievements which were made."

In the long run, Bissell said he welcomed change, but found it a difficult process which tended at times to undermine positive traditional values. Bissell explained that his book was neither purely autobiographical nor historical, but rather was intended to "highlight the U of T institution from a personal point of view."

He said he hoped it would have "social and cultural implications beyond U of T, because the university must respond to and partially shape society."

Bissell's "personal account" of his experiences with the university in Halfway Up Parnassus starts with his arrival as an "enraptured" undergraduate in 1932 and follows his growing involvement as a teacher and administrator to focus finally on the period from 1959-1971 when he was president.

Bissell began his reading from chapter one with an affectionate and anecdotal recollection of three teachers who influenced and impressed him greatly — Frank Underhill, A.S.P. Woodhouse and Herbert Davis — adding that friends have called this the best part of the book.

More lively was the short and vivid account of "the Clark Kerr incident" from the chapter entitled "Student Power."

Bissell described the student disruption of a lecture given by former Berkeley president Clark Kerr in February, 1969 with a mixture of humor and distaste.

He recalled how a student hung a chain of marshmallows around his neck to symbolize "the soft saccharine approach of Canadian liberalism."

The tension rose after noise from the audience and the appearance of then student leader Andy Wernick on the stage, which made it impossible for Kerr to continue speaking.

Bissell described how he lost control and enraged the demonstrators by shouting, "We have had enough fascism this evening."

Calm was quickly restored in this case, but "the mysterious terror" left "a deep impression," Bissell said, later condemning this as a "combination of arrogance, self-righteousness and contempt for others."

Bissell closed with an examination of the changing conditions and priorities and objectives of the university which are discussed in the last chapter.

By the end of the 60s, Bissell said, the university was openly criticized by newspapers and politicians for inefficiency and extravagance, with even the minister of university affairs calling for "more scholars for the dollar."

Increased government control produced, for Bissell, the fear the university would be swallowed up by a huge bureaucratic machine whose approach was, in his words, "If you can't measure it, don't measure it."

Although he regretted the breakdown of old hierarchies without sure alternatives and the loss of the university's protected status, Bissell welcomed a new vitality and responsiveness to society which he saw emerging in the university of today.

Former CIA agent on campus Monday

A 12-year veteran of the CIA, now a socialist revolutionary, will speak Monday evening at the Faculty of Education auditorium under the auspices of the Old Mole, a Marxist newspaper.

Philip Agee was recruited by the CIA from the Notre Dame campus in 1956. He left in 1969 as a colonel after apparently effective service, mainly in Latin America.

He was responsible for overthrowing the Velasco government in Ecuador and also participated in torturing opponents of the U.S.-backed puppet government in Santo Domingo following the American invasion of 1965.

Agee's recent book Inside the Company: CIA Diary, outlines his progression from agent to revolutionary and contains lengthy descriptions of the CIA's methods of intelligence-gathering and clandestine operations throughout the world.

The CIA tried mightily, but in vain, to force a halt to the book's publication. The agency's concern is understandable since Agee includes a 25-page appendix listing every CIA agent, employee, collaborator and front organization that he is aware of.

"You might have expected someone in Agee's position to simply defect to the Russians or Chinese, but when he comes over to the world socialist revolutionary movement that's really something special," said Revolutionary Marxist Group spokesman Barry Weisleder.

Agee has described himself as a former believer in "Wilsonianism" — the theory that holds there is a "third way" between traditional imperialism and revolutionary socialism in which liberal capitalist nations such as the U.S. could develop a liberal foreign policy combining self-interest and utilitarianism.

But he says he eventually concluded that despite its lofty rhetoric the CIA was really just "promoting around the world simply a new version of the classic imperialism of the nineteenth century."

His view of the methods used to overthrow Velasco is almost the classic example of the detached amoral pragmatism for which the CIA has been reputed.

"At one stage we had the vice-president on our payroll. He was paid $700 a month before he became vice-president, and after we increased his salary to $1,000 a month."

Agee appears not to have much first hand information on alleged CIA activity in Canada; however, his knowledge of American activity in the third world is undoubtedly accurate.

Since his book appeared, the Mexican government has successfully forced the removal of the known CIA operatives in that country.

Agee's speech begins at 7:30 pm. Additional information is available at 368-7313.

Hart House elections will be happening soon. There are many committees to get involved in, including arts, debates, farm, finance, house, library, music or squash committees.

Nominations and information can be obtained from the program office at Hart House.

Hart House is one of the few university institutions which is run by committees with a majority of students because it is financed from student fees.

The elections give students a say in who runs Hart House programs. Past elections have largely been by acclamation so students should try and create a contest to allow a choice.

There will be a benefit concert Saturday night for South Vietnamese Political Prisoners by Perth County Conspiracy with a speech by Phil Berrigan, a well-known American war resister.

The Vietnamese who the concert is being put on for are Nguyen Long and Vo Nhu Lanh, who are touring Canada. The evening is sponsored by Amnesty International, the Voice of Women, AMEX and the International Committee to Defend Vietnamese Political Prisoners.

Tickets are $3. The concert will take place 8 pm Saturday at Central Commerce High School at 570 Shaw Street. Tickets available at the door and at SAC, Egerton's and Round Records.

Minister of Colleges and Universities, James Auld, and his parliamentary secretary Harry Parrot have refused to confront U of T students on the same platform.

Parrot and Auld turned down SAC invitations to speak at a forum on the Ontario Student Award Plan that was aimed at giving students an opportunity to hear the government defend the plan.

The same ministry is also stalling on the U of T Act. SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said Auld told SAC in December the act, which deals with Governing Council composition, would be reviewed by the cabinet by the end of January.

However, Kanowitch said, Auld's executive assistant told SAC a few days ago that the review has not been done and she doesn't know when the cabinet will deal with it.

Kanowitch said "I don't think there is anything sinister about it. The Davis government is up to its ears in scandals and the cabinet has been dealing with them."

At 4 pm, Mr. Nixon will be a guest at a spaghetti dinner marking the opening of Ryerson's annual winter carnival and will serve the first 100 plates himself.

(From the itinerary for a forthcoming visit to Ryerson by Robert Nixon)

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprises. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Students will bear the brunt of grant cutbacks

The current administration of the province has created a crisis in university financing. During the mid-sixties, post-secondary institutions underwent major expansion due largely to the efforts of the provincial government. This expansion was certainly a positive factor, but now, the very same government which created this expansion in the sixties, refuses to sufficiently finance it in the seventies.

As usual, the group that will be hardest hit by cutbacks in provincial spending will be students. Probably the most dramatic effect of the cutbacks will be an increase in the present pupil-teacher ratio. Progressive Conservative cabinet minister John White in response to a query about this replied that in Mexico they have a pupil teacher ratio of 100-1 and as far as he knew, it did not affect the learning environment there. Since graduate and fourth year courses will always remain relatively small due to their high degree of specialization, introductory courses will receive the brunt of any increase in the present ratio, with class sizes of 500 students or more becoming the rule rather than the exception.

Another harmful effect of the tight money situation will be a trend towards more reliance on audio-visual equipment for teaching, and less reliance on professors actually being in the room. This approach, although cheaper in the long run than the present system, can only serve to dehumanize the educational process, and further alienate students from the learning system.

Students in the professional faculties, and the sciences will also be hard hit by the cutbacks as laboratory equipment cannot be replaced when broken, and departments try to squeeze more years out of equipment than they were meant to be used for.

The results of several years of inadequate government funding are already in evidence: the faculty of Medicine has asked the Governing Council to impose a $15 levy on all first year medical students to pay for the cost of maintaining laboratory equipment, Erindale students must now pay for the previously free bus service to Erindale College, and the Chairman of the Department of Interdisciplinary Studies has been informed that his department may soon no longer exist. While these occurrences, when considered in the context of the funds presently available to the university are certainly an overreaction, they are another indication of what the future at U of T will be like in the absence of increased funding.

Students, however, will not be the only group affected by cutbacks. It certainly does not make it easy for a professor to communicate in a meaningful way with his students when he is forced to lecture to a class of 500. Junior, untenured faculty members will be particularly hard hit by the situation. As the university grows unable to accommodate a proper complement of faculty members, tenure will become much more difficult to receive. Though not a bad thing in its own right, the increased difficulty in obtaining tenure will put even greater pressure on faculty members to concentrate on research and ignore their teaching since additional government funds can be obtained by the university for good research, while no extra money comes for good teaching.

Even U of T administrators will be affected by the current budgetary crisis. Faced with the prospect of short-term deficit-financing they must do so in a manner that will not precipitate public dissatisfaction with university fiscal autonomy.

In light of the fact that the financing crisis is something which affects the entire university, it is particularly disappointing to see administrators and faculty hastening to suggest solutions which do not solve the entire problem, but which merely alleviate their own individual problems by increasing the students' problems. That is to say, by suggesting that the universities could solve their financial problems through increases in tuitions.

U of T President John Evans, heads the list of those calling for increases in tuition fees. Evans has made it clear in talks with SAC and GSU, that he supports indexing tuition to the level of government financing. That is, every time government financing increases, tuition fees should also increase. Under the Evans "guidelines," within the next five years tuition fees would rise to approximately $1,000 per year. Evans calls this plan "the only logical compromise."

The Canadian Association of University Teachers have also made it very clear that they support an increase in tuition fees, arguing that students must pay a higher proportion of educational costs. It is interesting to note, however, that Faculty Associations across the country are asking for enormous salary increases. This is particularly true at U of T, where in spite of the fact that the faculty already make on an average $22,500 per year, the Faculty Association is asking for a 25 per cent salary increase. It is also interesting to note that at U of T Faculty salaries constitute the largest single budgetary expenditure. Thus, in effect, the faculty are arguing that students should pay more money in tuition so that they can make more money in salaries.

The approach presently being followed by John Evans and the CAUT in asking the province to generate more funds for the university by increasing tuition, is the age old tactic known as robbing Peter to pay Paul. It does not alleviate the problems of the university as a whole, it merely solves the problems of faculty and administrators by increasing the problems of students.

A more mature approach would be for all elements of the university to unite in presenting to the public the university's case for increased funding. Historically, this has proven difficult as faculty and administrators have concerned themselves with the preservation of the status quo, or with fighting exclusively for their own interests. But, in the present financial crisis, the only solution to adequately serving the financial needs of the university is to urge the public to pressure the government to alter its spending priorities.

What remains to be seen is whether or not administrators and faculty are prepared to bury their sectarian interests sufficiently to join students in a campaign to solve the entire university's financial problems by getting to the very root of the matter—the lack of commitment by the Ontario Government to Post Secondary education. Any other approach will ultimately fail.

Varg should run income tax advice

For the benefit of people who were freaked out by the millions of pages (or so it seems) of forms that bureaucratic paper-pushers in the Department of National Revenue require in order to justify the existence of their jobs, The Varsity should run a couple of articles on income tax preparation.

This would keep students from spending their hard-earned cash on expensive and often worthless tax preparation services. More importantly, everyone who got screwed by uncle Bill Davis on OSAP could at least get the satisfaction of finding out how to collect a couple of hundred bucks in tax credits doled out by the Tories to pacify the starving masses.

Erindale needs athletic program

In response to Dave Stuart's article on O.U.A.A. athletes at Erindale College, I would just like to point out that previously this year (1974) I was out with the Varsity Blues basketball team but found it impossible to continue because I live in the west-end of the city, which means that after classes at Erindale I had to go all the way downtown and then all the way back to the west end. Not only was there too much time travelling involved (over two hours each day), but there was also the cost of transportation both ways.

I would like to have the opportunity to participate in a program of O.U.A.A. calibre, and I can see no reason why Erindale couldn't have their own program. Concordia University in Montreal has two varsity teams, one representing George Williams College and the other representing Loyola College; and there have been similar set-ups both in Canada and the U.S. Surely the main campus has enough athletes to draw from, so that the 3,000 students at Erindale would not hurt their programme on the main campus.

When you consider it, you realize that we are even in a different city, which is not the same as, say, Vic, U.C. or St. Mike's on the main campus. I do hope we can get some understanding from the administrators on the main campus.

J. Spagnuolo,

Concert reviewer showed ingratitude

On perusing the Jan. 27 issue of The Varsity my attention was immediately grabbed by the article on Gentle Giant. As I had been to the concert and thoroughly enjoyed it, I was interested in what a supposed music critic had thought of it.

I had expected an intelligent, knowledgeable, and objective assessment of the concert but was instead confronted with a trite, irrelevant, biased piece of writing that was full of erroneous and misleading statements. The reviewer, Lawrence Yanover, was obviously totally ignorant of the band's music and had done absolutely no research to compensate for it.

As Mr. Yanover proceeded to lambaste the group and the audience who had appreciated their music (witnessed by the standing ovation at the end of their set) with an attack composed of overblown rhetoric, hyperbole, and misinformation, the piece took on the form of a personal vendetta instead of a competent music review.

To begin with, Mr. Yanover couldn't understand the apparent contradiction in the group's name. If he had taken the time to listen to their music he could clearly have seen that Gentle represented the subtle side of their music and Giant the more aggressive side. Indeed, there was a delay in the starting time but Mr. Yanover failed to give the whole story. The group's P.A. system had been stranded in another province and they had had to borrow another one on short notice. This was explained as soon as everybody was seated.

Convocation Hall was fairly warm, due to the large number of people within it, but Mr. Yanover must have a far more sensitive nose than mine because I found the air to be quite acceptable. Myles & Lenny were not met with a wall of vocal abuse. As is the case with the majority of support bands, they had to work harder to impress an audience which had primarily come to see the main band. I thought they were received very courteously and by the end of their set were given a deserved round of applause.

Mr. Yanover began his tirade against Gentle Giant by expressing his personal opinion on how rock groups should dress and act, presumably being the ultimate authority on the subject. This was all irrelevant as it was the music which was being showcased by the group and there was no stage show in the theatrical sense of the word. The band was multi-talented but the thought that there was enough instruments to outfit the Berlin Philharmonic is ludicrous. The interchange of instruments was necessary to successfully recreate the music appearing on their albums and in the process displayed the virtuosity of the individual members.

Mr. Yanover fails to mention specifically any of the songs performed or the solo work of each of the band members. This is due, no doubt, to the fact that he doesn't know who is in group, their background, what albums they have released, nor the songs on those albums. The lead singer is referred to as Merlin, for what reason I do not know (it is in fact Derek Shulman). What Mr. Yanover interprets as the casting of spells is merely the gesturing of Mr. Shulman to each band member as they in turn perform their parts.

It is in the final two paragraphs of the article that I begin to understand why Mr. Yanover wrote such an asinine review. I suspect that he was talked into going to the concert not knowing or caring anything about the group. Furthermore, I believe that the 3rd balcony wing seat he referred to was his own seat, for which he had only himself to blame. Everyone going to the concert knew there were no reserved seats and that if you wanted a good seat you had to arrive early. It is easy to understand why Mr. Yanover thought the sound was poor if he was in fact to the side or behind the P.A.

I was sitting in the third balcony in the centre and found the sound to be very clear once a few initial problems had been solved early in the set. The extent of smoking and drinking was no worse than at any other rock concert I have attended.

It is an insult to the music-going populace of Toronto for Mr. Yanover to claim that CHUM-FM has the power to provide a mass audience for any musical group. The majority of people go to see groups they personally appreciate and are not brainwashed into going by a particular radio station. The promoters were certainly not exploiting the audience. Ticket prices for U of T students with ATL cards was a very reasonable $4. Even at $6.50, the prices were competitive with those charged at Massey Hall and the Gardens.

I congratulate SAC for staging the Gentle Giant show and thereby continuing its fine policy of providing top quality, diverse musical groups at reasonable prices.

Pakistan needs earthquake relief

The earthquake that shook Northern Pakistan in the early hours of December 27 has already claimed 5,100 lives. Another 18,000 people have been injured by collapsing houses and boulders smashing their way along mountain slopes.

Relief operations have not only been hampered by high winds and poor weather conditions but also by an acute shortage of medical supplies, particularly plaster of paris, blood plasma and other essentials, which has created a grave threat to the lives of the survivors.

The Committee of Pakistani Canadians, on behalf of the earthquake victims and the Pakistani Community in Canada, appeals to all Canadians to help these victims. Cash or donations of any kind would be gratefully accepted, particularly medicine, blankets and tents, which are badly needed at the moment to save the survivors of this tragedy.

Cheques should be made payable to "The Pakistan Earthquake Relief Fund Committee." All donations are tax deductible. Receipts will be mailed on request.

Task force on student aid does very nicely without students

OTTAWA (CUP) — A combined federal-provincial task force reconsidering the whole question of student aid in Canada has been quietly operating since last fall.

Documents from the committee show that the task force was set up last August through an agreement between the chairman of the Council of Education Ministers (CEM) and Secretary of State Hugh Faulkner, at the initiative of CEM.

Bob Buckingham of the National Union of Students (NUS) wrote to the CEM Dec. 4, 1974 stating that NUS "has learned that the Council of Education Ministers is considering proposing changes in the existing federal plans for student assistance" and requesting that students be represented in these deliberations.

The reply from CEM secretary general Maurice Richer made reference to "ongoing studies regarding possible changes in existing student assistance schemes" but gave no indication of the existence of the high-level task force set up last August.

Richer rejected the possibility of student representation on the CEM because, "Council policy precludes representation on our committees by professional or other interest groups."

"I can assure you, however, that the provincial authorities are giving very careful consideration to the students' concerns and this, in turn, is reflected in the deliberations of the council," he said.

He advised that students in those provinces "where such input has not yet been arranged" might obtain representation "by addressing the minister responsible for higher education."

As set up in August, the task force consists of representatives of the federal government and of all provinces except Quebec. According to the minutes of the November meeting, Quebec may have already dropped out of the discussions. Quebec operated its own student aid plan and does not participate in the Canada Student Loan Plan.

The full term of reference contained in the draft mandate, which are believed to be incorporated into a letter of agreement between CEM and Faulkner "in order of priority of consideration and action" are:

- to give immediate consideration to those changes necessary in existing federal plans for student assistance in order to bring them in line with existing needs and educational patterns, including such problems as aid to part-time students; varying concepts of need (i.e. married students); debt problems for lower socio-economic groups; age of majority and parental responsibility; repayment patterns, including concepts of forgiveness;

- to establish with federal representatives the probable time frame within which the various changes identified can be made, and to set in motion specific steps in those areas which can be rapidly accomplished.

- to study possibilities of co-ordinating and or rationalizing the variety of existing federal student support patterns, i.e. Canada Student Loan Plan; Manpower training allowances; OTA; Canada Assistance Plan;

- to study and report on other proposals for student assistance which might ultimately replace or substantially modify existing plans.

- R. J. Lachapelle of the Secretary of State in Ottawa is the other co-chairman of the task force. Other federal representatives include F. C. Passy, chief of the Guaranteed Loans Administration, Dept. of Finance and P. Skippon of the Privy Council.

The Secretariat of the task force consists of M. Demisch and Y. Habib, stationed at the CEM offices in Toronto.

More women treated over sex role

The primitive, stereotyped role which women continue to play helps explain why twice as many women as men are under psychiatric treatment, a Toronto psychiatrist told a St. Lawrence Centre panel discussion Wednesday evening.

Mary McEwan, told an audience of about 1,000 she hopes to conduct extensive research to discover why women are less happy than men.

"To say that women are more emotional is too glib," McEwan maintained.

The panel discussion on psychiatry was presented by the Toronto Arts Productions' public affairs department in cooperation with the Ontario Medical Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association and Mental Health—Metro. All four panelists were psychiatrists.

A spokesman for the Citizens Commission on Human Rights questioned a statement appearing on the program sheet that as many as one in six Canadians may need mental therapy in the future.

Although the program quoted the statement from the Canadian Mental Health Association, the citizens' commission traced the statement's origin to the Ontario government, which has denied ever researching such a fact.

The spokesman suggested the statement was "made up" and that it was a "scare tactic" on the part of psychiatrists.

The visiting psychiatrists gave no explanation of the statement, and moderator J. D. Armstrong, director of the mental health clinic of North York General Hospital, responded by adjourning the meeting.

The psychiatrist's role was questioned by some members of the audience.

Panelist Douglas Frayn, director of the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry's ambulatory services, insisted it would be "a cheap shot to call psychiatrists elitists," pointing out the Clarke Institute has served 100,000 people.

Primal therapist Tom Vervy advocated the need to go beyond verbal communication in patient-psychiatrist relations.

Also on the panel was Elizabeth Brodie, an associate professor at York University's environmental studies, who described gestalt therapy, a modern form of psychiatry based on existentialism.

Nationalism baffles Marxists: Davis

By BOB BETTSON and BILL SIMPSON

Marxists have failed to come to grips with the problem of nationalism in the twentieth century. Horace Davis, author of Nationalism and Socialism, said Tuesday.

Davis prefaced his remarks by pointing out that Canada is, paradoxically, both an imperialist power and a semi-colonial country.

Although Marx was in favor of national liberation movements, the perennial marxist dream has envisaged a world-wide revolution waged by the international working class. But Marx himself concentrated on class exploitation above other forms of exploitation based on sex, race and nationality, Davis pointed out, and so there is no clear analysis of nationalism in Marx's writings.

Clear disagreements began to emerge among Marxists in the early part of this century, Davis noted. Rosa Luxemburg claimed that nationalism is just a side-issue which prevents workers from paying attention to the basic necessity of bring about socialism. Lenin, on the other hand, stated that while nationalism was not as important as the class struggle, it might become so; and he advocated supporting struggles for national self-determination.

Davis said Luxemburg greatly underestimated the power of nationalism, despite her victory over Lenin on the question within the Bolshevik party.

But it was Stalin's definition of nationalism which became the "correct line" in later years. Davis analyzed Stalin's definition in detail, pointing out its inadequacies. While Stalin favored "national cultural autonomy," he clearly prohibited political autonomy for national groups within the U.S.S.R. Davis said cultural autonomy was meaningless without reference to some degree of political autonomy.

After the 1917 revolution in Russia, the Marxist commitment to internationalism was replaced by "socialism in one country," Davis said. The U.S.S.R. quickly displayed that its foreign policy would be based on expediency and self-interest.

Labor's internationalism is an idea that dies hard for most Marxists, Davis said, but it is unfortunately clear that "labor is nationalist."

Many contemporary Marxist theoreticians, such as Franz Fanon and Amilcar Cabral, stress that peasants and urban fringe groups are more revolutionary than workers, he noted.

Davis also cited the case of the Chinese revolution and its strong peasant base, in opposition to what he called "the fallacy that labor is the key class."

Davis concluded by espousing flexibility concerning national liberation movements. "Marxists shouldn't go out and stir up nationalism," Davis said, but they should support national liberation movements where they arise."

New tenure proposal for Ryerson

Teachers at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute will have to submit to a new form of tenure if the board of governors approves a student board member's proposal.

Gary Clay, who will present his proposal to a Jan. 29 board meeting, asks that teachers who pass a three year probationary period be eligible for five year contracts, renewable only if the instructor has not had consistently bad course evaluations.

Ryerson instructors are now awarded tenure for life after successfully completing a three year probationary period. Many instructors are granted tenure after two years.

"AS it now stands a teacher would have to commit some horrendous crime — say assaulting a student — before he could lose his tenure," said Clay.

"I don't feel the system we have now has the potential for providing the best system for students," he said. "The idea behind this proposal is to provide an upgrading course."

Clay says that if it's evident an instructor isn't working to his or her capabilities and there isn't any pressure on him or her to improve after continually receiving bad course evaluations then pressure "can be brought to bear by the proposed new tenure system."

"There is no hard line opposition to the proposal," said Clay. "The president of the Ryerson Faculty Association feels the climate is right and the only problem is how to go through the bureaucracy properly."

Roam around Europe all summer for $180.

A Student-Railpass gives you two months of unlimited Second Class rail travel through 13 European countries.

Buy one, we'll give you a map, and where you go next is your own business.

All we'll say is that European trains are a sensational way to get there, be it Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden or Switzerland.

100,000 miles of track link cities, towns and historic, scenic and social attractions. Our trains are fast, modern, convenient, clean and comfortable.

And you'll discover there's very little second class about Second Class. You can sleep in a couchette for only $6.00 a night. And if you want to eat on a budget, inexpensive snacks are often available.

You can even take a cruise on the Rhine, if you like. Eurailpass is valid on many European ferries, river and lake steamers and hydrofoils. It also offers you substantially reduced fares on many side excursions you might want to take by motor coach.

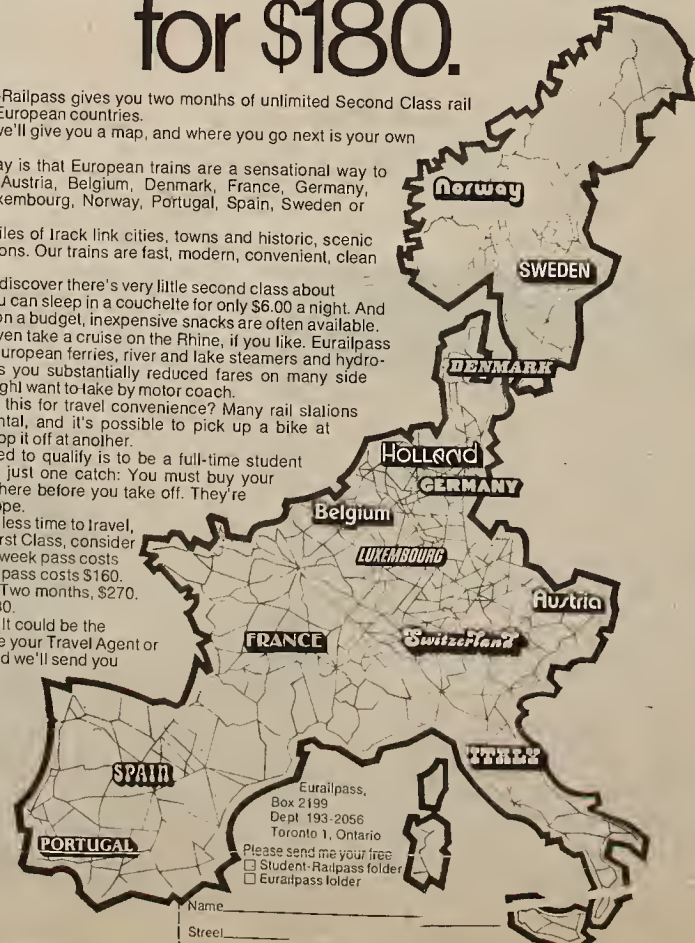

And how's this for travel convenience? Many rail stations offer bikes for rental, and it's possible to pick up a bike at one station and drop it off at another.

All you need to qualify is to be a full-time student under 26. There's just one catch: You must buy your Student-Railpass here before you take off. They're not for sale in Europe.

If you have less time to travel, or want to travel First Class, consider Eurailpass. A two-week pass costs $130. Three-week pass costs $160. One month, $200. Two months, $270. Three months, $330.

Don't wait. It could be the trip of your life. See your Travel Agent or clip the coupon and we'll send you all the facts.

In 1669 John Aubrey wrote his An Idea of Education of Young Gentlemen, viz. From the Age of 9 or ten years, till 17, Or 18.
 "A friend of Aubrey's had told him that he had found 'by experience that the only time of Learning is from nine to sixteen, afterwards Cupid begins to Tyrannize.' Aubrey himself wrote that 'Mr. Hobbes told me, that G. Duke of Buckingham had at Paris when he was about twenty yeares old, desired Him to read Geometrie to him; but his Grace had great naturall parts, and quicknesse of witt; Mr. Hobbes read, and his Grace did not apprehend, which Mr. Hobbes wondered at: at last, Mr. Hobbes observed that his Grace was at mastrupation (his hand in his Cod piece). This is a very improper age; for that reason for learning'."

daa-da-da-da-da-daa-daa! unpack your tap dance shoes: musicals are back!

I was in a musical in my high school days. It was a bit part or rather a number of bit parts: that's the way it usually is. That's the extent of my acting career but it was enough. I am able to appreciate the musical without an overbearing desire to excuse that appreciation away as cultural slumming.

Bring on the tapshoes, I say; bring on the chorus numbers; bring on the show-stoppers; bring on the character stereotypes: I mean, give me some of that old time razzamatazz!

Here at the U of T bringing it on they are.

New Faces 1975 presents its musical revue Adoration at New College's Wetmore Hall next Thursday through Saturday. Tickets are $1.50.

Victoria College Music Club presents its production of Cole Porter's Anything Goes from Tuesday until Saturday at Hart House Theatre. Tickets are $2.50 and $3.

The Victoria Music Club has been presenting musicals for decades now. Vic is as much noted for its musicals as it is for Acta Victoriana and the infamous bells.

Hewers of words, and choppers of songs.

Musicals have been mounted since at least the turn of the century. Robin Wardlaw, this year's Music Club president told me. The switch from the Gilbert and Sullivan operas presented then to Broadway musicals came in the 1940s. But the club may someday go back to G & S because Broadway hasn't been producing anything of note recently. Anything Goes was originally written in 1935, of course, and it has been produced once before by the Club — in 1962, when the musical was revived on Broadway.)

(Anything Goes was originally written in 1935, of course, and it has been produced once before by the Club — in 1962, when the musical was revived on Broadway.)

The Club productions have always been well received. But the essential escapist nature of the form may make this year's production more popular than ever. Musicals tend to flourish in depressions, Wardlaw, said, and the "present depression" may make them as popular as they were in the thirties, (it may also encourage the creation of musicals as good as those of that period).

Musicals seem to depend on an art that conceals art that also makes all the hard work that has gone into the production very obvious. You judge them as you see them. The production either is good or it isn't. It either flows or it doesn't.

Vic's Anything Goes flows — at least if one can judge by the rehearsal that I sat in on, in the cold second floor gym of the Vic Fieldhouse where the cast is rehearsing prior to moving to Hart House for dress rehearsals and the actual performances.

The tradition has paid off. Perhaps inevitably so since that tradition means the involvement of professional people and the spending of big budgets. $5,000 is being spent for this show, ($700 right off to the copyright owners, and $500 to rent Hart House Theatre, $100 for each night).

Stan Lesk, an actor, is making his directorial debut with Anything Goes. Lesk was Winnie the Pooh in the Young People's Theatre's Christmas production. After Anything Goes he goes on to a Maritimes production of Godspell.

The show is choreographed by Bonnie Sandison, a young freelance dance teacher who has studied and worked in London, England.

New College's musical revue does not have the strong tradition behind it that Vic's musicals do. It is only in its second year. But the material for the show is completely original — and that is certainly something worth building on.

The musical revue is not a college revue. It is a series of musical skits loosely grouped together around a central theme. The theme last year was "Life"; the theme this year is "Love".

Uh-uh.
 The irony of musicals of course is that the plot is usually so complicated to explain yet so very simple to understand. (Whereas the plot of a serious drama — Waiting for Godot, say — is so simple to explain, yet so difficult, if not impossible, to finally understand.) Adoration deals with a fellow who has come to "Adorsch Inn" where he encounters a Mystery Girl who quickly vanishes — but not before he has fallen in love with her. To find her, the man has to answer a riddle and endeavouring to do that, he has to knock at all the doors of the hotel. At each door he encounters a different aspect of love — religious love, physical love, avarice, platonic love, and so on. I have no idea how the show ends.

The show's two directors are Jim Betts and Doug Gahn. Betts wrote most of the show's material.

Betts told me his training in musicals comes from a former involvement with the Victoria College Music Club, although he has now "moved up" to New College, ("watch out Innis," a cast member interjected).

New Faces' success last year exceeded the expectations of those involved. An audience of some 400 was projected; more than 800 eventually saw the show during its limited run.

Certainly this year's cast seemed, in the rehearsal that I only glimpsed, to be enjoying what they were doing. I was invited to watch a run through. But I was already supposed to be somewhere else. I did see some of the script though.

— "What is all things in one, when one, yet is one thing in all. What is the sun when it rises, and the rain when it falls? What comes running unbeckoned and disappears when you call? What has a thousand deaths? What has infinite lives?"
 — Love.

— Love, Love."
 That's what they say — at least in musicals if nowhere else.

The Learning Machine
by Loren Lind
Anansi

Cutbacks and controversy in education are not limited to the university level. Perhaps the most direct controversies happen at the public school level, where the formative stage of education takes place.

Loren Lind, the Globe's former education reporter, has made an excellent case study analysis of the public school system in The Learning Machine, recently published by Anansi.

Lind draws on his experiences with the school system to survey a wide number of issues in the Toronto education system particularly emphasizing streaming, immigrant children, technical and vocational schools, and the school bureaucracy.

This book is an excellent primer for the uninitiated in the politics of public schools. Lind shows clearly how class and ethnic background relates to the quality of education.

Despite Toronto's reform image and the many extra dollars spent on inner-city schools, the hard truth is that by and large working class children are still dead-ended into vocational schools where they are made to feel inferior and only suited for the most menial tasks.

Perhaps the most effective part of Lind's book is his use of real life examples to illustrate his conclusions. Many chapters recount visits he has made to schools in Toronto and the situations he has encountered.

Lind also tries to expose how reluctant the system is to deal with controversial issues such as sex education. This reluctance is despite the shocking lack of knowledge and the prevalence of misinformation among Toronto

Energy and Equity
Ivan Illich
Harper and Row

"Radical humanist" Ivan Illich has come up with another seminal work in his quest to demonstrate the diminishing humanity of our ever-growing and over-industrialized society.

Following on the theme of his previous work, Tools for Conviviality, Energy and Equity is a brief polemic which claims that "equity" is the very antithesis to continued industrial growth. If a society opts for high energy consumption, says Illich, its social relations must be dictated by technocracy and will be equally disruptive whether labelled capitalist or socialist.

On the other hand, "a low energy policy allows for a wide choice of life styles and cultures."

Illich advocates the use of "minimum feasible power" as the foundation for a new social order, and warns that beyond a certain median per capita level of energy use, society will inevitably start to decay.

The metaphor used in the book — one could hardly call it the proof — is the comparison of the automobile and the bicycle, or 'transport' versus 'transit', the former a mechanical enslavement, the latter a means to permit human expression.

It would be too easy to label Illich a hopeless aviatist. As he points out more clearly in Tools for Conviviality, there is a level up to which technology is an unmitigated blessing. After a certain threshold, however, it turns its users into serfs.

Sports or Athletics: A North American Dilemma, Proceedings of the 15th Annual University of Windsor Seminar on Canadian-American Relations, 1973. Edited by J. Alex Murray.

The symposium is the opiate of the intellectuals. Good talk, good food, good intentions, goodbye. The solution of problems by means of a massive infusion of verbiage.

Thus, when academics are mixed with journalists, athletes, entrepreneurs, politicians and administrators for the purpose of discussing the phenomenon of North American sport, the result is virtually predetermined, though not necessarily quite what the organizers hoped.

The 184 pages of apparently unedited transcripts contain some useful, unique and occasionally disturbing contributions interspersed between the pathetic predictable pulp.

However, the impression is that of a lavish sports' celebrities dinner that somehow got way out of hand. If there's anything worse than the now-traditional ritual of businessmen rejuvenating their fantasies by rubbing elbows with well-known athletes at such non-events, it's probably the image one gets of this 1973 seminar where academics mingled with some members of the sports establishment to the greater honor and glory of American Capitalism (Canada) Limited.

The eighteen speakers, neatly apportioned into nine Canadians and nine Americans, covered such topics as "Why Olympics?", "the influence of the media", and "athletics and the big dollar". Unfortunately many of the remarks appear to be fatuous or simply unresearched ramblings by "big names" imported to Windsor in order to create more publicity for the seminar.

The performances by James Worrall, Canadian representative on the International Olympic Committee, and Roger Rousseau, Commissioner-General for the 1976 Montreal Games, are almost satirical when viewed with the delicious hindsight of the current financing difficulties.

The possible cancellation of the Games lends a certain understandable irony to Rousseau's comment that "even the most knowledgeable people in the sport world could not be blamed if they do not understand clearly the inner mechanics of the Olympic Games and more specifically the exact duties and responsibilities of their Organizing Committees."

Jim Finks, general manager of the NFL Minnesota Vikings, gave an excellent presentation of the well-trained corporate apologist at work as he stoutly defended the glories of the NFL reserve clause, and former U.S. track star Jesse Owens reached new depths in what has become a very sad portrayal of the well-merchandized hero of 1936 who spends his time speaking at similar symposia to extol clean living, hard work, belief in God, and the American Way.

Dominant iconoclast at the seminar was U of T's Bruce Kidd, who attacked American imperialism and the U.S. control of professional sport in Canada in a brief, bitter speech that clearly upset most of the audience, particularly Finks who launched a personal vendetta on Kidd during the ensuing question period.

In his speech, Kidd drew a distinction between professional sport, which he sees as "a practice of paying a salary to an athlete or a coach or a manager," and commercial sport which is "sport for buying and selling."

Commercial sport, in Kidd's view, is one of the main vehicles for the "colonization of Canadian sport by American sport." Another factor is "seminars of this kind (that) only serve to retard the development of the more humane, more democratic sporting culture in Canada, because they set out to treat the problems of sport in these two countries as being nearly identical."

"That proposition is as dubious as the recent awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Henry Kissinger and Le Duc Tho on the basis that they play equal roles in the Indo-Chinese war."

Kidd also attacked the theory that commercial sport is necessary for the development of excellence, citing examples where the manipulators of commercial sport, chiefly the team owners and a subservient media, have deliberately sought to maximize profits and revenues at the expense of the achievement of excellence.

He cited NHL expansion, the deliberate destruction of senior amateur hockey in Ontario, and the brainwashing effect of Hockey Night in Canada.

Abigail Hoffman, another well-known U of T athlete, also attacked the role of the media, pointing out that the current rediscovery of women in sport really just brings the clock back to the late twenties when, for example, all the Toronto newspapers had female sports columnists who regularly reported on women's sports, and radio stations carried play-by-play broadcasts of girl's high school basketball.

Bill Gilbert, a writer for Sports Illustrated — that most manipulative of all the printed-sports media — admitted with regret that sports is being used "as a device to promote the maintenance of established organizations in society."

Remarks by several other participants added validity to the critique suggested by Hoffman and Kidd.

Asked by the seminar organizers to define the closely linked concepts of "sport" and "athletics", University of Guelph philosophy professor John McMurtry replied, "in a word, sport is play and athletics is business."

McMurtry then moved on to a bitter denunciation of the competitive ethic.

"By structuring activity as a battle for winner spoils (whether such winner spoils — and this term deserves pause — be in the form of mere recorded final score or money-and-prestige jackpot), it turns participants against one another in action; it removes attention from sheer physical expressiveness and abandon to coming out on top; it causes negative emotions of fear of failure, hostility and vanity; it raises a costly and authoritarian official superstructure to regulate, grade and command performance; it yields a caste system of winners and losers, big-league and bush-league, small minority of doers and mass, majority of watchers; and it generally promotes a value-system of self-interested pursuit, elitism, us-them deviousness, obedience to authority, and instrumentalism of activity. The athletic, the contest-for-prize framework is, in a phrase, a bad trip. As the ancient Greek word for contest — agon — indicates, it involves us in a systematic commitment to human suffering."

Two American academics, University of Massachusetts sociologist John Loy and North Carolina research professor Pearl Berlin, presented solid statistical arguments which also added strength to the attack on the value system which appeared to dominate the minds of the seminar organizers.

In spite of the prevailing competitive syndrome, Loy argued, his findings indicate that "only a minority of young adults are involved in highly organized competitive athletics, and the majority of college and university students who engage in active sports do so for expressive reasons of fun and satisfaction rather than for instrumental reasons of achieving success through victory."

Berlin's research demonstrates that women are systematically excluded from senior administrative positions in most American national sports organizations, and also that during the sixties Sports Illustrated continually presented a highly sexist view of the female

 These were answers by a Grade 11 class at Humberide Collegiate on a birth control quiz.
 While the official philosophy of Ontario's public school system may be outlined in the educator's bible, Living and Learning, the Hall-Dennis report, the realities have shown surprisingly little change.
 Lind questions the depth of the much touted reforms of the late sixties. This has been one of the greatest myths perpetrated by the media. Only superficial changes have been made. The basic problems remain the same, although dressed in progressive rhetoric.
 The last part of the book deals with the educational decision-making process, the role of the Big Blue Machine and the local school boards.
 Lind saves his harshest criticism for the educational bureaucracy run by Queen's Park. He points out how central control and budget cutbacks have played havoc with the quality of education and local autonomy. Secrecy plays an important role in relations between bureaucrats at all levels and elected trustees, who are supposed to run the schools system.

 The blame is laid squarely on the shoulders of Bill Davis, the great centralizer, for the move to more technocratic values in education. What else can we say about a man who dreams about the day students will be taught by machines.
 This is reflected in the mania of the province for many levels of supervision with a dizzying array of petty bureaucrats looking after curriculum and exercising top down control over what is taught in the classroom.
 Lind says the alternative is the type of community-oriented system advocated by Toronto trustee Dan Leckie and other progressive trustees.
 Changes of this nature, however, will only come at a political level. Unless schools are transformed from instruments of the ruling classes of our society into those of the people, any chances of drastic changes seem futile.

bob betts athlete.

 Citing a series of unpublished manuscripts prepared by other researchers, Berlin disclosed that Sports Illustrated, despite its recent avowal of the cause of women in sport, has a clear history of hostility to female athletes.

Its coverage of women in sport actually declined during the sixties from five percent of all articles published in the magazine in 1960 to only two percent in 1970. Photo coverage also declined significantly during the same period, from 15.1 percent of all SI photos in 1960 to 8.2 percent in 1970.

Adjectives used by Sports Illustrated writers to describe female athletes are also indicative of the magazine's sexist value system.

Extroverted women were labeled as vivacious, alive, nicely elegant, bouncy, buoyant, gracious, poised. Introverts became thoroughly feminine, bland, pristine, neat and feminine, wistful, looking silly, having an "etheral air" or the "personality of a puppy".

The performance of the media people at the seminar ranged from that of Gilbert, who talked bluntly about the use of sport as social engineering but offered no solutions, to the accomplished fence-sitting of Windsor Star sports editor Jack Dulmage to the vacuous nothings of columnist and Hockey Canada executive Douglas Fisher.

"Three things about sports don't change," quipped Dulmage, "the need to win, the need to pursue excellence, and the need to have a piece of the action."

Referring to the seminar's topic, he concluded, "I understand that a dilemma is a situation involving choice between equally unsatisfactory alternatives."

I am certain that is one of the reasons I became a newspaper person. I can play with the alternatives without choosing them."

It was George Weiss, the former general manager of the Yankees, who said of sports reporters, "To hell with them. I can buy any reporter with a steak."

Not all speakers followed Dulmage to the haven of journalistic inaction masking as objectivity, and the capitalist ethic was certainly not without its passionate defenders.

For example, Donald Canham, University of Michigan athletic director: "We are criticized by some for hocking our product like it's a trip to the Caribbean. We do... athletics is big business. There is no question about it. But, I can't for the life of me, in our particular situation see what is wrong with that."

 Alan Eagleson, noted sports lawyer: "Major league sports is big business... so when you read the comments of owners that the salaries of players are becoming ridiculous, remind yourself that sports profits for owners are an important factor in their decision to stay in the business of sports."
 And of course the redoubtable Jim Finks: "We are really in a business and nobody is denying that. We're in the entertainment business and we have to be competitive with the theatre. We are in the entertainment business and nobody is suggesting that we are in anything else."

Entertainment, too, is what the seminar was all about. The skillful and passive intellectualization of the takeover of Canadian sport.
 The last angry riposte was delivered and the athletes went back to their training, the entrepreneurs to their balance sheets, and the journalists to their typewriters.

A final word about the editing of the transcripts. At $10.00 for less than 200 pages, it is reasonable to expect a certain amount of professionalism, dare one say "excellence". Several of the speeches were printed out of order and thus contained illogical references to previous speeches which appeared later in the book although occurring earlier in the actual seminar.

Moreover, there are some incredible spelling mistakes such as Joe Cap for Joe Kapp, Pete Rossell for NFL commissioner Pete Rozelle, George Hallis for Chicago Bears' owner George Halas, and Gregg Colonels apparently for London artist Greg Curnoe.

Fortunately, for those interested in the main issues raised at the seminar by the critics of the existing sports system, there is some other useful material that's available cheaply in paperback form.

On the relationship between commercial sport and American capitalism — Rip Off the Big Game by Paul Hoch;

On the role of the media — The Jocks by the late Leonard Checter,

On the control of sport and the uses of sport as social control — Games, Sport and Power edited by Gregory P. Stone.

The transcripts of the Windsor seminar are not without value, but the overall impression is that of a gathering of slaves to discuss the recreational problems encountered by the plantation owners. It makes for interesting discussion as long as nobody brings up the basic question of slavery, especially in the presence of the owners.

Cybernetics and the people

Stafford Beer went to Chile in 1971 at the invitation of Allende's government to create computer models and control rooms with which worker committees could run their own factories, and national models for a new hierarchy of economic and political institutions.

The great cybernetic experiment was halted by the dramatic fall of the Allende regime in 1973. The single prototype control room stands empty. Beer has returned to England.

Beer discussed his Chile experiences at a recent meeting of the Operations Research (OR) society's subgroup on social responsibility. He was particularly adamant about the purpose of the system.

"Because of the publicity about the operations room in Santiago," he said, "people have seen this thing as immense centralization of power. But what we were really trying to do was decentralize, to devolve power out to the individual worker groups in the various companies."

Beer designed a system for the Allende government that he said could change the traditional hierarchies and feed information out to the factories while it collected basic indicators for higher level organizations — without infringing the autonomy or freedom of the individual enterprises. His critics however were not sure (New Scientist, vol. 57, p 347, 363, 449).

In addition to providing basic indicators required by the industry (e.g. textiles) the industry group (e.g. consumer industry), and the national planners, Beer said his system was being used by some factories to build models for themselves, using their own indicators to create pictures of their situations.

"We developed certain methods of description that apply to all systems," Stafford Beer told his OR colleagues. Rather than calling it a 'control' system he repeatedly used the word 'autonomy'.

"'Autonomy' implies being in control or out-of-control, not me-controlling-you," he explained. "My inspiration for cybernetics comes from neurophysiology. 'If I were decentralised of centralised I couldn't function. My systems are not centralised or centralised but autonomous. Allende wanted his Marxist state this way. He was a physician; he knew about physical autonomy."

On a shoestring budget, hemodels were designed and built in 18 months, and the prototype control room created in Santiago. People from worker committees in factories worked with Beer in the construction of the models — he is concerned at the idea that he worked in secrecy.

Then they began training workers in more of the factories to use the system.

"I had to bring everything to the centre because I only had one centre," Beer said.

"If we had had microcomputers it could have been done on-site, with the basic indicators dropped off at the various levels of aggregation... We were planning a factory to mass-produce control rooms like the prototype, with no paper, and only seven chairs. You can't have a creative situation with more than seven people... Instead of tables they saw animated projections of their own models, so they could see the information they wanted, in a form they could understand."

By the time of the coup, Beer said that about 60 percent of Chile's economy was represented and reported in the system and training was progressing smoothly. Allende wanted to decentralise the traditional hierarchy and give workers control over it.

"My last meeting with Salvador Allende was on the 26 July," Beer recalled. "I explained to him my problems within this political system. I needed a directive from him regarding how far the worker control was to go. He looked at me and said: 'El Maximo'."

Beer ascribed Allende's downfall to a combination of an internal subsystem (the well-to-do who controlled the country's distribution), and forces from the world system of which Chile was only a subsystem (the flow of dollars and arms from outside).

Stafford Beer
 Assigning Freedom
 The CBC Massey Lectures 1973

The science of cybernetics has produced an eclectic range of thinkers in recent years who have used the concepts of that discipline to gain some provocative insights. Stafford Beer is certainly one of them.

Beer uses the lectures — a series of six radio talks — to argue that cybernetic principles should be applied generally to social organization. Moreover, he has had the chance to put his ideas into practice — a chance none of us will likely have during the Allende years in Chile.

On one hand, Beer belongs to a school of thought initiated by Norbert Wiener, who saw information in a social sense, and developed by Harold Innis and Marshall McLuhan, who saw history unfolding in relation to the technology and control of information. On the other hand, he shares many of the same concerns as Ivan Illich, anxious to put the average man in touch with technological tools which he can turn to his own advantage.

When Beer uses such cybernetic terms as 'requisite variety', then, he is no dispassionate efficiency expert, but a progressive, willing to risk his ideas on the largest possible stage.

Because these lectures were given in the days immediately following the coup, they form a two-edged sword. At once, Beer is trying to promote his theories and defend them against their apparent failure.

The core of Beer's theory runs as follows: societies are not rigid units, but "dynamic, surviving systems," always on the verge of collapse should they fail to adapt to the continual torrent of incoming information, which he terms "variety".

Consequently, the key to the survival of a system lies in its ability to cope with variety. The system itself must contain sufficient variety to cope with the variety it must monitor: it must contain "variety attenuators".

Consider the somewhat bland example of the department store. It must employ enough clerks to satisfy the customers, and must adapt the use of the clerks to suit customers' tastes. There is no sense having three shoe salesmen and one clothing salesman, when everyone is buying clothing rather than shoes. The clerks are the variety attenuators, moved around as incoming information — the tastes of shoppers — dictates.

Beer criticizes many already 'cybernetic' businesses. They use technology capable of incredible variety, but do not use the technology as a variety monitor. Technology here merely replicates a previously simple function, and its capacity goes wasted. As a result, operations are just as precarious as ever before.

The strongest critique of the failure of institutions to adapt is directed at government. Government is hopelessly unable to solve the environmental problem, for example, because its structure is fundamentally incapable of absorbing all the variety the situation presents, according to Beer.

Worst of all is delay. A piece of legislation, by the time it becomes law, will be useless because the situation it is designed to monitor will have changed.

All these criticisms are fairly mundane, but worthy of repetition from a cybernetic standpoint. The solutions Beer proposes are more interesting.

The key lies in greater awareness of variety, and the attenuation of variety. Freedom, to Beer, lies in improving the capability of the attenuators, and granting wider access to them.

To improve the capability of the attenuators, Beer urges use of the "three great liberators": computers, telecommunications, and the techniques of cybernetics itself. Improving access to the attenuators means giving those who inject variety into the system that access, for they best are able to express both the fundamental and ongoing needs to which the system must adapt.

Questions of access inevitably give way to those of power. If a system is to be efficient, in Beer's terms, it must necessarily be democratic; democratic from the base up, fashioned to the needs of those at the base.

The converse is also true; a democratic system must also be an efficient one. Beer himself puts it best:

"Civilization itself is being dragged down by its own inefficiency. We cannot feed the starving; we cannot stop war; we are in a terrible muddle with education, transportation, the care of the sick and the old; institutions are failing, and often we feel unsafe in the streets of our own cities. All this is inefficient. Then it cannot be correct to say that the only way to preserve liberty is to be so damned inefficient that freedom is not even threatened... We have to find a way to turn science over to the people."

The accompanying article indicates just how Beer tried to turn science over to the people.

Beer's experience with the Chilean tragedy has not led him to drop his commitment to people's cybernetics — far from it. He remains convinced that the overthrow of Allende demonstrates the urgency with which his ideas must be adopted. The coup was the result of the original structural instability, which he did not have enough time to correct, he claims.

There is something in Beer's thinking to challenge everybody. But perhaps the deepest lesson from his experiences should be drawn by those already in the socialist camp who remain entrenched in the epithets of the old left, wedded to the idea of technology as wrenches in the hands of the workers.

Beer has brought a distinctly twentieth century concept — cybernetics, control of information — to the rescue of the tired old workhorse of workers' control. He has shown new forms power can take, new means whereby control can be achieved.

We learn from Beer that workers control, in the late twentieth century, involves not only control of the means of production, but also control of the means of information.

The challenge ahead lies in asking how the two can lead us to a more enlightened form of community power. The Chilean experiment was only the first step.

The acting came straight from ham city; the costumes were either beautiful, or completely anachronistic (the chorus member with her own 1975 black plastic glasses, the leading man with his wallabys); the set combined authentic stone houses, a terrific ara, and plastic flowers.

But the music! From the first chord of the Faculty of Music's production of Donizetti's L'Elixir d'Amore last week, Maestro Barbini was in control of every note. I have rarely heard any orchestra sound as good as this one (which is composed entirely of U of T music students).

It is also thanks to the Maestro that every trill ended precisely and that the chorus sang so well — even if the lyrics got lost in the cavernous MacMillan theatre.

The Music faculty should be proud and thankful that such a man is working with their students.

Outstanding in their solo roles were James Shafer as Dulcamera, the quack doctor who sells cheap red wine as the elixir of love, and Sonia Meroniuk, as Adina's friend. These two singers could be heard and understood whether singing duets or against the whole company.

The chorus was far too busy nodding agreement or displaying their horror at the actions on stage, mistaking upstaging each other for acting.

All in all, one has to commend the faculty for staging such a large show. Cast of Fifty; Orchestra of Sixty! Director Constance Fisher and Maestro Barbini have influenced a large number of students and influenced them well.

DO YOU NEED A WILL?

Ms. Marie Huxter, Assistant Dean and Director of Admissions at the Faculty of Law announces a clinical training programme in will drafting. Members of the university community — academic and administrative staff, students, and their spouses — interested in having a simple will prepared should contact Ms. Huxter at 928-4908. Those interested will be accepted on a "first come — first served" basis. There will be no charge involved. The interview will be conducted and the will prepared by a practising lawyer. A small number of students (approximately 5) will sit in on the interview and execution of the will. Two attendances will be required and will be scheduled between 8 and 9 a.m. in the morning or 5 and 6 p.m. in the evening. The first attendance will be during the week of February 10 and the second during the week of February 24.

The Faculty of Law cannot undertake to supply complex estate planning advice in this programme. Should it appear that the particular circumstances of those wishing to participate involve advice of a greater sophistication than the programme can offer, they will be advised by the lawyer in charge of the interview.

Anyone who saw the opening ceremonies of the Munich Olympics must have found them hard to forget: the ceremonies telecast all over the world that centered on groups of German school children in brightly coloured smocks in the middle of the packed stadium dancing and singing the medieval song, Summer is I-Cumen In, as thousands of doves were released.

It was an occasion that came dangerously close to a parody of late Romanticism; dangerously close to a parody of some vision out of Isadora Duncan's autobiography. But it was also an occasion imbued with the integrity, the uprightness of that song.

That integrity, that unpretentiousness, were undeniably present in the concert the Toronto Consort gave this past Tuesday in the Trinity College Chapel.

The Consort, made up of four U of T faculty members, has been devoted to performing medieval music since its founding, a Pocoli Ludique Societas off-shoot, in the spring of 1972. This particular concert was given over to a variety of religious and secular works by the late medieval composer Josquin Despres and his contemporaries.

The concert included the Kit-chener Bach Choir, singing alone, and accompanied by the Toronto Consort.

For most people, though not necessarily for most of the Consort's enthusiastic audience last Tuesday — the group's music must rank as an experience, something to be discovered and appreciated, (since it is a music that is so unfamiliar to us) rather than evaluated. The simple nasal and percussive qualities of the medieval instruments which the Consort uses, the musical qualities of the sackbuts, the shawms, the krumphorns, the rebbers, are strange to the modern ear.

But the group itself also sings — and it is remarkably well equipped to do that, since one member of the group is a soprano, one a bass, one a tenor, and the last that rara avis, a counter-tenor. The Consort's singing, as a group and individually though it did not take up much of the program, in fact tended to be far more impressive than the singing of the Bach choir, which did take up a lot of the program.

What I especially appreciated at this concert was the effect of the lighting in the chapel which was hidden behind pillars behind the group and focussed on the altar (dressed now in green Epiphany colours) did not cut the group off from the audience; a situation recognized during the intermission when so many members of the audience left their seats and went up to the front of the chapel to look at the instruments and to talk to the Consort members.

The Consort has done relatively few concerts in Toronto this year. A deliberate policy since they feel they are overexposed here and underexposed in other areas of Canada. The group has tours to the east and the west of Canada planned for the near future.

The Consort is one of the few such groups in Canada. There is another such group in Vancouver and a much larger one in Montreal but neither tours.

The group is trying to put things on a professional level as much as possible. But an agent would want them on call from October to May, precisely when they are most busy with university duties. As a result the group is doing its own publicity and making its own touring arrangements.

The luckiest people are those who know what they want to do and are able to do it — even if they have to wear several hats in the process.

The Pits
Toronto Free Theatre
 24 Berkeley
 (below Front)

A play's title often affords a time pressed reviewer a catchy weapon with which to bludgeon a production to death. God knows I've done it before. Good News via the production became "Bad News". I Do, I Do! became "I Do, I Do!, Doesn't!". When the time comes I have no doubt I'll do it again, but not this time, not with The Pits, Toronto Free Theatre's first production of the new year. In this case the production is terrific and the title perfect. Nothing more or nothing else would work so well. The title at once crystallizes the whole shabby, depressing atmosphere of the rooming house — this place really is the pits. At the same time the title implies much more.

The Pits literally takes place in a pit. Raised a good seven feet off the floor, the audience is free to move about on the balcony that rings the acting area (bear baiting). From this vantage point the characters can be watched, observed, studied like rats in a maze (the audience used to occupy the pit in the theatre). The maze is the floor plan of a run down rooming house and the rats are the tenants.

As each roomer has his own room each room has its own character. Steve's is as neat as the drafting table in it; DeeDee's full length mirror says as much as her stuffed animal collection about the occupant; Daniel's junk hole reflects its tenant; Vera's dressed up mannequins display as much character as she does — and that is considerable; and so it goes.

The cast is superb. Particularly fine is Chapelle Jaffe as the mannequins' roommate, Vera Browne. Her knack for comic timing, her ability to underplay for masterly effect and her superbly and quietly

If these tenants have one thing in common it is their wish to be (and be seen as) someone else. Each creates and attempts to live in a fantasy world — a world that shatters the minute they leave their own room. Each room is a cell, each fantasy is a cell, and they feed as much upon their vision of themselves as they do on the peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. The inability of the characters to break through these cells is made even more apparent by the ability of the audience to move.

The focus of the play is difficult to pin down. Each room is its own set and each occupant his own cast. Except for the moments when they meet in the hall, we are really watching six or more separate plays running concurrently. There is a great deal of time spent when each character is isolated in his own room doing his "thing". Much of it is routine — not immaterial, just uninteresting. Recognizing this Palmer's directorial instincts were quite accurate. He encourages the audience to move about, selecting what it wishes to hone in on and choosing what interests it. The audience is forced to do what it does when it is not in a theatre and recognize the fact that it sees what it wishes to see. This audience manipulation is as much a part of the production concept as what the actors are actually doing.

Palmer has orchestrated the action beautifully. It is a masterful orchestration of distractions. As something erupts in one room with one character, the audience members scurry over to witness the event, like rats attacking a piece of cheese. By implication we become as much a part of the action as the cast. The audience is at once voyeur and blood sucker. To his credit, Palmer left the feeling implicit and in this way it is so much more insidious.

This is the kind of play that you'd like to come back and see six or seven times, once for each character. If it wasn't for an ending that was really the pits, I would. ed bean

Annie Fanny meets her double

Last Saturday at the York University comic convention, COSMICON IV, Harvey Kurtzman, the creator of Mad magazine and Playboy's "Little Annie Fanny" appeared with Michelle Urry, the cartoon editor for Playboy magazine.

The York University camera crew are setting up the lights and camera equipment while Harvey and Michelle analyse what approach to take to the panel discussion. The two have only just met, so they are making decisions quickly.

A student snapped pictures whispering "Just act natural — just act natural . . ." Michelle parts her glossy lips and answers back, "Act natural. You just act natural — you just act natural." A taut line draws her lips into a smile. Harvey gives a Kurtzman laugh and everything is natural.

Anne Scottin, York Student Council President, decides to start the show; She proudly introduces her guests. Questions are requested from the audience, but, "Michelle isn't going to answer any embarrassing questions, like, 'Do you enjoy sex?'" Anne laughs heavily into the microphone, obviously pleased with her illustration.

Harvey takes the microphone, "I'll answer all your embarrassing questions . . ."

In denim shirt, (middle buttons undone) denim pants, white sweat socks and desert boots, Harvey starts, "Now we'd like you to write your questions on this paper," he tears apart a pad. "Have you got any pencils? . . ."

Meanwhile Michelle, also wearing a denim suit, but of a "perfectly-patched-exclusive-couturier-design", retires to her seat and starts to smoke, her dark brown hair parted just off centre, subtly drooped over her angular face.

Michelle was born in the Canadian West. Her kin folk still live here, but Michelle "made it" down south". She tends to harbour a strong contempt for the lazy Canadians who have never "made it".

The questions are handed in and divided up. Harvey chuckles reading the first one, "Why are you asking us to write out these questions?" With his Kurtzman smile and cracked voice he answers, "Why are you asking us why we?" — Michelle shoves several sheets of paper under his pile — "are asking you to write out questions?" and throws the paper aside with an upward wrist motion.

Focus to Michelle. After careful selecting, she reads, "Why are there no famous women cartoonists?" Her shirt buttons undone, just showing the edge of her bra she replies, that women have a better sense of humour but that they are oppressed. "Women have never been allowed to laugh. If you look at books on rules of etiquette, in the past it was considered unattractive for a woman to laugh. It was unseemly and regarded as sexually provocative."

"Today the female humourist is the butt, if you'll pardon the expression, of her own jokes, like Totie Fields. But the dominant problem is that women are unsure of their subject matter. They are working in a taboo area. They are in a state of transition. Once they become more secure, more female artists will emerge."

With an air of finality, Michelle places the sheet of paper neatly under their chair.

"I would disagree with that one hundred per cent," Kurtzman says. "Somebody just mentioned, well, Bob Crumb was commenting on the fact that there are no groupies in the comic book industry . . ."

"Bob Crumb," Michelle interjects with knowing insight, "has contracted more cases of VD than any other person I know."

Harvey continues, stating that women lack an essential aggression that is an integral part of satire. The Kurtzman theory of self-laceration involving the comic and the cartoonist, the man "you laugh at, not with" is best illustrated with a few Will Elder stories.

Will Elder is Harvey's friend and co-worker on "Little Annie Fanny", "the one who draws all those crazy little figures in the corners".

"Will Elder is a wild man, a wild crazy mania. When we were in high school together, I used to see him in telephone booths with ketchup coming out of his mouth making frantic gestures. He was pretending to be a world war one fighter pilot."

"When he was a kid too, he led a gang in the Bronx. One day he decided that they would raid a meat freezer cart. Well they did and dressed the meat like children and lay the pieces on the railway tracks. Of course they were caught, and got into trouble."

"Also in the army, when they served goulash, he and a buddy would fill up hot water bottles with the goulash and go into town. They would place the hot water bottles under their shirts and head into a bar." They would open the bottles and pretend to vomit. Then Elder would get up and eat the mess.

There is something in Harvey's delivery that makes the audience roar with laughter. "They laugh," he says to the air, "you laugh. It's awful, but everyone laughs everytime I tell the story."

Michelle reads out some more questions. "Do cartoon editors get paid more than cartoonists?"

"Yes, most definitely."

"What do cartoon editors do?"

"Go to crazy conventions like this one."

"How did you become cartoon editor of Playboy?"

"It was luck."

Harvey assures the audience Michelle is a valuable commodity. The New Yorker has apparently offered her a job . . .

Michelle flashes her glossy teeth through her glossy lips and continues reading questions.

"Is there going to be a Playboy Club in Toronto?"

With a noticeable lack of en-dearment, she answers, "From the sound of these questions, I hope not."

The next question delights Harvey: could he talk about Bob Crumb the creator of Fritz the Cat and his adventures with Skip Wilson in the Playboy mansion? Rubbing his hand across the top of his head he says, "The last time I saw R. Crumb was at our place. He had brought Honeybunch Kaminsky with him. But the day he came to the Playboy Mansion he brought some friends with him and they all took their clothes off and went swimming. Well I saw Skip Wilson in the pool with no clothes on but I was told this was alright. 'You just worry if he shits in the pool,' and such a clean pool!"

Back to business and Michelle. Someone asks if Playboy accepts submissions from unknown artists. Michelle says yes but goes on to say there are a great many rejects.

"In the beginning I felt like Lady Macbeth running to wash my hands every half hour". Some of the cartoons she receives are totally out of step with what the magazine is all about. "I think some have never even looked at the magazine, just awful, strictly aberrational."

Someone asks from the floor what Playboy pays for cartoons. "I don't think that's of general interest to everyone here". A man behind me mumbles, everyone's interested in money." She continues, "Why don't you send me a NICE letter asking for this information. Besides, I can't remember the rates off hand."

After the question period is over, Harvey signs autographs and Michelle answers a few personal questions. It is now that I ask her the unmentionable question, to comment on the death of Bobbie Arntsen.

(Arntsen was the head secretary of the Playboy empire. She died from an over dose of drugs January 14.)

"No."
"You couldn't."
"No, I wouldn't. She was a very close friend."
She gets up and leaves.

Prospective candidates for election to the Governing Council are reminded that nomination papers must be filed by noon on Friday, February 14th, 1975. Nomination forms and copies of the regulations (Election Guidelines) covering the election are available from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, or the Registrars' Offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

There are vacancies in seven teaching staff constituencies (including three by-elections), and all eight seats in the three student categories.

Nominations must be signed by the following number of nominators:

- Teaching Staff — 10
- Graduate Students — 15
- Full-Time Undergraduate Students — 50
- Part-Time Undergraduate Students — 15

Present members of the Governing Council whose terms expire on June 30th next may be nominated again if they are continuing in the same constituencies for which they were elected previously. Those elected this year from the teaching staff constituency will serve for three years from July 1st, 1975, except those elected in by-elections, and from student constituencies for one year, as required by The University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Descriptions of the constituencies were published in the Varsity on January 27th, last. Enquiries for further information should be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 928-2160.

Election shall be by mailed ballot.

Au courant with the Chalmers

From my vantage point behind a vast sugary collation of jelly rolls and chocolate covered blobs I watched the livestock parade for the 1974 Chalmers Award.

There was Reaney — a slightly balding thoroughbred; Tremblay, jolly and hairy hooved; Salutin — very fiery little number that, nipping at everyone's heels, anti-bourgeois pedigre nailed to the shafts; Jack Winter in harness with Cedric Smith — Winters a bit heavy round the girth, Smith lean and seedy but both pretty cocky, stepping it out a predigested phrase a minute. And at the centre the red-eyed master of the ring, Herbert Whittaker, hot from New York, obviously tired and very confused. On the dais, the honoured patrons of the event, Mr. and Mrs. Chalmers. And in Mr. Chalmers' pocket the reason we're all here. No, Amanda, not a declaration of love for things theatrical, but money: $5000 for The Play of the Year, $2,500 for the runners up, and $500 for A Significant Contribution.

At the very sight of that bulging pocket, they're off! Winter and Smith are away to a fine start, tugging their bandwagon of Canadian quotations. A soupcon of social consciousness seems to have greased the wheels. Salutin is right alongside and it's neck-and-neck. All three are breaking into toetapping song as they round the turn. Reaney is nowhere in sight. He appears to be back at the start jiggling about with some little eyes evidently under the impression that he is moving at great speed through the Ontario countryside. Tremblay has just shot off a couple of untranslatable one-liners. He is creating quite a stir in the crowd with his kinky Cleo wig, and . . . Wait! He seems to be on a completely different track! Yes! Tremblay has just been gathered up in a cloud of cheap eau de cologne and wafted off to the Plaza Saint-Hubert. Winter and Smith are falling behind so it's Salutin and Reaney for the finish. Whittaker has staggered to the stand. It's over! Salutin by a short head! In a magnificent gesture he dedicates the entire prize money to The Mummies' Guild in Newfoundland. From behind the jelly rolls we applaud wildly.

But there seems to be something wrong . . . It can't be something wrong . . . Whittaker has balled it up! Salutin isn't the winner after all! It's Reaney — and all the publicity handouts have been printed up already so he'll just have to take first place . . . Never has there been a more photofinish. Tremblay has vanished under the table cloth. People are breaking into tears and sneers. Writhing and coiling fill the hall.

And here he comes, myth Ontario, clutching his cheque. Salutin has retreated into a corner, muttering "This is what happens when provincial critics try to pretend they're New York. Pack of bushers." Reaney makes a plea for more humane treatment of the livestock in future contests. "At present there's a bit too much theatre of cruelty, a bit too much Artaud," he comments. We applaud again, and it's over. We break into tiny bitching groups for the real fun of the evening.

theatre

Sorry for the wrong information contained in last week's Whatsup; Bonjour la Bonjour opened this week at the Tarragon. I think I can vouch for dates and places this week anyway: Free Theatre's The Pits sounds promising. (See review p. 12) It will be around till February 16. You also have plenty of time to catch A SoupSong; it runs till March 1st at Enoch Turner School House. The Solzhenitsyn play, Article 58 (otherwise known as The Lovegirl and the Innocent) plays at the St. Lawrence till February 15. Yards of skin over at Passe Muraille for another week or so — and I Love You Baby Blue may be extended after its official closing date — February 9th. The Royal Alex, for those who can afford it, is opening another Brit Com. on February 3rd. It's The Jockey Club Stakes with Willfred Hyde White. Those desperate for diversion in any form might try that, plus Frogs at Hart House (closes February 1st) plus School for Scandal at the Colonnade. (Closes February 6th.) If you are of a more serious disposition, a company new to Toronto, Le Theatre d l'Homme, is presenting Krapp's Last Tape. (Phoenix Theatre till February 9th.) And if melancholy is such that all you want to do is hole up somewhere with your TV or your radio, well, you can receive Ten Lost Years by tube on February 2nd, and Wycherley's The Country Wife courtesy of CBC Mon. February 4th.

A chance to wield power in the art world!

Hart House elections will be taking place Feb. 12 and nominations for committee membership remain open until next Wednesday, Feb. 5. The Hart House collection is the most valuable private collection of Canadian art and this is maintained and added to every year by the Art Committee. As a means of discovering the works of new artists for purchase and gallery exhibition, the Art Committee visits artists in their studios, collectors, private, public, and commercial galleries. They also sponsor programs and talks, (such as the Romantic Rebellion television series currently being shown, at Hart House). There are eleven members on the committee, most of them students, and they claim to want people of different tastes and interests. Application and nomination forms are available at the program office at Hart House and you are only eligible to run for one committee.

Next Tuesday an exhibition of wall hangings by various artists opens at Hart House. The response has been very favourable to the Claudette Boulanger crayon drawings currently being shown — people say that they're glad to have something that they can understand for a change! Ruth Tulving's "erotic serigraphs", which were shown at the Faculty of Architecture in the fall, have made their way out to Scarborough College's Meeting Place Gallery from Feb. 3 to Feb. 17. The exhibition "What is Man?", is described by the artist as "an attempt to depict the male model as seen through a female artist's eyes". Another female artist probing heavy subject matter is Joan Chisolm whose paintings will be showing at the KAA gallery, 4 Kensington Ave., until Feb. 9. The invitation reads "I love you. Is thought different from emotion?" Himm'm. Former U of I eminent, Barker Fairley, has an exhibition of recent work opening at the Slesler Gallery on Baldwin St. this Sunday. Until Feb. 20.

Once again the call goes out: if you've got a hankering to write about music, this is your big chance! The Varsity Review needs writers of all sorts, and if your idea of fun can encompass scribbling down your impressions of a record or a concert, you shouldn't pass the experience up. Besides, it's a great way to get free records and concerts. Drop me a line at the Varsity, or make a visit!

How many orchestras can you name in this city? Whatever number you came up with, add one to it, because this weekend marks the inaugural concert of the new Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra, conducted by Victor Feldbrill. This Sunday evening at 8:30 pm, the MacMillan Theatre of the Edward Johnson Building, home of the Faculty of Music, will play host to this new group. Program includes Shostakovich's "Festive Overture" and Dvorak's 6th, so come on out. Student admission is a steal at $1.00.

A smashing concert is in store for the lucky 700 or so who will see Anton Kuerti at Hart House this Sunday afternoon at 3:00 pm. Sonata no. 25, the "Diabelli" variations, and the "Appassionata" sonata are on the bill, along with Kuerti's wise and witty verbal annotations to the music.

The Varsity — Janet Clarke

Massey Hall goes choral next Tuesday and Wednesday nights as Elmer Iseler, the Mendelssohn Choir, and four vocal soloists (including John Shirley-Quirk) perform with the TSO. Program includes Bach's Cantata no. 80 ("Eine Feste Burg ist unser Gott") and Vaughan Williams' "Donna Nobis Pacem", a spectacular piece rarely heard in concert. $3-9, rush tickets for $2 at 7:00 pm.

The St. Lawrence piano series rolls along, bringing us Montreal musician Richard Gresko on Thursday night. His program includes the original "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Mussorgsky. $5 and $4.

If you're stuck home that night, check out CBC's continuing talent festival. This week the newcomers are: pianist Gifford Toole playing Beethoven's third concerto, and flautist Margaret Pritchett with Mozart's G Major concerto. 7:03 on the FM, 8:03 on the AM, next Thursday night.

A weekend of stars coming up: tomorrow night, cellist Mstislav Rostropovich plays Massey Hall, tickets $3-12, and very hard to come by now. Luciano Pavarotti, the king-size tenor with the unbelievable top register, comes in on Sunday afternoon. Should be a shouting match between the fans to see who can cheer the loudest. A sure sellout.

Finally, Glenn Gould fans (or foes) can whet their ears on another sample of his "contrapuntal radio" this Wednesday at 9:30 on CBC-TV. It'll be interesting to see how Gould, the acknowledged aural whiz will fare on the tube. The program is about "the flight from Order", going from the years 1910-1920.

Forget what various people have said about there not being a glutted concert market this year. Promoters a few weeks ago just didn't want to announce all the signings they'd made, probably because their lists showed little of an impressive nature. But if you're ready for the lineup, here goes.

At Massey Hall you can see Leonard Cohen tonight, the Straubs on Feb. 6, Roxy Music on Feb. 10, Murray McLaughlin on Feb. 15, Herb Alpert & The Tijuana Brass, and Queen on Feb. 28.

At Con Hall there's Lynnyrd Skynyrd on Sunday night, and Sonny Terry & Brownie McGee on Feb. 16, with guest artist, David Amram. March 9 offers Steelee Span, and jazz pianist Keith Jarrett is coming in for a show on March 21.

At the Gardens, Motown superstar Marvin Gaye gives his first Toronto performance on Feb. 6, and at Seneca College, Maynard Ferguson's fabulous big band appears on Sunday night, and Two Generations of Brubeck are dropping in on Feb. 17.

The El Mocambo offers John Lee Hooker until Saturday night and then has the new Iron Butterfly coming in for Feb. 3-4. Rounding out the week is the rather interesting, Goose Creek Symphony who'll be there Feb. 5-8.

This week Victoria College's Beaver's presents Mariposa stars the Original Sloth Band, who between the three members, play something like 20 instruments. Doing a guest set is David McBride, who dropped into the club for a set a few weeks ago and didn't leave until after an encore. Beaver's is located in the basement of Wymilwood, at 150 Charles St. W.

The Times Literary Supplement has ended its practice of anonymous reviews. Old news this. But the decision was the most visible sign that the paper had a new editor — John Gross replacing Arthur Crook whose fifteen year editorship has been criticized as "custodial" and "too reverential" and whose TLS was disliked by many because it rested too often on its reputation. But what is an even more significant sign of the new editor is the stunning quality of some of the articles that have been appearing under Gross' editorship. I receive the TLS by freight and it's mailed to my parents' home and I haven't been home in a while so I am not up to date. And I have no copies here with me. But if you're interested you might check the (air mail) copy of the TLS in the Robarts.

The TLS Commentary section has also become more inclusive in what it comments on. And the paper is relying more on pictures and graphics.

The principle of anonymity was not done away with without dissent. As Kingsley Amis noted at the time, "once you start attaching names you start attaching NAMES!" Its abandonment was seen by many as a sign that the Thomson men (eminent Canadian philistine Thomson owns the paper) had got their man in the editorship and that strong efforts would be made to make the paper of more interest to more people, more saleable. Names sell papers better than no names. The Times Literary Supplement has the same financial problems the Times itself has.

(It is of course the TLS whose layout style Janet Clarke and yours truly have been trying to imitate in The Varsity Review, at some times with more fervour than at others, with lots of boxes and short headlines, with all the relevant information gathered together at the head of the review, and with a certain "incised" quality. You hadn't noticed?)

Anonymity is not the problem at The Varsity. Pseudonyms are. Or rather one pseudonym is. I first started writing reviews under the name "Tom Hallam" in the first issue of this school year because I already had one big article under my own name in that issue, and because the particular article published under the Hallam byline was an art review: I thought I might continue doing art reviews, as jeux d'esprit, much as C. Day Lewis wrote detective stories as Nicholas Blake. And as Fulford notes, in Marshall Delaney at the Movies, about his pseudonym, "Delaney almost immediately assumed a personality of his own, and frequently it warred with Fulford's. Delaney was more personal, for one thing; he wrote occasionally about his childhood, a thing Fulford would never have done. He was more audacious in his judgments and theories, and rather more given to wide-ranging cultural references. He was a more confident writer, and at times a better one." I too was interested in what Hallam would do next. But also as the year went on, as I had less and less time to do any writing, I left myself time only to be dissatisfied with any article that I actually did do, and I gladly printed it under another name.

Now you know. Two student literary journals have been out for a couple of weeks now. Acta Victoriana the journal that gave Margaret Atwood her start, is left in piles at strategic places around Vic: you just pick it up if you're interested. Writ published by the Innis College Writing Lab costs $1.50 from the U of T Bookroom, SCM, etc.) but since SAC has given it financial support it has received some copies for free distribution. Check the SAC offices and the various SAC display stands.

Acta is probably more visually satisfying than Writ. It contains some interesting photographs — a number of them by The Varsity's own Brian Pel. Writ has no illustrations.

At least one other literary journal, centred at UC, is still soliciting contributions. Send poems, stories, novel excerpts, plays, criticism, graphics, photographs to The UC Writing Group, care of the Registrar's Office, UC. Deadline for submissions is 14 February.

I'm involved with the group that is putting this journal out. (Ah-ah!)

You might catch the Radio Varsity show Stories thursdays nights at 10:30 pm. One hour, two hours before the show you are solicited to phone in a story, preferably original, which you read over the phone onto a tape. The taped stories are then played back together over the air — and the best story wins a record! Core! The co-ordinator is Gary Middleholt.

It was by all accounts an interesting evening in the Hart House library on Wednesday with Claude Bissell. Fletcher Markle is coming up next, in February . . .

Further to our first mention of the Hart House Library Committee-sponsored Poetry Festival (to be held next fall) Thom Gunn and the Australian poet, Alex Hope, are also coming . . .

That's it, anyway, for this week's trivia fix.

V-Ball Blues may make playoffs

By TOM WOODS

While volleyball has not yet reached the popularity level of intercollegiate athletics' big three—football, hockey, and basketball—it is making rapid gains in interest and enjoyment on Ontario university campuses, according to Blues' coach Reg Eadie.

The Blues, currently preparing for their three final matches in regular season play at Ryerson on Sunday, have their work cut out for them if they hope to win a playoff spot.

Laurentian and Queen's hold down the top two spots in the seven team eastern division of the OUAA. To qualify for post season play the Blues must knock off the Gaels. Should the remaining games go as expected (with the Blues winning the other two encounters) Varsity and Queen's would be tied for second and it would be up to the statisticians to determine the winner — and here's where the problem begins.

Says Eadie, "the rules state that the winner will be determined on the basis of games played between the two tied teams (which would be even) and then on the basis of games between the 'next' team in the standings. No one seems to know whether this means the team above or below the tied teams. In any case the first job is to beat Queen's."

Laurentian has dominated OUAA play thus far and should maintain their unbeaten record through Sunday's action.

Eadie feels two factors have contributed to the surprising success of this year's squad compared to past Blues' units.

"The new ruling barring Ontario Volleyball Association players from competing in OUAA play has improved the team unity since, unlike past years, half the team is not playing for outside clubs.

"The other thing is the improved practice hours we have received this year. In past, volleyball has been assigned times like 9:30-11 pm, whereas now we work out twice a week at 5 pm, and have only one late evening. This of course makes it easier for the players."

Eadie is optimistic that Toronto will come to the forefront in Ontario volleyball in the years ahead. There is no doubt that Toronto high schools have the best volleyball in the province, and it appears only a matter of time before U of T comes up with a provincial or even a CIAU winner.

Alpine ski team report

U of T men's alpine ski team is more green than blue this weekend.

The team for the RMC dual slalom meet tomorrow includes rookies Bruce Ball and Andy Wilkes, and new first-team members Steve Pronoti and Paul Gordon, who will join veteran Britt Roberts.

The women's team will carry 8 to the race and select 5 to run, including Cindy Rogers, 9th in last week's opening race at the Ontario Series, and Marion Howard, an import from McMaster, who was 12th last week.

The men's team is in third place with 8 points behind Queens with 10 and Carleton with 9, after the first race.

This is the order of last year's finish, which was the basis for these three teams competing in the Can-Am Intercollegiate Alpine Ski Series at the beginning of January. If the three team domination continues, they will represent Ontario in the Can-Am Series II in Maine in mid March. The women's team finished well back.

Western leads the women's series followed by Queens. Competition is exceptionally high calibre this year with two girls off the national team and many racers with national experience.

The only U of T skiers with series standings to date are Cindy Rogers, 2 points, and Doug Carter, who received 9 points for a 2nd place finish last week. (He is unable to compete tomorrow)

Alpine ski racing has made considerable progress in combining men's and women's competition. If conditions hold, men and women often race the same courses, which encourages top women competitors to compete their times with top men's.

After the first run last week, Carolyn Oughton of Waterloo (formerly with the National Ski team) was ahead of all but one man. Training and racing the same courses has often been cited as the reason for Canadian women's prowess in alpine skiing.

New edges UC

By JOHN MIKA

UC's player-coach Bobrovich told his players before the New-UC interfac basketball tilt, "they're bigger, faster, and better than us." His characterization seemed valid as the scoreboard read 33-25 in favour of the Gnu's at half time.

However, New's height advantage wasn't matched by a control of the backboards, and their quickness was negated by numerous turnovers. The key to New's win was Rudmik, who used his speed to drive past defenders for layups, and whose brilliant outside shooting gave him a 29 point total at the match's end.

The game was in question until the final buzzer as UC's furious playing at the start of the second half combined with Gourel's 15 point performance unerved NC.

New finally emerged the victors by the slim margin of 60-56.

Faculty of Arts and Science Council and Committees

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ELECTION

One half of the elected membership of the Council and its Committees retires each year, to be replaced by elected members who will be elected for two years. The following summary relates particularly to the responsibilities of the elected student and faculty members of Council and the function and role of the Committees on which they will serve.

The major committee in the structure is the General Committee which has 49 elected students, 91 elected faculty and 59 ex-officio members such as College Heads, Department Chairmen and representatives of other Faculties. The General Committee is responsible for the formulation of policy for the Faculty of Arts and Science. It is concerned, for example, with curriculum development, admissions policy, study abroad programmes, and evaluation policy, and determines the regulations governing the length of the academic session and day. It also serves as a forum for discussion of any matters of general concern to the Faculty, from which resolutions may be sent to other bodies, including the Governing Council of the University. Some student members of the General Committee are elected directly to it (2 full-time from each College (except Woodsworth) and 3 part-time (Woodsworth College) students giving a total of 17). The remainder assume their seats automatically upon election to one of the five Curriculum Committees, or the Committee on Counselling, or Study Elsewhere. Membership on all Committees is normally for a two-year renewable term.

There are five curriculum committees: Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Sciences, Life Sciences and Interdisciplinary Studies, the last of which is also responsible for various special courses in the Faculty. Each committee is chaired by an Associate Dean and has 3 full-time students, 1 part-time student, and 6 faculty members. These committees review all course proposals submitted by Departments for inclusion in the Calendar, and may take initiative in proposing development of new areas of study and any other matters pertaining to the course offerings.

The Counselling Committee has 1 student member from each College and 4 faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members. This committee is responsible for co-ordination of counselling for undergraduates in Arts and Science and for secondary school students interested in eventually entering the Faculty. While many individuals and offices on the campus are involved in counselling of one kind or another, students all too often do not receive the information and advice which they need at critical points during their years at the University.

The Committee on Study Elsewhere supervises the arrangements through which students in the Faculty may spend a year abroad to facilitate their studies in certain disciplines. It will have four full-time students and four faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members.

In addition there is an Academic Standards Committee, a Committee on Standing, and an Admissions Committee. Appointed faculty and ex-officio persons will sit on these committees.

A list of positions that are open has been published in the University media and is available at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall, College and Departmental offices and the APUS office. In addition, a complete description of the structure of the Council and the accompanying rules of procedure may be obtained on request from the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

NOMINATIONS OPENED FEBRUARY 3

Full-time and part-time students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science are eligible for nomination to the following committees: General Committee, Committee on Study Elsewhere, Counselling Committee, curriculum Committee on Humanities, curriculum Committee on Interdisciplinary Studies, curriculum Committee on Life Sciences, curriculum Committee on Physical Sciences, curriculum Committee on Social Sciences. For nomination to a curriculum committee other than Interdisciplinary Studies, a full-time student must be intending to take at least three courses within the group in the next academic year.

Nominations open on February 3. Nomination forms may then be obtained at the Faculty Office, College Registrar's offices or Departmental offices, and the APUS office. Completed nomination forms must be returned to the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall prior to 4:00 p.m. February 14 to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box. Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392.

Blues avenge loss to Waterloo

By PAUL CARSON

Goaltender Mark Logan created a problem Wednesday night but it's probably the type of situation that Blues' hockey coach Tom Watt would like to have more of.

Logan, playing only his second game in the Varsity net, stopped 24 of 26 Waterloo shots as Blues edged the defending CIAU champion Warriors 3-2 in a hard-fought exhibition game played before about 1,500 at the Arena.

"Don't forget Logan hasn't played much at all since he hurt his back two years ago when playing for Oshawa in the OHA Junior A loop," Watt commented after the game.

"I thought he played quite well, and yes, this does give us three goaltenders with Logan, Dave Hulme and Bob Oss."

It could prove to be an embarrassment of riches since only two netminders can dress for any game and, of course, only one can play goal at any one time. What is Watt going to do, since unlike a professional coach, he can't make trades.

"I guess you might say I have a problem," quipped Watt as he headed off to check on the state of Blues' lengthy injury list.

Apparently the corps of walking wounded didn't increase despite the heavy stick and body contact that featured Wednesday's game. However, centers Bill Fifield and Ivan McFarlane plus winger Ron Harris and veteran defenceman Brent Swanick will all miss tonight's league game against Guelph set for the Arena at 8:00 pm.

Defenceman Al Milnes played despite his stitches and sore ankle and ironically was involved in the year's first official fight as he and Warrior forward Peter Ascherl drew majors and the automatic game misconduct for a brief scuffle late in the final period.

Overall, the game was exciting but far from artistic as both teams made numerous defensive errors, missed passes, and generally fouled up an almost never-ending series of potentially good scoring chances.

Warriors opened the scoring at 14:39 of the first period courtesy of a Varsity blunder behind Blues' net which allowed center Lee Barnes to sneak in front of the goal and slide a quick shot between Logan's legs.

Blues tied the score thanks to a similar defensive mistake as a Warrior winger inexplicably rushed to the players' bench while Blues were busily forechecking his teammates in the final seconds of the period.

Thus, Waterloo was in effect playing shorthanded when Warren Anderson fired a long screen shot past a very surprised Bob Hnatyk with only one second remaining.

Warriors were still muttering about that goal as the second period began and suddenly it was 2-1 as Gord Davies converted a Kent Ruhnke rebound after only 24 seconds of play.

Rookie center Bob Adoranti collected the eventual winning goal five minutes later as he poked home a loose puck in the Waterloo goal crease as Warriors defence stood around waiting for referee Bob Nadin to blow his whistle.

Moments later defenceman Charlie Hughes levelled Waterloo winger Ron Hawkshaw with the best (legal) check of the night, but the remainder of the period saw no further scoring in spite of several good chances at both ends.

Blues were content to play defence in the final period, thus forcing Logan to make a series of excellent saves. Waterloo finally narrowed the score when center Eric Brubacher converted a long breakaway pass with exactly two minutes remaining.

Warriors pulled the goaltender in the final minute but Davis made two key defensive plays to preserve the victory, which partially atones for Blues' 4-3 defeat in Waterloo two weeks ago.

Blues are now undefeated at home after ten league and exhibition games, only a 4-4 tie against Laurentian mars a perfect record. On the road the team has 12 wins and eight losses.

Left-winger Doug Herridge remains the top scorer with 37 points, followed by Ruhnke 34, McFarlane 32, Harris 29 and Davies 26.

Ruhnke, as expected, leads in goals scored with 20, trailed by McFarlane 17, Davies 12 and Harris 12.

Herridge is far ahead in assists with 26, Harris and Milnes share second at 17.

Anderson's goal in first was well-placed shot.

OUAA hockey league revamped to three-five team divisions

By MIKE FRIEND

The OUAA hockey hierarchy has decided to stamp out the inequalities of the present league set-up.

Next year it is proposed that the league will consist of three divisions all having five teams. The divisions are made up on the basis of calibre of play and geographical considerations.

In division I will toil Toronto, York, Queen's, Ottawa and Laurentian. Division II will have Waterloo, Laurier, Western, Guelph and Windsor. The third division will see McMaster, RMC, Ryerson, Brock, and a new entry, Trent University in Peterborough.

It has been proposed that each team will play a home-and-home series with the other teams in its division as well as four inter-division games. Each team will then play 12 league games.

The actual schedule is not yet finalized but the tentative schedule has Toronto playing McMaster, Waterloo, Guelph, and Western as the inter-division games.

Interfac playoff race tight in div II A

By DAVE STUART

In division IA interfac hockey, SMC, Erin, and Vic I are running away. The three teams are heads and shoulders above the rest of the division but only four points separate the squads. Vic I is in first place with 21 points followed by Erin with 18 and SMC A with 17.

PHE A has 12 points while Law I has 13 and are fighting for the fourth and last playoff spot. PHE A defeated Law 4-3 in an earlier encounter so phys-ed has the nod so far.

Sr Eng has only two wins in 12 starts and are groping but there are eight games remaining.

Scar I and Dent A are fighting for first in division IB with Scar holding 13 points and the dentists with 15. Each has won once over the other. Meds A and Grad I are striving for the last two playoff spots. Meds has nine points on two wins and five ties while Grads sports four wins and two ties for 10 points.

Still in the running are New I and UC I but hopes are thin. New has one win in 12 starts while UC doubled that with two wins — one by default over New.

The division IIA race is much tighter. Jr Eng leads with 8 points but breathing down skule's neck are For A with 17 points, PHE B with 15, Knox I with 15, and SMC B with 16. Innis I, Vic II, and Fac Ed are just treading water and are hoping for next year.

Three teams are dominating division IIB. Pharm A have not lost all year, winning nine and tying one against Scar II.

Scar II and UC II are battling for second place, each sporting seven wins this year. Emman is slowing pulling ahead of the rest of the rabble in anticipation of the final playoff spot.

Music, Mgt. St., Law I, and New II are pulling for the basement of the division with New favoured in view of their horrendous 1-7 season. Happy Harold Ballard is probably scouting them.

These four teams play for recreation not wins.

Blues dump Voyageurs

By DAVE STUART

In OUAA basketball action Tuesday night at Sudbury, the Blues decisively downed the Laurentian Voyageurs 83-58.

Laurentian, current east division leaders with a 9-1 record, were dismayed by the team work displayed by the Blues. Probably the most significant feature of the game was the Blues hit 11 of 14 foul shots for 11 points. This unusually high percentage for the Blues was almost the entire margin of victory.

The improvement in free-shots coincides with the beginning of Blues' two game win streak, over Carleton and Laurentian.

Jon Fjeld led the Blues with 19 points followed by Filinski with 17 and Skyvington with 15.

Blues' record is now 5-4 with key games on the horizon. Ottawa is in town tonight for a tough game at the Benson Bld. at 8:15. Toronto will be out to avenge the earlier loss this year.

Two easier wins over RMC and a tough return match over York will guarantee a playoff spot for the Blues.

Blues' scoring for the game went as follows: Fox-16, Scott-14, Kurezyk-2, Filinski-17, and Fjeld-19.

Varsity judo successful

By CHRIS PREOBRAZENSKI

Those fellows in the baggy white outfits and coloured belts known as the Varsity judoka travelled to Kingston last weekend and encountered stiff competition as well as partial judging.

Toronto took two first place finishes in the brown and black belt divisions. Raymond Leung was first in the 139 lb. division and Greg Dovlet took first in the 176 lb. division. Tiskovsky took third in the 154 lb. class.

In the intermediate class, Don Cosack placed second and Rolf Brockman third in their respective divisions.

The Blues are now preparing for the OUAA championships which Toronto has won five times in a row.

Differences on complex 'irreconcilable'

Both administration and residents' representatives left a meeting last night on the proposed athletics complex convinced that their differences were almost irreconcilable.

The meeting, organized by SAC last week after a discussion with residents' groups, drew to a close with both administrator Jack Dimond and residents' spokesman Alan McAllister stating the reasons for their refusal to compromise with one another.

The U of T's proposed athletic complex, which has been exempted from the city's 45-foot holding bylaw, has drawn the ire of residents' groups. SAC, in the meantime, has felt itself "caught in the middle," as until last week it was being asked to authorize a referendum for a student levy to allow construction of the building.

The U of T administration last week dropped its proposal to ask students to pay for the construction of the building through a multi-year capital levy.

McAllister, from the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association, said the residents "haven't opposed an athletic building as such," but added the scale, height and massiveness of the proposed building were something residents could not tolerate.

The residents, McAllister noted, have chosen to live in the inner city, yet the university "if it hasn't actually destroyed our neighborhood, has made it less viable."

McAllister charged the university hadn't made any concessions to residents' groups in the drawing up of plans for the building, but had been "presenting us with a finished plan."

"We as downtown residents have a lot of compromising to do," said one resident spokesperson. "And you've got compromising to do because you're a downtown community."

Sussex-Ulster resident Joan Doiron urged the university to "see yourself as a downtown community," and urged U of T to sit down and plan the building with residents because "you should be serving us."

Athletics department staff members vigorously defended the concept of the building, saying it was a "Ford, not a Cadillac," and that the building represented the bare accommodation of present need rather than the projection of future needs.

"We needed that building 15 years ago," intramural director Dave Copp told the meeting.

In a recent letter to internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, athletics department staff members have said they will not give any support to a building which incorporates anything less than the present proposals.

Physical education staffer Bruce Kidd, who authored a task force report on the need for improved athletics facilities, said completion of the building would move the university from 4.5 square feet per student to 11.3 square feet, still much less than many major universities.

Jack Dimond, special assistant to Conway and in charge of the building, says he expects to know by the end of the month where the university will be able to find alternative funding for the building, and to what extent the university will still be willing to commit itself to its construction.

"Without a building of this size," Kidd added, "we don't think we could do an adequate job."

"You can't think big about athletics," McAllister countered.

Residents' spokesmen warned SAC representatives they were far too late in attempting to take a position either for or against the building, since it had already escaped scrutiny under the height bylaw.

"I hope you like the building," noted one resident, "cos you're stuck with it."

Noting the inflexibility of both the administration and the community groups, Kanowitch said, "I think if there's anything SAC can do it's to define this building."

Immigration policies racist, Douglas says

By DONALD COLE

Canada's immigration policies have always been racist, charged Rosie Douglas, an active member of the black community in Canada.

Speaking at a forum Friday night, Douglas urged over 120 people attending to protest the ongoing deportation of Haitians and other Caribbean people.

"The Caribbean provided more skilled people (for Canada) than any other part of the world in 1969," Douglas said.

He foresaw the granting of "more discretionary powers to immigration officials" to stem what white racists in Canada regard as the "undesirable influx" of black people.

Referring to the protests against racial discrimination at Sir George Williams University (SGWU) in 1969, Douglas spoke of his and others' actions as a fight of "black students and white supporters against those who control the economy of the Caribbean."

Prominent Canadian capitalists on the SGWU's board of governors were those involved in Canada's over $1 billion investment in the Caribbean.

Douglas cited 70 percent Canadian control of banking, 20 percent profit return rates and Canadian military training in Jamaica in denouncing Canadian imperialism in the Caribbean.

Control over the importation of cheap labor from underdeveloped areas into Canada is part of this imperialist relationship, Douglas asserted.

Outlining the history of Canadian immigration policy, Douglas said in 1838 Clifford Sifton helped develop official Canadian policy to keep black people out of Canada.

Douglas read letters written in 1914 by civil servants to immigration officers with instructions on means to cover up the understood policy of barring Negroes from entry into Canada.

Although the designation of "non-preferred immigrants" was abolished in 1956, Douglas said, the discretionary power of immigration officials still maintains effective discrimination.

Instrumental in the formation of the Black Workers Alliance, Douglas called for "control of the means of production or else Black and Beautiful remains very empty, very abstract."

Douglas also described his own experiences with racism in Canada during his 12½ years here.

He now faces deportation back to Dominica for being a "risk for national security," as the certificate denying him appeal on humanitarian grounds states.

The Canadian immigration department can expel any immigrant from Canada by this means without having to bring evidence forward to back up their decision.

The judge presiding at Douglas' case has himself protested the pressure being put on him to uphold the deportation order in court Tuesday, Douglas said.

A member of the Action Committee against the Deportation of the Haitians from Montreal spoke of Douglas' case as "a political case."

To protest Douglas' possible deportation and oppose the continuing persecution of immigrants in Canada, the alliance has called a demonstration for today at 5:30 pm at the immigration offices at Dundas St. and University Ave.

OFS to meet with gov't on fees

Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) representatives plan to protest the possibility of increased tuition costs and diminishing quality of education in Ontario at a meeting with the colleges and universities ministry in two weeks.

OFS officials told a press conference Friday they were sceptical about tentative student loan increases, since the financial burden of students who have graduated would only increase.

The loan increases, according to government documents that the OFS has obtained, would be to a maximum of $1,900.

The documents suggest a rate of repayment schedule in proportion to the graduating student's income.

The documents also suggest that loans be allocated according to the occupation in which the student would eventually be employed.

OFS would rather see increased grants to students in need.

The loan increases, OFS representatives felt, indicate the alarming possibility of tuition increases as a result of government cutbacks.

These increases were suggested by the Ontario government's Coxwell Report of 1972, which is the basis of the OFS fears.

Ultimately, education will be available only to those who can afford it, or to students willing to "mortgage their futures" under the student loan plan, OFS spokespeople pointed out.

Government cutbacks will also result in increased class sizes, a higher rate of turnover in the underpaid support staff, a more acute shortage of laboratory equipment and other aspects of the decreasing quality of education, OFS spokespeople felt.

University of Ottawa students have already petitioned the government to assure it that the bilingual status of both Ottawa and York University's Glendon campus is threatened by cutbacks.

Richard Wilson of Laurentian University said the university's responsibility of providing education for small centres in northern Ontario would be more difficult to fulfill because of cutbacks.

OFS representatives discussed the issues of both cutbacks and loans with various members of the opposition parties earlier on Friday, and said they found these members sympathetic.

In a policy statement, the Ontario Liberal party has maintained, "the concept of cost ceilings for education is unrealistic."

The OFS executive has been seeking an appointment with the colleges and universities ministry for some time, but the ministry has apparently had no time for such an appointment.

OFS research coordinator Karoly Kendrick feels that the government is procrastinating the meeting until the end of this legislature session.

OFS gave no precise indication of when cutbacks would result in higher tuition costs.

Kendrick felt that the loan increases might be effective by 1976.

The OFS executive felt that by "reforming the tax base" increased grants to students and more money for universities would be feasible.

Anti-racist demonstration set

The Alliance against Racism and Political repression decided Thursday night to hold a demonstration in Toronto May 10 to protest the deportation of 1,500 Haitians from Canada.

The recently formed alliance is designed to coordinate the action of independent groups in the Toronto area against racism. It will begin immediate work on immigration questions.

Among the organizations supporting the alliance are the Toronto Committee to Liberate Southern Africa, the Black Student Union, the Black Education Project, the Marxist Institute, the Development Education Centre, the Communist Party and other left wing groups.

The alliance feels the Haitian deportation is a dangerous precedent which could create an atmosphere of racism and promote increasing cutbacks in immigration from the third world.

The group is conducting a campaign which will also include a rally in Toronto in early March with prominent speakers from the black community.

People who support the Haitians are being urged to send telegrams to immigration minister Robert Andras protesting the government's actions and Canada's racist immigration policy.

The activities planned are being coordinated with the work of a similar committee in Montreal. Among the speakers at Thursday's meeting were John Rodriguez, and Felipe Filsame from the Montreal committee. A steering committee was formed which will coordinate activities.

Wanna go to college? Not if you're poor....

By LIAM LACEY

If recommendations of a federal-provincial government task force on student aid become law, students from low-income families will be less likely to attend college, SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said at a SAC general meeting Thursday evening.

The Canadian Student Loan Committee proposed in October that the present maximum loan ceiling be raised from $1,400 to $1,900, allowing for a decrease in the grant portion of student aid.

"People don't want to come out of an arts or science program without a job and a $5,000 debt over their heads," said Kanowitch. "Studies through the 1960s show that the high loans prove a real deterrent to students of a lower socio-economic background," he pointed out.

Kanowitch suggested the CSLC recommendations should provide added incentive to the Student Aid Committee's drive to collect 7,000 signatures on a petition urging changes in the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP).

He pointed out that in the last four years there has been a 30 percent cut in student aid, a 30 percent increase in applicants and a 20 percent decrease in the value of money.

SAC's communications commissioner Michael Sabia, reported all was well with Radio Varsity under its newly appointed board of directors under chairman Wes Brown.

But Sabbia announced he had just received notice the university was unwilling to allow an antenna on the Roberts library roof, thereby forcing radio engineers to look for a new site.

The university also refuses to give a decision on whether or not it will allow an FM station on campus until SAC issues its report on the station March 1.

Fired for pregnancy, rehired

The U of T hired a worker for its offices at 215 Huron St. who was dismissed unjustly by the library for taking pregnancy leave.

This oddity came to light after the settlement of a grievance in favor of the union, filed on behalf of fired library worker Mary Rowana. Rowana will now remain at her job at 215 Huron.

Rowana complained because she was fired for leaving her job at the library because of her pregnancy, even though she was eligible for sick leave under the union contract signed by CUPE local 1230 in December, 1973.

Ordinarily someone must work a year with an employer before becoming eligible for pregnancy leave under the employment standards act. But the university, in relying on this requirement, ignored its contract with local 1230.

The grievance settlement was a major one, with a cash settlement of about $1,200 to make up the difference between what Rowana would have earned with the library and her unemployment benefits.

The university also agreed to waive any right to prosecute Rowana for not mentioning the firing from the library job on her application for a job at 215 Huron. The university only discovered the hiring a few weeks ago and six months after the union filed the grievance.

Rowana was actually fired on July 18 but the supervisor, Donald Smith, backdated her firing to July 2. The university gave in on all points in settling the grievance.

Union president Judy Darcy emphasized the victory for the union. "It's especially important we won it at a time when (Zoology department storekeeper) Paul McCreary lost his job allegedly over union activities and people are nervous about being fired," Darcy noted.

OSAP and its problems

How would you like to have a collection agency come knocking at your front door to collect your Ontario Students' Award Program (OSAP) payments?

It could happen to you, as the Canadian government is now prepared to hand over a student's files to a collection agency if he or she defaults on a loan for longer than six months, according to an official of the Royal Bank.

In a telephone interview, the official noted banks have no control over the process. "After a default of three months, a formal demand must be sent to the student, and after six months, the file must be turned over to the government," he said.

The government then reimburses the bank for the loan, and turns it over to a collection agency.

But the course is not often pursued: only about seven or eight percent of OSAP recipients default on their payments.

Don't be surprised if you paid more than the $800 OSAP loan ceiling this year. It is conceivable the ceiling could go as high as $1,400 a year.

For instance, arts and science students have to pay a minimum $850 loan for the first time this year because the loan ceiling rises $25 for every week beyond the "normal" academic term of 32 weeks.

U of T residence students who appeal for a residence adjustment must sometimes add up to $250 to their loan.

For the 10,000 students who report no summer earnings, appeals are in the form of a loan of up to $600.

Virtually all other appeals come in the form of a loan.

Although the job market is shrinking for university graduates, OSAP still insists on loan repayments beginning six months after graduation, regardless of whether a student has been successful in obtaining a job.

Moreover, interest rates continue to rise. Loans, once available in the sixties at six per cent interest, now run as high as 12 per cent.

The increasing likelihood of incurring a substantial debt at the end of a university career is discouraging lower and lower-middle income students from considering university, sociologist John Porter said in a study conducted in 1973.

According to one Ontario university students awards director, "What the high loan ceilings mean is that students who cannot afford to go to school incur a large debt, while wealthy students come out scot free."

Despite the action taken by British Columbia in instituting a $100 grant alternating with a $100 loan, Ontario continues to leave its loan ceiling at $800.

The U of T Committee on Student Aid is organizing a petition campaign for a lowering of the ceiling to $600.

The Ontario Student Awards Plan (OSAP) discriminates against women because of the unrealistically high level of summer earnings it expects them to contribute.

Ignoring the discrimination against women in higher paying jobs and the likelihood they will work for the minimum wage, the OSAP contribution tables do not take into account the vast differential in possible summer earnings between men and women.

OSAP also makes no allowance for the greater likelihood that women will not get jobs at all, due to discrimination in hiring practices.

Women also face discrimination if they want to supplement their OSAP grants through outside work and again when with less earning power they have to repay loans that are as large or larger than men's loans.

The problem starts even before university with many girls socialized in high school expecting not to go to university. Many families are reluctant to pay for women to go to university, making OSAP's parental contribution scheme unfair and discriminatory.

In the calculation of students' costs daycare expenses are not considered, making it difficult for women with children to attend university.

OSAP regulations also encourage the institution of marriage by immediately granting independent status to those who marry and not recognizing common law marriages.

Women are also more likely to be part-time students making them eligible only for a loan scheme with immediate repayment at 10 percent interest. Women now make up 65 percent of part-time students.

The reason there are more women part-time students also relates to sexual discrimination and financial inability to remain in full-time studies.

Two leading Canadian union representatives levelled harsh criticism at each other at a Saturday afternoon panel discussion which was part of the U of T law faculty's nationalism conference.

United Auto Workers' (UAW) vice-president Dennis McDermott used the discussion as a springboard to attack Ed Finn and nationalistic unions.

Finn is director of publications and information of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railroad and Transportation Workers.

Barrister Jeffery Sack served as chairman of the panel which also included Julien Major, executive vice-president of the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC), as well as Finn and McDermott.

Sack opened the discussion with several questions central to the topic: "Is the Canadian labor movement dependent upon the U.S.? If so, how much? Is this dependence good or bad? Is it changeable, and if so, is it being changed?"

Finn said it was academic, but there was "a movement towards autonomy" within Canadian unions.

"Nobody would say that Canadian labor unions should or won't move to autonomy. The only question is, 'How long will it take?'"

"I'm a Canadian nationalist," Finn said. "I'm a strong believer in Canadian nationalism in all areas."

Finn saw the most pressing issue was to "unify, strengthen and restructure Canadian labor unions... despite the attacks to demean them."

Major said the problem arose in the part because "the objective was unity without uniformity" in the unions.

"I am convinced the members of labor unions will sort out their problems without the help of academics," he said.

McDermott began by saying, "I've been waiting for a long time to get at this guy face-to-face," referring to Finn.

Finn has a weekly column in the Toronto Star and has written a series of articles criticizing international unions, using the UAW as an example.

McDermott, defending

Union men criticize each other

Ed Finn lays it on the line — he likes nationalistic unions international ties, said, "It is the work of international unions to change the craft unions and the U.S. unions posing as international unions, not pseudo-Canadian nationalists."

He emphasized the structural changes necessary to create Canadian unions.

"The dues system would not work," McDermott said. "They would have to double or triple."

"There is no national union, with the exception of the papermakers, that is worth the powder to blow them to hell. This guy's a jerk!"

"Just because you put a maple leaf on both their backsides doesn't make them a viable entity," McDermott said.

Finn agreed with this, but added "There are good and bad national unions, just as there are good and bad international unions."

"Brother McDermott was casting an unfair light on the quality of international unions by using the UAW as an example, which is a far better example than most."

Finn and Major, however, stressed nationalism as part of the rationale behind national unions. McDermott countered, saying unions have no nationality. "We have credentials with the blacks and the poor. But where is Finn's union in the area of human rights?" McDermott charged.

"What has Finn's union done in collective bargaining?" he asked.

McDermott said the international unions were the only means of gaining "the collective bargaining clout" needed to combat companies such as General Motors.

"The task is to do it, internationally as we have done," McDermott said.

Finn replied, "Ninety-eight point something percent of those who would vote to stay in our union if they were offered the opportunity to join with the UAW."

"At least had national unions make their bad decisions on this side of the border," Finn said.

One matter all three managed to agree upon was the Canadian government — they didn't like it.

Major said the CLC has only been able to organize one-third of Canadians into unions, and can do no more because of legislation.

Finn agreed saying, "Canadian labor laws don't promote labor organizations."

Control of energy important, panel says

By CIM NUNN

The crucial issue in federal-provincial relations is the control of energy resources, panel members agreed Friday afternoon at the law conference on Canadian nationalism.

A. E. Safarian, dean of U of T's School for Graduate Studies, introduced the panel consisting of Mark MacGuigan, federal Liberal MP for Windsor-Walkerville; Edward Roberts, leader of the Liberal opposition in Newfoundland; William Tetley, Quebec minister of federal institutions, companies and cooperatives, and Andrew Thompson, B.C. energy commission chairman.

MacGuigan, referred to himself as a "qualified centrist."

"Not all powers should be centralized," he said "but any weighting should be in the direction of the federal government."

Decentralization, MacGuigan said, is necessary in areas of culture and policy to allow for regional differences.

MacGuigan added the emphasis had changed over the years from "decentralization in 1972 to centralization today."

He described nationalism as "what Canada must do internally to assert herself among other nations."

Constitutionally, MacGuigan felt the federal government had more power granted in the British North America Act.

"Provinces have to be dedicated to a more regional conference," he said.

Tetley stated the case for federalism more strongly.

He said he believed in federalism and the use of two levels of government as a part of the system of checks and balances.

Tetley added he felt conflict and consultation between provincial and federal governments to be useful.

Roberts expressed a feeling similar to MacGuigan that both provincial and federal governments are important.

He said each area had to deal with strictly regional problems. The BNA Act couldn't deal with the problems which have arisen today, Roberts said, because these problems weren't conceived when the Act was created.

He reviewed crucial issues to be a foreign interest act and resources taxation because both sides had good cases.

Roberts said new federal-provincial mechanisms would be necessary in the future, but didn't specify any examples.

Thompson said the issue was "whether regionalism and provincialism is an impediment to new directions in Canadian nationalism."

Thompson said the provincialism was said to be in conflict with nationalism in several newspapers, but believed "provincialism is to nationalism what nationalism is to internationalism."

"The country should be able to flourish even as regionalism flourishes."

Thompson, calling himself a regionalist, said multinational companies and our government have been incompetent in their dealings in the field of energy resources.

He referred to the situation as a "standoff."

The provincial control of land and therefore resources equals the federal control of tax trade in commerce, he said.

He agreed with Tetley that the "federal system works best when there are countervailing forces of provincial control."

Suffering is Israel's fault

To say that the Palestinian's suffering is not the Israeli's fault is exactly the same as saying that the Jewish suffering in Germany was not the Nazi's fault.

The compassion, sentiments, and emotions in Mr. Peter Spiro's letter of Jan. 29 are clearly the result of a moral myopia which does not allow him to see the reality as it is.

History for him justifies the Jewish occupation of Palestine after more than two thousand years but denies the Palestinians the right to return to their homes after 27 years.

The writer's humanitarianism takes into account the Nazi's concentration camps but stops short of recognizing the Palestinians in their refugee camps.

From such moral myopia, it is easy to compare Zionist-Nazi behavior. To argue that the refugees ran away voluntarily or because their leaders wanted that is not only a myth, but also irrelevant. Have refugees no right to return? Have German Jews no right to recover their properties because they too fled? Ferdinand and Isabella expelled the Jews and Moors from Spain saying "we want Spain as Spanish." The response to this expulsion was compassionate support towards the Jews. But, now, the Jews are reversing the roles. Moshe Dayan, former Israeli Defense Minister stated in 1967, "even though Israel can absorb the Palestinians in the conquered territories, it will not do so because Israel will be then either a bi-national or poly-Arab-Jewish state instead of the Jewish state. We want to have a Jewish state, a Jewish state like the French have a French state."

How similar this statement is to the above one, and how different is the response.

Depravity reigns in peaceful Metro

Tom Hallam's observations in his article Aristophanes' Frogs in 1902 and in 1975 (Jan. 24) serve not so much to illustrate the decadence of those times as to affirm the depravity of our own.

Better Mao than tough Bob Nixon

I nearly choked munching on tossed salad and cottage cheese when I read your editorial, Robert Nixon: Man for Tomorrow, (Varsity, Jan. 29). I would have died had I been eating roast beef.

What kind of writing is this anyway? I see it only as the type of silly optimistic rhetoric that misleads the reader and distorts his reality by replacing the hard economic and political facts with childlike statements of "new visions," naive political yearnings, and general illusionism.

And what about the author's understanding of the political spectrum? Only if Nixon's name were replaced by that of Mao Tse Tung and the term "liberalism" replaced by "socialism" would the editorial be suitable to print. And does the author really believe that, of all people, Robert Nixon is going to "... smash the insurmountable barriers so cruelly erected by twentieth century Tory capitalism?"

If Nixon is elected such a feat will be the only change I can foresee for Ontario politics. The Liberals will then legislate no differently than the Conservatives and they will be quickly absorbed by the capitalist system in their necessary attempt to work for the system's health. And will the Liberals, looking through Nixon's spectacles, actually "... grind careful analysis into militant action?" No way! Nixon? ... militant action? — he might get his glasses broken.

And then there is the concept of "liberalism" itself, especially suspect when the author shouts that "only liberalism can put power back where it belongs — in the hands of the people." I suggest to the author that he look at Trudeau's liberalism in Ottawa, a politics that is centralizing power to such an extent that cabinet ministers are beginning to complain, deputy ministers and senior public servants are resigning because of a feeling of uselessness and the legislature is losing its power of accountability to the extent that we can talk seriously of the malaise of parliamentry democracy here in Canada — yes Canada. (see pg. 7, Financial Post, Jan. 25, 1975, and Walter Stewart's Shrug: Trudeau in Power).

Varg Vic report was speculation

We are writing in the hopes of cutting down on the rampant speculation which your paper seems to practise. In this case it concerns the article headlined Vic students get parity - Vic principal resigns (Mon. Jan. 27).

Although most of the speculation and innuendos contained in this article were later confirmed as facts, at the time of printing no one on your staff was certain about this. It would have been more ethical if an article containing the facts had been printed when the article headed "Resignation confirmed" (Jan. 29, 1975) appeared.

It is possible that Principal Robson's resignation could have been entirely unconnected with the student parity issue. You were lucky this time. Maybe next time you won't be.

Students should run bureaucracy

The recent resignation of Victoria College principal Robson graphically illustrates one of the dangers inherent in university government: faculty members in administrative positions often resign when views of student politicians prevail.

I believe that difficulty could be overcome by means of the following modest proposal. Let students run the bureaucracy on a permanent, non-salaried full-time basis. After all, our student representatives assure us that the faculty spends no more time at a university than we do. (At least that is true for those of us who take more than four years to graduate.)

Moreover, faculty members have come under increasing fire recently for poor teaching, probably because they spend too much time on administrative duties. If we freed them from those assignments, they would concentrate more on teaching. Classroom rapport would improve, and SAC could handle the affairs of the university on their usual distinctive level of competence.

Complainers, not operator at fault

I am writing in response to an article printed January 13, entitled Students say Ski Tour a Ripoff, concerning a ski trip through Summit Ski Group, Associated Travel Services.

I was also on the same tour and was very, very satisfied with the trip. Most of the problems presented were brought on by Krangle and Stern themselves.

Any person who cannot take the responsibility of keeping their luggage together does not deserve to have the service of it brought to their door. Your luggage is your responsibility.

To see an admission fee of five dollars per couple for a New Year's party in the Ballroom at the Hilton as a great expense is unreasonable, for most arranged New Year's parties run into a much greater expense.

I am not sure what bus they took to the slopes but our bus left at a reasonable hour every morning to allow for a full day of skiing.

When you are dealing with a group of 400 and two people want to make special arrangements for staying longer, and changing the whole procedure for the usual ski tour, no wonder they had a mix up with their room, the hotel was probably not ready to accommodate them.

Our hotel accommodations at the Hilton were excellent. Some tours got stuck in terrible rooms in other hotels while we enjoyed our color TV, bar, beautiful view from the fourteenth floor and the use of their outside pool and their sauna.

It is true we arrived quite a bit later than scheduled but we had bad weather on our way home and any reasonable person would have predicted that the arrival time would be delayed and would have phoned ahead to make proper arrangements to get home from Yorkdale.

I am afraid some people have lost the virtue of appreciation and unfortunately they ruined their own holiday.

Ceiling raises will hurt accessibility

To be blunt, the future does not look good either for students or for higher education in general. Following last fall's announcement of a cutback in the level of government funding for universities comes Friday's revelation that the ceiling on student loans is likely to be raised.

An increase in the loan ceiling from $1,400 to $1,900 has been proposed by the federal-provincial task force on student aid, according to secret documents made available to Canadian University Press Friday.

If implemented, that would mean that before getting any form of grant, a student would have to incur a $1,900 debt in any given year. Over a period of four years, that means a further debt of $2,000 in addition to debts that could already rise as high as $5,600.

The net result of such a move will undoubtedly be to deter those who can least afford to attend university — those whose families cannot afford to support them, and who must make full use of the loan system — from so doing.

To make matters worse, the government appears likely — not for next year, but for 1976-77 — to force a hefty increase in student fees. (Colleges and universities minister James Auld was backed into an early promise by student groups that there would be no fee increase next year.)

U of T president John Evans has already begun some hard lobbying to have government grants indexed to increases in student fees. The Canadian Association of University Teachers has also called for a fee increase.

We said editorially before Christmas that the government cutback did not seem to be the result of a consistent policy towards higher education, even a policy of "let the universities become more self-reliant." (We also said higher education would continue to flounder until such a policy, however odious, was forthcoming.)

We may always suspect the worst: that the cutback is a stumbling reaction to vaguely expressed sentiments that time spent at university is time spent in recreation.

The government must be made to realize that its de facto policy towards higher education will inflict the most grievous damage.

Much of the government's commitment to higher education during the 1960's was based on the conviction that the widest possible accessibility to educational facilities was a palatable method of securing opportunity and equality, that very commitment will be completely undercut if any attempt to raise student fees or loan ceilings is successful.

Very quickly, accessibility will dry up. (Several universities have already threatened to restrict enrolment.) The poor will be increasingly unable to attend university, and the rich will increasingly find it their plaything. And very quickly, the carpings that universities are expensive toys will have some substance, only serving to increase the pressure for cutbacks in university support.

It is imperative to maintain the widest possible accessibility to higher education. Moves to increase fees and loan ceilings will only have exactly the opposite effect, and should be curtailed immediately.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of The Varsity for the 1975-76 publishing year. The Editor is solely responsible for editorial policy and is responsible to the Board in all other matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority and responsibility, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $10,650 to $12,600 per publishing year. Including a salary of $3,450, or less for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her position only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

Undercover agent infiltrates secret hideout

The Varsity sent one of its top investigative reporters out last week to uncover one of the last bastions of conservatism, wealth and privilege on the U of T campus: the Faculty Club.

By BOB BETTSON

You may wonder where all your poor, underpaid professors hang out. You know, those guys who you see once in a while who are asking for a hefty 25 percent pay boost.

Well, look no further. They have their own hide-out on campus, away from the unwashed masses at the posh faculty club on Willcocks Street. Behind the modest facade there are three well appointed floors.

The facilities include four dining rooms, a billiards room, a darts room, several lounges and other amenities. Behind these doors, the grey-haired revolutionaries who make up the U of T Faculty Association plot their strategy.

On my undercover journey there for lunch last week I learned what really happens behind closed doors. Just as you enter the front door there is a very well furnished, tasteful lounge with a fireplace.

To the right is another brighter lounge, which I was told used to be for women members when they had a separate entrance. The lounges and dining rooms are usually busy with various faculty functions.

We ate upstairs at a cafeteria style dining room. Downstairs a larger room has table service and a more expensive menu. My companion assured me no "filthy lucre" (money) changes hands. Members simply fill out a form with the dishes they are having and are billed later.

A quaint custom he revealed is that if members are behind in their payments their accounts are posted on a bulletin board for all to see.

I enjoyed my chicken cacciatore, blueberry pie and milk but my companion said his was the worst egg sandwich he had ever had.

Among the luminaries I saw were historians Michael Cross, Bob Bothwell and UTFA president Bill Nelson. Math chairman George Duff was present as was east asian chairman Bill Saywell and famous political science professor Crawford Brough MacPherson.

Victoria principal Jack Robson, who just resigned over student parity, was hiding out with his paperwork in the basement. Governing Council member Chuck Hanly also had lunch.

Members are also entitled to use the facilities at other university faculty clubs in Canada with which they have reciprocal agreements.

The Faculty Club is of course licensed. Various service personnel are quite in evidence attending to every need of the faculty members.

One wonders in these days of education cutbacks how faculty members can afford to pay for such posh surroundings. Wouldn't a bag lunch or a meal with the student proletariat at Hart House be more appropriate?

But as my companion remarked, the U of T Faculty Club is one of the last vestiges of the 19th century mens' club at U of T.

When you top off your education with a degree, you don't start off at the bottom with us.

Your education deserves responsibility.

We can give it to you.

With your degree, you can start right off with us as an Officer, a leader with responsibilities. We can help you add experience to your knowledge.

And if you have the courage, you can go as far as you want with us.

That's what your degree can do for you in the Canadian Forces. Together we can put your education to good use.

- Salaries are very attractive
- Raises and promotion opportunities come regularly
- Four weeks paid vacation annually
- Many benefits ranging from free medical and dental care to a handsome pension plan

And by the way, if you don't have your degree yet, we can help you get it and pay you while you do.

NEW DIRECTIONS FOR CANADA

in energy...

By CIMNUNN

Developing Canada's new energy resource scheme may prove too expensive for a Canadian-owned industry.

That was the conclusion reached Saturday morning by a panel discussing energy at the U of T Law Faculty's 12th annual conference on law and contemporary affairs called New Directions In Canadian Nationalism.

U of T law professor Tom MacDonald presided over the panel which included Robert Page, national chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada; Andrew Thompson, B.C. energy commission chairman; and Max Saltzman, NDP Waterloo MP.

Although all agreed Canadian ownership of Canadian energy resource development was a good thing, they also said any government attempt to go ahead on the various development schemes would have to wait.

Saltzman listed a number of large projects including Syncrude, the MacKenzie Valley Pipeline and the Montreal Pipeline.

He pointed out there was little likelihood these projects would all reach fruition in the near future.

He said development of these schemes would necessarily demand either taxation "in a manner unacceptable to Canadians" or draw upon capital from outside Canada.

"We're not talking about just millions here. We just don't have the money."

In addition to a future increase in Canadian ownership, the panel agreed the ownership should be public.

"I don't want to transfer one private ownership for another," Saltzman said, and Page agreed.

Thompson partly concurred, saying he would opt for a mixed system. "I get just as worried about Ontario or B.C. Hydro as I do about any major company."

Federal vs Provincial Control

The problem of resource development raised a question of federal-provincial power distribution particularly related to the recent resource taxation.

Thompson said energy resources should be controlled by the province from which they were taken and that the recent federal government ruling to tax resources is unconstitutional.

Saltzman replied he felt independent work on court ruling "would acknowledge the provincial ownership of resources, but would claim the right to taxation when they were removed outside the province."

sports ...and

By JEAN BUBBA

Canadian Football League commissioner Jake Gaudaur, says he is "just starting to learn that "American" does not always mean "better."

Such patriotic sobriquets highlighted the Friday night panel on sport and Canadian nationalism.

Moderator Horace Krever focussed the evening's discussion on the issue of whether Canadian sports requires special treatment by the law.

Physical education professor Bruce Kidd, who apologized for not wearing his "Close the 49th Parallel" button, said, "We have to protect that which is culturally important for the community."

Speaking in terms of the legislation introduced last year to protect Canadian football, Kidd said, "The CFL is not concerned with the Canadian game or culture as evidenced by its salary scales which put Canadians far down the line ranking behind the American Black in salary considerations."

In Kidd's opinion, "The sport is fully Americanized and has no infrastructure to feed it from minor leagues."

Should Football Survive?

Then Kidd posed the key question: "Is football a game we as Canadians want to develop as a form of culture, since it is not part of the democratic mass sporting culture in which many participate?"

Gaudaur evaded answering Kidd's question and instead concentrated on what he felt made CFL football culturally different from the American version. "Canadian football originated in Canada and has a unique set of rules and playing field. It also has a constitution which limits the number of foreign players on any team. The decision-making process is entirely in the hands of Canadians."

"Football is so important in this country that it climaxes in a grant national event of such importance to Canadians that the game is broadcast simultaneously on two television networks," Gaudaur said.

However, Gerald Sternberg, lawyer and former CFL player, admitted "Canadian players could not survive without protection by the CFL unless they were trained in the U.S."

Survival of Canadian football is not limited to player protection. "Football is kept alive by the gate revenue. Revenue from TV rights make up only 10 percent of CFL income," Gaudaur said.

He admitted that professional football is another form of public entertainment, but was unable to adequately explain why the CFL should be treated differently from other aspects of entertainment.

"We don't provide enough jobs for artists and athletes at home since we have allowed the market to dominate the game and the market is obviously richer in the U.S.," Kidd charged.

"The community that allows this to happen has no self-respect."

Gaudaur replied that affluence should not determine the worth of anything, citing Sternberg's football career as an example.

"U.S. colleges have lots of coaches and lots of money to invest in training, but Gerry is a better person because he stayed in Canada and got an education as well as a football career," he said.

Nationalism in Sports

Kidd conceded the lure for Canadians to have a better life working or playing in the U.S., but insisted, "A community has a right to expect the people it trains to contribute to it, but it should also make it attractive for those people to stay."

Krever pointed out to the panel that "this country is what it is because of people coming in from another country. If you look at individual problems, might you not emasculate all civil liberties legislation?"

Gaudaur admitted the import restrictions of the CFL only "masked the citizenship factor," but blamed this on Chief Justice Bora Laskin who drafted the clause for the league.

Kidd did not accept the theory of the objectivity of competence and said Canada must "guard against future imports" although ethically it could not penalize those already here.

At this point someone noted that the bar had opened and the panel adjourned after entertaining only a few questions from the predominantly male audience, leaving undiscussed such important topics as the role of women in professional sports.

By PAUL HOCH

In the past six years Ms. magazine has gone from a small insert in New York magazine to become one of the best selling magazines in the United States.

Its rapid rise in popularity is unprecedented in American publishing history.

Not only has the magazine gained tremendous influence through its circulation, but its editors have been active in the Women's Political Caucus and the National Organization of Women.

The ideas and ideologies of Ms. indeed seem to have permeated almost the entire women's movement (even those sections of the movement which would ostensibly reject WPC and NOW as being too reformist).

Because of the dominant position Ms. has attained within the movement, it seems particularly important for feminists, and particularly socialist-feminists, to carefully examine the ideas and orientations of the magazine, trace these ideas to their logical conclusion, and see if they provide a valid strategy for women's liberation (including especially the liberation of the working class majority of women).

Perhaps the central ideological position of Ms. is that all women (of whatever social class, race and nation) have a common set of aims and aspirations around which they can and should unite, and for which the magazine sees itself as the spokeswoman.

To quote one recent example of this orientation, in the January 1975 issue Ms's publisher Gloria Steinem, reporting on a recent planning session for an International Feminist Conference, remarks that: "Officials of the People's Republic of China met with members of Congress in Washington, D.C. Because they are all 'token' women struggling inside their respective patriarchies, they soon find themselves in a classic consciousness-raising group."

The result is a plan to bypass their male party leaders. . . . She adds that, "Even the Egyptian and Israeli

THE POLITICS OF MS.

Class and Feminism

This is nothing new. The entire history of the white, upper middle class women's movement in England and America is, with few exceptions, one long chronicle of the total subordination of Third World and working class women to the demands of their upper middle class 'sisters.'

For example, in England and America the mainstream upper middle-class feminists consistently played down (and in England consistently opposed) giving the vote to working class women.

Their positions in relation to blacks and immigrants were even worse.

Following the Civil War there was a vigorous debate in the U.S. about whether black men should be granted the vote.

The position of the upper middle class feminist leadership was that it would be insulting to give black men the vote, without also giving it to their social betters, the white women.

Susan B. Anthony openly declared that she would "cut off this right arm of mine before I will ever work for or demand the ballot for the Negro and not for the woman."

Elizabeth Cady Stanton for more than two decades denounced the insult, to upper class women, of giving the vote to what she called "Sambos" and "ignorant foreigners."

In her book The Fight for Freedom for Women, Rose Treman notes that, "the 1884 Reform Act in England likewise brought class antagonisms to the surface. Middle class Victorian ladies resented seeing their gardeners and local shopkeepers given the rights still denied to them."

The upper-middle-class women's movement in America also long and bitterly opposed the extension of voting rights to immigrants. As Treman points out:

"The argument upon which the Seneca Falls Declaration had been based was the theory of 'natural right', namely, that in a society whose constitution was based on the belief that 'all men are created equal' and therefore endowed with 'certain unalienable rights', the women of that society should likewise be entitled to those rights. Now more and more suffrage workers conveniently buried the 'equal rights' argument. They had come to believe that the immigrant was not 'worthy' of the vote and that the habits and customs he brought with him would soon begin to destroy the fabric of Anglo-Saxon Protestant life. They resented the fact that foreigners now had the political power that was still denied them and openly began to disavow the theory that all men are created equal by their demands that the 'foreign vote' should be taken away and given to them (ibid).

In 1894, Carrie Chapman Catt, leader of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, declared in a speech in Iowa:

"The Government is menaced with great danger . . . That danger lies in the votes possessed by the males in the slums of the cities and the ignorant foreign vote . . . There is but one way to avert that danger, cut off the vote of the slums and give to woman . . . the power of protecting herself — the ballot."

Anna Howard Shaw, the other main leader of NAWSA, could likewise declare:

"that no other country has subjected its women to the humiliating position to which the women of this nation have been subjected by men. In Germany, German women are governed by German men; in France, French women are governed by Frenchmen; and in Great Britain British women are governed by British men; but in this country American women are governed by every kind of man under the sun."

Aileen Kraditor in her well-known history of the movement, sums up the NAWSA's position following the 1880s immigration:

Before (then) they had claimed the vote because all human beings, men and women, were equal. Now most suffragists were willing to claim the vote because all human beings, native and foreign born, were not equal, and the inferior ought not to rule the superior."

Similarly in England there was serious friction between the upper middle class feminists and the Independent Labor Party regarding the enfranchisement of working class women. As Treman puts it:

"The Women's Social and Political Union was . . . content, for the time being, to see the vote granted to a mere handful of women. They were not prepared to jeopardise their chances of success by committing themselves to an open demand for the working woman's vote; and it was here, naturally enough, that the ILP could not give them its blessing, nor they in turn follow where it led. The Labor Party believed, rightly enough, that the party that would reap the greatest benefit from the enfranchisement of a minority of well-to-do women should be the Conservatives."

The Pankhursts

The leader of the WSPU, Emmeline Pankhurst, fully supported British entry into World War I, denounced pacifists, supported British colonialism, and dutifully joined the Conservative Party. Treman speaks of a "high Tory snobishness" pervading her headquarters.

The first women elected to the British Parliament was Countess Markievicz in 1918 (though owing to the secession of Ireland she did not take her seat). Lady Nancy Astor likewise took her seat as a Conservative shortly thereafter.

Sylvia Pankhurst, who led the only significant section of the women's movement of that period oriented toward working class women, was drummed out of the WSPU by her mother and sister for "discrediting" the movement by her open sympathies for Irish independence.

The WSPU was such an authoritarian organization that it was virtually run by Emmeline Pankhurst as an absolute monarchy.

British feminists of the WSPU referred to her exile location in Paris as "headquarters." The "votes for women" campaigners of the WSPU were effectively barred from voting on the policies of their own organization.

These unpleasant facts, when they are mentioned at all (and they are never mentioned in MS), are often dismissed with a shrug that, "After all, the women's movement of those days was just a product of its times."

But then so was the slavery movement, the imperialist movement, and the Ku Klux Klan.

To say the movement's aberrations were just a "product of the times" explains absolutely nothing, because what isn't a product of its time?

It would be far more accurate to say that the anti-working class, anti-black, anti-immigrant attitudes of the upper middle class women's movement were a direct representation of the attitudes and interests of the social class these women represented.

This is still the case today.

representatives have become friends."

While international sisterhood is without doubt one of the most important aims of the movement, the question arises: is it really possible to simply proclaim sisterhood among women of economically unequal nations, classes and races?

In this regard the Ms. position seems to resemble that of the leadership of the British Fabian Society in the early 1900s who believed it was possible to build socialist internationalism while maintaining British colonialism.

Indeed it resembles the position of certain modern day economic 'socialists' who urge women and blacks not to mention such things as sexism and racism because this will "disrupt the unity of the movement."

The Bias of Ms.

If it is right for women and blacks to bring their orientation to bear within the socialist movement, how can it be wrong for black women, or working class women, or women of the colonial countries to insist that their oppressions (the oppressions of the overwhelming majority of the world's women) be dealt with within the women's movement?

Indeed the editors of Ms. would probably not even deny this, in principle at least.

Nevertheless, if we judge the magazine by what it does (rather than what its editors might profess), by the actual number and length of its articles on various subjects, it is undeniable that the magazine is written by, for and about the concerns of white, upper middle class professional women in the United States.

Though occasional pieces (usually short pieces) do appear about Third World women, the magazine's dominant practice is clearly to shunt the concerns of these women (the overwhelming majority of women) off to the side with pious incantations that, after all, "we are all 'taken' women . . ."

Now, either Third World and working class women have a set of problems and perspectives which is different than that of white, upper class professional women, or they don't.

Ms. would possibly admit this difference in theory, while totally denying it in the magazine's own political practice. This it does, not for bad Machiavellian reasons, but for hopeful, apparently progressive, reasons.

The magazine is earnestly trying to build a cross-class, interracial, international coalition to press women's common goals.

The magazine earnestly seeks to transcend divisions among women based on class, race and nation, without in any way dealing with the concrete material situations and oppressions that give rise to these differences.

How can the women's movement have truly common goals when the dominant minority in the movement belongs to a class, race and nation which oppresses the overwhelming majority of women and, in the name of an abstract and idealist international sisterhood, refuses to deal with the concerns, perspectives and orientations of the overwhelming majority of the world's women?

I think it is undeniable that, due to their very different historical circumstances, the worldview of white, upper middle class professional women is very different from that of Third World and working class women.

Again, it should be emphasized that this is not due to any conscious deception on the part of Ms's middle class professional women editors, but simply the result of the perceptions afforded by their own social class and situations.

But, to insist that Third World and Working class women uncritically accept this upper middle class worldview is to, in effect, demand that Third World and working class women subordinate their struggles to those of white, upper middle class professional women.

Concordia U head replies to racist charges

MONTREAL (CUP) — Concordia University rector John O'Brien has denied that his administration's decision to limit the January enrolment of foreign students has any racist overtones and said the matter is "purely a practical one."

The administration decision was kept quiet for almost a month until O'Brien was asked a direct question about the situation at a Dec. 20 Senate meeting.

Perhaps the loudest voice raised against the decision was that of professor Clark Blaise who said in a letter to the Sir George Williams campus student newspaper, the Georgian, that he was, "ashamed to read that there is a high danger that the percentage of foreign students would be too high."

"A danger!" Blaise wrote indignantly, "to whom and who decides, and what is this panic percentage?"

The problem centres on the original concept of January admissions which was originally designed to accommodate CEGEP (pre-university junior college) students who graduate in December.

At no time, O'Brien said, has the university advertised January entry to foreign students. What started to happen this year was that the huge backlog of foreign student applications which could not be dealt with in September was being considered in January, he said.

Since the university only budgets for limited additional programs at this time, O'Brien explained, the administrative committee had no choice but to head off a situation which would see budgets and course loads strained beyond capacity.

While enrolment figures are indeed down, from 10,081 full-time equivalent students last year to 9,407 this year, O'Brien pointed out that certain courses, especially introductory ones, are particularly popular with January entry students, and these are the areas which are suffering from overload.

A brief survey of Sir George's departmental chairmen seemed to indicate that there is still room in a large number of courses even after January entry.

Another factor which the university must consider, O'Brien said, is the taxpayers' feeling who might not "foot the bill" so that American students can come to study at Canadian universities at half the cost.

He added, however, that Concordia may feel it has a "certain duty" to students from the third world who apply to study here.

ELECTION ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

FACULTY AND STUDENTS

— GENERAL COMMITTEE —

— CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

Student radicalism on the decline

What ever happened to the fervent student radicalism of the sixties?

Well, for one thing it seems that U.S. college freshmen are definitely more conservative than their counterparts of 10 years ago.

A study of 311,950 first-year students at 576 institutions conducted by the American Council on Education indicates that 55 percent consider themselves "middle of the road" and near one-third believe that "the activities of married women are best confined to the home and family."

Results of the study, published in the Jan. 20 issue of Newsweek, indicate the freshmen surveyed have less interest in politics than any similar class since 1966 and that ever half believe that "there is too much concern in the courts for the rights of the criminals."

The percentage who consider themselves "conservatives" or "far right" stayed fairly constant at 14.7 but, says one ACE official, the students seem to have lost faith "that anything can ever be done — about politics itself or about problems that require political action."

The students weren't particularly worried about finding the money needed to pay for their college education, but that's somewhat understandable since 25 percent overall and 57.8 percent of these attending black private colleges were receiving government grants, and a whopping one-third listed family income of over $20,000 per year.

Skiers boogie in Calibogie

The men's and women's ski teams competed last Saturday in the RMC invitational dual slalom meet at Calibogie, Ontario. In dual slalom, racers run side by side down identical courses, a format adopted from the pro circuit, which results in faster times and stiffer competition.

As a team needs four of its six members to finish in order to achieve a good team standing, consistency as well as speed is important.

Because several of the men's A team members were unable to attend the meet, a composite team formed largely of the B team arrived at Calibogie on Friday to join the women's team for a day of slalom training.

Although the 'green team' didn't turn in any top times, four of the six racers finished both runs to give Varsity a fifth place finish.

Bruce Bell finished 25th for Toronto, followed by Britt Roberts, 26th, Andy Wilkes, 30th, and Rick Pay, 34th. Paul Gordon and Steve Promoli turned in good first run times but were disqualified in the second.

Carleton won the men's division followed by Waterloo and Queen's. Phil Gaulin of Ottawa took top honours in the men's, Rob Burbee and Mike Ryan both from Carleton were second and third respectively.

The men's and women's teams compete this Thursday and Friday in the OUA-OWIAA Championships at Blue Mountain, Collingwood.

By DEBBIE RICKETTS
The U of T women's gymnastic team presented a demonstration of gymnastic routines Sun. Feb. 2 at the Benson Building. All the competitors are preparing for the Ontario university championship meet in two weeks.

In the junior category, Bonnie MacTavish and Wendy Linton are strong all-round competitors. They will be facing competitors from six other universities and about forty other gymnasts at the junior level.

Nancy Howard of the intermediate category is especially strong in the balance beam event and is a hopeful contender for placement in vaulting and floor exercise.

At the senior level, Helene Smagala will be against stiff opposition from several Olympic level gymnasts from York University, but is expected to display smooth performances in all events.

The athletes have been training since September for this championship.

The competition will run from 11 am to 4 pm.

Playoffs nearing...yet Gee-Gees down Blues 61-51

By JEAN BUBBA
The up again, down again playoff hopes of the basketball Blues are somewhat down again following a 61-51 loss Friday to the powerful University of Ottawa Gee-Gees in an interesting game played at the Benson Building gym.

Blues are now 5-5 and have four games remaining in the torrid OUA eastern division race. However, to the team's advantage, two of the games are against lowly RMC so the playoff hopes should be settled in the away games at York and Queen's.

Gee-Gees are riding high again this season and were full merit for their victory. Blues made things interesting early in the second half by overcoming Ottawa's 24-17 half-time lead and with 12 minutes remaining Varsity was in front by one point 31-30.

Unfortunately, at that stage Blues went cold and Gee-Gees got very, very hot pouring in 31 points before the final buzzer.

It's certainly no disgrace to lose to a team with Ottawa's height, experience and talented personnel, but Blues might have made things more interesting had they exploited the fast break more effectively and taken advantage of the foul trouble that a few Ottawa players managed to get into.

As it was, Blues often took poorer forced shots while Gee-Gees resorted to a persistent stall in both halves.

In the final minutes, the visitors carefully preserved their lead by simply passing the ball around outside Blues' zone defence and waiting until an opportunity for a good shot became available. It made for dull but from Gee-Gees' viewpoint effective basketball.

Center Marv Sabey led Ottawa with 15 points, Jeff Smith added 11 and Bruce Davis 10.

Captain Glenn Scott poured in 20 points for Varsity but unfortunately his teammates couldn't match that pace. Bert Van Cook scored 8 and Randy Filinski 6.

Blues now have the week off before playing the final home game of the regular schedule Friday at 8:15 against RMC.

Wrestling

By JOE RABEL
Over the weekend, three members of the Varsity wrestling team survived the murders, rapes, and muggings of Detroit to participate in the Michigan Open. Despite being an open, the competition is somewhat of an elitist affair with some of the top wrestlers in North America competing.

Kirk Osadetz took a default win from Joe Sroboda but then lost twice — 7-0 to Ford of the Mayor Daley Youth Foundation of Chicago, and 10-6 to Gibbard of Oakland.

Rob Moore, competing in the 136½ lb. category, placed third in the class with wins over Gibbard and Meyers of the University of Western Ontario. Moore succumbed to a pin by Cornett of Indianapolis and a 10-1 squelch by Beiler, another Canadian.

In fact, Canadians dominated Moore's class. Egan Beiler took first and Joe Dell'Aquila from Ryerson placed second.

The third Varsity wrestler was Roger Vachon, in the 149½ lb. weight class. Vachon split his matches with a pair of wins and two losses.

The team trophy went to the University of Western Ontario.

The Varsity — Brian Peir

Some players had a ball Friday night, but not these two leaving the individual universities to pick up the balance.

If the league decision is not reversed within the next few weeks, it appears inevitable that college swimming will revert to the unfortunate situation that existed four years ago when some Varsity swimmers had to deliberately lose races in order to help their teammates qualify for the CIAU finals.

Hockey dynasty ends-

Guelph edges Blues 5-4

By MIKE FRIEND

The hockey Blues spent a miserable Friday night at the arena dropping a 5-4 decision to the University of Guelph Gryphons in what was a fast, chippy, physical game which culminated in Varsity's first loss at home in a regular season game in about four years.

Blues went into the game missing no less than six regulars, including all three veteran defencemen — the injured Brent Swank and Al Milnes, plus Warren Anderson who had important academic commitments as part of his final year Phys-Ed program. Frank Davis, Ron Harris, and Ivan McFarlane also didn't play.

However, the injuries are no excuse as Blues managed to outshoot Guelph 52-23 and had more than enough chances to win outright, let alone gain a tie.

A stalemate seemed inevitable with two minutes remaining, but Guelph's relentless fore-checking and Blues' persistent sloppiness suddenly turned a moral defeat into a statistical one. Steve Mantle broke up a Varsity rush deep in Blues' end and fed the puck to winger Dave Revington who was standing uncovered just outside the goal crease. Revington's quick shot beat Varsity netminder Dave Hulme at 18:44 and the entire Gryphon bench poured on the ice to celebrate.

Blues pulled their goaltender in the final minute and were unlucky not to get a tie as leading scorer Kent Ruhnké somehow failed to put the puck into a wide-open net with only 21 seconds remaining to play.

If Blues had to lose a game at home this year, Friday's match certainly had all the right ingredients. The six key players missing from the lineup, a hot opposition goaltender in Guelph's Dave Mooté, a weakened defence, an off night by Blues' own goaltender, too many goalposts, and although it may sound like sour grapes, some unbelievably inept officiating from referee Gary Moroney.

Blues also lost because Guelph played a better game.

Gryphons fore-checked relentlessly if somewhat crudely, using their sticks and arms at every opportunity. Defensively, they simply battered around any Varsity player who ventured near the goal and if holding didn't work they could always rely on less subtle forms of persuasion like charging and cross-checking. Once it became evident that referee Moroney wasn't going to call too many penalties Guelph's decision to use intimidation and clutch-and-grab tactics was certainly a very prudent one. Gryphons knew what they could get away with and promptly did so.

Offensively, as the shots would indicate, the Gryphons had few

A determined Guelph defense refuses to allow the Blues to set up in the slot really good scoring chances but took full advantage of what breaks came their way. Hulme made some sparkling saves but also was very weak on at least three of Guelph's first four goals.

Blues were leading 2-0 late in the first period when Hulme and his defence misplayed a rebound, allowing center Adam Brown to flip it home from close in.

Early in the second period, Blues were caught up ice as Kim Miles broke in with only Ruhnké back defending. Miles fired high at Hulme who somehow misplayed the puck and it rolled off him and into the net.

Brown, the OUA's leading scorer last year, made it 3-2 at 14:49 when he was allowed to skate unmolested from the corner to Hulme's right and he scored with a quick low shot to the far corner.

Thirty-seven seconds later, it was 4-2 when Hulme apparently thought that Dave Cobban would pass from the corner and instead Cobban shot to the near side as Hulme moved away from the post.

Blues got one goal back before the second period ended when Bill Fifield converted a Larry Hopkins rebound. After failing to capitalize on two power play opportunities in the final period, Varsity finally got the tying goal at 10:18 as Don Pagnutti beat Mooté with a hard backhand after a clever move in front of the net.

Despite the numerous defensive mistakes the game was probably lost on offence as Blues had those 52 shots and should have collected several more goals earlier in the game. Moreover, in the final period Varsity's rookie defence brigade of Charlie Hughes, Dave Rooke, Rocci Pagnello, and Alex Muselius, brought up from Erindale of the intercollegiate league, held Guelph to only one shot on goal during the first ten minutes, and only one more in the next eight minutes before the winning goal was scored.

Bill Hews opened the scoring with a quick wrist shot high to the glove side after only three minutes and a few minutes later Varsity had an opportunity to turn the game into a rout. Mooté took an elbowing penalty and seconds later, defenceman Doug McKay picked up a double-minor for cross-checking. As a result Blues had a two-man advantage for 78 seconds and a one-man advantage for no less than four minutes and 42 seconds.

Varsity was unable to keep the puck in Guelph's zone for most of that time and managed only one goal as Hews scored from Pagnello and Rooke at 11:33. The many missed chances and bad breaks became a major factor as the game wore on. Guelph roared back to take the lead and eventually win the game.

Swim Blues lose on U.S. cruise

By PAUL CARSON

The men's swimming team dropped a dual meet 73-40 to powerful University of Michigan Saturday in Ann Arbor, but in the process several Varsity swimmers turned in excellent times at a most critical period of the schedule.

Blues expected to lose, given the overwhelming superiority of U.S. college swimming, but in the process the Varsity team set one relay record and produced three individual life-time best times in a solid display of determination and confidence against the best that Michigan could offer.

"The improvement in our attitude is fantastic," said Varsity coach Robin Campbell. "Three years ago we simply gave up against Michigan's lesser known people. This year, our guys faced their top people and battled them all the way."

Blues were allowed to use veteran Jim Adams and he responded with victories in the 100 and 200-yard freestyles. He took the 200 in a rather slow 1:44 but shocked Michigan by blitzing their best, Tom Zuba, with 47.5. Zuba placed third in last year's NCAA championships.

Dave Wilkin produced his best-ever 50-yard freestyle, winning the event in 22.25 and then added more insult to Zuba by grabbing second in the 200 free with 49 seconds flat.

Shawn Laari took a giant step on his comeback trail placing third in the 1000 free with a lifetime beat of 10:10.05 and missed taking second by only a thousandth of a second.

Sophomore Mike Hibberd increased his chances of making the CIAU finals by chopping four seconds off his previous best time in the 500 free as he finished in 5:10.0.

Blues 400-yard medley relay team of George Gross, Juli

Daniel, Greg Vanular and Adams won their event in 3:40.9 erasing the former mark of 3:41.1 which had somehow survived from 1970.

Gross later placed second in the 200 back and Vanular was runner-up in the 200-yard individual medley.

The good times and renewed confidence have come at a most appropriate stage in the season, since an inexplicable decision by OUA athletic directors may result in only 25 Ontario swimmers going to the CIAU finals instead of the 50-member contingent that went last year.

In December the athletic directors decided that budget restrictions necessitated a severe reduction from the assumed figure of 50 to only 22 swimmers plus three divers.

Understandably upset at this decision, the league's swim coaches offered to pay the added costs from their own association funds in order that more athletes would be able to attend the national finals.

Under existing arrangements, the winner of each event in the OUA championships gets free passage to the CIAU meet set for Lakehead in early March. The CIAU also pays 50 percent of the airfare for the other competitors,

Seeley case under review

By MARINA STRAUSS

The John Seeley case has not closed yet. The OISE faculty association has formally asked the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) to investigate why the institute didn't hire Canadian sociologist John Seeley last fall.

In a telegram to CAUT Thursday, faculty association grievance committee chairman Andy Effrat asks the national federation to look into "possible procedural or structural inadequacies concerning appointment practices at OISE."

Although Effrat admitted yesterday he doesn't think Seeley will get a job at OISE, "an independent panel is needed to clear Seeley's name."

OISE director Robert Jackson vetoed the OISE sociology department's decision last year to hire Seeley, who has been highly praised for his work by colleagues and has over 400 publications to his name.

Effrat writes in the telegram that "ideological, political or personal factors and the like may have influenced the decisions of the (OISE) board (of directors), the director, and DPAC (director's personnel advisory committee which recommended to Jackson that Seeley not be hired) in such a way as to contravene some of Seeley's, the department's and the association's academic rights and to taint Seeley's name."

Effrat notes OISE's board of directors turned down a department and faculty association request last November to conduct an independent review.

Instead, the board conducted its own review and concluded the decision not to hire Seeley was valid — without giving reasons.

"Clear, mutually agreed upon and independent appeal procedures are lacking in personnel matters at OISE," Effrat cited as another of the six principle grounds he states for the association's grievance.

Another reason for the grievance was that "the initial rationale for the decision not to hire Seeley was not believed by the department of sociology in education and the association to be sound — especially since OISE offered Seeley the department chairpersonship just two years previously."

Effrat also pointed out the director, his personnel advisory committee and the board never replied to the department's rebuttal of the initial rationale for not hiring Seeley "despite repeated requests by the department and the association."

Effrat also notes the "possible political interference" of, for example, Ontario Education Minister Thomas Wells, who admitted in the Legislature in November he passed on negative comments about Seeley to Jackson.

Seeley, who is now 64 years old and lives and teaches in California, has urged the university to investigate why he was refused positions at both OISE and the U of T's sociology department, even if he never gets the job.

He is convinced his political convictions and activities — such as supporting many student liberation struggles throughout his academic career — were responsible for top administrators and educators in the province to oppose his coming here.

U of T sociology department chairman Irving Zeitlin came under criticism after he vetoed a staffing committee's choice last year to hire Seeley for that department.

Seeley, who co-authored Crestwood Heights, left Toronto in 1964 after a dispute with Murray Ross, then president of York University, where Seeley was sociology department chairman and assistant to Ross.

The dispute centred around York's planned expansion — Ross and Seeley had aimed to keep the university small and intimate.

Although Seeley had planned to speak at the U of T last month, he was unable to come because of a car accident he was in. However, he still hopes to come before the academic year is finished.

Rock gets thrown out of Con Hall

By BOB BETTSON

The U of T administration will no longer rent Convocation Hall to SAC for concerts because of excessive smoking and drinking which causes dangerous fire hazards.

According to U of T Vice-president Jill Conway, the administration has little recourse because there has been a long history of inadequate fire marshalling for the many rock and folk concerts SAC has run at Convocation Hall.

The presently booked concerts including Sonny Terry and Brownie McGee, Steeleye Span and Keith Jarrett will still be held, but U of T physical plant officials and SAC will meet to plan tighter marshalling.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch refused to comment until he has met with Conway today. The SAC executive will be meeting with U of T president John Evans next week to discuss the ban.

The hall, which has a capacity of 1,700, has always been regarded as a fire hazard. Both cigarette and marijuana smoking has been quite flagrant at recent concerts despite SAC attempts to stop it.

Conway said she did not foresee the possibility of future concert bookings for SAC in any event. She said Kanowitch requested the meeting.

"It has reached the point where the uncontrolled crowd is a considerable hazard," she said. "It would be reckless for the administration to allow this to continue."

Varsity rock critic Rob Bennett, who has attended many of the concerts, blamed the problem on SAC.

"They have been putting on the wrong shows. The size and acoustics of Con Hall can't handle hard rock shows," Bennett said.

Bennett said that hard rock acts tend to attract a rougher audience more likely to smoke dope and cause fire hazards. Any SAC warnings have been ignored and marshalling has been ineffectual according to Bennett.

"It's become so hot sometimes many people have had to leave," Bennett said.

He claims there has been little problem when folk-rock bands have been hired.

The Varsity — Brian Peil

No more health hazards like this one will be booked into Con Hall, a dismayed U of T administration promises.

The SAC concerts have been exceptionally popular with recent concerts by Gentle Giant and Lynyrd Skynyrd selling out.

But music critics have noted the growing lack of crowd control and the predominance of smoking and drinking.

As well as presenting a fire hazard, the behavior of crowds has annoyed performers and caused physical damage to the hall.

Despite residents pleas U of T exemption likely

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Toronto's building and development committee voted down a request by Ward Six community groups Monday to reconsider exempting U of T from the Modified Core Area Holding Bylaw.

The proposal that the university area be exempted was part of a report to the building and development committee adopted by City Council Jan. 22 and 23.

The report proposes for exemption U of T and four other areas as "areas of public and semi-public institutions which have already been predominantly redeveloped."

Subject to final approval by City Council, the commission's action means the university will not have to apply for exemption from the Modified Core Area Holding Bylaw for any buildings it plans to construct in the "University of Toronto area."

The area is defined as bounded by Bloor St., Spadina Ave., College St. and University Ave., excluding the Huron-Sussex area which is already classified as residential.

The modified bylaw is an attempt to circumvent the Ontario Municipal Board's December decision to disallow Toronto's 1972 bylaw prohibiting construction of buildings higher than 45 feet in the downtown core.

Sue Sparrow, special assistant to Ward Six Alderman Allan Sparrow, said the report was adopted by council generally so that technical work on developing the modified holding bylaw could begin.

However, there was an understanding that citizen groups would be allowed to make representations to the building and development committee, she said.

Sparrow said the committee allowed the community representatives only a token appearance before defeating their request.

The committee's recommendations must be passed by City Council in two weeks time, and are subject to small amendments.

Sparrow said although the university's exemption cannot be finalized until passed by the council, there was little chance for a reversal. Given the support of the council's executive and "Old Guard", it is almost certain to be passed, she added.

If adopted by council, the university's exemption will be effective for the duration of the Modified Core Area Holding Bylaw.

At the expiration of the modified bylaw in September, it is possible the university's exemption may become permanent in the adoption of the final bylaw.

Interdisciplinary budget slashed

By JENNIFER WONG

The arts and science faculty council has handed down a $50,000 budget cutback to the interdisciplinary studies program (ISP), reducing its funds from $110,000 to $58,000.

Although $25,000 is a straight cutback, the other half is a transfer of funds to support former interdisciplinary courses in women's and environmental studies now given under the auspices of Innis College.

Some of that money will also go to New College which is taking on INX 250, INX 311 and sections of the course in alternatives in education.

Although claiming sympathy with the ISP, arts and science dean Bob Greene said the faculty is under general financial constraint and balances must be made.

Greene added the ISP budget had been kept free of major cuts since it was established five years ago, although the Faculty of Arts and Sciences has itself experienced successive budget reductions since 1969.

Underlying the ISP budget cut is the gradual transfer of interdisciplinary responsibilities to the colleges.

"With the new Memo of Understanding between the university and the federated colleges," Greene said, "the colleges will be able to initiate courses and programs themselves; they should be able to provide a wider and better forum for innovation."

The Memo of Understanding outlines a plan to associate teaching of centralized university subjects with the colleges.

Greene mentioned the various colleges are developing interest in courses which span or lie outside the traditional disciplines.

Among others, he cited the film and environmental courses at Innis, Canadian studies at University College and the proposed medieval program at St. Michael's College.

Interdisciplinary studies program chairman Marty Wall sees the program's role as seeding new courses and finding them a "permanent home" in the colleges.

But, Wall added, "the colleges may be leery of taking on some of what have been called our 'subversive' courses. There is also the problem of the qualifications of certain teachers from outside the university."

If the ISP were to be phased out, the interdisciplinary symposiums may well disappear, said Wall.

These symposiums, where a group of students and teachers submit a proposal of study to the ISP, try out ideas which sometimes succeed in becoming regular courses.

Wall said this type of course presents administrative difficulties to the colleges, which normally formulate their offerings a year in advance.

His main concern is safeguarding the program's function rather than its existence, Wall said.

Arts and Science Student Union field worker Rick Gregory called the ISP cutbacks "appalling."

Gregory said the move shows a lack of commitment to ongoing innovation.

Gregory doubts the colleges will sustain their new role as course and program creators because "Their real interest is not innovation, but attracting students and the student dollar."

CIA protects big business: Agee

"The CIA is a secret police force working at the service of the U.S. multi-national corporations and next to warning about surprise attacks from a foreign power, its most important function is the protection of the economic interests of these companies," a former CIA agent said Monday.

Philip Agee, a Latin America specialist with the CIA from 1956 to 1969, told about 300 people at a forum sponsored by the Revolutionary Marxist Group that CIA activities are directed against "groups who would oppose U.S. capital penetration of their countries."

CIA activities must always be seen within the context of the prevailing economic realities, Agee cautioned. "The real argument is not with the CIA, but with the system of economic exploitation. The CIA is just the enforcing mechanism."

Although his activities were directed almost entirely at Latin America, Agee suggested the CIA is undoubtedly active today in Canada. "Since Canada poses such a minimal threat to U.S. economic interests," he said, "the CIA will likely have only a monitoring function, keeping its finger on the political pulse."

It pays special attention to groups advocating economic nationalism and likely reports regularly to other U.S. government agencies.

Despite the aura of mystery surrounding it, the CIA is not all-powerful and can be defeated, Agee said.

ANTI-CIA GROUP FORMED

As one technique, he announced the formation of a group in Washington, D.C., that will begin "a campaign of solidarity" involving progressive groups in countries where the CIA operates.

"We will collect information on CIA agents and then forward it to national organizations fighting for liberation, who will then take appropriate action to neutralize the CIA activity in their country," he explained.

Recently the group supplied sympathetic Mexican organizations with information concerning 37 of the 49 known CIA agents operating in that country.

The information was widely publicized in the Mexican press and, said Agee, "within two days the two top CIA officers were withdrawn from Mexico."

Agee confirmed that in Latin America and elsewhere the CIA has successfully infiltrated some leftist groups using paid spies and a variety of bugging techniques.

The agents' role is to promote factionalism and to spread false documents about the groups' aims and activities, he said.

Agee was still a student at Notre Dame University in Indiana when the CIA first contacted him in the spring of 1956.

He told the forum at the Faculty of Education auditorium that during his first few years with "The Company" he readily accepted the official explanation that the CIA exists to preserve American values and warn against any surprise attacks.

All revolutionary socialist movements were regarded as examples of Soviet expansionism, he said, and by defeating them the CIA claimed to be "buying time for the local liberal reformers."

SEES THE LIGHT

But his service in Ecuador and Uruguay in the early 60s led him to see "contradictions between liberal reforms and true social justice."

The promised reforms never affected the critical problem of land ownership and, "I saw that in the more we succeeded in propping up the existing regimes, the further away went the hopes for real reform since there was no longer any pressure upon the governments to act."

Agee now describes himself as a revolutionary socialist.

Drawing partially from examples in his own career, Agee mentioned numerous examples of CIA covert activities in Latin America and elsewhere.

The CIA staged the 1954 rightist coup in Guatemala to protect the investment of the powerful United Fruit Company. The 1965 invasion of the Dominican Republic was necessary to protect the interests of U.S. sugar companies.

In Brazil the CIA spent over $20 million to manipulate the 1962 general election, then supported the 1964 army coup and later helped train the secret police agency which currently runs a brutal police state with many "unspeakable tortures."

After Salvador Allende almost won the presidency of Chile in 1958, the CIA co-operated with the First National City Bank to finance the successful campaign of rightist Eduardo Frei in 1964 and of course helped engineer the 1973 coup in which Allende was murdered.

CIA ACTIVE ELSEWHERE

Elsewhere, the CIA is active in Laos, Zaire, Ecuador, Iran and South Korea, where it supports the local secret police whom Agee termed "one of the most terrible forces of repression in the world."

"Vietnam was a higher level of the same type of repression," Agee said, adding that the U.S. decision to commit hundreds of thousands of regular troops was an admission that the CIA's traditional covert tactics were a total failure.

The main factor governing U.S. policy in Vietnam is "the inflexible requirement for complete solidarity in preserving appropriate conditions for foreign investment by U.S. companies," Agee suggested.

He said that in western Europe the CIA actively supported Christian Democratic parties in order to deny political power to "the left socialists who had been the chief opponents of fascism." Compliant trade unions were formed to prevent workers from "ever seriously questioning the capitalist system."

Thus, said Agee, "under CIA control the unions became partners of the U.S. multi-national corporations."

Commenting on his brief period with the CIA's Greece affairs desk in 1959, he revealed the CIA had supported and supplied information to Constantine Karamanlis, the then and now premier.

Despite several questions from members of the audience, Agee was unable to supply any additional information.

He told one questioner he never saw any evidence linking the CIA to either the Kennedy assassinations or the Mafia, "but it certainly is possible."

Agee's book Inside the Company: CIA Diary, published this year, outlines his progression from agent to revolutionary and contains lengthy descriptions of the CIA's methods of intelligence-gathering and clandestine operations.

Forestry students await term marks

By MATHILDE VERHULST

Second year forestry students are still awaiting their first term marks with the date students can withdraw from their programs without paying a penalty only two weeks away.

The delay in receiving the marks is presumably caused by computer processing problems.

What's more, forestry SAC representative Rick Kelbertas revealed, there are supposedly 30 out of 83 second year forestry students on "probation" or with averages of less than 60 percent.

Forestry student union president David McGowan said, "I suspect marks will be out on time, but I'd like to have seen them out earlier to allow for a more competent decision on the part of the student."

The department implemented a semester system last academic year.

Under the new system, if a student meets probationary status for two consecutive semesters, he or she must withdraw for one semester.

Of the presumed 30 second year students on probation, 10 have failed their first semester, Kelbertas said.

He stressed he received this information "from a staff member directly involved with the marks before they were sent to the computer around Jan. 1 to be processed."

Kelbertas added, however, "There is a chance no one will fail" if the marks were altered by the faculty council.

"The marks have been tampered within so many ways," he said, "that I'm now skeptical to say whether 10 students have failed."

"The marks might have to be raised to a certain standard," he added.

Kelbertas blamed the computer system for the problems and delays in getting the first semester marks back to students.

Forestry assistant dean David Love said the alleged number of second year students on probation and the number of failures "is away off track."

Love said under the semester system's new regulations "no one fails in second year."

An average of 60 percent or less meant probationary status, Love noted, a warning to the student that his or her marks are not adequate.

If the students fail to achieve higher than 60 percent in their second semester, they merely withdraw for a semester.

Love squelched the rumor that the large number of second year students on probation was an attempt to cut back on student numbers for budgetary reasons.

Kelbertas echoed Love, saying, "The consensus is there is no desire to cut back on the number of students."

He added, however, forestry will cut the number of first year students entering the faculty in 1975-76.

McGowan agreed, saying the decision was made "to improve the quality of the student entering first year."

McGowan added that budget cutbacks were an "assumption." He said the forestry faculty has been undergoing an expansion program to increase its facilities over the last three years.

SAC to meet Evans on athletics complex fuss

SAC executive members will meet with U of T president John Evans Monday to ask where the extra $3.6 million funding for the proposed athletics building will come from, now that students will not be asked to pay a capital levy.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley said last night the executive would ask Evans for the source of the sum, and also ask for assurances the university would continue to fund the athletics department to at least 50 per cent of its budget.

"If the $3.6 million is completely up in the air," Buckley said, "we'd like to have some idea where it's coming from."

Buckley expressed reservations the money would be made up by effectively implementing a capital levy through the use of stiff users' fees after the building was completed.

The SAC executive also found itself split, "half-supporting, half reluctantly-supporting" construction of the building, Buckley said.

At a SAC-sponsored meeting Sunday night, local residents and administrative representatives found themselves unable to resolve any of their differences, thus leaving SAC "caught in the middle," as Buckley put it.

Local residents have argued the building will deteriorate the neighborhood, that they were not consulted on the design, and that U of T rammed its way through the city's interim height criteria.

The entire U of T area has been recommended for exemption from the city's Modified Core Area Holding Bylaw by Toronto's planning board.

On Monday the city's building and development committee ignored pleas from area residents to reconsider the proposed exemption.

A motion proposed at last night's executive meeting to suggest the U of T be subject to the development criteria — thus forcing critical examination of the athletics complex — failed.

Council race warms up

The Governing Council elections are swinging into full gear. Already some leading student politicians have crawled out of the woodwork to pick up nomination forms.

From SAC, president Seymour Kanowitch picked up nominations for the graduate OISE constituency as did vice-president Tim Buckley for the undergraduate professional student's seat. Communications Commissioner Michael Sabia picked up forms for the undergraduate Arts and Science seat.

Campus alternative reactionary James Hull picked up papers for the undergrad arts seat as did John Parker from Victoria College. Graduate Students Union President Frank McIntyre was among those requesting forms for one of the graduate seats.

Another rumored candidate is former arts student governor Howard Levitt who will probably run for a seat in the professional school category. Levitt is currently enrolled in the faculty of law.

The race seems to be warming up, sports fans.

The History Book, a series of animated films from Denmark will be shown tomorrow night and Friday night at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Rd.

The films are a "humorous and animated look at the Western World developed for use in Danish schools" of ordinary working people," according to the centre's information leaflet.

Cost for the films is $1.50 for adults and 50 cents for children. All are welcome to attend.

The report of the task force reviewing U of T's policy not to exercise its right to vote at stockholders' meetings will be made public Feb. 26 at a session of Governing Council's business affairs committee.

The task force was set up by business affairs last May in response to a complaint from Political Economy professor R. C. Pratt.

Pratt claimed the U of T implicitly supported the destructive activities in Guinea-Bissau (Portuguese Guinea) being carried out by the multinational Exxon Corporation, by not voting the Exxon shares it holds.

J. F. Brook, secretary of the business affairs committee, said the report was scheduled to be released last week, but "because certain key people were not at the meeting," the report was deferred until Feb. 26.

In preparing its report, the task force arranged two meetings for the presentation of briefs.

The fact "nobody came to the meetings" convened by the task force, Brook said, indicates "it is not quite the lively issue everyone figured it would be."

However, "the first meeting of the task force did not take place because several members were not available," Pratt noted.

Also, "there was very short notice given for the meetings," he said.

An advertisement appeared in the Varsity Nov. 13 to announce the meetings for Nov. 19 and Nov. 26.

Pratt and several other people submitted written briefs to the task force.

"When a person makes a written report, it is customary they be invited to discuss it at a hearing," Pratt said. "I was not invited, nor was anyone else, as far as I know."

Considering these reasons for the lack of attendance at the task force's meeting, no conclusions can be accurately drawn as to interest in the issue, noted Pratt.

"I still think it is very important."

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Students should pay higher fees

I write in rebuttal (stinging, I hope) to the editorial in the Feb. 3 issue of this paper (Ceiling raises will hurt accessibility). Although I would hardly suggest that "time spent at university is time spent in recreation," I certainly think that attending university is a privilege, not a right, and drastic demands are not only immature, but totally unrealistic.

The rapidly increasing costs of running educational facilities are of paramount concern in Canada and we should all realize that the money is coming from everyone's taxes — in other words, people who have worked all their lives, and who will probably never have an opportunity to attend university themselves, are heavily subsidizing our lectures, our libraries, and our degrees. While it is important to consider individual problems — bilingual status for some campuses and continuing education programs in rural and northern centres — these must be viewed with the overall situation in mind.

The front page of your paper carried an article on the Ontario Federation of Students and their fight to keep the university fees down. Now while I may, from a purely selfish standpoint, hope that they are successful, I certainly cannot condone their reasoning. Just who do they, and the editorial staff of this paper, think pays for their education? Or, more to the point, who do you think should pay for your education? As the costs for operating a university and faculty hiring increase, it seems to me obvious that tuition should also increase — at the same rate. Yet here is the irony of your argument: because inflation is rampant and because jobs will be more difficult to find; those seem to be the reasons that interest rates, which have increased everywhere else, should remain stationary in the OSAP program, and why a more lenient loan grant system should be adopted. (Not to make any mention of the petty discrepancies in the system which are constantly being flaunted, I wouldn't want to bore your readers.)

There is a solution to the whole problem of where to get money to pay for one's education. (Good news indeed!) Step one: take full advantage of the free secondary school education offered in this country. Step two: if you cannot afford to use the OSAP system or, like myself, are opposed, in principle, to government handouts, go to work. It is not as novel as it may sound. Many have done it before you, many are doing it now, and it will be done in the future by people who realize the value of a university education and are willing to work for it. Step three: go to university (work part-time if you have to) — it will be worth it.

While I am sure that the Ministry of Colleges and Universities will eventually meet with the OFS, I can well understand that they "apparently have no time for such an appointment." I myself would be extremely reluctant to waste my time.

ASSU a success, executive says

In your article of Fri. Jan. 17, St. Mike's Falls to get Rebate from SAC, you repeated a criticism of the Arts and Science Students' Union which we feel to be unfair. Specifically, you mentioned that the ASSU has been inactive this year. This criticism we believe to be both factually untrue as well as encouraging of false expectations concerning the activities of a union such as ASSU. We would like to respond to this in point form if we may.

1. ASSU is itself an umbrella organization consisting of course unions, faculty council reps, and people in the college councils. The main thrust of the union is to aid its members, particularly the course unions in achieving their goals. As a result, it is generally the course unions which achieve public exposure and not the ASSU as a whole. This in turn gives rise to the appearance of non-activity.

2. At the beginning of this academic year, there were four, possibly five function course unions. As of the beginning of this calendar year this number has risen to thirteen. Each course union has strived to encourage as much participation in their operations as is humanly possible. On the whole, though one could point to specific exceptions, we feel that the unions have been pretty successful in this regard. Such an increase in both the numbers of active unions, and a marked improvement in the quality of their work can hardly be considered as indicative of inactivity.

3. From time to time, we have been criticized for not having organized more course unions and for not having done more course evaluations. We couldn't agree more with these sentiments. The reasons for this are complex. In our first two years of operation (this is our third) we suffered from incompetence, improper supervision of staff and most important, from general confusion about what we should be doing. Fortunately, we have resolved these problems. We do however, continue to face serious financial shortages which prevents us from doing all that we would like to do.

Our annual budget is less than $20,000. Each course evaluation we do costs between $300-$500. Each course union needs a budget so that it can provide services to its members. The average budget is somewhere around $500, not very much when one considers that a film, or speaker, or a newsletter can cost up to a $100 or more. For the umbrella to function properly, so that contact can be maintained with existing unions and so that new ones can be organized, we must maintain an office and staff (one), all of which costs money. If we are to organize new unions and if we are to improve the operations of the existing ones, then we need more money. It would be foolish to think otherwise.

We do not mean to imply here that ASSU or its members are above criticism. We have made mistakes in the past and we are trying hard to avoid them in the future. Further we encourage people to get in touch with us if they have complaints of any nature. Our office is in Rm. 1068 in Sid Smith, our phone is 928-4903.

The ASSU executive:

 Sam Crewe

The assertion in the first paragraph of this letter is incorrect.

The article specifically stated "SMC reps have also criticized ASSU for a lack of activity." The article itself made no judgment on the ASSU — ed.

Minister afraid to defend OSAP

The following letter was sent Feb. 3 to Premier William Davis by SAC president Seymour Kanowitch.

As I'm sure you are aware, the Ontario Student Assistance Programme is a topic of concern on our campuses throughout Ontario.

In order to clarify the issues involved, the University of Toronto Students' Administrative Council had planned to sponsor a forum titled "The Ontario Student Assistance Programme — Is It Adequate?" The forum would have had a representative of the Ontario Government to explain its position on OSAP, while at the same time giving students the opportunity to share their concerns with the government.

Unfortunately, both James Auld, the Minister for Colleges & Universities, and Dr. Harry Parrot, his Parliamentary Assistant have declined invitations to participate in the forum, claiming that they are too busy. Since the invitation was offered early in January, and both Mr. Auld and Dr. Parrot were told that the forum would be arranged to suit their convenience, and since U of T is less than 5 minutes walking distance from Queen's Park, I have no choice but to assume that these gentlemen felt that they could not publicly justify the Assistance Programme before an audience of U of T students.

Needless to say, any forum on OSAP would be incomplete without a representative of the provincial government. Accordingly, should you feel that any member of your government is capable of defending the Ontario Students' Assistance Programme, whether they be from inside the Ministry for Colleges & Universities, outside the Ministry, cabinet minister, or non-cabinet minister, we would be most pleased to have them come and meet with the students of the University of Toronto.

Jews have a right to their own state

One of the underlying themes behind Zionism has been the desire of the Jews to have a country of their own, where they could establish a national identity like all other nation states. A country they could control in order to enact sectarian legislation (like Italian divorce law); discriminatory immigration policy (Uganda and its Asians) and have its own minority groups to hassle.

Following the great humanistic tradition of the Middle East (genocide of Black South Sudanese by Arab North Sudanese, 500,000 dead; massacre of Kurdish tribesmen by Iraqis; civil war in Yemen involving napalm and poison gassing of civilians) the Israelis have clear norms in which to operate. Looking at the 'democratic' and 'secular' state of Syria, where it is a crime for any state or military employee to buy anything from a Jew and where all Jewish property on its owners demise passes to the state, I can understand why expatriate Arabs in Canada are so upset with Israeli policy.

Once the Jews decided on an imperialistic and Western influenced nation-plan it is clear they have no right to remain. Parliamentary systems have no place in the Middle East: one party is enough, (Saudi Arabia, Syria, Libya, Iraq). Trade unions are a menace and instead of being a guiding force in the country (Histradruth) they should be in jail (Egypt). Better still, instead of locking up people at the taxpayers' expense, they should be handled in the traditional method and strung up on lamp posts, (Jews accused of spying for Israel in Baghdad).

I am surprised how few people know that terrorist acts played out on the bodies of Sephardic Jews are for their own good. Once a truly Palestinian state is constituted in the Middle East (more Palestinian than either Jordan or Israel — each with a majority of people born and raised in Palestine) these down-trodden, second-class Jews can be repatriated back to their proper homelands, (Palestinian National Covenant — Article 6). There in Morocco, Egypt, Iraq and Syria they and their children, over one and a half million people, will be peacefully resettled amongst the smiling natives who drove them from their homes and businesses; and upon prompt repayment of their confiscated property and belongings (5 billion dollars plus thirty years interest) they can regain their proper place in society.

As a footnote to a comment in Monday's Varsity, I guess that since we Jews have had a little more experience with Nazis than the rest of mankind, we seem to be associated with them more and more — especially in the letters to The Varsity and in Arab propaganda. I guess that they are truly sorry they hadn't developed their oil wealth in 1940 and could have been able to contribute that little extra bit to the German war effort. In case Israel comes out poorly in another war, S.S. General Alois Moser, mass murderer of tens of thousands in the Ukraine, is kept on staff as head of the Israeli desk of the Egyptian Secret Service. Let us not forget the recent history of this century in empty rhetoric and U.S.ese.

If Mr. Saab wants to amend the Israeli way of life, I suggest he become an Israeli citizen and run for election instead of preaching hate and violence in Canada.

Secret memo revealed

Confidential sources have provided The Varsity with a copy of a secret Conservative Party memorandum which indicates the party was on the verge of instituting a one-man dictatorship should it have won the July 8 federal election.

The secret memo, which goes by the code name of "The Campaign Song" calls on voters to "make a change," saying "it's now."

"The new day that's been coming is at hand," declares the memo. The document also makes a Goldwaterian plea for the hearts and minds of the voters. Instead of "in your heart you know he's right," the plea is "look inside, you've always known."

Why would one of Canada's traditionally reticent political parties adopt such a hard line stance? Why would it have thrown an 'easy' election victory by adopting revolutionary rhetoric?

The document seems to support the existence of a split between traditional party supporters, and young militants who refer to themselves as the Conservative Party of Canada (marxist-leninist).

NOW'S THE TIME

IT'S NOW, RIGHT NOW, IT'S NOW, RIGHT NOW!
 If there ever was a time to think it through, it's now.
 If there ever was a way to make a change, here's how.
 Our chance's a run, we'll take a stand.
 A man with strength to help this land.
 That new day that's been coming.
 That new day that's been coming is at hand.
 It's now, right now, it's now!
 IT'S NOW, RIGHT NOW, IT'S NOW, RIGHT NOW!
 Someone has to do it. The time is now.
 Someone's got a way to make it work, here's how.
 You make the choice, it's over due.
 You have the voice, it's up to you.
 That new day that's been coming.
 That new day that's been coming is at hand.
 It's now, right now, it's now!
 IT'S NOW, RIGHT NOW, IT'S NOW, RIGHT NOW!
 Someone has to do it. The time is now.
 Someone's got a way to make it work, here's how.
 Look around, you've always known.
 Now, look around, you're not alone.

DELUSIONS OF GRANDEUR

From bulletin populaire
The Olympic games are going to cost at least five times as much as forecast. The dispute has begun between Drapeau and Rousseau. Nothing works any more. The Olympics are becoming a sick farce which is going to cost us an enormous sum. One has the impression of having been fleeced and manipulated by Drapeau. His delusions of grandeur and his politics of prestige do not serve the great majority of the population — just the opposite.

In January 1973, Drapeau declared that it would be as difficult for the Olympics to leave a deficit as it would for a man to give birth to a child. Today, Drapeau must be pregnant. He's already bulging!

From the beginning, one must ask: who is benefitted by the Olympics? Who gains from this project?

In actuality, few people are going to be able to profit from the Olympics: the large contractors and suppliers for the construction and furnishing of the site, a few companies from the opportunity to make "the big dollar." It is no fluke that the costs are increasing at the speed of light. In the final analysis some people will profit.

The second large group of profiteers are evidently the merchants and intermediaries of all sorts who are taking advantage of the chance to make a quick buck — concessionaires for example; restaurateurs and hotel-owners, who are going to hike their prices (as they did during Expo).

Finally, several individuals have already begun to make themselves rich by the games, including all the high officials, administrators and bureaucrats responsible for carrying out the project. The best example is provided by the architect Tallibert — he has already received $1½ million in fees. An easy gain! Paid for with our money!

But the games do not only serve to enrich part of the bourgeoisie (large companies and individuals): they also serve an ideological function.

Bread and Circuses

Nero, well-known for setting fire to Rome several centuries ago, said it was sufficient to give the people bread and circuses to keep them in order. Similarly, in an attempt to make us forget the problems, which Montreal is now facing, Drapeau has "given" us the games.

It is not by chance if so much publicity surrounds the games, if one carries out propaganda campaigns in the schools to develop "the Olympic spirit."

However, it does not lead to very much to develop the Olympic spirit when one does not have the means to apply. To have the Olympic spirit when you can't play sports, when you lack the facilities to put into practice this "Olympic spirit" — that comes back to creating propaganda for Drapeau's "fantasy"; to making children believe that the Olympics are a good thing, although the facts show the Olympics will bring us nothing. Just the opposite — the Montreal working society will have to pay!

Bread and circuses — in Montreal, that is going to mean "dry bread and taxes."

Finally, it is we who are going to have to pay the cost!

An enormous deficit

In fact, everyone agrees today that the games will run a deficit. Self-financing is finished. How much will the deficit be? No one knows exactly. Probably several hundred million dollars.

It is already the working people who are financing the games through lottery tickets, stamp buying and Olympic coins.

With the deficits, one can expect a tax increase, since the money must be found in someone's pockets, whether it be Montreal, Quebec or Ottawa who shoulders the deficit — $200 or $300 million — that's an important sum!

What's more, we don't know how much more it is going to cost to attend the games. It seems that ticket prices are going to vary between $2 and $40.

And that's without counting the price hikes in the restaurants that we must assume evident — just like what happened during Expo.

Drapeau's politics of prestige to put Montreal on the map clearly appears a politics of class: in favor of those privileged few against the great majority of people who must bear an increasingly fascist mayor's delusions of grandeur.

Certain defenders of the mad project of the Olympic games argue that the games provide employment for a number of workers and will offer important economic benefits for the Montreal region. It is true that the games will actually create a certain number of temporary jobs (construction, employees of the games, and so on), but it is also true that it would have been possible to create work in constructing sporting facilities for the population, and not for an event which will last only two weeks.

For popular sports

The fundamental question is to decide what type of sports we want to have — prestige sports which last two weeks and which profit a minority, or popular sports in which everyone can take part.

Right now, there are no conditions for developing popular sports. Facilities are reduced to the minimum: a few gymnasiums, some sports grounds, some parks. In five years, the Drapeau administration has got rid of 25 parks. Worst of all for the Olympics, about 15 parks will be modified or will simply disappear. Long live the Olympic spirit! Today, the city allots only 6.1 percent of its budget to leisure, thus ranking 95th among Quebec municipalities.

In these conditions, to speak of sports activities and of Olympics is to speak of fraud.

You want to play hockey, our national sport? If you are lucky you can play about 11 pm, perhaps even at midnight or 1 am in the few arenas in the metropolitan region. That is the case with numerous teams formed in the factories or in metropolitan districts.

But meanwhile, Drapeau is building an expressway through downtown, and an enormous stadium.

The millions for the Olympics could have been used to start a program to develop sporting facilities, decentralised in the districts of the city, to be used by the majority of the population. "The Olympic spirit" would not have been as prestigious for the working class but certainly more profitable. Then it would also have been proper to speak of amateur sport, of good physical fitness, of the spirit of comradeship.

Drapeau has sabotaged this possibility with his "fantasy". He is hardly going to confine his monster. He follows the logic of his class... while we watch the games on television and our taxes increase.

The Economics of Cultural Nationalism

By YURI RUBINSKY

On January 17, 1975 the Ontario Legislature's Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism released its final report on cultural nationalism. A week later its final report on economic nationalism appeared. "These two final reports," a press release assures us, "mark the end of the Committee's work."

This work began in December, 1971. It included sitting through some 400 hearing appearances and sifting through a number of briefs and specially-commissioned documents. The hearings took place from Sudbury to Stockholm, fairly randomly scattered in time over the first two years of study.

During the week between the release of the reports it would have been fair to wonder what occupies committee members for such a length of time.

The "Final Cultural Report" claims it is a summary review of important cultural issues and that it is recommending priorities for future study and policy development. It treats itself generously.

It is, in fact, telling us bits and pieces that we all knew all along, and have stopped talking about. Possibly we are comforted that a government committee has noted "that a number of Canadian creative and performing artists have... competed successfully in such international cultural meccas as Hollywood, London, New York and Paris"; or that "an environment which is perceived to be pleasant provides comfort and satisfaction."

This latter statement leads to the report's argument favouring the preservation of buildings. (Environments "which stimulate the imagination contribute to elevation and refinement of values.") We learn that the French Minister of Culture once said that it is better to restore a thousand monuments for fifty years, than fifty monuments for a thousand years.

This seems to lead the committee to a point where it is favourably impressed by the Quebec government simply because it is engaged in restoring parts of Quebec City. The committee pooh-poohs without any other explanation that the destruction of the Van Horne Mansion in Montreal. It cites a list of restored Ontario buildings as being indicative of the benefits of "more systematic policies respecting preservation."

TIMIDITY

But what does anyone learn from this approach to disseminating information? Lists and cutenesses that no one would disagree with are really no beginning to formulating cultural policies for the rich and varied mosaic we insist we are.

The report is timid. The committee "notes" this, "also notes" something else, "would stress" this, "is concerned about" that, (although it seems to make a point of actually noting only that someone else is concerned). One is slightly worried that the Committee has noted but doesn't really feel one way or another.

In the end it simply recommends that another committee be struck, this one to be specifically a Select Committee on Cultural Affairs. The report identified a handful of "issues", noting that a "strong performing arts sector" is important; that there is a role for professional and amateur athletics; that there is an importance of the print media in the "Canadian cultural sector"; that there is a problem of lack of development and foreign control and distribution in the Canadian film industry.

Our most reasonable response to the final cultural report is simply "So?" Fortunately the committee revealed its economic report shortly after and we had to consider that maybe it had done a bit of homework after all.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The report describes itself accurately as "lengthy". But more importantly, it is detailed and has some punch to it. It gets down to actually recommending tax deductions for technological research and innovation that are Canadian-bred, and a penalty (albeit slight) for imported technologies.

Several examples will best illustrate the report's "punch": It recommends legislation require "that all advertising be free from intentional or apparent features or devices which tend to develop artificial psychological associations of the product with sexual life or social status, or elegance, glamour or excitement of 'lifestyle'. The use of testimonials and other devices to promote artificial and inappropriate associations of products with well-known personalities, their success or lifestyle... should be prohibited."

"The Committee recommends that all future transfers of... property in Ontario be restricted to Canadian citizens and landed immigrants in Canada."

"The Committee recommends, that legislation be introduced to provide that within five years all chancellors, boards of governors or equivalent, presidents, vice-presidents, deans and chairmen of departments at universities in Ontario be Canadians."

The Committee recommends that "for each university in Ontario, averaged over the 7 subsequent years, 80 percent of new appointments be from among those who have obtained most or all of their graduate training at Canadian universities."

We are reassured, no doubt, that this government committee's heart is in the right place.

We may be a touch worried that the report uses words that it doesn't define: Who will decide whether a particular piece of advertising carries an intentionally artificial psychological association? Does "most graduate training" imply more than just "a majority of years?"

When the report uses terms such as "priority should be given," or "policies should encourage," or even "should" alone, one worries about the recommendations' timidity, just how serious the government would be, where the lines are drawn between "shoulds" and "musts".

And in the meanwhile, one wonders, of course, what the fate will be of reports like this, whether (simply because the recommendations do seem reasonable in a number of instances) they disappear.

Maclean's wants a monopoly, Zimmerman, LaRue charge

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Eric Kierans claimed in his keynote speech at a Law and Contemporary Affairs conference on multi-national corporations two years ago that the answer to "American multi-national corporations is not Canadian multi-national corporations."

In other words, it's no use for Canadians simply to beat Americans at their own game.

That seems to be the lesson for 'Canadian magazine, publishing and film producing industries as well, or so two seminars held Saturday at the U of T Law Conference on New Directions in Canadian Nationalism at the Med Sci building would lead one to conclude.

At the magazine publishing seminar, Stephen LaRue, president of Time Canada and Edward Zimmerman, president of Readers' Digest of Canada Ltd., were much more articulate than their opponents Edward Cowan, publisher and president of Saturday Night, and Doris Anderson, editor of Chatelaine — and this was an important part of their argument.

The Canadian public and Canadian advertisers will have one major corporation... Maclean's, to deal with rather than three — as present, — Macleans, Time and Reader's Digest, they claimed — if they are legislated out of Canada.

A corporation is a corporation is a corporation. And a corporation in a monopoly position will give the public what it wants to give and charge what it wants for the service. Zimmerman and LaRue charged Maclean's had willingly divided the market with Time and Reader's Digest in the early sixties.

It had formed the Magazine Association of Canada with them and had developed a number of trade journals with great profits. But now Maclean's had become greedy and was merely using the issue of nationalism to disguise its expansionist ambitions.

Zimmerman derided the Maclean's people as the hot-to-trot ones who can taste a news magazine. "Buy their shares! Buy their shares!" he bitterly declaimed.

In the frequently emotional atmosphere, LaRue was the old cynic, who grinned when he told about Time Canada's "five, no, six, pages of Canadian content, and sometimes a cover."

Zimmerman was the fervent Canadian who felt that the time had come to denounce "blind nationalists who want to destroy what we have now for something they think, think, will be better."

And Keith Davey whose Senate Committee Report on mass communications had revived the issue was the detached observer who kept reminding the panel and the overflowing audience of the wider issues and problems in the Canadian communications industry, press concentration and magazine distribution in particular.

The seminar on the Canadian film industry returned very few answers, but it did ask some stimulating questions: whether Canadians are trying to create a film industry on American premises about budgets, particularly — or whether we are really trying for a different kind of industry, and whether that different kind of industry, in so far as it does exist, does not too often involve low-class production values.

The discussion was guided by some hard financial figures.

The exhibitor of a film in Canada, (Odeon or Famous Players) receives 50 to 60 percent of a film's gross.

The distributor receives 25 percent. The producer receives what's left. The producer then, if his film costs $1 million to produce, must gross $5 million if he is to break even.

The problem is how one was to get more money into the hands of the producers.

A levy tax on all films shown in Canada was suggested which would either be collected into a central fund and divided up among Canadian producers alone according to the gross of their films during that year or which would be returned directly into their hands.

The seminar was meant to discuss the possible importance of Pay TV to the Canadian film industry and representatives of cable systems which were considering using the pay-TV hardware which is in existence were on the panel.

But as one of them noted, TV has taken over from film the mass audience function that film used to have.

The bleakness of the situation was enough to prompt a member of the audience to question whether the Canadian film industry really is an industry or a cultural handout, and to suggest that if it is a cultural handout, that it be done more efficiently through a Crown Corporation devoted exclusively to making films.

Juneau's speech boring as law conference ends with a sigh and yawn

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The most surprising thing about CRTC chairman Pierre Juneau's keynote speech at the U of T conference was that the best up and coming legal minds of the best law school in Canada — and all the others assembled in the Four Seasons Sheraton ballroom — listened to it so patiently.

Juneau's speech, entitled Beyond the Labels, delivered Saturday night at the banquet which concluded the conference, went beyond all petty nationalist and internationalist labels into a sea of mind-numbing platitudes.

Juneau set the tone for the conference this year on New Directions in Canadian Nationalism with the opening sentence of his keynote address:

"I doubt that it would be proper for a public servant to come to a conference of this kind, and attempt to indicate a direction for Canadian nationalism.

The speech was uncontroversial, unpolitical, uninteresting, sliding from superficiality to superficiality. It was as bland as the chicken, rice and cut beans which preceded it.

The main point of the speech, the assumption that "any intervention by public authorities in the so-called free market is a form of protection and interference which almost inevitably leads to mediocrity," is an incredibly ignorant interpretation of the history of artistic creation.

"Most of the known works of art: painting, architecture, music, ballet, opera, theatre and in a more recent period, cinema, are the result either of a direct or indirect action by either the state or the church."

But Juneau, hedging his claims for the value of state intervention, also noted, "Imaginative and innovative talents are important, even in business terms.

"While demand for automobiles declines, demand for new forms of entertainment and information, for furnishings and decorations for our lives, and works of art and masterful performances for our cultural meeting places constantly grows.

"Record sales, paid admissions to the cinema are up, refrigerator and clothing sales are down. Why then do we continue to think of the creative sector as charity, as good work best left to socialites and volunteer committees?"

"If we study the real socio-economic role of this sector, we may even find it is not a charity at all. The Canada Council made a start in this direction in 1972 when it retained a consulting firm to study the economic impact of the return to the government in taxation of subsidies to several major performing companies. The total taxes from the companies and spin-off activities generated by the existence of these companies more than repaid the government subsidy," Juneau said.

I thought I was at a meeting of an annual convention of Jaycees or Rotarians.

The speech was totally alien to the give and take, the challenge and confrontation of the various interest groups that had made so many of the seminars so interesting.

This conference ended not with a bang but with a yawn. And another one. And another one.

Audience members at law conference struggle to stay awake.

Women lose out on property claims

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE
Despair not, fellow women! Did you know you are entitled to keep all wedding gifts should your marriage break up?

This cheering fact came out at a noon-time discussion about women's property rights at the Toronto Dominion Cinema, which drew a near capacity crowd.

The U of T School of Continuing Studies is sponsoring a series of lectures every Tuesday noon to discuss what its pamphlet describes as "issues for the urban woman."

Rosalie Abella, a Toronto lawyer, spoke yesterday about women and property law.

The lecture was subtitled How To Keep What You Have, but she suggested a better title would be How To Get What He Has.

Abella explained the existing system of separate property in Ontario means unless you have acquired a property and it is in your own name, you are not, upon the dissolution of your marriage, entitled to it.

The audience was reminded of Irene Murdoch, the Alberta rancher's wife, who, after helping to develop her husband's farm, was not entitled to any of it when the marriage broke up, according to a Canadian Supreme Court decision last year.

"The Supreme Court gave her a terrific amount of sympathy," Abella said, "but no farm." Abella urged legal recognition of a woman's contribution in a marriage.

The Law Reform Commission has recommended three systems of property law.

One would be the existing system of separate property. (Whosever name the property is registered under, owns it.)

A second would involve dividing the net assets at the end of the marriage equally between the two spouses.

The other possibility is a system of marriage contracts whereby the couple agrees before the marriage who will get what should the marriage break up.

The problem here is such marriage contracts are illegal.

It is illegal, Abella explained, to anticipate a break-up when entering into a marriage which is itself a legal contract.

Abella said property law in Ontario was last changed in 1884.

She said the courts must stop thinking in terms of who is entitled to what in a divorce settlement, and think rather of each spouse's needs.

Abella answered questions concerning practically every situation possible.

What happens when she walks out on him, or she puts him through school and then walks out on him? What if he walks out on her, or she puts him through school and then he walks out on her, or they both commit adultery?

The mind boggled with the infinite variety of scenarios.

Abella's conclusion in practically every case was that the woman was likely to be left with neither property nor redress.

Still no procedure for fired math prof's appeal

By BOB BETTSON

Fired mathematics instructor Stephen Salaff must wonder what he has to do to get an appeal of his dismissal. It has been three years since Salaff was fired and U of T president John Evans has still not agreed to a fair appeal procedure.

Salaff was fired by math chairman George Duff in December, 1972, after Salaff had a dispute with a senior instructor for taking the students' side in a grading dispute.

The firing sparked a petition and, with the denial of tenure to two other popular professors, caused students to hold an 11-day occupation of Duff's office in Sidney Smith Hall.

Salaff has tried for the past two years to get an open appeal hearing but failed. At first Evans refused to specify the method of appeal. Then, after pressure from U of T Faculty Association president Bill Nelson he agreed to set up a procedure.

Last May Evans agreed with a proposal of several faculty members to set up a tripartite commission with one member each appointed by Salaff and Evans and one appointed by the two jointly. The commission would hold open hearings.

But after Salaff wrote to accept, he retracted the offer and suggested a one-member commission appointed by himself.

This offer was written in September. Salaff wrote back asking the president to reconsider, but Salaff has received no reply.

Several weeks ago Salaff went to a meeting with internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway in which Conway reiterated Evans' refusal to reconsider the tripartite commission unless all sessions were closed.

"Recent years have witnessed a mounting wave of demonstrations, confrontations and violence in North American Universities. Increasingly these disturbances have been characterized by extremism and violence, confusion and division on the part of the faculty, frequent tacit or vocal endorsement of radical students by some faculty members, a wide range of responses by university administrators (all the way from condoning or forgiving extremist behavior to prompt reliance on the police), demands for amnesty in the aftermath of violence, and a growing disaffection and rage directed at the universities by the public and legislators.

"There can be no doubt this violence constitutes a serious danger to the survival of universities as places of teaching research and scholarship. These functions can only be performed in an environment free from coercion... The universities of Ontario will not carry out discussions or make changes in the force of threat or other forms of coercion...Expulsion or dismissal is the only appropriate penalty for those who would challenge the university's right to carry on its affairs through orderly and peaceful discussion and its right and responsibility to be a house of intellect."

From "Order on Campus"

the Committee of University Presidents of Ontario

Varsity Wed. Sept. 24, 1969

By BOB BETTSON

On the peaceful U of T campus of 1975 these words seem curiously outmoded, rhetoric from another age. Now students are fighting hard for parity on tenure committees to improve teaching quality, not marching on picket lines or occupying buildings.

But surprisingly the issue raised by this and other responses to student revolt of the late 1960's, discipline, is not resolved at U of T despite almost six years of debate on reports of various committees. This month has seen the formation of yet another negotiating committee to discuss the question of non-academic discipline. And yet it all seems so irrelevant.

However, the establishment of any form of non-academic discipline has crucial implications, both for the future of student dissent and the extent of university authority over every aspect of students' lives. With a brief review of the history of the debate on discipline at U of T it is possible to see the complexity of the issue and the wide range of points of view. This points dramatically to the stupidity of Simcoe Hall mandarins in expecting some consensus to be reached on non-academic discipline in a month so a policy can be enacted a March's Governing Council meeting.

LAW AND ORDER

The need for new disciplinary procedures to control the student radicalism of the late 1960's brought the first serious discussion of a code of behavior at U of T.

Administrators were caught with a problem which was outside their experience. Most previous disciplinary problems had related to harmless pranks or minor academic offenses. Now for the first time they were confronted with a new type of offense, which offered a clear threat to their monopoly on power.

Students were no longer content to be regulated by "in loco parentis" rules. Strict residence regulations fell quickly from favor. Not only this, but changes in lifestyles brought increasing contempt for authority inside and outside the university.

At U of T, the only university-wide disciplinary body was the archaic Caput, which included primarily deans and directors. There were no voting student members. Nor were there any faculty members. Clearly in the case of any popular movement this disciplinary body would be regarded as illegitimate and any action taken against student leaders would be suspect.

The Caput had previously dealt with minor offenses like cheating, petty theft, and parking and library violations. The most serious penalty it had imposed was a $4,000 fine and a year long suspension of the Engineering Society in 1954 for a near riot during a prank at University College.

With the beginning of non-violent disruptions as a means for gaining changes in the university, administrators started searching for new methods of control. The first action at U of T was an anti-war sit-in during a Dow Chemical recruitment drive. Others followed later with the disruption of a speech by American rightist Clark Kerr in 1969.

A presidential advisory committee was set up by acting president Jack Sword to be chaired by Ralph Campbell, which would make a full scale report on discipline at U of T. This was a parity committee, clearly in recognition of the vital student role in making any disciplinary procedures work.

From the time the committee was formed in 1968 until it reported in September, 1969, confrontation in the university increased with a radical SAC taking more militant stands on many issues.

The next discipline crisis was brought about in February 1969 by the disruption of the Kerr speech by the Toronto Student Movement, a more militant left wing group. The Caput met but agreed any action would be useless because of its lack of any real legitimacy.

U of T president Claude Bissell was away on sabbatical at Harvard where he became convinced of the need for more hard line approaches to discipline in line with American responses. Discipline loomed as the largest issue facing the university when the president released the report of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario (CPUO), "Order on Campus."

This report caused a storm of controversy. Among its recommendations were: the immediate expulsion or suspension of students or faculty involved in disruptions, all students and faculty be required to identify themselves on request, the president be able to suspend anyone for an obstruction of the university's processes, if this does not end the disruption the police would be brought in (without consultation if there was a threat of violence).

Bissell called this "a helpful document" SAC quickly demanded Bissell disown the report and added other demands including no disciplinary action until after the Campbell report was published, recognition that the Caput is not a legitimate disciplinary body, publication of the Campbell report as soon as the president received it, a reply to the demands within a week.

Bissell capitulated, faced with massive student opposition. A packed Convocation Hall cheered when he repudiated the hard-line CPUO report as a basis for U of T disciplinary procedures. The Campbell report was released and the U of T administration was off the hook. Bissell particularly scored a personal triumph. The report recommended a distinction between obstructive but peaceful demonstrations.

The Campbell report was seen by many students as an acceptable document. It rejected "in loco parentis" and called for several preconditions to a fair disciplinary system including operational agreement between professors and students in the classroom, effective student input into all decision-making bodies and dealing with any mass action through negotiations over substantive demands.

But because of its liberal recommendations and the simultaneous release of the Commission on University Government, which recommended partly faculty-student representation on a unicameral top governing body, the

ORDER ON CAMPUS

History of the Non-Academic Discipline

The 1968 Dow demonstration convinced many faculty members and administrators that a new discipline code was needed.

Campbell report was destined for oblivion.

Faculty conservatives led by History professor Bill Nelson and classics professor John Rist, realized the Campbell Report and the CUG report represented the greatest challenge to their power students had ever mounted.

The faculty succeeded in stalling the Campbell report, and an implementation committee floundered through a year of discussion before dissolving itself in March, 1970, unable to reach agreement on a reconstituted Caput.

Discipline moved into the background as a major campus issue. But political action on campus did not abate. In 1970 students occupied Simcoe Hall to demand better daycare facilities at university. Bissell gave in and agreed to fund a daycare centre.

1970 also saw the War Measures Crisis and the beginning of the struggle for parity in the faculty of arts and science which would lead to occupation of Sidney Smith Hall and disruption of the proceedings of the arts and science general committee.

Still no attempts were made to bring back disciplinary procedures as a major issue.

CODE REVIVED

But the 1972 mass actions which won demands for open access to the stacks at the Roberts library, the three occupations of Simcoe Hall, stimulated U of T administrators and faculty to once again think of means of control. The intervention of police for the second time within a year at the request of acting president John Sword had offended both faculty and students.

The ideal vehicle was at hand for hard liners in the administration. The new Governing Council had been constituted with only eight students out of 50 members. A code could be formulated with student input but in a non-parity situation.

New president John Evans also had the ideal drafters, new liberal vice-president Jill Conway, who was in charge of internal affairs and student governor Paul Cadario a conservative engineer, aspiring to a Rhodes scholarship.

Cadario chaired the internal affairs committee against the wishes of his fellow student governors. The committee soon started quiet deliberations on the fate of discipline at U of T. It invited submissions from local councils and groups on campus.

The Campbell report was not even used as a basis for discussion, despite the fact it had been adopted at Trinity College and was working well. Cadario and Conway set about drafting a code acceptable to faculty, without the sweeping liberal changes recommended by the Campbell report.

The conservative Miglin administration at SAC which ousted the left-liberal president Bob Spencer from power boasted they would have "Campbell by Christmas." But they spent little time on achieving this, concentrating their activity in the abortive fees strike. The new code finally appeared in March, 1973, and it clearly ignored the spirit as well as the letter of the Campbell report.

The non-academic sections were the most controversial. Any "undue" disruptions were outlawed and tough blanket provisions prohibited disobeying "lawful orders" and conspiracy to commit an offense. The code surfaced during the math occupation of 1973 and although many recommended action to end the 11-day sit-in, Cadario and others assured occupiers it would not be covered under the new code.

But clearly the Conway-Cadario code justified the criticism of students who labelled it "extremely repressive". It institutionalized tough penalties and co-opted students to sit in judgement on their peers for offenses they had no role in deciding on. The decision to prosecute rested with Simcoe Hall and there was clearly double jurisdiction with the civil courts on many offenses. Stringent academic regulations were buttressed with a hardline policy on term papers which went further than previous plagiarism rules.

But students were slow in reacting. The new SAC president, Bob Anderson, elected primarily on the staffing issue, decided to begin negotiations for changes, rather than reject the code out of hand. The other student organizations the Graduate Students' Union and the Association of Part-time Undergraduates concurred in this strategy. Students were in a difficult situation. They were presented with a draft code they could not accept, but the Governing Council was reluctant to make any more than minor concessions. There had been no campus-wide discussions of the issue and student bargaining power was weak.

The code had been well timed, only released in its final form after students had left the campus, and destined for approval at the June meeting of the Governing Council.

The Council rejected pleas by the major student organizations to postpone the decision until the fall when students were on campus and the code was rammed through without amendment on June 21, the implementation structures to be finalized in the fall.

At this point the student struggle looked hopeless. But a minority within SAC led by executive assistant Art Moses, a veteran of the Bissell years, spearheaded a re-examination of the SAC policy on discipline.

Moses wrote a scathing memorandum in August, tearing into the code and demanding SAC reject it and mobilize student opinion to overturn it. However SAC president Bob Anderson and other moderates on council waffled. Their line was to offer a student interpretation of the code which would serve as a precedent for prosecution.

During the fall as opposition mounted to the code and campaign to influence the Governing Council to delay implementation. A belated organizing campaign was begun which shifted the political focus on campus from the staffing referendum which the SAC executive had spent most of its time on to date.

THE ADMINISTRATION

BACKS DOWN

Despite several poorly-attended meetings, SAC was successful in building some momentum behind the drive to scrap the code. Almost every student organization on campus rejected the code, thus throwing a wide spectrum of student opinion behind the campaign. Efforts concentrated on packing the Governing Council in November. Internal affairs chairwoman Marnie Paikin backed down in the face of the student onslaught, and the implementation of the code was delayed.

The council meeting was anticlimactic but there was still an hour of tense debate as students jeered administration attempts to justify the code. The final amendment which was accepted said responsible amendments would be accepted but did not preclude implementation of the code.

Without a clear victory students settled in for a longer fight. Over the Christmas break SAC mailed out their position to every student with mail-back coupons supporting rejection of the code. They got 3,000 replies within a short time. The January governing council was to be the next focus for organizing.

A split developed between SAC and the Committee to Repeal the Discipline Code they were participating in with left wing political groups on campus such as the Revolutionary Marxist Group. The committee floundered as the seats demanded a platform for their "no code" position and SAC refused to support any publicity on this basis. SAC also began negotiating with administrators on changes in the code.

The umbrella committee finally broke up and SAC went on its own with the GSU and APUS. John Evans and Jill Conway began negotiations by shuffling students back and forth in an exhausting series of meetings offering concessions, then denying they had the authority to deliver.

The Governing Council's executive committee took the teeth out of a Conway motion which would have required student approval for any code. Negotiators finally gave up after finding they could wring few concessions in informal discussions.

The January Council agreed to set up an official negotiating committee, rubber-stamping the executive recommendations. Students were outnumbered as they tried to require consensus before any code was implemented. The academic code would go forward with minor changes and non-academic discipline would be postponed until January, 1975.

The negotiations were begun with wide representation including appointees from UTFA, GSU, SAC, APUS and the administration. Students were still firm on non-academic discipline so discussions were confined to making the procedures and regulations for academic acceptable for implementation. The discipline issue appeared to have lost steam.

THE BANFIELD AFFAIR

But on March 13 about 20 Students for a Democratic Society activists stopped alleged racist Edward Banfield from speaking at a guest lecture. A U of T professor still faces a charge of assault resulting from an altercation after one of the lectures.

Immediately hardliners in the administration and faculty attacked the SDS for offending the sacred concept of "freedom of speech." Many conservative faculty saw this as a vindication of their demands for a tough non-academic code. But SAC demanded this isolated incident should not be used to bring back the code.

Then the administration dropped its bombshell: they would revive the obsolete and illegitimate Caput against Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, the SDS activists who were involved in the disruption.

SAC had one observer member, president Bob Anderson, who informed the administration he would boycott the trial as would his successor Seymour Kanowitch. The reappearance of the Caput was an ominous indication of the administration's determination to use non-academic discipline rather than the civil courts.

The Math occupation brought the question of teaching standards and tenure to students' scrutiny in the spring of 1973.

ELECTION
ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE -
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership refiles. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

- Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Trinity, Erindale, New College, Innis, Seats available - 1 in each of University, Victoria, St. Michael's,
Seats available - 1 part-time student - Woodsworth

Faculty:

- Departmental:
Humanities: Seats available - 1 in each of FRE, ISL, ITA, PHI, PHL, REL, SIS, SLA
Life Sciences: Seats available - 1 in ZOO
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 1 in each of AST, CSC
Social Sciences: Seats available - 1 in each of ANT, GGR, POL, SOC

Divisional:

- Humanities: Seats available - 5
Life Sciences: Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 5
Social Sciences: Seats available - 3

STUDENTS

- COMMITTEE ON STUDY ELSEWHERE
- COUNSELLING COMMITTEE

Curriculum Committees

Students:

- Humanities: Seats available - 4 (including one part-time)
Interdisciplinary Studies: Seats available - 2 (Woodsworth student)
Life Sciences: Seats available - 2
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 3
Social Sciences: Seats available - 2 (including one part-time Woodsworth student)

Faculty:

- Humanities: Seats available - 2
Interdisciplinary Studies: Seats available - 1
Life Sciences: Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 2
Social Sciences: Seats available - 1

Committee On Counselling

Students: Seats available - 1 in each of UC, VC, TC, SMC, NC, IN, ER Colleges

Committee On Study Elsewhere

Students: Seats available - 4 full-time

NOMINATIONS

Nomination forms can also be obtained through Departmental and Registrars' offices or from the Faculty Office. Completed nomination forms must be received in the Faculty Office, Room 1006, Sidney Smith Hall, prior to 4.00 p.m. on February 14th, 1975 to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box.

Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392. A complete description of the Committees and the Rules of Procedure are available upon request at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

Western runs up $40,000 deficit

LONDON (CUP) — The University Students' Council (USC) at the University of Western Ontario has run up an estimated $40,000 cash deficit this year despite an increase of $71,000 in student fee revenue.

USC financial vice-president David Pollock reacted to questions from the Western student newspaper, The Gazette, about the financial difficulties by closing the books to public inspection.

"There are simply some things the students shouldn't know," he told a reporter. "If they know all the details, they'll want to know why we are spending $400 for this or $500 for that," he said.

USC business manager Fred Kempthorne said, "Next year's students are going to have to pay for the current situation through decreased services."

Kempthorne blamed USC's president Mike Janigan for what he called "personal extravaganzas." These include projects undertaken by Janigan such as a Confidence Canada campaign, club nights and a post-football celebration.

Although the books are closed for the present, speculation remains that even if they were open the actual reasons for the losses would remain elusive because of the poor state of the financial records.

Court decision victory for tenants, says lawyer

By JANNY VINCENT

Mary Hogan, a Parkdale Legal Services lawyer, described the significance of a county court holding in favor of tenants to a general meeting of the Federation of Metro Tenants Association Monday night.

West Lodge tenants who had withheld rent from landlord Phil Wynn this fall won a victory for all Metro tenants, according to Hogan.

The significant fact was that the court held for rent withholding because of poor conditions that affected not only the physical well-being, but also the psychological well-being of the tenants, Hogan said.

It is the first time such a decision has been handed down in an Ontario court, Hogan added.

Anu Bose, co-ordinator of the Metro Task Force on the Status of Tenants, said the aims of the force were to study rent control and city bylaws. Bose hopes the force will hear "the horrors of being a tenant in the city."

The task force will only be in effect for five to six more months.

Alderpeople included on the force are Dorothy Thomas and Allan Sparrow and meetings will be held Wednesday evenings at 6:45 pm in committee room one of City Hall.

The tenant hotline, begun two weeks ago, is a new federation service to Metro tenants who can phone 922-6544 from 10 am to 9 pm to complain, get advice and legal referral, free.

The federation intends to lobby Queen's Park and the opposition caucus this spring with its platform of rent control and tenant tenure (the lease of a long-term tenant must be automatically renewed unless there has been a serious breach of tenant responsibilities.)

Wheat stocks scraping bottom, Whelan says

By PETER O'MALLEY

Agriculture Canada has predicted a 25 percent decrease in Canadian wheat stocks at the end of 1975, despite the growing world-wide concern the food reserves are already dangerously low.

While Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan told an Agricultural Outlook conference held in Ottawa Jan. 20-21, "domestic and world stocks are scraping the bottom," a report from his department delivered earlier in the conference predicted that Canada will have 25 per cent less in reserve at the beginning of next year than we have now; a decrease of about 100 million bushels.

Whelan also said he expected that prices for wheat "will remain strong," a condition not unrelated to Canada's enthusiasm for increasing export sales next year or to the low stocks of grain reserves which will be left.

Canada has opposed the build up of world food supplies largely on the grounds that a secure reserve of food would have a tendency of reducing the scarcity and therefore price of commodities.

As a major exporter of wheat Canada has an interest in maintaining high international grain prices.

G. I. Trant, a senior civil servant in Agriculture Canada, confirmed government thinking on the question of food reserves in his speech.

He told the conference, "The very existence of large grain stocks, no matter who holds them, can be expected to have the effect of depressing world prices, with attendant discouragement to production."

He continued to say that a price decline would result whether the stocks were being held "for either enhanced capability to deal with emergency situations or for the purpose of increasing world food security."

At an agricultural symposium last October held at the University of Guelph, Trant said: "One is therefore drawn strongly to the conclusion that neither food stocks for world food security purposes nor food aid are likely to encourage world agriculture production."

During the Rome conference Trant's negative attitude towards food aid and secure reserves was not forgotten.

His Guelph speech was paraphrased, simplified and delivered by Eugene Whelan to a Rome audience during the conference. Trant himself was the top-ranking official adviser to the Canadian delegation.

Trant's theory is simply that food aid to chronically under-fed nations and secure world reserves would depress the international price which Canadian farmers receive for their wheat, while at the same time the availability of cheap food discourages agricultural development in the recipient nation.

According to the theory, the best way, if not the only way, for Canada to help the hungry nations is to help them to develop their own agriculture production subsistence level farming.

Whether the theory is good political economy, whether it realistically takes into account the potential for development beyond subsistence farming for many hungry nations, whether it takes sufficient heed of those who argue that the west cannot export its capital and energy intensive food production system without bringing disaster to the economic and social fabric on the non-western poor nation, or whether it is just an excuse complacency as millions starve; there is no doubt that theory is official orthodoxy in Ottawa.

Low grade wheat may be Canada's aid

OTTAWA (CUP) — Canada may pay off part of its world food pledge in low-grade wheat, according to a market forecast prepared by the federal Department of Agriculture. The forecast was released last month to the Agricultural Outlook Conference in Ottawa, an annual meeting for government and agribusiness leaders.

It predicted that some of the low-grade Canadian wheat, "will likely be absorbed into the export market, including aid shipments to India, Bangladesh and elsewhere."

The prediction contained in the report was confirmed by G. I. Trant, director general of the Economics Branch of Agriculture Canada.

A department spokesman for Trant said that the low-grade wheat, "may be counted as part of the million tons of food a year pledged by Canada at the World Food Conference."

Much of the available low-grade wheat is the result of the poor growing conditions experienced in Western Canada last year. Canadian Wheat Board estimates in October indicated that "only 36 percent of deliverable prairie wheat is likely to fall in the top two grades" compared with nearly 85 per cent the previous year.

At the World Food Conference last November, Canada was applauded for its apparent generosity in pledging to provide an average of one million tons of food aid annually for the next three years.

When it made the pledge, Canada agreed to specify a particular quantity of food aid to be sent rather than a money amount.

Foreign Affairs Minister Alan MacEachen told the world gathering in Rome, that Canada "agrees with the concept that, if the eroding effect of sudden price increases on the levels of food aid is to be avoided, the best way of pledging food aid is in physical terms."

But last month's forecast of low-grade wheat going abroad as aid suggests that the quantity pledge may be more advantageous to the donor government than to the recipient nation.

By pledging "tons of food" rather than "dollars worth of food" the recipients do get a hedge on inflation, but the donor government gains flexibility in its aid program which can be useful to domestic agricultural policy.

The unspecific nature of a quantity pledge like that of Canada means that the government can use food aid in managing domestic supplies of food and in disposing of "surplus" or low-quality commodities.

Since these commodities are either unacceptable to the domestic market or are slated to be withheld to keep prices up, Canada receives an economic bonus in using these for aid. They are already written off as expenses and the only additional expense to turn them into aid is to cover distribution costs.

The fact that Canada pledged an average of one million tons of food aid a year rather than a set annual amount provides additional flexibility for the government.

MacEachen had told the World Conference that Canada made a three year pledge because it "accepts the concept of forward planning." Canada could, however, discharge its pledge and still meet the three year average by sending three million tons of poor grain in a single year.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

ELECTION REMINDER

Prospective candidates for election to the Governing Council are reminded that nomination papers must be filed by noon on Friday, February 14th, 1975. Nomination forms and copies of the regulations (Election Guidelines) covering the election are available from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, or the Registrars' Offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

There are vacancies in seven teaching staff constituencies (including three by-elections), and all eight seats in the three student categories.

Nominations must be signed by the following number of nominators:

- Teaching Staff — 10
- Graduate Students — 15
- Full-Time Undergraduate Students — 50
- Part-Time Undergraduate Students — 15

Present members of the Governing Council whose terms expire on June 30th next may be nominated again if they are continuing in the same constituencies for which they were elected previously. Those elected this year from the teaching staff constituency will serve for three years from July 1st, 1975, except those elected in by-elections, and from student constituencies for one year, as required by The University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Descriptions of the constituencies were published in the Varsity on January 27th, last. Enquiries for further information should be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 928-2160.

Election shall be by mailed ballot.

Vice-president Conway tried to rationalize the decision saying the SDS was an "extreme isolated minority." But students remembered a similar description by Jack Sword of the group of occupiers who were brutally arrested at Simcoe Hall in 1972, demanding open library access. More than 7,000 students signed petitions backing demands of that "minority".

The SDS trial only succeeded in showing how hopelessly biased the Caput is. Chairman Albert Abel continually battled against the defendants, disallowing questions even before they were asked and terminating testimony before cross-examination was over. Any questions relating to Bartfield's racism or racism in the university were ruled out of order. The six week trial has been compared to the Chicago Seven fiasco with the daily skirmishes being televised on educational TV.

The verdict was a foregone conclusion. Leah and Schabas were suspended for three and four years respectively. They are not allowed to appeal the verdicts, only the sentences.

Another offshoot of the Banfield affair was the adoption of new measures to defend freedom of speech on campus by president John Evans. These included the delay of a disrupted meeting for 24 hours, consultation with the group involved and then the use of Metro police if necessary to maintain order. This is the first formal policy including the use of Metro police and clearly shows the administration's intention to use that kind of force to repress student struggles.

The first use of Evans "free speech" guidelines was at the Governing Council itself on March 28. SDS members were prevented from entering Simcoe Hall by Campus police, even though some of their number had tickets. They fought their way past campus police and burst into the council chamber. The meeting was adjourned despite the lack of any real disruption and convened the next day with 100 Metro police standing on guard.

NON-ACADEMIC DISCIPLINE STILL UNRESOLVED

Now the issue has been sent again to a committee, this one chaired by part-time student Bill Whelton, with representatives from SAC, APUS and GSU. But UTEFA has refused to name faculty representatives. SAC made its appointments reluctantly because of this action. The deadline given the committee, to report by the end of February for March's Governing Council meeting is clearly ridiculous to any informed observer.

The committee is already headed for stalemate because of the refusal of the administration to scrap the Conway-Cadario code as a basis for discussion. The faculty is in an enviable position of being able to disavow the results if they are not favorable because of lack of representation and accept them if they are to their liking.

The most constant factor in the failure of administrators, students and faculty to reach any consensus has been the unwillingness of faculty and administrators to put discipline in a political context, a context in which students are systematically isolated from positions of power in the university.

Until they stop trying to pretend discipline can be implemented in a vacuum there will be no consensus. The present student council position, adopted in November, 1973 explicitly lays out the ground rules for any acceptable disciplinary procedures.

The most important pre-condition should be adequate participation in all university policy-making bodies including tenure committees. Students must have the right to an equal say in the creation of the conditions under which they operate.

Otherwise they are being asked to discipline their peers in situations which they have no control over. Democratization of the university would ensure students have a say in the rules which govern their education. For instance if students had had an adequate voice in setting stack access policy in 1972 it would not have been necessary to hold four occupations to gain that right.

Any disciplinary procedures must ensure that the right of non-violent civil disobedience is enshrined as a right within the university when a group of students feel their rights have been infringed upon. Instead of dealing with this as a criminal action, administrators should be required to negotiate on substantive demands and not only within so-called "normal channels."

The final important pre-condition is the necessity for students and faculty to reach operational agreement in the classroom on course content and grading practices. This would present a direct challenge to the absolute power of faculty over students in the classroom, perhaps the most important power relationship in the university.

Without detailing objections to the Conway-Cadario code it is apparent it does not remotely resemble a fair and reasonable solution which takes into account the principles stated above. Conway-Cadario allows faculty to escape prosecution when offenses are under the "Haist Rules", which exclude students. The code would also give a wide latitude to the administration in deciding who to charge, potentially allowing selective prosecution of student activists or faculty reformers.

A judicial secretariat and prosecutor hired by the university would obviously be no more independent than the Governing Council secretariat or the University Bulletin are now. Some of the most onerous sections dealing with conspiracy and other highly charged political offenses were only removed under pressure.

But the non-academic code which remains certainly presents a clear threat to students. Many students have questioned the right of the university to legislate non-academic discipline at all. Setting up a quasi-judicial system when there are civil courts and the criminal code seems a dangerous and costly price to pay for repression. Why shouldn't students be charged under the laws of the land if they violate the law? Why should students be treated differently than other citizens of Canada, subject to an unusually repressive set of regulations administered in a manner in which the cards are stacked against the student?

But the administration refuses to confront these questions because they are basically interested in a code which will act as a means of control, a tool to deal with dissent. However, their desire for a repressive code when the condition which gave rise to that desire, the student revolt of the late 60's, has passed, is a paradox.

Maybe Simcoe Hall fears some day there will be a revival of mass student unrest. Maybe they see the passing of harsh disciplinary procedures now as the last chance before students gain even greater representation on the Governing Council.

But whatever the reason, discipline does present a clear threat to students' interests, and as such it has an importance which transcends the narrow issue of the drafting of a code. The fate of student efforts to make gains on other issues such as parity on tenure committees and gaining more power in departments may depend on the success of mass actions.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of The Varsity for the 1975-76 publishing year. The Editor is solely responsible for editorial policy and is responsible to the Board in all other matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority and responsibility, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $10,650 to $12,600 per publishing year, including a salary of $3,450, or less for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her position only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

X-country Blues host meet edged by Queen's

This is just a short blurb to remind all sports fans that lotteries based on the 1st goal of the interfac all-star game are illegal.

Lottery tickets for the winning time can definitely not be picked up at The Varsity offices. We will definitely not print the time of the last goal.

By TOM BEST
This past weekend the Varsity cross-country ski team hosted an extremely successful intercollegiate competition. The two day event took place at the Midland Mountainview Ski Club under sunny skies and with perfect snow conditions. The rivalry between the two top contenders, Varsity and Queen's University, continued to be strong as teams prepared for the OUAAs championships next week at Camp Fortune.

On Saturday, Mike Dyer of Queen's won the individual men's 15 km. race with an exceptionally good time of 56:04. He was followed by Tim Howard (RMC) — 58:12, and Lars Neuman (Guelph) — 58:37.

The Varsity squad placed five men in the top ten; Veli Niinimaa — 4th — 59:40, Dag Furst — 6th — 61:47, Tom Best — 7th — 62:03, Richard Sutcliffe — 9th — 62:33 and Paul Ketko — 10th — 65:17.

Queen's top three finishers just edged out the Toronto skiers to take top honours and the trophy donated by Molsons. Behind these two teams RMC followed Guelph.

In the Women's competition, Toronto's Sylvi Spleiss dominated the field of competitors to win handily the 5 km. race. She was timed at 23:50 followed by Janet Thompson (Western) — 27:54 and Kathy McRae — 36:38 another Varsity skier.

On Sunday, the Nordic competition shifted to the relays and Queen's once again narrowly defeated the Toronto A team. Dyer, and his teammates Klassen and Kopp finished the race in 56:47 while Varsity's team of Niinimaa, Sutcliffe and Best were timed at 58:01. Teams from RMC and other U of T teams finished well back of the two leaders.

The Toronto Nordic Team has done extremely well the past two years and is hoping for its third successive championship next weekend. Much of the credit is due to the leadership of last year's captain Doug Garfield. Garfield, who is expected to come back to coach next year's team, has been training with the U.S. Biathlon Ski Team as he completes his degree at the University of Idaho.

This year the team has been extremely fortunate to have Dave McClyment as the General Manager. The efficient organization of last weekend's race was due, to a large part, to his effort.

Last weekend saw the finals of the Women's indoor archery competition. The two-day tournament found U of T victorious with an overall score of 2030.

Queen's came up with a surprising effort to snatch second with 1790. Western and Guelph achieved 1759 and 1734.

The Toronto team was led by Kathy Corcoran who broke the indoor record for 12 ends with 275 out of a possible 300. Kathy also delighted the small crowd of spectators with 3 perfect ends.

Badminton

By DAVE STUART

Last Saturday, in the mid-west section of the OUAAs badminton circuit, the Varsity's men's badminton team emerged champions over Guelph and McMaster.

In the singles division, Tom Muir, Tom Ball, and Bob Hinchcliffe all won their bouts over Guelph and Mac.

The doubles team of Bob Hinchcliffe and Jim Ooi were victorious over both the competitors while the team of Tom Muir and Lane Bishop also won the three-way tournament.

Varsity golf tip number five — — added fundamentals

By BILL WHITCOMBE

While the four key points listed in Varsity golf tip number four are sufficient to get you off the ground in trying to build a swing, there are other important fundamentals that must come in for attention as your progress permits. All are extremely important in the building of a sound swing and must be incorporated into the general scheme of things as your instructor sees fit.

These important fundamentals follow:

A. Weight should be inside both feet and over heels at address; balance is important. Maintaining the weight on the inside of the feet from address through the backswing helps insure the very important steady head position over the ball. At the top of the backswing, the weight should still be on the inside of the right heel and the right leg acts as a sort of brace to turn against as the body coils up for the swing through the ball.

B. The left arm must remain in an extended position until after the point of impact; the left arm should hang down naturally towards the ground at address and should remain in that position, fully extended, throughout the entire swing until well after impact. Any weakening or bending of the left arm only changes the size of the swing arc and increases the chance of error. A full shoulder turn with the left arm pushing the club away from the ball on the backswing facilitates the continued extension of the left arm.

C. Both knees should remain flexed throughout the swing; at no time during the golf swing should either knee come to a locked or stiff position. The lower body has to move laterally towards the target to initiate the downswing. If the right leg locks at the start of the downswing, this very necessary lower body move is inhibited. You may very well achieve the desired results by having a slight feeling of sitting to the ball all the way through the swing, thereby permitting the knees to move towards the target and, as a result, allowing the club to extend straight along the line of flight for as long as possible.

D. Lateral move of hips and knees towards target: one of the most difficult moves for the beginner to learn is that of starting the downswing with a lateral move of the hips and knees toward the target. And yet, it is the very heart of a sound golf swing! The swing path is determined at the very beginning of the downswing and, without such a lateral move, the swing path will almost certainly cut across the intended line of flight and cause a pulled or sliced shot. The key then, is to start the hips and knees toward the target as the very first move from the top of the backswing. Perhaps the best gimmick to help you effect this move would be for you to roll your ankles and knees towards the target at the start of the downswing, resulting in a good natural lateral hip move. All of this must occur without the head moving forward. If the head moves forward even a little bit, it destroys the effect of the lateral move. By way of emphasis, if there is a secret in golf that separates the real fine players from the average players, it is the lateral move of the lower body. Work on it!

Interfac all-stars star Friday at arena

By MIKE FRIEND

On Friday night, contrary to popular belief, there will be a hockey game at the arena. No, the Blues will not be playing, but the entertainment level should be at least as good if not better than last Friday's fiasco against Guelph.

As interfac hockey turns into the homestretch, Division I teams take a break when U of T holds its first interfac all-star game.

Coach Kent Ruhnke with his division IA team consisting largely of Vic and Erindale players, feels his squad has just too much talent and should win easily.

Division IB coach, Bill Fifield, believes however, that there is little difference among the top players in either division. He feels that the all-star teams are evenly matched and the game should be a close one.

Game time is 8:15 pm and there will be free skating after the game at approximately 10:00 pm.

The following is the team rosters:

Division IA

SGS favoured to take Victoria Staff Trophy

By TOM WOODS

Four matches have been played in the double elimination playoffs of men's interfac volleyball. As expected, SGS I emerged with two straight victories 15-4 and 15-13 over Scarborough last Wednesday and 13-15, 15-7, 15-5 over Erindale on Monday.

Other action saw the engineers drop two straight to Erindale in the opening round 15-12, 8-15, 8-15 and then to Scarborough 12-15, 15-5, 5-15. As a result Erindale now meets the Eastenders tonight in the main gym with the winner needing two consecutive victories over SGS to take the Victoria Staff trophy.

In Monday's play, Scar took advantage of poor engineering blocking, and with strong hitting by Ihor Lotocky and Livio Iannucci, managed to rebound from poor defensive play in the second game to win the third game convincingly. Meanwhile Erindale, the underdog in their encounter with the highly favoured SGS squad, gave the grads a scare in the first game with excellent blocking by Ludis Habs, Atis Ozolins, and team leader Wally Sawranchuk, and inspired defensive work by all six team members.

Experience finally prevailed, however, as the grads who seemed to lose their cool on occasion in the first game on questionable calls by the referee, maintained their poise to take the match two games to one. Veterans Titi Romet and Henri Arnaud led the way along with contributions from Guy Bellemare and Andy Grant.

In second division action, four teams remain in contention in the single elimination playdowns which began with 12 teams. The winner of last night's games between New and Eng III, and Pharm and Dev Hs will playoff in the final tonight at 8:00 pm.

Blues miss playoffs

By TOM WOODS

On the intercollegiate volleyball scene, the Blues failed in their efforts to notch a playoff berth in the eastern division of the OUA loop.

After defeating Ottawa 15-5, 10-14 and RMC 15-3, 15-10, Varsity downed Queen's 15-8 but were unable to gain the required second victory, losing 3-15 and 8-15.

Final standings show the Blues with a 20-13 record in third place behind Laurentian at 30-4 and Queen's at 24-7. With two straight wins over the Gaels, however, the Blues could have pulled into a tie, with both teams sporting 8-4 match records.

Playing coach Reg Eadie was forced out of the second Queen's encounter with the Blues down 7-3. Eadie had his glasses broken when his head rather than his hands blocked a vicious Gael's spike. In his haste to re-enter the contest, Eadie inserted the loosened lenses into the wrong sides and after correcting this mistake, all hopes had vanished.

Despite their lack of success in reaching the playoffs, Eadie and co-coach Keith Doan are happy with the club's progress so far this year. The team is now preparing for OVA senior A league play.

In recapping the squad's efforts throughout the year, Eadie singled out three rookies who have shown substantial improvement and who have great potential on future Blues' clubs.

Rob Pitfield is a tall left-handed spiker from Ottawa with a 30 in. vertical jump. Chris Brown, also from Ottawa, is strong defensively. Oleh Inyckyj a Canadian from Newark, New Jersey is only 17 and, with only a single year of experience, has progressed remarkably.

In other volleyball news, plans are underway for a Varsity-interfac all-star game likely to be held in late February at Hart House.

Guy Bellemare (3) winces as his arm comes out of the socket when he missed the ball.

Varsity gymnasts swing to zone victory at Mac

By JOHN FAIR

This weekend saw Varsity men's gymnastics team competing in Hamilton at McMaster University. The team came first in its zone; thereby qualifying for the Ontario finals which will be held at Ottawa University on February 22. It should be a very tough meet and U of T stands to do well in it. The top team will go to Manitoba at the end of the month for the Canadian Championships along with any individuals who qualify for the individual championships.

The McMaster meet this weekend had Hans Frick, a competitor and coach for the U of T team competing extremely well to place second in the all-round standings individually. As well as this placing, Frick placed first in the pommells with 8.4, 2nd in the highbar with 8.85, 2nd in the parallel bars with 8.5, and 2nd in the floor exercise with 7.85. Of course Frick had a very high total of 49.5 points for the six events. He then had an average of 8.25. A very good performance from a fourth year mechanical engineer who will be a loss when he graduates this year.

The rest of the team did very well also as indicated by the team's total of 178.63. Captain of the team, Brian Euler was very close behind Frick with a good mark of 7.35 on the pommel horse. Chester Makischuk also made a very good performance on the vault with a score of 7.85. Good performances were also put in by John Kelly, Ron Collins, and John Fair, all of whom acted as anchor with very consistent scores. This is particularly vital in gymnastics because the first team will only be first if all of its' members and not just one or two are more than proficient in the sport. The reason for this is that the team total takes everyone's marks in all the events into account.

Two weeks ago the team was in Ottawa for a meet which had teams from most of eastern Canada, some of which were training for the upcoming Olympics. At that time Hans Frick was sick and was only able to compete in one event, but led by Brian Euler the team still managed to place fourth in a very top notch competition.

The team will now continue to train heavily for the next few weeks in preparation for the Ontario meet.

Blue turns white with exertion — remember, you read it right here in the sports pages.

Trustees want Seeley on Gov. Council

By MARINA STRAUSS

Controversial Canadian sociologist John Seeley — who was denied a position at U of T's sociology department — and a former SAC president have been recommended as government appointee candidates on next year's Governing Council.

John Seeley lives in California.

Governing Council chairman Malim Harding said last night the Toronto Board of Education submitted Seeley's and Bob Spencer's names to him following Harding's request last November that the board recommend "suitable candidates for nomination."

Harding said he plans to forward "without comment" the two names to the Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld today.

Auld is not bound to choose any recommendation for Governing Council he receives.

Seeley is the centre of considerable controversy at the university after prominent administrators and educators apparently influenced top-level vetoing decisions that the sociologist not be hired at both OISE and U of T. Ontario Education Minister Thomas Wells has admitted he passed on negative comments about Seeley from "prominent educators" to OISE director Robert Jackson last year before the director vetoed an OISE sociology department choice to hire Seeley.

Seeley has been known for his support of youth, student and minority liberation struggles throughout his academic year.

Harding noted this was the first time Governing Council has solicited candidate suggestions from people or groups outside a current council.

He said he has also written the City of Toronto and the Huron-Sussex Ratepayers' Association asking for nominee suggestions, but has not yet received names from them.

Harding explained the recent proposals during discussions of the U of T Act review last fall calling for more community participation in university affairs sparked his move to solicit candidates' name.

"The provincial government normally expects some recommendation from the university," Harding noted, but added it was on his initiative he wrote to the three outside parties.

In a letter to the Board of Education dated Nov. 20, 1974 — which was referred to the new board on Dec. 12 — Harding writes:

"I consider the role of lay members on the Governing Council as one of representing the public at large.

"While they may be expert and more knowledgeable in one particular sphere, I do not feel that it is desirable that their interests should be confined to the impact on any one area, but on the whole broad range of public interest."

Spencer, who was U of T SAC president during the 1971-72 academic year, is presently a Ward Six school trustee and a graduate student at OISE. Sixteen government appointees sit on Governing Council for three-year terms.

Last fall, the council submitted a proposal for a revision of its composition to the Ontario government, as it was required to do by last June.

The government, which must give legislative approval to the changes, has yet to bring the matter up for debate.

Student leaders are hoping to convince the government to reverse the council's decision to give students 11 seats and faculty 13 seats, and institute a parity arrangement.

Action by Carleton on academic freedom

WATERLOO (CUP) — Carleton University will consider Renison College's degrees as being questionable if prompt action isn't taken to restore academic freedom over a recent firing dispute.

Renison College is affiliated with the University of Waterloo and offers UW degrees.

A motion passed Jan. 21 by Carleton's social work faculty expresses concern that the Renison firings were politically motivated. It also called for immediate re-enactment of academic freedom saying that, "Until such time . . . the qualifications issued by Renison must be held in question."

When contacted Jan. 21 about the Carleton motion, University of Waterloo president Burt Matthews considered it a "threat" but he said the matter is for Renison to resolve. He also felt the motion tended to prejudge the case.

Renison principal John Towler refused to comment on the Carleton motion.

However, there are indications that Renison's board of governors will make a decision Feb. 5 over whether to accept binding arbitration, as proposed by the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), to resolve the dispute.

The dispute involved former Renison academic dean Hugh Miller, who was dismissed Dec. 21, 1974. Renison social science professor Jeffrey Forest, who was given notice that his contract will be ended April 30, 1975, UW human relations professor Marsha Forest who was forbidden to "team-teach" with her husband at Renison effective winter, 1975, and women's studies professor Marlen Webber who was threatened with dismissal by Towler over her involvement in the student protest prompted by the announcement of the firings Oct. 31.

Spectating area in complex needed, Kidd and Dimond say

By BOB BETTISON

University administrator Jack Dimond and professor Bruce Kidd defended yesterday the provision of 2,000 spectator seats in the new athletic complex, saying spectating should not be automatically discouraged because it provides an opportunity to see excellence in sport.

Dimond, a special assistant to vice president Jill Conway, and Kidd, a professor in the physical education faculty, were speaking to a lunchtime meeting at The Varsity offices.

Both felt although the provision of spectator capacity in the controversial complex is one of the most contentious issues with community groups, it is absolutely necessary to provide some space for the swimming pool and the gym.

The two have been facing an onslaught of recent opposition from residents' groups over the construction of the building.

Residents feel the facilities are absolutely necessary and, with the exemption from the city holding bylaw, the only question left is funding.

When questioned on the aesthetic quality of the building, Kidd commented, "Have you seen a building you really liked in the last 25 years? That is the modern style."

Kidd said the facilities provided, which include a 50-metre swimming pool, 12 squash courts, four basketball courts offices and male locker space, were a minimum.

He said the physical education staff was demoralized over recent problems in financing the building. The university only has $6.5 million of the $10.5 million needed for construction.

Kidd revealed many staff members are threatening to quit if the university does not deliver on providing better facilities soon.

He said the administration is looking into possible funding from the Sesquicentennial campaign, which is not going well either.

Dimond said resident groups had been consulted from the beginning and it was the president of the Huron-Sussex ratepayers, Doug Myers, who first suggested the consolidation of the pool and the field house.

Administration firm on concert ban

Simcoe Hall remains firm in its decision to prevent rock concerts from taking place in Convocation Hall, despite a meeting yesterday between vice-president Jill Conway and SAC president Seymour Kanowitch.

The four concerts presently booked — all of SAC's remaining schedule for the year — will go ahead as planned.

Vice-president Jill Conway said last night problems with crowd control were the major reason the administration was cancelling the concerts.

Physical plant director William Kirby Lye concurred, noting the problem lay with large audiences who were "difficult to control," adding there would be a problem with evacuation in the event of a fire.

Lye said yesterday Simcoe Hall was "sadly deficient" in pretty basic fire safety requirements, and that a report from an insurance company had called the hall a "serious fire risks."

A request for added fire safety improvements as a capital expenditure has gone to the provincial government for approval.

The decision to cancel the concerts was taken after a report went from Lye to business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin, and thence to Conway.

Campus services co-ordinator Lois Reimer said the move to curtail concerts was the "only decision possible." "They (SAC) do their damndest," said Reimer, adding "I would like to see them put on concerts in an appropriate place."

Reimer said there was a history of "minor damage" after the concerts. Lye agreed, saying, "There has been some kind of damage after every concert."

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch was upset about the decision, saying, "We've done everything we can do."

Kanowitch claimed SAC had enforced the no smoking rule, but janitors had told the audience they could smoke. He also said janitors had exaggerated the extent of the damage by piling up garbage and taking photographs of it.

"All we ask is that (vice-president Jill) Conway judge for herself" by going to the concerts, said Kanowitch.

Conway said she based her decision on reports from Reimer and Lye. Lye said he didn't go to the concerts, but that he had "been in after."

Reimer said she had been to "maybe a couple," but not stayed very long.

"Miss Reimer has made a point of going to see the hall after the concerts," said Conway.

Financially the concerts have been "hit and miss" this year, said Kanowitch, although the last two concerts have sold out.

SAC's arrangement with the promoters covers money for promotion and rental, 25 percent of the profits, and a maximum student price of $4.

"We don't do it for the money, we do it as a service," said Kanowitch, adding he would like to see other free concerts held in the Edward Johnson building paid for with profits from the Convocation Hall concerts.

Berrigan berates big nations for brutish behavior

By LIAM LACEY

Superstates such as the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. reduce people to "grey facelessness, obscuring our common plight — the struggle for survival — against the madness at the top," says war resister Phil Berrigan. The ex-priest and political activist, speaking to about 200 people in Convocation Hall Tuesday evening, stressed that "no human freedom will happen unless people insist on it themselves."

Berrigan's speech began with the plight of Ukrainian sociologist and historian Valentyn Moroz and led into a sweeping attack on "the excesses of superstates" and "the crime of despotism that is fed by the crime of apathy."

Moroz, who has outlined Stalin's techniques of imposing conformity in his Report From the Beria Reserve, is presently confined in a Soviet prison on charges of anti-Soviet activities.

Berrigan quoted extensively from the report to show how Moroz's thesis applied equally well to the U.S. and the Soviet Union.

"There the state coerces one into numb neutrality," he said. "Here, the culture entices one into the same condition."

Although jailed for his own political activities, Berrigan says it is "not terror that inhibits us and programs us."

"Death-dealing is good business — so we have found out — and I think you in Canada have found out," said Berrigan.

"It's our modest share of the great, violent, grab-bag that makes up the American experiment in imperial ripoff," he continued. "It's that illusion that makes terror unnecessary, that reduces us to grey facelessness."

When asked by a member of the audience about "collective action" towards a "workers' democracy," Berrigan replied:

"We've had collective action before, even mass action against the Indo-China war." The real difficulty was in sustaining this "collective action," he said.

We must seek "the sources of spiritual renewal," Berrigan suggested. He added he did "not mean to propose answers, only where to find them."

For those who missed the original, Radio Varsity will play the tape of Berrigan's speech at 6:30 pm tonight.

Trint mint in financial splint

By GILLIAN MacKAY

The Trinity College budget committee foresees an increase of at least $150 in residence fees next year along with a cutback in services.

Students at St. Hilda's and Trinity's male residences paid $1,275 this year for room and board.

Given the present system, the budget deficit for food and residence next year would reach $186,000 owing to a rise of 20 percent in food costs and 15 percent in wages.

Morrey Ewing, a budget committee student member, brought the matter before a joint college meeting at St. Hilda's last night and asked for suggestions about cuts and changes in the present budget.

With $90,000 to be cut from the deficit, Ewing warned students, "You may feel that the services are more important than the cost, but this would mean an increase of $300 per student."

One major proposal, he said, is to give up the separate dining arrangement at St. Hilda's and Trinity at a saving of approximately $30,000.

Instead, lunch and dinner would only be served at Trinity's Strachan Hall. Women would be given what Beaver Foods calls "a continental breakfast" at St. Hilda's in the morning.

Many students expressed the fear this would be "harmful to residence life" which is presently based on the separation of men and women.

One student voiced the opinion that onslaughts of women into Strachan Hall would endanger the intellectual life at Trinity.

Other suggestions included eliminating the weekly maid service, served evening meals, free guest passes and the lavish Saturday night dinners.

A committee was formed to investigate these proposals and report to the budget committee meeting at the end of the month.

Task force tries to help tenants

By ROB FRITCHARD

The task force on the status of tenants hopes to define, categorize, and increase the rights of tenants, four members told a press conference yesterday at City Hall.

The force was proposed last October by Mayor David Crombie. The four members present at the conference were lawyer Terry Hunter (chairperson); community worker Anne Harriman; Ward Six alderman Allan Sparrow; and Ward Nine alderman Dorothy Thomas.

Tenants' associations are also represented on the force.

The force wants to thoroughly study some areas of Toronto to put tenants' problems into "workable categories." Among such categories might be safety, rent control and lease protection.

Each category would be studied by an individual subcommittee.

At the end of seven months — the expected duration of the task force — concrete proposals might be made to City Council to improve the tenant's status.

Sparrow stressed the importance of the project, saying, "I hope the task force does not just come up with the conclusion that there's a problem."

He noted the annual tenant turnover rate in the Bloor-Carleton Streets district is 55 percent to show that the problem was quite obvious in a city whose residents are mostly tenants.

Harriman said she hoped the initial survey will be more comprehensive than merely the distribution of a questionnaire.

She suspected such questionnaires have not generated sufficient response in the past.

The members are particularly concerned about the restriction by many landlords to tenants without children.

Thomas felt this is especially unfair in high-rise apartments where landlords have deliberately neglected to build adequate playground facilities for children.

The task force hopes to make its findings known throughout Toronto, commencing with a public meeting 8 pm Monday at City Hall.

Sawbones' school in sad shape

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The University of British Columbia (UBC) medical school's clinical facilities are operating under "the worst possible conditions in Canada," medical school dean David Bates said last week.

The medical school will lose its official accreditation unless teaching facilities in Vancouver hospitals are upgraded, Bates said.

In a report prepared for the B.C. Medical Centre, which coordinates all public health facilities in B.C., Bates says the UBC medical school would have to cut admissions in half starting in September, 1976 unless work is started on improvements to existing facilities by this September.

The only alternative, according to the report, would be to cut admissions to the medical school in half from the current level of 80 students per year to 40.

The report comes in the wake of the action of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada to give the medical school a tentative two-year approval of its programs instead of the regular five-year approval.

The report says the college will withdraw its approval of the UBC medical school unless facilities are improved.

If this happens UBC medical graduates would be unable to become candidates for examination licences to practice in medical specialties.

The Association of Medical Colleges of Canada, the authority which issues medical degrees, would likely withdraw approval of the UBC medical school if the Royal College withdrew its approval.

"There wouldn't be any point in training in a place where the diploma isn't accredited," Bates said.

But while many medical schools have been placed on probation, Bates said that no school has ever lost its accreditation.

Bates said he must give a report to both bodies in two years detailing the improvements which have been made to the medical school facilities. If either group finds the improvements unsatisfactory, then they will send out an inspection team.

Staff of life

The Varsity holds its annual first-Friday-in-February staff meeting today at 1 pm on the second floor of 91 St. George St.

All are welcome to attend as we will be having a general discussion on the possibility of a summer Varsity and also cutting back to two issues a week next year.

By the way, we accidentally left Paul Carson's byline off the story on ex-CIA agent Philip Agee. Well, love is never having to say it's your story.

SAC's work continues

SAC is continuing to work with the Ad-hoc committee on student aid to circulate a petition demanding changes in the Ontario Student Awards Plan.

The committee is presenting the petition for approval to the Governing Council's admissions and awards committee Feb. 18 and met with U of T student awards director Patrick Phillips Monday to gain his support.

The Ontario Federation of Students is planning a province-wide conference in Toronto this weekend to plan strategy for the campaign for better student awards.

Last week confidential documents were revealed which exposed a government plan to raise the loan ceiling on the federal Canada Student Loan Plan to $1,900.

Would Smokey the Bear like this as a lair?

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

Despite the general self indulgence at City Council's Wednesday meeting, Ward Seven Alderman John Sewell had a good day, winning a couple of small victories and losing only on a measure which may ultimately benefit him.

Inveterate smoker Sewell's defeat came in the form of a motion passed to ban smoking for a trial three-month period at all meetings of the Toronto executive committee, all standing committees, the board of health and the planning board.

Although faced with many pressing matters and a business agenda three-quarters of an inch thick, council members spent more than two hours debating the motion. Quoting extensively from a Reader's Digest article on the effects of smoking on sex, chain-smoking council member Anne Johnson supported the motion.

Johnson contended that if by smoking less "we all become more sexy, we will have another problem in that the VD rate will go up." She nevertheless proposed banning smoking from all meetings at City Hall, but said provision should be made for regular smoke breaks.

Non-smoking alderman George Ben immediately objected to any form of breaks, saying the idea reflected the general trend of society to become concerned about the criminal and forget about the victim. "We use all the resources of the state to protect the criminal," he said.

Ben asked why people should expect to smoke at all, noting, "We don't smoke in church . . . or in Eaton's or Simpson's."

In a general statement of support for the ban, alderman Ying Hope produced a small brass pipe which he said was designed not for tobacco but a "special kind of incense."

Expounding on the history of the pipe, Hope said its use might provide council with an "atmosphere of ancient delight and delicacy," describing its effects as "exotic, euphoric, philosophic."

Exhibiting the tendency that politics makes strange bed-fellows, Old Guard member Ben collaborated with reformer Allan Sparrow to propose an amendment which would prohibit smoking from all public areas of City Hall. Sparrow explained, "We shouldn't fool around with half measures."

Breaking with the solidarity of the Reform Caucus to disagree with fellow member Sparrow, Sewell said, "This is moving from the sublime to the ridiculous."

Mayor David Crombie, previously designated by Johnson as chief cigarette borrower on council, said there would be difficulties in enforcing a total ban. In supporting the original ban, Crombie told council member Reid Scott, who had threatened to defy the ban, that he would not hesitate to call on City Hall security, Metro police or "former CIA agents" to eject Scott.

Scott later replied with a mumbling attack on Crombie, terming him as "the tiny perfect supercilious mayor."

Evidently heeding the mayor's advice, council defeated the Sparrow-Ben amendment and voted on the original ban.

In other business, council passed a resolution expressing condemnation to the federal government of the proposed Pickering airport.

Noting all members of the council's Old Guard were absent, Sewell amended the resolution to read that it had been passed unanimously, which it did in the subsequent vote.

Sewell also succeeded in having an application from the Royal Bank to specially treat the sidewalk around the bank's new building at Front and Bay Streets sent back to the executive committee.

The application requested permission to use granite pavers on top of the normal, concrete bed "to match a similar concept on private property."

Sewell pointed out this was an attempt by the bank to absorb the sidewalk into the corporate environment. "It's very important to distinguish between public land and private land," he noted.

Attacking Sewell for nit-picking, alderman Joe Piccinini succeeded in having the vote delayed in order to question public works commissioner Ray Bremner.

Bremner told council that public and private property would be "clearly demarcated" by an expansion joint.

It's time for a change. It's time for new people with new ideas to clean out the cobwebs, to restore integrity to government in Ontario.

Box Nixon,

The Varsity

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Exemption won't help community

The recent planning board recommendation to exempt the U of T area from the city's modified core area holding bylaw raises disturbing questions about the university's obligation to consult the community about its plans for development.

Technically, the exemption removes the university from public scrutiny, and permits it to develop without any mandatory public consultation.

The university has been recommended for exemption as one of the "public and semi-public institutions which have already been predominantly redeveloped." The exemption, although not finalized, has been approved in principle by City Council. The buildings and development committee Monday made no move to alter it, despite the appeals of residents' groups.

Practically, the exemption does not signify very much, since the university has little money to develop with. However, the exemption — which lasts until September, until final criteria are drafted — would give the university carte blanche to do whatever it pleased.

Such a prospect is doubtless frightening to local residents, and with good reason. During the 1960s, when the university underwent unbridled expansion, local residents literally lived in fear of the seemingly inevitable encroachment of the university. The university gained a reputation as an arrogant and selfish developer.

This year, the proposed athletic complex development at Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street has added fuel to the controversy. Residents claim the building will spoil their neighborhood, that it will be of no use to them, and that they have not been fully consulted on the plans.

Moreover, the City of Toronto-University of Toronto Liaison Committee, which met last year and actively pursued such questions as the university's responsibility to keep in line with city parking policy, has not met once this year.

To the university's credit, it has drafted a statement of intent to limit expansion to the Spadina-Bloor-Bay College area, at least until 1990. However, this is more a description of fact than a revelation of purpose.

The real issue is what the university intends to do with the presently residential Huron-Sussex area, much of which it owns. This is the only area in which the university could expand practically, if it wanted to — as it is presently doing with Innis College.

At the moment, the Huron-Sussex area has been classified as residential under the modified holding bylaw, which will protect it from development. Only a few years ago, however, the university was making active plans to expand in that area. Today, it has no power to move. But the situation could easily change. And as of now the residents have no clear indication just what the university intends to do with the area.

U of T has a responsibility to maintain a sincere and active liaison with the community, and to submit its development plans to the community for scrutiny. There will be no incentive to maintain that responsibility should the university be given its blanket exemption from the development criteria. Some initiative is overdue.

Strand writers should be fired

I wish to draw your attention to an article which appeared on page 6 of the Jan. 30, 1975 edition of The Strand, the Victoria University paper. This article, somewhat obscurely titled Pert & Vert, contained an item of particular interest to the Pakistani students on campus. I quote:

"Dear Victor:

The Sixth Floor of Marg Add would like to take this opportunity to complain about the "food". We overheard the dietitian last Thursday saying how difficult it is to find stray cats and Pakis late at night.

PENTHOUSE"

"Dear Penthouse:

Don't complain, my chainsaw stalled in a turban last night. Book 'em Danno."

This comment attempted to parade under the guise of humor, but is no more nor less than a tribute to the ignorance of its authors, two unknowns named "Gardner and Lowman," (Lowman — how aptly named?).

This kind of bigotry cannot be tolerated in an official newspaper of the university, and I am especially emphatic on this point, insofar as that newspaper is funded in some measure by the fees that I pay to Victoria College.

Moreover, I hardly need note the hypocrisy displayed by the editors of The Strand in allowing such racist trash to appear in the very issue which celebrates the progressive cause of student parity on the Board of Regents. The irresponsibility of the editors is also evident in the fact that they retain on their staff such ignorant bigots as Gardner and Lowman.

One is inevitably forced to reflect when confronted with this sort of mentality. Who are Gardner and Lowman, and what leads them to believe that they can, with impunity, insult other students at this university, and, indeed, insult the intelligence of the students at their own college? I consider myself a fairly representative member of the university — meaning I am apathetic on most issues — and yet I am aroused from my lethargy by such a direct contravention of the letter and spirit of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

For my part, then, my first inclination is to see Gardner and Lowman swing in the wind, but I am willing to settle for less — I demand their removal from the staff of The Strand, and I would even be prepared to see them suffer a more tangible penalty, such as expulsion from the university.

This would be the absolute minimum required to reassure the Pakistani students of our university that we will not tolerate racism openly directed at them or at any other ethnic group on campus.

Zoology faculty really at fault

The recent dismissal of Paul McReavy by the U of T zoology department emerges as a totally unjustifiable and outrageous act.

McReavy apparently was released for "rudeness and unsatisfactory performance," according to the administration, but it is obvious that McReavy's union activities and the overbearing insolence of a Dr. Jacques Berger were the essential factors in the move.

Undoubtedly the administration is highly reluctant to pay their non-academic workers reasonable wages or to respect the existence of unions.

To add to the injustice, they are naive enough to acknowledge the whimpering and whinings of a character such as Berger.

If his incredible puffed-up state of mind is punctured by a less-than-praising comment, the man is very liable to storm up to the administration, wailing and howling.

Such actions are unfortunately considered serious by the powers-that-be, and needless to say, McReavy was undoubtedly the victim of such irrelevant absurdities.

It is wildly ironic that Berger had been allowed to present relatively the same lecture material in three different courses over the last two years (zoology 201, 220 and 221), and yet McReavy was fired for much less notorious flagrances.

In the past three and a half years at U of T, I have been completely astounded by the utter incompetence one confronts within the confines of the zoology building.

In general, labs in the various zoology courses I have taken have been quite useless and seemingly irrelevant, while many lectures have been far from enlightening — especially anything offered by Berger!

With such in mind, I find it difficult to fathom the justification of McReavy's release.

As long as the zoology department proceeds in such an abortive, archaic manner, and as long as the whims of Berger and his cronies are acknowledged with such due reverence, one can only anticipate continued incompetence and lunacy to reign supreme in that respected department.

Corporate taxes must fund OSAP

The letter from Jane Burnes on Wednesday (Feb. 5) calling for higher tuition fees and higher loan ceilings under the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) is welcome because it brings out into the open some of the prejudices that are behind the cutbacks in student aid in particular and in university financing in general.

But let's make this clear first: these cutbacks have been substantial since 1971. There has been a 30 percent decline in the amount of money the Ontario government has allocated for student aid since 1971. In 1974-75, $36 million was allocated, compared to $51 million in 1971-72. The 20 percent inflation rate since 1971 means that the $36 million is really worth $28 million in 1971 dollar terms. This decrease is despite the fact that 30 percent more people are applying for OSAP this year than in 1971.

Also, let's make another thing clear: many of the problems with OSAP are not petty, as the author suggests.

If you had the same amount of money for food and rent in 1971 as in 1975 ($32 a week), would you consider that petty?

If you had to face a 22 percent increase in rents last year and a projected increase of 25 percent in 1975, would you consider that petty?

If you were a part-time student (Ms. Burnes is not), and had no student assistance available, would you consider that petty?

These problems are not of concern to Ms. Burnes. No, the crucial principle in her arguments is that "attending university is a privilege, not a right."

A privilege for whom? For the rich?

I would argue that education is a right. A right for those academically qualified. No one should be denied a post-secondary education because of his or her financial circumstances.

I do agree with Ms. Burnes when she sympathizes with "people who have worked all their lives, and who will probably never have an opportunity to attend university themselves who are heavily subsidizing our lectures, our libraries, and our degrees."

That is why the OSAP petition now being circulated calls for a restructuring of the tax system. It specifically condemns any suggestion that increased funding would come from raising the taxes of lower and middle income people.

A 6 percent increase in Ontario's corporation taxes would more than double the present student aid budget. And this increase need not be transferred to the consumer. Statistics Canada reported a 37 percent increase in profits for industrial corporations during the second quarter of 1974 over the same period of 1973. That's where the money should come from.

Bishop blasts boldly

By BOB BETTSON

A Brazilian bishop, Dom Helder Camara, charged Wednesday that institutions in the West and the Third World will be unable to engage in the "bold and decisive action necessary" to solve the problems facing mankind.

Speaking on an educational television broadcast, Camara charged the institutions are all bound into the capitalist system "The only hope is with small groups all over the world working for social change."

Camara is a leading figure in the Catholic opposition to the fascist Brazilian junta and has fascist persecution. Shots have been fired at his residence.

In Brazil, the progressive elements now are involved in consciousness-raising using the methods of innovators such as Ivan Illich.

"There is a tradition of passive Christianity. People accept authority", Camara said.

Camara challenged the president of Brazil to resign over allegations of torture. He said the international outrage had helped to the extent that the government is now cutting down on tortures.

He admitted he was an optimist who saw the first signs of change in Brazil recently.

On the question of violence, Camara was emphatic. "The first violence is the violence which causes misery, this is more terrible than the most terrible war."

He said Canadian aid was necessary in Brazil, but should be channeled through the United Nations.

He said the main fault of existing development strategies is the narrow view of development as economic aid, not the growth of the whole man.

Citizens complain, but permits likely

By ART MOSES

Politicians and citizens dumped all over Toronto's controversial permit parking scheme Tuesday, but City Council will probably implement it anyway within two weeks.

More than 300 residents jammed City Hall council chamber for a meeting of the public works committee and criticized the plan as an unjust tax on the working class areas of Toronto, where few people have garages or driveways.

The permit scheme would charge people $24 a year for the right to park on their streets, but does not guarantee a place to park. People who must park on other streets will be ticketed, permits or not.

With public works chairperson (Ward 9 alderman) Dorothy Thomas breaking a tie, the committee voted 5-4 to repeal the permit parking bylaw in those wards.

The motion would return to free parking, except on streets where residents specifically request permitting.

But it is unlikely City Council will agree at its Feb. 19 meeting.

Most citizen deputations urged that City Council help solve parking problems on a street-by-street basis, not by dictating a uniform policy on the entire city.

"Maybe permit parking will work on some streets, but it won't work on ours," Ward 7 resident Anne Gray said.

"We had no parking problem on our street before the city came around with a bylaw," Ward 9 resident Michael Predergast said.

"I would remind Toronto politicians who want to put a permit on every car that there once was a politician who wanted to put a Volkswagon in every garage, but he lost," Predergast said. "I suggest you withdraw this plan before the same happens to you."

Members of Council's Reform Caucus oppose the permit scheme, along with Ward 10 alderman Bill Kilbourne, Ward 9 alderman Reid Scott and Ward 4 alderman George Ben.

But a clear council majority appears determined to plunge ahead with the scheme city-wide.

Ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughan said although he recognized different problems existed in different neighborhoods, he refused to have some areas paying for permits, and other areas parking for free.

"If we had free parking in the Annex, we'd be deluged with cars every day from Mississauga and Scarborough," he said.

"But we don't have those problems in Riverdale," a member of the audience called out.

Ward 1 alderman Elizabeth Eays, a self-styled reform politician who, like Vaughan, chose to stay aloof from the Reform Caucus, informed the audience that "permit parking isn't like the Toronto-Dominion Centre. If it doesn't work, we can rescind it."

Eays said some streets in her ward want permit parking so she refused to support its repeal in wards which don't want it.

Ironically, Ward 8 aldermen Fred Beavis and Tom Clifford, whose ward currently enjoys free overnight parking, wants to eliminate that situation and support permits.

Clifford, a member of Public Works, left the Tuesday meeting early when he saw several of his constituents in the audience.

May get some representation

No students on aid task force

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal-provincial task force on student assistance will consider the question of student representation at their meeting Feb. 13 in Ottawa, according to the British Columbia delegate to the task force.

D. L. Clarke, coordinator of student services for the British Columbia government, said he was unsure of the exact reason student input was not being sought for the task force.

He said student representation on the task force, which has been meeting since last fall to overhaul the whole student aid system in Canada, was "a fair question."

At present, the task force consists only of government officials at the federal level and from each of the provinces responsible for the administration of student assistance programs.

Clarke pledged to bring the matter up at the next meeting of the task force. "I can put it in the minutes and see what other task force members say," he said.

Whether students will ever get to know the response to Clarke's motion is another matter, since the meetings of the task force are held in closed session and the minutes are considered "confidential."

Although Clarke said that he did not know why the task force had been set up without student representation, the task force secretariat said in a letter to Bob Buckingham, secretary-general of the National Union of Students (NUS), that "policy precludes representation on our committees by professional or other interest groups in the field of education."

Since November of 1973, NUS has had as a policy objective "that student representation be established on all federal bodies making policy decisions regarding student financial assistance." But so far, the federal government has not seen fit to place students on such bodies.

Buckingham said that he will be forwarding a letter to task force co-chairman R. J. Lachapelle asking that students be represented on the body and that NUS be given the opportunity to address the group at their Feb. 13 meeting.

"From reading past documents," Buckingham said, "it seems that they are not discussing the real issues involved."

Buckingham said the task force is only looking at minor changes in the system such as repayment schemes geared to income, but the major question of reducing or eliminating the loan system and establishing a national grant program has not been considered.

In the absence of student participation, Buckingham fears the results of the study will likely be an elimination of the grants program and increased loans for students in keeping with the position of several of the provinces to turn back an increasing amount of the cost of post-secondary education on the student.

A federal government spokesman said the possibility of student representation being raised as an issue at the next meeting "is news to me."

He said the issue had not been raised in the past, and that if it is, an attempt will be made to arrive at a consensus decision between the federal and provincial governments.

As for how the federal government would vote on a motion to include students on the task force, the federal spokesman said that it has "no position in advance of the matter being raised" at the February meeting.

Caroline Kendrick of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) said

OFS will support the request from NUS for student representation.

Kendrick added, "Student input into the position Ontario is taking at the task force is particularly important since Ontario seems to be taking the most regressive stance."

MARXISM AND FUTURISM

An interchange between a political economist and futurist and three Marxists on the subject of futuristics. This critical look at the futuristic approach will take the form of a panel debate around Jim Dator's paper, "A Eutopian Alternative to the Development Model of Future Society," followed by an open discussion.

PANELISTS:

Frank Cunningham, Dept. of Philosophy, U of T; Jim Dator, Program in Futures Research, Social Science Research Institute, University of Hawaii; Chandler Davis, Dept. of Mathematics, U of T; William Leiss, Faculty of Environmental Studies, York University

This forum will be held on Wed., Feb. 12, 4-7 p.m. in Rm. 1017, New College (Willcocks and Spadina). The public is cordially invited to attend.

Copies of Jim Dator's paper are available in the Reserve sections of New College Library and St. Michael's College Library. Further information: 928-2467.

The results of the tapestry design competition are presently on display in the HH Art Gallery. Above, the design by Donald Stuart. The committee has not yet made its decision.

HH commissions a tapestry for the Great Hall

The Hart House Committee elections are upon us — but the 1975 Hart House Art Committee, certainly, is going out with a bang. The committee has decided to commission a tapestry to be hung on the north wall of the Great Hall at Hart House. The results of a design competition the committee arranged among five loom artists are now on display in an exhibition which opened last Tuesday at the Hart House Art Gallery.

The committee has not yet reached a decision — understandably, since the tapestry will cost between $45,000 and $60,000.

The idea originated with the Warden of Hart House, Jean Lengelle.

"We were faced," he said "with the grey bare wall covered with concrete and stucco. The idea was to cover it with something involving a variety of colours and a variety of materials. Tapestry is on its way up in Canada, and after we had seen the tapestries in such places as the National Arts Centre in Ottawa and the Toronto Star Building we decided if we were to put anything on the wall that it should be a tapestry.

"The idea was presented to the Art Committee" (of which the Warden is by virtue of his office a member). "Once the committee has 'sensitized' itself to modern tapestry the idea of a competition was agreed upon.

"Six artists of repute were selected: and they were all sent photographs and blueprints of the Great Hall. Mariette Rousseau Vermette who did the tapestry for the Star Building, declined, we don't know why, to take part so only five artists submitted designs before the deadline last October 31."

Those artists are Micheline Beauchemin, Tamara Jaworska, Karen Pascal, Joanna Staniszkis, and Donald Stuart.

"The submissions sat in my office after the deadline so that the members of the committee could see them. But then we decided that they should be shown to all members of the university community so that we could hear what they thought.

"We have to decide whether or not we want a tapestry made from these designs, and if we do want a tapestry from these, which one we prefer.

"We have included already completed works by the five artists in the show so that people can get a better idea about what each can do.

"We may reach our decision by the end of the exhibition (it runs until the 21st of February) but we certainly want a lot of feedback from the university community.

"Financing of the tapestry is a problem. But we intend to approach the various foundations once we've made our selection. The Canada Council will not support a work but it will support an artist with one of its long-term grants. A project of this scope may take up to one to two years. I have been led to believe that the Council will accept our choice.

"And the approaching sesquicentennial of the university will provide a great opportunity for us to approach those people who might give money . . ."

Joe Rosenblatt: the need to be angry

The following is excerpted from a taped interview with poet-artist Joe Rosenblatt by Varsity staffer Nick Power. Perhaps the best introduction to it is a poem by Rosenblatt:

A portrait does not mean a face.
There is a friendly alien hidden in our image.

Our double from an invisible planet, a visitor
Who watches us as in a mournful vigil.

and when we prate loudly to ourselves about our stale aura, and its flickering, this tall dunce with a conical hat of truth fits rainbows neatly into our retinas.

Perhaps what is most surprising about any interview with a poet or a painter is how much he doesn't sound like one, how much he sounds like a business man or a lecturer or a politician but not a poet. So what the hell is a poet anyway? In the end we are forced back to the poetry or the painting, whatever made us interested in the interview in the first place. (And, of course, that's how it should be.)

NP: Are you writing poetry that you want labelled Canadian?

JR: One should write what he feels, not wave a flag. I'm a nationalist because I see a lot of artists being cheated. Because of the monoliths of American interests I can't find my books in the bookstore. Canadians are conditioned to feel that Canadian writers are inferior — that's a lot of bullshit — they're not inferior. There are strong and weak writers and unique voices. There are fantastic landscape painters here.

There's tremendous potential and until we get rid of our own masochism, and we're dealing with masochism, then I think it will be bad. One can't create literature in a masochistic situation: Canadian money doesn't invest in Canadian talent in a generous way. I must praise the Canada Council because they have invested in talent; but I'm talking about corporate wealth doing big PR on Canadian writers, Canadian painters. Then Canadian painters can fetch the same prices as American painters — because we certainly have the same capitalism here.

What we have is a certain kind of masochism that Americans don't have. They're masochistic about other things but not about bragging about their artists.

NP: Have you been directly oppressed by this situation?

JR: It's prevalent when you turn up at a high school to do a reading and they announce over the P.A.: "We have a Canadian poet with us today." What the shit are they talking about? where are we — in China? It's like someone reading in Peking and being announced — we have a Chinese poet with us today. It's total masochism, it's sick, it's not even interesting masochism ... it's a boil that won't break.

Don't blame everything onto the Americans. We should blame the leadership; we should blame the public media; we should blame the book editors of papers who won't promote Canadian books, who won't review Canadian books; we should blame the government for not having legislation to make it mandatory that the libraries carry so many Canadian books. Why should Canadian libraries carry only 5 percent Canadian books? — isn't that masochism, I mean they've got junk books from all over the world, why can't they get good Canadian books?

Our own culture is a minority and I don't think this exists in Australia

'cause they're far enough away from the US it doesn't exist anywhere in the world.

NP: Can you make a living from your writing?

JR: No, you can't, not in Canada. It seems to me that if this country is going to grow in terms of literature then it has to get rid of its own mind, it has to get rid of the chains, of the garbage in its head. You have to be able to tell people — this is a bunch of crap (about inferiority) we have good Canadian writers — what are you people doing about it?

If people want to investigate my poems after a reading and they can't get them — there's something wrong. Yet, they can get Rod McKuen who's a terrible, commercial, American poet.

And why does this exist? Because people aren't angry. They accept their masochism. Instead of getting rid of their hangups, they love them, they enjoy all the snot, they enjoy the pain.

NP: You wrote a poem on the War Measures Act in October '70, what happened to it at the time.

JR: I sent it to Saturday Night and it was the fastest rejection I ever got. I felt it was a very powerful, very good poem. It was written in the heat of the moment, I got carried away — it's a wonder I wasn't arrested.

Since Saturday Night wouldn't print the poem, I said what the hell, I'll take it down to the Varsity. I told (Milton) Acorn about it. He went down with me and three days later the damn thing was published.

NP: At the same time one of the issues of The Varsity couldn't get printed because it ran a copy of the FLQ Manifesto.

JR: They were the only ones in the world who would have published my poem. I mean now we can talk about these things; but then, it was tough, very frightening. People were shitting blood and what was, even more frightening was that 90 percent of the Canadian masses were for the War Measures Act, damn it.

That's how it was — they were ready to press the trigger — they talk about a free country. OK, there were some self-righteous lunatics running around — turns out there were only a dozen. And they were ready to throw everyone in jail. And 500 went to jail, lost their liberty. Trudeau lost his cool. I lost my cool and wrote this poem. I tried to get myself hung. If there were more than 12, if it was an insurrection, I would have gone to jail.

You can lose your life over a poem. Look what happened to Garcia Lorca, Osip Mandelstam. It makes it exciting though.

NP: Why are the poets and writers among the first to go?

JR: Because they can't be trusted. How can you trust a poet? A good poet — in a political regime you can't buy him. Look at Yevushenko. It looked like he sold out. People were running him down — too much money, running around in a proletarian mink sable coat ... Is this the workers state, people were saying. Look what happens, he comes out on Solzhenitsyn's side — that's like committing suicide. So how can you trust a poet?

That's possibly why they murdered Pablo Neruda — denied him medical treatment and he died. No one trusts a good poet. I don't trust them myself.

NP: Do you think you have a voice for the political feelings building in Canada.

JR: I don't know. I don't really care. I have a voice for poetry; I'm not a politician. I'm a lousy erratic politician. I wouldn't help anybody; it's like asking me to throw you a life line — I might throw you a chain thinking there may be more buoyancy in a chain and you'll go under. No, I have no public voice for politics.

NP: What are you concerned with in your most recent writing?

JR: Dream Craters, which is out now, has purely to do with dreams, with my terrible disillusionment with the world.

NP: Does one have to be crazy to write poetry?

JR: You have to be crazy to think you can live off poetry; not to write it. If you're crazy, you lose control of the poem. The public is nuttier than the poet — they want a crazy performer.

People ask me: why do you write? I say: why do you talk like that? I write because I enjoy it — other adults can't accept that enjoyment.

If they think poetry is just a hobby then they think a poet can come and read for nothing. They don't accept poetry in their own hearts as important. Look, when you need a plumber you got to pay for it. When you need a good poet you should pay a small fee for him. Since they don't accept that, you got to fight for it like a dog.

If you have a sense of humour, you can survive — you can joke about this. But some people come to a reading looking for trouble. They ask you: does your mother come from Ireland, did you ever have cancer in the family, or another poet? They want to open you up — you want to ice them all. After a heavy reading you don't want to talk to anybody. It's a curse — you're on exhibition.

NP: What can you do about this?

JR: If a person is going to be a public poet he has to accept the shit. He has to accept the responsibility if he sends in a bad poem and it gets printed; he'll have to pay for his sins if he doesn't fight hard enough for the design of his book. You have a responsibility to yourself — to insist on your rights.

NP: What is the Writer's Union doing?

JR: The Writer's Union is insistent, angry, because we're getting a raw deal. We're getting bad distribution, lousy contracts, other people are making money off us. Members of the union feel they have a right to live as writers, as much as plumbers and doctors — not a lot of money, but a living.

They have to fight for this right by trying to change publishing, by changing stupid librarians who won't order Canadian books. They're going to have to tell the publishing industry how to run their own business. Obviously they don't do any PR, there's no TV play to sell books. They say they don't want to waste money; if you have a product you have to make sure it goes. Even a bad book is a product — and bad books sell: Harlequin Romances are pushed! You have to do PR work — if you don't — books will not sell, the author won't make a living — it's as simple as that!

NP: Is there anything the League of Canadian poets can do?

JR: What they should do is dissolve the League and join the Writer's Union. It's a mistake to remain distinct because a novelist will get a $100 for giving a reading; a poet will get the same amount. They also have the same problem with publishers as far as contracts go; same problems with the distribution.

NP: Can the quality of writing be improved by a union?

JR: If a person can make a living from his writing, he writes less and less like a slob. He will not prostitute his being, his energy, on some other dull, uneventful thing. It might improve Canadian writing. It will certainly give Canadian writers a sense of respect, instead of being humiliated.

"A portrait does not mean a face."

Cockroach Poem

This poem was written by Toronto poet Joe Rosenblatt to commemorate the passing of the War Measures Act. Says Rosenblatt: "It expresses my opinion of the repressive measures being enacted in Parliament which are designed to destroy all dissent in this country. The modified version of the War Measures Act is just as vicious as its predecessor. These opinions are also, essentially, those of the poet Milton Acorn."

Acorn, who is in Toronto now, bases himself on Prince Edward Island. When the War Measures Act was imposed, Acorn promptly turned up at the Charlottetown police station to turn himself in as an FLQ sympathizer. He was turned away, and hit the road.

Make your peace with the cockroach

interview

In the Great Debate of the Sixties between the faculty and the students about the relative importance of each to the university, students claimed that their decision-making powers should not in any way be diminished or qualified simply because they were only here for a few years of their lives. The ultimate irony of course is that that view of the relationship of the students of the university seems, for better or for worse, to have changed precisely when those students left the university. Faculty do have a different stake in the university. And yet that stake is a part of what can be most valuable to a student in his experience of the university. Here if nowhere else is a community of intellectuals and kindred interests with which the student can come to terms on a personal level. And through the members of this community he can gain a sense of the history and the meaning of the institution and even of his own place within its history. More importantly, his awareness of these members as individuals may even challenge his own self-awareness.

Barker Fairley has left the U of T now. But he is an admirable significant role in the development of Canadian culture in the twenties, in Halfway Up Parnassus. It seems, in fact, looking back, as if the twenties were a golden time in Canadian culture. Varsity Art Editor Gillian Mackay and Review Editor Randy Robertson spoke with Fairley at his home near the campus last week before his show opened. We asked him about his involvement in the period.

"After I came to Toronto in 1915 — do you want me to talk about myself like this? — I got connected with a little group of staff and students who were publishing a paper called The Rebel. It was a student plan and then one or two faculty members were brought in — Sam Hook of Vic was one — and he brought me in — and we wrote for it. It was an irresponsible rag of a paper but interesting. It was rebellious in a playful way but it wasn't political — it was lively, unacademic. It ran for two or three years and then the students got fed up with it, I think because the staff were taking it out of their hands probably without meaning to. The students pulled out and left us with the thing on our hands. We were mostly staff — one or two non-university, we weren't solely university but chiefly — and I was the one who said "let's go to the and Letters Club every day. I met them there. And Sir Ernest Macmillan, Healey Willan, Sandwell, all of them would drop by for lunch. It was the centre of what was happening then. It still exists but there is nothing happening there now.

"There was a sense of a stirring then that there hasn't been since, in my opinion. The Depression came, and then the war, the terrible Second World War. I don't think we've had the same sort of feeling of something good being done and coming that we had then in the 1920s."

Fairley said he felt that Canadian painters had become influenced too much since the twenties by philosophies of art popular elsewhere. But he is not calling for a return to the standards of the Group of Seven.

"The Group weren't widely recognized; they weren't popular then. They were very much of a new thing in the twenties. Now they're too popular. It's time we forgot about them for a while.

"I was close to them then but I don't want to be identified with them because I think we should leave it all behind now.

"I don't mean to run their work down. They made a great contribution to Canadian civilization and they reached everybody and did something great for the country.

a lot of rubbish in recent years. I opposed it all along but I was defeated so they've got a lot of rotting on top of the good stuff . . .

"The problem is that we have no critics in the newspapers, we have reporters or gossipists but no critics. We're better off in the field of drama and in the field of literature than in the field of art. There is no good critic in the country and therefore there is no critical public establishing values.

"I think Barry Lord's book The History of Painting in Canada is pulling in a good direction because it's putting emphasis which I think we have to recover. He puts perhaps too much emphasis on it or he emphasizes a painter just because of his subject matter though he's perhaps not a very good painter — he's doing all that — and yet the whole effect of the book is salutary. I am in favour of it with all its faults and omissions.

"Lord's political views make people angry with him. But in spite of that the direction he's pointing in is a good one because it shows a concern for life and for people and we've got to discover that and not this nonsense of mucking about with pails of paint and saying, it doesn't matter to anyone. Lord's beliefs are better than having no context at all. We've just been in a void thrashing this lack of content. It got established commercially and people have simply gone on buying it. People with more money than brains.

"Design comes in only as applied to something. You don't want design in the absolute. It's no fun — design in mid-air. These painters should all be doing applied art instead of pictorial art.

"Pictorial art relates a life through its content and if there's no content then let them relate a life through a relationship to objects."

No one can deny the pre-natal attraction of Fairley's view of art. And the optimism upon which his interpretation of art is a rebuke that perhaps too many young people deserve. But the proof of a painter is in his paintings.

Fairley is calling for a revival in painting of subject matter is not calling for a return to representational painting. He criticized the High Realists to us: "Colour photography has reached such heights I don't see why painters try to compete — with it. The colour photographer beats the painter if he goes into that field. Look at the Gourmet magazine. Magnificent reproductions. Why should anyone else try to do it by painting so laboriously?"

"Why don't they look at Picasso Chagall, and see what they can learn from them?"

Fairley doesn't like "isms" but he will accept the term "expressionist" for his paintings. But even though he disavows the influence of the Group of Seven, what he's talking about does sound suspiciously like a description of their works. You really do have to see his paintings.

The remarkable thing about them is how they at one and the same time makes his views more complicated, more challenging that they appear to be, and yet also much simpler, much more obvious than they already are — and just as rewarding as one would like them to be.

Barker Fairley, painter.

review

The exhibition of portrait and landscape paintings by Barker Fairley which opened last Sunday at the Sisler Gallery (on Baldwin Street) is fresh and delightful.

Rather than modelling in light and shade, the artist builds his portrait surfaces using quasi-geometric planes of flat colour, made expressive by strong simplified lines. His portrait of Robertson Davies reveals a powerful presence through the stark juxtaposition of colour planes, coupled with a sense of warmth and humanity.

I noticed a softer and very appealing approach in the portraits of two women, Nancy Tully and Bridget Dearlove. There the emphasis is on a more delicate line modelling and the paintings are permeated by a gentle golden light.

The use of a line which is both sensitive and powerful, refined to its basic expressive qualities, is also characteristic of Fairley's landscape work. Through an economic and consistently sure use of line, expanses of field and sky are brought into definition and resolution.

Each of the landscapes is suffused with its own unique light. There are washes of olive grey, lemon yellow, dull wheat, teal blue, each the product of a particular observation. These small gem-like paintings look exceptionally well together, setting each other off by comparison and contrast of changing mood and light.

This strange hazy luminosity and the simple evocative use of line create an element of mystery about the works which partially explains their power over the viewer. There is a haunting quality about a tree or hill, isolated in the distance, which is part of the experience of our own land. Barker Fairley's work encompasses a rewarding poetic vision.

The exhibition continues until the twentieth of February.

example of the "ethos" (O too quickly popularized work!) of the university. Fairley is 87 now. His eyesight is failing him, he is no longer able to engage in prolonged reading or research. But he does have more time now for painting. In fact, he is painting so much that his current one-man show at the Sisler Gallery is made up entirely of works painted within the last year, year and a half.

Fairley came to Canada from England in 1910 and in 1915 to Toronto. From 1915 until his retirement in 1957 he was a professor of German at University College (with only one four year period away from the college in the thirties). He won an international reputation as a Goethe scholar during his years here.

Claude Bissell notes Fairley's country with it." And so we did. And so we started the Canadian Forum.

"The magazine has changed a lot from when we had it. In the twenties it was more lively and literary I think than it is now. It's much more of a party paper now. We were jumbled in our politics then.

"It was a happy time in the 1920s. The war was over; we didn't know another war was coming and it was a growing time, a happy time, relatively looking back on it. I was close to the Group of the Seven as they came to be called, and they became involved with The Rebel and then with The Forum through me. They published articles about what they were trying to do and they made drawings for it. I was the connection there too.

"The Group of Seven used to have lunch together at the Toronto Arts

But we've been rather stationary since. This non-objective painting which has been dominating the field has been a wrong step altogether.

"It's entirely a foreign invasion, of course, but they really shouldn't invade the pictorial field with subjectless painting. Those who do should be decorating things — walls, pin cushions, anything you like — or else painting pictures with some recognizable subject matter.

"Borduas as a painter only shows you how bored-you-are, I won't say that rippelle "rippelles" me but I don't really care about either of them. I have opposed non-objective art since I first saw it. I think it's a sign of a declining society. And if people were more alive to the world around them they would want to use it in the subject of their painting, the way a novelist wants to, and so on.

"Hart House has got filled up with about aimlessly. You can challenge Lord's beliefs, or improve on them. But at least they are there to start people going. It's good to see someone wanting to relate art to life more genuinely than it has been for half a century. They've been playing about with it outside of any social or human commitment and responsibility and I think it's good to have it restored to a social context.

Art can't flourish independently of all commitments and relationships to life. You get this non-objective nonsense which sells to the rich. The rich buy it because you can't tell them what's the matter with it because it's not at the level of intelligent interpretation at all. There's no intelligent interpretation possible, because there isn't anything to interpret. The art is protected by its own emptiness. It's easy to commercialize because of art

The exhibition of The Art of the Dance which opened last Monday night in the Theatre Lounge of the O'Keefe Centre is designed to illustrate to National Ballet viewers during the intermissions the interdependence of the fine arts and the performing arts.

But the exhibition also rests on more important assumptions.

Part of the late 19th century myth of the Romantic artist was the belief in a bohemian world where artists and aristocracy met freely, where each understood the other, misunderstood the other, misunderstood as they both were by the bourgeoisie.

In the new world, in the 20th century, the struggle to ensure that these myths survive is more often than not very embarrassing.

And they had to struggle hard last Monday night: never have I seen so many people so dressed up to view so much second-rate art. But that only meant that the exclamations were the louder, the critical judgements the quicker in coming, the drinks the faster in circulating, and the pictures that much more quickly forgotten.

Overheard: one couple on some monumental pictures of Nureyev.

"Aren't they sensational?"

"Absolutely sensational."

"Isn't there something we can do to get the city to buy them?"

And they moved on to something else.

So it went. Dilettante aesthetes.

Dilettante patrons. Enough to make me brood like a dilettante socialist. And inoculation enough certainly against the snobbery which will be unleashed at the National Ballet Gala opening tonight, and throughout the season.

Erick Dzenis was clearly the Degas of the evening. His pictures of Nureyev, of Karen Kain, of Veronica Tennant, are rather pleasing as examples of an obvious apotheosis of Eaton's catalogue sketches. Lots of Pastel Shading and Heroic Chains.

But Dzenis' work is better than Sydney Smith's appalling arabesques, or Phyllis James' patronizing studies of four-year-old, five-year-old ballet students, and certainly better than Prince Monvo's risible sculptures.

Vaslav Nijinsky kept a diary during his descent into madness. That diary says far more about the meaning of dance — and its paradoxical situation in the modern world — than this exhibition ever could.

"I danced badly; I fell when I should not have. The audience did not care because my dancing was beautiful. They felt my mood and enjoyed themselves. I wanted to go on dancing but God said to me: "Enough." I stopped. The audience began to leave. The aristocrats and the rich people begged me to dance once more. I said that I was tired. They did not understand me. They insisted. I said to one of the aristocratic ladies present that her movements were exciting. She thought that I wanted to offend her. Then I explained that I meant that she had a feeling for movement. She thanked me for the compliment. I gave her my hand and she felt that I was right. I like her but I feel she has come in order to make my acquaintance. She seems to like young men. I do not like this kind of life and therefore asked her to leave me. She guessed my feeling and did not continue the conversation. I wanted to talk to her but she did not feel like it. I showed her the blood on my foot — she does not like blood

And so it goes.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-In-Chief of The Varsity for the 1975-76 publishing year. The Editor is solely responsible for editorial policy and is responsible to the Board in all other matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority and responsibility, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $10,650 to $12,600 per publishing year, including a salary of $3,450, or less for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her position only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

Address written applications to:

Orient Express: horribly mediocre

Agatha Christie is an English tradition similar to pantomimes, Guy Fawkes night, cricket scores and the Queen's message on Christmas Day. She is the royal family of trash.

Her play, The Mouse Trap, holds all records for longevity in the theatre (twenty years in the same place). Ten Little Indians, which used to be called "Ten Little Niggers" was made into two well done films and is the classic suspense-twist who-dun-it where everyone gets it. The film of Witness for the Prosecution was also a big seller, with Tyrone Power, Marlene Deirich and Charles Laughton all caught up in a web of conceit, counter-conceit and deliciously atrocious acting.

Toronto audiences are now flocking to see Murder on the Orient Express, from a Christie novel in the Hercule Poirot series. They can only be loyal Anglophones, paying homage to English tradition in defiance of rampant Quebecois nationalism. However such loyalty is strained by this horribly mediocre film.

We are shown a rather well done montage of a kidnap-murder suggestive of the infamous Lindberg case, after that, "Five years later" flashes on the screen and the whole film takes a nosedive into the arch-typical Christie portrayal of a collection of bourgeois petty-bourgeois and aristocratic relics brought together for the express purpose of boring one another to death with decadent behaviour and racist insults.

They are on a train, in Yugoslavia, travelling between Turkey and France, in 1935. It is December, the off-tourist season. The train is trapped by drifting imitation snow.

One of the group decides to drop dead, accidentally, by falling on a knife, twelve times, in his sleep. And so, surrounded by Hitler, Mussolini, the great depression, wars in China and Spain and the great Stalinist purges, an actor who doesn't look like Albert Finney tries to save the train company from scandal by solving the crime before the Yugoslav police arrive and put greasy fingers on all the clues.

The music is terrible, the photography is restricted by the sets, and the attempt at Great Gatsby "atmosphere" is confined to the type face used in the credits, the appearance of a Ford Monoplane, and a Turkish chamber orchestra playing, "On the Good Ship Lollipop".

The director is Sidney Lumet, who also did The Pawnbroker, but that's another story.

Each character gets to play a different imperialist nation, although there appears to be a preponderance of cockneys in those countries in 1935. History majors may find the search for an allegory of Balkan intervention amusing. But if there is any political message it is very slight and hardly an explanation for the large number of people going to see the film.

It is playing near Victoria College on Bloor street. People are lining up past the Embassy to see it; even for the two o'clock showings. Thus the real mystery of the film would be finding out who all those people are and how much Warner Brothers is paying them.

And don't try to guess who-dun-it, they all did.

Lynyrd Skynyrd: ratty, uninspired

Over the past few years the aura of success surrounding the Allman Brothers Band has made people in the music business write about a new and unique sound coming from the Southern states. Until Sunday night many people sincerely believed that Lynyrd Skynyrd was part of all that new excitement down in the Deep South, but their concert at Con Hall set us straight.

Looking no better or more interesting than a bunch of escapees from a home for overaged roadies and other related sewer rats, Lynyrd Skynyrd took to the stage for an undistinguished but thankfully short set. Boasting perhaps the finest sound system to ever grace the hall, the band disregarded all its complexities except the volume and treble controls, both of which were cranked far too high, making the sound both numbing and far too shrill for clarity.

The band's greatest asset has been rumoured to be its three fine lead guitarists, Allen Collins, Ed King, and Gary Rossington. Seldom though did their work seem little more than competent, save perhaps for the occasional unison and harmony interplays of Collins and Kin. Generally their rhythmic work was monotonous and overworked and in only two songs did they even vary their tempo.

The obvious charisma of singer Ronnie Van Zant was overshadowed only by drummer Bob Burn's hi-hat, which had the strange tendency of repeatedly going up and down in time to the music. As for piano player Billy Powell, he remained the forgotten member for most of the set until given the chance to distinguish himself on a J.J. Cale tune. Anonymity suited him well.

When the band finally got around to doing its hit, Sweet Home Alabama, (after annoying the audience earlier with a near copy of the same tune) their performance seemed both ragged and uninspired, and was sharply degraded by the settings on their P.A. system. Nevertheless, the audience, like all Toronto audiences of recent years, enthusiastically jumped to its feet and welcomed the band back for an encore.

With a groggy reverence Van Zant dedicated the encore to deceased Allman members Barry Oakley and Duane Allman. At the end of it all, all I could say was, "Why couldn't they have shown some respect?"

Now the sibling shibboleth....

Bonjour, La, Bonjour
at the Tarragon
30 Bridgman

The Varsity — Bob Laney

First, the Homosexual Hangup, now the Sibling Shibboleth: Tremblay must be running out of taboo topics to explode and glorify — perhaps next he will give us an Oedipus who declares through the (obligatory) final kiss with Mater — "It's love, It's real, It's Beautiful!" For we are asked to believe this of Serge's love for his sister Nicole. Not that we wouldn't, but Tremblay devotes all his time to providing the overwhelming (to be sure) Freudian precedents to this situation, and little to the potentially intriguing relationship of little brother and little sister.

Jim Henshaw as Serge returns from Europe (which is a far more interesting subject that Tremblay only hints at, when he has the old aunts ask him such things as "They say Paris is shaped like an onion — is that really true?") to confront his father and four sisters. Thanks to a half-heartedly realistic set, he is caught as a helpless, silent listener for the most of the play, and tries to fill out the lacunae in his characterisation by alternating between the lovable kid and the tough little cynic who (of course) sees through all the pretensions of the 'oldies'. Only in his final desperate declaration of love to his deaf old father does he achieve any impact. The three older sisters are carefully blocked out like a psychoanalytic primer, with their respective substitutes for a motherless, loveless home: sex, food, pills. But Tremblay has already captured for all time the malaises of the suburban woman in Les Belles Soeurs. Helen Hughes and Doris Petric work hard to rescue the characters of the two symbiotic aunts from a familiar one-line joke which has been lavished 500 lines. Because of Henshaw's retreat in face of his meagre characterisation of his Brave New Cynic, Diana Leblanc's Nicole, though sensitively underplayed, has turned into a weepy, maudlin flowerchild.

As if to confirm his proposition, Tremblay gives us a long coda in which little Serge is revealed as the only offspring with the heart to take in his father. I suppose that is Real and Beautiful too, but director Glasco has compounded Tremblay's shallow psychology by giving us a realistic style of acting which tries to convince by gazing intently at the audience from a spotlight. Only an impressionistic, 'dream' style of presentation could sustain the crudeness of this exploration of an extremely complex situation. But, as if ignoring the whole play, Ed McNamara gives a superb performance as the 'Aged P.': totally convincing, his sonorous voice and slow dignity give us a character beyond both the easy comedy of the aunts, and the easy heroism of Serge. The play is worth seeing if only for those rare moments of theatre when old Gabriel reminisces about the first time he could hear the record his son had bought him ("When I heard those violins . . ."); and when he accepts his son's offer to live with him (a scene the intensity of which recalls Jack Nicholson's with his father, in Five Easy Pieces. Apart from that, the play is disappointing. Someone should tell Tremblay that if he wants to be the new Ibsen of Canadian theatre, he should (like his predecessor) take care in asking the questions, and not worry about answering them so simplistically and obviously.

Krapp's Last Tape Phoenix Theatre 390 Dupont Street (at Bathurst) until 9 February

Best intentions by themselves are, unfortunately, not enough to ensure successful theatre. Such is the case with the production of Krapp's Last Tape being presented by Le Theatre d l'Homme Actor's Laboratorium (LTHAL) at the Phoenix Theatre.

In most plays — especially this one — there is a sense of empathy that must exist in order for the play to succeed on all its different levels. Most important of these levels is that of encounter between the actor and his audience. If this empathy does not exist the play becomes a mere intellectual exercise and defeats its purpose. I am afraid that I have to say that in this sense the present production rarely left the ground.

Douglas Rodger as Krapp gives a very pleasing performance but is unable to overcome two obstacles: his interpretation of the play and its subsequent effect on his characterization.

Beckett usually takes a spartan approach to situations, showing them at their worst — nuclear holocaust in Endgame, being buried alive in Happy Days. But in all these plays, no matter how desolate, hope is always present, usually in the relationship that exists between the two central characters and the sense of communion built up between them (for example, waiting together in Godot).

In Krapp no such hope exists. All Krapp has is himself — the disembodied voice of a tape machine, emitting sentimental effusions and observations on his past life. His inability to live successfully in the community of human kind is his most profound failure, and is heightened by his physical isolation. Krapp is man turned in on himself, listening to himself to the exclusion of the world. His abortive attempt to make a last tape as a definitive act, to right the wrongs and to verbalize his disgust and regret is not enough, and the play ends with him frantically listening to an earlier tape in which he describes a romantic, quasi-erotic interlude with an unidentified woman — an insignificant episode in his life that is now all important.

The main problem I found with this production was a pervasive dissonance which never allowed one to break past the barrier of actor and audience. This dissonance worked on two levels. First, one was never aware of Krapp's age. Working with bare essentials and rejecting such conventions as makeup puts an added onus on the actor to create the feeling of age with the only tools he has left: his body and his voice. There were many instances in the production where Rodger's skill was evident, and he created some very nice sequences, however these were counteracted by a number of jarring moments, including his boogie with a broom handle to the tune of 'In the Mood'. A confusing sequence, albeit, very nicely worked out. But, more to the point, Rodger's Krapp was perhaps too active and too physical for this passive observer of life, as of course he would have to be for this interpretation. I found myself hoping that he would just sit back for a while and let the audience do some work. This chance was offered at the end but even then he did not stay seated long enough for us to look at him in silence and sympathize with his life: the lights snapped out before one had a chance.

The second area of dissonance is the more basic and arises from the actor's interpretation of the play. This Krapp is not the failure of Beckett's play but a survivor "who seems in constant attendance upon himself". Such an interpretation of Krapp as a success — insofar as he is able to survive day by day in his own strange, lonely world — would be acceptable if it were not at odds with the play. For even if the last wordless mouthings of Krapp were omitted from the production, which they were, one would still be left with the last words of the tape, which juxtaposed against the deathlike, vacant stare of the old man, do not seem to be the words of one who has successfully survived.

LTHAL is an impressive group of people whose work seems to be getting the attention it deserves, if its list of critical credits from Canadian and Polish newspapers is anything to go by. They are engaged in a type of experimental theatre that, as far as I know, is not widely practiced in Canada. Although not successful, this production of Krapp's Last Tape was definitely engaging and kept the audience amused in the sense that the ideas, the intentions, the enthusiasm, and, most definitely, the skill, were all there to be cultivated. You can expect some interesting productions from this group in the future.

Several new openings this week: on campus, a "collective creation" called Street Signs plays at UC Playhouse tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30. Off campus, Tolstoy's gloomy drama of peasant life, The Power of Darkness, opened at the Firehall last night. The Colonnade also has a new show, a double bill made up of Tom Stoppard's sleuth spoof The Real Inspector Hound and Peter Shaffer's Black Comedy. (Run begin February 12 through March 22). The other brand new show in town this week is Cosmic Jack a fantasy inspired by the beanstalk kid. It is scheduled to open tomorrow night at Global Village.

If you haven't done so already, you ought to make the effort necessary to find the Phoenix Theatre, buried in behind the warehouses and whatnot at 390 Dupont. Le Theatre de l'Homme's production of Krapp's Last Tape ends its run there on the 9th. (Reviewed this week). Article 58 at the St. Lawrence and The Pits at the Free Theatre are both worth a visit. They'll be around for another week — Article till the 15th and Pits till the 16th. My personal opinion of Bonjour la Bonjour at the Tarragon is that it is shoddy, self-indulgent and not a patch on Tremblay's earlier plays. This production also has the doubtful distinction of a star performance unrivalled for its sheer narcissism. But you could give it a try . . . Passe Muraille is following up Baby Blue with Tony's Woman at the Poor Alex. The publicity is tantalising. (Opened January 28th). Two others and that's it for the week: there's a J.B. Priestley play at Central Library Theatre — When We Are Married, a small-town Drama Society favourite. And Open Circle's A Soup Song continues at Enoch Turner School House for another few weeks.

I almost forgot: Calm Down Mother at UC Playhouse, 1 pm, Feb. 12-14, free; Magnificence by the PLS at the Hart House Debates Room, Feb. 12 through 15 free; and Electra at the Ward-Price Bldg., 23 Grenville St. 8:30 pm continuing until Feb. 22.

The English Studio International, the "most authoritative journal of modern art," as it describes itself, has, in its 83rd year of continuous publication, adapted the one theme double issue format that so many magazines (Esquire, Arts Canada, Columbia Journalism Review) have been using occasionally recently. Economics, of course. The switch-over here will be permanent: and I welcome it. If you want to read about Duchamp — as you will in the January-February issue — then you will read about Duchamp and not about everything else under the sun.

But besides the 36 page Duchamp section (which includes, to give an idea of its scope, an interview with Francois Le Lionnais on Duchamp as a chess player) the January-February issue (which isn't available here yet) will also feature Geoffrey Grigson on New Paintings by Ben Nicholson, Guy Brett on Chinese Art Policy, and a 20 page Review section that includes commentary on the Art Gallery of Ontario. The AGO bookstore will probably begin to stock the magazine then and feature it prominently: it seems that the only way magazines actually do get

Hart House a patron of the arts? It's an exciting idea. And I wholeheartedly welcome the committee's idea of a tapestry for the Great Hall. (See cover story.) If you want to help the committee decide which design to commission, drop by at the gallery. But perhaps the committee really should have staged this show in the Great Hall itself for more reaction certainly from the diners who use the hall most (though there would be inevitable problems of security if the Hall were used.)

An exhibition of the work of one of our greatest painters, Emily Carr, opens today at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Some of the paintings are from the AGO collection but the better part are on loan from the Vancouver Art Gallery. These will be on display in the Education Gallery until Feb. 28 and then they will be touring the province as one of the extension department projects, aimed at bringing the Art Gallery to the people of Ontario. The Chairs exhibit at the AGO continues until the beginning of March. The whole exhibit has been conceived in the spirit of a carnival which kids, in particular, seem to find very appealing. Not recommended for grownups with serious tastes and a passion for edification.

Across the street from the AGO, the work of two interesting Canadian artists is showing, Jack Bush at the Pollock Gallery and John Snow at the Gallery Pascal. The recent exhibit at Gallery Pascal was of watercolours done by Toni Onley on the Arctic trip — at the Merton Gallery (Merton Street) currently exhibiting artist, Judith Currelly, will show a collection of slides taken during 18 months spent alone in the Yukon bush.

In Markham village, the Mirvish Gallery is opening a show of new works by Friedel Dzubas tomorrow. These huge colourful works are well suited to display in the spacious gallery. A few houses down, paintings by Earla Alexander will be on view until Feb. 27 at the Gallery O.

One of the longest-awaited appearances in the TSO season comes up this Tuesday and Wednesday: Andre Previn will be arriving to conduct the Symphony, along with the excellent hornist Barry Tuckwell. The program includes Strauss Horn concerto no. 1, and Rachmaninoff's second symphony. Previn's recording of this work last year with the London Symphony was a triumph of interpretation and splendid recording, and if the Massey gang can pull off the same degree of interpretative excellence it'll be a treat all 'round. Tickets are $3-10, some rush seats available, but don't count on 'em. There's an additional performance of the same program on Friday night, so don't pass this one up.

Tonight at St. Lawrence, the fine local ensemble Camerata makes an appearance in an all-Mozart program. Going on their past performances, this one looks like a winner, too. If you miss them here, you just might have to wait until the Shaw Festival, where they are artists-in-residence. Tickets $3.50 — $4.50, if there are any to be had. 8:30 pm.

The CBC talent festival rolls along: Wednesday at 7:03 pm, clarinetist Timothy Maloney plays Debussy's rhapsody for Clarinet and Orchestra, followed by Joan Barrett, violin with the first movement of Saint-Saens' Concerto. Last on the show is soprano Belva Spiel with arias by Mozart and Puccini. No FM? Poor devil, you can hear it Thursday night on CBL at 8:03.

Guitar lovers will be flocking over to Eaton Auditorium tomorrow night for a concert by the top-rated American in the field, Christopher Parkening. $3.50 — 6.50, and quite a bargain to hear this man play. His Angel recordings are a good showcase for his talents, but a live concert should be worth the effort. 8:30 pm.

The same evening, New Music Concerts presents music of Gilles Tremblay and Toru Takemitsu, whose works were made (fairly) famous by Seiji Ozawa in his years here. 8:30 pm, tickets just $2.50 for students.

Up at York's Burton Auditorium, the Festival Singers of Canada make an appearance on Wednesday night. It's an all-Canadian program of vocal music, featuring composers Somers, Willan and Holman. Students $3.50, 8:30 pm.

Beaver's, the Victoria College folk club was sold out last Friday when it presented Mariposa stars, the Original Sloth Band. Close to 200 people crammed the candle-lit Terrace Room at 150 Charles St. W. to witness one of Canada's truly unique musical acts. Tonight Beaver's presents noted ragtime artist Bob Evans. Also on tap are Brian Scott and incredible harp player Dave White, who just happens to moonlight as a doctor at Western General.

As for concerts, the weekend is a write-off but Monday brings us Roxy Music, that British conglomerate of bad taste that will most surely find enough decadent Torontonians to fill Massey Hall.

On the 15th, you can start your reading week off with Murray

McLauchlin, who will be giving his new annual show at Massey Hall. On the 16th there's Sonny Terry & Brownie McGee at Con Hall, and on the 17th you can choose between Two Generations of Brubeck at Seneca College or Herb Alpert & His Tijuana Brass at Massey Hall.

Goose Creek Symphony is featured at the El Mocambo tonight and tomorrow. Monday and Tuesday a bastardized version of Spirit appears, to be replaced Wednesday by the Good Brothers. At the Chimney, Myles and Lenny end their week on Saturday, and are replaced next week by Ken Tobias. At Egerton's, Joshua Graves from Nashville appears through Saturday, with Hamilton Camp and Lisa Garber starting their week's run Monday.

While we slept the Kensington passed on. It held out for almost three years, if memory serves, which is a pretty fair achievement. It showed I Even Met Happy Gypsies. Now, re-named The Studio Theatre, the new owners will be programming recent American films on a regular run basis. There is to be a student discount in the form of a ten ticket package for fifteen dollars.

We also slept through the notices for Bergman's Scenes from a Marriage and so did not know until after we saw it that it was not a movie at all but excerpts from a six part serial made for Swedish TV. Hence the unaccustomed paucity of visuals — what can you show on TV but a close-up? — the episodic structure and the unrelenting talk. Though we were flagging before the end, we were gripped by most of it and tend to agree with the critics' lavish praise. At the same time we can understand why the Varsity reviewer last week didn't like it. The movie is, in fact, scenes from a marriage, less cosmic in scope than the cinematic Bergman. Probably, the older and more married you are, the more you will like it.

On Tuesday, Feb. 11, the East Asian Studies Student Association in co-operation with the Media Centre is presenting "Movement and Metaphor."

Professor Frank Hoff is hosting this videotape of two dances in the Japanese No theatre, which will illustrate the relationship between word and movement in this art form. At the Media Centre, room 107, from 4 until 6 pm.

Next week at Hart House, Feb. 17 at 8 pm, two No plays, Hagoromo and Kumasaka, will be presented by the famed Kita Troupe from Tokyo. No theatre dates from the 13th century, and has survived intact to the present day.

Each performance is a result of years of training, as well as complicated staging: elaborate masks, costumes, and ancient Japanese instruments.

Tickets go on sale next week. Phone 928-2092 for further information.

At O'Keefe tomorrow, the National Ballet begins its spring

This month at the Science Centre it is new Finnish movies on Tuesdays (Did you know, by the way, the Liv Ullmann is a Finn?) and new Spanish movies on Thursdays.

On Sunday night, St. Mike's is showing de Broca's King of Hearts which they call a "warm, funny, conspiratorial story". Clearly it is not being shown by medsmen. Surprisingly, the movie seems to be standing up, at least through its first decade. Our guess is that it will make it to the ranks of the movies' greatest romantic fantasies.

Monday to Thursday there is more lightness at the College Cinema with The Wizard of Oz ("Gee, Toto, I don't think we're in Kansas anymore") and Charlie Chaplin's Limelight.

On the other hand, the Revue is into the thick middle of their Bergman festival with Through a Glass Darkly, Winter Light, Brink of Life and The Silence.

And we were pleased to wake and find Malle's extraordinary LaCombe, Lucien still playing at the International. First run price, though.

Miscellaneous: The annual Victoria College public lecture series gets underway next week. Paul Bouissac, of Vic's French department, speaks on "The Meaning of Nonsense: Clowns and Limericks," next Tuesday at 4:30 pm in the Lecture Hall, Room 3 in the New Academic Building. There are three other lectures in the series: we'll announce them as they come up . . . This year's UC Alexander Lectures — not for a while yet — feature Richard Eilman on "The Consciousness of Joyce." 25-27 March. Because of the renovation of University College, the lectures have been moved from UC's West Hall to the Medical Sciences Auditorium . . . You might notice the Roberts Library's exhibitions in the area just in front of the second floor cafeteria. Some of the exhibitions are just plain silly — the current Art Mail and the earlier Art Christmas Cards. Some of them — including the current Australia exhibition — only reinforce the corporate image all too many have of the Library. Others — such as the current Emile Nolde exhibition and the pre-Christmas Chopin exhibition — save the whole idea. Someone told me about the frisson she received when she saw the life-moulds of Chopin's hands . . .

The exhibitions arranged by the Rare Books Library are more consistently interesting. One on children's miniature theatres — with an informative catalogue worth filing — has just closed. One on the season.

Coppelia begins the Gala Weekend with performances Saturday at 8:30, and Sunday at 2:00 and 8:30.

For Karen Kain fans, Wednesday evening will be a treat.

Kettentanz will be given its Toronto premier, featuring Kain and Nadia Potts.

Norbert Vesak's Whispers of Darkness will also be premiered, with Tennant and Surmewan dancing the leads.

To complete the evening, Kain and Potts will dance Constantin Patsalas' Inventions, which was danced throughout the company's recent tour of Eastern Canada.

The Program of three dances and Coppelia complete the week.

Ticket prices range from $15 a seat for the Gala Opening, to $2 for a rear balcony spot at the matinees (Rear balcony means the last five rows in the theatre).

And don't forget to save a couple of bucks to see the Toronto Dance Theatre, whose season begins Feb. 18, at our own MacMillan Theatre.

Fencers make good neighbours

On Friday Jan. 31 and Saturday Feb. 1, U of T hosted the OWIAA fencing championships.

After a season stretching from September, the six teams in the finals came together to vie for the team championship on the Friday. The teams, Carleton, McGill, McMaster, U of T, Western, and York, represented the top two teams from each of three zones in the province.

After a long day of fencing, the U of T team, Liz Lozinko, Yoko Ode, Anne Stokes and Vivian Zochowski took first place with no defeats. Carleton, which proved to be U of T's most difficult opponent, placed second and McGill finished third.

Last year's champions, McMaster, placed fourth and York and Western took fifth and sixth place respectively.

Twenty four fencers competed in the individual championships on Saturday. Sixteen had competed in the team event the previous day.

The calibre of fencing was at a high level and the individual bouts were cliff-hangers in the majority of cases.

Yoko Ode and Anne Stokes reached the finals this year. Luba Taguchi (McMaster), Janice Frezell (Carleton), Anne Buchner (Western) and Kathy Girard (Brock) filled in the other four spots.

The final bouts were tightly fought. Luba Taguchi, with four victories out of a possible five, emerged as the top women's intercollegiate fencer. Janice Frezell of Carleton took second.

Yoko Ode had to fight Anne Buchner a second time in order to break a tie and secure third place. Anne Buchner, Kathy Girard and Anne Stokes took fourth through sixth place respectively.

Seagren sees grim saga for summer games

By JOHN MIKA

During a recent interview in Toronto, Bob Seagren, silver medalist in the pole vaulting competition at the 1972 Summer Olympic Games, said that the upcoming '76 Olympics to be held in Montreal are in danger of the type of terrorist political activity which befell Munich in 1972.

Seagren supported his argument by reference to the intensified political racial, and social conflicts apparent throughout the world and the corresponding increase in terrorist activity.

The Olympics, he suggested, because they are at the centre of world attention, provide an ideal means through which militant groups can publicize their grievances before a world-wide audience.

To avoid another tragedy strict security measures are required, but, as Seagren noted, having police officers suited up in sweat suits with Tommy guns slung over their shoulders as in Munich, does not promote the atmosphere of friendly competition which is supposed to pervade the Olympics.

Seagren fervently supports the view the Olympics should be an event open to both amateur and professional athletes, saying amateurism in world competition sports is a myth.

At the world level, all amateur athletes are at least subsidized by government, and in Scandinavia some top calibre sportsmen earn up to $150,000 a year.

He also believes the Eastern Bloc countries possess too much voting power on the Olympic Committee because they operate as a single unit.

He described the pole vaulting event in the '72 Games as a complete fiasco. The gold medalist, an East German, along with four other competitors, were each allowed to use their own poles, while the rest of the field, including Seagren, were denied the privilege.

Seagren is currently involved in the Super-Star competition in which "star" professional athletes from numerous sporting fields are pitted against each other in various athletic tests ranging from power baseball batting to swimming — the eventual winner earning in excess of $60,000.

This year an invitation to the meet was extended to and accepted by Steve Smith, Seagren's arch rival in the pole vaulting event on the pro track circuit. Apparently the two ex-University of Southern California vaulters were at each other's throats during this last season — or so the media and the promoters maintained. But, considering the dismal economic year suffered by the sponsors of the pro track circuit, the animosity may just be a facade to gain publicity and attract more spectators — and it did help.

Discipline a problem again

By MIKE FRIEND

When one considers the basic philosophy of the intramural sports program at U of T — recreation with competition — one must wonder why we have so many disciplinary problems within the program.

Interfaculty sports are aimed at the person with average athletic ability, with the idea of developing basic athletic skills.

Also, they are intended to develop the qualities of sportsmanship and leadership in its participants. They are definitely not intended to act as an arena for gladiators as some of the players seem to think.

Stick swinging and violence have become too commonplace in our hockey games. Maybe it is our (the students') fault, as it is we, who run the interfaculty program. But I do not feel that this is a valid excuse, as some of the people who come before the Intramural sports committee for disciplinary reasons voice the opinion that if they did as they had done somewhere else, nothing would have happened.

We, the members of the ISC, do not like the idea of having to act as a court for these matters as they seriously limit any other functions that we would like to plan, as we spent most of our time dealing with these matters.

For example, the meeting Feb. 6th dealt with four disciplinary matters involving stick swinging and referee balking, while only one sports event was discussed — that being an interfaculty ski meet co-hosted by a brewery and the U of T ski team.

If the trend towards violence in sports continues, maybe we will have to re-evaluate our program and eliminate certain sections of it as a means to reducing it, but clearly, this is not a satisfactory solution.

Maybe the proper solution would be for the people involved to re-evaluate themselves and their thinking so that they could eliminate the problem themselves.

The ski meet is to take place at Georgian Peaks Friday, March 7, commencing at 11 a.m. The format is to be two runs over a slalom course with team and individual scoring.

Each team will be composed of six skiers and can be from any faculty, college, fraternity or recognized U of T group. If interested, contact your athletic representative or direct your inquiries to Rm. 101 in Hart House.

There will be a $10 entry fee that will also include transportation from Hart House to the site and back.

For all those interested in the new athletic complex, there will be an open meeting at the Benson Bldg. in the sports gym Feb. 12 at 1 p.m. to discuss the complex.

ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE -
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

- Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Trinity, Erindale, New College, Inns, Seats available - 1 in each of University, Victoria, St. Michael's,
Seats available - 1 part-time student — Woodsworth

Faculty:

- Departmental:
Humanities: Seats available - 1 in each of FRE, ISL, ITA, PHI, PHL, REL, SIS, SLA
Life Sciences: Seats available - 1 in ZOO
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 1 in each of AST, CSC
Social Sciences: Seats available - 1 in each of ANT, GGR, POL, SOC

Divisional:

- Humanities: Seats available - 5
Life Sciences: Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 5
Social Sciences: Seats available - 3

STUDENTS

- COMMITTEE ON STUDY ELSEWHERE
- COUNSELLING COMMITTEE

Committee On Counselling

Students: Seats available - 1 in each of UC, VC, TC, SMC, NC, IN, ER Colleges

Committee On Study Elsewhere

Students: Seats available - 4 full-time

NOMINATIONS

Nomination forms can also be obtained through Departmental and Registrars' offices or from the Faculty Office. Completed nomination forms must be received in the Faculty Office, Room 1006, Sidney Smith Hall, prior to 4.00 p.m. on February 14th, 1975 to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box.

Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392. A complete description of the Committees and the Rules of Procedure are available upon request at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

Bodies to bob in Benson Building bog

By PAUL CARSON

Varsity swimming fans can look forward to another exciting weekend as three top-notch dual meets are scheduled for the Benson Building pool.

The action begins this afternoon at 4.30 when the women's intercollegiate team hosts Waterloo, one of the strongest in the OWIAA.

Then at 7:30 pm it's the men's turn as Blues take on the Warriors, who surprised a lot of swimming experts last year by placing second to Varsity in the CIAU finals.

Warriors lost coach Bob Graham to a year's sabbatical leave, but still have three top athletes in backstroker Rick Adamson plus free-stylers Ian Taylor and Dave Wilson.

Potentially the best of the three meets starts at 1 pm Sunday when the Blues are matched against the Quebec All-Stars, a collection of the best college and high school swimmers in that province.

Drawing mainly from the powerful Pointe Clair Aquatic Club, the Quebec contingent should be led by backstroker Victory Ivory and at least three outstanding breast-strokers.

Bob Kastling, a former Olympian, is now swimming at McGill but due to academic commitments it's not known whether he will be a member of the Quebec team.

Apparently the Quebec government has decided to actively support the development of the provincial team since the swimmers are being flown to Vancouver for a dual meet tonight against Simon Fraser, and then back east for Sunday's competition.

"Obviously somebody in the Quebec government favors swimming," said Varsity men's coach Robin Campbell, "since flying those athletes all over the country for two meets on the same weekend is going to cost a lot of money."

Since the number of places on the OUAA team being sent to the CIAU swimming finals is still clouded in doubt, many Varsity hopefuls will likely go all out this weekend in an effort to record season and even career best times in order to increase their chances of making the final team.

Diver Tim Bean gets his chance tonight to qualify for Varsity's OUAA team as he'll take on both of Waterloo's divers singlehanded as Blues premier diver, Fin Temple, will be away competing in Ottawa.

With three excellent meets to choose from, the weekend seems to be the perfect opportunity for U of T sports addicts to broaden their experience by taking a look at some outstanding intercollegiate swimming.

Dual meets certainly don't lack for excitement since the thirteen events are run off in rapid succession without any intermissions. The times for the eleven swimming events can range from about 23 seconds in the 50-yard freestyle to between 10 and 11 minutes in the gruelling 1,000-yard distance freestyle.

Entry rules allow a maximum of 18 people per team and each competitor may enter only three events.

Thus, it becomes almost a poker game between the coaches as each attempts to gain the most points from his or her best swimmers while simultaneously tricking the opposing coach into wasting his or her top names in a losing effort.

To add spice to the permutations which each coach must calculate on the pool deck, dual meet scoring gives 5-3-1 points to the first three finishers in each race but with the catch that only the top two finishers from any one team can gain points. And to add yet another factor, in the two relays which open and close the meet, the winner gets seven points and the loser nothing.

Therefore, a coach must decide whether to pack his or her better swimmers into the relays in an effort to collect a quick 14 points while risking getting nothing, or whether to put lesser lights in the relays and hope to make up the points by placing one-two in several individual events.

Dual meets also favor teams with strong freestyle swimmers as six of the eleven races are freestyle and of course there's the freestyle portion of the 400-yard medley relay.

Consequently, a team with some outstanding freestylers plus one top diver or a specialist in another stroke should have an initial advantage over a team with average performers in every event.

There are 113 points available in all regular dual meets that include two relays plus one and three-metre springboard diving. The most lopsided score possible is 102-11 since a team gets a guaranteed one point simply by having an entry, however slow, in the eleven individual events.

The men's meet against Waterloo should be fairly lopsided in Blues favor, but spectators at the other meets should be watching for the adroit one-upmanship by the coaches as well as the fierce battles for second and third place which usually determine the eventual winner in close meets.

Interfac b'ball race tied in Gordian knot

By MRS. PARKER

Division 1A of interfac basketball sports a three-way tie for first place. Skule, Erindale, and Vic I all have 16 points, but both Erin and the plumbers have a game in hand over Vic.

Breathing hotly down the leaders' necks is the Med A entry at 10 points from nine games. The doctors split their games with Sr. Eng and Vic but have only encountered Erin once this season. In that one even OHIP couldn't help, as the OUAA hopefuls from Erindale trounced them 112-46.

Following Meds come the jocks. Phys-Ed have maintained a 50-50 season. (That means they won four and lost four.) After the recent road trip to Dorset, Ontario, the jocks expect to finish the year with wins.

Tied for second last spot are Law and SGS, both with four points. These two squads split their contests this year. Law downed SMC for the other points while SGS managed a 79-52 pasting of the mikes.

Last, and probably least come the best-dressed team of the league, SMC A. The fathers only won once over the jocks of all people. Dentistry is definitely not looking down in the mouth this year in division 1B as they lead the section with seven wins in nine starts.

Currently in second place is New I still dreaming of bygone glory. New runs up a fair point total but lost two close ones to Fac Ed and Dent A. Fac Ed is tied with New for second honours having won six of eight contests for the season.

UC is next on the totem with eight points, edging Scar who has six points.

Holding up the bowels of the division is Trin A who has not won any games at all this year. In fact, Trin finds it difficult to field a full team most of the time. Trin had defaulted two games and took a 88-38 pasting from New.

In division IIA, Pharm, those poor slob who take a beating from the Toike every week, are nonetheless leading with 12 points. In close contention for top spot are Jr Eng with 10 points, SMC B with 10 points, and Innis (Innis ???) with 8 points. For A with 6, UC II with 4, Med B with 2, Mgt St with 2, and Dent B with 2, are in a class of their own.

Just for a change, sports fans, we will describe the division IIB from the ass up. New II with no wins to show this season is making a concerted effort to be the only undefeated team in the league. Only Trin A is competing with them.

In second spot from the bottom (or second spot from the top — whichever you want to look at it) are: Law, Arch, and PHE C, all with four points.

In top spot (or farthest from last place) are Knox I and Dev Hs, two real powers of interfac basketball.

By DAVE STUART

Forechecking was the name of the game and that is exactly what the Blues did to University of Western Ontario Mustangs in the Gardens in London last night.

The Blues skated to a 4-1 win over the 'Stangs with solid team effort in positioned play and forechecking that had even the partial Western fans applauding.

Team work was evident by the fact that all three Blues' lines contributed to the scoring. The Blues' forechecking was so tenacious that Western fans cheered whenever their team managed to get the puck into Toronto's end, which wasn't very often!

Except for the opening minutes of the first period when the Blues looked confused in their own end and allowed Western several good scoring opportunities, the Varsity team was in complete control of the game. Having veterans Anderson, Fifield and McFarlane back in the lineup was the big difference between the Blues that won last night, and the Blues that lost to Guelph last Friday.

The Varsity team led after the first period by 2-0, on goals scored by Kent Ruhnke and Doug Herridge.

Ruhnke's goal at 9:36 was the result of sustained pressure in the Mustang's end. Both Pagnutti and Ruhnke were left alone in front of the net to bang at the puck. Ruhnke finally connected.

Herridge's goal came on a power play effort with the Mustang's Maurice Biron in the sin bin for allowing.

Ivan McFarlane did most of the work, lugging the puck the length of the ice to the back of Western's net. From there, he fed it to Herridge, who was standing alone in front of the net.

By the end of the second period, the Blues had upped the score to 3-0, as Bill Fifield dazzled the crowd with his adept stick handling around Western's defense and backhanded the puck between 'Stang's goalie, Paul Pappas' legs.

In the third period, Western struck quickly as Dave Roy raced down the right wing and fired from about 35 feet out. The shot beat cleanly past Hulme at the 23-second mark.

Ruhnke soon regained the three goal advantage for the Blues when at 4:31 of the third period, he netted his second goal for the night to bring the score to 4-1.

During the latter half of the third period, the Blues locked into several penalties. Western put on some pressure, forcing Hulme to make several key saves, especially during a bench penalty the Blues picked up for too many players on the ice. One particularly sparking save was when Roy fired at Hulme from close in. The puck flew high over Hulme's head, coming down behind Varsity's netminder, who reached back and snatched the sure goal in mid-air.

Shots on goal: Toronto 40; Western 27.

Volleyball

In second division volleyball, Eng. III defeated Devonshire House 15-7, and 16-14 to take the championship this year.

In first division action, Scar upset Erindale 15-13, 5-15, and 15-8 to earn the right to face SGS I in the championship match at Hart House. The match will be at 6 p.m. next Wednesday in the main gym.

Blues drop; need win

The basketball Blues have three road games following tonight's final home match, but if they don't beat the lowly Royal Military College Redmen, it could be a case of it's all over, baby blue. Sporting a somewhat disappointing record of five wins and five losses after their first 10 games, Blues desperately need a victory over RMC in order to stay in serious contention for a coveted playoff berth.

Blues are battling with Carleton, York and Queen's for third and fourth place behind front-running Ottawa and Laurentian. Carleton helped Blues' cause earlier this week by dropping a 66-53 decision to Ottawa. Blues can be masters of their own fate simply by winning tonight and then sweeping the final three road games against York next Tuesday and then in Kingston next weekend against Queen's and RMC. But that's a lot of "ifs" and it all starts at 8:15 pm tonight in the Benson Building gym. Admission is free and spectators can take in portions of the Varsity-Waterloo swim meet during halftime.

A reminder to all hockey fans

— U of T will host its first interfaculty Div I all-star game, this evening at Varsity Arena, beginning at 8:15 pm. The two teams, featuring the best players from Division IA and IB, should provide an exciting game. There is no admission charge to the game, which will be followed by recreational skating immediately after the game. C and B there.

St. Mike's owned land is adjacent to new Spadina subway line, creating pressure for both housing and park land.

SMC land sale likely

By JACKIE STEVENSON and JOSEPH WRIGHT

St. Michael's College will likely sell 10.3 acres of land it owns in the Forest Hill area to the Cadillac Fairview Corp., contingent upon zoning approval.

Following a refusal by the province last month of a Metro parks committee request to provide financing for purchase of the site as parkland, it is likely Cadillac will go ahead with its proposal to construct apartments and townhouses.

St. Michael's has an agreement with Cadillac-Fairview to sell the land for about $3 million.

The land has been a source of controversy involving the Borough of York, the City of Toronto, Metro Toronto, Cadillac and residents' groups since it was offered for sale by St. Mike's.

The college last year offered the land for sale to the city, which refused to buy at the $4.25 million asking price.

The situation has been complicated by the question of jurisdiction over the land, situated on the edge of the Cedarvale ravine, near the corner of Bathurst Street and St. Clair Avenue.

The southern 1.5 acres of the site is contained in a part of the Borough of York, the remaining 8.8 acres resting in the Forest Hill area of Toronto.

Under a plan designed by local architectural firm Diamond and Myers, Cadillac proposes constructing 234 townhouse units for a density of almost 27 units per acre for the tableland lying in the City of Toronto.

On the York site Cadillac proposes erecting an apartment building of 142 suites for a density of 92 units per acre.

York Borough council has sent an official plan amendment to the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) requesting approval to rezone the land to permit the maximum York density of 150 units per acre.

After unsuccessfully opposing York's case before the OMB, the city has now joined with residents' groups in appealing the decision on the basis that the high-density scheme would have a detrimental effect on the surrounding neighborhood of single-family dwellings.

The high density York area currently relies on the City of Toronto to provide water, sewage, schools and parks.

The Forest Hill Residents' Association maintains there is a real need for parkland in the area, pointing out that the proximity of the new Spadina rapid transit line would make the land accessible.

Ward 11 alderwoman Anne Johnston — whose riding contains the site — agrees the land would make terrific parkland. She says the reasoning behind not using the land for a park is that the city is suffering a housing shortage.

The argument doesn't hold water though, according to Johnston. She says housing in the proposed development will only be available to people in the same income bracket as those living in Forest Hill.

Terming the circumstances surrounding the land as "passing the buck" and fearing "we are not going to win," Johnston says she and residents' groups will continue to voice their opposition.

Forest Hill Residents' Association last month asked York Borough council to consider sharing the cost of appraising the land for park purposes, and the council has adjourned the matter pending more information.

Metro social services department is also looking into the possibility of creating senior citizens' housing on the city portion of the land, but no decision has been reached.

St. Michael's College is not eligible for provincial funding due to its affiliation with the Roman Catholic Church. To retain its religious ties and to keep its autonomy within the university, the college has expressed hopes of obtaining the highest price possible for the land.

OFS wants province-wide study sessions

By ARTHUR STEPHENS and BOB BETTSON

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) decided Saturday at an emergency general meeting to hold regional and province-wide study sessions on financial cutbacks and call for a meeting with Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld to demand changes in the Ontario Student Awards Plan (OSAP).

The Toronto meeting rejected suggestions by York University delegate Dale Ritch to hold a province-wide mass demonstration at Queen's Park in late March. A similar demonstration two years ago attracted only 500 people.

The meeting also rejected part of a U of T motion by SAC president Seymour Kanowitch calling for the meeting with Auld to be preceded by a press conference and include representatives from each university to explain the effect of cutbacks locally.

An executive proposal outlining federation policy on cutbacks was accepted by delegates. It detailed the main areas of concern, cutbacks in assistance, educational quality through faculty cutbacks, equipment, increased class sizes, increased residence fees and a general reduction in services.

The session was attended by 11 Ontario member institutions and was called to plan provincial strategy for the next few months on the financial crisis in Ontario universities.

Most universities have ad-hoc action committees working on circulating petitions demanding changes in OSAP as well as acting as information and organizing groups.

Debate centred at first on whether to demand short-term changes in OSAP and improvement in Basic Income Unit (BIU) grants from the government to the universities or concentrate on the long-term OSAP goal of free tuition and a living stipend for students.

Most people felt immediate pressure was possible on both OSAP and the BIU but long-term efforts should centre on the abolition of tuition with a living stipend. This would be financed by higher corporate taxes and personal income taxes for the rich.

Many delegates also felt a visit with Auld would be pointless because he would promise nothing, but just sit back and listen. Auld has refused to meet with OFS since November despite promises to the contrary.

But Kanowitch said a meeting with Auld would be useful to present demands and have them rejected, thereby gaining media coverage and helping build up public support.

The Brock University province-wide study sessions March 8 and 9 will be centred around discussion of the cutbacks as they affect Ontario universities and community colleges and reaching a common strategy.

What might come out of that would be a mass lobby at Queen's Park with representatives from various universities blitzing members of the Legislature to present the OFS case.

The OFS treasurer presented a financial report which confirmed expenditures of $53,000 to date of the yearly budget of $91,500 in revenue expected.

Half the membership have instituted the $1.50 levy and half are still on 40 cents per student.

The main expenses are the salaries of six full-time employees earning $135 a week each. The staff includes an information officer, several researchers and several fieldworkers.

The membership includes 18 institutions but only one community college, with enrolment collectively of 100,000.

Councillor boost student fares

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Toronto area post-secondary students will be paying lower public transit fares to get to and from school if North York controller Barbara Greene gets her way with the TTC and Metro Council.

Greene has sent letters to the student councils of all Toronto's post-secondary institutions, including U of T's, to drum up support for reduced student fares.

"After all," said Greene, "we already subsidize travel for the elementary and high schoolers, the disabled, those on welfare and those who aren't up to the working poor level."

"So why not university students? They need help too."

Students would certainly welcome reduced fares, especially because it's expected the TTC will raise fares to three tickets for $1 by April.

Greene said she sent a letter to the TTC recommending student fare reduction, but that Metro Council would make the final decision.

Three of the five commission members — Paul Godfrey, Karl Mallette and David Rotenberg — would seem to be unlikely choices to cast themselves in the roles of Good Samaritans, university division, but Greene remains "hopeful" they will agree with her recommendation.

"Even if they only set up a means test for students in need, I'd be satisfied," Greene said.

"I've been getting so many telephone calls, especially from students at York University, to tell me how expensive they find commuting," she added.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley said SAC would discuss the issue at a council meeting Wednesday.

THE ANNUAL ENGINEERING COMEDY REVIEW

UBC students protest prof firing

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The denial of tenure for a University of British Columbia commerce faculty member has raised the issues of teaching versus research in tenure evaluations, the value of applied versus theoretical research, and student opinion versus faculty decision.

Commerce professor John Evans has been told he will not receive tenure because he has not done enough research, but Evans argues this is not true.

Evans says he has done "a great deal of research" but that most of it was directed towards practical ends and was not suitable for inclusion into a scholarly journal.

He cited work he has done on compiling a data base for Canadian securities and a report he undertook last summer for the Economic Council of Canada.

Although he said the tenure and promotions committee which denied him tenure acted in a manner that was "infinitely fair given the standards they set," he is less than satisfied with those standards.

Evans charged that the standards place an "above average" emphasis on research and not enough on teaching, although he feels research is essential to teaching. The crux of the issue, however, is what constitutes good research, he says.

Evans maintains the commerce department spends too much time on theoretical research of little practical use.

"It's pure theory now," he said. "They're making models of mathematical methods for the fun of doing it."

"We should do more work that has direct benefits to the Canadian scene — policy-making papers for government and work that has applications to business techniques," he added.

Students in the department have expressed favorable opinions of Evans as a teacher.

"He's a good teacher, probably one of the best I've had," said one student. "You can understand him. He's up on what he teaches and he comes prepared."

Students reacted against the decision to deny Evans tenure and Evans was surprised at the support he received. "I hadn't expected it, and it came right out of the woodwork," he said. "It shows there's something to teaching after all."

But it is reported that the students, who have no representation on the tenure and promotion committee, have virtually no chance of overturning the decision.

The Learning Machine

The Learning Machine has not appeared for the last week because of a lack of submissions as well as lack of space. It will continue to appear, however, hopefully with increased submissions.

Submit your information or notices of educational happenings, course union events, college council news to Bob Bettson, The Varsity, 91 St. George St. 2nd Floor, 923-8741.

Future notices will include the many elections around campus which The Varsity does not have full space to cover.

While we are on the subject of elections, SAC will be holding its annual run for the roses on March 12 and 13 but nominations are due Feb. 28 — the Friday after reading week.

Elections for the president, a full-time paid position and two vice-presidents (20 weeks' salary) will be held. One of the candidates on each slate must be from a suburban campus, a professional faculty and a downtown arts college. Campaigns are funded by SAC to the tune of $450.

At the same time many colleges and faculties will be holding SAC rep elections. These are equally as important since the council makes all important decisions and the executive is selected from among SAC reps.

The council has an annual budget of over $300,000 and supports The Varsity and Radio Varsity. A large amount goes to its internal administration and grants for services and educational campaigns on campus.

If you think U of T cutbacks are bad, consider the situation of Algonquin College in Ottawa whose projected budget deficit is $2.8 million for 1975-6.

The proposal is to reduce student enrolment by 2,400 from the present 8,500 full-time students and fire 140 employees, including most of the English language instructors.

The college has a teaching staff of 1,300 and government cutbacks have hit hard. The other Ottawa universities, Carleton and Ottawa, are threatening to do the same thing.

A correction of the Governing Council election gossip is in order. GSU president Frank MacIntyre is not running for the council. He merely picked up SAC president Seymour Kanowitch's nomination forms.

We will report further nominations in next Friday's issue. Nominations close Friday for the eight student seats. So this is your last chance to become one of the select few and join the U of T cocktail circuit.

Ward Seven alderman John Sewell will kick off the Commerce Students' Association forum tomorrow at noon with a talk on urban sprawl. The talk, the first in a series of four lectures, will be at Sidney Smith Hall, room 2108.

The Commerce Ball will be held Feb. 27 at the posh Ontario Room of the Royal York Hotel. Association spokespeople predict the live band, sumptuous dinner and dancing will ensure a memorable evening.

Also in store for commerce students is sports night number two on Feb. 27 at the Benson Building.

Remember, if you're interested in running for the position of Varsity editor for next year, you must meet a deadline of 5 pm Friday.

All riders on proverbially dark horses should have their declaration to run completed by this time.

Integrate health ed, panel suggests

By REA HAMPSON

Moves should be made to integrate health education programs, a panel discussion concluding the Canadian University Nursing Students' Association (CUNSA) three-day conference urged Saturday.

U of T president John Evans, Jill Flaherty, dean of the University of Western Ontario Faculty of Nursing and professor Horace Krever of the U of T Faculty of Law were the three panel members of the discussion on the merits of interdisciplinary health education.

Evans spoke on the advantages and disadvantages of integrated health education programs. Evans said he believes integrated programs would help in eliminating traditional rivalries and hostilities which have existed between the professional health faculties.

However, he emphasized that an increased co-operation and co-ordination of these groups was a better more viable solution than a completed amalgamation of the separate faculties.

Flaherty spoke on the need for nurses to assume a more active role in the health care team.

She also felt integrated health education and increased practical experience would be important in improving health care services. Krever pointed out that although integrated health care education was one means of improving the nurses' position in the professional medical field, the establishment of a legal body is needed to define and regulate nurses' role in health care.

Most of the discussion from the floor was directed to Flaherty and concerned the lack of response on the part of other professional health faculties to the consideration of integrated health education.

Yes, they're playing tiddlywinks, and no, it's not a trend, Varsity photographer just has his ears (and eyes) open for campus events.

India's food problem said solvable

By ARTHUR STEPHENS

"Major reforms in farming methods will solve India's food problem," Simon Fraser sociology professor Hari Sharma said here Thursday.

Sharma was speaking to about 30 students at a World University Service of Canada meeting at Victoria College.

He denied that limiting India's population was necessary because, "there is still enough unused land to feed everybody."

He used China as an example. "Twenty-five years ago China was famine-ridden but now she exports rice."

"A people's revolution is the only solution," he maintained, because the present system is perpetuated by the rich landowners.

Before European domination, India was self-sufficient, Sharma noted. A strong agricultural base provided for the growth of a manufacturing and mercantile industry so extensive that trade routes of silk, jewelry, artifacts and spices made India wealthier than all western Europe.

The conquering of India in the 18th century changed all this, Sharma continued. Europe became rich and powerful, but India was slowly milked of her treasures and her land was converted to plantations for the production of cotton, cocoa, sugar and other items desired by Europe.

Two hundred years of exploitation reduced India to poverty and destroyed its agricultural base, Sharma said, leaving the country to become a food importer.

The colonial government inadvertently bankrupted the peasantry because a system of landlords was created to collect money. Each level took its cut, reducing the peasant class to virtual serfdom unable to buy land or to improve agricultural techniques.

Conditions did not improve with self-government. The landlords still exist, powerful and ostentatious, while unemployment is so high that two-thirds of the population cannot afford their daily minimum nutrients, Sharma said.

The rich land-owning class controls parliament and so the only solution, according to Sharma, is a complete restructuring of the political system.

Ralph Nader slated to visit U of T in March

The people who are attempting to set up a Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) at U of T are organizing a visit by consumer-rights advocate Ralph Nader March 5.

Nader is the originator of the PIRG — the public-funded research group which explores issues related to consumer protection and environmental problems. There are already two PIRGs in Ontario, one at McMaster and one at Waterloo universities.

Topics for PIRG research are usually determined by a student-run board of directors and students often work with PIRGs for course credit.

PIRG organizer John Bee hopes to persuade SAC to set up a PIRG by holding a referendum this spring. If the referendum goes through, students will pay an ongoing levy of about $3 to support a qualified staff of coordinators, researchers and secretaries.

Bee also hopes to organize a fair around the Nader visit, and at a Friday meeting attracted several organizers. Consumer and environmental groups around the city and the university will be speaking.

"People will be most surprised how many organizations there are," Bee noted.

The McMaster PIRG will be holding an 'Earth Days' Feb. 12-14, with speakers including architect-visionary Buckminster Fuller.

Anyone interested in working for PIRG can contact Pollution Probe for more details.

oops!

A typographical error omitted a key paragraph from Friday's story on Toronto's permit parking scheme. The missing paragraph said free overnight parking currently exists in most of east end wards 7, 8 and 9 and in north-west Toronto ward 3. The public works committee moved to restore that situation and repeal permit parking as applied to those wards.

Build complex

The proposed university athletics complex should be built, despite the objections of local residents. In this particular case, the needs of the university outweigh the objections of the community. Unfortunately, the university's gain will be the community's loss.

Everyone realizes recreational facilities in the university are abysmal. The administration is aware of its responsibility to provide the university community with the means to physical fitness, for which the building is essential.

For the residents, the building will be an eyesore. The old houses on Spadina Ave., which provided a barrier against the presence of the university, will be torn down, and an 85-foot monster will abut the street. The residents also claim parking will be a problem, although the university disagrees.

Both sides have manoeuvred themselves into a no-compromise position. The athletics staff have told vice-president Jill Conway they will not support anything less than the presently proposed facilities. Much as this may be an admirable statement in the abstract, in effect it puts the gun to the head of the administration in its negotiations with residents.

Then again, the residents don't really want the building at all. Although Huron-Sussex residents' spokesman Allan McAllister says residents "haven't opposed a building as such," he also says "you can't think big about athletics." The two statements seem difficult to reconcile. And if you don't want a building at all, compromise over its form is token compromise.

Not that the residents' position is an untanable one. Why should they support the building? It has been designed not for them, but for the university community. For example, residents are quite correct when they say "squash is not a game practised by the community." But it is practised on campus. Moreover, such provisions for community use as have been made are token, after-the-fact gestures.

The university has managed to gain a recommendation for an exemption for the building, and indeed for the entire campus, from the city's interim development criteria. As we said last Friday, this has removed the university from exactly the type of public scrutiny a large public institution such as U of T should undergo.

In addition, the probable exemption of the athletics complex has prevented the residents from having a reasonable chance to present their concerns about the building. When dealing face to face with the university, their views can be swept under the rug. They should have the chance to put their views to a suitable forum.

It is unfortunate the athletics complex should have become the focus for acrimonious debate between the university and the community, with the residents accusing the university of being a developer of the worst kind.

A far more accurate picture of the university as a developer will emerge when the university once more turns its eyes to the northwest campus, the Huron-Sussex area. In the long term, this represents far more of a threat to the community than the athletics complex which the university so obviously needs.

Must give support

The focus of attention on the proposed athletics complex is now shifting away from the desirability of construction, and towards the question of financing. The university has "recognized its obligations" to students, and withdrawn a request for a referendum asking for a multi-year capital levy to finance construction.

That in itself is good. To ask students to bear the cost of the building in addition to their academic fees would set a dangerous precedent, as it could have become a standard tactic to circumvent the government's freeze on funding capital development.

The administration is undertaking to find out where it can raise the additional money — approximately $5 million — to meet the $12 million construction costs, and will make a decision by the end of the month on whether construction is financially feasible. There is a danger the administration will withdraw all support for the building if money isn't found, something which will dismay all but the residents.

However, there is also a danger that students may end up bearing the cost of the building themselves regardless, by paying stiffly increased users' fees after the complex is built.

Fees are bound to increase anyway, but they should not be used to help finance construction of the building over and above their normal contribution to the athletics budget.

That is why the SAC executive position on funding — that the administration maintain its 50 percent commitment to the athletics department budget — is a sensible one. And that is why president John Evans must give the executive that assurance when he meets with them today.

Chilean sailors need help

The Chilean military junta is presently holding secret trials to prosecute a group of naval personnel and civilians who were detained for refusing to participate in the coup d'état against the constitutional government of Salvador Allende.

In the months leading up to the coup on Sept. 11, 1973, the right-wing conspirators among the Naval officers tried by every means possible to detect, intimidate and imprison the constitutionalist elements within the Navy.

Events surrounding and following the aborted coup attempt on June 29, 1973, enabled pro-coup officers to agitate within the Navy to remove from active duty, confine and torture those opposed to the treasonous plot.

The Naval conspirators made arrests in the base of Belloto, the Naval Engineering School of Las Salinas, while captains from Naval Intelligence carried out massive purges in the naval port of Talcahuano on August 5th.

The seamen of Talcahuano and Valparaiso, believing that it was their duty to denounce the instigation of the military coup and that the coup would entail an extensive massacre of the Chilean people, communicated with various high-ranking leaders of political parties loyal to the Popular Unity government.

The seamen informed them of the coup d'état being prepared by certain Naval officers in collusion with other branches of the Armed Forces and right-wing political parties. The Chiefs of Staff labelled these loyal seamen as subversives, imprisoned them and charged them with insubordination, the most serious military charge in peacetime.

In a letter made public on September 9th, two days before the military coup, the sailors from the barracks of Silva Palma in Valparaiso addressed themselves to the Chilean people, reaffirming their support for the constitutional government. They exposed the conspirators who, by means of torture and abuse, were trying to force the sailors to cooperate with the treasonous forces.

The torturers extracted "confessions" from some prisoners accusing the leaders of certain left-wing parties of planning to bombard Valparaiso, Vina del Mar and the Naval School.

"Because we refused (to cooperate), they continued to beat us, tying us to an anchor; they stuffed us in a coffin, they made us drink the urine of our torturers; they tied us by the feet and submerged us in water; they put us in pools of mud; they applied electric shocks to us; they threw boiling water on us, then cold water; and did dozens of other things to us."

The seamen were denied any defense other than official appointees of the military tribunal. At that time, the Naval Judge was Vice-Admiral Jose Toribio Merino, who declared himself Commander-in-Chief of the Navy on the day of the coup.

The seamen who are being secretly court-martialed today in Chile were among the hundreds who were persecuted, detained, and or executed during the preparation for and consolidation of the military coup. The military attorney has already asked for fifteen death penalties for charges of treason, and it seems likely that many of the other people on trial will suffer a similar fate.

By proceeding with these secret and unjust court-martials, the junta is violating once again the most elemental human rights of the imprisoned sailors. Hidden from the public eye by the silence of the dictatorship, the sailors' "trial" is coming to a close. The imminent danger to their lives has led us to speak out in their defense in this campaign to save the lives of all those who opposed the military coup in Chile.

We call upon all democratic and progressive individuals, institutions, and organizations to support us in all of the actions that we are organizing to demand and obtain the liberty of the sailors and naval personnel who are presently victimized by this unjust and inhuman trial.

SOLIDARITE AVEC LE PEUPLE CHILIEN

It should be noted well that neither the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), nor the university administration informed McReavy about his automatic union membership in 1969. Therefore it would seem that McReavy should be morally if not legally entitled to retroactive wages to the time of his hiring in 1969.

There is another point worthy of consideration. Being fired from one's job usually involves a certain amount of personal distress, and usually some difficulty in obtaining a comparable position. Can McReavy sue the university for defamation of character or for libel?

Now, besides The Varsity and the SEIU, what other campus groups or individuals are examining this unsavory phenomenon of 'arbitrary' firing? The UTSA? UTFA? GAA? SAC? The Governing Council? and the eight or nine unions already on campus?

Charge incorrect

I should like the opportunity to reply to John H. Whitlock's letter published in the Friday, Feb. 7 issue of The Varsity. Apart from its main thrust apparently being an ad hominem attack on Dr. Jacques Berger, for which Mr. Whitlock must carry his own responsibility, there are some inaccuracies that should be corrected.

Since I am in charge of the administration of Zoology 201 this year, I should like to comment on Whitlock's statement "It is widely ironic that Berger had been allowed to present relatively the same lecture material in three different courses over the last two years (Zoology 201, 220 and 221), and yet McReavy (sic) was fired for much less notorious flagrances."

Dr. Berger is lecturing in Zoology 201 for the first time this 1974-75 academic year. This course is for non-scientists, is very different from what it was previously, and does not count towards specialisation towards a B.Sc. in Zoology. Students in Zoology are warned of this aspect of the course. As such, it is planned to overlap with other courses. Perhaps Mr. Whitlock realized this in September, when he withdrew from the course last fall!

As to Zoology 220 and 221, Mr. Whitlock can read in the 1974-75 calendar that Dr. Berger is lecturing in Zoology 221 this year and in the 1973-74 calendar that Dr. Berger lectured in Zoology 220. Thus, he is entitled to present the same material to a different set of science students, mainly in second year, during each year. The change in lecturing schedule came about as part of the normal readjustment of course responsibilities because of changes in staff.

Mr. Whitlock may have been astounded by our incompetence, but I wonder if he has made his feelings known to anyone responsible? Perhaps an interview with our undergraduate secretary or another academic administrative officer, any of whom would be willing to talk matters over with Mr. Whitlock, would clear the air?

Raises questions

The recent firing of Zoology support staff worker Paul McReavy gives rise to a number of interesting questions. The administration will not state publicly its reasons for McReavy's dismissal. Are these reasons just? Who in fact can decide to fire an employee? What are the criteria for dismissal? Who formulates the criteria? All these are questions worth researching.

One wonders whether the Ontario Labour Relations Board condones the phenomenon of arbitrary firing and if laws do exist in this regard.

McReavy's case and that of all the other storekeepers on campus are to be decided by arbitration. How is the labour relations arbitration board composed and is it fairly composed?

The U of T administration has been reticent about the firing; presumably it will have 'proof' to substantiate its reason(s) for the dismissal.

Supports complex

Please permit me to correct several impressions your readers might have obtained from the lead article in last Monday's edition (Feb. 3). This concerns the desire of the university to construct a new men's athletic complex on Harbord St.

While Alan McAllister may well represent the people who live in the Huron-Sussex area, you must not conclude that those residents are being surprised by expansion of the university. They have known for years that they are living in the area on borrowed time: if I am not mistaken, U. of T. owns or controls nearly all the real estate in the Huron-Sussex area. It is true the university has postponed its expansion up Huron St. to Bloor, but it has made no secret for many years that this was its ultimate intention.

Your article gave the impression that folks who live west of Spadina in the Sussex-Ulster area are much opposed to the athletic building. I have been a member of the Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association for some years, and I can assure you it is the same few busybodies who year after year find something U. of T. has done to criticize.

In my opinion these people do not represent the feelings of a majority of residents west of Spadina in this matter. My own impression from talking to friends and neighbours is that most people here take a Ho-Hum attitude: no one I know would be so presumptuous as to suggest that U. of T.'s athletic building should serve the community around it first, and the students second.

Since Hart House opened in 1922 has there been any increase in men's athletic facilities? Rather, they have declined (e.g. Trinity Playing Field), while registration has risen many times over 1922 figures. If the university finds it has facilities which can be spared on occasion, then it may consider renting or giving their use to the community-at-large. But to make such use a condition for building, is absurd.

Personally I urge the university to send the Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association packing.

The following descriptions of the politics of development are edited versions of accounts that appeared in James Lorimer's The Real World of City Politics (James Lewis & Samuel), and are reprinted with the author's permission. The accounts themselves originally appeared in the Globe and Mail in September 1969.

Though dated by the passage of time, they are relevant in the context of the university's recent negotiations with local residents' associations and the city over the proposed athletic complex. They also indicate that the politics of expediency sometimes take precedence over those of principle, even with student politicians.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ASA LAND DEVELOPER

"She's been told for years now that they're going to need her property," said Walt Zmud, one of the members of the executive committee of the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association at a meeting last Thursday.

"We sent down to visit her the other night, and you know the usual story: they visit her every six months, and say 'We're going to be needing your property.' They give her a price, which she turns down. And then, six months later, after having said that they're going to need the property immediately, they come back with another offer, another go-around, the same thing."

The technique Mr. Zmud was describing sounds just like the usual practice of speculators and developers who are trying to assemble property.

"You know the house next door to that one," added Miss Gertrude Ross, another member of the executive committee.

"Silcoxon owned that house and they kept it beautifully. You know the look of it now. They just let it go down and down and down; it's awful. And it was beautiful."

This is a familiar pattern. People who see their neighborhood running down in front of their eyes are easily persuaded to sell their homes even if they would really rather stay where they are.

Houses that are sold are then rented to tenants who do not maintain them and who often cause trouble for remaining long-time residents.

Members of the Huron-Sussex association have experienced this too: "A good example," said one resident, "is down here on Spadina just north of Sussex. They had people there who were very responsible." They left and kids moved in. "And the kids have really run the place down."

Another technique used by developers is to tear down houses that have not been repaired for some time, leaving vacant lots between long-time residents who have not yet sold. This the executive committee of the Huron-Sussex group has also seen.

"I suppose they get a price for wrecking them," said one resident, "and find that it's less than fixing them up, and they leave the vacant lots sitting there. You can see this on Huron Street."

The people at last Thursday's meeting were quite aware that they were describing what very often happens in older residential areas. In their case, however, the purchaser whose practices they were complaining about is not a developer. It is, in fact, about as far from a developer as you could ever hope to get.

The people from the Huron-Sussex association were complaining about the University of Toronto.

The U of T's downtown campus stands just south and east of the Huron-Sussex area. Immediately to the north is the Ontario College of Education. In between the two institutions are about 140 houses, on three quiet residential streets: Huron, Sussex, and Washington.

Spadina Avenue is the western boundary of their neighborhood. Perhaps 300 families live in these houses, some of them students, some young couples, some long-established residents, middle-class and working-class side by side.

The Huron-Sussex Residents' Association was set up four months ago in response to rumors of imminent demolition of the entire area for use by OCE and the U of T. Its members are a cross-section of residents, and there are at least as many tenants as homeowners involved.

The situation in which they find themselves has been developing over the last several years. In 1961 U of T published a master building plan for its downtown campus covering the period to 1970 and providing for accommodation for about 23,000 students.

This plan indicated clearly that, apart from what looked like a reasonably small expansion of OCE, the houses in the Huron-Sussex area would be left standing. A small descriptive leaflet, circulated at the time the plan was published, is reasonably definite in its projections.

"The model is not precise in every detail, for changes are rapid and frequent. But, in general, the model provides a good illustration of how a great development plan is being implemented." In a speech that year, U of T president Claude Bissell said on the question of the geographical boundaries of university expansion: "Given our position in the centre of the city, there are obvious limits beyond which we cannot go, and by 1970 we shall have reached those limits."

The plan and statements of this kind taken together indicated reasonable certainty to people in the Huron-Sussex area that the university would not be expanding as far as their small, pleasant neighborhood.

By 1967, however, the situation had changed considerably. Letters were sent to some property owners on the north side of Sussex between Huron and Spadina.

One of these letters, said by university officials to be typical, stated: "It is necessary for us to ask you to consider the sale of these lands to the university." And, just in case the recipient of the letter wasn't in a selling mood, the university went on to give a non-too-gentle hint of what might happen if he did not sell: "The University of Toronto has under law the power to expropriate lands, subject to authorization by a county court judge, but it is to be hoped that we can reach agreement for a purchase of the lands without recourse to such action."

New university plans have been busy taking back Dr. Bissell's confident statement about reaching a ceiling on physical size as well as on enrolment.

"Holding at the above enrolment," says one plan, "in no way assumes that floor space and land needs will also be held. On the contrary, space needs of all kinds will continue to rise."

One of the areas chosen by the university for expansion is that where members of the Huron-Sussex association now live.

A university plan dated December 1968 proposes for their blocks a very large expansion for OCE, a building described as "parking for 600 cars with high-rise above," and a third building named Walker Hall which university officials have told residents is not yet designated for any particular use.

These plans apparently have been made by the U of T with no detailed consultations with either city planners or city politicians. Association members have been told that the city usually becomes involved only at a very late stage when the U of T makes specific requests for zoning changes, new services and so on.

What concerns residents most of all, however, is the fact that they have had nothing whatsoever to say in the formulation of these plans, even though it is they who will be evicted if the plan is to be implemented and even though, in many cases, it is they who own the properties where the university is confidently locating its new, vaguely-described buildings.

The association's executive has had meetings with university officials, and it has been made very clear to them that this is a state of affairs which the university has no intention of changing.

University vice-president A.G. Rankin told them at one of these meetings: "You cannot tell the Board of Governors of the university how to operate. We are not prepared to allow you to take part in the planning of this area."

This extraordinarily heavy-handed comment was included verbatim in minutes of the meeting taken by association members.

Mr. Rankin corrected some other parts of this record, but apparently regarded this as an accurate account of what he said.

How, in fact, does the university operate? Ron Thom, member of the Huron-Sussex executive and a planner for Trent University for the past six years, said: "We have realized that they have literally, not virtually but literally, no planning apparatus right now."

The university has a planning department, said Mr. Thom, but it is staffed not by planners but by engineers.

Another member of the executive, architect Stan Benjamin, said they had discovered that the university has no fixed plan for its future expansion.

As an example, he cited a refrigeration plant which the university is planning to build. Its location has, he said, been changed at least twice in recent plans.

Concerned as they are about the university's planning, the association's executive is even more worried about its property buying and management practices. So far, the U of T has bought 56 of the 143 properties in their area.

These have been assembled slowly over the course of several years. Once purchased, they are rented by an agency retained by the university.

They are usually not well maintained and often they are demolished long before any new building takes place on the site. Complaints about vacant lots have produced the association's only achievement to date: the university sodded one vacant lot on the southwest corner of Washington and Huron.

Often houses which the university purchases are taken out of the housing market altogether, either by demolition or by using them as office space. Sometimes they are simply left vacant.

Miss Ross cited a house on the corner of Washington and Spadina which, she said, has been empty for more than two years. "The windows are out... there's been a top window open all the time, through winter, spring and summer, and a window on the second floor has been open, and it sits there."

"The reason this has sat empty," a resident explained, "is that it has been allocated to university use and the faculty, as I understand it, that it has been allocated to hasn't bothered to use it. So there it sits, with its air conditioners and everything; and it was very nice, it was a good house at one time."

There have been many complaints in the past from residents of surrounding areas about the U of T's practices, but these have had no impact on the university's activities.

And usually, in fact, it has had little difficulty persuading residents to do but move when the university said it has to expand in their direction.

Planner Ron Thom said at last week's meeting, referring to his experience working at Trent: "I have more trouble moving a farmer off his potato patch than these people are having moving out 800 people."

STUDENTS AS LAND
DEVELOPERS

"I wish to assure you," said the letter written a year ago for Premier John Robarts to the president of the Kensington Area Residents' Association, "that no final decision will be made on this matter without adequate discussion with you and representatives of your organization."

The matter referred to in the letter written by Mr. Robarts' executive officer was a parcel of 52,000 square feet of land fronting on College Street between Lippincott Street and Bellevue Avenue in the Kensington area.

This land had been bought in the spring of 1968 by the University of Toronto apparently in trust for the provincial government and using a special $525,000 treasury grant to pay for it.

At that time, the land was intended for a students' residence to be built not by the U of T but by the Students' Administrative Council (SAC).

Now, a year later, the land is in the hands of Toronto's Board of Education and the board has said that it intends to expropriate some houses and build a school on the larger site.

A block plan prepared by the neighborhood's residents proposing a comprehensive redevelopment of the interior of the block by a locally-based, limited-dividend corporation has proved futile.

There is an interesting story involved in how SAC, the U of T, the Board of Education and the provincial government got together to make this land sale, including an interesting set of minutes from secret SAC meetings discussing its building project and the Kensington residents.

Kensington is one of Toronto's current urban renewal planning areas and, along with a long-established businessmen's association, the community has a residents' association.

In September, 1968, City Council established the Kensington Urban Renewal Committee with Controller Margaret Campbell as its chairman and the two aldermen of the ward and representatives of the local associations as its members.

City Council delegated to the committee the power to supervise in detail the preparation of an urban renewal plan.

As a background to the planning which has been going on in Kensington, there is an important commitment regarding citizen participation made in October, 1967, on behalf of the provincial government by Minister of Correctional Services Allan Grossman who is also the MPP for the constituency which includes Kensington.

Mr. Grossman, who said last week that he was "most proud" to have been able to have brought about this commitment, conveyed to Kensington residents a formal agreement from the government not to participate in the implementation of any future urban renewal schemes which had not been prepared with the detailed participation of local residents.

Mr. Grossman, when he read the commitment at a public meeting in the area in 1967, went on to spell out his interpretation of it.

"This means in simple terms," he said, "that you are going to have a great deal to say about how your district is going to be developed. The Ontario government is going to refuse to participate in any kind of urban redevelopment until it is satisfied that the people in the district not only know what's going on but that they will be represented on the committee which makes the decision — and that they'll be in agreement with it."

The residents' association and the URC interpreted this commitment to mean that the provincial government wanted to ensure that the interests and views of local people were fully protected and represented in the decisions about the future of their area.

When, in the spring of 1968, the province financed a land deal intended to give SAC a site for a students' residence they could build themselves, the Kensington residents' association executive became seriously worried that the provincial government might not be prepared to ensure that residents have a say in the development of a specific redevelopment project, even though this building and the use it would make of extremely scarce vacant land would have substantial effects on the rest of the area and the urban renewal plan.

But the letter from Mr. Robarts promising "adequate discussion" was interpreted as a reasonable guarantee that this would not happen.

The Kensington residents might also have felt less need to worry because they were dealing with university students regarding this land, and of course there is no group which professes a more sincere commitment to decentralized decision-making and participation by people in decisions which affect their lives.

This was expressed concretely in a decision taken by SAC that a local community should have a veto over any redevelopment project within its boundaries.

In a letter to U of T vice-president A.G. Rankin, the then SAC president, Steven Langdon, spelled out that this motion was passed by SAC with specific reference to Kensington.

"This is the firmest indication I can offer," wrote Mr. Langdon, "of the good intentions of SAC in its development planning for anything within the Kensington Area Residents' Association boundaries."

Beginning in about mid-1968 two planning efforts, both centred on the land purchased with provincial money and held by the U of T, got under way.

One of these was the work of the urban renewal committee and the residents' association through discussions with developers and a series of block meetings with residents of the College-Lippincott-Bellevue block where the vacant land is located.

After considering the needs of the area, and the available alternatives, the urban renewal committee proposed for discussion a scheme for a multi-use redevelopment of the interior of the block by a limited dividend corporation owned by the present owners of land in the block.

The corporation, which would be able to borrow money at specially low interest rates under the National Housing Act, would hire a builder to put up a development which could include student accommodation, housing for nurses, interns and possibly some non-acutely ill patients from Toronto Western Hospital, some residential accommodation, a local city hall to house certain city services and a rebuilt, or new, firehall.

There was also consideration of the need for more school facilities in the area, and the urban renewal committee proposed that the idea of a decentralized community school be explored for Kensington rather than having a new school or an addition on an existing school automatically put up.

After discussions took place with several builder-developers, an agreement was made with Cadillac Development Corporation Ltd.

under which Cadillac drew up plans for the proposed development in exchange for a commitment in principle that it would build the project if satisfactory agreements could be reached with all concerned.

When these plans were ready, block meetings were held in January, February and March with residents to discuss these proposals and alternatives.

Those at the meetings had many criticisms and suggestions to make of the original plans, but the general impression left by the detailed minutes of the meeting and confirmed by people who attended the meetings is that agreement among most, if not all, of the block's residents on a modified scheme looked possible.

SAC was informed about these plans by the Kensington Urban Renewal Committee.

Although everyone from the area and from the university kept repeating his desire to coordinate planning activities, in fact SAC was simultaneously developing (apparently at a cost of about $75,000) its own detailed plans for a high-rise students' residence on the vacant lot in the centre of this block.

In a letter to the urban renewal committee on February 13, Mr. Langdon spelled out the kind of development the students had in mind.

But there was no hint in his letter that SAC had detailed plans drawn up or that it was going ahead independently trying to finance the project.

Yet apparently this was happening. In February, according to Ed Clarke, secretary of the urban renewal committee, the architect retained by the students published detailed plans for the students' resident in a professional journal.

Until this happened, no one in Kensington had any inkling that these plans existed.

SAC was also apparently trying to obtain Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation funds to finance its project, but got nowhere. CMHC was no doubt aware that the project fell within an area where CMHC was contributing to the cost of all overall urban renewal plan.

SAC, blocked in its attempt to finance its residence, also realized that it would encounter enormous opposition if it tried to push through its scheme for a high-rise students' residence providing no substantial facilities for the area.

SAC had hired Brian Levitt, until this spring a U of T student and now an employee of the university's administration, to investigate the situation for it. Mr. Levitt held discussions with Kensington residents and urban renewal committee members and learned about the proposals which residents had developed for the block.

On May 27, Mr. Levitt was reporting to a secret SAC meeting on the residents' plans. Students at the meeting heard that there was no doubt that the residents' association would oppose the students' plan.

Their reaction was not to explore how their plans might be modified so as to suit residents.

SAC's employee gave an account of the Kensington situation which reported that a small group had taken firm control of the residents' association, and that the association was completely unrepresentative of the ordinary people.

Mr. Levitt sounded just like every city politician complaining about trouble-making and unrepresentative residents' associations.

In fact he suggested that the Kensington situation was much worse than that; he said that the active members of the residents' association were all controlled by one individual, and he went on to suggest that this individual might be a secret agent for developers.

'Save whales': B.C. student

VICTORIA (CUP) — An education student at the University of Victoria has launched an on-campus drive to "save the whales."

Pete King has combined the interests of both the Greenpeace Foundation and the Project Jonah in his fight for protection of the largest living mammal on earth today.

According to a leaflet King is distributing, "more than two million whales have been killed in the past 50 years, so many that all eight species of great whales are in danger of extinction."

"The slaughter" continues relentlessly. Between them, Japan and the Soviet Union kill over 80 percent of the whales. Every 14 minutes another of these gentle, intelligent animals is harpooned to agonizing death," it continued.

Dr. Harry Lillie, an opponent of commercial whaling, said, "The present day hunting harpoon is a horrible 150-pound weapon carrying an explosive spear which generally bursts in the whale's intestines.

"And the sight of one of these creatures pouring blood and gasping along on the surface, towing a 400-pound catching vessel by a heavy harpoon rope, is pitiful.

"So often an hour or more of torture is inflicted before the agony ends in death. I have experienced a case of five hours and nine harpoons needed to kill one mother blue whale."

SIGN THE PETITION

TO: MINISTER OF COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Because we, the undersigned, believe that education is the social right of all and that no one should be denied a post-secondary education because of his or her financial circumstances;

We demand the following immediate reforms in the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP):

- 1) An immediate increase of $15 in the weekly living allowance under OSAP to offset accumulated rises in the cost of living.
- 2) In future living allowances under OSAP indexed to changes in the cost of living in each of the provinces.
- 3) Because of loan ceilings and consequently large debts limit accessibility to post secondary education, the OSAP loan ceiling must be reduced to $600 from the current $800.
- 4) In the calculation of loans and bursaries, mandatory parental contribution should be abolished for all students 18 and over.
- 5) OSAP assessment should be based on the student's real income, including summer earnings, parental subsidies, bursaries and scholarships.
- 6) Part-time students must immediately be included within an adequate student support scheme.

These demands imply an increased commitment to the principle of universal accessibility to education. They should be funded through a restructuring of the tax system, not through an increasing of the taxes of lower and middle income people.

ANGOLA

Portugal agreed Jan. 10 to grant independence to Angola in November, 1975, thereby liquidating virtually the last remnants of Portugal's colonial power.

The agreement provides for a joint power-sharing arrangement between the three rival African Liberation Movements (MPLA, FLNA, AND UNITA), with the Portuguese (who will maintain responsibility for defence) in a transitional government.

Detachments from the three movements will be grouped to form the basis of a national army and a constituent assembly and president will be elected before independence day.

BANGLADESH

The Bangladesh parliament gave total executive authority to Sheikh Mujibbar Rahman in amending its 1972 constitution.

The measure was enacted without dissent Jan. 24 following on the heels of a state of national emergency.

Mujibbar was authorized to declare Bangladesh a one-party state. No parliamentary opposition parties or dissent will be allowed, and other political parties will be banned.

The authoritarian measures came in the wake of a grave crisis provoked by flooding, famine, gross corruption, political violence and the threat of mass starvation.

The Sheikh said the measures were necessary to spur economic growth and deal with anti-national elements, black marketeers, smugglers and political opponents inspired by foreign interests.

INDOCHINA

The National Liberation Front captured the provincial capital of Phuocbinh Jan. 11, 1974, in its most noted victory since the Paris peace accords.

Eleven district towns and one province (Puoclong) have been taken in the dry season offensive launched in December in the Mekong Delta.

Two other provinces are currently being threatened.

In Cambodia the Umer Rouge, have occupied stretches of the Mekong River, and attacked the key port of Neaoutung in an attempt to cut supplies to Phnom Penh.

River convoys have been subjected to heavy fire and the U.S. may be forced to airlift supplies from Thailand.

President Thieu appealed to the U.S. for additional aid.

After the fall of Phuocbinh the U.S. sent ships to the area.

President Gerald Ford has asked Congress for $522 million in military aid to prop up the Saigon and Phnom Penh regimes.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

ELECTION REMINDER

Prospective candidates for election to the Governing Council are reminded that nomination papers must be filed by noon on Friday, February 14th, 1975. Nomination forms and copies of the regulations (Election Guidelines) covering the election are available from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, or the Registrars' Offices at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

There are vacancies in seven teaching staff constituencies (including three by-elections), and all eight seats in the three student categories.

Nominations must be signed by the following number of nominators:

- Teaching Staff — 10
- Graduate Students — 15
- Full-Time Undergraduate Students — 50
- Part-Time Undergraduate Students — 15

Present members of the Governing Council whose terms expire on June 30th next may be nominated again if they are continuing in the same constituencies for which they were elected previously. Those elected this year from the teaching staff constituency will serve for three years from July 1st, 1975, except those elected in by-elections, and from student constituencies for one year, as required by The University of Toronto Act, 1971.

Descriptions of the constituencies were published in the Varsity on January 27th, last. Enquiries for further information should be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 928-2160.

Election shall be by mailed ballot.

Women swimmers dump Waterloo

By JEAN BUBBA

Varsity's women swimmers surprised even themselves Friday afternoon with a resounding 83-28 victory over highly-rated University of Waterloo in a dual meet at the Benson Building.

Neither team used its best swimmers in all their premier events so the final score, though decisive, cannot be viewed as an accurate measure of the comparative strength of either school. That will likely be resolved this weekend at the OWIAA swimming and diving championships in Waterloo.

"I really don't quite know how to explain it," said Varsity coach Liz Hoffman after the final event.

"We have basically a young team and each swimmer was really just aiming for a fast time in her events, and winning was just something extra, nice but unplanned."

Hoffman pointed out that Waterloo was missing its divers, thus handing Varsity a gift of 16 points. However, Varsity won a phenomenal 11 of the 13 events and Hoffman commented, "our swimmers just don't know how fast they can really go."

The OWIAA title could be decided by Varsity's ability to pile up enough points in the swimming events to offset Waterloo's expected strength in the one and three-metre diving.

"No one swimmer and no particular event can win the title for us," Hoffman said. "We will need an all-out effort from every member of the team."

Varsity's more-than-average superstar Jane Wright didn't enter the breaststroke but still had enough to romp to easy victories in the 200-yard individual medley and then back-to-back in the 100-yard backstroke and 400-yard freestyle.

Freestyler Shirley Schmidt was also a triple winner, in the 100 and 200 free plus an outstanding 59.4 split as part of the 400-yard freestyle relay.

Varsity settled matters early by winning the 400-yard medley relay in 4:46.2, then Paula Glover took the 800-yard freestyle (9:54.0), and Marilyn McCormick sandwiched a first in the 50 free between victories by Schmidt and Wright.

Sara Loftus bested teammate Rosalind Lee in the one-metre diving and Varsity led 41-10.

The second act of the Wright and Schmidt show followed and even Waterloo victories in the 200 butterfly and 100 breaststroke couldn't make a dint in Varsity's lead.

Varsity wrestlers exercise

By EUGENE SHAW-COUYER

According to Plato (Laws, 796A), the only genuine form of Greek wrestling, and the only form permitted in his ideal state, was the upright style imitated in the modern world as Graeco-Roman wrestling.

In this style an attack on the upper body through arm and neck holds, along with frequent throwing, is stressed, while tripping, leg-holds, and hand-holds below the waist are prohibited.

Three wrestlers from the University of Toronto team, in hard fought contests, won Ontario championships in the Ontario Graeco-Roman Tournament held Saturday in Toronto.

Len Gang (105 lb.) won an easy first, while Mike Stanley (180 lb.), wrestling a formidable and experienced opponent, gained a junior championship. Chris Preobrazenski, at 220 lbs., substituting for injured veteran, Roman Preobrazenski, fought tough against Ed Millard, former British Commonwealth Champion, and scored a dramatic pin in the second round.

All three wrestlers will represent Ontario in the Vancouver Games in March for the Canadian Graeco-Roman Championships.

Roger Vachon (149 lb.), also wrestling for the University of Toronto, was defeated after one victory. The U of T team was coached for the occasion by Jack Preobrazenski.

just behind Hunter both days, took second in the combined. Lau Long came third in the slalom but Carleton's Rob Langevin took third in the combined due to his good run in the giant slalom.

Finishing first both days, Carleton easily took the OUAA championship. Queen's placed second, Ottawa third, and Toronto took fourth place.

There are still three slalom meets left in the Ontario universities ski series. The series results hold a special significance this year in that the top three teams as determined by the cumulative points will represent Ontario in the Series II meet of the Can-Am Intercollegiate Alpine Ski Series. After four of seven meets Carleton is in first place with 39 points, Queen's with 34, followed by Varsity with 27.

If the Blues can hold on to their third place spot, they will be eligible to compete in Main this spring and again in Quebec next January against the top teams in eastern Canada and the U.S. in the Can-Am series.

Swimmers click in two meets

By PAUL CARSON

Things that go click in the pool almost decided yesterday's swim meet, between the Blues and a Quebec all-star team, which Varsity rallied to win 48-47.

Blues seemed to be on their way to a convincing victory when favorites Dave Wilkin and Lance Peto were disqualified for making two false starts in the 50-yard freestyle.

Five of the entrants in the controversial race jumped into the water for the first false start. After the swimmers took their marks again, there was a very audible clicking sound from the audience side of the pool — perhaps a camera shutter or a pencil falling to the tile deck — and Wilkin and Peto instinctively dove into the water.

After a brief discussion, the referee disqualified both swimmers and Quebec's Bob Luxenburg won the race in 23.1 seconds.

Due to the disqualifications, Quebec jumped into a 20-13 lead instead of trailing by six or eight points.

Varsity coach Robin Campbell was forced to do some rapid lineup juggling in order to compensate for the unexpected turn of events, and three events later Wilkin and Peto redeemed themselves with a first and third in the critical race which effectively decided the meet.

Wilkin edged Luxenburg on a judge's decision in the 100-yard freestyle as both were timed in 49.4 while Peto grabbed third at 50.9.

Jim Adams delighted the small crowd with two more pool records as he took almost three seconds off his own mark with a time of 1:42.9 in the 200-yard freestyle and later obliterated his own record in the 500-yard freestyle with 4:41.5, more than five seconds better than the previous best time.

Blues opened the meet with a solid victory in the 400 medley relay but Quebec's Paul Midgley cancelled that advantage by taking the 1,650 distance freestyle.

Adams blitzed through the 200 free but then came the controversial 500-free and to make Blues even more unhappy Francois Morneau bested Varsity's Greg Vanular in the 200 IM.

Quebec continued to pour it on as Ian Fraser grabbed first ahead of Mike Hughes in the 200 butterfly but the key performances by Wilkin and Peto narrowed the visitor's advantage to 34-27 with four races remaining.

George Gross boasted Blues' sagging morale by taking the 200 back in 2:03.7 and then Adams won the 500 free to narrow Quebec's lead to 42-37.

Juri Daniel and John Watt placed second and third behind Morneau in the 200 breaststroke so Blues trailed by six, 47-41, but could win the meet by taking the seven points for winning the final 400-yard freestyle relay.

Quebec coach Dave Johnson had only nine swimmers in all, and had utilized most of his freestyle specialists in the earlier individual events.

Still, his lead swimmer sprinted to about a one-second advantage but in the second leg of the race Varsity's

The Varsity—Peter Norman

Shawn Laari winning the 200 yard individual medley

Shawn Laari overtook his opponent and turned over a comfortable lead to Wilkin and Gross who swam well to record a six second victory at the finish.

Varsity therefore won the meet 48-

47 and finished the home dual meet season with a perfect record as the team begins the tapering down for the OUAAs championships February 21-22 at McMaster.

Blues warmed up for Sunday's activities with a meaningless 84-29 demolition of Waterloo on Friday evening. The times were uniformly slow and the only pool record broken belongs to meet manager Wayne Phillips, who efficiently staged the thirteen events in slightly less than two hours.

Best Varsity performances came from diver Tim Bean, who will probably win a spot on Blues OUAAs team with well-earned victories in both the 1 and 3-metre events.

Veteran Shawn Laari won two races and Blues' other victories came from Bill Chisholm, Dave Wilkin, Mike Hughes, Jay Steel, Larry Lapointe and as usual the two relays.

Dave Wilson salvaged Waterloo's only wins in the 50 and 100 freestyle sprints, as most of his teammates seemed unwilling to mount much of a challenge in the other events.

George Gross has four first-place rankings, while Juri Daniel, Jay Steel and Bill Chisholm each have one.

Div 1B all-stars upset Div 1A

By MIKE FRIEND

In an exciting game, the Whites from division IB upset the blues from division IA 4-3 in Friday's interfac all-star hockey contest. Div IA, who were favoured to win, were unable to solve the mystery of the Whites' goalies, John Haines (Grad) and Scott Allen (Scar). The Div. IA squad outshot the IB team 22-9 in the first period but came out on the short end of a 3-2 score.

Roman Kniginzky (Erin) opened the scoring for IA at 4:47 with assists to Wilson (Erin) and Walters (PHE). Less than three minutes later, the Whites tied the game on an unassisted goal by Tom Bartley (Dents). Twenty-eight seconds later, IB went ahead on another Bartley goal. Kniginzky and Ron Cook (Med) traded goals to round out the first period scoring.

The only goal in the second period came from the stick of Bartley (who else) with assists from Rahan and McWade. Div IA carried the play in the third period but came up short, managing only one goal to make the score reasonable at 4-3. Roman Kniginzky and Tom Bartley were picked the Most Valuable Players for their teams and each received a trophy for their efforts. Judging was handled by Blues' coach Tom Watt and Intramural head Dave Copp.

In view of the success of the first all-star game it is probable that the event will be carried on in future years. The players hope so, after all they got a free beer from the deal.

Now hockey Blues must scramble for playoff spot

By ANNE LLOYD
The Varsity Blues more than adequately demonstrated their generosity towards their fellow hockey rivals as they bungled their way to a 4-1 loss to the York Yeomen and very kindly handed York first place in the process.

three way tie for first place, the eastern Division title can pretty well be handed over to York, as their remaining two games are against the weak-sisters of the league, RMC and Windsor, whereas Varsity must defeat Laurentian and Queen's in order to guarantee their further participation in OUAAs hockey this year.

This must go on record as one of the few times in recent Varsity history that, with two games to go in the year, such interest has been aroused in the possibility of the Blues finishing out of the playoffs.

Certainly after displays of ineptitude such as the one witnessed by the second largest crowd of the season, one would feel justified in wondering if the Blues will make it into the playoffs.

A careful examination of the OUAAs statistics sheet reveals much in the way of answers to the question of why the Blues are doing so poorly. Varsity has managed to score the princely number of 57 goals in 12 games. This statistic becomes even more appalling when you notice that RMC has managed to score 33, Ryerson 41, Brock 49 and Waterloo 105. This accurately sums up the major weakness of the Blues this season: a more or less consistent inability to put the puck into the net.

And yet Varsity managed to outshoot York last night 37 to 29. Unfortunately, most of the shots were not in the least bit menacing. The Blues blew more chances in that one game than most teams manage to get in a season. The Blues have got to shake that attitude that seems to pervade the arena at times that it is their God-given right to win. The rest of the league have improved to the extent that Varsity can no longer rely on reputation to win games.

Varsity cannot expect to dominate unless they prove they are worthy of that distinction. York came into the game last night determined to play their kind of game and win, and did just that. There was no indication of any kind of team effort on the part of the Blues and sprad examples of individual excellence are simply not good enough to win games.

some nice saves in the game, you must give him that due, but spent most of the game looking frankly inept.

Not that anyone else looked a great deal better: the defence played one of its worst games of the year. Even Warren Anderson, who can usually be counted on for a consistent and steady game at the blueline, looked shaky and was frequently out of position on plays.

The Varsity forwards had many chances to score and managed to miss set-ups, abandon checks at the wrong time and otherwise make things easy for the Yeomen. The only Varsity goal came on a fluke shot which came from the corner, hit the goalpost and bounced in off the goaltender's pads. Ivan McFarlane was given credit for the goal, which came at 14:31 of the first period and gave Varsity a 1-1 tie. This was the closest that they came to winning.

On the other hand, the York line of Ampleford, Dunsmuir and Avery were a menace any time they got hold of the puck. Dunsmuir opened the scoring at 5:15 of the first, breaking in alone on Hulme. Anderson had a chance to save the day for Varsity, but succeeded only in knocking Dunsmuir off-strike. This would have been enough if Hulme had stood his ground. Instead, the Varsity netminder was drawn out and Dunsmuir made a neat deke to score.

Dave Wright made it 2-1 for York late in the first with two Varsity players in the penalty box. The goal was scored on Hulme's glove side — an area which seems to be one of his more obvious weaknesses.

York went ahead 3-1 at 11:10 of the second on a nice shot by Ampleford and it became obvious that unless Varsity started to rally at this point, it was all over and we might, just as well skip the third period and try to catch the end of the Leafs' game.

Led by Howie Hampton and Ivan McFarlane, the Blues tried for about three minutes near the end of the second to look like they had come to play hockey. Hampton broke in alone on York goaltender Rick Quance, but shot wide. McFarlane also had a good opportunity and hit the post. Ruhnke and several other Varsity bodies had a chance to poke the puck in, but there were just too many people in the way, not the least of whom was the sprawling Mr. Quance.

Early in the third, York looked like they were going to roll away to an easy 7 or 8 goal victory, but poor shooting and a pair of friendly goalposts kept Varsity within striking range.

Varsity responded by playing increasingly stupid hockey. The few times that Varsity managed to get a threatening shot away, Quance came up with the dazzling save to foil the attempt.

The last official York goal, which came at 9:32 of the third, symbolized the Varsity defeat. Al Avery gave Hulme a beautiful head and shoulder fake and easily put the puck past the befuddled Varsity netminder. The fifth York goal was not counted as it was kicked in.

Glenn Scott (with ball) play London Bridge with RMC

Hot and cold cagers are hot again - burn RMC

By JOHN MIKA

The University of Toronto basketball Blues moved into fourth place in the OUAAs Eastern Division basketball standings with a 108-48 trouncing of the Royal Military College Redmen on Friday night at the Benson Building.

To be assured of a playoff berth, the Blues, who now possess a 6-5 record, must capture their last three games against York, Queen's, and R.M.C.

Varsity added some speed to an attack that had of late been something less than quick and bewildered RMC's porous defence. Time after time Varsity forwards sneaked into RMC territory behind all defenders, pulled down 34-court-length passes which resembled the long bomb in football, and drove to the basket for easy lay-ups.

RMC's offensive attack was riddled in the early stages of the game by the Blues' strategy of using two men to press the ball carrier as he crossed centre: Varsity's defence forced RMC to set and reset, but no coherent play was forthcoming — unless one considers turnovers to the opposition confusing strategy.

RMC ended the game with a miserable average of 31 percent from the field, and one disgruntled fan thanked God for the nuclear age where we do not depend on sharpshooting from the army.

The Varsity team scored on 55 percent of their shots as they were able to move the ball downcourt quickly with few turnovers. Six members of the Blues scored 10 or more points with Glenn Scott and Doug Fox leading the way with 25 and 22 points respectively. Other scoring for the Blues: Skyvington — 11, Jon Fjeld — 10, Filinski — 10, Francis — 10, and Kurczyk — 8.

Coach McManus was able to substitute freely, and the flow of the Blues' offensive play did not suffer even though substitutions tended to be made when those players on the court were hot rather than cold.

RMC's players were noticeably disappointed as was reflected in their game, and so too were their coaches and the fans, by the absence of the Blues' cheerleading squad. The RMC coach emerged from the dressing room wearing a cowboy outfit, perhaps in anticipation of competing with or for the cheerleaders.

Whatever the reason for the cheerleaders' absence, this factor benefited the Blues who concentrated on the ball in the court rather than those in their pants.

If the Blues needed confidence going into an important game against York on Tuesday night, they should have gained it from this overwhelming victory against RMC who doggedly battled the Yeomen in a losing effort, 54-46 on Saturday.

However, over the entire range of the season, the Blues have played rather inconsistently — losing one week and winning the next; one can only hope that they play their remaining three games as well as they played on Friday night.

In other intercollegiate basketball games this weekend: Ottawa — 70; York — 57; Laurentian — 87; Ryerson — 70; York — 54; RMC — 46.

Carleton takes OUAAs ski meet

Thirteen universities competed in the OUAAs Alpine Ski Championships hosted by Guelph University at Blue Mountain last Thursday and Friday.

Figure skating

Stan Bohonek, a Science student at Scarborough College, placed third in the Men's Canadian Figure-skating Championship held in Quebec City last week. His performance received a standing ovation.

Bohonek is a member of the World team and will be travelling to Aspen, Colorado for 3 weeks training before skating at Colorado Springs March 4.

Both the giant slalom on Thursday and the slalom on Friday were run on icy slopes resulting in fast times and numerous falls.

Doug Carter and John Slaughter turned in good runs for Varsity in the giant slalom but falls by Al Abbott and Steve Promoli, and an error by Paul Leitch left the team back in sixth place.

Rick Hunter, who was on Canada's national team last year, won the event and led Carleton University to a first place finish. He was followed by Phil Gaulin from Ottawa and Rob Langevin from Carleton. Queen's University placed second.

The difficult first run of Friday's slalom caused many top competitors to fall or miss gates thus significantly reducing the number of teams to get three good finishes from six team members for the OUAAs results or four good finishes for the Molson series.

It was the Blues' credit that five of the six racers finished both runs to score well towards the cumulative series standings while placing fourth in the OUAAs results.

Varsity's best finish was turned in Paul Gordon who came from the 57th starting position to place in the top ten. Gordon was followed by John Slaughter, Al Abbott, and Paul Leitch.

Carleton's Rick Hunter won the slalom to take first spot in the OUAAs combined. Phil Gaulin who finished

Vice pres picks his own assistant for top news bureau job

By DAVID SIMMONDS

External affairs vice-president Norman James has replaced the director of the university news bureau with his own executive assistant, without offering the post for competition.

News bureau director Leonard Bertin has been given a six-month leave of absence, although his present contract does not expire until June.

The nomination of James' assistant Elizabeth Wilson will be put before the external affairs committee of the Governing Council for approval today. The committee must also approve Bertin's removal.

James denied he had fired Bertin, saying he offered him several alternative positions, but "all I've heard from him is silence."

Bertin, however, said that on Jan. 16 James told him to take two weeks to consider either carrying out his old responsibilities as a science writer at a greatly reduced salary, or taking a leave of absence until the end of his contract.

Bertin wrote back by registered letter Jan. 31 — which has since been acknowledged — saying he considered both options unfair and unacceptable. Subsequently, James sent Bertin a letter Feb. 7 telling him to vacate his office. Bertin had been convinced since last September James had a replacement in mind and was trying to persuade him to leave his job.

James said he would be happy for Wilson to take over the news bureau, calling her an "extraordinarily competent person."

James acknowledged that had a position become available, he would have considered Wilson for it, saying "As long as three months ago she had the capacity to be the director of an independent operation."

The day before Bertin received his letter of eviction, a position was advertised in the university as executive assistant and sesquicentennial affairs coordinator responsible to James. Wilson presently holds that position.

On Monday, James told the news bureau staff Wilson would be taking over.

No competition was open for the bureau's directorship. James said internal staff moves were "not of necessity on a competitive basis."

James said he had decided to reorganize the news bureau completely, and that he had concluded the bureau needed "more vigorous and dynamic management than it's getting."

James said he consulted U of T president John Evans and external affairs committee chairwoman Betty Kennedy before making the decision.

Bertin said the director of the news bureau has always been in a vulnerable position, since the university had no policy on public relations until one was drawn up last December by the external affairs committee.

James said he will present a master plan for approval to external affairs today, acknowledging his action with regard to Bertin was in pursuit of the plan.

The news bureau will be renamed the Department of Information Services.

A public relations officer, "responsible for the university's relationships with all media," has already been hired by James, and started work at the bureau Monday.

James said he expected the implementation of the approved master plan "within a few days," and that he would be making "major changes in the department."

James also said these would only be "evolutionary changes," and that he didn't anticipate any staff changes in the news bureau.

But the present editor of the weekly U of T Bulletin, Larry Jones, retires this June, and no successor has yet been named. Wilson said Sunday "absolutely nothing has been done about it at all."

James acknowledged he had promised Bertin he could see the results of a management survey done on the news bureau, but that he had refused when the survey was completed.

James said the study was done "for myself," and that it would not have been "constructive" to show it to Bertin.

James agreed the bureau was in good shape financially, but said he "didn't agree entirely" with expenditures made by Bertin, pointing specifically to the acquisition of computer-operated typesetting equipment.

Bertin replied the typesetting equipment had saved $25,000 within seven months of its acquisition, and cut the deadline of The Bulletin from eight days to two.

Replying to a question on whether he had treated Bertin fairly, James replied "unequivocally, yes."

U of T Bulletin editor Larry Jones said he had "no comment" on whether Bertin was treated fairly.

He also said nothing led him to believe Bertin would be fired, and was surprised to hear about it.

Jones said he was "not dissatisfied" with the way Bertin ran the bureau.

Eric Grace, another bureau staffer, said "we were not told why Bertin was replaced. The reasons behind some of the events of the last

UTFA presses Evans for facts on Seeley case

By MARINA STRAUSS

The U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) is pursuing its attempts to investigate if there was "unjustified intervention" in the non-appointment of Canadian sociologist John Seeley to the sociology department last year.

UTFA president Bill Nelson said last night he is "not entirely satisfied" with U of T president John Evans' recent assurance to the association that no breach of normal procedure was involved in considering Seeley's appointment.

Nelson said he plans to "press a little more closely the question of normal procedures — which is the key issue."

The sociology department's staffing selection committee's choice to hire Seeley was overturned last year by chairman Irving Zeitlin after senior department members opposed the appointment.

Nelson maintains it is of key importance to determine exactly what role Faculty of Arts and Science dean Bob Greene played in the decision not to hire Seeley.

Greene spoke with Zeitlin and with the selection committee and told the committee he would be "disciplined to approve the (Seeley) recommendation if it were made to him," Nelson said.

"He (Greene) made it clear he didn't like the proposed appointment," Nelson said. "And his principal grounds for this was that he regarded the appointment as divisive because of opposition from senior members of the sociology department."

"It doesn't seem good practice for senior members of any department to conduct affairs outside the department before they are completed inside the department," Nelson added.

"It's normal to consult with the dean," Nelson noted, "but what's not clear is his initial involvement in the decision. It is possible the dean was involved even before he spoke to the staffing committee."

Nelson also said it wasn't clear whether the dean spoke to the committee on his own initiative or at the invitation of the department chairman.

"If the initiative came from the chairman," Nelson said, "that would put matters in a different light — that might justify the intervention." Greene could not be reached for comment last night.

Although Nelson said his principal interest in the Seeley case was the question of "breach of normal procedure in considering appointments," the UTFA president also said it concerned him that "a distinguished Canadian sociologist wants to come to a Canadian university where a few years ago he would have been welcome."

The 62-year-old sociologist, who now lives and teaches in California, was offered the chairmanship of OISE's sociology department two years ago. Seeley declined the position.

Nelson wrote Evans in December asking the university president whether or not normal procedures in hiring practices were broken in the Seeley case; if normal procedures were broken, Nelson asked Evans if he felt it was justified; and thirdly, Nelson asked if Evans was conducting his own review of the case.

Evans replied last week saying "he had looked into" the matter and "didn't think a breach of normal procedures had taken place," Nelson said.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) is presently investigating why Seeley wasn't hired last spring at OISE's sociology department and possible procedural or structural inadequacies in appointment practices at OISE.

The institute's faculty association initiated the review after OISE's board of governors refused its request to conduct an independent review of the Seeley non-appointment.

Profs demand U of T racism probe

By BOB BETTSON

A group of faculty members met with university human rights advisor Daniel Hill Monday to demand a presidential advisory commission to investigate racism at U of T.

The seven faculty members involved included sociology professors Steve Berkowitz and Janet Salaff, Fred Case, George Bancroft, philosophy prof Danny Goldstick, math prof Peter Rosenthal and Terry Berkowitz.

Hill rejected the demands, telling the group more documentation was needed. He told them he wanted to study the problem of racism in depth and would raise issues the group was concerned about with the president.

However, more demand from the university community would have to be forthcoming before a commission would be established, Hill told the group.

The rationale for the commission would be to hold open hearings to determine whether the U of T as a publicly-funded institution is adequately dealing with racial discrimination in areas such as admissions, course content, hiring and firing, and other sensitive areas.

Salaff told The Varsity the group feels there is substantial racism in the university, particularly in faculty appointments.

She pointed out the history department had refused to appoint an eminent black scholar to a visiting professorship in African studies when Martin Klein went on leave of absence this year.

There has never been a black

African studies professor at U of T, and the university is one of the few major North American universities not to have an African studies department.

Salaff said the group is also concerned about the administration's refusal to make statements about its intention not to discriminate against landed immigrants in admission policies.

Third world studies courses are now facing cuts and the university's lack of commitment to these courses is evidenced by the lack of an integrated structure, the professors have charged.

The group is also upset that no denials were issued when racist statements were made by Canadian Medical Association president Bette Stephenson last fall and incidents of racist content appeared in the Toke Oike.

Another bone of contention was the refusal of Caput chairman Albert Abel to allow SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas a chance to raise the issue of racism at their summer Caput trial for stopping alleged racist Edward Banfield from speaking last March.

The group demanded a commission be set up, a clear denial issued of statements made by Stephenson and an agreement to spend as much time and money investigating racism as was spent on the Leah-Schabas trial.

Hill was in no position to answer these demands although the faculty members first approached Evans for a meeting and were referred to Hill.

Scar council may wrangle

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Passions which have been heating up since July threaten to blow tomorrow's Scarborough College Student Council meeting wide open.

The meeting is scheduled for 7 pm either in council chambers or in the Upper Dining Hall. Wherever it's held, one thing becomes increasingly clear — council president John O'Donohue will come under heavy fire.

It's the last council meeting before Reading Week and probably the last before the annual elections, which guarantees council members will arrive with whittled axes and a lust for bloodletting.

Scott Cavalier will lead the anti-O'Donohue troops into battle, armed with an angry letter from Carol Westman, who resigned as manager of Scarborough's riding stables in late December.

Westman arrived unexpectedly at a Feb. 3 council meeting and read the letter, which criticized the way she had been treated in general and O'Donohue in particular.

The meeting was stormy even before she arrived. During January, Cavalier had circulated a petition demanding council discuss "the recent actions of the president."

Because council lacked a quorum

Dentistry dean says his faculty faces 'serious dilemma'

By PAUL RAYNOR

Commenting on the recent Faculty of Dentistry cutbacks of $25,000, Faculty of Dentistry dean G. Nikiforuk says that the faculty's fiscal future is anything but rosy. Nikiforuk realizes that the financial climate at U of T is not healthy and views its implications for the Faculty of Dentistry as a "serious dilemma."

"The faculty's present budget allows for no more than a straight maintenance of the status quo," Nikiforuk said.

"No staff will be let go and things will be maintained as well as possible, Nikiforuk said. In fact, he added, "the Faculty of Dentistry is relatively better off than some other faculties, but we're still one of the 'thin boys' on campus."

There had been a fear among graduate dentistry students that the budget cutbacks would prevent the faculty from filling a vacant position in Oral Surgery.

Had the position been forced into a relatively permanent vacancy, dentistry's graduate department would have lost its Canadian Dental Association accreditation, forcing graduate students to write another exam if they wished to practice in provinces other than Ontario.

Despite getting the "go ahead" to fill the position in Oral Surgery, Nikiforuk still sees serious problems ahead.

He envisages both an "equipment and faculty crunch" in 12 to 24 months if new funding is not forthcoming.

The present budget doesn't leave room for the replacement of worn out equipment nor does it ease the faculty's burden of skyrocketing prices on supplies needed for the operation of its clinical facilities.

Dental Student Society president Michael Mills says the financial worries of the faculty do not end with its present budget.

Mills cites the new Health Disciplines Act, still in the works at Queen's Park, as an area of great concern within the faculty.

It is expected that the new bill will require an upgrading of equipment and standards in the Faculty of Dentistry, meaning that more money will have to be found.

Depending on the nature of the new bill, the Faculty of Dentistry's fiscal "crunch" may come sooner than even the dean anticipates.

Women still seen as home bodies

By MATHILDE VERHULST

"If men were born to work for their bread then women were born to work for their crumbs," a labor relations lawyer announced to a lunch-time audience at Women at Noon lecture series at the Toronto Dominion Cinema yesterday.

Mary Cornish, setting the theme of discussion for the hour, spoke about women's employment rights and discrimination against women in labor to a crowd of over 1,000.

Cornish said the prevalent ideology in the 1950s concerning women that "woman's place is in the home" is still a dominant attitude in labor today.

She said "the main factor" supporting this attitude is the "increasing rather than decreasing wage differential" between men and women in the labor force.

Cornish cited a recent study of office occupations in Toronto which discovered "a male junior accounting clerk earns $127 a week, while a female junior accounting clerk earns $107."

In fact, Cornish said, "it pays employers to discriminate against women."

She said "the average discrimination bill" (that is the money owing to North American women workers) last year was $7 million, only a minimal amount of which was collected by such companies as the Bell Telephone and American Telephone and Telegraph (AT & T) and paid back to women employed there.

Present Ontario law, Cornish said, "provides for equal pay for equal work" but wage differences still exist because of incentive, seniority and other systems built into most company wage policies.

Cornish stressed there was difficulty in determining if employers discriminated against women employees in jobs predominantly held by women. But she urged women to form trade unions and to "try for collective action" if they feel they are not being paid their worth.

Cornish described the labor laws as "full of loop holes" which "should never be seen as substitutes for collective action."

But she warned potential union joiners and organizers to "be very careful because unions are full of male chauvinists who can make you sign agreements of a discriminatory nature."

"But where there's equal pay you'll find there's a union," Cornish said, and urged women to "get on bargaining committees."

Cornish said there has been a movement among women toward unionization recently. She mentioned the opening of two certified union offices in Toronto for women's grievances.

Out of one million women workers in Ontario, Cornish said, about 500,000 are in job categories such as nursing, secretarial work and waitressing that can't be compared to jobs usually held by men.

This situation, she said, is often a convenient way for the employer to use his female employees as "a cheap labor force."

On the problem of pregnancy leave, Cornish said a woman can now obtain up to 17 weeks of absence from her work.

But, she added facetiously, "a doctor's certificate is still required to say that you're pregnant."

Sewell says suburbs are parasites

By TOM GERRY

"I am not being facetious in suggesting we build a wall around Toronto," Ward Seven alderman John Sewell told about 50 people in a speech on Urban Sprawl Tuesday at Sidney Smith Hall.

"They used to build cities with walls in Europe, and those cities work well," Sewell noted. "They developed before the automobile."

"People must decide whether they want to live in the city or in the country," he said.

At present suburbs exist as parasites on the city, Sewell maintained. "They are willing to suck off us," he said. "You don't see many people from downtown Toronto going up to Lawrence Avenue on Friday night to have a good time, do you?"

"Suburbs make sense from the developers' point of view but not from anyone else's," he said.

Sewell demonstrated how developers make enormous amounts of money by specialized land use.

In the city developers tear down houses and build offices, which results in the city's being dead most of the time, transportation problems with handling the massive daily occupation and evacuation, increasing land prices, and physical discomfort from wind and noise, he said.

Developers also use land in the suburbs in specialized ways, Sewell added, noting suburbs are areas of single-family units on large lots interspersed with shopping centres.

"Urban sprawl is not unplanned development," Sewell noted. "The developers' idea is to use as much land as possible."

Developers, according to Sewell, buy up land on the outskirts of the city at a low price and "sit on it." They encourage the city to spread toward their land by pressuring politicians.

"In a short time the developers build low-density housing and sell it at high prices," he noted, adding "this process is complemented by the other specialization by downtown developers who eliminate housing."

Reform alderman John Sewell says developers profit from suburbs.

Sewell pointed to problems which arise with suburbs. The comparatively few people in a large area (17 people per acre in Mississauga, 30 people per acre in Scarborough and 81 people per acre in Toronto) are unable to support such city amenities as public transportation which depends on a high concentration of people, he said.

When the single fare system was introduced "because of pressure from Metro," the TTC began to lose large amounts of money: $50 million this year, Sewell noted.

He maintained taxes are high in the suburbs because fewer people pay for such services as roads and sewers that cost about the same no matter how many people use them.

"Now the provincial government is trying to put a commuter system on us," Sewell noted, "and that won't pay for itself either because it's designed to serve suburbs."

"But the provincial government is very interested in promoting urban sprawl," he said. "Cabinet ministers like Darcy McKeough and Dalton Bales just love to make money out of land deals."

Not only the provincial government, but "city hall is controlled by the developers. They are always at hand to recommend and encourage programs for urban sprawl," Sewell said.

"We will begin to solve the problem of urban sprawl, as well as the housing crisis, when developers build denser residential areas and when people demand their shops and services be within walking distance."

"But developers can't afford to compact development because they'll lose money," Sewell said.

Sewell's talk was the first in a series of four lectures being presented by the Commerce Students' Association.

The Learning Machine

Sociology department faculty members have initiated an informal committee to assess the department's present programs, administration policy and quality. One of the central issues involved in this faculty assessment is the student parity structure.

Students in sociology have equal representation and votes on all formal committees and decision-making bodies in the department, but moves are afoot by some faculty members to alter this parity structure.

Parity on the department's committees enables students to have an effective, say in determining what courses will be taught, the policies relating to grading standards and to help select new faculty members to be hired.

One of the arguments against parity is the lack of student participation in departmental affairs. The department has its problems and a number of students have voiced their complaints.

The department faces an assessment by an outside body to determine its right to continue its graduate program. Loss of the graduate program will mean the loss of good faculty and will undermine and weaken the undergraduate program.

The solution to these problems lies not in altering the parity structure, but in making it work through stronger action from its members, sociology students' union spokespeople say.

The union feels it is necessary for all sociology students to discuss the issues and to prepare positions on the current state of the department.

The student meeting will be Friday, Feb. 14 at 3 pm in the Borden building, room 229.

In addition, there will be a party for sociology students that evening, Friday, Feb. 14, around 8 pm at 11 Langley St.

If a plan to phase construction of the new athletics complex is adopted as has been suggested by president John Evans, funding difficulties may not further delay construction.

Evans made the suggestion to the SAC executive at a Monday meeting. The architects are being asked whether the complex can be built without finishing the swimming pool but with all other facilities.

In another disclosure SAC spokesmen said the administration is again thinking of a student levy of $10 a year to pay for the complex although students who pay the levy will probably never use the building. Evans said the levy would be for "the future of mankind."

Evans also promised SAC the administration would try and maintain 50 percent funding of operating costs of the new building to keep the student fee down to a reasonable figure.

The Arts and Science Student Union will be meeting Thursday at 6 pm for its annual budget meeting. Funds will be divided up for various course unions, the fieldworker's salary and course evaluations.

Dinner will be ordered for the hardy souls who attend. All course unions, college councils and student members of faculty councils are entitled to send representatives.

★★★

The Political Economy Course Union is offering a series of lectures by leading professors in the department on topics of interest to students of political science or economics. The series will be held every Wednesday at 1 pm.

The six-week series will begin with a lecture by professor Peter Russell on Native Rights and Constitutionalism in Canada Today in room 1074, Sidney Smith Hall.

The union is also holding a general meeting tomorrow at 3 p.m. in Sidney Smith, room 1074. All interested political science and economics students are invited to attend.

★★★

The Hispanic studies course union will be meeting tomorrow at 4 pm in Sidney Smith Hall, room 1086 to discuss the possible lowering of grades, publishing of course evaluations and other student complaints.

The course union has just published a newsletter which is available at the Arts and Science Students' Union office, room 1068, Sidney Smith Hall.

Corporate taxes must fund OSAP

We received an interesting letter last week from a Woodsworth college student, Jane Burnes, who happens to be a leading light in the Ontario Young Progressive Conservatives, advocating higher tuition fees. The letter inadvertently demonstrates the importance of a strong student position in favor of the abolition of tuition fees and a living stipend for all universities.

The danger of the present campaign for changes in the Ontario Student Awards Plan being waged by the Ontario Federation of Students and U of T's SAC, is that students and the Ontario government will lose sight of the crucial long range aim of the end of the present tuition and loan schemes, which serve to make university education a privilege for the upper and middle classes.

Ms. Burnes tries the traditional Tory scare tactic of asking "who will pay?" But with her blue blinkers she cannot see that the working people who she says should not have to pay more taxes for university education, are denied access to higher education despite the high taxes they pay now.

Let's face realities. The people who benefit from university education in this province are largely the ones who are calling for cutbacks in government support. If they are joined by working people, it is only because it is obvious to workers that they are being asked to pay the shot while the corporations and the upper classes who the Big Blue Machine represent are getting off scot-free.

Universities in Ontario exist primarily to benefit largely foreign owned corporations by producing a wealth of highly trained manpower, a technical and business elite, at the taxpayer's expense. Yet these same corporations, with write-offs and tax breaks from the Davis government, pay far less than their share of the costs of university education.

The solution seems obvious. Increase corporate taxes and personal income taxes for those in upper middle income and upper income brackets. This will pay for free tuition and a living stipend for students while eliminating the present economic barriers for students from working class backgrounds. The present OSAP plan is a completely retrograde scheme which only allows the poor or working class student attend university if he or she is willing to live a spartan existence and build up a debt of possibly $2,000-$3,000 for when he or she leaves university.

OSAP, by any stretch of the imagination is not a "government handout," it is a poor substitute for a free university education available to anyone capable of attaining university admission standards. University education should indeed be a right, for anyone who can attain academic standards necessary, not merely those who are fortunate enough to have the money either from parental wealth or a summer job obtained through connections.

The Queen's Park Tory regime is not about to change it unless students make substantial efforts to press for change.

Athletics complex needs reassessment

I was very glad to see your editorial of February 7 which pointed out that the Huron-Sussex area is threatened with extinction by university expansion. And your support for development controls on the whole University of Toronto area is encouraging.

However, in your February 10 editorial you draw a distinction between the issue of the preservation of our neighborhood and the issue of the athletics complex. But the issues are related.

While no one is being forced out of their homes in our neighborhood (although there were people living on the athletics complex site who had to be moved out), there is an issue about the viability of our neighborhood if this complex goes up.

And if the ease with which the university has succeeded in gaining exemption from development controls for this building and for the entire campus is any indication, then the future of our neighborhood is very much in doubt.

By a peculiar bit of logic, The Varsity suggests that because residents are not happy about this building, compromise with them would only be taken. In your articles last week and in your editorial you presented the residents as being uncompromising. This is simply not true; we have always stressed that we are not opposed to the U of T building an athletics facility but we have questioned the need and desirability of the complex they propose.

We have questioned the necessity of tearing down several older houses which now act as a buffer between the university and the community. We have questioned whether such a hideously ugly building has to be erected. We have questioned this facility in terms of the university's priorities and the priorities for public investment. We have questioned whether a building of this scale is compatible with the surrounding neighborhoods. And we have questioned whether this building meets community needs, since until recently, the administration was giving such play to the idea of "community use".

If the only compromises that the university is willing to consider are taken, then as The Varsity suggests, there is no point in compromise. However, if the university is willing to talk about the scale of the building, then I think there is a possibility that we can reach a compromise. So far, however, the university has not been willing to talk about this issue.

The Varsity says the building is an "eyesore" and Bruce Kidd simply shrugs his shoulders and says, "Have you seen a building you really liked in the last 25 years? That is the modern style." Students need athletic facilities but they were not consulted about planning this building any more than the residents were. The momentum is there to get this complex built despite its esthetics and despite the opposition of the surrounding community.

It is unfortunate that SAC and The Varsity have chosen to register their approval without asking for a reassessment in which all segments of the community can participate.

Harlequin loves heartwarming story

The exhaustive piece on Harlequin in the Jan. 29 Varsity was warmly received here.

As purveyors of "typically white liberal remnants of Victorian imperialism and morality," we are generally neglected by the press, the Canada Council and governments when they give out book money. So, to receive three pages of attention in The Varsity made our day.

If any of your readers would like to actually read a Harlequin the better to understand the critique, I will be most pleased to send one along if she (or he) will write to my office.

I sense Ms. Grabb genuinely enjoys Harlequins and I am enclosing a special anthology edition with a library binding which I would ask you to forward to her.

Intellectual life must be preserved

Re Trint Mint in Financial Split, Varsity Feb. 7, 1975.

I agree with one student's opinion that "onslaughts of women into Strachan Hall would endanger the intellectual life at Trinity." God knows it's one of the few places left in the university (and Canada, maybe) where well-educated, masculine 16th century thinking still survives. Would you have such a fine "intellectual" life go the way of alchemy, feudalism, and the rack?

Liberals shouldn't act like Marxists

How novel to read in the pages of a Liberal publication a Marxist critique of Ms. magazine and feminism generally. That's not at all in the tradition of J.S. Mill (the original liberal) who was pretty close to early British feminism. I really don't know what to think.

About the article itself I have some pretty strong thoughts though. It seems that this guy Hoch is just another apologist for Marxian myopia. How else to explain the bending of facts and clever use of cover topics to present a point of view that is so manifestly limited by its patriarchal stance.

Ms. magazine is a publication of questionable political stance, I agree. I've recently cancelled my subscription because Ms. has regressed so far as to allow advertising and editorial copy touting some of the very aspects of North American life that the women's movement and progressives generally have most often attacked (I refer to the "sexy lady" make-up ads and articles suggesting a return to old fashioned romanticism).

To say, however, that the ideology of Ms. has permeated the women's movement is idiocy. Ms. adopted some of the ideas of the movement but can hardly be credited with developing ideology. The danger is now that Ms. will successfully convert the revolutionary ideas of the feminist movement into so much reformist pablum for mass consumption. It is right to attack and expose Ms., but it helps to know what you're talking about before you do.

In any event, the Ms. issue seems to have been mostly an excuse for Hoch to present some damning "facts" about early feminists. In fact, what he has presented is terribly misleading - the truth is far more interesting and can even be seen to support even more strongly his concerns about reformism and middle class movements.

Hoch makes many statements relating to racism, anti-socialism, reformism and reaction among the nineteenth and early twentieth century feminist movements. Actually, the women who were to become the leaders of these movements were among the most active workers in the emancipation struggles and were pilloried and even jailed for their public speaking and writing in support of black men and women. Indeed, it was only under intense pressure (largely generated by women) that slavery was abolished and eventually the vote given to black men. Throughout, the leaders of the women's organizations involved in this struggle had assumed and been assured that votes for women would be tied to votes for blacks. Susan B. Anthony's concern becomes understandable in this context, and it is a distortion to label her racist because she wanted votes for women too.

There is every justification for questioning the conservatism and reaction of the later versions of the women's rights organizations. But at the same time it must be recognized how this came about and why. Class orientation is not the whole answer. Indeed, some of the women closest to Susan B. Anthony and other leaders were responsible for the first North American publication of the Communist Manifesto. It was this proximity which led, in part, to the turn of the National Women's Suffrage Association from radical thinking to reformism - when Victoria Woodhull, already notorious for her socialist inclinations, announced she was for free love, the scorn and abuse heaped on her spilled over to her associates in the NWSA. They couldn't stand the pressure and soon adopted the politics of compromise and expediency long used by other groups.

This is not to say that radical feminist thinking died out in the nineteenth century. Groups such as the Women's Party and brilliant revolutionaries like Emma Goldman continued to work well into the twentieth century. But the adoption of reform as a major goal by large elements of the feminist movement resulted in its eventual (although temporary) demise.

Disturbing parallels can be drawn with the modern growth of radical feminism and the attempted cooption of the movement by the reactionary press. No movement or theory is immune to decay as the recent elevation of reactionaries in China or Stalin's pact with Hitler show. We must always be on guard against it generating new theory and new energy from our own experiences and our knowledge of history. Misleading articles such as Hoch's can only undermine our collective abilities to change and understand. May your liberal heart be cursed for printing it.

CBC may not air FLQ crisis film

OTTAWA (CUP) — A small Ottawa and Toronto audience got to see a film that the CBC may not allow the rest of Canada to see.

The film, called Action, was made by Robin Spry of the National Film Board and concerns the events leading up to and during the October 1970 crisis in Quebec and the imposition of the War Measures Act.

The film was sent to the CBC last September for screening, but since then has been sitting on the shelf collecting dust while CBC officials try to figure out what to do with it.

Those usually in charge of making the programming decisions seem to have bowed out on this one and the discussion of when, or if, the film is to be shown will likely go right to the top. So far, it has taken four months and there is still no decision in sight.

No pro-FLQ line

At a screening presented by the Ottawa Waffle Feb. 1 it was apparent that the question in the minds of CBC officials certainly have nothing to do with the technical quality, which is excellent, or the background research, which is meticulous, or due to any overt pro-FLQ or separatist line, which is not evident.

Instead it might be that Ottawa is concerned about the film because the analysis of the events leading up to and during the kidnapping of British High Commissioner James Cross and Quebec cabinet minister Pierre Laporte is in complete accord with the government's rationale for imposing the War Measures Act (WMA).

Confusing situation

If this sounds confusing, it is because Ottawa imposed the WMA on the country on the legal grounds that an "apprehended insurrection" existed in Quebec. But the same government tried throughout and after the incidents to paint a picture of the FLQ as being a small group of isolated fanatics who had no popular base within the province, thereby discrediting the possibility that an insurrection may have occurred.

Of these two theories the film gives credence to the first — that the possibility of political insurrection did in fact exist.

The film does this by placing the October events in the context of the social and economic developments in Quebec during the post-war period, including the political machinations of Duplessis, Union Nationale and Premier Robert Bourassa's Liberals, and the development of separatism and separatist terrorist groups.

Wide FLQ support

Most importantly, the film points out that the key to understanding the government's reasons for imposing the WMA is the message contained in the FLQ Manifesto (i.e. workers of Quebec should localize the struggle against the anglo oppressors) and the wide support that it actually received among people in Quebec.

After the government had agreed as its single concession to Cross's kidnappers that it would allow the manifesto to be read on television, the Quebec Liberals must have been surprised to learn that trade unions, separatist groups, student organizations and many common people were very sympathetic to the anti-anglo separatist message.

The film shows an enthusiastic crowd of Quebecers packed into the Jean Sauve arena in Quebec City the day after the broadcast, listening to respectable politicians and organizers calling for support for the principles enunciated by the FLQ even if they were less supportive of the kidnapping tactic. Then at 4 am the next day, the WMA was called into force and the troops rolled into Quebec.

Overthrow of regime

The point that is made in the film is simply that the political, social and economic conditions in Quebec were such as to make the general populace less than hostile towards FLQ objectives. An atmosphere of immediacy and crisis engendered by the kidnapping made it feasible for separatist political leaders to actually organize the population into a force capable, if not of social revolution, of overthrowing the political regime which existed.

The imposition of the WMA which allowed the government to arrest likely organizers is seen in the film to be justified if survival of the government was to continue.

This is the legal reason the government gave for imposing the WMA, its protestations about the FLQ having no support aside.

Earth Born... the new, non-alkaline shampoo with a difference you can see!*

The Facts:

A good shampoo should be more than a pretty fragrance. More than just gentle. It should be non-alkaline, like Earth Born — should match your hair's natural pH balance...like Earth Born. Most other shampoos can leave alkaline residue. Upset the natural pH balance of your hair.

*The Test:

Scientists use a special pH test paper to measure alkalinity. The darker the test paper turns, the higher the alkaline content. Earth Born doesn't turn the paper dark like most other shampoos.

The Results:

Earth Born restores hair to its natural non-alkaline pH balance. Leaves hair cleaner, stronger, shinier. Adds natural body and bounce.

The Fragrances:

In three formulas for oily, normal or dry hair. Each with its own fragrance. Green Apple, Apicot, or Avocado.

WILDERNESS VENTURE

Basic Cost: $329; Food Kitty: $28

14 DAYS ONE WAY between Toronto and Vancouver

This trip has been designed for those travellers looking for an entirely different way of crossing North America. The route will be basically the same as the Overland Trek, but the features include a three day canoe trip through the wilderness waterways of Quetico Provincial Park and a two day back packing trip into the Canadian Rockies.

This trip is relatively rugged and not to be inflicted on persons of fragile bones and disposition.

Ability to swim is mandatory.

Departures: From Toronto July 19; From Vancouver August 4th.

WILDERNESS CANOE TRIP

Basic Cost: $89.00; Food Kitty: $14.00

Join a small group of "Voyagers" and travel by canoe through the lakes and rivers of Ontario's most famous provincial park. Covering nearly 3,000 square miles, Algonquin is known for its natural beauty and is enriched by a variety of plants and animals including deer, moose, wolves, beaver and black bears.

All transportation between Toronto and Algonquin Park is supplied. In the Park, the only method of transportation will be by canoe or on foot. Whilst travelling from one lake to another, the canoes and the provisions have to be carried by the participating "Voyagers". Not all the time, however, will be travelling and much of it can be spent swimming and enjoying the wilderness. Bring a rod if you like fishing.

All equipment is supplied, including tents, eating and cooking utensils, canoes and pack sacks (excluding sleeping bags). All you have to bring is your personal belongings (casual clothes such as jeans, shorts, T-shirts, anorak, sweater, swimsuit, etc) and a sleeping bag. Remember, you will be the one carrying them! Provision will be made for storing your suitcase when you are issued your pack sack.

Food will be brought along for the duration of the trip (this will be paid for from the food kitty of $2.00 per person per day). Everyone is expected to help with the cooking and other camp chores.

Also included are travel/camping permits for the Park and the services of experienced guides whose job is to make sure you enjoy this wilderness venture. There is no need to bring any money, for once the journey begins there is nowhere to spend it!

It is imperative that all participants be able to swim.

DEPARTURES: From Toronto Sundays from 29th June to August 31st inclusive.

ON STUDENT AWARDS

In 1973, the price of rent for a student living in a rooming house was $20 per week, and the cost of food was $12 per week, for a total cost of living of $32 per week. In 1973 the Ontario Students' Assistance Programme awarded students $32 per week to account for the cost of living.

In 1974, the price of rent for a student living in a rooming house rose to $25 per week and the cost of food rose to $15 per week for a total cost of living of $40 per week. In 1974 the Ontario Students' Assistance Programme awarded students $32 per week to account for the cost of living.

In 1975 the price of rent for a student living in a rooming house has risen to $32 per week and the cost of food has risen to $19 for a total cost of living of $51 per week. In 1975 the Ontario Students' Assistance Programme is awarding students $32 per week to account for the cost of living.

Clearly, something has gone wrong.

In 1967 William Davis, in submitting his annual statement on University Affairs, wrote:

"The government has always been concerned not only with providing the facilities required for our students to obtain the highest standards of education but with ensuring that each student is able to avail himself of the opportunities existing in Ontario. The principle that all qualified students should be able to obtain a higher education which has been enunciated as government policy has gained wide acceptance during recent years. As a result, the Department has attempted through a variety of programmes to ensure that every able student will have the financial resources required to continue his education. Continuous study is being conducted to ensure that the awards programmes administered by the Department meet the objectives that have been set."

Meanwhile . . .

In 1971, a report on the career expectations of University of Toronto undergraduate students revealed that only 9 percent of U of T students came from families earning under $5,000 per year, while 25 percent of society at large is made up of families from this socio-economic grouping.

Clearly something has gone wrong.

IN THE BEGINNING

The period of time from 1966 to 1971 represented the Golden Age of post-secondary education in Ontario, and this was nowhere more clearly reflected than in the provinces student aid plan.

In 1966 the Province of Ontario Students' Awards Programme (POSAP) was established and funded by the province to the tune of $31.5 million. According to the programme the first $150 a student received was loan, and of the next $750, 60 percent was loan and 40 percent was grant. The balance received was entirely grant. Thus the maximum loan portion, or loan ceiling, on any award was $600, with the remainder of the award coming in the form of a non-repayable grant.

As enrollment in universities boomed in the late sixties and very early seventies, with John Roberts and subsequently William Davis guiding the helm of the Ministry for University Affairs, so too did student aid. The amount of money being spent on the awards programme steadily grew until 1971 when it reached an all-time high of $51 million. Then suddenly . . .

CUTBACKS

In 1972, the Province of Ontario began cutting back on the amount of money being spent on post-secondary education.

In April of that year the government announced an increase of $100 in tuition fees, while at the same time raising the OSAP loan ceiling from $600 to $800 (in effect cutting the grant portion by $200 per student). Meanwhile, the government also dropped the bursary of $500 which went to delay the cost of tuition for those studying at the College of Education. As well, a $250 tuition fee was imposed on the provinces previously untaxed nursing students.

Overall, the government reduced its contribution to all forms of student aid in 1972 from $51 million to $34.8 million, and its provision for grant assistance from $44 million to $31.7 million.

GRADUATE STUDENTS HURT TOO

Undergraduate students were not the only ones affected by provincial cutbacks, as graduate students also began to feel the squeeze, and many, as early as 1970.

In 1970 the government cut the Ontario Government Graduate Fellowship programme from $6 million dollars per year to $3.5 million. In 1971 it was again cut to $3.5 million and in 1972 to $3 million.

This year, the Ontario Graduate Fellowship was changed to the Ontario Graduate Scholarship and the number of grants available was reduced from 1,500 to 1,000. Even of the 1,000 remaining scholarships the government chose to award only 800.

THE FORGOTTEN MANY

Any discussion of the Ontario Students' Awards Programme has the dangerous tendency to degenerate into a discussion of whether or not OSAP is adequate to fulfill the needs of those who are presently attending university. What we tend to forget, however is that there are many people who never even get to go to university because of the inadequacies of the OSAP programme, and any discussion of OSAP must be considered in that context.

As was mentioned before, children from lower income families are very much under-represented in the university population. This fact can in part be attributed to the OSAP Programme, or more specifically, to the fact that OSAP is oriented towards loans rather than grants.

Numerous studies through the years have demonstrated that students from lower income families, uncertain of job opportunities following graduation and unable to draw on family resources, are far more reluctant than other students to partake in aid systems which consist of large loan repayment schemes.

This point is clearly demonstrated by the Clark, Cook, Fallis, Kent report entitled Aid and Access to Higher Education. As part of the study, the authors of the report asked grade 9 and 10 students from lower income families (parental earnings under $5,000 per year) if they would attend university if there were no student aid plan in Ontario. Only 44 percent of the grade 9 students and only 45 percent of the grade 10 students stated that they would attend university.

Subsequently, the OSAP programme was explained to the students and they were asked if they would go to university, knowing the terms of the OSAP programme. Of the grade 9 group 47 percent, and of the grade 10 group 51

in

promoted in the 1960's to sell the expansion of higher education to the taxpayer, new myths are being created.

One myth is that university enrollment is declining as a result of a lack of interest in post-secondary education. This however, is simply not true, as 1973-74 enrollment was up 3.6 percent over 1972-73.

Another myth is that university trained manpower is not really as economically necessary as was once believed. In reality, Ontario and Canada still need highly trained manpower in order to progress economically; this need is as urgent as ever. But the Ontario government wishes to obtain the trained manpower so badly needed by the whole society, especially industry, without bearing the costs necessary for the training.

Basically, the Ontario government appears to have adopted a policy that will assure them of a continuing supply of highly trained manpower, while at the same time reducing their financial contribution to the training of that manpower by transferring the cost of education to the individual and his family.

FROM HERE TO ETERNITY

While the present situation may be gloomy, the future bodes even worse. Reports from private talks between the Federal and Provincial governments indicate that the loan ceiling may very well be going up to $1,800 by 1976-77.

That is to say, higher education will be available only to those wealthy enough to personally finance themselves through university, or to those who are prepared to gamble on the future and mortgage themselves to the tune of $7,000 plus. If the rising costs of higher education and the present OSAP programme have already restricted access to university to only the 9 percent of students from lower income families who have been able to withstand the financial burdens of attending the U of T, then the new changes will surely eliminate the chances of even that persevering lot.

TOWARDS A SOLUTION

Clearly, the present Ontario Student Awards Programme is difficult in two areas. On the one hand it is not enabling students from all segments of society to attend university. On the other, it is not adequately fulfilling the needs of those who are already there.

Even more disturbing is the fact that at precisely the time when the federal and provincial governments should be talking about how to improve the student aid programme, they are talking about ways of further limiting its effectiveness.

The only solution is for the OSAP programme to reorient itself in a direction that will progress towards the replacement of loans with grants while at the same time ensuring that enough money is available to satisfy the financial needs of those attending university. Two points however, must be noted in this regard.

First, the transformation of OSAP from a loan to a grant oriented scheme cannot come about overnight if one takes must deal with the question of where the added funds will come from. The university is presently being supported by the taxes of lower and middle income groups, and to increase their burdens would be as unjust as to maintain the status quo.

This point was driven home by the 1973 Ontario budget which revealed that from 1966-73 personal income taxes rose from 16.2 percent to 19.8 percent while at the same time, the corporate share dropped from 11.3 percent to 8.6 percent.

Basic changes in the financing of higher education can only be accomplished through broader changes in our social tax structure. Though it may percent reported that they would attend university.

The results of this study cannot be underestimated. Only 3 percent of the grade 9 students, and only 6 percent of the grade 10 students stated that the OSAP programme made university more accessible to them than a system under which there was no student aid at all.

Finally, the students were asked if there was a system under which they received non-repayable grants would they attend university? This time, there was a marked jump in the positive responses, with 62 percent of the grade 9 students and 63 percent of the grade 10 students responding that they would attend university.

The authors of the report firmly concluded that there was only one way to guarantee universal accessibility to higher education, and that was through a student awards system of all grants:

"A grant scheme is essential if an awards programme is to have a long term effect of breaking down the class barriers to equality of opportunity. A loan bank scheme would only serve to accentuate the problem."

REASONS BEHIND CUTBACKS

During the 1960's the principle of universal accessibility to higher education was widely proclaimed and was assumed to be the final goal of the Ontario government. In reality, however, that was the period in which the taxpayers of Ontario were being called upon to finance the building of the physical facilities so necessary to produce the new scientific and technologically trained manpower so badly needed by Ontario's industries.

Democratization of access (a goal obviously never intended to be realized) was merely part of the sales pitch used by government and industry to sell the extremely rapid development of higher education. Now that the physical facilities for churning out university educated manpower are already built, we find these same spokesmen arguing against government support of higher education.

In order to retreat from the democratic principles temporarily to account the economic realities of the province. However, a programme of reorientation could be accomplished through a gradual phasing procedure.

The first step in this procedure would be for the government to reduce the loan ceiling from $800 back to $600, and to increase the cost of living allowance from $32 per week to $47. A further schedule of improvement could naturally ensue.

Secondly, any discussion concerning increasing the funds allocated by the Ontario Student Awards Programme, be unrealistic to suggest that this broader social reform be implemented, it is no less realistic than the view of those who believe that universal accessibility to higher education can be accomplished any other way.

For the government to do anything less, and for the government to still hope to maintain universities as a means of producing an enlightened society, is for the government to continue to do what they are doing at present, and that is partaking in a shabby indulgence in rhetorical hypocrisy.

term effect of breaking down the class barriers to equality of opportunity."

OFS urges students to write MPPs

WATERLOO (CUP) — An Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) executive member at the University of Waterloo is urging students on his campus and across Ontario to write to their local members of provincial Parliament protesting the Ontario government's financial cutbacks and to urge their parents to do the same.

Sahen Roberts, the executive member, says that mass street demonstrations, like those urged by Brock University students, is not the best or only way to protest the cuts. "It's far more effective to write your MPPs than to spend a few noisy hours outside Queen's Park demonstrating," he said.

Roberts asked the University of Waterloo (UW) Federation of Students' Council Feb. 2 to send a telegram to Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld.

"We must stand up now," he argued, "or the government will mount up more cutbacks." The current cutbacks are just the "beginning of a trend," Roberts stated.

He also called on the student newspaper, the Chevron, to produce a special issue, as well as placing advertisements in the local newspaper, The Kitchener-Waterloo Record, to publicly explain the effects the cutbacks will have on the universities.

But Roberts alerted student councillors to the possible negative reaction from the community to the university's financial plight, by quoting a Feb. 1 editorial from the Record that condemned students and professors at Carleton University for protesting the provincial cutbacks.

The Record editorial charged students and faculty with disrespect for the average taxpayer by staging strikes to debate reduced government spending in education, Roberts said.

The cutbacks in education were triggered Nov. 18 when Auld said that overall grants to the university-college system for 1975-76 would be increased by about 16 percent.

Ontario university presidents were unanimous in condemning the increase as being, in effect, a cutback. They argued that on a per student basis the provincial grants increased by only 7.4 percent.

OFS spokespersons in Toronto say that while the letter writing isn't really official, as it has only been talked about at several meetings, they have held, they think it is a good idea and that students should write the letters.

Guelph student fails; appeals to civil court

GUELPH (CUP) — In a move that may have repercussions in all Canadian universities, a student at the University of Guelph is appealing a course failure to the civil courts on the grounds that he was denied natural justice by the university.

The student, Greg Murray, says that the official mechanism of the university for deciding student grading appeals does not provide the student with the right to a fair hearing according to the legal definition of natural justice.

Murray has received both moral and financial backing from the Guelph students' council in launching his action against the university, and according to students' council president Tim Hawkins, "The faculty are up in arms about it."

Murray received a failing grade in a course last semester and launched an appeal of the instructor's decision through the usual mechanism.

This appeal consists of an initial informal meeting between the student, the instructor and the department chairman. If they are unable to reach an agreement then the student has the right to appeal to the Student Petitions Committee, a sub-committee of the university Senate.

The Student Petitions' Committee meets in closed session, does not allow the student to make a direct representation on his behalf, does not permit the student to call or cross examine the instructor whose judgment is questioned or to be represented by counsel. The committee gives no statement of reasons for its decision and the decision itself is final.

The only access a student has to the committee is to write a letter explaining the reasons for the appeal.

The precedent-making nature of the case stems from an act passed in 1971 by the Ontario Legislature which says that any denial of benefits or rights which are themselves conferred by statute can only be done if an appeal procedure embodying the principles of "natural justice" is made available.

The act, the Statutory Powers Procedures Act, has never been tested in the courts as far as its applicability to university appeal procedures is concerned. Universities have taken the position that the act does not cover such cases.

If the case of the Guelph student is upheld the university might not only have to change its appeal procedures but all appeals rejected since the act came into existence in 1971 may be questioned.

According to Hawkins the university has indicated that it is determined to fight the case in court, even if appeals to overturn adverse rulings are necessary. Hawkins says the president of the university faculty association has already contacted him to see if the case could be dropped and a fairer appeal mechanism established.

BRING YOUR A.T.L. CARD TO VOTE

SAC PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

MARCH 12-13, 1975

The election of the SAC President and two Vice-Presidents will be held on March 12 and 13, 1975. Candidates for these positions must run on a ticket of three: one from either Scarborough College or Erindale College, the second from the Faculty of Arts and Science (St. George Campus), and the third from the professional faculties.

Any University of Toronto student who has paid the SAC fee is eligible to vote and run. All full-time undergraduate students have had this fee deducted automatically.

Tickets must be nominated by 100 SAC fees-paying students and submit a deposit of $25 along with the nomination form. This deposit will be refunded to any ticket receiving at least one-third of the votes of the winning ticket.

Complete election rules and nomination forms will be available at the SAC office (928-4909) after February 24, 1975.

NOMINATIONS OPEN: February 24, 1975 at 9:00 am

NOMINATIONS CLOSE: February 29, 1975 at 5:00 pm deliberately, some anti-O'Donohue supporters say — whatever was to have been said wasn't, and will have to be said tomorrow night — or never.

There will be no dearth of issues to fight about:

- auditors' found the books to be 18 months behind and sums of money unaccounted for this fall.

- three leading council administrators resigned — Paul Carson, Jean Bubba (pub manager) and Westman — all accusing O'Donohue and his executive of interference.

- a $1,000 salary increase for O'Donohue to $4,200 will come up, which was especially contentious because it was discovered O'Donohue had already drawn $3,100 of his $3,200.

- charges and counter-charges of interception and destruction of private mail, political meddling, obstruction, alteration of council minutes, are among the disputes. Ordinarily, these matters would probably be forgotten, because presidential aspirants would be too busy preparing their campaigns to open old wounds.

But not this year, because the rumor is that O'Donohue will run for council president again.

Earlier this week, O'Donohue did not confirm or deny he might rerun. O'Donohue said, "I would give the matter some consideration. I can't see any leader on the horizon.

If they want to get together and get me to run, then I'm interested." But council member Brian Toole offered a different version, saying "as late as last Thursday, he was interested in running.

"He asked me to run with him, and offered me a choice of several positions if we were successful."

Last night, O'Donohue agreed he had had such a discussion with Toole, but termed it merely a "feeler."

"I'm not going to run again, and you can quote me on that!" said O'Donohue. "I welcome Scott (Cavalier) bringing up that letter at tomorrow's meeting."

"I have nothing to win and nothing to lose by it. Let people say what they want."

O'Donohue said he thought Cavalier, a presidential aspirant, was trying to make political hay over a "very petty issue."

"If Scott runs (for council president) he'll lose," warned O'Donohue. "He has no credibility with the students. Last year's elections proved that."

O'Donohue handily defeated Cavalier last year for council president.

"Why don't they ever give me credit for my accomplishments?" said O'Donohue.

"I founded the stables, got the administration to remove the word "probation" from hundreds of students' transcripts, got them to agree to improve inadequate study areas.

"I'm responsible for the publication of two course evaluations, which have never been done before in Scarborough, got the pub open five days a week among other things."

"My concern was to improve the academic milieu here, rather than running on a dance committee platform, like some other council members," said O'Donohue.

"I hope next year's council will concern itself about academic quality so it will be relevant to the students here," said O'Donohue.

Indians refuse to leave Natives' Embassy

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Indians who have been occupying an abandoned carbide mill on Ottawa's Victoria Island since last September are still there, despite an eviction notice from the National Capital Commission (NCC) which owns the building.

The 30 to 50 Indians told reporters as the Jan. 5, 6 pm deadline passed that the only way they would leave the building, which they have named the Native Peoples' Embassy, is if NCC "carries us out."

The NCC, which claims that it suddenly needs the long abandoned mill for renovations, has said that it will not use force or bring trespassing charges against the natives.

A group spokesman said that "things will really start to happen" if the NCC tries to freeze out the occupants by cutting heat and water supplies. Such a tactic is unlikely in any case, said another spokesman since it would mean freezing up the pipes and destroying the plumbing and heating system.

The Indians first occupied the building after the Native Peoples' Caravan demonstrated last September on Parliament Hill. One of the major issues in the demonstration was the Indians' complaints about living conditions on reserves.

The group in the unofficial Embassy say that the abandoned building is better than reserve housing.

Bureau science writer Robert Steklasa said he was surprised at Bertin's removal, calling Bertin the "driving force of the news bureau," and "a very dedicated man, who knew a lot about the university."

Steklasa said he thought the Bulletin had improved during Bertin's tenure, adding "had he stayed around, it would have improved even more."

Bertin, a former science editor for The Financial Post and The Toronto Star, came to the news bureau as science editor in 1964, and was appointed director in June, 1973.

He is the author of six books, including Atom Harvest, hailed by the Times Literary Supplement as an outstanding journalistic achievement, and Target 2067: Canada's Second Century, a collection of visions of the future written for centennial year.

Educated at Cambridge before the war in natural sciences, and after the war in ancient and modern languages, Bertin was also a science correspondent for the London Daily Telegraph.

Wilson, holder of a BA in philosophy and English from U of T, edited the Trinity College newsletter from 1968 to 1972, for which she won the American Alumni Council Newsweek Award for best alumni newsletter in North America. In 1973-74, she was assistant to the principal of Bishop Strachan School.

ELECTION ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE -

- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Trinity, Erindale, New College, Innis, Seats available - 1 in each of University, Victoria, St. Michael's,
Seats available - 1 part-time student - Woodsworth

Varsity golf tip number six added fundamentals-continued

By BILL WHITCOMBE
The little goodies in today's column are a continuation of last week's description of fundamentals to a good golf swing.

A Initiate backswing with shoulder and body turn: the backswing should be initiated with a simple 90 degree turn of the shoulders and a turning of the left side, the left shoulder turning underneath the chin, and the lower body turning to a lesser degree, approximately 45 degrees.

This is known as a "one-piece" takeaway. The weight moves 60 percent to 70 percent onto the right side and the left knee makes a subtle turn inwards towards the right knee.

The arms and hands do not lift the club — the wrists remain firm and fully extended throughout the backswing as the club head is kept as close to the ground as possible through the start of the takeaway.

There is no conscious cocking of the wrists at the top of the backswing, as a wrist cock will occur naturally at the start of the downswing.

B Swing from inside to straight: the plane of a golf swing is a slanting plane rather than a completely vertical plane. As a result, the clubhead moves back away from the ball slightly inside a line running towards the target. The club continues up in this same plane until the hands and club are over the right shoulder at the top of the backswing.

From this position, the club should move down towards the ball in the same plane and should come into the ball from slightly inside the line of flight, rather than outside that line.

You should make an effort to extend the hands and arms from inside the line to straight along the line through the ball as long as possible in order to get the ball started off on the proper line towards the target.

C The back of the left hand must be driving towards the target at impact. The back of the left hand and the clubface should be reasonably parallel with one another at address. If no conscious wrist cock occurs as the body turn takes the club away from the ball, then it follows that the back of the left wrist and the clubface will remain in their same relative positions through the backswing.

Thus, in pulling the club through the ball with the left side and with the back of the left hand driving towards the target, the clubface will naturally come into the hitting area facing towards the target at impact.

D The golf swing is a rhythmic continuous motion: the golf swing has a smooth motion from start to finish. Once the downswing has started, the hands and arms should have no feeling of sudden acceleration at any point and should flow smoothly through and beyond the ball. Any effort to "snap the wrists" or hit hard with the right hand will assuredly result in a missed shot.

Clubhead speed must be a factor, but it must come as a result of a good lower body move and resulting centrifugal force as the arms lead the clubhead through the hitting area.

This leads you to a finish position that finds all the weight on the left side, the hands high, the head back, and the back arched with the hips thrust towards and square to the target. A good finish is a sure sign that a sound fundamental move through the ball has occurred.

Women's Weekend Roundup

By FERN BRAND

On Saturday the Lady Blues intermediate basketball played Dawson College from Montreal and dropped a close one 45 to 38.

The Blues played an exciting fast game. They played a man-to-man defence, sticking to their opponents like fly-paper.

The Ladies seem to have a trend of slow starts against most of their opponents. This seemed to be the main factor contributing to their loss in this game.

The Ladies came up in the second half to close the score by doubling their points.

However, the comeback fell short as they did not gain enough points and lost a close game.

The University of Toronto's Women's badminton team gained first place in the Ontario Badminton Championships last weekend at Waterloo. This was the final section of a four-part series.

The team players were Vivien Cazzarini, Leilah Edroos, Mary Fournier, Wendy Stone, Susan Cooper, and Wendy MacKeigan.

All played excellently, and placed with first or second in their individual events. Edross and MacKeigan were the undefeated individual winners.

In the doubles, Cazzarini and Edross, Fournier and MacKeigan, Stone and Cooper, displayed excellent team effort and managed to capture first and second places in all their events.

The Lady Blues exhibited excellent team work in the OWIAA ski meet at Blue Mountain last weekend.

It was a two-day combined championship, with a giant slalom on Thursday and a slalom on Friday.

The women's team standings gave Western first place followed by Queen's, Waterloo, and in fifth place, Toronto.

Separately, Waterloo took top spot in the giant slalom. Queen's was second and in fifth place again came Varsity.

In the slalom, on Friday, Western won first place honours with Guelph second and Queen's third. This time the Lady Blues moved up to fourth place.

In the individual standings of the giant slalom, Caroline Oughten of Waterloo stood first, while Ginny Honeyman of Queen's took second. Toronto's best finish was 12th place captured by Peg McTague.

Other Blues' finishes were: Cindy Rogers—15th, Marion Howard—19th, Mary Jane Tropea—23rd, and Susan Aiken—24th.

In the slalom, Cindy Rogers was 8th, Peg McTague was 14th, Marion Howard was 16th, and Mary Jane Tropea 21st.

Basketball Blues lose 76-61 to York Yeomen

By JOHN MIKA

Last night on the picturesque campus of York University, the University of Toronto basketball Blues met the Yeomen in the most important game of Varsity's season.

Toronto sauntered onto the court in the Tait-McKenzie Building feeling confident after their destruction of RMC 108-48 Friday and secure in the knowledge that York had suffered two humbling defeats on the weekend to Ottawa and Carleton.

Believe it or not, Varsity lost 76-61. With the win York moves into a third place tie with Carleton in the OUA eastern division, but that position is by no means secure as York must finish the season against league-leading Laurentian while Toronto faces winless RMC and Queen's.

Varsity committed numerous turnovers and were forced to come back from two 10-point deficits. Unfortunately, Blues' rallies lost steam as they approached York's tally. Blues trailed 33-29 at the half.

The quick break tactics Varsity employed so well against RMC were stilled by the Yeomen's defensive play. Their full court press unnerved the Blues, forcing errors and erratic outside shooting.

If the Blues played badly, and they did, the referees played even worse. Numerous three-second violations received no attention from the refs, provoking obscene yells from the large crowd of York supporters.

Most of the swearing provided a good summation of the refereeing. Toronto scored on a dismal 37 percent of their shots from the field while York shot a more respectable 47 percent. Leading the way to defeat with 14 points was Randy Filinski, followed by Brian Skivington with 12. High scorers for York were Galka with 20 and Pietrobon with 15.

The Blues have two games remaining and unless the army coerces the government into passing a law providing for the conscription of towering basketball players into the RMC ranks, Varsity will gain at least two points this weekend, but a win against Queen's, a mediocre team like York, is another question.

It appears that the inconsistencies which plagued the Blues' performances in the early stages of the season will continue to plague them for the remainder of the year.

York and Carleton are now two points ahead of the Blues, and though the Blues have a game in hand, it is likely to fall out, if last night's game is any indication of play to come.

Intramural and Varsity athletics lock horns over money divisions

CALGARY (CUP) — The dispute between the University of Calgary's students' union and the University Athletic Board (UAB) is quickly drawing to a close as the abolishment of the UAB becomes a near certainty.

Major criticisms have been levied against the board, which controls both intercollegiate and intramural sport, by the union over the past two years. Students' union representatives have charged the board with "intercollegiate favouritism" because intramural sports receive only 17 percent of the UAB's budget. They have also criticized the board for a lack of student representation, over-representation of the Physical Education school and unfair funding.

Prior to Christmas break, however, a referendum aimed at withdrawing student support of Varsity athletics was overwhelmingly defeated by University of Calgary students.

Administration and student union concern over the causes and results of the referendum prompted a meeting in early January which began negotiations to revamp UAB.

According to Robert Westoff, former student representative to UAB, "representatives of the president's office took the students' side and insisted students were not properly represented in the power structure."

Proposals from the Physical Education Department were presented to representatives of student union, the president's office, the grad students association, and the physical education school.

"They did nothing to change UAB," said Westoff, "so we suggested intramurals and intercollegiate sport be separated."

Several negotiation meetings resulted in the proposed creation of two committees to control University of Calgary athletics.

The Recreational Services Committee (campus recreation) to be under student union authority, will conduct intramural activity while the Athletic Committee, under the Physical Education School's authority, controls varsity sport.

"Everyone had to make concessions," Westoff said, "but if the proposal is accepted by the Board of Governors, students could have authority and power over their own recreational monies."

The proposed Campus Recreation Board is a nine person committee, five of whom are student representatives. The student union has direct control over the finances which will be collected by an athletic fee.

The proposed Athletic Committee will also collect a student fee but request a university grant as well.

Both committees will conduct referendums in order to levy the intended fees. Students will be asked to pay $7 per term to campus recreation and $3 per term to the athletic committee.

Westoff, although unhappy with students subsidizing varsity sports, said, "no longer will students be giving the majority of their athletic monies to fund a varsity elite."

Maybe no rock concerts at Varsity

By MIKE FRIEND

For the umpteenth time, the men's athletic directorate yesterday, faced a request to rent Varsity Stadium during the summer months for rock concerts.

At the meeting, David Bluestein asked for four dates for concerts in return for which he promised to guarantee a minimum $40,000. He would be willing to pay $10,000 in cash plus a $30,000 bond in advance.

One of the main concerns of the directorate was damage to the field. Bluestein apparently had an answer for that one as well. He would provide a fireproof, waterproof tarp to protect the field as well as a clean-up crew.

The directorate felt these proposals were too good to be true, and in its ever vigilant manner, gave Bluestein two weeks to prove he is able to fulfil his promises.

Various soccer applications for rentals seemed to fare much better than the rock concerts. The Olympic Committee rented the stadium for eight games for the summer of 1976, at a cost of $65,000 or 15 percent (plus costs) of the gate. Conceivably, if all the games were sold out at an average ticket price of $5.00, the 15 percent figure could go as high as $140,000.

The Canadian Soccer Association rented four dates for this summer at the bargain hasegment price of $2,500 per date. The Metros—Croatians also rented the stadium for their 11 home games at a price of $38,500, in advance.

Finally, the last piece of momentous business touched on by the directorate was the old chestnut — Erindale joining the OUA basketball league. All the members of the august directorate cried and wailed in sympathy with Erindale's plight, but in the end the result was the same—tough titties for Erindale.

X-Country skiers place third at RMC

Last weekend was the third and final weekend of intercollegiate cross-country skiing competition. The meet was hosted by RMC and was staged on part of the Armed Forces base at Kingston.

The overall winner in the relay and 15 km. men's individual was Queen's, led by their indomitable Mike Dyer. Second place went to Guelph while Toronto took third followed by RMC.

The high placing of both Queen's and Guelph is largely due to their great stamina and tough competitive spirit obviously rooted in superior training.

Varsity's slump was partly due to the lack of accessible snow during the training season and partly to the loss of Doug Garfield and Ken Sidney, both a source of inspiration and skill for Varsity as well as top competitors.

Next year, Mike Dyer will be lost to Queen's. Toronto, on the other hand, loses none of its veterans.

Weekend Race Times

- Relay
 1. Queen's 79.18 min.
 2. Guelph 79.34 min.
 3. Toronto 81.59 min.
 4. RMC 85.32 min.
 Men's Individuals
 1. Dyer (Queen's) 70.47 min.
 2. Niinimaa (Tor.) 73.38 min.
 3. Neumann (Guelph) 74.65 min.

Volleyball

By TOM WOODS

This is it, sports fans, the night you have all been waiting for. Tonight, in the main gym at Hart House, otherwise known as the Black Hole to regular readers, will be staged what could be the final volleyball game of the season in interfac circles.

SGS I will take on Scarborough and if the Grads win they will be undisputed first division volleyball champs.

If, on the other hand, Scar should win tonight's encounter, another match will be played on Feb. 19 to decide the championship.

Varsity wrestlers prep for Finals

By LANCE BAKER

This weekend, Toronto's wrestling team will be off to Hamilton, for the OUA finals at McMaster. Competing in this circuit are most of the outstanding wrestlers from Canada, with Western and Guelph contributing their share of National champions. Toronto will be trying to slide into third or fourth place, with hopes of passing Waterloo for that third spot.

Coach Rabel is pleased with the results of this year's team, despite the fact that over half of the team being sent to the OUA finals consist of first year men. This year, Toronto will be sending a full twelve man team; one member in each weight class. This should be the Blues' best showing in years. The following is this year's edition of the Wrestling Blues, with some individual highlights:

100 lbs. — Leonard Gang: First place in Queen's Invitational, Ryerson Open and Ontario Greco-Roman Championships.

118 lbs. — Alan Kosugi: Second place in Toronto Novice Championships.

126 lbs. — Sam Turcchio: 134 lbs. — Kirk Osadetz: Second place in RMC Open 142 lbs. — George Multamaki: First in Central Ontario Winter Games Trials.

150 lbs. — Roger Vachon
 158 lbs. — Ed Rector: Third place in Central Ontario Winter Games Trials.

167 lbs. — Lorne Basskin:

Second place in Toronto Novice Championships

177 lbs. — Glen May: Fourth in Ontario Winter Games Trials, and fourth in Montreal Open.

190 lbs. — Doug Duncan
 220 lbs. — Chris Preobrazenski: First, in Ontario

Greco-Roman Championships. Hwywt. — John Martini:

Second place at Ontario Novice.

Rob Moore will not be at the OUA's because he is presently in Alberta representing Ontario in the Canada Winter Games.

Three news bureau staffers resign

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Three members of the university news bureau staff have resigned as a result of the dismissal of former director Leonard Bertin.

Science writers Eric Grace and Robert Steklasa, and administrative secretary Camille Dayaram have submitted resignations effective Feb. 28, less than one week after Bertin was told to vacate his office.

Bertin's removal was made official Wednesday by the external affairs committee of the Governing Council, as was his replacement by James' former executive assistant Elizabeth Wilson.

Wilson was put in Bertin's place before the committee had approved the move; her old position was advertised as vacant before Bertin was formally replaced.

Steklasa, who had been with the bureau 10 months, said, "The removal of the former director is a situation which I personally cannot tolerate. The move was done with little appreciation of Leonard Bertin's many talents, but even more importantly showed a callous disregard" for his loyalty.

"I do not," Steklasa said, in his letter of resignation, "consider people merely as some sort of magical machines, to be manipulated and disregarded at the whim of some high-ranking official. I find this type of person, to be quite frank, repugnant."

"The silent, secret manoeuvres which led to Mr. Bertin's removal have no place at the University of Toronto. It is, after all, a public institution, and not a corporation. Please excuse my youthful and naive idealism."

Steklasa said he has "no plans at the moment."

Eric Grace, a former post-doctoral fellow and lecturer at Erindale College, said he was resigning "in protest at the erosion of democratic principles manifested in this university in recent months, in particular to the replacement of the director of the University News Bureau.

Grace, who has been with the bureau since April, said he was resigning "without any prospect of a job," although he said while looking for a position he intended to do some work on scientific papers he had postponed.

Camille Dayaram's resignation was offered as a "result of the major changes which have taken place in the News Bureau recently."

The news bureau which will now be called the Department of Information Services — is responsible for all the university's public relations activities, in addition to publishing the two house organs, the U of T Bulletin and The Graduate.

The director of the news bureau has previously enjoyed salary and stature commensurate with that of the head of an academic division. Before being made responsible to the vice-president for external affairs, the director was responsible directly to the president.

Newly-appointed bureau director Elizabeth Wilson said she had no comment on the resignations, but said the long-term future "looks very good" for the bureau.

External affairs vice-president Norman James also had no comment, although he did say the turnover in news bureau staff recently had been "astronomical," and he had understood one of the two had planned to leave anyway.

Both Steklasa and Grace intend to pursue careers as science writers. Steklasa said he had been despondent before Christmas about his job, but that he had returned full of enthusiasm.

Former news bureau director Bertin said he had "tried to dissuade each of them from this decision, not only because each leaves the news bureau without another job to go to, but also because I see an organization falling apart that all of us in the bureau have worked to create over the last 18 months."

Bertin, news bureau director since June, 1973, was ordered by James Feb. 7 to take six months leave of absence, while Wilson was appointed in his place.

Bertin had been with the bureau as a science writer since 1964.

Leonard Bertin: his dismissal sparked resignations.

Advisory committee not consulted on changes

The committee which was given the job of recommending the appointment of Leonard Bertin as news bureau director in 1972 was not consulted on this week's appointment of his successor.

Writer and Massey College master Robertson Davies, chairman of a committee formed in 1969 by former president Claude Bissell as an editorial advisory board to the news bureau director, said he thought it "would have been normal to consult" the committee before making a decision.

Davies said the committee members "were very much surprised" to hear that changes had been planned for the news bureau.

"If they (the committee members) are not going to be consulted, what are they doing?" Davies queried.

Committee member Kenneth McNaught, a history professor, agreed. "What else do you have an advisory committee for?" he asked.

The committee wrote to U of T president John Evans Jan. 20 to ask for a meeting on the proposed changes, but was referred to external affairs vice-president Norman James. James and the committee have not yet met.

As vice-president for external affairs, James is responsible for the operations of the news bureau to the external affairs committee of the Governing Council.

James said he "advised" the committee of his intentions, but that he didn't think he had "any responsibility to call the committee."

James added he was "ready and willing to meet with the committee at its convenience," but that he thought the initiative should come from the committee.

Davies said he has been unable to arrange a mutually satisfactory time. In addition to Davies and McNaught, committee members include philosophy professor Larry Lynch, political economist Paul Fox and management studies professor Maurice Hecht.

SAC to hold referendum after all

Student reaction to the controversial new athletics complex will be tested next month in a campus-wide referendum, the Students' Administrative Council decided Wednesday.

SAC agreed at its general meeting to hold the referendum March 12 and 13 in conjunction with council's own presidential elections.

Students will be asked if they favor construction of the complex as it is presently designed, and also if they are willing to pay for the building's operating costs with increased student athletic fees or a special levy.

However, SAC emphatically rejected any plan which would force students to pay a capital levy to subsidize construction costs.

The present design will likely result in a construction cost of about $11 million but the university claims to have access to only about $7 million.

In a meeting with SAC representatives earlier this week, university president John Evans casually floated the idea of a student capital levy or avoiding the referendum by either phasing the construction schedule or by redesigning the complex.

"There is no way students should have to pay a cent towards the capital costs of the athletics complex," SAC president Seymour Kanowitch told Wednesday's council meeting.

"The university can easily provide all the required funds either from the sesquicentennial fund contributions or by selling some of its own land holdings," he added.

Prior to approving the referendum, SAC passed two motions endorsing the present design of the athletics complex and rejecting criticisms offered by the local community groups.

Alan McAllister, president of the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association, said his group is not "unalterably opposed" to the building but wants a complete reassessment of the design since the university administration has "only informed the community after the fact but never involved us in the actual planning."

McAllister produced a series of internal administration memos and letters which indicated that Evans and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway had held a series of meetings with city officials, including Mayor David Crombie, in an apparently successful attempt to gain an exemption for the building from the city's interim development criteria.

McAllister also charged Conway threatened last October to build two 45-foot high buildings at the corner of Harbord St. and Spadina Ave. if the residents persisted in opposing the exemption.

Kanowitch told the meeting Conway and Jack Dimond, her special assistant for the athletic complex, had phoned him Wednesday with completely differing versions of the administration policy regarding student capital levy.

No sooner had Dimond assured him there was no Simcoe Hall support for the student levy, Kanowitch said, than seconds later Conway called to say that Dimond "has been busy on his doctoral thesis and doesn't know all the new details."

According to Kanowitch, Conway then indicated the administration might support a student capital levy "since the women seem to want it."

This was a reference to the Wednesday afternoon general meeting of the Women's Athletic Association at which many speakers endorsed a student capital-levy if necessary to guarantee that the Scarborough reps accused of forging proxies

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

A stunned Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) last night heard third year representative Brian Toole charge "that a member or members of the SCSC have used proxies to their own advantage by forging them."

Toole's charge came as a complete surprise to the council which expected to deal with the letter from former stable manager Carol Westman criticizing president John O'Donohue with competence and interference.

Toole said, "Legal advice has indicated there are three possible courses of action:

1. "The member or members involved may quietly resign;
2. "If (they) will not resign the documents can be examined by experts of forensic science to conclusively prove they are forgeries. The council would then be forced to impeach the guilty parties."

3. If council follows either of these two courses, then Toole stated he "would be morally obliged to make available the evidence ... to the Metro police."

Toole said, "If I am forced to do this I shall," but he said he prefers council deal with it internally.

Metro police have the resources to verify that the documents are forged, Toole warned. If the police choose to act the member(s) involved could face a prison sentence, if found guilty.

Wishing to avoid this, Toole suggested that the documents be examined by handwriting experts at the forensic science laboratory and that council schedule another meeting before the upcoming March council elections to get the matter resolved.

Toole said, however, he would take no action until Monday in order "to allow the member(s) involved to speak to me" about it.

The council later gave Toole permission to go to a forensic science laboratory.

Toole refused to mention any names saying he believed "personalities have no place in a matter of such great importance. He said he would wait until council decided what course of action it would take.

In his statement Toole also criticized president O'Donohue's $1,000 salary increase because the motion did not receive a two-thirds majority vote.

"The question ... is not if the increase was deserved but if it is constitutional," Toole said. He called upon O'Donohue to return the increase or else prove the raise was constitutional.

Scott Cavalier, a possible SCSC presidential candidate, also joined Toole in criticizing O'Donohue's raise, saying it was unconstitutional.

Toole later said his information on the alleged illegal use of proxies came from "a variety of sources." Until a new constitution came into effect in December, council members could get proxy voting from absent council members and use as many of these proxy votes for as long as they wanted.

Council attendance has rarely been high, with not more than 15 of 26 members usually attending.

Since December use of proxy voting has been severely curtailed.

Dismissal 'makes mockery of Governing Council': Bertin

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Meeting in closed session, Wednesday, Governing Council's external affairs committee approved the appointment of Elizabeth Wilson as director of the newly-named Department of Information Services.

Wilson, previously executive assistant to external affairs vice-president Norman James, who recommended the appointment, replaces former University News Bureau director Leonard Bertin.

James ordered Bertin Feb. 7 to take a six month leave of absence, after Bertin refused options presented by James of either returning as a science writer at reduced salary, or taking leave until the June expiry of his contract.

Bertin was allowed to address the meeting, although his request for the proceedings to be open was denied by committee chairperson Betty Kennedy.

Bertin said the meeting reminded him of the Star Chamber, adding he hoped the committee had done him the courtesy of not discussing his case in his absence.

The manner of his dismissal, Bertin said, "makes a mockery of the whole Governing Council arrangement."

"Even though the regulations of Governing Council clearly state that the director of the News Bureau cannot be appointed, suspended or removed without the approval of this committee, the decision to replace me was announced at the time when your last month's meeting had been cancelled.

"I was ordered to quit my office only two working days before you were due to hold a meeting at which the whole matter could have been discussed.

"Furthermore, although I only learned of the decision from Norman James on Thursday, Jan 16, statements had already been made earlier in the same week at a meeting in Toronto of the American Alumni Association which led an information officer in another university to phone my office to find out whether there was any chance of him getting my job.

"In the same week, I understand, Mr. James made known to others the name of the person he intended to put in my place."

Bertin said he asked to speak to the committee "only because I wish to protect a professional reputation that has been established by hard work over a period of more than 30 years."

Only a month after James had sent him a letter saying they were "on the same wave length," Bertin said James told him he didn't look happy in his job, and that he had checked with the personnel department to find another post for Bertin.

"Is this the way the university now wants to operate?" Bertin asked. "You are now being asked to rubber stamp and take responsibility for this type of behavior."

Graduate student committee member Kitty Hoffman said the committee "satisfied ourselves the procedure was fair," and that the decision to replace Bertin "wasn't a whim" of James.

Committee chairperson Kennedy refused to speak to The Varsity, other than to say that the matter would be confidential until seen by the executive committee and full council.

James said the committee also ratified his "entire proposal" for the revamped news bureau, which included the hiring of a public relations officer for the department, and a change of name to the Department of Information Services.

James said he wanted to "expand and make more attractive" the services offered by the department, both on and off campus. He added it was important for the university "to present its best face to the public."

As part of the change, the official administration newspaper, the U of T Bulletin, will "develop a more interesting and appealing format," James said.

Last fall, a task force on public relations reporting to the external affairs committee recommended the Bulletin be expanded into a university-wide paper.

News bureau hirings under probe

The president of the University of Toronto Staff Association is investigating recent hirings at the university news bureau to determine if they were made properly.

Betty Connelly said yesterday she found circumstances surrounding the hiring of staff "upsetting, to say the least," and she expected someone to file a grievance over the entire incident.

The director of the new Department of Information Services, Elizabeth Wilson, was hired without any competition being opened for the post. Wilson was formerly executive assistant to the man who hired her, external affairs vice-president Norman James.

Another new position of public relations officer was filled by an outsider although Connelly said she understood the competition had only been advertised internally.

Normally, promotions within the university are opened to university staff for one week only before being made public. Connelly said the manner in which both positions were filled "seems strange."

Connelly also said the new appointments "don't do much for the morale" of the non-academic staff, she represents, adding it called into question the university's entire promotion system.

No Varg meeting but hacks need place to sleep, party

Yes, loyal Varsity staffers there will not be a staff meeting today, but instead a gathering of loyal hacks to provide sleeping space for other newspaper people from all over Ontario visiting the Varg this weekend.

Others who can't face the thought of no Friday staff meeting can join the exciting party as we wait to see who brings in applications for editor. ORCUP delegates will be arriving all afternoon. Any Varsity staffers are welcome to attend the Ontario Regional Canadian University Press conference which lasts until Sunday.

The social highlight will be yet another party at the east-end mansion of next year's CUP vice-president, affectionately known as "The People's Right to Know." Party is on Saturday evening, details at the Varg office.

Immigration paper attacked as racist

By ROB PRITCHARD

"The Federal government's Green Paper on immigration is certainly not a racist document," Freda Hawkins, an NDPer and immigration specialist, told a hostile audience at St. Lawrence Centre Wednesday night.

"But I don't think it tells us enough," Hawkins hastened to add.

Hawkins was one of four panelists at a forum on the green paper which became an angry attack on fascism and racism in Canada.

Richard Tait, chairman of the Canadian Immigration and Population study, described the four-volume document as a discussion of present and future immigration policies as well as statistical analysis and case studies of immigrants in Canada.

"The green paper is not a statement of policy," Tait insisted, describing the document as simply a basis for future debate by Canadians on the subject.

But Marlene Green, administrative co-ordinator of the Black Education project, doubted four volumes, which retail at $12.50, were accessible enough to most Canadians.

Green attacked the present policy of employment visas, whereby a foreigner may work in Canada without immigrant status, provided no Canadian has applied for the job.

She said it was a "response to capitalism." "Canada is forced to open its doors" to inexpensive labor, without adopting such workers as citizens.

York University humanities professor and prominent NDPer John Harney attacked the green paper's statement that Canada's population should not be substantially increased. This statement was the paper's justification of limiting population.

"If you want a vintage year for population growth, take 1913," Harney suggested, pointing to the 400,000 new Canadians of that year, who represented 12 percent of the population.

Harney also questioned the paper's fear of prospective immigrants' "adaptability," pointing to the "waves of people," including the Irish, Ukrainians, and Italians, who have migrated to Canada.

"After all, the original Canadians adapted to the whites," Harney added.

Hawkins tried to defend the green paper and Canada's immigration policy, which is "not only concerned about who is admitted, but how they are admitted." Hawkins commended the paper's opposition to the "brain drain," an expression signifying the emigration of a poor nation's most intelligent citizens to wealthier countries.

"Our selection system is good because it's simple," Hawkins claimed, but added selection of immigrants "must be more responsive" to the "accelerating world demand" for entrance into Canada.

However, she opposed some recommendations advocating a "distribution policy," by which immigrants would be encouraged to settle in areas other than the major cities.

The audience question period became a series of prolonged speeches by members of various left-wing groups who protested the deportation of 1,500 Haitians and black power advocate Rosie Douglas.

Moderator Art Eggleton, a Toronto alderman, had difficulty maintaining control of the meeting. At one point he threatened to adjourn the meeting if order could not prevail.

Douglas, invited by Green to speak to the audience, protested his threatened deportation for his participation in an illegal 1969 Montreal sit-in.

He felt Canada was violating policies against racism which "enshrined in the United Nations."

Hawkins voiced her disappointment at the disorder which prevented the planned discussion of immigration policies and not individual cases.

"What is depressing about this meeting is the people in the audience who have worked in immigration who have remained silent," Hawkins said.

All-faculty soc body draws student protest

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

The sociology department has set up an informal all-faculty five-man committee to examine the programs and administrative structure of the department.

Committee member Jim Turk said although there was certainly opposition in some quarters to student parity, "The motion wasn't formulated out of that intention."

Sociology students now have equal representation and voting on all decision-making bodies in the department, and it is thought that some faculty members want to change the parity structure.

Sociology Course Union spokesperson Janet Maxwell said there is some opposition to the faculty committee, noting that member S. D. Clark has never previously sat on a committee within the department.

Clark said there is to be a student meeting today at 3 pm today in room 229 of the Borden building to consider setting up a parallel committee to the faculty group and to speak with department chairman Irving Zeitlin.

Maxwell said the areas of student concern are teaching and how students can become more informed about the department.

"Some people are dissatisfied about teaching," Maxwell said, "but this hasn't been brought to light."

The committee will probably examine the department's graduate program following its recent assessment by the disciplinary assessment group of the Council of Ontario Universities (COU).

The COU has reviewed all graduate programs in the province and concluded there should be only three graduate sociology schools. Those at Carleton and York universities have been recommended, with the Toronto and McMaster programs to be re-assessed.

Any committee recommendations will be forwarded to the department assembly, Turk said.

He said there was no agreement to the direction of the committee but it hoped to "generate as many ideas as possible."

The broad terms of reference for the committee are an assessment of the structure and a general review of the department, Turk said.

Nothing the structure has been in operation for several years, Turk said, past attempts at review hadn't got off the ground.

Simcoe hall mandarins to meet over $ cuts

By JEAN BUBBA

Top university officials are meeting secretly today to agonize over budget priorities, according to SAC president Seymour Kanowitch.

Kanowitch, who says he was not invited to participate, told Wednesday's SAC general meeting numerous painful budget cuts will likely be made because of the university's worsening financial situation.

SAC representatives have collected about 2,000 signatures on a petition being circulated around the campus. SAC executive assistant Chris Allnut urged all council members to intensify their efforts because the U of T Committee on Student Awards will present the petition to the Governing Council sub-committee on admissions and awards next Tuesday.

Preparations for the annual SAC presidential sweepstakes were also completed as council agreed to raise the election campaign subsidy to $500 per ticket and place a full page advertisement in The Varsity March 10 outlining the platforms of the competing entries. Sort of a daily racing form, one SAC hack suggested.

SAC Vice-president Tim Buckley caused a few heads to turn by announcing his resignation as chairman of the elections committee.

Buckley muttered something about "academic pressure," but other members suggested he might be contemplating a run at the SAC roses in addition to the professional faculty seat on Governing Council for which he has already obtained the required 50 signatures.

Kanowitch announced the long-awaited SAC tabloid on hiring, and tenure will be distributed around campus Feb. 25.

"Given the budget cuts, the quality of teaching at U of T will be decided by who is fired, not by who is hired," Kanowitch said.

"If Governing Council votes against putting students on tenure committees, the issue is likely lost for at least five years." The crucial vote is scheduled for the March 20 Governing Council meeting.

"The Varsity is the U of T's answer to The St. Valentine's Day Massacre"

John Evans
Norman James

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Racism inquiry needs top priority

A group of concerned faculty members have met with little success so far in their call for an inquiry into racism at the University of Toronto.

We can't blame former Ontario Human Rights commission chairman Daniel Hill, because he was hired by president John Evans to take the heat off the university on charges of racism from the black and Italian communities.

Only the president has the power to set up a commission which would clear the air of serious charges of racial discrimination and determine whether they have a basis in fact.

So far Evans has done little to indicate his concern for the question. He referred the group of faculty members to Hill when the power obviously rests with Evans' own office.

There are certainly ample grounds for the setting up of a commission. Very serious charges have been levelled at the university on various occasions, particularly over the last 12 months.

Yet the administration's response has been ostrich-like, burying its head in the sand and refusing to admit the problem exists. Evans has refused to denounce racist content in the engineering newspaper, the Toike Oike. He also declined comment on statements by Bette Stephenson, the president of the Canadian Medical Association, who called for quotas on landed immigrants admitted to medical school.

On the other hand Students for a Democratic Society members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas were subjected to an expensive, six week long trial this summer when the Caput convened to convict them for disrupting controversial American urbanologist Edward Banfield's March speech.

The developments of last March, the Banfield incident and the furor over free speech could have been avoided by prompt university action to investigate whether charges against Ian Hector, a doctor charged with racist statements, were justified.

The administration had ample warning with large delegations of Italian workers appearing to demand redress at several Governing Council meetings. Yet Evans made a few confidential inquiries and the matter was dropped.

The U of T administration seems to think it can avoid the problem of racism by pretending it doesn't exist.

We think differently. There must be a wide ranging, open inquiry with submission of briefs and testimony from the university community and interested outsiders on racism at the university.

This inquiry should be conducted by respected outside commissioners, with a background in civil liberties cases. It should have the widest possible latitude to investigate racism in hiring, firing and promotion quotas in professional faculties, course content, textbooks and in campus publications.

Only then can the debate be raised above the shrill charges of the SDS on one hand and the curt denials of the administration on the other.

Racism is a serious issue which must be confronted. If it exists at U of T which seems evident, it must be eradicated.

Poets to Organize

I would like to add a wee paragraph or so to some of that commentary I made in that interview. The need to be Angry, carried in The Varsity Feb. 7.

My comments about the League of Canadian Poets joining the Writer's Union were premature. I suppose I was carried away with the energies of the Writer's Union, but in discussing the problems facing Canadian poets (bad contracts, lousy distribution of poetry books, masochistic librarians) with other members of the League I've come to the conclusion that the poets have begun to organize.

We now have a serious executive, a better course of action, and in the months ahead there'll be some serious changes.

In short, we're getting off our bed of nails.

TTC fares too high

Controller Barbara Greene should be given the necessary cooperation and support by all post-secondary educational institutions in her efforts to reduce TTC fares for students. (The Varsity, Feb. 10, Councillor boasts very little realization, if any, of the fact that most students at post-secondary institutions are struggling their way through school. They are supported either by their spouse or through their limited income received from summer and part-time employment and awards.

Most students at professional and graduate schools are forced to spend a fair amount every day on transport. Besides going to their respective schools they also have to go to different other places to receive practical training which is an integral part of their education.

The Research students have to hop from one library to another to locate the books they desperately need to complete their work. Such students would benefit immensely if they could be issued passes that would permit them unlimited travel within the different university campuses during week days.

I do hope the different student organizations at U of T and elsewhere would join hands with Greene in her laudable effort.

Classics rewritten

The Hart House Music Committee have shown admirable taste in deciding to insert evocative poetry into their display advertising for upcoming concerts. However, it seems necessary to inquire why, in their two most recent ads, (Friday the 7th and Monday the 10th) the heroine of the piece quoted has been named Rosalind?

The work quoted is Ernest Dowson's only well-known poem, but it is famous as Cynara, the name given to the pale lady who comes between Dowson and his enjoyment of carnal desire. There seems no reason for altering the text, and Flower in his edition records no such variant. This rewriting of the classics is not usual among the aesthetes of Hart House. Surely things are not as they once were . . .

Reviewer roasted

HOWEVER, last Friday, the pressure of virtuous living grew almost too much for me to bear. I savagely clubbed a rich old lady to death with a baseball bat and stole $3.50 out of her purse and went to see that "horribly mediocre" movie, Murder on the Orient Express. I went in full knowledge that the movie is full of "racist slurs", "aristocratic relics", "artificial snow-drifts", dirty Imperialists and dirty Cockneys. I prayed to Marx that I would not enjoy such a horribly revisionist movie.

Thanks to you, Varsity, I hated it. While the rest of the audience gripped their seats in anticipation as to whodunit, I sat back, bored and disgusted by such a horribly mediocre movie. For, in Friday's review of the movie in The Varsity (Orient Express: horribly mediocre), reviewer and comrade Mike Edwards, a man who has furthered the cause of revolution so admirably in his pungent reviews, did this Socialist a great favor.

Contrary to all laws of common consideration and literary convention, comrade Edwards revealed whodunit. By revealing the ending of Murder on the Orient Express, he spoiled the whole movie for me, and so I remain a committed and radical socialist. Marx bless you!

McCreavy supported

We wish to state our support for Paul McCreavy, the zoology stores worker who was fired recently by the university.

This is certainly not an isolated case. The university has two sides: the liberal mask that it wears for the students and the public who pay for it, and a heavy hand with which it squeezes the life out of the campus workers in a dozen different ways.

Two years ago, we were fired from the grounds department here. We had done two things that the university could not tolerate. First, we took action to preserve our jobs when 11 of us were laid off by the university. Second, we were organizing a Canadian union to get rid of the American one that we were in at the time.

The university is inefficient, bureaucratic and a depressingly disorganized and pompous employer. They are terribly afraid of any signs of life on the part of the workers and are very good at intimidating those that stand up to them. Many of the workers are immigrant women and find it hard to fight back. When we worked here, it was doubly oppressive because the Service Employees' International Union was collaborating in the intimidation.

Paul McCreavy was fired because he reacted to a rotten and oppressive situation with some show of human emotion and concern — he fought back. He should be reinstated in his job and allowed to join the union of his choice.

When we fought back two years ago, we too were fired. We received enormous support from students, workers and professors alike. We ask that you support Paul McCreavy now in whatever way you can.

OSAP called free money

I am astounded! It will take me a lot longer than two days to calm down after reading the editorial of Wednesday, Feb. 12, Corporate Taxes Must Fund OSAP. Righteous anger prevails.

Just how carelessly was my letter read? (Who was wearing the "blue blinkers" anyways?) Taking a statement ("working people . . . should not have to pay more taxes for university education") out of context is very clever, but surely not worthy of The Varsity. My argument is that they should not pay more (and I included all taxpayers) unless we pay more — or at least consider the rational possibility of being content with the status quo.

However, it is not just the fact that I have been misquoted which worries me. And I am worried. It embarrasses me to think that this paper may actually get off the campus and perhaps (oh, horror!) be thought to represent the thoughts of University of Toronto students. The Marxist-Leninist dogma in which this editorial is steeped surfaces the most blatantly (it is impossible to ignore at any time) when the writer calmly states that "universities in Ontario exist primarily to benefit largely foreign-owned corporations." Needless to say, I have never before heard that theory expounded by anyone who could keep a straight face.

Naturally, many other questions arise. If OSAP is not, "by any stretch of the imagination," a government handout, it is difficult to know what to call free money which students receive from the government. Life painted by you is pretty boring — a free university education served up at the expense of the taxpayers (SSSHH — don't let this out! Upper income people work too), and then a thrilling job as one of "technical and business elite" in a corporation. (OFY, UIC anyone?) Yawn. Gimme that old-time work ethic.

And at the risk of sounding noble, let me make it clear that I have not received money from "parental wealth" nor from "a summer job obtained through connections." Ergo: it can be done.

Raising personal income taxes for upper income brackets (tantamount to taxing incentive), abolishing tuition fees, having living stipends . . . when will the editorial staff grow up — and stop being unrealistic, irrational and naive? Life isn't so bad, the "Big Blue Machine" (?) does far more than represent the corporations and upper classes — it ably represents all of us too.

Canadian Marxist probes role of state

Carleton University political scientist Leo Panitch said Tuesday there is a desperate need for Marxists to evolve a theory of the state which explains a dependent capitalist economy such as Canada.

Panitch was speaking to a lecture sponsored by the Toronto Marxist Institute on The Role and Nature of the Canadian State.

According to Panitch the three main functions of the state are facilitating economic growth, coercion and legitimation of the existing social order. He stressed a historical approach must be taken before any conclusions can be drawn.

Panitch said the state does not merely consist of the government but includes the bureaucracy, military, judiciary, and provincial and local governments. Political parties, the media, the church and pressure groups are quasi-independent, unlike those in a fascist state.

The most important factor which makes Canada different from other dependent capitalist states is the federal form of government which gives substantial power to provincial and local governments and splits the country on an ethnic and regional basis, Panitch noted.

The decentralization in the Canadian state gives rise to substantial conflict on ethnic and class lines inside the system, he said. It has also been responsible, Panitch says, for the huge inflow of American capital as provincial governments compete for economic development.

Panitch also underlined the importance of the close identity between various elites, state personnel, politicians and the corporate class. "The degree of co-optation from business to government is startling in Canada," he said.

This presents tremendous barriers to the exercise of political power, even when social democrats form governments as they have in three Canadian provinces. The state's large role in Canadian society is mainly devoted to shoring up the capitalist system, Panitch said.

He explained several unique Canadian characteristics, the militancy of the labor movement and its non-involvement in tripartite planning programs with business and government, unlike American unions. Canada had the highest number of strike days lost next to Italy in the western world last year, he said.

The economic basis for Canadian independence does not exist, primarily, Panitch says, because there has been a complete lack of concern for the origin of capital needed for expansion during the last few decades. The foreign capital infusion has resulted in distorted economic structure and the development of a weak Canadian bourgeoisie, he added.

Surprisingly, Panitch said, the Canadian state has enacted very little legislation to fulfill the legitimation function. Canada was slow in bringing in welfare legislation and has consistently lagged behind everyone else in the western world in anti-combines legislation and business disclosure laws, he said. These are combined with the most repressive labor legislation in the western world with a substantial role for the courts in prohibiting strike action, Panitch maintained.

Despite the union militancy spawned by repressive legislation, branch plant ownership, low wages and non-involvement in consultation, the Canadian labor movement has only sporadically been militant, Panitch said.

"Without the formation of a Marxist political party, workers will continue to be faced with authoritarian challenges whenever their actions are militant," Panitch concluded.

Before specifically talking about the Canadian experience Panitch dealt at length with Marxist views of the state. He said most criticism is directed at the Marxist credo that the state is "the executive committee of the bourgeoisie," but this is merely a caricature of the Marxist analysis, which is in fact, far more complex.

Marx made no systematic analysis of the state, Panitch said, but had valuable insights particularly in his historical tracts such as the Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Napoleon. As a result the Marxist theory of the state has remained undeveloped despite contributions by Lenin and the Italian Marxist, Gramsci, Panitch said.

A TALE OF LOST FRIENDS.

BY A STUDENT.

I'm a poor lone man,
And it's very few can
Quite appreciate my sad tale.
I had just two friends,
Such as kind heaven sends
Not often in this tearful vale.

A bright, young fellow,
Whom I had known since childhood,
Oftentimes would visit me,
To talk of the good times,
When they used to rock
My cradle, long, long years ago,
With a smiling face,
I looked down on the little fellow,
Who put me to sleep,
And ever at night,
I said to myself:
"How good it is to sleep,
And the goblins away from thee."

But at last it grew,
From its labors true,
Enfeebled and quite worn out;
Its face so white,
Was a pitiful sight,
And its hands moved feebly about.

Its tick so strong,
Was all gone wrong;
And it lost its cheery, firm tone;
The striking part
Had given up heart,
And was solemn and still as stone.

One sad night alone
I caught its last moan,
And I murmured at fate's commands:
I went to its side,
And vainly tried
To rouse it by chafing its hands.

My stove was the friend,
Who next met his end.
I sing his dear name in this ode;
A "dear" stove indeed,
For he always would feed
On wood at five dollars a load.

Yet a day
He ceased to breathe,
And I was left
With a cold, and a headache,
Which I never observed with
Like some great men,
He died in a fit of the rage,
And I was left
With a cold, and a headache,
Which I never observed with
Like some great men,
He died in a fit of the rage,
And I was left
With a cold, and a headache,

His end it was strange,
And, in all the wide range
Of historical stoves, you're defied
To find under the sun
The stove that for fun,
Did attempt to commit suicide.

He dropped out a coal,
Which soon burned a hole,
And set fire to the white pine floor;
He was self-immolated,
In the way it's related
Of Hercules, long, long before.

OUR STUDENTS.

BY A. P. COLEMAN, B. A.

The essence of a university consists, not in its splendid buildings and expensive apparatus, but in the efficiency of its faculty and the energy and ability of its students. We hear much at present of endowments and new buildings for "Old Vic.," but not what to do with his big hands and feet, talks in tones of the jolting of his lumber wagon. He was not learned to the point of being a lady acquaintance, and a rough customer. The material takes one year at a college, and the process matriculation meantime he has probably become a confirmed dyspeptic, by study hard without exercise, and at labor, while he has been eating your brains out. He has a few notions, but he does not know what he did, and is such a normal place as a student's hands is in his pockets. He was acquired the college slang and, with huge inward satisfaction at his own cleverness, talks of "slopes," "ponies," and other wonderful things, and in every third sentence is snore to remark that something is "too thin." It may even be that he has set up for a wit in a small way, and, in season or out of season, squeezes out heart-rending puns, in humble emulation of his superiors.

The next student we meet has been a teacher. He is neat and clever as a rule, at least in his own opinion, with some pretence of knowing the ways of the world. He has been looked up to as infallible in the little country school house, and has probably learned to speak "as who should say, I am Sir Oracle, when I open my lips let no dog bark." He expects that his transcendent talents will straightway be recognized in a university town. Fatal delusion! Each older student feels it his religious duty, as well as privilege, to take down such a one every convenient opportunity; and, more galling still, teacher meets teacher in hopeless contest, infallibility against infallibility; gradually however his corners are rounded off and he becomes able to take a place among or

Editor: distribution a barrier

By ERIC RUMP

The biggest problem for small Canadian magazines is the difficulty of distribution, according to Drummond Burgess, managing editor of Last Post, a left-wing newsmagazine.

Burgess was speaking at a lunch time seminar Wednesday at The Varsity offices.

Last Post has about 19,000 circulation but its main barrier towards expansion is the problem of distribution. All the outlets are controlled by large American-owned firms which distribute within each city, such as Metro News.

Smaller periodicals are given little attention and they can't offer any special profit deals to distributors, Burgess said.

He added the plethora of skin magazines is also making it difficult for Canadian magazines to expand.

Last Post is a non-profit venture and all of its writers are without salary except for Burgess. It publishes seven issues a year with the aid of subscribers and newsstand revenues. Advertisement revenue is very small.

The greatest obstacle to growing as well as increasing frequency is the lack of capital, Burgess said. He discounted the importance of the political view of the magazine. "They only care if it sells."

Last Post has traditionally been seen as a primarily student and leftist-oriented magazine, but a recent survey revealed a large part of its readership make over $30,000 per year including civil servants and professional people. Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau even subscribes.

Burgess stressed Last Post sees itself as a magazine put out by journalists which is political rather than the product of a political collective. This makes it different from This Magazine which espouses the issue of independent Canadian unions.

He said for Last Post to have a broader appeal it might have to cut back on some of its business journalism and adopt more popular features.

The magazine has been a leading muck-raking journal, often publishing information the commercial press found too hot to handle.

C.U.P.W. says Postal code boycott on OTTAWA (CUP)—The Letter Carriers Union of Canada withdrew its support Feb. 3 of the postal code boycott.

Letter Carriers' union president Roger Decarie said there is no need to continue the boycott because coding machine operators now earn as much as manual sorters.

The stand was slammed by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers representing inside employees, which says the boycott wasn't launched to win parity but the right to negotiate technological changes.

"It'd be absolutely false to say the issue has been resolved," said Marcel Perrault, president of the union's Montreal local. "We are going to step up our boycott campaign."

Perrault accused Decarie of "dealing under the table" with the government and suggested the withdrawal of support for the boycott was linked to the letter carriers' talks with federal officials.

He reiterated his union does not aim to halt modernization but wants to protect its members by negotiating the rate of automation.

Under laws governing public service labor relations, postal workers have no right to negotiate changes. Workers outside the government can bargain on this point under Canada Labor Code provisions.

As predictable as always: and as enjoyable: scenes from past Skule Nite productions of the past.

Skule Nite 7T5: the engineer as actor

There is a division in the Varsity between the news and the ads. Of course. But what is worth noting is that each section presents two different views of the university, two views as different as they are valid. The news section deals with the university bureaucracy, with who said what and when, and who disagreed; it deals with various individuals on committees and councils, people who have certain views, who want certain actions taken. The ads deal with wedding rings, holidays, social events, dances, ski weekends. Things everyone takes part in, or at least can identify with, and events within which the individual's development is set (as opposed to the community's, which is the concern of the news section).

One of the most frequently recurring ads over the past few weeks (not only in the Varsity but also in the college newspapers) has been the one for Skule Nite 7T5 which opened Wednesday night at Hart House Theatre and which concludes its brief run there tomorrow night. Skule Nite 7T5 has everything that other college revues have: I mean, long pauses between set changes, incomprehensible jokes, inaudible jokes, and lots of stilled acting. But that is to judge it in a way that it is not judged by its audiences.

One extended skit deals with the School of Practical Science Achievement Awards. It notes the distinguished contributions to science and technology and industry of such graduates of the School and winners of the S.P.S. awards as James Morris, W.R. Laidlaw, John White, F.A. Gabby, H.G. Acres, Ralph Thompson. And it presents its versions — wry, slapstick, affectionate — of these achievements. On the one hand, there is the recognition of progress leading to increased automation, and expansion; these award winners have after all made their mark with such organizations as Standard Oil, NASA, and CP. On the other hand, not only in this skit but in the show as a whole, there are the stereotypes, and the old jokes, the simple, basic effects aimed at and achieved. The engineer, the show seems to imply, is so caught between progress and the preservation of what his engineering expertise threatens that he paradoxically places that much greater value on what it is he threatens. And he comes to terms with it, however roughly, by means of these stereotypes and slapdash situations, by means of the stylized nature of the production even to the Skule Nite 7T5 title which I have to remember to spell correctly incorrectly every time I type it. The show certainly has the air of a homecoming, a touching earth time, at which the students and even more importantly the alumni who make up a large part of the audiences recover a sense of their identity and their unity, a sense of the rhythm of student and alumnus, student and professional.

Skule Nite 7T5, it's what is expected but then it's what is wanted. It is really very enjoyable, it is in no way alienating: it is not sexist, (not much), it is not an in-Faculty production — in fact it even helps you to understand the engineer's axiomatic conservatism.

There are some very witty skits in the production this year, among them one about the Star Trek TV series, in which the identities of William Shatner as Captain Kirk and as William Shatner, Loblaw's spokesman, are played about with deftly, and "The Waiting Room", the only arts vs engineering skit, which got the biggest laugh of the night. Anne Robson, to name some names, was very good in "Telephone". Walt Galloway was an entirely convincing Father Christopher giving a sermon about sex in which he talks about the Quebec films he saw in which 18 acts of intercourse took place between members of the cloth and the unclothed, 8 of them women... Paul Baker, John Parker, Walt Galloway, Rob West, Dave Allen all made excellent singing patients in "Everyone Ought to Have a Nurse". The three latter cast members were also obviously very successful, to judge by the audience reaction, as the Dembrowsky Sisters, in "Sappy Days", the show's parody of the TV series, Happy Days.

But the real highlights of the show were the four numbers involving the entire cast, which opened and closed each act: The Theme song number, the barroom song, the Annex Luncheon scene, and the final extended skit entitled "Six Guns will Travel".

Male choruses are really not as common as they once were, but they are used to great effect in these skits.

The Lady Godiva Memorial Band — who marched down the aisles, flags waving, and who led the audience in engineering cheers at the end — deserve special mention. I knew they were loud. I didn't know they were good.

The show is produced by Michael Cox and directed by Stephen Cress.

Art and Hart House: The dilemma of amateurism

Problems. The Hart House Art Committee has problems, to put it mildly. A recently finished study of the permanent art collection has revealed that it is in a very sad state and in a very inimical environment. Hart House is subject to the changes of the seasons, disastrously so for the paintings: they shrink in the winter and they expand in the summer. They have had sherry spilt on them. Students have written on them in magic marker.

The Art Committee will soon have to make major decisions about whether it can afford to keep the more important works of art in the house, or whether these should not in fact be given over to an institution which can care for them properly as the national treasures that so many of them are. Perhaps there should be a building on campus designed specifically as an art gallery for the work all of the works.

More pressingly, the Art Gallery is being boycotted by an artists organization which claims that the gallery is refusing to recognize professional artists' rights.

The organization, Canadian Artists Representation, Ontario branch, (CARO) is a group of practising visual artists formed in 1971 which works provincially and nationally to "promote the improvement of the economic conditions of artists." The organization's main aim is to obtain fees for the individual artist for any use made of anything he has produced, be it reproduced (in a book, as a slide, as a postcard, as a poster) or hung by a gallery in a show.

This is where Hart House comes in.

CARO has gradually forced most public galleries in Ontario to pay such exhibition fees. It has in fact established a rate schedule for a gallery depending on what kind of show the artist's work in is involved in — whether it is a show arranged by a national, provincial, or local authority, whether it tours or not, whether it tours nationally or provincially, or locally, whether it is a one man show, a two man show, a three man show, a group show, how long the show is on, etc. There is a rate for each variation.

Hart House Art Gallery shows are "local regional non-touring shows of three months duration or less."

"Therefore Hart House Art Gallery should pay each artist who exhibits there, if one goes by the CAR fee schedule, $302.

CARO claims that Hart House, one, does not have a policy of paying fees, and, two, does not have a policy in principle if nothing else of paying CARO fees to artists. At a meeting of CARO at the Ontario College of Art last Sunday representatives of ten locals across the Province voted unanimously to put the boycott into effect. CARO claimed that four years of negotiation with the committee concerning the payment of exhibition rental fees left it no other choice if it actually wanted to get anything done, marked as those four years had been, so it claimed, by evasion and irresponsibility on Hart House's part.

Hart House has in fact been paying artists' fees since the beginning of last summer, at least, but it has only been paying them $75 a show. But it has paid for transportation, openings, security, insurance and everything else involved in setting up and running a show.

In a surprise move at Hart House Art committee meeting yesterday the committee moved the resolution that this fee be increased to $302 provided that the artist bear the cost of transportation, of invitations, and of an opening (if he wants one).

This may not satisfy CARO. According to two representatives Peter Wilson and Gary Greenwood, CAR feels that the artist shouldn't have to beg for a fee or to make compromises for it.

"Who else gets paid this way?" Greenwood said, "the HH janitorial staff gets its salary every week. Toff gets his, monthly. Why should the artist who is the point of the whole affair have to bother with this?"

"When the artist does get his salary at the end of the show (from a CAR supporting gallery) it's a great feeling. You feel like you're a part of the society, that you belong."

Wilson said that the artist should not have to feel that the gallery is doing him a favour in putting his show on and that he should be respectfully grateful.

The representatives also think of CAR as "a union of sorts," and want it to be treated as such. They say that if it does continue the boycott it expects help from the other unions who control other parts of Hart House and who are respected by the other Hart House committees. Greenwood also mentioned the possibility of seeking SAC support of its position.

Charity Grant, Dean of the Women's Residence at University College is the Art Committee's chairman this year. Alan Toff is the program liaison man within Hart House put at the service of the committee. Both of them said that they have sympathy for CAR's aims but that at the same time they fear the loss of flexibility adaption of the CAR fees schedule tout court would involve. But that flexibility itself poses its problems.

The Founder's Benediction — or whatever it is — engraved in stone outside the Great Hall hopes that students will use the House to develop themselves physically and intellectually. And HH has long tried to provide the opportunity for the cultivation of many talents.

Grant described the gallery as a space for students to learn in. And both she and Toff defended it as an educational experience for students within an essentially private institution.

There are inevitable connotations of amateurism and dilettantism however. The problem may be that the Art committee in particular has as an amateur committee has been too successful.

Peter Wilson provided a context for the boycott and the situation at Hart House.

"The whole issue of fees has a lot to do with changes in the art world in general, in the decline of commercial galleries in particular.

Conceptual artists, for instance, really live off what they receive for exhibiting, not off what they sell.

"CAR is a part of the avant-gard in this country. And the avant-gard is not a new style or school. All schools and all styles exist together now. What is the edge of the future here is social and political actions, not in any gross sense, in relation to how artists relate to their community and in what they do for the profession.

"And if you are deadset against this, then it will show in the kind of shows you can put on and the kind of attention they can attract."

"Electra"

Academy of Theatre Arts
The Ward-Price Building
33 Grenville St.

This last week your disinterested reviewer was called in to view a production of Giraudoux' Electra at the Ward-Price building, 33 Grenville Street (behind the College Street YMCA). For a number of reasons the evening was uncomfortable; partially because of my own expectations, but also because parts of the production were actively annoying. I venture, then, to condemn what I do not understand, but also to justify that damnation by insisting that a play must have both internal significance and internal consistency. Giraudoux' play is worthwhile, but this production jars one out of Tolkienian "secondary" belief.

This version of Electra (continuing until the 22nd) seems never to have been intended for public consumption as entertainment. Only a couple of dozen people showed up for the Thursday night performance, and from their casual intermission remarks it appeared as if all of them were there to see their friends.

As well, this play is being performed as a showcase for senior students of the Academy of Theatre Arts. They may or may not want to display themselves to the rest of the theatre world; I received a strong impression that the play is an in-courtesy attempt, intended solely for home consumption and as a simulation of a real situation. Certain touches of production professionalism are sadly lacking.

The Academy itself operates out of the Ward-Price building on Grenville Street, using a hall that is more suitable for exercise and rehearsal than it is for actual performance. Z.A. Turzanski, the artistic director of this non-profit foundation, which graduates its students after a three-year training, is an expatriate from Polish experimental theatre. His Toronto group has been in operation for seven years now, and has occasionally been noticed by the critics. At the moment, it seems on hard times — or at least there are no pretensions to slickness in the front-of-house arrangements.

The Academy is dedicated to an anti-Stanislawski system: it is held that the actor must not project his feelings into the role but must separate emotion and intellect and draw the audience into involvement. What is most apparent, in terms of the training that these actors have received, is a stylization of gesture, an almost continual movement (though this may be the fault of the players) and a truly amazing collection of fine, sturdy voices. Direction seems lacking.

Giraudoux and other modern French dramatists have found that the old Greek myths are wholly appropriate to the presentation of the compelling political arguments which have swept their country. In this case, the moral stasis imposed by the Gods, or Fate, in the Greek tragedy is replaced by two irreconcilable moral stances in the French. The Giraudoux Electra explored personal growth into decision-taking as a function of the pursuit of Justice, and sets all this within the tale of tormented love that pervades the original.

The Academy Electra is not exactly uneven, but the opening half shows appalling lack of focus. The costumes manager should be shot; Malabar does not an era make. The Judge (Brian Neller) in particular suffers from an absurd leonine wig that makes him absolutely, rather than somewhat, unconvincing. The opening of the play proper is preceded by an unintelligible parade of the entire cast around the pillars that dominate the tiny stage; and to indicate the tension about to begin, we have some music that sounds despairingly like Beethoven's fifth. The Gardener, (Richard Carter) who is being given Electra's hand lips and mimes too much to be solid. He and the judge have the dominating parts in the first half, and the play cannot rise, without inspired work from them.

Clytemnaestra, the gilly mother of Electra, is solid enough but not very passionate; and passion is necessarily the key to her character.

The three major figures in the Giraudoux version are Electra, the regent Aegisthus (a classic 'wicked Uncle' creation) and an unexplained beggar who describes the actions of the play with superhuman detachment and in the most abstract of terms. The young brother Orestes, just returned from exile, is the act of Justice in potentia and has nothing to do save carry out the final murders. Dennis Greig plays a very handsome and moody Orestes here, and imbues him with more than the script can give him.

Alvena Jones, playing Electra as a woman not self-realized until she is triggered by her somewhat-beloved brother, is handsome and sensuous, quite convincing as the picture of a woman obsessed with her version of life. It is merely coincidence that her opinions are more moral than her regent Aegisthus'. This part is done to near-perfection by Paul Valley, who gives an immaculate portrayal of a cultured despot who exudes languor. His speech is sometimes too quick and clipped, but his visual impression is convincing to an extreme.

It is only in the second part of the play that the potentials of the various characters are realized. The town drop, the wife of the Judge, and named Agatha (1), discovers her hatreds, Electra discovers her wish to power. Clytemnaestra finds her true need for Aegisthus'; but all stops when Aegisthus discovers his ability to be a man of moral activity. At the conclusion of the intense final scene, he still manages to tarry in argument over morality with Electra; and without his presence the garrison falls to invaders. Electra's words send Orestes off to murder; but her vision is triumphant only because it never depends on action. The Beggar dominates the close; Martha Gleeson excels in recounting, like a Sybil, the events as, or just before they occur. Gripping at last, the play ends in a blaze of malevolent symbolism.

Rarely seen, this version is worth attending even though it is a long and sometimes painful wait for the climax. The writing can overtop any faults in the actors, and does in fact triumph over its flawed production. Special mentions, after all this complaining, should go to Susanne Scott as the flirt and to her ambiguous stud, Richard Carter, who redeems his earlier performance as the Gardener.

Calm Down Mother UC Playhouse

Calm Down Mother is receiving only four lunchtime performances at UC Playhouse. And today (at 1 pm) is its last day. Pity.

The 45-minute play, by American playwright Megan Terry, probes the situation of women in the world today. Woman as soap-opera heroine, Woman as old and senile, Woman as hooker, Woman as daughter. As Linda Pakri, the director of the play noted, Terry teaches by example. She creates a mood to insinuate an opinion. The end result can only be highly ambiguous (vide, the title) — which works well here since the heart of the play is stereotypes and preconceptions and the last thing we want to do is replace them with more stereotypes and preconceptions.

What is surprising is the smooth and even compelling pace of the show, a great achievement for Pakri, a 3rd year Vic student directing her first play. What is particularly satisfying is how deftly Pakri steers between what the play could very easily become and what her actors are capable of. Terry is a lesbian and there are some scenes which could become strident and shrill simply through the actors' embarrassment. But that does not happen here.

John Wilson

Alice Quzik, Deb Rosser, and Nancy Snipper are the three actors who perform the various roles. None is better than the others, at least not that I could determine, such was the diversity of roles successfully presented: but they are all very good.

The Tenor T.C.D.S. Cartwright Hall

Last week I was able to see a performance of Wedekind's The Tenor, produced by the Trinity College Dramatic Society to coincide with Trinity's major social function, the Conversationa. The first-night audience were a major factor in shaping the play, for they were anticipating an evening of entertainment and were not prepared to invest much intellectual energy in weighing the arguments between the Tenor, a model of emotional buccaneering, and his recent amour, who has thrown away her respectability for Love.

The TCDS has fallen on hard times recently, but the cast assembled for this play were very solid and had the backing of a good tech crew. No performer was cast above his or her ability to support a characterization, but in general one felt that the visual was of greater concern than the emotive in casting. A fine sense of period was arrived at, but only an undercurrent of intensity was generated in a play that ought not to be melodrama.

One great problem with a Trinity cast facing a Trinity audience is the house's benign recognition of the actors' personalities in the roles they are playing. The director was aware of this, and cast his lesser characters accordingly. These supporting roles were played competently, though largely without inspiration.

Essentially the play deals with the last half hour of a famed opera singer's stay in an Austrian city. Besieged in his hotel, as usual, by female admirers, he is forced against his will to deal with a young girl, an old musician, and his current lover whom he is about to abandon.

As the Tenor, David Plant is spectacularly affected. His finest moments came, not when he spoke, but when he grimaced; particularly effective was the moment when, without speaking, he read his mail, and complacency and voyeurism flitted across his face. Opposite him, and handling a role of great passion quite deftly, was Janice Lindsay as the distraught Mrs. Marova. In the face of such audience passivity, she maintained the believability of the passionate woman who is willing to (and does) die for love, but she was not permitted to have her emotional position penetrate to her hearers.

Diane Gherson played a demure but foolishly romantic sixteen-year-old well; it must be successful acting that can make a character a lovable emotional vacuum. Fred Ford, escaping from his vice of excess, was excessively poignant as an ancient composer who begs the Tenor to read his score, only to be rejected for several false reasons.

The new stage facilities of St. Hilda's Cartwright Hall now allow for a softer more intimate staging; and the direction made good use of all available space. The over-all effect, achieved through the heavy concentration on gesture, costume and staging, was that of a well-organized production which provided a little more than entertainment for those who were prepared to pay close attention. Regrettably, the now concluded noon-hour performances this week do not seem to have been well-attended.

Alice Cooper is the Billion Dollar Baby; the book's

In Billion Dollar Baby, Bob Greene has written one of the best books about rock I have read, if not the best, probably because he is basically a straight journalist. He was fresh from writing a book on the McGovern campaign when he signed up as a reporter-performer on Alice Cooper's winter 1973 tour. Every night, to climax the show, Greene, dressed as Santa Claus, was beaten up by the members of the band.

Greene's background puts him miles ahead of those writers who are themselves part of the rock scene. While people like Myra Friedman, author of Buried Alive, a biography of Janis Joplin, leave the reader wandering in a mental fog, without any signposts, or to put it more prosaically, any clue that the person writing knows what is important about his subject, Greene has an instinct for what matters.

What matters, first and foremost, is media manipulation, at which Cooper and his manager, Shep Gordon, are past masters. Building almost entirely on negative publicity, this duo transformed a mediocre rock band into a star attraction.

On the subject of his success, Cooper waxes somewhat philosophical, in one of the most interesting chapters of the book. 'It doesn't matter whether they hate you or not. All that matters is that they know you. If you can keep them thinking about you, you've got it made.'

Cooper makes a revealing comparison of his negative publicity to Frank Sinatra's — revealing because Cooper dreams of playing golf with the likes of Bob Hope and Jack Burns, and is even now preparing to shed the rock-star image and break into the movies.

Why does Frank Sinatra punch people in the mouth, and call Australian newsmen hookers? To keep himself in the news. It works, doesn't it?

In defense of Sinatra, who at least once had a voice, the cultural manifestation Cooper reminds me of most is not Sinatra but the super-violent comics of the early fifties.

A Frederic Wertham wrote a book about those comics, called Seduction of the Innocent, and, judging by the sample strips he reproduces, there is quite a resemblance. Sure, there's a nod to sex now and again, a cunt crudely pencilled over, just as Cooper feels up a boa constrictor and 'brushes' a girl dressed up as a tooth with a giant toothbrush, but it's basically good old American violence. Dead babies and all.

There are two sides to the manipulation coin however. The media itself gets manipulated and so do the performers. Greene, the reporter who winds up as the helpless Santa Claus, typifies the media's confusion.

But I can also remember the original reactions to Cooper in magazines like Rolling Stone. The first two albums were dogs and rightly regarded as such. Yet after a time the media writers fed an unceasing diet of Cooper, began to lose their taste, until Jon Landau could write that 'Killer best rock albums of 1971. Alice Cooper is a band that will be around for many years to come.'

I have often wondered if getting taken so many times by rock hypesters has influenced magazines like Rolling Stone and Crawdaddy to turn away from the music scene in search of other subjects.

The effect of fame on performers has been dealt with many times before, of course, but Greene does an especially good job, displaying an almost novelistic eye. Over the course of the book Greene profiles each member of the band and manager Gordon.

Alice's own dismay at his success is interesting — a five-year-old boy accompanied by his mother runs into Alice in a shopping centre parking lot and starts singing 'Dead Babies' at him — but it was a stroke of genius to make Alice's portrait second-last and to finish with Glen Buxton, the lead guitarist, once the best musician in the group but now so wasted from drugs and alcohol that his amp is turned off during concerts and a hired musician fills in for him.

Near tour's end Greene pays a

The theory that radicalism and left-wing ideas died out after the explosions of the late 1960's has obviously not reached the book publishers, who seem to be finding a profitable market for an apparently unending flow of books on radical topics, and from radical perspectives. If the sale of literature is any indication, then more people than ever are showing an interest in socialist ideas and history.

One publisher doing some cashing in on this popularity is Doubleday, which is putting out (among a number of other things) a three-volume series of documentary histories on international communism from the beginning of the century to the Hitler-Stalin pact.

The first two volumes, covering the period to 1923, and 1924-31, respectively, have now been published. Both are useful, and, happily, the second is an improvement over the first, largely because the analytical-interpretative sections have been expanded. The result is that the tendency for collections of documents (and especially selections from documents) to appear in what is largely a historical vacuum because their actual context is missing, is by and large avoided. It becomes clearer why the major (and some not-so-major but important) pieces presented here were written, to whom they were addressed, what historical circumstances they stemmed from and what specific concerns shaped them. The documents become more meaningful because they are explained; simultaneously, the explanations are more readily susceptible to independent evaluation because the relevant documents can be referred to.

Clearly collections of excerpted documents are no substitute for thorough study of the questions involved. But these collections do have definite value as either introductory works, or as a general overview.

What the Anchor volumes do not do is to try to provide an interpretation of the events which are presented. This is quite proper: such a task would clearly lie outside the scope of the series, and would conflict with the manifest purpose of a documentary collection. (Which is not to deny, of course, that there is an interpretative bias underlying the explanatory, context-setting commentary. The nature of the bias, however, is not such as to significantly distort the reader's own ability to evaluate the documents.)

A third book, The First Three

Internationals, put out by the Trotskyist Pathfinder Press, does attempt to provide a general interpretation of the history of international communism. A slim volume, its intent seems to be to function as a primer for Trotskyists or near-Trotskyists. Consequently, the political analysis is paramount, the factual material much less important.

This could be useful: all the documents in the world won't enable one to understand, by themselves, why history moved the way it did. Unfortunately, this book fails. Partly because of the sketchiness of the format, but primarily because of the sterility of the thought underlying it, it comes across as a catechism giving the 'correct line' to the uneducated faithful.

What should be proven is assumed, what should be questioned is taken for granted. Interpretations are correct because 'Marxism teaches' that they are, Trotsky's estimates become firm figures, major debates are 'settled' in a single paragraph. In the absence of any serious analysis it becomes useless to take issue with the interpretations offered, since the book operates on the level of dogma and faith, not facts and argumentation.

The title, too, is a bit misleading as to the emphasis of the book: the Trotskyist left opposition in the Third International, hardly a political movement with earth-shattering consequences, is given more space than the first two internationals put together, and more than the Third International as well.

Not that this is a sin: there is nothing wrong with a political group coming to grips with its own past. But doing so should mean all the more that difficult questions are raised and dealt with intelligently. This is what doesn't happen. Instead, unproven assertions are made to substitute for logic and facts.

For example, the book argues that Stalin's Communist Party was the

All The President's Men by Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward
Warner Paperback Library

Now that Watergate is no longer the central preoccupation of the media in North America it is probably a better time to reflect on the meaning of the events and what they demonstrate about the American political system.

A good beginning is to reflect on the actual process which exposed the criminal escapades of Richard Nixon and his co-conspirators. The fact is that the wrongdoing was not exposed by a Senate Committee or by congressional impeachment proceedings. And the famous tapes were only the final absolute proof.

The main force responsible for finding out Watergate was not just a "third rate burglary" was the Washington Post and its two celebrated investigative reporters Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein.

To see Watergate as a triumph of the American system of law and government would be a tragic mistake. Even after substantial proof had been gathered it still took the tape recordings of Nixon himself, to clinch impeachment proceedings.

Bernstein and Woodward have written what promises to be remembered as one of the classics of investigative journalism, All The President's Men. They are working on a second volume which should be every bit as superb. Everyone knows the story of Watergate but Bernstein and Woodward make it live with their painstaking account of their investigations which eventually led to the White House and the President himself.

All The President's Men is now out in an inexpensive paperback edition which promises to become an unprecedented journalistic best-seller. It appeared in hardback last spring.

In the beginning Watergate was ignored by most of the media. The Washington Post's earlier revelations were regarded as an attempt to pump life into the hopeless campaign of liberal Democrat George McGovern for the presidency.

Bernstein and Woodward had never worked together before Watergate nor had they ever done much investigative work. Yet their dedication and unbelievably time consuming research demonstrates a level of competence at investigative journalism that has rarely been matched.

One of the most fascinating characters in the whole account is the famous "deep throat", the leak inside the White House which Bernstein and Woodward used to check all their hunches and verify their conclusions. He emerges as a strange betrayer, always revealing information only after the most careful questioning, never volunteering any new revelations. The 3 am meetings in a deserted apartment garage add a never to be forgotten cloak and dagger element to this fascinating account.

We also find out about the Washington Post editors who reviewed all the stories with Woodward and Bernstein. They were willing to stick their necks out but only if they could be convinced. It is a credit to the newspaper that it should gamble its prestige and its credibility on the work of two young unknown reporters and allow them to work full time for such a long time, with many periods when new revelations were slow in coming.

But on the whole, the Watergate story is very much a personal triumph for Bernstein and Woodward and for the Washington Post, not for the American media, who largely ignored the potential of the story until startling revelations were already established.

As for Watergate itself, All The President's Men does not purport to analyze the political implications of the scandal, but the authors expose through the accounts of the machinations of the Nixon staff, the utter corruption of system.

Perhaps more astonishing than the actual burglary is the fact that Nixon's advisors thought they could put one over on the American people with a cover-up. The amorality expressed in the tapes surprised many Americans, but it helped dispel the aura of dignity which has surrounded the presidency.

The revelation of Nixon and his advisors as just another group of second-rate pork-barrelers sparked a massive effort to purge the American political scene of these transgressors.

But who were put in their place, a man with the most reactionary voting record in congress for the past 20 years, Gerry Ford, and one of the most wealthy American capitalists with a long history of "'Glen didn't even hesitate. 'That's easy,' he said, 'I've thought about that one. I'm proudest of living past twenty-five.'"

Despite the depressing aspects of the tour — for one thing, it was obvious that the group was breaking up — the overwhelming mood of this book is the high, the excitement of being part of a touring band, and I would be doing less than justice to Billion Dollar Baby if, in commenting on the Alice Cooper phenomenon, I ignored that high.

complete negation of Lenin's. This is certainly an arguable position (if, in my opinion, an incorrect one) but to 'prove' it as the book does by saying that Stalin killed off most of Lenin's cadres is rather inadequate. After all, the vast majority of Lenin's cadre had already completely accepted Stalin's rule when they were killed. At any rate, the day had long passed when they were in a position to challenge Stalin. And furthermore, the facts that emerged after Stalin's death showed that Stalin's own followers died in much greater numbers during the purges than those who had ever opposed him.

The Pathfinder book is unfortunate because it will give no boost to Marxism in the eyes of those interested in what it has to offer, and also because it will merely serve to stifle the capacity for creative thought in those Marxists who take their 'analysis' uncritically from its pages.

involvement with the CIA and various political intrigues, Nelson Rockefeller.

The fact which really becomes clear in the book is that success in the American political scene often depends on corruption and a willingness to do anything "to save the plan." This has been true for years and will be for many to come. Democrat John Kennedy was elected by stealing votes with the aid of Mayor Richard Daily in Chicago to eke out a victory in 1960.

The recent scandals with the Davis government show that Canadians can't be smug about Watergate not being possible here. It can and will happen and in many cases despite embarrassment, the government can squeak out by firing a minister.

Journalists have a duty to follow I.F. Stone's precept, "never believe politicians, they're all liars," and go from there.

Cockburn and McLauchlin — Canada's best

Nineteen seventy-four was a very good year for Canadian music, both at home and abroad. Canadian performers stormed the major record charts in the States and this, in turn, has led to increased exposure and tours for many singers and bands. On the home front we had new releases by Bruce Cockburn, a veteran who seems quite content with being the best writer-composer in Canada, and by Murray McLauchlan whose goal seems to be for international stardom.

The two men present very contrasting approaches to their music. Cockburn being the mature, self-confident musician who makes the listener work without telling you why. McLauchlan in turn is a cocky, fast rising star, and his ability is reflected by the fact that all his tunes are catchy, and easy to remember, but they nevertheless retain a great deal of meaning and feeling.

Cockburn, on "Salt, Sun and Time", seems to have concentrated on his playing, which is probably the best music ever recorded in Canada. From the gentle, lullaby like opening cut, "All the Diamonds in the World", we see two sides of a musician. On one hand he is an excellent song writer, with a hauntingly gentle voice which seems to be complemented by his guitar work. On the other side we have the guitar player who has developed an almost classical style of playing. There are three instrumental cuts, with Eugene Martynec on guitar and synthesizer, and Jack Zaza playing clarinet, which are not only dazzling in their intricate structures, but also because they are so crystal clear. These are not instant favourites; instead they grow slowly, until you find yourself humming them constantly.

The remaining six songs are like pictures, each seems like a personal statement from a man who is fully established and secure in his way of life. On "Don't have to Tell You Why", the singer describes the important things in his life, the open country, and the love of his woman, yet he never says why, instead the contrasting imagery allows the listener (and the lover) to make the comparisons and arrive at the conclusions. "Stained Glass" evokes beauty and love, but in a blurred and reflective way, because the object of love is not there anymore.

The remaining tunes, "Never so Free", which seems to owe a lot to the playing style of Antonio Carlos Jobim, "Christmas Song", or "It won't be Long", seem to reflect a special kind of beauty seen through the eyes of Bruce Cockburn. It's the kind of record that will never fade or grow boring because it is perfect.

McLauchlan's lp "Sweeping the Spotlight Away", is completely the opposite of Cockburn's record. Murray deals with a totally different set of circumstances, personal in some instances but at the same time it includes a wide variety of characters — clowns, bums, street people, winners and losers all. The musicians included on the recording are some of the best in the business, like Ben Mink, Dennis Pendrith, Guido Basso, John-Mills Cockell, Mike McKenna and Bruce Cockburn. Murray himself does an excellent job playing the piano, guitar and harmonica.

It's difficult to classify his style of singing but the twang that he seems to have adopted reminds me of a mellow and young Hank Snow, and most of the material on this record could easily be classified as being country music. "Down by the Henry Moore", the opening cut, is probably the second skate-along song since Dylan's "Winterlude", and it's just as infectious. Most of the songs "Do you dream of being somebody", "Maybe Tonight", "The Next in Line", "Honey let's get Up and Dance", all deal with losers — in life, love, or both, yet despite the pain life does go on. And the most optimistic song on the lp is called "Takin' My Leave", a song about a man who'd rather have a good car out on the road than be tied down by the love of a woman.

Every single song on the record contains a catch and it is impossible to forget them, every one could make a great single release.

And to round out this review of Canadian talent I'd like to recommend a record by a Canadian band, but unfortunately it seems to be available only as a U.S. import.

There are nine of the nicest songs ever put out by any Canadian band, while the singing and musicianship are of extremely high calibre.

The album opens with a solid rocker, "I would be the one", with some fantastic horns in the back, and then rifts into the gentle and evocative "Speaking of dreams". "Color her Sunshine" is the love song of love songs, yet the band never gets mushy, it's a love song with balls, especially because of the vocal work of the lead singer.

All the cuts seem to work on the principle of undertoning the music and vocals, yet at the same time making each song appear like a photograph freezing action with economy, yet losing none of the beauty. Other cuts include "Coming home Soon", "Looking Glass", "Beatrice", "Girl is Young" and "Phoebe". The band presents a fresh new approach to music which is definitely missing in our big rock bands, while the singing, by McKie, Gibson and Martynec is superb.

The record was produced by none other than Felix Pappalardi, who also arranged the horns, and has such names as Keith McKie, Luke Gibson, Alex Darou, Jimmy Watson and Eugene Martynec as band members. The lp is called Avenue Road, and the band? They call themselves Kensington Market. Keep your eyes open for them.

As The National Ballet continues its spring season

There are only two reasons to see the National Ballet: Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn, in that order.

The audience at Wednesday's performance at the O'Keefe knew it. "Ketentenz", which premiered in New York with the City Centre Joffrey Ballet, featured the pair, and received a well deserved ten minute ovation.

Kain is a star. Her technique is faultless, and for her, as easy and natural as breathing. She involves each person in the audience, she plays to each of us individually, and one appreciates that rare feat.

Kain is a superb dancer. When the company enters in a quasi-kickline, she stands out — her steps are a fraction more exact, her toes hit the floor precisely on the downbeat, and she is never, never out of rhythm.

Her partner, Frank Augustyn, began weakly, but soon he, like the rest of the company, was caught up in the excellence of Kain.

As a pair, they are an unbeatable combination. The hours of rehearsal have paid off. They were certainly the highlight of the evening.

But even their fine dancing could not endear the other two works to the audience.

Vesak's "Whispers of Darkness", although full of emotionally charged pairs dancing, lacked the kind of focus needed to thrill. Whatever he was trying to say, was obscure enough to lose half the audience.

Probably the movements most easily understandable, were those between Kain, Augustyn and Tennent, who is the official prima ballerina of the company.

Kain and Augustyn are dancing; Tennent tries to get Augustyn's attention. He will have none of it. Then Tennent tries to separate the pair. Again to no avail. Ironic stuff that.

When Kain is on stage, with those long, expressive arms and legs, no one but Nadia Potts can come close to matching her.

And Potts did a spectacular job in her solo work. She is second only to Kain.

"Inventions", choreographed by the National's own Constantin Patsalas, is pretentious balderdash, with no coherent form, and few inner motifs worth a second glance. It didn't help that the dancers were counting beats, with blank, worried faces.

There is no reason for such mediocre content to be forced on the National, which could become a crack modern ballet company, if it had something decent to dance.

Coppelia, the opening ballet of the season, like most classical ballets, is short on plot. Coppelia goes one further, in being short on good dancing. This unfortunately shows up the plot for what it is: pointless, and annoying.

Swanhilda thinks that her fiance Franz is in love with Coppelia, who is really a wind-up doll, created by an aging toymaker.

the old toymaker, disorientating him to the point where he drops the key to his shop.

Swanhilda and her friends break into the shop. They wind up the toys (I thought the Chinaman was great), and find Coppelia.

We are supposed to find it highly amusing when Swanhilda tricks the old man, pretending to be the doll that he loves best.

As Swanhilda rips off her wig, the toymaker wheels in the doll, stripped of her pretty tutu, and without her hair. I found that I could not laugh at such a pathetic sight.

Swanhilda decides she has had enough fun, and reveals herself to her lover. They marry at one of the most boring weddings in history, if not the shortest.

Vanessa Harwood danced the lead role poorly, and was so tired by the end of Act II, that she was losing her balance while pirouetting on point. Her Swanhilda had no character to speak of.

Gary Norman, who danced Franz the fiance, suffered from the same problems. His technique is not good enough that we should be subjected to two hours of it.

The set was the most garish I have ever seen. The scrim was a beautiful blue with red flowers as a border. But what lurked behind seemed as if it had been designed by a color blind graduate of the learn-to-design-at-home-in-your-spare-time School.

Every color from mauve to orange to green was amply represented.

The costumes could hardly be seen in this riot of color, with the exception of the czardas, whose sequins caught and bounced the light.

Swanhilda's wedding dress needed pressing, and the serfs, in battered, dirty dirndls, should do something about their white crinolines, which matched those of Swanhilda's girly friends. Consistency is all I ask.

The orchestra, under George Crum, sawed its way through the score. The concert master sounded like a sick cat during the wedding pas de deux.

Smart ballet fans are getting their tickets early for the Kain and Augustyn performances.

For all you know, they may move on soon to a bigger and better company.

is decadence enough?

On Monday night, an initially anxious Massey Hall was rocked — and delighted — by the sounds of Roxy music. Although the British band has four successful albums to their credit, this was its first appearance in Toronto.

The most enjoyable aspect of Roxy throughout the evening was its ability, through carefully constructed contrasts in its music, to ramble with the audience freely throughout its musical history. The "barbershop quartet" vocalizations on "If There Is Something," contracted with the futuristic outlook in "Out of the Blue." Bryan Ferry crooned into the mike during "Three and Lane", while Andrew MacKay the competent reeds player blew some jazz in other pieces.

For the occasion, Ferry had donned a Rudolph Valentino tuxedo and was sporting a haircut reminiscent of Prince Charles. In contrast, MacKay, parodied the rock and roll period with a comical hopping sax solo that drew a grin from everyone.

With the parting of Eno to pursue an individual career, Roxy has recruited one Edwin Jobson to fill the vacated keyboards position in the band. Although he is by no means gifted on the keyboard, he has received classical training on the violin. Employing a clear plexiglass electric violin, Jobson, dancing early in the blue lights, provided the band with an added dimension to their sound.

Collectively, the members of Roxy provided an unending performance. As the music melodiously featured guitarist Manzanera, bassist Gustatson and drummer Thompson, the remaining trio would dance in the back stage lights. Pairing one another in various selections, Roxy formed a simple yet pleasing symmetry on stage.

With a powerful "Do The Strand" as the inevitable encore, Roxy Music proved to be a delightful surprise to even those who dare not be known by decadence alone.

to discover, to recognize

It is wonderful to be reminded that the Group of Seven, however popular, are not the only Canadian painters of interest. The exhibition of Canadian Painting in the Thirties, now showing at the National Gallery in Ottawa, and coming to Toronto this spring is an interesting, varied, and thoughtful tribute to a large and versatile number of Canadian artists working during the Depression.

The wide scope of the exhibition takes in some forty individuals, differing in origin, interests, and style. From all over Canada come landscapes, portraits, social criticism, and design for its own sake. The sympathetic portraits of grave, care worn children by maritimer Jack Humphrey speak as plainly for the time as the sharpest abstract arctic landscapes of Lawren Harris. And the instinctive feel for life in the water colour landscapes of the Ottawa Valley by Goodrich Roberts finds a violently contrasting counterpart in the apocalyptic symbolism of Carl Schaeffer's "Storm over the Fields."

In the midst of variety the individual is not forgotten. We can appreciate for its own sake David Milne's decorative use of colour, his almost oriental calligraphic style, in "Red Nasturtiums." It complements by contrast, the delicate sure line, mute colours, and thoughtful naturalism of L. L. Fitzgerald's "The Pool."

No individual predominates; the merits of each work stand or fall in relation to all the others, from the most famous of Emily Carr's "Pine Tree and Sky" to F. Varley's lesser known "Through an Open Window."

We can appreciate, in this unbiased setting, the true utterly unselfconscious originality of the painters of the Thirties. There is no confusion in this variety; it reflects these artists' concern for their art and its workings and responsibilities, which is more genuine than many of the esthetic certitudes we see today. A painting like Charles Comfort's "Young Canadian" expresses a more authentic feeling of nationalism than much of today's "vaunting aloud" — a less defiant, swaggering understanding of what Canada was and should be.

For we are never allowed to forget the effects of the Depression. Social criticism is implicit in even the most traditionally classical of subjects. Phillip Surrey's "Night Boardwalk," Andre Bieler's "Fete a S Adele," Louis Muhlstock's "Open Door," and J.P. Lemieux "Lazarus," are all moving evidence of these painters' consuming concern for the suffering of their society.

"Escalator," by Marion Scott, depicts with a mesmerizing stylized simplification of forms, the dullness of the machine held mind carried inevitably to anonymous oblivion on three stair cases, each moving in a different direction but all set on the same course. It is perhaps the ultimate tribute to the artistic concerns of the Thirties for it emulates two ostensibly irreconcilable opposites of that time: the question of the artist's responsibility to society as its critic and prophet, versus his responsibility to himself as the inventor and preserver of the expression of his art.

A number of the paintings are already familiar since they are in fact borrowed from the Hart House collection (among these are the Varley and the Comfort "Young Canadian" mentioned above).

It's an exciting even challenging exhibition; one discovers so much and recognizes so much more; I look forward to seeing it again.

"The Power of Darkness"
Toronto Firehall Theatre
70 Berkeley St.

Tolstoy's Power of Darkness is a powerful, moving drama of crime and confession. The Firehall Theatre's production, thanks chiefly to Peter Kunder's performance in the lead role of Nikita, conveys a sense of the play's force, but not much of its complexity or its real flavour: it is a decent amateur production.

The Power of Darkness presents some real staging problems. Set in nineteenth century rural Russia, it tells the story of a rich, old, sick peasant landowner, Pyotr, whose wife Anisya murders him to marry his hired hand, Nikita. After their wedding Nikita spurns his new wife for her stepdaughter Akulina, with whom he begets a child. At his mother's instigation Nikita murders the child moments after its birth by crushing its skull, so that their affair will remain a secret and his lover can still be married off, as custom dictates. But in the final scene, before the guests assembled for his lover's wedding, Nikita confesses the murder. Molly Thom's staging of the murder of the child, and of Nikita's confession, enabled Kunder to bring off his role well in both scenes, but without much help from wedding guests who did not look much surprised to hear from their host that he has ruined several women and crushed an infant's skull.

Both murders, the murder of Nikita's master and of his child, are conceived and planned by Nikita's mother. She wants Pyotr's farm for her son; to get it, her son must marry Pyotr's wife; so mother Marlyona persuades Pyotr's wife to murder him.

The reasons for both murders — the stepdaughter's wedding and the greed for land — rely for their full impact on the play's peasant setting. It is unfortunate then that except for John Gilbert as Pyotr and Ian Orr as Mitrich, Nikita's hired man, the actors utterly failed to convey simple, blunt, shrewd, witty peasant ways, or any peasant ways at all. Joan Calderera especially, as the stepdaughter Akulina, was too polished, too citted, and looked out of place in a peasant shawl. Neither Frances Halpenny as Nikita's mother, nor Margaret Edgar as his master's (later his own) wife were able to act convincingly greedy. Halpenny got a number of well-deserved laughs for her gruff comments on the other characters doings, but when it came to advising murder she never seemed heartless enough, and remained through all her manipulation and crime no more than a jolly old woman. While Tolstoy's point is that committing crime leads the criminal to the brink of insanity, Edgar, as Pyotr's wife whom Nikita jilts after she has murdered Pyotr to marry him, failed to become increasingly hysterical when she realizes that she has murdered a bad husband to murder a worse. She began her first scene so hysterical that she left herself no chance of growing more so.

While the production doesn't do justice to Tolstoy's characters, the play is such a fine one and so rarely done, that this production is worth seeing just to know it.

dance

Tonight is your last chance to catch the 15 Dance Laboratorium, in their Missing Associates Performance, at 155a St. George St., one block south east of Queen and Jarvis. The show starts at 8:30. Admission—$2.50.

If money is no object, the National is the alternative for tonight, with Coppelia on tap—matinee and evening performances Saturday, and a matinee on Sunday. Not for those with weak stomachs.

On Wednesday, the National will plod their way through Don Juan, which was premiered last season, and Kettentanz, premiered in Toronto Wednesday (see review p 12).

Tuesday sees the unveiling of two new dances from the Toronto Dance Theatre.

Peter Randazzo, one of the artistic directors of the company, has choreographed L'Assassin Menace, which was inspired by a painting of Magritte's.

David Earle is presenting Field of Dreams, which was inspired by the sonnets of Edna St. Vincent Millay, depicting the sexual fantasies of women separated from their men in times of war.

Randazzo's Starscape and Patricia Beatty's Rhapsody in the Late Afternoon will complete the programme.

Performances at the Edward Johnson Building, MacMillan theatre, from Feb. 18 to 22, 8:30, with a matinee on the 22nd. Student prices with your ATL.

Murray McLachlan celebrates the success of his latest album with a full house tomorrow at Massey Hall. There are, though, a few scattered seats left. Sunday at Con Hall, Blues immortals, Sonny Terry & Brownie McGee appear with the added attraction of multi-instrumentalist, David Amram.

On Monday the 17th, you can choose between Two Generations of Brubeck at Seneca College, or Herb Alpert's Tijuana Brass at Massey Hall. Feb. 24 offers Italian superstars Premiata Forneria Marconi, plus Audiomaster at Massey Hall, and the 28th brings the thundering sounds of Queen and Kansas, again to Massey Hall. John Entwistle of Who fame, is also scheduled for Massey Hall on March 1, at unfortunately high prices of up to $7.

Seven nights at Massey Hall have been set aside this year for Canada's most legendary folk singer and noted egomaniac, Gordon Lightfoot. His run, lasting from March 17 to 23 will almost certainly be a quick sell-out, so I recommend you don't delay in picking up your tickets.

At the Riverboat, tonight and tomorrow Toronto musical legend, Luke Gibbon appears after far too long an absence from the local scene. His rumoured retirement, I am glad to say, was merely that, a rumour. Tom Cochran replaces Gibbon next week, and Chuck Mangione's favorite vocalist Don Potter drops by for a week Feb. 25-March 2.

At the El Mocambo, The Good Brothers round out their week tomorrow night, are replaced in upcoming weeks by Roomful of Blues and the Downchild Blues Band.

For jazz fans, the Colonial offers Raashan Roland Kirk until tomorrow, and Stan Getz all next week.

At Beaver's, at Victoria College (150 Charles St. W.) popular Canadian folk artists Raffi and Peter Mathieson appear tonight at 9:00.

theatre

After a spate of openings we're back to bit of a trickle this week.

New shows in town include: Tolstoy's grim peasant drama The Power of Darkness at the Firehall (opened last week, see Review); a double bill at the Colonnade of two British plays—The Real Inspector Hound by Tom Stoppard and Black Comedy by Peter Shaffer (opens February 12th); and at the Global Village Cosmic Jack an adult beanstalk fantasy (previews 18th-23rd. Opens 25th).

Otherwise things are very much as was. Article 58 closes tomorrow night (15th) at the St. Lawrence. The Pits at the Free Theatre also closes this weekend, on Sunday. Passe Muraille's Baby Blue appears to be still with us for a week or so yet at the Bathurst St. Church. Passe Muraille is also running Tony's Woman at the Poor Alex ('til February 22nd). You have plenty of time yet to take in the latest Tremblay play, Bonjour la Bonjour at the Taragon; it closes on March 1st. Factory Lab will be opening on the 18th with a revival of the Homemade Theatre's Show of Shows. (You may have seen this group's TV effort, Dull Day demolition, one of the Canadian films shown on the Sprockets series.) Two politely minded class items to finish up with—Priestley's When we are Married will be running for another week at Central Library Theatre ('til February 22nd), and that vevy aristocratic show, The Jockey Club Show will be at the Royal Alex 'til the same date—22nd.

On radio, Noel Coward fans might be interested in the broad cast performance of Design for Living. CBC, February 18th at 8 pm.

classical films

There's a lot of stuff on this week, including the final concert in Anton Kuerti's Beethoven series Sunday at Hart House, 3:00 pm, that you should take in if you have the chance. But tonight at Massey Hall, Andre Previn conducts the TSO in what has to be one of the finest concerts I've ever heard down on Shuter St.

Opening the program is Elgar's overture "Cockaigne (In London Town)", rarely heard in this country. It's a noisy, spirited romp for the full orchestra, built around a boy-meets-girl, street-urchins-ruin-boy's-chances-with-girl story. The piece is more than a piece of fluff, but requires a lighthearted approach to make it come off. Previn, one is happy to report, handles it beautifully.

Barry Tuckwell follows, playing Strauss' Horn Concerto No. 1, an early work that has more than a few traces of Mendelssohn, Schumann and (!) Weber hanging about its pages. With his calm, dignified stage manners, Tuckwell is no histrionic showman, preferring to let his instrument do the communicating. In a field as thinly populated as that of Horn Soloists, Tuckwell gives a fine demonstration of why he stays at the top.

The real attraction is, of course, the Rachmanninoff Symphony no. 2 in E minor, recorded last year by Previn and his regular ensemble, the London Symphony. That disc was one of the finest recordings of the year and Previn, not surprisingly, brings much the same interpretive approach to the live performance. Each of the four movements is either based on or centrally features a slow, lyrical passage of sweeping, glorious melody in the violins. These large, grandiose and deliciously schmaltzy passages are the sort of thing Previn was born for; he exults in them, singing along with the orchestra, throwing himself totally into their being. There are fireworks aplenty, too: the percussion section was in fine form for the all-encompassing crashes of the last pages of the work.

This symphony is immensely attractive; if you don't know it, grab the record; if you can at all make it, go out of your way to get down to Massey Hall tonight. Come 90 minutes before curtain time (7pm) and you can get in for $2 to the rush seats. It isn't every day you get to see creative genius in full flight, searing you with the intensity of a personal vision into the soul of a work. Go see Previn conduct. That's all there is to it.

Sunday evening at Massey, Andres Segovia makes yet another appearance, possibly his last one for a while; rumour has it he's retiring. Less of a glorious sound than there used to be, but he's very much a living legend. $3-10.

Ordinarily that stretch of time known as Reading Week meant the campus was as empty as a Governing Council member's head. But not this year, what with everyone foregoing skiing, swimming and stumping to study their way into law or medical school.

You're not going to do all the studying you think, so why not see four or five good, cheap, nutritious movies?

Next Wednesday, OISE presents Citizen Kane (7:30 pm) and The Trial (9:30 pm). A week later Jack Nicholson takes over the auditorium with The Last Detail (recommended) and The King of Marvin Gardens (not recommended).

Tonight the UC Film Club serves up a movie to thrill all-you religious firebugs.

It's Carl Dreyer's 1928 scorcher, The Passion of Joan of Arc, about a young shaven-headed virgin who finds true happiness bound to a flaming stake. Burning flesh never looked so photogenic.

It must be National Suffering Week because Joan of Arc pops up again at 3 pm. Feb. 22 at The Art Gallery of Ontario. Film historian and musicologist Charles Hoffman plays original music he composed to accompany this silent film.

In the same series, tomorrow afternoon's showing offers six avant garde films of the 20's done by Renoir, Clair and Leger. Tickets $2. Pauline Kael called Peking's Straw Dogs "the first fascist work of art." She was wrong. It's Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will, made in 1934 to celebrate the Nazi success in Germany.

As powerful and fascinating as a 50 foot boa eating a mouse. Free. Lecture Theatre L72, 340 Victoria St. (Byerson). Part of Film as Propaganda series.

The Palmerston Library offers an interesting film series on The Treatment of Women in the Movies.

The series will attempt to approve the proposition that movies have sent women down a descending path since the first appearance of the tremulous innocents and flippant flappers of the 20's.

They begin 7:30 tomorrow night with two Sternberg films, The Salvation Hunters and The Shanghai Gesture. Next Saturday, Broken Blossoms and White Gold. Costs $2. March 1st it's—you guessed it—Joan of Arc.

Also at the Palmerston Library (560 Palmerston), Mr. Hulot's Holiday with Jacques Tati and Steamboat Bill, Jr. with Buster Keaton. Feb. 22, 2 pm, admission $2.

A good doubleheader at the College Cinema, 344 College St.: Limelight and The Wizard of Oz. Until Sunday. Bring ATL card for reduced admission.

books

A plan is underway in the Hart House Library Committee to form a special collection of Canadian poetry. The collection is intended to give some focus to the second-floor library—and that's something that has been needed there for a long time. The collection—the exact nature of which has not yet been determined although it will emphasize contemporary poets—won't be out on the shelves for a while. Something has to be done about security. The situation is getting worse. One committee member estimated that the amount of books stolen last year was some 20 per cent of the total collection. Just a few weeks ago, someone lifted a whole shelf of British history books. (This is a theft rate rivalled only by the Howard Ferguson library in the basement of UC's Sir Daniel Wilson residence.)

If you take your briefcase into the room and you feel you look suspicious and you start to feel guilty: you should.

(In past columns I have referred to Aleck Dadson as chairman of the Library committee. He isn't. Students are always the committee secretaries. Faculty members are the chairmen. And John Leyerle, Director of the Centre for Medieval Studies, is the Library committee chairman.)

The book sales continue. McCland Stewart's "paperback sale of the year" is on from February 20th to March 8th. You get one extra McClelland and Stewart paperback for every two you buy. The bonus book is your choice but it cannot be more than the cost of the less expensive of the two books bought. The U of T Bookroom is taking part in the sale but it will be closed for inventory at the end of next week so it will miss out on the first part of the sale. The sale has been incredibly successful on campus, so the manager of the Bookroom told me. (It's really the only time to buy these paperbacks since they're so overpriced the rest of the year.) Nationally—it is a nation-wide sale—more and more bookstores are joining in every year. There were 191 taking part the first year, 240 last year; there will be 350 involved this year.

Jack McClelland will be doing his publicly-conscious best to promote the sale. There's no way, he says, that he can send all his 200 authors out to push it—they complain too much, for one thing—so he will do it all himself. He will travel from Halifax to Vancouver during the sale after launching it here in Toronto. At noon, on February 19th, he will stand on the s.w. corner of Bloor and Bay and give out books.

One sale at the Hudson's Bay department store concludes today.

All the books here are Doubleday duds—Hair and How to Care for It, The Prints of Currier and Ives, A Pictorial Biography of Solzhenitsyn. But you are not told this. The Intercom Lady frequently interrupts the store's shoppers of the "Book Fair" in progress. That is all. These sweet-heart sales are more common than they should be, no doubt. Nevertheless I picked up a good hard cover edition of The Education of Henry Adams Leitch, for 66 cents.

Maclean-Hunter do things more honestly than Doubleday: they offer their own bookstore in their office building on University (on the first floor) where such items as Clans of Scotland and Preserving Flowers the Easy Way go for much more than they are worth, yes, but much less than was originally charged for them.

Why are book sales so prevalent at this time of the year? End-of-the-fiscal-year clean-up, often. U of T Bookroom's sale, which concludes today, is a week before its inventory. But as well, the pre-Christmas buying season is the high point of the bookseller's year. And the immediately following months appear even worse than they are by comparison though they are bad enough. Nothing is happening: school books are not "happening"; the fall publishing season is not "happening".

The Canadian Periodicals Publishers Association has distributed a booklet promoting the various magazines published by its members. Some are more interesting than others. But then maybe some people look forward eagerly each month to their issue of Dogs in Canada. I picked up my copy of the booklet up at the Queen's Park Legislative Library (where I go to read my home-town newspaper)—they have all Ontario newspapers here, readily accessible and up to date. There is none there now.

(On my way over to check, I passed Davis' black limousine with the 1-Crown-1 licence plate. Perched precariously on the edge of the thick black leather back seat was an O Henry chocolate bar. Davis is buffeted by scandal; he is a back-room wheeler-dealer; he is overweight; he has a partiality for O Henry chocolate bars: he is but human.) But you can get a copy from the CPPA offices or wait until a larger distribution planned for the spring.

Today is the deadline for submissions to a new literary journal centred at UC. (Those of you who just happen to have great undiscovered poems in your pockets, drop them in at the UC Registrar's office.) Acta Victoriana has issued an appeal for submissions to its second issue. Deadline (for prose, poetry and photographs) is February 21st, submissions depot: 150 Charles Street W.

William Blissett gives the second Victoria College public lecture, Monday, February 24th. Blissett who is editor of the U of T Quarterly, and an English professor at UC will speak on "Coriolanus and the Helms of State."

The 1975-76 Hart House Library Committee has been elected. There were nine candidates and eight seats available. These are the victors: P. J. Bates, G. R. Carr-Harris, Bob Cooper, P. Kotras, J. P. Manthorpe, A. North, E. Shaw-Colyer, and M. S. Wolfish.

Wilson Key, the author of Subliminal Seduction which was given a celebrated review in the Varsity last year by Ulli Delmer is at the St. Lawrence Centre. Next Monday, 8 pm. Free. Sponsored by the Toronto Arts Public Affairs Department.

A week next Tuesday, the U of T Library (!) sponsors a reading by two poets—Abbott Anderson, who teaches here at Woodsworth and at the Faculty of Education, and Tom Marshall, from Kingston, who was editor of Quarry during its formative period—the Science and Medicine Library, Room 28, King's College Circle. 12:30 pm.

Toole charged the alleged illegal proxy voting was done between September and November when important issues like the budget were before the council.

A shocked council heard Toole declare, "I will not be a candidate for any office contested in the annual elections next month."

Council sat in silence for at least 30 seconds when Toole finished and resumed his seat.

Subsequently the council did not discuss anything Toole said and moved on to other matters.

O'Donohue said he had no comment on Toole's charges, saying they had nothing to do with him.

Cavalier said, "It came as a total shock to me. I didn't know anything about it."

Later, Cavalier read Westman's letter as expected. Westman had shown up unexpectedly at the last council meeting to read the letter criticizing the way she had been treated.

That council meeting, which had been called by Cavalier to investigate O'Donohue's conduct as president, lacked a quorum and therefore the letter was reread last night.

Westman criticized O'Donohue's administration as "haphazard."

She also said the weekend stable manager hired to replace her was incompetent and the hiring had been done without consultation with council.

Westman did not appear at the meeting to elaborate on her criticisms.

After Cavalier finished reading the letter council took up the matter and fought it out tooth and nail, with council members taking either pro or anti-O'Donohue stands.

Two professional horsemen who had been associated with the stable since its inception were present at the meeting and both spoke for O'Donohue's handling of the stable.

Cavalier introduced a motion to refund $6 to Westman, which was one of her grievances.

Cavalier introduced a motion to refund money which Westman said she had to pay unnecessarily out of her own pocket to her successor. Another part of the motion was for O'Donohue to send a written apology to Westman.

Discussion bogged down on these technicalities and the motion failed.

When questioned O'Donohue said the discussion on the stables had "exonerated" him and he felt further comment was unnecessary.

The pub also came up for discussion with council member Bill

Deneault informing council he had received over 30 applications for the pub manager job after it was advertised in the Star.

He recommended, however, that these applications be disregarded and that present pub manager Glen Toombs be retained.

Deneault said council could feel confident in hiring Toombs because he "recommended him." Deneault said it would simply be a lot less trouble than sifting through the 30 applications.

Toole wondered how Toombs could be a full-time college employee and a full-time pub manager and do justice to both jobs.

Deneault said Toombs as pub manager would only be a part-time manager and draw a salary accordingly.

Council was not persuaded, however, and decided to retain Toombs as pub manager until the end of March at which time the other applications would be considered for next year's pub manager.

complex would be built as presently designed.

"The actions of the administration have forced us to choose between the need for an athletic building and the legitimate criticisms put forward by the community," said SAC vice-president Tim Buckley.

Buckley opted for the building, saying, "The needs of the university must outweigh the community objections."

His position was supported by two leading SAC heavies, university commissioner Gord Barnes who is rumored to be a SAC presidential aspirant, and Governing Council member Peter Jarrett.

"I'm not happy with all the aspects of the building, but the students want it and it should not be delayed," Barnes said.

St. Hilda's representative Sally Coultis claimed the community groups have no right to complain since "people who decide to live near an airport can't justify complaining about the noise."

"The university must assume the social responsibilities inherent in its downtown location," replied SAC executive assistant Chris Allnutt.

McAlister said, "The squatters' rights are logically ours not the university's."

After lengthy debate SAC defeated a motion demanding the university be subject to all interim development criteria approved by the city.

The meeting then overwhelmingly supported a lengthy motion offered by Jarrett which endorsed construction of the athletic building as presently designed, attacked the university administration for its recent maneuverings, and affirmed that all university future planning except the athletic complex should be subject to city bylaw restrictions.

Buckley called the motion "moral bankruptcy" telling Jarrett, "You can't save your soul now."

Jarrett defended his apparent compromise position as a valid combination of "principles and a realistic evaluation of circumstances."

SAC PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION
MARCH 12-13, 1975

The election of the SAC President and two Vice-Presidents will be held on March 12 and 13, 1975.

Candidates for these positions must run on a ticket of three: one from either Scarborough College or Erindale College, the second from the Faculty of Arts and Science (St. George Campus), and the third from the professional faculties.

Any University of Toronto student who has paid the SAC fee is eligible to vote and run. All full-time undergraduate students have had this fee deducted automatically.

Tickets must be nominated by 100 SAC fees-paying students and submit a deposit of $25 along with the nomination form. This deposit will be refunded to any ticket receiving at least one-third of the votes of the winning ticket.

Complete election rules and nomination forms will be available at the SAC office (928-4909) after February 24, 1975.

Despite an offer by the league's swimming coaches to provide additional funds from outside sources, the athletic directors appear determined to send not more than 22 swimmers and three divers even though Ontario college swimming is the best in Canada.

Both the swimmers and coaches are extremely concerned and somewhat agitated at the OUA A decision since at least 40 swimmers would qualify for the national championships under the current CIAU time standards. A crisis could result if either the coaches are determined that all qualified swimmers be sent to Lakehead or if some swimmers decide to use the courts to overturn the OUA A ruling.

Earlier this year, at least three hockey players successfully challenged OUA A eligibility restrictions in the courts and there could be a significant legal crisis if any of the teams involved wins the OUA A title and advances into the CIAU playoffs.

It's getting somewhat redundant to repeat, but Blues will as usual make a farce out of the OUA A meet in the pool since Blues consistently hammered all league opponents during the dual meet schedule and a quick look at the national rankings in 13 individual events plus diving and relays shows that Blues have a 300-point lead over all other schools.

Since winning their fifteenth consecutive championship is not really at issue, Blues will be trying to qualify as many swimmers as possible under the CIAU standards in order to enhance the coaches' case against the athletic directors.

Veteran Jim Adams is ineligible but Dave Wilkin and Lance Peto should take to the slack in the freestyle sprints, with Shawn Laari, Mike Bibberd, Jay Steele and John Sebben available for the distance freestyle events.

George Gross, Greg Vanular and Russ Farquhar give Varsity three experienced backstrokers, while Juri Daniel, John Watt and Lance Aho provide depth in the breaststroke.

Vanular, Mike Hughes and Bill Chisholm have recorded good times in the butterfly and divers Fin Temple plus Tim Bean will add more points to the total in the 1 and 3-metre diving.

Based on the most recent national rankings, Blues could win almost every event but of course the real competition puts the swimmers and coaches against the short-sighted athletic directors.

"Here at Toronto we are fortunate to be enjoying really great support from Dalt White," said Blues coach Robin Campbell, "but some of the other directors around the OUA A simply don't seem to know what's going on. Their interests in swimming is next to nothing."

ELECTION ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE —
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

- Students: Seats available - 2 in each of Trinity, Erindale, New College, Inns, Seats available - 1 in each of University, Victoria, St. Michael's, Seats available - 1 part-time student — Woodsworth

Faculty:

- Departmental:
Humanities: Seats available - 1 in each of FRE, ISL, ITA, PHI, PHL, REL, SIS, SLA
Life Sciences: Seats available - 1 in 200
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 1 in each of AST, CSC
Social Sciences: Seats available - 1 in each of ANT, GGR, POL, SOC

Divisional:

- Humanities: Seats available - 5
Life Sciences: Seats available - 3
Physical Sciences: Seats available - 5
Social Sciences: Seats available - 3

Committee On Study Elsewhere

Students: Seats available - 4 full-time

NOMINATIONS

Nomination forms can also be obtained through Departmental and Registrars' offices or from the Faculty Office. Completed nomination forms must be received in the Faculty Office, Room 1006, Sidney Smith Hall, prior to 4:00 p.m. on February 14th, 1975 to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box.

Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392. A complete description of the Committees and the Rules of Procedure are available upon request at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

Varsity golf tip number 7 - the short game

By BILL WHITCOMBE

Golf tip number 7 is presented today since there will be no Varg during reading week, just in case you find a golf course open.

The short game, in golfing vernacular, refers to the short shots taken from a short distance away from the green in an attempt to get the ball on the green as close to the hole as possible.

The pitch shot is a short high shot taken from some distance off the green, while the chip shot is a low trajectory shot taken from just a few feet off the edge of the green.

The pitch shot is usually executed with the No. 9 iron or the pitching wedge. For a conventional pitch shot you should narrow your stance considerably, open your stance slightly, and strike the ball with a smooth slow-tempo swing. The slower tempo will help get the ball up in the air quickly and land on the green with a minimum of roll.

The chip shot can be executed with most any club from the No. 4 iron down through the pitching wedge, depending on how high you want the ball to go.

In executing the chip shot you should stand with an open stance, heels about 8 in. to 12 in. apart, knees flexed, weight favouring the left side, and very close to the ball.

You should literally feel that you are "sitting down" to the ball and your head should be almost directly over the ball. The hands should be choked down near the bottom end of the grip for more precise control.

The ball placement will vary a bit with the ball well forward in the stance for a more lofted shot and moved backwards towards the right foot for a lower running shot.

In any case the stroke should be a firm one and the ball should be struck crisply on the downswing. As in putting, most beginners err in attempting a long backswing and then trying to slow the club down enough for the short shot. You should think of a short backswing with a short crisp stroke.

The length of the backswing is directly proportional to the distance the ball travels. It is a very simple formula-short backswing, short shot; longer backswing, longer shot!

ELECTION REMINDER

Arts and Science
Council and Committees

Feb. 14th - 4:00 p.m.

Last day for receipt in Faculty
Office of nomination forms

Without a doubt, the most important fundamental in the chip shot is the extreme importance of the hands starting out and remaining ahead of the clubhead throughout the swing.

At address the club shaft should be pointing towards the left hip joint, thereby placing the hands ahead of the ball and the clubhead. The grip should be firm with the left hand, and the left wrist should remain firm with very little in the way of a wrist break on the backswing. The swing tempo should be relatively slow with commanding left arm control.

By way of additional emphasis and to provide a visual checkpoint for you in learning this all-important technique, you should never permit the clubhead to pass a straight line with the left forearm in executing the chipshot.

The clubhead should never pass the hands and the entire arm assembly precedes the clubhead through the hitting area. This helps to ensure striking the ball slightly on the downswing, for if the clubhead is permitted to flip, past the hands, the arc then becomes an upward one and a skulled or topped shot is a certainty. You have heard it before in an earlier tip, swing the arms through the ball.

As in all golf shots, the left arm and hand must be in control of the club. Looseness in the hands or flippiness in the wrists often results in stubbed or bladed shots. An absolutely steady head position is a must. There is little (if any) body action in the shot, as the weight stays firmly on the left side throughout.

Chip shots are amongst the easiest to execute but are a bit more difficult to learn. Time spent in mastering the shot is time well spent, however, for this shot is one of the great stroke savers in golf.

Interfac hockey playoffs just around the bend

By MIKE FRIEND

With the regular schedule of interfac hockey drawing to a close, the scramble for playoff positions is in full swing.

In division I, the top three teams from group A and B qualify with the other two playoff spots awarded to the teams with the highest point total exclusive of the teams already in the playoffs. Sound confusing, sports fans? Well, now you know why it takes three people to administrate the interfac leagues.

Vic I, Erindale, SMC A, PHE, and Law A have qualified for the playoffs while Dent A, Scar I, and Grads I qualified from IB. There could be some small changes in the standings, but there is no hope for Sr Eng, New I, Med A, and UC I.

In division IIA, there is a real rat race for the final playoff spot. Jr Eng with 23 points, For A with 21, and SMC B with 19 seem sure of gaining the right to participate in post season play.

The final berth is a bit messy. Trin A, PHE B, and Knox all have 15 points but the nod should go to PHE who have three games left. Knox has two to play and Trin one.

Division IIB has the only sure first place finisher with Pharmacy going undefeated so far this year. (Stick that in your pipe and smoke it, Toike.) Other teams certain of playoff rights are Scar II and UC II. Again there is a two-way fight for the playoff spot between Emmanuel and Music. God's People have the edge with a one point lead over Music on even games.

Innis, Fac Ed, Mgt St, Law II and New II are all out in the cold. So far this week, Scar I came out on top of a goaltender's duel, winning 8-5 over New I. Grad I sent the doctors to nurse their wounds by thrashing them 4-1. Vic I outlasted SMC A 6-3 and Dents dumped UC I 5-2. Erindale squeaked past Law I 7-3 while PHE only tied Sr Eng 2-2 in a game they should have won.

Division II play saw SMC B tie Jr Eng 2-2 and Emmanuel scared Pharm before bowing out 2-1. Trin A shut out Vic II 1-0 while Music doubled the count on New II 6-3.

Boos behoove Blues need win over Queen's

The hockey Blues find themselves in a strange position going into tonight's final home game of the regular season against Queen's Golden Gaels.

At this stage of the schedule, Blues are usually in the process of locking up first place but 1974-75 has not been the best of years and the team needs a victory tonight just to clinch second.

York Yeomen virtually locked up the top spot after their 4-1 victory over Varsity last Saturday since Yeomen meet league patsies RMC and Windsor in their final two games.

Second place is, however, very valuable to Blues since it means they get home ice advantage in the eastern division quarter-final set for Friday, February 21.

Victories over Queen's tonight and then against Laurentian on Monday in Sudbury would likely see Blues hosting Unjersity of Ottawa at Varsity Arena in that first playoff game next weekend. Should Blues prevail, the OUAA finals would be at Varsity on February 28 and March 1.

This year, Blues have lost three league games for only the second time in coach Tom Watt's ten years at the helm. Inability to capitalize on power play opportunities and inconsistent goaltending have been the predominant criticisms. Watt will have to choose among netminders Bob Oss, Dave Hulme and Mark Logan plus devise a potent power play formation.

Tonight's game will also be a sort of homecoming for two Gaels' defencemen as both Rick Leroy and Dave McDowall formerly toiled for the Blues. McDowall was a many time league all-star and captained Varsity's 1971-72 CIAU championship team.

Blues earlier defeated Queens in Kingston 6-1 but were held to a 4-4 tie by Laurentian thanks to the hot goaltending of another former Varsity player, Dave Tataryan.

Tonight's game (and hopefully) the February 21 playoff game will start at 8:00 pm.

Blues cinch to clinch OUAA

By PAUL CARSON

The women's swim team challenges Waterloo for the OWIAA swimming title this weekend in Waterloo while the men's team has one more week of workouts before travelling to McMaster for an OUAA championship that may see more competition outside the pool than in it.

The women's hopes are resting on several unpublicized freshmen and sophomores who must make the finals in several events in order to bolster the points guaranteed from such stalwarts as Jane Wright and Shirley Schmidt.

Wright is currently top-ranking among Canadian collegiate swimmers in the 100-yard breaststroke, both the 200 and 400-yard individual medleys, the 800-yard freestyle, and the 100-yard backstroke.

Schmidt is placed third behind her teammate in the 800 free and is also among the top ten in the 200 and 400 free plus the 100 back.

Blues also must get strong performances from other nationally ranked swimmers such as Paula Glover, Marilyn McCormack, Carol Moultray and Cindy Lee in order to offset Waterloo's home pool advantage and strong diving team.

Most of the excitement at the men's championships next weekend should center around the controversial decision by the OUAA athletic directors limiting the number of swimmers who will be sent to the CIAU meet at Lakehead in early March.

Well, it's that time of year again, when the militant worker-student collective at the Varg puts all the editorial would-be's through the meat grinder. The candidate(s) for editor will be screened by the staff at noon today, at our second floor office, 91 St. George. The ballot box will be open Thursday for qualified staff members between 10 am and 8 pm. If a second ballot is necessary, it will be held at 1 pm Friday at our regular staff meeting.

Chant proposed as provost

U of T president John Evans will propose Zoology department chairman Don Chant as university provost to Governing Council Thursday. The Varsity has learned.

The position of number two man in the U of T administration became vacant last November when vice-president and provost Don Forster resigned to take the Guelph University presidency.

Chant, a noted environmentalist, has been chairman of the Zoology department since 1967 and is currently two years away from the end of his second term.

Chant would not comment on his possible appointment, but did say he owed the university a debt for the way it had treated him, and that to administer the university in times of financial stringency would be a "tremendous challenge."

Evans would not comment on the proposed appointment.

As provost, Chant would be the administration's link with the academic divisions and faculties of the universities, being responsible to the academic affairs committee of the Governing Council. As vice-president, Chant would be directly responsible to Evans.

Arts and Science faculty dean Bob Greene said he would be "absolutely delighted" about the appointment, terming Chant "one of the most effective chairmen of one of the largest departments."

Greene added since Arts and Science was the "heart of the university" it would be essential to have a provost who was knowledgeable in that area.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said he was surprised at the appointment, adding he expected someone inside campus political circles to get the job.

"It's probably a good thing" that he's not an insider, Kanowitch remarked.

"We all know where Chant stands on pollution," said Kanowitch. "Where does he stand on campus-oriented issues?"

U of T Faculty Association president Bill Nelson too was a "tiny bit surprised" by the appointment, saying he had never had any dealings with Chant, although he would keep an "open mind."

Vice-provost Milton Israel, once rumored as Forster's successor, and who will take over as interim provost until Chant takes charge in the spring, said Chant would be a "very good choice."

Calling Chant a "talented academic administrator," Israel said, "I look forward to knowing him better."

Associate Zoology department chairman D. F. Mettrick said Chant had been an "outstanding" department chairman.

This sentiment was echoed by zoology professor Chris Plowright, who called Chant a "superb administrator" who had "played a major part in making the zoology department the happy place it is."

Chant was a founder of Pollution Probe, and the more recent Energy Probe, and has been a member of several government committees, including the Environmental Council of Canada, a 16-member body which reports directly to the minister of the environment.

Auld says cutbacks for five years

By BOB BETTSON

Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld told representatives of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) yesterday present university cutbacks will last five more years.

Auld told OFS the government is not planning any major changes in university funding and the deficit situation of some universities will probably continue.

The minister also indicated there will be modest changes in the Ontario Student Awards Plan (OSAP) but none would approach OFS demands which he estimated would cost almost $300 million.

The OFS campaigns for improvements in OSAP have been geared to immediate reforms which would lower loan ceilings to $600, abolish expected parental contribution, increase the cost of living allowance by $15 a week and abolish tuition.

Auld blamed the universities for internal misallocation of resources when OFS executive members Barb Cameron and Susan Rich, both U of T students, complained bitterly about large class sizes and declining quality of education.

The OFS presentation stressed the declining standard of living for students across the province and the lessened quality of education caused by faculty lay-offs and other cutbacks.

Cameron said increased corporate income taxes and a more progressive taxation system should pay for increased student assistance and end cutbacks in university spending.

But Auld claimed the average taxpayer would end up paying it anyway because corporations pass on tax increases in the form of price increases. He also said corporations might move to other areas where taxes are lower.

The OFS brief called for abolition of tuition and a living stipend for students. Their position has been backed up by the circulation of thousands of petitions across the province. Organizers at U of T have over 3,000 signatures on petitions.

Auld said faculty-student ratios are quite favorable especially at U of T. He said the average class size is 24 students.

When students disputed his figures

The Varsity—Bob Bettson

James Auld plays Old Mother Hubbard, and very successfully too.

he said all they had to do was average out the number of students, hours of classes, hours of teaching and number of professors.

The minister said support for universities is up 17 percent or almost $200 million, which is greater than inflation and greater than most government departments.

"Everyone will have to tighten their belts," Auld said. He said figures showed Ontario is spending three percent of its gross national product on post-secondary education, which is more than the United States.

Auld also said OSAP is more generous than aid schemes in all other provinces except Quebec with a loan ceiling of only $800, compared to $1,400 in most other provinces.

OFS information officer Chris Harris told Auld students have been shuffled back and forth with the universities blaming the government and the government blaming the universities for the present difficulties.

He said all students were concerned about is having a decent living standard and a quality education.

Auld said universities should not be shocked by the present cutbacks in spending increases because for seven years the government has been cutting back expenditures.

He asked OFS to present its demands for changes in OSAP to an interim committee for student aid.

OFS officials have had to wait more than three months for this meeting with Auld which they requested in November, 1974.

Evans warns cuts ahead

By ROB PRITCHARD

Insufficient government funding has forced the university to institute major budget cuts for the next fiscal year. U of T president John Evans told about 300 members of the Faculty of Arts and Science Council Monday.

The necessary changes — to be decided at a Governing Council meeting Thursday — will include the limiting of tenure-streamed appointments and an increase in student-to-staff ratio.

Governing council chairman Malin Harding and other chairmen of university boards of governors have had meetings with cabinet ministers and Premier William Davis.

These meetings culminated in a Monday meeting with Minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld. The Ontario Committee on University Affairs recommendation of a 10.5 percent increase in government funds was rejected by Auld, who proposed instead a 7.8 percent increase.

Evans said the 10.5 percent

Council stalls on density requirement

By BOB BETTSON

Toronto City Council has thrown another snag into the already delayed construction of the university's proposed new athletic complex. Council decided over Reading Week the university would have to conform to official zoning density requirements.

In the past U of T has been allowed to shift densities across the campus, thus enabling the construction of the John P. Roberts Library which was over twice the allowed density for the site, but when averaged with green space on campus, was acceptable.

The athletic complex is now planned for 2.6 density and the allowed density for the site is 2.0. Therefore the university will have to redesign the complex or apply for a rezoning.

University spokesman Jack Dimond, special assistant to U of T vice-president Jill Conway, said construction might not be delayed because the U of T would not have trouble getting rezoning. He based this assessment on the exemption which U of T recently received from interim planning criteria.

But Dimond said the decision will definitely have major implications for future campus development.

Before the university decides on a rezoning application, the density will have to be calculated on this basis of block size, which has yet to be finally determined.

SAC vice-president Tim Buckley said SAC hoped U of T would get a rezoning to enable construction of the building to go ahead as soon as possible.

But Buckley said that apart from the athletic complex, SAC believes U of T should follow any criteria the city sets for future development.

"We are opposed to the city's decision in the sense that it will delay the building," said Buckley. "SAC will probably make a presentation in favor of the exemption during hearings before the zoning committee."

Huron-Sussex ratepayers spokesman Allan McAllister said the decision will hopefully force the university to talk to residents' groups about changes in the complex.

The residents had initially favored trying to get the interim criteria reimposed on the campus but the council was reluctant to do this.

Then Ward Six alderman Dan Heap and Allan Sparrow planned a motion which would slap a height limit on all university construction but it became apparent this would fail.

Finally, McAllister said, it was discovered the complex had a density of 2.6 as opposed to the allowable 2.0 and this was permitted through the transfer of densities.

City Council decided to instruct the building commissioner not to grant building permits until density requirements were met.

No surprises in university funding

The Tory public relations mill whirred into action again Monday as the minister of colleges and universities, James Auld reannounced increases in government funding for universities.

Although Auld announced the final increase of 16.7 percent late last year, he announced the final figures Monday. The basic income unit will be $2,108.

The province will spend a total of $567 million of which the U of T will receive $126 million. Supplementary and other special grants were added to the basic formula financing grants.

Carleton, Lakehead, Brock, Laurentian, Trent, Windsor and York will receive supplementary grants because of special financial difficulties.

Auld accepted recommendations from the new Ontario Council on University Affairs, chaired by former U of T professor Stephan Dupre.

The OCUA, however, recommended an additional $17 million to compensate for inflationary trends but this was refused by the government.

Auld said he was "pleased" with economies made by some universities in adapting to cutbacks and said increases could not be made because of the "prevailing economic climate."

The increases were immediately attacked by administrators and student groups across the province. U of T president John Evans said the increase of 7.8 percent in the basic income unit is "inadequate."

Evans said a minimum increase of 10.5 percent would have been required to enable universities to maintain present levels of education.

He chastised the government for ignoring the advice of the OCUA which made a careful examination of requirements. He said the U of T could have balanced its budget if OCUA recommendations had been followed.

SAC president Seymour Kanowitch said the announcement was "nothing new. It is characteristic of the way the Tory public relations campaign works to cut funds and announce it as an increase."

Kanowitch said "we're looking at a larger problem. The government has built the universities up to the present level and now refuses to fund them, opting instead to transfer the cost to the individual."

Kanowitch was disappointed with the statements by president Evans. "What the university is saying to the public is we're short of money but we won't show the public our books."

"There is a growing suspicion among students that U of T is not short on funds but just mismanaging its affairs," Kanowitch said. "And until students play a major role in budgetary decisions this will continue."

"There is nothing wrong with a deficit if the books are open to the public," he concluded.

Kanowitch accused Evans of "intellectual snobbishness" for earlier declarations that the university should not open its books because the public couldn't understand university budgeting anyway.

Reaction has also been equally hostile from Ontario Federation of Students and the Ontario Council of Universities who have again called the increases completely inadequate to maintain quality education.

Admin softens stand on SAC concerts ban

Concerts may return to Convocation Hall next year if the next two SAC sponsored events are as successfully fire-marshalled as the last one, says U of T president John Evans.

Evans was responding to demands by SAC for the revocation of previously announced ban on SAC-sponsored concerts because of excessive smoking and drinking at concerts by Gentle Giant and Lynyrd Skynyrd in January.

SAC services commissioner John Tuzyk and concert organizer Dave Bluestein met with Evans during Reading Week after the almost flawless success of SAC fire marshals in preventing smoking during a Feb. 16 concert by famous blues artists Sonny Terry and Brownie McGee.

Evans said he received favorable reports from the physical plant's superintendent. A member of the internal affairs committee of Governing Council will be attending the next two concerts, featuring jazz pianist Keith Jarrett and bluesman BB King.

Most of the previous difficulties were caused by drinking and excessive smoking of dope and cigarettes at hard rock concerts held throughout the year.

With a SAC commitment not to hold hard rock concerts, the ban will probably be lifted by the internal affairs committee in April, Tuzyk said. At internal affairs, some members wanted an immediate lifting of the ban, but it was finally decided to let the next two concerts determine concerts' future.

Short-term appointments ahead?

The University of Toronto may consider making three to five year academic appointments as a way to circumvent the provincial government cutbacks in higher education, U of T president John Evans told the academic affairs committee Thursday.

Evans was responding to a query from committee member and history professor Desmond Morton, who wondered if the committee's deliberations about the procedure for granting tenure were going to be meaningless if no tenured appointments were likely to be made in the foreseeable future.

Evans said it was essential for the university not to enter into any long-term financial commitments for 1975-76 in order to preserve financial flexibility and make appointments where they are needed most. As such, Evans argued, tenured appointments would be inappropriate.

Morton told Evans that uncertainty surrounding the future of academic staff for 1975-76 made it difficult to plan curriculae, which in turn made students unwilling to pursue studies.

Evans also acknowledged it would be "mischievous in the extreme" to tell graduate students anything other than that their future looked extremely gloomy.

Acting vice-president and provost Milton Israel said the committee was "not wasting our time" discussing tenure procedures, and new appointments would be made.

But earlier this month, the university put a two-week hold on new appointments, and its initial budget recommendations called for a halt in staff expansion.

Should the university continue to come under financial pressure for two more years, Evans said, it would require a 10 percent reduction in the university's base budget. Salaries constitute 80 percent of the budget.

Morton said he raised the issue after hearing a circular existed calling for a 10 percent reduction in three years. Evans denied the existence of such a report.

Leah, Shabas to appeal sentences

Tony Leah and Bill Schabas, two former U of T students convicted last summer by the Caput for their role in the Banfield affair, will appeal their sentences at an all-day hearing March 4.

Presiding over the appeal will be the former head of the Upper Canada Law Society, Sydney Robins.

During the Caput trial, Leah and Schabas maintained they were acting in "interests of the university" by preventing Banfield from speaking, since racism has no place on campus. The charges each faced were prefaced with the words "prejudicial to the interests of the university." However, they were not allowed to make their case on those grounds.

The Governing Council has ruled the appeal cannot question the verdict, but only the sentence.

Leah said he and Schabas intend to argue for reduced sentences, since there were mitigating circumstances; namely, the need to combat racism on campus. The appeal should only take a day or two at most, Leah said.

During televised proceedings of their summer trial, Leah and Schabas constantly denounced the Caput as a "kangaroo court" and said they were being tried by an arm of the administration that laid the charges. The appeal will begin at 10 am March 4, and will be held in the Galbraith building council chambers. Proceedings will be open.

Racism here?

An ad hoc committee of inquiry to determine whether racism exists at the university will convene March 4, the day SDS members Tony Leah and Bill Schabas appeal their convictions by the Caput.

According to mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal, the committee was set up after it became apparent that presidential human rights advisor Dan Hill was unwilling to set up an inquiry himself until he had more evidence.

According to the committee's statement, the inquiry will determine "whether the prima facie case of racism and discrimination at the university is serious enough to require a full investigation."

The committee intends to pursue the question of racism and discrimination in such areas as admission procedure, hiring of faculty and support staff, course content, treatment of staff, treatment of students and effects of the university on the community.

The committee will conduct an open hearing between noon and 2 pm March 4 in the International Student Centre, and is encouraging members of the university community to submit briefs. Briefs should be sent to Salafi at the Department of Sociology as soon as possible.

Other committee members include Tom Bribrisco, chairperson of the CUPE local 1290 negotiating committee; Ed Clarke, national black coalition chairperson; St. Michael's College French professor Peter Fitting; United church university chaplain Eilert Frierichs; law student Betty Ho; student Governing Council member Peter Jarrett; Graduate Students' Union president Frank McIntyre; lawyer Charles Roach, chairperson of the Committee Against Racism; and U of T Advisory Bureau acting director Farrel Tombs.

weeks until noon Friday, March 27.

Six students are contesting the two seats in the arts and science division, five are pursuing the two seats in the professional division, two entertain visions of grandeur as they jockey for the two openings for part-time students and three students want the two chairs empty for graduate school aspirants.

The candidates in the arts and sciences division are:

Tim Bermingham, Irving Handler, Brad Nixon, John O'Donohue (Scarborough College Student Council president), John L. Parker (Toike Oike newspaper business manager) and Michael Sabia (SAC communications commissioner). Two seats available.

The candidates for the professional faculties division are: Tim Buckley (SAC vice-president), John Floras, Doug Gerhardt, Howard Levitt (a former Governing Council member) and Robert Skolnick. Two seats available but two different faculties must be represented.

The candidates for the part-time division are:

Jonathan F. Gentry, Felix Salazar (APUS Voice editor). Both acclaimed to the two seats available.

The candidates for the graduate school division are:

(1) humanities — one seat: Kurt Loeb (APUS executive) and Byron Wall (member of the Forster Task Force).

(2) sciences — one seat: Seymour Kanowitch (acclaimed).

The Varsity will be carrying interviews with the candidates in upcoming weeks.

Over and out

As we work our way to that big "30" in the sky, we thought our devoted readers, political fuddle-duddlers and advertisers might wish to know exactly how many issues are left.

Be ye advised: We publish this Friday, and then the week of March 3. After that it gets irregular: Wednesday, March 12; Friday, March 14; Wednesday, March 19 and, last but not least, Wednesday March 26.

Just to complicate matters, we might have a special Monday issue March 17. Stay tuned.

SAC needs strong pres next year

The deadline for SAC presidential election nominations is drawing near and this year it appears there will be a serious lack of credible candidates.

In previous years the Varsity has refused to speculate on the SAC election race until after the nominations were in, but with the absence of quality leadership on the horizon, we feel it necessary to state our position.

The Students council is an extremely important body. This may seem self-evident because it administers a large budget of over a quarter of a million dollars and it has crucial role in representing undergraduate students at U of T.

But unfortunately the quality of student leadership on the campus has deteriorated during the past few years. One only need look at the many fiascos in local councils such as economic mismanagement and feuding over personalities at Scarborough this year to see what the results of this decline can be.

SAC has usually been able to attract enough experienced people to provide a pool of talent for the left-liberal coalition which has been victorious in most elections for the past few years.

This year, many of the SAC executive members who could run are reluctant, some for personal reasons. But this year there is also a complete vacuum of quality leadership in the college and suburban councils.

Therefore, we would urge some of the present SAC executive members to reconsider their plans and consider running on presidential slates.

Next year's council will have a crucial role to play as educational cutbacks present an increasing threat to the quality of education at U of T and accessibility for working class students.

It will also have to deal with a situation where students are demanding a voice on staffing decisions within departments and faculties but are frustrated by campus-wide regulations established by the Governing Council.

It is imperative that U of T students have a SAC executive to provide leadership in opposing cutbacks which will raise class sizes and deny accessibility as well as those which would enforce hardship on the already underpaid non-academic staff at U of T.

We feel that leadership could not be provided by the Young Socialist slate which has indicated its candidacy, or the slate headed by Peter Bauman, which may run for the third time on what could be called a joke candidacy. Fortunately a right wing or joke engineering slate has not come forward or else we would have a three ring circus.

However, The Varsity feels there is a candidate who could head a ticket which could provide leadership needed next year.

We would support present SAC Vice-President and third year Engineering student Tim Buckley, who has demonstrated with his hard work this year he is capable of leading a progressive coalition which would work effectively for students' interests at U of T.

Buckley would require running mates from downtown arts and a suburban campus. While no candidates come to mind from Scarborough or Erindale, one present executive member, services commissioner John Tuzyk would seem a logical.

Buckley should not refuse to run because his nominations have been submitted for the Governing Council election. It seems clear to us it would be more important for students to have effective leadership at SAC.

Mary McGrath, nutritionist with the Ontario Food Council: "I think children going to McDonald's would get a balanced lunch. They get protein in the hamburger, some Vitamin C in the French fries, and other nutrients in the bun and the shake. It would be much better nutritionally, though, if people had an option to have salad instead of French fries."

Will one of the SAC rogues' gallery come out of the woodwork?

Universities' future bleak

Monday's announcement of the level of provincial funding for universities provides no comfort to U of T, which faces a deficit of at least $4 million next year.

Colleges and Universities minister James Auld seems determined to adopt a Nixonesque "hang tough" position, determined to avoid reason and save the taxpayers money. "In view of the prevailing economic climate and the current need for fiscal restraint, it is unfortunately not possible to increase the global sum already allocated to the universities," says Auld.

Perhaps that line will pay in Port Arthur, but Auld should realize the immense problems he is creating for universities, particularly insofar as he continues to insist that access remain as open as possible.

Auld has completely ignored the report of his own Ontario Council on University Affairs, the advisory body set up last summer to act as a buffer between universities and government. The OCUA recommended the government provide universities an additional $16.2 million to offset inflation.

Students will soon feel the effects of the cutbacks. Services will be cut to the bone. Class sizes will increase. Course selection will be lessened, and some programs will be cut out entirely.

If the provincial cutbacks continue, John Evans has pointed out the U of T will have to cut back its base budget by 10 percent; and in a budget dominated by salary payments, that means only one thing: staff will be released. Then the problems will really begin.

James Auld may think he is being really tough in holding back on the universities. He is also "particularly pleased with the efforts some universities are making to examine the objectives of higher education, to define more clearly their own institutional role in the Ontario system, and to find ways of adapting their institutional procedures to meet the pressing financial constraints."

If Auld is convinced the universities are examining their priorities, then the universities have a right to be convinced he is examining his. Auld must demonstrate to Ontario universities that his ministry is at least attempting to formulate a policy towards higher education.

If all he is able to demonstrate is a reaction to the availability of ready cash, then higher education is in serious trouble. And right now it looks as though the minister's position is exactly that.

This reminds me of the statement made by William O. Twaits, former chairman of Imperial Oil, a branch plant in Canada of multi-national Exxon, a corporation that reported 2.4 billion dollars in profits during the so-called "Energy Crisis," as quoted in the Oct. 14, 1974 issue of this newspaper: "I consider myself as representing the public interest." Can I assume that Premier Bill Davis does too?

Yet we should remember Porter's reply to such altruistic statements made by members of the economic and political elites: "The fact that the corporate elite hold important positions beyond the corporate world means that they are in a position to make their ideology pervade the entire society until it becomes identified with the common good." (p. 305, The Vertical Mosaic).

We therefore must recognize Ms. Burnes, a member of the Ontario Young Progressive Conservatives, as a spokesperson for such selfish and narrow-minded functionalist ideologies that justify the existence of the statement, "universities in Ontario exist primarily to benefit largely foreign-owned corporations," as being ludicrous. In doing so, however, she completely ignores John Kenneth Galbraith's analysis that "modern higher education is... extensively accommodated to the needs of the industrial system." (p. 378, my edition of The New Industrial State).

Furthermore, her stand on OSAP seems to ignore the crucial question of the accessibility of the university to various sectors of society, especially in the light of John Porter's view that "the universities serve the middle and upper classes in far greater proportion than they do the classes below..." (p. 283, The Vertical Mosaic).

Her attitude towards the OSAP question stems from what I believe to be a rather deep-seated elitist bias. This appears quite strongly in her conclusion that "the 'Big Blue Machine'... does far more than represent the corporations and upper classes — it ably represents all of us too."

upper classes on the basis of "incentive" rather than privilege and exploitation.

McCreavy ouster was Berger's fault

The recent dismissal of Paul McCreavy seems to have resulted from two sources: pro-union activity and alleged insolence to one Jacques Berger, also employed at the Department of Zoology.

I will leave it to the Labor Relations Board to evaluate the pros and cons of the former charge, but there are some things I must say about the credibility of the latter. Jacques Berger is not the nicest guy in the world by any means. His faults are not great in number, but he certainly makes the most of them. Those who labor under his rather ample shadow must crawl on eggs. Moreover, his performance in many ways inadequate, and when faced with situations in which this mediocrity is starkly brought home to him, he tends to tear apart the first underling within range to distract the attention of others, and perhaps himself, from his own shortcomings.

I think it quite probable that the alleged insolence is more a product of Jacques' sensitive pride and self-esteem than any overt rudeness on the part of Mr. McCreavy. In the 5 years during which I associated with him in the department, I found him always to be polite, friendly, and helpful. This trait must be considered in the context of McReavy's situation.

People with such short tempers and overbearing personalities do not belong in a community of scholars devoted to the study of the living world. Nor should their windy tirades be allowed to influence the destinies of others in such a community. The best thing Jacques Berger could do for himself, as well as for those who must endure him is to resign.

Chilean gov't was unconstitutional

I noted with interest that the oped article on Monday Feb. 10 referred to the "constitutional" nature of the Chilean government at least three times. I have a few comments to make about this.

1) Seeing that Allende consistently ignored the decisions of the courts, the judges of the highest court in the country sent Allende an open letter of protest. Allende replied, "since the courts do not have access to all the social and economic elements of a situation, it is the government that has to decide whether or not a court decision will be followed." So much for the courts.

2) Parliament passed a bill (economic in nature) which Allende promptly vetoed and sent back with several suggestions for amendments. Since the amendments were totally contrary to the intentions of the bill, parliament re-passed the original bill in January 1973. Allende now had two legal options, sign the bill or hold a national referendum within a

Incentive theorist has elitist bias towards OSAP

I would like to reply to several issues raised by the "astounded" Ms. Jane Burnes in her letter, OSAP called free money (The Varsity, Feb. 14).

Firstly, she terms the University driving staff to unionization deadline (some arrive after the deadline has passed). And the grapevine reports that desirable positions are often filled prior to announcement of their availability.

Thus, cynics should note that the university has eschewed a hypocritical practice and now openly and honestly ignores its personnel policies.

As the veil of pretense has been lifted, perhaps it might be instructive to ponder the university's possible goals with regard to the brand of personnel relations it practices.

Traditionally, poor personnel relations encourage unionization. Thus it is not surprising to learn that the hallowed administrative regions of Simcoe Hall and 215 Huron Street are organizing, that the Graduate Assistants Association is well along in its attempts to seek certification and that the academic staff are contemplating similar action.

Does the Administration want unionization? Does it hope that a widely unionized staff will put backbone into its requests for increased government funds to pay salaries? If so, perhaps some additional methods of encouraging unionization should be brought to its attention. It could, for example, totally ignore the job classification system; hire and promote staff entirely by nepotism and favouritism instead of merit; fire those involved in employee organizations; or give mid-year salary increases to those staff threatening unionization in order to encourage their colleagues to follow suit.

Perhaps, however, reorganization and not unionization is the goal. Perhaps the administration hopes that poor personnel practices will rid it of those long service employees who make the university function. Encouraging their departure into higher paying jobs outside the university would allow their replacement by Fresh, transient, staff who, without any training, would be able to bring total chaos to the university's bureaucracy.

By encouraging administrative collapse not only would the non-academic payroll be reduced by the administration would be able to justify elimination of entrenched academic fiefdoms on the grounds that the old patterns of organization could no longer be made to work.

Perhaps, therefore, the real target is reduction of the academic payroll. What better way to encourage the voluntary departure of tenured academic staff than by disrupting their territorial prerogatives or by assigning them the duties of managing the administrative quagmire left by the departure of the non-academic staff?

In fairness, the above speculations probably attribute too much clear-sightedness to the University administration. Surely it has no ulterior motives in creating poor personnel relations. Surely it merely stumbled in the Bertin affair. Perhaps there is still time to replace the veil of pretense, to retreat back into hypocrisy — or even to make personnel practices conform to stated personnel policies and to plan and implement organizational change in a humane and gracious manner.

Recently Leonard Bertin, the Director of the University News Bureau, was fired by the Vice-President of External Affairs. The former Executive Assistant to the Vice-President External Affairs, Elizabeth Wilson, was selected, without internal advertisement of the position, to replace Bertin.

The precipitous manner of Bertin's dismissal and the method of Wilson's promotion raise questions concerning the personnel Practices of the administration.

Many have long suspected that the policy of internal advertisement of vacant positions was window dressing, and not a genuine attempt to encourage development of a widely experienced, career-oriented non-academic staff. "Promotional Opportunities" frequently arrive in departmental offices only one or two days prior to the application

Parental grants hurts low-income students

It is a basic premise of the Ontario Student Assistance Program that the primary responsibility for meeting educational costs rests with the student and family. The parents of Group A ("dependent") students are expected to contribute towards the educational expenses of their children in proportion to their financial resources, as determined by an objective need assessment process.

—quote from OSAP Policy Manual
What the above premise implies is that most of us are forced to live on just the amount of money given us by OSAP, plus whatever we can save from summer jobs. Our parents often try to give us whatever they can, but often, especially when our families are from lower income groups, the amount they give us is nowhere near what the government expects them to give.

The government does not allow for the possibility that our parents refuse to contribute to our education or that we might refuse to ask our parents to continue to sacrifice to help us through school.

If we don't receive the parental contribution computed "by an objective need assessment process," it's tough. This is one thing that is not appealable under OSAP.

Well, let's see how much our parents are expected to pay. (Don't be deceived by the brochure put out by OSAP which implies that if a parent's gross income is $10,000, no parental contribution is expected. That's only true if there are three dependents in the family.) These are all with only 1 dependent. For a gross parental income of $8,000, a $93 mandatory contribution is expected; for a $9,000 income $493, and for a $10,000 income $656.

Two people trying to live on $10,000 a year (approximately $7,000 net) is difficult enough. Expecting them to save up and spend $656 each year on their child's education in most cases is next to impossible. So we don't receive "the mandatory contribution" and are forced to subsist on $656 less in the school year. (The room and board allocation is already below the subsistence level.)

The only way for us to change this situation is to convince both the Ontario (OSAP) and federal (loans) governments to look at us as independent adults, who should be assessed on our real incomes, not that of our parents. Such an assessment would then include what our families actually do contribute rather than what the government states they should contribute.

Such a system may be difficult to administer basing assistance on real income. Certainly the process of assessing and encouraging but not indiscriminately requiring, parental subsidies will take time to work out. But Quebec has just agreed to do this in principle and is beginning a four-year implementation program. Surely richer Ontario can afford to do this too.

The U of T Committee on Student Aid is circulating a petition that will go to the Minister of Colleges and Universities that calls for an end to the arbitrary government assessment of mandatory parental contribution. It is not directed at having OSAP available for students whose parents earn over $25,000 a year and give the student $5,000 for his education. Rather, it is aimed at ending the squeeze now put on the parents who take home between $5,000 and $10,000 a year. Only in this way can we ensure that no one will be denied a post-secondary education because of his or her financial circumstances.

an official protest listing 14 grievances (unconstitutional actions and things like executive approval of physical attacks on judges). Allende was obliged by law to reply in writing to these shortcomings. Of course he did not do that. He made a speech 'to the people', accusing parliament of sedition (intenciones sediciosas) but in no way trying to refute any of the allegations.

You may agree with Allende's goals and you may even agree with his tactics, but to call his government 'legal' or 'constitutional' requires quite a bit of imagination.

Poetry incorrect but seductive

In your last issue (Friday, February 14), John Wilson points out, quite accurately, I am afraid, that the name Rosalind has unaccountably been substituted for the original heroine Cynara in Dowson's poem, which was used in two Hart House Music Committee ads.

The error is mine. Having quoted from memory, perhaps the artifice of that faculty suggested to me that Rosalind was a more likely name for a lost love than was Dowson's, which, after all, he borrowed from Horace. In any event, mea culpa.

Mr. Wilson also laments that things are not as they once were. How true! Non sum qualis eram bonae sub regno Rosalindae.

Ultimately, the purpose of the poetry, if there is such a thing, is to entertain, to divert, and to seduce the reader into an awareness of the advertised event. Admittedly, subliminal seduction is in disrepute, but what is aimed at here is sublime seduction.

The relation between poetry and music may be remote, but they both possess, at least, the power of diversion, so that through them we may forget the Cynarae of the world, for an interval. If nothing else, they come to you, as Pater says, proposing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to your moments as they pass, and simply for those moments' sake.

Review biased

I am writing in regards to Janet Clarke's supposed review of the National Ballet's current performances in the Feb. 14 issue of The Varsity (As the National Ballet continues its spring season . . .). Needless to say, I was completely and utterly outraged by the so-called expertise in which this person reviewed the performances of Coppelia in particular.

The bias against and disregard, or rather ignorance, on the part of Ms. Clarke to classical ballet traditions and her rather petty concentrations to costume condition ("Swanhilda's wedding dress needed pressing"), stage scenery ("The set was the most garish I have ever seen . . . as if it had been designed by a color blind graduate of the learn-to-design-at-home-in-your-spare-time School") and plot ("pointless", "annoying", "pathetic") among others, instead of receiving the actual ballet production as a whole, shows her up to be a complete moron to the intricacies, timing, physical exertions, and fluid cohesiveness of dance, music and scenery involved in a single production of a ballet (classical). Modern ballets can frequently get away without some of these niceties.

I ask here, what are Ms. Clarke's qualifications for such a post as a cultural events reporter, when more experienced professional reporters highly praised the particular ballet production in question?

I would like to know what gives this person the right to such bad, truly bad, reporting as was done in the article? I know something of journalistic reporting, but I know a great deal more about Classical Music and Ballet. I, for one, was thoroughly delighted with the Coppelia.

CONTRACT PROPOSALS

The G.A.A. has not yet been certified as a bargaining agent. But the time is near and it's time now to start talking about what we want to bargain for.

Starting next week, we will have a continuing series of meetings to decide just what to ask for. Look in the table below for the date and time of your department's meeting.

We have some proposals ready for you to discuss, on such things as wages, limited term tenure for G.A.'s, regulations governing hiring and firing, grievance procedures. They can be picked up from your department's representative, or at the G.A.A. office at 16 Bancroft Avenue. (928-7057)

Discipline group subcommititigates

By ANNE GORDON

The only thing the newly formed discipline committee managed to decide at its first meeting yesterday was to strike up another sub-committee.

The discipline committee was formed by Governing Council to review the Conway-Cadario non-academic discipline code, which was delayed last year mainly because of strong student opposition to it.

The committee, advisory to Governing Council's internal affairs committee, consists of five students, three faculty members and two administration members.

Among the student members are SAC president Seymour Knowitch, co-chairmen Brad Nixon and Bill Whelton, Rob Herman, Eric Moore (SGS), Maria Hutchinson (P-t).

Faculty members include Laidlaw professor Joan Foley and Nursing dean Kathleen King.

The U of T administration is represented by law professor John Swan and arts and science associate dean R.H. Farquarson.

The committee's agenda includes an examination of both academic and non-academic sections of the code.

The academic section of the code will be studied to see if there are any areas of discipline which have not been covered. This section has already received approval from Governing Council.

The section of the code dealing with non-academic discipline, which met strong student opposition last year, will be the main object of debate.

The administration hopes the code can be modified and somewhat toned down. But SAC feels that because the major premises underlying the code are largely unacceptable to the majority of students, it is unrealistic to hope to modify it.

According to SAC, the code is an unacceptable means for handling discipline on this campus. Only by junking the Conway-Cadario code and starting afresh will an acceptable solution be found, according to SAC spokespeople.

The Learning Machine

We will again offer the Learning Machine column for the remainder of the publishing year as free space for course unions and college and faculty student councils to announce events or issue brief statements on issues which concern students. The prime focus is what is happening in the classroom and what students can do about it. Submissions are necessary. People can bring contributions to Varsity assignments editor Bob Bettson, 2nd floor, 91 St. George St. or phone 923-8741.

Keep those cards and letters coming.

Candidates need snaps

The Varsity would appreciate all Governing Council candidates dropping in on Friday during the noon hour to have their pictures taken for publication with forthcoming interviews.

This applies to all student candidates. If you don't show up, there won't be a picture. And we all know what that means, no public recognition.

If any other student hacks who will be running in other campus elections coming up want to drop in we can also oblige them in advance. So come all ye hacks to 91 St. George from noon to one on Friday.

Petition over quotas

A petition raising objections to proposals by the faculty of engineering to limit its admission of foreign students is being circulated this week.

In a proposal to be brought to Governing Council Thursday and already passed by council's academic affairs committee, the quota would be lowered from its current 10 percent of enrolment to 5 percent.

The petition was drawn up on the initiative of academic affairs committee student member Gord Barnes, who called a meeting Monday of Black, Italian and other student groups.

The petition states the move to cut back foreign enrolment "is compromising this university's commitment to being an international university."

Claiming the 5 percent quota is "very arbitrary and out of line with other admissions quotas being discussed and approved at other universities," the petition urges Governing Council to continue its present unofficial quota of 10 percent foreign students.

Engineering faculty dean Ben Etkin has defended the quota proposal, saying the department was unable to accept all its qualified candidates, and its first responsibility was to Canadian citizens.

Of 2,797 applications for 700 engineering places in 1974, 850 were from foreign students.

Changing the quota is not intended to be a move of policy, but rather one of practice. Academic affairs committee members expect the initiative for foreign student quotas to come from the Ontario government.

Teaching workgroup

The Governing Council's academic affairs committee has established what may be a very important committee to report on possible methods of evaluating teaching.

The Working Group on Teaching Quality was established by the committee at its Feb. 13 meeting. Membership will be decided at the next meeting. The chairman will be faculty liberal Larry Lynch, a philosophy professor at St. Michael's College.

Committee member Gord Barnes said the report would be a major one whose recommendations will carry considerable weight.

The working group will investigate all areas of teaching evaluation and not exclusively course evaluations. Sub-committees will probably be set up to look into various areas.

At present the area of teaching evaluation is done on an ad hoc basis. Teaching quality is haphazardly assessed for tenure decisions, mainly through student evaluations.

The committee appears to be a response to student demands for more student input into the evaluation of teaching.

St. Mike's grad hospitalized after beaten at boycott.

By PETER ROWE

A recent graduate student of St. Michael's College was hospitalized last week after an incident at the York Mills and Penseide Sts. Dominion store.

Michael Cahill, nephew of U of T philosophy professor William Dunphy, was distributing leaflets there in support of the United Farm Workers (UFW) grape and lettuce boycott.

He was surrounded by the produce manager and several employees, who tore his leaflets, stuffed them inside his shirt and then pushed him into a door.

After leaving, as Cahill was walking toward a bus stop, an unidentified assailant struck him from behind in the back of the head and several times in the stomach and groin.

He was taken to St. Michael's Hospital for observation. Cahill had recently undergone surgery there for the partial removal of a kidney. Fortunately, doctors say, his coat insulated the blows, preventing internal injuries.

Cahill, who is now all right — except for "a couple of bruises" — is "very angry with the store" and feels the store employees acted "childishly," he said.

"Even though it was not the store employees who jumped me, I feel they are responsible for setting the scene, Cahill said. "By ripping up my leaflets and pushing me around, they showed that other people could get away with violence."

Representatives of Dominion stores were apologetic, he said. Cahill intends to press charges against the assailants.

The director of the Canadian boycott effort, Marshall Ganz, was incensed by the action.

"The boycotters are absolutely peaceful and non-violent, but it appears that rather than cooperate with the boycott, Dominion has turned to the same 'goon-style' of tactics which the growers and Teamsters used against us in California," Ganz charged.

John Godfrey, chairman of the U of T boycott committee, said the group was considering some sort of protest action when Dominion begins its on-campus recruiting this spring.

U of T may get ombudsman

By AMANDA HANSON

Last week the academic and internal affairs committees approved in principle a proposal for an ombudsman which would establish an independent grievance committee for university-related problems.

Daniel Hill, U of T's presidential human rights advisor, suggested the creation of a university ombudsman last November and John Parker, U of T manager of labor relations, looked into the idea a year and a half ago.

Both men see the ombudsman as an independent mediator between all facets of the university community.

The ombudsman, Hill said, would investigate grievances within and towards the university, serve as a "general information centre" about grievance situations and direct services during emergencies.

In the same vein, Parker said the ombudsman would make sure that set procedures are carried out when a problem arises and that new procedures are established if unforeseen difficulties arise.

Essentially, Parker said, the ombudsman would be a "Jiminy Cricket sitting on the back of the administration." He or she would have no administrative power and would have the freedom to publicize any complaints as he or she would like, Parker said.

Internal Affairs chairman Bill Whelton said the ombudsman would hold power in "a moral sort of way." An ombudsman would "reach out to the people," hold "the confidence of faculty, students and administration."

A suitable candidate would be "very hard to find," Whelton added.

Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway has recommended a search committee be composed of six members: three students, from SAC, GSU and APUS; one teaching staff member and one presidential appointee. The committee would have 60 days to file a report.

The proposal goes before the Governing Council tomorrow to establish the exact duties of the ombudsman and make a final decision on the composition of a committee to select the ombudsman.

Steinberg's stops sale of boycotted grapes

By PETER ROWE

A major breakthrough in the United Farm Workers (UFW) grape boycott was announced last week when Steinberg's, the largest food retailer in Montreal, agreed to stop the sale of boycotted grapes in its 60 Montreal Island stores as of the 1975 season.

Steinberg's is the first supermarket chain in Canada to ban non-UFW grapes, and farm worker spokesmen are hopeful now that the leading retailer in Toronto, Dominion stores, will take similar action.

UFW organizer Stephan Robertson said, "Steinberg's decision has made the boycott legitimate for supermarket chains in Canada. Dominion has been saying all along that a supermarket couldn't do this kind of thing, but now the pressure is on them."

Dominion spokesmen were unavailable for comment, but according to one source, they were "sick of hearing about Steinberg's."

While Steinberg's progressive decision, UFW spokesmen say, "was made on the basis of a real recognition of the important moral issues involved in the farm worker struggle," it was influenced somewhat by a desire to avoid the picketing and demonstrations which have characterized efforts to persuade Dominion stores in Toronto to honor the boycott.

Protesters here have been staging silent vigils in front of the grapes inside Dominion stores for several weeks now, covering up to 52 stores each Saturday.

The UFW boycott, which includes California head lettuce as well as grapes, began in 1973 after the Teamster's union signed "sweetheart" contracts in collusion with the California growers, denying workers the right to the union of their choice.

The purpose of the boycott is to convince the growers to permit secret ballot elections for farm workers, and to recognize the union they choose in the elections.

Has Robson resigned?

By AMANDA HANSON

Victoria College principal Jack Robson is currently drafting a letter which will reveal whether or not he is resigning.

Robson handed in his resignation to Victoria University president Goldwyn French Jan. 24, one week after students at Victoria had been granted parity on Vic's top governing body.

The parity decision came a month after the board of regents accepted another controversial proposal for a unicameral government, a decision which Robson also reportedly opposed.

The new unicameral governing structure would combine Victoria University's present senate and board of regents and would be responsible for all academic and other decisions.

When asked if he was reconsidering his resignation as the Vic board of regents has suggested, Robson said "Presently I will not state either way."

Robson, who teaches English and specializes in John Stuart Mill's political writings, has been Vic principal for five years and, French said, has no specific term in office.

SIGN THE PETITION

TO: MINISTER OF COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Because we, the undersigned, believe that education is the social right of all and that no one should be denied a post-secondary education because of his or her financial circumstances;

We demand the following immediate reforms in the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP):

- 1) An immediate increase of $15 in the weekly living allowance under OSAP to offset accumulated rises in the cost of living.
- 2) In future, living allowances under OSAP should be indexed to changes in the cost of living each year of the province.
- 3) Because high loan ceilings and consequently large debts limit accessibility to post secondary education, the OSAP loan ceiling must be reduced to $600 from the current $800.
- 4) In the calculation of loans and bursaries, mandatory parental contribution should be abolished for all students 18 and over.
- 5) OSAP assessment should be based on the student's real income, including summer earnings, parental subsidies, bursaries and scholarships.
- 6) Part time students must immediately be included within an adequate student support scheme.

These demands imply an increased commitment to the principle of universal accessibility to education. They should be funded through a restructuring of the tax system, not through an increasing of the taxes of lower and middle income people.

University of Toronto Committee on Student Aid

If you support the above demands, SIGN THE PETITION.

By MARTIN GLABERMAN

On the morning of July 16, 1970, the Detroit Free Press featured on its front page a large picture of General Motors Vice President Earl Bramblett and UAW President Leonard Woodcock shaking hands as they opened negotiations for a new contract. The headline beneath the picture read: "Negotiations Begin: Auto Talk Key: Living Costs."

The banner headline that morning, overshadowing the ritual start of negotiations, was: "Ousted Worker Kills Three in Chrysler Plant Shooting, 2 Foremen, Bystander Are Slain." A black worker at Chrysler's Elden Avenue Axle Plant, suspended for insubordination, had killed two foremen (one black, one white) and a Polish setup man.

The timing of the events was coincidental — but it was the kind of coincidence that lends a special insight. What is at issue — not only in the auto negotiations but in most relations involving workers, unions, and management — is not living costs but living. Involved is not just dollars and cents, important as always to workers, but an entire way of life.

Take a close look at the union's demands.

The UAW left only one thing out: the demand to turn the plants over to the workers. Apart from the usual wage increases and financial improvements, some of the issues raised by the UAW bargaining teams included: pensions after 30 years instead of after a specific age; restoration of the escalator cost-of-living clause to its original form; ending time clocks and putting production workers on salary; inverting seniority so that older workers could take the time off at nearly full pay in the event of layoffs; the problem of pollution; both in the plants and in the community; changing production to deal with boredom on the assembly line.

Many of these issues were raised purely for propaganda effect with little intent to bargain seriously over them.

But taken as a whole, they provide an interesting picture that reflects, if only in a distorted way, the extent of the worker's concern for the nature of his workplace.

PUBLIC SHOW OF MILITANCY

This technique of bargaining was developed by Walter Reuther and is being continued by Woodcock. It gives the public appearance of great militancy but it means something very different.

While the leadership of the union goes through the motions of accepting all the workers' demands and pressing them on the companies, the tactic of publicly demanding almost everything that could be thought of at the beginning of negotiations is intended to keep the workers off their backs and keep them quiet when the serious negotiating begins in secret sessions. It leaves the union leadership free to work out any settlement it thinks reasonable and to establish its own priorities in the negotiations.

The range of union demands in negotiations also reflect something else. It is a sign that unionism is reaching its limit. Not because they will win so little, but because they will win so much and it will prove to be so little.

It will not make the life of the black worker at the Eldon Avenue plant of Chrysler or the white worker at the Chrysler plant in Windsor one bit more tolerable.

That is one of the reasons that the union leadership has such a hard time with the new generation of young workers in the plants. They tell the workers about the great victories of the union in the past and what it was like in open shop days.

They are telling the truth — those were genuine victories. But they have been changed, by being incorporated into contracts and the whole process of labour relations.

(Labour relations, it should be noted, has nothing to do with workers; it has to do with relations between company representatives and union representatives.) The Detroit Free Press published the following report in August 1970:

"Some 46 per cent of General Motors' hourly workers are below age 35. They have never known a depression, they have had more schooling than the man who lived through the last one, and they aren't impressed by the old Spartan idea that hard, repetitive work is a virtue.

"They are less responsive to authority than even the men who seized the Flint GM plants in the historic 1936-37 sit-down strikes."

That is precisely the background against which discontent is surfacing throughout the industry today, discontent that has reached its most advanced stage in the auto industry.

At the time of the dispute at the Chevrolet Vega plant in Lordstown, Ohio, production on the assembly line had been rationalized to the point where a job took 35 seconds.

There are two categories of time that are difficult to visualize from outside the factory.

One is 35 seconds. You cannot light a cigarette or get a drink of water in 35 seconds without a car going by on the assembly line.

The other category is the rest of your life. This is where the worker expects to be for all of his working life — accumulating seniority. How can one express the tensions that are inherent in such a situation — doing a job that takes 35 seconds for the rest of your life?

UNION

The formation of the CIO in the 1930's settled once and for all the idea that owners or managers or stockholders had the right to run their plants any way they saw fit. Sit-downs, strikes, wildcats, direct on-the-job action, sabotage and violence established the power of the workers in the plants. The tactics used and the extent of that power varied from plant to plant and from industry to industry.

Sabotage and violence have long been a part of the auto industry. There were reports of the murder or disappearance of foremen at the Ford Rouge plants in the days before the union, the recent murder of two foremen at a Chrysler plant is not a new development.

INDUSTRIAL SABOTAGE

Other forms of sabotage are less severe but nonetheless effective. On some assembly lines where the links are exposed, an occasional rest period or slow down is achieved by the simple (and virtually undetectable) tactic of putting the handle of a long open-end wrench into the chain to shear the pin and stop the line. Sometimes the light bulb that signals the line breakdown is unscrewed or broken so that an extra few minutes are gained before the stoppage is discovered.

Not uncommon is the sabotage of the product. Sometimes this increases the amount of the repair work coming off the lines. Sometimes this saddles a customer with a built-in rattle in a high-priced car because some worker welded a wrench or some bolts into a closed compartment.

The nature of violence and sabotage as a tool of workers provides an insight into the problems caused by the extensive technological changes of the past 20 years. Although generally called automation, something else is involved: the first and basic reason for technological change is the struggle against workers' power by the employers. Technological advance is designed, directly or indirectly, to eliminate workers or to make them more subservient to the machine. And most changes made in plants are made solely to increase production rather than out of any concern for the workers.

For example, Chrysler stamping operations are now centered in the Sterling Township Stamping Plant, about 15 miles outside Detroit. The plant now does operations that were formerly done at the Dodge,

The new workers have never known a depression and they are not impressed by the old Spartan work ethic.

Plymouth, and Chrysler plants.

Separating 4,000 or so workers from most of their fellows seriously reduced the power and effectiveness of the workers. The shutting down of old plants means that formal and informal organizations are broken up or abandoned.

And it takes time for new relations and new organizations to be worked out. Workers at Sterling have indicated that it took approximately four years for the plant to be transformed from just an accidental combination of workers to a relatively well organized and disciplined force.

In the early days of the union, the power of the workers could be wielded more openly and more directly. Workers negotiated directly with the lower levels of management and were able to settle things right on the shop floor. How easily they were able to do this depended, of course, on their relative strength and the nature of the technology involved among other things.

As an example, workers in the heat-treat department at the Buick plant in Flint had an especially strong position.

One time, shortly after the union was established, they felt themselves strongly aggrieved. But the early contracts did not rigidly define the grievance procedure. So instead of locating the violated clause and leaving their fate to a bureaucracy, they simply sent the steward to see the general foreman.

Since their interest in this discussion was very high, they accompanied the steward and stood around outside the foreman's office while the discussion was going on.

UNIONS vs. WORKERS: to Industry in the Seventies

The time they picked for this meeting was just after they had loaded a heat into the furnace. The heat was scheduled to emerge from the other end of the furnace 20 minutes later. If the heat was not pulled at that time the damage to both the steel being treated and to the furnace itself would have been irreparable.

workers, and very often local union officials participated in and supported the numerous wildcat strikes that took place.

This process of bureaucratization was completed with Walter Reuther's victory and his substitution of the "one-party state" in control of the union for the consider it rewarding work. The difference is in who controls the work.

It is clear that historically bosses never thought that workers would work without the severest external discipline and control. And they still don't.

In addition, no matter what all the theoreticians of capitalism may say, workers are treated very differently from anyone else. The Industrial Division of American Standard has a plant in Dearborn, Michigan, which manufactures industrial air conditioning. The company places ads in trade journals urging employers to air condition their facilities.

The office section of the facility is air conditioned. The plant is not. The only thing that makes this situation unusual is that the company manufactures the equipment. But even that isn't enough to get them to provide for blue-collar workers what office workers, engineers, managers, and professionals now take as a matter of course.

The reorganization, technological change and decentralization that characterized the fifties and culminated in the depression gave way to a new expansion which brought significant numbers of young workers into the industry. These are workers who couldn't care less about what the union won in 1937. They are not more backward (as the union bureaucrats like to pretend) but more advanced. They are attuned to the need to change the nature of work,

In the early stages of the discussion the foreman was adamant. He would not accede to the demands — "and you'd better get those guys back to work." As the minutes sped by, the foreman became less and less adamant until, with a couple of minutes to go, he capitulated. The steward then signalled the workers standing outside and the heat was pulled.

This might be an extreme situation but it was not an unusual one. Workers are very aware of how their jobs fit into the total process of production.

To change the scale and to change the time: almost 30 years later, during a wildcat at the Sterling Stamping Plant of the Chrysler Corporation in 1969, the workers made clear their awareness of how their plant fit into the scheduling of Chrysler plants in Detroit, Windsor, St. Louis and elsewhere. They knew when and in what order the Sterling strike would shut down other Chrysler plants. The knowledge of the workers' importance in the overall framework is both an instrument in the day-to-day struggle and the essential basis for a new society.

UNIONS VS. WORKERS

The instinctive assertion of their own power on the shop floor that workers managed in the thirties was extended in the forties when war production requirements and the labour shortage forced the government and the corporations to make concessions to workers' control.

But that was also the period during which the separation of workers from the union structure began. The last major organizing success marks the turn to bureaucracy.

When Ford fell to the union in 1941, both the check-off and full for-union committeemen were incorporated into the contract.

But the apparent victories only created more problems. Workers wanted full time for union representatives to get them out from under company pressures and discrimination. Getting elected steward often got you the worst job in a department and stuck away in a corner where you couldn't see what was happening.

But full time for stewards did more than relieve union representatives from company pressure — it ended up by relieving representatives from workers' pressure. The steward is less available than he was before, and you have to have your foreman go looking for him should you happen to need him.

The check-off produced a similar situation. Designed to keep the company from pressuring the weaker workers to stay out of the union even though they were sharing its benefits, the check-off ended up reducing the worker pressure on the union officials.

No longer does the steward have to listen to workers' complaints each month as he goes around collecting the dues. Once a month the dues are delivered in one huge check from the company to the union and the worker never sees his dues payment.

ONE-PARTY GOVERNMENT

World War II finished what the Ford contract had begun. The top layers of the union leadership were incorporated into the government boards and agencies that managed and controlled war production. In return, certain concessions were made in terms of union organization.

Union recognition was often arranged from above without the participation of the workers in strike or other action. At this point in time the lower levels of the union leadership were still pretty close to the democratic kind of factionalism that had been the norm in the UAW before.

And with the Reuther administration the union moved to participate directly in the management and discipline of workers in production. All through the fifties, with intensive automation and decentralization going on in the auto industry, the union collaborated in crushing the numerous wildcat strikes, in getting rid of the most militant workers, in establishing labour peace in the industry.

The course of future developments in the factories has to be sought outside the unions.

In the other industrial unions the pace of bureaucratization was much more advanced. In steel, for example, Phil Murray kept a tight and undemocratic hold on the Steel Workers Organizing Committee until after the basic contracts had been negotiated with United States Steel. It was only then that the Organizing Committee appointed from the top was replaced by an autonomous union which could vote on its own officers or contracts. Any worker can illustrate the bureaucratic history of his own union.

The grievance procedure became virtually worthless to the workers. In 1955 at the termination of a contract presumably designed to provide a grievance procedure, there were in some GM plants as many as 10,000 unresolved grievances.

The situation has not improved since then. GM complains that the number of grievances in its plants has grown from 106,000 in 1960 to 256,000 in 1969 or 60 for each 100 workers.

What are these specific local grievances? They involve production standards: the speed of a line, the rate on a machine, the number of workers assigned to a given job, the allowable variation in jobs on a given line. They involve health and safety standards: unsafe machines, cluttered or oily floors, rates of production which prevent the taking of reasonable precautions, the absence or misuse of hoists or cranes, protection from flames or furnaces, protection from welding or other dangerous chemicals or fumes, the right to shut an unsafe job down until the condition is changed.

They involve the quality of life in the plant: the authoritarian company rules which treat workers like a combination of prison inmate and kindergarten child, the right to move about the plant, the right to relieve yourself physically without having to get the foreman's permission or the presence of a relief man, the right to a reasonable level of heat in the winter or reasonable ventilation in the summer. And on and on.

The grievances that crowd the dockets of General Motors and of other companies cover the total range of life in the factory. The fact that they are called grievances helps to conceal what they really are — a reflection of the total dissatisfaction of the workers in the way production is run and of the desire of the workers to impose their own will in the factory.

The UAW and the Ford Motor Company recently have been discussing the problem of boredom on the assembly line. The only reason they are discussing it at all — it is by no means a new development — is because more and more workers are refusing to accept factory discipline as a law of nature.

And it is not boredom but power which is at stake. The same worker who for eight hours a day attaches belts to a motor and can't wait to get out of the plant will spend his weekends tinkering with his car and to the need of human beings to find satisfaction in what they do.

It is this new and changing working class that was the basis for the new level of wildcat strikes, for a doubled rate of absenteeism, for an increased amount of violence in plants. It is a new working class that no conceivable contract settlement can control or immobilize.

Both unions and industry are aware of their problem to some degree. "The UAW believes," says the Free Press, "that a better-trained corps of union stewards would be better equipped to cope with these issues and with gut plant problems, like narcotics, alcoholism, loan-sharking, weapon-packing, pilfering, and gambling. 'A bunch of armed guards isn't the only answer,' said one committeeman."

The slowdown of automation in the sixties (a consequence of the shortage of capital) has led to a relative stabilization. That is, workers in new installations and in old ones that have been reorganized have now had a few years to work out new forms of organization.

The tightly-knit structures of the big industrial unions leave no room for maneuvering. There is no reasonable way in which young workers can use the union constitution to overturn and overhaul the union structure. The constitution is against them; the money and jobs available to union bureaucrats are against them. And if these fail, the forces of law and order of city, state and federal governments are against them.

If that were not enough, the young workers in the factories today are expressing the instinctive knowledge that even if they gained control on the unions and reformed them completely, they would still end up with unions — organizations which owe their existence to capitalist relations of production.

The impossibility of transforming the unions has been argued by a number of observers. Clark Kerr has noted, without disapproval, that "unions and corporations alike are, with very few exceptions, one-party governments." That is the phrase usually reserved for Stalinist or fascist totalitarian governments. But it is not overdrawn.

And all of this is what young workers are revolting against.

That means that the course of future developments in the factories has to be sought outside the unions. Caucuses and factions will still be built and, here and there, will have temporary and minor successes. But the explosions that are still to come are likely to have the appearance of new revolutionary forms, organizations which are not simply organs of struggle but organs of control of production. They are a sign of the future.

SAC PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION MARCH 12-13, 1975

The election of the SAC President and two Vice-Presidents will be held on March 12 and 13, 1975. Candidates for these positions must run on a ticket of three: one from either Scarborough College or Erindale College, the second from the Faculty of Arts and Science (St. George Campus), and the third from the professional faculties.

Any University of Toronto student who has paid the SAC fee is eligible to vote and run. All full-time undergraduate students have had this fee deducted automatically. Tickets must be nominated by 100 SAC fees-paying students and submit a deposit of $25 along with the nomination form. This deposit will be refunded to any ticket receiving at least one-third of the votes of the winning ticket.

Complete election rules and nomination forms are now available at the SAC office (928-4909).

GAA to study bargaining

The Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) will be holding a series of 14 meetings today, Thursday, Friday and Monday in an attempt to "demystify" the collective bargaining process.

"Negotiating a contract isn't some sort of mystical experience. We want to let people know that collective bargaining doesn't just happen around a table, but happens out on the street," said GAA organizer Andy Stanley in describing the purpose of the meetings.

The GAA is currently attempting to unionize about 2,100 teaching assistants (TAs) at U of T's main campus and plans to discuss specific contract proposals during the meetings.

One of the most important contract items the GAA is seeking is the right to file grievances for individuals and groups of TAs in disputes with the university.

"That way, teaching assistants wouldn't be going it alone every time they had a complaint against the university. The union would be there representing them," Stanley said.

Information on the specific times and locations of the meetings is available in the GAA advertisements in today's Varsity, or by phoning the GAA office at 928-7057.

Departments not paying increases

By LAWRENCE GOLDSTEIN

A number of academic departments at U of T have found a novel way of fighting inflation.

They aren't paying out wage increases which Governing Council awarded to some of their employees more than a year ago.

In November, 1973, Governing Council's budget committee recommended an increase to the accounts U of T's various departments use to pay their part-time and junior teaching staff.

The increases were to provide graduate students working as teaching assistants (TAs) during the 1974-75 academic year with a seven per cent wage increase over their existing pay rates.

The committee also recommended that the hiring rate for TAs be set at $7 to $10 an hour.

To ensure the smooth implementation of the budget committee's recommendations, Governing Council established an anomalies committee.

The anomalies committee sent out a memo to the academic departments explaining the changes.

Early in the current academic year, it placed advertisements in the campus media informing TAs of their new conditions of employment with the suggestion that TAs appear before the committee if they felt these conditions were not being met.

So far, things have gone less than smoothly.

The Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) estimates between 250 and 300 TAs in at least 10 university departments haven't received their pay increases.

The GAA, which is currently attempting to unionize TAs at U of T's main campus, became involved in the issue when TAs started coming to them, instead of the anomalies committee, complaining they hadn't received any pay increases.

"The teaching assistants came to us and not the anomalies committee for two reasons," GAA organizer Andy Stanley told The Varsity.

"First, anomalies is a university-appointed committee and people were afraid to appear before it."

"Second, they probably didn't think it would do much good telling a university-appointed committee that the university wasn't making good on its promises," he said.

Stanley added there was confusion over the memo the anomalies committee sent to the academic departments with some departments claiming they never received the memo and others saying they couldn't understand it.

"Some of them probably didn't want to understand it," Stanley said.

David Cook, secretary of the anomalies committee, acknowledged, "There have been cases where departments have not been able to follow the rules" with regard to the pay increases.

Cook said some of the departments, under budget pressure, were forced to economize through lower salaries or increased teaching loads for their TAs.

But she added the anomalies committee was prepared to earmark funds for paying TAs in departments facing legitimate budgetary problems.

"There's no reason why they (the departments) shouldn't give out the money," Cook said.

GAA vice-president Jay Drydyk criticized the anomalies committee for what he described as its "unsystematic" approach in dealing with the pay increase irregularities.

But Drydyk is convinced the interests of TAs could best be protected through unionization and the collective bargaining process.

GAA efforts to unionize TAs at U of T's downtown campus are currently stalled while the association and university administrators debate who does and who doesn't qualify as part of the bargaining unit.

U of Victoria student forms lobby for overseas aid

VICTORIA (CUP) — A former University of Victoria student is now forming a Victoria committee to increase Canadian aid to Third World countries.

Greg Hartnell says that Canada's foreign aid program has actually decreased since 1972 while military spending is on the rise.

"Every two cents of the Canadian tax dollar goes to foreign aid while a whopping 12 cents goes directly to the Canadian military," Hartnell said.

The point his group is trying to make is that "Third World countries will go on starving as long as this attitude is maintained," he said.

The committee is now circulating a city-wide petition that calls for a change in the spending priorities of the federal government. Hartnell is trying to gain support for the petition by speaking to various individuals and groups throughout Victoria.

"Canada's policy toward foreign aid makes me ashamed to be a Canadian," Hartnell said.

Committee accepts OSAP grievances

The concerns raised by the University of Toronto Committee on Student Aid should form the basis of negotiation between students and government in revisions of the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP), the academic affairs sub-committee on admissions and awards decided last week.

The committee was asked by SAC president Seymour Kanowitch to endorse a six-point petition which currently has 3,000 signatures. Campus organizers expect to have 5,000 signatures by the end of the week.

- The points of the petition include:
- an immediate $15 raise in the OSAP living allowance;
 - living allowances indexed to the cost of living;
 - a reduction in the OSAP loan ceiling from $800 to $600;
 - abolition of a mandatory parental contribution for those over 18;
 - assessment for OSAP based on real income of students;
 - adequate inclusion of part-time students within OSAP.

Although the committee did not endorse the entire petition, it did support the preamble, which stated "no one should be denied a post-secondary education because of his or her financial circumstances."

Last November, the committee instructed U of T president John Evans to write Colleges and Universities Minister James Auld that there should be a significant increase in the board and lodging allowance, and that this allowance should be tied to the cost of living — thus agreeing with the first two points of the student petition.

Committee members were generally sympathetic to the student case, although unable to agree with all of the individual points raised in the petition.

There was, however, one exception. Medical faculty associate dean Jan Steiner said the committee was "wasting valuable time" talking about the petition which "reminds me of the communist manifesto or the Bible: it tries to be all things to all people."

Both Jesus Christ and Karl Marx were unavailable for comment last night.

Hiring policy queried

The U of T Staff Association (UTSA) has written to president John Evans expressing concern over university policy on appointments and promotion as a result of the appointment of Elizabeth Wilson to the directorship of the U of T news bureau.

External affairs vice-president Norman James two weeks ago appointed Wilson, his executive assistant, without competition for the job being offered.

In a press release, UTSA communications committee chairperson Jean Wilson says, "The recent reorganization of the News Bureau and the dissolution of the department of development (a fund-raising body which was closed by James) raise serious questions about how University of Toronto policy operates in practice as opposed to in principle."

"The UTSA executive has requested clarification by president Evans of the university policy with respect to appointment and promotion in particular," the release states.

Former news bureau director Leonard Bertin was ordered by James to take six months' leave of absence Feb. 7, after refusing to do so voluntarily. Three news bureau staffers resigned as a result of Bertin's departure.

Alpine skiers march to Maine in March

By DENNIS COLLINS

The men's alpine ski team has secured its invitation to the Can-Am Intercollegiate Meet in Maine this March. After the two-day meet at Blue Mountain, Collingwood on Feb. 6 and 7 the Blues' third place standing was being threatened by Trent, Western and Ottawa.

Since then, Varsity has competed in two more meets at Collingwood and has not only left any third place competition far behind but now stands a chance of upsetting the strong Queen's team which is in second place. Carleton University has already captured first place in the circuit.

On Friday, February 7, the team competed in the York University invitational at Craigleith Ski Club in Collingwood. They went into the race 27 points behind Queen's (34 points) and Carleton (39 points).

The tight slalom course which became deeply rutted caused many competitors to fall but the Varsity team skied well and three racers made the top ten.

Doug Carter, who was one of the few first seed racers to finish, placed fourth. He was followed by John Slaughter in seventh and Britt Roberts in ninth. Anchorman Bruce Bell racing in sixth seed placed 24th and gave the team its fourth finisher. The team placed second behind Carleton for nine series points.

Rob Burbee and Mike Ryan from Carleton were first and second respectively followed by Peter Tolnai of Queen's.

In the McMaster Giant Slalom, Varsity again placed second. Toronto's Doug Carter, who had the fastest second run time, finished third, only 5 one hundredths of a second behind second place Jamie Neilson from Queen's. Phil Gaulin of Ottawa was first. Toronto's Al Abbott (13th), Dan Handford (15th) and Steve Promoli (17th) gave the team its strong finish.

Queen's won the men's competition but since Varsity placed second it closed the point spread even more. Queen's now has 44 points and Toronto has 31. York University was third.

Queen's women's team also won on the strength of a second place finish by Ginny Honeyman.

Al Abbott flashed down the slopes for U of T.

increase "assumes an increase in productivity" for which the government has been applying "relentless pressure."

Most of the 80 new appointments for the 1975-76 fiscal year will be replacements, Evans said. Some will be made to satisfy needs in particular areas, he added.

"We will have to limit our tenured appointments and fill them by cross-appointments and visiting appointments," Evans said.

"This is not a crisis and crisis-type responses are not called for," Evans said. "But we must avoid being forced into a situation where our only recourse would be to dismiss staff for fiscal reasons."

One professor opposed "the policy of not appointing graduating PhD students."

He referred to the case of one of his own students who after becoming a North American authority in his specialty was forced to return to farming as an occupation.

Evans said an alternative might be "a new category of appointment for those wishing to come on a temporary basis."

But, he warned, "It is too late this year, to introduce such a category."

"For certain universities, money is generated by enrolment increases," he said.

"But this is not so at Toronto" where "self-imposed limits on growth" have rationalized the government's spending limits.

"Supplementary grants are being offered to smaller universities on very slim grounds," Evans charged.

But this university can adapt more effectively to its fiscal problems than many universities in this province," he added.

History professor Kenneth McNaught criticized the government's policy of giving larger grants to universities with increased enrolments.

"Some institutions have listed as full-time students persons who are studying a third of a full year's program," McNaught claimed.

"The greatest university in Canada... should not have to enter into competition with Lakehead, Brock or Trent" for government money, McNaught maintained.

Evans said, "Competition has caused some universities to admit numbers of students who shouldn't be in university."

"We are resigned to our fate," Evans acknowledged.

He suggested "we make every possible effort to make the best possible use of our resources in the future" as a means of inducing the government to increase its grants.

History professor W. M. Dick suggested that, on the contrary, the government might be more effectively influenced if the university allowed "deficit financing in an election year."

Evans replied "we are going to be in a deficit position" no matter how efficiently university money is spent. This deficit will occur despite a $2 million surplus currently held.

"The question is, how large should our deficit be?" Evans said. "We should explicitly reject the notion that grants are made on the basis of a deficit."

"If the government had moved away from its growth-related formula" for giving money, Evans said, "we would have been very close to a balanced budget."

Evans said during the period of cutbacks "greater understandings" was needed throughout the university.

York wins OWIAA gymnastic championship

Helene Smagala doing floor exercises here took first on uneven bars.

By MATHILDE VERHULST

York University once again captured the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association (OWIAA) gymnastic championship at the Benson Building two Saturdays ago but not without pretty stiff competition from the Western, Queen's and Toronto teams.

York's points in the overall standings totalled 261.4 leading Queen's with 253.6, Western with 240.7 and Toronto obtaining 229 final points.

Over 350 people watched the annual meet as Laurentian, Ottawa and McMaster joined the other universities in the fight for the Ontario title.

Western surprised many by claiming the junior and intermediate team titles with 91.7 and 91 points respectively.

The Varsity intermediate team almost tied York's score of 85.9 points with a total of 85, nearly snatching second place from York in that division.

York also placed second in the junior division by scoring 90.2 points, while Toronto grabbed third with 88.6 points.

Toronto intermediate Nancy Howard showed a strong performance by winning the balance beam competition in her division. She received an 8.0 while teammate Dagmar Justa won third place on the beam with a 7.

In the Senior A and B divisions, Varsity competitors Helene Smagala and Barb Clemes were the only U of T representatives.

They earned a fourth place for Toronto behind Queen's in first place, York second and Western third.

In the senior B division Smagala landed a first on the uneven bars with a competent score of 7.5. She was only .2 points away from second place in the senior beam competition following Western's Debbie Brown with 7.4 and Pat Oliver who scored 7.9.

Senior A competitor Barb Clemes captured a first place for U of T on the beam obtaining 7.35.

A gymnast must compete in the Senior A division if she has either placed first, second or third the year before or has competed as a senior for a club in the Canadian gymnastic championship.

Clemes would have competed against Canadian gymnasts from York, Nancy and Teresa McDonnell, Lise Arsenault and Sharon Tsukamoto but the four cancelled out two days before the meet.

In the junior vault event Toronto's Wendy Linton came in second with 7.6 behind Queen's Marion Burdsall who took an 8.15.

Varsity's Lady Blues manage a strong fourth

Linton was third on the beam receiving 7.8 while Western's Janet Sutherland with 8.0 and Sue McKelvie with 7.9 placed first and second respectively.

Individual winners in the junior division were: Marion Burdsall (Queen's), 31.2, Debbie Glebocki (York) 30.9, and Wendy Linton 30.8 (Tor).

In the intermediate individual standings York's Deb Alderman claimed 31 points for first place while Varsity's Nancy Howard was a close third with 29.5 points, right behind Western's Barb Kane with 30.5 points.

Besides her beam victory in the intermediate division, Nancy Howard managed a fourth place in the floor exercise, only .05 of a point away from snatching third place from the 7.9 obtained by Western's Kathy Mathers.

Varsity senior Smagala took a close second individual win with 28.7 points as Debbie Brown of Western won the Senior B division trophy with a total 29.4 points.

Varsity coach Linda Coutts should be commended for her coaching efforts, especially for the graceful and well-executed floor routines.

Ideas: The spark we run on

Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted, ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. SMC has broomball title wrapped up but b-ball playoffs are confused

By MIKE FRIEND

This is the time of year when the majority of interfac sports turns to playoff action. Most sports are already into playoffs or will be by next Monday.

Broomball

The broomball playoffs are beginning to come to a close with six teams remaining but only two have a chance to be champion: SMC A and SMC B, while Innis, Pharm A, Pharm B, and Pharm C still play for second place.

There will be two games on Thursday: Pharm A against Pharm C at 10:00 pm and Innis against Pharm B at 11:00 pm.

Squash

In squash six teams remain in the double elimination tournament with Trin and Eng I still undefeated. Innis, Med C, Law A, and Vic II all have one loss but are still eligible for the championship.

The favoured team would have to be the winner of the match between Trin and Eng I as the other teams would be forced to win five straight games, which would include two in a row over the Trin Eng I winner.

Basketball

Now for those sports fans who like puzzles and quizzes. Try and figure out which teams in division IA and IB of interfac basketball that will play which teams in the playoffs.

Med A, Sr Eng, Vic I, Erin, and PHIE are in the playoffs from division IA but the order of finish is still anyone's guess.

Division IB is a little easier to pick as Dent (16), New (14), and Fac Ed (14) seem to be assured of a post season berth, but Scar (12) could displace any of these teams.

In division II, A and B, there has been a problem with defaults but there are still enough teams left for playoff action. In div IIA, Jr Eng, Innis I, Pharm, For A, and SMC B have qualified for the playoffs. In div IIB, Knox I and Dev Hs have earned a spot while Arch and Law B are fighting for the final spot.

deflection and not the shot. The shot by Martel beat Logan cleanly.

The goal (5:31) fired up the Vees, and 74 seconds later, Dan Cromo was given credit for the second Laurentian goal, which appeared to go in off a Varsity defenseman.

Laurentian had the momentum at this point in the game and held an 8-2 lead in shots for the period, but a spectacular goal by Kent Ruhnke got the fans off their feet and the Blues out of their lethargy.

Ruhnke dashed in from center, faked and then deked Dan Cromo, and finally backhanded the puck along the ice past Tataryn. Varsity now held a 3-2 lead with 12 minutes remaining.

Varsity came alive with a vengeance, as McFarlane and Herridge both had several good chances. However, Laurentian's Tom Blake capitalized on a poorly directed pass and tied the game.

Both teams played cautiously for the remainder of the period and started out the same way in the overtime period. This slow cautious style was alleviated by several fine individual efforts, notably by Cromo of the Vees and all-star Ivan McFarlane for the Blues. Both Tataryn and Logan made excellent saves to preserve the tie.

The Blues applied steady pressure in the Vees' end and at 12:25 it paid off as Don Pagnutti fired a hard shot wide and then dug out the rebound to Innimate Larry Hopkins who beat Tataryn high to the glove side.

Hopkins, known more for his hard work and defensive efforts than for goal scoring, made a beautiful play drawing the puck over to his backhand to beat Tataryn.

And so it is on to the semi's against Waterloo Friday night at 6:30. Following that encounter, York and Western tangle in the other semifinal at 9:00 pm.

The two winners from Friday night will play Saturday at Varsity at 8:00 pm for all the OUA A marbles.

Blues might have made a complete runaway of Saturday's events as they placed at least two finalists in every individual event, but a combination of psychological letdown, aroused opponents and strange officiating limited Varsity to only three victories.

Wilkin took the 100 free, Daniel the 100 breast, and the entry of Gross, Daniel, Greg Vanular and Lance Peto swept the 400 medley relay in 3:44.00.

Vanular, Hibberd and Lance Aho added points with solid second place finishes as Blues concentrated on producing fast times in the individual events in order to qualify for the CIAU contingent.

Waterloo earned its solid second place overall finish with some strong individual performances from Wilson and backstroker Rick Adamson, plus clever tactical decisions to concentrate on the high scoring relays.

Western relied on its talented divers, Ottawa had Pearson and McMaster used Steplock. The other schools were simply outmatched.

Meet officials made little secret of their sentimental hope that Steplock would win at least one event in his final year of OUA A eligibility. To no one's surprise, he finally did, although it took a controversial judges' decision to give him a share of first place in the 100 back with the apparent winner Adamson.

The various backstroke events produced the more inept officiating decisions as Gross was disqualified from the 400 IM on a very close call while the same officials ignored several obvious illegal turns in other races.

Blues leave today for Thunder Bay and their first CIAU final in five years without the redoubtable Jim Adams. However, based on the solid performances last weekend, come Monday the trophy for the national team championship should be again resting in its usual place in Hart House.

Varsity golf tip number eight: the bunker shot

By BILL WHITCOMBE

Sand shots come in a variety of shapes and styles. At this stage of development, the beginner should not attempt to learn anything but the simplest fundamentals of bunker play.

For a conventional, reasonably level bunker shot, you should assume a slightly open stance at the ball with the clubface resting slightly open to insure adequate loft. The ball should be played well forward in the stance and the weight should slightly favour the right foot.

After assuming the stance and wiggling your feet down to a solid base, you should pick out a spot approximately 1½ to 2 inches behind the ball and aim to strike the sand at that point with the clubhead.

The arc should be a conventional one with a slow tempo and firm wrists through the shot. One essential point to concentrate on is that of making certain the clubhead is swung down and through the sand underneath the ball, carrying the swing to a reasonably high finish.

You do not hit the ball first, but rather, you hit the sand first, cutting underneath the ball. Hence, both ball and sand come out of the bunker.

This kind of shot will get your ball out of the bunker for now. You can learn more rudiments and more intricate sand shots as you improve your game.

In any case, a few hours of practice in a bunker will show dramatic results and your confidence in the shot will increase rapidly. Too many golfers, including some good ones, make the mistake of ignoring bunker practice. Just one hour of practice per week could make any golfer into an adequate sand player.

There is a special club constructed for this shot, called the sand wedge. It is a heavier club with a good-sized flange built along the bottom edge of the club to help keep the club from digging too deeply into the sand. In the absence of a sand wedge, you may use a pitching wedge.

Interfac v-ballers challenge Blues

By TOM WOODS

You remember volleyball — that's the game you played in high school or on the beach where you and maybe 20 other people split up into two teams around a sagging net.

You knew the rules stated that each team was allowed to hit the ball three times before it passed over the net, but it just never turned out that way. The ball seemed to be in constant motion back and forth usually being hit only by those players positioned near the net, while you, in the backcourt wondered to yourself how anyone could enjoy such a dull game as volleyball.

You can catch some of the best v-ball Ontario has to offer on Friday at 12:30 pm in the main gym at Hart House. The Varsity Blues, just coming off a third place finish in the OUAA east division, will play host to the interfac all-stars.

In most sports, a Varsity-interfac duel would be no contest, but in volleyball things are different.

A recent OUAA ruling which barred university players who competed on outside teams from Varsity play resulted in many former Varsity lettermen opting out of university competition in favour of the higher calibre Ontario League.

These ex-Varsity players are now in the interfac league which is favoured in Friday's encounter with the Blues. Remember, the Blues are laden with rookies.

Heading the interfac lineup is Tiit Romet, formerly captain of the Blues. Romet of the SGS team is probably the best setter in Ontario volleyball, where he competes with the Toronto Slovenia club. Other all-stars from the SGS team are George Zajak and Henri Arnaud.

Zajak, a former Varsity player now playing with Toronto Ukraina, will act as player-coach of the all-stars.

Scarborough sends team captain Ihor Lotocky while Erindale is represented by Wally Sawranchuk and Atis Ozolins.

Leading the Blues will be player-coach Reg Eadie and engineers Sam Manougian and Emilio Tacconelli. Rumour has it that Keith Doan will also take to the floor to provide extra spiking power against the tall interfac squad.

The Friday match, time permitting, will be a best-of-five affair with game time at 12:30 pm.

V-ball fans should also note that the interfac first division final between Scarborough and SGS will be held in Hart House on Feb. 28 at 6:00 pm.

Lady Blues in OWIAA: curling, skating, swimming

Synchronized Swimming

On Feb. 14 the Lady Blues synchronized swim team travelled to Windsor for the OWIAA championships.

Varsity was impressive considering the small number of experienced swimmers on the team but nevertheless took second place in the team routine only 0.3 points behind the winner, Queen's.

The overall meet winner (including individual routines) was Queen's followed by McMaster. The Toronto team finished fifth in the standings.

Curling

The women's intercollegiate curling team competed in the OWIAA curling finals in London on Feb. 14 and 15.

In the qualifying rounds on the Friday, the Ladies lost out to Western, eliminating Toronto from the finals on Saturday.

Varsity took the consolation trophy by defeating Trent and Windsor on Saturday.

The OWIAA champion was Queen's University who defeated Western and Windsor.

Figure Skating

Also on the weekend of Feb. 14, the OWIAA staged the finals for figure skating at McMaster University.

Queen's won the competition with a total of 111 points followed by Varsity with 104. York, McMaster, and Western followed in order.

The results of the Varsity women follow:

Dance: Junior, Dot Todd and Penny Clapp (1st); Novice Mixed, Ron Jackson and Geri Ashdown (1st); Junior Mixed, Ron Jackson and Sue Patterson (2nd); Senior Singles, Merry Carscallen (2nd).

Pairs: Junior Ladies Similar, Lynn Shapely and Helen Laurent (2nd).

Singles: Novice Ladies, Ellen Sawyer (1st); Junior Ladies, Anne Bowlby (3rd); Intermediate Ladies, Penny Clapp (3rd).

Interpretive: Junior Ladies, Anne Bowlby (2nd); Senior Ladies, Beth Peters (1st).

Formation Fourteen Step: Varsity (1st). Synchronized Group: Varsity (1st).

Swim Blues take OUAAs

By PAUL CARSON

In a year when some Varsity teams have won pyrrhic victories or encountered unexpected defeats, the men's swimming team won both the battle and likely the war last weekend while capturing Blues' fifteenth consecutive OUAAs swim title.

Blues amassed 555 points during the eighteen events at the McMaster pool to finish comfortably ahead of Waterloo (429.5) and Western (327). The nine other entries trailed far behind.

More important, however, is the fact that sixteen Varsity team members qualified for this weekend's CIAU national championships at Lakehead University in Thunder Bay.

According to coach Robin Campbell this should give Blues sufficient manpower to retain Varsity's national team championship as well as guaranteeing the OUAAs retains its conference title.

The OUAAs finals were somewhat of a confused meet with eight records set but some very slow times recorded in other events plus a few examples of unexpectedly confused judgements from meet officials.

Freshman Juri Daniels paced Blues' efforts by setting new records in both the 100 and 200-yard breaststrokes with times of 1:02.9 and 2:19.6 as Blues' group of six breaststrokes contributed almost 100 points in just two events.

Shawn Laari cruised through the gruelling 1650-yard freestyle in a record time of 17:23.1 and the 400-yard freestyle relay unit of Russ Farquhar, Lance Peto, George Gross and Dave Wilkin added to the records with a timing of 3:17.5 as Blues grabbed a solid lead after Friday's nine events.

The Varsity — Peter Noman

Juri Daniels, a rookie, set new records in 100 and 200-yard breaststrokes.

Western's premier diver, Doug Darling, set new point records in winning both the one and three-metre competitions while Ottawa's versatile Mike Pearson took the 400-yard individual medley in 4:27.5 and Waterloo's Dave Wilson won the 500-yard freestyle in 4:55.2.

Records were also set in what is becoming an annual competition between the league's swimming coaches and the OUAAs athletic directors. The directors had twice voted that only 25 OUAAs athletes would be permitted to attend the CIAU swimming finals but the coaches managed to attract some additional government money and the battle was on.

Many heated speeches later, the coaches decided to phone the athletic directors directly and in the ensuing poll, seven of eight directors contacted voted to send an additional ten athletes to Lakehead.

Five of these additional members are from Varsity so not only does coach Campbell gain a team of sixteen instead of eleven but he gets $500 of that government money to help defray the costs. Not bad for one night on the telephone.

Buoyed by the significant political coups achieved Thursday night, Blues proceeded to make a shambles of Friday's competition by winning six of the first seven races.

Mike Hughes took the 200-yard butterfly in 2:03.5 and then sprinter Dave Wilkin edged McMaster veteran George Steppock in the 50-yard freestyle with a clocking of 22.1.

George Gross made it look easy in the 200-yard backstroke with a 2:02.4, over two seconds better than his nearest rival.

Pearson broke the string by winning the 200-yard IM but Blues came right back with three more victories as Laari won the 1650 timed final, Daniel set the first of his breaststroke records and Mike Hibberd won the 200-yard freestyle in 1:48.00, the third fastest time ever in that event for a Varsity swimmer.
