Frank zaps rock fans with Hamilton concert, nifty new LP

Zappa-Beefheart-Mothers
Discreet DS 2234

Rush seats only for the Mothers in Hamilton so we get there forty-five minutes early. Three thousand people block the entrance to two small doors. Every once and a while a small piece of the surging crowd manages to squeeze through one of the doors. One minute we're standing at the periphery of the crowd trying to decide which current of mangled bodies to become part of, and the next minute five hundred people appear behind us gently grinding our bodies into the line of backs in front of us. At the rate of three people every minute, we are part of the mob quite a while. Who organized this concert, anyway?

Bongo Fury is the Mother's latest album, the larger part of which is live, recorded at the Armadillo World Headquarters. It co-stars Captain Beefheart—harp, vocals, shopping bags. If you like the Mothers you'll like this album. If you've never listened to the Mothers you'll like this album. If you don't like the Mothers you'll like this album. If you've been fretting over the course rock music has taken in the last five years, relax.

Concerts in Hamilton are different. At the Strawbs show in Hamilton Place last spring a row of policemen formed a line behind the last row to make sure the No Smoking signs were obeyed. They were. The acoustics in Hamilton Place make it hard to stomach anything else, but somehow the feeling of being watched overrides other considerations. As we slowly press towards the midget doors the gentle tinkling of smashing liquor bottles signals once again the presence of the ubiquitous Hamilton police. The good people of Hamilton obviously spend a great deal of their spare time worrying about what their children do for recreation.

Close to the entrance, illuminated by a Hamilton-moderne outdoor sidewalk lamp, is a small leafless tree that looks as if it is about to be uprooted and swept into the auditorium by the force of three thousand bodies rubbing against it. Instead, four pre-teens, two of whom are sporting Halloween masks, struggle up into the branches and start jumping around, shaking the leaves and making ape noises. Some people encourage them and some boo. I prepare myself to get hit on the head by a broken branch and one or more airborne goofs. Is this the darker side of Stanley Kubrick's legacy?

Just as the crowd starts to turn ugly I am propelled at last through the midget doors, past the giant policemen, and into the auditorium. Incredibly, the place is almost full already. We find two seats on the basketball stands high in the top far corner of the auditorium. The Zappas, Frank and Gail, are gracious hosts, as I found out when I talked to them in the Windsor Arms Hotel. Frank's concern for my comfort was almost motherly.

"Cozy?" Two soft brown eyes looked at me down that famous nose.

"Brrflinrip?"

"All politicians are chumps" he declared. "Suckers. McGovern asked me to play at the Democratic National Convention but I refused. He was a chump."

"Rrrllirlll?"

"The TV special is finished. It's fantastic. It's a mixture of music and clay animation. It's already scheduled to be shown in Europe and I think Australia, and there's a good chance you'll see it in Canada, but it might never get on the air in the U.S. There's a blacklist in the States against certain people appearing on network television and I'm on it."

"Why?"

"Because they know I have a big mouth. If I'm not on-TV as far as most people are concerned, I don't exist."

Happy two hundredth birthday, America.

Myles and Lenny finish their set. Don Messer's Jubilee gone electric and the crowd loves it. I've never seen a warm-up act, Canadian or otherwise, better received, and they deserve every bit of it.

After intermission, during which the PA system plays a taped interview Frank did with the CBC, the lights go down, and from the back of the hall the members of the band march single file onto the stage to the rhythmic applause of the audience. The first onstage are Napoleon Murphy Brock, wearing what looks a French Lieutenant's uniform, and Norma Bell, in one of those campy Esso coversalls you all remember from one of the twenty back issues of Time Canada that arrived the day after the mail strike. Finally, with everyone present, plugged in, and tuned up, Frank adjusts the height of his mike.

"Welcome to the Mothers of Invention Extravaganza."

Talking to Frank Zappa, it's important to resist the urge to tune out the conversation and just stare into his eyes. Every feature of his department might have been designed to force the attention of the Tribby's among us up, way up, from the foot of his long flowing black kimono, past the funny moushache, along the gigantic nose, into the eyes, into the eyes, into the...

"I'm sorry Frank, what did you say?"

"It's not true."

"What's not true?"

"What they said about me."

"What who said?"

"What Time magazine said."

"About what?"

"Me. Me performing twenty minutes of pig noises at the Emmies because the audience was rude. It's not true."

"Oh."

"I hope you don't believe everything you read in Time magazine."

"I won't from now on, Frank."

You can keep your Who, Led Zepelin, Rolling Stones, et al. The Mothers of Invention are, and have been for some time, the best band to see in concert. And it doesn't seem to matter who Zappa has playing with him. Although some editions of the Mothers are more fondly remembered than others, the standard for the group is carefully guarded by Zappa. This time round, for instance, I was a bit disappointed to hear that once again Ian Underwood wouldn't be playing, but the performance of newcomer Norma Bell on sax was so outstanding that there was little opportunity to ponder the fate of past favorites. She really whips it out. And to think, she's a well, you know, . . . girl!

To begin with, it was the Grammy Awards, not the Emmy's. Having dutifully performed his set, Frank was in the hall backstage on his way to the WC. A lady, obviously the wife of some record company executive, bound up in a tight shocking pink evening dress, spangled with diamonds and all the other paraphernalia of the middle class, middle aged glitter culture, passed Frank in the hall, shooting pointed glances in his direction, muttering Things under her breath. Frank, already miffed at losing out on the Mr. Congeniality Award to the then up and coming Peter Noon, decided he didn't have to take abuse from the likes of this middle aged hen. You must remember this all happened before the summer of love at which time everyone in the record industry became cool.

"I called out 'Come here, you'. She walked right up to me and defiantly pressed her face up against mine. I shouted out as loud as I could 'You are a pig!' She reacted as if she had been hit over the head with a lead pipe. Her face was stunned, as she reeled backwards, hands at her sides, and proceeded to twirl back and forth zigzag around the hall like a wounded toy soldier."

The Mothers play for a solid two hours and the enthusiasm of the crowd is obviously very gratifying to Frank.

"This is the best audience we've had on this tour, and you can be sure I'm gonna tell everybody."

Through the course of the evening the group performs a wide range of material, including a medley of hits from "We're Only In It For The Money". Norma Bell is a standout, and as usual, Frank himself plays a couple of solos that come at you from nowhere. His ability always grows. He always amazes. Possibly the only disappointment is Edwin Jobson, from Roxy Music, who is a special guest. Although I am a big fan of Roxy Music and have enjoyed his work on their albums and at their concerts, with the Mothers he seems a bit fense, and unable to let loose.

The band finishes but the audience demands more. Frank always makes the crowd wait before granting an encore, to make sure they really mean it, I suppose, and this night is no different from all other nights. But finally they all pile back onto stage. The big question, of course, is why Toronto was passed over on this tour. I forgot to ask.

Sherlock Holmes has been featured in at least thirty different stage productions, including a musical and a ballet, since the night in 1893 when Charles Brookfield first played the role in Under the Clock, a revue at the Royal Court Theatre in London. It is a pleasure to see the sleuth once again taking his nightly bows—this time in a production of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's The Speckled Band at the St. Lawrence Centre. It came as a great surprise to this particular critic to learn that The Speckled Band is Conan Doyle's only full length dramatic work, apart from an 1899 collaboration with William Gillette, entitled Sherlock Holmes. (This latter is to make a Toronto appearance later this month.) Nonetheless, I must report that the surprise was a pleasant one, for this production is of a superior quality. In it the melodrama is always crisp and the comic touches are frequently electrifying. Moreover, the director, Malcolm Black, is successful in demonstrating that Conan Doyle was always his own best satirist by giving us a serious presentation of the comically tenuous script rather than embellishing it with the gaudy exaggerations which usually run rampant in similar period presentations. It is a consistent and stylish production of a melodramatic entertainment which, on the whole, is never more and certainly never less than entertaining. It is a commercial piece which was written to please and will, whether you are a Sherlockian purist or not. I must confess, however, that I found the first act boring. Conan Doyle has put in far more exposition than is necessary for his dastardly doings to be successful, and as a result the pace drags interminably. Nonetheless, there was a saving grace in the sterling performance of James B. Douglas as the butcher, Mr. Armitage. For Armitage, an excited member of an otherwise uninterested inquest panel, is determined to discover whether Dr. Grimesly Rylott, a moody Anglo-Indian surgeon who is the owner of Stoke Manor (the scene of the crime), did or did not murder his stepdaughter, Violet Stoner. Douglas's colorful interruptions were always welcomed and his sharp northern jibes made this secondary character come strikingly alive. There were, unfortunately, two very poor character portraits delivered in this act. One was by Mervyn Blake, as an old family butler, and the other was by Marilyn Lightstone as Mrs. Staunton, Dr. Rylott's evil housekeeper. Blake's technical tricks were far too broad and coarse, while Lightstone insisted on straining her vocal cords in an unsympathetic performance. Both actors sadly stepped out of tone with an ensemble which, on the whole, acted very well together. The second act, however, was where the real delight lay. The ground rules had already been well-established, and now it was time for some melodramatic fun and the long-awaited entrance of the most beloved of all super sleuths, Sherlock Holmes. Had the actor who played him been weak the whole project could have crumbled, but here Patrick Horgan's performance was never less than enchanting. He successfully met all the expectations of an avidly expectant audience. In his scenes with the tempestuous Dr. Rylott, melodramatically portrayed by the competent Kenneth Pogue, and with the quiet Dr. Watson of Owen Foran, Horgan pictured a splendidly fastidious, world weary genius with a rough emotional transparency. Horgan has done a very difficult job extremely well and as a result deserves much respect. Moreover, the stunning sets of Murray Laufer and the colorful costumes of Hilary Corbett lived up to the immaculate artistry of the rest of the production. The St. Lawrence Centre stage always looks grand surrounded by its beautiful proscenium arch, and the set for Holmes' Baker St. study, complete with scarlet velvet wallpaper (which appears to have been stolen from the Royal Alexandra's staircase walls), the violin, a tobacco slipper, and a bottle of cocaine, was always a feast for the eye. Finally, it must be noted that the technical progression of the play moved along swiftly. For despite a current strike by stagehands, the scenery and lights were ably dealt with by a capable administrative staff. Thus in many ways The Speckled Band is a very important achievement for the Toronto Arts Productions. One can only hope that it is a strong indication of an important and thrilling season to follow in 1976. Bruce Wall

TWP version of Christmas Carol falls flat

On January 2nd 1844 Mr. Charles Dickens wrote a letter to Mr. Cornelius Felton stating that "over this Christmas Carol, Charles Dickens wept, and laughed, and wept again, and excited himself in a most extraordinary manner in the composition; and thinking whereof, he walked about the back streets of London, fifteen and twenty miles, many a night when all the sober folks had gone to bed."

That Dickens thoroughly appreciated not only the religious aspect of Christmas, but also cordially approved of the social festivities which mark the joyous season, is evidenced in his own observance of them. No man entered more heartily into the spirit of fun and frolic which characterized what is now usually termed the "old fashioned Christmas". "Such dinings, such dances, such conjurings, such blind-man-buffings, such theatregoings, such kissing-out of old years and kissing-in of new ones, never took place in these parts before." Consequently, it was these very same social aspects of The Christmas Carol which Francois-Regis Klaffer strove to illustrate in his interpretation of the work recently housed at the TWP theatre. Unfortunately, although all three of the Christmas spirits were present, the overall spirit of Dickens's enchanting piece was lost.

Nonetheless, Klaffer's return to the nineteenth century

Dickens without Tiny Tim is like breakfast without Anita Bryant tradition of the parlour reading, where a group of literary luminaries and Victorian eccentrics gather for an evening of academic fun and games, was most refreshing. It brought one closer to Dickens' original inspiration for his work; a children's birthday party. "If you could have seen me," Dickens later wrote to a friend, "at a children's party at Macready's the other night, going down a country dance with Mrs. M., you would have thought I was a country gentleman of independent property, residing on a tip top farm, with the wind blowing straight in my face every day."

But when the guests at Klaffer's own special party began to dramatize Dickens' fantasy, with each actor playing a wide variety of parts, the notes in this merry dance began to jar. Such confusing of dialogue with narrative, such over acting, such dull sets, such screeching music, such awkward costume changing and such a poor imitation of Alastair Sim have never been seen in these parts before. And although could find occasional glimpses of the physical dexterity and energy which have long been associated with TWP I found little of anything else. There certainly was no magic evident; not even a Tiny Tim. One could definitely conclude that there was "more grave than of gravity" about this production. Bruce Wall

Hong Kong hallucinations: the demi-monde of George Walker

Factory Theatre Lab tends to silt with its hunches even when they don't pan out. Nevertheless, their occasional blindneses are outweighed by a steady output of solid, mentally acrobatic theatre which, if not as daring and experimental as the company's name suggests, is still not classifiable as is other Toronto theatre. Being neither Great Star theatre, nor Solid Fare (Neglected Classics) nor even Unknown Genius (Soon-to-be-Neglected Classics), the Factory ambience is well suited to the idiosyncratic vision of George Walker.

Walker is fascinated both by the East and by a mental reconnaissance into period politics. His previous plays, Bagdad Saloon and Beyond Mozambique, were both well-crafted works received by the intelligentsia with interest, but not fanaticism. This time, around, in Ramona and the White Slaves, he is working with a cast of familiar faces to invoke the atmosphere of curiously civilized decadence which he believes Hong Kong to have been during the British supervision.

A few nights ago I had an opportunity to talk to one of the leading actors in the show; and, regrettably, had to come away with my interest in the play whetted but not satisfied, and with the feeling that David Bolt is a good actor who can't resist being cryptical. Bolt, who has the crucial part of the police inspector in the play, was able to take some time from his rehearsal to talk; but unfortunately he was only suggestive. Both of us were tired, and as in most interviews, the wrong questions usually get asked. One of my major interests is the self-perception of the varieties of local theatre, and I presumed Bolt had reasons for working in the milieu he has chosen. He has worked in Walker's previous plays produced in Toronto and he has worked before now with Jin Henshaw, a local film star. In terms of a contemporary history of theatre, he is connected with the Adelaide-Berkeley Street axis.

But all those questions got us only a short way. Bolt noticed I wasn't writing much down; and we drifted along in an amicable non-conversation, punctuated by my sporadic efforts to find out what exactly Bolt thought of the way the play worked, and what kind of realism was involved in an opium fantasy. My impression was, and remains, that he is competent, given to imagining his character as being a creation larger than the stage presentation, but that he is not particularly interested in being au-courant of various theories.

Dealing with actors is much different than simply going to the shows they appear in. They have long pasts, lied to shows you know nothing of; they are an interrelated family where one set of black sheep are the heroes of another set, and the occasional performer is granted transcendent ability. Even when arguing with friends, no reviewer can do more than state preferences for plays and productions which have intrigued him; with an actor, a new technical vocabulary is required and fewer judgements can come without rehearsing.

Bolt made it quite clear that from his point of view, and from the point of view of his associates, Ramona and the White Slaves was well done. I, on the other hand, have begun recently to question the promotional sanity of the entire operation, since Peaches and Poisoned Cream was given an extended run, time without end, and the most part of the audience came to see insanity on stage. But regardless of the actors or the theatre, Walker's plays have internal validity in terms of construction and independent thought, and even in barest outline this must be expected to be a thought-provoking play. More thoughts at another time on Aristotelian categories and the drama.

Taperecorders and carte blanche yield bland, sanctimonious good news

 edited by Eliot Wigginton
 Doubleday

These come in handy for doing oral history of the ginseng root

The successive best-selling Foxfire book collections, the third of which has recently been published, are drawn from the eponymous magazine written by a group of high school students aided by their school administration in the southern Appalachians. The wonder of course, as with Johnson's women preachers, is not whether they do it well but that they do it at all.

They certainly do not do it well.

The third collection, like the preceding ones, is ostensibly about Appalachian crafts, about "animal care, banjos and dulcimers, hide tanning, summer and fall wild plant foods, butter churns, ginseng and still more affairs of plain living," as the subtitle suggests. The students' involvement does obtrude though. The articles are not so much stories for the reader as events for their writers. And they are experiences not reflected on but simply reflected.

The book contains a bit of everything and not much of anything: from useless information lifted from the nearest encyclopaedia ("the scientific name for a dipper gourd is Cucurbita foetidissima penns.") through indiscriminate appraisal ("one of the most interesting men we have ever met" "a uniquely interesting individual", etc.) to even more useless personal interjection ("I really had a great time interviewing these people, and I think they had as much fun talking about it as I had listening... I'd like to give special thanks to Mr. Billy Joe Stiles and Margie Bennett, who helped me get a lot of information on ginseng, and also..." etc.)

The students were apparently given taperecorders and carte blanche. Once the play button was pushed it seems they felt they had little obligation to listen and form valid reactions to what was happening then and there. What we get are only loosely organized tape transcripts and a growing sense that the ever increasing number of bad practitioners will very easily discredit the fragile oral history movement.

It is odd that a book about Nature, the Folk, the Good Life, reminds one with any validity only of the self-indulgence, the gullibility, the claustrophobia, of the high school system and its population, student and faculty. There are interviews with old men and women talking about "Daddy" and "Mommy", interviews with old men talking about "her" — the wife — and with old women talking about "him" — the Lord, if you want to be patronizing: you can get a sense of oneness with people you wouldn't normally cross the street to speak with. But there is much more that is much more depressing on entirely different grounds.

Out of Bounds was a British school paper published during the 1930's by Giles and Esmond Romilly. The paper billed itself as the "Public Schools' Journal Against Fascism, Militarism and Reaction", and advertised that it was "Banned in Aldenham, Cheltenham, Uppingham, Wellington." It had articles on running away from school, on propagandist teaching, even one entitled "Morning Glory: Sex in Public Schools". The paper reached a circulation of 3,000 — and aroused support from unlikely sources, G. B. Shaw and members of the British Left, among them. The paper's whole situation seems dangerously close to a satire of the radical press — the editors were 15 and 16 years old — but it is far more interesting, even simply to read about, than Foxfire 3 is.

Out of Bounds was "relevant".

Foxfire is essentially a good news publication — not a very good one — and as such, ephemeral, bland and irritatingly sanctimonious.

Recycled Peale polemic raises pesky questions

Positive Thinking For A Time Like This Norman Vincent Peale
Prentice-Hall, $8.95

This is no time to evade difficulties. Dr. Peale is well aware of the necessity to plunge right in and tackle problems, even though he knows "full well that problems can be, and often are, unpleasant and pesky in the extreme". (Something striking in that phrase, "pesky in the extreme". Just consider the economies of expression that could be realized if we were willing to substitute degrees of peskiness for the dreary and wasteful vocabulary of apocalypse and catastrophe: a mildly pesky war, a slightly pesky earthquake, a rather pesky military coup).

But the first pesky problem to confront the reader of Dr. Peale's latest book arises from the title and the unusual circumstances of the book's publication. Positive Thinking For A Time Like This is a revision and condensation of an earlier book by Peale, The Tough-Minded Optimist, published in 1961. The reader might therefore have reasonable grounds for suspecting that the insights of an earlier day would be applied to the different conditions of 1975. The only acknowledgement of the passage of fourteen years, however, appears to be the addition of the phrase "in a time like this" to the title and to the summaries at the end of each chapter. Thus: "We suggest the importance of positive thinking in a time like this"; "practice being a positive thinker in a time like this"; "always be aware that positive thinking has the victorious answers for a time like this"; "When your mind is cluttered up with gripes, resentments, and hates, it can hardly be expected to produce peace and contentment, and certainly not positive thinking for a time like this." Just what a time like this is like is a question left mostly to the reader's imagination.

Yet Peale fans will not be disappointed by Positive Thinking For A Time Like This, if indeed a Peale fan can be disappointed at all. For while the book contains a hearty sample of the expected inspirational anecdotes which illustrate one of the basic premises of Peale's thought — that "God always pays off" — there is a surprising polemical note.

The though of Peale defending himself and attacking his critics may unsettle those who prefer the more traditional Peale of the bland all-encompassing affirmation — the Peale who, much like the proponents of value-free social science, value-free ethical theory and related aberrations, seeks to forestall any possible objection by making the very thought of objection impossible. The academic version of the gambit usually goes as follows: (1) I am objective; (2) anyone who disagrees with me is therefore biased; (3) anyone who is biased is wrong; (4) anyone who disagrees with me is wrong. The Peale version of the same litany usually takes the following form (1) I am a positive thinker; (2) Positive thinking pays off and is therefore right; (3) Negativism is self-defeating, does not pay off and is therefore wrong; (4) Anyone who disagrees with me is thinking negatively and is therefore wrong. The important thing in both cases is to avoid actually dealing with the substance of the objections. But now we find that Dr. Peale has crept, however haltingly, into the area of substantive disagreement. The reader can only applaud this development and express the fervent hope that discerning academics will follow suit.

The problem all started when Peale entered the Boston University School of Theology: "The first attempt of the faculty was to upset my 'simple' faith and to substitute an intellectualized approach to the teachings of Jesus which made of them a kind of social manifesto". But the approach of the liberal seminarians didn't satisfy Peale: "... I just never could bring myself to go along with the bumpfulous assumption that to be a Christian I had to lead a strike or join a socialist party or push social legislation through Congress or call people reactionaries who didn't do so." Rather, Peale took the view that all problems are individual problems. What's wrong is not anything about the world, but the individual's way of looking at the world. Thus "The tendency is to blame other people or social conditions or forces beyond your control. But the real truth is that your problem is not beyond your control; the solution is within you". But there's a twist: since mankind is basically rotten ("Several thousand years of so-called civilizing process have only coated him with a pseudo-niceness; and let's face it, under that thin coating he is amoral, unmoral, immoral, predatory, aggressive and every other adjective you can think of to describe human nature with gloves off"), the only solution is to surrender yourself to God's will. What Peale ends up with is a blend of absolute individualism, complete idealism, and abdication of personal responsibility which surely must be the strongest prescription for political and social quiescence ever written.

Within this framework, Peale goes on to say that he believes "wholeheartedly in the application of Jesus' teachings to the incredible evils and injustices in society". He even admits that "judging from a Reader's Digest article on 'How 29 Companies Got Into Trouble' a lot of shady stuff does go on". Maybe ten years hence, when the book is re-reprinted under the title of No Time Like the Present For Positive Thinking, Peale will have become a first-rate muckraker ... imagine Bernstein and Woodward supplanted by Peale of the Digest. Imagine anything you want, for that matter. Especially at a time like this. Gene Allen

Walrus swoons in ecstasy

See the dreaded Freemason!

Involvement, meaning, burlesqued in ex-heavy's fairytale

When Bergman was very young — I got this from Jay Cocks so it may not be true — he was taken to see The Magic Flute and it fascinated him. He even wanted to mount a production of his own, with puppets, but failed, because he didn't have enough pocket money to buy the records. Now he has made his childhood dream come true.

That's culture for you. When I was little I never got to see anything classier than a Christmas pantomime. This is a genre that may not be familiar to all of you: they were cheerful and silly affairs written more or less collectively, and partly improvised by the cast, based on fairy tales but the stories twisted to accommodate local and topical jokes, and songs stolen from recent Broadway shows, because no one in the company could write songs. This lighthearted attitude to the story was part of the appeal: everybody knew what was going to happen, and nobody cared, as long as it provided an excuse for songs, dances, fake sword fights, jokes, costumes and scenery.

The charm of The Magic Flute is of much the same kind. Oddly enough, before I had seen or heard it I had the vague idea that it was extremely mystical, and several friends have confessed to the same misconception. This may simply be a traditional mistake, handed down from ignoramus to ignoramus since the time the opera was written, when Freemasons, who figure largely in the plot, really were a persecuted underground organization, and were regarded by the man in the street as rather sinister. (A reputation they have not entirely lost: when a friend of mine was in Sunday school they told him a story about a priest who once infiltrated a Masonic meeting — in disguise, of course, but after only a few minutes the leader stopped the proceedings, said darkly, "There is someone here who is not one of us!" and vanished in a puff of smoke.)

Bergman's choosing to make a movie of it will probably deepen this impression in the minds of some of the people who don't go to see it, and we'll soon be overhearing references to "Mozart's Persona" in the Cafe Ritz. But Bergman made Smiles of the Summer Night as well as Persona, and even a nightmare like Hour of the Wolf (which contains, incidentally, a bit of a scene from The Magic Flute, performed by puppets) has a wide streak of crazy humour.

In fact The Magic Flute is the silliest of Mozart's operas. The plot includes all the important parts of a good fairytale, and treats none of them as of the least importance. There is a hero, Tamino, a pure brave knight, and his garrulous, greedy, cowardly, generally humorous-but-lovable second banana, Papageno the bird-catcher. (At one point he gets his lips padlocked for telling lies, and has to sing with his mouth shut.) There is a fair lady for each of them to win, both perfectly suitable, right down to their names, Pamina and Papagena. There is a wicked witch, the Queen of the Night, who at first appears to be good;

the most remarkable of her supernatural powers is her ability to reach high F. There is a good magician, Sarastro, leader of the secret brotherhood, who at first appears to be bad. There is a treacherous servant. There is a dragon, a quest, several sets of attendant spirits, an attempted suicide, trials by fire and water, and so on to the happy ending.

Bergman hams it up splendidly, in a style that would have been alienating if there had been the least question of involvement in the first place. It is set on a stage, with gorgeous unreal flats and creaky machinery. We get glimpses backstage, and of the audience, bored or enthralled. The man in the dragon suit is great fun, and even better is the walrus who wanders inexplicably out of the forest while Tamino is playing his flute, to lie down on his back and feebly flap his flippers in a swoon of ecstasy.

Every conceivable point of moral or emotional involvement (some of them conceivable only by a considerable stretch of the imagination) is burlesqued; of course in a film this can be done with little gestures that would be completely lost on stage. All the corniest lines are held up on placards while they are being sung, thus affording native speakers of Swedish an amusement akin to that you and I derive from the subtitles, which are in wretched doggerel — "Fearless heart and nimble feet Make for a discreet retreat," and so on.

All the singers mug madly, or keep the same sweet smile for the whole time it takes to sing or listen to a song. And since the film was originally made for television, there is a high proportion of closeups: it is quite clear that these people are involved with the singing, not the story, and that they are enjoying it hugely. It is also fascinating to watch their mouths — the singing was actually all recorded separately, but you'd never know it.

It is a marvel to me how perfectly suited in spirit this happy-go-lucky, completely nonsensical libretto is to Mozart's complex and perfectly logical music. Perhaps it is because the music itself is essentially frivolous. It expresses nothing; indeed it has nothing to do with human emotions except that it makes you happy by being so beautiful. And you can hum and tap your foot to it, too.

I want to emphasize that the audience at the Towne last night was definitely not a normal movie audience, it was an opera audience. They weren't as overdressed as usual, and one or two sneaked in popcorn, but they were unmistakable. There weren't very many of them either, and that's a pity. You don't have to be a faithful opera-goer (I'm not) to enjoy the movie. I can't think of a more painless way to get acquainted with great music, and as a matter of fact I can't think of a more pleasant way to spend an evening.

THE SAC STUDENT DIRECTORY HAS ARRIVED ... AND THIS YEAR IT'S FREE

The directory contains the names, addresses, and phone numbers of all students at the U. of T. It is available at the SAC office free of charge to all undergraduates with ATL cards, and for one dollar to all other U. of T. people with I.D. (staff, grad students, etc.). The directories will be available at the front office of SAC, from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. daily.

Wilson MacDonald, a poet of stinging thought.

When men were men and poets were gypsy scholars

Wilson MacDonald's Western Tour, 1923-24 ed. Stan Dragland Coach House Press

Among the new books in the bookstores today is one that will, I do not hesitate to proclaim, become a minor classic: Coach House Press, Wilson MacDonald's Western Tour, 1923-24. This seemingly unlikely candidate, "a collage of letters (to, from and about Wilson MacDonald), newspaper clippings, poems, drawings and miscellaneous MacDonaldiana," as it is described on its title page, provides a marvellously telling and vastly entertaining description of the infancy of Canadian literature, and of some of its growing pains, through its presentation of the now-forgotten Canadian poet and the letters and reports generated by his poetry reading tour in the Western provinces in the 1920s.

It was the time, before the crusading of F. R. Scott, A.J. Smith, Robert Finch and E. J. Pratt, among others, when Canadian poets thought they had to display themselves as happy-go-lucky vagabonds, and gypsy scholars, a time when they eagerly crowned themselves with laurels as they told one another how "virile" and "brutal" their poetry was, a time when The Canadian Bookman was the leading literary organ, a time when Canada was thrilled that Mazo de la Roche had won the Atlantic Monthly Prize with Jalna; a time, in short, when vanity, pretension and a certain awesome innocence prevailed.

Among the material printed in the book is Wilson MacDonald's press release.

It quotes various critics: "Do not stifle his genius by your indifference. Honor him. Let him feel your pride in him. He is one of the greatest poets of the Anglo-Saxon race" — Rev. Robert Norwood, M.A., D.C.L.

"Wilson MacDonald interested me more than anything else in America." — William Archer, Dean of English critics.

"He is a poet of stinging thought. He sings without fear of the critics and the pampered taste of the throng. Kitchener was visited by a great poet last night." — Kitchener Record.

And then we read some of his poetry . . .

Whist-Wee!
Little brown Dee
Peers from her shelter
Of bush and of tree.

Her time she is biding
To leap from her hiding etc.

Another poem about the brotherhood of man rises to such ringing lines as

His Goethe? nay; my Goethe?
nay; our Goethe? yea . . .

His Appassionata? My Appassionata? Nay; Our Appassionata? Yea.

The book is a succession of lethal detail after lethal detail . . . MacDonald was "recently elected a member of the most exclusive literary organization in the world — the P.E.N. Club" . . . One organizer of a poetry reading wonders why MacDonald, instead of staying at a downtown hotel, doesn't take a room at the Y . . . One Westerner tells MacDonald the West doesn't need sissies or poets but real men: MacDonald immediately breaks into a (poetic) panegyric of the poetry of life in the west and a scathing indictment of the gross materialism of the man who lives for the pleasure and profits of the city . . . Another Westerner complains that MacDonald doesn't include enough of his sleigh-of-hand tricks in his readings (He was apparently very good at these, at least.)

You could cry . . . It is all true — assembled by Stan Dragland wholly from the Lorne Pierce archives at Queen's University. But the ridiculous situation was so perfectly realized in life, and is so well presented here, that honest enjoyment is best.

movies

Friday — The New Yorker will be showing two films by the young American director Marlin Scorsese; Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore at 6:30 and 10:25 and Mean Streets at 8:30 which as a double bill is an excellent display of his range; the former being one of commercial successes of 1975 and the latter being one of the biggest critical successes of 1973 but not by any means a crowd pleaser. The Revue has two of Truffaut's earliest and best showing there tonight — his first film The 400 Blows is at 7:30 and Jules and Jim (don't let all the palaver about it being one of the greatest films ever made get to you — it really is quite enjoyable) is at 9:30 — that bill is also running on Saturday.

Saturday — The New Yorker will continue to show Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore at 2:00, 6:00 and 10:00 with Klute at 4:00 and 8.

Sunday — One of Louis Malle's lesser known works The Thief of Paris-Le voleur starring Jean Paul Belmondo and Genevieve Bujold is showing at 7:00 with yet another tale of Parisian criminals — Alain Resnais' Stavisky at 9:15 starring Jean Paul Belmondo as well; that bill will run until Tuesday. Eros and Thanatos have it out in an empty apartment, on a bare mattress, introduced by the paintings of Francis Bacon to the music of Gato Barbieri and directed by Bernardo Bertolucci in Last Tango in Paris at the New Yorker at 2:00, 6:30 and 10:45 with Fellini's tonoclastic Satyricon at 4:20 and 8:45.

Monday — The New Yorker continues with Last Tango in Paris at 6:30 and 10:15 and Francois Truffaut's The Wild Child at 8:45.

Tuesday — The Roxy will present two epics of montage and Russian history by Sergi Eisenstein — Alexander Nevsky and Ivan the Terrible, Part I at 7 and 10:15 and 8:40 respectively. The New Yorker has two early to middle films by Ingmar Bergman; The Virgin Spring at 6:30 and 9:45 and The Magician at 8:00. At Harbourfront there will be an extensive show of avant-garde and underground shorts starting at 8:30. Tonight's show consists of L'entrechat, Charlie Company, Arthur Lipsett's Freefall, Bumsel and Dal's Un Chien Andalou, two films by Stan Brakhage, Thigh Line, Triangular and Mothlight, and Jim Anderson's Yonge Street. Admission is Free!

Wednesday — The Roxy is showing two vintage Hitchcocks; Rebecca with Laurence Olivier and Joan Fontaine at 7:00 and Notorious with Cary Grant and Ingrid Bergman at 9:15. John Schlesinger's version of Nathaniel West's Day of the Locust is on at the New Yorker at 9 and Coppola's The Conversation at 7. The Revue has an interesting double bill of recent feature films dealing with primitive people with Nicholas Roeg's story of an aboriginal boy's rite of passage in Walkabout at 7:30 and Philip Kaufman's White Dawn at 9:15.

Thursday — It's Harold Pinter Night at the New Yorker with Butley at 7 and The Homecoming at 9:15. The Roxy's bill for tonight consists of two films by the late Pier Paolo Pasolini. Of the two his loosely told story of a semi-divine, semi-carnal visitor and his effects on provincial hosts, Teorema, is this reviewer's favorite but as it tends to provoke odd reactions in people I don't recommend it outright. In other words see it for yourself and develop an odd reaction of your very own. It's showing at 7 and 10:20 along with Pasolini's highly entertaining retelling of Boccaccio's The Decamerone at 8:40.

Today, only a brief and fragmentary listing. In the wake of the postal strike and the holidays, changes have been made all around the city. Despite the two dozen groups who can get by, there is always one which has monstrous financial difficulties, and this I gather is the case with Actors Repertory Theatre, whose extremely ambitious programme is likely to be curtailed through financial deprivation. On the other hand, the Toronto Truck Theatre is moving in to fill the Colonnade Theatre, with three productions on tap within a small radius of Yorkville. Last of the Red-Hot Lovers, a Neil Simon patented social comment, begins on the 14th at the Colonnade. On the same schedule, that is Wednesday to Saturday with performances at 8:30 save Saturday (7:00 and 9:30), is The Tempest, at the home stage, 94 Belmont Street. At the Heliconian Hall, Strindberg's The Creditors, a love triangle. Friday to Sunday only, same times.

At New Theatre, 736 Bathurst Street, an interesting production, Kennedy's Children, life in the seventies for the waifs of the sixties. Wednesday to Sunday, call 534-5000. A third good play will be George Walker's new Ramona and the White Slaves, beginning formally on Tuesday at the Factory Theatre Lab, 207 Adelaide Street. Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30. Up to $4 but Tuesday night and a Sunday matinee at 2:30 are pay-what-you-can. Opening Tuesday at the Tarragon, 30 Bridgman Avenue, is the Performing Theatre Company's odd notion of humour, Gallows Humour, dealing with a condemned man's last hours, his dealings with the warden, and the warden's dealings with his kitchen. Somewhere in there there's also, apparently, a state-employed prostitute. Tuesday to Sunday, two week run. All shows 8:30, Sunday at 4; five dollars, students half price except Friday and Saturday. Call 531-1827. Theatre Passe Muraille continues 30 Minutes From Downtown at its new space, 16 Ryerson. Thursday to Saturday at 8:30, $2, and Sunday matinee at two PWYC. I've heard mixed reviews of this, and we will report back to you as soon as possible. At Harbourfront, from the 8th to the 11th, improvised comedy with the Young Street Company. All at 8:30.

Odds and ends: at the St. Lawrence, The Speckled Band, try for student rush; at the Royal Alex, A Matter of Gravity, with Katherine Hepburn. Beginning Monday; she's good, but the playwright, Enid Bagnold, has turned 85 and was responsible for National Velvet. At the O'Keefe, the Royal Shakespeare Company, or part of it, in Sherlock Holmes beginning Tuesday. Also at the O'Keefe, one chance to see Emyln Williams' one-man show of Charles Dickens Sunday at 7:30; this comes universally recommended. In the meantime, Aladdin a traditional pantomime, will hold the boards.

Closer to home, the Phoenix Theatre is making money on The Mousetrap. Managerie Theatre delves into Ionesco's Bald Soprano. Hart House is rehearsing All's Well That Ends Well, and U.C. Playhouse imports a renowned mime company next Friday and Saturday. All for now, but there is an interesting display of theatrical engravings at the Central Library, 20 St. George Street.

If you can resist the temptation of all those Academy Award movies there is a fair selection of acts in the clubs about town. Your best bet is Jesse Winchester at the Riverboat Hill Sunday. A Foot in Coldwater will be at the Gasworks, maybe they'll turn down their amplifiers enough so you can drink there. Lick N' Stick is at the good of 'El Moccabo is you can pass the sirens in front of The Silver Dollar. Crack of Dawn are at the Colonial Tavern till Saturday. Moe Koffman plays K-Tel Bach at George's Spaghettia House. If you like Bach don't go. This week's bumper is Shooter at the Forge. Shooter were better as the Greaseball Boogie Band, the Forge was better as the Old Bavaria. Try the War Amps just around the corner.

As for concerts, January is a little empty but try this... on January 31 at Minkler Auditorium, Sencore College, is an all-singing, all-dancing Ballet, performed completely by gay male ballerina-persons. Wow! If you've recovered by Feb. 9 you might be able to catch Donna Warwick at Massey Hall. Labelle will be there on Feb. 16. David Bowie, sans the Rolling Gitter Review will be in the Gardens Feb. 26. TH

Hart House a Hassle— New Haven sought for Jocks

By DAVID CASS

Here she stands. Antiquated yet venerable. One gaped in wide-eyed delight at the stately magnificence known as Hart House. A gift from the Masseys so long ago, it remains hallowed and revered; a refreshing reminder that prefabricated buildings are only a modern phenomenon. But, more importantly than this notion, as it rests in the hazy mist of downtown Toronto oblivious to the beats and walls of passing frivolities, it remains secure in the knowledge that "The House" is symbolic of the University of Toronto; showcase of all collegiate institutions.

And it is nice to look at. But unfortunately the fact remains that Hart House is indubitably the worst athletic facility of any University in Canada. And it hurts.

When informed that RMC in Kingston, with an enrolment of 600 had just opened up a new sports complex which houses, amongst other paraphernalia, four regulation basketball courts with wall to wall tartan floor covering, I nearly tossed my tuna patty.

U of T, enrolment 34,000 plus is content with one gym in the Benson Freezer and one "almost life size" court in Hart House where "you couldn't fit 25 people in with sardine oil" according to coach John McManus, a man who possesses infinite patience and a virtuous soul. There is no bitterness when McManus speaks. The man isn't capable of such tawdry vindictiveness. He is a mensch.

Yet the facts are clear enough. No young high school basketball player is going to come to Toronto when he's seen the sybaritic lifestyle accorded athletes... at other universities. No facilities, no athletes. Simple.

Those athletes who do come are those who must come to Toronto to study their speciality which is unavailable elsewhere.

However, while the intercollegiate sports program at the university suffers, that is still not the most pressing concern.

The point is that without proper facilities the ordinary student who pays his tuition and is entitled to all the athletic privileges available is unable to participate because of the mammoth overflow of students waiting in line to toss a basketball. It becomes an exercise in utter futility. The student then loses out on a fundamental element of the university experience. Tough isn't it? Yeah, but what a nice building and on a clear day you can see the CN tower.

SIDELIGHTS... The Blues are on the road this weekend in Kingston for games against Queens and RMC

... Doug Fox, Toronto's playmaker and shooter ranks seventh in scoring in the Eastern Division of the OUA with a handsome 15.9 avg. All those table-top hockey aficionados heed this column. A table-top hockey championship, the brainchild of SAC's Glenn Sernyk is in the works for mid-February. It's an open tournament meaning people from outside U of T may enter. It is rumoured that all of the Russkys presently in Canada have ordered table-top sets to take back with them to Moscow. Some people already entered include "Fingers" Kowalski, Pig Iron, "Tabletop" Tasker and "Shaky" Humjob. More details available in a while.—ED

Olympics for good Health

By MIKE EDWARD

If the federal government makes good its commitment to more spending on physical fitness, the Montreal Olympics are worth the money said Doug Gilbert, a sports columnist for the Montreal Gazette.

He was speaking at a week long conference of Canadian university newspaper editors and staff in Montreal last December 30.

Gilbert, speaking at a sports writing seminar said the Olympics should be seen as a focus around which many Canadians might begin to take their own fitness seriously. And he defended the $1 billion-plus cost of the games by saying physical fitness shouldn't be subject to "cost-benefit" analysis.

As a matter of fact, he said, the Olympics are already having some effect on Canadian bodies. He pointed out that despite the fact that the commercial media concentrate more and more on spectator sports, more Canadians than ever are buying bicycles and ski and tennis equipment.

Gilbert attacked the federal physical fitness program as a pile of rhetoric. "There's no program behind the slogans," he said.

He asked how it was possible to promote "participation" when "in order to play a sport you have to be an athlete in the first place."

"There has been an increase in the number of lower back injuries because people who are not fit are encouraged to play tennis," he said.

By way of example, Gilbert outlined part of the physical fitness program in the German Democratic Republic (East Germany).

"This country of 17 million people won 66 medals in the 1972 Olympics. If they can take 10 swimming medals from the U.S. they will be in second place," he said.

Part of the German program, said Gilbert, was a "run-a-mile" lottery in which ticket holders would have to perform the equivalent of running a mile in various categories and age groups.

"They received 37 million entries," he said.

"There is no sport competition allowed in the schools," he offered as one of the basic differences between the German and North American systems.

Streaking swimmers Seek no.17 in '76

By DON WARNER

On Saturday the Intercollegiate swimming season gets underway when the Blues travel to London for a dual meet against a greatly improved team from Western.

This year the swim Blues will be seeking their 16th consecutive O.U.A.A. crown and 10th C.I.A.U. title since 1966.

In swimming, dual meets are intended mainly to provide the swimmer with an opportunity to compete against rival swimmers from other universities prior to the championships.

Since every Ontario university is allowed to send 18 swimmers to the O.U.A.A.'s in February, the dual meets do not directly contribute towards the overall championship. Of course the times recorded by swimmers at these meets do give a good indication of how well a team may expect to perform at the championships.

In past years, swimmers could only qualify for the subsequent Canadian championships (C.I.A.U.'s) by matching the C.I.A.U. time standards at their various regional championship meet, namely the O.U.A.A.'s for Toronto.

However, a new ruling this year makes it possible for any swimmer to qualify for the C.I.A.U.'s based on a time he records in a dual meet.

This is a welcome innovation since it will increase the incentive for swimmers to perform well at the dual meets, and remove much of the pressure which was felt by many swimmers at having only one chance to qualify for the C.I.A.U.'s.

In tomorrow's meet, the Blues will need to be in top form to defeat Western, who have been riding a wave of confidence since they almost upset our squad in the McMaster relay meet last November. Varsity has not lost to their arch-rivals in a dual meet in more than 20 years.

This year's team should be able to continue Toronto's dominance despite the loss of several key swimmers in the last couple of years. Although the team is slightly smaller than usual, it is a well-balanced and talented outfit.

Dave Wilkin, team captain and always a high finisher in the sprint events, leads a strong group of freestylers. Joining him in the sprint distances are rookies Greg Ballanger (from Riverdale C.I.), Phil Moore (NYAC) and Mike Craney (a transfer student from Buffalo State University). Third year man Rob Goldberg, a backstroke specialist, is also a strong sprint freestyler.

In the longer distances, veteran stalwarts Shawn Laari and Mike Hibberd, who placed second and third respectively in last year's C.I.A.U. 500 free, are also complemented by several promising freshmen.

Foremost is Rick Madge from London, Ontario, currently ranked fifth in Canada in the 400 m. free, and a definite Olympic prospect. In addition, he is versatile enough to swim almost any event for Varsity as reflected by the fact that he is fourth in national rankings in the 400 m. individual medley.

John Lyall (NYAC) and Don Shropshire (EMAC) have also shown early season signs of performing well at the longer distances.

In the backstroke events Goldberg is joined by another third year man Greg Vanular, who placed second and third respectively in the C.I.A.U. 100 and 200 yard events last season. He is also a top butterfly swimmer.

Bill Woodley, another outstanding rookie and former Ontario high school champion, will add great depth in not only the backstroke events, but the butterfly and individual medley as well.

Veterans Juri Daniel, Lance Aho and John Watt lead a strong contingent of breaststrokers. Daniel, also an Olympic prospect is certain to become the first Varsity swimmer in history to break the one minute barrier for the 100 yard distance.

Aho and Watt are also accomplished breaststrokers. Rookie Don Shropshire has had several years of experience at EMAC and should do well in the breaststroke and distance freestyle.

Joining Vanular in the butterfly are old reliables Mike Hughes and Bill Chisholm, who were both finalists in last year's C.I.A.U. 200 fly. Freshman Gary Jones has also improved greatly this fall.

Divers Brian Rutt and George Soughey are both new to the team this season.

Most dual meets will be away-from-home encounters for the Blues in 1976. However, fans may look forward to two meets at the Benson Building against American colleges during the next month.

Colgate University will be here on January 31, and the highly-ranked Michigan University the following Saturday. Both promise to be quite exciting and should provide audiences with an excellent display of swimming.

Women host invitational Basketball tournament

University of Toronto will be hosting their 2nd Annual Invitational Basketball Tournament this weekend January 9 & 10. Teams from Ontario and Quebec will be competing from 11:00 a.m. to 10:00 p.m. Friday and from 10:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. Saturday. The final game is scheduled for 4:30 p.m. Saturday.

The perennially strong Hamilton Mercury Bob Cats are favoured to repeat last year's success due to their strong record both in Ontario and Canadian competition. However the Ottawa Rookies, a strong young team which is on the way up, will at least give Hamilton a run for their money.

Other contenders include two teams from Quebec, Dawson College and John Abbott College. From Ontario, Queen's and McMaster should add quite a bit of fire power.

All in all it looks like an exciting weekend of Basketball at the Benson Building.

Dave Wilkin is the Blues team captain and co-winner of the 1975 Bickel Award for his contribution to U of T swimming.

Ski Bums part one: British Columbia

By JAY WAKS and
JOHN LUBBELSKI

For those poor souls who are wandering around Sid Smith wondering where everyone got their tans, the answer lies somewhere south of the 49th parallel. However, as the initiated few know, skiing is and always will be the thing. With this in mind we'd like to suggest a few spots outside of Ontario.

Hopefully the following series of articles will give you something to look forward to during Reading (Ski) Week.

Blues grapple Gaels tonight

By JOHN ROBB

Tonight the Blues hockey team plays host to the Queen's Golden Gaels in the first game of the new year. Coach Tom Watt is a trifle apprehensive about this as Queen's has already seen action in 1976, defeating the Ottawa Gee Gee's 3-1. The Varsity squad, on the other hand, has not played since December 15. Despite the fact that they have practiced regularly during the vacation period, Coach Watt is worried that the lack of real playing may result in a bit of sloppy play until the Blues regain their pre-Christmas form. The problem may be further compounded by the fact that the Gaels are in second place behind the Blues and will doubtless be up for the game, so the match should be an interesting one.

On the plus side Bob Adoranti and Wayne Morrissey (the of the misspelled name), have returned to the lineup which means that everyone is healthy. The Blues feature a solid, hard-working team that is doing very well this year, yet fan support is dropping. Now that the Blues have more home games on the weekends let's see more people out there cheering for them. Remember, game time is 8:30 p.m. at Varsity Arena.

When skiers speak of Western Canada the areas which instantly come to mind are those of Banff, Lake Louise, Sunshine Village etc. For those of you who never knew, or cared, there is another world for skiers to enjoy in the interior mountain ranges of British Columbia, home of some of Canada's greatest slopes, resorts, hot springs and an air of hospitality that helps to make that special vacation. Here one can forget the frustrating lineups, the unpredictable weather, and all at a price which is surprisingly easy on the pockets of U of T's students, (1 week is $120, plus airfare).

Tod Mountain, located in the heart of B.C., is one of the most accessible mountains in Canada. Only 45 minutes from Kamloops, Tod offers 3,100 vertical feet of unexcelled skiing, with runs up to seven miles in length.

With a mountain of this size, there is something for everyone with expert runs that have been rated as some of the steepest in North America, to beginners' slopes that wind down 5 miles of the easiest terrain, to accommodate the most novice skier. All this is serviced by the chairlifts that lift the skiers up to the Alpine bowls at the top.

An expert can ski 50,000 vertical feet in a day, or the beginner can do 12,000 feet at his or her lessons. For first-timers there is a T-bar and poma at the bottom to get one started, until they are ready to tackle the big time.

Base Lodge, Ski School, Ski Shop (Repairs, Rentals).

Kimberley: Canada's highest city and the closest thing you'll find to skiing in the tradition of the Bavarian Alps. In 1972 the town of 8,000 was renovated to completely resemble an alpine village in Europe.

The superb powder of Kimberley's North Star mountain and a vertical rise of 22,000 feet offers miles of fantastic ski runs. Facilities include a new 3,600 foot triple chairlift, a 7,900 foot chairlift, a mile-long T-bar, two novice lifts and night-skiing facilities which offer runs of up to 1 1/2 miles. (Collingwood after dark.)

For those who crave apres-ski, Reading Week happens to coincide with the Kimberley Winterfest, the Oktoberfest of the ski crowd. Kimberley also offers many choices in night clubs, restaurants and entertainment, which cover all apres-ski requirements.

Base Lodge, Ski School, Ski Shop (Repairs and Rentals).

Panorama Mountain, a short distance from the Radium Hot Springs offers 3,100 vertical feet of skiing on one of B.C.'s best ranges. A two mile long chairlift which runs in tandem with a 1 1/2 mile T-bar will give skiers runs of more than five miles. Beginners are not forgotten; the 1,600 foot platter lift on a gentle straight hill is probably the best beginner-novice learning area in Western Canada.

Due to the altitudes at which the runs are situated snow is almost assured to the end of May. Powder snow freaks will find more to please them with lots of that loose, fluffy stuff at 6,900 feet.

For those willing to bust their budgets, Panorama's helicopter program offers glacier skiing at the 12,000 foot level. For $250 one can have 3 days of 30,000 vertical feet of skiing in some of the world's deepest powder, under the constant eye of Bugaboo guides.

Base Lodge, Ski School, Ski Shop (Rentals and Repairs).

Cross-country skiing is Canada's fastest-growing sport and the 108 Ranch is the place to do it. In its 26,000 acres the "108" has the perfect combination of rolling hills, flat meadowlands, frozen lakes and evergreen forests to challenge every level of cross-country skier from novice to expert.

There are 65 kilometers of trails with 3, 5 and 10 kilometer tracks through open and wooded countryside to suit all levels of ability and stamina. Canada's national team has trained here and now have made it their headquarters.

With a sunny and crisp winter climate, the 108 offers constant powder snow conditions so important to the cross-country skier. Right on the ranch is a Ski Shop (sales, service and rentals) as well as a ski school.

Short-schooling no threat to education

By CHRIS DU VERNET

Although the university admissions process has not been detrimentally affected by the Toronto high school teachers strike, next year's freshmen will be at a "competitive disadvantage" in programs of limited enrolment and courses requiring cumulative knowledge, U of T president Evans indicated last night.

After losing almost forty school days, university officials fear Toronto students will not have covered enough material in mathematics, physics, French, German, and Latin to deal with university-level programmes.

However they do expect high schools to proceed with instruction on a compressed basis, and will accept marks from schools affected by the strike without discrimination. Evans revealed yesterday he expected schools "to give extra attention to these disciplines" as students "would find themselves at a considerable disadvantage if they did not."

The Council of Ontario Universities has also indicated its concern for students "competing for admission to limited enrolment programmes and scholarships" chiefly because of "delays in the academic process." Disruption of the "mechanics of the established university selection procedures" was cited as the reason for this.

Government officials have admitted that some students may have already been affected. Education Minister Thomas Wells said Friday "it would be naive to say that there weren't some casualties" but would not commit himself to legislation as a solution to the strike. With negotiations at a standstill, despite the Cabinet's encouragement of last-ditch talks at the Sutton Place Hotel this weekend, few observers doubt legislation will be implemented.

Trinity College Registrar W. Neelds told The Varsity middle- and lower-achieving students would probably be affected to the point of no return regardless of how soon teachers returned to work. "They may not have the background," he said. Citing a lack of depth in their knowledge of the sciences, he indicated student prerequisites would be jeopardized most severely in these areas.

R. Wormleighton, associate professor of mathematics, disagreed that math students would be affected at all. "There is sufficient variability from one school to another that to a certain extent we have to do some review anyway," he said. "We have to duplicate material we want students to know" to ensure that all students have an equal background, he explained.

Toronto students "may have to work a little harder" but he foresaw "the strike will have no effect" despite this initial imposition. Although government and education have exuded optimism on the ability of teachers to make up lost time, Wormleighton doubted their ability to do so. "They won't have the time," he said. Wells, on the other hand, remained confident measures such as a lengthened school day, or an extended school year would be accepted by all and implemented successfully.

Input puts up output or putts off

By PAUL McGRATH

The Canadian Radio and Television Commission commences a week of hearings today to decide on 9 applications for use of three frequencies open on the Toronto-area FM dial.

One of the applications is from Input Radio, a U of T-based group that hopes, with heavy financial backing from the Student's Administrative Council, to operate a community-access radio station from the third floor of the SAC Media Building.

Plans for an FM station at U of T go back a decade, but the current attempt is the closest the idea has come to completion. After nine months of work the case now rests with the CRTC, which has intimated that it thought highly of the idea of community access radio.

THE Varsity

Mon., Jan. 12, 1976 TORONTO

If the CRTC gives Input the affirmative, plans will go ahead for the first year of operation starting in September. Operating expenditures for the first year have been estimated at $175,000, $50,000 of which will be in the form of a grant from SAC. The council has also promised $70,000 towards the capital costs incurred from the purchase of equipment.

The concept of access programming relies heavily on allowing air time for community and special interest groups to broadcast live or taped shows. The emphasis will be on news, current events and advocacy advertising. The station's salaries will go to provide a nucleus of trained staff to maintain programming standards, but the station will rely heavily on volunteer labor from the university and the many community groups that have already indicated a willingness to participate in Input's programming.

Input is up against eight other applicants, but is the only group headed towards community access on the basis of a restricted commercial license. That sort of license would keep the amount of per-hour commercial time well below the standards of mainstream stations and would disallow normal product-oriented commercials in favor of advocacy and public service advertising.

There are two other applicants interested in community access radio, but on the basis of an unrestricted commercial license. Input, in an intervention brief to the CRTC, has said that the two concepts are incompatible.

Ontario raises prices for liquor licences

By LINDA GUTRI

One might say the days of wine and roses are over with no special thanks to the LCOB who have raised the price of their Special Occasions Permit from $15 to $50.

A $35 jump as of January 2, 1976 seems a bit steep, but according to the Executive Director of the Liquor Licensing Board, Russel Cooper, the new price was originally proposed to be as high as $85.

Since the passing of the act responsible for the increase in July and the act becoming effective this year, Cooper said the Provincial Anti-Inflation Board reviewed the proposed increase and whittled it down to its present $50 in December.

Researcher for the Ontario Federation of Students Paul Johnston says a lot of places aren't affected by the raise in the Special Occasions Permit because they operate under a Canteen Licence, which allows events to be licensed under a blanket permit. This is cheaper, Johnston said, and is paid on an annual basis.

Johnston said "We're still waiting for a statement from the Ministry," to find out the details of the new act regarding Special Occasions. "We're still trying to find out how many people are going to be affected."

Most U of T pubs aren't affected by the new act, operating under U of T's Canteen Licence. Victoria College's pub however, still uses Special Occasions Permits.

According to Vic Pub Manager Bob Keys, "It was a very unreasonable raise." Where he used to pay $15 for a pub-night permit, Keys says he now has to pay on the basis of the number of beer cases bought. Thus, $5 permits 5 cases of beer, $25 permits 5-10 cases, $30 permits 10-15 cases, $40 permits 15-25 cases and anything greater than 25 cases of beer, Keys said, would make the permit $50 for the one night.

The permit also allows the sale of a certain number of ounces of liquor or wine. "But," says Keys, "if you don't use liquor or wine, you can't substitute beer for it." "They're being very unreasonable about the whole thing," he added.

Scarborough College Pub Manager Glen Toombes, who runs a daily pub at Scarborough, which operates under the university's Canteen Licence, said they are not affected but adds, "All I know is if it happened to me, then $50 a day would hurt the pub."

However doom is not in line for the Vic Pub. Keys foresees no problems "Unless we don't get the Canteen Licence soon, because U of T pays for it."

Before the Canteen Licence can come into effect for Vic, said Keys, Simcoe Hall has to inspect and okay the proposed pub premises. If the pub area does not meet the standards for licensing, it will have to be renovated.

Referring to licensing standards, Keys said "They give you stories you wouldn't believe. The doors have to be open the right way, there have to be enough urinals, they have to be a certain size based on the number of people allowed in the room. There can only be a certain number (of people) per square foot or yard."

Since last summer, the Service Commissioner and the Beverages Controller from Simcoe Hall were expected, Keys said, to inspect the pub premises. Keys said they had apparently made an inspection and added he thought the pub needed "a few more exit signs, otherwise we're O.K. Oh, and there's one set of doors that don't open with the flow of the people." These may have to be changed, said Keys, but Vic still waits for the official word from Simcoe Hall.

Glen Toombes at Scarborough said his pub area also had to undergo some changes before they could be okayed under the Canteen Licence. "The doors had to be altered, the cash register wasn't big enough and little things like that," he said. The renovations weren't too bad, Toombes said, because the pub is located in the new wing of a building.

Next year's rookies catching up on maths and physics prerequisites.

Plutocrats to plan punishing pirates

By JOE FEBRUARY

Essay writing services may soon be soliciting more "research" from law students in the near future, and not for re-sale either.

The Working Group Investigating Plagiarism, a body set up by the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards, has recommended to the subcommittee that the university investigate what legal action, if any, can be taken against essay bank services.

The recommendation has been passed by the subcommittee and has been forwarded to the Academic Affairs committee for consideration Thursday.

The report by the Working Group names four commercial firms who it describes as "purchasing, writing and selling term papers."

They are: Quality Research (information not available); Term Papers Service, 3199 Bathurst Street, Suite 206; Essay Services, 57 Spadina Avenue, Suite 208; and Custom Essays (information not available).

The report says Term Papers Services charges $3.00 per page for essays on file and that Essay Services charges $2.75 per page for essays on file and $4.00 per page for custom written essays.

Working Group chairman Brad Nixon, a student member of the Academic Affairs committee said the committee would probably pass the recommendation with little discussion.

Nixon said he had visited essay banks in the group's investigation and had bought a catalogue of available essays from Essay Services.

Nixon said one member of the subcommittee had suggested that the catalogue be xeroxed and sent to every faculty member.

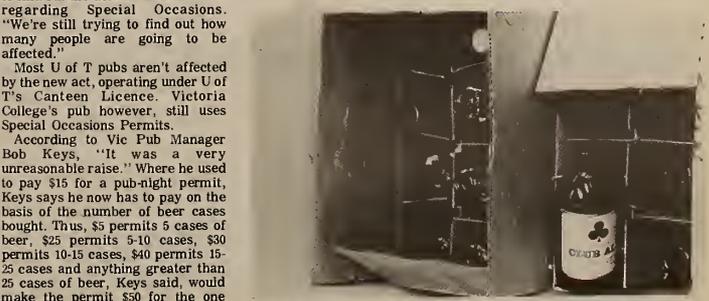

Nixon said successful legal action taken by universities in the United States had usually involved charges of fraud or fraudulent use of the mails, and that "the onus had often been placed on the student in presenting a fraudulent essay."

The report finds that at least nine states had enacted or proposed legislation to prohibit "preparation", "sale" and "advertising for sale" of term papers, including New York, California and Massachusetts.

The report cites a New York State Supreme Court ruling against a term paper company which found "the business (the) defendants are conducting is morally wrong" because it "subverts the learning process and encourages intellectual dishonesty and cheating."

The report points out since the implementation of the Academic Code of Behavior, the university has an "effective definition of plagiarism associated with essay writing firms" and can impose sanctions, including expulsion, on students using their services.

In agreeing to recommend investigation of possible legal action against term paper firms, the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards found that "The plagiarism activities of term paper companies which provide commercialized assistance in cheating, and thereby subvert the educational process, are intellectually objectionable and morally reprehensible."

Pub prices may zoom when selling permits rise by 233 per cent.

Meeting to plan anti-gov't rally tomorrow 7pm

There will be an open meeting Tuesday evening at 7 p.m. to discuss plans for the Jan. 21 rally against current student aid policy and on the general situation of university cutbacks. All students, faculty and workers are invited to the Croft Chapter House, University College. That's the round building close to the bookstore.

SAC has requested that classes be cancelled for the rally.

Food for thought...

DALLAS (ZNS-CUP)—A group of Texas chickens are being fed cement-laced feed so that their eggs won't break easily.
The Texas Agricultural Extension Service reports that a flock of white leghorns are given a commercial feed each day which contains cement as the major source of calcium.
The Agricultural researchers say the hens lay eggs which are bigger, and have stronger and thicker shells than eggs laid by chickens on a non-cement diet.

WASHINGTON (ENS-CUP)—The Center for Science in the Public Interest has launched a nationwide campaign to improve the quality of food sold in school vending machines.

According to the consumer group, about 80 per cent of the $5.5 billion pumped into vending machines in 1974 was spent on junk foods, which are low on nutrition and high in sugar and fat.

Spokesperson for the group, Robert White, said vending machines "are frequently located in grade and high school cafeterias, where they compete with the lunch program for the students' appetites."

Elbow-benders imbibe booze at new building

photos by Bob White

After ten years of false starts, the new Innis building is now open for public scrutiny. The building, a morass of cul-de-sacs, stairs that lead nowhere, open plumbing and the finest pub this side of Bourbon street was officially opened by its current principal Peter Russell. He was accompanied by Pauline McGibbon, the Lieutenant Governor and three or four hundred hangers on.

When the architect, Jack Diamond, handed the key to the student president Mike Friend he said "The doors should never be locked."

Opening ceremonies were preceded by a parade from the old building at 63 St. George, which will be reclaimed by Knox college for its grad students. Parade participants carried much of the old furniture, fire extinguishers, phone books and the Lady Godiva Memorial Band.

After some boring speeches, the Innis pub officially opened for business. SAC president Gord Barnes was one of the first customers but was unavailable for comment afterwards. Pub features food service including espresso and cappuccino coffee and ralph's hot meat patties.

'Dealings with women were remarkable' but . . .

Jesus not a feminist

By KEN WYMAN

This is the advent of women priests, and there is "no theological reason why women shouldn't be ordained," according to Joanne Dewart, A U of T professor of theology, who spoke on Christianity and Feminism in Canada at the Newman Center Thursday evening. Dewart reluctantly agreed with one member of the audience who suggested that "the ordination of women may come simply because the church can't get enough men" to be priests.

Others think that the easiest way to "get a woman priest is by ordaining a man who would then have a sex change operation," Dewart replied, noting that ordination is for life.

Or, she said, a Bishop, probably in the Third World, where priests are hard to find, will simply ordain a woman "and the fat will be in the fire."

But Dewart hopes that is not how it happens. Women are increasingly accepted in the church, she said. When she was a student at St. Michael's College, Dewart pointed out, she was not supposed to be allowed to take philosophy "because it was a male preserve." Nor were women allowed into the American Catholic Theology Society when she started teaching.

Next year St. Mike's first year class may be half women, she said. A member of the audience recalled that in the forties women weren't even allowed to take books out of the library at St. Mike's.

The priesthood won't necessarily change when women are admitted, though. "I'm impatient with people who suggest women are better, that we won't repeat the mistakes men made—I bet we will," said Dewart. Mottos like "A woman's place is in the home" started "for obvious reasons . . . children and motherhood," Dewart said. "But it gained an almost religious value in time."

"Staying home did not put a woman outside of social reality until recently. The home was a focus." Working class women always went out to work, she added, and now it has become a middle class status symbol to keep a woman idle.

Christianity should encourage today's woman to spend at least half her day in service, Dewart believes. "It is a serious moral fault to stay home to grow African violets, bake fancier and fancier cakes, or play golf, "instead of serving humanity. She did not elaborate on the kinds of service that are of value.

In fact, Dewart said, "It is the obligation of every Christian to be a feminist," just as they must be non-racist, and opposed to exploitation.

Was Jesus a feminist? Dewart doesn't think so. "Not anymore than He was an active abolitionist or a socialist. He was not an active social crusader. None the less His dealings with women were remarkable," she said.

Religious Jews did not speak to women on the street, or communicate with women outside of their own family, at that time in history, she said. But Jesus had women disciples, they remained with him at the cross, and they received the message of the resurrection first.

Women were Deaconesses up to the third century of the church, she said, referring to the volume of work that has been done in the early history of the church.

On deciding

Having trouble making decisions? Yes? No? Can't decide? Boy, are you in trouble. But there's hope.

New College is offering a ten-part lecture series for fence-sitters entitled "The Fine Art of Choosing: Theory and Practice."

The series is a preview for a course that New College will offer next year on this topic. Scuttlebutt has it that it will be required credit for all Governing Council members and administration.

The lecture series runs from Jan. 21 to April 7 on Wednesday evenings 7:30 to 9 p.m. in New College Rm. 1016. It features talks by members of the Faculty of University of Toronto and other Ontario and American universities.

The topics covered include "Policy Making in Conflict and Crisis" which will discuss the War Measures Act, "Human Perception as Decision Making" and "The So-Called Field of Honour" which will feature a live on-stage duel.

Each lecture will be preceded by discussions on Tuesday 5-6 p.m. and followed by discussion Thursday 5-6 p.m. in the Wilson Hall Common Room.

Hands in your pocket planned

By LEA RYAN

This is the first part in a series of articles which will analyze the proposals put forth in the report of the Special Program Review — the Henderson Report.

The Henderson report is planning on putting its hands in your pockets, but so far it's only talking about "cutting back". One of the major areas turns out to be cutbacks in post-secondary education.

In November 1975, the Ontario government tabled the report of the Special Program Review, or the Henderson report, to "enquire into ways and means of restraining the costs of Government through examining issues such as the continued usefulness of programs, alternative lower cost means of accomplishing objectives, and the problem of increased public demand for services in an inflationary period . . ."

The section on post-secondary education is based on the view that post-secondary education is no longer as socially useful as in the 1960's, and therefore individuals should bear responsibility for the cost of their education.

It obscures the fact the government spending on post-secondary education was a direct result of the expansion of US imperialism during the 1960's. The cutbacks are an attempt to shift the burden of the economic crisis onto the backs of the students.

During the 1960's, US imperialism expanded into Canada, exporting massive quantities here. Through their control of the Canadian state and the provincial state apparatuses, the US financed the establishment of an infrastructure for its expansion: the building of transport and communications network, electric power and water utilities, schools to train managers and technicians, etc.

This resulted in a huge increase in government spending, which was nearly tripled by all levels of government in Canada between 1960 and 1970.

This spending was financed by Canada's taking loans with the same US finance capitalists, printing money and taxing the people in order to pay the interest. As this expansion continued, large numbers of educated youth were needed to fill the jobs.

The Canadian people paid the bills for building large numbers of universities, colleges and technical schools. The US imperialists made superprofits by financing this expenditure and supplying that market with expensive equipment, construction material and a wide range of labour-intensive items imported from the US.

Now, with a sharpening economic crisis, the government of Ontario finds it more profitable to spend money in places other than education. The Henderson report is an elaborate justification of these cutbacks.

In 1972-73, the first steps were taken "in an effort to control rising costs":

- A moratorium on all new capital funding.

- Embargo on funding of all new graduate programs.

- Restraints on the enrolment level to be funded for part-time general interest courses in the community colleges.

- Across-the-board increase in student fees of $100 a year.

The government also established the Ontario Council on University Affairs.

In 1974, the university moved from an enrolment-based financing formula to a global budgeting approach. This meant the government determined the total amount of funds to be allocated to universities and colleges, with the stipulation student fees were not to be increased.

The Henderson report still notes several areas of "concern": Post-secondary education costs $1 billion, or 8.5 per cent of total provincial expenditure; The open door policy may lead to higher taxes for "citizens and businesses"; Cost ceilings imposed by the federal government raise the question of Ontario's share; "The direct advantages of post-secondary education accrue primarily to about one-third of Ontario's young people . . ." "Because of market forces and an over-supply of graduates in some disciplines, the economic benefits of post-secondary education to certain individuals are no longer assured."

In order to cope with these "concerns", the Henderson report calls for no increased student participation, increased tuition fees to increase the students' share of total operating costs, and a move away from "reliance on paper credentials" for the job market. The salient proposals are: (1) lifting government controls on tuition fees to allow the universities and colleges to set their own (2) increase in tuition fees to increase student proportion of costs borne. (3) shortening college courses, and putting part-time general interest courses on a "full-cost recovery basis." (4) no funds for new graduate programs.

Further, specific proposals include: increasing tuition fees by about 65 per cent. This means university fees go from $588 to $970, while Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology (CAAT) fees go from $250 to $400. All this in order to reduce the budget by $80 million.

In case some are reluctant to take this move, they can always cut staff, a neat way to try to set up an antagonism between students and faculty. This would mean cutting 2,700 out of 11,000 full time university professors, and 1,250 CAAT teachers to reach a level of 5,000.

And just in case you can afford the tuition, the Ontario government plans to make OSAP harder to get. "As a first step, the maximum provincial grant be decreased from $3,200 to $2,200 and the loan portion be increased from $800 to $1,800," says the report. As a matter of fact, it may be that the OSAP regulations are first to change, so the government can ensure it receives the increased tuition fees it is proposing.

So these are the main features of the recommendations on post-secondary education; push the burden of the economic crisis onto the students by making post-secondary education an almost inevitable debt through increasing the loan portion of OSAP and tuition fees.

These features are comparable to the report's recommendations in other areas of the economy. But this section on post-secondary education is the first for us as students to grasp, and to reject.

Enjoying the sunshine and Bahama like temperatures... wait a minute, is this another planet? Trudging through the snow to deliver the news were: Chris Du Verne, Linda Gutri, Brad Nixon, Sebastian Tischerger, John Robb, Sharon Stevenson, and all the desks. As soon as the SAC executive reaches puberty, things will start to happen, we hope.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweek Enterprises. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

The battle of the university, in which government forces scored a major victory due to disorganization and infighting among the heseided. Don't let it happen.

Yes, it's war. But who'd know it?

There's something about the university at this time of year; everyone seems mentally snowed in. The sleepers outnumber the alert in the libraries. And news is close to impossible to find.

The annual doldrums? It's hard to say. From reading past years of The Varsity, this year is in tune with the eternal ebb and flow of the last 50 years; this time of year is the same at any given time.

But this year's blahs have been compounded by a very uneasy feeling on campus which we attempted to chronicle throughout the first term. Instead of the academic contentment marred only by occasional scraps between faculty and students, we're faced with a much more complex problem. The overwhelming feeling is one of discontent and mistrust.

At no other time in this university's history have there been so many indications of this feeling. There are disagreements between students and workers, between faculty and administration, between faculty and Governing Council and, one must assume, between levels of administration. The last is the hardest to document, but rest assured that six million dollars doesn't disappear from a budget without a lot of intramural haggling.

For that is the crux of the entire problem: money. According to the government there isn't enough so the time has come, they say, to cut the strings of dependency by a few trifling millions.

The unfortunate result of this has been quite evident throughout the year. Any group desiring an upgrading in (or simply maintenance of) its standard of living or its standard of academics is pitted against the next group that desires nothing more than the same.

Two cases in point: The library workers and the graduate assistants. These two are the most consistently underpaid and ignored groups inside the university. The assistants are asked to take on in some cases full-time teaching loads for an insignificant sum of money and a pat on the back about how it's valuable teaching experience. The library workers were also being asked to bear sub-standard wages.

But, with the help of the university administration, instead of recognition of these injustices by the university community, the groups are suspected of avarice, greed and seeking to destroy the university community by lusting after too much of this small pie we hear so much about.

That sort of internecine quarrelling is pointless. The spatting makes it easier for the government to step up its attack on the education system, and make no mistake about it, they're going after the universities with every weapon at their disposal, including the divide and conquer routine.

It goes something like this: If you want to deprive a group of people of something you have a duty to provide them with, convince them it's their fault. So we are being convinced that the problems of the university are the result of excessive academic dalliance, permissive admission policies and excessive wage demands.

It looks as if we've been won over. Students refuse to understand the problems of the people that keep this place running and the administration, fully immersed in liberal guilt, seem unwilling to counter the propaganda coming from Queen's Park.

So we're stuck. All the important discussion on curriculum structure and democracy within the university has gone by the boards, replaced by the financial wrangling.

How is this going to change unless we put up a fight? We have a choice between accepting this strangulation or yelling as loud as we possibly can.

that they are inventing the problem of racism on campus.

Did Communists create the problem of racism?

Lawyer J. O'Brien, who was hired by the University to defend the Faculty of Medicine, argued throughout Fong's appeal that the charge of racism was a red herring. Others charged that Fong's counsel, Lawyer Michael Smith and Professor Peter Rosenthal, both members of the Canadian Party of Labour and the Committee Against Racism, (CAR), were stirring up racism to promote revolution. Unfortunately, all of the evidence and the long history of racism at the University of Toronto show that this charge is a lie aimed at stopping the fight against racism.

No doubt C.P.L., a communist party, is aiming for a working class revolution that will put the racists behind bars; but C.A.R., itself, was initiated by C.P.L. in 1974 because of the desperate need for a mass, activist organization to resist the daily oppression and super-exploitation that is the core of racism.

Communists and non-communists have united in the Committee Against Racism to end the racist divisions which stand in the way of all progressive reforms and to fight racism in a mass way. Communists didn't create the problem of racism, but racism is creating many communists.

What is to be done? We must reverse the decision in the Henry Fong case and win his re-admission to medical school for many reasons:

- a) Henry Fong and his family deserve just and non-discriminatory treatment.
- b) Administrators must be shown that such unfair treatment of a student won't be tolerated.
- c) Those faculty and administrators who are attempting to use Chinese and other immigrant students as scapegoats must be taught that the rest of us won't stand for it.

The recently concluded appeal to the Subcommittee on Academic Appeals is the final one according to University regulations. But the decision is too outrageous; we must overturn it. This can only be done by building a powerful mass movement of students, faculty, and campus and off-campus workers to demand:

We will not stop until we win, and we will win with city-wide support!

Our next action is a demonstration at the Academic Affairs Committee meeting which will receive the Subcommittee's decision. Join us at 3:30 p.m. on Thursday, January 15, outside Simcoe Hall, to demand that Academic Affairs reject their Subcommittee's decision in the Fong case.

The departure of the last Portuguese troops from Angola last November 11 marked the end of five centuries of Portuguese colonial rule in Africa. Whether this will result in an independent Angolan state, however, is in question. At the departure of the Portuguese army, the left-nationalist Moscow-backed Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) proclaimed a new government. Soon afterwards, the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA) and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), effected a paper unity at the hands of the US and South Africa to form a puppet "Democratic People's Republic" in competition with the MPLA's "Peoples' Republic of Angola."

Background to the Strife
The struggle between the three groups can be traced back to over a year before the final departure of the Portuguese troops. A "transitional government" set up with the signing of the Alvor agreement in January 1975 broke down two months later following bloody fighting in the capital. A second attempt to set up a four-part coalition (along with the Portuguese military), the Nakuru accords in June, did not last even three weeks before serious clashes again occurred. The battles quickly developed into full-scale civil war, with the leftist MPLA tenaciously holding onto the capital and the north central region, the FNLA firmly entrenched in north Angola, and UNITA consolidating its grip on the south central plateau region around Nova Lisboa.

During this time each of the three groups had its foreign suppliers: the MPLA receiving Soviet bloc and Yugoslav weapons; the FNLA backed up by Zaire, China, and the

Angolan resolution means break with Moscow and Peking

US; and UNITA receiving aid from Zambia and now South Africa.

Although the influx of foreign armaments had a strong effect on the shifting of battle lines, the struggle at the time remained essentially a three-cornered power struggle between rival petty bourgeois nationalist formations. Within this framework there was no way that Marxists could take sides politically among the contenders; in Angola there was no qualitative difference between the petty-bourgeois nationalists of the FNLA and MPLA, and any union and party-based formation struggling independently would meet with the same savage repression at the hands of these nationalist groups.

Internationalization of the War
The removal of the Portuguese army left a power vacuum which the imperialist forces were not about calmly to let slip into the orbit of Soviet influence. Making a mockery of detente, the imperialist powers were quick to intervene in an attempt to "counter Soviet influence", turning Angola into a battlefield between the US and USSR. The decisive evidence of the subordination of UNITA and FNLA to imperialist and neo-colonial forces was the appearance of an armored column headed by 500 white mercenaries, organized by the rightist "Portuguese Liberation Army" (ELP) and launched from South-African held territories. This column appeared at the head of the joint FNLA-UNITA force that pushed north along the west coast, driving the MPLA from key ports, which was eventually to form the puppet "Democratic Peoples' Republic" as the competitor to the MPLA's previously proclaimed government.

Now that Angola has become an international battlefield for the USSR and the imperialists, the call of true Marxists is for military victory to the MPLA against the imperialist coalition, without placing the slightest political confidence in the radical petty-bourgeois nationalists. Nationalism is a fundamentally anti-proletarian ideology which deserves no support. National oppression in the epoch of imperialist decay cannot be eliminated without overturning capitalism, which maintains scarcity and exploitative relations of production that lie at the heart of national wars.

The Soviet Bureaucracy
and the MPLA

In contrast to revolutionary Marxists, the Moscow Stalinists support the MPLA only because they seek a bourgeois Angola in the Russian orbit, or at least a pawn to be bargained away in the interests of detente. Unlike Vietnam, where despite the Stalinists' popular frontism the worker and peasant masses were lined up against the forces of imperialism and a real but brittle domestic bourgeoisie, in Angola the defeat of the imperialist-led troops by the MPLA will not lead to the end of capitalist rule. Despite its leftism, the MPLA stands outside the workers movement and while it has a close relationship to the labor federation (UNITA), the relation is that of master to servant. The MPLA was quick to denounce the longshore strike early last year and called on the "transitional government" to smash it.

The alliance between the MPLA and the Soviet Union is a fragile affair. MPLA head Agostinho Neto has repeatedly asserted that he is not committed to the Soviet bloc, the proof of which is the MPLA's close collaboration with the Portuguese government last year.

The Chinese Stalinists
Concerned only with blocking the influence of the so-called "Soviet-social imperialists" in Angola, the counter-revolutionary Chinese bureaucracy for months has been aiding the virulently anti-communist Zaire-based FNLA in its struggle against the Moscow-backed MPLA. But now that the civil war in Angola has become internationalized as a "war by proxy" between the Russian-backed, Cuban-staffed MPLA and the CIA-South African-led FNLA and UNITA, the Peking bureaucracy is no longer confined to aiding the FNLA from Zaire, but rather lines up with US imperialism and the South African apartheid government to defeat "Soviet social-imperialism" in Angola.

In this "war by proxy" the Chinese slogan "Superpowers Out of Angola!" translates directly into the policy of Henry Kissinger (who has become fluent in "superpower" rhetoric). Both Mao and Kissinger demand that the Soviet Union cease its aid to the MPLA and withdraw all its troops. Yet neither Mao nor Kissinger demands that the South Africans withdraw. In Angola the line that the USSR, a bureaucratically deformed workers state, represents an "imperialism" more dangerous than US imperialism leads directly to a bloc with the real imperialists!

Today's situation in Angola poses serious problems for Maoists. Hard-line loyal Maoists are forced to echo the Chinese bureaucracy's call for "Superpowers out of Angola", placing themselves on the side of the imperialist-apartheid forces.

The fake-Trotskyists of the United majority faction of the "National Secretariat" (USC), which claimed to be the Fourth International, represented in Canada by the Revolutionary Marxist Group, raises the call "Defend the Democratic Republic proclaimed by the MPLA!" thereby giving it political support. Always in a rush to place confidence in an "adequate but blunted instrument" for revolution in place of the Trotskyist vanguard party, these imposters are sowing the worst illusion in the revolutionary pretension of the MPLA. The USC minority (represented in Canada by the League for Socialist Action), in a classical capitulation to liberal bourgeois public opinion, has limited its response to "Hands Off Angola" with a call only for the imperialists to leave the country.

Serious revolutionaries must not be misled by these various ostensible Marxists, but rather must break politically with both the Moscow and Peking brands of Stalinist class collaboration, and with their respective petty-bourgeois nationalist allies. Military support to the Soviet-backed MPLA against the imperialist-led coalition is a necessary tactic in the context of our fundamental strategic aim: to build an independent working-class Trotskyist party. Such a party, basing itself on the powerful South African and copper-belt proletariat and the fledgling working class in Luanda, and supported by the peasant masses, must be built in order to wipe out capitalist exploitation and the oppression of the black masses and construct a socialist federation of Southern Africa.

Mapuche means "people of the land." But there is mounting international concern that all is not well with the people of the land called Chile — in fact, there are rumours of thousands of Mapuche deaths since a military government was installed in power in 1973. Mapuche leaders have been imprisoned. Mapuche people are suffering unspeakable poverty.

It was not always that way — once the Mapuche were free, and they had a taste of that freedom again for three years under the Allende government of 1970-73.

There are about 550,000 Mapuches in Chile, out of a total population of ten million. Most of them, about 400,000, live in the countryside. In the cities, the rest work at the lowest-paying jobs — the women are maids, the men work at menial jobs in bakeries.

The Mapuches who live in the countryside live in southern Chile, on some 3,000 reservations. The reservations are scattered throughout the countryside, located on hilly, badly-eroded land. The more productive land in the valleys is owned by white Chileans. The total area of the reservations is a little over 2,000 square miles, about the size of the state of Delaware.

The Mapuche are crowded on their land. The average reservation has about 130 persons, which means about two acres per Mapuche. When the reservations were first introduced in the late 1800's, there was more land — about ten acres per person. The Mapuche population has remained about the same from the late 1800's until now — what has happened is that white Chileans have systematically stolen land from the reservations.

BATTLE THE INCAS

The Mapuches have a long history of struggle to keep the land. First the Incas invaded from the north in the 1400's. They built stone roads down the long coast of Chile. They brought well-organized armies to colonize Chile and to collect tribute from its inhabitants, but the Mapuches fought them off. Hidden deep in the densely forested hills of southern Chile, in an area which has an extremely high rainfall in the winter, the Mapuches used their knowledge of the terrain to hold off the invaders.

After the Incas came the Spaniards. They invaded Chile in the mid-1500's, coming down the same roads the Incas had left. The Spanish were looking for gold. They brought horses, swords and guns, weapons which were unknown in Chile, and which were superior to native arms.

The Spaniards were successful in defeating the native population of northern and central Chile, inhabited by nations related to the Mapuches, but who spoke a different dialect. When the Spaniards reached southern Chile, however, the area known then, as now, as The Frontier was blocked to their advances. The Mapuches developed a system of guerrilla warfare.

Alonso de Sotomayor, a Spaniard in Chile, wrote to his King Felipe II in 1585 to complain about the Mapuches: "One can wander for a year and find nothing but an old woman, if they don't want to fight, because the terrain is so difficult and they are so free-moving, and we are so overburdened with supplies, cattle, and attendants that our movements have no effect. And everyday they steal our horses."

Within 25 years of the Spaniards' arrival, the Mapuches began to develop their own cavalry, and within a few more years, they began to use firearms. Their new weapons only added to their main advantage of the Spaniards — their knowledge of the terrain. The Mapuches had no state, no formal structure of government. They lived in small bands linked by family ties, uniting for defense, but otherwise remaining separated. They usually lived many miles apart from one another, hunting, fishing, growing crops, and eventually moving on to a new settlement area every few years.

In 1970, they began taking back the land. They were seized before Allende took power. After the election Allende's bureaucracy could not handle the expropriations. The landlords fought back. The Mapuches had battled with the Incas and the Spaniards, and were prepared to die.

THE WORLD'S A Four Hundred For the Chile

COST MORE THAN THE CONQUEST OF AMERICA

The Spaniards were unable to make headway, even when they knew that there was much gold in the land of the Mapuches. In another famous quote, a Spanish governor of Chile wrote to the king: "The war with the Mapuches has cost more than the conquest of all the rest of America."

Indeed it had. In the first hundred years of the war, 29,000 Spaniards and 60,000 mestizo (mixed-race) auxiliaries were killed. These were heavy figures for military losses in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Eventually the Spanish gave up. A series of forts was set up along the edge of the Mapuche territory, and an uneasy truce was arranged which lasted until 1884. That year, the white Chileans, now independent of Spain, were finally able to militarily occupy the land of the Mapuches. Thus ended the longest successful native resistance in Latin America.

FORGERY AND THEFT

The occupation accomplished, a reservation system was set up. The Mapuches, used to moving frequently, were told that the land where they were located was theirs, and they had to stay there. All 'unoccupied' land was auctioned off to white Chileans. By 1931 a whole series of laws had been passed and the reservation system was finally complete. The original laws had been modified to make it easier for reservations to be broken up. The 1931 law allowed a reservation to be divided if only one third of its inhabitants so desired. Outside landowners frequently tried to bribe a few of the reservation to agree to division. Once this was done, the landowners moved in and bought up individual plots. Usually lawyers were engaged to forge consent papers, and Mapuches were tricked into signing things they did not understand.

Through these methods, by 1970, over 700 of the 3,000 Mapuches reservations had been divided. In addition, almost all reservations had been severely reduced in size due to thefts by the landlords. Most reservations were only a small percentage of the size they had once been.

That was the situation until 1970. The Mapuches, confined to the worst land, grew wheat and raised sheep. Very little of their produce went to the market — most was for personal consumption. They continued to speak their complex and expressive language, which was unwritten. The Mapuche men learned to speak Spanish, because of trade with the merchants or through contact with white Chileans when working as seasonal labourers on the landlords' estates. Few Mapuches could read or write Spanish.

DYING FROM POVERTY

On the reservation, oxen and handmade wooden plows were used. Fertilizer was used only about half the time, and fields had to be used every other year, because of the shortage of land. As a result, yields were low. Most Mapuche families earned under $100 a year. Infant mortality was very high — most Mapuche women had lost one or two children at early ages. Usually death resulted from severe diarrhea caused by intestinal diseases. Diet consisted primarily of bread and maza, as well as vegetable soup. Meat and eggs were rare, cheese and milk almost non-existent.

The Mapuches had gone from a good life to desperate poverty. In some areas, the majority of young men had no jobs, and no land. They were forced to work for the landlord of the big farms, when work was available, usually during harvest. The rest of the year there were only a few permanent workers on each farm, usually white Chileans. The big farms were often used as summer homes by the landlords, and they were unproductive agriculturally. Often much of the land on the big farms lay fallow, or was used as pasture for a few cattle. The Mapuche were bitter as they watched this land lie useless while they themselves lived nearby, without land, and without work.

In September, 1970, the Popular Unity Government of Salvador Allende was elected. Allende promised a massive agrarian reform. The idea was to expropriate the often unproductive big farms and turn them into co-operatives which would be more intensively cultivated and employ many more peasants. The old land owner could be paid compensation by the state.

In southern Chile, the Mapuches represented almost 70 per cent of the rural population, but held only about 20 per cent of the land. Allende proposed that where the big farms had land which had been stolen from the nearby reservations, the government would return such land to the Mapuche at the time of expropriation. The Mapuches would benefit from land reform because their reservation would get back the stolen land, and because new jobs

"THE WAR WITH THE MAPUCHES HAS COST MORE THAN the stolen land. Hundreds of farms were lost in September. After the Mapuches didn't keep up with the Mapuches' demands, they were pushed back, attacked at night. But the Mapuches fought back against the Chileans and the Spanish. They were would be available at the co-operatives.

THE POLICE ATTACK

The agrarian reform of Allende came none too soon for the Mapuches. Already on early 1970 they had begun to take back the stolen land. Hundreds of takeovers occurred in southern Chile in 1970. Before Allende's election, the police frequently attacked and threw Mapuches off land they had reclaimed, but when Allende came into office, he gave orders to the police to live the Mapuche alone.

Without police repression, land reclaimings became a daily occurrence throughout 1971. They began as fence runnings, when the Mapuches moved the fences at night to regain the stolen land. Whole Mapuche communities, armed with sticks, shovels, wire-cutters, and occasionally an old rifle, would take a long line of fence, and move it hundreds of yards into the adjacent farm to restore the old boundary. Then the Mapuches would remain to guard their turf against the landlord.

SEIZE THE BIG FARMS

Later, when land reforms had started, the Mapuches began to take over whole farms from the landlords, instead of just the portions which had been stolen from the reservation. After all, in the beginning all the land had belonged to the Mapuches. Besides, for many years it had been Mapuche labour which had allowed the landlords to grow wealthy.

Now it was finally time to seek justice. It was difficult for the government to expropriate the farms as fast as the Mapuches were taking them over. The legal process — the shuffling papers from agency to agency, and the payment by the government to the landlords — took time which the Mapuches did not always have. For example, in Lautaro county of Cautin province, 37 farms were expropriated under the three years of the Allende government. The Mapuche had occupied 16 of them prior to expropriation.

Usually such occupations were done with the help of the workers on the farms. When the Mapuches had occupied the farm, they immediately set up barricades to prevent the landlord attacking with a gun squad. The landlords used pick-up trucks and high-powered rifles. The peasants defended themselves with whatever weapons they had.

NIGHT TIME GUN BATTLES

At times, lengthy gun battles ensued. Dozens of Mapuches were wounded or killed in such battles. Usually the police would try to prevent the attacks by landlords, but frequently the landlords would wait several weeks, until the police were withdrawn and then they would attack at night. Sometimes they had friends among the police officers, who would tell them when a good time to attack might occur.

The Allende government helped the Mapuches by passing legislation which cancelled the old reservation laws, and abolished the old Indian courts. A new agency was set up for the Mapuches, and the law made it more difficult to divide up reservations, and much easier to regain stolen land. The Allende government also carried out publicity campaigns to combat the racism of white Chileans towards the Mapuches. For the first time in history, a Chilean government was actually doing something to help the Mapuches.

During the three years of the Allende government about 35 per cent of the usable land in the country was expropriated. Most of the biggest farms were taken over. In the south, hundreds of co-operatives were formed which employed tens of thousands of Mapuches. Tractors, seeds, and fertilizer were made available for the first time, at very cheap rates to the reservations. Credit at low interest enabled the Mapuches to purchase five times more agricultural supplies in 1973 compared to 1969. A Mapuche radio station was created, and Mapuche leaders began to play important roles in government. Greatly increased medical care was provided through the use of rural clinics.

Of course not all the problems were solved. More than half of the land stolen from the reservations still had not been recovered. Many Mapuches were still without land, or work. The new Mapuche agency was under-staffed, and could not investigate all claims.

DOUBLE THE WHEAT

But the government programs, abstract on paper, did mean better lives in many concrete ways for the Mapuches. Tractors were used, eliminating weeks of hard work with oxen. Fertilizer meant that wheat yields sometimes doubled, meaning that families had enough bread and wheat left over to sell on the market.

Kerosene lanterns could be bought instead of candles. Fruit could be bought in the winter time, and children could eat meat and eggs, and wear shoes.

These tangible benefits meant that the Mapuches supported the Allende government. The landlords, stripped of much of their wealth, joined with the big businessmen in the cities in opposition to Allende.

Since the CIA supported the coup in 1973, most information has been focussed upon the tremendous repression of professionals, intellectuals, workers, and politicians. Almost nothing has been said on the fate of the Mapuches.

Repression against them has been severe, not only in their homelands, but in the capital city where thousands of them have migrated since the turn of the century.

An intense persecution began against all those who had supported Allende. The military gave the expropriated farms and recovered reservation lands back to the landlords.

RANDOM KILLINGS

Mass killings of random groups of Mapuches took place, often on the basis of unsubstantiated rumours that the Mapuches in a given area were hiding arms. Near Pitrufuquen, a town in Southern Chile, dozens of bodies of murdered Mapuches floated down the river while observers in the town saw military trucks loaded with dead bodies coming back from the countryside.

The same scene was repeated throughout the south of Chile. In Temuco, capital of Cautin province, doctors reported that dozens of dead Mapuches arrived daily at the morgue, riddled with bullets.

Dr. Natacha Carrion, a doctor, who, with her husband, Eduardo Gonzalez, tried to bring health care to the Mapuches has been imprisoned. Her husband was summarily executed.

The military especially looked for Mapuche leaders, and several, including a member of the Chilean Congress, and executives of the Revolutionary Peasant Movement have been imprisoned, tortured and executed.

Back in Lautaro county, the landlords moved quickly to regain almost all of the 37 farms which had been expropriated under Allende. After the initial repression, an even more sinister attack began — no land, no work, no credit.

In the last few years, the Mapuches have returned to an even worse poverty than they suffered before Allende was elected. The policies of the military dictatorship are translated into sickness and starvation from the Mapuches.

The military junta which has taken over Chile in 1973 has murdered a total of as many as 30,000 Chileans. No one knows how many of these were Mapuches, but it is safe to assume that they suffered an even more brutal repression than did the population as a whole.

Many resisted the best they could. In Lautaro county, for example, trees were cut down to block the roads on the day of the military coup to keep the army out of the countryside. Later, when the trees were cleared, the Mapuches would light fires at night on the hillsides, causing the military to investigate. Upon arrival the soldiers found nothing, but soon another fire was lit up some distance away.

Many soldiers in southern Chile were themselves Mapuches, drafted into the Army. Forced to commit atrocities, groups of soldiers from the regiments in Temuco and Valdivia chose to desert. They stole trucks and arms, and drove away to link up with the resistance.

And so, despite the repression, the Mapuches are continuing their century-old struggle to regain the land.

Inflation: legal theft by bankers

By DAVID ASTLE

While it is not necessary to be a Political Economist to understand the causes of inflation, there is no doubt that such qualification could be a help. Political Economists, for their own best reasons, have neither made satisfactory explanation thereof, nor have they offered satisfactory solution thereto. . . . Surely there could be nothing more worthy than examination of that process by which mankind is legally robbed of the fruits of his labours? However, it is more than clear that no "Laws", or "Equations" or "Graphs" etc. can ever circumscribe the fickle and changing character of human need and greed.

Inflation comes about as every unit of exchange injected into a circulation amongst the people reduces by an exact valuation the worth of each previously existing unit of exchange.

Such infusion of new units of exchange may actually cause an increase in the worth of all units of exchange as may circulate. Beyond a certain point the existing system of exchanges of any particular state will not be able to absorb additional units of exchange.

Up to a certain point, infusion of new Units of Exchange is a quickening force to the engine which drives human economic activity. Beyond that certain point the engine itself becomes clogged up.

Prices rise as the ratio of goods and services to a given number of Units of Exchange decreases; with the consequence that savings fall in value. With the picture of a life's labour withering away to nothing, despair becomes the lot of many who had trusted their Rulers to have care that their subjects be not abused.

There may be said to be two principal forces contributing to an inflation of values nowadays. These may be described as A. National; and B. International. They need not be operating simultaneously but it is clear that if there is an international force injecting Units of Exchange of any particular country into an international circulation, then if the Unit of Exchange of that particular country be already accepted internationally as an international currency, such as is the American Dollar, then a National inflation will result; perhaps in many countries.

Now here it might be remarked that the principal factor that most of all governs the speed of change of price levels is the volume or "amounts" in which the Unit of Exchange is being "Thrust" or is being "Drawn" into circulation.

"Thrust" as in the first case will be exemplified by the act of the Bank Manager who importunes a client, successful at his trade or in business, to accept a loan.

"Drawn" will be exemplified by the process of increasing the amount of Units of Exchange in circulation as through the successful act of workers and wage earners generally demanding increase of pay out of righteous and genuine need.

Speaking of the latter case as a factor in a National inflation, increase of wages, when conceded by an employer, immediately compels the employer to reorganize his whole system of costing. If such increase cannot be absorbed, he must go back to he who is in finality the master, namely the banker, for more capitalization; which will come from such master's virtually costless money creative processes. Repetition of this process will soon put him in a position in which he is completely dependent on the wish or will of the Master Money Creator, a fact which should always be born in mind by workers considering strike action.

It also becomes immediately clear that the banker wants the business on an economic basis i.e.: getting more work out of employees and, or, increasing the price of goods and services. Such bankers are not interested in controlling sick businesses.

National Inflation

The talk of "experts" obviously postulates that the power of the joint stock banks to create money and inject it into the circulation, will immediately be increased by the action of such Government in creating a budgetary deficit, but never is there any explanation of the process by which this power, clearly not to be exercised by ordinary profit seeking men, is brought into existence.

The steps by which "deficit financing" as it is called, is a road to inflation, may be enumerated as follows:

1. The Finance Minister (presumably at the end of the fiscal year) consults with the head of the Bank of Canada, as word has come to him of this lamentable condition of the Treasury.

2. He then will most likely be told that money is hard to get, and that he should be more thrifty; but, however (as a special favour no doubt!), the Bank of Canada will help him out.

3. He will be instructed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada to have printed say $4000,000,000.00 worth of certificates of admission of Bond (or admission of debt as it is really indicated thereby) at a designated rate of interest. These Bonds the Bank of Canada agrees to buy.

4. The Government does not pay its bills to its servants, to contractors, to private business etc. with cheques drawn on its account at the Bank of Canada (strangely enough!).

5. The Government maintains deposit accounts at the chartered banks. The chartered banks will, after settlement, experience a corresponding increase in their accounts at the central bank.

6. Such increase in reserves has the effect of increasing "Credit" which is "Money" as much as is the 20 cents with which the schoolboy buys his chocolate bar, or the millions of dollars by which the late person known as Onassis might have bought a super-tanker.

7. Against this "Credit" inflation the bank in question, or all of them if that is what has been decided, may now turn around and buy the balance of the bonds being offered by the Government against its imbalance of account; may bid on paper money or coinage or so-called short term treasury bills, or engage in whatever business appears to be profitable, financing whoever it may

About the Author

David Astle is the author and publisher of a new book on money entitled, The Babylonian Woe: A study on the origin of certain banking practices and their effects on the events of Ancient history.

He commenced a sea career at the age of 16, and have travelled most of the world's great trade routes. He served as an officer in the Royal Navy during the second world war, and saw service in many theatres of war.

According to Astle, he became interested in the apparent chaotic nature of world economics by witnessing, first hand, "the melting away" of the British Empire and "everything upheld through the achievement of victory" by the allies in the war.

At one time, Astle was active in the Social Credit party, and is somewhat embarrassed to admit being a federal candidate for the Soviets. In his opinion the party has turned away from some of the basic tenets of social credit.

been possible before, at least under British Rule, and their rapid institution of branch banking systems lending money to all and sundry.

3. The action of the oil producing countries in drastically raising their prices involved tremendous increase in the cost of much plant operation in the manufacturing countries.

While the latter instance of a factor giving rise to the world wide inflation is more of a result than a cause, one of the really deep-seated causes of international inflation of the Value of the Unit of Exchange is also the result of sleight of hand manoeuvres.

As a consequence, one of the major causes of the burgeoning expansions of credit (or money as it may equally be known) now adding to the world wide inflation is due to the weakening of the control by central banks over National Monetary Systems. Liquid resources of the money market can now be more easily expanded or reduced independently of the policy of the monetary authorities.

Mor to the point, Euro-Currencies can expand by the process of money creation, even without infusions from oil nations or payments deficits. Just as dollars are created when banks use reserves to create loans, creating deposits that can be transferred to other banks to become reserves for further loans and so on, banks in London and Zurich create dollars when they make Euro-Dollar loans.

Swapped Dollars

This may also indicate the connection between the so-called "Swap" deposit, and the Euro-Dollar Market which the remarks as quoted below from the Report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance 1964, certainly seem to indicate:

"In addition to their deposit business with non-residents, the banks do a substantial foreign currency business with Canadians. Some of this arises naturally out of the international commercial business of their customers, but the banks have also developed a technique by which holders of Canadian dollars may in effect acquire short term foreign currency investments through the banking system without incurring exchange risks.

"The banks purchase the customer's Canadian dollars for foreign exchange, normally U.S. dollars under an agreement to reverse the transaction at a fixed date in the future. In the interim, the customer carries his foreign currency balance on deposit at the bank, earning a return formally made up of interest on the time deposit, and the profit and loss on the foreign currency "Swap". In effect he is earning a combined rate of return on his Canadian Dollars.

"Whereas the banks pay common agreed rates on their Canadian notice deposits, they compete with each other and other channels of international investment for these "Swap" deposits on an interest rate basis. Although it is technically possible for a bank to do such a "Swap" with a customer without selling the Canadian dollars and acquiring foreign currency for the life of the deposit, we were informed that it is the bank's practice to complete the transaction by acquiring foreign exchange in the "Spot" market, and selling it "Forward". Thus the funds represented by the "Swap" deposits enter the general pool of bank funds available for investment in foreign assets . . ."

The process as described herein of the creation of money as through state indebtedness may vary in detail, but the underlying principle may be accepted as a constant.

International Inflation

Some of the principal factors however, that are the basic cause of the overwhelming inflation that has ravaged the whole world since approximately 1968, and which are the cause of the almost uncontrollable inflation of prices of certain staple commodities, including oil fuel, and which are the main stimuli to such world wide inflation of prices, necessarily giving rise to demands by labour for increased wages in order that a decent and honourable life may continue to be enjoyed, as is the right of all, are as follows:

1. The break-up of the British, French, and Dutch empires instituting the so-called newly developing countries and giving them the right and power to sell their raw materials.

2. The immediate entry of the joint stock banks into the abandoned colonies to an extent that had not

Inflation, money and banking

The Report of the Royal Commission on Banking and finance continues... In indicating the main lines of the bank's international business, we have barely suggested the breadth and complexity of the role which they now play in the world's financial markets. We should, however, return briefly to one point. It has been argued that the "Swap" deposit business which enables Canadians to acquire foreign currency deposits which are in all essentials the same as Canadian dollar balances, somehow weakens domestic monetary control by building a larger banking system on a given cash reserve base.

We do not believe this particular way of economizing on "Cash", to be any more or any less a factor in weakening the Central bank's influence than many other ways in which the financial system generates close substitutes for money. The Bank of Canada can always take compensating action to offset the generation of "Swap" deposits, or any other liquid assets, by acting on "Cash reserves" and domestic interest rates.

The Bank of Canada might experience serious technical difficulties if shift into "Swap" deposits became massive or unpredictable. However, if circumstances were to change markedly... and if banks were to abandon present policy of matching "Swap" deposits with foreign currency assets there would be reason to revise this judgment in the interests of Domestic Monetary control.

Abstract money indeed! What, indeed, does go on here? It need not be doubted, much of these foreign currency deposits generated by the "technique" of the "Swap" deposit, goes into the Euro-Currency market.

The Suicide of Inflation
Clearly the phenomenal growth of the so-called Euro-Currency market, expanding without reference to that National monetary system indicated by the particular currency concerned, is a vital factor in the ever widening spiral of inflation of currencies world-wide.

According to Paul Einzig "Today the construction of plants by German firms in underdeveloped countries is financed to a by no means negligible extent by borrowed Euro-Dollar Deposits." Hence the Euro-Dollar Market further contributes towards the same world-wide inflation as has been outlined above. At the same time, such industrialization of the under-developed countries clearly deprives the former manufacturing countries of their markets, and indeed reduces them to the status of mendicant nations.

Further and perhaps the principal cause of the world-wide inflation, may be traced clearly to that decision of the so-called International Monetary fund to institute settlement of International trade imbalances by the use of "Paper Gold". In view of the activities clearly projected in 1968, by the International Bankers, Gold itself would no longer suffice.

The institution of "Paper Gold" by the International Monetary Fund meant that gold itself, undoubtedly an anchor that held down the ever present tendency of the present banking system towards inflation, had been virtually demonetized, and as from henceforth its price would drift up and down on the markets of the world in the same manner as silver during the last 100 years.

More important was the fact that the demonetization of gold, and the institution of "Paper Gold" meant that as from henceforth International Trade Balances could be settled as by ledger credit page entry. Money created out of thin air as by the hand of the immortal gods, by an organization without Nationality and with loyalty to none.

The end is nowhere in sight, and total chaos grows, and the international banking institutions are largely powerless to deal with a situation created by themselves through the complete lack of principle underlying their institution, which is that of insatiable greed directed towards the irresponsible exploitation of mankind.

Their dream of World Government by themselves using the elements of our peoples who hung back in the last two exterminative wars, that disposed of so many of our finest men, has already shown itself to be a drifting mirage, and indeed is fast turning sour. Discussion of everlasting peace already shows itself, even to its devotees who derived so much personal profit by allegiance thereto to be so much double talk. To use the words of Mao Tse Tung, it is to be feared that power comes out of the barrel of a gun, and it might be added, for the holders of which, moneymen and money changers, if such are permitted to continue to be, must be servants, and not masters.

MANIFESTO

Admin scraps student union

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Students Society at McGill University has had its constitution suspended by a motion of the university senate last month.

The move appears to be the result of a conflict between opposing groups of students. However the main reason put forward by the Dean of Students Saeed Mirza, was "financial difficulties".

According to Mirza, "a total reassessment of the executive's structure is required."

In addition to suspending the students' constitution, the senate has installed temporary methods of operation so that student clubs, including the McGill Daily, can continue as usual.

Three committees have been set up to serve during the interim period, which is supposed to last until March. The three committees are: Managerial, Interim Policy and Restructuring.

Of the three, only the Interim Policy committee is staffed by student reps alone. The other two have representatives from the faculty and administration but students retain a majority by one vote. Some Senators found themselves in difficulty because they were not sure of where, and who all the student clubs and societies were.

One motion to refer the matter was eventually defeated after at least one senator expressed doubts that any referral committee could "untangle the byzantine politics in the Student Society."

Dean Mirza said that the effect of the proposals would be to create a "relevant, autonomous, effective and valid Students' Society." He stressed the word autonomous. When some senators asked for some documentation, specifically the old constitution, Mirza could only offer the "orientation handbook," which wasn't published for that year.

At an earlier meeting a student representative expressed concern over the publishing in the McGill Daily of reports from confidential meetings. He suggested that leaks should be "investigated."

McGill Principal, Robert Bell said although preliminary inquiries had been made, he suspected these sorts of leaks have always gone on and "probably will continue to do so."

Feds figure future filled

WATERLOO (CUP) — The number of students at universities and colleges in Canada is still going up, and will hit a peak in 1982 according to a Statistics Canada analyst. However, a ten-year drop will follow and enrolment will bottom out in 1992, not returning to its present level until 1998.

The population forecast based on many statistics says that the number of Canadians aged 18 to 24, now about 2.95 million, will be up to 3.34 million in 1982 before dipping down to 2.60 million in 1992. It will be back up again to 3.28 million in 2001.

Zoltan Zsigmond of Statistics Canada points out that "the non-compulsory nature of post-secondary education requires that attention be given to special factors that may have a bearing on enrolment". The share of people aged 18 to 24 who are students has increased from 10.6 per cent fourteen years ago to 19.2 per cent last year, and Zsigmond predicts that it will rise a little more to 20 per cent, and then level off.

That means that enrolment which was 567,500 in 1974 will rise to 670,000 in 1982, then fall to 520,000 by 1992 and recover to 660,000 by 2000.

Universities and colleges can choose between having more students than they can handle for the next seven years, and building to handle the 1982 peak and then having more facilities than they need.

Zsigmond cites several results of the coming fluctuation.

- Faculties "in which enrolment is determined by the availability of facilities" (medicine) will not suffer a drop in enrolment.

- Faculties "in which enrolment depends on economic conditions" (engineering) "will not be strongly influenced by population patterns."

- General faculties, particularly arts and science, are likely to feel the effects of the population decline. The "wave" effect will mean that there is a shortage of freshmen while the number of senior and graduate students increases; later, that number will decline again and there will be an increase in the number of freshmen.

- "More research funding may be sought to make up for some of the money that will be lost through lack of students."

- "Operating expenditures, in constant dollars, will not change significantly, and definitely will not decline proportionately with enrolment. . . . Expenditures per student will rise."

- Institutions will have more buildings than they need.

- There is a prospect of more university graduates coming into the job market than there is room for, and it may be wise for government to cut down on student assistance to reduce the number of students.

Graham Wise finds the going rough in the court of the Crimson Queens.

Gaels goalie baffles blues

By JOHN ROBB

Friday night was a frustrating evening for the Blues hockey team as for the second time this year they ran up against a hot goalie. The first time it was Tom Wynne of McMaster, who shut out the Varsity squad 3-0. This time it was Clyde Harris of Queen's who had the whammy on our team.

It took over fifty-seven minutes of shooting before Graham Wise finally beat the bearded wonder in the Gaels' goal. Unfortunately at the other end of the ice, Mark Logan had not been as lucky, and had seen one puck go by him in each period. When given half a chance, Logan stopped anything that came at him, including the occasional Queensman meandering through the crease, and he couldn't be faulted on the goals.

The Blues came out flying right from the drop of the puck, but their speed was greater than their precision, which resulted in numerous missed passes. The scramble play wasn't helped by some over-zealousness on the part of the linesmen, who had several bad off-side calls.

Despite being slowed down by these calls, the Blues had the best of the play but were getting frustrated by the abilities of Clyde Harris. The only score of the period came when Dale Sandles took advantage of a Varsity defensive mixup to fire the puck past an off-balance Logan.

The second period was more of the same. Toronto applied pressure steadily on the Queen's defence but Harris was always the man they couldn't beat. The Gaels' football team could take lessons from their shabby club on how to recover fumbles as the game seemed to become a series of goalmouth scrambles that always ended with at least two bodies on top of the puck. In any case, it was Queen's that scored to gain a 2-0 bulge, as Willie Wing deflected a slapshot past Logan for the eventual winner.

As the third period began, Varsity still looked like the better squad. It seemed only a matter of time before they broke the goose-egg on the scoreboard, but then Blues' Doug Herridge and Doug Grills of Queen's had a disagreement behind the Varsity net.

It seemed to be worth two minutes each, but apparently the zebra had a better view of it as he awarded the two miscreants four minutes each for roughing. He also thought Herridge was worthy of a five minute match penalty, which meant that the hustling winger beat his teammates to the showers and that the Blues had to kill five straight minutes of a Queen's power play.

It was during this penalty that the Gaels took advantage of a two on one break to up the score to 3-0. From then on it was first Graham Wise and then Ron Harris who baffled the visitors with their time wasting tactics. Harris was particularly effective as his puck-ragging drew a penalty to even up the manpower situation. This still didn't put the Blues on the scoresheet until finally Wise beat Clyde Harris with a wrist shot between the legs, breaking the shutout.

Although Varsity never gave up, that was the only time they could beat Harris before time ran out. It seems that the only way to beat the Blues this year is to hope that your goalie comes up with a super game.

NOTES: This loss doesn't change the standings but it does move the second place Gaels two points nearer to the Blues. . . The next home game features the ice-men from Laurentian, who will be here this Friday. . . It was good to see a decent number of people at the game this time, and especially good to hear what sounded like the entire Lady Godiva Band.

The Drowning Pool

MEN'S SWIMMING

By DON WARNER

In the last couple of years it has become common for the University of Western Ontario to upset U. of T. in certain intercollegiate sports.

Many of the Western students are from the Toronto area and seem to particularly relish defeating Varsity.

Two years ago the hockey team was shocked by UWO in the semi-finals, and last year the football team succumbed in the College Bowl.

On Saturday it was the Blues' swim team which fell victim to Western, emerging on the short end of a 62-51 core before an aroused homecoming crowd in London.

This was only the third dual meet loss to a Canadian university for Blues' coach Robin Campbell in his eight years at Toronto. It was the Blues' first loss to their arch-rivals since 1959.

Everyone including the swimmers, agreed that the meet was the most exciting they had ever witnessed.

The lead see-sawed back and forth, with the outcome dependent on the winner of the last event, the 400 free relay. This race had the packed house on its feet and saw UWO edge our squad by a razor-thin 1.5 of a second.

A dual meet is not the same as a championship meet however, and the local chants of "We're number one", may prove to be premature.

In the dual meets for example, only the top three finishers in individual events may earn points for their teams on a 5-3-1 scoring basis. For relays, only the winning team gains 7 points, while there are no points given for coming second.

However, in both the O.U.A.A. and C.I.A.U. championships, the top 12 finishers count for points, in both relay and individual events. It is here that the great depth of the Blues usually predominates.

On Saturday, both sides put on a strong display of swimming for so early in the season.

Blues' rookie sensation Rick Madge, who hails from the Forest City, returned to his hometown and set two pool records, in the 500 Free (4:55.9) and 1000 Free (10:12.9) while winning three races overall.

Juri Daniel, Mike Hibberd, Greg Vanular, Mike Hughes, Bill Chisholm and Bill Woodley also put on very fine performances for Toronto.

Daniel's 2:19.1 in the 200 Breast, Hibberd's 1:51.5 200 Free and Vanular's 57.4 in the 100 Back, all beat the C.I.A.U. time standards. Hughes swam an excellent 53.3 relay split for the 100 Fly and 2:05.9 200 Fly, while Chisholm splashed to a fine 2:10.2 in the 200 Fly.

Woodley's splendid 48.9 anchor leg in the 4 x 100 free relay almost won the event and the meet for Varsity.

Honourable mention is also in order for John Watt who missed three turns out of seven, en route to a disqualification in the 200 Breast. His unofficial time of 2:23.7 would have been even better had he been able to touch the wall with two hands simultaneously.

Blues' next encounter will be against Waterloo this Friday night.

Everybody gets into the picture in a 14 team tournament.

Dawson takes women's Tourney

By L. D. and SEBASTIAN
TISBERGER II

The 2nd Annual Women's Invitational Basketball Tournament was played on the weekend at Benson Building. The 14 teams entered played a total of 23 games. Teams included were the Hamilton Bobcats, Ottawa Rookies Queens, Windsor, Dawson, York Raiders, John Abbott, MacMaster, Scarborough, London Lords, York Grads, Brock, Toronto "A" and Toronto "B". Both Senior and Intermediate teams participated.

The two Toronto teams pulled the wrong animals out of the hat and got knocked off by the two finalists, Dawson and Ottawa. Toronto A got hammered 64-30 by Ottawa. The final was won by Dawson over Ottawa to the tune of 82-59. Lori Sprague, a definite prospect gunned for 37 points in the championship game. Miss Sprague was also high scorer for the tournament.

Hamilton defeated the York Raiders to win the consolation. High scorers for the Blues in the tournament were Terry Knight with 22 and Karen Zellen with 18. For the intermediates it was Chang Isai with 32.

The tournament was competitive and rough. No Red Army style walkout was staged but the number of elbows thrown certainly gave enough players a closer look at the floor than they would care to have.

FOUL SHOTS . . . In case you're wondering where the big story on the Mens wins in Kingston is, where they dunned Queens 75-64 and clobbered RMC 92-69 — it's not here. Our ace reporter Dave Cass got food poisoning while eating a Dennis the Menace Burger at the Dairy Queen. His last words, paraphrased, were "If I ever come out of this alive look forward to a big story on Wednesday." The prognosis is good so to all you Glen Scott diehards — Cool your jets.

Nobody loves you when.....

Well folks it's time for the good hockey teams in intercollegiate to stand up and be counted. Innis, sit down. In a shocking display of schlock Innis found themselves at the wrong end of a 1-0 shutout. In a complete turnaround from Tuesday's 3-1 loss to SMC the Skulchchildren found a goalie and some defense somewhere and handcuffed the loser causing nothing but tourists for league leader Chris Bouris.

Unavailable for comment from Innis were Jay Polon, Herb Willer and all the rest of the Glasshouse Gang. Carl Kurz was however — "I played a pretty good game." When Carl, when? — JG.

'All loan program coming': OFS

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
The loan ceiling for Ontario Student Assistance Program loans will be raised to $1,000, a spokesman for the Ontario Federation of Students said yesterday.

Quoting a "100 per cent reliable source", Peter Macdonald told The Varsity "It's a step towards an all-loan program" which the government hopes to implement.

The government has established an Advisory Committee on Financial Assistance for Students to study the problem and recommend legislation. However, the Report of the Special Program Review (the Henderson Report) advised the loan portion of OSAP "be increased from $300 to $1,800" in November of 1975.

The loan raise suggested by OSAP would be in accordance with the report and would be a virtual refusal of any dissenting suggestion by the Committee.

"The secret loan ceiling increase makes any deliberation by the Committee suspect," Macdonald said. Although the committee will be hearing briefs from interested groups later in the year, these hearings would be "futile" if the increase has already been decided. Although government officials could not be reached, and despite no public announcement from Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott, Macdonald insists the raise is a reality.

Suggesting it was a secret recommendation by the minister, he said the committee has been told the loan ceilings will be set at $1,000. After the OSAP hearings were finished, Macdonald said the committee would announce its decision to raise the ceiling to $1,000.

The Henderson report suggested a larger raise, but Macdonald believes it is a graduated approach that will ultimately result in the recommended increase.

The report recommended the raise because of skyrocketing enrollment in universities which it said resulted in exorbitant costs. Established to cut government expenditure, it concluded OSAP grants were a less necessary area of expenditure and did not produce enough benefits to the province's taxpayers.

The raise would become part of a comprehensive program of reduction affecting all areas of provincial expenditure, including many sections of Ontario university administration.

Macdonald indicated OFS researcher Dale Martin originally discovered the raise in discussions with an unnamed ministry source. He would not reveal the source.

Macdonald said the purported raise "laid suspicion on how much influence the committee will have" in student assistance. "It's certainly not being taken seriously," he claimed.

No other government sources have been able to confirm the raise, and Queen's Park observers say only the minister and his executive assistant would know of the proposal at this early date in the Committee's deliberations.

Macdonald however remains firm. "It's absolutely true," he maintained. "He's asked that the raise for 1976-1977 not be made public," he explained.

More government spending freezes reported, millions perish.

Gov't report invalidates gov't committee

OTTAWA (CUP) — One hundred placard-carrying students from Carleton University told a special provincial committee investigating student aid to resign, and then walked out en masse at public hearings held last month at the Rideau campus of Algonquin College.

The Carleton students, led by student president Dave Dunn and organizers from the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), said the committee should abandon its investigation because the recent release of the Henderson Report "has turned the committee into a sham," Dunn said.

The Henderson Report recommended the provincial government raise tuition fees by 65 per cent for college and university students, the elimination of OSAP grants, and the establishment of an all-loan student aid system.

Dunn said the government will place more weight on the recommendations of the Henderson Report than those which the special committee will produce, and claimed the committee and its hearings will create a false impression that genuine public discussion and debate preceded "changes in student aid which are against student interests, but which the government intends to make anyway."

In response to a question from committee chairman J. Stephan Dupre whether the committee should resign, Scott Mullin of the Carleton student council replied "Yes" amid cheers from the students. Dupre said he would record that in the committee's minutes.

A student member of the special committee, Tim Doyle of Windsor, claimed he did not intend to resign because "we've already done a lot of work and there's a lot left to do."

When it became apparent that neither Doyle nor Dupre, who receive $105 per day as members of the committee, intended to consider resignation, the Carleton students rose and walked out of the auditorium.

The committee members, after sitting silently for a few moments, resumed the hearing of briefs from the small audience still in attendance.

The Carleton students, meanwhile, are planning to charter buses to attend a province-wide rally in Toronto on January 21, when OFS is scheduled to present its brief to the special committee.

The OFS brief calls for the abolition of tuition fees and the establishment of an all-grant student aid system to promote greater accessibility to post-secondary education.

University and college administrators, as well as government officials, have recently called for increased tuition fees, more loans, and the abolition of OSAP grants, as outlined in the Henderson Report.

Support builds for Jan 21 demo

By LEA RYAN
Organizing for the January 21st rally at Convocation Hall to oppose the Henderson Report's recommendations on education cutbacks, education took a major step forward at a SAC sponsored Tuesday night meeting.

SAC External Affairs Commissioner Rob Snell, who chaired the meeting, pointed out the urgency of mobilizing students against the Henderson Report before Ontario Federation of Students researcher Dale Martin gave an analysis of the report.

OFS representative Marilyn Burnett pointed out massive student opposition to the report is being planned across the province, with most universities and colleges not only sending participants to the Toronto rally and demonstration, but also holding local rallies.

Martin pointed out Colleges and Universities minister Harry Parrott revealed yesterday a plan to increase the loan portion of OSAP to $1,000. "This is an important development, which reveals that Progressive Conservative policy is moving in the direction of the infamous Henderson Report," he said.

The Henderson Report aims towards students paying 100 per cent of the costs of post-secondary education, said Martin. He added the report includes the potential for a 20 per cent reduction in faculty, with a corresponding increase in class size.

When Snell opened the meeting to general discussion on the issues posed by the Henderson report, two main areas of concern emerged. The first was the elimination of the grant portion of OSAP, and the proposed 65 per cent increase in tuition fees. The second was the quality of education.

Martin pointed out that by decreasing the financing to the institution itself, accessibility to the institution was cut for working and poor people. "This is the most threatening aspect of the report — it destroys any possibility of equal access." He went on to say cuts were being made in experimental programs and research.

"But the elimination of the loan portion of OSAP and the increasing of tuition fees by 65 per cent are the most significant aspects," pointed out a student from Scarborough. "We collected a 1,000 signatures on a petition very quickly, simply because students are angry at the proposed massive increase in tuition and the loan portion of OSAP."

During the discussion, one participant pointed out the necessity to build resistance in a step by step fashion, and to see the January 21st rally as a beginning of the process. He added that faculty and campus workers are also affected, and unity should be built in resistance to the cutbacks in post-secondary education.

The participants in the meeting showed definite interest in ensuring the January 21st rally at Convocation Hall is a success.

Hiring racist: prof

By ARTHUR PERCY

A Carleton university professor, who has been in the forefront of the battle to Canadianize our universities, has issued a detailed indictment of what he calls "racism" in hiring practices at Carleton.

Robin Mathews, an English professor and well-known Canadian nationalist reports his findings in a 40-page study he has forwarded to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities and the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Mathews charges Carleton is guilty of discriminating against Canadians in faculty hiring practices through repeated violation of CAUT (Canadian Association of University Teachers) guidelines requiring advertising of vacancies inside Canada.

This failure to advertise has resulted in the hiring of non-Canadians where there may be qualified Canadians to fill positions, Mathews concludes. The failure to widely advertise vacancies also violates standards set by Carleton senate. He accuses Carleton President Michael Oliver and other top administrators of deliberately ignoring the guidelines.

Mathews says the "racism" he has documented is reflected in systematic poor treatment of Canadians in hiring practices. He points out this discrimination is reinforced by immigration policies which give US citizens almost automatic landed immigrant status while the US refuses that status to Canadians when there are US citizens available.

The study says university authorities have been masking their "racism" for many years under a number of disguises. One example he gives is the excuse: "We desperately wanted Canadians but none of reasonable qualifications applied."

Other similar arguments rest on such assumptions as "scholarship is universal" and "the most advanced work in the field is being done outside Canada." Mathews sees these as covering up for the basic failure of many Canadian institutions to provide adequate opportunities for Canadian graduates.

Focusing on Carleton in particular, Mathews tells of a long and finally successful battle to get Carleton president Michael Oliver to reveal statistics on the hiring of Canadians.

In 1975-6 51 per cent of new Carleton faculty were non-Canadian, an increase from previous years. Oliver only revealed the figures after pressure from Queens Park and the ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Mathews says even these statistics are inadequate because they don't include part-time teachers at the university. Oliver had told Mathews there was no record of the citizenship of part-time teaching employees.

Mathews further documents seven cases where Carleton departments have failed to live up to senate requirements that vacancies be extensively advertised in Canada. In many cases non-residents were hired.

As well as flaunting Senate regulations, Mathews says trends at Carleton are directly opposing the spirit and recommendations of the legislature's "Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism."

Mathews also accuses the faculty association, recently certified as a union for accepting a contract with a non-discrimination clause and supporting the senate requirements but using a meaningless definition of "Canadian."

The definition used applies to all Canadian citizens, legally landed immigrants and those legally resident on ministerial permits. Mathews calls this definition "cynical and irresponsible."

The report concludes with a strongly worded indictment of the treatment of Canadians in hiring both at Carleton and other universities.

"Millions of dollars are spent each year and are being spent in 1975-76 to employ for the first time non-Canadians in Canadian universities to fill positions that are not announced to Canadians inside or outside Canada," he charged.

Mathews makes several recommendations to remedy the situation including:

- All positions legally required to be advertised to Canadians inside and outside Canada.
- Where qualified Canadians apply they must be given preference in hiring.
- Where Canadians are not hired evidence must be submitted that qualified Canadians are not available.
- That non-Canadians be given only two year appointments, non-renewable.

Yankees here Friday

Students from Ohio State university will arrive here this Friday as part of a weekend exchange visit with residents of New College dormitory.

A total of 86 men and women from Ohio's co-educational residence Taylor Tower will spend four days here and in turn will be visited by 78 New College students Feb. 13-16.

The Ohio students will be billeted as compatibly as possible at the New College residence according to personal resumes submitted and will be provided with meal tickets.

Activities planned for the visitors include a Varsity Blues hockey game, organized tours to the Art Gallery of Ontario, Kensington Market, the Royal Ontario Museum and the McLaughlin Planetarium.

Other outings include shopping and sightseeing in Toronto, a "meeting" at the Brunswick House ("This tavern has an atmosphere of amiability unmatched throughout Toronto and has become a favorite entertainment spot of U of T students"), athletic activities, a skating party and a Saturday night disco dance at New College.

The itinerary also features a seminar entitled "Political, Economic and Cultural Nationalism in Canada", to be delivered by an NDP member from the legislature.

We don't teach good-academics

By JOE JANUARY

You probably already know about all the benefits of plagiarism.

However, the university is planning to distribute an information sheet to all students at next year's registration which will define it — according to the Academic Code of Behavior, will undoubtedly outline the sanctions applicable to guilty parties and will inform people of how to improve their essay writing facility.

The idea stems from the recommendations of an unlikely sounding body entitled the Working Group on Means of Responding to the Plagiarism Problem, set up by the Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee.

The group also suggests

• Setting up writing labs to teach the techniques of essay writing and "the proper use of footnotes"

• Courses for "new Canadians" which would include essay writing techniques.

• More imaginative research assignments, and ones which would integrate course and lecture material.

• The use of class essay techniques, assigning topics and giving students one hour to complete them in an exam type situation.

The report on Grading Policy, recommends that essays be used for a minor part of the student's evaluation of the course and essays be returned personally with an interview for each student.

In analyzing the reasons for plagiarism the group cites competition for high marks in order to enter lucrative professions and the use of various means to achieve this end.

The report points out the availability of the essay services lends credibility to their acceptance and in this "age of the big rip off", "any short cut to achieving one's objective is considered to be an intelligent route to success."

It finds "Graduate students who have not gained access to the profession of their choice are being approached by the essay banks and find lucrative employment there."

Singling out high schools, the group finds the optional program as one reason students do not learn to write essays and turn to essay services. They also claim discontinuation of standardized grade 13 exams contributes to "confusion in admission standards and practices and inadequate preparation for university education."

As far as university experience, the group finds students resent their essays being marked by an "invisible marker" and hope with so many students per professor there is little chance they will be detected.

Professors, they find, say the weight assigned to an essay in determining the final mark can prove to be an incentive to plagiarize. "It is actually possible to buy the degree," if all the courses selected by the student give major weighting to essays, the report concludes.

They also found that essay banks give rebates to students who report to them the course number, professor's name and grade received on a purchased essay.

The report concludes its recommendations could help to rectify "what appears to be a very loose situation within the university". But they concede "The ideal solution would be to reduce class size so that each student's performance could be closely assessed by his professors."

One big student union?

OTTAWA (CUP) — Canada's national and provincial student organizations are one step closer to possible amalgamation and will draw up a common program as a result of a two-day meeting here January 3 and 4.

A target date for the creation of "one student organization" has been set for May 1977.

Delegates from five student organizations resolved to work on a "restructuring plan" which will be presented at the organizations' respective spring conference.

Also to be presented is a "common program" of action which will be drafted when the organization next meet in February.

NUS represents 150,000 of Canada's 591,000 students, while the remaining organizations represent 240,000. Next year they expect to have a combined income of $0.5 million.

The delegates agreed the common program should centre around the issue of universal accessibility, as it applies to such questions as student aid, unemployment, tuition, spending cutbacks and student housing.

Each organization will outline its own "strategy", but a "commitment to intensify" the work on the program must be taken, the delegates agreed.

The meeting was the second in a series to discuss improved cooperation among Canada's provincial, regional, and national student organizations, and delegates from each have attended with various types of mandates.

"Some organizations gave specific instructions to their delegates to work on certain directions" while others have been "less specific" as to their expectations, NUS executive secretary Dan O'Connor commented.

O'Connor said the organizations hold varying opinions on the nature of a unified student movement, ranging from ANEQ's concept of a "very loose confederation to mobilize students", to AFS's idea of provincial extensions of a strong centralized national body.

The BSCF delegation had specific instructions to study restructuring, he said. OFS has not yet clearly defined its position.

The delegates also discussed the national newspaper they agreed to set up when they met last October. The first issue is due at the end of this month.

It's gone too far, back to negotiations

Before the possibility of a strike becomes too entrenched in people's minds, the SAC executive and its workers really should sit down and go at it once again.

There are a number of reasons why. The next month is crucial for SAC; it cannot afford to operate at anything less than full speed in hosting a large rally that is the first step in building resistance to the cutbacks in education spending. Secondly, we at the Varsity have a job to do that we would sincerely like to get better at. This won't be possible if this strike forces us to stop publishing.

SAC has a reputation for being somewhat of a progressive organization and in the past has supported numerous labor actions in search of the decent wage. It's almost amusing that when it gets a little too close to home, the progressives start to waver on their principles. Makes you suspect they didn't have any in the first place, but that's another story.

The fact is that the CUPE wage demand is not unrealistic. Comparable student organizations in the city and the province. So there should be no substantive disagreement on that point. Wage parity is the sort of thing that SAC has in spirit been fighting for years. There is no reason why their workers should be lag behind employees of other student organizations.

The difference between the entire bill for the CUPE requests and the SAC offer is approximately $5,000. SAC collects more than $300,000 every year and has another $200,000 stuck away in the bank, according to SAC sources. It's ludicrous for SAC to say they don't have the money, so why do they begrudge their workers the extra money?

Part of its stems from the admitted feeling among some of the more loose-lipped SAC executive members that "we can get along without them." That sort of flippancy shouldn't be tolerated in serious negotiations. The staff complement at SAC wasn't built up to give unemployables something to do, each one of the employees performs a valuable function. Where the hell would Gord Barnes or Sa'ad Saidullah be if they had to type their own epic communications? They're fairly lucky the SAC accountant isn't part of the CUPE bargaining unit, they would then know quite quickly how valuable these people are. SAC would grind to a halt. As it stands, it will be a wheelchair SAC for the duration of this strike.

When all is said and done, this strike doesn't have to happen. There is nothing unpalatable in the CUPE demands, and no reason why SAC can't accede. If they don't, the SAC office will be the site of more hostility than they ever could have imagined. The office at present is almost divided into two camps. The only solution is negotiation.

A commitment needed

The discussion centering on the "problem" of plagiarism deserves some comment. A committee is dealing with the subject in all its ramifications and has come up with some noteworthy thoughts.

One of the suggestions involves requiring that competency in English grammar and composition be a requirement for university entrance. This seems to stem from the concern, as yet undocumented, that students nowadays are less literate than those of yesteryear. Another committee will hold its first meeting this week to decide on whether that is an imagined rather than a real problem, so we'll have to reserve judgement.

Another, more concrete solution to the problems that cause plagiarism is to de-emphasize the essay from its present state of the be-all and end-all in marking. This potentially involves more tests, or smaller essays on a shorter-term basis. A laudable idea, that one. But it must be stressed that a major essay assignment is one of the few ways that a student can produce original thought. Since most profs. would agree that original thought is the first thing they're looking for, any regulation that cuts in on a student's ability to work well by her/himself should be implemented carefully and should always be open to specific exemptions.

Much of the problem surrounding plagiarism seems to stem from an unwillingness on the part of the teaching staff to become personally involved with students. If a professor knows her or his students well, there is very little chance that a student will be able to pull the sort of flim-flam they're concerned about. It's hard for a student to lie to someone who has taken the time to become acquainted.

This is why it's disturbing that the committee would not deal with one of the suggestions, that each professor, after marking a student's essay, return the essay personally or allot time for an interview. This seems to be the ideal answer. It seems likely that, in discussing the essay with the student, those who had submitted plagiarized essays would within a short time demonstrate their ignorance on a point that was not included in the essay but would have been impossible to overlook in the execution.

It comes down to this: If a professor concerned about academic standards wants a commitment to these standards from every student, then she or he must be prepared to accept a commitment involving, no doubt, a number of hours to make plagiarism a personal and academic impossibility.

Honest students interested in their work who feel strongly about the possibilities offered by large essay assignments, should not have to pay because the faculty is unwilling to take some care.

SAC hack counters "liar" charge

To The Editor:

For the past several months I have been deeply involved in contract negotiations between SAC and its staff, members of CUPE local 1222. Over this period it has been the opinion of the SAC executive that it should maintain a low-key approach to these matters so that the negotiation talks could proceed in the most expeditious and business-like manner possible. That opinion ended last Friday, when a member of the union, Kevin Kelleher, launched a full attack, in the Varsity upon myself as well as other members of the SAC executive for bargaining in anything but the manner we desired.

The essence of Mr. Kelleher's argument was that SAC was in a financial position that would allow it to settle with its staff members for a more extravagant wage and that SAC should, therefore, do so. A cursory analysis of Mr. Kelleher's reasoning made clear his inability to distinguish between an income statement and a balance sheet in determining SAC's financial position, and for this reason casts some doubt upon his usefulness as a financial analyst. Mr. Kelleher would be well advised to address himself to subjects in which he

CUPE member warns that they're serious

To The Editor:

As Strike Marshall of CUPE 1222 I would like to take this opportunity to publicly assure Gord Barnes and the SAC Executive that unless the current contract dispute between SAC and members of CUPE 1222 is settled by the end of this week CUPE 1222 will legally go on strike possesses some basic knowledge and to check his facts before he makes further libelous remarks about any member of the University community.

Michael Treacy

effective January 16th.

It is necessary to realize a strike will seriously curtail all SAC services and make it financially impossible for The Varsity to continue publication after January 19th. If Gord Barnes or Mike Treacy believe that these will not be missed in a university community of 50,000, they are being not only naive but selfish.

In the more than three months of contract negotiations I have become personally frustrated with the irresponsible and immature attitude of most of the SAC Executive. During a conversation with Doug Gerhart in my office last week in which I explained that CUPE 1222 was primarily asking for wage parity with other U of T student unions he made reference to "those commie unions" and told me that members of CUPE 1222 "aren't worth it".

I think it is time the SAC Executive moved beyond its undergraduate mentality and realized once and for all that the members of CUPE 1222 are full time employees worth what they are asking for.

OFS to blame, not SAC: Editorial countered

To the Editor:
Who is responsible to whom? In your front page "Editorial" of January 7 you imply that the SAC executive is somehow negligent in its failure to support the Ontario Federation of Students, of which all U of T undergraduates are members, in its organization of a mass demonstration in Queen's Park. Surely OFS is responsible to its members, and not vice versa. On behalf of the U of T undergrads SAC has told OFS that persuading some people to stand in Queen's Park and yell is not the best way of improving conditions at the university. If OFS continues to misuse the membership fees of U of T students we should consider to withdraw from the organization. With the money we save we can show twenty times as many free films.

"SAC Special" erroneous: Grossman clarifies

To the Editor:
I was disappointed, though by now not surprised, when I read the "SAC Special" misinformation. As I have stated before, SAC is entitled to its own viewpoint and own opinion, as is everyone else. It is no more entitled, however, to present as "facts" items which are not facts, than are the politicians they always criticize for allegedly doing the same.
I, of course, refer to the clear impression left by the "Special Issue" that the Ontario Government has decided to implement the Henderson Report or any portion of it, particularly that portion suggesting a 65 per cent increase in tuition fees and the eventual elimination of the grant portion of OSAP.

While the Government is grappling with inflation and is concerned about government spending, it clearly has not in any way reached any conclusions as yet with regard to any portion of the Henderson Report. The Henderson Report is simply and only recommendations and suggestions from a Committee and it is now up to the Government to decide which portions, if any, of that report should, or could, be implemented.

The facts are that Premier Davis has stated quite clearly and in fact on the University of Toronto campus, that tuition fees will not be increased in the 1976-77 academic year, just as they were not increased in 1975-66, 74-75, 73-74.

I am writing because as the M.P.P. for St. Andrew-St. Patrick, which includes the University of Toronto, I am involved daily in ensuring that my constituents are treated fairly and are not "kept in the dark". Perhaps SAC ought to do the same and see that the facts about the Henderson Report are properly presented to the students so that a proper, legitimate and valid debate can ensue, if, as, and when the Government (of whatever party) comes to deal with the Committee's recommendations.

Editorialize on your editorial page, report facts in your "Special Issue".

"SAC Special" another Toike Oike: Reader

To the Editor:
Lies, slander, innuendo — yeah guys, we had it all in the Tuesday issue of the "SAC Special".
Just in case you missed the latest method that SAC has ingeniously found for wasting our money, perhaps I should warn you that it won't do you much good to read that paper. The fact is, it does nothing but twist the truth — mainly by equating the Henderson Report with government policy.
This is scare tactics at their worst — of course the Henderson Report is being discussed but, as the Hon. Darcy McKeough said, the government has no commitment to implement any of the proposals.

Another major factor that the "SAC Special" failed to note is that the 65 per cent increase that was suggested would be applied over a period of a number of years.
Let's face the hard realities of life as it is now. The rapidly increasing costs of running educational facilities are of paramount concern in Canada. As the costs for operating a university and hiring faculty increase, it seems to me obvious that, sometime in the future, tuition should also increase — and probably at the same rate. Premier Davis has assured us that tuition will not be raised in the 1976-77 academic year which is, for the economy, a generosity which we hardly deserve.

As he himself has said, what more can he do, write it in blood??
Actions like the publication of papers like this serve only to persuade people that some of the students we elected to SAC are being wilfully stupid — or worse — and that some students are wasting taxpayers' hard-earned money by attending university. Obviously they are getting very little out of their education if they don't know the difference between a Committee report and government policy.
At first, I was convinced that the "SAC Special" was merely another Toike Oike. I can only wish that it had been.

Deaf Education - A fa

By FLORA CLARK
"The problem of people with hearing impairments should be of particular concern to all of us. We are the only people who can help them learn." (The Varsity, Editorial, Nov. 12, 1975).

Well said, but what do we mean by 'hearing impairments'? A noted educator in the United States, Richard G. Brill, has described the words as "... a global term ... that must include the prelingually deaf, the postlingually deaf, the hard-of-hearing child at the very least, and possibly in addition to this the pseudo-hard-of-hearing and the possibly aphasic" (Brill, Address at Communication Symposium, 1970).

Brill goes on to explain that the methods for helping each sub-group are very different.

Since the 1950's a great many studies have gone into assessing methods of teaching language to the deaf. No matter how figures were juggled and no matter how many traditional educators of the deaf rose up to pick the research to pieces, the fact remained that those deaf who had had communication through sign-language and finger-spelling before attending school showed measurably superior attainment in skills and adjustment to the educative process and the best social adjustment.

What is the Oral Method and what is the Total Communication Method? And what is the Rochester Method?

The Oral Method seeks to establish speech, lipreading and language by constantly talking to the deaf child. Reading, writing and visual aids are much used. Sign-language and fingerspelling are not used. In addition, much use is made of 'amplification' by which is meant hearing-aids. The method is in use in day classes and in most of the Metro Toronto School for the Deaf classes. It used to be required. It has one draw-back for the prelingually deaf child. He cannot learn language by this method and usually cannot learn to communicate. There are exceptional circumstances in which laborious care by teacher and parents have achieved quite a degree of success. But the child's success is possible only because of his own stubborn determination and the grace of intelligence. They often appear to learn in spite of the system and not because of it. Where the special circumstances of teacher and parental care and the determination of the child are absent, as is usually the case, then the Oral Method does not work as well as the Total Communication Method.

The Total Communication Method is "... the right of a deaf child to learn to use all forms of communication available to develop language competence. This includes the full spectrum of child-devised gesture, speech, speed reading, formal signs, finger-spelling, reading and writing and the opportunity to use any remnant of residual hearing he/she may have."

(David M. Denton, Supt., Western Maryland School for the Deaf, Frederick, Maryland).

The Rochester Method is referred to, in the Ontario Schools for the Deaf, as Visible English. It consists in speech-reading and finger-spelling only with the addition of 'amplification' and other visual aids of every description. While the schools concede that "... Speech-reading is the cause of 'deaf language' " the child learns to understand what he sees but because he cannot see the connectors, his written and spoken output often lacks these connectors (verb endings, pronouns, articles, etc.) he tends to put them in the wrong place "... and further concedes that "... The natural language of any child is that language to which he is consistently and persistently exposed from birth through the first five years ... they do not actively encourage parents to commence finger-spelling as soon as possible after the discovery of profound hearing loss in the small child. And they insist on holding the fingerspelling hand much too close to the face which as several deaf students of the author's acquaintance have stated, "... makes me cross-eyed".

PROBLEM OF TRADITIONAL METHOD

Since the 'we' of the editorial could possibly stand for a parent of a deaf child or for hearing people in general and most certainly a person resident in Ontario, the next question is: what do 'we' know about the problems of the parents of deaf children in Ontario? Let us quote from a letter in the Globe and Mail (20.6.73).

"... As the mother of a profoundly deaf child I am deeply concerned about the present lack of educational continuity of the deaf in Canada. I have become aware of this situation through involvement with:

- a) hard-of-hearing classes at Queensdale Public School in Hamilton.
- b) meetings of the Deaf and Hard of Hearing Association of Hamilton.
- c) reading the Canadian study of Hard of Hearing and Deaf by Dr. Graeme Wallace.
- d) visits to the Ontario School for the Deaf at Milton.

When first faced with the handicap of my son when he was eight months old, there was presented to my husband and myself, by the audiologist and doctors, only one theory of education for the deaf, the oral method. Due to the extent of my son's hearing loss, this method has not proved adequate to develop the necessary communication skills. Through testing it has been shown he had the ability to accomplish much more had the proper teaching aids been used. I believe the best method for the functionally deaf is total communication. Personal experience and study has resulted in the belief that this child would have developed to a greater potential had he been given this method.

"As stated by Moores (1967) and noted by Dr. Wallace in his study, 'any language development program that is initiated after the age of 5, no matter what method is used, is doomed to failure for the majority of deaf children.' I strongly feel that there should be early screening of children to determine their learning capacity in relation to the degree of hearing loss and the most appropriate method of teaching be implemented accordingly in order to avoid the situation I am now facing.

"The method of teaching to be used at the Ontario School for the Deaf at Milton in September is the Rochester Method where no

Much of the social work for deaf people to date has been handled by the Catholic church. Many feel that their work is an attempt to compensate an inadequate public education. Father Dwyer has been very active in the deaf community and is helping non-denominational social service groups such as Silent Voice.

Scientists evaluate deaf education

By CHRISTINE CURLOOK

The education and social integration of deaf children is not proceeding as smoothly in Ontario as in other North American centres. According to Dr. Carol Reich, an OISE faculty member, "In Metro Toronto, integration of hard-of-hearing children is accepted as more feasible. Subsequently the school boards have directed their energies and thoughts into this, over the integration of deaf children."

Reich has just begun a course of limited enrolment for graduate students entitled Communication and Deafness, in co-ordination with her husband, U of T Linguistics professor Peter Reich.

In a telephone interview, Carol Reich indicated most hard-of-hearing children have been integrated. She said children with impaired hearing who can learn language in a normal way can rely on their residual hearing and training with speech therapists to function and learn in a regular classroom.

Reich feels the extra problems encountered by profoundly deaf children is reasonable justification for the Metro schools attitude. "It is the exceptional profoundly deaf child who can survive the non-specialty equipped classroom," she said.

"Attempts to integrate deaf children have been largely a result of parental guidance and interest," she said, and extra facilities including a person to "sign" or interpret the spoken language into finger spelling or sign language are necessary. Note-taking service and additional tutoring must be arranged for also, she added.

Interestingly enough, a unique model of deaf child integration exists in a public school in Alaska. Children attend classes in a special classroom designed expressly for them and are integrated fully in subjects such as physical education, social studies or in wherever their particular confidence and strength lies.

Having just completed a study on the integration of hard-of-hearing children in the school system, Dr. Reich emphasized that not much is known of the complete success or continued success of this and related programs.

Reich emphasized the necessity for careful assessment of the individual child's abilities and needs to determine if they can cope or function capably in the regular classroom situation. She mentioned that there are only a few profoundly deaf students actively involved in a complete course program at this point. In Metro, George Brown College and various vocational schools such as Castle Frank have evolved programs on the Alaska school model.

Dr. Reich believes that "two extremes exist today; those individuals very much opposed to the integration of the deaf child in the regular classroom and those who are very enthusiastic about the possibilities and who are determined to follow through with the studies and experiments being done". Dr. Reich continued that what is needed, again, "is careful planning, and a realization that some children can be integrated and others not, depending upon the facilities that are available. If sign language and other interpretation services are not available then the possibilities are obviously limited."

The Reichs have also completed a survey on the use of sign language by profoundly deaf adults between 18 and 36 years of age.

They undertook the survey in order to resolve a debate between the two schools of thought involved in educating the deaf.

A representative of the Metro School for the Deaf had said, in a special class, that sign language lowers the motivation to learn English and mitigates against forming patterns of thought and word associations.

On the other hand, some social workers involved with the deaf maintain that lip-reading and oral expression are inadequate giving rise to frustration for the speaker and for the listener. Sign language should be used as an aid to the deaf and hard-of-hearing, according to proponents of this "total communication".

Failure to communicate signs are used at all. When I inquired as to how this method was selected, I was told that the experts had chosen it and the school was only following the orders from their superiors . . ."

From the above letter we note several things. The mother is competent, practical, concerned and well-educated. The audiologist may have been competent to diagnose the hearing loss, but neither he nor the doctors were competent to give advice in a professional (unbiased) manner because they did not offer alternatives, carefully explained. This mother soon found that the oral method would not work for her son. She wanted Total Communication. It was not available in her area. The method used by Milton School was imposed by unnamed 'experts' whom the school did not dare disobey. The 'unnamed experts' to this author's certain knowledge, were a group of senior educators of the deaf of this province who were forced by the panic caused by the Wallace Report to find a middle-ground between the strict Oral Method formerly in use and the distasteful, to them, Total Communication Method. The decision was arrived at by a show of hands. That is how 'expert decisions' are made in the education of the deaf in Ontario.

Once the hearing impaired have worked their way through the non-educative processes, what is available in Ontario for them? Most find work. But of late years, owing to problems of one kind or another, such as inadequate preparation, training in obsolete skills, things have begun to look grim. In the 1930's, the situation was very bad. After the war, the economic expansion made jobs available to the deaf and there was relative plenty. The deaf did not need to huddle as hard in their own behalf and gradually the younger and younger ones lost all interest in clubs and associations.

Now we are faced with rebuilding the structure into new modes more consistent with the times as they are. We need to train our deaf and hard-of-hearing in leadership and club management for their own social and cultural satisfaction and provide them with avocations (hobbies) as well as providing vocations (job skills). We need to put modern technology such as Film and Television within the reach of average deaf people.

In this province, cultural affairs are lacking because of the Utopian dream of a handful of neurotic fanatics that the deaf could be "made to fit in the hearing world".

The hearing world has its own problems. As a totally deaf person, I am quite content to keep a peaceful co-existence with the hearing world, but prefer to socialize with the deaf group — because there is less wear and tear on the nerves of all parties.

A few deaf do fit into the hearing world. And some more have been forced into it with adverse psychological consequences by anxious parents and teachers.

The hard-of-hearing, an admittedly larger percentage of the hearing-impaired, fit into the hearing world more or less well, depending on many factors.

There are hearing people who are willing to help the adult deaf accommodate themselves to the world in general. Some of them make quite a good living at it, but most do not. The deaf are glad to have all the help they can get, as long as it is what they want.

Many professionals who work with deaf people due to personal needs or missionary zeal, tend to adopt an offensively patriarchal attitude. They are likely to forget the rights and human dignity of the individual and plan for the deaf person's future rather than planning with the deaf person. They make decisions for the deaf person instead of helping to make his or her decisions.

University not geared to solve problems

Students interested in the subject of deafness will find about 400 titles on the subjects of Hearing, Deafness and Noise available in the Toronto area. Most of the better quality publications are to be had at UTL and YorkUL. A few good titles can also be found in Metro Public Libraries (Central) OISE has practically no titles worthy of the subject. There is a great need for research in all areas. Reading the literature should give hints.

We need audiologists. Requirements are at least an MA in the Humanities, especially English studies and further training in audiology. But you may face a 'closed shop' of already established professionals and the OMA. We need more trained, UNBIASED Social Workers. We need other willing, UNBIASED professional workers. We need research into causes, prevention, and alleviation of hearing impairments.

IWY: Funding famine follows feast

OTTAWA (CUP) — The end of International Women's Year has left many women with a false sense of progress and many women's groups with uncertain funding for the coming year.

This was the reaction of those involved in women's service operations in Ottawa, where the impact of the federal government's twelve month balley-hoo has been most easily observed.

Diana Pepall, staffer at the Ottawa Women's Centre, said women are now more acquiescent about their status than they were before the $5 million celebration of women began.

"Women have now put their faith in government. They believe there's nothing else to do that isn't being done," she explained. "Women don't think there's a struggle now."

Although the effect of the IWY on women's consciousness may be a point of conjecture, the debate is not carried over to the question of the continued financial operation of women's service programmes.

Those who worked on those programmes feel certain the higher levels of funding received last year were artificial and won't be renewed in 1976.

In Ottawa, financial shortfalls will be felt by groups ranging from the Women's Co-op at the University of Ottawa to the local Rape Crisis Centre in the coming year.

The Ottawa U Women's Co-op is funded by the University, and project coordinator Cindy Diamond said that increased funding was apparent during IWY.

"I don't think we'll get the increase again," she said, adding "I don't think IWY has affected women already involved in the Co-op, although more women have been coming in to write term papers on IWY."

Sandy Merriam, coordinator of the Ottawa Crisis Centre, commented on the increased awareness in Ottawa of the problem of rape, but added: "I don't think IWY had anything to do with that. The Centre's work caused that."

Aside from the financial uncertainty facing the LIP programme, the Centre will also lose grants this year from the Secretary of State and the Department of Health and Welfare, whose financial assistance came from funds set up for IWY only.

Pat Hacker, counsellor with Women's Career Counselling in Ottawa, also foresees cutbacks to women's programmes. She also expressed doubt that promises of affirmative action programmes for women within the federal public service will be honoured by government in the coming year.

Hacker said IWY had no impact on women coming for career counselling. She said women were seeking job advice for the same reasons they always have — financial pressure, death of a spouse, new financial independence. Larger firms are hiring more women, according to Hacker, but she attributed this to public relations and government approval rather than a changed view of women in the workplace.

As long as Health and Welfare spokespeople are denying women a priority, and Manpower officials refuse to educate themselves about women's problems, Hacker feels that IWY is a failure.

"There has been no real effort made in IWY," she pointed out, asking "When will there be an effort?"

The VARSITY

The Undergraduate Newspaper

Flashes from the past: Yesteryear's Varsitys

20 years ago

The Varsity had just been ranked, among all the Canadian University Press papers, as number 17 on the freedom list. A list drawn up informally at the CUP Conference of 1955 placed The Varsity way down on the list of free newspapers because it was noted that more Varsity editors had been fired or suspended than those of any other newspaper. It was also mentioned that The Varsity still submitted to a certain amount of censorship from the Student's Administrative Council.

University College women were informed that they no longer were compelled to wear academic gowns while inside the College. It was stressed that the rights of any women who wanted to wear a gown would not be interfered with.

McGill students volunteered to pay $5,000 to the Montreal Transportation Commission for damages incurred in a "streetcar riot" by students there. The Student Council president admitted that he was "ashamed" of his constituents.

The usual winter wait for bursaries was longer than usual. The Department of Education blamed it on the lateness of the applications. "I'm tired of living off the crusts of people in the Arbor Room," said one of the disgruntled.

Snow or no snow, the Winter Carnival will go on, students were relieved to hear. "Skaters may be swimming next weekend, but the Winter Carnival will go on," said one organizer. Some changes were made. Instead of sleighs, the Chariot Race would employ wheels. The Ice Igloo would have to be made with imported ice, while volunteers to sleep in it for two nights were scarce.

And the South African government, in a fit of paternalism, decided to re-evaluate apartheid.

The food at Sir Dan's residence was the topic of the day. The university was attempting to cut down on second portions in order to improve food quality. The hungry runners were complaining of tastelessness, and general unpalatability.

McMaster students blocked the entrance to the university parking lot to protest that university's recent charge of $2 a month for parking. Students stalled their cars, and asked for change of $20 bills. Some wanted to pay by cheque, others brought handfuls of pennies.

A Vic student, publicity director for the Victoria College production of Guys and Dolls, quit because others involved in the show would not accept his design for the show's publicity poster, which showed the male and female scientific symbols intertwined in a not-so-subtle way. The student felt the symbol was "artistically very good, eye-catching". It just caught the wrong eyes.

A speaker on campus had the temerity to say that alcoholism was worse than drug addiction and accused the government of making money on the sale of legalized death. Boy, if he'd met all the marijuana addicts I have . . .

Pimps: More business!

One of our readers maintains that our present conception of prostitution should be revised. He suggests that the following categories of people should be defined as prostitutes:

- 1) Pimps and Company staff who puts pressure on its employees aimed at involvement in sex activities;
- 2) Both, males and females engaged in sex activities during working hours and or at working place;
- 3) Those offering, asking for and/or accepting a car ride;
- 4) Married men and women which cheat each other without applying for legal separation;
- 5) Men and women engaged in group sex and or having intercourse in public; and
- 6) Men and women who promote group sex, and or live in a commune.

The money-making girls are a product of our schools and the victims of socio-economic conditions. But the point is, that each partnership requires expenses in one form or another. It would be up to the partners to decide how to spend money which is theirs.

Nutritional guidelines bullshit - biochemist

WATERLOO (CUP) — "What we don't know about food... can hurt you, and hurt you very seriously," according to Ross Hall, Biochemistry professor at McMaster University.

Hall was speaking on "Nutrition Fakery in the Food Industry — Food Processors Contribution to Heart Disease and Cancer" as part of a nutrition lecture series at the University of Waterloo.

Hall termed nutrition labelling, required in the States and expected to come to Canada, "very misleading".

"You have very individual requirements for vitamins and minerals," he explained. "The recommended daily allowances are absolutely useless when it comes to predicting your personal requirements."

Hall produced an advertisement which claimed that a 1% ounce bag of potato chips reinforced with Vitamin C is more nourishing than an apple. "Vitamins are no good if the basic nourishment is lousy," Hall said.

The U.S. government has decreed that two "super" donuts (vitamins and minerals added) plus one glass of milk constitutes an "official meal" providing one-third of the daily nutritional needs, Hall said. It is being sold in five states as part of the school lunch program.

When nutritional labelling comes to Canada, the Canadian consumer is going to be completely bamboozled with the connivance of our federal government, he warned. Eighty per cent of food sold in Canada is factory processed or "fabricated", Hall said.

The effect of fabrication on nutritional quality is the loss of nutrients — known and unknown — and the destruction of molecular relationships within any natural food substance, Hall said.

"These relationships are critical to the way in which food is digested, and yet their importance has not been stressed as much as that of nutrients, Hall added.

Most chocolate products such as chocolate chip cookies and eclairs are synthetic, as well as the cheese in any prepared food — for example, macaroni and cheese or pizza, Hall said.

He wondered what the long-term effect might be of eating milk puddings which are treated chemically to keep the starch from breaking down.

In every natural substance there is a mechanism for self-destruction — milk should go sour, bread should go stale, and meat should go rotten, Hall said.

Although the protein in soybeans is very good, processing can result in a loss of two essential amino acids and several minerals, Hall said. As artificial hamburger it doesn't compare to meat for nourishment.

There are no requirements for the synthetic product to be labelled if it appears in a prepared food, he added.

Hall said the practice of striking eggs from the diet because of cholesterol content is "ridiculous". "Whole eggs are probably the most nourishing food possible," he said.

Referring to a chart from a poultry journal, Hall pointed out that over the last 15 years the consumption of eggs has gone down, while the incidence of coronary heart disease has gone up.

Hall added that every cell in the body contains cholesterol, and dismissed the notion of an increased risk of heart attack due to eating cholesterol as "purely cojecture".

People who eat a natural diet, Hall concluded, do not get ulcers or cancer of the colon which is a major killer in Canada and on the rise.

B-Ball Blues connect in Kingston

By DAVID CASS
While it's true that the basketball played last weekend in Kingston was far from being what might be called good, the Blues came away with a two-game win streak to even their season accounting at 3-3. Unbelievably, Toronto is, in the words of Mick Jagger, "just a kiss away" from a post-season berth in perhaps the weakest division in Canada.

Led by Brian Skyvington's 27 pts. and his all-around Bobby Clarke tenacity, the Gaels were gored 75-64 on Friday night. The Blues encore was a 92-69 demolition of the zippy rag-tag cadet corps of RMC on Saturday afternoon following some ribald nocturnal antics that only a jock could love.

After rolling up the sidewalks at 8 pm, the Queen's game presented the only social event of the evening. As such many folks witnessed a total of a dozen travelling violations in the first 3 minutes. However, the travelling soon abated and was replaced by turnovers of every race, creed, and colour that caused the groans in the crowd to resemble the noises usually accompanying a nice wet one.

With Fox and Cook hitting from outside and the truculent Skv controlling both boards, the Blues managed to hold a slim lead in the first half that was unblemished by offense.

The second half proved more exciting as Queen's, led by Swine Swinnard's 26 pts., made a concerted effort to make a game of it. But they fell short mainly because the Queen's stiff resembled the hippos in Walt Disney's "Fantasia". Yet the game was precarious until Z.Z. Zito, on a menacing drive drew a foul and converted one to make it 67-62. Van Cook then stole the ball and waddled in for the crushing layup. Chalk one up to persistence.

RMC presented a match that had no one particularly excited. Indeed, after Queen's this was a case of sloppy seconds. Thus, with an evening of atomic situps ("a little brown-eye never hurt anyone"), prayer meetings, portentous warnings from management (and a general belief that those guys tomorrow are, let's face it, crap), the kids meandered their way into catatonia for the military.

RMC's line-up boasted such unlikely characters as Savage, Sergeant, and Target and needless to say the Blues coasted with Kushi (self-proclaimed All-Canadian if... J Kurczyk towering on defense, Skv scrambling for 15, Preacher Hilbertus bombing away from the demilitarized zone for 20 and Gorzynski pounding the boards for 12, T.O. returned satiated with a .500 record.

Sidelines: . . . Rookie George Gorzynski is known as "the Polish Sausage" due to a peculiar pre-game ritual . . . RMC facilities must be seen to be believed. . . Bert Van Cook with 11 and Wily Fox with 14 rounded out top scorers against the Gaels.

Muskoka X-Country

By TOM BEST

In 1520 Gustav Vasa skied some 53 miles from Salen to Mora to lead Swedish patriots in the overthrow of the Danes in an effort to free Sweden. In 1923 Swedish sportsmen set up the Vasaloppet in memory of the Swedish hero. The loppet, a long distance race, has become a popular tradition in the world of cross-country skiing.

On Sunday the University of Toronto Cross-country team competed in the difficult 30 km. Muskoka Loppet. Tour races such as the one held annually in Muskoka are becoming popular events for both the racing and general touring skiers. Of the eighty-three racers who began the race only seventy-two completed the course.

The race, organized by the Muskoka Winter Association and Jordan Wines, stretches from Hidden Valley to the town of Port Sydney. This race attracts top racers from all over the province.

Richard Sutcliffe, a third year veteran, came from behind to lead the squad finishing 28rd with a strong time of 2 hours, 15 minutes and eleven seconds. Close behind in 25th position was Paul Ketko at 2:16:31, followed by Tom Best in 27th spot at 2:18:33 and Veli Niinimaa, 30th place with a time of 2:19:27. The Nordic team of eight racers fared well in the racing division for the university class. Taking the combined times of the top three racers, Toronto was narrowly edged out over the long distance by Queen's University and had to settle for second place.

This year has been important for building a strong nucleus of skiers for future years. Impressive showings by first year skiers are indicative of the depth on this year's team. Jim Georgas placed forty-third with a good time of 2:26:13. He was followed by Paul Stapleton 49th, at 2:29:49, Grant McCaffrey 53rd at 2:35:31, and Paul Kempainen 60th, with a time of 2:41:00. Special mention should be made of the fine finishing time of Mike Yealland, U.C. Resident advisor, who finished in 58th position with a time of 2:37:03. Other first year Toronto skiers included Lyndon Humber who finished with a time of 2:41:06, Don Gibson at 2:53:14 and Bo Kent completing the race in 3:05:56. The results auger well for this season and the next few years.

On Saturday the combined Men's and Women's team competed in the Joslin Cup Race at Gravenhurst. The Women's Group was very successful in their 5 km event. Susan Rowley took top honours in Senior Ladies division with an excellent time of 27 minutes even. She was closely followed by teammates Bea Hampson and Leslie Thompson tied for third place at 28:43. First year skier Mary-Ann Bonchar improved her performance with a commendable time of 34:34. The Men's Team, racing a 10 km course, was led by newcomer Mike Dyon with his best time to date, 37:52. On the team Veli Niinimaa finished with a strong time of 39:51 followed by Richard Sutcliffe 41:36, Stuart Stark 42:20, Paul Ketko 42:57, Paul Stapleton 44:48, Jim Georgas 46:31, Mike Yealland 48:11, Paul Kempainen 49:17, Grant McCaffrey 55:04, Don Gibson 54:31 and Lyndon Humber 55:40.

The team hosts its own meet in cooperation with Molson's Breweries at Midland Mountainview ski area on Jan. 31st and Feb. 1st. Spectators are welcome to this event.

Janice Greenwood, Captain and Senior competitor on the Toronto team.

Blues seek re-demolition of York

By MEL RASKIN

The Varsity Hockey Blues play two very important league games this week. Tonight, they travel to York for an 8:15 matchup with the Yeomen, and on Friday, they play host to the Laurentian University Voyageurs.

Yeomen are currently four points behind Toronto, thanks to an 8-7 victory over Queen's on Saturday. York had a chance of narrowing the gap to just two points on Sunday, but they were defeated by Waterloo by a score of 6-3. York Coach Dave Chambers is determined that the 11-2 drubbing his team took at the hands of Varsity in their last encounter, won't happen again. Peter Ascherl, a 19-goal scorer for Waterloo last year, has been inserted into the lineup.

statistician, and three of his players took in the York-Queen's encounter Saturday, and gained some insight into York's new game plan.

Then on Friday, Laurentian comes to Varsity Arena for an 8:00 pm matchup against the Blues. The way the standings are right now, every game is very important. The top two teams in the OUA East get home ice for the quarter finals, scheduled for February 20. Furthermore, Laurentian has played more games than any other team, so they must keep winning in order to stay in the running with the other East division teams; Queen's, York, Ottawa, and Toronto.

Blues centre, John Preclous, who played for Laurentian for four years, discussed Friday's game. "Sure, it's going to be really important. One look at the standings shows you that. I remember when I played for Laurentian, we had no trouble getting up for a game against the Blues. They were the perennial champions, and if we could beat them, it was really something. It gave us a real lift last year, when we defeated Varsity in the last game of the regular season. You can be sure Laurentian will be ready for us on Friday."

Laurentian coach Joseph "Bepi" Polano concurred. He admitted to me that of all the teams in the OUA, he likes playing Toronto best, because his team seems to play their best brand of hockey against them.

Last Friday's game against Queen's saw a good fan turnout. The players were really pleased so many came out to the game to cheer them on. They do appreciate your support, so please keep it up. There's an hour's free skating after the game, and admission is just $1.00. In these days of inflation, that's a real bargain. This Friday at 8:00. See you there.

SAC Forces Strike

By JOE WRIGHT

All unionized SAC employees walked off the job, initiating a legal strike as of midnight last night.

Despite an all day mediation session at the Ontario Labour Relations Board yesterday, no agreement was reached between members of CUPE 1222 and SAC.

CUPE 1222 is comprised of the six employees in the SAC office and the two members of the Varsity Advertising department. All SAC services are expected to halt for the duration of the strike. The Varsity will cease publishing regularly with this issue.

Charging inflexibility in the SAC position, chief union negotiator John Bennett said "I firmly believe they could have settled if they hadn't made that the final offer."

After considering the last union offer yesterday morning, Bennett said, SAC negotiators came back with an offer which they said was final.

"They didn't even give us a chance to comment on it," Bennett said. "We hoped we could talk about re-adjustment but they came back and said this is it."

Referring to what had previously been the major obstacle in bargaining, Bennett said: "They made it clear to us that once the matter of job descriptions were settled, money would not be an obstacle to settling."

SAC negotiators said they were disappointed in the breakdown in talks. "We've really made an effort. We made a couple of serious proposals we thought were concessions," said negotiator Tim Buckley.

The SAC domain in friendlier days

SAC objections to the union offer centre on the issue of job classification and the length of the contract. Negotiators said they were surprised by the union's demand for a one-year contract. They maintained bargaining had proceeded on the basis of a two-year settlement.

Bennett however, disputed the claim. "We've never stated a duration for the contract," he maintained. "That depends on the size of the settlement."

Citing the often yearly turnover of staff, Bennett said "We don't feel we have the right to sign on half the members to something they have no say in, just as SAC doesn't like to pass things that are binding on next year's council."

"The wage offer is still less than comparable wages paid elsewhere in the city, and in the second year of their offer they would be less still," said Bennett.

Outlining other objections to the SAC offer, Bennett pointed to the issue of job categorization. "We asked for one (pay scale for everyone), would accept two — but they insist on three."

SAC negotiators said maintenance of job categories was necessary. "Consolidation in the office has caused dissension," according to Buckley.

The SAC offer calls for the three job classifications to receive $160, $135 and $170 per week in the first year and $170 and $180 per week in the second year of the contract.

The union proposal asks for a one year, one category contract with a starting rate of $160 per week and raises to $170 and $180 per week on Jan. 1 and April 1.

The striking workers at the Students Administrative Council have apologized to the Varsity and the students in advance for any inconvenience that will be caused by disruption of publication and other SAC Services.

"We do not have to understand, we have no choice," said union negotiator John Bennett. "We're sorry that SAC couldn't see its way clear to keeping talking."

The union has made it clear that they will do everything it can to help with next week's rally at Convocation Hall.

"We won't do anything to interfere with the rally," said Bennett. "That means we won't picket at Con Hall."

"If the Varsity wants to publish news about the rally, that won't be considered strike-breaking."

The union is presently seeking money for its strike fund and is asking for student support to pressure SAC into returning to the bargaining table. It would also appreciate respect of its picket lines.

Fong decision stands

Henry Fong made no progress yesterday in his fight to overturn the Dec. 18 decision of the Subcommittee on Academic Appeals which upheld an earlier decision requiring him to withdraw from his fourth year of medical school.

Fong and 15 to 20 supporters demonstrated outside Simcoe Hall yesterday as the Academic Affairs committee met to receive for information the subcommittee's report on their decision.

They were hoping Academic Affairs would comment on or possibly reject the subcommittee report. Committee chairman William Dunphy made it clear before the matter was brought up that it was not within the committee's jurisdiction to do so.

Dunphy pointed out that as constituted the decisions of the subcommittee were in effect the decisions of the Governing Council, and that these decisions were reported back to the council solely for information.

"This report is not in front of us for a decision," Dunphy said, "in fact the Governing Council has already decided."

A vote to have the committee deal with the report in closed session, as is the usual procedure in dealing with personal cases, failed for lack of a second. It was felt, since the hearings into Fong's case had been public, that there was no reason to close the committee dealings.

Student member Seymour Kanowitch requested that Fong's counsel, mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal, address the committee but was challenged to show cause by Dunphy. Kanowitch responded that the subcommittee report on the Fong decision had glossed over or omitted several important pieces of evidence and that Rosenthal would be able to clarify some points. The committee voted against allowing him to speak.

Before receiving the report, student members of the committee posed questions to the subcommittee's chairman, Prof. Bruce Dunlop.

Kanowitch, despite protestations from Dunphy, asked a series of questions relating to evidence that he thought the subcommittee had ignored.

Kanowitch noted a section of the subcommittee report that posed the possibility that Fong's original appeal to the Faculty of Medicine Appeals Committee could have been invalidated due to overlapping membership between it and the faculty's Board of Examiners that had originally expelled Fong. The subcommittee had decided to overlook this and make a decision based on the evidence.

Dunlop was questioned as to why the subcommittee had not investigated charges made during the hearing by a former medical student that other students of Chinese origin felt discriminated against by faculty members.

"He (the student) said, and nobody doubted, that some students thought there was discrimination against them. But these people named were not involved in assessing Henry Fong."

Dunlop added later that in his estimation "there is racial prejudice" within the faculty.

When questioning finished, the Committee voted to go into closed session to receive two other reports from the subcommittee.

The committee was jeered and the protesters filed out to the hallway where they had a short meeting to decide their next tactic.

200 Oppose Cutbacks

By GARY SANDS

Over two hundred students from Scarborough College attended an organizing session yesterday for the planned January 21st demonstration at Convocation Hall.

The Scarborough meeting chaired by SAC rep Gary Sands heard an analysis of the Henderson report and its proposed tuition increases of 65 per cent by OFS researcher Dale Martin and SAC External Affairs Commissioner Rob Snell.

Martin pointed out that the statements by provincial government spokesmen "differ substantially from the policy direction that they appear to be heading in". He also expressed concern that the Henderson Report appeared to be dividing faculty and students by forcing them to choose between either massive tuition increases or cuts in teaching staff.

When the chair opened the meeting for a brief general discussion on the Henderson Report's recommendations, two main areas of interest to the Scarborough students arose. The first was the proposed 65 per cent increase in tuition fees and the second was the elimination of the graduate portion of OSAP. This is of particular concern to Scarborough College which has an estimated 40 per cent of the student body receiving student aid, one of the highest percentages in the province.

During the discussion many students expressed interest in the attitude of the NDP and Liberals towards the Henderson Report. Martin pointed out, "The OFS has received substantial support from the NDP, however the policies of the Liberals haven't been too clear, although the degree of student reaction in the next few months might have some influence on their position."

A number of people at the meeting expressed dissatisfaction with the fact that SAC has decided not to back the provincial student demonstration at Queen's Park.

SAC External Commissioner Rob Snell responded by saying that SAC would however, do everything to facilitate Scarborough students attending the January 21st rally by booking a minimum of five buses for the College to take students to the rally.

A petition condemning the Henderson Report was circulated gathering over a thousand signatures. Over two thousand SAC leaflets on the Report were also taken during the forty minute meeting and several students volunteered to help with the rally.

GA calls U of T anti-union

By LEA RYAN

GAA organizer Andy Stanley, said teaching assistants are experiencing the same treatment from the university as they encountered during their year battle to organize. "The university's strategy is to stall on all key issues," he pointed out.

Current negotiations indicate two or three meetings between now and the end of the month when two days are scheduled with the conciliator, said Stanley. "The results of the last set of negotiations this week were to settle a couple of peripheral issues, things like a management rights clause," he added. According to Stanley, there aren't many peripheral issues which can be settled, because the "key issues colour everything else."

The core issues include check-off, job security from one year to the next, a protection against the planned mass firings, limitations on hours of work, and class size, said Stanley. "We have not yet won on any of the key demands because the U of T is an extremely anti-union employer. For instance, they are hiding behind the sessional concept and trying to retain the right to fire someone through non-recallable layoff."

"The university's position is that someone is hired for a set period of time, from September to April and are then terminated and can be rehired in the fall. Our demand is for limited term job security, unless there is an unsatisfactory work performance, a most modest proposal," he said. "The university clings to the right to fire for no reason."

Stanley pointed out the university has forced a 5 per cent budget cut during the next year on the departments. "They want to use us to solve the cutbacks problem in the departments" he said. "This will definitely affect undergraduates. For instance, there's a proposal in the math department to wipe out all first and second year tutorials and replace them with a centre to discuss problems. That means problems will continue to be given, but won't be marked. Final exams will gain more weight. It'll mean a real reversion to the old system, where everything hangs in the balance at once."

"Because we feel the university's position is set, the bargaining team feels that the key issues will still be unsettled after the conciliator's report at the end of the month," Stanley said. "We would be less than responsible if we didn't tell people to hang on to their money. If we are forced to reject conciliation, the possibility of a strike can no longer be ruled out. People should realize that when thinking about their financial situation," he said.

Stanley added he wished the GAA could report that negotiations had been fruitful, but they couldn't compromise on issues which were the reasons the GAA organized in the first place.

Re-introduction of draft feared in US

WASHINGTON (GUARDIAN-CUP) — According to recent news reports, mass military draft registration for 1976 will soon be announced, effectively bringing back the American Selective Service system.

Although the authority of the American president to draft people into the armed forces was allowed to lapse at the end of 1973, Selective Service officials have been quietly working up an ominous new plan. On a certain day in March, soon to be announced, a mandatory mass draft registration will be conducted for all males between the ages of 18 and 26. The one day mass registration will be repeated annually.

While there are no immediate plans for induction of the people registered, they will constitute a "stand by" draft ready to be mobilized by Selective Service should some "national emergency" occur.

Lottery numbers will be given to all 18 year olds, so a call up system will be ready.

The mass registrations will be conducted mainly at colleges and high schools, in keeping with the new government campaign of projecting the military as a natural part of everyday life.

Loch monster living

By BEA HAMPSON
At 1:40 am on the fateful night of August 8, 1972, half a dozen men on a vessel anchored in the chilly waters of a lake in Northern Scotland suddenly became aware of a large object moving beneath them.

Small fish began leaping out of the water around the boat, obviously frightened by something. Seconds earlier sonar equipment picked up readings from an object swimming 45 feet below the surface.

The men on the boat were part of a scientific team headed by the American physicist Dr. Robert Rines. Dr. Rines and his companion Dr. Martin Cline had set up photographic and sonar equipment in the waters of Lochness in the hope of obtaining evidence to prove the existence of the fabled monster. They were rewarded for their efforts that summer with two photographs which after enhancement revealed the outline of a fin — over 6 feet in length.

In a lecture to a packed audience at the Royal Ontario Museum on Tuesday night, Dr. Christopher McGowan described and analysed the most recent scientific data produced on the highly controversial and rather elusive subject of the Lochness monster.

Experts analysing the underwater photographs and sonar readings of the 1972 study said Rines had come into contact with an object which was over 30 feet in length. It possessed an appendage over 10 feet in length (believed to be the fin) and was capable of travelling at a speed of 6 knots.

The Computer Enhancement Laboratories in Pasadena, California reported their corroboration of the photographic and sonar evidence suggested Rines had found a large aquatic animal.

Three years later, in June 1975, Rines returned to Lochness, he told the audience. By this time he had ironed out the technical difficulties which had obscured his previous photographs. Soon after, the camera and sonar equipment were placed in position for the second study, the automatic timer was set off.

At 11:45 am a photograph was taken which under later observation clearly depicted a head. The audience was shown a picture which revealed it had eyes, a raised ridge over the snout region, nostrils and horns. One of the scientific observers interviewed by a New York Times correspondent described it "as hideous, angular, bony and revolting."

Dr. McGowan pointed out that the clear and detailed photographs obtained during last summer's observations confirmed the reports of many of the ratified visual sightings of the monster.

When asked if the monster resembled any prehistoric reptile he was familiar with, Dr. McGowan replied he could not positively identify it as yet, emphasizing more evidence was needed. McGowan claimed one could not rule out the possibility the monster was an air-breathing reptile. He said frequently rough conditions on the 24 mile long lake obscured the probability of more frequent sightings.

In the past there have been frequent problems with people fabricating evidence about the existence of the Lochness monster. McGowan maintains the possibility of the latest and by far the most tangible evidence being false is very slim. "There are too many people with too much to lose who are directly involved," he said.

McGowan did not feel the Nessie craze would endanger the livelihood of the species. Anyone who is foolish enough to put a foot into Lochness with a spear gun would be devoured by the natives, he said. More viable methods of protection are being considered by the British House of Commons at present, he added.

Dr. McGowan was invited to Britain in December by the Royal Society of Edinburgh to attend a scientific symposium on the subject of the Lochness monster.

But the symposium was never held due to the excessive publicity it received. However, its members were invited by a number of concerned members of Parliament to discuss the issue in the British House of Commons.

Grading guidelines get going over

By KAREN MCGUIRE

In the beginning God created the exam and grading.

And the grade was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the Faculty.

And the Spirit of Change moved upon the face of the Faculty and said, Let there be standardized grading, and it was a long time coming.

New issues have evolved and many points of contention among sectors of the university community have been clarified since the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards first became distressed in 1974 over a lack of standardization in evaluative procedures at the University of Toronto.

Concern was focused on apparent fluctuations in grading patterns among the various departments of Arts and Sciences. In response to the problem, Curriculum and Standards set out to devise guidelines for the normalization of grades and evaluative procedures.

The resulting recommendations are now before the Academic Affairs Committee for modification before being sent to the Governing Council for revision and implementation.

Academic Affairs committee chairman W.B. Dunphy, described the main thrust of the grading policy review as "a desire for uniformity in evaluative criteria across faculties, and departments within the faculties."

Law professor and committee member R.E. Skane elaborated on Dunphy's comments. "At this point transcripts from different departments lack meaning. They need some kind of standardization to be useful. Without that, everyone's degree is cheapened."

SAC president Gord Barnes concurred with Dunphy's statement about the need for greater uniformity in grading procedures, but was disappointed with the committee's resulting recommendations.

"The committee is too involved with the evaluative aspect of ranking students in relation to each other. Rather than focusing predominantly upon the marking scheme, the standardization of evaluative procedures should facilitate an improved quality of teaching and learning."

These divergent points of view came into confrontation at last night's meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee where several grading recommendations came under debate.

In response to a set of recommendations drawn up by the committee in November, Dunphy submitted a modified set of proposals.

"The committee had proposed that during the first week of classes in each course, students shall be presented with the proposed method of evaluation for discussion and possible amendment, subject to final approval by the instructor."

Dunphy submitted a recommendation providing for the instructor's explanation of the method of evaluation "as early as possible"

Academic Affairs member Brad Nixon pointed out that Dunphy's revised recommendation removed the possibility of a democratic exchange of views between students and the instructor. In addition, Nixon pointed out later, Dunphy's recommendation vaguely outlined the occasion for such discussion, removing the clause, "during the first week of classes."

Nixon remarked, "Such obscurity could be detrimental to the student's welfare as he were unaware of the method of evaluation until after he was unable to withdraw from the course."

Dunphy's revised recommendation was rejected by the committee in preference to the earlier proposal after a short discussion.

Disagreement also focused in a subsequent discussion over another of Dunphy's recommendations. Dunphy proposed "All modes of written term work that constitute one-third or more of the final grade should be returned to students with appropriately detailed commentary either in writing or orally."

Nixon pointed out that many pieces of term work constitute less than the proposed minimum of one-third of the final grade and that, in such cases the instructor's commentary could not be enforced.

"A grade without commentary is often insufficient," Nixon stressed. "A student regards the evaluative process as a form of constructive criticism. A grade alone is inadequate and does not facilitate the student's learning experience."

In a counter-recommendation accepted by the committee, Nixon proposed that "All modes of written term work should be returned to students with appropriate written commentary," and that "For all modes of term work that constitute more than one-half of the final grade, the instructor must allow appropriate time for discussing with each student the piece of work itself, the comments made, and the grade assigned."

This latter clause, he remarked, would ensure that evaluation could be a part of the educational process, and would give the instructor an opportunity to detect any plagiarism in a student's work.

Gord Barnes is still unsatisfied with the recommendations of the committee. He would like to see final examinations returned to students with comments. "The learning experience of a student should not end on the last day of examinations," he said.

Recommendations of the Academic Affairs Committee are still under review and will be subject to further modification.

1st '76 threat bombs

By ERIC MCMILLAN

It was a slow day in the cop shop Wednesday when the call came through.

"Listen carefully," said a young male voice on the other end. "A bomb is scheduled to go off in Sidney Smith Building this afternoon."

Within minutes U of T campus cops were searching Sid Smith floor by floor. The building was not evacuated but office workers were allowed to leave if they wanted, although most stayed in the brave work.

Deputy Chief Jack Irwin directed the search from the lobby. "Get a hold of Max and give another shakedown completely," he barked into his walkie talkie as reporters pestered him for details of the threat.

"I don't form any conclusions. We have to assume what we're told," he answered when asked for his suspicions about the caller. Bomb threats are more common during exam time when students have a stake in postponed schedules Irwin explained. He wondered aloud whether any tests were lined up for that afternoon.

Meanwhile students were stopped before entering the building. "There's a bomb threat in this building. You may enter at your own risk," Office Denis Studders warned. Most took up the offer of a legitimate excuse for skipping classes.

Metro Police received an identical bomb threat just before the campus police but did not show up at the scene.

Irwin said campus police were in touch with the boys downtown. "Metro is at our beck and call," he explained. "If we find anything we can get the bomb squad here in minutes."

Manager of Protective Services and Communications Division G.W. Huff said later, "We don't evacuate buildings anymore, especially high rises. They get so many threats downtown."

Last year U of T had three such scares, none of which were more than scares. Deputy Chief Irwin couldn't recall ever finding a real bomb in the nine years he's been with campus police. (But then he's never been to the SAC free movies.) Since a few years ago the number of bomb threats has decreased, he reported.

Huff discounted the theory of panicked students calling in the threats to forestall scheduled tests. Although "we never find out who it is," Huff speculated, "Usually it's some crank and usually someone from outside the university." Probably "someone mentally disturbed," he said.

Stranded JMC 300 students (China in Revolution) were spotted wandering the police-patrolled halls of Sid Smith, terrified the revolution had begun while they were in class. Varsity staffers denied phoning the threat because it was a slow news day.

Gov't puts boots to teachers

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

Education Minister Thomas Wells yesterday introduced legislation forcing teachers back to work under a settlement to be reached by an appointed arbitrator within 30 days. The settlement will be binding on both parties for a term of two years.

Citing "solid evidence" which "indicates clearly that a continuation of the strike will place in jeopardy "secondary school students' educations, Wells told a tense legislature the onus was now on MPPs "to deal quickly and responsibly" with the situation.

Liberals indicated they would support the Bill "in principle," and it is expected to be implemented without major changes.

The first Bill of the new year would require teachers to return to the classrooms on Monday, and outlaws any work-to-rule they might consider implementing. Within one week of its approval in the house, both parties in the dispute must submit their final positions to the new arbitrator.

Fines of up to $10,000 for organizations and $500 for individuals per day can be levied for contravention of the Act.

Despite past statements of concern for the students and acknowledgement of the Ministers ability in handling the dispute in the past, opposition MPPs were unexpectedly critical of the Bill.

NDP Leader Stephen Lewis charged the Minister was guilty of "hypocrite" and "right on" he told Davis "Maybe I have an overly romantic view of the Premier's office" but he said Davis had established "a record in this dispute for arbitrators and interlopers" when personal prestige could have been used.

Speaking amidst cries of "hypocrite" and "right on" he told Davis "Maybe I have an overly romantic view of the Premier's office" but he said Davis had established "a record in this dispute for arbitrators and interlopers" when personal prestige could have been used.

Lewis referred to the arbitrator as a "poor beggar (who has no authority whatsoever" sarcastically citing the Anti-Inflation Boards "thoughtful, rational decision" to limit wage increases.

He advocated continuing collective bargaining guaranteeing at least the last board offer extended to the teachers. Both the Board and the teachers, however, conceded that an irrevocable impasse had been reached in their briefs to the Education Relations Committee.

Liberal Leader Robert Nixon told Davis there was still "a residue of respect for the Premier" which he could have used to force an early conclusion to the strike. He said the record length (37 days) of this strike was caused "due to a lack of vision on the part of the Minister".

Although Wells had met many times with both parties and the arbitrator, Nixon agreed with Lewis that Wells should have met with them more often and with a firmer approach. Wildly gesticulating, he asserted he had no complaint with the decisions of the Anti-Inflation Board "and anyway it doesn't matter if I have."

He affirmed his support of the teachers right to strike and said "I believe in the strength of Bill 100" that gave it to them.

Conservative Premier Bill Davis returned the fire by asserting there had been clarity in Mackenzie King's "convolution and crystal-ball gazing" approach compared to the NDP. He charged Lewis with being contradictory for urging a return to work while pressing for continued negotiation, already proved fruitless by the 37 day strike.

Wells made particular reference to the Bill's cancellation of the rest of the teachers Professional Activity Days. He said this move had been suggested "so that every available day will be used to help students."

No lengthening of the school year or school day was suggested, although Wells had earlier mentioned this as a possibility.

Calling Ms. Tracy

By LINDA GUTRI

Why might anyone be on a search for Dick Tracey's female counterpart? Because he needs a female private investigator, of course.

President and owner of the Canadian Investigation Bureau, Philipp Varels said he's been advertising with the Career Counselling and Placement Centre for the position since last fall. Often two or three women apply in one day, but most of them are turned down, he said.

Applicants must pass an oral test exhibiting intelligence and a capacity for spontaneous reaction to different situations, Varels said. In addition, she must be a landed immigrant over 21, and supply two pictures of herself to be licensed.

Asked if slyness was an asset for investigators Varels said, "This is an advantage, but is not necessary, if a person is smart it is not necessary to be sneaky, but he must be able to react fast, properly, feel free, be smiling, laughing and joking."

Being a licensed bureau of investigation, Varels said he didn't mind having a story published about his business, because, "You're not going to talk about any particular person, you're going to talk general," he explained.

His company specializes in divorce cases, but also deals with accident, theft and even some criminal cases. The twenty-two employees, 16 of which are women, receive $3-$7 per hour depending on past experience and qualification. Cameras are supplied and all expenses are paid by the company.

An alumnus of U of T, having received his Bachelor of Sciences degree here, Varels said he prefers to hire students from U of T to do part-time work. He always gives them simple work, usually divorce cases. The job is to, "Follow the people to see if they have boyfriends or girl friends, take pictures if necessary."

"It is a serious matter," he said and is done strictly for legal purposes.

Whom are the SAC reps speaking for?

A newspaper, while not unbiased, should keep the events on the news pages and the opinions on this page. The news can be reported according to a certain bias while being fair to arguments on all sides. However the events of Wednesday's SAC meeting and the bias of this reporter are irreconcilable.

The two main topics on the SAC agenda were the rally to be held at Convocation Hall next Wednesday and the deadlocked situation between the SAC executive and their own workers.

"Do the work and don't beef" said one SAC rep to a very harassed union-worker negotiator. And then later said rep came on to executive member Rob Snell about the rally implying that there's nothing to worry about and the government is doing a good job.

"I didn't come here to listen to political toaming at the mouth," said another rep to Snell, after he had tried to present a detailed survey of some recommended government policies. Snell is far from radical, you understand.

These comments seemed to represent the mood of the majority of voting members of the meeting. What has us worried is where they think they get their mandate? Are there no cutbacks, or are the students here truly behind the government in their attempt to cut spending? Are the SAC reps truly representative of this campus?

The SAC executive, by every means available is stalling the building of a progressive student movement. They use personal politics, they use lies, they use red herrings, and why?

The fees are going up, the loans are going up, the cost of living is going up. They've all been going up for the past five years, and every year we get more personal bullshit, more lies and more red herrings.

And now The Varsity is going under. The mechanics of the SAC strike are such that The Varsity is unable to publish. We can't say anything, we can't be nice to the right wing boxes, we can't be nice to the left-wing boxes and we can't try to be nice to everyone who thinks there's no problem at all. So what, in all objective fairness, did the SAC meeting accomplish?

They said they want to build a rally, but they got us rally leaflets and meaningless posters to do it with. They said they have all faith in the executive to continue negotiations, but the union is tired of twenty-year-olds telling them what to do and for how much.

Meanwhile the Ontario Federation of Students, and some out-of-worker student organizers are trying to accommodate a massive student sentiment that says "no" to cutbacks, "no" to the Henderson Report, "no" to crowded classes, higher fees and lower grants.

There's a bus load of students coming from Sudbury. There are six buses coming from Ottawa, and from Hamilton, London, Waterloo and Peterborough and St. Catharines.

All that SAC has to do is tell them where to meet. And they tool around one evening, in a back room with hardly anyone in attendance. So to hell with it, it never happened.

Don't forget the rally next Wednesday. Bye-bye.

SAC workers explain the strike

The membership of CUPE 1222 of The Varsity and the SAC office feel that the January 15th offer by SAC is a substantial improvement over the December 8th proposal. Although our contract ended September 30th, SAC made no move to serious negotiations until December 8th. Job descriptions have been a serious impediment to any settlement. Finally SAC agreed yesterday to continue the system of job descriptions which has been in force for three years, and removed that block.

Although present salary levels are almost acceptable to union members, they have affirmed that the distribution of wages remains unsatisfactory. Additionally, the union is willing to accept a salary offer which is in fact less than parity with other student organizations. We cannot accept the two year offer because that offer would, in two years time, put us in the same unsatisfactory position we are in now — which has made contract negotiations so difficult. The increment for the second year as presently offered is insufficient to meet even the new "controlled" rate of inflation.

Finally, CUPE 1222 would like to reiterate that settlement could be reached without an increase in cost to SAC, and that we believe that had SAC remained at the bargaining table, we would not be on strike today.

Union members have agreed that the rally on Jan. 21 in response to the Henderson Report is a matter of concern to all Ontario university students. Even though SAC has participated in organizing the rally, union members will not interfere with that event.

Zoo student ticked off

To the Editor:

This letter is written in order to complain about a term test in Zoology 226 worth 30 per cent of the final mark in that course. Five of the nine questions on that test were taken from last year's term tests. These tests were not available to all students equally, but only those who had friends who had taken the course before. Term tests are not available in the library.

When the Arts and Science Student Union complained to the Professor responsible for this course, he refused to make any adjustment in the marks or set a new test. Rather he said that this type of test is given all of the time and that those students who were really interested in the course were the ones that had copies of the test and that they deserved to do well. As mentioned above though, this is not the case.

Most of the students enrolled are interested in this course, but only the ones who "know somebody" are able to benefit by studying from old tests. Marks are important in this course as it is one that is used by many students who are applying for medicine. Marks should be given for a knowledge of Zoology rather than an aptitude for beating the system.

When Professors say that this type of thing happens all of the time, they show that Zoology Professors are either lazy, irresponsible or incapable of setting new and proper tests. I want the department of Zoology to intervene in this case, and either reset this 30 per cent term test entirely or decrease the value significantly and set another new test in addition.

The Arts and Science Student Union has unsuccessfully pressed the Zoology department on this issue, and have been unable to get any commitment. I hope that the department can be made to see the obvious injustice of this situation and will intervene as I have suggested above.

Fong should be re-assessed

With regard to the compulsory withdrawal of Mr. Henry Fong from the Faculty of Medicine, the Chinese Students' Association of the University of Toronto has twice expressed publicly that the University should investigate into and disclose its findings about the incident so as to ensure that no injustice has been done. Recently the verdict has come out that Mr. Fong's appeal be defeated. In the statement supporting the verdict, however, the university has failed to explain satisfactorily certain facts, thus making the soundness of its judgement very disputable. They are the following:

- The conflicting assessments about this student by different professors.
- The letter sent by Dr. Albert Leung to Dr. Steiner and the circumstances prompting the writing of that letter.

• The delay in the advice of a failure in surgery, when an earlier advice would have enabled Mr. Fong to take remedial measures in the "elective period".

In the absence of satisfactory explanation about the foregoing, it is only reasonable for us to infer injustice in the incident. In view of the conflicting evidence about the ability of this student we deem that neither competence nor incompetence has been demonstrated about him in the evidence brought forward in the hearings. Because prejudice is an elusive attribute to demonstrate unequivocally, and because several witnesses did testify Mr. Fong's ability, we feel it is to the benefit of justice that the abilities of this student be reassessed, preferably in another medical school.

Students should support rally

To the Editor:

The OFS is organizing a rally and demonstration this Wednesday to protest the education cutbacks projected by the Henderson Report. These actions deserve the full support of students at U of T.

When the Henderson Report was released last November, Ontario Treasurer Darcy McKeough denied that its recommendations represented government policy. Recent events indicate otherwise. Wednesday's Varsity disclosed government intentions to raise the loan ceiling by $200. Yesterday, Toronto dailies carried an announcement by the Ontario government stating that tuition fees would be one of the few items in the province not formally covered by the federal government's controls program. This is a clear warning that we can expect a tuition fee hike in line with the Henderson report's recommendations.

At its Wednesday council meeting SAC endorsed the rally against the Henderson report but defeated by a margin of only one vote a proposal that it also support the demonstration following the rally. Only one other member institution, the OFS is not supporting the demonstration. The main reason given by SAC president Gord Barnes for opposing the demonstration was that if it were small it would be counter-productive.

This fear is obviously unfounded. Already an estimated 1,000 students from outside Toronto will be attending. A good turnout by students from Ryerson, York and U of T will make this one of the largest demonstrations ever by university and college students in Ontario against education cutbacks.

The past five years has shown repeatedly that education cutbacks are not due to government bungling or "honest" mistakes. They are part of a carefully worked out plan to cut social service spending. Consequently, small meetings between student representatives and government ministers will not change government policy. Only a massive counter-mobilization by students can prevent the government from implementing further cutbacks.

Wednesday's rally and demonstration can initiate a campaign and begin the building of a province-wide movement with the power to block the implementation of the Henderson report. Everyone opposed to the cutbacks should help to organize and attend these important actions.

Exec explains their side

To the Editor:

Students are going to face some reduction in the services provided to them by SAC due to the imminent strike by the SAC office staff (members of CUPE 1222). After lengthy negotiations, yesterday we reached the final offer — the SAC employees were currently being paid a base rate of $124-$134 per week and were offered in negotiations base rates of $160-$165-$170. In the second year of the contract the base rate would be increased to $170-$175-$180. In addition we are offering the following benefits: OHIP payments, Extended Health Care, Dental Plan 7, Canada Pension and Unemployment Insurance. A major difference between the union and the SAC negotiating teams was job descriptions. Until yesterday the SAC negotiating team wanted to have slightly more flexible job descriptions, but this matter was conceded and SAC agreed to have the rigid job descriptions wanted by the Union.

This entire offer has been rejected. The Union wants to have no pay scale differential and a one year contract. We have been proceeding with negotiations for several months now and regret that they have ended in a strike.

Varsity staff: "Avert the strike"

The government is attacking post-secondary students throughout the province of Ontario by cutting back on education spending. The Henderson Report is a direct blow. Students are in the process of building a resistance movement. A rally and demonstration on January 21st are on the agenda.

In this situation, the U of T is faced with a strike on the part of the 8 SAC employees. Their demands are completely reasonable. SAC has moved this week. They must be encouraged to move more, to avert a strike.

SAC represents the students of this campus. They should be progressive employers, paying adequate wages. They also have a responsibility to lead the students of this campus, particularly during a period when they are under attack.

A strike will temporarily paralyze the initial efforts made in this direction. SAC and the SAC workers have to sit down and sort things out. We need maximum unity in the face of the enemy. The provincial government is the enemy of both students and workers. Unite to oppose the cutbacks. Avert the SAC strike.

REVIEW

Aristocratic Quebecois used to languish by the hour beside the St. Lawrence, diverting themselves by reciting smutty limericks.

Didja hear the one about the jeune matelot's scarf?

The Canadian Limerick Book
Hugh Oliver & Keith MacMillan
General Publishing, $4.95

The Canadian Limerick Book is, from an admittedly narrow point of view, a delightful book — despite its lack of humour, despite its lack of taste, and despite its lack of even passable limericks. These limericks are delightfully atrocious and, in fact, at times so poor that one must laugh at them. The book is, simply, a poor one. We need not make no fanfare here, we need not condemn General Publishing for printing such trash, nor need we bewail the possible dangers of such lacklustre work upon future Canadian writing. Our literature is far too strong, too solid and too good to fear this tiresome collection of verse.

Any person who reads these so-called limericks will soon discover that they are presented under headings such as "Quebec", "The Maritimes", "Ontario", and so on. However, the artificiality of these subject divisions soon becomes clear. Although appropriate towns and cities are used in each section, they play no part other than to complete the rhyme (often ineptly) in bad puns.

A chapter such as "Quebec", for example, never really pokes fun at the French-Canadian, nor even the English-Canadian way of seeing the French-Canadian. When considering the section entitled "The Prairies", one finds, once again, nothing particularly striking in the humour, nothing that could possibly be construed as amusing about this section of Canada. The chapter titles could be shuffled like cards and no chapter would suffer or improve. Even the title The Canadian Limerick Book is pretentious nonsense, for there is nothing which could even be remotely considered as "Canadian" humour in these pages.

Although these detriments would be enough to condemn most works, our limerick book does not stop here. The authors warn us of their "four-letter stance", and that it is an essential part of their humour. Anyone squeamish about four-letter words such as hole, rape and dong (which seem to be used most predominantly) should turn to other printed matter. How honest is even this claim? Well, let a quotation from the text speak for itself:

Voir le jeune matelot de Quebec,
With a dong that hung down to the deck;
So to keep it from harm,
And to keep himself warm,
He just wound it around at the neck.

This reviewer can only suggest that a number of magazines provide both better and "dirtier" jokes. And they don't annoy the reader with illustrations of a man with a peculiarly shaped scarf strung about his neck, just in case the reader is unfamiliar with the language of the street. Yet, if your bathroom lacks reading material or if you need umpteen new verses for "Ky-yi-yi-yi", by all means spend the $4.95 on this book. At the very least it will make rather expensive kleenex.

Debauchery, intrigue and mouldering mattresses

Memoirs
Tennessee Williams
Doubleday, $9.95

Tennessee Williams cannot keep a secret about himself. A very untrustworthy, very frolicsome great man. He began to write this autobiography in 1972 and found his past filled such a large chunk of the present that he didn't finish it until now. He didn't sweat blood over it; it seems that all the sweat and guts were spilled over the past four decades. So he swept it all up and flourished the title Memoirs onto it. Hence we may read a mop bucket. It's not clean at all, not sweet in the least, but swirling with sordid little incidents squeezed out into a rather shapeless morass. It's very honest, as is almost any dump.

There is no inherent condemnation in calling a book a dump. Some of the most exquisite joys are found in rooting through piles of mouldering mattresses (of which Williams left behind in his amorous hopscotch). It may be that the debilitated mystique of America—the New Orleans sweatsoot of "A Streetcar Named Desire", the shoe factory despair of "The Glass Menagerie", and the sad sultry sex of "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof"—that fleshes Williams' plays animates his life. It is not a rare parallel in the histories of writers. Yes, Tennessee's life was down in the dumps; there are files on him and the cheery wave that Memoirs tosses in their direction is meant to greet them, and not at all to let him know that he had indeed been living?

The rot set in during 1911. Williams was born then, somewhere deep in the heartlessness of Mississippi, and he moved to St. Louis to adolescence with remarkably little grace. His sister Rose was already catapulting towards madness and his father liked his glass too well. In the end, life didn't treat him; he had to pay for everything. A succession of lovers dominated his attention, if the book is to be believed; the life of the theatre, he protests, speaks for itself, and that leaves only a chronicle of love and lust, and if there's a coarser term Williams plumbed it. He writes little of the drama except as it riddled his sensitivity with intrigues and passions; there is no theory and a surfeit of emotion. Of course, dumps contain very few philosophic treatises and much festering vegetable matter.

Have we a mess of pottage, then? It is not easy to judge a work that is confessed by the author to be a stream of consciousness, that seems more a sewer of conscience in which a constant flow of sordid, noisome lumps makes its way. The style is simple and poignant, if style need be imputed to it. Just so is a sad joke. It is as open and lucid as Rousseau's Confessions, but if Rousseau professed to teach men a lesson, Williams seems to want to teach himself. It is wise, and peopled with names that the most sure-fingered among us would like to drop. So too is a satire on all that posers hold most dear. If Boswell tells the life of Johnson, then Williams tells the sick leave of Williams.

No, it just won't do. There is no redeeming quality to an antihomeric epic of a man trying perversely to get away from home, no joy to a string of debauches and insanities, no profit in the recesses of a man's mind without the public counterparts, no nothing. The sole virtue of this carrion — and it is everything in a literature unfettered from academia — is that it cannot be proverbially put down. Can a dump not have a fine prospect?

Collective creates cacophony: reviewer suffers

CJRT staged the second of its benefit concerts last Tuesday night at Basin Street. Along with the Jim Galloway Quartet, which plays every night, the Ted Moses Quintet and the Canadian Creative Music Collective were there.

Jim Galloway's group plays standard Dixieland-type stuff. Galloway himself plays baritone, tenor and a curved soprano sax. His playing, though of very good quality, is not at all imposing. I imagine he has worked very hard to develop a style which does not interrupt conversations that are going on in the same room. The bassist in the Quartet is also very good, if anything, better, and entirely unassuming in ensemble playing, but his solos were doubtless the most interesting of anyone's in that group. About halfway through their 11:00 set, a young guitarist by the name of Ross Hunt joined the Quartet. The sound of his amplifier was a little muddy, but his staccato playing was clean and precise. He could really make his solos swing and yet, he did not sacrifice any "musicality" or interest: when he played, everyone listened.

The Ted Moses Quintet is an unusual group in that the bassist, the trumpet player and Kaihy Moses, who plays flute and tenor, are excruciatingly mediocre while Ted Moses himself and his drum player are extremely talented musicians verging on being first-rate. Moses plays the piano and soprano sax with seemingly equal facility. His ensemble playing is imposing and interesting while his solos were positively dominating. However, as I say, the discrepancy in the quality of the playing within the group is so great as actually to detract from the quality of the group as a whole.

The CCMC plays a sort of music for which I have not yet developed an appreciation.

While I would not exactly call it cacophonous, the harmonies are so subtle as to be almost imperceptible to me and, I noticed, to many others. Beyond that, I decline to commit myself, since I do not really understand their music.

However, there appeared to be very minimal interaction among the musicians to keep a tune going. But more significantly, there was absolutely no interaction between the musicians and the audience. Since these two sorts of interaction are, to me, the essence of jazz and, moreover, have not been eschewed by even the finest and most progressive of artists, I found myself quite disappointed with the concert as a whole.

Scobie-dobie fans can hear Dave Brubeck and others on CJRT-FM which needs $150,000 to survive.

Small contribution aids CJRT and jazz lovers - raise $$'s and standards

CJRT is one of the most important cultural resources of Toronto. It provides its listeners with the most consistently high-quality programming of any radio station in the city without any commercial interruption whatever. CJRT broadcasts many hours of "Classical" music each week. There is a rock show and one devoted entirely to Big Band Music. They also offer Open College courses in Medieval and Renaissance Music, The Canadian Novel and the History of Science. But its value is... most apparent in its jazz programming. CJRT is the only station in Toronto that has a regularly scheduled jazz programme and Ted O'Reilly's The Jazz Scene, which is broadcast every weekday evening and all morning and part of the evening on Saturday, for a total of 24 hours per week, is a good jazz show by anyone's standards.

CJRT is supported to the extent of 80 per cent of its budget by the government, but must acquire the other 20 per cent through contributions. In an attempt to raise the requisite $150,000, Ted O'Reilly is hosting a series of six evenings of jazz at the Basin Street club on Queen St. Virtually all the notable jazz musicians in Toronto have volunteered their services for the benefit of CJRT. The last two nights of benefit shows will be Friday the 16th and Saturday the 17th January, and for a contribution of $2.00, you can hear Mike Stewart and Keith Blackly along with the Ed Bickers Trio on Friday night and The Humber College Big Band and the Artist Jazz Band on Saturday. The Jim Galloway Quartet plays the set from 11:00 to midnight every evening and other musicians sit in on their set and jam. If you can't make it to the concerts, they are being broadcast on CJRT (91.1 FM) from 10:00 to 1:00.

Even if you don't like jazz, it is almost impossible to live in this city without profiting by the existence of CJRT and there must be few in Toronto who do not owe the station some small contribution to help it continue the fine work it has been doing.

EXPERTS SAY: proliferation of meaningless prose may bring end of civilization as we know it

The Review has obtained evidence of a fiendishly clever plot to bore Toronto area dissident groups into a state of unconsciousness. A crack Review team of cultural analysts went to work on the document printed below—apparently an all-purpose "meeting report"—and came up with a unanimous conclusion.

BORING

"This is without a doubt the most boring document I've ever seen," said prose-lover Bill Simpson. "Not only does it say absolutely nothing, it is also written in the most turgid and roundabout style imaginable. I wouldn't want to be on the receiving end of too many of these babies," Simpson said.

Cultural analyst Simpson in rare moment of wakefulness

The outlines of the plot are frightening in their simplicity. Since dissident groups have an insatiable appetite for printed material, specially-trained agents ennuvants (as opposed to the clumsy agents provocateurs of earlier days) can easily sneak spurious documents into their circles. It is estimated that only two or three applications of the specially-prepared documents are needed to reduce activists from their usual state of sharp-witted discrimination to a hortifying morose stupor.

"This could be the biggest threat to Canadian leftists since the Opportunities for Youth program," an unidentified rad told the Review. (Caution: those with a low tolerance for stuffifying material are advised to read only every second sentence of the following document.)

GROUPS, INDIVIDUALS

"The meeting on brought together a number of distinct groups and individuals under the general rubric of a meeting for a general exchange of ideas and insights. Many common assumptions and precepts were discussed and shared by many of the participants, some of whom came from Toronto and the surrounding metropolitan region. Many issues were discussed such as the need to relate to people in order to effect a means whereby effective dissemination of ideas and insights could be effected. Although differing opinions diverged, a common agreement was discovered in the need for amicable accord in all facets of activity.

INSIGHTS

The meeting was moderately though not extremely unsuccessful, however, in providing a forum where different insights could be focussed on the question of meaningful dialogue. Despite the limitations imposed by the difficulties of intersubjective communication, reasonable though not overwhelming success was achieved in a number of areas. A number of people attended the meeting thus giving evidence of purposive activity and common assumptions.

DIFFERENCES

Numerous needs became articulated during the course of the meeting at different times and in different ways. They were also expressed in different places as well as in different tones of voice. Several were especially evident and particularly prominent. Those that stood out were the need for clarity in the dissemination of informational material vis a vis the more or less well defined parameters of the basic guidelines that by and large were embodied in whole or in part by the consensus developed over time during the course of the meeting. There was also expressed a feeling generated by disorientation caused by inability to interpret correctly the basic guidelines describing means of entrance and egress from the meeting room. This feeling, often expressed as that of "being lost", was a source of frustration to those who experienced it. Creative discussion did arise but this tended to happen either before or after the meeting. There was a tendency for such creative discussion that did occur during the meeting to happen somewhere else and to take place among people who were not in attendance at the meeting.

DEVELOPMENTS

While many of the shortfalls and inadequacies of the meeting were due to the insufficiency of attempts at maximizing clarity among the attendees with regard to aims and objectives desired with respect to practical activities, a better organizational methodology aimed at focussing on in-depth planning toward the goal of more and better organization could plausibly have laid the foundation and cleared the way for the discussion of ways to achieve the above objectives. A greater reliance on small group sessions consisting of interested groups and individuals, particularly at the beginning and end of the meeting as well as during the middle portions of it could have facilitated fruitful developments."

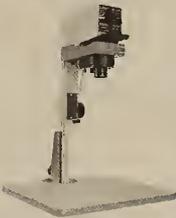

MR. DARKROOM

It was never my intention to lean on the commercial aspect of our business in this series. However, at several recent public colour printing demonstrations a very blunt question has been asked. "Why is Durst equipment so much more expensive than other brands?" To fully appreciate the reasons for price difference we must refresh our understanding of the true function of an enlarger.

Any enlarger performs one major function: that of taking a small negative or slide and magnifying it into a print of the required size. This may be anything from album-size to a wall mural. Print quality depends on efficiency of the lighting system and correct alignment of negative carrier and lens system. When these two all-important components function poorly the end result suffers. The question is, what do you look for to make sure that every possible enlarger benefit is working for you. Notice that I use the word benefit, not feature. If you analyze a "feature" list, many of the facts listed mean nothing at all when translated to terms of what they do to create a better enlargement.

First, is the enlarger steady? Is the column rigid enough to support the head steadily, and designed to allow turning of the head to project on a wall or even the floor when you want a bigger print than can be done on the baseboard. Is the elevating mechanism firm enough to permit easy raising and lowering yet hold the head in a fixed position during printing? As to the lamphouse itself, how is it constructed? On a Durst it will be either a one-piece casting or stamped rigid metal. If the unit has bellows are they plate-riveted in place or only glued? Are the lamphouse and mounting plate held together securely? Is the negative carrier an integral part of the lamphouse assuring perfect alignment with the light path? Can you adjust the lamp vertically and horizontally to compensate for flaws within the bulb itself? While we're on the lamp, with Cibachrome taking its place in the amateur darkroom the need for bright, efficient illumination becomes more important, as this superb material is slower than presently existing colour printing paper. Thinking colour automatically raises the question of a colourhead. Two of our lower priced units do not accept this, but all Durst enlargers have a filter drawer as standard equipment. Can you change negative formats quickly and easily? Are accessory negative carriers and condensers available? Is the lens-mount standard? Do you need a compact unit that disassembles easily? The "take-apart" unit for portability and easy storage was created many years ago by Durst.

In a nutshell, look for an enlarger designed with top quality printing in mind. Don't be sidetracked by fancy design and "gimmicks". For a preview of the Durst enlarger family drop me a line. My nine-step Darkroom Chart will show you how easy it is to be a blow-up expert, and you'll also receive a brochure on darkroom accessories by the Paterson people, who also believe that equipment should be designed for use, not used for their design.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

ELECTION ANNOUNCEMENT

The following are excerpts from Election Guidelines 1976, a document setting out the procedures for the Elections to the Governing Council discussed below. Copies of the complete Election Guidelines 1976 are available from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, telephone 928-6576, where any additional enquiries may also be directed.

Should further election announcements and information scheduled for publication in the Varsity be unavailable because of a possible strike which would involve the Varsity, please see the University of Toronto Bulletin, where this information will also be published, or contact the Governing Council Secretariat.

The election shall be by mailed ballot, and information regarding balloting procedures will be published at a later date.

AUTHORITY FOR THE CONDUCT OF THE ELECTION

The election is conducted by the Governing Council under the authority of the University of Toronto Act, 1971.

In the event of any conflicts between these guidelines and the provisions of the University of Toronto Act, 1971, the provisions of the Act will prevail.

These guidelines are with respect to the election of members from the University's staff and students only.

The Election Advisory Committee of the Governing Council shall appoint a Chief Returning Officer who shall be responsible for the interpretation and implementation of these guidelines.

The Chief Returning Officer shall rule upon the validity of nominations, voter eligibility, and verification and tabulation of returns, assisted by such legal counsel or Election Advisory Committee advice as he may wish to employ. His decisions, when concerned with technical matters, shall be final.

The Chief Returning Officer may prescribe forms for use in connection with the election which may contain instructional notes and informational requirements in addition to those set out in these guidelines, so long as they are not inconsistent herewith, or with procedures used in the previous Governing Council Election.

In matters of procedure not provided for in these guidelines, the procedure shall be regulated by an analogy to the procedures that were employed in the previous Governing Council Election, or, if no analogy exists, as the Chief Returning Officer directs.

A group of persons to be known as election overseers and composed of members of the Election Advisory Committee of the Governing Council shall be appointed by the Governing Council, and a majority of such persons shall be members of the Governing Council. The overseers shall consider any objection to a ruling or decision of the Chief Returning Officer (other than a final ruling or decision concerned with technical matters) or any appeal or other matter of contention regarding the validity of nominations, eligibility of voters, tabulation and verification of the validity of the election, either generally or in respect of any candidate or constituency. A majority of the election overseers shall constitute a quorum for the consideration of any such objection, appeal or other matter of contention, and the decision of the overseers who undertake such consideration, or a majority of them, shall be final and not subject to any further review or appeal.

DESCRIPTION OF CONSTITUENCIES AND TERMS OF OFFICE

Description of Constituencies

"Teaching Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine, and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry)

Teaching Staff Constituencies:

In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school, will his constituency be determined by another appointment. Teaching staff who hold a concurrent non-academic or academic non-teaching appointment will vote in the appropriate teaching staff constituency.

Constituency 1—6 seats—divided as follows:

Constituency 1A—1 seat—all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments in the federated universities.

—W. B. Dunphy—term expires June 30th, 1977

Constituency 1B—1 seat—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—all teaching staff members who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges.

—G. R. Thaler—term expires June 30th, 1976

Constituency 1C—1 seat—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—All teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Classics, English, French, German, Near Eastern Studies, East Asian Studies, Middle East and Islamic Studies, Italian Studies, Hispanic Studies, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Sanskrit and Indian Studies, Fine Art, Religious Studies and Linguistics (excluding those who are members of Constituency 1A or Constituency 1B)

—V. E. Graham—term expires June 30th, 1976

Constituency 1D—1 seat—all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Anthropology, Geography, History, Philosophy, Political Economy, Sociology, Psychology, (excluding those who are members of Constituency 1B)

—B. Kovrig—term expires June 30th, 1978

Constituency 1E—1 seat—all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Astronomy, Chemistry, Computer Science, Geology, Mathematics, Physics, Botany, Zoology, (excluding those who are members of Constituency 1B)

—M. W. Lister—term expires June 30th, 1977

Constituency 1F—1 seat—all teaching staff who are members of Constituencies 1C, 1D, or 1E

—J. M. Bliss—term expires June 30th, 1978

Constituency 1I—1 seat—all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering

—R. W. Missen—term expires June 30th, 1977

Constituency 1N—2 seats—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

(One seat only)

—all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Medicine

—J. W. Meakin—term expires June 30th, 1976

—M. W. Thompson—term expires June 30th, 1977

Constituency IV—1 seat—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—All teaching staff members in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Science, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Pharmacy, School of Physical and Health Education

—A. M. Hunt—term expires June 30th, 1976

Constituency V—1 seat—all teaching staff members in the Department of Architecture, Faculty of Management Studies, Faculty of Forestry and Landscape Architecture, Faculty of Law, Faculty of Music, Faculty of Social Work

—W. B. Courts—term expires June 30th, 1978

Constituency VI—1 seat—all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Education, Graduate department of Educational Theory, Faculty of Library Science

—G. A. Reid—term expires June 30th, 1978

"Graduate Student" means all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies

Graduate Student Constituencies:

Constituency I—1 seat—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—all students in Division I (humanities) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division II (social sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies, with the exception of the Graduate Department of Educational Theory

—B. E. Wall—term expires June 30th, 1976

Constituency II—1 seat—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—All students in the Graduate Department of Educational Theory; Division III (Physical Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division IV (Life Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies

—S. Kanowitch—term expires June 30th, 1976

"Full-Time Undergraduate Student" means all students registered at the University in a programme of full-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in Arts and Science, on all campuses, for electoral purposes, will be considered full-time if enrolled in four or more courses.

Full-Time Undergraduate Student

Constituency I—2 seats—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—all students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science including Erindale College and Scarborough College

—J. O'Donohue and M. J. Sabia—terms expire June 30th, 1976

Constituency II—2 seats—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED

—all students registered in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Science, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Medicine, Faculty of Pharmacy, Faculty of Physical and Health Education, Faculty of Education, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, Department of Architecture, Faculty of Forestry and Landscape Architecture, Faculty of Social Work (with the proviso that both members elected in Constituency II not be registered in the same faculty or school), and that in the event that a member elected while registered in one faculty or school later registers in the faculty or school in which the other elected member is registered, the transferring member shall resign his seat)

—T. Buckley and J. Floras—terms expire June 30th, 1976

"Part-Time Undergraduate Student" means all students registered at the University in a programme of part-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in Arts and Science, on all campuses, will be considered part-time if enrolled in less than four courses.

Part-Time Undergraduate Student Constituency:

Constituency 1-2 seats—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED
—all part-time undergraduate students
—J. Gentry and F. Salazar—terms expire June 30th, 1976

"Administrative Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who are not members of the teaching staff thereof.

Administrative Staff Constituency:

Constituency 1-2 seats—FOR WHICH AN ELECTION IS REQUIRED
(One seat only)
—all administrative staff members
—K. R. Bowler—term expires June 30th, 1977
—G. Russell—term expires June 30th, 1976

Terms of Office

Administrative staff—three years
Students—one year
Teaching staff—three years

REGULATIONS

Nominations

Nomination period and deadline

Nomination forms will be available at the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, and at registrar's offices at Scarborough College and Erindale College. Nominations for four teaching staff, one administrative staff, and eight student seats will open on Monday, January 19th at 9:00 a.m. and remain open until Friday, January 30th at 12:00 noon. Nomination papers must be filed at the Governing Council Secretariat and nominations received elsewhere or after that time will be invalid.

Errors or irregularities in nominations

THE ONUS IS ON THE PERSON NOMINATED FOR ELECTION TO FILE A BONA FIDE NOMINATION PAPER. Errors or irregularities in these papers constitute grounds for rejection of the nomination. Such errors or irregularities may be corrected prior to the close of nominations or during the time allotted in the correction period. The Governing Council Secretariat will attempt to notify candidates of the existence of any errors during this period, but is not bound to do so. Candidates are advised to complete and submit their nomination forms early in the nomination period.

Eligibility of nominators

All nominators must be members of the same constituency as the nominee. A nominator may not nominate more candidates for election than there are seats vacant in his constituency.

Nomination signatures

Nominations for teaching staff seats must contain the signatures of 10 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and department.

Nominations for graduate student seats must contain the signatures of 15 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and student number.

Nomination for full-time undergraduate student seats must contain the signatures of 50 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and student number.

Nominations for part-time undergraduate student seats must contain the signatures of 15 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and student number.

Nominations for administrative staff seats must contain the signatures of 20 nominators, each indicating their printed full name and department or office.

Citizenship

Any person nominated as a candidate must be a Canadian citizen at the time of nomination if his candidacy is to be acceptable. Documentary evidence of Canadian citizenship must be presented with each nomination form for examination in the Governing Council Secretariat.

Any one of the following will be considered acceptable evidence of citizenship: certificate of birth in Canada; certificate of citizenship; certificate of naturalization; Canadian certificate of registration of birth abroad; certificate of retention of Canadian citizenship; valid Canadian passport. Photocopies will be deemed sufficient for this purpose. Failing such documentary evidence, a notarized statement to the effect that the nominee is a Canadian citizen must accompany the nomination form. The Governing Council Secretariat will make available such statements for signature and, if requested a sufficient time in advance, will arrange for their notarization.

Candidates are primarily responsible for their own publicity. However, nominees may submit, on nomination forms, two biographical statements or other comments, up to a limit of 75 words each. Statements must be typewritten or clearly printed to be acceptable. The candidate's name will not be counted in the 75-word total if placed at the beginning of the statement. Acronyms will be counted as one word. This 75 word limit is not a guide, but an exact limit. Such statements are voluntary and will be made available to voters through the campus media and accompanying ballots, unless a second statement is provided, in which case, the second statement will accompany ballots, and the first statement will be distributed through campus media. Statements will not be published or distributed if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Governing Council, in consultation with the Election Advisory Committee, assisted by such legal counsel as he may wish to employ, they would render the University liable to a suit for libel. The decision of the Secretary in such instances shall be final. Candidates' statements may not be altered or amended after the close of nominations.

Candidate's telephone number

The home and business and or University telephone number of the candidate must be on the nomination form. The absence of a telephone number or alternative means of communication with the candidate may be grounds for the technical invalidation of the nomination.

Candidate's signature

Nomination papers must be signed by the candidate. The signature of the candidate in the nomination form signifies his willingness to stand as a candidate, his possession of Canadian citizenship and his approval of the candidate's statements, if any, made on the form.

Verification listings

Copies of the lists for students and staff used to verify nominations for candidacy for election to the Governing Council will be available for viewing by prospective candidates or single representatives authorized by them in writing.

These lists will be available shortly after the nomination period opens, and may be seen in the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall from 9:00 a.m. to 4:45 p.m. Monday through Friday.

This information is being made available in order that a candidate may have the opportunity to pre-check the information given by nominators before filling the nomination forms with the Secretariat for verification. The candidate should not make any alterations to the signatures or names of nominators, but should either have the nominators correct the information themselves, or obtain signatures from additional nominators with information as required.

Since only one list per constituency will be available, candidates are asked not to mark the lists in any way. Candidates should also find it advisable to complete the nomination forms early, so that they may have sufficient time to utilize these lists.

Verification process

Those nominations which have been received by Friday, January 30th, at 12:00 noon will be subject to a verification process. The eligibility of nominators will be verified as follows:

- teaching staff constituency IA—printed full name and department against staff records in the federated universities.
- all other teaching staff constituencies—printed full name and department against Personnel Department records.
- all student constituencies—printed full name and student number against records of the Office of Statistics and Records.
- administrative staff constituency—printed full name and department or office against records of the Personnel Department and staff records in the federated universities.

Certification of nomination

If the candidate is eligible for election in the constituency for which he is nominated, and the nomination form contains the minimum number of verified nominators, it will be certified as a correct nomination form by the Chief Returning Officer. Once a nomination has been certified as correct, following the close of nominations, no alteration of the nomination or appeal on other grounds is permitted.

Announcement of irregular nominations

On Monday, February 9th at 12:00 noon, the names of candidates whose papers are found to contain some error or irregularity, and whose papers have not been otherwise corrected before the close of nominations will be announced publicly by a written statement made available at the Governing Council Secretariat. The candidate or his authorized representative must correct the papers himself.

Deadline for filing of corrected papers

On Tuesday, February 10th, those individuals whose papers for nomination were found in some way to be irregular or in error will be permitted to re-file corrected papers. Any corrected nominations filed after 5:00 p.m. on that day will be void. No new candidates may file for election during this period; only individuals who filed papers during the regular nomination period may have this privilege.

Technical invalidation

Despite the existence of the correction procedure, papers which are obviously in error or on their face are not appropriately verifiable will be automatically invalidated on technical grounds by the Chief Returning Officer. Such a decision will be final and there will be no opportunity to correct the papers under the foregoing procedure which will not apply.

Candidates may, therefore, not knowingly file incorrect papers in order to use the correction period as an extension of the regular nomination period. Consequently, wherever possible, errors in student numbers or other information must be corrected, in preference to the collection of new signatures to obtain the minimum number of correct nominators' signatures. This correction period is designed only to facilitate the correction of minor human error on nominations otherwise made in good faith.

Announcement of candidates for office

On Thursday, February 12th at 12:00 noon, the names of all individuals who have presented acceptable nomination papers, whether at the close of the regular nomination period or the correction period, will be announced as candidates for office.

Filing of notice to appeal decision

Those whose papers were found still to be in error may file by 5:00 p.m. on Thursday, February 12th at the Governing Council Secretariat, notice of intention to appeal this decision before the Governing Council overseers, unless the error was declared to be technical in nature by the Chief Returning Officer in which case there shall be no appeal.

Appeals

Insufficient time for the correction of nominations will not be considered legitimate grounds for appeal. Appeals will be completed by 5:00 p.m., Friday, February 13th. The decision of the Governing Council overseers is final and no appeals will be permitted.

Announcement of additional candidates

The names of those who have successfully appealed the nomination procedure and are consequently additional candidates for office, will be announced Monday, February 23rd at 12:00 noon.

Names of candidates

The names of candidates nominated for election will be considered public information as they are received. The names of nominators will not be released by the Chief Returning Officer except to a candidate or his authorized representative during the correction period.

Withdrawal of nomination

A person nominated as a candidate in the election may withdraw his nomination by notarized instrument in writing received by the Governing Council Secretariat within 24 hours after the close of the correction period. The Governing Council Secretariat will make available such statements for signature, and, if requested a sufficient time in advance, will arrange for their notarization.

Posters:

Regulations issued by the Physical Plant Department with regard to the placement of posters are available at the Governing Council Secretariat for the use of candidates.

Scrutineering

Each candidate for election may in writing appoint a scrutineer for the tabulation of returns in his constituency, and such scrutineers may also check the completed verification of ballot returns prior to tabulation.

Equality of votes

In the case of equality of votes for a greater number of candidates than there are vacancies to be filled in any constituency, the successful candidate or candidates shall be determined by lottery conducted by the Chief Returning Officer.

Election expenses

Candidate campaign expenses will be refunded up to a limit of $50.00 on production of bona fide receipts within 14 days of the close of election, subject to the following restrictions:

- i) If in any single-seat constituency more than five candidates run for election, the campaign expense refund provision will apply only to those candidates who obtain at least 20 percent of the vote obtained by the successful candidate.
- ii) If in any multiple-seat constituency more than five candidates per seat run for election, the campaign expense refund provision will apply only for those candidates who obtain at least 20 percent of the votes obtained by the candidate elected with the least number of votes.

Irregularities

An Irregularity which does not or is not reasonably likely to affect the outcome of the election shall not invalidate the election.

Announcement of results

The number of votes received by each candidate will be announced, as will the number of spoiled ballots received.

Retention and disposal of ballots and return envelopes

All ballots received, and all return envelopes, will be held in security by the Governing Council Secretariat for a period of twenty-one days after the announcement of election results. If authorized by the Governing Council overseers, a recount will be conducted on the written request of any candidate in that constituency, within a period of fourteen days after the announcement of election results.

Resignation for ineligibility

A successful candidate must resign his seat at any time he ceases to meet the eligibility requirements for that seat.

Duties of the Governing Council

The University of Toronto Act, 1971, vests in the Governing Council the government, management and control of the University and of University College, and property, revenues, business and affairs thereof, and the powers and duties of the former Board of Governors and Senate of the University.

Committees

In view of the size and complexity of the University and the extensive duties of the Governing Council, it has delegated many of its review powers to working committees. In addition to an Executive Committee, the Council has established an Academic Affairs Committee, a Business Affairs Committee, an External Affairs Committee, an Internal Affairs Committee and a Planning and Resources Committee. Members of Council normally sit on at least one of these committees.

Kubrick avoids emotions, thought, in stilted pursuit of pure style

Kubrick tries for painterly effects in Barry Lyndon, but even minimally alive actors destroy static compositions.

Stanley Kubrick's Barry Lyndon, tangentially based on the Thackeray novel of the same name is the story of the rise and fall of an 18th century Irish rake and self-made gentleman named Redmond Barry (played by Ryan O'Neal). The film follows Barry's progress from being somewhat of a nothing at the time of his banishment from Ireland after a duel with an English officer, to his career as a soldier both voluntary and involuntary during the Seven Years War, and from there to his escape from military service and his entry into high society. Being for a time the right hand of a notorious card shark, Barry decides to use his current status to make a grab for some permanence in the form of the recently widowed Lady Lyndon (Marisa Berenson). After the intermission we are shown Barry Lyndon's home life complete with his infidelities, his shaky financial situation caused by his lush living, and his rivalry with his stepson which is ultimately his undoing. Despite his changes in role and status, however, Redmond Barry Lyndon is pretty much the same as he was in the beginning — a nothing.

I would like to say either to those who like Barry Lyndon or to those that have yet to see it that I am aware of the possibility that I have started off on the wrong foot with this film and that somehow this time Stanley Kubrick's grand design has gone right past me.

During my adolescence Kubrick was one of the first directors whose films made me aware of the language of the cinema. His style is expressionistic even at its most austere moments. Prior to 2001:

A Space Odyssey the involvement of many people of my television nurtured generation was in the form of a passive acceptance of film. Most people really didn't and most still don't know how a film works on them. The stylistic approach of Kubrick with its all too obviously composed shots and blatantly synchronised music and images was an aesthetic shock treatment for many of us. It is bewildering to read some of the statements of some people writing about 2001 during its first release. One would think that they had never seen a film before and in many ways perhaps they had not.

As one's knowledge of the terms of cinematic expression grows one tends to appreciate its subtler practitioners, or those whose styles — even if as overblown as Kubrick's — seemed to have a more accessible outlook on life. If there is yet another distinguishing element in Kubrick's work it is the borderline poverty of his ideas and the sometimes sheer ugliness of his personal vision. Despite all of this I still retained a respect for Kubrick as a stylist. Regardless of how pointless 2001 is even when you do get the point of it or how ghoulish A Clockwork Orange, one must still admit that they do hold together. So does Barry Lyndon, but lacking either the appeal of inventiveness in depicting a future world like 2001 or the constantly benignant vision of Dr. Strangelove or A Clockwork Orange, it is merely a detailed but dry recreation of the past utilizing all the worn out tricks of commercial photography and taking a sense of historical accuracy by cribbing compositions from (semi-?) contemporary 18th century paintings.

So seriously does Kubrick take this treatment that the actors look hopelessly restrained in their movements as they try to avoid ruining Kubrick's static compositions. In trying to achieve painterly effects he compromises both painting and photography as the old art criticism phrase "the quality of light" becomes the quantities of light which in photographic terms shows up as overposure, graininess and fuzzy focus shots.

Sometimes rare moments break through the general drone of the film but they manifest themselves in the most melodramatic manner possible. At various scenes Kubrick's film suddenly goes hair. Its handheld camera and wide angle lens work with an almost Theatre of Cruelty effect. While watching scenes like Barry Lyndon thrashing his stepson or Marisa Berenson in the throes of an attempted suicide one becomes involved but only because now that the scene has become frantic with distorted action one feels something concrete and visceral in one's stomach; but the emotions and thought are still in the limbo which Barry Lyndon occupies.

This week saw the release of Bob Dylan's 20th album. So, in addition to a review of the current album, The Varsity presents a series of Rolling

Dylan's Desire; Hu

Following the success of the Rolling Thunder Revue, Bob Dylan's new album, Desire, which hits the streets this week, was bound to be a success before it was released. The album lives up to the expectations of any album bearing Dylan's name.

The album is a product of a collaboration between Dylan and songwriter Jacques Levy who shares writing credits on all but two of the compositions.

The album's success is made more amazing by the fact that Dylan has produced 19 consecutive albums plus 12 bootleg albums in 14 years without a dud. Clearly Dylan knows the secret of maintaining both innovation and intellectual growth and retaining his popularity.

Dylan's latest influence is obvious. A summer in the village with Jacques Levy and Bob Neuwirth produced Desire and Rolling Thunder. While history will be kinder to Rolling Thunder, Desire is still no mean achievement.

The album is sub-titled Songs of Redemption by Allen Ginsberg who writes the inner jacket commentary to the songs. The songs on the album show the many facets of Dylan, from protest to mystical hymns of love.

Both sides of the album start with long protest numbers. The first side opens with "Hurricane", the song about New Jersey's answer to Stephen Truscott. The song has already received considerable exposure at Dylan's two Toronto concerts and on CHUM-FM where it is playlisted. Dylan is clearly telling us (and Joan Baez) that he can still sing protest. The indignation of "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll" comes solidly through in "Hurricane". The song is musically pleasing, with Scarlet Rivera's violin soothing the ear between each electric verse. "Isis" is also familiar from Rolling Thunder. It moves like a dirge but the lyrics interweave a love song with a classical quest theme.

In "Mozambique" Dylan sings a Calypso travelogue about the country where the lovely people are free. But can we really take Dylan literally? Has he even been to Mozambique?

"One More Cup of Coffee for the Road" is pure Dylan. While the first three songs were Jacques Levy creations,

Remember those Dylan Look

Eyes filled with oily rainbows, Rimbaud reached America, having served the five years since 1878 with the U.S. Navy. Let the other carry his identity in the ancient lands of Abyssinia and take the consequences of the tertiary stages of poetry. He would walk the length of this vast new land of hope and industry, and raise a son made rich through the application of Kabbalistic knowledge to science and technology.

He died, undistinguished, in 1910, but, in 1941, his great grandson, Bob Dylan, 5th cousin twice removed of Blind Lemon Jefferson, related by dream genetics, which carried not Huntington's Chorea, to Woody Guthrie and vaguely associated with a woman whose nephew once met Hank Williams in a bar, was grepped up in as a bizarre way as any of us, listening to the R&B radio stations and having a banana band in high school. He perhaps tried to find or project a new kind of desperation on the desolation of the landscape around Hibbing, Minnesota. Strip mining; maker of great photographs, but of little local interest in the arts.

He went up to the great school, like here, a landscape useless for the production of great photographs but with a great interest in the arts, and dropped out, dropped in, dropped out, played the acoustic guitar, found a myth to follow, headed for New York City all the while making up his past as he walked along.

By dint of keeping on he made a record album, Bob Dylan, full of charming artifice, "I don't mind dyin' but I hate to leave my children cryin'" rough and forced it's not real, but a realistic image.

In the next years he was writing up the news and touching it with art and getting famous for "Blowing in the Wind" with a thank you to Peter, Paul and Mary and Albert. Amidst the social realism and verified anger came "A Hard Rain's A'Gonna Fall", a list of ominous images, "The hard rain is fallout", said the head of the booster club in my high school English class and the teacher agreed, but I still wondered.

He maybe read some books but claimed he didn't, went to Greece, recorded Another Side of Bob Dylan in time for Columbia's fall sales convention. No finger pointing songs on this one but nobody seemed to say too much until... rock 'n' roll! Bringing It All Back Home, full of petty-surrealism, some pretty thin rock numbers, the lovely "Love Minus Zero-No Limit", "Hey Mister Tamborine Man", if's drugs, that's the answer... hey waitaminute.

Bob Dylan had attended the Poetic Convention up in high mountains. The Muse had arrived in a wheel chair, like some old upstate mobster. She didn't brush him, she gave him a cigarette. It was then he realized that his songs would not prevent a tragedy such as the coming massive U.S. involvement in Vietnam. He knew that one day he was going to die and go off the earth and he wasn't liable for the draft like a rolling stone he took off his glasses and he couldn't see the troop trains. It didn't matter whether he could see them or not. He suddenly could not conceive of becoming reinvolved in social protest unless all the people in the world disappeared. The songs contained transcriptions of his own rhythmic vomit, or exercises in tonal breath control. "My older songs, to say the least, were about nothing. The newer ones are only as seen inside a bigger thing, perhaps called the nowhere." Old hats now, but in '65 intentional art of a surrealist bent was about as common as a cat walking along the ninepin moon. The marvelous thing about Bob Dylan's songs is that they are impossible to understand in any common meaning of that word. I know it made a poet outta me.

He played Paris and London and Etc. with his Band and was not well received. At the Royal became the cover photo on Blood on the Tracks. In addition to being a photographer, Till is also a writer with an unhealthy overactive imagination. So he presents here a short and spurious history of Mr. Dylan's growth leading up to the most recent works.

"Dylan strolled the stage like an Orpheus, amidst the flower and flesh of the asahi camera company, burst up in brown flame, myth figure melting invisibly from his arm.

he has past the open road behind thee locked door of Cerberus that he did not touch 'til he took here for hell hath no fury.

Tricane TKO's Gallo

"Cottee" is clearly Dylan's. Allen Ginsberg in the liner notes calls it the first "hebraic cantillation" in U.S. song.

"Oh Sister" is Dylan's detence of incest and apology for International Women's Year. Ginsberg, Dylan's poet laureate contrasts "Oh Sister" with "Like a Rolling Stone". It, too, was part of the Rolling Thunder repertoire. This is the kind of material which made Joan Baez decide to join Dylan on the Revue.

The second side of the album starts with "Joey" an 11-minute Ballad for slain mobster Joey Gallo. Dylan collaborated with Jacques Levy to produce this masterpiece, which dominates the whole album. They have exercised a great deal of poetic licence to deify a mafioso and generate a myth. The song is a logical outgrowth of Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid in two respects. Firstly, Dylan once again glorifies the outlaw, while editing history a little to make him a hero. Secondly, the style and imagery of the song are strongly cinematic. Joey is born to the tune of an accordion in the lyrics, then the accordion starts. In the Post-Watergate Era, America is ready to accept Dylan's notion that anyone who lives outside the corrupt laws must be heroic.

"Romance in Durango" is a pleasant ballad which could have been a leftover from Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid. While it was much more breathtaking in concert it still has an odd, forgetful presence.

"Black Diamond" is a hymn to apathy — Who really cares? We are led through the quiet desperation of the islanders who do not know they are all about to die. But then even we don't care — Dylan turns off Waiter Cronkite and gets another beer. "Sara" is back to Dylan's "Super-Yid" style of Planet Waves. As in Planet Waves, Dylan avoids indulgent spouse worship. This is poetry, and beautiful poetry at that.

The release of this album follows The Basement Tapes which was a pleasant look back to earlier Dylan material. But after we have satisfied our curiosity as to where he's been, we might do well to look at where he's going. In a few years, the rest of the music industry will be following.

Albert Hall the crowd clapped together in an apparent protest against electricity. "Mumble mumble mumble over the mumble mumble mumble mumble mumble mumble," for 30 seconds, "If yah just wouldn't clap so hard," Dylan said. Voice from the crowd, "Judas!", Bob Dylan, "I don't believe you."

So he broke his neck in a motorcycle accident and some whispered of a CIA-Johnson plot. He had been asked, "Do you ever expect to be hung as a thief?" "You weren't supposed to ask that," he said. In that dark night came the Basement Tapes from the waters of oblivion. Perhaps the most beyond the edge of any of Dylan's creations. This feeling was reinforced by purchasing the record from Yossarian Records, the broom closet record store in the front of Rochdale in the summer of '69 or '70 and by the hiss from the generations of dubs made before the recording reached Lurch Records and by the snatches of songs from a transistor radio between the cuts. A land of the absolute other as dissociated from normal patterns and interactions as any of Rimbaud's Illuminations.

Stepping back just a little from the void, into the myth of a classical Americana, was John Wesley Harding, Dylan's most perfect album. For public consumption it was "Dylan's back!" Little were they to know that the next album would consist of extensions of Down Along the Cove and I'll Be Your Baby Tonight rather than All Along the Watchtower. With Nashville-Skyline the cigarette of the Muse seemed all smoked up.

He forgot the deal with a laugh "What about the poets? You once said something about Smokey Robinson . . ." asked Jan Wenner "I didn't mean Smokey Robinson, I meant Arthur Rimbaud. I don't know how I could've gotten Smokey Robinson mixed up with Arthur Rimbaud (laughter), but I did."

The next album, Self Portrait, was as crazy as the Basement

Tapes although different, what is this . . . ? And they was singing "Rimbaud, Rimbaud, didn't he Rimbaud he's found his Abyssinia, just like a New Orleans Jazz funeral. They didn't know that Rimbaud had someone else go to Abyssinia while he planned to found a new empire in America. There's a lost suitcase full of poems in some cave in the rockies or maybe in the pyramids under ice in the midwest but Dylan's not really a grave robber, it he found the suitcase I'm sure he looked and then walked on in his own old way. But that album with the anonymity of All the Tired Horses what did it all mean. inexplicable? Or did Dylan, bereft of material, resort to the big lie technique. Or something else or. And nobody even mentioned Andy Warhol or Roy Lichtenstein.

Another complete album of new songs did not appear until January of 1974. One or many lost albums in there somewhere. Around '71 there were reports of an album somewhere between Blowin' In the Wind and Highway 61. Probably lost on the interstate. Around the same time Dylan was writing and recording with Allen Ginsberg.

Planet Waves and the '74 tour. "Dylan's Back".

Blood on the Tracks. "Dylan's Back".

The Rolling Thunder Revue. "Dylan's Back".

Well oranges and cows, Dylan is Back. New Mythology, social realism and a song about slain mobster, Joey Gallo which makes one wonder if Dylan is serious or just telling us not to take him seriously. Anyhow, Rimbaud's day is done. Let Patti Smith take him for a while. Time for another precursor of the surrealists to be spoken of in the same breath as a rock star; Nerval and Bruce Springsteen, Lautremont and David Bowie, Paul Verlaine and Bobby Vinton, Chaucer and Chuck Berry and Alpred Centuri and Blind Magic Paul.

The Rolling Thunder Revue was great.

'Matter of Gravity' shows death of polite comedy

The only thing truly grave about Enid Bagnold's new play A Matter of Gravity is that it signifies the end of an era; the death of the drawing room comedy. Gone are the days of the clever comedic colour of Gerald Du Maurier; gone is the grand wit of our beloved Master, and now gone as well are the gentle eccentrics of Enid Bagnold.

This unfortunate piece is dangerously misplaced in the suitably odd drawing room of an old English country house — a variety which, apparently, only the English can build. The stunning set by Ben Edwards clearly illustrated a detailed awareness of fading grace which is crucial to this play and was hopelessly lost in the other parts of this production. It certainly was not evident in Noel Willman's stilted direction.

Consequently, one finds a beautifully antiquated parlour which is ruled over by an aging matriarch, Mrs. Bazil, (Katherine Hepburn), who clings adamantly to the "polite" past which she finds impossible to forget. The "originality" of her youth has slowly withered with time into a tear of death and the coming of a new reality; the world of "the common man; and Oh! Is it common." Her subjects, which include several Oxonian homosexuals, a drug fiend, a black lady who has married her white grandson and a drunken lesbian maid who flies, are all used to illustrate Mrs. Bazil's old fashioned stability, and imaginative quirks. In the end she commits herself to an asylum with the flying maid and dies her hair green, in a world like this, who wouldn't.

The plot is non-existent and both the play and its production are inept. How one can find any sympathy for this ponderous piece and its players is simply beyond me. It is long, it is boring and it is ridiculously inane. Lost, apparently forever, is the gentle grace of a Mrs. Somerset Maugham in Bagnold's The Chalk Garden and the elaborate conceit of the aging actress in this once lauded playwright's The Chinese Prime Minister. Not even a shadow of her former glory remains. For those who knew and respected Enid Bagnold's subtle work of the past, A Matter of Gravity can only be a painful torment.

Moreover, for those who know and respect Katherine Hepburn it is also an evening for remorse. This lady is a legend. However, she plays the part of her myth without ever touching upon the monster, which isn't quite fair. In her early stage career Dorothy Parker said that Miss Hepburn ran the gambit of emotions from A to B. Nonetheless, those piercing blue eyes still glisten in the light and her gentle lips still quiver delicately, although now it is in time with the rest of her countenance. In addition, that voice still cackles out its famous yet measured tones, just as it has been doing for half a century. Unquestionably, Miss Hepburn is a great star. But whatever else A Matter of Gravity may need, it desperately needs an actress. Miss Hepburn is not an actress. The fact that the sad supporting cast made no attempt whatsoever to speak the standard English which was called for in the text seemed to matter little for several of them appeared the greatest difficulty in even speaking American. From beginning to end this entire project was an embarrassment, especially when one considers the two tremendous talents which were associated with it. Let us hope that this was not intended to be their swan song. The act of death is not deliberate. This act of theirs apparently is meant to be.

Dictionaries invariably define the word 'pantomime' in a great variety of ways. And rightly, because pantomime is a form of theatrical entertainment that has been changing constantly throughout the years. Consequently, it is hardly likely that the early Victorian pantomime addicts would recognize the abomination that was recently housed in the O'Keefe Centre.

When I think of a pantomime, I remember the traditional Christmas show, the musical fairy tale complete with dame, principal boy and on one very memorable occasion Maggle Smith as Peter Pan. However, the vulgar exhibitions of Lionel Blair and his sordid troupe in Aladdin were completely unrelated to that memory. All the vocal grandeur and wit which had been borrowed from the commedia dell'arte, the origin of the twentieth century British panto, were replaced with a crude harshness in this thin commercial excuse for a festive diversion.

At the time of the Boer War, Londoners had the pick of a dozen pantomimes every Christmas. By the time of the Vietnam War, they only had two to choose from. All the great pantomime palaces of yesteryear have now closed their doors. Some are still theatres, a few are cinemas, but most have been razed to the ground. This startling drop in quantity is not surprising if the drop of quality illustrated in Paul Eliot's production is anything to go by. If Aladdin is in accurate measurement then I fear that the immediate future of the mime is very bleak. The horrid songs, the farcical dances, and the infantile jokes are not, the stuff of which children's dreams should be constructed but they are responsible for many mature nightmares. Why, when Canadian children and their parents can view the marvelous Karen Kain dance a stunning Sugar Plum Fairy in the Nutcracker, should they be made to suffer such an insult as this?

"Woman and child" by Munamee, Nuwoodjuak, Baffin Island

Standardization of Eskimo art for urban culture consumers threatens its authenticity

As abused as the term "Eskimo art" is today, it does locate and specify the activities and products coming from the Arctic. But the failure to make the necessary distinction between talented and indifferent Eskimo artists by collectivizing characteristics and forming generalizations concerning all Eskimos and all Eskimo sculpture, has led, inevitably, to extensive misinformation regarding Eskimo authenticity and art imitation. While carving and other techniques are practised by many Eskimos, art is by no means a collective activity, and the belief that all Eskimos carve or that all who carve are artists is absurd. There does exist a high percentage of good artists among the contemporary Eskimos; quite remarkable is the fact that they are able to create in view of the cultural vacuum which has resulted from the intrusion of the kabulnail and the destructive alternative with which he has presented the Eskimo culture. The unfortunate exception within the entire art-and-craft production by Eskimos, is the increasingly large percentage of work of collective content and, almost, anonymity of form. These are the souvenir carvings; classifiable and predictable, categorized by gift-shop operators and pseudo-"social" scientists as "typical" Eskimo Art with a capital A, because they are representative identifiable commodities.

Mastery of materials and techniques is essential in any artist's work; the Eskimo artist's great and subtle range of response within the limited materials available demonstrates an extraordinary ingenuity and versatility.

The compelling individuality of the artist, one of the essential characteristics of contemporary Eskimo art, is consistently overlooked. Those artists who have managed to preserve the "art impulse" tradition are those who are readily identifiable by association, who have a marked individual style; their works show authentic yet conceptually new Eskimo art forms instead of the anticipated native charm. Vital aspects in new form and perception are progressive with new elements, influences and motivations in the evolving, acculturating Eskimo lifestyle. In Canada, unlike Alaska and Greenland where sterile perpetuation of tradition has resulted in the typical commercialized souvenir specimen, contemporary Eskimo sculpture is not part of a fictitious pre-Dorset myth or tradition.

There is no word for art in the Eskimo language, rather, the term "sanasuatavut" is employed meaning "from the real to the unreal". It is the basic premise of contemporary Eskimo art dealing with the idea of having succeeded in making a likeness, "achieving a likeness-reality" as one artist expressed it. The judgement is, then, how well the carving is executed rather than how pleasant it is, has the artist reacted sensitively and intelligently to his medium: the making and achieving of a likeness which becomes its own reality.

The Eskimos consider the subject matter, then, the focal point of all their art activities while in contemporary Western aesthetics, the major emphasis is placed on form; the quality of work of art is determined by its aesthetic excellence and a sad syndrome of pre-determination i.e. that created by an artist is automatically acceptable as art, has developed. Eskimos have not yet determined what the criteria of excellence are but rely largely on the notion of art as reality, art as truth, art as effective communication. "Truth as beauty" precedes all other considerations in the process of art making.

The Inuit Gallery, owned by Ab Isaacs, 20 Avenue Road, is devoted exclusively to the sale and exhibition of Inuit sculpture and drawings. The exhibits are run in three week intervals, the works represented are obtained through dealing with the art co-operatives, the major co-op centres being Ottawa and Montreal. Various artists (last week, notably Pitseolak) are featured in each show.

THE GLORIOUS BEER OF COPENHAGEN

Copland's enthusiasm, personality make memorable TSO concert

Excerpts from Copland's Rodeo ballet gave audience quite a jolt

Massey Hall was charged with excitement last Wednesday, Jan. 7, when composer Aaron Copland entered to take his place at the podium, where the night previous he had made his Toronto Symphony conducting debut. Not only is he one of the best-known serious music composers writing today, but quite possibly the most popular. His 75th birthday last November was certainly cause for general celebration.

Albert Roussel's Suite in F, op. 33 (1926) opened the program. Though I had never heard this particular work before, I feel that its neo-classical bite might have been rendered even more mordant with somewhat taster empli, especially in the final movement, a brilliant and vigorously rhythmic jig.

The Royal Hunt and Storm scene from Berlioz' magnificent opera Les Troyens was played in an utterly compelling fashion. As I received the complete recording of the opera for Christmas, I might be biased in favour in Colin Davis' suave reading of that luscious score. Not so. Indeed Sir Thomas Beecham always declared it to be one of his favourite pieces of music, and I have no doubt that it must be one of Copland's as well. There was such warmth and depth of expression in the Toronto Symphony's performance that I shook with sheer pleasure. The winds and brass, moreover, played with such richness and passion, that I was deaf to all mistakes. I think

I have never heard the orchestra play more gorgeously, or effortlessly as in that luminous and ineffably beautiful work of Berlioz.

Copland brought down the house with his interpretations of two of his own compositions, the popular dances from the ballet Rodeo, and his 3rd Symphony. Who knows how many times he has conducted those works all over the world, yet he still directs from the score. Copland's own enthusiasm and personality came through most clearly here, and the orchestra served him lovingly. In the presence of genius, performer and listener are helpless to resist. I cannot agree with Koussevitzky, that Copland's 3rd symphony is the greatest American symphony, though there is no denying that it goes from the heart to the heart. The memories of that concert will be memories to cherish.

York Winds' uneven musicianship matched by choice of music

Last Friday night's Array concert with the 5-member York Winds was not particularly memorable for the quality of the performances, which at times were decidedly uninspired. As a professional ensemble the group still requires the polish and maturity to be gained only from long years of music-making together. For a start, however, clarinetist Paul Grice might try wiping the smirk off his face, for if he can't take himself seriously, how can we? Besides, in the words of Catullus, "risu inepto res ineptior nulla est." The music heard was another matter.

Clifford Ford's Alliances for Winds was written to exploit the conflict inherent within a group composed of five instruments of diverse timbres. Fluctuating between sparsely textured moments of restive consonance and thicker passages of considerable strength, the work as a whole showed an impressive ingenuity in the manipulation of several repeated motives. The ending would, I think, have been rendered even more effective, had the work been somewhat shorter. Ford was represented on the program as well by a fine background score to the film Valley of the Moon by Ron Webber.

Variations II by John Fodl seemed at first to be rather more accessible than his previous efforts, although his overly dense and abstract music has never really appealed to me. However, despite a number of convincing passages, the work as a whole struck me as too static, sterile, and tar too long.

There followed the premiere performance of Chole, by Michael Parker, a Classics student turned composer. Though represented most frequently on Array programs as a violist, Parker has had his own compositions premiered there as well. Chole, which means in Greek, anger, or more precisely bile, is on all counts an impressive accomplishment, and was the work to which the audience responded most warmly. Musically, the piece seemed well laid out and effectively contrasted passages of "violent outburst and reflective calm". Cadenza-like passages for solo instruments often placed the performers at a disadvantage, for I sensed a number of rough edges, which more practice would have eliminated.

Marjan Mozetich's In The Air was to my ears the most musically satisfying work of the evening. Its title did not belie its marvellous clarity and openness, which after Fodl's excesses, was truly refreshing. Mozetich, a former student of Luciano Berio, is a talent to be reckoned with, and one whose compositions never fail to impress or surprise for inventiveness and sincerity of expression.

Pianist John Hawkins joined the York Winds in the final work on the program, Brian Cherney's Nocturno. Their combined talents were wasted however in this vulgar and pretentious piece. Nocturno was almost never convincing.

With all its borrowed cliches (speaking parts are not new, but have rarely been employed more effectively than in Harry Freedman's Graphic II, for string quartet), and its lack of taste was an insult to our musical sensibilities. Cherney, a professor of composition at McGill University and author of a new book on Toronto's Harry Somers, could learn a few things from Messrs. Parker and Mozetich.

Kipling came up with story of seedy Shangri-la

John Huston's film adaptation of Rudyard Kipling's The Man Who Would Be King is an entertaining effort, functionally directed, photographed and edited with all of the parts well played. Starting off with a feeling of vague unevenness at the beginning of the film this reviewer found himself increasingly fascinated by a story, which despite its predictability was made into an involving piece of film-making by the cast, the director's touches and the script. The basic story is old; it's one of the legends of imperialism which one can sense behind the Spanish conquest of Mexico, Champlain's intervention in the Huron-Iroquois wars or in Joseph Conrad's The Heart of Darkness.

The story begins in this case with Rudyard Kipling, played for all the role can give by Christopher Plummer, being interrupted from his writing by a half-blind and lame beggar who turns out to be Peachy Carnehan (Michael Caine).

Some years earlier Peachy and his old army buddy Daniel (Sean Connery) had signed a mutually binding contract which Kipling witnessed. What Kipling now witnesses is the grisly outcome of the project which the contract had served to protect.

Daniel and Peachy, both discharged soldiers from the British army, decided after a long career of gun-running, smuggling and extortion to become the kings of Kafiristan which is a small mythical country to the north of the India that these two lads feel has become too small a place for the likes of them. They reckon that where there are people there are wars and that by involving themselves in whatever internal strife Kafiristan has they could, with their military expertise, hire themselves out to some prince of the realm and make that man king. The rest of their plan would be simply to subvert the king; after that it's Fat City.

So the tale proceeds, filling in Kipling's short story with enough Kipling-like details, characters and scenes that manage to keep the film from looking like a 1950's-lost civilization-Grade B thriller. At first the lost civilization that they do find is quite acceptable to our present day sophistication, being neither Shangri-la nor Opar but a collection of mud huts and goat herders. However as the story gains momentum, the dog getting shaggier scene after scene, Kafiristan proves itself quite the adversary to the white men's pretensions.

The film derives its effectiveness from Huston and his actors both major and minor having found excellent dramatic and cinematic equivalents for the basic elements in Kipling's story. The film while watched appears at first as occasionally loose, but by the end one is aware of the tight net of coincidence and foreshadowing which has snared the characters and the viewer. I have avoided saying very much about the plot since that is where the main interest in the film lies. Stylistically the film breaks no new ground but rather travels well worn paths with competence.

CULTURAL NOTE — Forget your T.M., Tai-Chi, Scientology or Sufi Dancing as far as being spiritually in goes — Freemasonry is where it's at.

I feel little qualified to criticize the first half of the Toronto Consort's concert last Sunday at Harf House for the somewhat mundane reason that I wasn't there. Whether my presence at the second half improves my qualifications is debatable, but here goes anyway...

I came in time for the Florentine Carnival Songs, songs written for the festival of Calendimaggio, a festival which lasted from the first of May until the 25th of June. Their writing was encouraged by Lorenzo the Magnificent and they represent the many trade guilds, poking fun at all foreigners and often being rather obscene. The program on Sunday began with a song praising lancers, and the Consort, with their period costumes and lances, effectively hammed it up for the audience. On we went to songs about marvellous ointments, poor beggars, gypsies, retailers, rebeck players etc. On the whole, the Consort's a capella vocal renditions were the most convincing. Alone, Katherine Pimenoff, soprano, sings with too much breathy vibrato, and the instrumental playing often lacks confidence. One sometimes felt that the hamming up was intended to obscure the hesitation of the playing. These objections notwithstanding, the efforts of the Consort to blow the dust away from Renaissance music are admirable.

A funeral moftet for Lorenzo, by Isaac was impressive in its swelling phrases and rhythmic complexity. Again though, Ms. Pimenoff's voice was not subtle enough in its enries. A hilarious "Contrappunto bestiale" was the encore: fa-la-las alternating with barking, meowing, etc. If's

Dead albums look good compared to many live ones

The New Year is here again and it's time for some of us to indulge ourselves by making New Year's resolutions. This year I have trimmed things down to bare necessities and so I only have three: to pass economics, to finish reading Crime and Punishment and finally, not to buy any more live albums. The last of these was promoted by the recent discovery that I have approximately thirty live efforts in my record collection, the majority of which are downright awful.

The live album is a godsend to the record company, an easy way out for the performer and usually a waste of the consumer's money. Record companies seem to love them and not without reason, for they save valuable time and money that otherwise would be spent in the studio. For the band it's just another concert and once more the record buying public suffers.

Quite simply, the live album can either be a masterpiece or a veritable disaster, and unfortunately it is usually the latter. Rarely is there a happy medium. In my opinion, Van Morrison's It's Too Late To Stop Now is the prime example of the live album at its best. The audience is warm and receptive, the band tight and the recording has captured the magic of a special evening. Another fine production is Journey to the Centre of the Earth by Rick Wakeman, who must rank as the Cecil B. de Mille of the rock world. Unbelievably Wakeman succeeds in intergrating his own special keyboard sound with a full orchestra and choir. The Allman Brothers' Live at the Fillmore East, Get Yer Ya-Ya's Out by the Rolling Stones and Lou Reed's most recent live recordings, Rock and Roll Animal and Lou Reed Live, are four more live albums that are valuable additions to anyone's collection.

Now for the other end of the spectrum — the disasters. Normally I play these when I want people to leave the room and Uriah Heep Live is very successful for this purpose most of the time. These are two records of sheer unadulterated boredom; the biggest thrill of the concert is when the lead singer, and I use the term loosely, finds his boot is stuck to the stage with a piece of chewing gum. Focus at the Rainbow shows how a good band can have an off night and Polydor has captured it on record. Of course we can't forget Steppenwolf Live, though God knows I've tried. Lou Reed fares just as poorly on The Velvet Underground Live at Max's Kansas City. This LP was recorded on a portable mono cassette recorder, and most of the first side is taken up by a customer trying to order a Pernod from the bar.

My New Year's resolutions normally don't last past January and I don't suppose this year will be much different. That means there may not be much hope for either economics or Dosfoevsky. Still I hope that perhaps rock groups and record companies will think twice before releasing many more live albums. There is a vinyl shortage and I hate to think that an uninspired live recording of some well known band might be causing some new talent to go unnoticed. If people decide to fake a long hard look at the whole concept of the live album, perhaps 1976 won't be so bad after all.

Screwed goat as child, now under psychoanalysis

Bidart examines lies, fathers and sons, failure of memory

Frank Bidart
Golden State
Brazilier Press, $2.95

Frank Bidart's first book you won't forget. Some of its poems might have been wrought by Quentin Compson had he come not from Yoknapatawpha County but from garish California AND learned to write at the Cambridge knee of Robert Lowell with Freud in one hand, Milton in the other.

But putting it that way belies Bidart's ear for the punchy, obscene terseness of our idiom. Not, finally, Life Studies of eccentric Brahmins, his "The Book of Life" studies the poverty of memory and means central to our fallenness:

*I once knew a man named Snake.
He killed
All our snakes.
One day one bit him.*

*"Ha-ya feelin', Snake?"
I asked when he returned.*

*He said,
"My name is Walter."*

Adam was, Adam spoke; Adam named the beasts, One of them, endowed with speech, used it duplicitously. We know these things because even today his tongue is played and true speech, for us, hard to find:

For men are not children, who learn

not to touch the burner; men unlike Walter, cannot simply revert to their true names.

in poem after poem Bidart remembers daddy Adam and the fortunes of speech in the original Golden State.

The volume's title poem recalls him in Bidart's own father, a wealthy potato-grower (American capitalists this way fill the ground) and cowboyish womanizer. It's a relief to have him dead, yes, but the nagging of "why things were as they were" cannot be killed:

I know that you the necessity to contend with you your helplessness before yourself,

—has been at the center of how I think about my life . . .

Such contending turns the son into a new Adam who's still fighting with the lies of memory, of "mere, neat poetry." Bidart has wrought lines of fensile barrenness, whether in the scary calm of Herbert White's voice:

*—Once on the farm, when I was a kid,
I was screwing a goat; and the rope around his neck
when he tried to get away pulled tight;—and just when I came,
he died . . .*

Bidart visits kindergarten, is reminded of spud-capitalist father or that of the psychoanalysis and:

When did I begin to substitute insight, for prayer? . . .

When all tongues are played, the truest ones are double, and Bidart speaks forkedly through a translation of the Aeneid's introit as well as through Catullus:

*Understanding friend: with whom only
I can be frank; can even you receive this as I received it?*

Perhaps we can, but frankly, he asks a lot. At times it seems no less than a journey to the bottom of the night with the intensity, if not the longevity, of such journeys as, say, O'Neill, Conrad, Djuna Barnes, and Edward Dahlberg have invited us to share. In Bidart, as in these authors, the darkest interior may signal more:

*How can I say this?
I think my psychiatrist likes me: he knows the most terrible things I've done, every stupidity,
inadequacy, awkwardness,*

ignorance, the mad girl I screwed because she once again teased and rejected me, and whose psychic incompetence

I grimly greeted as an occasion for revenge:

he greets my voice with an interest, and regard, and affection which seem to signal I'm worth love.

By Michael Lynch
Frank Bidart reads in the St. Michael's Poetry Series next Thursday, 22 January, at 4:00 p.m., Upper Brennan Hall. His second book, The Book of the Body, will be published later this year by Farrar, Straus, and Giroux.

SEE YOU THERE

The first thing that strikes you as you prepare to see the new Theatre Passe Muraille production, "Thirty Minutes From Downtown" is the theatre itself. Fortunately it's only two minutes from downtown, at Ryerson Street. An austere old factory-cum-warehouse, its brick walls, cement floor and ancient pillars supporting steel girders and a wooden-beamed roof lend it an air of grimy poverty.

But one corner of the floor is equipped with a couch, a kitchen table laden with appliances, a rug, and a wall clock. A curtained window is thrown open to admit a patch of blue sky. On this sparsely equipped stage, with the help of subtle lighting and our own imagination, the drama of suburbia is to unfold.

To the side a young woman starts to sing and play guitar, "to get you in the mood," she says. The tune is snappy, her voice lyrical and melodious.

As the play begins the set is transformed into a subway car, the four characters swaying back and forth to the rhythm of a recorded subway train. Suddenly the scene changes.

"Welcome to our home," says a smiling and vacuous fellow with pompous pride as he sprawls on his couch. "Meet my wife Jenelle." His frowny be-dressing gown wife neglects her husband's scrambled eggs for a moment to give us a sleepy smile. "And our daughter Suzie." Suzie can't walk or talk yet, but nevertheless makes a splendid entree as she crawls over to daddy's lap, dribbling scrambled eggs. If nature imitates art, then babies imitate her!

Our nuclear family suddenly explodes into action as little Suzie takes her first steps (dance steps, no less,) and thus, first by the subway, and then by a cut-away view of someone's living room we are led into the world of the ultra-normal suburbanite.

The normality of the characters' lives is fascinating. In an office: each of the four players in turn explains his function while the other three remain frozen in mid-action. "The company brought me in," says a suave young exec, "because they were on the verge of financial ruins. But," he says proudly, "I put them back on their feet again. It took a long time and a lot of hard work, but I managed it."

"Would you get us some toilet paper for the women's washroom please?" asks one of the secretaries.

"Certainly, certainly, in just a moment!" says fancy pants, with an expansive gesture.

The secretary nods resignedly. This is obviously an old story for her. The new girl though, after being hired as a research assistant and put to work fetching coffees and copying reports, doesn't know the score. She comes back from the washroom looking rather uncomfortable.

The show is a collection of sequences such as these, some funny, some not so funny, some sad, some simply weird. There is a wondrous dream sequence when hubby is transported on a magical bus to a world containing everything you could possibly wish for: a gigantic indoor shopping plaza.

The women stand out with especial energy: for being more ill treated than the men, they have more pounds for indignation and having less to gain from their work in the office, all the housework at home, and despite this, they complain but little. In fact, it comes out that the women accept their lot on the whole ironically. "My doctor told me that if I didn't slow down it'd be me that was stretched along the floor instead of my carpet," says one lovable housewife. "Now I take the time to relax. I watch the Yoga on TV — it's done me a world of good."

A young woman, in one of the long soliloquies that typically punctuate the action in a T.P.M. production, tells the whole story of her life. If started in a suburban subdivision; she acquired a boyfriend, a job, broadloom and bone china; but her innocent happiness terminated suddenly when she was overcome by a nervous breakdown. Her appearance changes before our very eyes as her life runs its course: revelation succeeds revelation — she dons scarf, discards purse, puts on a flashy hat and sunglasses. "What can it be?" you wonder, as she becomes more and more confident, more and more happy. "I finally knew what I was dreaming for so long. It was... to get married, have children and go live in a nice house in the suburbs!" It is the least decided to join a women's group, or something like that. But that's not the style of this play: one gets the impression that Toronto's suburbanites live life in the same way as they do the weather: you can't change it so you might as well learn to live with it.

Towards the end of the play, just as though we'd lived out a couple's innocent youth and had arrived at the stage in their lives when they are discovering pimples on each other's backsides they hadn't noticed before, the mood changes. A husband telephones his wife for the nth time to say he'll be late for dinner again; she throws her ironing board crashing to the floor — "Oh, if it weren't for the children..." she menaces.

Another woman has a fight with her husband, and, choking back the tears, she says with some determination, "Goddamn it, this time I'm really leaving!" whereupon she stomps out of the house in her slippers. But wife number one soon picks up her ironing board again; and wife number two only gets as far as the park by the side of the Humber River, near where they live. Enraptured by the beauty of nature, she watches a little bird take flight from the ground, and says, "You know, after that I felt better," and turns to go home.

"Thirty Minutes From Downtown" is unabashedly optimistic in tone, yet somehow it is made so without evading the important issues. The traditional method of depicting conflict and its resolution by development of a plot in logical stages is completely eschewed; instead, the subject is presented as seen through the eyes of the performers. In this way suburban living does not emerge as something inherently meaningful (suburbia is this, suburbia is that,) nor do any characters emerge upon whom we are invited to pass judgement ("so and so is a good guy," "so and so is a bad guy"). What happens, when seen through the eyes of individual performers, is that the subject is not analysed, sometimes not even strongly dramatized (as, for example, when one of the soliloquies occurs) and what we get is a mosaic of impressions.

The main problem that director Howie Cooper faced in carrying out this project was precisely to achieve a disciplined, unified whole and still give free rein to all the actors. I think the former goal suffered at the hands of the latter; and I think the director felt the same way. Nevertheless, as a performance it came off much better than the City Show a Passe Muraille production on a very similar idea which played in Toronto last fall. The City Show was a long and sprawling series of scenes, some of which were staged exactly as they were witnessed by the actors during research. That kind of realism can get a bit boring and fortunately there wasn't much of it in the Suburbs show. (Perhaps the performers could concentrate less on the stark facts and more on their presentation as a lot of the research had already been done in connection with the previous show.)

COLLECTIVE CREATION... (OR IS IT CREATIVE COLLECTION?)

Whatever the reason, the newer effort was the better organized. The good moments were many, the bad moments few and the acting wonderful.

After the show I asked Howie about Theatre Passe Muraille.

H. If it consists of about 30 or 40 people, working around a handful of directors. But people come and go. T. P. M. is not an entity in the sense of a theatrical company. It's simply a producer.

Q. How does a show like the one we've just seen come about?

H. There are three or four exercises that come into play. One is "show and tell". The actors go out and research a subject, come back to rehearsal and "show and tell" what happened. Some information will be worth keeping, some will be scrapped. They'll be looking for historical information, biographical information, anecdotes, etc. The most difficult thing, in doing research, is deciding what you want to focus in on; and usually that defines itself. You go out open, and the possibilities narrow down. What Paul Thompson very often does is to throw some actors together to "jam on ideas" in a space, get ideas that way.

Howie denies that the result of a collective creation is a point of view of the actors.

"At first, yes; but then, as you become more skilled what comes out (hopefully) is not you, but the information."

Q. Although life in the suburbs can be abysmally depressing, your production is on the contrary on the light-hearted side. How do you account for that?

H. True, but it wasn't easy to get that. It wasn't necessarily the vision of all the actors. It took a lot of work, srafin and breakthroughs to get it. Anyway, what's the point? I didn't want to make a depressing play, and I don't think anyone else did either. Well I guess it is to do with what you feel, it does come from it's real, and if it's depressed or not is irrelevant.

Q. Is this the kind of work you like to do best?

H. Yes. There are faults with the play; for example it's not polished yet. But the quality of the material is dense, and I think it gets at the essentials.

Q. How do you feel about the quality of the scenario that came out?

H. Well, it has its faults certainly. One of the things I'd like to do in fact is to work from a scenario, instead of trying to build one from what you've got.

Q. Which means having a cast writer on hand?

H. Yes. But oftentimes a writer works with you on a creation, the collective then includes a writer and a director. One of the important things in a collective is the idea of function: The writer, if there is one, must be allowed to write, the actor to dramatize.

Long after the play was over, as we prepared to draw the interview to a close, the girl whose singing has provided the background music to the play was still hunched over her guitar, still filling the hall with music.

Perhaps it was the lack of a unified and coherent theme in his play that made Howie decide in favour of working from a scenario in the future. But not all of Passe Muraille's directors feel this way. Jan Amis, another of the directors, is more enthusiastically inclined toward collective improvisation. For her, the results obtained by "jamming of Ideas" are so satisfactory that she feels no need for a writer.

"Thirty minutes" probably came together much the same way as the play Jan is currently directing, which is about the formation of a secretaries' union within the administration of an academic institution.

On arriving at an audition I took my place on a bench on the second storey of their hulking old warehouse. The dozen or so assembled there were listening to Jan explain the proposed plot outline. Jan already had the general scheme of events clearly in her mind, including the exact number of personages and the type of characters that they were and the roles they played. The occurrences were taken from real life, so that, having a train of events already laid down, the actors were not presented with the problem of trying to depict a generality or of having to sift through mounds of material. They began working up a scenario, without worrying whether or not they were correctly translating a general idea, as was the case with Howie's production.

"Mr. Hurd," she said, "is heard but never seen." "Mr. Big, 2nd down in the administrative hierarchy, maintains the orders in the office, and although he grants his secretaries in a state of complete subjection, he couldn't manage to get through one morning without the help of his personal secretary, Ursula, who does all his paperwork for him.

Jan ran briefly down the list of characters, which includes Billy the P.R. man, Flossie, the most docile and uncomplaining of the secretaries and all the other secretaries, the most outspoken of whom have decided to band together to bargain for more rights.

Call it a women's liberation festival, a call for workers' power, or what you will; what is especially fascinating about it is the way it is being made. Here there is no omnipotent director telling each actor exactly what it is he is going to say in order to achieve a desired result; those actors that don't stand out particularly are playing contributing roles, not merely supporting ones.

To begin with, anything goes. "Be in an office performing office-like duties," Jan commands, and stands back watching appreciatively what happens as one, two, three, and finally six or seven of us sortie onto the floor and begin to act. Each buses himself, in the person of some imaginary office functionary, about some imaginary task. The dirty old room is devoid of props save a desk, a couple of chairs and a bench bearing the stencilled inscription "The Metropolitan Opera." One person goes to work at a filing cabinet, another at a typewriter. Someone who is evidently there in the capacity of musician falls in with the girl at the typewriter, click-click-clicking some sort of Latin American scraper as the girl progresses across the page and then striking a triangle as she begins to write. Jan nods and smiles on the sidelines. Someone else is playing a receptionist beleaguereed by a row of shrilling telephones. The calls come in fast and furious: two or more unidentified but obviously irate clients must hold the line while she communicates with a third. Someone sees that, overburdened as the secretary is, he has an opportunity of forcing her hand. Casually strolling up to her desk, one of the bosses tosses her a portfolio. It must be assessed, he orders, and ready for his approval within the hour. What should she do? Neglect the dossier and attend to the telephones, making her boss angry? Or should she go through the papers immediately, leaving her callers waiting at the end of the line? Either way, through the interaction of the two actors at this stage of the game, a conflict is created which may well be remembered and entered into the play under production. The others are not idle. One, who obviously has poor Flossie in mind, plays a guitar, gingerly attempting to manoeuvre a mountainous tray of coffee intended for the bosses down an aisle fraught with wastebaskets and phone lines. But all good ideas wear themselves out eventually, and when Jan and her colleague see nothing further to exploit in the office scene they call us off and begin on a fresh idea.

The evening wears on in this fashion, ideas are explored either at Jan's instigation or at individual suggestion, and we try to squeeze every ounce of dramatic possibility from every situation.

Finally, the talents of one or two of the more gifted improvisors emerge, and Jan, who has revelled in every exploit of the imagination, noted every detail that was played, seemed well satisfied as she wound the session up.

Afterwards Jan explained the guiding motive for her methods. "If you do a written play, you are obliged to enact someone else's ideas. But we want to do plays that are of interest to us. You can't do a scripted play from scratch unless you have a writer in the company. What if you don't? That is one of the reasons that this method of creating collectively evolved. Later, we found that this method produced valid and exciting results; and now, well, I find I enjoy working like this more than in any other way."

Unrelenting remorse as bad as Time magazine

Director, cast, bring life to bleak play about "the 60's"

The New Theatre's production of Kennedy's Children has an adroitly managed, willful bent that overcomes the pathos and clichés playwright Robert Patrick drags out of the closet in his attempt to sort out the meaning of the '60's in America.

Patrick's play, as the title might suggest, examines a group of American orphans (waifs of the 60's) frozen in a moment of unquiet recognition. Isolated within his own despair, each frantically gropes his way through the debris of disappointment and disillusionment in his attempt to explain how and why after all the bleeding and dreaming he has arrived at the doorstep of nowhere on a rainy afternoon in a tumble-down bar on New York's lower East Side, 1974.

Kennedy's Children is an anti-nostalgia piece with bleak things as well as our immediate present; in this attempt to turn the tired rhetoric about the 60's inside out, Patrick calls forth the spectrum of stereo typical characters made famous by the 60's. There are five in all: first, a blonde with a small voice and big eyes who seeks recognition but finds every con-artist only America could invent (archetype: Monroe); second, the Vietnam vet suffering mind-rot from drugs and war brutality who in a spasm of schizophrenic-paranoia has murdered his best buddy; third, the gay actor who lives in dismal recesses of underground theatre; four, the bedraggled career woman from Madison Avenue who keeps her weather eye on Vogue and for whom John Kennedy was the risen redeemer; and five, a hard-core unreclaimed long hair. Patrick attempts to parry the false myths surrounding such character-types of the 60's with a massive, grim spectacle of their past losses and present despair.

However, watching Kennedy's Children I had the feeling that there is a point where one's disillusionment can itself become father to delusion. Patrick, entranced by a desire to mine the arid ground beneath a certain kind of logic found most often and most shamelessly in places such as the essay pages of Time magazine, has ultimately become trapped by his need to explain what he has been trying to transcend. Time magazine after all is really responsible for creating what we call 'the 60's'. Hamstrung by this need to controvert the glib, liberal, middle-class rhetoric which has created a mystique of the 60's, Patrick rarely takes the time to disclose a new depth in the lives of his characters. We are left with a statement which is as lopsided in its unrelenting remorse as any other might be in false optimism.

Nonetheless Jon Stanley's production had enough verve and stamina to divert this critic long enough to thoroughly enjoy the show. The sense of discouragement projected from the world of this tumble-down bar is real and at times frightening in its immediacy. Each member of the cast makes an exquisite contribution to the effect of dramatic counterpoint which provides Patrick's play with a fresh, almost musical form.

Subtle, careful production of Strindberg's "The Creditors" tightens nerves of audience

A quiet meal in Yorkville. Half an hour of window-gazing. Around the corner, up the steps and into the Heliconian Hall. A stylish room, half-a-dozen people waiting for their friends on benches at the back; the same number of theatre types looking disorganized. There is seating for a hundred or so, completely empty. We peregrinate around the edges and admire the sewing that decorates the walls. Eventually we sit just beneath a small stage with a very approximate look to it. The lighting bars are almost non-existent. Someone comes on stage and replaces a prop. The whole evening has come to take on overtones of home-town amateur theatricals, where all the pomp and circumstance of an immense programme can't make up for the meagre talent and excessive optimism of the organizers. The man beside us reads a theatre news-sheet, an old one, recommending plays I thought were terrible. Music from the back, the sound of the door opening and closing. The place fills up.

But when they start! Suddenly the now nearly full house is understandable. In a small seaside hotel, the artist Adolf is finding, through his conversation with a stranger, how much he really distrusts his wife, how he fears her intelligence and her attractiveness, how he suspects his own talents, makes horrid comparisons with her former husband. The stranger is very controlled, his actions plausible, the actor's delivery flawless. And the wife returns — and laughs derisively at her husband's newest work.

In twenty minutes the Toronto Truck Theatre's production of The Creditors has transformed an audience into a nervous and intense organism, searching from the convolutions of the dialogue for a central meaning to their own relationships. The tension of the visible breach between husband and wife was not for an instant relinquished. It is a matter for commendation that for this one evening of the run at least, the expansive nature of the hot-blooded lady novelist did not interfere with the essentially small-scale drama of Strindberg's play. To a large extent this credit must go to director Tom O'Hanley, who played the part of the inquisitive stranger (who incidentally is the previous husband) and maintained a convincing development, or rather revelation of his complex character. The movement on stage was not well done, but the series of tableaux which were struck were thoroughly controlled. And although the technical work was not strong, it could not detract from the sheer vitality of the key actors' work. Robert Rooney, faced with the character of Dolf, managed to convey a growing intensity rather than the dangerous art of being sheerly irrational throughout. Tekla, the twice-married woman, was portrayed with grace and conviction by Claire Marshall. And O'Hanley, as the bleak ex-husband, had a mastery of timing and facial expression that made the play pleasurable within the small space available.

In brief, The Creditors remains a gripping play, rather than a hysterical melodrama, in the hands of O'Hanley and his cast; and the pace of the Strindberg is maintained with dexterity and occasional insight. It might be well worth while to drop up to this weekend production.

FRIDAY At the Revue at 7:30, Welles' latest, F for Fake, a fantastic farrago of diabolical deceit; at 9:15 those swept away by Swept Away can see more Wertmuller: The Seduction of Mimi; same shows, same time, Saturday and Sunday. Fans of science fiction or revolting movies, have a lot of choice tonight: the Roxy has softcore spoof Flesh Gordon at 7:00 and 10:30, and Pink Flamingoes at 8:00 and 11:00, while the New Yorker has the animated feature Fantastic Planet at 7:00 and 10:40 and Marcello Mastroianni and friends eating themselves to death (no kidding) in La Grande Bouffe at 8:30. If you can't decide try the Roxy first: the two at the New Yorker will also be around Saturday and Sunday, though at different times.

SATURDAY At three today or Sunday you can see 100 minutes of Recent Canadian Independent Film, by a number of directors using a variety of experimental techniques. Those out for a good time are directed to the Roxy for Monty Python and the Holy Grail, at 7:30 and 9:30, but are advised to get well out of there before midnight, when it turns into Lisztomania, a pumpkin if ever I saw one. And just for you, Thomas, the New Yorker is showing Female Trouble at midnight. De gustibus non est disputandum — i.e., it's too disgusting to discuss.

SUNDAY If you're not at the Revue or the New Yorker tonight, you should be in church.

MONDAY At the New Yorker, 6:30 and 9:30, Felini Amarcord, by Roger Corman, and Antonia: a Portrait of the Woman at 8:30. The rest of the evening is devoted to directors' double bills: at the Aladdin, way up on Yonge St., at 7:30, two by von Sternberg: Shanghai Express, with divine Dietrich, and Shanghai Gesture; two by Chaplin at the Revue, tonight and tomorrow: The Gold Rush at 7:30 and The Great Dictator at nine; the Roxy has two by Paul Morrissey: Warhol's Dracula at 7:00 and 10:15 and Warhol's Heat at 8:45.

TUESDAY German Expressionism at the Aladdin (7:30): Wegener's Antonia again — they must have found a print — at 6:30 and 10:00; and Cassavettes' A Woman Under the Influence at 7:30. At the Roxy, 7:30 and 9:30, tonight and tomorrow, Brother, Can You Spare a Dime, a collage of the thirties.

WEDNESDAY Those with world-historical consciousness will choose the programme at A.G.O. at 7:30: The Train Rolls On, a lyrical documentary about Medvekin and his cine-trains, by the French film collective S.L.O.N., of which Chris Marker is a member; and Dziga Vertov's The Man with the Movie Camera — it changed Godard's life, it could change yours. The bourgeois may prefer the Hitchcock double at the Revue, 7:15 and 9:15, tonight and tomorrow: Spellbound, with Ingrid Bergman and Gregory Peck — and special effects by Dall (who had to be forcibly restrained from covering Bergman with ants), and The Paradise Case, also with Peck, and Charles Laughton and Ethel Barrymore as well.

THURSDAY People disappointed with One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest can see it done right in Ken Loach's Family Life: Wednesday's Child at the Roxy at 8:45; it's flanked by Slaughterhouse-Five, which is not quite so highly recommended, at 7:00 and 10:40. Maximilian Schell and German guilt at the New Yorker: The Man in the Glass Booth at 6:30 and 10:00, and The Pedestrian at 8:30.

Special Sneak preview (advance plug): next Friday, the New Yorker starts an extended run of the uncensored version of Marcel Carne's Children of Paradise. Andrew Sarris says: "Anyone who can resist its flamboyant charm deserves never to see Paris." LM

Ah, the delights of openings! Once again, intriguing experiments and old favourites are paraded in front of our jaded appetites. At Brannan Hall, SMC, Theatre de Kerkhove presents (fanfare) Jarry's Ubu Roi, perhaps the ultimate ancestor of absurdism. In French, tonight and tomorrow night only at 8:30, admission free to students, $1.50 for lesser mortals, and reservations are recommended at 925-5755.

Also on campus: at the U.C. Playhouse, 79A St. George Street, Paul Gaulin and the Compagnie de Mime both Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:30. Students, and others, are free but again reservations are wise: call 928-6307. Gaulin is a local artist about to (or even in process of) becoming a Name. Since his style has benefited from instruction of Marceau and Decroux, he is likely to entertain and stimulate.

A few brief reminders for off-campus presentations. I'm sorry to short-change the readership for the second week running, but full-scale listing will resume next week. At the Colonnade, Simon's Last of the Red Hot Lovers; at Toronto Truck, Tempest and at Heliconian Hall, Creditors. At the Central Library Theatre, two one-act Ionesco plays. At the Tarragon, Chekhov's Ward Six, beginning the 22nd. Kennedy's Children at New Theatre, 736 Balmhurst, is highly regarded; Gallows Humour still at the Tarragon; TPM and Thirty Minutes from Downton at 16 Ryerson; at 519 Church Street, Moving Theatre presents The Death of Artaud January 16-18 and 20-25. At 8:30.

At the Big Time, forget you ever heard the name Katherine Hepburn. Everyone else in the city wants to see her too. Sold out since Saturday. The Speckled Band and Sherlock Holmes held down the other spots.

What else can we say? Hart House is now selling tickets to All's Well That Ends Well. I hope it's true for you too. JW

Imaginative production of 'Tempest'

Imagination was the outstanding feature of the Toronto Truck Theatre's production of Shakespeare's Tempest. Director Peter Peroff had an ambitious cast of eight actors, most of whom played dual roles and who also took care of the technical aspects of the production. The versatility of the actors was impressive. James Bartley alternately played two very opposite roles — those of the young, honorable Ferdinand and of the experienced, unscrupulous Antonio. Art Austin did justice to what must be one of the most difficult parts to act, a drunk, and also doubled as the villainous noble, Sebastian, realistically accomplishing the transition from the staggering gait of the drunken Stephano to the elegant walk and gestures of a courtly man. In fact, the entire cast knew instinctively how to balance the right facial expression with the right gestures and postures. I was especially interested in their use of the dual roles because in the final scene all the characters have to be on stage together. This was cleverly accomplished. Since the theatre at 94 Belmont Street is a rather small one, it seems to be a Toronto Truck Theatre tradition to have no definitive boundary between the actors and the audience. It is an effective way to draw the audience into the action and in no way inhibits the action of the play. I was sitting behind three of the actors, and I never saw them changing their costumes because the audience's attention was directed elsewhere at those moments.

The opening scene was memorable and a tribute to the technical excellence of the set, lighting, stage effects, and costuming. Tim Fort gave a good performance as Prospero, the manipulative but kindly busybody who oversees the action of the play. His domestic scene with the Innocent Miranda (Rosalie Shackleton) showed Prospero as the doting father and fascinating storyteller and his daughter, like us, the rapt listener. Virginia Reh played Ariel with such obvious enjoyment that she brightened the stage with each entrance. The combination of music, costume, and movement in her part made her seem more spirit than human. Although all of the acting was strong, two of the cast deserve special mention. The first is David Moulday, who played the reliable Gonzalo and the scatter-brained Trinculo, and who redeemed a rather tedious scene in the first part of the play. The second is Stephen Geras, with his cave-man rendition of Caliban. I got the impression that although they had good parts to begin with, they used a lot of personal imagination in their portrayals.

The play's strong point was the atmosphere it evoked. The magical, dreamlike, timeless mood of the play was due in a large part to the music. When Prospero began his "Our revels now are ended" speech, the audience was brought back to reality and I realized with sadness that the play was going to end. I am not sure exactly how they accomplished the shift in mood from the enchanted dreaminess to a melancholy realism.

I would strongly recommend this highly imaginative play to Shakespeareans and non-Shakespeareans alike.

York edges Blues in return match

By JOHN ROBB

Wednesday night saw a continuation of the old familiar cross-town rivalry between York U and U of T, but this time there was a surprise ending as the York hockey team upset ours 3-2. The hockey game played in the wilds of Steeles and Keele, and "wilds" is a good description. Any geography student wishing to study arctic tundra firsthand should transfer to York for the winter.

The Blues were returning to this hostile arena as the winners of a previous game 11-2, something the Yeomen obviously remembered. Despite York's hustle Toronto still managed to hold a 1-0 lead at the end of the first period as John Precious had scored a powerplay goal on a pass from Larry Hopkins. The other high point of the period was when the Blues wasted enough time to compensate for having two men in the penalty box. That's as much as can be told, because due to transportation problems (thank you, Tim, this reporter's arrival did not coincide with the start of the game.

I did arrive in time to witness the start of the second frame, which began rather conspicuously with the York backup goalie taking part of the board's home as a souvenir. After repairs had been made, the game began again. The checking was close at both ends until Bob Wasson of York let a slapshot go from the left side that fooled Dave Hulme. This goal gave the Yeomen just the lift they needed, and they were all over the Blues from that point on.

When Varsity found themselves with two men in the penalty box again it seemed that York would quickly take advantage of the situation to go ahead in the game. Paul Sawyer, Larry Hopkins and Dave Rooke had other ideas, and were more than effective in their time-wasting roles, particularly Sawyer, who drew a double shift as penalty-killer. Dave Hulme was also wide awake as he made sure that there were no loose pucks to tempt any wandering Yeomen.

However, York continued to dominate the play, and the Blues soon found themselves shorthanded again. This time the York powerplay clicked as Hulme found himself unprotected when Peter Titanic got the puck in front of the net.

This seemed to memorably wake the Blues up. The result was the type of play that they are really capable of, a passing combination that was the best play of the night. Dave Rooke fed Frank Davis, who in turn spotted Ron Harris up-ice. Harris took the pass from Davis, beat the defence, deked the goalie and put the puck behind him. That was the way the period ended, 2-2. The shots on goal were more indicative of the play as York outgunned the Blues 16-6.

The third period was more even, but once again the Yeomen had the better of the play. Hulme continued to be solid in the Blues' net, making several good saves.

The best example of his talents came on a York breakout when Hulme outwitted the Yeoman forward and left him nothing to shoot at, effectively thwarting that opportunity.

It was York's night, however, and soon after Al Avery took advantage of a goalmouth scramble to ram in the winning goal. Toronto pressed continuously from then on, which in turn created many good chances for York, making for an exciting game. But neither team could score again, and the game ended 3-2 in York's favour.

Coach Tom Watt was not pleased with the way that the team performed, noting that they had been outthrust by the York squad. The Christmas layoff still seems to be affecting the team, as they seem to be out of shape for games. In any case the Blues are winless in their last five games, a very unfamiliar state of affairs. Tonight's game against Laurentian is now a really big game for the Blues, so come out and give our team some support. Game time is 8:00 p.m.

York does more than edge B-Ball Blues

By DAVID CASS

"If you gotta mention somebody, mention them. We stunk. They were too much." This insightful comment by vet Willy Fox summed up the York Yeomen's thorough thrashing U of T 85-62 at the Benson building last Tuesday, a blustery night in the out-of-doors.

The precise quality of York's play, right down to the last goateed reserve, charmed the partisan York folk and frustrated the blasé collegians from Toronto.

It needn't have. The class of the division, York strengthened its season mark to 5-0. Tournament tough and drooping for a shot at the CIAU crown, the Yeoman possess one of the most well-balanced line-ups anywhere. With venerable Ev Spence and super-sprite Ted Galka at guard and an efficient, oft times flashy frontcourt trio of Roman Callegaro, Chris Dorland, and Ed Siebert, backed by an able bench, York epitomizes the team ethic in win games.

York employed a deft fastbreak led by Spence, whose silky moves and peel-offs opened up the offense when the break stalled. With Spence quarterbacking, the spidery Callegaro and ghostly Galka were able to skitter in and out of the Blues defense demonstrating a variety of skills based on quickness and shooting touch. Callegaro leads the Eastern division in scoring with a 23.6 scoring avg.

But what makes it all happen so smoothly is the gangbusting style of rebounding, both offensively and defensively, that York employs. Quite simply it intimidates.

Specifics, maestro. Indeed. Utilizing those facets perfectly, the Yeomen broke on top quickly 17-2 leaving the Blues in a puddle of befuddlement. After a brief respite, coach McManus worked a 3 guard offense replacing Kurzyk with Zito Baccarni at guard. Slowly the Blues brought the game under control with consistent outside sniping from the guards Hilbertus "Bert", the effervescent Fox and the amazon Zito who buzzed about tenaciously muscling with the beef inside while collecting 12 pts. in the first half alone.

After pulling to within 23-21, the 3 guard offense sputtered whence a queer coaching move occurred. McManus took out big Skyvignon putting in the frail, inexperienced Alexov to go it alone with rookie Gorzynski in the ferocious rebounding pit under the boards.

York took full advantage of this move to brace ahead 38-21, and finally close out the half up twenty, 45-25.

When queried at halftime about his strange substitution, an obviously upset McManus asserted that the move was justified. "Skyv cost us 20 pts. He wasn't covering his man. Siebert went around him 4 times at the baseline. Look at the stats. One rebound offensively when things aren't going well ya gotta make a change". Perhaps. But a change like that?

To compound the situation, McManus unbelievably started a 4 guard offense to begin the 2nd half, bringing guffaws from the gallery. You figure it out.

Death appeared imminent when York's husky Siebert left Foxy's jock somewhere in the balcony on a move to the hoop. The outcome quickly became a trivia question.

Vic comes alive to shutout Scarborough

By JONATHAN GROSS

Amongst all the broken sticks, stray squirrels and pseudo rink rates that inhabit Varsity Arena there are some people who know the value of a puck.

Doug Herridge and his wily crew of veterans are the closest thing to a "money" team this university possesses. After a slow start Vic has found their niche, as evidenced by their 1-0 triumph over the Scarborough Blazers on Wednesday night.

Before the game coach Herridge was warning his players that Scarborough has a roster full of ruffians including newcomer John Vernon, who is a football heavy without equal. Lacking the wheels of a great player Vernon makes up for his shakiness on the blades with a good MPP (Marginal Propensity to Clobber).

Since this reporter was relegated to a position of timekeeper it can be said that the penalty box was busier than the Notell Motel on a Friday night. The interesting thing was that Vic took far more penalties than the Peripheral Franksters.

The game was full of tight checking and Scarborough had just a handful of good scoring chances. McQuillan for the Jennings Cup champions lost his stick early in the game but made a fabulous play to stop a three on one without the benefit of any lumber. A little later Boddy of the Maroon Machine came down the right side and let go a lethal blast that Scott Csumrik didn't even catch a glimpse of as it rebounded off the crossbar and out of danger.

Csumrik played some stellar net while the Vic defense came through despite numerous penalties, including a five minute match penalty for buttending to Young taken dangerously close to the end of the game.

The lone Vic goal came on a backhand that went in off Denisovitch's skate. John Richmond started the play by intercepting a clearing pass in the Scarborough Zone and he then fed it to Hughes who took the shot.

The Grads team walked a mile in New Colleges' shoes on Wednesday, getting leveled by PhysEd 10-1. In the dressing room after the game the TA's were upset about the fact that they couldn't field any Woodsworth players. This seems to be a growing gripe in interfac sports. Part-time students are not allowed to participate simply because they are part-time. The Grads think this is unfair. Anyways Sora scored three and Turner two for the Jocks.

Getting back to the sport it was Trinity 4 and Law I 2 on Wednesday. Scoring for the winners were Brown, Kirk, Shatz and Nicol. UC II kept the faith by downing Emmanuel 6-2. Roger Greenberg had two for UC. The God Squad shutout You-New-Who II 3-0 as Marcus Stone scored all the goals in the entire game. Paul Smith had a full roster again but as the saying goes, "It's quality not quantity." SMC B had their win streak broken by PHE B in another 3-0 affair, a game which saw 11 penalties go to SMC.

The shocker of the week was the 2-2 tie between New I and Fac Ed. Jay Polon was in the nets. Schwaybe Brown was not there along with Norm Grosman and Albert Shames. Adams scored twice for the Chartreuse Caboose.

O come all Ye Rowers

By LARRY MARSHALL

Although this may seem an unusual time of year to begin a rowing season, a closer look shows the logic to be infallible. This year the oarsmen themselves have taken the initiative and have organized a comprehensive land training program, to begin immediately, in preparation for the upcoming season. For many reasons, this season should see much success.

The main reason is the much appreciated decision of the Athletic Directorate to allocate $6,000.00 for the purchase of a top-quality shell. Its delivery is promised in time for the start of the intercollegiate season next September, in company with a brand new set of blades. This shell will be instrumental in re-establishing U of T as a rowing power.

There is a strong probability that U of T will be travelling to the Dadrave Regatta in Philadelphia in May, to compete against American Ivy League crews. As a result, land training becomes important, since the American crews can train all winter and will therefore be at the end of their season. In this regard, all persons interested in rowing for U of T should come to an organizational meeting at 4 p.m. on Tuesday, Jan. 20 in room 215 of Hart House.

This training has paid off for U.W.O. and Brock, and there is no reason it won't for U of T. Although, due to his election to a lofty post with the rowing powers-that-be, Gord Leighton will be unable to coach this year, the team has shown sufficient self-motivation to avoid any problems until a new coach can be selected. Now if we can just decide on a painting scheme for our new blades...

NO TUITION INCREASE NO LOAN INCREASE
NO COURSE CUTS
NO FIRINGS

Reject the Henderson Report

HENDERSON REPORT

A 400-page document was tabled by Ontario Treasurer Darcy McKeough last November which tells the government how to save a billion dollars over three years. One recommendation says that tuition should rise to $1,000, and the loan portion of OSAP with it.

Another recommendation says there should be no more nursing homes. The overall thrust of the document is to shift the government's economic crisis on to the weaker portions of society.

EDUCATION IS A RIGHT

If tuition fees go up along with the loan portion of OSAP, and if the government abstains on its commitment to assist poorer students, then the university retains its elitist position, educating only the rich. Education is not only an economic commodity but necessary for a society to grow. Keeping education as a privilege is to say that the common person cannot join in the advancement of society as a whole and that we should be ruled by an isolated, privileged elite.

TAX THE CORPORATIONS

It is the position of the Ontario Federation of Students and the National Union of Students that the cutbacks represent an unwillingness of the rich to pay for the welfare of anyone but themselves. The government consistently refuses to tax those who are able to pay for social services. In fact the proportion of tax revenue collected from corporations has descended from 25 per cent to less than 10 per cent over the past five years. Meanwhile corporate profits have skyrocketed absolutely and relatively.

IF YOU WANT TO HELP, PUT UP THIS POSTER

WE'RE BACK

By MIKE MARCH

The Varsity has returned because unionized SAC workers have found an almost amicable solution to their twelve day strike.

Both sides are claiming victory. The union, CUPE 1222, is happy that the salaries are virtually equalized. The SAC executive is happy that the total wage package costs less than its complicated multi-tiered December 8 offer.

The announcement of the strike settlement was made last Wednesday at Scarborough College during a regular SAC general council meeting.

The base wage for the two-year settlement is $176 per week. Special Project Staff (fieldworkers and researchers) get an extra $5 a week to compensate for their one-year term employment. The Varsity Ad Manager also receives more since the SAC executive insists on offering a greater incentive for the job.

Salary increases are retroactive to October 1, 1975, the expiry date of the old contract. The increases range from $15 to $30 over current salaries.

Although most SAC union members are happy with the settlement, some are unhappy at the eight-per-cent increase for the second year of the contract.

According to SAC executive assistant John Bennett, the union is pleased that the base rate has been raised significantly from the old figure of $124.

However, Bennett pointed out to the SAC meeting that under the new agreement several people would be accepting a lower salary than they were previously offered.

Bennett told the meeting that the union was anxious to return to the work of building the student movement. Union members were active in organizing the January 21 demonstration against the Henderson report even though they were on strike.

SAC president Gord Barnes expressed his displeasure to the SAC meeting at the union's conduct on the picket line. He asked that SAC members address themselves only to the issue of whether or not the SAC executive negotiating team had done a good job. He said the executive was unanimously behind the offer published in that day's issue of the "SAC Special". That offer was five dollars below the finalized version.

The "SAC Special" newspaper was one factor which led to bitterness in the conflict between the eight member union and the ten member SAC executive since the strike's inception January 16.

The first issue of the SAC Special advertised the January 21 rally before the strike began. However, the executive printed two more during the strike. The union viewed this as strike-breaking.

The Varsity editorial staff had agreed not to publish during the duration of the strike. The SAC Special used the Varsity logo and printed ads from Hart House despite their specific objections.

In other strike action, well-known feminist author Germaine Greer cancelled her appearance in sympathy with the strike.

Greer was supposed to appear last Monday evening but refused to cross the legal picket-lines of the SAC union at Convocation Hall. According to informed sources Greer refused to appear on learning that SAC wanted to pay its women workers less than the men.

Eye-witnesses have confirmed that Gord Barnes and SAC finance commissioner Mike Treacy asked U of T vice-president Frank Iacobucci and Metro police to arrest the picketing workers last Monday night.

At the January 21 rally at Convocation Hall, CUPE 1230 members stood in silent protest during Gord Barnes' speech on accessibility to post-secondary education.

Feds roll back library wages

The library workers union is charging the university with violation of its contract over its refusal to implement the 18 per cent increase settled on Dec. 9 after a 20-day strike.

Representatives of the university and the Canadian Union of Employees (CUPE) 1230 will meet today in an arbitration session following the initiation of a policy grievance by the union.

Following a Jan. 14 ruling by the federal Anti-Inflation Board which disallowed the 18.5 increase, the university has refused to award more than the 12.2 per cent increase approved by the board. The Board also rolled back increases awarded to the U of T police.

In charging that employer with failure to carry out the terms of the contract settlement, CUPE is initiating the first test of the validity of a collective agreement that has been ruled unacceptable by the board.

George Ferguson will head an arbitration hearing into the case and can decide to rule in favor of either party or may declare that he has no jurisdiction in the dispute.

The CUPE national office has declared that if the university does not implement the negotiated increase it will take the matter to the courts on constitutional grounds.

The union disputes the right of the Ontario cabinet to submit the province's public sector to the jurisdiction of the Anti-Inflation Board without the approval of the Ontario legislature.

Under the contract signed Dec. 9 employees earning from $5,771 to $15,309 were awarded increases ranging from 10.5 to 21.3 per cent for an average of 18.5.

The university is now only willing to pay salary increases of from eight to 15 per cent for the average 12.2 per cent increase approved by the Anti-Inflation Board.

The union argues that the old contract was signed in December 1973, which under the terms of the federal guidelines exempts them from regulation.

It also points out that federal finance minister Donald Macdonald has stated that persons earning less than $7,000 per year would be exempted from the guidelines.

(The anti-inflation Act regulations state that any employee should be entitled to earn at least $3.50 per hour without subjection to the board's regulation to an annual equivalent of $7,280.)

CUPE 1230 president Judy Darcy said the arbitration would not deal with the question of the Anti-Inflation Board's ruling but only the university's failure to live up to the terms of the contract.

CUPE national secretary treasurer Kealy Cummings warned Thursday that a ruling against the library workers could prompt massive strike action by the Canadian Union of Public Employees, one of the largest unions in Canada.

The university has announced it is preparing to make a submission to the Anti-Inflation Board asking for a re-consideration in regards to the settlements with CUPE 1230 and the United Plant Guard Workers, who represent the U of T police.

Adim pokes parity principal

By JUSTIN CASS

Student and faculty leaders at Innis College are not finding much support for the concept of parity with the U of T administration. Innis College is governed by a council which has fifty per cent student representation.

President John Evans and the Academic Affairs Committee have told the Council where to get off in their request for a student parity committee to select a new principal for the college.

According to the university rationale, the principal is an appointee of the administration. "A person selected by a parity committee would not have any credibility in the rest of the university," said John Evans at an earlier meeting of the college council. "Principals don't grow on trees," he explained.

But a majority of the current Innis College Council are upset at the prospect of a top-down appointee. "If we are the black sheep of the university community," argued student chairman Bill Drury, "the university should accept us as part of the flock and not try to whitewash us."

However, at last Thursday's Academic Affairs meeting, turned down a request for special dispensation from the established procedure. They voted for a compromise motion unacceptable to the college council.

The compromise is also unac-

College fears alien appointee.

Grads face security stalling

By LEARYAN

Security seems to be tight everywhere these days, except when teaching assistants are asking for some.

Job security is a key demand for the GAA's teaching assistants in their present negotiations, said GAA business representative Diane Moeser. "But the university has refused to bargain seriously on this issue as part of the contract," she said.

Moeser pointed to a "weak letter" dated January 30 from U of T provost Donald Chant which specifically refuses to guarantee a continuation of the same number of jobs.

The letter states: "The divisional proposals indicate to us that we need not contemplate any drastic reductions in the number of teaching assistants across the university. Moreover, I stress categorically and without reservation that the University has no intention of singling out its teaching assistants to bear the brunt of whatever cutbacks may be necessary."

But Moeser stresses, "If they don't plan to cut jobs, why don't they put it in the contract?" This letter means nothing if it doesn't give us the guarantee of collective job security and a continuing number of jobs for teaching assistants."

Furthermore, the faculty have recently been promised a lift on the hiring freeze. They will actually be able to increase jobs. But the university won't guarantee teaching assistants even maintenance of the status quo," Moeser said, citing another letter from Chant.

On January 20, U of T principals, deans and directors received a memo which stated: "In view of the pressing urgency to initiate search procedures, and because the budget of the University can now be predicted with some confidence, I am now prepared to receive requests to recruit academic staff and to make decisions on them."

"It's fine they're finally recruiting more staff," said Moeser. "Now they must also be prepared to deal with the teaching assistants. Obviously, lifting the freeze is a move against cutbacks. But TA's shouldn't have to bear a disproportionate share of the budgetary reductions which confront this university," she said, quoting Chant's letter.

Faculty is getting additions. The GAA is asking for maintenance of current teaching jobs."

ceptable according to the administration's own guidelines for principal search committees. Thus the matter must come before Governing Council on Wednesday. No one is too sure of what happens next. The college has voted to boycott any compromise measures. But John Evans is anxious to get the process underway. Many Innis people are upset because they feel that the current principal, Peter Russell was instrumental in getting funding for the many Innis courses, and their new building.

New Brunswick students! no gains

FREDERICTON (CUP) — New Brunswick Premier Richard Hatfield has refused to make a commitment to improve the provincial student aid program demanded by the Atlantic Federation of Students (AFS).

Continuing class boycotts and a mass province-wide demonstration despite extremely poor weather, more than 600 students arrived outside the New Brunswick Legislature January 22 to protest the governments lack of concern for provincial student aid.

Demonstration organizers say there would have been more demonstrators but a heavy snow storm delayed buses arriving in Fredricton from other centres in New Brunswick.

Meeting with representatives from the five-provincial post-secondary institutions Premier Richard Hatfield admitted, "Our program of student aid, as the students have pointed out, has not been overly generous".

He did agree, however to present the AFS demands to the provincial cabinet for discussion.

Outside, UNB president Jim Smith said "it just seems like the run-around again". The demands were presented to the cabinet three months ago and no changes have been announced.

Demands include student representation on policy-making bodies relating to student aid.

"In reality we have as much input now as we will ever have," said UNB student representative Jim MacLean.

"Yeah, Right," replied Hatfield who went on to suggest the government would be unable to accept proposed changes "even in principle" although it may "give some consideration to some sort of body to examine student aid."

"In view of the fiscal situation at the moment we cannot consider the loan bursary ratio until next year," he said, predicting severe cuts in government services next year, including hospitals and road construction.

Tax-payers cannot be asked to finance improved student aid plans. MacLean said the changes would cost about three million dollars, the approximate cost of constructing three miles of highway.

"This is what restraint means, we have to cut back", responded Hatfield. "If I could give you more money, I would not hesitate, but the government is not in a position to do so."

Bucket-kicking stable

OTTAWA (CUP) — Canadians died at about the same rate in 1974 as in the previous year, but found different ways of doing it, according to advance mortality data released by Statistics Canada.

Canada's total death rate remained unchanged in 1974 at 7.4 per thousand population, with heart diseases still leading the way as the most popular means of dying, accounting for 34.9 per cent of the 166,786 total registered deaths that year.

Cancer continued strong in second place, remaining unchanged at 20.2 per cent of the total, while deaths due to accidents declined to only 7.8 per cent of the total, compared with 8.0 per cent in 1973.

On a provincial basis, death continued to grow in popularity in Prince Edward Island (9.3 per thousand), while people in the Northwest Territories continued to shun the grim reaper, resulting in a death rate of only 5.5 per thousand population.

Because of its large populations,

Ontario and Quebec led the parade, accounting for 60,555 and 42,767 respectively of those taking their final ride, well over 60 per cent of the total.

Plant suicides remain mystery

MICHIGAN (ZNS-CUP) — A University of Michigan scientist who last year discovered that plants commit suicide, now says he knows how the plants kill themselves — although he doesn't know why.

Professor Larry Nooden, studying under a department of agriculture research grant, says he found that plants want to end it all release what he calls a "killer hormone". He says the killer hormone spreads throughout the plant, causing a color change and eventual death.

Nooden says the killer hormone appears usually at the time the plants begin to flower or develop pods. Why some plants commit suicide, Nooden says, "remains a mystery".

Grads school finally fills students seats on council

By BOB COLLIER

It has taken over nine months for the School of Graduate Studies to finalize the selection of student representatives on the school council after a plague of student disinterest and a mail strike.

The results of the October by-election to fill the vacant seats were announced by SGS last week. There is now a full complement of students in every division except for the physical sciences where nobody bothered running.

Remember the long series of debates associated with the administration attempts to fill the student seats?

The whole story started last spring when the SGS announced the opening of nominations for the twelve student seats on the council which runs the graduate school.

A grand total of two students handed in their names for the 12 seats, and were of course acclaimed.

Realizing the situation was somewhat farcical, SGS to their credit held a by-election last fall to fill the ten vacancies.

There were more nominations this time. Four students ran for the three seats representing the social sciences and five ran for the two life science positions. Two humanities students were acclaimed for their division but, physical scientists presumably didn't even notice that there was an election, and no candidates showed up.

SGS were not overly satisfied with the situation, but went ahead with the vote anyway. They stamped and addressed 4,700 envelopes and got them ready just as the postal strike hit. They gave up on mailed ballots, announced that a ballot box would be set up in the SGS building and waited for the crowds to come in.

Well the crowd consisted of 32 people. That is 3.5 votes per candidate or 0.57 per cent of the 4,700 students who were eligible to cast their ballot.

Not an overwhelming vote you might say. Obviously embarrassed by the situation, SGS decided to seal the ballot box and hold the mail-in vote at the end of the postal strike.

In the meantime, they wisely decided that all the candidates could sit on the council and-split the six social and life science votes among themselves in whatever way they wished.

But that's not the end of the story, by any means. One of the four candidates for the three social science seats decided he'd had enough.

In the true spirit of democracy, he withdrew his candidature, claiming in part that "my withdrawal will enable these excellent candidates to be elected by acclamation, thus saving both the university and students, at large, precious energy and expense that might best be serviceable otherwise during these crucial decision-making days on campus."

So, half the twelve student seats were filled by acclamation, and another quarter were not filled at all.

Persevering against all odds, SGS went ahead in their fight for a democratic election. They mailed out 800 ballots for the two remaining seats and, hallelujah, got 22 per cent of them back. That's not bad for a graduate student vote.

And who finally got in you ask? Zoologist Doug Jackson lead the polls with biochemist Paul Doherty about 20 votes behind.

ASSU headed for fees decision this month

With the positive results in hand of a referendum to raise their fee next year from $2 to $4 per student, the Arts and Sciences Student Union is hoping the university will agree to collect that fee at this month's meeting of the Internal Affairs Committee.

ASSU represents 10,000 undergraduate students on St. George campus and provides funds for 16 individual course unions which in turn provide course evaluations for those departments.

ASSU's need for increased funding stems from the growth of the course unions in the past two years from six to the present number.

In order to have the university collect the money instead of the Student's Administrative Council, ASSU had to prepare a brief to Internal Affairs including this year's budget, next year's budget and a constitution. The university also requires audited books.

"We're just waiting for the auditor to finish," said ASSU's full-time fieldworker Jeannie Greatbatch. Outside of that, we're ready."

In October 87 per cent of those voting in the referendum were in favor of the fee raise.

Greatbatch admitted that even from next year's collection, things would be slim for the course unions.

"The individual course evaluation budgets run between $200 and $500. We're going to have to find a cheaper way to produce them," she said.

Greatbatch is also concerned that other course union events, such as forums and social events, will also be jeopardized.

ASSU has budgeted for no increase in the full-time labor, adding funds only for a part-time bookkeeper and typist.

ASSU's Greatbatch hopes for the go-ahead from Internal this month.

THE UNIVERSE

Amnesty International, an organization to free political prisoners, was recently voted a grant up to $350 from U of T Students Administrative Council (SAC) after President Gordon Barnes explained the moral considerations behind the grant. Seems some U of T students have relatives suffering political oppression in other countries. The money will help finance a benefit concert in Toronto.

PLANET EARTH?

A pride of SAC hacks are rumored to be seeking positions of power. Names which have come up in connection with the imminent SAC elections are External Commissioner Rob Snell, Women's Commissioner Shirley French, former Sac Student President Jon O'Donohue, and Innis rep Bill Drury. The only potential candidate who could be reached last night, Rob Snell, admitted he's been "talking it over" and considers running on a "progressive" platform. At least two socialist groups are expected to parachute candidates in from their own red planets.

Congratulations to John Floras (Meds III) on a hard-fought campaign for Governing Council. He has been acclaimed as the only candidate in his professional category. Nominations for Governing Council have also come from three Artsies, three engineers, and "probably six" part-timers, according to Chief Returning Officer David Warren.

THE NATION

Nine hundred University of Calgary students protested a proposed 25 per cent tuition increase last Friday. Alberta is presently suffering an 11 per cent ceiling on public service spending.

Post-secondary students in New Brunswick voted last week to go on strike to back up demands for student aid reforms. New Brunswick Youth Minister J.P. Ouellette had actively campaigned against the strike.

University of Regina students held a mass meeting recently to organize work committees and publicity to fight an expected 10 per cent tuition increase.

Don Kossick, a representative of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, offered to form an alliance of students and workers against wage controls and education cutbacks.

And didn't something happen at U of T last week?

ONTARIO

Former Liberal leader and controversialist Robert Nixon when cornered at the recent Liberal convention said, "It's too late for that." He left us with "I've seen The Varsity all over here." Maybe the world does revolve around U of T after all.

Delegates' comments on the leadership victory of shrink Stuart Smith included "This party needs a psychiatrist."

Former Ward 6 Board of Education trustee K. Dock Yip supported David Peterson for the leadership because "I think he wants to limit spending on education," said Yip.

Winner Smith also had views on the Henderson Report, tuition increases, and the OSAP loan ceiling.

BUSINESS

In opposing a SAC grant to the Alexandra Park Community Health Centre, a health clinic for area residents, Finance Commissioner Michael Treacy noted the $7,500 grant amounted to a $1.50 handout to each of the 400-plus student users of the service. The motion to provide the grant was passed.

Subway artsies face press hostility

By DAVE MILNE

The same mentality that almost scrapped the "Archer" is being demonstrated again, fueled by some incredibly biased and incorrect reporting in the Toronto newspapers and a bungled public relations campaign by the art co-ordinators. This time the target is "subway art".

Last Friday the artists and the subway art coordinating firm revealed the extent of their project at a press conference held at the Art Gallery of Ontario. The public was finally allowed a view of models and renderings of art work planned for the new subway line.

TTC representatives and sympathetic officials all revealed their bewilderment at the newspapers' greatly inflated price estimates.

One article was headlined "Subway art is it worth $459,348?" but failed to clarify many of the financial outlays to this date.

The coordinators pointed out that about one-fifth of the cost was irretrievably spent on preliminary searches for projects.

They emphasized a standard TTC bathroom tile treatment would cost $60,000, and that the entire cost would be recovered if every student in the city made one trip to see the line.

TTC commissioner Karl Mallette, a supporter of the project pointed out that the entire cost was only slightly more than a day's revenue for the transit system or slightly under the cost of one new subway car.

Over coffee, a group of artists pointed out the most germane reason for brightening up the subways — safety. Their consensus seemed to be that the more people attracted to the transit system the safer it would be for the passengers and that recent incidents of violence have all taken place on deserted platforms of little-used lines.

If the work was completed as it was displayed at the Art Gallery, the Spadina line would become a mile-long showcase of current Canadian art. Works include John MacGregor's whimsical stack of cups, Gordon Rayner's geometric murals, Joyce Welland's thirty foot quilt and Michael Hayden's 570 ft. long neon greenhouse.

The subject matter would be varied. Streetcars, caribou, two-storey orchids and a surreal mural would all flash by the passenger's window.

Written descriptions have failed to describe the excitement of the renderings and models currently on display in the Art Gallery of Ontario. Preview what may be the most exciting urban project in North America. If you wish to support it a petition and letter are available at the desk.

According to Mallette and others, if the public response in favour of the project is great enough it will be completed. If not, we may all get a transit "art" comparable to New York's — complete with a cop in every car.

Back underfoot again. Today's effort: Eric McMillan, Sharon Stevenson, Dave Milne and all the regulars. Nuts to all those that didn't get their copy in on time. Let's hear it for the Anti-Initiation Board. You know, those guys we pay $40,000 per annum to tell us why we can't make $10,000. Such a system!

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1930 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Shazam! After all that, it ended in 40 minutes

It was a beautifully orchestrated end to the SAC strike. Most of the witnesses were flabbergasted that after weeks of jawing and wrangling over five dollars it could reach such a quick and painless settlement.

In the end the credit goes to the union for compromising more than it wanted to. At Wednesday's SAC meeting of the General Council it looked as if Gord Barnes was about to follow through with his promise of pushing a motion through council stating that SAC had made its last offer. That of course would have been the epitome of bargaining in bad faith, but it was evident that council feeling on the subject was strong enough to pass the motion.

The SAC feeling was overheard this way: "Let those bastards freeze on the picket line."

So when the union unexpectedly showed a willingness to compromise, council jumped at the chance to force both sides back to the bargaining table. Both sides were told to leave the room for twenty minutes. Forty minutes later they arrived with a settlement.

Up until that point only the most incorrigible of optimists could have hoped for a solution for at least another month. The Varsity staff was demoralized and chopping at the bit, the Varsity Board of Directors had passed a motion suggesting to the editor that he "employ his best efforts to publish," and SAC had refused to pay the editors unless they crossed the picket lines to publish what would have been an unpopular newspaper.

The Varsity itself was not on strike. The most frustrating thing was the knowledge that there were two sides fighting and we weren't one of them. Any move we made could only have been construed as either anti-union or anti-SAC. Our only logical tactic was the one we chose, to sit on our hands until this disagreement blew over.

Had we published we would have been crossing a picket line as well as pulling the union's largest bargaining rug out from under their rather cold feet. Two of the union members are integral to our operation. The smoothness of that operation could not be jeopardized.

The strike was by no means friendly. There were rough words, as well as rumors that SAC was attempting to have the strikers arrested for picketing Convocation Hall last week for the non-appearance of Germaine Greer.

It's probable that relations at the SAC office between workers and executive, already at ebb tide before the strike, will reach untold lows from here on in. The multitude of hatchets (more than figurative) will have to be buried if anything constructive is to take place.

So it's back to work with SAC complaining that they've been lied to and cheated and the union uttering a similar litany. Nonetheless, it's better than it might have been had they not reached this decisive compromise.

During the strike, a few members of the executive could be heard muttering "well it doesn't matter, I've given up on this year anyways." That had better not be the case. If the SAC executive thinks they can coast through the end of the year on the excuse that personal relations bar any possible action, they'd better be prepared for a stink from our side.

And we won't rest it because we have nothing better to do, nor out of personal disagreement with SAC executive members, but because they've got a job to do. They were elected for that reason, and nothing should get in the way. It's the price you have to pay for running in popularity contests.

OFS responds Varg article:

Hindsight proves them wrong

To The Editor:

I am writing this letter to correct your article on the coming increase in the OSAP loan ceiling. "All-loan program coming": OFS"; Wed., Jan. 14). In this article, I was quoted as saying that the increase in the loan ceiling is "a step towards an all-loan program." This statement implies a certainty, whereas only a possibility exists; if we have learned one thing in the past few years, it is that it is very dangerous trying to predict what the government is going to do.

Your reporter has also quoted me as saying that the Advisory Committee on Financial Assistance for Students would "announce its decision to raise the ceiling to $1,000." This implies that the Committee would pass off a government decision as its own, and thus seriously call into question the integrity of the Committee's members. This is something that the OFS-FEO has never done. We do not expect that the Committee will produce an ill-considered report or that it will merely parrot the government's line on student aid; our concern is rather that the Committee's report will be entirely disregarded by the Minister, and that any student input would thus be negated. I am very concerned that this matter be set right, and that the members of the Committee be cleared of any unfair imputations. The announcement of the increases will probably come from the Minister himself, and while the fact that the decision has already been made calls into question the Government's sincerity in setting up the Advisory Committee, it in no way reflects on the sincerity of the Committee itself.

Upset reader: "Tighten belts"

To The Editor:

Awright, now that you guys are back in business, why don't you get your heads firmly stuck back in reality and tell the truth about this university?

So who reads the Goat and Snail anyways?

Bad press coverage of the encouraging showing at Queen's Park two weeks ago has forced students and student politicians alike into new paroxysms of liberal breast-beating over the position of the student in society.

The rally was in many ways a startling success, marred only slightly by the poor showing from our own campus. But the Toronto papers were there too (or at least they tried to make us believe they were there), and from their reports the population of Ontario receives a rather distorted view of what happened and why it happened.

While none of the papers carried actual news reports of the event, which could only have been a conscious decision on their parts, each allowed their columnists to go at the occasion with everything they had.

The scenario: Students, led astray by sympathizers of the Fourth International and other assorted crackpots, did everything but flash their private parts at government spokespersons at a noisy near-riot to demand a softer cushion under the rear ends of the most elite group in Canadian society.

The press has been towing this line for years, that students form an upper-class all their own, privileged and spoiled. Any move we make can only be construed as a move to perpetuate our elite position.

There are holes in this logic through which one could drive the Robarts library. If an elite wished to perpetuate itself as an economic unit, its first move would be to keep the stakes high. Adding to the possibility that the university population consists of the sons and daughters of Canada's elite, the press concludes that we approve of this, even though every major student effort in the last ten years has been directed against the initial economic discrimination. Equal criticism has been directed at the "streamlining" process that stereotypes students in the primary and secondary schools.

One of the more outrageous explanations for our fight to at least maintain tuition at its present point is that we don't like to earn our keep during the summer, even though students have proven that they are ready and able to take on the dullest job in any steel mill or construction site in order to earn the "privilege" of an education. The jobs are harder to find every summer, and we take jibes from journalists who make a fair penny themselves by scapegoating the students as a source of the economic imbalance in this country.

The odd detail that the journalists couldn't fit in to their view of the matter was that most of the people in attendance were fighting against something that would not affect them in the future. When tuition rings in at $1,000 per annum very few of us will be here. We call it fighting on a principle, they call it selfishness. It's hard to get ideas across these days with everyone in this anti-inflation frame of mind. It's not unadjacent to tunnel-vision.

They have a few believers on campus. Much of the criticism of the rally at the latest SAC meeting stemmed directly from the press criticism a week earlier. SAC reps were advocating a more polite form of demonstration to keep the press happy. This is nonsense. While the rally did lack slightly in discipline, there is no reason to balk because of the response of a traditionally hostile press. SAC's job is to organize the students, not the Ontario newspapers.

That doesn't mean the press is an adversary. The government is still the target. No matter what the press says, conditions are changing in front of our eyes. The university game is getting harder to play every day.

that every student demands his marks and his essays back on time. Keep 'em hustling.

Varg hack replies to Migdal charge

Letter to The Editor:

Oh the Flattery and degradation, Ada please control yourself. In the first issue of Migdal, which is published by the Jewish Student Federation and the Hill Foundation, Ada Rosen headlined her article "LETTER TO BOB WHITE". Was my long sought dream of fame realized, but was this destined to become a collectors item?

Alas, I am dashed to suffer the fate of Barabas, Gollum, and other lowlife of this existence. Ada Rosen accuses me of erroneous information in an article which appeared in the Varsity of November 21, 1975. In fact, I was called a liar. Well I see you have been studying the Varsity style guide on how to become a successful journalist by means of slander, innuendo, and unsubstantiated rumors, however it could upset sensitive people like me.

The problem is simple. I had absolutely nothing to do with the writing of the article which concerned the appearance of Shafik Al Hout at the Faculty of Education. The story clearly had no byline and that was so because of disturbing reasons which do not concern this particular issue.

Ada was probably confused as my name was beside the two photographs which accompanied the story. I can not deny it, I did take the photographs.

It appears as if it was an explainable mistake, however, I feel that Ada Rosen and the Migdal should scrutinize their facts before they set out on strong personal attacks.

Now, how will I explain this to my mother.

Op-Ed: Coalition states its principles

By PETER ROWE

Organized opposition to the Davis government's proposed cutbacks in social services and education is intensifying throughout Ontario. An important development in the fight was the formation last week of the Coalition Against Cutbacks.

The Coalition is a broadly based alliance of social service workers, unions, tenants, senior citizens, and community groups representing well over 200,000 Metro citizens.

In a press conference Thursday, members of the Coalition urged all people across Ontario who are being victimized to join with them to secure the reversal of the "arbitrary, heartless and irresponsible policies, and to obtain social policies that are rational, humane and just."

The Coalition intends to challenge both the legality of the cutback measures and the government rationale for implementing them. The legal question remains somewhat ambiguous. While the government is obligated by its own legislation to reimburse the municipalities at present percentage rates, it can alter the regulations of the relevant legislation in order to renege on its commitments.

The real issue, though, "is the deliberate subversion of the Government's promises to the citizens of Ontario." The Coalition has asked that Municipal councillors carry out the legal challenge.

The Conservative rationale for the cutbacks is based, first, on the claim that expenditures in the education, health, and social service areas have grown out of proportion with other government spending, and, second, on the fact that revenues have been insufficient.

The first claim contradicts what the Tories were saying less than a year ago.

Treasurer Darcy McKeough stated that: "In local government spending from 1970 to 1974, the slowest growing major function was in health and social services."

The second claim, that revenues are insufficient to allow for the necessary increases, is true, but the Coalition argues that it is a problem of the Tories' own making.

"Between 1962 and 1972, the corporate share of taxes fell from 62 per cent to 29 per cent while individuals' share rose from 38 per cent to 71 per cent. While corporation taxes contributed 12 cents of each revenue dollar collected in Ontario in 1975, personal income tax alone contributed 23 cents."

The Coalition's charges that the Conservatives are responsible for the revenue problems are substantiated in a recent article in the

Jan. 15 Globe and Mail by Alderman John Sewell. Since revenues are now lower than originally estimated, the government argues that transfer payments should be lower. Sewell asks why revenue was less than anticipated:

"In April, the retail sales tax was cut from 7 per cent to 5 per cent — and by that simple act the province lost $520 million in projected revenues. Most people saw this as a crass political move aimed at gathering support for the summer election.

"Now the government is using this loss of revenue as an excuse for transferring fewer funds to local governments. Property taxpayers end up paying for the Tories' election strategy. It's a cruel joke."

On the basis of these and similar criticisms, the Coalition demands (1) the immediate lifting of the arbitrary freezes, ceilings, and cutbacks, (2) the reversal of administrative directives that undermine basic social services, (3) a reordering of government priorities, and (4) a re-examination of the provincial tax scheme towards a restructuring that places costs where they belong.

In addition to its widespread support from community and social service organizations, the Coalition also received the backing of the Ontario New Democratic Party.

Ross McClellan, Community and Social Services Critic for the NDP announced that the caucus "supports utterly and absolutely the proposals of the Coalition." McClellan outlined the probable scenario for the next few months when he said the NDP would be "quite happy to fight an election on these issues."

McMaster University now has a third option for students interested in proceeding to a Master of Business Administration degree: a co-operative option, whereby students alternate four-month periods of study and relevant work experience. A limited number of applications will be accepted for the semester beginning in September, 1976.

Co-op

An MBA degree from McMaster could help you to achieve your career objectives in the areas of management, administration, and education because the McMaster MBA program offers a wide range of optional courses (that can be selected to your needs) as well as providing a core of basic knowledge and skills. Although admission is restricted to those who have proven that they have the potential and commitment required to complete a demanding program, graduates in any discipline may be accepted.

Full-time

Academic standing is not the only entry criterion but, as a general rule, you can have a reasonable expectation of completing the McMaster MBA program if you have maintained at least a second-class standing in the last two years of your undergraduate program and if you can achieve a satisfactory test score in the Graduate Management Admission Test.

Part-time

Applicants for the McMaster MBA who have taken relevant course work may be granted advanced standing in our program. If you are interested in exploring this challenging opportunity further, fill in and mail this form.

Montreal students continue strike

MONTREAL (CUP) — Geography students at the Université de Montréal have agreed to accept a structure for a neutral committee to investigate their demands.

The neutral committee would consist of three geography specialists from outside the university geography department. One is expected to represent the students, one to represent the administration and one to represent neither — according to the student proposal drawn up January 26.

The students who have been on strike since last October have suggested that the committee be responsible for examining the cases of the four geography professors the students have asked to resign.

The students insist that the recommendations from the committee be final and implemented immediately. They refused to accept administration veto power over any decisions that might be made.

The proposal asks that the committee meet for three weeks and says that the students will not return to class during that period.

A spokesperson for the striking students said "to return to the classes of the very profs we have asked to resign defeats the entire purpose of the committee, and of our struggle."

The students also decided not to respond to the letter sent by the administration insisting that they re-register for their second term or leave the university. According to the students, the signature was photocopied on each letter and is technically not official or legal.

The demands include the dismissal of four professors of the department whom the students deem incompetent. According to the students, three have been hampering attempts by both the students and faculty to change curriculum. They are apparently senior professors who have been labelled "allies of the administration".

The students have complained that the courses offered by these professors are purely descriptive and not at all scientific. One student said that "they are the kinds of courses one has in elementary school."

Other geography professors apparently approved of the proposed curriculum changes but have been afraid of administration reprisals if they attempt to side with the students.

Carleton union blocked

OTTAWA (CUP) — A newly formed staff union at Carleton University is facing strong opposition from the administration. Carleton vice-president Albert Larose challenged the eligibility of 250 members of the proposed bargaining unit which has signed more than 800 members.

According to Carleton University Support Staff Association (CUSSA) coordinator Phyllis MacRae, such a move would block certification by the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

Support staff salaries range from $4,600 to $15,000, but the average wage is only $7,000. Support staff includes technicians who maintain science labs, nurses in the health services and secretarial staff. According to MacRae, because some secretaries have access to confidential information which may benefit a union, their membership in the union is being challenged.

MacRae has accused the administration of failing to show good faith, by stalling on technical grounds.

If an interim certificate is not granted by the end of January, it could take up to six months to clarify the remaining positions.

In the meantime, said MacRae, support staff are left without protection and with their salaries frozen under the labour laws of Ontario.

CUSSA represents the last and the largest group at the university pushing for union certification. The Faculty association, certified last spring, signed an agreement in November that includes an 18 per cent raise and protection from layoffs due to financial cutbacks.

Acadia council fires newspaper editor

WOLFVILLE (CUP) — The editor of the Acadia University Athenaeum has been fired by the University's Student Council because of what that body calls "irresponsible behaviour".

Bringing the motion before Council January 21, Student President Jim Enman charged editor Michael Chiasson with using second-hand news sources and ignoring the advice of three lawyers.

According to Enman, Chiasson had written an article January 8 charging a visiting professor with plagiarism during a mathematics seminar in which the mathematician failed to acknowledge sources pertinent to his talk. The professor was an applicant for head of the mathematics department.

The article drew protest from the majority of the Acadia mathematics professors, the University President, and from the Student Council executive.

University President Dr. J.M.R. Beveridge, in a letter to council president Enman said he could "think of no story published in the student newspaper that has hurt to a greater extent any department, or indeed the University itself than has this article."

Beveridge, along with 10 Acadia Math profs who submitted their letter to the editor of the paper, requested an apology and a retraction.

Chiasson, however, in separate meetings with the University President and the executive of the student council, refused to retract or apologize, stating that he had acted in good faith on information from sources, which, though he claimed journalistic prerogative in not naming, he had no reason to disbelieve.

Enman wrote a publisher's retraction and ordered Chiasson to print it on the front page of the January 15 issue of the Athenaeum — Chiasson printed the retraction but also included an editorial accepting no responsibility for the retraction.

Staff members of the Athenaeum presented their constitution to the January 21 council meeting asking that a committee be struck to investigate the issue, however, Enman stated the procedure was "a waste of time" and moved that the constitution be suspended.

Council agreed to suspend the constitution and agreed that since the legal opinion sought on the matter indicated that Chiasson's article was "potentially libellous", he had acted irresponsibly and the motion to fire was passed.

HAMILTON (ZNS-CUP) — A Canadian researcher reports that he attached electrodes to a bowl of lime Jell-o and succeeded in picking up recordings of wave activity similar to that given off by the human brain.

Doctor Adrian Upton of McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario, says that the portion of Jell-o involved was about the size of a human brain.

Upton stresses that the lime Jell-o was not doing any thinking. He says the apparent brain waves from the gelatin dessert resulted from various artificial feeding machines and respirators that were operating next to the Jell-o, causing it to vibrate.

Upton did not explain why the lime flavour was used.

"Why are so many of us being killed in car accidents?"

It's a fact. Last year the 16 to 24 age group accounted for more than one-third of all drivers killed on Ontario roads.

And nearly 40% of all drivers involved in fatal accidents were our age.

Maybe we can't change the world but we can change this.

We've got to slow down.

We've got to live.

Think about it.

Codco puts on a show complete with pratfalls

By GENE ALLEN

Anyone who needs a few laughs to escape from the mid-winter doldrums should see Codco's latest show at Theatre Passe Muraille, Would You Like To Smell My Pocketcrumbs. Codco, a group of seven Newfoundland expatriates, write their own dense and satisfying comic sketches, and perform them with such energy and abandon as to erase worry-lines on even the dourst of Torontonians' foreheads. The impression left last Friday night as the excited and appreciative capacity audience left the theatre was of a group that had just received a much-needed and massive dose of exuberance.

But to attribute Codco's appeal to nothing more than high spirits is to underrate the group's considerable skill as writers and actors. For an extended evening of comic sketches to be successful (the present show is almost two hours long, with no intermission), the sketches must be fast-moving enough to hold the spectator's attention, yet must avoid overpowering the audience with a barrage of frantic activity which quickly becomes tiresome. How Codco steers its way past these twin difficulties is a matter best left to the theoreticians of comedy, but the fact is that the company succeeds admirably. The show is consistently funny throughout, with only a few quickly forgotten weak moments, and the laughs were rarely forced. The explanation lies in the variety and inventiveness which the seven-member cast brings to the preparation of its material, characterization, and action in the pratfall-inflated-pig-bladder vein. Clearly the actors are well-used to working together, as evidenced by the strong collective sense of timing, which allows the complex and absurd plotlines of the sketches to career off in all directions without ever losing momentum.

The sketches are varied enough to make it difficult to pick one as being typical, but a look at the sad story of Morton, the dying child molester, may provide the unwary with some idea of what to expect. Morton, a confirmed child molester, has a final break-up with his long-suffering wife in a cocktail bar. He learns from his doctor (a two-bodied monstrosity with a poor bedside manner to boot) that he has cancer and must go into the hospital. While Morton is forced to wait to be admitted by a surly nurse, all manner of exotic and improbable characters and sub-plots emerge. The clearly loony hospital staff, not knowing what to do with Morton, and not caring much either, decide to send him to the pediatric ward, a place where one might expect Morton would have some difficulty than usual in controlling his forbidden predilections. At the climax, in a grotesque and hilarious play on the most hackneyed of doctor-show clichés, Morton Does The Right Thing by donating his kidney to a little girl, impregnated by Morton, and now in the process of giving birth to Morton's child. The child, it turns out, needs a kidney too, and Morton's sole remaining one is expeditiously pressed into service. Even before Codco from proceeding with their usual illogical, surprising, and always welcome comic embellishment. The doctor, working feverishly over the little girl, calls out to his assistant for ether. "Ether what?!", replies the assistant coyly. "Ohhhh, god-damn!!!", moans the doctor in a perfect picture of frustration as he tries to remember the password, "ether — uh, ether — ether bunny!" He is then handed the ether by his smirking helper. The whole exchange takes no more than ten seconds, and may not even seem particularly funny when removed from its carefully-constructed context, but it is precisely this sort of irrelevant comic detail which keeps the audience laughing without ever testing their patience. And such detail only adds to the range of Codco's satiric vision, a good example of which is the sharp sketch about the establishment of Newfoundland as a tourist haven for rich mainlanders.

RHODESIA MUST DIE-ZIMBA

By LEARYAN

"The struggle in Zimbabwe has been going on continuously for nearly a century. Zimbabwe was colonized at the end of the nineteenth century and by 1893, the first rebellion, they call it 'revolt', was launched by our people against the British colonial settlers. This war of liberation has continued from 1893 to the present. Although the war of liberation has suffered temporary setbacks over the periods, it is indeed not a new struggle, as one would probably read in the Western imperialist press." These were the remarks of Michael Mawema, Organizing Secretary of the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) at a recent press interview. Mawema is on a cross-Canada fund raising tour, and will speak tomorrow at U of T.

"This is indeed an old struggle," said Mawema. "The present revolutionary movement is being led by ZANU, the Zimbabwe African National Union, born in the sixties. ZANU came into being as a continuation, of course, of the struggle that began with the formation of the African Nation Congress in the 1950's, the National Democratic party in the early sixties, then ZAPU in the late sixties, and continues now under the Zimbabwe African National Union. So, the struggle of the people of Zimbabwe is as old as colonialism is in Zimbabwe."

Mawema has described the history of the repression of the Smith regime against the people: "The colonial government of Rhodesia, which is of course a white racist and fascist minority regime," Mawema said, "has employed very destructive political, psychological, sociological and economic measures against the people of Zimbabwe. In order to frustrate the rising opposition against this government, the white minority settlers have continuously banned African nationalist movements," he added.

"TERRORIZE THE RACISTS"

Mawema contends ZANU represents an advance in the resistance movement against the racist Rhodesian regime. "ZANU arises from the indecision, and the conciliatory politics of ZAPU which it has associated itself with in the politics of exile." The birth of ZANU introduced slogans like 'Confrontation' which have continued up to this day. Before ZANU was banned we had made a decision to terrorize the racist settlers and here we had, I think, what was the beginning of what we can call urban guerrilla warfare. Areas then were set up in 1963, destruction of factories, stores, burning of farms, terrorizing the white racist settlers, was begun."

Mawema pointed out the decision to take up organized armed struggle arose after ZANU was declared illegal. "After ZANU was banned, and the leadership imprisoned, we decided to launch the armed struggle. In other words, it was a development from the terrorizing method that had been adopted. The idea here was to wage psychological warfare on the minds of the white settlers and make them ready to talk."

"By early 1963-64" Mawema added, "ZANU was interested in a constitutional conference, if it was to come about. But having failed, the decision of the Central Committee in prison was to commission certain members of the Central Committee, who were not in political detention, and who were outside Zimbabwe, to set up a military structure."

Mawema described the course of the armed struggle carried out by ZANU. "We succeeded (in mobilizing young people for armed struggle), so much so that in 1966, ZANU was able to launch the first organized armed struggle ever with the Simba Battle. This was the first major battle fought within 100 miles of the capital city of Salisbury and this battle laid the foundations of armed confrontation. Since then ZANU has been on the march. On the offensive so much that it has dug into the enemy's mind, it has dug into the enemy's economic structure and the entire political structure."

ZANU now controls an area of about 48,000 square miles, according to Mawema. It was this fighting ability, continual movement, and victories that were achieved by ZANU which created chaos amongst the white racist settler minorities. For the first time, the farmers ran away from their farms. For the first time, the Smith propaganda machine did not have any effect in the rural areas, particularly in the areas where the ZANU armies had taken over. For the first time in Rhodesia, Smith was confronted by white refugees. His own people were running away from the rural areas of Zimbabwe.

"ZANU was able to show the African people that the settlers claim of invincibility was not true. They were as vulnerable to attack and defeat as all other imperialists and colonialist forces which have been wiped out all over the world," Mawema said. "It was this growth and the pressure of ZANU on the Rhodesian government that forced them to resort to the most destructive, inhumane activities in the countryside of Zimbabwe."

IAN SMITH POISONED THE WATER

Mawema went on to describe the concrete tactics used by Smith government to combat ZANU. "They went about poisoning the running water of the country, they killed animals; they spoiled, in actual fact, poisoned the water in the rural areas to kill men and animals because they supported ZANU guerrillas."

"When they found that their terrorizing of the population was not as useful to them as they thought it would be, Rhodesia was advised to adopt the methods used by the Americans in Vietnam to create concentration camps, which in Rhodesia are called 'protected villages'." The Rhodesian government had found that not only were the guerrillas fighting against it, but even the local populace were rising against it," Mawema said.

But the Smith regime did not stop at that, Mawema continued, "So they adopted measures of expropriating people's property, arresting and intimidating people, assassinating leaders, executing people in prisons and total confiscation and removal of peasants from their land. When we speak of people in concentration camps, in Zimbabwe, we are speaking of the landless people whose property has been confiscated by the Rhodesian government, because, they say, they are collaborating with the freedom fighters of ZANU."

"CAPITALIST CONSPIRACY"

Mawema pointed out these successes in the armed struggle led to more desperate acts. "In response to this progress and development in 1974, the capitalist and imperialist world saw that something had to be done in order to rescue and to protect their interests. Hence they collaborated recognizing, for the first time, that ZANU is a mighty fighting force. They sought constitutional discussions with ZANU, but in order to do so, some of their lackeys suggest that it would be good to also release such people as Joshua Nkomo and others who had been in restriction."

Mawema said the process of detente in Zimbabwe was a result of this manoeuvre. "They were released and it is this new thinking which has been called the South African 'detente'. It has been a machination of the collusion of the reactionary forces in Southern Africa together with British and American imperialism."

"Detente brought about problems for ZANU, in that when the collaborationists and revisionists were released from prison, they were given maximum publicity and maximum support by their masters in order to operate. The Smith regime demanded that ZANU stop fighting, but ZANU did not submit to that. A united front of the people of Zimbabwe was required," he said.

In describing the process of building the united front, Mawema said: "What ZANU did object to was the tampering with or watering-down of their policy of 'chimurenga', their policy of armed confrontation with the white minority settler forces of Rhodesia. All the imperialist and colonialist forces were working against this policy, one way or another. The only way they were able to tamper with it, was to collude and conspire to destroy ZANU."

They resorted to murder, Mawema pointed out. "They assassinated the man who was leading the ZANU Military High Command, the late Herbert Chitepo. The Zambian government arrested and detained more than one hundred and fifty of the ZANU army leadership and entire military high command including the ZANU Central Committee members. These people are still incarcerated in the Zambian prisons. So what purports today to be a constitutional discussion going on in Rhodesia is in actual fact the result of imperialist conspiracy that have been directed against ZANU."

A 'REASONABLE' BLACK MAN

In order to clarify the role of those in the national movement who have taken up the politics of 'detente' Mawema pointed to Joshua Nkomo. "Joshua Nkomo is now negotiating with the Ian Smith government. I think the world has seen how much not only Rhodesia with South Africa's support, but also even the social-imperialist Russia and the American, everybody has made Joshua Nkomo a hero, a 'reasonable' man, who can talk sense into the white man. The black man who can squeeze 'majority rule' from Ian Smith. But so far as ZANU is concerned, it indeed does not object to negotiation, because it did participate in some negotiations, but ZANU has taken up a decision and is committed to the liberation of Zimbabwe by armed struggle, and this it has been able to demonstrate as the only way, the most correct way."

Mawema outlined the importance of armed struggle. "Only by armed struggle can ZANU set up an independent state based on its own principles, on its own structure not determined by the white colonial forces of Southern Africa, not even consulting with the international 'socialism' which is destructive of our ambition. So therefore at the moment, ZANU is committed to fighting. ZANU rejects unequivocally Nkomo's discussions with Ian Smith. It rejects the entire theory that in 1975, after almost twenty years of negotiations, while Ian Smith continues to say publicly everyday that he is not willing to give majority rule to Nkomo, that he can spend his time hobnobbing it with the colonial and imperialist masters of these people. ZANU is not going to waste its time on this. ZANU's military camps are overflowing with guerrillas."

THE U.S., U.S.S.R. AND CHINA

Mawema went into the question of U.S. and Soviet involvement in Africa and Zimbabwe. "U.S. imperialism has not supported the UN sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. The U.S. economically supports any illegal regime in Southern Rhodesia."

"Presently there are more than five hundred white U.S. Viet Nam veterans fighting with the Rhodesian army. The U.S. supplies almost everything that it provided to its allies in Vietnam to the Rhodesian forces. The U.S. multinational corporations continue to block publication and propaganda of the people's revolution in Zimbabwe. It is the U.S. that maintains, runs, directs, and controls the total economy of South Africa, which has been the guarantee of our exploitation. Hence as far as the people of Zimbabwe are concerned, the U.S. is indeed an enemy."

Mawema went on to describe the role of the Soviet Union. "Russian imperialism is seen by its consistent support for Joshua Nkomo, who is today the 'running dog' of the Russians and U.S. imperialism. He is an eager brainchild of the South African and Rhodesian political draftsmen. We have been informed, and I think it has been authenticated, that it is the Russians who have continuously financed ZAPU, that they have told Nkomo to split from the umbrella organization African National Council (ANC)."

"After he split from the ANC, the Russians gave him more than $50,000 to support him in his bid for recognition by the Ian Smith and South African governments. So far as the people of Zimbabwe are concerned, the continuing support by the Russians of ZAPU and Nkomo, is an act of aggression to the people of Zimbabwe, particularly to the armed forces of ZANU."

ZANU leader oppose the interventions of the Soviet Union and the U.S. and encourage their soldiers to study the works of Mao Tsetung. The current fund raising tour, which will bring Michael Mawema to Innis College Tuesday night, is sponsored by the pro-Chinese Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) and "other progressive and democratic organizations" according to their press release.

NOW IS THE TIME FOR ATTACK

"For the first time, the ZANU training camps are overflowing with young men and women who have committed themselves to the armed revolution," according to Mawema. "ZANU has maximum support in the country. This has been demonstrated every time ZANU has called for action within the country. Its process, its programme of training continues very effectively," he said.

"ZANU has enjoyed the support of both the Tanzanian and Mozambique governments."

At this time, ZANU is going to launch the greatest of its offensives on the Rhodesian forces. We have to set up a pre-emptive action before the sellout agreement is announced between Joshua Nkomo, Ian Smith and the British government.

It is true that ZANU has suffered from great setbacks particularly in the arrest of its able leadership which is languishing in the Zambian prisons. But ZANU has come back to restructure itself, to redefine, to re-establish and to reset itself on the course to armed confrontation."

Mawema added "As far as future government is concerned ZANU is very clear, it has committed itself both in principle and in action to the establishment of a socialist state. We mince no words as far as our commitment is concerned. We are all out against social imperialism and against any forms of capitalism. We would not be party to anything that has been or may continue to be a means or source of exploitation of the people of Zimbabwe. We will rid Zimbabwe of the total capitalist structure."

ZANU is not concerned very much in dealing with the issues of segregation or discrimination etc. We are fighting to establish majority rule now and on that policy our people are committed and they will stand by it. We will fight and will win. The time factor is hard for me to say, but it is no exaggeration to say the distance of success is nearer than the distance we have come in the past."

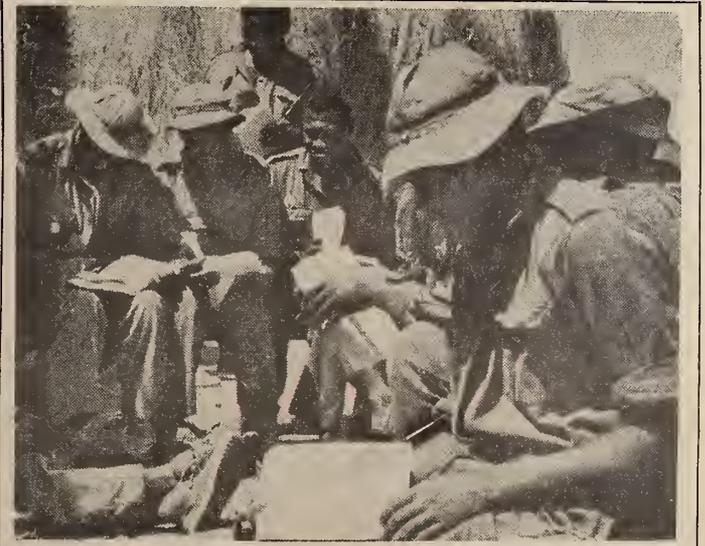

THE FINAL BLOW

"We have the force that we believe the Rhodesian forces can never stand, given the support which we believe the people of Canada and the people of the world will give us, and given the means to train and put our people in readiness, we are ready to give what will be the hardest blows, if not the final blow to the white racist minority regime of Ian Smith."

"We believe it is only after knowing what we are going through and why we are going through it that the people of Canada can help us. So my mission here shall be to give that information. We would like the people of Canada to give us moral support. It is this spirit of proletarian internationalism that gives us the courage while our young men and women are fighting in the countryside," Mawema concluded.

Saskatchewan council moves against student editor

SASKATOON (CUP) — The student newspaper at the University of Saskatchewan has all but squashed a student council proposal to take over "the affairs of the Sheaf".

Recent policy proposals by the U of Students' Union posed what Sheaf editor, Don Thomson, called a serious threat to the editorial autonomy of the student newspaper.

Talks between the newspaper and the student union began shortly after the release of a "working document" prepared by student union internal vice-president Doug Pearce, which outlined a proposal for placing editorial control of the Sheaf in the hands of a Students' Union "media board".

In his proposal, Pearce questioned, "whether or not the Sheaf has been meeting the needs of the students".

Pearce did not specify which needs had not been met, but said, other than advertising campus activities, the main function of the newspaper should be "to stimulate and consequently emulate campus opinion."

The media board as outlined by Pearce would be "charged with the supervision of the affairs of the Sheaf". This excluded financial affairs which are already controlled by the students union.

The board would have two major functions. It would control appointments to the editorial positions of the paper and direct its editorial policy, the proposal stated.

The board would be comprised of the Sheaf editor and two elected members of the Sheaf collective, the USSU vice-presidents (finance and internal), one student selected at large, one faculty member, one representative of the local print media, and one representative from the Saskatoon community.

The USSU President would also like to sit on the board.

The Sheaf collective immediately responded by condemning the proposal as "fascist" and called a special emergency meeting of the editorial collective which unanimously decided to oppose the formation of the media board.

According to editor Thomson, the proposal would place editorial control of the Sheaf in the hands of the people who know nothing about newspapers, with the exception of a member of the "establishment" press.

"The proposed membership of the board," said Thomson, "represents the various vested financial and political interests within the university, towards which the Sheaf has always acted in a critical or 'adversary' role. To place the editorial control of the newspaper in the hands of these people is, in effect, to eliminate the 'freedom of the press' at the University of Saskatchewan."

The presence of a member of the local professional print media on the board signified to Thomson that the USSU desired to implement a "straight media mentality" with the Sheaf. This the collective felt ran contrary to their interests as progressive journalists.

Thomson stated "it would seem they (the USSU) are telling us we cannot effectively criticize or investigate corporate groups, electoral candidates and elected officials within the University community. This reduces the Sheaf to a simple house organ of the student union, rather than a newspaper," Thomson said.

After what Thomson called "an informal confrontation" with Pearce, the Sheaf gained a number of major concessions from the USSU. Pearce has now substantially revised the wording of the document and made major alterations in the proposed media board.

As the proposal now stands, the Media Board is to act in an advisory role to the Sheaf. Controls over membership in the collective and appointments to the managerial positions have been completely cut out. In addition, the Sheaf has gained veto power. Final editorial content is to be determined by the collective.

But Thomson says he is still unsatisfied, but feels the altered proposal was definitely an improvement over the first draft.

"If the Sheaf had to work under a media board, this is close to what I would expect," he said. "However, I seriously question the need for a media board at all. I think Pearce and the USSU executive are suffering from a serious lack of communication with the Sheaf.

Instead of working within the system as it now exists they want to change the system to promote their own self interests," he said.

McGILL DAILY
The case of Rubin "Hurricane" Carter and John Artis has in recent weeks finally gotten the public attention it deserves partly as a result of growing press coverage and partly as a result of Bob Dylan's song "The Hurricane."

It's a bit sad, but perhaps typical that as the Carter case reaches the critical stage, it has taken a musical concert tour to bring public recognition to the sick fact: Rubin Carter, black activist and former world middleweight boxing contender and John Artis have spent over nine years in prison for a crime they did not commit.

On January 12 of this year, lawyers for Carter and Artis argued a motion for a new trial before the New Jersey State Supreme Court. The defense maintained that significant evidence was "purposely withheld" during the 1966 triple murder trial which ended with Carter and Artis receiving life prison terms.

In September, 1974, the only two witnesses against Carter and Artis admitted that they lied during the trial. The original trial judge, however, refused to grant a new trial based on the recantations saying that they lacked the "ring of truth."

Since then New Jersey Governor Brendan Byrne has appointed a State Assembly member to study whether Carter and Artis should be pardoned or receive executive clemency and the State Supreme Court has, on its own, decided to review the case.

Meanwhile, the two original witnesses who'd recanted their stories, have recanted their recantations. Based on their new version, and the still confidential report by the State Assemblyman, the prosecution now claims that Carter and Artis instead of being the killers, served instead as lookouts for the real murderers.

Many of the principals in the Carter-Artis prosecution have graduated to loftier levels of power since their involvement in the original trial. Chief among them is Brendan Byrne a former prosecutor now governor of New Jersey.

Carter was, at the time of his arrest, a leading middleweight boxing contender. "Hurricane" Carter, as he is known, was also an outspoken proponent of the right of Black people to self-defense. He was openly critical of police brutality in New Jersey and New York during the mid-sixties and was targeted by authorities as a "cop-hating militant." His stature in the Black community made him a constant victim of police harassment. John Artis, a young friend of Carter's, happened to be with him on the night the murders were committed.

What is the case for and against Rubin Carter and John Artis? The following facts speak for themselves:

1. At 2:30 a.m. on June 17, 1966 two black men armed with shotgun and pistol entered the Lafayette Bar & Grill in Paterson, New Jersey, and killed the bartender and one patron. A third person, Hazel Tanis, died a month later of her wounds and sole survivor William Marins lost an eye in the attack. All the victims were white.

2. Shortly past 3 a.m. Rubin Carter and John Artis were stopped by police for allegedly fitting the general description of two black men in a white car. They were questioned for 17 hours at police headquarters and released.

3. William Marins and Hazel Tanis both described the shotgun killer as a light-skinned black man, about 6 feet tall, 175-190 pounds with a pencil-thin moustache. Carter was dark-skinned, 5'8", 155 pounds with a thick drooping moustache and goatee, and a shaved head.

4. A .32-caliber solid lead bullet was allegedly found in Rubin's rented automobile. However, the bullets actually involved in the killings were .32 caliber copper-plated.

5. Grand juries met on this case in June and August 1966, but no indictments were handed up.

6. On October 14, 1966, four months after the slayings, Arthur Dexter Bradley and Alfred Bello signed statements positively identifying Rubin Carter and John Artis as the murderers. That night Rubin and John were arrested.

7. Bello and Bradley were both 23 years old and had long criminal records. The two men admitted being in the area of the scene of the crime for the purpose of a burglary of the Ace Sheet Metal Co. Bello, who was in violation of his parole, further admitted robbing the contents of the bar's cash register moments after the gruesome killings. Bradley faced nine felony indictments in five New Jersey counties.

8. On May 26, 1967, primarily on the testimony of these only two witnesses, an all-white jury found the defendants guilty of murder, but recommended mercy.

9. On June 19, 1967, Carter and Artis received multiple life sentences by Judge Samuel Lerner.

10. In September 1974 Bello and Bradley formally and independently recanted their original trial testimony. Both men accused Passaic County Detective Lieutenant Vincent DeSimone as the officer chiefly responsible for pressuring them into perjury.

11. In October-November 1974 a hearing was held before Judge Lerner on a motion for a new trial. In his December 10, 1974 decision, Lerner rejected the motion on the grounds that the recantations "lacked the ring of truth."

12. At the recantation hearing much previously suppressed evidence was revealed:

a) Notes of detective DeSimone of meetings with Alfred Bello on June 18 and 20, 1966.

b) A one-hour taped interview on October 11, 1966 of Alfred Bello by detective DeSimone and Robert C. Mohl. Promises were made to Bello regarding his parole, and assurance given that he would not be indicted for an attempted burglary.

c) Pages from an October 17, 1966 Paterson Police Department report dealing with a undisclosed meeting on August 4 between police and Bello and Bradley — it was during "confrontation" that the attempted burglary was first made known. The prosecution contended that their eyewitnesses never had an opportunity to meet before trial.

13. Lt. DeSimone also conceded at the fall hearing that he made promises to Bradley. He admitted they visited several prosecutors' offices (one of them being present N. J. Gov. Byrne) to win leniency for Arthur Dexter Bradley.

14. A five-day discrepancy was disclosed between the trial testimony of Paterson police detective Emil DeRobbio and the actual record. DiRobbio, who allegedly found a .32-caliber bullet in Carter's car, said he turned that evidence over to the property clerk on the day of the murders (June 17). The record shows the bullet was recorded as being received on June 22, 1966.

15. In January 1975 a motion for a new trial based on the suppressed evidence was argued before Judge Lerner.

16. On February 11, 1975, Judge Lerner denied the motion.

17. On May 22, 1975 Judge Lerner denied a request to grant bail for Carter and Artis pending their new appeal for a re-trial.

18. On September 2, 1975, an appeal was filed with the New Jersey Superior Court Appellate Division.

19. On September 29, 1975 Governor Brendan Byrne asked the chairman of the New Jersey Assembly Judiciary Committee, assemblyman Eldridge Hawkins, to review the case and recommend whether pardons should be granted.

After nine years in jail, Carter is slowly winning public support.

The directory contains the names, addresses, and phone numbers of all students at the U. of T. It is available at the SAC office free of charge to all undergraduates with ATL cards, and for one dollar to all other U. of T. people with I.D. (staff, grad students, etc.). The directories will be available at the front office of SAC, from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. daily.

Zoology dept. tarted up

Who said that profs sit back for life the minute they get tenure? Their troubles may not be as acute as ours, but don't worry, they get ulcers too.

Take the zoology department for instance. After the promotion of pollution-prober Donald Chant, the department chairmanship was handed to the next-in-line, David Metrick. After a decade of benevolent rule, the arrival of a disciplinarian ruffled many of the younger profs. They were amused by the endless cascade of memos, all aimed at "shaping up the department" and they decided to help him out by writing a manifesto of their own. Quietly slipping it into the zoology newsletter, The Zoonews, it surfaced as:

CHAIRMAN'S REMARKS

New Administration:

All full professors are simultaneously appointed Associate Chairpeople with equal responsibilities for all departmental matters. However, being cognizant of the shortcomings of democracy I wish to make it clear that in the event of us failing to eclipse the University of British Columbia in international standing by the end of the academic year, all departmental officers will be detenured and I shall assume sole command.

Promotions:

Continuing my theme of objectivity and quantitative criteria for assessment of professional performance, the old system of Brownie Points — introduced by my predecessor, Professor Chant — will be replaced by Personal Initiative Merit Points, or PIMPs. Professors will be selected for advancement on the basis of their PIMPING records and will be expected to justify their place in the department with comprehensive histograms and statistical analyses of their record submitted 15 months in advance of the convening date of any promotions committee by which they wish to be considered.

Guidelines for the acquisition of PIMPs are outlined below.

It has come to my attention that certain junior faculty have been deliberately publishing erroneous data in order to increase their coverage in Citation Index thereby taking unsporting advantage of the fact that this worthy publication fails to differentiate between favorable and unfavorable citations. This stratagem will not win PIMPs.

In my previous missives, faculty were encouraged to cooperate on joint research projects with other colleagues and students. Unfortunately some have deliberately misconstrued this as an invitation to publish multiple author papers! In most cases it is clear that the secondary authors have contributed little more than the removal of coffee stains from the manuscripts with liquid paper. In the unlikely event that more than one author claims a salient contribution to the work, negative PIMPs will be applied and the publication rights forfeit to this office.

Negative PIMPs will be accumulated by faculty persisting in joint publication with former graduate students. Exceptions may be made when the faculty member is a full professor.

PIMPs will be awarded after a minty inspection of the night-watcher's after-hours register. Faculty should note that persons signing the register often will be regarded as unable to fulfill their professional responsibilities in a reasonable time whilst persistent absentees will be considered lacking in commitment to academic excellence.

Professors are visible representatives of the university and should show sartorial elegance and gentlemanly bearing at all times. Shirt tails should not be in evidence, laboratory glassware being readily dried with Kleenex. As an alternative to the customary frock coat and wing collar, vividly hued pantaloons are considered acceptable for informal gatherings.

The number of graduate students supported should be related to experience and intelligence of the professor together with the size of his operating grant. The optimum number of students can be determined using the algorithm:

No. of Students = $G + t + s + s$
For example: a full prof. with a large grant ($G = $22,500$), long service ($s = 18$ years), and thick skull ($t = 1.79$ cm) would be required to supervise 1.59 students. By contrast, an intelligent and new assistant prof ($G = $17, s = 1$, and $t = 1$ cm) should have 17 students to ensure consideration for advancement.

Undergraduate Affairs

The question is, of course, how to maintain academic standards in an inflationary period and declining budget. I think there are financial savings that can be effected by reducing the number of courses offered and some careful pruning of content.

The five hundred and twelve courses currently offered will be reduced in number to four. Following the universally acknowledged success of the computer taught B10 110 this course will now be offered in all years as B10 110; B10 210; B10 310 and B10 410. This will ensure the desirable uniformity of both academic standards and content.

Since a teaching team of proven ability already exists for B10 110, they will be expected to teach the other courses as well. Those faculty remaining will be expected to pursue innovative research and develop the highest standards of scholarship.

Following directives from the Faculty of Arts & Science committee on academic standards that all courses must have the same mean grade it becomes axiomatic that all students must be of uniform ability and the courses of equal calibre. From this it is clear that last year's fall in class average for B10 110 reflects an erosion of teaching ability not declining student performances.

It is confidently predicted that with the reiteration of B10 N10 at all levels, any tendency for mark erosion will be countered by a progressive improvement resulting from the laudable pedagogical practice of reinforcement of learning. Should the expected improvements not be realized the problem will be rectified by the expedient of awarding PIMPs only to those professors turning out "A" students.

The Graduate Programme

I am disturbed by the gradual decline in numbers of our graduate students. I am not interested in third rate students — what this department SHOULD be attracting is solid A students. My detailed comments are given below.

Professors who go out and hustle for students will increase their PIMP rating.

It is anticipated that there will not be any difficulty recruiting excellent students from our own undergraduate programme which in the future will produce a uniformly high proportion of grade A results. Applicants from lesser institutions (UBC, McGill, Cambridge, M.I.T., etc.), where inefficiently highly diversified courses are still given, may be at an understandable disadvantage.

The serious decline in graduate applications I mentioned above is almost certainly the result of an increased population mortality, significant numbers of undergraduates being bored to death with the prospect of B10 110 through 410.

General Comments

With respect to animal care it has been brought to my notice that certain professors are still persisting with outmoded and costly experimental techniques requiring live animals. Their attention is drawn to the unparalleled diversity of species currently available in the departmental museum which are presently under-exploited, particularly by the physiologists. The penguin and loon, for which a great demand is anticipated, may be booked in advance and reduced hourly rental rates will be available for week-end use. It is hoped that faculty will endeavour to follow the example of the ecological modelling group in their approach to the use of computer simulated animals.

Following the initial success of the "chargeback" system of accounting, all support facilities (workshop, electronics, photography, etc.) will be organized into profit making corporations operating in a free enterprise environment. It is felt that the healthy financial competition for research grant monies will improve morale amongst the support staff and encourage frugality amongst the faculty. Support staff who are unable to show profits at the annual audit, together with faculty who cannot continue a viable research programme with their diminishing resources, will be transferred to the Building and Grounds Department.

I would like to end these remarks on a personal note — my chief and only concern is the welfare and development of the department over the next few years. I deeply understand the importance of good morale in achieving the goal of making this a truly great department and hope that the preceding remarks will have helped in this regard.

David Lewis on two weeks loan as U of T lecturer

By MIKE EDWARDS

If past performance is anything to go on, David Lewis will have a lot to say about our troubled economy tomorrow evening at Scarborough College.

Lewis is a sessional lecturer at Carleton University in Ottawa and will be working at the U of T as a resource person for the next two weeks.

Lewis has been invited to give the P. B. Watts Memorial Lecture on "Corporate Power and the Reality".

When Lewis spoke to students last Monday at Carleton he stressed that the big corporations "must be broken". He told the students, fresh from the experience of protesting the Henderson report at a large demonstration in Toronto that it is important to "carry out your duty to the community."

He urged students, on graduation, "to join the ranks for improvement instead of protecting the status quo."

"Too many students think they have lifted themselves by their own bootstraps," said Lewis. He explained that society pays for the bulk of a person's education and it's important for students to fight against "the basic malaise in traditional thinking."

"What does Trudeau mean when the system is not working?" asked Lewis, referring to the prime minister's recent "talks": "It's working very well for the corporate sector," countered Lewis.

"The corporations are continuing to make high profits and are only saddened that they are down from the immensely high profits of the previous two years," said Lewis, angered that Trudeau could talk of a new society without giving people a way to get it.

Lewis offered his brand of "socialism by the democratic process" which according to the ex-leader of the NDP, involves "painful work for the next two or three decades."

"Our education system teaches us to consume. We are taught to need what we don't want and to want what we don't need," said Lewis, critical of those who believe it's possible to change people's lifestyle overnight.

He also took time to condemn the concept of violent revolution and its attendant dictatorships.

Lewis talked about his own lifestyle as an example of someone who could afford to reject consumerism. Lewis receives a substantial pension from his years as an MP. He contrasted this with the "too many millions of Canadians who live in an environment that makes change difficult."

Lewis was critical of the "tory" logic behind the Henderson report. "It is taken for granted that private spending is good and that public spending, by definition, is wasteful," he explained.

The longest country in Europe.
Two months for $195.

Student-Railpass covers 100,000 miles of track in thirteen European countries, all the way from the Arctic to the Mediterranean. And $195 buys you unlimited Second Class rail travel for two whole months.

On a student's budget that's some deal. In fact, the only thing cheaper is thumping it or wearing down your heels. Besides that, the trains are fast (some zip along at 100 mph), clean, comfortable and fun. You can go and come whenever you like. And you'll meet more Europeans than you would on the road.

Trains are dynamite. But how about ferries, lake cruisers, river boats and hydrofoils? Student-Railpass covers them, too. And it'll even get you discounts on motorcoach trips.

If you want to do it big and mingle with the First Class types, think about Eurailpass. Same places, same trains (First Class, though), in two-week, three-week, one-month, two-month and three-month passes.

To get a Student-Railpass, you have to be a full-time student, under 26. And both Student-Railpass and Eurailpass are sold here through a Travel Agent. You won't be able to buy them in Europe. So plan ahead. We've got a big country waiting.

Students paraded under the watchful eyes of the Ontario Government's crack security force to protest government cutbacks in education spending. 2,000 students marched from Convocation Hall, around University College Circle, under the bridge and through traffic on their way to Queen's Park where they were met by more security (below). At bottom right two campus hacks chant slogans in preparation for the demonstration.

Response from the government has been less than conciliatory. Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott said the cutbacks were "tory policy." At least he's honest.

Swim Blues by Colgate

By DON WARNER

Last Saturday at the Benson Building pool, the swim team entertained Colgate University, an American College from Hamilton, New York.

The Blues acted as uncharacteristically good hosts, allowing the Colgate team to achieve a relatively easy victory.

In recent years, Blues' coach Robin Campbell has arranged dual meets against several American Colleges in order to keep our swimmers sharp through extra competition prior to the championships.

Indeed, the Varsity team normally responds with top efforts against their American counterparts.

On Saturday however, most Blues' swimmers came up a little 'flat'. Despite giving it their best effort, many of the times recorded by our team were not personal bests for this year.

Most noteworthy for Toronto was John Watt's 2:21.0 in the 200 Breast Stroke, and Bill Chisholm's 2:07.9 for the 200 Fly. Veteran diver Fin Temple was a welcome returnee to the Toronto lineup for the first time this year.

This Saturday, the powerful University of Michigan will invade the Benson Building for another 2 P.M. start. Perhaps our team should try another brand of toothpaste for better luck this week.

Flip Turns — On January 23, Robin and Vicki Campbell became proud parents of their second baby girl. That same weekend the Blues were victorious in three dual meets.

Part of the team journeyed to Ottawa, outscoring Ottawa University 88-11 and Ottawa Kingfish 48-47. John Lyall, who is improving very rapidly swam a 200 Free in 1:55.4, while Juri Daniel achieved a career-best in the 200 Breast at 2:16.5.

The rest of the team went to Guelph and dropped the host squad by 65-41 margin. Making his debut in the diving events that day, Gary Jones hopes to improve on the average score of 1, which the diving judges awarded him.

You're a Shining Star

This Wednesday at 4:30 will see the second annual inter-fac all star hockey game, which just goes to remind us that not all the good hockey players on campus are on the Varsity team. The game features the best of Division IA against those of Division IB, in three of the better periods of intramural hockey you're likely to see this year. This is because of the quality of player available for the match.

As a matter of fact, it looks like old home week for the Blues. Although the line-ups for the two teams aren't completed yet, so far they include ex-Blues Albie Shames, Bill Hews, John Richmond and Roman Kniginzky. Also included are two players currently listed with the intercollegiate squad, Alex Musei and John Bays. Fans may remember Bays as the rookie defenceman who got four assists in the Blues' last home game, a 7-4 win over Waterloo.

The game will be played just before the Toronto-Guelph tilt in three fifteen minute periods (stop time). Coaching Div. IA will be Doug Herridge, while counterpart Dave Hulme will try to live up to the standard of his predecessor. Last year Div. IB were the upset winners of a 4-3 match, something Coach Hulme would no doubt like to see repeated.

In any case, it's good to see games such as this one set up as they bring together talented players in an above average contest, and thanks should go to Tim Filler of PHE IV for arranging it. So if you want to see more hockey than just the Blues game this Wednesday, drop around Varsity Arena a bit early. Good seats are still available.

Skibums Part II - Europe

By JAY WAKS and
JOHN LUBELSKI

In the late 1960's the ski world was rocked by revolution. No longer did one have to present his bank book when checking into a hotel at St. Moritz. Charter airlines and package tours had thrown the slopes of Europe open to the masses. The common folk could now socialize and compare techniques with royalty and movie stars.

For those of you who took advantage of this new development at its inception, ski excursions consisting of air fare, hotel accommodations, all meals and two weeks of skiing could be had for the ridiculously low price of $350.00, a real bargain.

Eventually, realizing the tourists were really getting a good deal, the inkeepers, the airlines and travel agents blaming the world economic situation, got together and radically raised the prices. Today one's excursion into the Alps for an 8 day period will cost between $500 and $700 depending on the quality of accommodations and reputation of the ski area. Although prices have skyrocketed, the opportunity to challenge the slopes of Europe and the women, far outweigh such petty concerns as money. Besides tuitions aren't going up until next year.

Zermatt (Switzerland) Cervinia (Italy) — Located on the Swiss-Italian border in the shadow of the Matterhorn, Zermatt provides top calibre slopes and a fantastic atmosphere in which to enjoy a skiing holiday. Situated 200 miles from Zurich (which can't figure out the metric system), Zermatt is accessible only by the Brig-visp railroad line. Surrounded by gigueund mountains on all sides, the permanent residents of Zermatt have yet to breathe the innocuous fumes of the automobile. Transportation within the confines of the village is restricted to foot, horse-drawn (radio-dispatched) carriages and the odd golf cart.

From the time one leaves the train station one is engulfed by the atmosphere which exists only in Europe. The narrow winding streets, quaint medieval buildings and cozy taverns all contribute to its attractiveness. For the apres-ski crowd Zermatt just about offers it all: the restaurants provide meals which range from gourmet seven course dinners to an informal fondue or pizza and beer at the Spaghetti Factory (no relation). Although the hotels reflect the grand style, characteristic only to Europe, their night clubs, some cut out of solid rock, provide the latest in disco and rock. The most popular night club in town, the Cave, offers live bands (complete with German accents) and a dance floor almost as large as the Sid Smith lobby. For those of you who require milder forms of entertainment, many places, particularly Elsie's Bar, are highly recommended.

"So how are the slopes?" you might ask. Zermatt's main range, located directly beneath the Matterhorn offers an impressive 6,500 foot vertical rise. The runs, some stretching as far as 12 miles provide excellent skiing which is geared more towards the accomplished or intermediate level skier. The more than 30 interconnected trails and runs include a wide variety of terrain, from the most tremendous moguls we've ever skied across, headwalls with slopes of 75 degrees, to wide open territories. Because of the elevation of the runs, (the top of the mountain is a glacier), snow conditions are almost always excellent.

Due to the size of the range and the number of trails on the 3 interconnecting mountains, it is highly recommended that your party shell

Due to late notice of a resumption of work this reporter and others like him could not get out to Kingston for the Blues two-game series against Queen's resulting in a split with the Blues losing on Friday 4-2 and trouncing on Saturday 8-2.

Super Manager and Interfac Allstar John Richmond reported that Friday's game featured some Dunc Wilson-like netminding by Clyde Harris to preserve the win while on Saturday the game was closer than the score indicated as the Blues led only 4-2 after the second period before exploding in the third.

A competent skier in condition can make the trip at least twice in one day. Again a guide is recommended for first-timers as the top section of the mountain on the Italian side tends to be somewhat

Budget promises cuts in staff, maintenance

By PAUL McGRATH

In an effort to pare $7 million from the university's 1976-77 base budget, the Budget Committee has recommended significant staff cuts in both academic and support positions as well as severe restrictions on maintenance of the physical plant.

The committee also recommended large cuts in budgets for campus and student services and the university's central administration. After four months of deliberation, the committee presented its report to the president last Friday and aired it publicly at yesterday's meeting of the Planning and Resources committee.

Although the work of the committee is for the most part finished, the report made it clear that the budget is not at its most refined state due to two unknown factors. These are the level of government per-student funding for the university and the outcome of the present salary negotiations between the university and both academic and support staff.

The university is expected to receive 22 per cent of the entire "global grant" of $626 million to Ontario universities.

The committee's report outlined the reductions necessary in all areas of university spending, as well as the effects that these reductions would probably have.

In the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, including all the constituent colleges (Victoria, St. Michael's and Trinity and federated colleges) and the Schools of Continuing and Graduate Studies, the committee recommended a reduction of $1.5 million.

The committee said this would require "the elimination of a large number of academic positions and the integration of evening instruction in the winter session."

"This Integration" means that teaching staff, who normally instruct evening courses on a stipend basis, will be asked to take on the jobs as part of their normal work load.

The committee was concerned about staff reductions and urged the Dean "to consider whatever alternatives may be available to him to minimize the reduction of academic staff positions, or bring them into appropriate balance with support staff reductions."

The committee's recommendations will be achieved through non-replacement of staff and "compression" of course subject matter and teaching loads.

Breaking down the constituents of the Faculty, the committee recommended significant cuts in the budgets of Innis, Scarborough and Woodsworth College.

The School of Graduate Studies was asked to cut $45,000 from its administrative costs and almost $110,000 from the budgets of its related centres and institutions.

The budget committee turned down a request from Graduate dean Ed Safarian for a $175,000 increase in graduate fellowships.

The only college to come out on the plus side was Erindale College, due to an unexpected enrolment increase. Although major cuts were ordered in administrative, physical plant and campus and student services, the committee allowed Erindale to budget for "eight to ten" new academic appointments to handle the increase.

Scarboro College will have to chop nearly $100,000 from its physical plant costs for the next year, and the committee noted that a reduction in expenditures for equipment might result in the elimination of labs for some science courses.

Professional faculties may also have a hard time making research ends meet.

In recommending a total budget cut of $47,200 to the Faculty of Pharmacy, the committee noted that the reduction in equipment expenditures "will cause the faculty's research effectiveness to diminish."

The Faculty of Nursing will have to discontinue one full- and one part-time academic appointment which "may reduce the amount of time the Faculty can devote to research."

Among the other health science faculties, the Faculty of Medicine will have to cut $1.1 million over the next three years as well as increase its income from outside teaching and research grants.

In medicine "no programmes will be discontinued, but some individual teaching units which constitute some programmes may be eliminated, thereby shifting their instructional loads to other units."

The Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering has been instructed that its options in cutting $389,000 from its budget may lie in the areas of "academic staff (perhaps as many as nine or ten positions), graduate assistants, supplies, computer services and equipment."

The Faculty of Education will reduce its budget by $392,000, mostly through non-replacement of both academic and support staff.

The U of T library system will suffer more than it has in the past few years. The acquisitions budget will not be increased, but as in past years excess operating funds will be used for book acquisitions up to a maximum of $60,000.

A further $496,000 will be saved by internal reorganization and "by increasing use of Library Automation Services for greater efficiency."

It is hoped that integration of smaller divisional and departmental libraries will cut costs to each of the departments. This move has been resisted in all but one of the departments affected.

The most significant percentage cuts were made in university administration and the physical plant budgets.

Total reduction for university administration will amount to $881,000, comprising staff cuts and re-classification in almost every major office in Simcoe Hall.

Administrative cuts also call for less frequent mailings to alumni and the possibility of less frequent and smaller printings of the U of T Bulletin.

Along with a $72,000 expenditure cut, the committee also recommended to the U of T Personnel department an increase of $180,000 for fourteen new positions to give the department more strength in labour relations and salary administration.

The Physical Plant was the hardest hit. It will take a recommended 11.2 per cent cut in spending, which will require the loss of 120 positions, as well as less frequent cleaning and patcher security. The budget committee warned layoffs would be required.

Campus and Student Services will be cut back almost $198,000 next year. Most of the reduction will be made up by shifting and cutting staff positions.

On top of this, the Health Service may have to charge higher fees, and the possibility still exists that the infirmary may be closed. The International Student Centre will also have to curtail some of its activities.

Budget reception confused at best

By PAUL McGRATH

Confusion and frustration greeted the emergence of the university's recommended 1976-77 budget at last night's meeting of the Planning and Resources committee.

In dealing with the proposed cuts difference between the two make more funds available. A substantial amount of the additions would be in the form of academic positions.

"Hopefully we will restore some of these," said Connell, "but these restorations shouldn't be part of the regular budget."

Committee member Michael Sabia and S. J. Colman were upset that Planning and Resources was looking at an incomplete budget.

"I don't understand how we can have any meaningful discussion without knowing what the faculty settlement will be," Sabia said. Faculty and staff salary negotiations have adjourned until the government announcement of the level of funding.

One member expressed the suspicion that the negotiators would wait to see what the university was offered before making a final wage request.

The difference between the government funding and wage settlements could be as much as $3 million, and a number of jobs and services hang in the balance.

U of T vice-president and provost Donald Chant responded that "We will pay as much as we can afford." He noted that salary levels at the university ranked sixth among other Canadian institutions.

History professor Michael Bliss objected to the budget committee's recommendation that teaching for day and night courses be integrated into normal teaching loads, saying that it would engender "unfair competition" for night students who were already hampered by a limited choice of courses.

Members were curious as to what extent the division heads and principals were bound by budget committee recommendations.

Although the recommendations, according to the report, "should not impinge on the responsibilities of the division heads," Connell added that they were "strong recommendations."

Most members expressed dissatisfaction at the lack of planning across the entire university. Sabia called the budget recommendations for the most part "irrational." "They're not based on any insight on where our strength lie, or what we might have to do without in the future."

Student member Michael Sabia

R. M. Barford, responding to Sabia, said "We have to look at what we're willing not to do in order to do some other things excellently."

Concerned about was expressed the large aggregate budget figure the committee was asked to deal with in the case of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences. Although the Faculty suffered only a 3.3 per cent reduction, members were curious about the effects among the constituents of the faculty.

"While this looks like an essay on equality," said Sabia, "I doubt whether it really is."

Smokers and eaters beware: Classrooms out of bounds

By KEN WYMAN

Smoking and eating are to be banned in all U of T classrooms, beginning today.

Provost Donald Chant announced the new regulations in a one-page memo being circulated to all deans and department heads today. The decision had been under discussion for some time, and will come as no surprise to senior academics, according to Chant's office.

University representatives say the move is in part an attempt to cut back on high classroom cleaning costs. It is also prompted, they say, by repeated requests from non-smokers, who claim the thick classroom air poses a real health hazard.

Non-smokers can inhale the equivalent of a pack a day, according to scientific reports from several university research centres. Some studies show the floating "second-hand smoke" is more toxic than the fumes smokers inhale directly.

Denise Frucher, an executive member of the U of T Non-Smokers' Rights Association called the move "a giant step forward." But she said, there may be some "problems enforcing the new regulations." There are no provisions in the new rules for penalties for infractions.

Frucher urged non-smokers to speak up when offenders light up, and apply "peer-pressure" to help keep the air clean.

Strong opposition to the prohibition is expected, particularly from those students who must eat in class, because of "wall" timetables, which offer no lunch breaks.

One observer opined that campus weight watchers will declare unconditional support for the ban, however.

The staff of the Physical Plant department apparently supports the change, too. Pointing to similar rules that have been in effect in the Engineering Building for several months, Buildings and Grounds Manager Evan Pritchard said that he expects "a considerable savings will result, but we'll have to wait a while to find out exactly how much."

Budget Chief George Connell

of $7.6 million, the committee members bemoaned the lack of detailed information about the decisions and the incompleteness of the budget.

"A number of factors make it a fuzzy budget," said budget chief George Connell. Among them he cited two crucial factors, the amount of money coming from the provincial government and the amount the university would pay to staff members after settlements by the faculty and support staff.

Nonetheless the budget committee presented its report on the assumption that the two would balance each other and would make no difference to the level of expenditure reduction across the university. The committee presented a supplementary list of additions to the budget should the

Students occupy N. B. legislature

FREDERICTON (CUP) — About five hundred students, mostly from the Université de Moncton, have occupied the Centennial Building here, the seat of the provincial government, demanding improvements in the province's student aid program.

The occupation began on January 28, a week after an earlier occupation attempt fizzled in face of government intransigence. Students from the U de M participated in that attempt, but left when the other students abandoned the occupation the same day it began.

When they got back to Moncton they called a general meeting at which it was decided to organize for an occupation. Committees were established, logistical planning began, and by mid-week the students were en route to Fredericton.

The U de M students' demands are the same as those advanced by the previous week's demonstration on student aid policy, a reduction in the loan ceiling from $1,800 per year to $900 per year, and increases in living and other allowances.

The students are occupying the lobby of the building, directly below the offices of the NB Premier Richard Hatfield. Hatfield emerged about 5 o'clock the first day of the occupation, and read a prepared speech in French rejecting the student demands, and claiming that no changes could be made in the aid program until federal legislation is changed in 1977.

The students rejected Hatfield's position and told him they would stay until their demands had been met. The students appointed a negotiating committee of two to meet with Hatfield and Youth Minister J.P. Ouellette. Meetings were held that evening and the following day, but no progress was reported.

In those meetings the government reiterated its position that changes in the program cannot be made until 1977, while the students maintain that changes must be made effective September 1976. Negotiations are continuing, and will likely go into the weekend (January 31).

Hatfield has conceded however, that there are "some problems" with the student aid system, and has admitted that setting the loan ceiling is a provincial rather than a federal responsibility.

The occupation has achieved almost universal support among U de M students and faculty, and among high school students in the Moncton area. Six buses of high school students are reportedly en route to join the occupation at the time of writing. And on January 28, the U de M faculty decided to cancel classes "indefinitely" to support the occupation.

There has been little support, however, from the students of the University of New Brunswick. Observers say this is partly due to the conservative politics and history of UNB, as well as the inexperience of the UNB student leadership in alerting students to what is going on.

On the afternoon of the 28th about 15 students from UNB did arrive and were given a tumultuous welcome by the students in the lobby. Meetings on UNB campus are being planned to encourage other students to join the occupation and other campuses in the province are reportedly chartering buses to take them to Fredericton.

The students in the lobby are reported to be in high spirits, and are passing the time reading, singing and discussing. The organization has been described as excellent, with strike centres having been set up, courier service between Moncton and Fredericton operating smoothly, and even film and tape units being present to record events.

Discipline has not been a problem, since the students have set up their own internal security in the occupation area, and no confrontations with the RCMP or local police are expected.

Toronto's core area planning guidelines have been passed by council. Critics find it a good replacement for old newsprint. See editorial page 4.

Loot for list expected

By CHRISTOPHER DuVERNET

The university administration is "sure" most of its four million dollar request for projected capital project funding will be met by the Ontario government.

Alterations to antiquated heating and air conditioning systems, a new athletic complex and renovation of the Sigmund Samuel Library are ranked highest among the list of 37 proposals submitted for consideration to Queen's Park late last year.

A list of approved projects will not be issued until March but the university has already committed itself to continuation of many of them.

Vice-President of Business Affairs Alex Rankin revealed yesterday that the university is acting on the assumption that it will receive "at least the $800,000 for the Athletic building" but conceded that recent cutbacks would virtually eliminate the complex if cuts were implemented in capital expenditures.

"Now that the government has cut back it's pretty hard to say we need an Athletic building over everything else," he said. The government has told us they will put up three and one-half million dollars in three years, Rankin said. He indicated $100,000 would come from the Community Services Ministry. "It's been specified we will get it," he explained.

Rankin indicated that expansion of some of the proposed projects and implementation of the others would not go ahead if the money did not become available.

Although they all have "got to go forward", Rankin suggested that the proposed University College renovations, at an estimated cost of $2,700,000, would be the first project to be shelved. Rankin said it had already been carried over from last year.

Rankin asserted that capital expenditures would not be in conflict with more education-oriented expenditures despite likely government funding reductions in this area. Included in the seven highest priority proposals were a new high temperature waterline and alterations to streamline reinforcements and sewer reinforcements, which Rankin claimed were essential to functioning of many university buildings.

"There's no use in having new buildings renovated without new lines," he said. "There'd be no bloody heat" for these structures if the already-old lines failed."

Although the university is treating the seven proposals as "equal priorities", "When the treasury is allocating money it does compete" with expenditures related to salaries and tuitions, Rankin conceded.

According to Rankin, the government might not fully fund the projects because of an anticipated drop in student demand for facilities expected by 1981. The government is aware that the pipeline for high temperature water "will not be filled" is this drop in demand occurs, he said.

But Rankin claimed "continued pressure in Metro areas" by taxpayers who want their children to attend U of T was a major force in compelling the government to meet the university's bill.

Among the projects not given priority are fire safety alterations to the Haultain Building, a campus centre, a replacement for the Border Building, energy management projects and alterations to 16 Hart House Circle, 713 Spadina Avenue, 63 St. George St. and 215 Huron Street. Rankin did not indicate whether these were still expected to be implemented.

'Conspiracy' exposed by guerilla

By ERIC McMILLAN

Racist laws, political executions and concentration camps in Rhodesia are "covertly supported" by the superpowers claimed an African guerrilla leader in an interview Monday.

Michael Mawema of the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) is touring Canada to break what he calls "the conspiracy of silence" about American and Soviet intervention in Zimbabwe (the native name for Rhodesia).

"Rhodesia is the blue-eyed boy of the West," said Mawema. He claimed South Africa and Rhodesia receive arms from NATO and the U.S. and "thousands of mercenaries" from America and Europe.

Although the United States supported a United Nations resolution to impose trade sanctions on Rhodesia, there is "no country that exploits Rhodesia like the U.S.," Mawema said. He cited examples of multinational companies which profit from Rhodesia's resources and noted, "The best chicken produced in the country is Nelson Rockefeller's farm."

Mawema termed the Soviet Union "neo-colonialist" because it backs "collaborationist" Joshua Nkomo who is seeking an end to the 85 year liberation struggle through negotiations with the white minority in Rhodesia.

Zimbabwe blacks outnumber whites 26 to 1 but are not allowed to own property, can elect only 15 members of the governing body to the whites' 50 members, and in many cases are kept on "reservations", Mawema pointed out.

He claimed ZANU, banned as a political party, is carrying out guerrilla warfare with the support of 80 per cent of the Zimbabwe people and controls from one-third to one-half of the country.

In resisting ZANU, the Rhodesian army is herding rural blacks into "protected villages" which, Mawema charged are actually concentration camps surrounded by 12 foot barbed wire fences and policed by German Shepherd dogs. Epidemics of cholera have broken out in the filthy conditions of the camps, he said.

Mawema himself was imprisoned for "creating hostility between blacks and whites" in 1964 but escaped in 1971. In prison he said he was allowed only two pairs of pants and two shirts per year for clothing. The authorities have used "a dozen of the best torture experts from Vietnam" against political detainees and captured guerrillas, he claimed. He also charged the Rhodesian army employs Vietnamese "scorch the earth" tactics which include poisoning streams and destroying wildlife.

ZANU is not seeking arms from Canada, Mawema said, but needs financial and material aid in the form of educational supplies, clothing, and medicine for Zimbabweans.

The stated aims of ZANU are "to politicize the masses and direct the political consciousness of African peoples toward the destruction of colonialism and imperialism on Zimbabwe soil."

Once in power ZANU would establish "a socialist democratic government" which would not be "a carbon copy of what you call Western democracy or Eastern democracy," said Mawema.

ZANU has accepted some aid from China because "China has no imperialist designs on its friends and supports the people of the Third World against colonialism," Mawema alleged. He pointed to the example of Angola, where he said China withdrew from the struggle once liberation was in sight as compared to the U.S. and U.S.S.R. which stepped up their campaigns. Mawema said "we are learning from Angola what superpower intervention can do."

Mawema expressed surprise at the "tremendous and overwhelming" support he has so far received on his Canadian tour and said, "I believe students of Canada will not be party to the conspiracy of silence."

Cops question contract quashing

By JANE BURNES

Campus police plan to take their case to Ottawa, following the rejection of their recent contract settlement by the Anti-Inflation Board (AIB).

The contract signed by local 1962 of the United Plant Guard Workers, who represent the campus police, provides for a 15 per cent increase in the first year of the contract with a raise of 10 per cent in the second year.

The AIB has ordered a roll-back in the increases to 10 per cent in the first year and 8 per cent in the second — despite the fact that the AIB has admitted the cost of living increase in the previous contract needs some catching up.

U of T Management-Labour Relations head John Parker told The Varsity he and vice-president of Internal Affairs Frank Iacobucci will be meeting with two administrators from the AIB this Friday.

Parker noted an historical parallel could be made between the pay rate of the campus police and the Metro Toronto Police — the U of T police have always managed to keep pace with their Metro counterparts. If this roll-back becomes final however, they will be dropping behind.

The AIB has stated one consideration for exemption from the guide-lines would be in the case of contracts signed before January 1, 1974. The campus police last signed a contract in 1973.

Parker commented that he hopes that the re-submission to the AIB on Friday will be a joint one with the library workers joining the campus police.

Chief of Police J.B. West said there are 34 police on the campus force who are affected by the AIB decision. However, it does not appear probable that any strike action will be taken by the group.

Dennis Braithwaite, Tues. Feb. 3, Toronto Star: "Equality for women? By all means sir. But please couldn't we fob them off with something else — money, titles, power — rather than let them be radio and TV announcers? As every married man knows, a woman's voice is not exotic, a man's the magic of the spheres. Even women if they're honest must admit that for announcing there is no substitute for a male voice in the lower or Baritone register."

Budget is only 'rubber-stamped'

Quite a bit of next year's financial oxygen rests on one future inhalation and one exhalation at the end of this month. All that can be said about this year's "Bare-bones" budget is that it's bad, but it might be better.

A number of issues arise. The worst effects of the austerity can and may be mitigated depending on the size of the wage settlements presently being negotiated.

But, rather than working from the situation at hand, negotiators seem to be waiting for the government announcement. One can't help but suspect the motives.

The trade-off is quite clear. If the faculty and support staff head for the sky, they'll be making more money, but they'll be working harder. They will have to balance very carefully the academic quality of this university against their future comfort. Of course it's quite possible that the more established faculty are willing to sacrifice the junior members for a little more pay, but they must be very clear that they're trading jobs for money.

But we should not limit ourselves to discussion of the size of the pie. Looming as always over this proceeding is the Ontario government, whose policy has forced the university into pitting its own members against each other for a slice. Our faculty members are still not the most well-paid in Canada.

The fear was expressed yesterday that Planning and Resources has sunk further into its role as rubber-stamper of the single most important document on campus. They have no ability to accept or reject this report. They can ask questions, but they can't change a thing.

The most frustrating thing for them is the knowledge that, as much as the budget recommendations signify an attempt to come to grips with major problems, they tend to cover up the massive lack of any rational planning on the campus.

The attempt to spread a five per cent reduction over the entire campus preserves the status quo but balks at asking the proper question: "What are we doing and what can we do without?"

Over the years the university has built up a diverse programme. Are some of the constituents of that programme unnecessary? Do we want to keep everything at half-strength just so we don't have to make some hard-core decisions about what this university is all about?

It's apparent from the round of complaints at P and R that nobody in administrative circles is asking the proper questions. They wince when the government jobs, they pass the reductions on, and everyone is miserable, but equal. It's not the sanest way to run a large institution, and will only become more added as the financial situation worsens. And have no doubt that that's in the cards.

Also apparent is the inability of the decision-makers to do their job without full disclosure. Even the budget committee is remarkably ignorant about the goings-on inside the Faculty of Arts and Sciences. It's monolithic, it moves immutably ahead, and no one wants to ask whether it knows the reason for or the limits to its existence. The same proper questions mentioned above cannot be asked, however, unless the Faculty is willing to disclose more information to the planners on this campus.

Yes, we're definitely bleeding. This is the first indication of just how quick the loss of blood is proceeding. If you've ever had any doubts that the situation is being exaggerated, trot over to Simcoe Hall and pick yourself up a copy of this monument to confusion. See what it means in terms of class sizes, number of labs available, number of teaching jobs lost, the disappearance of courses. It'll open your eyes, as well as provide good bedside reading.

So, back to the rallies, the demonstrations and the petitioning. Something has to give, and we can't give much more.

City sold out as Crombie triumphs

A bold new plan for the City of Toronto, a triumph for Mayor David Crombie over the "radicals" on city council. That was how the Toronto press treated last week's debacle over the new downtown plan for Toronto.

The trouble is despite paying lip service to protecting neighbourhoods and creating new housing downtown, the new plan is a body blow to the citizen's reform movement which started in 1972 with Crombie's victory and the ascendance of the "reformers" in aldermanic elections.

Virtually every citizen's groups which made representations to the council and the planning board criticized the plan as inadequate. They pointed out that far from being a bold innovative successor to the 45 foot height limit, the new bylaw fails to ensure major new housing for low income people, lower commercial densities and an end to destruction of neighbourhoods.

And when the reform caucus came forward with detailed responses, introducing amendments and demanding answers to their questions, Crombie was silent. In fact last week's "debate" on the future of downtown featured mainly the attacks of aldermen Heap, Sparrow, Sewell, Goldrick, Vaughan and Howard. The majority, Crombie's moderates and the council's Old Guard, remained silent.

Since 1972 it has been increasingly obvious that despite the liberal rhetoric of Crombie's moderates, the city council is making decisions which by and large satisfy developers and high income groups in Toronto.

With the support of the few remaining Old Guard relics left from the developer's councils of the late sixties, Crombie has systematically opposed measures which would make Toronto a better place for people to live in.

The downtown plan is the latest evidence of this. Because of intense development pressures which could change the face of downtown Manhattan of the north, Crombie brought in the 45 foot holding bylaw to temporarily stall development until the city could debate the future of the downtown core.

What has resulted from this much heralded debate? Unfortunately, the final plan does not reflect the views of citizen's groups but reflects, with liberal window dressing, a status quo solution satisfying neither all-out development advocates or citizen's groups.

The worst thing about the new bylaw is that it camouflages with hundreds of pages of planners reports, its failure to deal with the major issues facing middle and low income city residents.

Crombie says 30,000 housing units will be added downtown, but neglects to mention much of it will be only affordable for a tiny minority. Who else can afford to pay for luxury accommodation inevitable in mixed commercial-residential high rise.

Commercial developers, under the plan, will be able to build higher density buildings if they include housing.

However Toronto already has a vacancy rate of ten per cent in existing commercial space. Why do we need anymore at all? Why not halt all commercial development until more space is needed?

What about housing? While low income people face continuing encroachment from the white painters, driving housing costs soaring and turning into additional working class areas into fashionable upper middle class havens, the plan tries to get housing by incentives to developers to provide some residential space in their concrete towers.

Another Crombie boast was 20 acres of new parkland for the city. But considering the high density of areas like St. James town and the core, this is a paltry amount, almost a laughable answer to the needs of the people who live and work in the city.

Perhaps the saddest part of the whole charade is that the city had a unique opportunity to try and come up with bold plans which would really change the face of the city, providing new housing and parkland and restraining indiscriminate commercial development. This is what residents' groups and the reform caucus wanted.

John Sewell perhaps best summed up the magnitude of the defeat when he said the old plan passed by a council which was outspokenly in the hands of big developers would be better than the Crombie mish-mash. As Sewell points out, at least it was honest.

Future dreary says Drury: UIC or welfare for those seeking jobs

To the Editor:

The Government of Ontario is considering tuition increases of 65 per cent and the elimination of OSAP grants. These, together with other cuts in government spending, are meant to improve the economic situation according to current government logic.

Some students seem to feel that these measures are justified in light of the economic crisis. These students are usually from financially secure families.

Other students feel that the upper classes, who control the economy and influence the ruling party in the government have had their fill of middle class mobility, and are now pushing for the creation of financial barriers.

It is my feeling that the government is simply inept. They haven't a clue as to what they should do to solve the province's economic problems.

What is the sense of creating barriers that prevent people from attending university when there are no jobs for them? Is the government not going to end up subsidizing these people through welfare and unemployment insurance?

Universal accessibility to post secondary education has been one of the cornerstones of free society. What is the message in financial cutbacks? Are we being told that education is no longer important, or are we being told that a free society is no longer important?

It is our responsibility to voice our concerns about the adverse effects of proposed policy: Not only in education but in other social services too. The worse the policy, the more vigorous our demonstrations of disapproval need to be.

As members of an academic community, if not as members of the broader society, we are supposed to be dedicated to the advancement of human understanding and freedom. It is impossible to support both tuition increases and the goals of this academic community.

1200 Cuban Soldiers Stalemated by UNITA

By LEARYAN

UNITA is not losing the war in Angola despite a foreign invasion force of "over 13 battalions comprising around 12,000 troops", primarily Cuban, according to Jeremias Chitunda, UNITA representative to the United National.

A bitter battle has raged in the mineral rich west African state since August 1975. The opponents are UNITA (the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola), MPLA (the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola), and FNLA (the Front for the National Liberation of Angola).

Reports in the western press that the MPLA is winning are untrue, Chitunda said. "The propaganda of the U.S. imperialists and the Soviet revisionists that UNITA has been suffering losses on the battlefield is completely false."

"The Cubans and Russians can pump in more and more mercenaries but the Angolan people will not waver," he said. "Our people are determined to fight until the country is completely free of foreign troops and to fight for a truly socialist society." "While the situation is extremely serious in our country, the best the enemy has achieved so far is a stalemate. They have not gained any ground."

Chitunda went on to repudiate rumours that UNITA is working with South Africa: "UNITA was the first movement to denounce the South African invaders, as early as August 1975. South Africa invaded Angola against the will of the Angolan people. Their intentions were no different than any other of the invading troops. . . . The propaganda that UNITA is working with or collaborating with the South African invaders is a monstrous lie."

The issues underlying today's bitter struggle in Angola are first, whether Angola will have a government of national union or national betrayal; and second, foreign interference in the internal affairs of the Angolan people, according to UNITA.

After years of revolutionary war against the Portuguese and the U.S., a government of national union in

Jonas Savimbi, leader of UNITA: "The Press Lies"

Angola came close to being established when the three liberation movements in Angola agreed to co-operate in 1974.

But the Soviet Union forced a counter-revolutionary civil war in order to install a government which would serve their interests in Angola. "During the 14 year war against the Portuguese the Soviet Union invested a total of about $54 million in aid to the MPLA. But after the defeat of the Portuguese, during the 12 month period from November 1974 to October 1975, the Soviet Union spent about $120 million in aid to MPLA. Now obviously the only enemy was the Angola liberation movements that did not want Russian imperialism in Angola," said a UNITA press release.

The fight in Angola is not between the MPLA, supported by the Soviet Union, and UNITA, supported by the U.S. and South Africa, they say. UNITA wants to form a government of national unity within Angola, free from foreign intervention. "UNITA has the population and the political and moral strength of the peasant masses, controlling 55 per cent of the Angolan population — and an army of 40,000 men. . . . Unfortunately, only a fraction of its men were armed, for UNITA never had the support of any superpower," said the release.

UNITA foresees increasing foreign intervention as the war continues: "Already Russia, Cuba, East Germany, Czechoslovakia and other East European countries on the one-hand — and South Africa on the other — have actual physical presence in Angola," the release continued.

"If the Soviet Union continues its established path of imperialist intervention, the physical presence of other foreigners is a virtual certainty — not because UNITA invites it, but because superpower politics will make it inevitable."

UNITA has called for a political solution to the problems facing Angola: "UNITA continues its just struggle and is pressing for enough military victories to force Soviet dominated MPLA to the bargaining table. No one group alone can militarily dominate our country, which geopolitically is controlled by three forces — UNITA, MPLA and FNLA," said the release.

This article presents one view of the current struggle in Angola. The Varsity published a contrary view November 12, '75.

A UNITA representative will speak at a meeting Sunday on Angola. Watch your Friday Varsity for details.

FEELING HELPLESS?

In every facet of life there is a spiritual law that really works.
Hear this explained in an important lecture

ENTITLED

"INDIVIDUALIZING GOD'S POWER"

by Jessica Pickett C.S., a member of The Christian Science Board of Lectureship

IN THE AUDITORIUM
252 Bloor St. W., Toronto on Sunday, February 8 at 3:15 p.m.

Jessica Pickett, a former business woman, serves in the healing ministry of the domination, and is currently on a lecture tour in South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, the United States and Canada.

Christian Science has been associated with healing throughout its history, but the healing goes far beyond the healing of physical diseases: it embraces the myriad problems which confront human beings.

In her lecture, Miss Pickett speaks of learning how to apply God's power to whatever the need, in order to help solve personal and world problems. By accepting Him as literally all-powerful in every direction, His force becomes apparent in very practical ways.

She points out that we are never too young nor too old in years to learn how to individualize the infinite power of God in overcoming obstacles to health and harmony.

Literature on Christian Science is available on request in French, German, Italian, Portuguese and many other languages.

And now for something completely different... MORE CUTBACKS!

INTRODUCTION

The information for this article was collected by the Arts and Science Student Union in cooperation with its course unions from departmental chairmen. Although the information is by no means complete, we see it as a basis for collecting more information, and making the effects of the cuts that have been imposed upon departments felt by students.

Next year departments in Arts and Science will have to take a 5 per cent "across-the-board" cut from the Faculty. What this entails is departments losing off 5 per cent from all of their budget areas. In most departments, except the large sciences, over 90 per cent of the departmental budget is spent on salaries. Thus making a 5 per cent cut entails firing someone in the department.

As the university administration issued a statement saying that no tenured faculty would be fired as a result of these cuts, those who do get fired are the TAs and support staff. Therefore next year what you will be seeing around the Faculty is a combination of fewer teaching staff, larger classes, fewer tutorials, and much less contact time with your TAs and profs.

Cuts are being made in other faculties too, but they have not been taking the severe cuts that A&S have been taking for four years now. Most departmental chairmen do not know what other departments in the faculty are getting in the way of funds, as this is worked out on a very arbitrary basis between the individual chairman and the Dean. Chairmen also claimed that total cuts will only amount to five per cent.

However ASSU has reason to believe planning has taken place which will involve cuts of five per cent in each of the next three years at least.

Many departmental chairmen that we talked to expressed the sentiment that budget decisions should be made in an open manner, with student participation in the decision-making process. We could not agree more!

ANTHROPOLOGY

The department has suffered significant losses in teaching staff especially in the socio-cultural and linguistics sections. The department, possibly the best in Canada, is one of the few places where undergraduate and graduate students can take courses in all four of the sub-disciplines of anthropology.

The loss of teaching staff, coupled with an increase of student enrolment signifies a decrease in the quality of teaching. Cuts will be implemented "across-the-board" — in other words, all areas in the department will suffer.

Effects of cuts:

- increase in large staff-student ratio by not replacing profs on leave
- decreasing the number of sections for "core" courses (i.e., piling 1,000 students into one section of ANT 100 and teaching it in Con Hall)
- not replacing broken, lost and stolen material in the Physical Anthropology labs
- not replacing 1 Linguistics prof and 1 socio-cultural prof leaving the department in May '76.
- minor cuts in the number of TAs that are hired, and increasing the work load of those that will be hired.

ASTRONOMY

The Astronomy department is lucky, as science departments go, in that optics do not wear out as easily as most other scientific equipment. When the department was moved to its present quarters at the top of the Physics tower 7 years ago, it was fully outfitted with new equipment for teaching purposes.

But the department's present equipment budget has been reduced to such an extent that they cannot afford to purchase the auxiliary electronic apparatus needed for a modern training in astronomy.

The department has such a small working area that professors share offices. Over the past six years enrolment has increased and then fallen to its 1971 level, but the number of TAs has fallen by almost 30 per cent.

The 5 per cent cut will mean that the department will have to choose between laying off technical staff or professors. Laying off professors will mean an end to the teaching system in the department as it now exists, and laying off technical staff will mean that bureaucratic services to students, such as grant applications will either cease or be minimal.

With fewer technical staff scholarship applications would go out late, records would not be kept up to date, and documentation and requisition would not be as accurate.

BOTANY

Over the last five years the Botany department has responded well to cutbacks, managing in most instances to implement them without too much harm to their programme. But the threat of a further cut of 5 per cent has caused much demoralization in the department, as the professors feel that the programme of teaching that they have worked so hard toward improving, even in the face of cutbacks, will now suffer damage that may be irreparable. Ontario is fast becoming the disaster area in Canada for the Botany field.

At U of T, the Botany department has been facing cuts in their equipment budget of $40,000 over six years, while the real costs of replacement and updating have doubled.

Students use growth chambers that are 15 years old, and other equipment is obsolete or broken. The greenhouses are 45 years old, and are totally inadequate for modern needs; but the department still keeps them in operation.

The department is so grossly overenrolled for its facilities that last year it had to turn away 30 per cent of those students who applied for second year courses. There is no student common room or study area in the Botany Building, and only one seminar room.

The 5 per cent cut will mean the following:

- taxonomy, ecology, and plant pathology will be affected by the loss of at least 2 teaching positions
- the quality of research conducted in the department will decrease sharply, due to lack of funds for equipment from the University, coupled with the cuts in NRC grants
- non-graduate student TAs will have to be laid off
- lab equipment will not be repaired or replaced
- enrollment ceilings on courses, due to lack of equipment in labs.

CHEMISTRY

The total departmental Chemistry budget has been increased by 20 per cent in the last 6 years, but salary increases have accounted for as much as 12 per cent of this increase, meaning that other budget areas have taken only an 8 per cent increase.

Essentially this means that the department's ability to buy equipment has been eroded to the point that students will be unable to compete with people trained elsewhere for jobs, due to the fact that they will not be trained on modern equipment.

In the last 6 years staff had decreased by 12 per cent, while enrolment has risen by 45 per cent. The following will be cut:

- money for research equipment, which will affect graduate students, (also 4th year undergraduates) in that they will have to wait for equipment for experiments
- support of secretaries and technicians

- reduction of demonstrators in undergrad labs
- tutorial programme in 1st year will be cut completely — study room programme for 1st and 2nd year students will be cut altogether

(NB) This means that 1st and 2nd year students will have no opportunity for discussion of problem areas, and explanation of difficult concepts.)

ENGLISH

Last year the combined department of English offered a total of 264 sections in their field. Next year students will see no more than 232.

At Erindale the number of courses offered will remain stationary, but there will be a further increase in the student-prof ratio. At Scarborough the number of TAs will go down from 18 to 5 next year, making the department there dependent almost entirely on the permanent staff for teaching.

FINE ART

Cutbacks in the Fine Art department budget have been higher than the average faculty cuts since 72-73 to date. In 1975-76 the Fine Art department had no cuts, but this was offset by integration with Woodsworth College.

As a result of this integration, the enrollment has dramatically increased yet the budget has not been proportionately augmented. Cuts proposed are not only 5 per cent for 76-77 but an additional 5 per cent for 77-78 and 78-79.

Results of cuts:

- Graduate assistants have lost 14 per cent in real wages since 1968
- general supplies budget has gone up by $1,500 since '71 but has not kept up with inflation
- professors leaving the faculty, especially those in Italian Renaissance art (an important area of Fine Art) have not been replaced.
- number of graduate students has increased from 12 to 60 in the past five years but in 75-76 the department is operating with less professors than five years ago; it will have to reduce the number of graduates admitted or increase the work load of professors (guess which?)

The department is trying to carry out "compression" with as little damage as possible due to the quality of teaching, but it seems that as a result of a shrinking budget they may start firing professors (tenured) within the next two years.

FRENCH

From 71-75, the St. George campus department has lost 21 full-time professors, with only 6 new appointments made during this period, signifying a reduction of 15 full-time teaching positions. The departmental teaching load has been increased by the integration of 20 new Woodsworth courses.

At Erindale the department has only one full-time professor to cope with teaching several hundred students. The department's French-Canadian section is short of graduate staff, with the result that this vital area of study is suffering.

Since 1971, the department has been cut by $300,000 in spite of increasing enrollment. The department has been doing 80 per cent more teaching with a 14 per cent reduction of teaching staff. The cutbacks within this department are being carried out by attrition; 4 professors are expected to retire this year and these positions are not to be filled.

The principal problems within this department is lack of "young lions" or new professors coming into the department bringing with them new methodology and new ideas. The problem becomes one of a definite age gap between the professors' and the students' interests, to the detriment of the students' initiative to learn how to communicate effectively in French.

GEOGRAPHY

In the Geography department the cuts mean that the departmental library will have to be closed down, due to lack of funds. New courses that were proposed will now not be offered, and half courses have been cancelled. In podology the number of field trips has been decreased by one-third. Old equipment in photo-grammetry makes learning more difficult.

GEOLOGY

Geology has undergone a major revolution in methodology in the past 10 years, making the use of very expensive analytic equipment (mass spectrometers, photogrammetric systems) imperative.

The Geology department at U of T is unable to offer the students the use of this new equipment because of a shrinking budget.

Enrollment in this department has increased by 150 students in the last two years, and the staff-student ratio has increased by more than 35 per cent in the past six years.

Geology has already established an enrollment ceiling in courses for Engineering students, and will have to extend this policy to all courses with less than 200 students. Laboratories are the major problem here, as the department has an insufficient amount of equipment for the number of students and cannot support enough TAs on its budget to provide the necessary individual attention to undergraduates in lab teaching.

The Mining Building, home of the Geology department, has not been renovated in 20 years, resulting in no increase in much-needed lab facilities. The building is still a fire hazard.

Results of cuts:

- not enough teaching equipment; microscopes, analytical tools

ment will have to abandon the style of teaching in which the department strongly believes, and which History students have enjoyed for generations."

The current winter programme in Modern History has been decreased by 7 courses in the past two years, and it is expected that over 30 courses including "core" courses History 101 and 361, will not be offered in '77. This implies that Japanese history will be non-existent, Latin American studies severely limited, and Canadian

— the visiting lecturer in Modern Hebrew literature — part-time lecturer in an INV course
— teaching fellows in several undergraduate courses including Palestinian archaeology, Egyptian and Classical Hebrew.

PHILOSOPHY

The department of philosophy has been able to absorb most of its cuts over the last 6 years without seriously hampering its course offerings, although quality has been studies cut back for the third consecutive year.

There has been an increase in enrollment from integration with Woodsworth, thus increasing teaching loads of both professors and TA's.

Results of cuts:

— in order to comply with a 5 per cent mandatory cutback, the department will have to fire:

- 4 profs and 2 TA's or
- 3 profs and 6.6 TA's or
- 2 profs and 14 TA's.

— reduction of up to 54 classroom hours

— loss of 2 second-year courses, 4 third-year courses and 10-15 graduate and undergraduate seminars.

— limit enrollment in overcrowded (i.e. popular and necessary) subject areas

The department is also considering using senior graduate students as lecturers in core or introductory courses in order to alleviate the teaching load on professors.

ITALIAN

Since 1973, when the department separated from Hispanic Studies, the Italian department has gained students at a rapid rate and at the same time has been suffering massive cuts.

The department now relies on TA's for 50 per cent of its teaching load with a resulting low faculty-student contact. At Erindale the largest student enrollment in Italian is taught by only one full-time professor and three visiting professors.

Results of cuts:

— two proposed Italian literature in translation courses will not be offered.

— elimination of 1 full-time office staff member — elimination of 1 part-time lecturer

— 2 TA's laid off

— increase in size of language classes, with the result that the undergraduate students will have little opportunity for conversing in Italian — equipment budget down to $100.

NEAR EASTERN STUDIES

This department has the reputation for having the finest program outside of Europe and constantly receives applications for graduate school. It strives to maintain its reputation by balancing teaching load and research and the proposed 5 per cent cutbacks will topple this balance.

Ninety-eight per cent of the departmental budget is for salaries; nearly all of the teaching staff are tenured professors, so cutbacks mean that the department will have to start firing tenured staff.

Furthermore, there are very few persons qualified to fill-in when the professors go on leave or are fired, due to the high degree of specialization required for this field, and any cutbacks signify a drastic decrease in quality.

Possible areas of cuts include no re-hiring:

adversely affected.

Six years ago the Philosophy department hired senior visitors to replace people on leave. Now they are forced to hire young professors who are unable to get permanent replacements elsewhere for replacement of profs. There have been no tenure appointments since '69, with the result that there are few new faces around the department.

This year the department made a conscious effort to cut graduate course offerings due to reduced faculty resources. The departmental chairman, Gauthier, feels that the department was able to anticipate the cuts, and so have been able to absorb them well, but at the same time he feels that this is the last cut that the department will be able to take without seriously harming the programme. But the graduate programme will be absorbing half of these cuts, and he will encourage people to rotate at the graduate level of teaching.

Effects of Cuts to Come

— giving up 1½ appointments, to cover 5 per cent of central budget

— no replacement of people on sabbatical — loss of 1 support staff position

— lay-offs of TAs in proportion to number of faculty positions lost — decrease in graduate enrollment in proportion to loss of faculty positions

— cutting 9 graduate and undergraduate courses

Professor Gauthier feels that University budgeting should be put "on top of the table", and that departments should insist that this be done, so that people will know how the budget decisions are made around here.

PHYSICS

This department, quite possibly in anticipation of the cutbacks, began to economize on its departmental budget two years ago by not replacing members of the staff who retired or left, and it appears that it will be able to soften the blow of cutbacks by these measures.

Its research budget, possibly one of the largest budgets for science departments within the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, will not be able to absorb the 5 per cent cuts and these cuts will be felt most acutely by those professors and students who relied on the University for their research money.

In '77 there will be no cuts in the number of graduate and undergraduate courses offered, but there are proposed cutbacks in the equipment budget and in the temporary staff budget (TA's and lab demonstrators).

POLITICAL ECONOMY

Enrollment in the last year has increased in the Commerce and Finance area of the department by 28 per cent, in Economics by 26 per cent, and in Political Science by 17 per cent. These follow enrollment increases of 44 per cent the previous year. At the same time the number of full-time teaching staff has been decreased by 4 positions. In Commerce the pressure of increased enrollments has been met by increasing the size of the lecture sections. The situation is now such that undergraduates will never experience a course with less than 50 students enrolled, at any level below 4th year. With the increased enrollment now experienced, it is probable that undergraduate classes, even at the 4th year level will have more than 50 students in attendance.

At the graduate level courses have been cut out completely, and other courses have been integrated with 4th year seminars.

Effects of 5 per cent Cut:

— the number of teaching assistants will be cut in half

— 10 per cent reduction in teaching staff other than TAs (loss of 3 profs)

— increases in class sizes by over 60 per cent in major courses — limited enrollment in classes of the 200 level, probably by using grades as requirements for accessibility — higher level courses will be offered on rotation.

PSYCHOLOGY

The major problem in the Psychology department will be the loss of 3 professors at the end of this year.

This will result in:

— cancellation of some of the smaller courses

— increased teaching loads for professors (less contact-time with students)

— cancellation of statistics course — combination of sections in larger courses.

SANSKRIT AND INDIAN STUDIES

The department of Sanskrit and Indian Studies would more appropriately be named the department of Sanskrit Studies. The undergraduate programme of the department was initiated in '64, and the graduate in '66, and both suffer from stunted growth. Only classical areas of study were built up in the department before the freeze. In '67 the budget was frozen, with the Classical programme well established, but the modern language and culture areas seriously understaffed. In 70-71 the department's budget was cut by $5,000, the following year it was cut again by $16,000, and since then it has been further cut by $20,500.

University of Toronto has the only department of Sanskrit and Indian Studies in Canada, and is one of the few on the continent that offers an undergraduate programme. Its graduate programme is considered the best in North America, due to its scope.

Since '67 the department has lost 4 profs, with only 10 remaining and 2 TAs filling one of the teaching positions.

Effect of Cut:

— losing two profs (one through resignation, another is a visiting position)

— Tibetan language will not be taught

— Hindi offerings will be restricted.

SLAVIC LANGUAGES

The department of Slavic Languages has been taking cuts for a number of years, but most of these were absorbed by reduction in the supplies until '74. In '74 the department lost one position through attrition in the Russian-Ukrainian languages area. This affected the department's inability to replace people on leave. The department attempted to get a full-time appointment in the area of Polish, through letters and lobbies to Dean Greene and President Evans, but this failed, thus only a visiting appointment was made, leaving the possibility of the area being cut at a future date.

Effects of the Cut:

— loss of visiting appointment in Polish

— lay-off of TAs

— no literature in translation courses.

TA's pressure McGill

MONTREAL (CUP) — McGill University is feeling the mounting pressure of a work slowdown by teaching assistants in the Arts Faculty that began early last December.

The McGill Teaching Assistants Association (MTAA), fighting for fair wages, working conditions and official recognition by the university administration, voted January 22 to take "further action" if settlement is not reached by January 31.

Students needing transcripts of marks have found many to be incomplete since many grades may not have been entered by the TA's. In some classes students are confronted by TA's who attend class but refuse to lecture, as part of the slow-down campaign.

Initial contract demands by the MTAA included an independent cost of living clause (COLA), job security, a standardized 10-hour work-week, and standard salary increases equivalent to those received by McGill staff.

Last salary offer by the Arts Dean Robert Vogel, 3,750 plus tuition fees, has been rejected by the MTAA.

At MTAA's request, Vogel has reaffirmed the 10-hour work week but is holding back on job security, COLA, and official recognition of the union as a bargaining unit.

Vogel said January 19 the question of COLA depended on the McGill Faculty who are currently negotiating for salary increases. He also cited the federal Anti-Inflation Board (AIB) as a possible stumbling block.

"I'm not quite sure why we should treat the TA budget differently from the faculty budget," said Vogel.

One MTAA member countered this: "Since we earn considerably less than faculty, we're not subject to the same federal controls. There is no reason why we should have to depend on what the faculty gets," he said.

MTAA made a gain January 21 when the TA lecturers in French as a second language voted to negotiate only through the MTAA. Vogel had stated earlier that he might be able to negotiate separately with the French TA's because they have a heavier teaching load.

Vogel said that he recognized the MTAA "as much as I recognize anyone else".

Texaco 'the worst'

SAN FRANCISCO (ENS-CUP) — Among the nation's eight major oil companies, Atlantic Richfield has achieved the best overall performance record on pollution control. At the opposite end of the scale, Texaco has been judged the worst polluter due to "consistent intransigence in the face of regulation."

These facts emerged from a report released in early December by the Council on Economic Priorities. The Council has surveyed a total of 61 oil refineries owned by the top eight companies.

The survey is particularly relevant due to the huge pollution problem caused by oil refining. The Environmental Protection Agency rates the petroleum industry among the three largest sources of air and water pollution.

The study also gave high marks to Shell and Exxon, and low rating to Gulf and Mobil. But it concludes that the greatest variations in standards were not between the companies but between geographical regions. This, said the report, reflects the fact that the biggest hurdle to clean air and clean water is getting the regional enforcement agencies to crack down on offenders.

Watery Grave?

MOUNTAIN VIEW (ENS-CUP) — A Mountain View, California man was arrested January 20 on a murder charge involving an unusual weapon — his waterbed. According to police accounts, Mark Bates quarreled with his bride of one month, then threw her on their waterbed, slashed the mattress with a knife and tried to drown her. She escaped and summoned police.

Law students find 'first test' trying one

EDMONTON (CUP) — One hundred and nineteen prospective law students are angry and upset. They have just received news that the University of Alberta's Law School Admissions Tests (LSATs) have apparently vanished into thin air.

The students wrote the examinations on December 26 under the supervision of the U of A's Student Counselling Services. Counselling sent the exams off to a brokerage firm in Toronto on the 10th and the bill of lading stamped received on December 12. And then... they disappeared.

LSATs are produced and marked by Educational Testing Services (ETS) of Princeton New Jersey. A. Hough, Director of Student Counselling, explained that "because of the mail strike, ETS had specified that we were to send the papers to this border brokerage firm in Toronto, which we did.

"We've been on the phone a dozen times to Princeton, and I'm fed up," Hough continued. "I think we're getting the run-around; ETS should be putting tremendous pressure on that brokerage."

Professor Hough said that the only lead they have at the moment concerns some 91 boxes of tests which are still to be shipped from the brokerage firm to New Jersey. "We can only hope that they're in that package. If they're not, I don't know what we'll do."

H. Irwin, Assistant Dean of Law, said that it would be impossible to assess any applicant to the Faculty of Law without an LSAT score, on the basis of the criteria presently used. He added that examination of applications would not take place before the latter part of June and therefore students could have the opportunity to write another set of LSATs in April.

He said there could be a positive benefit to the problem if applicants do have to rewrite, as they will have had the benefit of a previous writing without it going on record.

No mention has been made concerning additional payment of fees for a rewrite, as all parties await resolution to the problem.

Students stall fee increase

CALGARY (CUP) — The University of Calgary Student's Union has delayed a Board of Governor's vote on a proposal to increase the universities tuition fees by 25 per cent.

Council President Dave Wolf told the Board January 20 that he had received the formal proposal too late and the union had not had time to examine it carefully or develop any solid position.

He also said there had been no consultation with the student government when the formal proposal was drawn up.

Board Chairperson I. N. McKinnon opposed the Wolf motion saying, "we have very little choice in our position", however after the delay was allowed he said the Board had the unfortunate choice of either voting now and stirring public resentment for "steamrolling" or vote later and upset the business and planning programs of the university.

Wolf said the 25 per cent was too great an increase over one year, but added he was not opposed to the increase if it could be spread over two years.

Board members pointed out that the U of C had one of the lowest tuition costs in Canada and it has not increased since 1968.

"We are sympathetic to students but I see no alternatives," but to raise tuition fees, said Dr. William Cochran, university president.

Video history created

VANCOUVER (CUP) — As post-secondary students across Canada organize in response to government cutbacks in education, a Vancouver group has completed a video-tape on attempts by BC high school students over the past six years to organize.

Through interviews with ex-student organizers, the thirty minute production titled "The Students' Voice" traces the growth and decline of several active organizations that sprang up since 1967.

The Inter-High Student Union, (67 to 69) arguing for community control over and access to schools, removal of compulsory attendance and non-competitive learning.

The Oganookie Standard, (70-72) an inter high school newspaper continuously blamed by the school boards for unacceptable content like birth control information. The paper was an attempt to overcome the near-total control school principals had over posters, bulletin boards, PA systems, and school newspapers.

The Bill of Rights Movement (72-74) which drew up a basic list of rights for students that was ratified by 11 student councils.

The British Columbia Federation of Students (73-74) which tried to initiate discussion among student councils on various issues affecting students. (no relation to the current post-secondary organization, the BCSU)

It can show the general public a lot about the high school system," he said. "It puts together a number of students who articulate clearly some of the grievances they have.

But, he said, a major function is relating to students in high school and university some lessons about the organizational process.

"Students lack a sense of history, as does any oppressed group like women, the natives, or the poor," he said. "They are denied the experience of those who preceded them and tried to change their situation."

But the same obstacles that students in the film articulated may be around the corner for the group in distributing it: control of information by bureaucrats (school boards, principals, government officials) who would rather keep such information out of the hands of the students.

During the two years in which the tape was produced, Goodman says no help was forthcoming from any government department he approached.

He hopes to have better luck with the Provincial Media Resources Board which acts as an audio-visual library for schools in the province.

In the meantime, groups wanting the tape or equipment to show it should contact:

Geneticist fears genetic manipulation

OTTAWA (CUP) — Could the slogan "All people have the right to give birth to a healthy child" become the centrepiece of a movement in the 1980's? Geneticist, Dr. David Suzuki, says it's very likely, but he's worried about its reciprocal. "All unhealthy, abnormal children have no right to survive."

Speaking at the University of Ottawa's Festival of Life, January 27, Suzuki, geneticist and T.V. and radio series commentator, warned about the potential abuses of scientific information and pointed out that further advances in science will put increasing pressures on society to face serious moral and ethical questions.

"In the 1970's we have an understanding of molecular biology that has brought about options of manipulation undreamed of 10 years ago."

Recently developed techniques like amniocentesis and fetoscopy, which allow direct observation and photographing of the fetus, can already detect certain abnormalities.

"Where do we draw the line on acceptable and unacceptable characteristics and who decides?"

Is it "unreasonable and irresponsible", as one scientist has suggested, to allow the birth of mongoloid children? "I don't think so", Suzuki said.

He pointed out the problem has wider ramifications saying, "Triage is at the nub of many problems."

The term refers to a sorting method used in the first world war in which seriously injured soldiers were left to die and those with minor injuries were left to help themselves thereby concentrating aid on those who had good chances of survival.

Will we soon be talking about cutting off aid to the Third World? Suzuki asked.

"What about when our energy runs out—and it will—will we draw the lines of triage against the mentally ill; the elderly?"

He admitted these were far-reaching problems for a society that has as yet "to resolve the basic morality of abortion" and the question of what to do with nuclear power.

He questioned the right of the military and industry, "two major users of scientific research not known for their concern of the general public", to hide their work behind a top secret stamp asking: "Do we want major corporations to decide which scientific research to use?"

Suzuki said the crisis in science now is that "we no longer have time for reflection."

"We now accept change as the one unchangeable thing in our lives."

This, coupled with a history of racism in genetics and a government which supported the War Measures Act and the Oriental Exclusion Act poses "great danger" to further development in the field.

Suzuki himself spent four years in B.C. concentration camps "for having committed the crime of having genes from Japan three generations ago."

He also called for a halt to studies which purport blacks are hereditarily inferior or IQ is inherited saying it is impossible to make comparisons when one is studying subjects from a common human gene pool.

If the men doing the studies "aren't terribly mischievous, they are very ignorant," Suzuki said.

The crux of the matter, he says, is to "de-mystify science". "My whole schtick is the translation of science into English."

"We (scientists) have to establish rapport with these groups" because "the issue at stake here goes to the heart of what only humans have and our society treasures."

V-Ballers undefeated

By PAUL JOE

Last Saturday the final OUA A regular season Volleyball matches were held at York University. With it came an undefeated season for the Blues as they closed it out with victories over Queen's (3-1), York (3-0) and RMC (3-0).

Blues' play was rather lacklustre. They really didn't get into high gear as a team all day though there were several creditable individual efforts. The defense held up but the inconsistent play was probably due to a combination of factors: a two week layoff from hard competition, injuries to four spikers leaving only two to work with in practice and the prospect of playing two of the weakest teams in the league.

In spite of these setbacks, the Blues really didn't have that much trouble against their opponents. Captain Keith Doan led the way with his "Captain Kangaroo Jump." With gazelle-like grace Doan would soar over opponents to score at will whenever he got the ball. Blocking was a problem all day due to some not so great jumping. The absence of the four spikers may have had something to do with it. Defensive work by Livio Iannucci and Wally Drozdowski saved the day when the mean up front were under the gun.

The day really belonged to the coaches, Reg Eddie and Trit Komet who have prepared their young charges to handle any situation. This coming weekend features the OUA A finals to be held at McMaster on Sunday. The teams who qualified are Mac, Western, Toronto and Laurentian. One of these four will proceed to the CIAU finals in Moncton. Mac and as usual, the Blues appear to be the teams to beat. If you're in Steel City drop by, you seexy thing.

Evran Jones (15) spiking past the York block is aided by Livio Iannucci and Ara Haebeough (14).

U of T competitive in X-country

By STUART STARK

This past weekend the U of T hosted its annual Invitational cross country ski race at the Mountainview Ski Hills in Midland. The races, sponsored by Molson's and Fischer, were a great success attended by 60 skiers from 6 Ontario Universities.

Saturday's races, the Men's 15km and the Ladies 5km, were plagued with a preponderance of pitfalls. The course was characterized by conditions varying from drifting snow to icy patches which made waxing difficult. Most skiers had problems which led to considerable stumbling and as the races progressed, larger divers that proved to be the nemesis of the last lap. On Sunday the craters were smoothed out and the waxing proved more manageable for the relay events.

In the 15km race Crestoph Weber of Guelph won easily in the super time of 52:32. He was eventually followed by Richard Lay also of Guelph in 60:40 and Rob MacInosh of Queens in 61:28. For the U of T Paul Ketko finished a strong 4th in 62:25 followed by Mike Dyon 6th in 64:17, Veli Niinimaa 8th in 65:22 and Tom Best 10th in 65:43 rounded out the 4 skiers whose times contributed to the combined 2nd place finish to Guelph in this event. Other skiers for the U of T men's team included: Paul Stapleton finishing 12th in 68:44, Richard Sutcliffe 13th in 66:47, Stuart Stark 16th in 68:24, Paul Kemppainen 17th in 68:31, Jim Georgas 20th in 70:07 and Grant McCaffrey 24th in 74:50 out of a field of 41.

The U of T Ladies team continued to show the strength it displayed in the zone races last month. Susan Rowley captured the ladies crown with a time of 28:08 beating McIntyre of Trent by 18 seconds. Third place in the 5km event went to Muir of Western in 25:25 followed closely by Leslie Thompson of the U of T, 4th in 25:53. Other U of T skiers were Bea Hampson finishing a strong 6th in 27:28 and Mary Ann Bonchar 15th in 32:30 out of 19 skiers.

The men's A team came up with an excellent effort for the 3x3km relay. Veli Niinimaa, Mike Dyon and Paul Ketko skiing very strongly won the race convincingly in 59:54 beating Queen's by 50 seconds and Guelph by 79 seconds. The U of T B team of Tom Best, Paul Stapleton, and Richard Sutcliffe finished 4th and the C team of Paul Kemppainen, Grant McCaffrey and Stuart Stark finished 6th out of the 10 teams entered.

Using a bent rule Western narrowly beat our ladies team of Leslie Thompson, Mary Ann Bonchar, and Susan Rowley. In spite of a strong finishing effort they lost by 20 seconds finishing in 37:47.

This was the first intercollegiate race this winter and hopefully its success will lead to the formation of a University circuit in the future. The only other intercollegiate event is the OUA A championships to be held February 6-7th near Ottawa.

Davies comes home to coach

By JONATHAN GROSS

Sports Editor

Ask anybody who has been a student at this institution over the last half-decade who they think of when the Varsity Blues hockey team is mentioned and the name you're most likely to hear is that of Gord Davies.

After five years as a player and two-time captain of the Blues, Gord will be trying his luck as a part time coach of the team in Tom Watt's absence. Watt is currently in Innsbruck as a colour commentator for the Olympic games. Davies will guide the team over the last five games of the season starting tonight with Guelph.

Gord Davies has spent the better part of this year in a hockey 'limbo'. Since he had graduated from the University with a graduate degree in metallurgy his eligibility had run out in the OUA A. After a distinguished collegiate career during which he was a member of two CIAU champions, Gord looked to a career in the professional ranks.

During the summer Davies, who led the team in scoring last year in league play, sought employment with the Minnesota Fighting Saints of the World Hockey Association. The Saints, who were sold yesterday for the paltry sum of $130,000, let Davies go as they had made commitments towards people like David Keon and Michael Walton. Gord, who always has a smile on his face no matter what, attributed it to "Too many players, not enough jobs."

Back in Toronto, he offered his vast acumen of hockey knowledge to Tom Watt who gladly led "Gordie" assist in the coaching chores. According to Davies he was there to help out with the skills of the individuals who needed aid in certain areas.

The "blood" was still with him, however, and after an Italian pro league reneged on an offer Gord went to Buffalo to join the Norseman for the measly sum of $225 a game. Gord wasn't happy there, under the tutelage of player-coach Guy Trotter, a veteran journeyman in the pros. His explanation was simple: "In the pros, personal incentives are replaced by monetary incentives. I still needed personal goals and Guy was not providing them."

Having had his share of the pros he landed a good job with the Noranda Mining Company in the sales department. He doesn't start work until the end of the month so he grasped this opportunity to get some coaching experience and earn some non-volunteer wages in Watt's absence. Helping Gord will be former stars Paul Laurent and Ward Passey.

Davies first test will be tonight against the Guelph Gryphons who are currently in second place in the OUA A West. The line on this team is that due to their semester system,

Gymnasts 'Kings of Kingston'

The last two weekends have produced as many victories for the Varsity Blues Men's Gymnastic Team. Saturday January 24th saw the Blues win the Queen's invitational, with John Fair taking a first in All-Round Honours for U of T. Injuries prevented top gymnasts Brian Euler and Chester Makischuck from competing, but rookie Derek Wulff stepped ably into the gap and won the vault with a score of 8.2. Art Bowman placed on floor and Ron Collins placed on parallel bars to round off the victory.

Team success can only be achieved in gymnastics if the entire team performs well on all apparatus. On Sunday February 1st the Blues were a model of consistency, defeating the powerful York Yeoman by a convincing margin to win the divisional finals at McMaster.

The team was again led in scoring by John Fair who won a second place on both Rings and High Bar. Art Bowman tumbled his way to a third place in Floor Exercise, veteran John Kelly finished fourth on Parallel Bars, and Derek Wulff again scored well on Vault.

Team captain Chester Makischuck distinguished himself on High Bar while Ron Collins, the token artist on the team, looked strong on rings and vault. The significant factor in the victory was that all the Blues did well in all events; individual totals differed by only four points, demonstrating once again the balance and depth of the Varsity team. Undeafated so far this year, the Blues are now training for the Ontario finals to be held at Western on Feb. 21.

Davis promises no rise for next year

TORONTO

Fri., Feb. 6, 1976

By CHRIS Du VERNET
Premier William Davis committed his government to no tuition fee increase for next year but refused to commit himself any further.

The premier dismissed accusations of a massive increase in tuition. "They're just wrong and the history of the past five years demonstrates that."
"In terms of support the universities have had an equitable share, no question about it," Davis claimed in answer to complaints of cutbacks.
Davis was noncommittal on changes in the Ontario Student Assistance plan. The ministry of Colleges and Universities recently raised loan ceilings of the loan-grant scheme to $1,000. "There are very few students who want to go to university who can't attend," he claimed.

Referring to U of T, Davis maintained "there's not a university in this province that does any better in terms of accessibility."

University heads give nod to future fee hikes

By DAN KEETON
Another voice has been added to the call for increased tuition fees for Ontario university students, this time from university administrators.

ratio to 16:1 from 13:1, as a method of reducing costs. Increases in government funding have consistently decreased in the last three years.

In the wake of the government-sponsored Henderson Report calling for a 65 per cent tuition hike, a special committee of the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) has recommended "more modest" increases up to 25 per cent.
But "additional adjustments should be considered if required to take account of rising costs" says the report of the special committee, chaired by University of Ottawa rector, Roger Guindon. U of T President John Evans was a member of the committee.

In accepting the government's suggestion for institutions to take over responsibility for tuition fees, the committee appears to be willing to take a politically unpopular task from the government. If students protest tuition fee increases the government could point to individual institutions.

The Guindon report also follows the Henderson report in advocating an all-loan student aid plan for Ontario and the institution of a "special bursaries" programme for low-income students.

"Our conclusion is that the argument that the benefit of university education is both private and public is valid. Equity in paying the cost therefore calls for a sharing of the cost by the student and the public," the Guindon report concludes. However the report notes that several Western European countries have either nominal tuition fees or none at all.

Currently the Ontario Student Assistance Programme (OSAP) includes a loan-grant split, although the loan portion was raised to $1,000 from $800 by the province's ministry of colleges and universities last month.

The COU has sent the Guindon report back to the committee for further consideration because council members found it "confusing". Some disagreed with the tuition hike recommendations, said Trent University president Thomas Nind, who called the report "cynical and unrealistic."

The Guindon committee justifies its all-loan proposal by recommending a "contingency repayment plan", in which students would have to repay the cost of their education based on income after graduation.

Ontario Federation of Students executive member, Murray Miskin, said a 25 per cent hike would limit university accessibility to "those in the middle and upper-income brackets."

The Guindon Report is the final version of a report leaked last spring which called for massive cutbacks in post secondary education spending including faculty firings, higher tuition and lower enrollments.

Committee member and York University president, Ian H. MacDonald disagreed, claiming the all-loan scheme "does not necessarily imply any additional hardship."
"It depends on the attitude of people toward borrowing," he rationalized.

The leaked report was subsequently revised after a storm of criticism greeted its publication in the campus press.

The Guindon committee, which also includes university presidents from Toronto, Western, McMaster, Carleton and Laurentian, made headlines in the student press last March when a draft of its report was leaked.

The report also recommends universities be allowed to set their own tuition fees. They are currently regulated by government per capita grants which pay a portion of the institution's cost of educating each student.

The detailed draft voiced acceptance of the government's cutbacks measures and proposed tuition hikes, larger class sizes, reductions in faculty and faculty salaries, and the elimination of low-enrollment courses.

The committee argues government grants should not decrease but that a greater portion of future cost increases be borne by students. It also recommends the grants become independent of fee income.

The COU is an advisory body to the ministry of colleges and universities, the Ontario Council on University Affairs and individual institutions. Among its members are the presidents of Ontario's 15 publicly-funded universities.

The report contrasts its tuition hike proposal to the Henderson report's alternate suggestion of reducing university staff by 2,700 and increasing the student-faculty

Smiling Bill promised no tuition increase for 1976-77.

University may fire entire watchmen staff

The University of Toronto informed union representatives yesterday that it wants to trim its budget by laying off its entire staff of 46 night watchmen, a move that union spokesmen said would leave most campus buildings virtually without protection.

Eliminating the watchmen was discussed as part of an administration plan to cut 120 people from the physical plant staff. Administration officials revealed the proposed cuts at a meeting with 22 union stewards.

The proposals are to be considered before the university sets its budget on Feb. 26.

Joseph Jordan, business agent for Local 204, Service Employees International Union, told the Varsity last night the watchmen are responsible for internal security in most campus offices.

"Laying them all off would mean there would be no inside protection" in most buildings, he said.

Jordan said the university is also considering layoffs among its cleaning staff. Another union official, chief steward Robert Gibson, said he cannot imagine how the university could consider any further reductions of cleaning staff.

"Four or five years ago, there were 10 cleaning people at Sydney Smith Hall. Two years ago it was down to six. I was talking to someone over there recently, and they have been cut down to three."

"They shouldn't be laying people off, they should be hiring people," Gibson said.

In the university's budget recommendations, drafted largely by George Connell, vice-president, research and planning, a reduction of $1,464,165 is projected for physical plant spending.

The report, drafted by the university's budget committee, observes "there is no realistic possibility that the necessary reductions in staff can be achieved through attrition, in 1976-77."

Most of the reductions, the report states flatly, "can be accomplished only through elimination of staff positions."

U of T labor-management chief John Parker refused to comment on the layoffs, saying that he had met with the union today to bring the possibility of layoffs to their attention.

Parker said there would be no firm plans regarding layoffs until the budget is passed by the Governing Council.

N.B. Occupation Continues

Students occupying the New Brunswick government's Centennial Building will vote today whether to accept a government offer to strike an official committee to look into student aid problems in the province.

Provincial Youth Minister J.P. Ouellette offered the compromise to students after a Wednesday meeting of the New Brunswick cabinet, in an attempt to persuade the 500 students, who have been occupying the building since Jan. 28.

The proposal calls for a committee composed of representatives of each campus of the University of New Brunswick, as well as from the government and public sectors.

Ouellette could offer nothing in the way of immediate aid for the students, who are demanding a $3 million increase in the province's student aid budget.

He said that $500,000 to $1 million seemed like a more reasonable offer and added "if they continue to fight for three million dollars they'll be there for a long time."

Ouellette said that the government would consider a greater increase in next year's student aid budget if the unemployment situation proved to be bad over the summer.

Minister Parrott caught between the students and his colleagues.

Once again a gremlin has tarnished the Varsity's shining reputation for accuracy among the masses at U of T.

In Monday's issue it was reported SAC's striking workers had won a base rate of $176 a week. Unfortunately the skinflints on the SAC executive only agreed on a base rate of $165 a week.

The Varsity apologizes to CUPE local 1222 for improperly reporting their settlement.

Monday's article on the search for a new principal at College gave the impression that Academic Affairs was totally hostile to any concept of parity on the search committee. Academic Affairs however, was agreeable to parity inside the Innis components of a university-wide search committee, but was bound by the HAist rules not to allow a search committee comprised totally of people from Innis College.

As well, the story lends the impression that the topic would be discussed at a full meeting of Governing Council this week. That meeting was not on the schedule and represents a further foray into creative journalism on the part of the writer.

Editor The Varsity

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of The Varsity for the 1976-77 publishing year. The Editor is solely responsible for editorial policy and is responsible to the Board in all other matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority and responsibility, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $10,650 to $13,975 per publishing year, including a salary of $3,750 or less for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her position only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

TA's will be asked to reject offer

By LEARYAN

More than 2,400 graduate assistants at U of T will be asked by the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) bargaining team to reject the university's last offer, says business representative Diane Moeser.

But this does not mean the GAA members will go on strike. Moeser says by asking for rejection of the university offer the bargaining team is asking for "a strong mandate" to return to negotiations.

The GAA is now negotiating its first contract after a two-year battle for certification with the university. Its members do 40 per cent of undergraduate teaching.

"The bargaining team is convinced the university is merely testing the strength of the union," she said, "and armed with a rejection vote, we're sure we can make significant gains at the table. Pressure against the administration is also coming from petitions on our support from undergraduates and faculty."

Moeser says the results of conciliation to date have won two significant gains for the GAA. "We have won a good grievance procedure, which means a lot in terms of enforcing the rest of the contract. Previously teaching assistants have had no recourse to redress unjust working conditions."

"The bargaining team has also won a list of duties included within a 10-hour week," she said. "This means the administration has agreed to include all preparation time as well as contact time in the 10 hours. And it's enforceable. If you work more than 10 hours you can file a grievance. Some people are now working 20 to 30 hours a week for their 10 hours pay."

But the university has not yet conceded on many of the major demands of the GAA.

On individual job security, the administration has refused to give anything significant, she said. Sessional employees have no right to any kind of job security. They are hired for 1 or 2 terms, and then let go. Present practice is that most people work for at least 2 years.

Collective job security is still at issue because Provost Don Chant has stated the GAA members will not have to bear the brunt of cutbacks, but the university has been unwilling to put a no lay off guarantee in the contract.

The university is still trying to get voluntary check-off said Moeser. "This proposal amounts to union busting. The administration knows the union must have bargaining in order to survive," she charged.

The GAA bargaining team is also adamantly opposed to the university's 3 scale wage offer of $2,100, $2,500 and $2,875. "We want one wage scale with a higher wage for part-time lecturers. This is a paltry wage offer. At McGill the teaching assistants have just turned down a package which includes $3,750 plus tuition fees for 10 hours work," she said.

The university is also attempting to remove people from the existing bargaining unit. "Previously we agreed in the certification certificate that Transitional Year Program, Innis College and School of Continuing Studies teachers should be in. Now the university is trying to remove them," she said.

The university is also unwilling to place a limit on class size. "This is just another sign they are unwilling to protect the tutorial system in any way," Moeser added.

"The bargaining team is convinced that with a strong rejection vote from the membership, we will definitely win further gains at the bargaining table."

Governing Council Nominations Closed

By BOB BETTSON

Nominations have closed for seats on next year's Governing Council. The vote will be conducted later this month by mailed ballot.

Full-time undergraduates in arts and science will choose their two representatives from three candidates Brian Peil, Varsity Photo Editor, John Burnes, a young Progressive Conservative and Robert Gardner.

One professional undergraduate seat went by acclamation to a member of this year's council John Floras a medical student. Three engineers, Louis Auger, Richard Hadjukiewicz and SAC finance commissioner Michael Treacy, will compete for the other seat because the two professional representatives can't be from the same faculty.

Jonathan Gentry and Felix Salazar are running for re-election in the part-time students constituency against Sandra Nimmo, Mary Cresti and Joseph Renda.

If the U of T Act amendments are passed by Queens' Park, students may get three more representatives but they would be chosen next fall.

Graduate students won't have to vote because David Vaskevitch was acclaimed in one constituency and no-one ran in the other. A by-election will probably be held in the fall for the vacant seat.

The drop in interest in elections for the four year old top governing body was also reflected in the acclamation of candidates to the four faculty seats up for grabs. Faculty are elected for three year terms so the other remain the same. Elected were humanities prof. P. H. Salus, English prof. H. Auster, medicine prof. J. W. Meakin and pharmacy prof. R.M. Baxter.

Five administrative staff are running for the one seat out of two that is up for grabs. Contestants are Edward Beaver, Gwyneth Bishop, William Kent, Ronald Raw and Ernest Reid.

Profiles of student candidates will appear in The Varsity after reading week.

This is the complete list of candidates, points out the Chief Returning Officer, David Warren, because all the nominees have already corrected their nominating forms.

Grant ends boycott of HH Gallery

By KRISTINE KING

Pennies from heaven? More like a goshend of $1,830 and both the Hart House Art Gallery and Canadian artists are sporting broader smiles this year.

An Ontario Arts Council (OAC) grant awarded last December to the Hart House Art Gallery was instrumental in ending a boycott of the gallery by Canadian professional artists. The grant makes it possible for Hart House to pay what is considered a decent exhibition fee.

The Canadian Artists' Representation, Ontario (CARO), declared a boycott, which stretched nation-wide, in February of 1975. It came as a result of four years of fruitless negotiations with the gallery concerning exhibition fees for professional artists.

CARO Executive Assistant Carolyn Moskowitz yesterday said the CARO exhibition fee "depends on whether it is a group show or single show, and also on the duration".

She said the fee for a one-person show of three months or less would be $302 and a two-person exhibit for the same period would be $151 per artist. These conditions apply only to public galleries where work is not exhibited for sale.

Moskowitz said Hart House in the past paid $35 and $75 for solo exhibits and also covered transportation, invitation and opening costs. Before it received the OAC cheque Moskowitz said the gallery agreed to increase the exhibition fee to $305 but at the same time would cancel its policy of paying for expenses.

CARO has 500 members. Moskowitz said the majority are practicing visual artists but there are also institutional members such as the Art Gallery of Ontario and the National Gallery. CARO charges minimal fees — $10 annually per individual and $15 for associate membership. CARO depends on the OAC for most of its funding.

Dr. J. C. Lengelle, Warden of Hart House Art Gallery, explained that the gallery is maintained through students' fees and is "managed" by the Art Committee. He said the 1975-1976 budget is $9,000 and that the gallery has roughly $2,000 with which to buy paintings for the House' permanent collection.

The budget recommendations: What are the effects?

The university's budget recommendations for next year are contained in a 50-page document. To gain a general view of the effects upon the university, the Varsity has excerpted the most important of these effects in the budget committee's own wording.

On Programme Cuts

"No recommendations have been made which call for the elimination of major academic programmes. Given the reduction of formula income that would follow from the discontinuance of a major academic programme and the time schedule that any such elimination would require, the Committee concluded that the elimination of an entire academic programme would not solve the University's budgetary problems for 1976-77. This is not to say that programme elimination might not be an effective solution in the context of longer-term financial plans. In fact, recent government policy about graduate programmes will provide opportunities to consider discontinuation of entire programmes without affecting the University's income."

On Class Sizes

"The likelihood is that more than one-fifth of an undergraduate's formal instruction will be provided in classes that enroll more than 120 students, with the proportion of larger classes being much greater in the first and second year."

On Clinical Instruction

"In 1976-77, no fewer than six divisions — Dentistry, Education Medicine, Forestry, Music and Social Work — will have to reduce to varying extents the duration or variety of their clinical instruction, or in some cases change the method by which it is offered.

Laboratory Instruction

"Examples of the effect of reductions in equipment and supplies would be the necessity of eliminating or significantly reducing the laboratory components of some courses or the increased burden on academic staff as some instructional aids become in shorter supply. Certainly a shortage of equipment and supplies will reduce the University's research capabilities."

On Research

"Reductions in academic staff will have an effect on the University's research activity. As greater staff efforts must be devoted to teaching, less time will be available for research. This is of course an extremely general description; the transfer of academic effort from research to teaching may not be obligatory in all cases. Nevertheless, the overall amount of time spent in research activity probably will decline in the University at large."

On The Libraries

"The Committee concluded that some divisional and departmental libraries should be integrated with the central library system, but recognized that a co-ordinated two- or three-year plan for carrying out this task should be developed. There will be some progress made in this direction in 1976-77, notably in the Faculty of Forestry and Landscape Architecture."

"We've expenditures for acquisitions to remain at current levels for more than a year or two, some damage to programmes would undoubtedly result."

Administration

"The Admissions office will reduce its staff and, thereby, might be forced to keep shorter public hours. Alumnus address files will be less well maintained. Staff bulletins and directories will be less frequently published. Reductions in the staff of the office of the Vice-President—Research and Planning will limit the University's resource planning capability and its capacity for responding to requirements for information about programmes."

Physical Plant

"Periodic maintenance will be discontinued to the extent that only emergency maintenance will be possible. Other services such as cleaning, painting and wall-washing will be significantly reduced. The University has already instituted skip-cleaning and will introduce further reductions of this sort in 1976-77. The night watchman service will be phased-out. If lay-offs are necessary, the Personnel Department will immediately take steps to meet with representatives of the relevant unions."

"We also recommend that a programme designed to conserve energy be introduced with the aim of reducing the University's consumption of energy by two per cent. If it were to prove necessary, we would recommend that the programme institute an incentive scheme which will reward those divisions that reduce their consumption of energy. For example, purchases of new equipment that would make additional demands on utilities might be restricted unless there was corresponding compensatory reductions in the use of equipment already on hand."

On Academic Staffing

Although the number can neither be controlled or exactly predicted, the Budget Committee expects that approximately 125 vacancies in academic staff will occur in 1976-77. Given the committee's recommendations overall, only about one-half of these vacancies can be filled."

New Inflation solutions: Kraft dinners and parsnips Restraint! is a nicer word than "cutbacks". Governments exercise restraint to trim budgetary fat, which supposedly contributes to inflation.

Which leads to the question: Are the social services being cut back really fattening? Who is being forced to diet for whose overeating?

The Company of Young Canadians would have cost Canada six million dollars this year for their work among the disadvantaged, including self-employment projects for welfare recipients. With the social workers and those they help back on unemployment, the disbanded CYC could cost the government 7 million next year.

Closer to home is the provincial ceiling on municipal assistance, in the spirit of the recommendations of the Henderson Report. Of course the Henderson Report isn't really government policy — Davis innocently commissioned an enquiry into "means of restraining the costs of Government through examining... the continued usefulness of programs" and, shock! the committee recommended restraint through cutting back programs.

No doubt the provincial spending limits are well-intentioned, aimed at cutting back such trills as police, transit, welfare, and day-care services. You just have to expect such side-effects of inflation-fighting as TTC fares approaching 50 cents by summer, property taxes up 30 per cent, not to mention lower incomes for the truly needy in Toronto.

Of course we all know there are "thousands of bums" on welfare who don't need it — the reason we can't name any is no doubt due to the different circles we move in.

As for the federal wage and salary controls, what can we say that isn't fast becoming obvious. Action against prices and profits would be nice.

As students we're very much aware of the effects of fiscal restraint in education. For a deteriorating education we're faced with the spectre of an eventual 65 per cent jump in fees and the elimination of OSAP grants. Ontario university presidents have been moved to calm us by announcing they want only a 25 per cent tuition increase.

Why do people put up with these measures? Because of a story being fed us that our lives are being run by big business, big labour, and big government. The sequel to this two-thirds myth is that our enlightened leadership is fighting the giant interests (business, labour, and bureaucracy) on our behalf through restraints — "cutbacks" to us.

So you see, unions like the library workers have to be slapped down. Didn't you know multi-millionaire Judy Darcy pulls the strings of the nation from behind her desk in the Roberts circulation department? Haven't you noticed the library workers hanging out in the Granite Club after a soft day of shelving books? It's these workers averaging eight thousand a year who have to be kept from fuelling inflation.

As for bureaucracy, everyone's against it until the decision has to be made what and where to cut. Everyone's against waste in government but when you come right down to it extensive cuts in bureaucracy are going to mean lost jobs.

Students should not fall into the trap of advocating cutbacks in bureaucracy rather than in education. After all, education is the social service most often fingered as being excessively funded. As illustrated by this year's university budget which proposes cutting courses, academic positions and 120 Physical Plant jobs, austerity measures are aimed at students and workers alike.

What can governments do if they're serious about fighting inflation? Question the long-term benefits to the people of Today's potato stirred by a skeleton crew. Schoolwork is no excuse, do all our writers think they're here for an education? Come now. Anyways, Eric MacMillan, Bob Collier, Caitlin Kelly, Gary Lennox and others whose names are in our novenas. At Castle ran the copy in that god-awful lime-green Volks and Seltzer did the proofing as well as filling in for toothless Joe Wright. Have a nice weekend.

grandiose schemes which eat up public funds. In Quebecalone we can point to Drapeau's Olympic-sized debt, the Mirabel mirage, and the James Bay corruption project.

Instead of using the scalpel on social services, governments can reconsider the various subsidies handed out to what used to be called "corporate welfare bums." First on the list should be the oil companies profiting from the 100 million dollar Syncrude grants. Instead of cutting social programs, increase revenues by taxing the Rich and incorporated.

And do something about unemployment. If you are out of work, you can't afford much — whatever the price.

As for the federal and provincial cabinet members, put them all on a diet of Kraft dinners and parsnips.

To The Editor:

Mr. Drury in his letter (Jan. 4) criticizes the policy to raise tuition fees. He writes that if people because of poverty are prevented from attending university, then the government is still going to end up subsidizing them through welfare and unemployment insurance.

In terms of simple economics, Mr. Drury's logic is wrong. Although the government is going to end up subsidizing, it seems highly probable that this kind of subsidizing will total less than the government spends on education.

Furthermore, even if the government were persuaded by Mr. Drury not to increase tuition, then the graduate would still have to face welfare and unemployment at least some of the time after his years in the university, since university education is not necessarily a guarantee to employment. In fact, one of the justifications for cutbacks is that university education often fails to conform to manpower needs.

This brings me to another criticism of Mr. Drury's letter. He seems to imply that it is not a question of education conforming to economic restriction (for example, a closer correlation between education and manpower needs) because the university's creation of a "free society" should have top priority: "Universal accessibility to post-secondary education has been one of the cornerstones of free society."

I ask Mr. Drury, a student who is very much involved in the liberal policies of Innis College, and a student who has previously written letters to The Varsity complaining of the university's capitulation to general conservatism, how can he define society as being free.

Also, what "universal accessibility to post-secondary education" is he writing about? It is a well known fact that the offspring of richer parents are over-represented in university attendance. This hardly seems like universal accessibility.

One must differentiate between myth and historical reality.

Reader disagrees with deaf story

To The Editor:

In reply to Flora Clark's "Deaf Education — A Failure to Communicate" it may be instructive to your readers to hear the opposite viewpoint as expressed in her article of January 14, 1978.

It is most unfortunate that Ms. Clark based her article exclusively on the views of Richard G. Brill and a letter from the Globe & Mail (20.6.73), giving a "biased" view with total disregard to the acoupedic approach. May I direct her to a letter in the Globe and Mail (16.1.78) as well as Doreen Pollack's Educational Audiology For the Limited Hearing Infant. Dr. Pollack's acoupedic approach, also known as the auditory-oral or auraloral approach, is well worth stating. It is based on the use of the child's residual hearing maximally so as to integrate hearing into the personality of the young hearing-impaired child, which is accomplished in the following ways: 1) early diagnosis of hearing impairment; 2) hearing aids are fitted as soon as diagnosis has been made preferably binaural fitting; 3) the child is given the fullest opportunity to use his residual hearing to stimulate and develop normal patterns of language accomplished by inundating the child with speech and the sounds around him and thus developing his sensitivity to sound by communicating auditorily to him; and 4) the child is not segregated into a special situation with other hearing handicapped children from whom he can never acquire normal speech patterns. Instead, he acquires language at home and in much the same way as any normal child does during the formative years.

If all this sounds theoretical, it is not. We are fortunate to have available here in Toronto at the Hospital for Sick Children a programme in this auditory approach which has been admirably documented in October on the CBC programme "The Nature of Things." The acoupedic approach is not, as some would have us believe, for the superior intelligent and the privileged few. The reason it is for the few is the fact that total parental commitment is indeed required. Its result is an enormous saving to the community of having to integrate in their tents or adulthood people with a hearing handicap. It should be noted that children that have been educated in the acoupedic approach are part of the mainstream of society from a very early age and, therefore, never make it as part of the "deaf" statistics. Most important of all, those children educated in the acoupedic approach CAN HEAR AND ARE NO LONGER DEAF. They are part of the hearing world and fail to stand out as "deaf".

There is no reason for the hearing impaired child to be deprived of the opportunity of making the maximum use of his residual hearing. The critical years in the acquisition of speech are the early formative years, as with any normal hearing child. If he fails to do so, as some are bound to, there is always the option of the "total communication" route.

Miller's tale of Salem witch trials lets opera students show off their talents

Opera students give distinguished performance of Miller's "Crucible"

The Faculty of Music Opera Department presented the first in a series of four performances of The Crucible last Friday night (Jan. 30). The music for the opera (based on Arthur Miller's play) was composed by Robert Ward, and the libretto was written by Bernard Stambler. The work won the 1962 Pulitzer Prize in composition as well as a citation by the New York Music Critics' Circle, and it's not hard to understand why. The Crucible represents contemporary opera at its finest — the perfect fusion of music and drama.

This fusion of musical and dramatic values was admirably realized by conductor James Craig and director Constance Fisher. The cast and orchestra lost not a moment in creating dramatic tension, and succeeded in maintaining it, at varying levels of intensity, throughout the four acts. Two particularly memorable moments were the passionate confrontation between John and Abigail at the beginning of Act II, and the courtroom scene at the conclusion of the same act, in which Mary Warren's accusation of John arouses a frightening hysteria in everyone around her.

The most astonishing asset of the production lay in the evenness of quality in the singing and acting; while all the players were of impressive musical and dramatic calibre, one can perhaps single out Nancy Hermiston (Abigail), Patricia Harlow (Rebecca), Jonas Vaskevicius (John) and Barbara Ianni (Elizabeth) for special mention. In addition, credit should go to designer Elsie Sawchuk for her authentic re-creation of puritan austerity in the sets and costumes.

This highly distinguished production should not be missed. You have two chances left to see it: Friday Feb. 6, and Saturday Feb. 7 (Both at 8 p.m., at the MacMillan Theatre in the Edward Johnson Building).

Lougheed should know clean hands, oil, don't mix

The Tar Sands
Larry Pratt
Hurtig, $3.95

Some of the mystery surrounding Peter Lougheed's non-start in the Conservative leadership race may be cleared up with the publication of this book. Larry Pratt makes Alberta's Mr. Clean come up smelling like he just spent a week rolling in the oily, bituminous sluff that's supposed to turn Calgary into the next best thing since Houston, Texas.

To put it bluntly, Lougheed's claim that he brought the oil companies into the Syncrude project "on the government's terms" sounds more and more like outright showmanship. One suspects the divine Mr. L took lessons from Robert Bourassa and Jean Drapeau before he made his big announcement.

The fact is, as Pratt demonstrates, that Lougheed not only went against the recommendations of his own civil service in deciding to develop the tar sands, but also jumped just about as high as the oil companies wanted him to.

The companies had owned lots in the tar sands for years, but weren't going to develop the sands until they were ready; in particular, until the price of oil had gone up enough to make it worthwhile. As a matter of fact, as far back as 1951, the Social Credit government of Honest Ernest Manning had sung fruitless arias on its hands and knees to try and bring the oil companies aboard.

Why let the oil companies in? Why did Lougheed give up so early? The companies argued only that their scale of operation (which included massive exports) made the sands economic, and therefore that the sands had to be developed on their terms or wouldn't be developed at all. Second, the Alberta and federal governments saw Canada rapidly falling short of oil, and thus felt they had no alternative but to see the sands developed.

Unless the governments were prepared to nationalize the oil companies, they really had no bargaining tool. They were over a barrel, or, as Donald McDonald put it at the time, "over 125,000 barrels".

To add insult to injury, the governments decided to chip in their one billion dollar support of the Syncrude project, under pressure from the oil companies, on the basis of figures supplied by the companies themselves.

So you thought the tar sands were the one 'clean' energy project we had, the one to be developed without all the fuss of James Bay, the MacKenzie Valley Pipeline and the rest? Not a chance. Perhaps if Canada had a good strong conservative prime minister, something would be done about it?

Back to Beulah: amiable loonies reverse doc's logic

Nurse Ratched should have faced what Harriet, Betty, and Agnes made their psychiatrist, Dr. Anders, go through. On the other hand, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest was a didactic investigation of the psychiatrist-patient role reversal where W.O. Mitchell's Back to Beulah (currently being presented by Theatre Calgary at the Tarragon Theatre) is a heartily comic yet warmly human sketch. Nurse Ratched would probably never change as Dr. Anders certainly does. Nevertheless, it's hard to believe that anyone could remain harshly scientific when confronted with such marvellously eccentric people as these three women in this dingy apartment.

Back to Beulah, directed by Guy Sprung, is a balanced blend of farce and pathos, emotional confrontation and intellectual teasing. The situation is a ready-made stock comic one. But the unpretentious dialogue, fast paced farcical scenes, and absolutely believable (and surprisingly fulfilling) ending combine in a play that is funny even for those who take their comedy with a heavy dose of Oscar Wilde, and spiritually moving for everyone. Harriet, Betty and Agnes make their home in a basement apartment that is their half-way house from the psychiatric institution of Beulah. Christmas eve preparations reveal why they would be labelled "crazies". All of them dream of different worlds — Betty, of movie stars; Agnes, of babies; and Harriet, of a world free from immorality and guided by the bible. However, their anger over their treatment explodes at the initially obnoxious Dr. Anders. As their captive she is subjected to the same mind games that R.D. Laing has suggested are often the cause of continuing confusion in psychiatric patients. Her own catch phrases of "what is, is: what isn't, isn't" are turned against her when Harriet accuses her of using the three of them as her dolls. Of course their game can't continue indefinitely, but the conclusion is sufficiently plausible and satisfying to suggest that Dr. Anders has learned something out of the whole process.

The four lead members of the cast have no difficulty whatsoever tackling Mitchell's rapid movement from quiet intensely to raucous farce and back to gentle revelation. Maureen Fitzgerald as the simple and honest Betty is superb throughout the play, maintaining the right amount of naivete even in the midst of the wildest hide-and-seek games. Marrie Mumford is always consistent as the saint — like nymphomaniac Agnes. And Samantha Langevin as Dr. Anders makes the doctor's personality changes throughout the action thoroughly convincing. One of the most dramatically powerful scenes in the play and the one that immediately reveals the strength of Helen Hughes' acting is a scene that some people might miss. While the audience is coming into the theatre Harriet (Helen Hughes) is alone in the basement apartment preparing dinner. She rests in her rocking chair with a cup of coffee waiting for Agnes and Betty. Suddenly you become aware that the play has actually begun. The tension between the noise of the audience and Harriet's quiet rocking more than any words can, suggests the loneliness and latent anger that an older person must feel cut off physically and mentally from society. Hughes, without saying anything, establishes a mood that will underscore the rest of the play.

The set is nothing short of a relief. A realistic basement suite was needed and Roberts' old fridge, well stocked cupboards, landlord-green walls, torn lacy couch and ancient furnace gave the play precisely that feeling.

Back to Beulah was not perfect. If it wasn't for the effective combination of director, acting and setting such dramaturgical weaknesses as the limited development of the historical basis of the animosity of Dr. Anders and the three women could have been more destructive to the play's unity. However, after being entertained spiritually and emotionally so completely, they hardly seem worth bothering about.

If Horatio Alger wrote about ex-Rochdale folk star...

Last Friday three hundred people went to Innis Hall to hear Stringband play their own brand of country pop-folk music. Stringband is a Toronto band which is making waves outside the mainstream of the music business.

In these days of hype in the music industry, when The Varsity can refuse to review the Patti Smith album because we didn't get our ounce of dope from Clive Davis, it is somewhat refreshing to interview someone as down to earth as Bob Bossin who is both a realist and, in some measure, a success as a musician, songwriter and performer. Bossin teams up with Marie Lynn Hammond and Terry King to produce the distinctive Stringband progressive folk sound.

For all their low-key, paced approach, Stringband is making headway in the often treacherous music industry. Their first album has sold 6,000 copies and their most recent album is selling well at 5,000 copies. Perhaps the most surprising aspect of these good sales is that Stringband does not deal with a record company. Bob Bossin, who does most of the business dealings for the band, shied away from record companies with the first album Canadian Sunset, because of the long lead time between producing the album and its appearance in the stores. In addition Bossin was repelled by the commercialism inherent in promoting popular music. So the band sold copies themselves between sets at their performances and a few Toronto record stores carried their albums. In the meantime Stringband has been doing the coffee house circuit and has appeared on numerous television shows. As sales of the first album were surprisingly good, the band decided to take a stab at getting a record company to handle their second album. They even hoped to call a few shots—limit the price of the record to close to five dollars, and get a better deal on the writers' fees.

None of the record companies would bite. All of them said that the material was "too Canadian" and "too unconventional to have a chance at the 'World Market'", meaning the American market. So Stringband went ahead on their own again. This time they got Treble Clef distributors to handle the record stores, but they still sell albums between sets.

Given their continued success, it seems strange that no record company was willing to risk carrying their second album. Bossin seems to understand—he claims that Stringband has a rapport with their public, but that the "middlemen" of the hype machine are more conservative than the public. In many ways, Stringband is the classic success story—a shining example of laissez-faire capitalism at work. Indeed, Bossin spent three years in Rochdale college, the last stronghold of unregulated entrepreneurial freedom, where rags to riches dope dealing stores abound. Somehow, though, Bossin and the band don't quite fit the image. To begin with, Bossin sees no reason for artists to grow rich. "It's nice," he says, "but the artist is just a worker. There's no reason he should get more than a worker does."

Furthermore the band debates at length how much to charge for concerts; they try to stay in between underpaying themselves and overcharging their audiences. Bossin talked about his qualms at the Riverboat's price of $3.75 a ticket. "We worried about it the first time," he says, but when he saw that they were attracting a different audience than their university appearances he was happier. "Nobody has to pay to see us. Besides there are $2 student tickets at SAC." Next week Stringband will be playing the Riverboat. Cheaper tickets are available at SAC (advance tickets only). It will be a good chance to catch these down to earth people playing their own down to earth music. Adolphus Delphinus

Sackbuts, dusty manuscripts are Consort's raw material

Interviewing Tim McGee, director of the Toronto Consort was a pleasure, because of his obvious enthusiasm about his work and because of the fascinating nature of the esoteric world of medieval and renaissance music.

The Consort materialized in 1972 through McGee, David Klausner, and Gary Crighton. Initially, they provided music for Pocoli Ludique Societas, the drama group on campus which presents Tudor and medieval plays. Eventually, David Walker, tenor, and Katherine Pimenoff, soprano joined the group and they were underway.

Performing music of a period which is relatively unfamiliar to general audiences has been a challenge. McGee, a professor of musicology at the Faculty of Music, enjoys being able to share his insights with audiences, and consequently, Consort concerts (!) are often informal with the musicians explaining the origins of their instruments or, as in their last Hart House concert, dressing up in outrageous period costumes, something which inevitably makes the music more accessible to the 20th century listener. One realizes that actual PEOPLE made that music.

The Consort's repertoire ranges from the twelfth century to the late sixteenth century, and each of their programmes tends to focus around the music of a particular composer, school of style etc. Much of the music performed has to be obtained from the original manuscripts which are tracked down in dusty European libraries. McGee, himself professor of a course dealing with problems in the performance of early music, will soon be publishing a first-ever edition of 96 Florentine Carnival Songs.

Likewise, the blueprints for the making of medieval instruments are found in Europe, as well as the actual instruments, the largest collections of which are to be found in Brussels and at the British Museum in London. The Consort is also the nucleus for a summer workshop held in July at Scarborough College. There, under the guidance of specialists, you can learn how to make lutes or sackbuts, learn how to play them . . . McGee makes all the instruments he plays and most members of the Consort can play most of the instruments they use. Pretty versatile lot.

Having already recorded one record with the CBC (Music for Early Instruments), the Consort plans to release another one in May — a smorgasbord of musical periods and styles. Other plans include a tour of the East Coast in late April, and a crowning summer tour of three weeks in Italy. Closer to home, their next concert is on April 21st — English Music of the Middle Ages and Renaissance. I'd go.

Suave super sleuth delicious dazzler, despite American cast's vulgar moves

Last month Toronto was graced with repeated visits from that most beloved of all super sleuths, Sherlock Holmes. His most recent sojourn was amidst the Royal Shakespeare Company's production of Sherlock Holmes at the O'Keefe Centre (now relocated to Hamilton Place). However, this piece was not so much a play about Holmes as it was a melodramatic vehicle for its author and original star (who developed the play in collaboration with Conan Doyle) William Gillette.

From early childhood Gillette developed an interest in acting and the theatre that sustained him through his long and distinguished life. A product of Yale, Harvard and Massachusetts Institute of Fine Arts, Gillette was dignified and cultured in his own person, and for most of his stage life portrayed similar characters. In general, he played in parts specially written for him. None was more deliberately crafted to fit him than Sherlock Holmes.

Although this background is not necessarily known to modern theatre-goers, the play remains a vehicle for a strong lead actor. This revival is thus very fortunate to have as Holmes Robert Stephans, who capably fills Gillette's role. Stephans was at all times deliciously Fey and performed every melodramatic move with sophisticated perfection. His very heady creation even allowed one to forget the majority of unfortunate attempts by the American supporting cast, especially the unsuitably vulgar mannerisms of Allan Sues as Dr. Moriarty, "the Napoleon of crime".

Moreover, Carl Toms's Tony-award-winning sets have now begun to look tired and chipped after three years' wear. The thrilling effect overall is still retained, and the picturesque costumes (in particular Holmes' multicoloured satin dressing-gown) were warmly welcomed. This production goes a long way to establish the contemporary significance of Vincent Starrett's statement (in The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes) that we still live "in a romantic chamber of our hearts in a nostalgic country of the mind where it is always 1895".

Blahs devastated by musical gnome

You can analyse the individual or collective skills of Gilbert and Sullivan on the most elevated dramatic and musical planes, and they will still be found worthy artists. England had produced no music of its own of comparable quality for over a century before these men pooled their talents, and the drought continued for decades after they were gone.

But the important thing to bear in mind when dealing with the operettas — or the selections from them now being performed by Tom Kneebone and Peggy Feltham at the Theatre-in-the-

Dell — is that these musical melanges are brilliant, comic, lyrical, and completely joyous entertainment. Whether or not you take the music seriously, it is still by several miles some of the best musical theatre one can find.

Gilbert and Sullivan Tonight makes good use of its personnel. Tom Kneebone, a devilish gnome, performs a delightful Titwillow and is a devastatingly comic Lord High Executioner.

Michael Fletcher shows great vocal strength in the Soprano Song and Kathleen Payne, although her voice is very weak, manages to maintain a pleasant countenance. Even Kate Reid appears as the voice of Queen Victoria, exercising her usual aplomb. The choreography and direction (by Angela Leigh) were lithe. Gilbert and Sullivan Tonight is in this day and age a bit of history, satiric still, but with added musical sugar to make the pill of social comment slide down. This sturdy performance might well be the perfect cure for the February Blues.

Tennstedt's originality, skill, bring out the best in TSO

The Toronto Symphony was in fine form again Wednesday, Jan. 14, in a program of music by Brahms, Mozart and Schubert, under the baton of the German guest conductor Klaus Tennstedt. The featured soloist was the distinguished French flautist Jean-Pierre Rampal. Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, with its rollicking student tunes, never fails to get a concert off to a good start. Tennstedt led the orchestra through its paces in such a way as to make this popular favourite seem like almost a new work. How I could in repeated past hearings have missed so much is hard to believe. Suffice it to say that the TSO gave us an earful, and thrilled the capacity audience so much that some enthusiastic music lovers just off the boat from who knows where began to applaud even before the piece was over!

Rampal took his position next for a beautifully poised performance of Mozart's Flute Concerto No. 1, K. 313. The cadenzas which he supplied were an example not only of his effortless virtuosity, but also of his perfect understanding of what constitutes taste and sensitivity in musical interpretation. Complementing the soloist's consummate artistry was the fine backup given by the orchestra. Schubert's Symphony No. 9 (The Great) concluded the evening, in a reading that was in itself truly great. From the powerful horn solo which opens the work to the end, Maestro Tennstedt was in perfect control of his orchestral forces. His interpretation seemed to be completely personal and original, yet always natural, highlighting phrases and passages of orchestral colour which had eluded me for years. He favoured a quicker tempo for the second movement (Andante con moto) than is usually taken, thereby enhancing, I think, its march-like quality. I regretted the absence of some of the deliberateness and lyrical poignancy that I am used to, but I very much welcomed the added motion of the piece. The last movement, a whirling tour-de-force, was likewise full of surprises. True to the composer's intentions as indicated in the score, Tennstedt ordered a considerable decrescendo on that last, long chord of doubled C's, though some conductors prefer to blast listeners out of their seats with it. The audience went wild, and rightly so. Klaus Tennstedt is one conductor I look forward to hearing again.

Rough-edged yodeller Essig spans country, bluegrass, folk, blues

Somewhere in the vicinity of Algonquin Park there is a small place tucked back in the woods which serves as the base for one of Canada's most unlikely record moguls. Perhaps mogul is not quite the right word; in and coming conglomerate might be a bit closer to the truth, but at any rate, David Essig's Woodshed records project has its spiritual home up there. Somehow, listening to Essig on Tuesday at the Riverboat, the sense of Algonquin Park, or more, the sense of open country was the guiding force behind his music.

In some ways, the Riverboat is an unusual club. When it's full, the sense of excitement and intimacy makes it probably the best "concert" club in Toronto.

When the crowds arrive dressed as empty seats, as was the case Tuesday, one of two things generally happen; either the Riverboat becomes a bit intimidating and self-conscious, causing an uninspired performance by the artist, or, as it was Tuesday, it becomes the performer's living room, and the natural intimacy of the club becomes even more so. Much of this has to do with the performer, and Dave Essig's easy manner and vast catalogue of musical knowledge soon had the club effectively turned into a front porch gathering.

Essig's repertoire encompasses most of what is called American folk music. This includes bluegrass tunes, cowboy songs, country-blues, delta blues, and virtually anything else that the traditional musician might play. Dave's voice is well suited to the material; it's rough-edged and yodelly, not the voice for doing sensitive love ballads, but a great voice for the traditional tunes.

One of Dave's strongest suits has always been his instrumental work, and this is still the case. His guitar playing styles vary from the bottleneck of the Mississippi Delta to the super-rhythmic twelve string picking reminiscent of Leo Kottke or Fred Gerlach, to the bouncy bluegrass flatpicking of the Ozark Mountains. Unfortunately, Essig didn't play his mandolin, the instrument upon which he is an acknowledged master.

In short, if traditional country and blues music is your cup of tea, you will probably enjoy Dave Essig. He's at the Riverboat until Sunday.

Cosmo deals with questions in perception theory, such as: does a Cosmo girl still exist when no one's looking at her?

Cosmo offers women the freedom to be a fantasy-object (and a good consumer too)

My favourite cure for the winter blues has always been the same. Make a pot full of peppermint tea. Buy a box of chocolates — the kind with the soft, gooey centre. And sit in a big, comfortable chair with the January issue of Cosmopolitan magazine to keep me company.

Cosmopolitan makes life seem so easy. If I wore one of those clingy dresses, if I put a dab of Tigris perfume behind my ears, and if I wore my hair in the proper "free but pulled-together" style, then life would have no problems for me. As they say on one of the fashion pages, "January bliahs can't keep a girl like you down".

If only I could learn to be "deliciously naughty", then the Clark Gables of the world would be beating a path to my door. Of course, Clark Gable has been replaced in the Cosmo girl's cosmology by James ("Machismo for fun and profit") Caan, and unlike Claudette Colbert, the Cosmo girl no longer teases the need to divide the room with a sheet to keep the newest Clark Gable at a properly chaste distance. But while the Cosmo girl is now allowed to sleep with someone, she still spares a sigh for the good old days when men, presumably, were men. Sex still improves when it has been "mystified". In an article entitled Love in the afternoon Florence King writes:

"The air is electric between you, taut of the crackly zing of sensual awareness, and suddenly you find that you can't finish that beautiful steak, even if it did cost ten dollars. Suddenly you both know... The first time you "go home" for lunch" really ought to be the result of such a spur of the moment inspiration... To launch an affair of matinees you need that glamorous feeling of having been swept away and he needs to know that he was irresistible enough to do the sweeping."

It's all right to sleep with someone, but not to look as if you had planned all along. (This is the old "I didn't know what I was doing; I just got carried away with passion" tactic). If your mind doesn't know what your body is doing, you cannot be held responsible. Thus Cosmo girls are given the following advice: "Make the bed before you leave for work in the morning. A messy bed is like a messy woman; neither is inviting. If you leave it unmade because you know you're going to get back into it at noon, a man might think that you have too casual an attitude toward sex."

A special bonus in the January issue is The Cosmo Girl's 1978 Bedside Astrologer. This booklet is filled with useful advice such as which your romantic days are (better watch carefully for these — there are only three per year), your most successful "seduction strategy", and even your favourite perfume and record. It doesn't matter if you don't like Lou Reed. If Cosmopolitan says that all Cancers like Lou Reed, then you just have to start liking him.

The most interesting reading in this booklet is the description of each sign's hidden desire. Mine remains relatively tame. I apparently like "to be put on a pedestal by that special man, having him swoon at your every entrance". I wish that I could claim to be a Gemini who secretly wants to "send him a pornographic letter written in delicate script on lemon-scented tissue-thin stationery". And how I envy Sagittarius who wants to "be made love to while astride a magnificent black stallion, back to front and front to back, in a moonlit forest".

The entire world of the Cosmo girl revolves around her relationship with "her man". No question here of any female friends — they might be lesbians, or they might want to steal that fabulous man. Even the glamorous job that every self-respecting Cosmo girl has exists only as an avenue to meet exciting executives, to go for romantic candlelit dinners after a hard day in the office, or to jet off with "the boss" to exotic paradise settings.

The novels that the Cosmo girl reads, the clothes she wears, the records she listens to, all exist solely to make her a well-olled, sleek automaton who can please her man. The woman's body is exalted only insofar as a man can gain pleasure by looking at it. As soon as there is no man to admire the style of the surface, it seems, the Cosmo girl will fall apart, or even worse, completely disappear.

Picture this: The woman is dressed in "a torchy jumpsuit with that down-to-there neckline, backless back so right with a velvety tan". She is in some exotic setting — St. Thomas, Antigua — the setting is actually not important, so long as postcards will impress the folks back home and the editors of the Cosmopolitan fashion pages. Her hair is "dazzling". The man beside her has even white teeth, a dark tan, and he looks remarkably like Johnny Carson. Suddenly the man leaves. He is no longer looking at the Cosmo girl; his pleasure is momentarily unattended to.

And what happens then? Our Cosmo girl has lost her scenario. She turns into a lumpy, mixed-up, non-exotic, non-sensational female. She becomes human again.

Everything in Cosmopolitan is reduced to the lowest common denominator — how to make yourself attractive enough to catch a man. It is not that important to hold a man, as witness the many articles in each issue on divorce, but it is important to be able to attract and dazzle. Philosophy, religion, world issues, all are seen only in terms of their relationship to sexual attractiveness. In an article on fasting, the author mentions meeting a staff member at the Moscow Psychiatric Institute, who had been on a fast for 25 days. The author assures us that this man never looked better in his life, and goes on to assure his readers that no, they will not get bags under their eyes if they go on a fast, and their sex drive may actually increase. Any political or moral implications that the Russian's fast-hunger strike may have are completely ignored.

The perpetrator of this mythical super-girl image is Patti's father and Citizen Kane's son, none other than Randolph A. Hearst. And the editor who is responsible for that breathless prose style that jumps off the page at the reader is Helen Gurley Brown. No one but Helen Gurley Brown can make a simple sentence look as if it has been written entirely in italics. She first gained fame with her book Sex and the Single Girl, and we have her to thank for almost single-handedly creating the mystique of swinging singles. The one fact that is repeatedly impressed upon us in the pages of Cosmopolitan is that this mythical Cosmo girl does in fact exist somewhere. The Cosmo girl is real. She walks and talks and breathes. At least, so Cosmopolitan magazine tells us. As much as I enjoy sitting in my comfortable chair and reading the magazine, I don't think that I ever want to meet this Cosmopolitan girl. If she actually does exist, she would be the most frightening non-person in the world. The life-style of Cosmopolitan magazine may be tempting briefly, but the thought of actually being a mindless Cosmopolitan girl, with all of the implications, is enough to make me send out a subscription to Ms. magazine.

Charlie's face is pure, gel-cleansed, more interesting. Because Charlie's face gear has less additives, less glop, more colors, more fresh new ideas than anybody's.

A glowy, satin-smooth complexion doesn't have to be born, you know—it can be made (by you!). All it takes is finding out what's good for skin. . . . and then doing it. To get you started, here's a list of top-priority helpers. (One not on the list, but a very basic skin-bloomer, is—yes!—fulfilling sex.)

Everything's dermatologist-tested, irritant-free, ph-balanced. Absolute genius. All in all, the greatest stuff you'll ever have to work with to give your face personality.

3. The Single Man. Peter is about your own age. He pays $250-a-month rent and has a fine collection of stereo tapes. He plays tennis and backgammon and you suspect he spends more than he earns. He also talks a lot about independence and is in favor of Women's Lib. But most important, he smells great.

Even seasoned Cosmopolitan readers often have difficulty telling the difference between editorial copy and advertising copy. Try your luck with the excerpts printed above, and win a dream job working in an office at the T-D Centre, where you can meet dreamy executives who play backgammon and smell great.

Punk-funk revisionism scored by discophobe

Soul moves on (with a few clear exceptions)

If there's one thing that the current disco and punk-funk revisionism can't obscure, it's the fact that good, solid, innovative soul music is alive and well and under the leadership of some talented people.

Disco is a curious craze. Sure, you can dance to it, but why subject yourself to the mundane melodies and amateurish over-production that have hit the airwaves? Disco came from soul music; it stole the rhythms, the arranging and production ideas and immediately headed for the lowest common denominator. The result is porridge, not music.

So discos must go to those who are forging ahead despite the bad name it is being given to soul music. Two of the best records of 1975 and one of the worst of 1976 are in this category. As usual, women are leading the way.

Aretha Franklin's latest is good man, lost some weight and kicked the booze habit that nearly killed her career after her marriage to Ted White crumbled four years ago.

Two of them are unabashed syrupy love songs, but nothing Aretha does comes out that way in the finished product. Her singing would make opera fans stand up and listen and her tone and tonality are perfect. If you're tired of the dull five-ton scales of most popular singers, listen to the twists she takes around chords and the compression and amplification of notes that most singers would be afraid to touch. The voice is crystal clear with no affectation.

The second side doesn't quite stand up to the first. The opening cut is the single "Mr. D.J." which was a bad choice on Atlantic's part, but forgivable because their primary job is to sell this album. Aretha's albums never do sell all that well, even though her two-year-old "Let Me In Your Life" was on a number of Ten best lists for 1974.

of the overblown soul music (for hooters that is) we hear daily on the charts. Aretha is the queen.

If Aretha's the queen, surely Chaka Khan is leading the insurgency forces. She and her band, Rufus, are bar none the most hard-charging funk-peddlers to rise out of obscurity in the past two years.

Comparisons with Aretha Franklin are difficult and even unfair. Where Aretha croons, Chaka howls; where Aretha nips a note, Chaka sinks her whole set of pearly whites in and pulls it apart. She is a phenomenon.

The band came out of obscurity with the single "Once You Get Started" which had my upraised hand as the best soul single of last year. The album it came from gave soul a badly needed shot in the arm. Instead of funky bass lines and tuneless vocal meanderings we got real honest-to-god songs with instrumental expertise almost unparalleled in the field.

The band just gets better all the time. The latest album is called, oddly enough "Rufus" and contains some shall we say "provocative" pictures of Chaka in skins and leathers for all you fetishists.

The collection of tunes inside the pictures is outstanding, marred only by two complete turkeys, one of which is a totally unnecessary remake of the Bee Gees' "Jive Talkin'".

The band has a very distinctive approach to the idiom. They write excellent songs, musically and lyrically complex enough to rank with any "art music," but never lose sight of the prime goal of providing good dancing and listening.

"Fool's Paradise," "Have a Good Time," and "Ooh, I Like Your Loving" start off the album with a blast akin to Amitchika. They have it down pat. Proper cadences, good dynamics and intelligent use of the staple electric instruments indicate a thorough knowledge of all the possibilities of their brand of music.

Chaka Khan herself is mystifying. All the singers I know listen, shake their heads and ask "How does she do it?" She's never satisfied leaving a note where it is, she pulls away from it if it lasts too long and throws on these tails of notes that can take her as far away as an octave within two beats. She has a bizarre sense of what notes will fit into the chord changes below but she's rarely wrong. Like Aretha, she's never satisfied with just singing the song the way it was written. Each verse is a new number, she attacks it differently, comes down from above where you expected her to rise to the note. You forget that you're listening to the same number she started a minute earlier.

That is certainly the most remarkable thing about the band. Instead of monotony, we have actual progression, restatement of theme, variation, just like they taught you in music appreciation class. The songs move from start to finish without once leaving the impression that you've heard something twice.

So this band has two excellent albums and a totally distinctive sound to their credit. Above all, they have the most dynamic new singer in America at the head.

If the entire population of China put this album on at the same time, San Francisco would fall into the sea and the Mississippi would change course.

Amazing the things that come in the mail. The third recent offering in the female vocal category comes from Betty Davis, entitled Nasty Gal.

Well, nasty she is, a singer she ain't. As a matter of fact, neither is she much of a composer or lyricist. But, I repeat, she is nasty.

She has a penchant for unmelodic, growly singing that sends out the most unsubtle slightly twisted sexuality ever preserved on wax. She screeches, groans, moans, pants, and I turn the volume down, yawn and proceed to my second perusal of Reader's Digest for relief.

The songs go nowhere, her singing goes nowhere, and the entire album never quite made if to the startling line. The band, however, is one of the lightest combinations that has ever wrapped itself around one chord. In order to get down to the hard-core chunka-chunka they decided to eliminate the unnecessary constituents, including any semblance of musical progression.

There are four numbers on this album that are identical, lck for lck, with only minor variances in the vocal lnuendo. Each comes complete with a news set of deviant lyrics, but don't be fooled. The band certainly wasn't, and I'm sure they left the studio with half-concealed smiles at what they'd pulled off.

There are only mild surprises. One number, the title of which escapes me, is actually a tender, well-played well-produced love song. Only in this song does she attempt to actually sing, and only then is it crystal-clear that she can't.

But that shouldn't deter you. If you like aimless but easy-dancing funk, this is your number. If you like the musical version of whips and leather, it's right up your alley. As a matter of fact, meet me in some dark alley and I'll give it to you. My mom told me to watch out for girls like Betty Davis.

Paul McGrath

Up-and-comer Chaka Kahn knows now to rip a note to shreds tastefully just a touch short of spectacular. Some aficionados argue that she hasn't been the same since 1970, but these are the same folks who will pull out old Wilson Pickett and Marvin Gaye chestnuts at the drop of a party hat.

The album is titled You and if you start on side one you'll be knocked out. The side starts with an infectious ditty called "Without You" which will make you wonder what happened to your feet after that steady diet of Van McCoy. The band is closing to perfection and the surprise is that it is comprised of a completely different set of backup men than that of her previous three recordings. The original band had all the Atlantic session men in it, Richard Tee, Bernard Purdie and Willie Weeks, but the new group contains virtual unknowns. But they're all masters of the idiom and their instruments.

The first side moves along into two more quick tunes impeccably recorded and a couple of slow ones that illustrate just how far Aretha has progressed and how much better she feels since she found a

Opposed to the first, the second side tends towards the middle of the rhythmeter, but this is where the band is at its most subtle and the textures are the most refined. They move effortlessly and never once do you get the feeling you're being hit over the head. "Now That I've Cried My Love To Sleep" stands out as an extraordinarily haunting song.

Outside of Aretha's voice, most of the credit goes to Atlantic's veteran producer, wonder-man Arit Mardln. This is the man who has done more for soul music in the last ten years than any other. As well as being the guiding light of Atlantic's arranging and producing team of Mardin, Jerry Wexler and Tom Dowd, he has shown the light to incredible numbers of musicians in that field, including blue-eyed soul folk such as the Average White Band, the Rascals, and even Laura Nyro (although she's heavy on the blue eyes and light on the soul).

All in all, the album is a relief after the slight disappointment of her last album. Everything on it is recorded beautifully and the musical calibre is outstanding, head and shoulders above most

You'll have to get your kicks looking at the cover of Betty Davis' disc, because there aren't many inside

Manic arpeggios, chaotic classics inflame even die-hard rock fan

Since I was old enough to glue an ear to a radio I have been a cyed-in-the-wool Rock fan. I have never really consciously accepted any other form of music. Lately, however, disturbing things have been happening: late at night I find myself turning on a strings recital on the CBC or humming Mozart quietly to myself. I keep saying to myself, "It will pass . . ." It hasn't.

Saturday the 24th of January found me taking in a concert put on by the Chamber Players of Toronto, under the direction of Victor Martin. What was even more horrifying than this however was the fact that I found myself really enjoying it: "Classical Music" (whatever that is . . .).

The program was a nicely balanced one with works varying in age from the early 1700's to the now delunct year of 1975. Pergollesi's "concerto number one" (a singularly moving title) which opened the program (after the appropriate pause for the traditional tuning up on stage and fits of coughing and wheezing from the audience) is an incredibly intense piece of music with highs and lows that could only have come from a manic depressive or a junkie.

Very nice. This was followed by Boffesini's "Gran Duo for Violin, Bass and Orchestra" which struck this reviewer as a refined "Duelling Banjos". As the program notes: "If you have never heard a Double Bass and Violin soaring together in the sonic stratosphere in the most passionate of outbursts, or madly cavorting together on double stops and rippling arpeggios, then you have missed something." All that aside, riffs like that on acoustic instruments are something rare. By the end of the piece Victor Martin on violin and Joel Quarrington on bass had earned the standing ovation they received. Both displayed the type of dexterity I never dreamed possible in a tuxedo.

The highlight of the evening was the premiere performance of Murray Adaskin's "In Praise of Canadian Painting in the Thirties" commissioned by the Chamber Players in 1975. The work is divided in three parts, which are named after, respectively, Paraskeva Clark, Louis Muhlstock and Charles Comfort, all of whom were artists painting in (you guessed it!) the Thirties. The composition is a curious blend of spatial string passages and ragged chaotic harpsichord passages leading to no ultimate resolution. This struck me as a fairly accurate picture of Canadian Painting in the "Dirty" thirties. It was more coolly received than I thought it deserved. I guess nobody knows what to do with a new piece of music: "Don't clap too loudly kid it might not be a classic . . ." Everyone more or less settled down as the Chamber Players whipped out everybody's favourite standby, Tchaikovsky, secure in the knowledge that, good or bad, it was a classic and no amount of applause would be the slightest bit inappropriate. Quite nice.

John Martin

Strings delight with rhythmic wit though tuning less successful

Saturday evening, Jan. 24th at Massey Hall, Isaac Stern and Pinchas Zukerman delighted an audience with four pieces for two violins and one for violin and viola.

The program opened with a Sonata by Leclair. This was, in certain respects, the nicest offering of the evening. Balance of tone was well maintained from the first bar in a performance of sheer rhythmic joy.

With the second piece, the Sonata in C, op. 56 by Prokofiev, we were launched into the real "meal" of the first half. The composition itself ranks in the highest order of the composer's output and draws on an intellectual side of the listener's perceptions. The performance, emotional and dramatic, was brought off (notably in the gymnastics of the Final movement) very near to perfection.

Third on the program were two Caprices by the Polish violinist-composer, Weiniawski, amusing miniatures with those slightly demonic overtones of late Romantic style (cum Liszt, Paganini . . .), played with great wit by the duettists. They were less successful with the second half of the program.

Returning after the intermission with the Duo No. 1 for violin and viola by Mozart, their performance did not go as well as expected. The opening movement sounded less than prepared, amid problems with pitch and tuning. Indeed, this seemed apparent throughout most of the second half. The exception was the slow movement of the Mozart, during which Stern's silver tone was well set off by the amber qualities in Zukerman's viola playing.

The final piece on the program was a Violin Duo by Spohr. It is a rather pretentious sounding piece at best, and the performance was not especially memorable. But still, it was not at all an unsatisfying evening, and the accomplished pair sent people home in high spirits with two polished encores, a Mozart Adagio, and another piece by Leclair.

WHY LIVE A LIFE WITHOUT MEANING?

Too many of us are in places we don't want to be. Doing things we really don't want to be doing. Sometimes, it's because we can't think of anything better to do—but that's no way to live.

Since you have only one life to live, you might as well live it with joy . . . with a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment . . . and the knowledge that you are giving, not taking. Why not decide to live for the best . . . for a great purpose . . . for something bigger than you are?

If you want to change the direction of your life, you might investigate the Paulist way of living. The Paulists are a small group of Catholic priests dedicated to preaching the Gospel of Christ to the North American people. For over 100 years the Paulists have done this through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—on college campuses, in parishes, in missions in North America, in downtown centers, in working with young and old. Because we are flexible, we continually pioneer new approaches. To do this we need dedicated, innovative men to carry on our work.

To find out what road God has chosen us to walk is one of the most important tasks of our life.

Which road will be yours?

Losey turns against his own material in a comedy of bourgeois manners

The year 1975 saw the appearance of two Joseph Losey films, one a flawed adaptation of Galileo, a project dear to Losey's heart from his Hollywood days with Brecht, the other The Romantic Englishwoman. The contrast is startling. Galileo is about individual choice and social-historical determinism, a theme that runs through much of Losey's work. Losey, a little like Galileo, has had his struggles with fate, and his films are often marked by a sense of individual struggle towards realization (and indeed by struggle towards 'realisation'). The Romantic Englishwoman is quite different. It's light-hearted, for a start, almost a comedy of domestic manners.

The manners are bourgeois. In a scene near the beginning of the film the host, having piled his uninvited guest with brandy and cigars, says, "So bourgeois life does have its compensations." The guest replies, "What would it be without them?" A nice Stoppard line (he did the screenplay from the novel by Tom Wiseman).

Not just the guest, but the director too seems determined to epater le bourgeois. Losey has called his film a more conventional Charme discret de la bourgeoisie. More conventional: more discreet, less discrete: Losey gets a story out of it.

Michael Caine plays a novelist, Lewis Fielding, whose fantasy about his wife's affair with the stranger practically forces them into each other's arms. Life imitates art, you might think. But Losey never has been interested in that conceit, and he downgrades the artist to a third-rate novelist whose imagination can create only tawdry imitations of tawdry romantic movies. What might have developed as a sinister manipulating figure is instead powerless and rather pathetic. Where then does Losey's interest lie? Partly in making fun of his bourgeois.

And then there are the makings of a fine study of a marriage gone sour, along the lines of Eve or Accident; but Losey is more concerned to attack the emptiness of this house of mirrors. Another theme is the emancipation of Elizabeth Fielding (Glenda Jackson). But she receives from the director as little sympathy as from her husband (she files into a rage at the assertion that "Woman is an occupied country"; while the producer of the film for which he is writing the screenplay dismisses a feminist slant as 'pretentious and derivative — and boring'). As with Losey's version of A Doll's House, woman's attempt to determine her life — a Loseyan-enough theme one would think — is played down in favour of a dispassionate analysis of romantic fantasies. Finally, there is the figure of the outsider that appears in Losey's later films as catalyst of the action. Thomas, the poet-gigolo-dope-smuggler, (suavely played by Helmut Berger), remains free of the seductions of bourgeois life, save for his Yves St Laurent wardrobe: He represents, or represents himself as, the poet, in contradistinction to Fielding, a mere 'imaginer of fictions'. If is an ambiguous contrast, for the poet's literary remains are a couple of half-empty notebooks. Losey's comment on our sterile times?

The main subject is the bourgeois disease of romanticism. The Fieldings' house is filled with mirrors, and both are wrapped up in their dream-worlds, the husband more so. His wife, a realist of sorts, at least propagates plants in her greenhouse, whose walls let the outside in. It is here, incidentally, that the novelist's fantasy is enacted, exposed to the light. But she too is romantic (there's a scene of the two in bed reading, he a paperback War and Peace and the Goon-show scripts, she a glossy hardcover on Byron). It is Elizabeth who carries out the fantasy, who believes in it, and who takes her revenge. According to Thomas, Englishwomen are the most romantic of all: they want everything. It is that is the definition of 'romantic', Glenda Jackson certainly plays up to the title. This femme proves fatale. Still, it is not fate; it's not so much the wheel of fate that turns, but rather the roulette wheel of chance (the film begins in Baden Baden, reaches its climax in Monte Carlo). The poet is destroyed, the bourgeois lives on just the same.

Elizabeth is not romantic in any ordinary sense. Whereas Losey is — he has actually called himself 'a romantic Marxist': is that the same as 'Trotskyite'? — and it is the poet who gets romanticized.

Despite its visual flare and its moments of insight, the film is not one of Losey's best (there are some who would say even his best is not good enough). What is puzzling is how Losey turns on his material, mercilessly dissecting the Englishwoman of the title, ignoring just those things one would expect him to develop.

Harpist Judy Loman gives Toronto audience rare taste of textured, soulful music

When was the last time you heard a really fine harp recital?

Uh . . . okay, I'll make it simpler: when was the last time you heard a harp recital of any kind? Never? Up until last week that answer would not have been unforgivably embarrassing due to numerous factors such as limited demand, limited repertoire, and few performers.

However, the third concert of the Thursday Evening Scholarship series at EJB gave Toronto audiences a glimpse into the esoteric musical world of Judy Loman. If you missed it, your repentance should last for a long time. This internationally known soloist, teacher, and member of the TSO presented a varied and impressive program that satisfied all criteria for a virtuoso recital.

The opening three works, although competently played, served as a kind of warm-up for both the audience and the performer. Handel's "Prelude and Toccata" and Scarlatti's famous G major and D minor sonatas are transcriptions of keyboard works whose chords and runs are exhibited well on the harp. The sound lacked the depth and "soul" that made the remainder of the concert an outstanding event. The real treat of the evening came with a solid core of music that was unmistakably written for the harp. Following an enthusiastic performance of C.P.E. Bach's Sonata for Harp, (one of the basic items in the instrument's repertoire), was the C major Prelude by Prokofiev. This very short work (less than three minutes) was presented with virtuoso control that carefully balanced the rapid, yet delicate accompaniment and the lyrical theme.

The birth of Impressionism was largely responsible for the survival of the modern harp; the instrument enjoyed a sudden popularity as a result of the new pastel and shimmering sensations of Ravel and Debussy. "Sonatine pour Harpe" by Marcel Tournier received a tireless and imaginative presentation as Miss Loman's versatility handled well the moods of this impressionistic work. In opposition to these textures Germaine Tailleferre's three movement Sonate was clear and simplistic in nature. The soloist's graceful and unassuming stage presence eliminated the vacuum that often exists between artist and audience and replaced it with a quiet sonata de camera feeling. The harp, unlike the piano or even the violin, cannot dramatically produce triple forte chords followed by a subito piano; it must employ other effects to involve the listener sensually. In both the Tournier and Tailleferre pieces, the texture of the sound seemed to thicken with each bar as the full range of the instrument was explored until the hall seemed to burst with vibrations.

The token Canadian composition was a work written in 1973 for Miss Loman entitled "Night Space" by John Felice.

Despite the brevity of the piece, the former U of T student seems to suffer from the all too common plight shared by many contemporary composers: namely, too little to say and too much space to say it in. Perhaps banality is an environmental influence that even a current term as professor at New England Conservatory cannot neutralize.

The program closed with "Variations sur un theme dans le style ancien" by Carlos Salzedo, with whom Miss Loman toured and studied for many years. The entire recital was received with enthusiasm by the audience and perhaps with a bit of disappointment as the evening ended sans encore.

"Ramona" experimental but trite convoluted opium nightmare jumbled with decadent vision

I would like very much to be able to say something pleasant about Factory Theatre Lab's production of George F. Walker's Ramona and The White Slaves. Experimentation is the life-blood of dynamic drama and when it comes to jumping into controversial fires and untried experiences, Factory Lab leads the field in the theatrical "guts" category. But when "guts" replaces sensibility and rigorous dramaturgical inspection you get a play like Ramona that you leave saying, "I'm not sure what just happened, and I can't really be bothered figuring it out."

What happens in Ramona and The White Slaves is the sporadic sketching of a vulgar and violent decadence. Ramona has fallen as far from grace as an ex "bride of Christ" can, becoming a prostitute in the Hong Kong of 1919. Whatever moral standards the Catholic church can have claimed to instill in its children have been lost on Ramona and her two convent-girl slaves. Their world is one of people being determined by their use-value, of frequent beatings and killings, and of lying. But this world is still one step above that of the cannibals and seething masses who live somewhere in the streets below their window. Ramona seems to personify the overwhelming force of decadence. It brushes aside the artistic creativity of one of the girls, the naivety and fanciful visions of her sister, the kindness in the gift of legs to Ramona's son, the incorruptible police detective and, of course, people's lives — that is, anything that may get in the way of Ramona's "Godot"-like goals. But even Ramona is not immune from this force because for her, there is the ever present lizard. The ultimate effect of this world is to break down the boundaries of traditional behaviour so that the characters of Ramona, the detective, the "boss" and Ramona's dead husband melt into each other.

That's what seems to happen to the central idea of the play. But what actually happens dramatically is that the many images, rather than weaving in and out in a captivating flow, dribble out in a web of jumbled dialogue and numerous trifle phrases. How often have I heard such gems of precise verbal conclusiveness as "Time passes, and things happen occasionally", or when Ramona refers to her son's piano playing as "unique, but it takes some getting used to". And Walker's summation of the play, mouthed by Ramona and the detective, is "Behaviour isn't what it used to be". It's lucky that Walker allows Ramona and the detective to sum up the play in monologues, otherwise it might have been totally incoherent. It should be a signpost of weak construction when an audience has to be told something rather than shown it. In this case, the effect of being told is to set up a situation in which there is confusion in plot line or intention of images but the blame for not understanding is put on the audience.

The aspect of the play which makes it bearable, if not mildly intriguing, is the complex relationships of the characters to each other as they suck what they can from the post-war Hong Kong world: the contradictory affection and hatred of the sisters; Ramona's determined single-mindedness juxtaposed with her frightened isolation from her past; and the subtle heroism of her son's struggle with his new legs contrasted with the shallow arrogance of the young military officer. But above all, each character demonstrates an uncanny ability to be honest about their individual motivations and weaknesses. At these moments, Walker's insight into human relationships is powerful.

The two Factory Lab plays this year have combined the writer-director function, and I think both set design and acting have suffered from this. This set did not serve to draw out any of the passions or emotions that may have been in the play. The chairs were there to sit on, the bed to lie on, the piano to plunk and lean on and the mirror to look at yourself in. The difference in power that is possible can be seen when you compare this dull set with Miro Kinch's frighteningly simple design for Toronto Free Theatre's Mystery of the Pig Killer's Daughter. What was lost in word abstraction in T.F.T.'s play was

From the beginning, the boundaries of the opium nightmare and the supposed "real" world are convoluted, suggesting that it will be the visible images and their effect rather than plot simplicity or development that will be the focus for the play's impact. However, this should in turn, demand clarity in the purpose of each of the vignettes or a unifying trend or purposeful heaping of one image on the next. Not one of these happens in Ramona and The White Slaves so dramatic tension and excitement are lost.

Paul Gaulin technically faultless but short on inspiration and plot --gags lose bite on sixth exposure

While The Varsity was, indirectly, strike-bound, the U.C. Playhouse presented a mime troupe on two successive nights to a crowded house. Paul Gaulin, a local talent, assisted by Naomi Tyrell and Terry Burke, presented a number of episodes, some with plots, and others without.

Technically the troupe cannot be faulted. However, at times the material itself falls far short of the quality of the mime. Really fine moments of humour were, again and again, spoiled by carrying the gag too far. For instance, the hero of Kid Pipling

no. 1, an excellent portrayal of a Fifties greaseball, goes home to practice his piano backwards; a rejected young man considers suicide, only to have his intention thwarted by the sound of the Leafs on the radio. (Canadian content?)

The scenarios were announced by a clothesline. The first time it did its job nicely but then refused to function properly. Time and again Burke would come out and threaten it until resumption in service was obtained. Amusing, yes, but after the sixth time a little much. It's unfortunate something better could not have been invented as filler.

At times the plots seemed to be too obscure for the audience to follow. It is certainly difficult to hit the median between a good plot and one that can be presented easily and clearly. Sometimes the Gaulin troupe had this balance; other times they didn't. Gaulin himself is talented, but needs more inspiration and maturity before he will become first-rate. He is in town again in a few years from now, pick him up:

Ionesco now staple of academic marketplace

Menagerie Theatre embellishes the absurd with comic verve

'Collapse of reality,' he said. 'The word as shell, hollow, an echo-chamber.'

Probably at some time we've heard someone say something about the 'Theatre of the Absurd.' Yet, it suddenly occurs to you, what has it actually all meant?

The Menagerie Theatre Company's production of Ionesco's The Lesson and The Bald Soprano not only provides a good clue as to what it's all meant but manages to find us still exasperated and intrigued. Since The Bald Soprano's first appearance twenty years ago, Ionesco has been enfranchised in the academic marketplace and his avant-garde status is somewhat compromised. Moreover, the non-sequitur dialogues, the arbitrary gestures, and the abrupt shifts in scene tone (the stock-in-trade of Ionesco, as of all dramatists of the Absurd), have become little more than dramatic commonplaces over the years.

Yet, despite our sophistication, it would be hard not to be surprised by the supple comic appeal of these two one-act plays. In each play, Ionesco transforms a basic comic situation into an emblem of the Absurd. The Lesson examines a wizened professor's attempt to instill in his pupil an appreciation for the fundamentals of language and mathematics. The student, however, is pre-occupied with a toothache. The Bald Soprano takes a prolonged look at a tedious get-together between two suburban couples.

The Professor (Bob Dunham) confronts academicians' demons: rising prices at the faculty club as well as collapsing reality

Milton Branton's production of The Lesson has a hushed suspense that nicely captures the mounting absurdist resonances beneath the dark comic surface of the play.

The 'collapse of reality' that has taken place in the world of The Bald Soprano is depicted in David Beard's production with the comic aplomb for which Keaton was famous. Each actor brilliantly projects the stone-faced stoic attitude of one floundering through an after-dinner party, urged on by the unfathomable compulsion of the conversational bromide.

In both productions, the sense of the Absurd was embellished with true comic verve. While the question of precise meaning may be temporarily left up for grabs, one comes away from these plays certain of the rewards of the theatre experience.

Le nouveau Varg bilingue presente:

Ubu Roi -- une danse des bouffons

Vendredi et samedi de la semaine passee, le Theatre de Kerckhove a presente la comedie en cinq actes d'Alfred Jarry qui s'appelle Ubu Roi. C'etait curieux, pour dire le moins, de voir la reaction des spectateurs modernes a une piece qui a cree un scandale incroyable au Theatre de L'Oeuvre en 1896 et qui a amu le poete W.B. Yeats a dire que c'etait le debut de l'epoque du "Dieu Sauvage". Avec son manque de respect complet pour les traditions du theatre de la fin du siecle, c'est-a-dire les procedes du naturalism, Jarry est devenue inconsciemment un precurseur aux traditions du Theatre de l'Absurde. Ironiquement, nous sommes tout a fait accoutumes a ce genre en 1976 apres avoir vu des pieces de Beckett, Argabal, Ionesco et d'autres, et les essais de Jarry dan Ubu Roi doivent nous sembler plutot naifs que revolutionnaires. Alors, la semaine passee, on etait capable d'apprécier les elements de farce mais non pas les aspects d'une comedie plus noire. C'est dommage, mais a la fois je me demande si personne pourrait l'accomplir d'une facon plus satisfaisante aujourd'hui. Au centre d'Ubu Roi est la revolution ou le Pere Ubu devient le Roi de Pologne et durant son regne nous sommes les femoins d'un systeme de justice, d'impots, de gouvernement en effet, qui defini la vision grotesque de l'humanite que Jarry voulait metre sur la scene. Jarry desirait que le grand public soit plus conscient de son autre personnalite, son autre "soi". Il y a une grande fragmentation de l'intrigue, et dans chaque episode ce qui reste evident c'est qu'il y a un egoisme, une bassesse de l'instinct qui devient la tyrannie, une stupidite, une conditie eternelle, qui sont communs a tous les personnages. De plus, ses qualites sont a eux pour tout le temps dan le contexte de la piece. C'est l'humour mais c'est une humour sinistre. Par exemple, toute la noblesse est condammee a la mort par le roi Ubu. La raison? "Rien" est un assez bon pretexte pour faire tout dans le monde de Jarry. Malheureusement, comme je viens de dire, c'etait difficile a voir ce cote noir dans la presentation des etudiants du college de St. Michel. S'il y avait une faiblesse dans cette presentation elle se trouvait la. Ubu Roi est une danse des bouffons, mais cette danse se passe dans un monde afreux; la burlesque est la-dedans mais ce n'est pas la totalite de la signification de la piece. Alors, ou est cette qualite burlesque? Les acteurs et le directeur, Barbara Santa Maria, l'ont trouvee dans les action, les situations, et les paroles. Il est dans cet aspect de leur presentation que les etudiants ont vralment saisi l'imagination de leurs spectateurs. Imaginez Tony Martino qui jouait Ubu, un homme a une tete et un ventre gonfle, se promenant comme une marionette tout en disant "Merdre" our "De par ma chandelle verte"! Les spectateurs avaient l'experience de voir l'armee de Pologne qui etait composee de vint ou trente soldats de papier dans une toute petite charrette rouge. De plus, ils voyaient enfin des hommes tues par des mots: "Boum Boum!" De cette facon, il faut le dire, la presentation etait de plus ou moins fidèle a la perspective de Jarry lui-meme. Il voulait voir un theatre de marionettes ou les changements de l'action serait accomplis seulement en utilisant des placards. La semaine passee, les acteurs n'ont pas porte des masques mais leurs visages etaient tout couverts de maquillage. Luba Mycak comme Mere Ubu etait admirable dans son role et son cri agacant "Oooh! Pere Ubu" restera a jamais dans ma memoire. Et qu'est-ce qu'on peut dire de Ugo Centofanti qui jouait le Capitaine Bordure, un homme courageux a un esprit lache, sauf, "Felicitations". Tout le monde jouait une diversite de roles avec une dextérité meritoire. Pour souligner des moments amusants et les changements de l'action on n'a utilise que les lumieres et des morceaux de musique bien choisis pour leur valeur burlesque.

Alors, en fin de compte, la presentation devrait etre considerée comme succes. Il y avait des faiblesses bien sur, (par exemple la prononciation de frnçais etait forcee et assez difficile a comprendre), mais il y en a toujours dan n'importe quel essai amateur. Moi, je prefere de louer les puissances que de critiquer seulement; leur energie et leur imagination etaient evidentes du commencement a la fin; ils aimaient ce qu'ils faisaient; les spectateurs s'amusaient du spectacle. Ubu Roi reste une piece difficile a presenter, mais l'offre ses compliments aux etudiants de St. Michel pour une soiree du theatre, et interessante et divertissante.

This weekend the Sam Noto Quartet will be appearing at the Mother Necessity Jazz Workshop (14 Queen St. E.). Monday and Tuesday, Kenny Wheeler, an excellent trumpet player who has recently been working with Anthony Braxton, will be at the Workshop with Art Eifelson. Wednesday — the Terry King Quartet (King on violin); Thursday through Saturday — Ed Bickert (guitar) with his quartet. And every Sunday night the Mother Necessity Big Band gigs with Ted Moses, 8-12 pm.

The Stage Door 212 (212 Dundas St. E.) will be presenting clarinetist Buddy de Franco with his quintet through Feb. 7. Next week, the Jerry Mulligan sextet (Mulligan on baritone sax) through the 14th. Though it's not quite definite yet, Charlie Mingus will probably be at the Stage Door from the 16th to the 21st . . . unexpected pleasures . . .

This week's show at A Space, the Sonny Greenwich Sextet, has been cancelled. Plans are for it to be rescheduled in April.

Moe Koffman will be appearing at George's Spaghetti House (Sherbourne and Dundas) through Saturday, followed by the Ted and Kathryn Moses Quintet from Feb. 9-14. Howard McGhee is playing at Bourbon St. through the 14th; Vic Dickenson at Basin St. also through the 14th. Both at 180 Queen St. W.

The Canadian Creative Music Collective does a show every Tuesday and Friday night at the Music Gallery (30 St. Patrick St.). There are workshops at the Gallery every day in music and dance as well as regular Thursday night jam sessions — all are invited, bring your instruments, but call first to make sure it's happening 368-5975. Saturday, Feb. 14 — the Avant Garde Revival Band at the Gallery.

A jazz scene really is coming together in Toronto. Get into it; keep it happening.

movies

Without a doubt the finest film playing in Toronto at the present time is Marcel Carné's Children of Paradise which is currently enjoying an extended run at the New Yorker every night at 8:00 (with different times on the weekend — 1:30, 5:00 and 8:30). Looking at the length of this week's column I'll have to keep my comments shorter than I would like but there isn't a great deal that I feel equipped to say about a work of such quality. The standard descriptions, charming, exhilarating, refreshing, near-perfect, and so on are all true. To describe the plot would come nowhere near giving a sense of how this film unfolds itself so that one spends somewhere over three hours not so much escaping this world but finding oneself involved in another.

Paris in the latter part of the 19th century may have been nothing like what one sees in this film but for the sake of its genuine beauty and the characters who inhabit it one is only too glad to give this imaginary world one's attention. Children of Paradise is a quiet epic and an excellent entertainment.

FRIDAY — Robert Altman's Nashville is showing tonight at 8:30 at the Revue — also on Saturday at 6:30 and 9:30 and Sunday at 8:00. Rarely seen outside of Japan, Kobayashi's three part film The Human Condition will be shown at the Japanese Cultural Centre. Part 1 will be screened tonight and Parts II and III on Sunday afternoon.

MONDAY — The Revue will show The Lenny Bruce Performance Film at 7 and 9:35 and Henry Miller's Quiet Days at Clichy at 8:05 and 10:45. Nellie-Wyck is screening Arthur Penn's Mickey One with Warren Beatty at 8 pm. The Revue is continuing its Robert Altman festival with his examination of madness; Images with Susannah York and his look at the lives of gambling addicts, California Split at 9:15. The Aladdin Theatre's double bill tonight is Macbeth by Von Sternberg with Marlene Dietrich and Gary Cooper and The Passion of Joan of Arc beginning at 7:30.

TUESDAY — In its major points Hearts and Minds is either mediocre or a complete failure but in certain isolated scenes (of which the film has plenty) it strikes home, giving images of Vietnam at variance with the standard version. It is showing at 7 and 10:50 with Les Ordres at 9:00 at the Roxy. Nellie-Wyck is showing Eli Kazan's On the Waterfront with Marlon Brando at 8 pm. The double bill at the Aladdin Theatre will be Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde by Rouben Mamoulian with Fredric March and The Phantom of the Opera with Claude Rains starting at 7:30.

WEDNESDAY — The Revue will begin a two night run of Chabrol's Le Boucher at 7:30 and Le Grand Bouffe at 9:15.

THURSDAY — The Roxy appears to be hosting a Canadian premiere tonight by showing the film Ice a film which offers a projection of American political life twenty years from now complete with urban guerrillas and police state style government. It's showing at 8:35 with Godard's La Chinoise at 7 and 10:45.

P.S. The Aladdin's Bazaar Theatre will be running four hours of vintage cartoons on Friday, Saturday and Sunday starting at 7:00 pm. Friday's show will feature Popeye, Saturday's Betty Boop and Sunday's Superman. On all three programs there will be showings of Gertie the Dinosaur and the first Felix the Cat cartoon.

Friday: The Opera Department of the Faculty of Music presents The Crucible by American composer, Robert Ward, from the play by Arthur Miller. It's the first performance of this opera in Canada and has had great reviews, so is well worth seeing. MacMillan Theatre, EJB, 8:00 pm. Reserved tickets available from the box office at $2. Call 928-3744. Program repeated Saturday night.

Canadian bass, Don Garrard, appears in one of his rare recitals with Derek Bampton at the piano. Town Hall, St. Lawrence Centre, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $5.50 and $4.50. Call 366-7723.

Sunday: The Orford Quartet, the resident quartet of the Faculty of Music, performs Beethoven's Quartet in C Minor, Op. 18, No. 4, Bartok's Quartet No. 1, and Mendelssohn's Quartet Op. 44, No. 1. Walter Hall, EJB, 3:00 p.m. Tickets: $2. Call 928-3744.

Monday: The Bach Youth Ensemble appears with pianist and violinist, Carolyn Gadel in a performance of Mozart's A Major Piano Concerto, his D Major Violin Concerto, a Concerto Grosso by Vivaldi, and Benjamin Britten's Simple Symphony. Ontario Science Centre, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $3 at the door.

Tuesday: The TSO, with Misha Dichter, pianist, will perform Berlioz' King Lear Overture, Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 23 in A Major, K. 488 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D Minor. Op. 70. Massey Hall, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $3-$10 and, of course, the good ol' rush seats are available. Call 363-7301. Program will be repeated Wednesday night.

Baritone Norman Rubin, and pianist Carl Morey join forces to present Schumann's Dichterlebe, and songs by Charles Ives. Walter Hall, EJB, 8:30 p.m. No tickets required, no charge.

The Music Committee of Hart House presents Walter Delahunt, pianist, in a program of works by J.S. Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, and Chopin.

Thursday: Christiane Edinger, violinist appears in recital at the Eaton Auditorium at 1:30 p.m. Tickets: $1.50. Call 291-7204 for more information.

Internationally renowned Canadian baritone, Louis Quilico, joined by students of the Faculty's Opera Department, will perform Verdi. The program will be divided into three sections: Verdi and Shakespeare —

Macbeth, Otello, and Falstaff; Verdi and Schiller: Luisa Miller and Don Carlo; Verdi and History: Un Ballo in Maschera. Walter Hall, EJB, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $2. Call 928-3744.

The Quartetto Beethoven di Roma, Italy's famous piano quartet will appear in recital at the Town Hall, St. Lawrence Centre, at 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $4.50 and $5.50. Call 366-7723.

Friday: The Chamber Players of Toronto, with violinists Victor Martin and Harry Sargous perform works by Pachelbel (the famous canon), Handel, Purcell, Torelli, and Bach. Walter Hall, EJB, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $3. Call 928-3744. Program repeated Saturday night.

Something slightly out of order: This Sunday, Feb. 8, the Gadar String Trio will perform Beethoven's String Trio Op. 9, No. 3, Hindemith's II Streichtrio (1933), and Mozart's Divertimento K. 563. Town Hall, St. Lawrence Centre, 8 p.m. Tickets: $2.50 and $3.00. Call 366-7723.

Something else: "Lest we forget, Toronto would be immeasurably poorer, musically, without the Edward Johnson Building and what goes on inside it."

"Not that we do forget. But it's good to remind ourselves every now and then that a city without a fine university music faculty in its midst tends to subsist on a monotonous musical diet."

"The fact that our diet has variety does a good deal to the University of Toronto's Music Faculty and the concerts it presents at its home base."

William Littler, The Toronto Star, JM

Dave Essig is at the Riverboat this week. A Foot in Coldwater is at the Penthouse in Scarborough, and Gary and Dave are at Zodiac 1.

There are quite a few concerts coming up. Sunday Feb. 7 Sweet is at Massey Hall, but it's already sold out. The 9th Dionne Warwick is at Massey Hall, followed by Bruce Cockburn on the 12th and 13th. LaBelle is there on the 16th if you like to see women wearing the latest in bathroom fixtures, and David Bowie, the Anthony Newley of the Rock World, haunts his vacuous talents at the Gardens on the 26th.

On Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. the National Lampoon Show is coming to Con Hall, with discount tickets ($4.50 at SAC. Ray Materick is at UFSO on Feb. 20 at 8 pm.

The calendar then has a large hole in it until March 20 when Vally appears at Massey Hall, closely followed by a week-long engagement (Mar. 22 to 28) at Massey Hall by Gordon Lightfoot. A few things are bound to pop up to fill March out, so keep your ears clean.

theatre

Out of chaos and confusion, Phoenix-like the Varg returns. Not a moment too soon for the windbags amongst us, at an embarrassing time for the SAC executives, and a damn sight too late for groups who have put on good theatre in the last two weeks. With some chagrin I confess that I tailed to cover the St. Mike's production of You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown. But I can cheerfully report on plays or revues staged at Hart House, U.C. Playhouse, and Trinity College.

At Hart House, I picked up All's Well That Ends Well at a particularly trying time in rehearsal. It is always to some degree unfair to write about a cast who are playing to an empty house while properties are being reglued and the furniture or the blocking is being shifted out from under them.

Nevertheless, the miscues seen in rehearsal tend to illuminate the directions in which the play is thought to move by both the cast and the director. My overall impression of the show was favourable, as the cast was more highly trained than is usual (many being alumni of Hart House Theatre, temporarily available on campus again) but Lord how slowly the first act went! All's Well had a typical Martin Hunter style — not easily definable, but there are certain kinds of business which he favours — and it had typical performances from many of its actors: Rod Beattie as a deep and sombre Parolles (less effective than one would expect), Barbara Stewart as another winning heroine, Doug Beattie as a helpless romantic; and also an entertaining performance from David Gardner as a very imperious King of France. The performance was fairly even, apparently aided by the advice of several scholars who gave seminars for cast members. The effect of the play was maintained throughout an excellent set, which merits the palm in this production.

Also, a memorial notice for Gas II at the U.C. Playhouse. Emerging from a class on play-directing, Cynthia Grant created a peculiar piece which when it succeeded existed as allegory alone or as a poem with a limited choice of images. When it failed, as it did frequently, (largely due to the chronic lack of sympathy from the audience, who found the work itself too heavy-handed or too slow) the super-realism reminded me only of a used set from Lost in Space peopled by characters from the Klm II Sun Pages From History series of propaganda comcs. It was a thoroughly political drama, and unfortunately, a type of theatre with which I was quite unfamiliar and am not particularly receptive to. Georg Kaiser wrote the play as the conclusion to a trilogy in 1919, and his description of life in a factory dedicated to production of the raw material for war seemed somewhat dated and more than a little transparent, since the sentiment was no longer revolutionary and the stage-craft in the script so limited. The best parts of the play were those which were provided by the special effects team, who arranged to have a cloud of poison gas and a violent explosion surround the audience as the entire set imploded. A small fire (unplanned) allowed us all to escape without saying much. The direction (which was I suppose largely the point of the exercise) was good indeed, considering the material. The acting was in a few cases quite good, but only when the text was lyrical; at other times, the stilted words affected the performances.

A third brief note on the revue Mad Dogs and Englishmen which graced Cartwright Hall for two performances last weekend. Concocted in haste, it was a good example of witty delivery matched with solid writing (the reverse being usually true in the material Trinity attempts). Skills by Noel Coward formed the backbone of the evening, and the good spirits felt by the cast hauled them through the rougher spots when their voices weren't up to the music. It is rather a shame that topical material could not once more be written for an audience who deal daily with satire.

On Dec. 2, 1975, the Blues women's hockey team journeyed to Guelph to play the game which would ultimately decide who would cop the first place position at the half way point of the season. Going into the game both squads were undefeated, so the two points that were up for grabs were mighty important.

In a game marred by fourteen penalties (whatever happened to the no body contact rule?), the girls from T.O. ran the Guelph squad into the ice on its way to a 7-1 victory. The four goal performance of Ange Coleman highlighted the game, adequately reinforced by a pair of the stick of Betty Cook, and a singleton potted by Val Bush.

In league action after Christmas, T.O. defeated the hapless York Yeowomen 7-2 on Thursday, Jan. 15th, with 4 goals and 2 assists by Lynda Harley, and sparkling play-making by Carol Slipetz, with a goal and three. The Western game Jan. 23rd produced two points in a 3-2 squeaker, but a rematch against Guelph came out in a 4-2 loss to Guelph here Friday night. Blues played well, but Guelph wanted it more, and the result was a 3-2 win, with an extra goal tossed in the empty net. Goal scorers for Toronto were Betty Cook and Val Bush.

So the Blues are now not sole possessors of first place, and the team has to play high-flying Queens and Mac in the last two games of the season. Both matches are four-pointers in the bid for first place, and the game against the Gaels is at home tomorrow at 3 p.m. On Wednesday, Lady Blues travel to McMaster for the game there.

WHAT'S GOIN' ON... There's a lot happening in women's athletics this weekend at U of T. Volleyball's Central League is holding a sectional tournament all day Saturday. Starting time is 10:00 a.m. at the Benson Building. Participating teams include Brock, Ryerson, Toronto and Trent. The Fencing team will also be holding a tournament at the same time.

Friday night at 7:30 the Intermediate Basketball team will play Sir Wilfrid Laurier while on Saturday the senior team takes on Queen's. Saturday afternoon at Varsity Arena U of T's women's ice hockey team faces off against Queen's Golden Gaels at 3:00 p.m. A victory here would put Toronto on top of the O.W.I.A.A. hockey league. All in all it looks like a very competitive weekend for U of T's women athletes.

Blues Batter Guelph in Davies' Debut

By JONATHAN GROSS
Sports Editor

The Guelph Gryphon's season took another turn for the worse last night as the Blues demolished the Farmers 9-4 at Varsity Arena.

The semester system affords Guelph the advantage of adding fresh blood in January but this year the newcomers are doing more harm than good as the team has compiled a record of two wins, four losses and two ties since the new year after remaining undefeated in 1975.

For the Blues the game was another show of strength. Kent Ruhnke seems to be finding his wavelength. The captain scored three beautifully-manoeuvred goals and added an assist for the win.

It was the team's first effort under interim head coach Gord Davies and although the team let up early in the second period, allowing three quick goals, Davies never showed signs of blowing his cool.

The officials were severely tested in a very physical game that saw thirteen minors handed out to each team. Mike Hannan, who accounted for five of them, commented that, "You have to let them know that there's another team out there." Larry Hopkins of the Blues found out on his first shift as a Guelph player cut him in three separate places over his left eye and sidelined him. Hopefully he'll be in shape for the next game.

Aside from the action in the penalty box the play was fast and exciting with both teams receiving excellent scoring opportunities throughout the game. This is reflected in the number of shots on goal as the Blues outshot the Gryphons 46-42.

The Blues took a dvantage of Guelph's disorganization in the first period and led 3-0 on goals by Hannan, Ruhnke and Doug Herridge. Hannan's tally early in the period was set up by pass from Bob Adorati. Ruhnke, using his size and speed outran and outmuscled a Gryphon defenseman and beat Guelph goalie Dave Mooto with a shot along the ice. Doug Herridge did likewise on a neat, little deflection from John Precious who picked up three assists on the night.

After the second period Wayne Morrissey who was sitting out the game with pulled muscles in his lower abdomen, commented that "everybody seems to be trying to do it themselves." The phrase would apply to both teams throughout the game.

Rob Allen of Guelph went off for roughing late in the first. The Blues took advantage of the leftover time in the second to make it 4-0 on a rebound shot by Bill Fjeld. Shortly thereafter the overhead roof fell in.

The latent individualism on the Blues came through as the defense was beat with three extremely fast goals. John Bays, who has been skating with the team since the holidays after playing for PhysEd, was victimized by Guelph's Dave Cobban on the second goal while Rolci Pagnello missed a clearing pass that landed on the wrong stick for the third score. Clearly a case of do-it-yourself.

The Blues came back to make it 6-3 with two goals in the last minute of play. The team added three more in the third and Guelph added one. The third was marred by violence combined with more violence and the crowd seemed to dwindle with the quality of play.

BLUE WALLS . . . The crowd was small but noisy, most of it coming between the second and third periods during an horrendous display by the Women's figure skating team. Accompanied by music that sounded like a broken garbage disposal, the ladies were about as athletic as Magilla Gorilla. . . . Cutbacks are needed. . . Robertson paces IB Allstar upset

By KARL KURZ

Before a smattering of fans that was more "girlfriend" than "fan" Division IB downed IA 5-3 to win the second annual Interfac Allstar Game and retain possession of the Labatt's Brunswick House Trophy. The boys of IB under Dave Hulme recorded their second upset over the overpaid "fatcats" (it says here) of IA.

Ian Robertson of Scarborough led the team with two goals and won the most valuable player award. The Scarborough contingent played well as Glenn Farber teamed up with New College's Albie Shames as a defense pair 'sine qua non' or whatever.

The goaltending was definitely of the allstar calibre. John Haines of Grads was particularly impressive in the first period while Dr. Lorne Kilman was particularly despondent about letting in three goals. His major concern took the form of "How come Schwaybe Brown gets all the ink?" Plushy PhysEd goalie Chris Sammot, U of T's answer to Gary Smith, played well for the losers. Robertson's winning goal came through a screen that rivaled that of a fan dancer's for effectiveness.

Alongside Shames and Farber, John Richmond from Vic and Murray McCarthy from PHE deserve praise for their efforts in a losing cause. Larry Howorth bagged two for IA and won a free skate sharpening from Howie. Yippee.

It was a scramble game and the players were not used to being on the same ice with so much talent. Dave Hulme the winning coach said "Only eight guys showed up for Monday's practice. As far as team work was concerned, we just worked on clearing passes."

The clearing passes were definitely effective as IA couldn't penetrate for very many great shots. In any case allstar play gives the fans a chance to see some good hockey players excel at the trade they love most — drinking.

CHEAP SHOTS . . . Unfortunately, despite protests there will be a Division II Allstar game Feb. 24. . . Help . . . Bizarros Such as Jay 'Man or Myth' Pilon should be there along with The Richie Shaw Glee Club. . . Oh Please — ED

Interfac B-Ball shorts

The going has been rough for many teams in interfac basketball. PHE C has bitten the dust after failing to show their OHIP numbers. They must be in the country illegally. Ken Andrews of Wycliffe has just had his protest upheld over the use of "Ringers" on ChenEng IV. Remember you heard it here first.

In the two team race in division IA Sr. Eng, led by Vaughan Road Hero Ron Gratz, downed Meds 82-79. They stayed in first while the second place PHE A edged SGS I 81-76 despite John Fjeld's 31 points. Fjeld is playing out his option before going to the Seattle Superonics (pure rumour).

FACED stormed past the fallen losers into second place. Mike Katz's knee is feeling better and his 20 points against Erindale in a 70-63 had the crowd on its feet.

In other very exciting action this week Law II who are probably stronger than their first division reps edged New II 49-45 while Dents clobbered Vic I 80-63. Chase was never caught as he gunned for 32 on the winning side. Player of the week, Scarborough buried Law I to confirm this reporter's suspicions, 94-54. Campbell slunked his way back to the Sticks with 28. New I took PHE B 76-75. There will be an AllStar game on the 26th of February, or is that the 24th? Check with your PR man. — ED

Darcy returned in CUPE election

By MIKE EDWARDS
"The election was a positive experience," said newly elected chief steward Greg Collins about last Thursday's general election for CUPE local 1230 offices.

Referring to the two slates who stood for election, Collins said, "both major groups were able to present their views and discuss the issues." In a telephone interview last night, Collins explained, "The election was based on principle, not on personalities," he continued.

Election results were close but all elected candidates managed a clear majority. Judy Darcy was re-elected as president with 174 votes to 32 for Stephanie Hurko, with third place going to James Mayor with 32 votes. All other candidates on the Darcy team were elected to the remaining six executive positions. Hurko's slate was defeated by Darcy's "progressive" slate of seven. Hurko's campaign literature said "we are diametrically opposed to the concept of politicization of our Union." Four members of the Hurko slate withdrew their nominations following Darcy's election.

According to their literature, the Hurko slate was opposed to "a battle ground for different ideologies or party politics". They offered as an alternative the concept of "good management-labour relations".

"We believe that Library and University Managements would be more concerned if the union elected a reasonable and moderate executive rather than a radical and Militant one," they explained.

The corresponding literature of the Darcy slate maintained the opposite viewpoint. "We would work toward the creation of a solid front of workers, students and faculty which can oppose the university management," they stressed.

The Darcy slate, comprised of Judy Darcy, Sheila Copley (vice-president), Greg Collins (chief steward), Clem Shillingford (secretary-treasurer), Angela Wilke (recording secretary), Robert Byrnes (corresponding secretary), and Eric Lovgren (records officer) termed their opposition to "business unionism".

Their platform included planks against wage controls, unity with other union struggles, education of the rank and file and a long-term perspective in dealing with the university administration.

Collins admitted that there are some strong differences of opinion and that he feels that the executive has to find common ground. "Now we will see what we can do about putting our program into action," he said.

The progressive slate admitted to two errors in their recent fight with the administration. "We lost contact with the people and our timing of the strike was poor," said Collins.

The library workers are now facing a fight with the federal government's Anti-Inflation Board. The Board recently rejected their 15 per cent Dec. 9 settlement.

Greer deplures "kitchen-garden" orgasms

By CAITLIN KELLY

"In an ordinary, kitchen-garden orgasm, the male ejaculates 80 million sperm — whatever for?"

Such thought-provoking questions were run of the mill as Germaine Greer, feminist and author of "The Female Eunuch" spoke at a SAC-sponsored event in Convocation Hall Friday night.

Speaking to a near-capacity audience of mainly young women, Greer concluded a two week tour that had taken her through the U.S. and Ontario. She delivered a two hour presentation which was amusing, direct and graphic, as she dealt with topics such as abortion, contraception, and self-love.

Greer compared the principle of natural selection in the animal world, and the mating process among our "near-neighbours, the apes", with human reproduction. She seemed to feel that natural selection was by far a better basis for perpetuation of the species.

"It's being said that by the end of the 20th century we will defeat infection. The only diseases left will be genetic ones. Medical technology means we can't fix in the face of natural selection."

She condemned the popular concept of Zero Population Growth as a "terrible notion", that of another "mini-couple" just like their parents. "The idea of such duplication horrifies her with the repetitive implications of the unfeasible situation of "coupledom". Greer predicted that for children of ZPG parents there would only be two alternatives — confrontation or breakaway.

Greer's address contained several anecdotes. "I saw a man today on a plane with a brown tie embroidered with little orange pigs, and above each little orange pig were embroidered the initials MCP," she related. "I whispered in his ear as I walked by. 'Oh, you're a Malicious, Cowardly Prick!'" "To say 'I'm just a male chauvinist pig' implies that I have enormous sexual appetites, am very well-hung and picturesquely old-fashioned," she continued. A burst of laughter greeted the story, but the several male listeners in attendance may not have been equally amused.

Greer discussed the problems of contraception in great detail, and especially those of the lack of trust involved between the sexes. "You cannot build fences that will keep 80 million sperm out," she said.

"The more you build walls around women, the more you try to encircle them with regulations, the more the alienation between men and women increases — the more the quality of trust diminishes."

"Our sexuality penetrates every area of our lives. We choose to be infertile for the vast majority of the time. It is in the management of fertility that women have suffered in the past," Greer added.

"Isn't it time that men took part of the burden?" she asked. A burst of applause erupted at this remark, but she cautioned, "You won't applaud when you hear what comes next."

"Fertility is not a by-product of coupledom," she continued, as she criticized society's present attitudes towards the subject. "Each one of us has the responsibility of fertility to accept. We can't pretend that responsibility, duty and freedom don't apply to us."

"Communication between the sexes is not sufficient," she elaborated. "We couldn't allow men to be infertile on our account like opening doors or carrying suitcases. It's ridiculous!"

Greer felt strongly about the effect of the Pill on modern women, and feminism. "We had the idea of the Pill as a monolith, like the Philosopher's Stone — guilt-free infertility." But, comparing that assumption to Columbus' discovery of the Indies, she added, "We were just as wrong."

She spoke of a phenomenon she had witnessed in her native Australia that had greatly disturbed her. She spoke of

NB students occupiers evicted from building

By PAUL McGRATH

Two hundred and fifty students were removed, some carried, from the New Brunswick Centennial Building by Fredericton city police yesterday, ending for the moment an occupation lasting almost two weeks.

The students, most of them from the University of Moncton, had been occupying the building in shifts since January 28 to support demands for a $3 million increase in the province's student aid budget.

The students voted Friday to reject a government proposal for a $500,000 to $1 million increase in the budget and decided to stay.

Yesterday at 3:30 the Fredericton chief of police, along with provincial youth minister J.P. Ouelette, warned the students that they would be allowed 15 minutes to leave and then would be held responsible under Section 41 of the Criminal Code which provides both that "it is justified in using force" to clear a building of trespassers and that anyone who resists is committing an offence.

About 50 police moved in 15 minutes later. Some students had to be carried from the hall, but no arrests were reported.

The students are presently grouped near door at St. Dunstan's Roman Catholic church. They were invited in by the parish priest.

At the time of the arrest, according to sources at the Brunswick, University of New Brunswick newspaper, phone lines into the building were cut off "so they couldn't get any legal counsel."

The president of the New Brunswick Student Union, whose offices had been used for organization during the occupation, reported that his phone lines had been tapped during the week.

It is unclear what the students will do next. Some wanted to return to Moncton, others to stay and occupy the building today. The New Brunswick government spent $3,000 to rent buses that would take the students back to Moncton, but they turned the offer down. Those who return will do so on public transportation.

The students occupied the building without support from Fredericton students.

"middle-class mums with education" who had gone through their youth with "parking" as their "main activity between 16 and 26."

"When their daughters start coming home late they think 'I'm so glad my daughter can be free and spontaneous.'"

According to Greer these mothers start spiking their daughters' coffee with contraceptives. "They're doing it with love," Greer explained, "but it might just as well be hate."

The implication in such an act is that the daughter isn't capable of making her own informed decisions, Greer feels. It is the "problem of a young woman discovering her own sexuality and dealing with it."

Greer suggests that a daughter, finding out about such treatment, would quite rightly be "humiliated" and "furious". "The whole point is growing up and making your mistakes and expurgating them," she explained.

"If someone doesn't let you make decisions, you are kept in an infantile state," she elaborated. "Women have been kept in a sub-adult state. Whenever we accept that manipulation of fertility, we continue that same castration, that same unconscious expression of contempt."

The blame however, lies not only with a manipulative situation in society and justice, but with ourselves, she stated. She described what she calls the "Marcus Welby syndrome" in which fertility is seen as "a worry, a bore and a trial."

"It shows itself in the anxiety of women to accept that the form of contraception they're practicing is perfect," Greer continued. "All we seem to be trying to do is stop anxiety," she exclaimed. "Women who accept crass, clumsy contraception are being babyish."

Greer's main emphasis throughout her speech was the responsibility that women must take for themselves, their bodies and their fertility. She deplored the passive attitude women have taken in the past towards their own bodies, especially in the area of contraception. She cited many examples of the Pill's side effects, and pleaded a case for increased awareness of its implications.

"Is the Pill good enough?" she asked. "I'm not talking about death, I'm talking about reduction of the quality of life." She gave as an example a side effect that influences the production of a mood-changing hormone, tryptophan. This effect occurs in one out of three women, she said. "You're infertile and you're miserable — terrific!" she summarized.

The topic of overmedication proved to be one of her most lucid and impassioned subjects. She stated what she feels is the senselessness of taking the Pill for 365 days a year for a total of 156 fertile hours in the same amount of time.

One more year for infirmary

By CAITLIN KELLY
Good news for cold sufferers at the U of T: the Infirmary will not be closing for at least a year.
In a telephone interview yesterday Health Service secretary D. J. Gunn said, "It's been given the go-ahead to run for at least another academic year. We've had the official word that it will not close for the academic year 1976-77."
The latest word from Budget Chief Connell doesn't promise a healthy future for the infirmary, however.
The budget recommends in two years the Health Service be entirely self-sufficient, depending on OHIP and student fees for its income.

At the moment the Health Service is given a University subsidy of $100,000 per year. This figure, says Connell, must be reduced by half as the first step to self-sufficiency.
Any additional anticipated income up to $25,000 dollars must also be forfeited, which means the Health Service will be taking a 75 per cent loss in revenue in one year.
Dr. George Wodehouse said, "We now have two people retiring; this makes up just about the $50,000. Unless we can get an increase in fees, though, we'll have to close down after a year."
The two doctors leaving are full-time psychiatrist Dr. John MacIntyre and the assistant director of Women's Services, Dr. Francis Stewart. There has not been a need to fire anyone yet but Wodehouse pointed out that the threat is there.

Scar elections start

By BOB COLLIER
The fifties are back, along with school dances, Friday night movies and political vacuity. At least you'd think so after looking over the campaign literature of some Scarborough College candidates.
Starting today, Scarborough students have four days to elect their college council and SAC representatives. But, for a change, students are being offered a genuine dimorphism among candidates.
The school dance set are out in force, two slates no less, with a third saying they are still interested in fighting real politics. But then, you might say, they're passe.
The incumbents, president Russell Henderson and his v-p Bruce Edwards centre their platform on SAC services, or the lack thereof.
Bruce Edwards claims that SAC doesn't offer them anything they aren't powerful enough, as one single college, to affect government policies."

They point to their record over the year that they have been in office and proudly say, "We have proven ourselves."
Richard Turnock is, perhaps, more parochial than the Henderson-Edwards team. In his campaign for council president, he has emphasized the more pragmatic aspects of council services.
He wants to redistribute the council budget, cut down competition between the dance committees, improve the college newspaper and redirect course unions.
He doesn't want to involve his council in university wide politics. Like his competition, he argues that "Scarborough College can't storm Queen's Park; the college can't stop cutbacks; all the college can do is form a unified front with the other colleges and fight together. That's the job for SAC, not us."
He would use the college newspaper, The Balcony Square, to build support, but only by writing responsible articles.
"The Balcony Square doesn't include enough current affairs either," says Turnock. "We need an organized 'Here and Now' column and more communication between the editor and the college president," he says.
Turnock seems to take great interest in the more mundane aspects of college life. "There is too much overlap between the Cultural Association and the Services Commission," he grumbles. "Instead of organizing the dance schedule properly, we often have small dances on alternate weekends instead of a really good one twice a month."
Garry Sands and his running mates, Russell Woods and Jay Madsen, scoff at the dance mentality of the other candidates. "They're apolitical," they jeer. "His campaign centres around the classical fight for more student representation and cutbacks but is also highly concerned that SAC services are so poor."
"We must maintain our relations with SAC," he says. "The last council has almost severed our connections with them by blocking off movies and groups they have offered."
He wants to get more services from them and argues that Scarborough students don't get their money's worth from SAC because they are so isolated.
Sands argues fiercely for more student power on the college council.
"The students can only choose 36 members of the council, but any professor can sit whenever he chooses," says Sands, "and there are 900 profs in this college."
"Some faculty have even questioned our right to speak at all," he claims.
"We need to improve communication between the campuses too. The university administration takes advantage of our isolation because we are prevented from fighting on a unified front." He cites the faculty attempts to cut the college budget by five per cent next year and the decision to limit enrolment next year.
He is as critical of SAC as the other candidates. "They do not represent us and aren't aware of our problems," he claims.

don't have already.
"We know best what our students want," he claims repeatedly. "We always get large crowds at our dances and we put on really good Friday night movies, none of those mouldy oldies that SAC seems to like."
The Henderson-Edwards slate wants to redefine the role of SAC as far as their college goes. As a result of the geographic isolation of their college they feel that SAC should minimize its input into their world. They are prepared to handle the social life of the college and any politics directly affecting their college, but they want to leave any major issues to the SAC hacks.
"We are a more effective political body as part of the university," says Edwards. "All the students here are represented on SAC and we stand by our representatives. Besides, we

Innis seeks program parity

By JUSTIN CASS
Innis college is meeting yet another challenge on the question of student-non-student parity. This time it has come from students outside the college.
Students none of whom were Innis members concerned about the survival of their newly created film studies program proposed in a meeting Thursday that four students sit on the equally new Cinema Studies Programme Committee.
However there are already fifteen faculty members on the committee.

working number and that the question of parity would be too controversial to worry about.
It was suggested that the faculty members elect their own four representatives to the program committee.
An amendment was quickly added to the main motion that the students reserve the right to parity at a later date.
In the meantime the cinema studies program appears to be well underway. A student group now hopes to form the Cinema Studies Student Association. The founding members are Clare Brigstocke, Diane Porrest, Lee Morris and Barbara Jones.
They and another eight interested students voted to set up an election procedure for representation on the Programme Committee. There will probably be an election this March for three of the four reps. The fourth to be elected next year.
All students taking a film course can vote. There was some question about students, not registered in the course who pay their lab fees. That question will be studied further.
Meanwhile, Innis College Council is under attack from the Administration for daring to ask that a Search Committee for a new Principal be a parity committee. They are considering the boycott of any non-parity committee set up by the administration.

However a member of the college reminded the meeting that Innis College which has been given the task of overseeing the functioning of the entire program, is a parity college.
When asked why the low number, interim student executive member, Lee Morris said that four was a good

SAC sweepstakes scenario set

By JIGGS TRAWN
The SAC presidential election is not until mid-March, but already the jockeying for position among veteran student pols has become fast and furious, according to one seasoned observer.
Following the non-candidacy announcement of everyone's favoured choice, Communications Commissioner John Tuzyk, a veritable plethora of equally ambitious but less subtle prospectives have announced their hopes for the future.
Erindale SAC Rep John Doherty has made no secret who his choice is. After motioning to thank SAC External Affairs Commissioner Rob Snell for the latter's organizing effort for the January Rally at the latest SAC

General Council meeting amid shouts of "Are you related?" Doherty's byline ran under an article entitled "Snell responsible for rally" in a recent edition of Medium II. Doherty is rumoured to be one of Snell's choices for the two vice-presidential spots.
SAC Women's Commissioner Shirley French has not been wasting time either. She took full opportunity of her position to introduce Germaine Greer to a near capacity crowd at Con Hall Friday night, and has reportedly put together the rest of her slate.
Innis SAC Rep Bill Drury, another pseudo-candidate, has recently been availing himself of the Varsity's letter column to engage in a polemic with another Innis student regarding accessibility to university education.

Automation gets increase, library jobs threatened

By LEA RYAN
University budget proposals for the library's next year of operation do not augur well for students. Both Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn and Chief Steward of CUPE 1230 Greg Collins agree.
The proposals include a reduction in funding by $469,307, to be achieved through "reducing expenditures for services, by some internal re-organization, and by increasing use of Library Automation Services for greater efficiency."
Blackburn commented that he did not "know yet" could not "really tell" what the expenditures reductions would mean, but went on to say "it's not good, it can't be good, these are cuts for, I think, the eighth year."
Blackburn said the reduction in purchasing power over the last 8 years made tremendous reductions in books purchased. "The effect is cumulative — it only becomes noticeable when time after time the library does not have what you want. This is the kind of damage you can't repair," Blackburn said, adding that more money in the future wouldn't allow the library to go ahead and purchase missed publications.
"Exactly 5 per cent has been cut in the library," said Blackburn, as he pointed out that the final decisions of what to cut were made by the budget committee.
Blackburn added there have already been reductions in services and staff in the library, and that while this was one of the major issues in the recent library strike, the university had been unwilling to guarantee no lay-offs.

"Internal re-organization" would mean a reduction in the numbers of jobs, which the library would try to get through attrition, not through lay-offs, according to Blackburn.
Greg Collins pointed out a key issue for the union in terms of job security was automation and technological change, issues which "have been smouldering beneath the surface of the library for some time."
"Last year's budget saw a reduction of the overall library budget and an increase in allotment for Library Automation Systems," said Collins. (This year's budget continues this trend — spending for Library Automation Systems is recommended an increase of $282,727). He added that while the union has as yet no official position on the issue, this "has to change."
Collins pointed out there was no objection to automation in principle, but that when the benefits of automation did not accrue to either the library workers or the library users, massive objections arose. "It's just saving money for the university and the provincial government to appropriate the results," he said.
"What happens is that services do not improve," said Collins, pointing out several rumours about "internal re-organization" include closing the card catalogue.
"This will mean large areas of information will become unavailable to undergraduates," he explained.

may be they'd save a little if they turned the lights off.

Less Library Hours?

By GARY LENNOX
Students may be faced with the possibility of a reduction in library hours, according to a report received by SAC.
SAC external commissioner Jay Lefton submitted a brief January 30 to the SAC executive following a meeting January 9 with chief U of T librarian Dr. R. H. Blackburn.
Lefton has been investigating the feasibility of keeping the library open for longer hours during the rush periods in late November and March. His proposal included a Saturday closing at 10:30 p.m. and a Sunday opening at 10:00 a.m.
Lefton backed up his proposals with the argument that study is easier in a "purely academic atmosphere" and that the resultant library use of materials would help save money by reducing processing costs.
Blackburn said he favours keeping libraries open "as long as possible", but that there is "always a trade off between what is desirable and what is possible".

He cautioned there has been some talk of a reduction in library hours over the past two years, and that there are financial considerations which must be weighed apart from the merits of the proposal.
Blackburn added he is currently involved in reviewing the budget, and declined to comment on the financial implications of keeping the library open longer hours, especially during the peak exam-essay periods of late November and March.
He indicated the library budget is roughly $8 million this year, with an anticipated cut of 5 per cent. Blackburn favoured raising the book budget as much as possible, maintaining that holding it steady would result in a 15 per cent per year reduction in purchasing power for new materials.
Lefton is asking for support for his proposal from all college and residence councils before Reading Week, but was not available to comment.

Foreign students: close the doors?

Canadian universities are step by step making it difficult or impossible for foreign students to study in this country. A partial survey of Canadian universities shows that the growing concern over the numbers of foreign students has generated much in the way of regulation and legislation to combat what administrators see as a drain on our dwindling resources.

The methods are many and varied: Upping the fees for students from other countries, limiting the enrolment of such students and judging their facility in the English language as a criterion for admission.

Although it is difficult to understand why this is happening (and too easy to blame it on simple xenophobia), it is nonetheless a relatively easy task to debunk some of the more public expressions of reasoning on the subject.

One such states that in this age of dwindling resources, we should not be wasting any money on non-Canadian students. In this is the inference that foreign students don't pay their way, that they are here on a hand-out of some sort. This is untrue. Foreign students pay tuition like any other, and in some Canadian universities will pay more than Canadian students very soon.

Perhaps it would clarify the situation somewhat to point out that there are almost as many Canadian students studying abroad as there are foreign students in Canada. The term "reciprocity" springs to mind. The two numbers were as close to equal as could be until the early 1970's. Part of the reason for the disparity at present stems from fee hikes in foreign (predominantly British) institutions, increases that were probably roundly derided in Canada. If we were to deny spaces in our universities to foreign students, we could hardly blame any foreign country for sending our students home packing to fill spaces in our universities. We would still be spending the same money, but students from Canada and other countries would be losing valuable learning experience.

So, we're not wasting any money on foreign students. One of the more bizarre twists in this subject is that we hear two further conflicting arguments used to justify the same discriminatory attitude against these students.

The first is that they take away employment opportunities that would be available for Canadians. As SAC's Kevin Kelcher pointed out in a brief to the university committee presently discussing the subject, this is nonsense. Immigration Act legislation makes it impossible for students to apply for citizenship while in this country. They don't just stay and work their way into our economic system, they must leave the country and apply from their home. This bunk about foreigners "sneaking" into the country on student visas is way off the mark.

The other side of the argument is one that resents foreign students who come to Canada, "steal" our education and then return to their country to put good old Western ingenuity to work. So they get hit from both sides.

While the facts in the second case may be true, it should be a basis for encouraging rather than discouraging foreign students. It is simply ludicrous for a country like Canada, which has benefited so much from the colonization that has contributed to the economic disparity between it and third world countries, to further that disparity by denying the benefits our advanced and specialized education system can offer.

The U of T has in some small way recognized this. President Evans pointed out to the Ontario Council on University Affairs in May of last year: "Now that we have become an educationally 'developed' area, it behooves us to assist the educationally 'undernourished areas' in the same way: it would be sheer hypocrisy for us to say that helping those from the Third World is beyond our means."

However, U of T action since then has been at best muddle-headed. Pressure from the professional faculties, who have been leading the way in popping up these made-of-straw arguments, has left the decision-makers at a bind. The best they could do was say that "some" spots should be left open for foreign students.

This shows absolutely no commitment to the idea. With their minds stuck on the current economic crisis and current dislike of strange faces and skin tones on campus, they have

Not exactly a spring wind out today, but it'll do. What with this winter, we know at least that the ice age is not on the way, as suspected. Today's inkling delivered by Sharon Stevenson, Bob Callier, Gary Lennox, McGill Daily, Caitlin Kelly, Hiss-bo to the unnamed who did not deliver their pieces, and it's no my fault if I smell like oysters.

There are a number of good reasons for insuring that foreign students fill no less than ten per cent of our total student population.

Cultural exchange is invaluable inside any university. We are all students, and there is no better focus for study of a foreign place than another student. More myth can be shot down inside fifteen minutes of good conversation than inside a dozen books.

The second argument is one of responsibility. There is no liberal guilt involved when we say that Canada has a responsibility, and with it the universities, to share our wealth. Most of the world does not benefit from the academic resources and specialization as we do. The rest of the world must have access to that which has given us a high standard of living, and if they have to come here to get it, than they should be welcomed with open arms and not higher tuition fees.

Any university must have an international outlook. Without it, it suffers from the worst effects of academic tunnel-vision.

Gov Con election: "Ignore it"

To The Editor: There are a number of events happening in this "academic community" that have very far-reaching significance. However, the student election for seats on the Governing Council is not one of them.

The University of Toronto, by virtue of provincial legislation, offers eight seats to students on the Governing Council. This, with twelve faculty member seats represents forty per cent of the total number of seats on the body.

This university is run for the students, with the students, but not by the students. We are students. We are niggers.

If there comes an issue which affects the students, such as a fee change, or a course cut, the students councillors can offer their objections or they may not. The rest of the Governing Council may listen and they may not. They may say sorry and they may not.

But if the administration and the province decides that the fees are to go up and the small courses are to disappear, then the fees will go up and the small courses will disappear.

The only way that the students can stop this process is by demonstrating, in person, their grievances. Do Governing Councilors support rallies, teach-ins, petition campaigns, marches, strikes, moratoria, or anything? No, they don't.

One tried Seymour Kanowitch tried to break across the secret shenanigans of the administration. He failed to do anything but raise the issue. No one rose to his defence when he was "fired" from his executive committee seat. No one cared.

If the students are to get anywhere, they should organize independently. A vote on the governing Council might be an assistance to such organization but it is no substitute.

The students running for seats on governing council are in my estimation politically suspicious; not because they are "right" or "left", but because they are planning to become more of the same. More show and less go.

The election procedure is screwy too. Only Canadian citizens can run. Engineering is under-represented. Students have less votes than the faculty. The administration more or less appoints the alumni representatives. But the point is this.

The demonstration last January 21 was a breath of fresh air. The Governing Council election is a stale cigarette.

Ignore it. Rip up your ballot. It will arrive in the mail in a couple of weeks.

Defaultist line of the week: Congrats to the History Student's Union in their latest newsletter for rewriting government press releases and passing them off as "analysis." We are told that high tuition fees don't make an elite. "First class education is only going to happen if we pick up our share of the tab. The choice is yours." Damn right the choice is mine. And I choose to put up a fight.

Jewish students disown "Migdal"

To The Editor: Recently, Hillel-Jewish Student Federation presented their new joint publication "Migdal" to the campus community. "Migdal" proudly claims on its front page to be a "non-partisan newspaper produced by and for Jewish students in Toronto and region". It also claims to be "born of great travail".

The "travail" referred to was the successful cancellation of community financial support to "Masada" a decidedly Zionist and therefore partisan publication.

"Masada" was criticized and ostracized by Ben Mayer (Director of U. of T. Hillel) and Lou Garber (Director, Jewish Student Federation of York) for being divisive and non-representative of the Jewish student community. "Migdal" it seems, being supported by Mayer and Garber could not possibly share this criticism. It is doubtful, however, whether Myer Rosen's article "The Flame of Joseph" could by any means be construed as representative of the sentiments of most Jewish students both in its tone and content.

Rosen writes about the "ritle butts of the Israeli Labour-Zionist government" and of the "bloodthirsty wretch Victor Shemtov" (Israeli cabinet minister). These are contemptible words in a time of crisis when Israel needs and deserves the full and united support of the Jewish people.

Is it more "treif" to criticize a Jewish trailer like Barney Danson (as "Masada" did) or to viciously and fanatically lash out at the "Israeli Labour Zionist government"? This epithet sounds more like those used by the enemies and not the lovers of Israel.

Ben Mayer and Lou Garber are guilty enough for having spearheaded the campaign against "Masada"; they should be condemned by the community for allowing this diatribe against the State of Israel to appear in their newspaper.

"Migdal", containing several frivolous and at least one destructive article is a shameful misuse of community funds. The community has committed a grave error in replacing "masada" a forthright Zionist voice with "Migdal", a publication which is at best useless, more probably damaging to the Jewish cause.

Debate "thoughtless"

To The Editor: The debate at Hart House (Jan. 26) "Resolved: Zionism is Racism," struck me as thoughtless, flagrant theatrics, presumably staged for the enjoyment of the debaters. I had gone feeling that as a Christian, I ought to pose the following question to the participants and onlookers: "Is it Christian to debate a people's existence?"

Obviously I was mistaken in my expectation that the debate assumed the value of serious reflection. The -ce at Hart House discredited advocates of freedom of speech and grossly exemplified the sacrifice of playing with a people's existence.

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of The Varsity for the 1976-77 publishing year. The Editor is solely responsible for editorial policy and is responsible to the Board in all other matters affecting the newspaper. As the job carries considerable authority and responsibility, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format, editorial policy, or internal structure, and names of prospective staff. The amount available for production staff salaries in recent years has ranged from $10,650 to $13,975 per publishing year, including a salary of $3,750 or less for a full time editor.

Applicants will be interviewed by both the current Varsity staff and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision. The editor may be removed from his or her position only by concurrent decision of The Varsity staff and the Board.

Medieval grad assistants object to contract offered to the university

After careful consideration of its provisions, we, the members of the bargaining unit enrolled in the Centre for Medieval Studies, do not find the contract offered to the University on our behalf by the GAA to be in our best interests as graduate students or as teaching assistants.

Our fundamental objection to the contract is that it is based upon a wrong understanding of the nature of our teaching activities. As this error is rooted in the further misunderstanding of our position in the academic community, this position should be carefully defined.

We belong to the academic community primarily as students: our principal occupation and obligation is to study. We have been accepted as colleagues by the faculty and administration of our department because of our potential to do at some future time what they themselves are already doing, and because of our willingness to develop this potential in a way mutually agreed upon. The relationship between faculty, administration, and students is such that their interests cannot be said to be naturally opposed. We have, then, a basic "contract" which attaches to our position as graduate students, and which cannot be ignored or impinged upon by any further contract into which we enter.

How, then, should we characterize the teaching and related duties which we undertake while pursuing our graduate work? Because our principal activity is study, we cannot consider teaching as our profession. On the other hand, it cannot be classified as a part-time job in the same sense as non-academic work in which we engage to support our academic activities. Because of its close relation to our graduate study, teaching must be viewed as a sort of professional training. As a corollary to this, the compensation which we seek for our efforts should be viewed as a bursary: its principal purpose being to enable us to continue our studies. Furthermore, all contract provisions should be accepted or rejected insofar as they are appropriate or inappropriate to the nature of our teaching activity as outlined. Upon this basis we have the following recommendations to offer:

There does not seem to be any sufficient reason for limiting graduate teaching jobs to "regular positions" as defined in art. 16.02. There are many students who desire professional teaching experience, but who regard a 10-hour position as an excessive infringement upon their study time. This problem as well as the desirability of offering professional experience to as many students as possible has led the Centre for Medieval Studies to establish teaching positions of 5 hours or less for its students. The teaching assistants at the Centre unanimously support this policy. We would recommend, therefore, that the offering of half or quarter positions should remain the prerogative of the department, which the provision that the salary of these positions should be proportionate to the hours worked; i.e., a 5-hour position should be compensated at one-half the rate of a 10-hour position.

To demand a 5-year contract for a job designed primarily for the support and experience of students is not legitimate (art. 16.01). A department should be allowed to be the judge of a student's competence in teaching, as they are the judges of his competence in all other academic areas; they should be allowed to extend his employment on this basis, or to terminate it. Moreover, when there are admittedly fewer jobs than there are students, a "tenure" policy severely limits the number who can gain the professional experience which is so indispensable in the overcrowded academic job market. Those who would suffer most from this policy are students who do not presently have a teaching position, and future students, two groups which have no voice in the present contract, and whose interests we are morally obligated to protect. What is important is that students are guaranteed the amount of work they are offered, and the compensation they have counted on. We would recommend, therefore, a 1 year contract specifying the nature and responsibilities of the position, the hours required, and the rate of compensation. While it is unrealistic to demand that job notification be given as early as April 1 for a fall appointment (art. 16.14) (many departments do not have a budget at this date), it is legitimate to expect that this be accomplished by June 1.

In the light of our understanding of graduate teaching positions, seniority is the least important criterion in the awarding of positions (art. 16.12). The University has stated that academic qualification, experience and suitability for the position should be among the criteria for hiring. We recommend that these be not only the principal criteria, but the only criteria.

In regard to art. 16.10 requiring that departments list available positions outside of the department, we recommend that this provision be stricken, as it contravenes a department's right and responsibility to provide for its own students.

In regard to evaluations (art. 14.07), we find it inappropriate to remove unfavorable work evaluations if, indeed, they are deserved. We would deplore the GAA's interference in proper departmental procedure for academic evaluation.

We hold that our academic freedom would be seriously infringed by compulsory union membership (art. 5.01). We recommend, therefore, that union membership be strictly voluntary, and that check-off (art. 6.01) be applicable only to union members.

Problems of tutorial and class size (art. 18) should be handled through grievance procedure. The individual is the best judge of his teaching environment. We recommend that the phrase "reasonable access" apply to all facilities mentioned in art. 26.01.

We recommend that teaching assistants continue to receive University holidays, but that no compensation be required for holidays falling on Saturdays or Sundays (art. 19.03-19.04).

We conclude with our wish that contract negotiations between teaching assistants and administration should be conducted with the understanding that we are colleagues and members of a common academic community.

This statement was read and accepted at a full meeting of the students of the Centre for Medieval Studies.

Flic hacks make film market flack

WINNIPEG (CUP) — An application for an inquiry into the market practices of the foreign-owned theatrical film distribution and exhibition system in Canada was filed February 4 with the Combine Investigations Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in Ottawa.

The application was announced by Sandra Gathercole, chairperson of the 8,000 member Council of Canadian Film-makers, at the 4th Winnipeg Film Symposium being held here.

Also signing the application for an inquiry into possible abuse of market control were author, television personality Pierre Berton, Saturday Night editor Robert Fulford, film directors Michel Brault, Alan King, and Peter Pearson, producer Budge Crawley and actor-writer Gordon Pinsent.

Practices of tied selling, exclusive agreements, and refusal to deal with independents were cited in the application as examples of abuse of market control. The applicants state that these practices have been employed in the Canadian feature film market from "at least the early forties to the present" and that they constitute an offense under the Combines Investigation Act.

Gathercole announced that 10 distributors and exhibition companies were named in the application, including Famous Players, Odeon Theatres, United Artists, Paramount and Columbia Pictures, Warner Brothers, Universal, Twentieth Century Fox, Avco Embassy distributors, and Walt Disney.

The application states that two foreign controlled corporations, Famous Players and Odeon, together control in excess of 63 per cent of the gross earnings of the $200 million annual Canadian box office. The distributors cited control between them more than 80 per cent of the film rentals in Canada.

The applicants contend that Canadian films have not had reasonable access to Canadian theatres owned by the major chains, and that independent Canadian exhibitors have not had access to first-run films handled by the U.S. distribution companies.

They also note that revenues earned in Canada by U.S. distributors have increased 98.9 per cent between 1970 and 1974. In 1974 Canada became the largest foreign market in the world for American films, while Canadian film production has fallen drastically over the past five years.

The applicants conclude that an inquiry is needed because the extent of foreign control of the Canadian market restricts legitimate competition and places Canadian films at an immense disadvantage in their own country.

Toronto lawyer Karl Jaffary was named as legal counsel for the applicants.

Contraception, Greer said, "would happen at most about three times a year without chemical intervention" and even less if the woman "was in tune with her body." "We really don't know what the effects of long-term medication are."

A chilling example of this she gave was the case of DES (diethylstilbestrol). A hormone given to women during the Second World War, its effects have only now become apparent in the daughters of these women Greer said. When they reach their early twenties, they contract anterior vaginal cancer.

Greer not only felt strongly for fellow-women in Canada and the U.S. who have access to contraception, but for those women in Third World countries who have it forced upon them with little consideration of the effects.

She spoke of those countries with vehemence and an obvious strong disapproval of the methods of international health organizations. "They're selling the Pill like they sell Coca-Cola. God knows what kind of a pill it is!"

"All out attempts to impose fertility regulations upon foreign people have been misconceived, brutal, and — thank goodness — largely ineffective." Greer cited as examples of contraceptive blundering the disastrous effects of the IUD on Hindu women in India.

The intrauterine device has as side effects heavy menstrual bleeding and increased cramps, which, bothersome to Western women, prove incapacitating to those of the East. Because of the lack of protein in their diets, Greer said, these women have difficulty replacing the increased amount of blood lost, and the enormous amounts of iron with it.

When menstruating, these women are outcasts from their villages, making it even more difficult to obtain food. On top of all this, Greer added, there is the fact that these women are doing heavy agricultural labour which affects very differently the pelvic and uterine muscles involved with an IUD.

The subject of abortion was another on which Greer felt very strongly. "It's an immoral act for doctors, lawyers or the Archbishop of Toronto to decide whether a woman should carry a pregnancy to full term," she said.

She surprised her audience when she added, "I agree that the average Canadian abortion is thoroughly repugnant. I deeply object to unnecessarily postponed abortions. What's the point of increasing the trauma?" she asked.

Greer felt there was only one kind of acceptable abortion — one that could be obtained as soon as desired, one that was non-traumatic, free and one that put no strain on therapeutic services.

When challenged with the question of whether a foetus is a person, she replied, "No." "A foetus is not yet a person. If you met a zygote in the street you'd be very puzzled as to how to address it. The fact of the matter is, a foetus may become a person and it may not."

Greer feels that the most effective and harmless contraceptive may be found in the form of prostaglandins. This is an abortive pessary that would bring on a late period and can be used without side effects. Greer feels that prostaglandins are relatively unknown in North America because they're "too bloody effective."

She pointed out that the major drug companies have a good thing going with the Pill and that to maintain the contraceptive status quo is a much easier and more lucrative situation than investigating alternatives such as this.

Greer concluded her speech on a poignant note.

"My concern is not for the Church, principally, the unborn — my concern is for the woman whose moral stature is to take care of herself. Love thyself. Don't make do with second-best."

HOW THE U.S. NAVY BRAIN TRAINS POLITICAL ASSASSINS

The controversy over whether the U.S. Government has ever made use of "political assassinations" seems certain to take a new turn after a remarkable disclosure a few weeks ago by an officer in the U.S. Navy.

In the course of conversation during a NATO-sponsored conference in Oslo, it was said that the U.S. Navy has been seeking out convicted murderers for retraining in a "political" role. The suggestion was supported by details of this training which, if they are true, might have been taken from the screenplay of Kubrick's film "A Clockwork Orange".

The details come from Lieutenant Commander Thomas Narut, a psychologist working at the U.S. Naval hospital in Naples. He was attending a NATO conference held in a hotel near Oslo at which about 120 scientists, including five from Britain, exchanged information on psychological research designed to help people in tough jobs — especially soldiers — to cope with stress.

Dr. Narut's story was later categorically denied — but no explanation was offered why a Navy officer should or could volunteer the detailed descriptions he did.

The conference heard papers on the effect of battle stress on soldiers in the Yom Kippur War, as well as on the backing out of supersonic fighter pilots, and on the long term effect of interrogation in enemy hands.

Dr. Narut's paper appeared to be much the same: the abstract circulated before the meeting was entitled: "The Use of Symbolic Model and Verbal Intervention in Inducting and Reducing Stress". And in the course of a ten minute discourse on it he did no more than hint at his work in teaching "combat readiness units" to cope with the stress of killing. It was only afterward under private questioning with a small group of listeners, and then later with Insight reporter Peter Watson, that Dr. Narut began to unfold his remarkable story.

GORY, VIOLENT FILMS

Dr. Narut is in his mid-thirties. He completed a doctoral thesis several years ago on whether certain films could provoke anxiety and whether forcing a man to do tasks irrelevant to the film while watching it might help him to cope with such anxiety (a technique described in Clockwork Orange). He began his speech to the conference by saying that in the U.S. Navy scientists were well provided with facilities for research. Psychologists, for instance, had access to computerized records, including psychological tests, of large numbers of personnel.

His naval work involved establishing how to induce servicemen who may not be naturally inclined to kill, to do so under certain conditions. When pressed afterwards as to what was meant by "combat readiness units", he explained this included men for commando-type operations, and — so he said — for insertion into U.S. Embassies under cover, ready to kill in those countries should the need arise. Dr. Narut used the word "hit-men" and "assassin" for these men.

The method, according to Dr. Narut, was to show films specially designed to show people being killed and injured in violent ways. By being acclimated through these films, the men eventually became able to dissociate any feelings from such a situation. Dr. Narut also added that U.S. Naval psychologists specially selected men for these commando tasks, from submarine crews, paratroops, and some were convicted murderers from military prisons. Asked whether he was suggesting that murderers were being released from prisons to become assassins, he replied: "It's happened more than once."

Another American delegate present in the group, Alfred Zitam, from New Jersey, was sufficiently surprised to remark to Watson: "Do you think Dr. Narut realizes what he has just said? That kind of information must be classified."

Later in private conversation with Watson, Dr. Narut described the training in which he had been involved. It had, he said, three phases:

SELECTION:

Research on those given awards for valour in battle has shown, said Narut, that the best killers are men with "passive aggressive" personalities. They are people with a lot of drive — though they are well disciplined and do not appear nervous — who periodically experience bursts of explosive energy when they can literally kill without remorse. Dr. Narut says he and his colleagues have therefore been looking for men who have either shown themselves capable of killing in this premeditated way (in Vietnam, perhaps, or in a murder in a barracks) or whom the Navy's tests show as potentially capable of it.

STRESS REDUCTION TRAINING:

The men selected are brought either to the Navy's neuropsychiatric laboratory in San Diego, California (which also trains spies in techniques to counter interrogation) or to the laboratory where Narut works in the U.S. Naval Medical Centre in Naples.

They are first taught to shoot, and then the "Clockwork Orange" training begins in earnest, to rid them of any qualms they may have about killing.

According to Dr. Narut, men are shown a series of special films "to heighten their dissociative powers with regard to killing." The films are gruesome and as the training proceeds they get progressively more horrific. Even so the trainee is forced to watch. His head is bolted into a clamp so that he cannot turn away, and a special mechanism also ensures that he cannot close his eyelids.

Dr. Narut said that one of the first films a trainee sees is a brutal, blow-by-blow account of an African youth being cruelly circumcised by fellow members of his tribe. No anaesthetic is used and the knife is obviously blunt (this film in fact is one regularly used in psychological experiments "to create experimental stress").

When the film is over the trainee is asked such questions as "what colour was the belt on the dictator's trousers?" or "what was the motif on the handle of the knife with which the circumcision was made?"

From here the trainees proceed to films with people from a little nearer home. In one the camera follows the movements of a man at work in a saw mill, slicing planks of wood along their length. The film shows the thrusting movements, back and forth until suddenly he slips — and cuts his fingers off.

In this way, said Dr. Narut, many of the trainees learn how to cope with even the most gruesome scenes with complete detachment. If psychological measures — like heart and breathing rate — which respond dramatically during the early films, calm down and resume their normal patterns as more bloodthirsty scenes are shown, the men are judged to have completed this stage. Many do not adjust, said Dr. Narut; presumably they are "failed".

DEHUMANIZATION OF THE ENEMY:

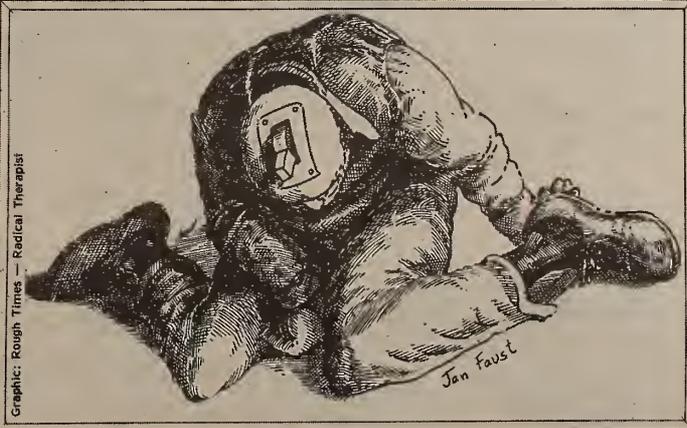

In this last phase, the idea is to get the trainee to think of the potential enemies he will have to face as inferior forms of human life. They get lectures and films which portray personalities and customs in foreign countries whose interests may go against the U.S. But the films and lectures are specially biased to present the "enemy" as less than human: the stupidity of local customs is ridiculed; local personalities may be presented as evil demigods rather than legitimate political figures.

The process, according to Dr. Narut, takes a few weeks and the men are passed on. He refused to say where the men went, arguing that he did not have the necessary security clearance. However at one point in our conversation he used the Athens Embassy as an example and he also said that his busiest time, when the largest batch of men went through this training, was towards the end of 1973, at the time of the Yom Kippur War.

Since our reporter returned from Oslo on Thursday, Dr. Narut has not been either at his home or his laboratory in Naples to comment on the issues raised by the disclosures. When we gave details to the U.S. Embassy in London, they referred us to the U.S. Navy office here.

The Pentagon in Washington last night denied categorically that the U.S. Navy had ever "engaged in psychological training or other types of training of personnel as assassins." They also denied that any such training had ever taken place either in San Diego or Naples. They have been unable to contact Lt. Commander Narut. All they were able to confirm was that he was indeed on the staff of the Navy Regional Medical Centre in Naples as a psychologist.

CIA-'We're merely making contacts'

Despite rumours of hundreds of CIA-instigated murders, the Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency insists that "there have been no assassinations."

Asked specifically about the death of Trujillo in the Dominican Republic, three-star general Vernon A. Walters, the presidentially appointed military chieftain of the CIA responded negatively. "We had merely made contact with the people who eventually killed him," Walters said.

Walters also reiterated the CIA's denial of any direct involvement in the overthrow and subsequent death of Chilean President Salvador Allende, saying that the CIA only contributed funds to the "democratic forces which Allende sought to obliterate." He points out that Allende had only 36 per cent of the vote and that the president of the Chilean Supreme Court and the Speaker of the House had declared that Allende's programme had gone outside the bounds of the constitution.

The Deputy Director emphasized that deadly toxins which the CIA had produced experimentally were never used. As for recently publicized experiments with LSD that had resulted in the suicide of an unwitting human guinea pig, well, you have to understand the spirit of the times in the fifties when it was thought that the Russians had a new diabolical brain-washing technique.

Ex-CIA agent Phillip Agee, whose book, CIA Diary: Inside the Company disclosed a damaging number of Agency secrets and covers, sees things differently.

"Shellfish toxin, cobra venom, poison dart guns, and illegal domestic operations are sensational and shocking. Damaging to the CIA as these revelations may be, however, they divert attention from the real victims of CIA operations: the millions of people who have been assassinated, tortured or imprisoned without trial after having organized to change conditions in their own countries," according to Agee.

Walters sees Agee as the best proof that the CIA does not perform assassinations, since he reveals so much classified information with complete impunity.

"If you listen to Agee, you might as well be listening to the Cuban radio," scoffed Walters, in reference to the fact that Agee researched his book with help from the Cuban government.

And, although Agee thinks that the CIA would interfere is Quebec separatists took power and attempted to nationalize industries, Walters denies it. "There have been plenty of other nationalizations," he says, "where the U.S. has not reacted, such as in Mexico and Saudi Arabia. Of course there has to be some compensation and not outright piracy."

More important, "Canada is simply not an intelligence target," insisted Lt. General Walters, now in his fourth year as Deputy Director. "Our interests are not at all incompatible with Canadian sovereignty."

And the Prime Minister will agree the United States conducts no undercover operations within Canadian borders without the knowledge and consent of the Federal Cabinet and the RCMP.

The Tobacco Companies

Money To Burn

The diversified multi-national companies that control the tobacco industry have a strong stake in keeping you smoking.

In 1974, Canada's tobacco manufacturers grossed $1.5 billion. About $215 from each and every smoker. They made a collective after tax profit of $52 million.

Interestingly, during the same period the federal and provincial governments took in $720 million in sales and excise taxes on tobacco. And in a recent ad directed at supermarket managers, R. J. Reynolds, the American firm which owns Canada's MacDonald's Tobacco Company, pointed out just how profitable cigarettes could be. In 1971, the ad claimed, cigarettes were the supermarket's number one money maker in the 'grocery' department, accounting for $51 out of every $1,000 of total grocery sales. Incidentally, the next three most profitable items were soft drinks, coffee, and pet food, in that order. As the Association for Non-Smokers' Rights commented, "food ranked so low it didn't even show up on the chart".

The corporate response to the controversy over smoking and health has been swift and strong. The following is a quotation from the United States Tobacco Journal, October 25, 1973:

TOBACCO COMPANIES SEE 'SUBTLE, CREEPING DANGERS'

"It has been pointed out that perhaps the most potentially dangerous threat to the future of the tobacco industry is not so much legislative smoking and advertising bans — or even outrageous levels of taxation — as the developing psychological idea that smoking is somehow socially unacceptable. As non-smokers in recent years have gone through various levels of what might be called consciousness-raising via anti-smokers' adroit use of media, there has been declining willingness to tolerate tobacco smoke.

"This "take-a-stand" attitude on the part of non-smokers has been reflected in the growing hue and cry for smoking bans, which has met with only limited success thus far, and for advertising bans, with both cigarettes and cigars now off the air — and attention turning to excluding tobacco advertising from print media.

"More subtle, but far more dangerous, is the creeping attitude that smoking is not always socially acceptable. If smokers can be made to feel guilty if they do something frowned upon in certain social situations, they're less likely to do it. There's a snowball effect, with the socially unacceptable situations widening. More and more smokers are likely to give up their pleasure altogether. Guilt is a powerful force.

"We think there is evidence of this attitude and it is apparently becoming more widespread. People who smoke, who enjoy it, many of whom are not on the least desirous of giving up their pleasure, are beginning — because of a developing social unacceptability — to enjoy it less and even forego it in certain situations.

"The tobacco industry must begin to think about this phenomenon and lay the ground work for a countervailing strategy to defeat it."

U OF T BIG WINNER IN TOBACCO COMPANY GRANT GRABBING

This strategy has included introducing 'low tar, low nicotine' cigarettes, and funding a variety of scientific projects. Clearly experimental evidence that proved that smoking was not a leading factor in the cause of cancer, or the development of an anti-cancer vaccine, reducing the fear of smoking, would not only benefit the public, but such results would remove a great deal of negative pressure on the tobacco companies.

To this end, hundreds of thousands of dollars have been given away, including $300,000 to Dr. Hans Selye, of the University of Montreal, to look for links between stress and smoking. An additional $300,000 was given to the National Cancer Institute of Canada, to administer as the institute saw fit.

From 1954 to 1968 the University of Toronto received $113,500 from the tobacco industry — more than any other university on Canada. The research money went to Dr. G. F. Wright, of the Dept. of Chemistry ($39,400). Dr. Ham of Anatomy ($9,700), and Hamilton of Pathology ($4,500). R. C. Ross at St. Michael's Hospital received a further $11,120.

The tobacco companies have also taken legal action from time to time, to protect their interests. In 1971, for example, the industry joined forces with three magazine publishers, and, of all people, the Canadian Football League, to take court action against the government of British Columbia, which was seeking to ban tobacco advertising in the province.

"I believe he's trying to tell you something."

MULTINATIONAL TENTACLES INTO DRUGS, BOOZE, SNACKS

The tobacco companies' primary response, however, has been neither research nor legal action. Instead there has been intense competition from the market, and corporate diversification into the closely related fields of alcohol and snack foods.

Imperial Tobacco, for example, manufactures or imports 23 of the 50 cigarette brands available in Canada. It also handles 24 pipe tobaccos and twelve lines of cigars, including White Owl, which has recently become known for its conservation awards.

Its present firm, Imasco, which in turn is controlled by the British American Tobacco Company, controls a number of other companies. At last count the list included: Top Drug Marts 40(plus) stores; the United Cigar Store-Incination chain of 230(plus) shops; 19 sporting goods stores (Collegiate Sports is one of them); and two American retail chains. Its food subsidiaries include: Tic Tac Mints; Pasquale Brothers; Unico; S & W Fine Foods; Grissol; three U.S. snack food companies; vending machines; and a caterer in Montreal.

The largest cigarette manufacturer in the world, and Imperial's nearest competitor in Canada, is Rothmans of Pall Mall. Part of a world-wide corporation, Rothmans is owned, indirectly, by a South African millionaire named Anton Rupert. In Canada his empire makes 11 brands of cigarettes, owns three breweries (Carling, O'Keefe, and Dow), four wineries (Jordan, Villa, Chalet and Growers) and an Alberta oil and gas exploration firm. Benson and Hedges, which is controlled by the American Phillip Morris Company, also makes 10 different brands. Benson and Hedges has only one direct subsidiary, a chain of tobacco stores that bear the corporate name. It recently sold Formosa Breweries divisions to Molsons. However Phillip Morris itself owns Miller Breweries, an Australian winery, and an industrial division.

Finally MacDonalds, which until 1974, was a Canadian company, is now owned by the U.S. giant R. J. Reynolds. It is a relatively small operation with approximately 18 per cent of the tobacco market, and several textile companies. The purchase price for MacDonalds was between $40 and $50 million.

Advertising is a key factor in tobacco sales. The companies spent a combined total of $20 million in 1974. That works out to about $3 per smoker per year in Canada. In the U.S. the companies spend only about half as much per capita. Launching a new brand can easily cost a million dollars for ads alone.

All in all, it's enough to ensure that we're Number Two. Canadians rank second in the world in the number of cigarettes consumed per capita.

Just behind the U.S. The smoke is thickest in Ontario and Quebec, where, statistically, the average smoker inhales 10,000 cigarettes a year — about 25 a day.

Who's Who

If you smoke, here is where your money goes:
 Imperial: Buckingham; Cameo; Embassy; Du Maurier; Gold Crest; Kool; Matinee; Millbank; Pall Mall; Peter Jackson; Phillip Morris; Playtex; John Players' Special; Sweet Caporal; Victory; Imports; Chesterfields; Kent; Lucky Strike; Newport; True.

Rothmans: Black Cat; Craven A; Craven M; Dunhill; Number 7; Perilly; Peter Stuyvesant; Richeieu; St. Moritz; Sportsman.

Benson and Hedges: Alpine; Belmont; Belvedere; Benson and Hedges 100's; Mark Ten; Maverick; Viscount; Parliament; Virginia Slims.
 MacDonalds: British Consuls; Contessa Slims; Export; MacDonalds; Cavalier; Winston; Wedgewood; Contessa Select.

NO SMOKING OXYGEN IN USE
 People are trying to breathe
 Non-smokers

Fuming Mad

Less than two-fifths of the adults in Canada are daily smokers. Only 45 per cent of Canadians smoke at all. It's hard to believe that the majority of people don't smoke, judging by the blue clouds hanging over classrooms and bar-rooms, but it's true.

Increasingly non-smokers are demanding the right to breathe clean air in public places. It's not that they're crabby puritans, it's just that, as one Toronto organizer said, "the fumes are more than annoying, they're dangerous."

Six times more smoke is emitted from the burning end of a cigarette than from the puffing end. This 'sidestream' smoke, as it is called, is more hazardous, too. It contains fifty times as much ammonia. Five times as much carbon monoxide. Three times as much benzpyrene, which may be a cause of cancer. Significantly more cadmium, which, experts report, may be a cause of emphysema. And twice as much tar and nicotine.

The pollutants can reach astonishing concentrations, even though this sidestream smoke is diluted by spreading through an entire room.

A NASA scientist calculated that a single cigarette smoked in a typical, well-ventilated office can raise the tar level in the air to 36 times the safety level in accepted clean air standards.

After thirty minutes in a smoke-filled room noticeable increases occur in a non-smoker's heart rate, blood pressure and the amount of carbon monoxide in the blood. During a day, a non-smoker can inhale pollutants equivalent to smoking between five and 25 cigarettes.

In one experiment, nearly twice the danger level of carbon monoxide was recorded in a smoky room. In the chair next to a person who had smoked seven cigarettes in one hour, in a ventilated room, there were concentrations of carbon monoxide of 90 parts per million. The danger level is 50 ppm.

Ten cigarettes were smoked in a car during another experiment, and carbon monoxide reached the same dangerous levels. The blood of both smoking and non-smoking passengers showed four times the normal level of carbon monoxide two hours later and twice the normal level four hours later.

Blood clots can result from the nicotine that non-smokers inhale just from being near a burning cigarette. Other experiments showed that the Vitamin C in your body is destroyed by the chemicals in the smoke. In fact one cigarette neutralizes as much Vitamin C as you could get from eating a medium sized orange, about 25 milligrams.

One out of ten people — 2,100,000 Canadians — have respiratory allergies. When a smoker lights up near by they may start coughing and wheezing. They may get dizzy, and their eyes may turn red and itchy.

But children are the most unfortunate victims. Kids whose mothers smoke are slower in school, and shorter than their classmates whose parents don't smoke, according to an English study. When both parents smoke, a child is twice as likely to get pneumonia or bronchitis before the age of one. Smoking during pregnancy increases the risk of death for the newborn infant by 24 per cent, and substantially reduces birth weight, an experiment in Quebec revealed.

And of course thousands of people die from tobacco-induced cancer and emphysema each year. When John Munro was Minister of Health, ten years ago, he said that "the cost of certain identifiable consequences of cigarette smoking in 1966 was about $400 million". Today the expense has probably more than doubled. The Globe and Mail reports that $1.7 billion was spent on 'problems arising from the use of tobacco' during the period 1961 to 1971.

Reform comes to Portugal's

By ART MOSES
For Canadian University Press
EVORA (CUP) — Portugal's south-central Alentejo region is where the country's deepest social revolution has occurred since the fall of fascism in April 1974.

Here thousands of rural farm workers now control the gigantic estates formerly owned by Portugal's grand seigneurs — the absentee "latifundarios" — who paid their workers starvation wages while neglecting their land.

For the lives of the poor rural population the improvement has been immeasurable. But as Portugal continues its steady move to the right, the latifundarios are poised to return.

"The land to those who work it" was the rallying call during the wave of land occupations which began sweeping Alentejo late last winter.

The province is dominated by the huge estates — Portugal's granary. The major crop is wheat, followed by oats, corn and barley, along with olives, cork, tomatoes, sunflowers, oranges and beef cattle.

Portugal's new military rulers wanted to humble the latifundarios who had been strong supporters of the old fascist regime. But the government's proposed agrarian reform was too timid for the rural poor. Years of bitter struggle had given them strong organizational potential and political awareness.

Encouraged by the Communist Party which enjoys solid majority support amongst Alentejo farm workers, they began declaring the estates theirs. They invited the men who managed the latifundarios' affairs to join them as fellow workers. Many did. Others left.

Faced with the massive occupation movement the government acquiesced, and began recognizing the workers' right to their land. The latifundarios could only withdraw and wait for the political winds to change.

Now Portugal's farm workers control about 1,000,000 hectares (about 4,000 square miles) mostly in Alentejo. The province's key districts of Evora and Beja have between 70 and 80 per cent of their land occupied. The rest belongs to small and medium-sized farmers who are divided in their support for the workers.

Elsewhere in Portugal right-wing forces, backed by the latifundarios, have mobilized thousands of private farmers against the agrarian reform. They are pressing the government to "disoccupy" the land. These farmers are predominantly from the north and centre of Portugal where most land holdings are small.)

The Alentejo workers have organized the estates into democratically-controlled cooperatives which have managed to improve crop production and working conditions remarkably in only a few months.

"Just before the occupations the workers were making 30 escudos a day (about $3.50) and only when there was work for us," said Francisco, a worker at the 22nd of July Cooperative just outside Evora, Alentejo's largest city about 140 kilometres south-east of Lisbon.

"Now we make 5,400 escudos a month (about $205), which isn't enough, but it's more than double what we were getting before."

"Before it was 7 days a week when we worked; now there's no working on Saturday afternoons and Sundays, and soon no working Saturdays at all. The co-operative pays us when we are sick and we get 18 days holidays with pay a year," he continued. (In 1964 the workers won the 8-hour day after a bitter strike, brutally repressed by the old regime.)

Most important, the cooperatives have virtually eliminated rural unemployment. In some areas, workers complain of a serious labour shortage. "Alentejanos" have returned to their native communities after spending years as emigrant workers in Northern Europe.

That is because the latifundarios never bothered to fully utilize their land. Vast sections remained uncultivated; they preferred investing in urban real estate and sure-tourist operations to the uncertainties of trying to improve land productivity in southern Portugal's less than perfect soil conditions.

They owned so much land — a medium sized estate would be 13 square miles — they received sufficient income from limited operations and from money received from peasants who rented small plots. Careful investment in fertilizers, irrigation, and other improvements was unnecessary to support their lavish urban lifestyles.

Agricultural experts agree Portugal could become a major exporter of wheat and other Alentejo grains, given technological improvements. But last year Portugal, even now one of Europe's largest grain producers, imported much of her requirements.

"The latifundarios didn't care about improving the land," one worker said, "they used the best soil and left the rest uncultivated."

The system meant chronic underemployment. Few jobs were available outside of seeding and harvesting times.

On the 22nd of July Cooperative 56 men and women are now employed full-time compared to 25 with uncertain job security before the occupation. This winter the workers have been going all-out to collect the full olive harvest, rarely attempted by the latifundarios.

"They used 2 or 3 women to pick the olives off the ground after the rain had knocked them down," another worker of July workers said in disgust. "The rest they left to rot!"

This winter about 20 workers have been in the olive grove since early November. Male workers hit the trees with wooden poles, while women workers — who still do not earn as much as the men — collect the olives from the ground. The collection is thorough from every tree — some 2,000 at the 22nd of July Cooperative.

Much of the crop is used for olive oil, manufactured in a factory the 22nd of July workers occupied just after taking over their estate. The oil — basic in Portuguese cuisine — is even more vital in the simple Alentejo country diet of bread and oil-based soups, rice, and some meat from the workers own herd. own animals and gardens, but only if all the workers agree that the private activity won't interfere with the cooperative's work.)

Most significantly, the workers have just managed a staggering increase in the amount of wheat sown for next year, after collecting a record harvest during the summer.

Some observers attribute the record harvest to particularly good weather, but the increased seedings — also corn, oats and barley — can only be attributed to the feeling that "now we are working for ourselves", in the words of one labourer.

But the workers face serious problems.

Many cooperatives suffered ruinous sabotage when the latifundiaros — anticipating occupations — sold all livestock, crop stockpiles, and farm machinery to foreign buyers. Now livestock herds are small; meat is in short supply. The workers must gradually rebuild the herds and cannot slaughter as many animals as before.

As Portugal continues its shift to the right, Agriculture Ministry officials who support the agrarian reform are being replaced by more conservative bureaucrats. Credits to the cooperatives — never given generously — are now even harder to get. Thus the equipment, seeds, livestock and fertilizer needed to really develop Alentejo's agricultural potential are being denied the workers.

Meanwhile, in Portugal's more populous north and centre rural areas, the right-wing political parties are supporting the massive protest against the cooperatives. A so-called "Confederation of Small and Medium-Sized Farmers" has held several large rallies, attended by many former latifundiaros, in which farmers demanded an end to the occupations. Some foreign journalists have been physically attacked at these rallies by people alleging they were Communist spies.

Although few small landowners have lost land to the workers, the conservative forces have apparently convinced many poor peasants they could lose theirs.

The campaign is similar to last summer's anti-communist hysteria fomented by the Catholic Church and local power brokers in the north.

The Confederation was initiated the night of November 24 when farmers blocked all roads north of Lisbon, just before Portugal's military authorities moved conservative troops to the capital to disarm its leftist regiments. The events of November 25, which the government called an attempted leftist coup, have swung Portuguese politics sharply to the right.

But when the Confederation tried to hold a rally in Alentejo on January 3, the cooperative workers showed up in force, along with many small farmers who supported them. After unsuccessfully appealing for military intervention to disperse the workers, the Confederation leaders left. The workers and farmers held their own meeting which strongly endorsed the agrarian reform.

The government has responded by virtually limiting the reform to southern Portugal, and leaving the door open for the return of some 70 per cent of the occupied land even there. There are also indications the government plans to interfere in workers' decisions on the cooperatives. The government has declared the cooperatives "national property".

The new regulations probably mean the end of several cooperatives scattered through northern Portugal. Here the Communist Party, which agreed to the new policy, has limited influence. But it is unlikely the government will move too harshly against the Alentejo revolution, at least not yet.

In a speech in Beja City January 18, Communist Party leader Alvaro Cunhal appealed to cooperative workers to help solve differences with Alentejo's small and medium-sized farmers.

Many cooperatives already have working arrangements with them, sharing equipment, leasing land and giving other assistance.

Cunhal has made it clear his party, which retains a tremendous ability to mobilize thousands of workers through Portugal, will not tolerate any return of the latifundiaros. The Communists so far have offered little more than verbal protests against the degenerating political situation — the release of former fascist police agents, the killing of demonstrators by regular police forces, the purges of leftists from the news media, and the continued imprisonment of leftist military figures.

But agrarian reform is basic to the Party's program and it is unlikely to betray the hopes of its traditional Alentejo supporters.

Travelling through Alentejo now, an outsider finds it hard to miss the all-pervasive feeling of hope and purpose when meeting these people long accustomed to bitter despair.

But it is also hard to miss the scores of Mercedes Benz' prowling the highways and the larger towns — reminders that although the old exploiting class has been removed and replaced, it is still waiting eagerly on the sidelines.

ELECTION

ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES

FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students:

Seats available - 2 in each of Victoria, New and Erindale Colleges
Seats available - 1 in each of Trinity, St. Michael's, Innis and Woodsworth Colleges

Faculty:

Departmental:
Humanities Life Sciences

NOMINATIONS

Nomination forms can also be obtained through Departmental and Registrars' offices or from the Faculty Office. Completed nomination forms must be received in the Faculty Office, Room 1006, Sidney Smith Hall, prior to 4:00 p.m. on February 16th, 1976 to be valid.

Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392. A complete description of the Committees and the Rules of Procedure are available upon request at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

UNIVERSITY OF

The recent presentation of the University of Toronto Budget offers a and the U. of T. administration towards the quality of post-secondary

I've Got a Secret

..The University of Toronto is a large institution employing thousands of people and responsible for educating thousands more. Its total budget is in the area of $170 million.

..You would think that, when dealing with an institution of this size, the Ontario government would give universities enough advance warning to make their plans. The university begins to spend money for its next fiscal year in ten weeks.

..Yet, the Ontario government has not yet announced the formula for financing universities and colleges for that year!

..Such an approach makes budgeting a game of speculation and intrigue — something akin to a huge floating crap game.

..Is this responsible government? Can it possibly lead to proper planning and good management?

Father Knows Best

..Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and University Affairs:

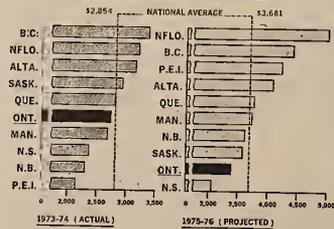

.. "This year, every province but Nova Scotia exceeds Ontario's operating grants to universities per full-time equivalent student. I make no apologies for the decline." McMaster University, January 14, 1976.

And More to Come:

..The Henderson-McKeough Report recommends

- increases in tuition of 65 per cent
- an all-loan assistance scheme
- reduction in numbers of faculty.

PROVINCIAL OPERATING GRANTS TO UNIVERSITIES
PER FULL-TIME EQUIVALENT STUDENT

BUDGETING:

.. Budgeting is not synonymous with planning; it should be a means by which plans should be put into execution. The budgeting process — the actual setting down of figures — should only proceed after there has been an opportunity for the university community to discuss the university's priorities.

.. At the community priorities.

.. Budget Cuts: The Ontario government's program of cutting back on universities will drastically reduce the quality of education, personnel and services at the University of Toronto. This fact is vividly demonstrated by the university's budget. Some of SAC's major concerns are:

Scarborough cut $293,000: The introduction of fares on the inter-campus shuttle bus. The elimination of some laboratory sections in science courses.

Dentistry cut $144,000: Dean Nikiforuk states that the laboratory staff reductions forced by the budget mean that students will be doing more lab work when their time would be spent more profitably in the clinic.

The U of T dental school, which already has by far the worst student-staff ratio of any dental school in Canada, will suffer further teaching staff cuts.

Innis cut $11,000: The elimination of the innovative writing laboratory.

Engineering cut $389,000: The continued use of old and outdated equipment — some surveying equipment still used by students dates from 1900.

An increase in the number of students in laboratory groups. Dean Etkin comments, "There is nothing pedagogically worse than too many in a lab party — better too few than too many."

unique opportunity to examine the attitudes of both the Ontario government education and how decisions are to be made affecting it.

All in the Family

..After months of shrouded discussion, the U of T Budget Committee presented the 1976-77 Budget on Tuesday afternoon at 4:00 pm. SAC received a copy Tuesday morning.
 ..President Evans may have known what the budget proposals contained, but few others did.
 ..Does this provide time for the university community to respond and participate in any meaningful way in the budgeting process?

Lost in Space

..Not only doesn't the university know what its' revenue will be, it also doesn't know the exact size of the largest component at the expenditure side — faculty and staff salaries, which account for 80 per cent of the budget expenses.
 ..Is it responsible for the Governing Council to decide a budget under such circumstances?

Let's Make a Deal

..During the campaign to place students on tenure committees, faculty claimed their commitment to the university was much greater than that of students.
 ..Is this commitment to the university evident in the faculty's demand for a big salary increase, which will certainly mean cuts in other areas to the detriment of a quality education?
 ..Is this commitment to the university evident in that the faculty have apparently waited to hear word of the government's level of support before settling the question of their own increase?

University of Toronto, this is not the case. The university is presented with a batch of figures, supposedly reflecting the of the institution. The problem is, no one has discussed those

..The university community must be given a chance to debate the priorities and direction of this institution before the budget makes discussion academic.

Health Services cut $75,000: Though previous discussion indicated that a health services budget cut would mean the closing of the infirmary, Health Services director Dr. Wodehouse has decided to save the infirmary for one year at least. This will mean dismissing two physicians — and still leave $25,000 to be cut in some other aspect of the Health Services.

Arts and Science cut $1,521,512: This cut is hitting every department hard.

In Political Economy the number of teaching assistants will be cut in half and class sizes will increase by 60 per cent.

In Chemistry the number of lab demonstrators will be reduced and the first year tutorials will disappear completely.

Medicine cut $589,000: Plans to phase out the Art as Applied to Medicine programme will be accelerated. There will be teaching staff reductions. The budget itself states, "As the staff-student ratio decreases, the quality of clinical instruction will decline."

U of T Library cut $469,307: Chief Librarian, R.H. Blackburn, points out that this cut, combined with inflation and the budget reductions of the last few years means that the book purchasing power of the library is 50 per cent of what it was six years ago.

Discussion is underway concerning further reductions in already extremely limited library hours.

A reduction in expenditure on library services will mean more waiting for less service in the library.

Law cut $30,000: The Law Library, "bad enough already" according to one law school official, will suffer further cuts in acquisition power and service.

Worker finds cooperatives work

The following article by Art Moses is a farmworker's account of the events described in his article on pages 10 and 11.

VIMIEIRO (CUP) — Diamantino Lopes pointed proudly at the milling machinery.

"It may look old but it will work. Next week we'll be making flour from the wheat from all the cooperatives of Vimieiro."

Lopes is from the Ilha Fria Cooperative near here. His current job is to guard the factory that workers from seven cooperatives in the area occupied last October 25. The factory includes a flour mill, bakery, machine shop, and other equipment for processing the region's agricultural products. It's by far the largest work-place in this town of about 2,000, 150 kilometres east of Lisbon and 40 kilometres north of Evora, the Alentejo region's largest city.

But the factory has been closed for five years. The owner had been phasing out operations and shifting them to two other plants, one elsewhere in Alentejo, another near Lisbon.

For Vimieiro the closing meant the loss of 25 stable jobs.

But now revolution has come to the town. Beginning last February the workers on the farm estates began occupying the land, ending the control of the local economy by the latifundarios. The resulting change in economic relationships was overwhelming.

The new local economy the workers are building has other uses for the old factory on the main road than as a playground for the town's rats.

Last October 25 the workers picked the lock and declared the factory property of the cooperatives of Vimieiro.

The old owner wasn't impressed. He said the workers couldn't do anything with it. He would be astonished if he came back to look. Just to make sure he doesn't get too close, Lopes and another worker keep the place guarded day and night.

"There's no way anybody else gets this factory," Lopes said. "It belongs to the cooperatives and we intend to keep it."

After two months of intensive labour, mostly by the cooperatives'

144 women workers, the factory is almost unrecognizable. The workers removed mountains of junk, discarded the dead rats, scrubbed floors, dusted and polished machinery, painted all walls and ceilings.

The cooperatives have hired a professional miller, a baker and some assistants. Soon they will be milling their own wheat, and baking bread.

Thus the cooperatives will have a completely integrated operation, supplying their own bread requirements, and selling surpluses to the public. They'll use the resulting income for badly-needed investments in the fields.

The workers are also setting up a farm machinery repair shop in the factory. The government extended credits for the purchase of welding equipment and other tools.

"Now there are 12 cooperatives involved and we use the factory as a meeting place," said Lopes, who has spent his last 35 years working on the 1,150 hectare estate (4.5 square miles) that became the Ilha Fria Cooperative. "This is where the government people come when they want to talk about lending money to the cooperatives."

The workers will deposit their tractors and other equipment at the factory. They have decided the cooperatives must share their machinery. Government credits helped buy tractors which scarcely existed in the area when the latifundarios ruled.

Eventually the factory will also mill feed grains, including the piles left by the old owner.

Just after November 25 a gang threw bombs at the factory but did no damage. The townspeople mobilized, dealt with the bombers and set up armed guards around the factory. Later troops from Evora came to search the factory for arms.

Lopes says three workers were arrested and one is still in jail. The workers are wary now about the support they can expect from the military.

Lopes said several small farmers with land near the factory are hostile toward the cooperatives. "They liked the old regime better." But for the workers there's no turning back the clock. The opportunity they now feel of freedom and economic power, the feeling that pervades Alentejo region, is something many would die for rather than give up.

More than an Engineer.

Our Military Engineers are very specialised people.

They design and build bridges, airstrips, base facilities, supervise and maintain all kinds of equipment on our bases around the world.

It's a very special job. One that involves working with men. Guiding them. Training them. A job where you can apply your knowledge in all kinds of challenging situations.

If you're into engineering, we can get you into something more than just an office job. An Officer's job where you can develop your full potential.

Give it some thought. We can give you plenty of opportunities to use your specialised knowledge in some very unusual ways.

Boycott over

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Postal Workers announced February 5 it was officially calling an end to its Boycott of the Postal Code Campaign.

"The Boycott of the Postal Code was a protest against automation without negotiation. We have succeeded in negotiating good protection from automation in our new Collective Agreement. We feel the articles in the Collective agreement give our members sufficient protection as long as the employer lives up to them," said CUPW President Joe Davidson.

The Union started the Boycott Campaign in late 1972. Canadian businesses and the public have been slow to adopt postal codes, which are essential to the automated mail system.

"Most Canadians do not believe that working men and women should be thrown out of a job or have their pay slashed because of a machine," said Davidson.

"Our Union was trying to negotiate basic security for postal workers faced with a mammoth automation program. Finally, with the help of an impressive public Boycott of the Postal Code and strike action, the government came around to seeing the issue our way."

"On behalf of all postal workers, I extend our sincere thanks for the solidarity and support shown by so many Canadians. We hope the protections we have won with their help will become a model for other Canadian workers. Technology should be for the benefit of working people, not a weapon to be used against them and we have won recognition of this principle", concluded Mr. Davidson.

Jobs for residents 'ensured'?

OTTAWA (CUP) — Manpower and Immigration Minister Robert Andras announced in late January that discussion will shortly be started with the provinces "on the ways and means of ensuring that Canadian postgraduates receive fair consideration for university teaching positions."

Andras said his concern is "jobs for Canadian residents" and that immigration policy can be used to achieve this objective.

He noted in his statement that the influx of university teachers from abroad occurred with the rapid expansion of the universities a decade ago, when there were insufficient numbers of Canadian graduates available to fill teaching vacancies.

But his concern now "is that Canada may now have a surplus of postgraduates." Andras pointed out that he could take unilateral action to control the admission of foreign academics, but rejected this approach "because while we (the federal government) are responsible for the admission of persons into Canada, the provinces are responsible for education."

Don Savage, executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) said in an interview he finds Andras' statement "rather vague". CAUT, he said, plans to meet with Andras later this month "to find out what he meant by the statement."

Savage said CAUT would prefer to see universities set up their own review committees to consider appointments of foreign academics rather than government involvement.

He said the CAUT policy is that a foreign academic should have "substantially better" qualifications to receive an appointment than Canadian applicants for the same position.

Mustangs muzzle blues in London

By JONATHAN GROSS
Sports Editor

The road is not smooth for the Varsity Blues, literally or figuratively. Everywhere they go it's a special treat to "Beat Bay Street". Earlier in the month in Kingston the Blues split a weekend with the Queen's Gold Gaels before a crowd that cheered so loud that "... you'd think they'd just won the Stanley Cup," as Blues forward Graham Wise chose to describe it. Queen's was David to Toronto's Mustangs.

Friday night in London was no exception. The J. Gordon Thompson Arena was the scene of a "neat night out" for the estimated crowd of 3,500, who booed the Blues to a 4-3 loss at the hands of the Western Mustangs.

Obviously the fans did not win the game but they certainly helped. Greg Keating of Western, who forechecked and backchecked without relent, commented on the crowd. "They're usually pretty docile and apathetic but tonight they were with us all the way. It's hard to understand." No it isn't.

The Blues are a hurting skinny club. Larry Hopkin's eye is still unplayable, while Graham Wise hurt himself in the Guelph brawl. The list goes on: Al Potts is out with an ankle and Wayne Morrissey is playing in less than perfect condition. John Bays is inexperienced but the Blues need him, so he's on the blueline.

Western won the game with forechecking and backchecking from people like Keating and leading scorer Peter Fraser, who scored two early goals to put the Blues in an early hole. The Mustangs pressed all game, driving puck carriers behind Mark Logan, forcing errant passes, and generally messing up the Blues' system.

Taking an early two-goal lead Western put Toronto in a "catch-up situation" very early. Adding one later in the first and a fourth in the second Western provided themselves with a four goal cushion.

Western scored two goals on their first two shots on goal. With only 23 seconds gone in the game Fraser took a pass from linemate Steve Gelinas and rifled a wrist shot past an unsuspecting Mark Logan. Mike "Misdemeanor" Hannan went off about a minute later for an errant elbow giving Western a power play opportunity. Wasting no time Fraser was found unattended at the same spot he scored the first tally from and he drove a punishing drive high into the rigging to make it 2-0.

Mark said he was ready for the second goal but it was a labelled shot and he couldn't get near it. Logan has played a lot of hockey recently and he knows it's beginning to show. He will probably get a rest this week as Dave Hulme is scheduled to go against Waterloo Tuesday.

Logan was staring at a red light later in the period when Western practically forced the Blues into their own net. Larry Russell tapped in the umteenth rebound to up the deficit to three with just over five minutes to go in the period.

The second period started off with more of the same and the crowd loved it. Kent Ruhke had an up and down night, victimized for one goal while scoring two in a losing cause. Midway through the period Ruhke was chased behind his net and the puck was taken off his stick by a Western player who threw the big fella aside like empty luggage. The rubber disc, weighing approximately six ounces, ended up in the net after Dan Smith knocked in his own rebound.

From this moment on Mark Logan found himself at the wrong end of some vicious "razzberries", not unlike the treatment Dave Reece received Saturday.

Gord Davies wired Tom Watt in Austria after the game to report the loss. Actually the team only lost the first half of the game. Later in the second Ron Harris put the Blues on the purple scoreboard by stuffing in a rebound from Bill Fifeild's stick. Late in the period Ruhke raced in from the left wing and jammed the puck past Cam Fink's keister.

The third period was action packed as the Blues tried to pull it out of the fire. Early in the stanza Ruhke came down the right side and found the short side unprotected. No hesitation. 4-3 for Western. Midway through the period Captain Kent had a possible hat trick disallowed when it was ruled he batted it in with a glove. Game over.

The Blues complained after about the size of the rink. "It was practically oval." John Precious was very vocal on this point. A carpenter who blames his tools...? The Blues were outthrust from the start and although they came back to make it close Western never let up. Peter Fraser of Western remarked after the game: "I hope to hell we meet in the finals. I'll be another great game." For who Peter?

BLUE WAILS The team outshot Western 36-32... Once you get past Western's "This isn't the NCAA-but-don't-we-look-nice" philosophy and the mondo bizarro student body who live by the creed, "This isn't U of T but aren't we having a good time," London is a decent place... Blues are in Waterloo Tuesday.

Never mind the puck; where is the goalie? This wasn't a goal as Mike Hannan couldn't get a grip on the elusive ellipse. Kent seems to be having a good time.

Skibums part III

By JAY WAKES and
JOHN LUBELSKI

Just as the West has its cliches, many skiers believe that skiing in the East is confined to a few selected areas in Quebec and Vermont. You may be surprised by the fact that the best skiing in the Northeast is a hop, skip and jump from Buffalo in up-state New York.

Whiteface mountain, part of the Lake Placid complex, provides more than the greatest vertical drop in the East. It is the most complete winter sports facility in North America. Whiteface Mountain is part of the great Adirondack Range. Located near Wilmington, New York, it is equally accessible from either Toronto or Montreal. Serviced by both the NY State Thruway and the Adirondack Northway, it is only a one-hour drive from Toronto.

As the site for the 1980 Winter Olympics, one can well imagine the diversity and difficulty of the slopes of Whiteface. The mountain itself, which has a vertical rise of 3,100 feet is a complex of 28 interconnecting trails. Although geared more to the expert and intermediate level, Whiteface does provide an adequate amount of area for the novice.

The challenge of skiing Whiteface rests in the quickly changing terrain coupled with narrow tree-line trails. Because of its location, Whiteface rarely has powder or soft snow conditions. The snow is more often hard packed or icy resulting in fast times over the two to five mile trails.

As part of the Lake Placid complex, Whiteface Mountain provides a diverse range of accommodations and entertainment. The town of Wilmington itself is a quaint settlement in the Rip van Winkle style. Here one may choose between small guest houses which provide two meals a day or the most luxurious rooms provided by your basic Sheraton Inn or Howard Johnson's. Since 1932 when Lake Placid first hosted the Olympic games, it has attracted vacationers from all over the world. As such a place one will find that there are a number of great restaurants and apres ski lounges.

As previously mentioned this area is more than the best ski area in the Northeast. Rather than skiing, one may enjoy a full array of winter activities, including sleighing, hockey at the olympic rink, and bobsledding.

Apily named the "champaigne of winter sports", bobsledding is perhaps the most exciting way, short of sex, of whiling away the afternoon. The bobsled run at Mt. Hoeenberg is acknowledged by many experts to be finest in the world. Under the control of the NY State Dept. of the Environment, Whiteface provides an excellent bobsled competition and learning program. Since the program was introduced in the 1950's, over 10,000 men, women, and children have learned this sport.

Whiteface is a convenient spot for some Reading Week recluse and its proximity to our border makes it a facile weekend venture. Though it is known for its luxurious living, Lake Placid can be enjoyed without emptying the coffers providing your accommodations are more in the guest house category. An exclusive area, it provides a fun alternative to Vermont. The Canadian dollar is on par with the US buck so take advantage now!

Grads reject university offer

By LEARYAN

The Graduate Assistants Association voted 3 to 1 at a general membership meeting of over 200 Monday evening to reject the contract proposals offered by the U of T administration.

The recommendation to reject came from the bargaining committee, which asked to "be sent back to the bargaining table for a better offer." Nancy Wallack, delivering the report on conciliation, stated the university had not moved on most key issues.

A major fight is emerging around the non-negotiable issue of union check-off, said Wallack. "We need it to survive." There was strong feeling at the meeting in support of check-off, and a number of speakers reiterated their determination to win this demand, as they recounted the hard work it had taken to build the GAA to date.

Wallack stressed that removal of these individuals would allow the university to determine arbitrarily the composition of the unit, and would set a precedent for removing other sections. "Next year it could be Engineering, the year after, Arts and Sciences. We can't allow this precedent to be set."

Job security was "not guaranteed in any way" said Wallack. The GAA's demand is that teaching assistants be hired for a specified period of time, longer than a year, with firing only for just cause such as "unsatisfactory performance or a drop in enrollment."

The GAA is also fighting to maintain a specific number of jobs, or collective job security, and will "listen to any serious proposal from the university assuring this." A similar reasonable attitude will be shown by the GAA on class size.

"We want to work at this indirectly, and establish a precedent for limitation of class size. We will be able to grieve gross violations now."

"The wage rate proposal is also very low," Wallack said, adding the U of T's offer ranged from $2,100 to $2,875, while a recent offer to teaching assistants at McGill was $3,750 plus tuition. The GAA is also asking a higher rate for part-time instructors.

The mood of the meeting, reflected in the overwhelming 3 to 1 vote, led to consideration of how to increase the union's strength, and show their determination to reject the contract. The meeting passed two resolutions, one to reopen the membership drive for the GAA, thereby building support among graduate students themselves.

NUS needs plus from us

By BOB BETTSON

U of T students will vote on continued membership in the National Union of Students (NUS) with an increased levy to $1.00 per student in a referendum March 10 and 11.

The referendum, which will be held with the Students Administrative Council elections, is one of a series across Canada for the three year old national student organization as it builds its membership.

U of T is already a member of NUS as a result of a 1973 referendum but a new mandate is needed for the increase in the per student levy from 30 cents to one dollar. The new levy would be added to the present $15.50 SAC fee.

According to NUS field worker Gavin Anderson the increased budget will enable NUS to expand its limited staff to work on action-wide student issues. Anderson says after 16 successful referendums NUS membership is up to 170,000 and should go over 200,000 by the spring.

The top NUS priority, Anderson says, is doing lobbying and research to fight for a better national student loan program. The fiscal arrangements act and the Canada Student Loan program are being renegotiated in 1976-77.

The increased budget from $50,000 to $200,000 Anderson said, will enable NUS to provide fieldworkers to work with student unions across Canada, as well as researchers and national office staff in Ottawa.

NUS presently has two fieldworkers and a national secretary in Ottawa.

Another major NUS priority is a campaign to provide student summer employment. Anderson predicted this summer will be the worst in many years. Government cutbacks and the cancellation of Opportunities for Youth will likely increase last summer's 17.6 per cent student unemployment.

NUS is also concerned with lobbying and research on other issues such as student housing, foreign students, women's rights and student services.

In the field of services NUS is only now able to consider new initiatives with a large membership base. Negotiations have started with the AOSC travel agency.

Anderson explained NUS is very close to the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) in both philosophy and practice, but works on national issues.

SAC has already endorsed NUS membership and will be conducting a campaign in support of the referendum according to SAC external affairs commissioner Rob Snell. The campaign will concentrate on informing students about NUS and its objectives.

Int'l view-our education poor

By KRISTINE KING

A renowned international organization criticizes the Canadian system of education as being inadequate and severely lacking in coherent goals.

A committee of five from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) covers the entire range of public education from early childhood to adult continuing education in a 100-page working paper on education in Canada.

The OECD review, which will be formally published by the organization, was made public yesterday by Ian Morrison on behalf of the Canadian Association for Adult Education (CAAE) where he is Executive Director.

Morrison said the CAAE obtained the "restricted" document from an unexplained source and given the fact that it raises matters of "so much importance", they decided to distribute it to the press in hopes of stimulating public debates and forums on education.

Morrison wants to see approximately 20,000 copies of the document distributed across Canada and has already approached the Students' Administrative Council at the U of T to solicit support for the enterprise. At a council meeting Monday night SAC voted to cover half the publishing costs.

The OECD is a club of twenty-four affluent countries which was founded in 1916 to promote policies to expand economic growth and world trade. It also promotes the development of innovative policies among its members in such matters as science, technology, manpower development and education.

The report was written by five members of the OECD, who have a strong background knowledge in the field of education. They composed their findings after a one month visit to Canada last June during which they studied reports made by the provinces.

Three of the members are citizens of countries with federal systems of government, (Belgium, U.S.A., Germany), and Morrison emphasized this point of fact as being important in their understanding of the problems Canada faces.

Morrison said the report exposes the grievous neglect of the underprivileged in the Canadian education system. The report states that "most provinces fall far short of adequate provision in public schools for handicapped children." It goes on to say "these children must either be sent to expensive private institutions" or they "are simply kept at home" which is illegal.

The government has also not coordinated its activities in the area of Native People's education, according to the report. It claims "native children suffer as do handicapped children from the splintering of responsibility for their education among several sectors of government."

As a consequence, "there is no overall conception for the improvement of the education opportunities of native children, and for their steady and devoted realization."

The report comments on all areas of Canadian education. It states there is great need for improvement in promoting bilingualism, especially in British Columbia which it finds is the only province that "has not taken any special measures."

Also, the study of art, music and physical education have been largely viewed as "frills" within the system, according to the study.

In addition the report claims that women are more under-represented at administrative levels than statistics would have us believe, and that the Canadian education system is structured so as to inhibit general citizen participation in the decision-making process.

Cleaning jobs are on the block as a result of last week's budget announcement.

Staff union fears elimination

By MIKE EDWARDS

The University of Toronto is attempting to smash one of the staff unions according to union chief steward Bob Gibson.

Gibson is asking all 700 members of Service Employees International Union (SEIU) local 204 to come to a meeting today at 8 pm at the War Amps. The University of Toronto and its cutback policies will be discussed.

The university has announced it intends to lay off 46 night watchmen. Gibson is upset that the 1972 contract signed with the university offers no job security even though the University claimed that it did.

According to Gibson the 1972 agreement only offers security against contracting the work out to other workers. Thus if the university wants to eliminate jobs it can. The university budget guidelines have suggested at least another 80 support staff will get the boot.

Gibson is also upset the university has hired three new U of T police while it claims to be laying people off. Gibson has proof that U of T police have been handling parking problems. Parking attendants are members of SEIU.

"There are too many chiefs and not enough Indians" said Gibson in a telephone interview last night. He was referring to the 16 foremen who work at night hassling the cleaning staff. According to Gibson there should be ten cleaners working at night in Sid Smith, now there are only three women who are continually harassed by the multitude of foremen.

Newbies end occupation

FREDERICTON (CUP) — 700 protesting students from colleges and universities across the province have decided to end their 12-day demonstration for increased student aid following the New Brunswick government acceptance of an agreement drawn up by student negotiators.

The agreement calls for one representative from the provincial government, one student representative and a third person chosen by the two representatives to meet Feb. 15 to begin negotiations for changes to the student aid program in New Brunswick. The agreement was signed by Premier Hatfield, youth minister Jean-Pierre Ouellet, and student representatives.

Another factor which forced students to call off the demonstration was the lack of accommodation in Fredericton for more than 600 students from the Université de Moncton. These students had been occupying the lobby of the Centennial Building (where provincial offices are located) since Jan. 28 until police last Sunday forced students out of the building. Students were offered accommodation in a nearby church for the night, but were asked to leave today following protests from the church's parishioners. Student union officials at the University of New Brunswick were reluctant to help accommodate the students in the student union building for the fear of violence breaking out between protesting students and UNB students on campus.

The decision to end the occupation at the Centennial Building was made after a two-hour discussion amongst all the protesting students. Some students were reluctant to leave, feeling that the protest should continue until their demands were met by the government.

At U de M, a mass rally is being planned by students for Tuesday and Wednesday to devise a new strategy for applying pressure on the government. Many of the U de M students felt that students were going to be back again to protest.

Polluter pushes paintings

By KEN WYMAN

Reed Paper wishes people would forget that its subsidiary in Dryden, Ont. has dumped thousands of pounds of poisonous mercury into the rivers which feed the natives of the White Dog and Grassy Narrows Reserves.

It wishes the public would ignore its application to expand its lumbering operations into 25,000 square miles of northern Ontario forests. Part of their attempt to paint a clean corporate image involves sponsoring a $30,000 to $40,000 art exhibit — ironically enough, a display of Canadian landscapes — at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

But more than a hundred environmentalists, artists, and native rights advocates will be on hand to make the opening of the exhibit this coming Friday an evening to remember.

Protesters are irate that Reed can afford the money to host an art exhibit, but not to clean up the pollution they have caused in the English-Wabagou River system. They are astonished that Reeds have received more than $2.5 million from the Federal Department of Regional and Economic expansion in grants . . . and 118,640 in tax incentives from the Ontario Government. Reeds have now applied for a grant for their proposed northern expansion (in forestry operations)."

Not only have they not cleaned up their deadly mess," said Jill Tory, one of the organizers of the demonstration, "but they continue to make it worse. The river is completely dead for 40 miles." Tory pointed out.

Many of the artists whose paintings will be on display as part of the exhibit are equally upset. Jack Chambers has written to Roald Nasgaard, one of the gallery's curators, demanding his work be withdrawn from the show unless "a new sponsor for the event be found."

"As an artist and a concerned individual," Chambers wrote, "I object to the use of my art in this blatant propaganda attempt by the company to present itself as a friend of both the arts and the environment."

"I am insulted and horrified by the kind of corporate hypocrisy that allows Reed to take credit for an art exhibition glorifying the Canadian landscape, when, in fact, Reed and others like them are directly responsible for destroying it."

Chambers is not the only prominent Canadian artist upset by the show. Joyce Wieland, and Michael Snow, whose art works were included in the exhibit without their knowledge, are expected to make statements at Friday evening's demonstration.

Our rundown on the candidates for Governing Council should have included the name of Irene Allison, who is contesting along with six others for the two seats in the part-time undergraduate.

When we printed the election results for CUPE 1230 last week, we said that Clem Shillingford was elected Secretary-Treasurer. Lolita Ona was actually elected to that position. Apologies. The writer has been beaten.

Attention: This is the last issue of the Varsity for this week. We will publish again Feb. 25, the Wednesday after reading week. Here and now forms and letters to the editors should be in the office Tues. Feb. 24 by 1 p.m. and 3 p.m., respectively.

U of T grads tell you how to do it

By ERIC McMILLAN

Toronto is a city of contrasts:

For instance, above the Roy Rogers fast-food joint at 83 Bloor St. West is a store selling books like "The Up-with-Wholesome, Down-with-Store-Bought Book of Recipes and Household Formulas."

The Can-do Bookstore is the only store in Canada specializing in how-to books, according to Sue Chaiton who opened business last September with co-proprietor Stan Adelman. From talks with friends in the book-selling trade, the two U of T graduates learned that among the most popular books sold were those teaching crafts, hobbies and home-repairs.

And the nearest shop dealing exclusively in how-to books was in Philadelphia.

Chaiton and Adelman feel their is a store whose time has come. Chaiton agreed they are part of a do-it-yourself movement. "People you hire don't even have the skills anymore." From renovating her own home she learned, "The trades are not as good as they used to be and they charge an arm and a leg."

Chaiton admits the recession might have something to do with the increasing numbers of people baking their own bread, growing their own vegetables, spinning wool, and so on. Her clientele tends to be middle class, "the people caught in the middle, wanting to fix up their homes and learning crafts."

The store's biggest sellers are furniture-making books and back-to-the-land manuals.

"The idea doesn't stop at just books," said Chaiton. The store has already sponsored a furniture-making demonstration and plans are being made for courses on bike repair and photography and for handicraft displays.

Inflation has also hit the book industry but Chaiton pointed out Can-do books have a wide price range. For example, books on macrame instruction range from 60 cents to 15 dollars.

Can-do stocks around 20,000 books in its brightly renovated quarters but will order any book not on hand. Asked whether she expects to make a profit the first year, Chaiton said "I haven't a clue." Apparently neither her nor her partner have much business experience and she said there's "a good chance" they'll suffer losses for a while.

So far books on everything from bonsai to practical karate, cookbooks to plumbing, log-cabin building to dome construction, scrap craft to solar heating . . .

And where else can you find a book titled "Frisbee: A practitioner's manual and definitive treatise."

Student calls terminal "disgusting"

By DARYL PIPA

The Bay street Bus Terminal, better known as the "Bus Barn" is a disgusting, • humiliating and dangerous place, according to Pauline Boote.

The middle-aged Ontario College of Art and active community workers says conditions in the summer are terrible, holiday weekends are a nightmare and reading week should prove possibly fatal to numerous student voyagers.

Boote cites a recent trip to Peterborough as a typical "Bus Barn" dilemma. If one can manage to survive the half-hour wait for a decent seat, standing in the cold dodging buses passing through the same traffic lane, straining to hold one's suitcases just above the filthy slush, one is certain to be overcome by the suffocating fumes and noise, she maintains.

Boote has taken pollution tests of the Bay Street terminal which seemed excessively high to her, however she said the Ministry of the Environment insists they find no "significant" air pollution readings. However another such "professional" assured Boote, "Sleeping behind a greyhound bus while it is idling will probably not affect your health."

She revealed an important factor in setting "acceptable" air pollution levels is that occupational levels allowed to be considerably higher than the environmental since it is believed the body can tolerate such levels of pollution when exposure is restricted to working hours.

Nevertheless, Boote points out the remark made by one Occupational Health Protection Branch official who said, "We should probably have a lot more tests on these things."

Part of the reason for the inertia at the "Bus Barn" is that plans are being discussed for a new transportation terminal. Three such ideas include the 401 site where it meets Spadina, the removal of the Elizabeth Street Terminal to Union station to operate in conjunction with GO trains, and retaining, but improving the present Bay Street location.

Viewing students as major users of the Bay Street terminal, Boote adds, "What I would like is for people, especially the students, to offer suggestions for improvement even on a temporary basis. We could do a lot more with the main terminal with what we have now."

All reading-week travellers should beware the "Bus Barn", den of smoke.

The university: two views

To read a copy of the week-old budget recommendations and then the nine-year-old Macpherson Report puts one in the middle of severe case of time-warp trauma. Can they both be talking about the same university?

The Macpherson Report, published in 1967, was the result of years of talk about the role of teaching and undergraduate education. For its time, it produced some fairly lucid recommendations about how faculty should teach and how students should learn. It was no weak-kneed document by any means. It took swipes at all of the major academic traditions. The almighty lecture and exam, research versus teaching and much more came under their scrutiny.

Almost everything the report stood for has been unravelled and forgotten in this time of trouble. Those who wrote the report are probably shaking their heads and saying "ah well, Disneyland couldn't last forever."

For a start, the report looked forward to the death of the lecture as the main component of undergraduate instruction. There were reasons for this, among them the suspicion that the lecture was just a way of cramming information into students while taking no responsibility for the student's synthesis of this information.

Nine years later, what do we have? The schedule according to the budget recommendations calls for the compression of almost everything but the lectures. You can kiss your labs and tutorials goodbye, but your right to sit in a classroom with 120 other people and listen to someone give you the truth according to someone else is guaranteed.

And how utopian they were back then. Recommended tutorial size: 10 to 12 people.

The report spent some time on the criterion for academic appointments and promotions. It seems a mite useless in the wake of the hiring freeze instituted last year.

The report dealt with ways of attracting more grad students for teaching positions on campus. This year they're trying to find ways to discourage them.

The report detailed the steps the university could take to avoid the "monolith" reputation it was building up. They could have no idea then that in nine years their lives would be controlled by one committee.

The list goes on. It is sufficient to say that everything the university hoped it could stand for has been sacrificed in the name of some mythical "restraint."

It's not as simple as saying "well, these things cost money and we haven't got any." Rather, these things were and remain essential to the proper operation of this institution, and if we are not allowed to run it properly, why the hell are we bothering at all?

The university today couldn't be farther removed from what they thought it could be nine years ago. According to the government, it's nobody's fault but are own. The longer we buy this damn fool line, the farther the gap will widen between what we hope for and what we'll get.

Election report inaccurate: Hurko

To The Editor:

I would like to make a few comments to your report of the CUPE election in Varsity of Feb. 9, 1974. It mentioned the Greg Collins statement that "the election was based on principle, not on personalities". Although "progressive slate" and "Hurko slate" presented two diametrically opposed platforms the election was not based on principles but on the personalities issue.

When I accepted nomination for the president of CUPE Local 1230, one week before the election, the "progressive slate's" campaign was already in progress. After we presented our platform the "progressive slate" started to back up from their original "blue and orange" platforms and introduced the "yellow platform" abandoning their political principles and adopting concrete Union issues.

On top of this they started to spread rumors that our team was "selling-out" to management. Ironically some of our supervisors and heads of departments were intimidating our team, preventing us from campaigning or forbidding us even to discuss union issues in the offices where we work. Members of the "progressive slate" were diligently campaigning during working hours showering all of us with their literature (5 colorful publications plus some anonymous masterpieces of vicious invective and intimidation), posted on Union boards, all designed to undermine the confidence of our members and to discredit my abilities to serve as president of our Local.

"Progressive slate" won this election on the basis of "cult of personality" which is almost unavoidably introduced with the kind of political movement that "progressive slate" represents.

It should also be pointed out that although Judy Darcy was re-elected by 174 votes, this is in fact less than half of the total membership of CUPE local 1230. 92 people voted for what the "Hurko slate" stood for, and by their vote protested against the reality of a union which became the bulwark of a political movement dedicated to destroy the foundation of our democratic society. 100 members, most of whom are so disgusted with what happened during Judy Darcy's term last year, did not vote at all. Many, many members of this Local are in fact so disgusted that they would prefer to have this Union de-certified.

The result of this election puts our Union in a tragic state. It has revealed a very deep and irreconcilable split that divides it in two belligerent factions that will eventually lead our Union to destruction, thus serving the ulterior goal of University management.

Gov Con runner replies to letter

To The Editor:

In a letter to Monday's Varsity, news editor Mike Edwards calls upon U of T students to ignore the upcoming Governing Council election on the grounds that the body

How are the following facts related?

Roy McMurtry proposes and the government imposes seat belt legislation.

The federal government doesn't propose but somehow imposes anyway, the wage controls. Price controls have yet to be heard from.

Prime Minister Trudeau warns in a nationally broadcast speech that if we, the people, do not cut back on our riotous living, we, the government will have to cut back for us, the people. "The system isn't working," implies that Trudeau has another system up his sleeve.

The newspapers keep flashing the spectre of violent death from firearms and analyse this as a need for gun control.

Banks are asking for pictures on your ID, and the government is thinking that your picture should appear on your driver's licence. It is an offence to fail to produce a driver's licence to a police officer while in charge of a motor vehicle.

"Concerned" city councillors want to clean up Yonge Street by legislating against leafleteers and posters.

And now for something completely different, Judy La Marsh, an ex-Pearson Liberal, wants to licence newspapers, ostensibly to curb the promotion of violence.

It all spells social control.

offers no real power to students and that only independent student organization can effectively deal with the issues that face us.

Edwards is correct when he says that student-faculty representation on the Governing Council is an administration-government sop meant to delude those who use and work at the university into thinking that it is a "democratic" institution capable of justly representing the views of all its constituents. The notion that student (or faculty) representatives on this august body of capitalist financiers and industrialists have any power to "democratize" the university or serve students interests against the administration is, to say the least, naive.

The university is an elite institution which serves a specific purpose in capitalist society — to train government administrators and industrial managers and to propagate bourgeois ideology. The working class gets only enough "education" for the capitalists to extract maximum profit from its labor power. While we must defend the elementary democratic right of opening up all institutions of learning and culture to the exploited and oppressed through open admissions, no tuition and full living stipend, this is not something that can generally be achieved under capitalism.

But Edwards proposed "alternative" is revealing. He lauds the idea of the independent organization of students to fight for their demands, characterizing the January 21 anti-cutbacks demonstration as a "breath of fresh air."

While actions such as the Jan. 21 demonstration are certainly positive and important as a strategy for achieving real change in society (and thus in the university) they are utterly impotent. The Henderson report cannot be defeated by campus-restricted struggles because the cause of cutbacks is off-campus — in the economic crisis of capitalist society. Students wield little or no social power to effect the workings of this society. Only the working class; through its access to the means of production (its ability to withhold its labor power) and the material basis for its class consciousness in its social organization of work — has the social power to extract meaningful and lasting reforms from the capitalists.

Don't give up your unused freedoms

The suggestions come from conservatives and liberals and different factions within the conservatives and liberals. Even the NDP governments of Blakeney and Schreyer are supporting some sort of wage controls. The federal NDP's support gun control.

We live in a free society. Not like Germany in 1935. We don't have to produce our "papers" for a police officer. We don't have to get a government licence to work. We are not in constant fear of random search by the police. Our newspapers can print "the truth as they see it." There are no concentration camps.

Or is it that we don't have these things yet? It is entirely possible that a majority of the population agree with gun control, seat-belt legislation, social insurance numbers and all the other "little" things.

This is a violent society. To attempt to legislate against violence is an absurdity. Such legislation can only suppress it. Several governmental bigwigs are attempting such suppression by suppressing everyone.

Stay awake. Don't give away freedoms because you don't use them. Hopefully the LaMarsh suggestion is an aberration. We are not really going to have government control of newspapers. Are we?

Deaf education misled: Clark

To The Editor:

I regret that Mr. Samson (Feb. 6) thinks I have a "biased" view. I also regret that he appears not to know that the mentioned Dr. Brill is one of the foremost educators of the deaf in North America. Mr. Samson is apparently unaware that Dr. Brill's contribution to my article was limited to that quotation. The rest was my own, based on my own experience.

I am familiar with the "Acoupedic" approach. It is not a method of educating the deaf. It is a method of denying them an education. It is helpful to those with limited hearing, but the deaf have no hearing that can be used, contrary to the acoupedists silly clack. I know it is also known as the oral-aural approach and it is not new. It has been around since the sixteenth century in England and the 1870's in North America. The ordinary deaf one meets from time to time are the result of this method of "education". Until 1973 all schools in Ontario used this method.

Inundating a child with amplified sound can be lumped with assault and battery, cruel and unusual punishments and child abuse. I know at least one mother and a few second-hand reports of children who were withdrawn from the clinic in the Hospital for Sick Children for these reasons. I work with a hard-of-hearing woman who gave up on the binaural method because it was causing pain and distraction. She now uses one aid in her good ear. Little children cannot explain these things. Who knows how much they suffer? The audiologist? Don't be silly. In the HSC they are in the business to sell hearing aids willy-nilly.

Integrating the deaf with the hearing is good in principle. It does not work in fact with prelingually deaf. The two groups may attend the same school but do not socialize fully. Most of the social workers' problems with the deaf come from these 'integrated' deaf.

The very idea that children educated in the acoupedic approach can hear and are no longer deaf is a big lie and callous rip-off.

As an aside, Total Communication also uses the Acoupedic methods as part but not the only part of their system. Total Communication also encourages parents to use signs and fingerspelling to assist the child in acquiring language. Total communication is favored by the deaf because it is educational, whereas pure Acoupedia is not.

SAC rapped for labour position

To The Editor:

As far as we know the recently settled strike by CUPE 1222 against SAC and its executive is the first case in the province of a strike by a trade union against an elected student organization. We think that it raises some important questions pertaining not only to trade union-management relations, but also to the nature of student unions and the role they are and should be playing.

Readers of the Varsity should be familiar with the background, and now with the strike itself: the workers without a contract since the end of September, the SAC executive breaking off negotiations hours before a probable settlement, executive members questioning whether the workers are "worth their money" and threatening to have them arrested, etc. Members of the executive acted completely irresponsibly when confronted with reasonable demands relating not only to salaries, but also to job descriptions, and thereby to the status of women workers in the office.

It seems that some of the SAC executive view themselves as corporate bigwigs, and SAC itself as a profit-gouging corporation.

But the difference between SAC and a corporation is this: SAC is, or should be a democratic organization representing undergraduates at U of T. Its executive is, or should be, composed of representatives in whom we as students have confidence, and who are responsible to us. If this were really the case there would be no fundamental clash of interests between SAC as an organization and its workers, of the type which leads to strikes by workers against capitalist corporations and their governments. Students have no interest in screwing people who really work for them, nor should an organization which is supposed to, and should represent them.

The actions and attitudes of the majority of the SAC executive in relation to CUPE 1222 are not isolated instances of stubbornness. Over the last year it has consistently adopted positions contrary to our interests, abdicated its responsibility in organizing the outbacks, and generally ignored the real needs of all of us. If this is allowed to continue we will be facing rising tuition fees, outbacks in staff and facilities without an organization capable of taking any effective action.

It is important that this not be allowed to happen. Let's do more than hope that events leading to the strike by CUPE 1222, and all that it represents are not repeated again.

Gardner's friend deplores laspe

To The Editor:

I would like to call to your attention the inappropriate way in which The Varsity (Feb. 6) listed the candidates for the Governing Council seats for the full-time, undergraduates Arts and Science constituency. They were listed, "Brian Pel, Varsity Photo Editor, John Burnes, a young Progressive Conservative, and Robert Gardner."

In naming the candidates it is unjust to state an achievement for each of the first two candidates and nothing about the third one. I think that Mr. Bettson, the author of the article, as a competent reporter should have taken a neutral position portraying each candidate equally. All the other candidates were named. Why did Mr. Pel and Mr. Burnes receive an extra honourable mention?

I would like to point out that Bob Gardner has many achievements which could have been stated. Mr.

Bob Gardner is presently the Chairman of the Scarborough College Council, the Chairman of the Cultural Affairs Sub-Committee, and the Academic Affairs Commissioner of Scarborough College Students Council. He has many other achievements but one of these should have been included in the article in question if Mr. Bettson was to be objective.

LaMarsh hints at licensing

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
Government should "supervise the social accountability of media organs within its jurisdiction", recommends the interim report of the Royal Commission on Media Violence (the LaMarsh commission).

Although the commission was unable to find a direct causal relationship between media violence and actual violence, it recommended wide-ranging restriction of media content by government and industry.

The more extreme measures include the imposition of tariffs on imported film and television content, media violence monitoring and a tax on entertainment violence.

Citing "apparently direct" inspiration of violence by media, the report quotes a televised mock suicide which they claim caused a Calgary youth to try the same technique and hanged himself, as well as a "fictional" scene of dousing a skid-row derelict with gasoline and setting him on fire which was followed by "a rash of such crimes on real city streets" as proof.

The commission sought expert advice to bolster the "preliminary conclusions" they had reached. A coroner is reported to have advised the government to support beer ads "showing the usual happy party ending in a car smash with bodies hanging out of the windows." Members of the commission did not comment on this example of proposed media violence, however.

MAGIC MUSHROOM EXPERT ...AND PSYCHIC SAVANT

By BILL WINE

Andrija Puharich is an expert on hallucinogens, a noted psychic phenomena researcher, a physician, a best selling author, and the inventor of numerous biomedical microelectronic devices.

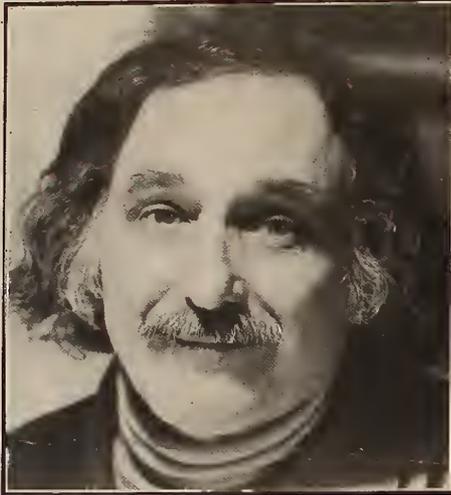

In 1960 he led a 14-man expedition into Chatino County of Oaxaca Mexico, sponsored by the University of Washington and the Aluminum Company of America. The purpose of the expedition was to collect hallucinogenic botanicals and study them. ABC Television made a documentary of the trip.

During a survey of the Hawaiian Islands in 1961, he discovered the first hallucinogenic mushrooms ever found there. Specimens of Panaeolus Campanulatus have now been catalogued at the Bishop Museum, in Honolulu.

FIRST WHITE KAHUNA PRIEST

While in Hawaii, Puharich became the first non-Hawaiian admitted into the Kahuna priesthood, after a period of intense training designed to develop his powers of consciousness. The Kahuna priesthood is the established orthodox lineage of persons who have demonstrated skills in healing. Membership is usually restricted to native born Hawaiians who have been trained continuously from an early age.

He led a group of physicians to Brazil in 1968 to study native pharmaceuticals, and the work of a native healer named Arigo. But most people have heard of him through his best-selling non-fiction work Uri: A Journal of the Mystery of Uri Geller, or his two other books Beyond Telepathy, and The Sacred Mushroom.

Puharich's interest in paranormal phenomena research developed from an academic curiosity about telepathy. In 1948, he had established the Round Table

Foundation for parapsychological research in Maine. There he conceived and developed a series of ingenious experiments to electrically enhance ESP in sensitives. Among his colleagues and research associates: there were author Aldous Huxley, and Dr. Samuel Rosen, a world renowned ear surgeon.

His first serious research subject was a medium named Eileen Garrett. The results of his research convinced him that telepathy is a real and studyable phenomenon.

Puharich brought the Dutch sensitive Peter Hurkos to America for investigation, and was the first to study this gifted psychic. His work with Peter Hurkos and Harry Stone in the Faraday Cage, are now regarded as classic by investigators in the field and as methodologically sound by members of the general academic and scientific community. The Faraday Cage was devised by Michael Faraday, a famous physicist who established much of the current scientific thinking about electromagnetic fields. The Cage surrounds an experimental subject with copper shielding to screen out electrostatic and electromagnetic radiation noise that might interfere with the physiological recordings that are being made of the subject's galvanic skin response, heartbeat rate, electroencephalograph, body temperature, and muscle tension.

INVESTIGATING URI GELLER

In 1971 he met Uri Geller in Israel. He became the first serious scientist to investigate the phenomena associated with Uri Geller. His book "URI" has been published in 8 languages, and was responsible for interesting other scientists in studying Uri's feats of metal bending, fixing watches, and taking mental pictures on photographic film. The story of Uri Geller has affected many people both experts and non-experts, supporters and detractors.

Many people claim that Uri's performances are to be denigrated as frauds or hoaxes or cheap tricks. Bitter controversy has arisen around this as an issue. Some claim that Uri has maliciously hoodwinked naive scientists, or even that the scientists themselves were part of the hoax. One magician, "Randy", claims that he can duplicate many (but not all) of Uri's performances through mere trickery and prestidigitation and thereby, strangely, concludes that Uri must have arranged the performances in that same way.

Puharich does not speak often to public audiences. However he has consented to come and speak at U of T.

TIME FOR MAJOR BREAKTHROUGH

It would seem that the time is ripe now for a major interdisciplinary breakthrough in the thinking about paranormal phenomena, comparable to the Theory of Relativity and Quantum Theory. Indeed, one of the areas where this research is pursued most vigorously is at the Max Planck Institute.

Puharich organized a symposium exactly one year before his talk will occur at Convocation Hall, bringing together scientists from different Universities and Research Institutes, both government and non-government, to discuss theoretical implications of findings in the area of paranormal phenomena research. The symposium was summarized in a chapter by Puharich in a book entitled Psychic Exploration, edited by John White.

While he here at U of T, physicians, physicists, anthropologists, psychologists, educators, mathematicians, psychiatrists and engineers on the faculty have accepted invitations to share their findings, interests and perplexities with him in a seminar.

ELECTION ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL COMMITTEES FACULTY AND STUDENTS

- GENERAL COMMITTEE
- CURRICULUM COMMITTEES

Nominations are now open for student seats and faculty seats on the Committees of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Membership on these Committees also entitles students to membership on the Faculty Council. These elected seats are filled by students and faculty who serve for two year renewable rotating terms i.e. each year one-half of the membership retires. Accordingly, the remainder of the seats on the Committees will be filled next year by current members who have indicated that they wish to serve for a second year.

The following outlines by committee and constituency the seats to be filled by this election:

General Committee

Students:

Seats available - 2 in each of Victoria, New and Erindale Colleges
Seats available - 1 in each of Trinity, St. Michael's, Innis and Woodsworth Colleges

REVIEW

The love, cynicism, and betrayal of actors, artists, and thieves in 'Children of Paradise'

The vibrant Lemaître plays, as usual, to the galleries

The paradise is the highest seats for the audience, the cheapest, the seats furthest from the stage, the seats that the actors must play to, the greys.

The children are the actors and the artists and the criminals and prostitutes who consort and cavort at street level. They are also you and I.

Children of Paradise is a love story, a gripping tale of betrayal, murder and revenge.

No it isn't. It is a story of cynical actors, who can only act their emotions but not live them.

No it isn't. It is a highly political allegory of freedom shot during the strict Vichy regime of France in 1943.

No it isn't. It is an epic story of misplaced emotions and the harm that love can do. It was the first film shown in liberated France in March 1945. It is a three hour formal drama, with English subtitles, no intermission and virtually no plot.

It's great and beautiful. Frederick Lemaître was a famous French actor from the 1850's who, blessed with great wit, and insight, fought producers and writers and became the definitive expression of Othello, the character who always escaped him.

Baptiste Debureau was a famous French mime from the same period who had such sensitivity, and such adoration of women, that it almost destroyed his art.

Lacenaire was a famous French gangster from the same period who robbed, and killed according to his own set of principles.

It was the opinion of Jacques Prevert, and Marcel Carne and a stock company of film artisans that these three people must have known each other. Since all three were able to manipulate people, then they must have manipulated each other. Since all three were intelligent, and sensitive, they must have been aware of their own importance and their own responsibilities.

That is the stuff of theatre, and of cinema.

The entire film shows great care in production. The masses in the street are pushing and shoving, dancing and laughing, they are never just there. The subtitles are careful translations which capture the fast paced witty dialogue of the three super-egos.

The director apologized for the black and white film and promises, in a 1944 interview that all future efforts would be in color.

If you think you know what love is all about, be prepared for a shock. To an actor, love is a series of movements and dialogue. To a criminal, love, for anyone other than yourself is a waste of time; and love is pride without vanity. And they are all correct in life.

Surrounding the three protagonists are a multitude of false prophets. To the playboy, beauty becomes an insult to an ugly world. Men do not love beauty they merely chase it, he says.

To the all seeing rag-picker, people are fools for they turn a blind eye to their loved one's infidelity. So he becomes a tattletale, hated by everyone. And the women try to love without understanding and understand without love. They become isolated, humiliated and eventually forgotten.

Of the three, perhaps Lacenaire is the hardest to understand. For he acts in the real world where one goes to jail for theft and to the guillotine for murder. But of him it is all the same. He doesn't want an audience, he doesn't want to feel their hearts beating with his as do the other two. He simply acts.

An enigmatic film simply because it is there. Go see it. Bethune Film Group Bread Bakers Theatre: how well do entertainment and politics mix?

High Park in the summer rather than the U.C. Playhouse in the middle of this dreary icebound winter would be the best place to appreciate the talents of Bread Bakers Theatre. But nonetheless, the two members of the troupe, David Anderson and Sarah Barker put on a lively and energetic performance last Friday, the final day of their three-day noon-hour run.

It's not so easy to come up with a pocket description of the two pieces Bread Bakers presented, entitled "The Rat Movie" and "The Practical Princess". Both were parodies of standard fairy-tale themes, and the mixture of these two elements meant the show could appeal to kids as well as to such a worldly and sophisticated audience as U of T undergrads. The quick costume and character changes by the players were supplemented by a hand-cranked series of drawings going along with the action (called "cranky movies"), adding to the storybook feeling, and allowing the more fantastic parts of the stories to be presented (murdering a giant rat, blowing up a dragon, etc.) without having to rely on complicated special effects.

In "The Rat Movie", a typical Vancouver resident, Mr. Goodman, befriends an orphaned rat and brings it home with him. Eventually, however, the rat grows so large and obstreperous as to demand the lion's share of Goodman's food, and even goes so far as to make designs on Goodman's baby as a snack. The distraught would-be philanthropist tries to get some help from city agencies, all to no avail. The city health department offers to send over a bulldozer to raze the house, a suggestion which Goodman understandably rejects. "The uneducated are so ungrateful," is the bureaucrat's judgment. The Salvation Army offers to convert the rat to Christianity, but this too is unsatisfactory. Finally, as in all good fairytales, a guardian angel, wielding a sharp knife, swoops down from the heavens to dispatch the recalcitrant rodent. The story has two morals: either make sure you have a guardian angel, or make sure you're willing to take the knife into your own hands.

Bread Bakers' work has been called political satire, and it is political as far as it makes the point that one is just as likely to be helped by a guardian angel as by churches, politicians, or bureaucrats. Here their message seems to be: look out for yourself, it's a hard world. The political point remains unclear, however. While it never hurts to be cynical about governments and other institutions, does this mean we must all lapse into a distrustful individualism.

Perhaps it is unfair to fault Bread Bakers for not doing something they did not set out to do. Above all, Bread Bakers want to be entertaining, and they succeeded in that; the political comment adds spice, but it is clearly secondary. In any case, their presentation is clearly preferable to the lifeless political morality plays travelling under the assumed name of entertainment one finds in the pages of China Reconstructs, and Reader's Digest of international socialism. Still, this reviewer's favorite part of the show as the song linking the two sketches, sung to the tune of "What A Friend We Have in Jesus", with the cheery I.W.W. style refrain: "Stiffen up, you ordinary duffer, and dump the bosses off your back."

Bread Bakers will be playing at York University next week, and apparently they plan to spend some time in Toronto if they can find more engagements. Pale-faced easterners who heed the siren call of B.C. culture and split for the coast this summer will be able to catch them at Vancouver's Stanley Park, where they have played every summer since 1971. This would be the best place to see them; their show seems made for streets and parks more than for theatres.

Big bands try to figure how to let brass shine

Big bands have lots of problems. Besides the hazards involved in keeping personnel or even getting 9 or 10 people to agree on rehearsal time, most have had trouble deciding exactly what they are. The question usually boils down to discovering the proper balance between the different components of the band. This in turn usually involves finding the proper slot for the brass section.

Brass was the mainstay of popular music throughout the era preceding rock and roll, but the limelight was stolen from instrumentalists as the vocal and small electric ensemble took over. Since then good instrumentalists have suffered in the popular field; the only idiom that used brass regularly was rhythm and blues, and you were lucky if you could find the names of the players on the back of the album covers.

Now that brass has once again become a regular band component and the instrumentalists are featured as something more than simple backup musicians, the struggle to find the balance between vocal and instrumental is all the more pronounced. Recent offerings by some large bands give a few indications of the differences of opinion on the subject.

Tower of Power has always been somewhat of an overpowering band. This Oakland-based collection of 10, including a vocalist, is consistently gutsy, and their blend of the two different components is quite distinctive.

The brass section runs this band. The result is somewhat of an anomaly. The music harkens back to the old Motown ideas of snappy, often banal, lyrics built around a catch-phrase, usually an old aphorism. Some of the song titles on their second most recent recording: "Don't Change Horses in the Middle of A Stream" and "Skating on Thin Ice," give an indication of their roots. There the Motown similarity ends. The brass section is much more noticeable, unrepentently so, than any Motown producer would have allowed.

The only real model for band arranging was the big band era of the forties, and Tower of Power's new album in the Slof gives you an idea of how they've been influenced by that era. The brass is used "a la mode" in conjunction with the rhythm section, almost as just another, part. The brass plays the part of the punctuators, short blasts to end a phrase, commas tying together two phrases, and constant breaking-up of the beats with short interruptions. Most of their training must have been limited to locking the brass section in a room and teaching them to play one quick note at a time in unison.

Given the predominance of the instrumentalists in this band, it's no wonder they've had trouble with the vocal end of things. They've had a different vocalist with each new album, which surprises me, as I can't tell the difference between the three. All have that so so hangover voicing that belies much of what has gone down since in the way of vocal innovation.

The new album presents a collection of (for the most part) excellent material. The arranging talents of the two lead men, Greg Adams and Chester Thompson, have developed extensively in the past year.

The songs range from up-tempo unbeatable dance tunes like "Just Enough and Too Much" and "Malanaska" to their distinctive ¾ swing numbers like "As Surely as I Stand Here". In all of them the brass arranging is the most noticeable component and development comes in a curious way; each song seems to have as a reason for existence the struggle to make the brass section work harder and quicker than they did in the last one. These guys must have good wind. God knows how they get it in San Francisco's pea-soup oxygen.

It's the vocals and the lyrics that suffer with this album, but then again the singer and the songs are only puppets for the instrumentalists. The band seems to know which side the popularity bread is buttered on, so they pay a little more than lip service to the vocals. What they need badly is a distinctive singer to pull this show together. If they're still going to focus their talents on lyrics, they have to have somebody who can deliver the goods.

With Earth, Wind and Fire, a ten-piece soul band from below the Mason-Dixon line, there is no such confusion about their focus. While all of the instrumentalists are quite accomplished, the emphasis is on solid, harmonically innovative vocals. The brass plays second fiddle, so to speak, but is nonetheless quite noticeable.

E, W and F came out of relative anonymity this summer with a single "That's the Way of the World," from the album of the same name. Although they've had both a new album and an excellent new single since then, it's their studio work on the first that indicated better what they're up to.

If the album cover would provide it for me, I would give you the name of the vocalist, but whoever he is he's got my ballot as the number two male vocalist in popular music today (next to Stevie Wonder). Finally someone has perfected that black male falsetto that Curtis Mayfield and Eddie Kendricks tried so hard to popularize. This nameless man has taken it further than the previous two probably ever thought possible. The album is worth the price just to hear one note that he manages (god only knows how) to reach at the beginning of the outstanding tune "See the Light." All of the remaining members of the band add soft and gritty backups. The emphasis is on strange vocal chording.

The band's roots are sluck in soul music with a heavy overlay of gospel, a combination that seems to be hitting it big with the likes of the Staple Singers. The lyrics are sometimes uncomfortably religious, reminding me of Sonny Rollins' recent lamentation that he couldn't tell the difference between church and street music anymore.

As the band's focus is the vocals, the lyrics reflect a little more thought than goes into a normal Tower of Power number. That doesn't mean they're intellectual in any way. To be truthful, they've fallen into a similar trap as the O'Jays, who have been chained to the "Love, family and unity" line of Gamble and Huff. The lyrics talk about love, peace and religious redemption with just a touch of resignation ("That's the Way of the World.") One would think that those days were over, but that sort of meandering is still a saleable product. The music however, does not suffer from the lack of pith in the lyrics. It's infectious, interesting and innovative.

A further word on the brass. Earth Wind and Fire have stuck closest to traditional ideas on brass arranging in popular music. The saxes and horns, rather than having lines of their own, are very strictly used for chord-formation, never straying outside what is given to them by the piano, guitar and bass. They've found their own version of balance within a large band, and it's one that works without a hitch. They're probably headed for the top of the charts, so pick up the album while it's still cheap.

the personnel on the album are first-class rhythm and blues and rock session musicians.

David Sanborn's first album under his own name Taking Off would stand as a jazz recording (if you're hot on classification) if it weren't for the fact that all

Alto sax player Sanborn and his side-kicks on this particular album have been adding beautiful solos and accompaniment for years to recordings by Aretha Franklin, the Rascals and numerous waxings of the light-jazz variety from the CTI studios. Impatient possibly with letting singers do all the work, they've banded together for the second time to produce a very listenable and occasionally exhilarating collection of tunes.

The personnel is a who's who if there ever was one. Along with the Brecker Bros. (who will be in town this week possibly with Sanborn) padding out the brass section, they've brought in Rick Marotta and Ralph McDonald on drums and percussion. Will Lee, a veteran Atlantic bass player, fills out the rhythm section with Don Grolnick on piano.

The main reason I picked up the album was the inclusion on guitar of the world's greatest, Buzzy Feiten. Nobody in the world plays like this man, and I certainly can't do him justice in words. In the past he has been the overwhelming influence in the development of the late Rascals, and his playing on Stevie Wonder's albums has been other-worldly. He has a technique and a concept of phrasing that blows most other fretlists out into left-field.

Anyway, with all these excellent musicians in on the session one should expect a lot, especially since the first time they got together (under the name of the Brecker Bros.) the result put arranging concepts for brass two or three years ahead in a single recording.

Unfortunately this one is spotty. One can't expect a player like Sanborn, who is accustomed to succinct solos and accompaniment, to carry a whole album. The result, while of good musical quality, is a little stretched.

Two tunes stand out "Butterfat" and "The Whisperer." The first is a funky little number reminiscent of Junior Walker, the second a slow piece with outstanding work by the composer-pianist Grolnick and of course Sanborn.

Two other songs on the second side are good, but the side is weighed down by a frilligoy, something I'm usually leery of, especially, as in this case, when you can't tell the difference between the three parts. And so it goes.

Woolf's letters show steady mining of thought, perception

The Flight of the Mind:
The Letters of Virginia Woolf 1888-1912
Clark, Irwin & Company
Limited, $17.50

When Virginia Stephen was 30, she became Virginia Woolf by marrying a Leonard of that name. This volume, the first in a series of six intended to publish the whole of her correspondence, ends precisely on the eve of that marriage. It is therefore the record of Miss Stephen who was trying to write a novel, was trying to endure the deaths of brother and father, was trying to discover whether marriage was a fit subject for her life. It is definitely not the record of Virginia Woolf; she came late. This is the ingenuousness of Yr Affate Goalus Esq. who tossed off letters to friends who were growing up with her or sufficiently recovered from the process to help her with their wisdom. In short, a portrait of Growing Up Absorbed. Although she was not yet Virginia Woolf, literature was in her blood; she wrote to an aristocratic lady, who could care less (which seemed to be true of all her correspondents), that "when I see a pen and ink, I can't help taking to it, as some people do to gin". Writing was in her blood; it was the alcohol of her existence. Perhaps it was surrounded by many people who needed no stimulus but their own cultured joie de vivre that gave her such a quality of Seeing Things. Perhaps it was a genetic quirk, to steal any romantic aura from the situation, but this Virginia Stephen wrote letters to those people — her sister, the painter, Vanessa Bell and the dilettante Violet Lytton Strachey — that could portray a scene or character in just the way to revivify it, invest it with a moral meaning that came from who knows where. Perhaps it was just a talent.

Too much happened to Virginia in the years of this book for it to be possible to give a plot outline. Lives are liken that — too full to be given a thin thread to follow, they bulge so much. She travelled quite a bit, went mad less frequently, moved house several traumatic times, and never ceased from a stream of letters that hid nothing and tried to find a lot. They tell stories, paint portraits, dredge up her deepest thoughts, you think, until a deeper follows. It's as if she is mining, steadily. There she is sitting in a train to Cornwall: "There was a woman with eyes like those bunches of trosted grapes one sees in grocers' shops . . . Then there was a virgin, who only thought of her own hat, which, with its dead seagull, would lop sideways — and in the midst of them all sat an aged couple, growing colder and colder, on a polytechnic tour. But I must now go to bed." And so she goes to bed, but another vivisection of all she sees will follow the next day, and the next, and the sum of those days will emerge through 500 pages as Virginia Stephen, complete. Somehow she translated times and places into herself.

An enthusiast for Virginia is hard put to restrain his enthusiasm; probably, a despiser would avidly despise this cornucopia of intimacies. If is such pristine emotion in its Woolf's clothing. Such letters oughtnot to convert the despiser nor alter the enthusiast. I suspect that they will simply satisfy those who want more Woolf. It is a peculiar thing in a writer, this peculiar sense that more will not be enough, ever.

A bit of Canadian historical pornography, or just a dirty book?

Belinda or, The Rivals
by A.S.H.
(Abraham S. Holmes)
Anansi

What a dirty little book! First published in 1843, Belinda is puffed as "the story of a wayward Ontario coquette, as she flirts and slns her way along a trail of broken hearts, ruining the local men with cheerful hypocrisy". "She is frankly out for sex, conquest, and a good time," the introduction says, "and seems indifferent to the race or social rank of the available men, trying out Scotsman and Jew, shepherd and squire, with true democratic zeal." If only such were indeed the case. Next to an Agatha Christie there's nothing like smut to while away the hours. Belinda however is concerned exclusively not with sex but with property and family, with whom Belinda should marry, with whom she can get the most from. The book bores; what does disturb is the amount of lip-smacking A.S.H. seems to do while writing about these estates and shame and honour.

Only a bourgeois with property obsessions equal to

Belinda is pornography for the property-obsessed bourgeoisie

John Glassco's sexual ones could enjoy it.

The introduction claims that the book is "a sophisticated spoof on the sentimental novel popular at the time of its writing." Maybe. It is certainly an inadvertent satire of pornography. Take one aspect of life, any aspect, isolate it from all others, make it seem like the be-all and the end-all of life: that's pornography.

"Essential for students of Canadian literature and social history," the back cover blurb says, "Belinda is also delightful entertainment for the general reader." Ho-ho-ho.

Chekhov's brilliant story is effectively turned into drama

Anton Chekhov was a master of character portrayal. In a few lines of dialogue, monologue, or prose he could convince even the most indifferent audience or reader that his personages were of flesh and blood, that they were something more than abstract fictional creations or mere figures on a stage. Like Oscar Wilde, he believed that even the 'walk-in' parts should bear a significance and quality of their own, and in consideration of this talent we are not hesitant to acknowledge an artist of genius.

In his brilliant short story, Ward Six, we see Chekhov the dramatist, moralist, and social critic at his best. The plot is concerned with one of five inmates of a psychiatric hospital ward in rural Russia at the turn of the century, and the melancholic supervising doctor whom the author describes as "positively impotent" and "obviously bored with the monotony and palpable futility of his job". Before the doctor's arrival, the hospital is in complete shambles physically and is operated by a staff which would find a welcoming home among thieves and sadists. Nikita, the ward guard, makes a regular habit of beating 'the lunatics' as he is "firmly convinced that this is the only way to keep order in the place".

In the meantime the patients accept such mistreatment without question, unable to consider themselves anything more than rotting fixtures in a rotting world. Only the one patient, Ivan Gromov, sees differently; but the very cause of his apparent insanity, his complete lack of confidence and fear of the greater powers that be, namely the police, forbids him from taking a stand for the benefit of himself and his cohorts.

As the plot develops, the supervising doctor, who is himself incapable of taking a stand against the surrounding corruption, becomes gradually more interested in Gromov, who struggles to express himself before the very man who confined him to the hospital.

Gromov is confused by the fact that there are so many less sane people walking about in the streets or in high positions while he and others are imprisoned in the hospital as 'scapegoats for everyone else'. The doctor's response to the lack of morality or logic in the situation Gromov presents comes not as a surprise: "about my being a doctor and your being a mental patient, it's sheer blind chance."

His answer seems to summarize Chekhov's impression of many worldly matters, and not merely psychiatric care. It is Gromov, however, who delivers the gospel as a stab at the doctor's indifference to mankind's plight: "Hunger, cold, injury, loss, tear of death a la Hamlet... why, these feelings are the very essence of being a man!

They're the whole of life, these sensations are. Life may irk you, you may loathe it, but despise it you mustn't." As it turns out, the doctor himself is later suspected of insanity by his medical assistant due to the great amount of time he spends listening to and debating with the madman Gromov, and in the end dies a patient of the ward and a victim of the very brutality and deception he at one time might have corrected.

Artistic director Michael Witta and assistant artistic director Alexander Maiden worked on a dramatized version of the short story, and managed to produce a theatrical piece which is both interesting as an adaptation and which remains true to the original plot. In order to avoid complications, they have written in the role of a narrator who is also Darya, the doctor's maid, beautifully handled by Gabrielle Blair. In fact practically all the characters not omitted from the short story in the dramatized adaptation are well presented, although at times one may notice where the actors might have been more familiar with their character. One reservation in particular of mine rested in the exclusion of the brutal Nikita, whose presence in the drama might have both impressed upon the audience the external horrors of the hospital, and provided a significant though undesirable alternative to the insouciant attitude of the doctor. Both Nikita and the doctor are incapable administrators, for neither can justifiably rationalize the failure of their approach to worldly dilemmas. And yet the doctor retains, despite his melancholic scepticism, a certain dignity of position up to the point where his sanity is questioned, which is a factor that I think Alexander Maiden, who played the doctor, should have kept in mind.

On the whole, however, it is a play definitely worth seeing for its moving plot and occasional tight bits of acting, as in the case of James McLarty, playing Gromov, and in particular the fine performance of Brian George, who plays Moseyka, a fellow inmate. If one wishes information about the dates and times for this production, the company's phone number is 532-3242. As a newly-formed company, they are undoubtedly anxious for your patronage; but more than that, they deserve it.

Parody misses an easy target

Most of us remember with some horror our first, and probably our first ten, readings of the UofT calendar, filled as it is with impossibly tedious details about faculties, courses, and deadlines, with an embarrassing lack of logic and wit in its introductory apologies. Most of us, too, can remember a peculiar pride felt when we were first introduced to the catalogue of another university, puffed up with pictures and cannily laid out in the hopes of leading the prospective student by means of graphics into the lanes of academe. Now a parody of the university calendar has been marketed by Press Porcepic.

Intended to reflect the appearance and some of the tendencies of that propaganda form, I think that frankly the minimal amount of effort spent on the imitation is not worthy of the title of lampoon.

Kitsilano YoU is about 80 pages of artistic subsidy and failure coupled with weak-kneed editing, filled (one might say, loosely) with about thirty putative course offerings, and a similar number of unendurably private jokes. Leaning heavily on perverse sexual humour, the authors have managed to hit upon the happy notion of the juxtaposition of old line-drawings and modern typographical incomprehensibility, and the reader has the advantage of watching their slow-blooming senses of humour blossom page after page. There may of course be local references which give this work a regional notoriety, private references which render this work's toothless bit harmful to the overswollen vanity of someone, somewhere. But I doubt it.

A certain style of politics does seep through the turgidity. An aroma of the counter-culture can be found, in the embrace of inactivity, the despair of the intellect, the recognized assistance of Mr. Primo Afghani. Is the fragmentation of this book the two greatest achievement of its two authors? Surely Avron Hoffman and Richard Snyder are capable of more constructive work than this small book. Is it possible to see in the successful publication of this book either the birth of thinkers such as this age can scarcely begin to contemplate, or the complete collapse of the toleration ethic among pseudo-intellectuals (the I-don't-understand-I-don't-think-I'll-comment bunch) who at long last have every right to complain that it is not art, and it has no claim on their pocket-books.

Kitsilano YoU is a book which I will give shelf room to, pass around among my friends with suitably neutral comments in the hopes of being enlightened, and one which I might on occasion present to one of my madder friends. But it is not one I recommend for purchase. Find yourself a good little newspaper, and get a review copy. Otherwise you might not read it all the way through.

Loss of Eno doesn't cause heartburn

Roxy Music
Siren

When Eno left Roxy Music after their second album, For Your Pleasure, many people figured it was only a matter of time before Bryan Ferry, the dominant personality remaining in the group, would start to run dry, eventually leading the band into obscurity. Three albums later the expected evaporation of Bryan Ferry's creative juices has failed to take place. If anything the post-Eno albums have shown steady improvement so that now, with Siren, we have an album that can stand comparison with either of the first two albums.

The band has taken a direction that it would have been unlikely to take had Eno remained, which is not necessarily a bad thing. Bryan Ferry wants to be as near to an equivalent of a Matinee idol as is possible in 1976, and what with pre-teens all over the world ruining the wallpaper over the Bay City Rollers, I suppose it's only fair that Big Sis have her fun too.

Phil Manzanera (guitar) and Andy Mackay (reeds) must satisfy their own ambitions by putting out solo albums, and those of us who appreciate Eno can turn to his five solo albums, so in the end nobody suffers. Only once on Siren is there a trace of the old Roxy Music style, and this occurs in the grotesque electronic buildup to "Sentimental Fool". The highlight of the album is the last half of the second side. The last three songs, "Both Ends Burning", "Nightingale", and "Just Another High" are as good as anything Roxy Music has ever done, and are sure to worm their way into your memory.

If not for Roxy Music and the various efforts of people connected with this band the rock scene would be even bleaker than it already is. (Did Tony Orlando and Dawn really win the Grammy for best pop group?) Siren shows them to be still improving, no mean feat after five albums, and to have finally overcome the gap created by the departure of Eno.

O, seeking self-transcendence, no

Film version of "O" twists subversive vision

In North America Histoire d'O merits a cute title in TIME Magazine and is written off. In France it is something of a national epic. In my position it is hard to know what reception the filmed version received in Toronto but in France the film was greeted by lineups which Les Dents du Mer has not matched. Most of what follows was written two months ago immediately after I saw the film. I had waited in the hopes that in time it would trouble me less — waiting is a favourite game of expatriates — but so far it has come to nothing.

In France one may assume that everyone knows the story, but in North America, in Toronto where the reading of Les Hautes Pornographes has not yet reached the point of intellectual and cultural necessity, a brief recap is necessary. The plots of novel and film vary slightly but importantly; for the moment I will sketch from the novel and will detail the discrepancies below.

O. is a successful photographer, a woman of some status in the male world. She has a lover, named Rene, to whom she is devoted in the extreme. At the outset of the novel they get into a car in Paris and are driven to a great Sadean chateau set conveniently away from the rest of the world. There she joins a number of other young women who are kept as slaves to the desires of a group of rich and powerful young men. There are whips in every hand, chaining stations in every corner. The women are used as often and exactly as the men desire. The chateau does not exist for its own sake, however, it serves as something of a training school. Eventually O. graduates and is deemed ready to return to life in Paris; she and her lover leave together. Sometime after their return Rene introduces her to his half-brother, an Englishman, Sir Stephen who, for a time, shares her with Rene, and eventually takes her over. During her transition from Rene to Sir Stephen she is sent to do some post-graduate work at a smaller version of the chateau run by a somewhat creaky schoolmarmish lesbian. Her training complete, she returns to Sir Stephen for a time. The book has two endings, neither definite. In one of them it is rumoured O. to die when he was ready to discard her. Certainly the progress of the novel makes this conclusion more likely than any other.

In abstract Histoire d'O does not sound any more or less interesting than the general run of pornographic works with a strongly sado-masochistic orientation. What separates it from that mainstream is the character of O herself. She is not Justine, or any other of de Sade's nubile ninnies, innocents doomed to a perpetuity of having his her innocence battered and trod into the filth, and of being unable to learn anything from their degradation. Nor is she Fanny Hill or one of her inheritors who typify the 'yes folks, women do enjoy sex' argument, being little more than healthy appetitive bodies. O. has an individual intelligence which separates her from the former category, and a spirit of aspiration (in the mystical sense) which draws her apart from the latter. O. is an adept, a novice, whose experiences form something of a pilgrim's progress.

Pauline Reage is at some pains, in the novel, to ensure the reader's awareness that O. may not be written off as the victim

we might expect. It is a tidy bit of rhetoric, akin to that of the political speaker who draws out a long skein of observations before his audience to each of which his hearers have little choice but to nod, and then, just when the head has become accustomed to the gently rocking motion of affirmation, springs an absolutely unthinkable conclusion. The audience is likely to discover that its head is still nodding for a split second until the implications become clear and the neck attempts to shake the burden of the nod off. In this manner Reage is driving the reader toward a conclusion which threatens many of our most treasured post-Freudian liberal assumptions about human sexuality, a conclusion are as schizoid, as double-minded in the massive presence of money as any of the rest of us, and that's the hard fact. The Man has a branch office in each of our brains, his corporate emblem is the white albatross, each local rep. has a cover known as the Ego, and their mission in this world is Bad Shit." They need us to have egos and fairly stable ones; it is their best means of control. No one wants to govern a stateful of mystics.

Accordingly any attempt to frame a contemporary spirituality must take place within certain bounds or else it becomes a danger. There is little of worry in bizarre religious sects; after nearly two thousand years of variations on Christianity the power that are been accepted in certain gulches, masters and maids, New York bitch, the cult of the SS. The genius of Western culture is adaptation and copion; all manner of aberration may be accepted before there is genuine change.

There are, however, authentic challenges to this order and the shifts made against them (by each of us — this is not a paranoid argument unless we accept the idea that we are conspiring against ourselves) are curious to observe. It has been argued, most cogently by Susan Sontag in her essay 'The Pornographic Imagination', that Histoire d'O presents such a challenge. It is in this light that the film version, which is likely to reach an even greater segment of the population than the book has, and is far more likely to be seen from beginning to end than the book is to be read from cover to cover, is most revealing.

III

It is difficult to imagine anyone who could attend a screening of Histoire d'O and view it solely as a film; it attacks the viewer at too many points of vulnerability. This uninky male viewer is forced to wonder about himself if he is aroused and to wonder about the film if he isn't. And he is spared the problem of identification with the heroine. A feminist acquaintance remarked that it would have been easier to discount the film if O. had been the ninny she had expected her to be. Corinne Clery, in the title rôle, may not be a superb actress (the rôle is less than demanding) but she does convey a positive sense of O's intelligence, and the strength of her will, which make it almost impossible to disregard her. The effect must be just as jarring to the anti-feminist woman as the film may easily be seen of the reductio ad absurdum of the woman sacrificing herself for her lover husband. This effect is heightened by the playing off of conventionally, even stereotypically, romantic scenes (long walks along tree drives, soft focus scenes on beaches, intimate dinners in expensive restaurants) against scenes of extreme physical cruelty when the lovers are alone, or in the company of trained torturers. When I saw the film there was a good deal of nervous flittering from the eminently respectable citizens in the audience. Something was striking a bit too close for comfort.

On the other hand comfort and moderation were the key words for the director of the film (Just Jaeckin). On emerging one could only wonder what the film would have been in the hands of a master of the spare and stark, Antonioni perhaps, or better still Robert Bresson; or what someone from the other fringe, Fellini, or Ken Russell, might have made of it. Probably something far more of some form of sexual psychopathology. The whippings are central here. When one reads of someone enjoying the sear of a whip or riding crop across the back or buttocks it is not difficult to regard it as an experience confined to those whose sexual proclivities are not our own. O. however, does not enjoy being whipped; she does not transform the pain into some form of sexual excitement. For her it remains pain, yet after each beating she is glad that it occurred. The experiences are a part of the process through which she is driving herself, signposts along the way. Because O's reactions to the external facts are not very different from those which we would expect of ourselves we are driven to examine the conclusions she draws from her experiences, conclusions which are certainly at odds with what which has significant power, and that power is of subversion.

II

This form of subversion drives us off once again into the search for a spirituality without the aid of a God. By spirituality I mean nothing more than the movement toward self-transcendence which is at the root of what is generally called the religious impulse. Self-transcendence is a dangerous game when viewed by those in power; the continuity of the state, imperial or corporate, depends largely on the stability of the shelves of its subjects, and their dedication to the state's central focus. In an ideal state nothing may be set higher than the state itself — in a consumer society there may be no higher goal than consumption. Temporary power is predicated on the continuity of the self. Thomas Pynchon puts it succinctly: "Sad but true. They have figured out how to handle that sort of theism. In fact the more peculiar the sect the more adaptable it is to the purposes of control. Krishna consciousness and the Maharaj Ji and the Children of God in no way attack the vital centres of power and can be safely disregarded. They may even be quitted cheered (someone has suggested that the Rev. Sun Moon is a CIA project) for sopping up loose energy which might be directed into more dangerous channels. Thus the mysticism of sex must grow up within certain parameters. One may chart the growing ability of the society to absorb without being endangered by the succession of sexual fads in the last five years; lesbianism, bisexuality, S & M. The last, as it is perhaps the most dangerous of the lot, given its establishment of an alternate power structure within the frame of the relation, has only threatening, either way. The texture of the film is far more accessible than that of Reage's prose, her cold analytical phrasing is entirely lost. The prose of the novel, however much colour it notes (and there is the genre's traditional emphasis on rich reds and gold), always reads black and white, and increasingly white as O bleaches out her personality. The conventionality of the film's colours and settings works against this effect, toning it to an acceptable level. Yet Jaekin refuses the other course, that of focussing on the romantic elements, of smearing Vaseline over the lens and showing us everything through gauze curtains.

The general effect of the film's technique is one of conscious non-commitment and tends to make the fact that the director and the writer of the screenplay have done something very central in rearranging the novel, something which overturns the film's impact completely. They have made their commitment and have come down firmly against the subversive possibilities of the novel.

The key to this subtle (until the postscript) but all-important change is the reinterpretation of the novel's last scene. In the novel O is led to a party by Sir Stephen; she is in chains, bearing the marks of her whippings and her master's brand. She is naked except for a cape which is fastened to the collar she wears about her neck, and a mask, which is that of a bird of prey. She is escorted in and it occurs to none of the guests that she is human and someone who should be spoken to. In fact she is no longer regarded as animate in any manner. It is at this moment that the reader knows that O. has finally transcended her humanity, her person-ality. If we consider the self a valuable, or necessary portion of being, then her position is tragic but it is the position she has actively pursued. From this moment there can be no desire left to her except the final consummation with unbeing which will be hers when Sir Stephen grants her death. It is an ecstatic state which few of us (I imagine) have envisioned as an end for our sexual lives.

In the film the surface appearances are identical: O. is taken to the party and stands there masked and naked amidst the crowd of well-dressed party-goers while Sir Stephen drifts about the edges of the throng marvelling at the accomplishment. This is not the last scene of a woman seeking self-obliteration — it is a triumph of the will. A friend observed, "If I had a body like O's and was standing in the middle of that party, all I would feel would BE POWER." And that is certainly what both O and Sir Stephen are feeling in the film. This is her last proof that she is worthy of him, that she too is above the pettiness of bourgeois life. This impression is confirmed in the film's postscript in which O and Sir Stephen, obviously very content with each other, are talking in front of one of the gigantic hearths which litter every domicile in the film. She asks defusing the charge which resides in the novel. Not entirely, as the occasional squirms in the audience revealed, but enough such that the work is not only cooptable, but useful too. It may be falacious to assume that the reading given by the film is that of the film (and we are speaking of the film here) she is a successful person; by the end she has become a successful woman, having given over everything to her lover while retaining her position in the real world, i.e., she's still a photographer at the end. She has exalted herself above other women (and this is a country in which 37 percent of the women would prefer to be male) and assumes a sort of heroic stature. This, however, is the self-fulfilling heroism of consummate pride, not the selfless heroism of transcendence which animates Reage's O. In the film version sex is a tool, not the end in itself. The movie O's progress through the chateau and the secondary establishment is reduced to the status of a progressive Masters and Johnson course in shedding herself of her sexual repressions and becoming the perfect lover for her man. There is a scene toward the end of the film in which O. is making love with some innocent stranger. The narrative voice comments that the innocent stranger had never met a woman so adept, so eager, so all-capable a lover as O. In this interpretation that is all she has become. Gee gosh . . . This is not what we had hoped at all.

Perhaps the filmmakers are right and Reage is pointing us into a blind alley; perhaps it is hopeless to search for an alternate spirituality along these paths. It may be that sex is just like drinking coffee, only better for you. Perhaps a good fuck makes a person a better citizen, more contented with his her lot, longer lived, more eager to consume and that's all . . . It's probably even good for the complexion.

One had hoped for something more but this viewer can rest content that what seems to him the most telling argument against Reage's vision of self-transcendence did not appear in the film version. In fact it has been left out of all of the discussion (and there's been more than you can read — entire forests have disappeared overnight) that I have come across on the subject. The problem is that essential to both the novel and the film is a high seriousness of which most of us are incapable. It is so hard to be serious yet it is absolutely necessary to the practice of the mystic (I suspect that the temptations of the desert Fathers were probably demonic slapstick routines). The greatest danger to O's progress is her sense of comedy. If she were to stop, even for a moment, to consider the giggling absurdity of being sodomised by an elderly stop, even for a moment, to consider the giggling absurdity of being sodomised by an elderly but ever so perverse gentleman in a small room in a restaurant while the waiter solemnly moves the dishes back and forth, the entire structure would collapse. I suspect that even should the waiter snicker — I like to imagine him being played by Chico Marx — the spell would be broken. Histoire d'O takes place in some other world, a world in which kitchen sinks never back up in the middle of a seduction scene, in which the meter men go away if you refuse to answer the doorbell, in which, in a crowd of partiers, there isn't some comedian who's going to play little boy to O's Emperor, in which no one ever laughs, no one has any sense that the human condition might be the slightest bit silly. It's not a world I know anything about — nobody I know lives there.

Irony, double consciousness, a sense of the absurd: a quick a quick inventory of the arsenal necessary for survival, yet it is this array that Reage asks us to give over. Self-transcendence is a serious business; mystics are a notoriously humourless bunch — but what can we do if we feel the power of their calling? What if we know that some shift must be made against the world as it is, and against the structure of power and authority which invades even our ability to sneeze? If it is only through high seriousness that such a move may be made, then we must paint our faces with frowns — if it's salvation through solemnity then it's the end to laughter, now proved to be nothing more than a delusive voiced exhalation of breath planned by the authorities to keep us in check. But there is something else. Is it only a nostalgia for thoughts which are warm and comfortable? Or is it possible that the Fool and the Clown (as the Elizabethans might have known them) might also be our companions? The siring of alternatives to the mainstream of society has been inordinately grave in our century; Art (in which the artist becomes the sacrifice), Madness (and not the pleasant Madness of the Renaissance either), Revolution (not a lot of giggles from Joe Stalin or the S.L.A.), Sexuality (from Reich to Reage), even Dope . . .

It is a hope, and a paleone, that Reage is right, and she is wrong; that there are anarchic, transcendent energies in our sexuality, and that we may find them without giving ourselves over to an impossible solemnity. It is a thinly voiced hope for a revised consciousness in which O. and the Marx Brothers are equally possible, equally necessary. Histoire d'O the novel, as one can only truly appreciate after viewing the revisionism of the film, opens a door in the passage we might not have noticed. In the process, however, it slams several others, in fact, all of the others. One only wonders whether they might be left ajar.

It is a hope, and a pale one.

him, after he says that he loves her, whether he would endure even one of the torments that she has passed through for him. He says that he thinks so and she calmly allows the coal at the end of his cigarette to burn down into its holder heating the metal ring at the base of the stem. This she places of the back of her hand, leaving her own mark: O.

I suppose we are to assume that they live happily ever after, having proven their love for each other, each of them worthier of the other than anyone who has not undergone the process that O has, could be (in the process she has far transcended lesser men like Rene, and has, indeed, sent her own subaltern lover Jacqueline to the chateau for training). The transcendence has vanished; we are back in the world. Somewhere we have lost The Divine Comedy and have been given the last scene of The Way of the World instead.

IV
This shift has the effect of which has caught the imagination of the French public but there are numerous reasons for believing this to be the case. (French intellectuals are another matter, although even there one has doubts of the acceptance of Reage's work. Jean Paulhan's introduction to Histoire d'O, La Bonneheur dans l'Esclavage reads rather more like one of the kinkier passages of Penthouse Forum than one would hope from an old buddy of Sartre and de Beauvoir.)

For women a variation on the same theme seems to apply. The film seems to become an exaggerated metaphorical statement about the difficulties of finding a place in French society for the working and successful woman. 'French women are not afraid to be feminine' goes the cry and it is largely true. On the other hand it has been the impression of this observer that they are terrified to be anything but, and that may include successful. This is the problem which O. resolves for herself in the course of her pilgrimage. At the beginning Struggle to get the vote wasn't all peaceful propaganda.

In recent years we women have forgotten our historical background. Women began campaigning for the right to vote in the late 19th century. It's difficult to imagine the surprise awaiting England's first women voters in 1918. Unlike men, all women over twenty-one could not vote. As a preventative measure, only women over thirty, with property were allowed to cast their ballots. They only discovered this upon arriving at the polls. Since there was a higher population of women than men in England during the war, those in power (men) sought to protect their interests by denying the vote to an extremely large percentage of women. Thus, out of seventeen women candidates, only one was elected and she forfeited her seat in the House of Commons on the grounds of refusing to pledge allegiance to the Queen. It wasn't until 1928 that all women over twenty-one were granted voting privileges.

Shoulder to Shoulder is a large new paperback dealing with the Suffragette movement. With over three hundred original photographs, excerpts from diaries, letters and speeches and an attractive, glossy cover, it should be a collector's item. The author, Midge Mackenzie, a film producer and feminist, was one of the originators of the B.B.C. television series on the same topic which was aired last year on O.E.C.A.

Emmeline Pankhurst and her daughters, founders of the Women's Social and Political Union, the largest militant suffrage group in England, began as peaceful agitators. As the movement grew, it developed into a frenzied battle for rights. The women found that militancy became the only way to receive the recognition so vital to revolutionize the Government's mode of thinking. The controversial tactic of the Suffragettes created widespread news coverage. It was a struggle to correct injustices, worthy of the risk of brutality, starvation, solitary confinement, personal inflictions and even death.

In Shoulder to Shoulder, the Suffragettes tell their own story of the struggle from genteel persuasion to violent confrontation. These events were recorded daily by the Suffragettes, but not by historians. What has emerged since then are impersonal accounts of the winning of votes for women, erroneously attributing this victory to women's labour during World War I, 1914 - 1918.

Shoulder to Shoulder reveals a deep insight into the real militancy and brutality of the Suffragette movement, and of the dedicated women whose deeds have been buried in archives rather than taking their rightful position in the story of the victorious struggle for the right to vote. True accounts by the women who lived the movement, backed up by over three hundred photographs, gives Shoulder to Shoulder tremendous impact and an undistorted view of the early feminist movement.

Paper Airplane Competition

There will be five categories for which prizes will be awarded. They are: 1) Floaters, 2) Computer Card Darts, 3) Varsity or Toikse Specials, 4) Standard Open Class, and 5) Super Modified.

Rules and Regulations

- 1.0 The competition will be held and judged by SAC at the Wetmore Hall, Thursday, February 26, 1976. Three (3) judges will be appointed by the SAC. The judges' decision is final in all cases.
- 1.1 The competition is limited to students of the U. of T. Each competitor is entitled to one entry per event.
- 1.2 All competitors will be judged on the basis of time in flight, and distance travelled to a designated target.
- 1.3 All competitors are limited to a team of two attempts in all events.
- 1.4 SAC members will be allowed to compete upon the presentation of a note from their mother.
- 2.0 Categories
- 2.1 Floaters: These are limited to one plane made from a standard 8 1/2 x 11" piece of paper. The plane will be launched by dropping from a height of 10 feet and allowed for time in flight, and distance travelled to a designated target.
- 2.2 Computer Card Darts: These must be made from one standard elastic band design.
- 2.3 Varsity or Toikse Specials: One page of a Varsity or Toikse may be used. Any paper provided the length of the wingspan not more than 1/2 the width of the page. The planes must be launched, by hand, towards a standard garbage can 20 feet away. The competitor who gets the most points will be nominated as Varsity (or Toikse) calculation manager.
- 2.4 Standard Open Class: The planes will be made from one 8 1/2 x 11" piece of paper. The competitor will launch his plane towards a target 50 feet away. The competitor will be awarded points for within five feet, three points for 5-10 feet, and one point for 10-20 feet.
- 2.5 Super Modified: Anything that flies, provided it weighs less than 20 pounds and has an area of less than five square feet. The one judged "best" by the judges will be the winner.
- 3.0 The number of entrants will be limited to 20 per category, so arrive early to avoid disappointment.

The co-ordinator for the airplane contest is Richard Pearce, who lives (more or less) in Devonshire House. Phone him, and he'll be your friend for life.

Table Hockey

This man is a table hockey champion. You can be one too.

Tournament

The SAC table hockey tournament will take place February 25 and 26 in the Great Hall of Hart House. Table hockey, as you know, is that child's game played on a Bobby Orr endorsed machine, employing plastic men to propel a wooden puck into a net. Many afternoons are spent in the Great Hall, playing table hockey. To prove a thoroughly engrossing pastime.

1. The rules of the tournament are as such:
 1. There will be an entry fee of 50 cents. All entries must be received at the SAC office by Tuesday, Feb. 24 by 5:00 P.M.
 2. The games shall consist of three (3) seven minute periods, with a two minute prep game warmup, and a two minute intermission between periods.
 3. Should a game result in a tie, a five minute running time overtime shall decide the result. The overtime shall begin after a two minute break. Should the result still be tied, the competitors shall enter a sudden death period, after a two minute intermission.
 4. Should the puck leave the playing surface, or become lodged in the goal crease, the referee will stop play, and a faceoff will ensue.
 5. Should the referee deem that a player is attempting to stall the game, play will stop and a faceoff will ensue.
 6. The tournament shall consist of two games, total 14 minutes, and a final, and a trophy for the final. All playoff games will be played consecutively.
 7. The games will be in the SAC office during reading week, and up to the time of the tournament. If you wish to come in a practice, feel free to contact the co-ordinator, Dave Cass, at the SAC office.

Tickets for Events

SAC has a limited number of week's passes available for $5.00. These passes entitle you to entrance to:

- HOMEMADE THEATRE
- DAN HILL
- RAFFI AND NANCY SIMMONDS
- THE DANCE

and also get you into the Riverboat for $1.00 during the week of February 22 - 28.

Tickets for individual events will be sold at the door the night of the events, so arrive early to avoid disappointment.

"Summer's Night": if Shakespeare wrote about Marlowe's dreams.....

A cold night in early February, with the temperature dipping to minus five degrees (Celsius, of course). Yet, withal, a glimpse of summer. A time to sleep, perchance to dream; a time to meet Puck, Christopher Marlowe, Merlin and Shakespeare; a time to be sat upon by a Griblich. This magic tour through the world of English literature and the enchanted forest of A Midsummer Night's Dream did not take place in the rational sterility of a lecture-hall, nor in the midnight reveries of last-minute cramming. True, it did occur in New College, even within the institutional architecture of a dining hall. But not if you were really listening. "On a Summer's Night", written by Jim Betts and Lesley Havard had its last performance on Saturday, February 7 to a sell-out crowd and a standing ovation. But it was really in that forest near Athens.

After the musical "Prologue" sung by the cast, the audience was ushered into a world of imagination and fantasy. We meet a likeable but off-key Christopher Marlowe who is supposed to be Shakespeare's Muse. The Bard's wife never sees him, and we understand that the ghost of this other Elizabethan playwright is the real inspiration for most of Shakespeare's plays. Shouldn't it have been Bacon? All right, and the whole cast of A Midsummer Night's Dream. His mind is populated by many other creations of Shakespeare; it is even filled with a Merlin and an

Arthur. But Marlowe and all his dreams are really visions in Shakespeare's mind. Clear? But never mind, you're there to enjoy, not dissect. Betts' production (he wrote much of it and conducted the orchestra) is an amusing musical revue loosely based on Shakespeare's play. But with changes. Peter Quince, director of a rustic troop of players, now sports an ascot, beret, sunglasses and baton reminiscent of a modern film director. The rustic mechanics in Shakespeare's play now have hard-hats (U of T 77), and possess names like Jack Hammer. But Bottom's still there. We also have incursions from other plays. Anyone who has ever mixed up characters and scenes must have loved it. In a humorous parody, all Shakespeare's well known death scenes occur at once; we have Antony, Ophelia and Caesar, to name a few, dropping dead like flies to the accompaniment of drum rolls. Shakespeare might well have approved. He probably didn't want to be taken in a deadly scene in Romeo and Juliet; there was even someone playing the balcony. He squeaked and swayed. In the first act of this two act production, we were presented with memorable comic repartee between Merlin (played by a mellow-toned Ross Turvey) and a sprightly Puck (Magg Ruffman). Throughout the comedy of errors involved in Shakespeare's play, were woven several comic songs; of particular notice were "Put Me on the Stage", "The Griblich Song" and the tongue-twisters of

"Confrontation". In Act II, the audience heard the melodious harmony of "A Midsummer Night's Dream", the closing number, and "Lord what Fools These Mortals Be". After this, can there be complaints? A few. One enjoyed this combination of modern music and Shakespearean comedy, but had a nagging feeling some of the styles and songs were familiar. An overwhelming sense of déjà vu. The company which put on this production, New Faces, were riddled with Old Routines. Lysander's enjoyable comic antics reminded one of Bob

Newhart. Puck's moving "Look How my Dreams Come True" was delivered in an unmistakable Liza Mannell (in Cabaret style). Helena (or in the real world, Ellen Dimittroff) sang "Even for That" like a torch song given by Barbra Streisand. But this imitation may have been intentional; Mr. Betts worked in Godspell, where a similar technique was used. There was also the usual cliché use of sissified (ie. "Faggot") male mannerisms for an easy laugh. Merlin came dangerously close, as did Peter Quince. It wasn't long before Lysander was chasing Demetrius, and Helena chasing Hermia. This wasn't much of an improvement on Shakespeare's play; it was predictable and tiresome. Also, it seemed obvious that the writer of this Revue must have been an English major. Literary references were a little too clever and self-conscious. Marlowe must have been a ghost because one knows he died two years before Shakespeare began writing A Midsummer Night's Dream. We also have Merlin, who names Marlowe "Arthur", and a shrewish Anne Hathaway who gives the berated William a choice between his work and her bed. We all know he gave his wife his "second-best bed", but gave his plays to the world. Right? A song like "The Man I'll Meet Someday" seemed inserted for no other earthly reason in the play's action than to try out some original Betts material. There were other jolting clashes in the script like this.

But wait. I did enjoy the various skits and songs interwoven with the Shakespearean cloth. Some of the material seemed unfinished, but so do some of the Bard's plays. And, after all, who says you can't use other works to compose a new one of your own. Shakespeare did. So, all in all, one has to give William (R. Jeff Rosenzweig) his due, and Puck, and the Carol Burnett cum Celia. A fine entertainment for a winter's Night. The Betts production of the year?

Cleo Laine knocks out Massey crowd, turns pop songs into gold

The concert ended. The clapping began. In the balconies the people began pounding their feet on the floor. The bravos broke out. Against the wall of sound dumb-shows were acted out: a few members of the audience (voice-teachers, perhaps) rushed up the aisles of the pit to continue clapping, nearer but still at a respectful distance; some ventured closer to carry flowers to the stage. On the stage the lady bowed and bowed and bowed again. Finally a nod of the head. Silence. And her encores.

The lady was Cleo Laine at last Thursday night's Toronto Symphony Pension Fund concert at Massey Hall. "Cleo Laine, Superstar", the headlines have been screaming. But perhaps it is nearer to the truth to say that she gives the word "star" itself new meaning.

There was no hysteria associated with the evening.

Jesus Christ may be a superstar and Elton John is. But Cleo Laine, she's a singer. Her performance was completely, perfectly satisfying as a performance of a singer.

She faces the danger because she is so good and her singing so seemingly effortless that her concerts may become displays of virtuosity or merely a series of bravura exercises designed to show off her skills and range. That hasn't happened yet though. She amply demonstrated her interpretative powers last Thursday night by transmitting quite a lot of the pop material (meretricious and otherwise) of which most of her concert was composed, into gold.

A certain aloofness does tend at times to keep one ever so slightly aware of her vocal pyrotechnics however. It is no doubt the result of her maturity and experience as an entertainer (it's hard to believe, certainly just from looking at her, that she will be 50 years old next year). This aloofness and sense of reserve did mean that she was most immediately enjoyable in the few satirical numbers she did (such as Who is Sylvia? and Dunsinane Blues from the Shakespeare Fantasia, arranged by her husband, John Dankworth and the Noel Coward medley also arranged by Dankworth), and in her competitions with Dankworth and his saxophone in such numbers as Bird Song. But the emotional heights she achieved in Streets of London, in Prepare Ye the Way of the Lord, in Isn't It Rich?, had a rare plangent richness.

Now to see her act... And to hear her sing again (she will appear at Stratford this summer as she did last).

Musical spirit soars over technical flaws

I attended the Noon Hour Concert at Hart House last Tuesday and heard a promising young pianist perform works by Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, and Prokofiev. Bernadene Blaha is, apparently, a high school student and has performed with one, or some (I wasn't listening to the opening remarks that well) of the minor U.S. orchestras.

She began the program with Beethoven's Appassionata, op. 57, Sonata, and, although the technical difficulties were not firmly under control, she gave a strong, musical performance. I particularly liked her rendering of the majestic first theme, she is evidently a performer with strong lyric tendencies. Consequently the second movement turned out to be one of the "rightest" interpretations I've heard, in spite of some lack of smoothness. (I don't think the Music Room, with its lunch-time audience, is all that conducive to an artist's concentration. The first piece is inevitably a "warm-up", anyway.) However, she did warm up, and her playing of the Brahms was well-controlled. She handled the phrasing of the Rhapsody, Op. 79, No. 1 with extreme grace and the jollity in the Capriccio, Op. 76, No. 2 was conveyed very well.

The Chopin Fantasy, Op. 49 again suffered from thorny ground in the technical passages and the performance lacked some conviction, being a bit jerky in the lyrical sections, but the overall effect was not unsatisfying.

Her efforts to get her technique under control were perhaps most rewarding in the final piece, the Prokofiev Enticement, Op. 4, No. 4, a physically strenuous, percussive work in moto perpetuo style, not unlike some of Bartok.

On the whole, I think that Miss Blaha's difficulties lie more with presentation than with musicality, and, for me, it was a very worthwhile concert.

Red herrings and humor keep audience guessing at
"The Unexpected Guest"

It is an impeccably well-tailored production (Miss Marples would have approved); it lulls a suspicious audience (trained amateurs all) into a series of audacious red herrings through a meticulous, detailed presentation of distinct but recognizable characters. Yet most surprisingly, it succeeds in using the audience's alienation from the stage as a source of humour.

The University Alumnae Dramatic Club's presentation of The Unexpected Guest is a well-tuned production which draws its ultimate dramatic effect from a properly-disciplined cast working well within a standard murder-mystery storey which in my opinion does not easily transform itself into a script. Only a fine cast could accomplish the transition, or the even more difficult task of delivering some of the incredible lines involved without either grimacing or breaking into gutfaus.

The play opens with the sound of a foghorn, and footsteps outside a window. The catch is turned, the room entered, a body discovered, an apparent murderess uncovered. But the discoverer of all this likes to play the game — and invents his own version of the fatal evening to tell the police. After this novel beginning, we are as it were brought into the usual role of the Christie reader, following the police on their appointed rounds, which neither family-tragedy, blackmail, nor the suppression and reappearance of new evidence can stay. After everyone has been shown to have a creditable motive for killing the victim (a swinish cad by all accounts) a false conclusion is reached, and then the true one.

The principal source of humour is the combination of a perfect drawing-room approach from the cast and the delight of the audience in recognizing it. The costumes and set reflect this ironic self-knowledge, being remarkably like the Platonic form of the detective novel setting. In particular, the work of Ian Orr as the mysterious visitor Starkwelder is excellent in timing and irony. Some of the humour is derived, though, from the sparseness of the dialogue contrasted to its content. A big-game hunter, sitting at his window, shooting at cats? No! an eyebrow raised. And the lady collecting for charitable work? "Ran like a hen." No further comment required.

I found the mysteriously bereaved widow, played by Olwyn Millington, to be too thin a characterization to please me; she looked quite unfit to perform a crime of passion. So, too, did Miss Bennett, the family retainer, (Esther Hocklin) appear to be nothing more than a gossip until a dramatically satisfying (and still funny) scene which she shared with a wildly fantasizing mentally-retarded boy (Bruce Wall). Wall had a difficult part to play, having to separate a deceased mental age of perhaps eight from a deceased physical age (perhaps nineteen). He moved a little too quickly to allow the eye to relax and grew into a fascinating mad mind in the last third of the play. Giving a peculiar dignity to the piece was the aged mother of the victim, Maggie Bassett, who apparently would have acquiesced to her son's death by violence. The forces of intrigue were well served by the disreputable manservant Angell (played in such a fashion as to leave a slime-trail by Hugh Graham) and the exhonourable man-next-door, portrayed by Ray Slancer in a somewhat inconsistent fashion. For the side of Goodness, Beauty, and Truth, Sergeant Cadwallader (John Cummings) was disreputable Welsh in his accent but flawless in his timing, and the Inspector was fleetingly gangling and quite plausible as personified by John Illingworth.

The kudos has been distributed, with the majority going however indirectly to the director, Cicely Thompson, and the designer, Elsie Shewchuk. The individual performances were strong and well-balanced within the play's structure. The story is a classic, its successive revelations of nothing-of-importance and its presentation highly finished. Perhaps lowbrow for UADC but worthwhile.

Tyner's power, majesty come through despite bar's rotten atmosphere

Whatever one might think of jazz in general, or of McCoy Tyner in particular, it is impossible not to be deeply affected by the overwhelming energy, power, and perhaps majesty of McCoy Tyner in performance. McCoy has been one of the acknowledged giants of the jazz world throughout almost his whole career, which spans two decades. First achieving renown as one of John Coltrane's sidemen, McCoy has, since 1967, worked as the leader and focal point of a number of ensembles, constantly changing his personnel. The consistency with which he has maintained his highly developed style throughout these incessant revisions is at once remarkable and disturbing.

McCoy has, to a significant degree, transferred to piano elements of style which Coltrane developed on tenor sax. Most obviously, he has the rare ability to embellish elaborately upon the main melodic line of the tune while maintaining its rhythmic sense, harmonic balance, emotional coloring; in essence, its logic. He also has the capacity, in his ballads, for sustained lyricism with a sensitivity for musical space, though, regrettably, this did not come through during his Wednesday night performance. But however much of a genius he is, McCoy is becoming predictable. I really feel that there has been little alteration or development in his work over the past few years and that, though he may well be the creative force behind his ensemble groups, he relies very heavily on his other personnel for whatever true originality there is from one performance, or recording, to the next. He has become, perhaps, a bit over-stylized, and consequently, not broad enough in his range of musical expression. It in no way lessens the impact of his performance, but it is disturbing to see a musician of such talent stay within the confines of a well-defined, if powerful, stylistic mode.

McCoy played, during his gig at the El Mocambo, with two exceptional but little-known horn players; George Adams on tenor sax and bass clarinet, and Joe Ford on alto and soprano sax. Though neither of them had much room within the sets, which were dominated by McCoy, they offered some sparks of creativity to offset McCoy's familiar sound beautifully. They were also stylistically well balanced; Adams playing very free, using harmonics, et al, as opposed to Ford's more controlled and perhaps technically more proficient, though no less powerful, style. Their solos were, without exception, excellent.

The rhythm section included Eric Gravatt on drums, who played with Weather Report for a few years. He is steady and sensitive, and can think melodically as well as rhythmically, which makes his solos really interesting. Guillermo Franco, on percussion, is a perpetual motion machine whose facial expressions and gestures add as much emotional content to the performance as his array of instruments does to the sound. The only disappointment in terms of personnel was the bassist, Jerry Ruper (?), who produced consistent back-up but could only deal with the music within a very narrow rhythmic mode. His solos were repetitions of the same melodic figure up and down the range of the bass with absolutely no melodic or harmonic content. I was really surprised that McCoy didn't take the initiative to break into his solos sooner.

A McCoy Tyner performance is a moving and dynamic experience. When one sits back and looks at it with the eye of the detached observer, the music has its shortcomings. But during the performance, it is impossible to assume that position, and it is impossible to remain detached.

A few words about the El Mocambo—basically, the place is a rip-off, especially for liquor, and the people have a strange penchant for hassling their customers. It's not a jazz club, in the words of the manager, jazz is only a "fill-in" for the regular shows. Think about McCoy Tyner or Gary Burton as a "fill-in" for anything, and you'll have a decent idea of where their heads are at. Unfortunately, they do have the money to attract some big name musicians, so one is forced to put up with it. But check out some of the smaller jazz clubs in town, if you have the option, where the people are really into what they're doing. It makes a difference.

Opening act Carmen ended up as main attraction

In the field of pop and rock, there are very few performers who can sing songs by well known groups and at the same time as successfully imitating them, be different enough to be genuinely unique and interesting. Besides Eric Carmen, I can only think of one other rock musician, Elton John, who can take an old, familiar style of playing, like rock and roll, and translate it into his own style using contemporary instruments like electric guitar and synthesizers. Elton John, however, does not imitate any specific singer, but combines elements from various sources to create a hybrid sound including songs like "Alligator Rock" and "Benny and the Jets". Eric Carmen, when he so desires, does indeed sound like the Beatles, the Beach Boys and even the Drifters. Take that sound, increase the volume quite a bit and add a heavy dose of electronic power and rawness to create the fun of a Beach Boys concert with the energy of a Who concert, and you have Eric Carmen.

Eric Carmen, if you don't know by now, is currently on a hot streak. His single, "All By Myself" is in or approaching top ten status, and his album Eric Carmen on the Arista label is quickly rising on the charts. On Saturday night, CHUM-FM did a one hour special on him and then interviewed him live a few hours before the concert. They may have gambled somewhat, but it was a good gamble. I have the sneaking suspicion that many people in the audience, including myself, came mainly to see Eric Carmen. It was a shame that he only played less than an hour.

On the other hand, the Sweet, the actual headliners, played almost an hour and a half with generally the same hard driving, repetitive music that becomes almost boring after two numbers. The four members of the group looked and acted like they belonged to a bygone childish era. All of them still have long hair, which seems strange when you look at current mixed styles. The satin and suede-fringed outfits fitted perfectly with the young punk syndrome. Besides a good rendition of "Fox on the Run", their current single, the most interesting part of their performance was the use of a dual screen above and behind the playing area. The show began with a countdown from ten to one featuring animation, words, snippets from silent films and a strip sequence with music of David Rose's "Stripper" on tape. I was disappointed when this originality did not follow through into the actual performance, (although the screen was used one more time to alternate between live and filmed drum solos and drum interchanges going back and forth quickly between screen and live effort). But, in the end, the quality of the music did not even sustain the interest, very long, of the teeny-boppers who came to hear simple, loud, throbbing music. The whole show would have been much better if the Sweet were the opening act for Eric Carmen. Sonny Forest

U.C. REVIEW

Liberal myths exposed by department-store fan

Is there a better image of consumer society than the department store? Part subway station, part warehouse, part fantasyland, it is itself a model of market relations, and more gripping because of its immediacy than the elegant explanations so lovingly detailed by economic theoreticians. Take a look — preferably from an escalator, the best vantage-point and watch each individual in the crowd, each one locked into his own personal calculus of satisfaction — maximizing behavior, each one asking the questions — will it be Revlon or Estee Lauder? General Electric or Westinghouse? — that keep the Invisible Hand's finger stuck firmly in the social dike.

Canada, a country not well-known internationally for the verve of its entrepreneurial spirit, has found some degree of recognition in at least two fields of endeavour, not counting hockey: banking and large-scale retailing. The presence of the Bank of Montreal, Bank of Commerce, and Toronto-Dominion Bank, is felt on Wall St., and if there were some similar international pantheon of department stores, Eaton's, Simpsons, and The Bay would surely be represented there. Although its mail-order operation may be gone forever, the new Eaton Centre project testifies to the continued job-creating consumer-satisfying vigour of the enterprise. The new Bay store at Yonge and Bloor, with its chrome mirrors, and non-linear aisles, is more disorientingly up-to-date than the Electric Circus ever was.

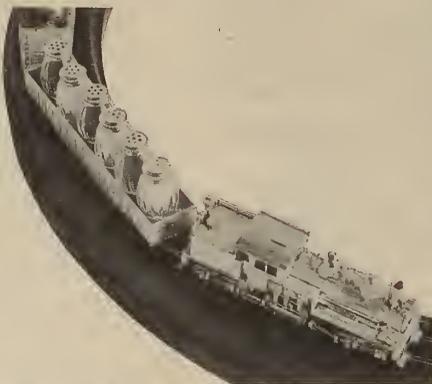

Despite our national genius for mass merchandising, however, the international laurels for creative salesmanship must go to Neiman-Marcus in Dallas, Texas, a name in the annals of American culture only slightly less Homeric in stature than Disneyland or CBS. Two recent publications — one a book, Minding the Store, by Stanley Marcus, son of one of the store's founders (Signet Books, 1974, $1.95 paperback), the other the Neiman-Marcus Christmas Book 1975, accompanied by a smaller pamphlet, Christmas Preview 1975 (both mailed free to the select thousands on Neiman-Marcus' mailing list) — allow us to take a closer look at the phenomenon.

This reviewer's job would have been much simpler if Stanley Marcus had conformed to type and presented us with either a neat picture of a crass materialist or of a smug penny-hoarder. As it is, Marcus comes across as being likeable, fairly articulate, energetic, and possessing a wide range of well-cultivated interests, not to mention being a consistent liberal in the political wilderness of Dallas. Dumping on the hypocrisy of liberals is a time-honored sport, but Marcus may be one of the few who do not deserve it. Marcus displays some faults, name-dropping among them, but considering the temptations of autobiography, the note of authenticity found throughout the book redeems them.

Marcus is a free-enterpriser, but a liberal, reforming free-enterpriser who thinks there's nothing wrong with capitalism that more honest men and social welfare programs can't fix. (It is true, of course, that a kind master is preferable to a cruel one, but subservience remains in both cases.) What an examination of Marcus' book along with the Neiman-Marcus Christmas Book shows is precisely that even with relatively decent men such as Stanley Marcus, who worries about ethics, in control of things, the twisted expression of human needs and desires in terms of cash relations — a characteristic feature of capitalist economies — goes on.

While Marcus cheerfully admits that "I don't regard it (running a department store) as the most important activity of mankind," he thinks nothing of making use of esthetics, family ties, or more blatant forms of psychological manipulation to make a sale. He quotes with approval a letter from an acquaintance comparing the Neiman-Marcus store to a cathedral, and concluding that "one wants to buy after being aesthetically stimulated." Marcus recounts the following story, again approvingly:

"One of my less fortunate purchases had been a fairly large stock of deep lilac paper which no one seemed to want. One day, Miss Kramer noticed a customer on the selling floor who was dressed in a purple outfit. She realized that the lady must like purple, so she approached her in another department, introduced herself, and showed her a sample of our deep lilac overstock, saying, 'Since you seem to like purple, I couldn't resist the temptation to show you one of our very lovely papers in a shade which is very difficult to find in most stores.' The customer was so genuinely pleased by this attention that she not only bought our entire stock of lilac paper, but ordered more. Which only proves an old retail adage that 'There's a customer for everything.'"

But aside from such forays into creative retailing, what distinguishes Neiman-Marcus most clearly in the public imagination is its collection of more exotic items, such as his-and-her mini-submarines, original letters written by George Washington, or the chance to dig up a dinosaur skeleton with a University of Utah research team and donate it to the museum of your choice. A neat reversal of the attractions of mass production, this, and one that Marcus understands clearly: the advantage of selling a $50,000 coat and a $50 dress in the same store is that people will "deliberately choose to buy their $50 dresses from the store that sells $50,000 sable coats. A little bit of the lustre of the sable rubs off on the label of every $50 dress." As in the case of the lady who liked purple, one buys an image for oneself, and becomes a function of what you buy. And for Marcus it can be justified because we are free to choose, free to choose between purple and green, between Sony and Toshiba, even between Neiman-

Marcus and the store down the street.

But what of the freedom of choice of those who wish to choose a world other than one in which "value" by definition means the same as "cash value"? The problem with Marcus' liberalism is that such a choice is not even considered as possible.

All the same, I wouldn't mind having a Neiman-Marcus "Gravy Train" to while away these long winter evenings around the dinner table. The "Gravy Train", in the immortal words of the N-M copywriters, is "the world's laziest Susan . . . Small talk won't be sidetracked while our sterling and silver plate HO gauge waiter zips around the track to the call of four control switches, delivering gravy, salt and pepper, condiments, sugar and lemon. For dessert service or cocktails it could handle nuts, mints, olives, onions, and sauces. The hard working little engine is silver plate — a replica of those used in lumbering and mining. The four cars are sterling silver. The oval track has a polished walnut base 44" long and 30" wide, to blend with the best table settings. The engine and cars have their own velvet-lined case to keep them safe and unharmed when the Gravy Train is not on duty. Special order. $8,000." Even the grandeur of Yorkdale will never look the same.

This compact and colourful column to inform you that with your admission ticket to see any performance of the National Ballet at the O'Keefe you can enjoy the art of dance reflected in over 75 paintings, sculptures, banners and bas reliefs. Also an arts and crafts show by staff and students at OISE; carvings, brass rubbings and macrame. Annettes Francoise frames mirrors with fat, cushioned applique banners, rich tapestries too in a warm and humorous collection at Galerie Dresdnere until March 1. Dennis Burton, one-time struggling, rebellious young painter, exercises non-objective, conscious intelligence in middle-age at the Isacc's Gallery until Feb. 26. Five Toronto Printmakers, who exhibited in Europe recently present a wonderful cross-section of styles and techniques at The Gallery on King St. The Canadian preoccupation with the land endures meanwhile in Changing Visions: in the Canadian Landscape at ACO. Finally, rattles, masks and tribal detail at Gallery O on Markham St. of mixed nature; sponge, horsehair, fur, paint and leather. Remember expressive and communicative theories in art.

Last week in a series of brief notes I mentioned three plays that I had seen and my straightforward reactions to them . . . but unfortunately those reactions signally failed to satisfy those concerned with the productions. It is undoubtedly my own failings that a phrase intended to be resonant, to suggest to the reader a group or cluster of emotions which I experienced when viewing the work, a phrase intended to suggest to one who had not seen the same production an equivalence with productions he has seen, should also be terrifyingly ambiguous to anyone closely connected with the play I had seen. My comments of last week were, I thought, favourable in general about each of the plays mentioned; there were specific parts of the productions which failed to satisfy me.

Primarily a play must appeal to me as a play by being accessible without specialized knowledge. I issue a call for common knowledge as the subject matter of the play, and feel compelled to reject purely private experience as a basis for valuing a work of theatrical art. It is the right of the critic to say this; it is certainly his duty to honestly hold himself open to the slightest surruration of emotional content which might whisper into his soul some hint of Truth. It is also his duty to grow in knowledge, and the sooner all critics acknowledge themselves deficient in wisdom the sooner all critics will include the class of all sensitive souls. I announced, both privately and in public, that I had a lack of empathy with Gass II, but I feel constrained when speaking of the play to indicate what its limitations were to me. I can only speak for what I saw, and what I imagined; if the imaginings it stirred in me are not as high aspiration as those other plays have stirred, I have a right to consider the play a lesser form of art. No amount of private acting experience which takes place on the stage in front of me can benefit me in the course of the experience of watching the play. Mine is not the learning experience of repetition and cumulative meaning; mine is the experience of immersion in the artform once and for all.

A second set of remarks was challenged by students of Trinity College. Did I find their production unprofessional? Yes, and in a way which I would not ascribe to the U.C. performance. The revue I saw was delightfully amateur — one of the fiftiest amateur productions I have seen — and yet that old Trinity daemon, recognition, rendered useless all discipline which I knew members of the cast had showed. The play was concocted in haste — I know that, the cast members know that. The work was intense, and profited from its intensity. The staging was tightly-patterned, the music and skits fitted into a new unity which Noel Coward and Sandy Wilson might not have recognized as quintessential Thirties, but which gratified the audience present and being catered to. As entertainment, a fine performance, and my last remark still holds: Trinity would well afford to write topical material in this format. It would succeed.

To end this spate of self-justification: all of us who bring you vicarious pleasure by reviewing and organizing this paper would be delighted to hear contradictory impressions from the great void into which we pour our solipsistic prose week after week. If you consider us too childish, our categories improper, our transcendence immoral, our nipple surrogates too blatant, WRITE. And, secondly, I am pleased to report that the winner of the 1975 Chalmers Award for the best Canadian play newly performed in the Toronto area is John Herbert's Fortune and Men's Eyes. Runners-up were Tremblay's Bonjour La, Bonjour, Reaney's Handcuffs, Marlin Kinch's April 29, 1975 and Bernie Slade's expatriate opus Same Time Next Year. The winner receives $2,500 and the runners-up share the same amount.

A few very brief notes before I too vanish into Reading Week. On campus, at the U.C. Playhouse, Feydeau's On the Marry-Go-Wrong, being presented as, indeed, a circus, Thursday to Sunday at 8:30 and Sunday matinee at 2:30. The Thursday performance is essentially a dress rehearsal added to accommodate departing skiers. Direction by Lewis Baumander, at 79A St. George Street, free admission. Also this week, at Upper Brennan Hall, SMC, (Feb. 11 and 12 at 8 pm; Feb. 13 and 14 at 7 and 9:30) the P.L.S. return after two strong shows and one week with what promises to be their most spectacular production of the year, The Dance of Death. At Innis, Toronto Truck have imported The Creditors, which will play Thursday to Saturday at 8:30, 12th-14th and 19th-21st. Students $1.50, others $3.50. The Innis Kitchen Sink fund gets half the profit. All three shows highly recommended.

Off-campus, a few interesting items, just for interest: at Phoenix Theatre, the Improvisational Olympics are again underway; at the Royal Alex, another Feydeau, 13 rue de l'Amour and at the St. Lawrence, Romeo and Juliet.

movies

WEDNESDAY: Cinema Lumiere has an Orson Welles double bill: at 7:30 Journey into Fear, which was actually directed by Norman Foster; but the screenplay was written by Welles and scored by Joseph Cotton, who also stars, as we reviewers say. At 9:00 Citizen Kane. The same show is repeated on Thursday, but at 7:00 and 8:15, to make room for a poetry reading afterwards. At the Revue, at 7:30, Claude Chabrol's Le Boucher, with Stephane Audran, the tender love story of a schoolteacher and a homicidal maniac. I'm not kidding; maniacs have feelings too. At 9:15, Ferreri's La Grande Bouffe; the pair continue until Friday.

THURSDAY: At the Roxy at 7:00 and 10:45 is Godard's La Chinoise, the movie that actually caused the French student uprising of May 1968: it was only seen by thirteen people but they were the right thirteen. In between, at 8:35, is Ice.

FRIDAY: At Cinema Lumiere are 8:00 and 9:45 is de Sica's Garden of the Finzi-Continis. If you feel you should let yourself in for a little bad luck you can try Rollerball at the Roxy.

SATURDAY: Take someone you love to Truffaut's Day for Night at Cinema Lumiere, at 7:30 or 9:45. Take someone who loves Diane Keaton to Love and Death at the Roxy at 7:30 and 9:30; if you go to the late show you can sleep through Sleeper, which starts at midnight. And the Revue begins a ten-day love affair with Fellini; tonight and Sunday at 7:00 and 9:30 it's Amarcord. MONDAY: At Cinema Lumiere, at 7:00 and 9:15, Buñuel, directed by Pinter and starring Alan Bates.

MONDAY: More Fellini at the Revue: tonight and Tuesday at 7:30 Variety Lights (1950 and at 9:15 The White Sheik (1951). At the Aladdin at 7:30, Sternberg's The Devil Is a Woman, with Marlene Dietrich; Betty Boop in Snow White — no one should miss Cab Calloway's rendition of St. James Infirmary, in which he actually turns into a twenty-dollar gold piece on a watchchain, right before your eyes — oh yes, and No Man of her Own, with Carole Lombard and Clark Gable. At Neill Wycik at 8:00 is Beat the Devil, a spoof of thrillers perpetrated by Bogart and Huston from what was already a pretty strange novel by Claud Cockburn.

TUESDAY: At Neill Wycik at 8:00 Kurosawa's The Seven Samurai, with Toshiro Mifune; they bill it as "the greatest battle epic since Birth of a Nation" which is a real PR slip-up because Birth of a Nation itself is playing at the Aladdin, at 7:30, in a hand-coloured print, which you don't get to see too often.

WEDNESDAY: Still more Fellini at the Revue: at 7:30 Toby Dammit (1968), from an anthology film called Spirits of the Dead — adaptations by various directors of stories by Poe. At half past eight, 8½ (1963); same again on Thursday.

THURSDAY: At the Cinema Lumiere, at 8:30, yet another film by R.W. Fassbinder, fastest camera in Europe The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant. It continues through Saturday, but at 7:30 and 9:45.

FRIDAY: And still more Fellini at the Revue: Fellini's Roma at 7:15 and Fellini Satyricon at 9:30 today and Saturday. The series winds up with Juliet of the Spirits (1965) at 8:00 on Sunday and Monday.

MONDAY: The Aladdin, at 7:30; Sternberg's The Scarlet Empress, with Dietrich as Catherine the Great; another Betty Boop; and My Man Godfrey with Lombard and William Powell. About as long as all of these put together is Jean Eustache's The Mother And The Whore, with Jean-Pierre Laud and Bernadette, two old Truffaut alumni, at Cinema Lumiere at 8:00; Jean-Paul Sartre makes a cameo appearance.

TUESDAY: Cinema Lumiere has an interesting idea; at 8:00, Top Hat with Astaire and Rogers, followed by a live dance performance by Elizabeth Chitty, at 10:00.

Letter department

Dear Movie Editor:
Two weeks ago last Friday my steady-person and I went to see Love and Anarchy. The next Friday we saw Swept Away. Then on Tuesday he took me to the Revue to see The Seduction of Mimi. And then this morning he phoned me up and said, "Say, doll, how's about the two of us shuffle off to the Big Apple for a fun weekend? We can take in Seven Beauties: And Bobbie — I want to go! All the time I seem to see Giancarlo Gianinni flexing his eyelids. Sometimes I even feel that what I need is a good slap in the face, to straighten me out. What should I do? Just sign me

All Screwed Up

Dear All:
Your problem is a common one. Every now and then there comes along an artist, such as Wertmuller or Riefenstahl, who is of undeniable technical prowess but who threatens to undo so much that has been accomplished. Such artists are better left to the enjoyment of those who, ideologically speaking, have nothing to lose. I realize however that this advice is not always easy to take. Often there is something within oneself that must be purged. Radical therapy can often help, and I do suggest you arrange for a consultation. In the meantime, One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest is showing at the Uptown. You can eat at the Ritzy afterwards. Good luck, sister. Ed.

dance

For those of you who can't escape to the ski hills or beaches next week, the realm of dance has much to offer, provided you don't plan on sleeping for 168 hours.

The Toronto Dance Theatre will be at the MacMillan Theatre February 17-21. The modern dance company, once described by the late Nathan Cohen as the most stunning in the country, presents a panorama of their repertoire classics.

Student tickets at the MacMillan Box Office are $4.

A good bet on Valentine's evening is you've nothing planned is Montreal's Le Groupe de la Place Royale at Minkler Auditorium, Seneca College. This brilliant modern dance company visits Toronto all too rarely — the last performance here was a windy night in November.

Le Groupe de la Place Royale, best known for its successful incorporation of multi-media techniques with dance, guarantees to steal or warm the heart.

Saturday they perform "Une studebaker pour Jimmy", (by gawrs, un car sur la stage?), and "100,000 signes". Tickets ($4 and $5) at The Bay or La Chasse-Galerie (924-1468).

rock

The thrills and chills of the rock world here in Toronto offer you an alternative to a dull ski week up in Frostbite Falls. The Climax Jazz Band is at DJ's in Hydro Place, if you can stand all the engineers. Brewer and Shively are at the El Mocambo. The commercially untainted Stringband are playing the Riverboat, but don't look for Horatio Alger, because he's on the Riveria spending his kickback money. If you are out in Scarberia, take the 60bus (and a spare bolt) to the Penthouse. Bananas are playing there. If none of that appeals to you try Al Martino at the Hook and Ladder Club.

In concert, Bruce Cockburn is at Massey Hall tomorrow and Friday. La Belle plays Massey Hall on the 16th — tell them you read it in the bilingual Varg.

Ray Materick is at UTS on Feb. 20 at 8 pm, SAC pushing that one. The Gardens, still thundering for Darryl Sittler's record breaking 10 points will host David Bowie on Feb. 26. If it sounds droll, don't worry — it's sold out anyway. Speaking of droll, Valdy is at Massey Hall March 20, but Gordon Lightfoot should pick things up. He's there March 22 to 28.

The SAC Winter Week will have some good shows going on the week of Feb. 22-28. Feb. 24 Lisa Garber is at the Med Sci Aud. at 1:30 and HomeMade Theatre is at Vic College, Rm. 3 at 8 pm. Lisa Garber is free and the HomeMade Theatre is $1.50. Feb. 25 Dan Hill is at Innis College Town Hall at 8 pm and the price for this show is also $1.50.

Feb. 26 Raffi and Nancy Simmonds are at Rm. 3 Vic College at 8 pm and admission is $1. The 27th Leon Redbone and John Arpin are at Con Hall at 8 pm. Admission is $4.00. Feb. 28 there is a dance in Hart House with Octavian for $1.50.

There's an all week pass for $5.00 to all the above mentioned Winter Week events (except Leon Redbone) that is available at the SAC office. Also the Original Sloth Band is at the Riverboat that week and passholders get in for $1.00.

GETTING TO EUROPE

Flying to Europe is a complex and sometimes frustrating experience. With the variety of fares it is sometimes confusing as to which is the best and most economical fare to use. Following is a description of the types of fares that are available to you and lists of special A.O.S.C. flights designed especially for you—the student.

ADVANCED BOOKING CHARTERS are charter flights which must be booked at least 60 days prior to departure. The outbound and return dates are fixed. Provided that you find departure and return dates that conform to your needs, ABC's are the most economical method of getting to and from Europe. Upon booking you must submit a $50.00 deposit. Your deposit is non-refundable in the event of cancellation. Balance payment including Canadian departure tax of $8.00 will be due no later than 65 days prior to departure. Should cancellations be made on or within 60 days prior to departure, the full fare is forfeit. Cancellation insurance, which will cover any monies you may lose to an airline in the event of cancellation, for reasons of illness or accident, is available at a cost of approximately $8.00. Following is a list of ABC flights offered by AOSC. In addition AOSC is able to book any charter flight advertised anywhere.

Additional ABC Charter Flights: Information on charter flights from Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax to London, Amsterdam, Frankfurt, Paris, Dublin for 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 weeks in duration is available from A.O.S.C.

A.O.S.C. IS AGENT FOR ALL ABC CHARTER FLIGHTS ADVERTISED ANYWHERE.

AFFINITY GROUP FLIGHTS are special departures on scheduled service organized by A.O.S.C. The departure and return dates are fixed and A.O.S.C. must gather a minimum of (40) forty passengers on a particular departure before a group may operate. However, A.O.S.C. group flight departures offer an advantage of a longer stay in Europe than normally afforded by Apex and excursion fares to those persons who do not qualify for the Youth Fare. A deposit of $100.00 is required at time of booking and balance payment is required 36 days prior to departure date. Cancellations occurring on or within 30 days prior to departure are subject to a cancellation fee of 10 percent of the full fare and cancellations occurring on or within 15 days prior to departure are subject to a cancellation fee of 25 percent of the full fare. Only students enrolled at member colleges of A.O.S.C. and members of their immediate family are eligible for these flights.

Citywide cutbacks questioned. Help needed

By PETER ROWE

The Coalition Against Cutbacks announced two public meetings on the Davis government's cutbacks in social services and education. They have also articulated in a press release future strategy in opposing cutbacks.

The first meeting will be a forum at the St. Lawrence Centre on February 27. A government spokesman has been invited.

The second meeting is actually a mass rally on Friday, March 12, a location has yet to be announced.

The Coalition is urging Metro Council to meet with Stephen Lewis and the members of the Official Opposition on February 17 to discuss the cutbacks. The Ontario NDP has approached Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey about such a meeting.

Alderman John Sewell, a member of the coalition wants to transfer payments from the province to the municipalities to increase at the same rate as provincial revenues. At present they are increasing at less than half that rate.

Other members of the coalition feel that commitments to social services should be based on actual needs, not on arbitrary figures such as the rate of increase in provincial revenues.

Consequently, the coalition advocates the restructuring of the provincial tax system to provide for those needs.

Angola's "correct path"

By LEA RYAN

"The two superpowers, the Soviet Union and the United States, are responsible for the present situation in Angola," according to UNITA representative to the United Nations, Jeremiah Chitunda.

Chitunda was speaking to a packed meeting Sunday night at Innis College, on a rare occasion when UNITA spokesmen have presented their position outside of Angola.

"We have placed our emphasis on developing the struggle inside Angola, but we need to counteract the vilifying propaganda of the western press," he said.

UNITA was founded in 1966 inside Angola, because the "then existing liberation organizations, MPLA and FNLA did not appear to be following the correct path. UNITA arose in response to the internal contradictions of Angolan society," Chitunda claimed.

There were two main issues which UNITA felt decisive to advancing the liberation movement, according to Chitunda. The first was "a solid political line had to be defined, taking into consideration the fact 90 per cent of the people are peasants, and the role played by the peasant masses. Along with this we had to base the leadership permanently inside Angola, to suffer with the masses, to struggle with the masses."

The second issue, according to Chitunda, was to base the national liberation struggle on as wide a base as possible, "rather than on geographical area of ethnic group, to combat tribalism and sectarianism."

The present fight in Angola has nothing to do with communism or anti-communism, said Chitunda. The media outside of Angola promotes an image that UNITA is supported by South Africa, and is hiring mercenaries to fight, he said.

"I want to leave this thing quite clear. There is no grounds to say UNITA has military or financial support from South Africa. And we understand the use of mercenaries is always self-defeating."

Chitunda went on to document UNITA's close relations with SWAPO, the liberation movement of Namibia, who "shared blood, shared barracks, and material things" with the UNITA guerrillas. "Today you still find 3,000 SWAPO guerrilla fighters in UNITA territory," he pointed out.

"The image being promoted by the media is that the African people can't fight for themselves, but must be backed by some superpower. The example of Asia last year proves otherwise. With the people, everything is possible," said Chitunda.

X-country skiers place second in OUAAs meet

By STUART STARRK

The cross country ski season culminated this past weekend amongst the beautiful terrain north of Ottawa with the OUAAs championships. Under near perfect conditions the races, hosted this year by Queen's, ran flawlessly.

Unfortunately for the other six universities present, Crestoph Weber's superb skiing led the Guelph Men's team to a decisive victory. U of T Men finished second overall followed by Queen's. Our Women's team came through with an excellent effort taking the women's title, beating teams from Trent, Western and Queen's.

In the 35km men's relay, the Guelph team of Crestoph Weber, Richard Lay and Kim Poole took 1st place in 60:59. The U of T team of Veli Niinimaa, Mike Dyon, and Paul Ketko edged out Queen's by 22 seconds to take 2nd place in 63:25.

The women's relay, also a tough 35km race, saw the U of T win convincingly. Susan Rowley, Leslie Thompson and Bea Hampson beat the Trent team by over 3 minutes and the 3rd place Western team by more than 8 minutes.

For Saturday's individual races, much to no ones surprise, Cress Weber poled away with a 6 minute victory margin over Toronto's Veli Niinimaa. Veli, skiing one of his best races this season finished in the excellent time of 63:04 over the demanding 15km course. Third place went to Richard Lay of Guelph in 64:04 who was followed by Tom Best of Toronto.

Susan Rowley continued to dominate the University women's races taking their 5km event in 26:31. She was followed by Martha McIntyre of Trent in 27:18 who just edged Leslie Thompson of the U of T by 15 seconds.

Downhill Dramatics

By SUE AITKEN AND SAMANTHASLADE

The U of T Women's Ski Team placed third out of eight participating universities in the O.W.I.A.A. Alpine Championships at Mt. St. Marie in the Gatineau's, Quebec. From Thursday Feb. 5 to Saturday 7, weather and ski conditions were favourable for the two events, the "far-out" team placing 5th overall in the Slalom race and an encouraging 2nd in the Giant Slalom.

In the Slalom, individual placings were 4th by Andrea "Ace" Esson, 10th by "Crazy Legs" Jane Seymour, 15th by Marion "Big Foot" Howard and 24th by Sue "Shakin' Bakin'" Aitken, out of approximately 42 participants.

In the Giant Slalom, individual results were 1st place for Esson, 14th for Debbie "Beer" Bongard, 16th for Aitken, 17th for Howard, 19th for Seymour and 24th for Rosi "Mittermaier" McLaughlin.

The combined results for U of T were Esson 1st, Seymour 9th, Howard 12th and Aitken 19th.

Unfortunately, the O.W.I.A.A. trophy was secured by Western, who placed highest in both events, thereby achieving the best combined team standings.

The Men's Varsity Alpine ski team are now the OUAA Champs after defeating the field of Queen's and Western.

Toronto placed second in the slalom event with Mike Bell winning the event and Graham Hess finishing fourth. U of T won the Giant Slalom as Hess was first and Bell placed.

Queen's was second and Western third in the combined standings. Mark Bell won the combined individual while Hess was second. The rest of the team consists of Mike Bulger, John Trist, Mark Groulx, and Mike Duder. The baddest bunch ever with gatebusters like Tom Creed and Al Satrata not even skiing it's a great team.

No sugar for Innis

By JONATHAN GROSS

John Ota was close to tears. Chris Bouris couldn't believe it. Skip Rabkin wasn't there. It has been a long time since the New York Rangers have sipped champagne from the Stanley Cup. It may even be longer before Innis makes the playoffs.

Last Friday before a partisan St. Mike's crowd Harold Innis's boys dropped a 3-1 decision to the Shamrocks thus putting them only one point ahead of SMC in the race for the final playoff berth.

After Monday night's tie with Trinity it looks like Innis will occupy a lower berth in the train of life. Earlier in the afternoon, St. Mike's defeated Forestry, already assured of a spot, 3-1 to pull into a deadlock in fourth.

Each team has two games left. Innis has to down Law and PHE B while SMC gets a 'free ride' against defaulted Vic II and a couple of brass rings towards the playoffs. They end up the season against the Junior Lackeys of Skule. Vic has invested a lot of hard in their first division team. Jackets, sweaters and even equipment bags have been distributed, if you can believe it.

Neglect is what they have given the second division people.

Dineen picked up two for SMC against Forestry. Rod Mins, who was a first division allstar last year at New, chose to play for his faculty this year. He didn't show yesterday. Could've been the difference for the Smokeys. Mins is now the most wanted man at Innis.

In the Trinity game it was Chris Bouris who scored for Innis while Schatz broke Marv Kurz's shutout in the second period. Kurz played well while allstar nominee Andy Dehio was all over the ice. It's been a disappointing season for Innis. Training camp was excellent and the fresh blood brought fresh attitudes about winning.

Right now they have two options. Firstly they could chip in and spend $30,000 skins and acquire the skills of Mickey Redmond, recently put on waivers by the Detroit Red Wings, quickly enrolling him in the school of Engineering. Plan 'B' would find Jay 'Heinrich' Polon enrolling in the Patty Hearst Famous Kidnappers School for a crash course in Mass Abducting. After his graduation the whole SMC B team would disappear only to surface after defaulting to Jr. Engineering for lack of players.

Fencing Finals here

Saturday, February 7th was an eventful day for U of T's Intercollegiate Women's Fencing Team, consisting of Carol Langer, Marcia Ryan, Alice Chan and Elle-Mai Laikve. Toronto maintained its position as first overall winner in both sectionals, defeating both Brock and McMaster 11-5 and 8-8.54 hits to 47 respectively.

Carol Langer faithfully remained the overall individual champion, with 21 victories and only one defeat. Langer, Ryan and Chan also qualified for the Individuals and the Team has great expectations of victory at the finals in Ottawa on the 27th of February, 1976. Many thanks go to Kenneth and Company, signed, the Team!

The Varsity Men's fencers did not fare as well as hoped last weekend. On Saturday at the OUAA semi-finals several fencers qualified for the finals to be held this Saturday at Hart House. It will be an all day affair so pack a lunch.

In sabre, Doug Crawford, John Hepburn, and Brad Patterson will compete as individuals, having gained up positions against strong competition. Unfortunately, as a team they were eliminated; each had fought one round of competition more than most team opponents from Carleton and RMC. Fatigue became a factor.

In epee, the team of Rob McLean, Elgin McMurchy and Alex Vezer was eliminated by Carleton and RMC. Equally disappointing is the fact that only Rob McLean will compete individually. There is no explanation except that maybe the team didn't eat their Wheaties.

The foil team of Rich Arthur, Mike Stephenson, Bernard Tsui was able to compete, defeating both RMC and Ryerson. They move into the finals with Carleton. Mike Stephenson will also participate in individual competition.

Once again it's Saturday at Hart

House if you want some pointers. Not very punny, are we?

downed Music 3-2. Richie Shaw tells us that a prediction was made by this sports desk. Okay so New won a game. We underestimated their hockey prowess. A few of them actually skate on one blade instead of two. MacDonald, Laughton and Puckering kissed the red light.

Serves Randy MacKenzie right. Phmy drove Emmanuel out of the Arena with a 12-1 drubbing. The Emmanuel goalie was last seen filing a law suit with the Dave Reece Famous Goalenders Hockey Camp. Apparently they reneged on their guarantee of a 2.00 GAA 'or your money back! Hetherington turned the trick for the Druggies.

Mike Turk wasn't there but who cares. Scar II, this reporter's pick to go all the way, played with UC II until it was time to win and that they did, 7-1. Don Burt, Paul Mark and Murray Lecout were each deuces for the Maroon Morons. Now that's entertainment.

In other action ENG Senior downed Vic I 4-3. Kolanko, Russell, Bolton and Deluce beat Scott Csumrik. Hundt got two in a losing cause. Doug Herridge was visibly upset about the violence in the recent Vic-SMC A game. Vic lost 4-1 in a game that was ended in a brawl during which four players were thrown out. What does it all mean?

Friday: track, boxing

So you laid out big bucks to see the Thrilla in Manila. Who cares? Friday night's your chance to see the Sullyvans and Dempsseys of U of T in their only home appearance at Hart House this season. A nationally ranked team from south of the border, Brockport College will venture from the wilds of Rochester to battle our 'champeens'.

As part of the ECBA training period before the championships at Westchester State, Westchester PA., this match represents the first half of a home and home series to be continued next week in Rochester.

This year's roster includes Jason Lo, Paul Ross, Tom De Wolf, Joe De Fonzo, Steve Kent, Martin Diagh and Gary Robertson. John Raftery is on the team but he will be at the Ontario Winter Games this weekend.

The team practices till 6:15 at Varsity Stadium in Room 4. Call 924-3876 for info. Ask for Bob. Float like a butterfly . . .

Also be on the lookout for some U of T students at the Star Games this Friday at the Gardens.

In the mile relay the team of Frank Kerslaw, Dave Colbert, Bill Warrick and Gerry Feeney will carry the Blue and White colors. Sue Bradley and Curtis Sahadath will run the 50 yard hurdles while John Sharpe, who won the 3-mile trials two weeks ago at the CNE over the No. 2 marathon runner of 1975, Jerome Drayton, will try and better his excellent time of 13:17.

A number of athletes will also be competing for their clubs instead of their school. There's a college meet Saturday afternoon from 12:00 to 3:00 p.m. also.

Council refuses to rollback TTC fare increase

By BOB BETTSON and ERIC McMILLAN

Despite vocal support from over 500 citizens who jammed the Metro council chambers last night, the council defeated by 22-10 a motion by Toronto Alderman John Sewell to rescind the TTC fare increase for 30 days to find alternate funding.

The fare increase, announced last Friday, increases fares from three for a dollar or 40 cents cash to five for two dollars or 50 cents cash. Senior citizen and student fares will be raised accordingly.

The increases were implemented swiftly to prevent hoarding and the TTC meeting which passed the increase was called without public notice. But Alderman Dan Heap charged the increase had been planned for several weeks because of the immediate appearance of new sheets of tickets without an amount on them.

Sewell presented the council with petitions signed by over 5,000 people opposed to the fare increase. He proposed a four part motion demanding:

A 30-day rollback of the increase, pressure on the province for more funding, the removal of Metro chairman Paul Godfrey and Etobicoke controller Pete Farrow as TTC commissioners and the tabling of reports on possible increases in business tax assessment.

In a two and a half hour debate punctuated by frequent outbursts by the audience in support of those opposing the TTC increase, arguments centred on whether the TTC's deficit should be financed by fare increases or by increasing taxes.

Alderman Colin Vaughan said the TTC deficit could be financed by a special surtax on municipal taxes paid by businesses.

But supporters of the fare increase said people would have to pay anyway and increases in business taxes would hurt the boroughs in their attempts to attract industry.

Sewell said the increase was too much, would cost the TTC millions of riders, would directly hit low income people who can least afford it and contradicts the principle that the city should not encourage the use of automobiles.

He charged the procedure used in passing the increase was "absolutely shocking." As an alternative Sewell called for an increase in corporate taxes, pressure for increased provincial subsidies for public transit.

Vaughan told the council everybody's money should be used to keep TTC fares down because recommendations before they have been approved by council.

The supporters of the increase, many from the majority suburban contingent on Metro council, charged that an increase in fares was preferable to an increase in taxes on homeowners. They said larger tax increase would not win popular support.

Godfrey summed up the pro-fare-increase sentiment when he said "If it is a choice between a transit fare increase and more police protection for the city, I'll pick more police protection." Among the possible effects of the new Metro budget will be a freeze on increases in police.

The furor over the TTC fare increase has increased as citizens groups have rallied to fight the second increase in under a year.

The surprise announcement on Feb. 21 came after speculation the hike would come this summer or April 1 at the earliest. Godfrey, a TTC commission member, promised last year there would be no increase for three years.

The Movement for Municipal Reform (MMR) were taken by surprise because the previous increase in fares last March had been passed on the condition that an in depth study of alternatives be carried out before any further increase. However, no such study has come to light, MMR spokesmen told a hastily organized press conference Friday.

SAC participated in the press conference to oppose the fares hike. SAC Communications commissioner John Tuzyk said students are "among the heaviest users of the transit system" and the hike shifts TTC costs to "those least able to pay" such as students and low income earners.

SAC researcher Kevin Kelleher claimed the TTC will not increase revenues greatly from the increased fares. TTC officials had told him they expect a "massive drop" in transit riders after the hike.

Tuzyk and Kelleher joined Toronto Aldermen Heap, Vaughan, Johnston, Sewell and Sparrow in expressing "shock" at the haste with which the decision to increase fares was made.

Kay Parsons of the Grange Park Residents' Association charged the TTC fares are "really hitting ordinary workers hard." York councillor Oscar Kogan argued corporations should be taxed to subsidize transit.

Organizers of opposition to the increase indicated the fight is not over. They will continue the petition drive and mobilize support for a demonstration opposing all social service cutbacks at the opening of the provincial legislature March 9.

Group may be banned after meeting fracas

By PAUL McGRATH

U of T administration is looking into the possibility of banning a recognized campus group following a series of violent confrontations at a political meeting two weeks ago at Innis College.

The Academic Activities Committee, founded by the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) seven years ago to hold forums and meetings on political issues, hosted a meeting on the situation in Angola at that time.

At this meeting three violent confrontations occurred. At one point approximately 15 members of various political groups in disagreement with the CPC (M-L) were pushed out onto the sidewalk on St. George St. They had previously been selling newspapers close to the front door of Innis College.

A second disturbance involved an appearance by alleged Western Guard members, who were beaten by those inside the meeting. According to most reports, it was this confrontation that resulted in the subsequent breaking of two windows and the painting of a swastika on a wall at the college last week. A similar occurrence took place at Bethune College at York University.

A third incident occurred when meeting security members would not allow entry to a Toronto black activist, known as a sympathizer of an Angolan group the CPC (M-L) was opposed to. He and two friends, both of whom were Innis College students, refused to accept the decision and a fight ensued. All three were ejected.

Since then Innis students have met with Principal Peter Russell to ensure that similar battles do not occur.

According to Russell, he called representatives from the Innis Student Society and the CPC (M-L) together. The latter made no promise that such disturbances would not occur again, he said.

Innis Student Society president Mike "Friend" was ejected at the disturbance and at the CPC (M-L) refusal to follow security procedures.

"We've given them halls three times for free and now they've screwed us around," he said.

Russell's major concern, which he explained in a letter to vice-president Internal Affairs Frank Iacobucci, is over the "employment of private political security forces to control access to university buildings."

"In my view, this is wrong," he said yesterday.

Russell asked the CPC (M-L) to comply with university rulings regarding security at meetings. These rules call for postponement of any meeting where violence is expected until proper security measures can be taken by U of T police. The group refused to comply. Russell's letter to Iacobucci calls for their expulsion as a recognized campus group if they continue their refusal to comply.

"As a community, we're shaken by this incident," said Russell. "As a college, we've been consistently politically involved, now we're seeing what that involvement entails. This sort of security should not be allowed."

Iacobucci has turned the investigation over to his special assistant, Michael Dafeo, who will look into the matter and may suggest future policy changes.

GAA checkoff main obstacle

By LEA RYAN

GAA stewards are united in their demand for check-off as a key demand in the current GAA-administration negotiations at the Stewards' meeting held Tuesday, they passed a resolution calling for compulsory union dues, collected by the administration.

"The stewards council supports a modified formula that would make union dues compulsory for all new employees and allow present employees to opt for no dues payment," said the resolution. Dan Sadoway, from Metallurgy & Material Sciences said check-off was an important issue since the union has to have funds to support executive operations, secretarial staff and a grievance procedure.

Bill Stratton, Philosophy, pointed out the members voted for check-off when they ratified the union. He went on to say a petition supporting check-off had been signed by over two thirds of the philosophy teaching assistants.

Eric Wallberg, from Political Economy said "People in my department who are serious about the union are adamant about check-off." A petition opposing cutbacks in political economy was returned to department chairman Harry Eastman by over half of the teaching assistants.

David Wolfe, a former TA from political economy, said "If the university feels the union's position on check-off is not representative, surely the onus lies on them to prove it."

Bizzaro boosts brass

From the Crime Desk
 Someone's getting down on brass plaques. At least the latest campus crime trend seems to suggest so.
 Following the disappearance of the plaque from the front of University College last fall, and the removal of Simcoe Hall's plaque two month's ago, the brass bandit has again struck, this time at the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.
 Following the Institute's move into their new quarters at 15 Hart House Circle from their old location on Wellesley, they promptly hung up their shingle only to suffer another visit of the brigand of brass.
 The Institute has not seen fit to declare it an international incident yet, but they would like to get it back. They have reported the matter to the authorities who have so far failed to dig up any clues.

 A public education agency devoted to stimulating a greater degree of interest in international affairs and Canada's role therein, the Institute has had a close relation with U of T since 1928. It maintains a library and reference centre which faculty and students are invited to use.
 Executive director Robert Reford said the plaque does not answer to any particular name, but is made of brass, is approximately one foot wide and three feet long, and is inscribed "The Canadian Institute of International Affairs".
 Reford said the plaque had no price on its head because he anticipated anyone arranging its return would want to remain anonymous. He said he believed it is small enough to fit into the book return chute.

Levy or lose it: Internal hacks

Unless a special fee is levied on students, one or more of the university student services must close.
 This was the view of a report prepared by an administrative group headed by Internal Affairs vice-president Frank Iacobucci, which was discussed at yesterday's meeting of Internal Affairs committee. The committee will continue discussion of the report at its March meeting.

 The report states, "if the imposition of a fee for student services and/or an increase in the Health Service fee prove unacceptable" then "the only option will be to close down one or more of the services."

Dollars for scholars?

Following revelations from the provincial government about the level of support for the university, the administration will meet today and tomorrow with representatives from the faculty and staff associations to work out a wage settlement for next year.

Last week's government announcement of a 12 per cent increase in the level of funding caught the university by surprise and is rumoured to have thrown members of Simcoe Circle into significant trauma. U of T president John Evans commented that the increase "is only fractionally above our most pessimistic forecast."

"It therefore appears unlikely that much alleviation of the divisional cutbacks can take place," he said. "The alleviation was built into the budget in the form of "add-backs", items that could be re-installed into the budget if the announcement and the wage settlements proved to make money less tight. According to Governing Council member Michael Sabia, the add-backs are now an "academic question."

However, according to Sabia, it is now more important than ever that the faculty and support staff moderate their wage demands to loosen the pressure.

"We're all just sitting and waiting for the results," he said. "It's too bad we won't have them for Thursday's Governing Council meeting."

Asked about the effects of the government announcement on the wage negotiations, budget chief George Connell said that the administration would not move too hastily to force a low settlement.

"I think to be fair, that the administration will have to listen to their whole story before we make any commitment to the add-backs," he said.

President Evans expressed concern late last week that the university had been dealt with unequally, noting that the 12 per cent increase is "the lowest of any Ontario university."

"The other large institutions in the province receive increases ranging from 13.5 per cent to 16 per cent," he said.

Although a faculty and support staff position on the budget is unclear, there has been pressure from within the faculty to moderate the wage demands to take off some of the financial pressure. Eighteen faculty members suggested such in a recent letter to the Globe & Mail.

The budget will come up in front of the whole Governing Council tomorrow for discussion.

Internal Affairs acts as the policy making committee for the Health Service, the Housing Service, Advisory Bureau, the Career Counselling and Placement Centre and the International Student Centre.
 Concurring with Sabia, student governor Jonathon Gentry said the lack of mention of other revenue sources besides a student fee was "reprehensible".

An Internal Affairs Study Group last year recommended no cuts be made in the 1976-77 services budget, noting that total services allotments were only about 1 per cent of the total university budget, and that they were operating at the bare minimum of funding necessary. The Budget Committee recommended this year a 9.3 per cent cut in next year's services budget.

Woodsworth principal Art Kruger, an Internal Affairs member, disagreed with the Study Group's approach, arguing that no part of the university could escape cutbacks by using the argument that they were operating on the minimum level of funding possible. He said everyone would use that defence.

In other Internal business, Iacobucci agreed to a request from Sabia to provide a report on the disturbance at an Innis College meeting where windows were broken and a swastika painted on a wall.

Speaker slam Fong decision

By DAVID JONES

"As a lawyer, I was appalled by what I saw" in the Henry Fong appeal hearings, MPP Margaret Campbell told a rally in the lobby of the Medical Sciences Building yesterday afternoon.

"If they can't determine in the initial stages (of a students' progress) that he won't make it through, then something is wrong with the system," Ms. Campbell said. "Henry Fong should not be made a scapegoat of that system."
 Other prominent speakers at the rally included Toronto lawyer Charles Roach, and K. Doc Yip, a lawyer and former school trustee. Lawyer Mike Smith and Math Prof. Peter Rosenthal, who represented Fong in his appeal for readmission to the medical school last fall, also spoke.

The rally, besides bolstering Fong's continuing struggle with the medical school, was intended to muster support for a further demonstration at tomorrow's Governing Council meeting.

That meeting will receive the final report on the rejected appeal, and consider a proposal from the Academic Affairs Committee to introduce non-academic criteria into the med school's admissions procedures.

"Wherever you introduce subjective criteria, you increase the chances of prejudice," Roach told the rally. "That's why we are pledged to oppose (the criteria)."

Smith charged that the "determined persecution of Henry Fong" by the medical school has "paved the way" for the introduction of communications interviews, already a part of medical school admissions procedures, and now for the non-academic criteria.

"The medical faculty used Henry Fong to test the water, to see how far they could go," he said.

Smith predicted that the new criteria, if passed, would be used by the medical school to exclude immigrant students, and also working class students "who don't have the right references."

Tomorrow's rally to protest the new admissions criteria and the Fong decision will begin outside Simcoe Hall before the Council meeting and move inside for the proceedings.

Harry Whittaker is the people's choice, the only U of T prof to win one of the 20 teaching awards given by the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations.
 Whittaker was nominated for one of the annual awards by medical students at U of T, who collected over 600 signatures within two days. He received support from faculty members, as well as from U of T president John Evans.

Whittaker was lauded by students for "his friendly attitude, smiling face, sense of humour and incredibly clear explanations". He teaches in the department of Anatomy.

Whittaker is famous for his noon-hour slide shows on the subject of anatomy, which he does on his own free time and of his own initiative. They are usually well-attended.

Grads gobble gourmet goods

Food lovers you have another outlet. The GSU has extended its normal fare from sandwiches to "healthy peasant food" and will soon join Innis College as the only real eating places on campus.

The man in the picture is Brian Wojtowicz, a chef who has been spirited away from Bumpkin's to lead the shift in menu. The new fare includes soups and salads and a hot feature every day.

Wojtowicz hopes to be in full swing within two weeks. Pay the GSU a visit at 16 Bancroft St. just west of the textbook store almost at Spadina. Beer and hard stuff as well.

Greetings again from high on top the second floor. Coasting into home stretch, with all the regulars at the wheel helped by Chris Du Vernet, Mr. Weiss, Oliver Berfin, Sharon Stevenson, John Tuzyk the publisher and others unnamed. Hello young lovers you're under arrest.

The Varsity a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. TTC increase: Not without a fight

Judging from the response of labor, political and student groups, the TTC is going to have a difficult time maintaining their recent fare increase. Leaflets are circulating, people are meeting and it looks as if Gordon Hurlbut may have a hard time maintaining his position as chairman.

There are a number of disturbing aspects to this increase which illustrate that, despite all city council has done in the last few years to make Metro conscious of its transportation responsibilities, we're still stuck deeply in the philosophy that makes the user bear the brunt of the TTC's lack of principled planning.

The TTC seems to have no philosophy about its function. If it wants to take responsibility only for its solvency as a break-even institution, then the fare increase is right in line. But it has to take more than that small responsibility; it is insufficient to reduce its service down to a numbers racket. Before taking such a step, it should have looked closely at how the running of an efficient transportation system is tied in with the overall well-being of a large city. Once they made those sort of connections, it should have dawned on them that this increase does very little for our aforementioned well-being.

For one thing, the difference in expense between riding transportation and driving a car is becoming quite slim, enough to push a conservative 20,000 or so into using their automobiles. This is counter to a lot of what the city has been pushing for recently. Through policy decisions on topics such as expressways and air pollution, it has attempted to discourage unnecessary use of the almighty private four-wheeled vehicle.

As you might have expected the second gripe about the increase is that it hits students quite hard. For the most part, students do not have access to a car, nor do they enjoy the sort of lifestyle that allows a dollar or more per day for transportation. Transportation should not become a major expense in student weekly budgeting. There are enough outside expenses already.

Students, with the help of our own SAC, are pushing for maintaining the old fare. This goes approximately half way. They should continue, as they have in the past, to push for a student fare, which would more than certainly force Metro into some quick thinking about their responsibility towards subsidizing what qualifies as probably the best transportation system in North America. Until they take this responsibility, we can look forward to more of the same increases.

Faculty utterance a healthy sign

"Although the faculty has limited power in the wider society, it does have substantial power in the university. The time has come to use it for establishing priorities based on prudence and justice."

Bravo! and a few "hear hear"'s go to the 18 members of the U of T faculty that published that statement in the Globe and Mail two days ago. In a rather strongly-worded statement, they took the university to task for the way the budget has set priorities here for next year.

The letter, reprinted below in our letters column, represents a significant gesture to the workers on this campus from the faculty, the first of its kind. In it they suggested that there is no reason why faculty salary demands should in any way jeopardize the employment of the 120 physical plant workers who face some sort of insecurity due to the fragility of our financial situation.

Although it's sure that this does not represent an official faculty position (as they go into the wage discussions this week), it surely shows the government has failed to force the constituents of this university to fight each other for the right to survive.

It's a healthy move. Signs of solidarity are always healthy, especially when the top wage-earners appear to be concerned about the lowest-paid. Maybe it's a little presumptuous to think that they may have some power, but it's encouraging nonetheless.

Unfortunately, all this talk of one belt tightening instead of another diffuses our concentration somewhat. We might be tempted to think of our problems as solved if the faculty and support staff will make some wage concessions this week. But we'd be kidding ourselves. It's heartening to see some budge to make room for others, but the pressure is still on. The government has made no concessions. Even if the pressure is relieved somewhat this year, it will be back on to the next. Will the faculty be asked to make larger concessions next year? It would be unfair to ask them.

It remains to be seen how much influence these 18 profs have among their colleagues. Wage talks are going on today and we won't know the results until the end of the week. In the meantime, Governing Council will talk about this rather horrendous budget and we'll see just how much power they do or don't have over its implications. Keep your eyes and ears open.

Faculty slams budget priorities

To The Editor: The provincial Government's restrictions on spending for higher education have come in the wake of massive expansion promoted by the same Government. The present situation allows that Government to produce a divide-and-conquer situation. Groups are pitted against other groups in an unhealthy way as uneven and unpredictable limitations are put on all of us. In this situation only the powerful groups will gain; the spectre of unemployment hangs over the most vulnerable.

The report of the University of Toronto budget committee reflects this serious and disturbing tendency. It recommends that 120 positions on the maintenance staff of 750 will be eliminated, including all night watchmen. Faced with government cutbacks, the budget committee recommended, nonetheless, that the salaries of academic staff at all levels be kept "competitive". We deplore the priorities these two proposals represent. A marginal increase to those of us earning much higher salaries cannot be so important as to justify the loss of employment by these persons.

We are convinced that these dismissals are unjust. We are not at all convinced that they are prudent. We are told that periodic preventive maintenance will be eliminated. It may be more exciting for our boom-bust psyches to move to "emergency" maintenance, but our children will pay for our shortsightedness.

At the University of Toronto over 120,000 employees receive over $20,000. The 18 signatories to this letter are members of this group. We have signed this letter as a result of a brief and incomplete canvass of only a few departments. None of us has taken a vow of poverty. Although we all would like a lower student-staff ratio, we are not ready to recommend the severe cuts in salary required to take the university in that direction. What does make sense to us is a willingness to take 2 per cent less than we might receive to ensure that no maintenance people are dismissed and to keep our buildings in proper repair. We do not believe that the primary condition for academic excellence is high salaries. It seems ironic that just when we, a largely tenured faculty, are headed into unionization, we should be the beneficiaries of unjust dismissals and of weakening the power of lower paid unionized and non-unionized workers. Although the faculty has limited power in the wider society, it does have substantial power in the university. The time has come to use it for establishing priorities based on prudence and justice.

Libertarian likes Varsity editorial

To The Editor: I found your editorial of Feb. 11, "Don't give up your unused freedoms", interesting considering the usual Varsity slant on government. You warn against increasing social control but fail to mention that welfare, student grants and loans and other examples of government "benevolence" are part of this control. In a paternalistic system, Big Daddy hands out lollipops to some kids using money that his other kids are forced to turn over.

The ZIA sets out its policy

To The Editor: The Henderson-McKeough Report which recommends social service cutbacks also contains suggestions from the non-government sector. The report says the suggestions are worthy of mention. Here are some examples.

1. Do not borrow money in Germany.
2. Welfare parents should be sterilized or permanently excluded from the welfare system.
3. Stop building expressways in Toronto.
4. The benefits of homeopathy should be investigated.
5. People should do more for themselves.
6. Evaluate existing programs, keep successes, and throw out failures.
7. Legal aid is very good.

We, the Zoids In Action, suggest, in response to the above quoted suggestions, the following:

1. Do not borrow bananas in Germany
2. The Ontario Government should be sterilized or permanently excluded from society.
3. Stop building time machines in Queen's Park, education has already been set back fifty years.
4. The benefits of salubrity should be investigated.
5. Cyborgs should do more for themselves.
6. Evaluate existing bananas, keep accomplished bananas, throw out irresolute bananas.
7. Legal aid is very nice.

Undergrad dislikes CUPE attitude

To The Editor: I read with interest the article appearing in the Varsity of February 9 concerning the election of the executive for CUPE 1230. While I support the union's fight for a fair wage settlement, I disagree with the executive's position on pursuing a long run policy of "confrontation" with the university as the best means to achieving their objectives. This view follows from an old assumption that one person's gain is another person's loss. Only through treating the other party as the "enemy" can any gain be assured. Unfortunately, there is some degree of universality in this logic that transcends class biases. This same outlook motivates most students in the professional faculties to conceal or make inaccessible key information (e.g. tearing articles out of journals) from fellow students. Any gains are illusory, because the opportunity has been missed for all parties to cooperate for mutual gains that will be greater. In a world of increasingly scarce resources demanding that man's best abilities be applied to their optimal use, space for the "confronters" is growing smaller. If CUPE achieves their objectives, the executive will no doubt laud their "politics of confrontation." If CUPE loses, will the executive succeed in confronting the rank and file in the next election? New liquor licensing makes sudsing difficult for undergrads

We'd like to illuminate you on certain aspects of the University of Toronto's number one participation sport, drinking.

As many people may know, the LLBO, that is the Lawless and Lubgubnon Boneheads of Ontario, have instituted a concept called a "blanket license" on campuses across Ontario. What this "blanket license" means is that Special Occasion Permits will no longer be needed to hold a licensed event. Rather, the organization simply tells the holder of the license (the university administration) that they wish to have a licensed event, the administration notes the fact, assigns you to a designated licensed area, orders your beverages for you, and away you go.

This sounds very simple, but, as in all university bureaucratic operations, there is a Catch-22. This one is the money involved.

Formerly, the organizations would pay $15.00 for a permit, buy their beer at the regular retail rate plus $1.00 levy per case, and sell it as they pleased.

Those days have passed, thanks, in part to the aforementioned LLBO, who have upped the price of a Special Occasion Permit to $50 for all events where the participants will be doing anything more than sniffing corks, and partially due to the university administration, who have established a Beverage Management Division, whose employees, naturally, expect to be paid.

How, one might ask, in these days of cutbacks, etc., are they planning on funding the Beverage Management Division? The answer is very simple. They buy the beer at retail rates, then sell it to campus organizations at close to twice what they paid for it. Hence, a case of 24 ends up costing about $9.00, or over 35 cents a bottle "cost". When it is considered that the price of beer at, say the Vic Pub is the "cost" price, plus the cost of staff, room rental, cleaning staff, ice, glasses, etc., the price mounts very quickly. At an establishment like the Vic Pub, these extra costs can amount to 25 cents per bottle, easily. So immediately we are looking at a 60 cent or 65 cent beer, without allowing any margin for a small profit, to be used for hiring entertainment, damages incurred, etc. Basically, then, what this great saviour license is doing is eliminating the two things that a student-run pub has going for it — cheap beer and a small operating margin.

There are other finer points of pub operation that the license eliminates. As many know, staff at U of T pubs used to be amenable to taking a smaller wage in exchange for their services, providing that they could refresh themselves on occasion. Hence, a pub manager could pay his staff ten bucks and half a dozen beers and everybody would be happy. Now, minimum wage must be paid to all staff, T-4's will be issued if an employee makes enough money, and 10 per cent sales tax will be charged on all beer sales. This really puts it to the campus club that wants to have a small party where beer is served, since they will have to keep detailed accounts, charge sales tax, pay wages to employees, rigamarole, rigamarole, rigamarole.

Naturally, for a small phenomenal fee, the university will supply the bartending, staff, and bookkeeping services, provided you're willing to sell beer to your friends or club members at 65 cents.

The LLBO has also cut the capacity of several places around the campus, most notably the Hart House Great Hall complex. Back in the good old days, Hart House could be licensed for 500 people (as the Engineers know all too well), and an Engineering Dance in the House was, if nothing else, a very large good time.

Now, the LLBO has cut the capacity of the Great Hall down to 250 people, which, as one may imagine, makes the organization of a large function both spiritually and economically unfeasible.

A case in point is the SAC dance on February 28th. The entertainment for that dance will cost $700. The staff for that dance will cost $200. The room rental will cost slightly in excess of $100.

Previously, the Great Hall could hold 500 people, so that $1,000 fixed cost could be whittled away considerably by the $1.50 cover charge, leaving a loss of about $250, which is not bad, all things considered.

Now, with only 250 people allowed into the Hall, the loss would be only $250 if we charged $3.00 per person, quite an outlandish cover charge for a student council operation that is, supposedly, a cheap night's entertainment.

Why, one might ask, did this blanket license come about? John Clement, a former minister in the Davis government, said it was to make things simpler and cheaper. Mr. Clement is presently not occupied in politics.

People in the know seem to think that the Canadian Restaurant

Association lobbied on the basis that student pubs undercut their business. This is just idle speculation, however, as we all know, the Davis government is above responding to pressure groups that just happen to have a lot of money.

The fact of the matter is that this license is yet another inexplicable bit of government fiddling aimed at students. It doesn't make things cheaper; it doesn't make things simpler; it merely eliminates inexpensive student pubs.

York University received the first of these wonderful blanket licenses, and the cheapest beer you can get at York is 90 cents. Think about it.

A meeting to discuss strategy for the pub is open to all at the North Sitting room at Hart House Thursday at 8 p.m.

by Glen Sernyk
SAC worker

The beer on the table may represent a few week's earnings if the licensing folk get their way, says Sernyk.

SAC PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION TIMETABLE

NOMINATIONS OPEN UNTIL 5 PM FEB. 27, 1976

Electioneering Period Feb. 28 - March 9, 1976.

The election of the SAC President and two Vice-Presidents will be held on March 10 and 11, 1976.

Candidates for these positions must run on a ticket of three: one from either Scarborough College or Erindale College, one from the Faculty of Arts and Science (St. George Campus), and one from the professional faculties.

Any University of Toronto student who has paid the SAC fee is eligible to vote and run. All full-time undergraduate students have had this fee deducted automatically.

Complete election rules and nomination forms will be available in the SAC office (928-4911) on Feb. 23, 1976.

Allison clears up position

To the Editor:

On Wednesday, February 11, The Varsity printed parts of my response to Mike Edwards' letter (printed the previous Monday) on the subject of the upcoming Governing Council elections. The letter which I submitted was edited in such a way as to render its original meaning incomprehensible. The original editing for space was done by a member of the Trotskyist League in the presence of The Varsity editor who accepted it, but further editing was never checked through myself or any other representative of the TL. Those portions of my letter which were omitted contained the crux of my rebuttal. As well, The Varsity editor responsible omitted a key phrase from that portion of the letter which was printed, thus substantially altering the sense of an important sentence.

In its original form, my letter responded to Edwards' call for boycotting the Governing Council elections with an analysis of that body and an explanation of why we, as communists, run for election to this or any other capitalist body: "I am running for Governing Council, not in the hope that I will be elected and thus be in a position to somehow work toward "reforming" the unreformable Governing Council. In fact, the first plank of my election program is "Abolish the Governing Council!" — For Student-Teacher-Worker Control of the University!"

Communists run in capitalist elections to use the campaign platform to spread the ideas of Marxism and thus win people to the program of proletarian socialist revolution. The TL has only one campaign promise to make — we are unalterably committed to the overthrow of capitalism through working-class-led revolution. If we win, we have unlike our opponents, no intention of actively participating with the administration in the governing of U of T. The Governing Council is an illegitimate and undemocratic tool of the capitalists and must be abolished.

In the original letter I also dealt with Edwards' student-powerist and utopian notion that only students, organized as students, can deal with the cutbacks in educational spending — cutbacks which are only one part of the attempt to make the oppressed and working people pay for the current capitalist economic crisis. Varsity editing, however, saw fit to delete our counterposed strategy. As the original draft stated, we stand for mobilizing the tremendous power of the working class, through a mass labor-student mobilization against cutbacks, layoffs and wage controls. The working class, by virtue of its relationship to the means of production (i.e. its ability to withhold its labor power) is the only social force strong enough to definitively defeat capitalist attacks — as well as being the only class strong enough to wrest social power from the capitalists and reorganize production for the benefit of the vast majority.

This strategy was put forward in rebuttal to Edwards' notion that the January 21 cutbacks rally was a real alternative strategy. While we criticize the OFS action for restricting the struggle against cutbacks to the campus, we state clearly that we participated in the march and the rally because such actions are positive and important. The statement on participation in my letter of February 11 was removed from the body of the paragraph in which it appeared.

I trust that The Varsity editors will print this to clear up any misunderstanding about the TL's position which may have stemmed from the printed version of my February 11 letter.

TA's support GAA check-off

We the undersigned Philosophy GAs express our support for the GAA demand for compulsory check-off of union dues. All GAs will benefit from a GAA contract with the University. Hence it is not unreasonable to ask everyone to contribute their quota for the maintenance of the GAA. One of the University's weapons against the GAA is to rob it of its financial base.

Drury posits

Dear Editor:

It seems to me that the current SAC executive believe that they can be suspended in space indefinitely. They believe they are free from all constraints of time and gravity.

And what has the SAC executive done lately? You tell me. They have agreed to be opposed to cutbacks, that is very nice but it is not sufficient. They must make a point of telling us what cutbacks are.

Where are the forums that give us a chance to learn more about cutbacks with a chance to express our views? Where are the articles from the members of the executive explaining how it is possible to oppose the cutbacks and still be a responsible, perhaps even conservative, citizen?

Where is the action?

Doug Gerhart and Mike Treacy both attempted, at a recent executive meeting, to discuss and publish the reasons behind opposition to cutbacks. They were alone in their desire, and were voted down by the balance of the executive.

Apparently the majority of the members believe that they can remain suspended in heaven. They need not make contact with, or even consult us, the people they claim to represent.

We should attempt at a consensus on a realistic and defensible base on which to build our opposition to government cutbacks. Rob Snell and John Tuzyk, two other executives, are capable of turning the tables on this situation. Phone SAC at 928-4911 and ask them for a forum on cutbacks.

There will be a cross city rally on all social service cutbacks March 11. The rally is sponsored by a number of respectable groups, including SAC. Students need to keep informed on the nature of educational cutbacks. A forum before March 11 would be ideal.

Innis good space for mellow jazz

The Message

By NANCY WEISS
If you're into jazz, getting into jazz, don't know much about jazz, or have nothing else to do, stop into Innis Town Hall any Thursday at four o'clock and ease into some good music. Innis will be presenting a series of concerts of ensembles sponsored by the Blacks Arts Production.

'The Message' is a quartet of young local musicians who play a broad range of music, falling under the category of jazz. Last Thursday, their two-hour gig included straight jazz, some elaborated blues, one reggae tune, one funky tune, and a free-form percussion break. They seem most comfortable in straight jazz or when they get slightly funky, but the other modes are good variety, if not as successful.

The group is tight, especially rhythmically. In fact, the rhythmic content of the music generally dominates the melodic. This may have been exaggerated at the last gig, as the bassist didn't show and the pianist had to pick up the bass lines. He did it remarkably well, though necessarily at the expense of a certain freedom of movement. When he could get free of the bass lines, his playing was much more interesting and more lyrical, but still less melodic than rhythmic. I was reminded of Herbie Hancock's percussive style, prior to his overtly commercial era.

The drummer was the most consistent musician of the three. He showed remarkable sensitivity, his time was excellent, his solos expressive. And he always looked like he was digging the whole scene. The horn player did most of his work on tenor, doubling on flute and recorder. He is proficient, his tone on tenor is beautiful, but his solo work is inconsistent. Perhaps the most difficult thing for any musician to attain in solos (which really distinguishes the excellent from the good), is the ability to develop a coherent musical idea, or set of ideas, throughout the whole of the tune's chord changes.

The horn player seemed to pick up good ideas, but not to be able to hold on to them long enough to really say anything within his solos. With one or two exceptions, they struck me as somewhat scattered and lacked real impact because it is impossible to build to musical climaxes when that coherency is lacking. One positive quality his playing has, which is rare among non-professional musicians, is a sense of musical space and sustained tones. Few non-professionals seem to realize that jazz is not merely the ability to play as many notes in as short a time as possible.

Regardless of what I would consider problems with their music, these people have a lot of talent, certainly more than some of the local "professionals".

Though I haven't heard the coming groups — this week, the Valora Wayner Trio; next week, the Roco Bibi Quintet — I would urge your support for them, and for jazz at Innis. The scene at Innis is perfect for a mellow late-afternoon jazz concert.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ELECTION OF NEW MEMBERS

16 are contesting 7 staff and student seats

On or about March 5th, 1976, ballots will be mailed to eligible voters for the election of 7 new members of the Governing Council of the University of Toronto.

Four candidates have been elected by acclamation to four teaching staff seats. They are: Professor Peter H. Salus (Constituency IB), Professor Henry Auster (Constituency IC), Dr. J. W. Meakin (Constituency III) and Dr. Ross M. Baxter (Constituency IV). The remaining eight seats are held by the following members seated in previous elections: Professor W. B. Dunphy, Professor B. Kovrig, Professor M. W. Lister, Professor J. M. Bliss, Professor R. W. Missen, Dr. M. W. Thompson, Professor W. B. Coultas and Professor G. A. Reid. Since all teaching staff seats are either held by continuing members or have been filled by acclamation, no election will be necessary in any teaching staff constituency.

Four candidates are contesting one administrative staff seat. The other administrative staff seat is held by a continuing member, Mr. Keith R. Bowler.

Twelve candidates are presently contesting five of the student seats. Nominations were re-opened in one other student seat (Graduate Student Constituency I) and will be closed on Wednesday, February 25th at 5:00 p.m. Further details of this constituency may be obtained from other notices or from the Chief Returning Officer, phone 928-6576. The remaining two seats have been filled by acclamation by Mr. John Floras (Full-Time Undergraduate Student Constituency II) and Mr. David Vaskévitch (Graduate Student Constituency I). As all student seats on Council carry one year terms of office, there are no continuing student members, except that Mr. Floras has been re-elected by acclamation.

Sitting members whose current terms of office expire on June 30th, 1976 are indicated below.

Teaching Staff
Constituency IB—G. R. Thaler
Constituency IC—V. E. Graham
Constituency III—J. W. Meakin (re-elected by acclamation)
Constituency IV—A. M. Hunt

Administrative Staff — G. Russell

Graduate Students
Constituency I—B. E. Wall
Constituency II—S. Kanowitch

Full-Time Undergraduate Students
Constituency I — J. O'Donohue
— M. J. Sabla
Constituency II — T. Buckley
— J. Floras (re-elected by acclamation)

Part-Time Undergraduate Students
— J. F. Gentry
— F. M. Salazar

In accordance with the University of Toronto Act, 1971 the remainder of the Governing Council will be composed of the President and the Chancellor (ex-officio), two presidential appointees, sixteen appointees of the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council, and eight members who are not students or members of the teaching or administrative staff elected by and from among the alumni.

The election will be conducted by mailed ballot, ballots to be mailed to eligible voters on or about March 5th, 1976. Ballots may be returned to the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, by Canada Post, Campus Mail, or personal delivery.

Ballots must be received, by mail or personal delivery at the Governing Council Secretariat by 12:00 noon Thursday, March 18th, 1976 in order to be valid.

Any eligible voter who receives an incorrect ballot, or no ballot due to an error in records, may contact the Governing Council Secretariat, phone 928-6576 in order to obtain the correct ballot.

Details of the contested constituencies are outlined below, along with biographical or other comments supplied, on a voluntary basis, by the candidates.

The election is conducted by the Governing Council under the authority of the University of Toronto Act, 1971. Any inquiries should be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 928-6576. The election will close at 12:00 noon on March 18th, 1976.

FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"Full-Time Undergraduate Student" means all students registered at the University in a programme of full-time study, who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in an Arts and Science programme, on all campuses, will be considered full-time if enrolled in four or more courses for electoral purposes.

Constituency I—two seats

All students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science including Erindale College and students registered at Scarborough College.

John Burnes

Experienced in media and government including: Students Administrative Council, Council of University College, University College Literary and Athletic Society, and Hart House Debates Committee.

In the face of immediate economic restraint and potentially greater constraint it is imperative that student members provide RESPONSIBLE yet DECISIVE involvement. Realistic financial planning is necessary to restore the quality of education and services that students deserve. To achieve these priorities CREDIBLE representation is ESSENTIAL on Governing Council.

Bob Gardner

is a third year student at Scarborough. Bob believes in representative, responsible and responsive government. Bob realizes that every problem has a solution and he wants to find them for you. He has the experience, the knowledge, Bob is against cutbacks and large tuition increases. Bob cannot stop them; he can work for the best compromise solutions for students. Bob knows we must adapt to cutbacks. Give Bob a chance to work and serve you.

Brian Pet

Preservation of teaching quality in the face of continuing cutbacks is a vital priority in the coming year.

Parity and Tenure not withstanding, it is important that students recognize the advantage in developing a closer working relationship with faculty on Governing Council.

Students at U. of T. must have reasoned articulate expression of their needs and views if they are to assume a larger and more responsible role in decision-making which directly affects them.

Constituency II—two seats (One only to be voted on)

All students registered in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Science, Faculty of Medicine, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Pharmacy, School of Physical and Health Education, Faculty of Education, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, Department of Architecture, Faculty of Forestry and Landscape Architecture, Faculty of Law, Faculty of Music, Faculty of Management Studies, Faculty of Social Work (with the condition that both members elected in Constituency II not be registered in the same faculty or school).

Because of this condition, Mr. John Floras, a student in the Faculty of Medicine, has been elected to one of the seats in this constituency by acclamation. His name will appear on the ballot for information only.

The remaining seat is being contested by three students who are registered in the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering. All members of the constituency may vote for one (1) candidate only.

Louis Auger

Currently an Engineering representative on the Students Administrative Council, a representative on the "Faculty of Applied Science Faculty Council" (2 yrs.) and a representative on the Engineering Society (3 yrs.). I have been active in university affairs for my three years here. I believe in student representation on tenure committees, stable tuition fees and support any measures which foster university spirit.

Richard Hajdukiewicz

I am enrolled in the third year of the Metallurgical Engineering program in the Faculty of Applied Science, and am presently a member of the University's Athletic Directorate and have held the position of Vice-President, Secretary-Treasurer of the Engineering Athletic Association.

Michael Treacy

—Students' Administrative Council Finance Commissioner
—Engineering Society Representative
—Alumni and Physics Liaison Committees

Students at this University are concerned that budgetary constraints could result in financial strangulation of student services, both present and planned. Student Governors cannot allow the Campus Centre Project, placement centre, or health services to be cut back and to this end Michael Treacy is firmly committed. Opening the budgetary process will help realize this goal as will strong, experienced student representation.

PART-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"Part-Time Undergraduate Student" means all students registered at the University in a programme of part-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in an Arts and Science programme on all campuses, will be considered part-time if enrolled in less than four courses, for electoral purposes.

All part-time students are members of this constituency. All members of the constituency may vote for up to two (2) candidates

Irene Allison

Trotskyist League candidate, wants the Governing Council abolished—for student-teacher-worker control of the university and free quality education for all (open admissions, full living stipends). Link students to workers' struggles. For a class struggle fight against racism and sexism. For a labor-student mobilization to smash cutbacks, wage controls, layoffs. For workers democracy and a planned economy—build a Trotskyist vanguard party to lead the international socialist revolution
VOTE COMMUNIST—VOTE TROTSKYIST LEAGUE!

Mary Creits

A third year student pursuing an honours degree in Archaeology, Mary has been involved in student politics at the grass root level since high school days. She is acutely aware of the problems of part-time undergraduate students. Mary believes that as part-time undergraduate students constitute an integral part of University life, they should participate in the decision-making process of the University. She sees a growing need for participation on behalf of part-time undergraduate students.

Jon Gentry

In seeking re-election, Jon reminds part-time undergraduate students that he has served on the following University Committees: Woodsworth College Council and Academic Advisory Committee, Governing Council and Standing Committees for Internal Affairs, and Planning and Resources

He is serving, ex officio, on the Apus Executive, and as a class Rep. He feels the best representation can only be provided by an informed individual who has learned the workings of the University

Joe Renda

Active for several years in students' affairs, was president of the Seneca College Student's Administrative Council, served in various capacities on organizations at York University where he obtained a degree in Political Science.

Joe is pursuing studies in Industrial Relations. He is Vice-President of the Woodsworth College Students' Association, an A.P.U.S. Executive member and an A.P.U.S. representative on the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council.

He believes in student participation at all decision making levels

Felix Merryll Satazar

Felix Salazar has represented part-time undergraduate students in a variety of capacities at the University of Toronto for the past three years. Presently he is a member of Governing Council, Academic Affairs Committee, Presidential Budget Advisory Committee, Business Affairs Committee, Teaching Evaluation Committee. In the past he has served on the APUS Executive, Curriculum and Standards Subcommittee, Academic Affairs Committee, and as Voice Editor. He is anxious to continue working on behalf of part-time undergraduates.

Sandy Nimmo

Recognizing the influence of the Governing Council on our academic lives, I propose strong representation of the special needs of part-time undergraduate students. To effect this, I will establish a system responsive to student opinions and ideas, and report frequently on significant Council activities. My campaign will elaborate three basic principles: Responsiveness, accountability, and strength of representation of our unique interests. Your representative must both understand your needs and fight for them

GRADUATE STUDENTS

"Graduate Student" means all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

Constituency I—1 seat

All students in division I (Humanities) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division II (Social Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies with the exception of the Graduate Department of Educational Theory
 Information and statements of candidates for this constituency will be published at a later date

ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF

"Administrative Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges, and federated universities who are not members of the teaching staff thereof.

The following definition is included for information.

"Teaching Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry.)

All administrative staff are members of this constituency. All members of the constituency may vote for one (1) candidate only

Edward E. C. Beaven

Joined University of Toronto Press in 1957. President of Universities and Colleges Employees' Credit Union and a director for ten years. Has always been keenly interested in labour-management relations and union affairs, having studied these subjects at T.U.C. Summer Schools in England at Oxford universities. Believes that all levels of university employees should have a voice in Governing Council deliberations and, if elected, will do his best to achieve this.

Gwynneth Heaton Bishop

Head, Science and Medicine Library since October 1970. Toronto born and alumnus of University of Toronto. BA, 1959; BLS, 1960; MLS, 1974

Held positions at State University of New York-Binghamton; Stanford University Graduate School of Business; Canadian Institute of International Affairs, Toronto. In Royal Canadian Air Force University Reserve Training Plan.

If elected, I will use my experience in a variety of institutions and jobs to do my best to represent all Administrative Staff

Ron Raw

Ron is a forty-one-year-old electrician employed by the University of Toronto. He has a wide variety of administrative experience and a deep concern for the working people. Presently he is a trustee on five Union affiliated Boards, also is past Vice-President of the Electricians Credit Union and a Canadian Securities Course graduate.

His objectives are for fair treatment of the staff and to cut spending on needless frills resulting in more efficient management

Ernest G. (Ernie) Reid

Employed by D.L.A.S. for eight years, I bring to Governing Council the availability and industry that have made me known on all three campuses. My many contacts have given me a wide-ranging knowledge of University and departmental functions and problems, enabling me not only to represent all parts of the administrative staff but to work for the good of the entire University. My political experience includes the presidency of C.A.L.A.S., a national professional-technical organization.

Joseph Clark

the "vrai bleu" cowboy messiah

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

In a world of Lippman-like images, it is important to know who is what. This is no more true than at a political convention, where geographic diversity and unwieldy numbers of potential supporters make campaigning very much a matter of appealing appearance.

What makes Joe Clark's leadership victory all the more unusual, then, is that the image he presented, and the way in which he communicated it, was the least orchestrated and professional. Instead, there was an actual reliance on human contact, and a substantive response.

In his speech on Saturday to delegates and alternates, Clark asserted that he alone was the man with the qualities the PC Party needed. He called himself "vrai bleu" and asserted that he, unlike some others had "served a long apprenticeship". Speaking to an experienced, and committed audience, he emphasized the harmony of Canada's diversity with the variety of his travels and experience.

To those conscious of tradition, he was careful to claim to represent the party "legacy" of "opening new vistas, of closing old wounds".

To court leftwing supporters, Clark proposed to "challenge — and to change" the country.

Above all, Clark promised his party victory. To this end, he advocated suspension "three of the empty arguments of left and right" because he alone was "in the centre — with the great majority of you".

The promise of success, and the appeal to change combined with an appeal to the unity supporters so clearly desired, brought Clark second-chance support. This support, embracing Flora MacDonald to Sinclair Stevens carried late victory to him.

While other candidates were either specific on policy, or general on philosophy, Clark was careful to avoid specific commitments, while presenting the broadest concrete appeal he could. Mulroney fell into the trap of being too broad, while the majority of defeated candidates narrowed their support by being too policy-oriented, and too specific.

Clark was able to strike the right chord in all delegates. Everyone could see something in him, while few could disagree with anything specific — because there was nothing.

Behind the Scenes

Leaks & Leaders

Billed as the biggest and the best of Tory conventions, it could more accurately be described as the poorest organized ever held.

After years in the wilderness of opposition, the Progressive Conservative party demonstrated it has too many hangers-on with too little ability.

Organizers inability to handle the swollen media representatives as well as registration and voting procedures exemplified the type of bureaucracy conservatives have criticized for years.

Scheduled for the cramped and leaky Civic Centre to avoid regional rivalries the party administration soon faced a lack of room.

Inadequate facilities for everything from seating to accommodation contributed to confusion. Media facilities were inadequate, hampering coverage of the convention.

Registering delegates were routed through a maze of tables to their regional and alphabetically listed sections. After picking up convention kits, they had identification cards bearing their name and photograph made and proceeded to the convention floor where they had to sit in a section belonging to one of the candidates.

Eventually, registration bogged down when workers "misplaced" registration forms for several delegates. Ontario Solicitor-General John Macbeth was refused registration and a vote when a Quebec worker could not locate his form.

Media also encountered a similar breakdown in registration. When security officials advised media liaison that some media limitation would have to be applied, organizers quickly chose their favourite press for floor privileges.

Although 1,400 media people initially received certification and were told they had full privileges before the convention, late Friday Raymond Grenier, Media Liaison Officer, decided to cut it down to 350 (now that they were all in Ottawa). "Some of the smaller press got left out in the shuffle," he conceded. However CBC and CTV retained their 700 floor passes.

Disorganization prevailed even at the level of the Convention Committee.

Early in the campaign period, the committee decided that no candidate could use the official party logo on any publicity. Claude Wagner, however, used the logo on almost all his literature, including huge cardboard signs displayed around the Civic Centre.

The Varsity — Christopher Du Vernet

"Ladies and Gentlemen, th

When informed of this, the committee refused to take any action against Wagner. Committee Co-chairman Dan Mazankowski was later seen wearing a Wagner hat on the convention floor.

Accommodation was another controversial area. Although organizers advised delegates and alternates that there would be no central hotel in Ottawa for the convention, candidates soon were able to purchase, or arrange for blocs of rooms as well as the rental of suites and meeting rooms.

Media organizations favoured by the party were provided with blocs of rooms in the best hotels, while media and party supporters with lesser prominence were either given rooms not serviced by convention shuttle buses or not given a room at all.

Only the candidates and large media organizations were prepared adequately for the convention. CBC and CTV built large platforms around the convention floor and in front of the major candidates seating areas. As well, they set up rectangular platforms directly beneath the candidates seats where they could locate and interview prominent Conservatives while denying access to these areas for any other media.

Policemen hired for the convention effectively prevented CTV cameramen from getting on the spot coverage by allowing CBC interviewers exclusive access to space closest to the candidates.

Student press, of course, rated next to Liberals on party lists. To placate budding journalists, a student press liaison was appointed.

Brian Mulrooney

The Bionic Man

The Varsity — Christopher Du Vermet

"A gift from Frank Moores," she whispered, as she slipped a miniature bottle of Newfoundland screech in my pocket, as I taped Mulrooney's luncheon address to supporters and clam-chowder enthusiasts in one of his Skyline suites.

She wore a long dress with the red and blue Mulrooney pattern on it. Around her neck was a Mulrooney scarf. As she pinned both kinds of Mulrooney stickers on, one of the Mulrooney bands started to play the Mulrooney song in the background.

To the left of me, delegates were lining up for bowls of clam chowder (another gift of freebie-king Frank) and inexpensive liquor in Mulrooney glasses. Some clutched Mulrooney serviettes, while other preferred to fan themselves with cardboard Mulrooney fans.

Dieting delegates deluded themselves by reading the latest issue of the daily Mulrooney newspaper, or searching for the next policy session, described in the Mulrooney Program (complete with "convention information, Mulrooney campaign data, guide to Ottawa, and voting score card").

Youth delegates were looking forward to the Mulrooney rally in the nearby Coliseum, where Ginnette Reno, a prominent Quebec singer at 10,000 dollars a show, and a brass band were scheduled to play amidst subsidized booze and free corned-beef sandwiches.

After this took care of Friday night, there was Saturday's Mulrooney Pizza Party - featuring Chris Lane and his Solid Brass plus Comedian Dave Broadfoot (with pizza-subs-suds, of course). For the more enthusiastic supporters, this could be followed by an "Eye-opener Brunch" on Sunday morning. For all of these events, the Mulrooney bus service was available.

All this would have been hard to keep track of, were it not for my free Mulrooney pad. Or I could have followed it all on Mulrooney closed-circuit television in any one of his several suites or his display booth in the Civic Centre.

But where are his policies, some might ask. After a deluge of criticism, the Mulrooney campaign provided delegates with a 22-page, two colour brochure entitled "Mulrooney speaks out", in addition to reprinted newspaper editorials, a six-page, three colour magazine, a four page folder, regular mailings, a six-page black and white Gestelettered pamphlet, speech texts, a biography and other personal information, and notices of television appearances.

But the Civic Centre itself topped it all off. For hours, Mulrooney workers had competed with other workers to string up hundreds of 25-foot plastic banners, signs, stickers, and slogan billboards. Youth workers laboured for hours storing placards together to be stored inside the Mulrooney booth for the hundreds of delegates anxious to bring victory to Brian Mulrooney.

To maximize support, computer delegate lists had been drawn up and revised daily, so that voters preferences were ranked and monitored. Workers on the floor wielding walkie-talkies watched polling lines to ensure all supporters went through on time. A bank of phones gave organizers 13 telephone lines and one "hot line" to speed crucial information to the campaign.

Male supporters wore Mulrooney-patterned vests and even trousers to make their preference unmistakable.

And yet it all failed. Brian Mulrooney, the man the pollsters lionized and the media criticized, steadily dropped in support ballot after ballot. No deals came his way, and no fearful candidates joined his flock.

Was it the money? In talking with countless delegates in all camps, it appeared that those who supported him apologized for it, and those who opposed him were jealous of it. Very little spontaneous criticism of his spending was registered on the basis that it was immoral. Many wondered only where it came from, while others enjoyed it to its fullest.

The real cause for his failure is twofold. First, as one Mulrooney delegate put it, "We're not supporting Mulrooney - we're supporting a winner." Once Mulrooney failed to place high on the first ballot, many supporters deserted him for the most likely winner.

Because many of the ideologically similar candidates had also done poorly, and because Claude Wagner was the antithesis of the Mulrooney platform, most of his less committed support went to Clark.

Second, Mulrooney made a singularly poor speech on Saturday. Lacking specific content, and sandwiched between two dramatic candidates, the speech exposed Mulrooney to many wavering delegates as superficial and slick. All the hoopla in the world could not sway the delegates for whom this convention was a matter of philosophy and platform. The energetic performance of Heward Graffey made Mulrooney look weak - and strength is what most delegates desired.

While other candidates promised specific solutions and pragmatic platforms, Mulrooney was never able to escape platitudes and time-worn cliches. His program for government included reviewing legislation "to make it more responsive to the needy without squandering its benefits on the fortunate" while his proposals for respect of the law asserted that "the sanctity of our democratic institutions must be preserved with the utmost diligence and anyone, notmatter (sic) his position, who tolerates individuals and groups whose selfish ambitions are furthered at the expense of these institutions must be exposed and dismissed."

So it became clear that Brian Mulrooney, the candidate opposition called "the bionic man", really had no positions at all. This lack of a firm commitment to any approach was the source of his defeat.

Now, Clark will pay for his broadness. Sometime, he will have to commit himself on policy that must favour one philosophy, or the other in the PC Party. This choice will be the key to Clark's success, or his failure within his party.

... the next Prime Minister. . ."

His duty was to give out as little as possible while warding off as many complaints as possible.

After tolerating a lot of deserved abuse, he admitted students really weren't important as far as this convention was concerned, and that "real press" might become upset by the presence of student media. This had a minimum effect as security at the convention disintegrated. Eventually even observers and the public wandered amongst other media and delegates.

Approved media were given a virtual free hand in access to candidates and assistants. Ambitious cameramen zoomed in on weeping delegates. Defeated candidates were asked why they lost, or just before losing, what they were going to do when they did lose.

Media were often victims of purposeful manipulation, as well. Selectively placed rumours were distributed to reporters to create the appropriate bandwagon effect or emphasize desired strengths. During a "spontaneous" Horner demonstration, I was approached by a placard-waving worker who said Diefenbaker was "solidly" behind Horner. Curiously enough, this Friday revelation only proved true for the first ballot on Sunday.

Many media people arrived at the convention determined to seek out evidence of preconceived conclusions. CBC interviewers struggled to squeeze confessions of Quebec favouritism or anti-French bias out of delegates. Others swallowed the grass roots theme that dominated this gathering of party elites. They were determined to play everything up, which seemed unnecessary for this spectacle.

Dealing in Dark Horses

Pierre Trudeau, Secretariat, Joseph Clark. What do all these have in common? Before you say "nothing", it would be wise to remember this year's PC Leadership Convention.

In a race of dark horses, won by a dark horse, each of the last three men have been billed as the real one. None of them, however, were given a good chance of winning the race this time round.

What is most surprising, however, is that new PC leader Joe Clark actually had some of the most unattractive literature, the fewest mailings, the smallest budget, and the least prominent support of all convention hopefuls. Still he overcame heavily favoured Claude Wagner after four ballots.

In a convention of bought votes, free booze and golden oratory the High River native and sometime journalist and political scientist overcame money and party bigwigs to beat convention favorite Claude Wagner.

Watching Clark while he awaited results from the last two ballots, it was hard to believe he was actually winning. He lacked charisma, and had trouble with his voice even in the middle of his crucial Saturday speech. Despite these drawbacks he ended up supported by Jim Gillies, John Fraser, Flora MacDonald, Sinclair Stevens and privately by Brian Mulrooney.

Across the convention center floor, Gisele Wagner was preparing herself to be wife of the new leader, and several MPs were choosing their posts in the soon to be formed shadow cabinet. The Wagner camp expected victory.

But in the Clark camp there were no telephones, tables, stationary or glossy buttons - just Joe Clark and hundreds of supporters waving skinny yellow signs. Joking with reporters, he displayed little surprise at the victory he anticipated. Clark seemed totally removed from it all, and yet just yards below him, hysterical middle-aged women, converts from Flora MacDonald, were screaming slogans to the point of exhaustion.

But when victory came, Clark was well prepared. By the middle of the third ballot, he had begun preparing notes for his victory speech. Halfway through counting, he refused to go over to see Brian Mulrooney, who had a lengthy letter of concession delivered to him moments before. By the conclusion of counting, he was planning activities for the next day. When the official results came, he was escorted from his section by pushing police clearing the way to the stage.

It was a tumultuous moment for everybody. Weeping Mulrooney supporters lashed out at the media, complaining "you press always exploit our private moments."

Media people were shoved around by security. A frustrated Jack H A frustrated Jack Horner swung at reporters who pressed him for comments after his defeat.

The victory for Clark divided his party. In a race of dark horses who never quite finished the race, defeat was more prevalent than victory. Stunned and haggard workers wandered the floor aimlessly, while the networks gave a post mortem on the results.

It was all over. Hundreds of signs joined crumpled hats, pamphlets, stickers, littering the auditorium floor.

Dollars from donors for East Asian studies

By MIKE EDWARDS

While university funding for East Asian Studies has been dwindling at the regular rate, private fund raising by the department chairman, professor G. Saywell, has permitted the hiring of at least one additional lecturer.

Among the major donors to the department is the Canadian Donner Foundation and the Japanese government, who together have contributed over half a million dollars.

The federal department of external affairs has chipped in another $100,000, while the American Mellon Foundation and various Japanese corporations have contributed a considerable amount. According to Saywell's rough estimate, the department has collected about $800,000.

The money is in the form of three and five year grants. In the case of the Japanese grant, only the interest is available to the department but the government may donate the principal after a review of five years.

The money was collected jointly by York University and the U of T. Currently Mike Donnelly is taking advantage of the expanded program. He is teaching a course here in Japanese politics. A similar post at York is still vacant. According to a SAC spokesman, the university administration is preparing more incursions into private funding, but Saywell said that his work was not part of any integrated program.

East Asian Studies is on the 14th floor of the Robarts Library. The library of 150,000 volumes mostly in Chinese, Japanese or Korean occupies the eighth floor.

Still some chance for summer jobs

By JOE McTEER

While most post secondary students in Canada will probably face unemployment this summer because of government cutbacks and austerity in the private sector there are still a few innovative programs left.

On a smaller scale than the now defunct Opportunities for Youth Program and with much less fanfare the federal government has launched the Student Community Service Program (SCSP).

SCSP will only fund voluntary organizations which have already been operating for a year for summer projects involving community service, not just continuing the regular activities of the organization.

Political projects are explicitly prohibited and the projects will have to be different from existing services provided.

The jobs will only be open to students returning to school next year. Organizations receiving the grants will be hiring workers who will be paid $120 a week. But the organizations will be required to contribute to the costs of the projects.

But organizations intending to apply for grants must apply before February 29, 1976 in order to qualify.

Successful applicants will be notified in April.

Toronto applications should be sent to the Regional office, Secretary of State, 55 St. Clair Ave. E., Room 810, Toronto, Ont. M4T 1M2.

The SCSP is one of the few new programs in a summer when the federal government has cutback from 49,924 to 13,660 summer students.

Canada's 500,000 post secondary students may be scrambling for only 200,000 jobs, tripling last year's record 18 per cent student unemployment rate.

On the following issues which are being fought through their contract demands

- 1) Class Size (protection of the tutorial system) The GAA is negotiating a maximum class size and holds that the number of tutorials or labs not be cut back. This will ensure an important part of undergraduate education will not suffer in any attempt to solve the problem of cutbacks by eroding the tutorial system.
- 2) Maintenance of the number of GA jobs The GAA is fighting cutbacks of the number of tutorial leaders, lab demonstrators, etc. where these cutbacks are unrelated to a drop in course enrollment. Without this minimal maintenance of the number of jobs, next year will see a great reduction in labs, tutorials, and contact time.
- 3) Individual job security The university wishes to continue the present system where a GA does not know from one year to the next whether she/he has a job and where no reason need be given for refusing to reappoint a GA.
- 4) Check off Union survival is at stake on this item. The university has refused the GAA proposal that union dues be regularly deducted from salaries and sent to the GAA. This is standard practice in union contracts and allows the union to work on servicing the contract rather than each and every year spending enormous amounts of time trying to collect voluntary dues.

The Graduate Assistants' Association is the union representing student academic workers—teaching assistants, demonstrators, tutors and markers—employed by the University of Toronto.

The Graduate Students' Union has financially supported the formation of the GAA since 1972. An all out effort to establish the GAA began in the spring of 1973 with the hiring of a full-time organizer. Since that time many hundreds of graduate assistants in all departments of the University have helped build the GAA.

In May 1974 a vote open to all graduate assistants at the University of Toronto was held under the supervision of the Ontario Labour Relations Board. 73% of the ballots were cast in favour of the GAA. In June 1975 the GAA was certified by the Labour Relations Board as the sole bargaining agent for graduate Assistants at the University of Toronto.

Ideology as science: Paul Erlich

By Kris Klaasen
Canadian University Press

... we should be on our guard not to overestimate science and scientific methods when it is a question of human problems; and we should not assume that experts are the only ones who have a right to express themselves on questions affecting the organization of society."

Albert Einstein

OTTAWA (CUP) — Crusading doomsday ecologist Paul Ehrlich says the key to continued life on earth is to have less people.

When Ehrlich closed the University of Ottawa's 8-day Festival of Life February 1 he gave the 1,000 people there a prediction: "Either birth rates go down or death rates will go up."

"If we shared all food equally everyone would have just enough," he conceded, observing however "there are 2 million to 20 million deaths each year due to maldistribution" of world food resources.

He concluded that "people have not yet behaved like saints", which he suggested was necessary for fair food distribution. Therefore, he contended we should "try and design a world" that recognizes our unsainly nature; one which admits that some are going to end up "with the short end of the stick" but which ensures that even they "have plenty to eat."

Thus Ehrlich joins the ranks of those who recognize that the main problem in the world is economic inequality, but who pose solutions to our problems which do nothing to challenge that fundamental inequality.

On the surface Ehrlich plays the role of a dedicated scientist burdened with information which points to a hard-nosed solution he feels obligated to communicate and fight for. He almost quit the fight once, he says, to pursue laboratory research on butterflies and plant-insect inter-relationships but, encouraged by population control progress in North America he has continued.

While the story he tells of mass starvation and nuclear war based on a struggle for a piece of the world's diminishing food and resources is indeed grim, his solutions, based on facts compiled from over 15 years of scientific research, seem astonishingly simple, shortsighted, if not chauvinistic.

The story goes like this: World population has doubled to 4 billion since 1930 and is expected to double again by the year 2000. While world food production has been rising it's likely to drop in absolute terms because weather from 1930 to 1960 was the best for agricultural production in the last 1,000 years.

With a return to normal weather — more variations and fluctuations — the risk of crop failures around the world is high. For instance, last year Russian grain belt production fell short by 79 million metric tons. Should a similar situation occur alongside a production shortage in the U.S. grain belt, and failure of the Indian monsoon, millions would starve.

A study quoted by Ehrlich points to a 20 year drought cycle in the U.S. mid-west. Early weather reports indicate it might start this year. And another study shows that the Indian monsoon fails every two years. The last time it failed was in 1974.

To augment this, genetic variability in crop plants in running dangerously low because many countries are planting the same crops.

So if our food supply is marginal, Ehrlich concludes we must reduce population. That will be no easy task he says, because a Harvard demographic study proves even if average family sizes in nations with high birth rates dropped immediately to four, overall population would still increase 2.5 times before levelling off, simply from the pressure of existing numbers.

One step in reducing population, says Ehrlich, is to "look at the factors that make people want to

Last night, ah, yesternight, betwixt her lips and mine
There fell thy shadow, Rosalind! thy breath was shed have large families and change some of these."

At the same time he admits that large families in poor nations are an economic necessity for individual family needs even though they inhibit overall economic growth.

He attributes the population decline in North America to unemployment, a rise in the standard of living, and the success of the women's liberation movement.

It's obvious Ehrlich already knows why some people "want to have large families." Plus, he has observed the factors leading to the population decline in North America. Yet he fails to mention how those solutions can apply to poor nations.

By doing so he has effectively soothed the conscience of North Americans by washing their hands of the food and resource maldistribution problem.

He has lifted the burden of sharing from North American shoulders.

But more importantly, he has skirted the issue of the political upheaval necessary to redistribute wealth in those poor nations, many of which are typified by extremely wealthy elites and impoverished masses.

It is in this context that Ehrlich's vehement opposition to the widespread use of nuclear power becomes clear. He raises the very real problems of nuclear waste disposal and risk of accidents, but hints at the future necessity of global triage and possible radioactive terrorism.

Triage refers to a sorting method used in the first world war in which seriously injured soldiers were left to die and those with minor injuries left to help themselves, thereby concentrating aid on those who had a good chance of survival.

The issue was first raised during the Festival of Life by Canadian geneticist David Suzuki who rejected it, asking, "Will we soon be talking about cutting off aid to the Third World?" Little did he know.

When Ehrlich was asked what the probable cause of an increased death rate would be, if birth rates didn't go down, he did not discuss food and resource shortages. Instead he said the cause would likely be nuclear war. In his address he said if the world follows the wrongtrack affluent North America would literally be a "lifeboat". He hastened to add that the lifeboat would be very vulnerable if deprived nations were armed with nuclear weapons.

And to ensure the lifeboat doesn't become overcrowded before the possible crunch comes, Ehrlich suggests the United States and Canada should restrict immigration "save for humanitarian reasons."

He also advocates government following a philosophy of "macro-control and micro-freedom" by putting "the clamps on upstream". For instance, government should decide how much petroleum a country can afford to use and then let the market decide what goods to produce. Unfortunately, Ehrlich neglects the problem of widespread monopolistic control of oil resources, and the injustice of a distribution system based on ability to pay rather than need.

While his concern for the environmental havoc the human race has caused is well-based in fact and his message that unless a proper ecological balance is struck it will mean the end of us all should be seriously considered, Ehrlich's North American chauvinism has not allowed the need for a parallel political balance to enter his solutions.

He says, "there's a small probability of making it." But if the rest of the world doesn't pull through, it's clear Paul Ehrlich stands on the side of "lifeboat" North America, and wants to ensure that it's well-stocked.

Journalism

We need 6 people of faith, courage and intelligence to help expand our western Canadian news magazine.

The Company of the Cross, an Anglican religious community which runs a general weekly news magazine at Edmonton, Canada is seeking 6 new members, men or women, married or single, as reporters, writers and ad salespeople to enable us to extend the magazine to other cities. Company members require a decisive and reasoned religious conviction. Their income consists only of living essentials plus a very small cash allowance. Experience is not essential. A willingness to work hard to learn the necessities of the news and publishing industry is very essential. For further information write The Minister, Company of the Cross, 2304 Millburne Road W. DONALD DUCK & THE CIA

To the Third World, Walt Disney does not mean animal operas alone, it means comic strips in more than 3,000 newspapers and comic books in 8 languages, selling more than 50 million copies a month in more than 50 countries. In Chile alone there are more than a million readers and it was a Chilean women's magazine that proposed giving Disney the Nobel Peace Prize in 1970.

According to Ariel Dorfman and Armand Mattelart, authors of How to Read Donald Duck (International General, NY, 1975, $3.25), this is enough reason to take a serious look at the comic heroes of America and the Free World.

Today's Disney hero, they say, is no longer Mickey Mouse, the virtuous policeman, but the imperfect Donald Duck, submissive victim of his Uncle Scrooge McDuck. Sound Familiar? The cartoon message sometimes blares out direct, labelling murderous vultures "Hegel" and "Marx", showing Viet Cong fighters squabbling over inferior watches from "the workers' paradise", peace marchers throwing down their banners to mob the lemonade stand, and Arabs handing over their treasures in return for fubble bath. More subtle is the nightmare world of Ducksburg.

love only uncles, aunts, nephews, united by tyranny and greed. For cruelty it rivals a nineteenth century orphanage. There is no sex and motherhood. Women are either infantile consumers or witches.

THE GOLD OF INCA-BLINCA

The setting is either an urban nightmare or a foreign land: 47 per cent of comics studied show our heroes seeking adventure in such places as "Aztecland" or "Inca-Blinca," where the inhabitants are stupid savages dressed in loincloths and avid for trinkets. Dorfman and Mattelart reproduce the most embarrassing cartoon strips depicting Third Worldlings as abominable snowmen and their cultures as tourist products: "Visits Aztecland. Entrance One Dollar."

These foreign lands are there solely as a source for adventure and for gold. After all, adventure must be rewarded. The gold comes from some unknown ancient civilization, so the present Third Worldlings are never its rightful heirs. It is Uncle Scrooge McDuck who gets it, and Donald and his nephews who dig it up and bring it back.

Nobody produces anything in Ducksburg. People buy. Everybody talks money but nobody works except as service personnel like waiters and salesmen. Work merely perpetuates the buying cycle and has no meaning. Even unemployment has no economic meaning. Donald Duck is a typical submissive victim of the system, forever getting fired for incompetence, and proving that the unemployed don't really deserve a job.

Any change is bad. Science is gimmicky. There is no future, for the system is entirely rigid, with dominators and dominated, no communication and no way out. Roles are fixed elsewhere. There is no past either. "Disney the bourgeoisie's eulogist and flattering mirror has distorted history so that the dominant class seems its rise as a natural, non-social phenomenon," says the authors.

Within this static order, Donald and his nephews seem to have freedom of choice for "adventures", but these are really only errands for Uncle Scrooge and rewards for good behaviour.

CAPTAIN GADABOUT AND THE SAVAGES

There is some criticism of this society, but it mostly validates the system. When Donald's nephews switch allegiance to a TV hero, Captain Gadabout, Donald complains. But it is Captain Gadabout who rescues Donald from the "savages" in the same strip. Every successful system knows how to incorporate criticism to its own advantage.

This Disney world, with its consumerism, repression and frustration, mirrors Third World lives. "Reading Disney is like having one's own exploited condition rammed with honey down one's throat," says the book.

Attacking Donald Duck is not a popular iconoclasm, especially when the attack is serious. After all, aren't they getting carried away? Isn't Donald Duck really the most innocent of Disney's animals? It must take a deadly lack of humour to see him as a threat.

Dorfman and Mattelart, who first published their book in Chile in 1971, know better. They understand not only the reality base of all fantasy in the dreams and fears of its culture, but the reality of the Third World where such media as the comic book promote an alien culture through sophisticated and monopolistic technology.

CHILE BURNS AND BANS WHILE DISNEY SUES

How To Read Donald Duck became a bestseller in Chile, was published throughout Latin America, was translated into Italian and Portuguese, and now appears in English. Witness to its calibre is the attempt of both the Chilean junta and the U.S. to suppress it.

It was burned and banned after the 1973 coup in Chile, and now its distribution in the US is being held up by Disney's attorneys, interested of course purely in problems of copyright. These are not the sort of critics that imperialist systems patronize and absorb.

They understand how fantasy works in projecting adult nightmares on a child's imagination. Fantastists like J. R. R. Tolkien know that fantasy is a serious business. So do Dorfman and Mattelart, who say "Juvenile literature . . . is perhaps the best (and least expected) place to study the disguises and truths of contemporary man."

Dorfman and Mattelart direct their criticism as "but another means of furthering the whole process of the potential Chilean and Latin American revolution by recognizing the necessity of deepening the cultural transformation." Their analysis is readable, edited in comic book style and written with estimable lack of scientific or political jargon. There is a 12-page bibliography of marxist writings on mass media which should start readers investigating other western fantasies, from Sesame Street to mass spectator sports.

SESAME STREET AS MIND CONTROL

Indeed Sesame Street has managed to gain a firm hold on the world market. It is shown on television in more than 60 countries, and many languages. According to its producers and the American ministry of Education which promotes and finances it this series could serve as a model for a "truly international television." Thanks to the help of the Ford Foundation and the Xerox Corporation, the series was very quickly adapted for Latin American countries. Two versions have already been created in Mexico and Brazil. Only Peru banned it, because it is based on an authoritarian educational model and in a subtle way it instils the values of the North American middle class.

The series has marked a turning point in the technique of popular 'mind control'. Most of the Latin American countries which bought the series have set up special university teams of sociologists, psychologists and anthropologists, all supported by the Ford Foundation, to study the effectiveness of the message of Sesame Street. These days the television viewing public is carefully divided by ages and watched over by scientists. Their entertainment is no longer confined to the inspiration of a stage director.

To confirm the paranoid image of a conspiracy . . . In 1973 Jack Vaughan, ex-head of the Peace Corps, who acted as the ambassador to Columbia in 1970-71, was given responsibility over the International Division of Children's Workshop Theatre, the company that produces Sesame Street, and its older sibling The Electric Company. And in 1972, Henry Loomis, the director of radio broadcasting for the openly propaganda oriented Voice of America was placed in charge of Loomis is also a director of The United States Information Agency (USIA) the $200 million a year American mirror to the world. Its 9,855 agents spread out in 109 countries were able to continue to assure the propagation of the Voice of America through its 123 radio stations in the world; to publish 35 magazines and four newspapers, in several languages; to take public opinion polls in various countries; and to run several hundred cultural centres and libraries. In Brazil alone there are 29 of these centres, 13 in Argentina, 9 each in Mexico, Columbia and Peru, and 7 in Chile which operated during the Popular Unity government.

USIA officials have admitted to very close relationships with multinational firms such as Sears-Roebuck in Columbia, and Proctor and Gamble in Mexico. In 1969-70 in 10 Latin American countries they clandestinely produced and distributed unsigned, specially designed comic strips which were aimed at discrediting the guerrilla movement and promoting the peaceful heroes of "community development".

Latin American Vacuum

He could not give his real name. We'll call him Pepe. He is a Latin American student at U of T, but he knows that if he speaks out publicly, there will be severe repercussions from the police in his home land. And from the Canadian government, which was very hesitant to grant landed immigrant status. And from the University of Toronto administration, which did not want to admit him in the first place, and has made it impossible to get a student grant.

Nor is he alone. Twenty five Latin American students in similar positions here have banded together to form the U of T Latin American Students Association (LASA).

Their goal is to find a way to talk to North Americans about the realities of life south of the Texas-Mexico border.

"The CBC does not give much information," Pepe said. "They will report 'There has been a coup in Peru.' Period. One line. But if a movie star gets married in Europe we know all the details."

To fill the vacuum, a Latin American Cultural Night is being held at the International Student Centre on Saturday February 28. Two films will be shown. In The Jungle There's Lots To Do, a "progressive children's film" based on a letter from a Uruguayan political prisoner to his daughter, and Brazil: the Price of an Economic "Miracle", a recently updated slide show about the Brazilian reality.

Four experts on Latin America will hold a panel discussion after the films. They are Miguel Murmis, an Argentinian Sociologist at U of T, Jose Nun, a Political Science Professor, David Raby, an Assistant Professor in Dept. of History, and a specialist on Mexico, and Herbet De Souza, a Brazilian student at York.

The evening will wind up with Latin American Musicians playing folk and protest songs of Mexico, Chile and Columbia, and a dance. Refreshments will include Empanadas, a distinctly South American snack, and beer and wine.

The competition for the Toronto Cricket Club Trophy begins next Tuesday at 7:00 pm on the track at Hart House. The meet will run over the first three Tuesdays in March, and for all you girls who have been gracing the track lately, the meet is co-ed. Victoria Col. has won the meet for the last two years in a row, and appears to be the favourite to win this year as well.

New College gave a serious challenge last year but this fall's outdoor meet showed no sign of the former strength of the Gtus. Can Jon Ireland stay out of the Brunswick long enough to lead his fellow Gtus back to respectability? Then again, Knox is a perennially strong team, and could pull off an upset if they could induce all of their runners to compete. On the co-ed side, New dominated last year's events for women, sweeping almost every event in the face of minimal opposition.

The events on March 2nd will be (in order), the 4 x 6 lap relay (men), the 4 x 1 lap relay (women), the 1 mile run (women) and the 1 mile run (men).

...Synchronized mermaids too

Queen's University dominated the women's intercollegiate synchronized swimming championships last Friday and Saturday at the Benson Building.

The Kingston university had 35 points to second-place McGill's 27. Western was third with 20. Hamilton's McMaster University was fourth with 17 and U of T tied for sixth spot with Windsor with six points.

Mermaids place in Kingston

A week ago Saturday the Women's Swimming and Diving Team travelled to Kingston for the Ontario Championships hosted by Queen's University. Resplendent in their new blue and white patterned skin suits, the team barned their way to 2nd place in the overall standings with 39 points, qualifying 10 of the 41 swimmers representing Ontario in the Canadian Championships.

The divers also fared well with two team members on their way to the Canadian Championships. Spirit was high throughout the whole weekend as all 16 swimmers managed to score points towards the team total by qualifying for either the finals or the consolations.

Individual and team highlights included a sweep of the top three places in the 100 Backstroke (Jane Wright, Laura Anglin, Anne O'Brien), three 1st place finishes by Karen LeGresly in the 200, 400 and 800 Freestyle and second place finishes for Kathy Hanley (200 Breast), Sharon McMurdo (3M diving), and Shawne "Cat" Palmer (400 Ind Med).

Juicy... Bill Woodley skipped practice to lead a booming cheering section with a voice that was louder than a Kate Smith bellyflop.

OUAA Playoffs: Blues Out Ravens In

By RAY STONE

The Basketball Blues played their final game last Friday, crushing RMC 95-70 in a meaningless contest. The real season ended the previous weekend in Ottawa when the Blues eliminated themselves from the OUAA playoffs by losing to Carleton. The Blues' trip to Ottawa was typical of their problems away from home, as they dropped back to back games to Carleton and Ottawa.

A capacity crowd of nearly 1,000 spectators turned out at Carleton to watch the crucial game which would decide whether Toronto or Carleton would go to the playoffs. An inspired Carleton team, obviously still high from their upset over Ottawa the previous weekend, played exceptionally well to stomp the Blues 90-68.

Carleton could have run away with it in the first half but Toronto played tough defence to fight within four points at half-time, 46-42.

The second half was all Carleton, unfortunately.

The Ravens, confident and aggressive in front of the home crowd, (an unknown phenomenon in Toronto), played super basketball, not like the Ravens who lost by 13 in Toronto earlier this season.

Outstanding performers for Carleton were Jon Love with 18 points and 14 rebounds, and fast-Armstrong with 22 points and fast-handed Don Reid with 16 points. Love and Armstrong have since been selected for the OUAA East first and second all star teams, respectively.

For Toronto, Bert Van Cook had 14 points, Brian Skyvington had 13 points and Paul Layefsky had 11, all in the first half. Those sit ups must be paying off, Paul.

The game with Ottawa the following night was a real cliff hanger (yawn) with Ottawa finally prevailing in overtime, 86-83. The Blues played well to stay with 3rd place Ottawa and the game could easily have gone the other way.

Godden and Smith, the big men for Ottawa did most of the damage. Godden scored 18 points and pulled down 11 rebounds, while Smith scored 22 points with 13 rebounds. Blues' old man, Brian Skyvington scored 20 points with 11 rebounds for a very strong performance. Doug Fox had 17-points and Bert Van Cook had 12 points in spite of a sleepless night on the floor of the Sheraton El Mirador. George Gorzinski did a fine job on the boards.

Toronto's victory over RMC last Friday came as a great surprise to no one. Somewhere in the OUAA bylaws there is a provision to the effect that RMC may occasionally beat Queen's, but must always lose to Toronto. Although the Redmen led by 12 at one point, the soberminded knew the issue was never in doubt. The Blues stopped their game of cat and mouse in the second period and completely outclassed their opponents, 95-70. Van Cook and Fox led the Blues with 24 and 23 points respectively. Tasker had 23 for the losers.

Perhaps the most notable aspect of the game was that it was the last appearance representing the University of Toronto for Brian Skyvington, Bert Van Cook, Rich Kurczyk, and Zito Baecarani. Coach John McManus will certainly miss these talented and hardworking athletes.

Swimmers snag No. 16 Western walloped

By DON WARNER

This past weekend at the O.U.A.A. swimming championships, the Varsity swim team once again proved their superiority by taking the meet for an unprecedented 16th straight year.

Taking the lead with Mike Hughes' victory in the first event, (the 200 Fly) the Blues' never looked back. Over the two days, Toronto emerged victorious in 12 of the 18 events.

The final score left Toronto in first place with 600 points, followed by Western 478 and Waterloo 352.5.

Although this was captain Dave Wilkin's fourth O.U.A.A. championship, he termed it his most satisfying victory yet. He pointed out that the entire team was psyched up for the meet and that every swimmer came through with a good race when he had to.

The Toronto onslaught was led by Greg Vanular, a swimmer of such talent that he is rarely seen at team practices during most of the year. Vanular was the only swimmer to cop 3 individual gold medals, taking victories in the 200 yard Back (2:02.7), 100 Fly (54.1), 100 Back (in a meet record 55.0) and leading off the record-typing 400 Medley Relay which matched the former standard of 3:34.2 set by the Toronto team of 1972.

Mike Hibberd, who has improved dramatically in each of his three seasons at Varsity, swam a blistering 1:45.8 to win the 200 Free by half a length over his nearest competitor. He also won the 100 Free in a record 48.3 and swam on two winning relay teams.

Rookie Rick Madge though not in peak form, still set two new records with victories in the 1,650 Free (17:13.8) and the 400 individual Medley (4:22.4), as well as anchoring the record-setting 800 Free Relay which set a new mark of 7:19.9.

After being edged out in the 200 Breast on Saturday, Juri Daniel came back to defeat his adversary from Laurentian the next night, and take the 100 Breast in a record 1:01.8.

However, it was the strong performances of the freshmen swimmers and "buffs" which really made the difference from a Toronto standpoint.

Moore was practically walking on water after winning a swim-off to get into the finals of the 50 Free. His time of 22.4 was a personal best; he also placed sixth in the 100 Free, and swam very well on two relay teams.

Having given up his aspirations to join the diving team, Gary Jones settled down to make the finals of both the 100 and 200 Fly, where his times were 56.6 and 2:05.9 respectively.

Looking more like a second Mike Hibberd, John Lyall swam to a fine fourth place finish in the 200 Free with a 1:52.1 clocking, plus swimming on two winning relay teams.

John Watt, still trying his best to get himself disqualified, took a bronze medal in the 200 Breast at Toronto's outstanding breaststroker, Juri Daniel, broke his own OUAA record in the 100 yard distance with a time of 1:01.8.

2:19.4, and in the process knocked the "king of the buffs", Lance Aho (out of third place) in the Toronto record books.

Aho, the prime example of a swimmer with a minimum of talent who does little training, nevertheless, achieved his goal of qualifying for the CIAU's before he retires.

Rob Goldberg also made the CIAU time standard with a 58.4 in the 100 Back. Woodley swam second to Vanular in both the 100 Fly and 200 Back as well as being on the winning 400 Free Relay. Breaststroker Shropshire placed 5th and 8th respectively in the 100 and 200 yard distances, while Ballanger's efforts on the Freestyle relays proved to be a great bonus.

Special thanks also go to Murray Smith who hails from Ryerson College, U of T. Infamous for his amazing imitations of seals, pigs and cows, Smith is also a pretty fair swimmer as he proved in the 200 Fly and 100 Free.

The victory was particularly gratifying to coach Robin Campbell, who adopted what turned out to be the correct strategy necessary to win the meet.

Believing that Western would be pulling out all the stops in an effort to win their first OUAA crown since 1960, Campbell decided to have all but his top 5 swimmers 'shave down' so that they could be assured of doing their best times. Normally, most Varsity swimmers do not shave down until the CIAU's.

However, Western coach Bob Eynon decided not to have all of his team shave, in what turned out to be a grave tactical error. As a result, many of his top swimmers did not do as well as had been anticipated.

In two weeks, the Varsity team will be seeking to retain its CIAU title at Waterloo. The high calibre of swimmers from other provinces should make that meet even more exciting than the one just completed.

Varsity Ice men take steps towards OUAA finals

By JOHN BOBB

The Varsity hockey team came up with one of their best games this year to defeat the Golden Gaels of Queen's 2-1 last Friday night. The win gives the Blues the right to advance to the semi-finals this weekend at Western.

It was a night for the less celebrated players to shine, as Doug Herridge and Ron Harris came through with great performances. Herridge in particular had a night worthy of a Bobby Clarke as he scored the first goal of the match, killed penalties and was a constant thorn in the side of the Gaels (as more than one bruised Queensman can attest).

Herridge's goal came at the 2:58 mark of the first period when Ron Harris' hustle resulted in Queen's losing possession at the puck. Harris promptly fed the disc to Herridge, who beat Clyde Harris in the Gaels' nets. Varsity kept the pressure on, especially Kent Huhnke, who hit every Queen's player he could find. The pressure broke Queen's, and four minutes later Herridge returned Harris' favour by feeding him. Harris then beat the opposing netminder, finishing with a Bill Barikolo flourish.

The goal seemed to sting Queen's, however, and it was the Blues turn to withstand some pressure. That they did so was due partly to the sharp goaltending of Mark Logan, and partly to the persistent checking of the Blues. By the end of the period Varsity had upset the Gaels enough that the Queen's offense consisted largely of dumping the puck into the Blues' end and chasing it.

The second period showed that the Gaels weren't ready to go home yet. They scored a powerplay goal with 6:14 gone in the frame, and though it proved to be the last goal of the game, no one in the arena would have bet on it then. Queen's came on as the Blues had trouble handling the puck.

The hustle of the Davis-Harris-Herridge line swung the momentum over to Varsity, and the Hopkins-Precious-Ruhnke combination took over. Together with Wayne Morrissey and Dave Rooke, this line made it seem as if it was them against Clyde Harris alone. No matter what they did, though, they couldn't beat the Gaels' marvel.

Neither team was ready to play it safe in the third period, as both squads came out in an aggressive mood. Both goalies were equal to the test however, and there was no change in the score. An indication of the way that the Blues were playing came in the last minute of play. As might be expected, Queen's tried to pull their goalie and ice an extra attacker. Varsity forechecked without relent and Queens was pinned down. The game ended with Clyde Harris still between the pipes. BLUE WALLS: Toronto earned the privilege to beat Queen's in the first round of the playoffs by finishing the regular season in first place. They managed this by virtue of 7-4 and 11-4 wins the previous weekend over Laurentian and Queen's respectively. Don't let the last score fool you; Clyde Harris didn't enter the game until the score was 8-1. . . . York copped second place in our division, while Queen's came in third. Varsity's reward was their tough match with the Gaels, while York coasted to an easy 14-0 first-round win over Ryerson (remember them from the good old days?) . . . Also on the bright side, Captain Kent Ruhnke has at least tied for the scoring title with Bob Wasson of York, or he may have won it outright, depending on what statistics are accepted as final. . . .

The OUAA All Star teams were announced last week and three Varsity players were chosen. Charlie Hughes and Kent Ruhnke made the first squad while Graham Wise was found on left wing for the second team. The Blues will play the Toronto Marlboros in an exhibition match at 8 p.m. Wed. March 3rd. Should be a good game. . . .

Dave Hulme hasn't seen much action this year but he was seen in Blues final regular season game, an 11-4 decision over Queens'. Charlie Hughes was the backup.

Boxers split with Brockport

The University of Toronto boxing team is travelling down to Westchester, PA, this Friday to take part in the Eastern Collegiate Boxing Association championships. A review of their performance during the last two meets with Brockport College, shows a total of six wins and six losses and one draw. Last weekend, four of our boxers were not given fights, and we could have possibly had a much better record, as John Rafferty did not fight. Rafferty missed the first fight in Toronto, because he was competing in the Winter Games at Sault Ste. Marie.

Championships. Certain problems exist, however which could prevent some of our more experienced fighters from competing. The E.C.B.A. has certain rules about amateur fighters, and because Rafferty has had Golden Glove experience, may not be allowed to fight. The other problem stems from the fact that we have more than one fighter in certain weight classes. If more than one entrant is not allowed, and you can't fight up a weight class, our team could lose a few boxers from competition.

Paul Ross's opponent of two weeks ago, after celebrating, slipped on some ice and broke his ankle. The fortunate part of this, was this person won his weight class last year in West Chester. Everything considered, we are sending down a number of good fighters. Boxing is alive and well at U of T.

Angry protesters disrupt meeting

By BOB BETTSON

Forty angry demonstrators protesting the expulsion of Chinese medical student Henry Fong stormed yesterday's Governing Council meeting, halting proceedings until the matter was raised.

But the Council failed to take any action. Student governor Seymour Kanowitch's motion to have an impartial investigation of the fairness of the appeals committee decision to uphold Fong's expulsion, will be discussed at the next meeting.

The demonstrators paraded outside Simcoe Hall before the meeting, but in the middle of the council's discussion of the 1976-7 university budget they charged into the meeting chanting "Reinstate Henry Fong" and "Fight U of T racism".

The group included a number of Chinese students and their supporters, members of the Committee Against Racism. They were initially refused in their demand to change the agenda.

But when their chants continued to interrupt the meeting council members voted to consider the Fong matter.

However, under questioning from Kanowitch, Academic Affairs Committee chairman William Dumphy remained adamant in contending the council and its academic affairs committee had no authority to alter the appeals subcommittee's verdict.

Earlier this year, after lengthy hearings into charges of racism against Fong in his expulsion from medical school, the committee decided to uphold the medical school.

Lawyer Michael Smith, who represented Fong at the hearings, made a strong attack on the decision. He charged the committee with ignoring evidence of racism presented at the hearings.

"They spent the whole time justifying the conduct of the medical school," Smith said. "It is clear that there is no doubt Fong's expulsion was determined by racism. They're saying he was too stupid to continue medical school when he already passed two years of pre-med and three years of medical school."

Smith said the committee ignored evidence presented by Fong's instructors who testified to his competence as well as ignoring evidence of a climate of racism in the faculty.

Since the Fong expulsion, Smith said, the medical school has continued in its drive against Chinese students by introducing non-academic criteria into admission procedures.

"This council must reject the decision and order the medical school to allow Fong to complete his fourth year and graduate," he concluded.

After Smith's speech the demonstrators left peacefully.

'Indecent act' charged after kiss

By KEN WYMAN

Metro Police on February 9 arrested two Toronto men caught in the act of kissing at the corner of Bloor and Yonge. The two were charged with "Committing an Indecent Act" and "Causing a Disturbance by Impeding", and released pending trial.

They may face up to 14 years in prison each, because of an "ambiguity" in the law. Parkdale Community Legal Services, which is assisting the two, told The Varsity that Impeding is legally an act of "Mischief". It can be an indictable offence, with a 14 year maximum penalty. However the Criminal Code also allows the charge to be laid as a summary offence, with a maximum penalty of $500 or six months. It is unlikely the crown prosecutor will request the longer prison term.

The maximum penalty for Committing An Indecent Act is $100 or six months in jail. Indecent Act is not defined in the law books.

The two were shaken by the severity of the penalty they face. "We didn't believe it was possible," they said. The charges were laid against Tom Field and Bill Holloway, both members of the Spice of Life collective, which operates a popular vegetarian restaurant on Yonge Street.

The two were arrested while posing for a photograph to illustrate an article about Homophobia — the fear of homosexuals — which appears in the current issue of Alternative to Alienation, a newspaper published by their collective.

While they embraced in front of the Hudson's Bay complex, and photographer John Steer snapped their pictures, two policemen approached. Identification was requested, but Field refused. He pointed out that the law does not require anyone but the driver of a moving vehicle to produce I.D. unless under arrest.

The policemen promptly informed him that he was indeed under arrest. Asked for the charge, he replied, "Committing an Indecent Act."

Field and Holloway were taken to Police Station 52 on College Street, where they were each issued a summons and released. The charge had been changed to Causing a Disturbance by Impeding, and they were instructed to appear in court Monday, 28 February.

Forty or fifty supporters accompanied them to court that day, but were denied attendance to the courtroom. Inside Field and Holloway discovered they would have to face both charges. The two will return to court on March 9 to set a trial date.

Field hopes to raise public support for their cause "not only as a gay rights issue, but as a matter of liberties. The cops have a myriad of petty laws that they can drag out to harass people, both psychologically and legally," he said.

Going to court was a revelation, he said. "There were twelve people in the courtroom getting paid to shuffle papers. And everytime they postpone trials, they are just making more money for themselves. It's a waste."

Field says he is in fact gay, although he has had sexual relationships with women. "I just feel more when I'm having sex with men," he says.

The Spice of Life collective encourages its members to have full, honest and alive relationships, whether gay, straight or in between, it's the quality that counts. "There are forty members in the collective group, and at least 15 of the men are completely heterosexual," Field explained.

The collective believes in discouraging exclusive relationships with just one other person, though. They hope to be able to have relationships "of the same depth as monogamous ones" with all the people in the group.

The collective operates a restaurant, a typesetting business, and a magazine, Alternative to Alienation, which is published every two months. They share living quarters in a house north of Rosedale, and in apartments over the restaurant. A small farm was purchased recently, but there are no habitable buildings yet.

Evans says gov't 'galling' in limiting grant increases

By BOB BETTSON

U of T President John Evans attacked the recent decision of the Ontario Government to limit grant increases to U of T to 12 per cent as the Governing Council considered the budget for next year.

Evans said U of T is getting the lowest proportional increase in the province which is "galling" in view of U of T's decision not to increase undergraduate enrollment.

He said the government's decision will "depress the quality of graduate work" and "make financial survival for most universities dependent on undergraduate expansion."

Evans said salary discussions with support staff and faculty, which would make the final budgetary picture clear, are proceeding.

He said the administration is proceeding in negotiations with the aim of providing fair competitive salaries, while avoiding increase more than grant increases of 10.4 per cent which would necessitate layoffs.

Faculty member William Dumphy said he supported the letter printed in the Globe and Mail by 18 faculty members who said academic staff should consider taking a smaller increase to avoid layoffs of non-academic staff.

The budget adopted by the council calls for the dismissal of 120 physical plant staff including the entire complement of 46 night watchmen. However contingency addbacks have been prepared for reducing layoffs if more revenue is available.

Dumphy said the faculty should feel "a moral obligation" which "goes beyond dollars and cents" to minimize effects of layoffs and spread their effects over the whole community.

He proposed an amendment which would have applied any saving on faculty salaries from a voluntary cut applied to prevent layoffs but dropped it when Evans promised to bring the question back to council if there is any voluntary reduction by the faculty.

Several minor amendments to the budget were defeated, leaving it virtually intact.

The budget involves substantial across the board cuts including large reductions in physical plant, student services, divisional budgets and administration costs.

The total amount cut from the base budget needed to run the university by the budget committee was over $7 million.

Student member Michael Sabia took a slap at the council for passing the budget without a final figure for the largest component, staff salaries.

He criticized the whole budgeting process calling it "window-dressing. There is an absolute lack of planning and a lack of information. The budget committee doesn't know what's going on in the divisions," he charged.

John Steer — Alternative to Alienation

Officers 2401 and 5825 arrest the kissers. The unidentified woman said "They don't know how they make women feel. It's disgusting." Turning to the police, she added "I'm glad there are still some real men in the world."

Robarts Robot Rumbas

By PAUL McGRATH

"Yes, readers, this machine will do everything but charge the book out for you, just press the button and let it strut its stuff."

Yesterday's introduction to the new computerized Robarts "Call Number Query System" had somewhat of the carnevalesque atmosphere to it. Those responsible for its performance were tickled pink to show it off when a request for information came from the Varsity.

The system revolves around a computer keyboard and if you follow directions you can get a number of things that you could get from a reference librarian only under threat of death.

The machine is designed to provide a different kind of access to the more than a million books in the University of Toronto Union Catalogue. The card catalogue can do many things, but the retrieval system is designed to take over when the catalogue reaches its limitations.

For instance, you have a subject that is in an area sufficiently obscure that you could gather a bibliography only through hours of cross-referencing in the card catalogue. If you feed the machine the magic code it will print on the video screen above what amounts to a bibliography on the subject.

The machine really brings down the house with its best number, a book-by-book scanning of what would be on a particular shelf if it hadn't been decimated by the other 30,000 people looking into the same subject. If you have the call number of a book in that area, the machine will scan forwards and backwards to give you an idea of everything on the shelf closely related to the topic at hand.

The testing period for the system starts Monday and proceeds to April 31. Allan Horn, the Assistant Librarian for Reader Services, said that this is the first of a number of different kinds of access possible into the catalogue system. He stressed that "this is by no means all we have to offer."

"Also, this is intended to supplement rather than replace the card catalogue," Horn said.

The computerization of the university's book holding has been going on for 10 years. In that time they have fed "a majority" of the holdings into the system and are proceeding at a quick pace towards completing the assignment. Harriet Velasquez, also of Reader Services, said "everyone in the library, in one way or another, is contributing to the process."

The information presented on the print out is not an exact replica of that on the Library of Congress card in the catalogue. The computer supplies the author, title, date of publication, publisher and the location and number of copies within the university system. It does not provide more detailed information such as cross-referencing and pagination.

During the test period there will be four terminals feeding into the system. They are located at the Robarts, Sig Sam, Science and Medicine and Engineering libraries.

Bibliography a bore? Lickety-split, Robarts machine does the trick. The Varsity—Caitlin Kelly

NDP's Steve Shoots the Breeze

By CRAIG MacAULEY

Stephen Lewis is "not sure" the NDP is right in advocating an end to university tuition fees.

Speaking in a jammed fnnis Town Hall yesterday, he said accessibility to higher education is perhaps better served by a system of generous grants. "Free levels wouldn't be so important then".

Lewis minimized the importance of the Henderson Report, saying its "silly" recommendations were designed to create an atmosphere rather than to serve as a "document of limitation".

The leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition said that the universities have gotten off relatively easy as he compared their 14.5 per cent ceiling to the 5.5 per cent limit imposed on social services.

A bit of sabre-rattling followed. According to Lewis, the NDP "will not think of electoral consequences when it comes time to move an amendment to the throne speech. We're not prepared to equivocate. Let the chips fall where they may."

However, Lewis said he thought it quite possible the Tory government will last a long time yet, given the Liberals' attitudes.

The NDP's amendment won't be based on one issue—"that would be irresponsible and play to the Tories' strength", Lewis said, but he indicated the health cuts would be central. He claimed no money will be saved by the government's recent actions, citing the pressure which will be put on preventative health care and force nurses onto unemployment insurance.

Lewis promised detailed suggestions on where fat could be trimmed for the next session of the legislature. He said an NDP government would look at OHIP and its reliance on private laboratories as a source of savings. It would also increase revenue by plugging tax loopholes and increasing corporation and estate taxes, he said.

Manitoba NDP premier Ed Schreyer's position on wage and price controls was a "disappointment" to Lewis, he said, as it "lends credence and support" to the federal government. However, he hopes opposition to Trudeau won't come to a "suicidal" general strike called by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Stevie Wonder: NDP leader foresees long Tory rule

Rent reviews for residence blues

By ERIC McMILLAN

Student residences and co-ops may be subject to Ontario's rent controls, according to provincial rent review officials.

With two days remaining in which to appeal rents increased since last summer, students are generally unclear as to how the guidelines apply to them, said Toronto's Senior Information Officer.

Ruth Raziell explained all residences and co-ops are subject to the rent guidelines except those owned by non-profit co-operative associations incorporated by law.

Raziell said it is likely U of T's residences are covered by the Rent Review Act although she would not generalize since "not all student hostels are set up the same way."

She did not recall any applications for rent rebates or increases being received from U of T yet, but officials of Neill-Wyck College at Ryerson have sought permission for rent increases up to 13 per cent.

Neill-Wyck Registrar Bob Luker said last night the college is not certain it is covered by the rent review legislation but is "operating on the assumption it does apply to us."

The 700 members of the college are organized as a co-op, whose elected Board increased their rents by an average of 6 per cent.

However, the increases are not being applied evenly across the board and residents in apartment units are being charged 13 per cent more than last year as compared to the 4 per cent increase charged to multiple unit dwellers.

Simultaneously two Neill-Wyck students are asking the rent review office for rebates of rent paid in excess of an 8 per cent increase since September.

February 29 is the deadline for tenants disputing any rent increases between July 30 and December 31, 1975 or seeking rebates for rents increased more than 8 per cent in that period.

It is also the last date for landlords who need approval for rent hikes over 8 per cent for the period July 30, 1975 to April 30, 1976.

After this deadline tenants may still appeal rent increases within 60 days of notification by their landlords. Contrary to popular notion, increases under 8 per cent may be disputed and a written lease is not necessary.

According to the Landlord and Tenant Act, landlords must post their legal names and addresses in a prominent place in the building. This applies to university residences as much as to privately owned apartments, said Raziell.

The rent review office at 77 Bloor Street West will be open from 8:30 am to 4:45 pm this Saturday and from 1:00 pm to 5:00 pm on Sunday.

You're In Deep Trouble

Fire and brimstone. Hell and damnation. Ugly faces and epithets. Such is the wrath of a Varsity editor vexed by disloyalty.

The notice informing staff members of the screening for next year's Varsity editorial candidates was heeded by only 8 members. The result was a postponement of the screening until Monday, March 1 at 3 p.m. All of the 54 people whose names are listed below are exorted to attend this important meeting.

The screening will be followed by voting all day Tuesday in the Varsity office. All listed may vote. The decision will be announced in Wednesday's paper.

The editor warns that all the unfaithful will receive moose droppings in plain unmarked envelopes weekly in the mail. The voting list follows:

I don't even know what street Canada's on" - Al Capone.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

White Is Might?

Toronto's racists are not just harmless theoreticians. Yes, they write books and newspapers, they have their meetings and their forums, but incidentally they also attack innocent people on the streets. That's where political civil liberties stop; their recent attacks on Toronto citizens should not be tolerated.

Besides the growing number of street and subway attacks on minorities by various "anonymous" punks in this city, a group known as the "National Socialist Underground" has been making the rounds to political meetings on campuses. Two weeks ago they smashed windows at Innis College and a week later defaced walls and a statue at Bethune College, York University.

One would think that a group so militant must stand for something. But they don't. When you wade through the prattlings about "spheres of influence" and "separate development", all you can uncover is hatred. White Is Might is all they preach, and they've added fists to illustrate how mighty white pigishness can actually be.

One of the few things that makes Canada's future so potentially bright is the fact that we are a "mutt" nation. There is no such thing as a Canadian. We can develop no cheap nationalism, no theories of a superior race, nor can we impose Canadianism on the rest of the world were we ever given a chance. There is no reality whatsoever to any Canadian resident's claim that he or she is racially superior to another.

But imbedded in the mosaic are those hate this concept of Canada. White folks only, they say, and they are prepared to assault every non-white in this country to achieve an ivory-soap nation.

What can you do? It's not good enough for nice university kids like us to apologize to those affected and hope it won't happen again. It's not good enough to say "the police will handle it," because one of the first things they learn is that the police will not handle it, and in some cases will encourage this assault with their own harassment of minorities on the street.

The law is vague when it comes to preaching violence, but certainly not when it comes to assault. But you could probably count on one hand the number of convictions handed down for racial violence by the white aggressors.

Right now all that can be done short of forming counter vigilante groups, is what the various communities are doing right now, banding together to discover ways of defending their brothers and sisters on the streets. This will first instill the realization that they are not alone and will not be cowed by thug squads and second warn these thugs that violence will be dealt with in some way. If counter-violence is the only answer, then so be it. There are more non-white in this city than there are racist gangs, so the potential power is there.

We refuse to tell minorities not to fight back or that they system will protect them. It's a standing joke.

A clear violation of various civil rights

Somewhere in Wednesday's sleepy SAC meeting, which even the most committees professed to nodding through, a quiet little motion was passed outlawing the assistance of non-students in student campaigns.

One SAC executive member said that this was aimed at present SAC employees, to bar them from furthering their political careers by backing the right candidate for next year's presidency.

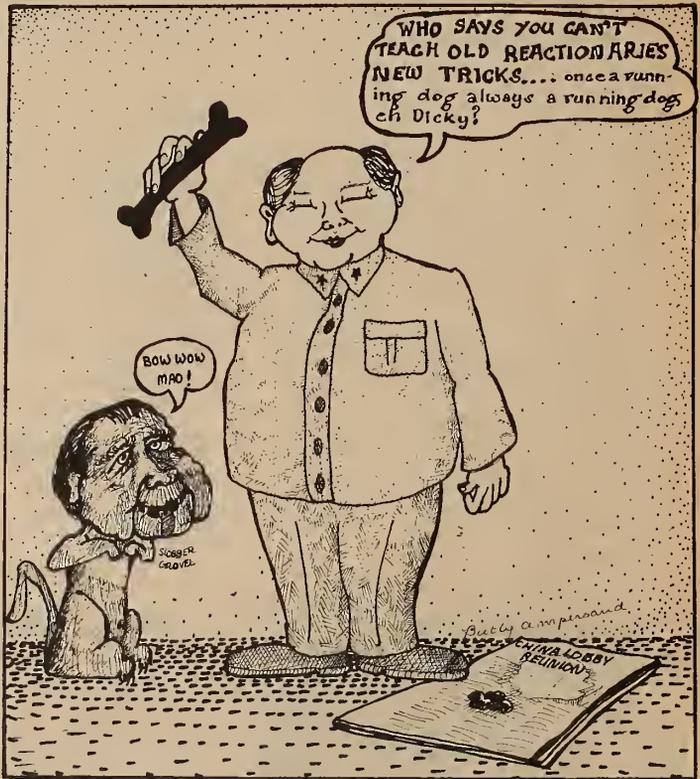

It raises some questions. As everyone knows, there are people on this campus who are not students but nonetheless through their various non-student positions in the area feel the desire to back a candidate for the presidency. There people, through the letter of this motion, are barred from so much as putting up a poster for the candidate. Candidates, that means you'd better keep your mom and dad from coming on campus or even answering the phone.

The legislation looks on paper quite similar to the rather repressive rules that are keeping Ontario civil servants from enjoying the political liberties offered to every Canadian citizen. And in practice it goes just as far.

SAC council members were vague (few so much as yawned when the motion came to the table) about the secondary functions such as printing. Do the poster printers or designers have to be students?

If nothing else, this little number is a clear violation on the rights of any interested people to participate in the political life on campus. They won't get a vote, and that's as it should be, but there is nothing in the law-books anywhere that denies them the right to participate.

SAC should move quickly to rescind this motion before it gets in the way of the operation of this year's presidential campaign.

Dim times for Doctor's Hospital

Doctor's Hospital is in limbo. The government has warned it and its polyglot medical staff that the axe is in store. Right now much effort and 58,000 signatures are going into the campaign to save it from closing.

Just another victim of the hard times, most people are saying. Hospitals are closing all over the province, Metro has to take its share.

Without going at length into why noone has to take a share, there are many reasons why Doctor's Hospital above all should not have suffered from the current penchant for restraint in government spending.

Doctor's Hospital has a loyal community behind it unlike any other in the city. It is the haven for a downtown neighbourhood that probably contains that largest ethnic cross-section anywhere in Toronto. At any one time the medical staff alone can talk to patients in 30 different languages. It is not a drain on the economy; for the past five years it's spending has fallen short of its budgeted figure, last year by $160,000. A part of its uniqueness lies in that fact that its medical staff represents close to every minority group in the city, and the same doctor follows the patient from home to hospital and back home.

Make no mistake about it, the ethnic people in Toronto consider the closing of Doctor's Hospital as something short of a crime. The black press, especially the weekly Contrast, treats this as a serious issue.

In a sense the Doctor's Hospital is one of the few truly Canadian hospitals, serving every constituent of this diverse population. A government as committees to multiculturalism as Bill Davis' professes to be had better take into account the impact of this on the community. Maybe 58,000 signatures (make that 58,000 votes) will give him an idea of what the community sees as the impact. A walk along College St. past Spadina testifies to the concern in the Greek, Portuguese, Black, Jewish and Italian communities.

There is no excuse for the closing of this and similar institutions. Health, education and welfare of the population should not be sacrificed for an economic solution that will not work.

Reader raps, suggests vibrating

To The Editor:

I know you guys read the Enquirer but you're going to have to do a lot better with the headlines, etc. if you want to really compete. Maybe there's no Liz and Dick, Jackie or Cher around here but stuff like "Role of superpowers questioned" is enough to send you straight for the bottle of Old Sailer.

Take the latest issue for example. Page three was sort of interesting with such offerings as "Bizzaro boisis brass" and "Grads gobbie gourmet goods".

But let's face it, at the same time you got stuff like "GAA checkoff main obstacle" on the front page. Surely a little bit more thinking could have produced something like "GAA says checkoff only way to stop alien beings." That's a bit more snappy, eh?

And by the way, where was the "Top Psychic Predicts" story for '76? I don't know any crystal ball gazers but there must be a few on the loose. You might ask Governing Council who they use.

Oh yeah. You might jazz up the classified ads a little. I suppose people need typing services and all that but I can't really see it as the kind of thing to help you through the night. Electric typewriters can vibrate pretty O.K. but they're awfully big for personal use.

Prof: Clark has view on deaf

To The Editor:

As intemperate and ill-informed a letter as that of Flora Clark in Wednesday's Varsity should not be allowed to stand uncorrected. It is obvious that Ms. Clark believes passionately in her version of the truth about education for deaf children, but I submit that there are other views, equally strongly held. This, indeed, is the central problem facing the parents of a deaf child — we must decide which educational path to follow, but we hear conflicting recommendations and get precious little hard information on which to base an intelligent choice. Yet our decision, made when the child is still a toddler, may make or break his life. It will certainly be the principal determinant of the kind of life he will lead as an adult — with whom he will socialize, what kind of job choice will be available to him, and more.

It is obvious that Ms. Clark's experience is largely with deaf persons who are now adults, i.e., persons who are products of the educational system and electronic technology as they were 10, 20, 30, perhaps up to 50 years ago. Probably most of these people are indeed genuinely deaf — meaning they have no usable hearing; either with or without the use of a hearing aid. Their needs are equally as worthy as those of my deaf son, but isn't it conceivable these needs may be different? It may be at least possible that these deaf adults, like almost every "deaf" child, were born with some residual hearing, but because of primitive hearing aids, old-fashioned methods of education, or no education at all, the ability to use this residual was never developed, and thus has atrophied as a functional sense. If they are adults, it is safe to say that none of them has had the chance to be educated under either the "acoupedic" or the "total communication" approach. Alexander Graham Bell did indeed pioneer the use of an oral approach to education for deaf children in North America, so this method has definitely been around since 1870. Yet Ms. Clark is just as wrong in identifying "acoupedics" with the traditional oral approach as she would be had she identified "total communication" with old-fashioned sign language. The traditional oral method as it has developed with a primary reliance on lip-reading to understand speaking shares with the sign language approach a similar philosophical basis, namely that the hearing handicap is to be compensated for by developing the use of other senses. Approaches which stress the training of residual hearing have a different philosophy — that the handicap can be in a significant measure overcome by training in the use of residual hearing. The hearing will never get better, but many (not all) deaf children, like any musician, can be taught to listen more efficiently. This approach can work only with modern, powerful hearing aids that use the latest in transistor and IC technology. In general, we would expect it to work best for those with the smallest hearing loss, but I know children who are extremely profoundly deaf who are successful with this approach. The entire reason for trying such an approach is to give those children who can benefit by it as normal and unsegregated a life as possible, but even more importantly, to give the child, when he reaches adulthood, the choice of whether he wishes to live in the "hearing world" with all its difficulties and frustrations, or whether he wishes to join "the deaf community" and confine himself largely to that subculture. I very much resent anyone's attempts to deny my child that choice, and I view prescriptions that claim one method will work for all of "the deaf" to be totally misleading and an infringement on the rights of my child, for whom I am charged by both love and law with decision-making responsibility.

Ms. Clark's experience apparently also does not include that of being a parent, which her silly paragraph about the dangers of amplified sound reveals. Indeed this sound can be excruciatingly painful, but what parents do not recognize in their own children, even as tiny babies, the difference between signs and cries of pain or distress, and those of hunger or frustration? We, too, have had our disputes and frustrations dealing with audiologists — especially at The Hospital for Sick Children — but Ms. Clark's statements that "they are in the business to sell hearing aids willy-nilly" borders on the libelous. We are, as parents, literally forced to deal with HSC's or other independent audiologists, since neither hearing aid dealers, nor the government, nor Ms. Clark, nor anyone else, it seems, will provide us with the comparative performance data and an intelligent set of criteria on which to base our choice of hearing aid or no, and if so what model.

Ms. Clark approves of integrating "the deaf" with "the hearing" in principle, but feels "it does not work in fact with prelingually deaf children," and cites as support the notion that these groups "do not socialize fully." That's true — there has been research which shows that, on average, deaf children in ordinary classrooms have a smaller circle of friends and make more demands on the teacher's time than do hearing children, on average. Is that a failure? Or is it still perhaps in the range of normality? Why does a deaf child have to be just like an average hearing child to be considered a successful example of integration? A much better approach to the integrated child is to ask if he or she is functioning adequately, both academically and socially, compared to some range of acceptability for all children at that age or grade level. I think segregation into schools — especially residential schools — of children all of whom have the same handicap, tends to reinforce rather than alleviate the children's problems, and is a much better example of "cruel and unusual punishment" — to both the child and his or her family, than is Ms. Clark's example.

When you top off your education with a degree, you don't start off at the bottom with us.

Your education deserves responsibility.

We can give it to you.

With your degree, you can start right off with us as an Officer, a leader with responsibilities. We can help you add experience to your knowledge.

And if you have the courage, you can go as far as you want with us.

That's what your degree can do for you in the Canadian Forces. Together we can put your education to good use.

• Salaries are very attractive • Raises and promotion opportunities come regularly • Four weeks paid vacation annually • Many benefits ranging from free medical and dental care to a handsome pension plan

And by the way, if you don't have your degree yet, we can help you get it and pay you while you do.

An Officer's job is a far better alternative to an office job.

They're annoyed that professors are not enforcing the new ban on smoking in classrooms, and that inconsiderate students are openly violating it.

To fight back they are mounting a new poster campaign, and starting a membership drive. Their next meeting will be held in the Music Room at Wymilwood at 7 pm Wednesday, March 3.

Meanwhile in England the national Health Education Council has launched a new media campaign. In a typical television advertisement a boy tells his girl friend "Your breath stinks of tobacco."

And in cinema ads, a girl refuses to kiss her boyfriend because, as she tells her friend, "He's very nice, but his breath smells like you'd get lung cancer just kissing him."

A holiday romance ends in a radio commercial with an exclamation by the girl: "Phew, what a letdown. His breath reeked of stale tobacco and his mouth tasted like an old fag end."

This campaign is the first of its kind in Britain to be directed specifically at a teenage audience. It is to run three months, at an estimated budget of $200,000. Its underlining message is that personal relationships as well as health can be harmed by smoking.

Wacky, wonderful and wildly funny - play defeats blues with droll antics

If you're looking for a way to shake off the mid-winter blues over school and ensuing job searches, You Can't Take It With You is a fine solution. Moss Hart and George Kaufman wrote it in 1936 to cheer up a Depression-depressed American public. The play revolves around the antics of the wacky Sycamore family of New York and young Alice Sycamore's love for her employer, the boss's son. The two families are so mismatched emotionally that an interpreter would not have come amiss at their catastrophic (and hysterically funny) meeting in the second act. Knowing in advance how hilarious the play can be, my major curiosity was how the actors would handle their various parts.

Penny Sycamore, played by Bonnie E. Kelly, gave a well-timed, believable performance as a middle-aged housewife-playwright whose childlike honesty produces the funniest lines of the play. David Moulday, who was not helped in his difficult task of giving a convincing portrayal of the seventy-ish grandfather Martin Vanderhof by either his moplike wig or his heavy-handed makeup job. In my opinion he overcame these obstacles superbly so that by the third act he achieved his full stature as one of the two male leads. The two lovers Tony Kirby (Bill Jackson) and Alice (Sherry Flett) were a likeable romantic duo but both had real difficulties in convincing the audience of their sincerity when they displayed anger. Mr. Kirby's (Garnet Truax) wooden rendition of a Wall Street capitalist was far too stolid and humourless. His eventual willingness to apply the Sycamore's attitudes to his own way of life failed to convince me.

There were a variety of special touches which increased

What is Bill Jackson planning to do with that piece of wood? Will Sherry Flett survive?

my overall appreciation of this production. Fred Astaire's song They Can't Take This Away From Me was played during the intermission before Martin Vanderhof's speech about his life in which he uses almost exactly the words of the song title. Essie, Alice's ballerina sister, never ceased her droll leg movements, even when the audience's focus was on another part of the stage, thereby increasing the feeling of non-stop exuberant family energy. In "screwball comedies" of this nature it is essential that the diverse segments of the action continue unflaggingly since it is this which produces the dizzy madcap atmosphere.

Since 1976 is the United States bicentennial, the revolutionary spirit of You Can't Take It With You is very apropos. Grandfather Vanderhof's idea that you shouldn't work unless it's fun is as unusual today as it was in 1936. Toronto Truck Theatre's invigorating performance of this wacky play not only provides you with an evening of hilarity, it also leaves you with a stimulating message to ponder.

Finger Pinkie: do politics and tight sweaters mix?

It really is quite easy to write a review critical of a play. A few barbed comments about the talents of various actors, designers and directors, perhaps a nasty remark about the playwright and several indignant phrases about technical flaws and lack of artistic merit and there you have it — your review is written before you know it.

Perhaps it is fortunate that reviews are not always so easy to write. "Good" has become a trite word, but "Operation: Finger Pinky" at the Theatre Passe Muraille really is good. Not excellent or worthy of superlatives, but simply a good play. It is also an entertaining play — truthful, witty and at times even moving. Certainly there are also flaws in the production. The satire is usually based on extremely broad characterizations. As usual in collective efforts, the director, Janet Amos, could have used more discretion in cutting over-familiar material and in giving the play more of a focus. Some of the jokes have been heard once too many times before. The music was less than successful, with over-worked lyrics and non-humtable tunes. The guitarist, Elliott Feldman, was hidden from audience view and his disembodied strumming was consequently somewhat disconcerting. On the whole, though, the world of the IBM Selectric typewriter and the steno pad has been effectively defined by the Passe Muraille's collective of actors, Charlotte

Blunt, Jessica Booker, Jeff Braunstein, Charles Irvine, Paul Kelman and Diana Knight.

The set design, by Miro Kinch, says everything about the world of the office worker. On one side the elevator and the coffee machine. On the other side the person who is calling is only two feet away. Offices also breed paper, or at least it seems as if there is a constant creation of paper. In the play, a secretary asks her new boss what all the envelopes are that litter the floor of his office and he replies, "I don't know. They come from downstairs somewhere." That is the true mentality of the office — imperious telephones and papers that seem to appear out of nowhere and disappear immediately into a similar state.

The individual scenarios in "Operation: Finger Pinky" are as painfully familiar as they are amusing. On Monday morning the secretaries stumble out of the elevator yawning and clutching their brown paper bag lunches. The principal of Secretarial College says in his introductory lecture that he looks for a secretary who "looks like a woman, thinks like a man, acts like a lady and reacts like an it." In that all-too-familiar job interview innocuous questions about typing speed and dictaphone skills are interspersed with such relevant queries as "Do you dye your hair?" and "Are you pregnant?". One of the actresses says that this play is for you, "if your boss has asked you to do everything but sleep with him, and maybe even that too". (Yes, Virginia, it does happen!)

"Operation: Finger Pinky" is divided into two parts. The play is set in a none too mythical York University. The first part summarizes the woes and worries of the office worker. We meet Flossie, girl neatly pulled back by bobby pins to complement her bulky unflattering sweater. Flossie never complains when asked to stay late and type reports. We also meet Barbie Day who probably hasn't typed since her days back at Secretarial College when she was Miss Mississauga. On the other hand she hasn't had to type since her mental and clerical deficiencies are well-hidden by her pink hair bow and her tight sweaters. We meet the bosses — Dr. Dirndl who dictates rambling philosophy lectures to his dedicated secretary and is annoyed when she asks how to spell Hegel. Mr. Smally, head of personnel, has developed the regrettable habit of falling asleep during the presentation of employee grievances. And of course we meet Mr. Biggs. He knows more about running horses than about running a university. We meet the middle echelon too, the men who are on their way up the corporate or university ladder. Down in the basement is George, the bright snazzy library technician who is willing to fight his way to the top, not necessarily retaining loyalty or ethics on the way up. The actors slip easily from one role into another. There is a revue quality to the first half of this play. The dialogue is snappy and torch songs, running sight gags and even a male chorus line add to the light, almost supervivial quality.

In the second half of the play we retain the same cast of broad characterizations, but the action becomes more political and serious and less satirical. This part begins to deal with the more important issue of the unionization of clerical workers. The combination of clerical and university staff provides the ideal forum for a didactic play about unions. A program note mentions that "Operation: Finger Pinky" is inspired by true, historical events. This is the point at which the play stops being merely a witty revue piece and moves to become the serious political statement for which the collective and director have aimed. The jokes become purposely stale; the action leans toward the melodramatic, and the broad characterizations of the first half become almost puppet-like. The jokes make palatable the reality of unionization at the university level in a way that no confrontations on a picket line outside the Robarts library or the SAC office could ever hope to do.

Unfortunately, as the play begins to move more into the realm of political satire rather than character satire, it also becomes less successful artistically and theatrically. The main complaint about cliché action and dialogue must be aimed at the second half of the show. It seems that as soon as a play begins to make a political statement, its creators feel that artistic merit and creativity can be sacrificed to make room for the politics of the situation.

"Operation: Finger Pinky" is a good play. It should even be required viewing for the people here at the University of Toronto. But as the dust of the satire and wit begins to settle, one starts to wonder whether more could not have been achieved with less sacrifice. It shouldn't be necessary to assume that politics and theatre do not mix well, but somehow when attempts are made to mix them on any level other than the purely didactic, one element — either the theory or the theatrics — always seems to suffer.

Modern dance-play graced by melodrama and boogey

The Toronto Dance Theatre's (T.D.T.) performance at MacMillan Theatre last week proved to be more theatre than dance in three of their classic works. The dances, one by each of the company's three choreographers, were graced by a number of stunning highlights, a little boring vocabulary and some delightfully exuberant comedy.

Comedy in a slapstick vein was the lifestream of Peter Randazzo's "L'Assassin Menace", a story about a famous criminal Fantomas. Fantomas, danced by Randazzo, was the kind of diabolical fellow who loved intrigue and misfortune but was never caught for his evil deeds.

In this "dance-play" Fantomas murdered a beautiful but prissy maid-cum-siren, Nancy Ferguson, who later returned on the scene as a hilarious boogeying angel replete with tin-foil halo. All through the work Fantomas was pursued by two carbon detectives.

L'Assassin began with Fantomas dressed in a black suit and thin cravate looking at a gramophone which was set on the table. He looked to the rear of the stage where a mountain scenery painting dropped oddly enough, behind a window space in the backdrop. When he faced the audience again he sported ye olde diabolical moustache.

Fantomas broke into a refreshing tap dance which along with the antics of the Stan Laurel, pie-faced detectives was priceless humour. The audience responded throughout the dance with vital, unrestrained laughter; a good time all round.

And, Ann Southam's contemporary musical score blended well with the spirit of the dance. Resident composer for the T.D.T., Southam graduated from the Faculty of Music here and now teaches electronic music at the Conservatory.

The T.D.T. is a company working out of the principles established by American dance beacon Martha Graham. The Reprive, choreographed by Patricia Beatty, was a succinct example of classic Grahamesque style.

The Reprive revolved around the conflict between a woman and death, danced by Beatty. Beatty was a striking figure, wrapped in a red gown that draped and fell to the graceful, high kicks she cut slowly in the air.

At no time throughout the evening's performance was the dancing in any way exceptional. However, the atmosphere in The Reprive proved to be breathtaking at a number of points.

David Earle, dancing "the one who knows", entered with a long expanse of fabric about six feet wide. One side was black, the other red. The woman and "the one who takes" or death, danced by Michael Quintance, each draped an end around them, Beatty in red and Quintance in the symbolic black, became a gently revolving set of scales. It was a brilliant moment.

The imagery of the piece was enhanced by the set designs of Robert Wiens. Wiens used tarpaulin material stretched in individual directions. Southam's electronic music injected a curious hypnotism into the woman's drama of life, death and love. The dance of embrace between Beatty and David Wood, "the one who loves", was a compelling duet to watch, especially with the resonance of metallic chimes produced by Southam.

The first dance, Legend, was the interpretation of a North American Indian legend in which a boy is given a gift of music. Unfortunately the vocabulary of movement lacked elasticity and a convincing emotional force.

The other two dances, the classic and the comic, did establish that the T.D.T. is a company to look out for.

Contemporary Ensemble tickles auditory canals although Orford Strings lay some impure bows

Some concerts pass by, it seems, unnoticed, some deservedly so. Others merit coverage even long after the event itself. So it is with two musical programs which I heard near the end of January, the reviews for which I offer here today — better late than never — for the delectation of our readers.

The so-called Contemporary Chamber Ensemble under the direction of Arthur Weisberg gave a stimulating program of new music composed within the last twenty years in a concert on January 22 in Walter Hall, as part of the Thursday Evening series. An effective and colourful piece entitled Light Spirit (1963) by Michael Colgrass (b. 1932) opened the program. Scored for flute, viola, guitar and a variety of percussion instruments, the work attempts to create the character of jazz without, however, employing such techniques as time-keeping and improvisation. Reminiscences of Schoenberg's Serenade, op. 24, and Stravinsky's jazzy l'Histoire du soldat did not detract from the overall impact of the work, nor cast doubts on composer's own original conception of what constitutes jazz.

William Sydemann's (b. 1928) Music for Flute, Viola, Guitar and Percussion (1962) lacked perhaps some of the more striking colourful effects displayed in the Colgrass work, but still made for enjoyable listening. Its greatest strength lay for me in the expert handling of rhythmic intricacy, which within the well-balanced work as a whole, never failed to fascinate the ear.

Pierre Boulez' significant composition Le Marteau sans Maitre (1935-1955), which had not previously been heard in Toronto in its entirety, is no easy nut to crack, nor either the performer's or listener's point of view. What distinguishes this nine-part cycle for alto voice and six instrumentalists from similar all-serial efforts by other composers is not so much the strict inner working of the system, but rather the end result. Glenn Gould has observed, for instance, that Schoenberg's claim to fame lies not with his development and total commitment to the dodecaphonic approach to composition, but in what he managed to create with it. In Boulez' case, Le Marteau sans Maitre is brilliantly effective and intriguing music, which demands repeated hearings for a full appreciation of its wealth of expression and inventiveness. Mezzo-soprano Barbara Martin and the ensemble did full justice to the work, which has already become a twentieth-century classic.

The Oxford String Quartet, artists-in-residence at the University of Toronto, attracted a capacity crowd for their first program (Sunday, January 25) in a three-concert series, devoted to the music of three masters of the quartet form, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Bartok.

Mendelssohn's passionate Quartet in F minor, op. 80 was given a sturdy reading, with sheer virtuosity never overshadowing the lyrical poignancy of the expressive slow passages. Bela Bartok's Quartet no. 3 is a vigorous and masculine composition, and the Oxford was up to the task of its interpretation. The work's special string effects, which were executed with clarity and great sensitivity, impress the listener not so much for their novelty, but rather for their perfect appropriateness and effectiveness in the piece as a whole. The Bartok was for me the musical highpoint of the afternoon.

The reading of Beethoven's lengthy Quartet no. 15 in A minor, op. 132, proved to be not as satisfying as I might have hoped. I sensed in parts some rhythmic imprecision and lack of clarity, especially in the first movement, where the echoing voice in a number of canonic passages was scarcely audible. An unmistakable impurity in the laying on of bows in the third movement, a hymn of thanksgiving, was particularly disconcerting. The half-hearted ovation given the Oxford Quartet upon completion of the work indicated that other members of the audience were not entirely satisfied with either their performance or interpretation.

The Victoria College Music Club performed Bells Are Ringing at Hart House Theatre, Feb. 3-7. This 1950's musical tells of the troubles of a well-intentioned, meddlesome telephone-answering-service operator, Ella Peterson (Susan Thorburn), when her cousin Sue's (Isobel Jory) company, Susanswerphone, is suspected by police inspector Barnes (Glenn Wilkins) of being a cover for some crime. He warns the operators not to pass on information they hear to any client except the one it was intended for; however, Ella learns facts which would be important to three of her lost-sheep clients: a playwright making his first solo writing attempt, Jeff Moss (Chipper Thompson), whom Ella loves but has never seen; a Brandoesque actor, Blake Barton (Andy Kirkpatrick); and a dentist, Dr. Kirichell (David Fallis), who composes songs on his air hose instead of filling teeth. Ella delivers the information in person in an unsuccessful attempt to avoid Barnes and his tape-recorder. Meanwhile, Sue is duped by J. Sandor Prantz (Blake Heathcote) into using Susanswerphone to take calls for Titanic Records, a front for his book-making racket. Ella, of course, "corrects" some "orders" and Sandor gets in trouble with the mov. Everything is resolved for the best, finally.

Any musical with tunes by Jule Styne and words by Betty Comden and Adolphe Green ought to be enjoyable but when the stage production takes three hours, almost twice as long as the movie version, it is a bit wearing. Although the clever and attractive sets appeared as if designed for ease and speed of handling the set changes were slow, leading to needless, boring repetition of Styne's tunes by the nine piece orchestra. The performers are expected to sing, dance and act, any one of which requires full time preparation, and a lot of work has gone into this production; it was so well rehearsed that there were no missed lines. To their great credit, the performers ignored technical difficulties with the sound system for the telephone conversations, but the prize showmanship was displayed by Sue and Sandor who kept on singing while when the lights went out in the middle of their duet. Also noteworthy were singer Diane Huestis who also served as Musical Director, dancers Don McKenzie, Shirley Blackstone and Lori Hamilton, and supporting actor John Mayberry. One example of the thought put into this production was the design of the program as a thin Telephone Directory Yellow Pages. Even more fitting since Bell Canada (and Xerox Ltd.) helped in the production.

There were a few minor irritants: Ella's voice being overtaxed, Jeff putting his hands in his pockets far too often, and a couple of slips in the otherwise impressive choreography. Just in Time would have been better danced as a waltz or fox trot than as a Canadian Two-Step Shuffle). Some actors looked younger than their parts, some seemed not to be acting at times, but these problems may have been due to opening night jitters. My greatest regret was that the sophistication necessary for a Comden and Green musical was missing.

Broadway musical have always been popular for their catchy tunes with witty lyrics and for their convoluted plots from which the heroes and heroines emerge victorious. A musical may be regarded as the "poor relation" of opera, ballet or drama but it presents challenges and provides rewards that any of these others do not. Quite apart from the difficulties of the co-ordination of the various directors and the integration of vocal and instrumental music, choreography and acting musicals present problems arising from their very popularity. Except for first run, extremely difficult, or very poor shows, the majority of the audience will have heard the individual songs and possibly seen movie versions or other stage productions. One difficulty this creates is a loss of satiric impact of individual songs in the context of the entire show. Bells Are Ringing pokes fun at a number of things including the "society" of which Broadway musical writers are a part. VCMC ought to be commended for and deserves to be supported in its regular presentation of musicals on campus and for the great and varied experience it provides to those involved.

Alphabet flick takes a cool look at hot lust

Warm on the heels of L'Histoire d'O comes another alphabetical film from France, Truffaut's latest, L'Histoire d'Adele H. Mere coincidence, you say, — and I agree — but did you know that one of Truffaut's very first films was a comic short about a flood, made in 1958 in collaboration with Godard, and called Une Histoire d'Eau?

The victim (to shift into a higher seriousness) in search of a victimizer is a common feature in Truffaut's films. "400 Blows" does refer to the punishment inflicted on young Doinel, but it also refers to his own antics — faire les quatre cent coups is a French idiom meaning to raise hell, to kick up a rumpus; the title emphasizes the boy's self-destructiveness, which might be obscured by little Leaud's chubby charm. When Doinel grows up, if that is the right impression, he becomes if anything even sillier and more accident-prone. Charlie Kohler in Shoot the Piano Player is prone to more serious accidents. One remembers Jules standing in the dark, so you can't see his face, talking to Jim with just a hint of bitterness in his voice...

Pierre Lachenay the Balzac expert throwing his life away for a stewardess with soft skin. The ludicrous male moths fluttering around the flamme fatale in The Bride Wore Black and Such a Gorgeous Kid Like Me.

The Story of Adele H. begins with the arrival in Halifax of Adele Hugo, second and only surviving daughter of Victor Hugo, the greatest poet in the world — as several characters tell us — in search of the man she loves. He is a lieutenant in the 16th Hussars, who presumably seduced her while staying in Guernsey, where she lived with her father in exile, and has now been posted to Halifax. We are not told or shown how the affair started and one wonders at first how it could have. Lieutenant Pinson has the features, the intellect, and the blood temperature of a lizard. It is soon clear to everyone that he would have preferred her to remain a fond memory, or rather a statistic, another pl & oph in the list he keeps or has his batman keep for him: clear to everyone but Adele, who lies to herself as consciously and deliberately as she does to the lady she boards with; to the pleasant cripple who sells her paper to write her journal on; to her father; to Pinson.

She knows he is not worthy of her love, yet she loves him. She pays his gambling debts, though she can hardly support herself in expensive Halifax even on the generous allowance sent her by her long suffering father. She spies on him when he is with other women. To prove she is not jealous, she sends him a prostitute. When he is posted to the Barbados, she follows him there. She loves him until her love burns her out and she has to be shipped home, to spend the rest of her life gardening and practising the piano.

This simple story told has been taken in a surprising number of different ways by different people. I saw it as a detached critical view of romantic passion and posturing. A friend of mine found it moving and involving in the extreme. A friend of his said it was a formal tragedy. Pauline Kael, bless her heart, called it a comedy. Clyde Gilmour, bless his, thought Isabelle Adjani as Adele was too "histrionic."

Tati is often spoken of as a maker of "democratic" films.

In Playtime, by shooting every scene in long shot and filling the screen with detail, he gave the spectator so much to choose from that everyone in the audience could see a different film every time you went, especially if you sat in different parts of the theatre. The marked difference of opinion over Adele H. (which could not be divided simply into people who liked the film and so might be considered to have "gotten" what Truffaut was doing, and people who didn't) suggests to me that despite its definite plot, a central character much bigger and brighter than everyone else in the film, and the simple compositions of Nestor Almendros (he also photographed another of Truffaut's period pieces, The Wild Child, and he's just as good in colour) it is "democratic" in a way similar to Playtime; and I think Truffaut has used something like one of Tati's devices to make it so.

Clyde aside, Adjani is a splendid actress. Adele's are at first timid and a little stilted; she is among strange people, and she has to lie to everyone of them. She improves with practice, moves more naturally and confidently, even brazenly — until at the end she marches through the streets of Barbados like the Queen of the Dead. Whenever she has anything to do with other people, even when she is lying to her father in her letters, or to posterity in her journal, she keeps herself in an iron grip. When she is alone at night, in her bed, she yields to her grief and despair. Adjani plays these moments for all they're worth.

But the camera doesn't give her any help. It keeps a little farther back, and much stiller, than is usual in big emotional scenes.

Thus Truffaut establishes in the film a tension between subject and style, between the most romantic passionate story he has ever filmed and the most dispassionate manner of filming he has ever employed (although he has never been so infatuated with some of his characters as are many of his fans). Each spectator has the fascinating exercise of resolving this tension for himself, and then arguing with his friends about it.

You want to change the system.

But you don't think you have the bucks.

The system in question is your present stereo.

What's happened is that you've developed a more discriminating ear.

What once sounded terrific suddenly doesn't sound so hot.

And what never sounded like the silbance way behind the rhythm guitar is now a veritable pain in the cochlea.

You're ready to upgrade. But you're wary is that moving from stereo to true high fidelity is awfully expensive.

Well, it can be. But it doesn't have to be.

Hitachi has just brought a new line of equipment into Canada.

Good looking, contemporary, high quality, high fidelity.

With specs you'd expect to find at a much higher price.

The name of this new line is Lo D, the result of over three years research that specifically focused on the listener and his needs. (What is the range of his hearing? Is he capable of catching the lowest and highest notes? Or is he limited to the middle range?)

Hitachi scientists measured these individual listening reactions by testing over 5000 people in Hitachi's sound labs. Then, the results were mathematically tabulated and converted into a unique Sound Design chart.

Called ESP for its investigation of Emotion, Sensation and Physical Characteristics, the Hitachi hi fi report was the genesis of Lo D.

When you hear its brilliant sound, and look at its brilliant price, you'll discover Lo D is quite an achievement.

The kind of achievement that suddenly makes it easier for you to improve the system you're living with now.

The kind of achievement that has made Hitachi a world leader in electronics.

Masks, shadows haunt performance of Yeats' poetic 'circus animals'

The audience that came to watch the Death of Cuchulain last Wednesday night qualified numerically, and as I think most were eligible by an acquaintance with "Mr. Yeats' plays on the subject". Having passed the audition, as an audience we were ready ourselves to pass judgement. The programmes were hand set, there was a promise of refreshments to follow, and the play was free. Because the work prescribes a small audience the music room at Hart House suits a closet piece; but the lack of publicity, the accurate notion that it should be played for the select and elect does violence to the importance of the play. Death of Cuchulain was written less than a month before the poet Yeats finally died. It is a play in five sections; the effective dramaturgy dictates that continuity should be split. Basically it concerns the motif which runs from Yeats' earliest plays to this last, the myth of the Celtic warrior Cuchulain; in this piece Yeats gives us a parade of circus animals from past poems and related plays. It is evident that, although Yeats had been a very old man since his early thirties, this work was to be a ten-page summary.

The play begins under the cold eye of the wry Old Man, well impersonated in this rendition by Alexander Legatt. He expects us to have libraries of our own, or at least, perhaps, access to the one at Massey College; as a preface we are shown well the Old Man's understanding of his place in the history of drama. This was written in 1938-9, years of Oxbridge playwright ascendancy; the sense is set for irony as the Old Man dismisses his production as "antiquated romantic stuff". The epithet is accurate; the primal music, the dance, certain Noh conventions date it with all classical theatre. We are moved from the introductory diatribe to the two mythological sequences without the dictated curtain. Nor was there any cloth-folding and neither was missed. It is my opinion that these segments are the least interesting in the play and they certainly were in this performance. A major fault was that none of the actors in these portions exploited the poetry, with the exception of Susan Wilson as Aoife. Every actor moved in a naturalistic manner; clearly there was little attempt to study or borrow from the stylized dance or the song included later in the play. Death of Cuchulain is pure mythology, and should owe nothing to mimetic acting. There was too little subservience to the impressive and expressive masks, is it impossible to design a mask so as not to muffle and swallow the poetry? Cuchulain proved to be neither noble nor heroic; I suppose the intent was to underline the final irony of his betrayal and his bought death. There was no definite sense of either the Lady Gregory Cuchulain, embittered and resigned and defeated, or the Yeats hero, indomitable and haunting 'individuality against inevitability'. Certainly the irony surfaced in certain lines, such as Cuchulain assigning his mistress Eithne to a fellow warrior "because women have called him a good lover". But the tone fell badly in wounded Cuchulain's response to the Blind Man's, "What is your name?" This reply should only be very grand. The spoiling of the binding veil seemed likewise inconsequential. The director, Wayne Fulks, was right in observing the prepared melancholia and the inevitable chain-link progress of a dream, but the mythological sequences remained too flat due to a lack of a rich vocal sense of the process of words as events themselves. The poetry should and did not carry the scenes.

Certain production techniques deserve mention; the floor light threw a proper mystery onto the masks and gave huge shadows on the walls, well compensating for the creaking of the floorboards and the total obscurity of the parallelograms on the floor to anyone sitting more than three rows back. The voices and music carried well but no one to whom I spoke could remember hearing the "Faint bird notes" so important to our understanding of Cuchulain's final transfiguration, and this is a serious loss. But the original music by Don Horsburgh was the more amazing for having no published precedent; the addition of the cello to the prescribed musician's roster was very effective especially in the last plucked sections of the final song. The six drumbeats echoed well the six mortal wounds. Emer's dance by Roxann Brown was properly salomean and symbolical and surprisingly short. The correct climax of this production, however, was the combination of the haunting melody and Jane Neville's superb voice on the lines, "Are those things that men adore and loathe. Their sole reality? What stood in the Post Office With Pearse and Connolly?" the real strengths of the play, then, came at the first and the last and only thematically concerned the death of Cuchulain; was it the play or the players that made these parenthetical commentators fully realize the piece? More important, perhaps, than the fact of the heroic great soul subsumed, are the Old Man's and the street-singer's perspectives on the fact. Therefore, the presentation over all was rounded, competent and enjoyable. The choice of the play should be commended; it is twenty minutes of difficult and intense theatre, and because it is an ending, it is a proper introduction. Rod Taylor

From Brooklyn to Bohemia and back

Not since Steve McQueen burst out of Stalag XIII has the screen seen such a Great Escape.

It is 1953. Larry Lapinsky (Lenny Baker) is a struggling young actor — struggling, that is, to break free of his obsessively possessive mother (Shelley Winters). After four years of college, Larry finally musters the courage to exchange Brooklyn for Bohemia. But despite his artistic headgear — a beret — Larry's refuge is neither Montmartre nor Montparnasse. It is Greenwich Village, only a few subway stops away.

Larry rents his very own set of cockroaches, gets a job in a delicatessen, and takes acting lessons. He quickly makes all the right friends: a suicidal actress, a poet gigolo, and a gay black named Bernstein. But he cannot escape the long arm of his Mom Mrs. Lapinsky constantly drops in unannounced, bearing ready-to-serve chickens and showering strudels on her son, the genius. Larry develops homicidal urges.

Paul Mazursky's Next Stop, Greenwich Village is an affectionate look at the process of growing up. Unlike its cinematic godfather, American Graffiti, it has few political pretensions. McCarthy and the Rosenbergs are discussed down at the Original Capuccino cafe, and Larry takes part in a demonstration or two, but his sights are set on Hollywood, not Washington. He eventually shines in a screen test and departs for a bit part in a big-time production. The movie ends. At last, Larry Lapinsky is reconciled to his mother, to apple strudels, and to his past. Obviously, the plot of this film is not its strongest point. Nothing is unexpected. Larry's girlfriend has an abortion, the gigolo seduces the girlfriend, Larry seduces the gigolo's girlfriend. Everything happens twice. The suicidal friend calls wall once too often, and the gay black carries on the tradition of despair, wailing that he has been "brutalized mentally and physically". So what else is new?

But if the film lacks a sturdy story-line, it more than compensates with sensitive direction and fine acting. Paul Mazursky — who has also written and directed Harry and Toronto, Blume in Love, and Bob and Carol and Ted and Alice — draws on his own experiences as a former actor and veteran of the Village. He has the knack of satirizing his characters without shredding them, and his sympathy seldom slops over into sentiment.

Shelley Winters makes a memorable individual out of the Mother-as-Invader cliché. Lenny Baker is the quintessential Oedipus Vexed. The gigolo (Christopher Walken) and the girlfriend (Ellen Greene) are excellent, and several of the minor roles are scene-stealers: a pissed party-goer, a tactless Method Actor, a nosy neighbour. But the henpecked father (Mike Kellin) is needlessly unobtrusive. Even as a foil for Winters, he is far too bland. It would have been much more interesting to have given the character slightly more life.

Next Stop, Greenwich Village is a charming and evocative comedy. But it is not a film that I would want my own dear parents to see. It strikes too close to home, Sweet and Sour Home. Andrei Grushman

The stickers reproduced above (dark blue interior space with red border) are illustrative of the kind of slanderous shenanigans indulged in by a scattered smattering of cynical individuals with only a slight sense of professionalism. The sticker on the right was created by simply ripping the middle chunk out of the real Mulroney sticker (shown on the left), and seems to be in obscure reference to the impression one got that the electrician's son from Bale Comeau had more dollars floating around his campaign than could logically be accounted for.

Most Dreadful Use of Leiraset and Selectric Typewriter Faces Award certainly goes to Flora MacDonald's campaign people who certainly lived up to, at most instances, the image Flora had slipped into of having a Poor but Populist campaign.

Most ignored candidate in the race was Dr. R. C. Quittenton, one of whose published policies was: "Change the name of the Progressive Conservative Party to the Social Conservative Party and develop a formal working alliance or merger with the Social Credit Party."

In spite of the backing of Last Post magazine and Canadian University Press Dr. Q., as Quittenton is known in Windsor, Ontario, withdrew from the race the night before balloting began, throwing his support to Claude Wagner. Given Q's presidency of St. Clair College and of the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario, a disappointed Patrick Brown of Last Post was forced to conclude that Q had in fact "peaked too soon".

This placed Brown in a compromising situation since the magazine's editorial collective had previously announced in a hard-hitting press release supporting Quittenton that "Last Post has consistently been opposed to premature peaking".

Q's biographical literature did include one of the most inspired pieces of prose from any of the camps: "Dr. Q and his sons have canoeed many of the wilderness canoe routes of Canada and his favourite song is still the song his paddle sings."

This collection would not be complete without mention of Joe Clark's material at least once. The yellowness of everything connected with his campaign showed up well on TV and in the convention arena as well, noticeably outshining the red, white and blue of everything else except Hellyer's orange.

probably the only piece of Clark's material that was "catchy", and technically well done. In this age of cynicism and doubt, it may well be that the delegates to the convention actually looked at the content of Clark's literature, possibly thought about it. If nothing else, this 1976 contest seemed to indicate that, in the end, votes could not be bought. Yes, I was surprised too.

A Consistency in Convention Coverage award should go to The Globe and Mail for its issue dated Friday 20 February. The title over Norman Webster's column read "Zanyness descends on Ottawa" and two pages later Christina Newman's article bore a headline whose opening words were "A zany event..."

The menus reproduced above represent two extremes in terms both of attitudes and dollars. One of menus is for an "ol' fashioned Soup Kitchen", the other for "a Special Celebrity Lunch". The two meals took place simultaneously, one in the Ballroom of the Chateau Laurier, the other in the basement of St. Andrews Church. One was free, the other was advertised as costing a quarter. And in the end, on the first ballot, Paul Hellyer got only 17 votes more than Flora MacDonald.

Memorabilia

The Varsity prides itself on being hip to most important trends, and media overkill at the Progressive Conservative Leadership Convention last week was one bandwagon we wanted to be on in full force: Wednesday's Varsity gave you two pages of coverage prepared by regular news and photo staff. Today's Varsity Review brings to the cultural marketplace two more pages of dribs and drabs from the event.

Prize for Most Effective Use of a Photograph of Dief goes to Paul Hellyer for this full-colour shot that appeared in a brochure toward the last days of the race. The implication of the date appended to the Chief's John Henry is clearly one of acquiescence: no doubt remains in anyone's mind but that John George knew the shot would be used in Hellyer's campaign and approved. A nod is as good as we wink ...

Runner-up in the same contest is Brian Mulroney for this photograph taken from the January brochure entitled "Who is this man Mulroney?"

Least known of the "did-not-runs" (DNR's, we call them in the ad business) — an imposing list including the likes of Joseph Zappia, Leonard Jones, Winnett Boyd, Allan Lawrence, Peter Lougheed, you and me — is John Franklin, an elderly British-sounding gentleman who lives in Montreal.

In a press release dated 7th February, Mr. Franklin "advocates immediate replacement of the incompetent Trudeau Government by a 'Caretaker Government', headed by Rt. Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, with specific Mandate to build ONE CANADA."

He continues: "Please keep constantly in mind that Canada is the envied quiet haven in the very middle of the most diabolical, vicious, violent and widespread revolution and civil war in human history."
 "Our task is to establish and develop Peace, Order and good Government in Canada as a practical example for others to emulate."
 "The final objective, to be achieved before June 1st, so that a General Election can be held June 14th in anticipation of the 76th Anniversary of Magna Carta, is Parliamentary Democracy, with its Inherent Free-Enterprise Economy ..."
 "Plans with full details are available from Magna Carta Councils, Suite 3235, One Place Ville Marie, Montreal."

More of this stuff on the next page

If there were awards for best use of dog photographs, Jack Horner would have it. In the glossy magazine entitled simply "Horner" (the absolute glossiest of all the campaign literature, Mulroney's notwithstanding) one can find those three famous standards: "Man and his Dog in the Front Seat Driving Somewhere", "Man and his Dog Leaving Footprints in the Snow as they trek across Frozen Wastes", and, reproduced below, "Man Playing his Dog for a Yo-yo".

Certainly someone during the four-day Progressive Conservative blowout last weekend called the event "the greatest show on earth". This writer has no recollection of the comment's context. Was this anonymous commentator just joshing us? Perhaps noting that to most of the world this Monday morning might well seem no different than the previous ones? Or was this person serious?

x x x

The delightful thing about Tories, especially at conventions, is that they have The Answer. For the most idealistic, but naive, this means they are involved in "building a better world". (I've heard it argued, by the by, that Paul Hellyer is one of those.)

I'm not certain that idealism can be metaphorically "stepped down" like this, but probably the next level could be those Conservatives that know they could do a better job than that Trudeau. They're involved in a religious fanaticism they share with Billy Graham and the young Maharaj Ji. Some, but only some, of that zeal may well be the result of stuffing thousands of Tories into one crowded, often hysterical, often tired ambience.

Surprisingly enough, the hysteria is not essential to the single-minded zeal, although it is certainly crucial to electing a new Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

(Speaking of The Queen, I should point out the backstage panic before John Diefenbaker's Thursday night speech which flared and dissipated when a portrait of Elizabeth was pinched from some other room and strung above the podium, a tiny postage stamp of a Queen adrift on a sea of folding partition wall.)

It makes sense really. The delegate who comes in from small-town Saskatchewan, Ontario, New Brunswick, maybe not previously hysterical, finds himself, herself, in the swaying, clapping mass of People Who Agree. The same people who cheered Pompey cheered Caesar when he defeated Pompey a short time later.

Which gets us to Trudeau's role in this convention. His ghost was omnipresent, larger than life—so ubiquitous and so powerful an evocation as to make one think he can never be dislodged. Curiously, ironically, he was mentioned always in a context of "how we'll beat him", "when we beat him". He was necessary certainly. The distaste Tories feel for the road Trudeau is taking us down (that metaphor) seemed to this observer to be the only common cause the melee could snare.

I got caught up in that business myself. For a while there "Party Unity" was something that mattered: I was outrightly pleased when blatantly right right right-wing Jack Horner supported Claude Wagner (yes, consensus has given the "W" a "V" sound) on the final ballots, in spite of their opposing stands on bilingualism. And the articulate graciousness of Wagner's final speech after Joe Clark (check spelling) has hoovered his way to victory I believe set the tone for the lessening of a French-English split in the party.

Which by no means leaves the party unified. Sinclair Stevens (a "right-wing candidate") declared his support for Clark—presumably assessing Clark's position as more centrist than left (as Clark himself maintained) and assessing the mood of the delegates as being also that way inclined. Stevens seems to be an honourable and intelligent man, and no doubt saw Clark's support as coming from a slightly wider slice of Canada (Clark had more Quebec votes than Wagner had votes from the West) and assumed in the crunch of the convention floor—surrounded by footarah, shenanigans and brouhaha of all sorts—that Clark had (has) a better chance of defeating Trudeau (or whatever leader the Grits come up with by the next election) than Wagner.

Stevens was thinking fast. He is generally credited with giving the vote-switching-to-Clark its initial impetus. He may well have been right about Clark being the one to defeat Trudeau... there certainly seemed to be problems inherent in the election of most of the other candidates and Clark's campaign certainly gave the evidence of thrift and hard work, both worthwhile features in these trying times.

But I seem to have lost track of that party unity theme.

In spite of Sinc Stevens' gap-bridging, the split that remains in the party is still left-right, or, as Keith Davey, a prominent Liberal, put it, extreme right and even more extreme right. (I kept forgetting in the midst of all the talk about Red Tories and whatnot that in fact these people are all still ruddy Tories.)

Larry Zolf introduced Sean O'Sullivan, member of Parliament for Hamilton-Wentworth to someone as an "alleged member of the Chateau Cabinet". O'Sullivan corrected Zolf... "a member of the alleged Chateau Cabinet".

Alleged or not, the 30-odd members of that decidedly right-wing edge of the party are even now saying Clark will have to come around and see them—implying he will have to compromise his more moderate views to get closer to them.

This in spite of the fact that Clark—with his position well-known to the delegates—was elected in what seems to be an exemplary example of Democracy in Action.

This uninvoled observer wants neither to preach nor to end this piece on a serious note where none is needed, but does feel that the right-wing fringe will simply have to face up to the fact that they tried—rallying behind Horner, Hellyer, then Wagner—and lost. If any of us in the sceptical public are going to believe that the Tories can effectively work together, they just have to rally now behind Clark. It's as easy as that.

WHY LIVE A LIFE WITHOUT MEANING?

Too many of us are in places we don't want to be. Doing things we really don't want to be doing. Sometimes, it's because we can't think of anything better to do—but that's no way to live.

Since you have only one life to live, you might as well live it with joy... with a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment... and the knowledge that you are growing, not taking. Why not decide to live for the best... for a great purpose... for something bigger than you are?

If you want to change the direction of your life, you might investigate the Paulist way of living. The Paulists are a small group of Catholic priests dedicated to preaching the Gospel of Christ to the North American people. For over 100 years the Paulists have done this through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—on college campuses, in parishes, in missions in North America, in downtown centers, in working with young and old. Because we are flexible, we continually pioneer new approaches. To do this we need dedicated, innovative men to carry on our work.

To find out what road God has chosen us to walk is one of the most important tasks of our life.

Which road will be yours? For more information on the Paulists, fill out the coupon and mail today.

Country rockstar Fogelberg rates commercial kudos

Captured Angel
— Dan Fogelberg

San Francisco and Los Angeles have traditionally had a rivalry for rock supremacy in California. The Beach Boys era was followed by the years of the S.F. Airplane. Dead sound. The country-rockers in Los Angeles today are holding their own against the mellowed Frisco heads. Jackson Browne, Linda Ronstadt, and the Eagles, are the principal purveyors of the genre. A worthy compatriot is Dan Fogelberg, who has recorded two very tasty albums in the past two years.

Souvenirs was a fine album featuring some high-priced help. Joe Walsh, the newest Eagle, produced the album and played on most cuts. Fellow Eagles Don Henley, Glenn Frey and Randy Meisner sang harmony, and Henley played drums on one cut. Graham Nash's clear harmony highlighted the single "Part of the Plan". RUSS Kunkel played drums on most cuts; Joe Lala of the late lamented SHF Band helped out on percussion, and America's Gerry Buckley played acoustic on a cut. SHFer Al Perkins' steel countryified the album, and Kenny Passarelli, Walsh-compatriot and bassist in the new Elton John band played on most of the tunes. These all-star sessionmen did not obscure the excellent guitar and keyboard work by Fogelberg.

His songwriting and singing made Souvenirs one of the most pleasant albums of 1974.

The follow-up album is entitled Captured Angel. Fogelberg produced this album, painted its cover, and did just about everything else. The liner notes speak for themselves "Dan Fogelberg played all guitars, keyboards, bass, percussion, banjo, harp, and vocals except where otherwise noted." The guests on this album are Russ Kunkel, back on drums, Norbert Putnam on bass on three cuts, and Al Perkins on steel on the current single "Next Time", which also features the harmony vocals of J.D. Souther.

How does Daniel's solo opus compare to his previous album? Quite favourably. He has not over extended himself through his versatility. His song-writing is still troubling, full of natural imagery and the quest for freedom. The fear of apprehension and emotional imprisonment permeates his writing. Women are caged birds seeking to be free. The overall vision is one of love that is never quite satisfactory and a life of movement and stress. The music itself, though, is hard-driving and optimistic. The lyrics seem to belie the rhythms, but it all makes fine listening.

The major change in this album is an intelligent use of strings, especially in the opening suite "Aspen These Days" which establishes the mood of the LP. Another outstanding cut is "Old Tennessee" which features some nice acoustic work. There are good electric solos on "Man in the Mirror" and "Below the Surface" and an effective bridge between the two songs. The ominous "Crow" is punctuated by David Lindley's fiddle. The final song, "The Last Nail" is a marvellous sustained piece of music. Fogelberg's production of his own harmonies is impeccable.

Captured Angel is a fine album. Dan Fogelberg is in the vanguard of L.A. country-rock set, and deserves the commercial success that will soon be his.

The longest country in Europe.
Two months for $195.

Student-Railpass covers 100,000 miles of track in thirteen European countries, all the way from the Arctic to the Mediterranean. And $195 buys you unlimited Second Class rail travel for two whole months.

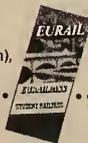

On a student's budget that's some deal. In fact, the only thing cheaper is thumbing it or wearing down your heels. Besides that, the trains are fast (some zip along at 100 mph), clean, comfortable and fun. You can go and come whenever you like. And you'll meet more Europeans than you would on the road.

Trains are dynamite. But how about ferries, lake cruisers, river boats and hydrofoils? Student-Railpass covers them, too. And it'll even get you discounts on motorcoach trips.

If you want to do it big and mingle with the First Class types, think about Eurailpass. Same places, same trains (First Class, though), in two-week, three-week, one-month, two-month and three-month passes.

To get a Student-Railpass, you have to be a full-time student, under 26. And both Student-Railpass and Eurailpass are sold here through a Travel Agent.

You won't be able to buy them in Europe. So plan ahead. We've got a big country waiting.

Yellen the maker: her bottles contain the very soul of Adam

According to the second account of the creation which Genesis gives us, Yahweh God fashioned man out of the dust of the soil. The name "Adam," applied to both our original parents, comes indeed from the Hebrew "adamah" meaning "soil." I'm not original in the least to note that every potter who makes bottles from clay reenacts this myth.

Be it urn, amphora, or jar, the bottle form is vestigially human. Our common language testifies to it — we speak, after all, of a bottle's neck, ears, shoulder, lip, foot. Every potter is a Yahweh — or, to credit Hebrew anthropomorphism, Yahweh Good imitates the potters.

Dina Yellen calls her clay objects "bottle forms" as if to preserve the vestigial humanness of the bottle even as she flees its container utility. In a show currently at the Ellis East gallery, Yellen's delicate balance, between bottles and forms comes clear.

These objects are for hanging and touching, not for filling, and yet they remain containers as Adam "contained" the breath of life. This is but one of several delicate balances that give to Yellen's work a discombobulating freshness.

For Yellen is the genuine faber, a fabricant in clay. Her kiln is a forge and its issue are fabrics. Fabrics! It clay is the matrix of the human form divine, Yellen proves it also the matrix of all textures and textiles. Her objects originate laces, damasks, crewelwork, bossed tapestries, appliques, tooled leathers, snakeskin, supple suedes. She impresses and studs her clay with more clay, weaves in strands, engraves it, subjects it to multiple intaglio, upholsters it with no other than itself.

Further more, she lets the bottles nearly form themselves into fabric things: a beaded Navaho bag, an overstuffed cushion, a fragment of fossilized limestone, an art deco plaque, a splayed Victorian settee. But here is the second delicate balance: between the impulse to trope l'oeil and the reminder that it is, after all, only clay.

Despite the fabrications, Yellen shuns all glazing, shuns the imposed sheens that would conceal the dust of the soil. Her basic beige is enriched with oxides worked into the clay itself, filling a palette with modulated fans, chocolate brown, denim blue, mossy green. Even the most outlandish — unearthly! — of her textures is thus grounded in its ware.

Delicate balance number three poises homogeneity against difference. Dina Yellen curtails her scope drastically: all forty pieces (with the exception of several freestanding planters) are cognate in dimension, palette, slightly skewed symmetry, and the feel for fabric. But no two are alike.

Some are particular pillows, some suggest scenic plates, some rage with whimsy: a clay rose dangling in a doughnut wreath, peas in suspended pods, tassels, stuffed inkblot triptychs tightly ribbon-laced. One most simply list them since their similarities fail to vilate their discreteness.

Beverly Ellis has, in short, opened a handsome new gallery with a stunning show that well repays the trek downtown. Ellis East brings to Toronto the good taste and reputation of Winnipeg's eight-year-old Young Designers gallery. It is located in the newly renovated flatiron building near the St. Lawrence Centre, probably Toronto's most charming antique skyscraper.

Also exhibited currently are ceramic plaques by Ken Charnavitch — which merit a review of their own.

'Odd Couple' re-run is stultifyingly unfunny comedy

In the last issue of Variety, The Sunshine Boys is proclaimed to be the leading money-grossing movie of the week, ahead of such blockbusters as Jaws, Barry Lyndon, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, Dog Day Afternoon. It got four nominations for the Academy Award, two for its principals, for screenplay and for art direction. Both these factors would tend to make one believe that The Sunshine Boys is a film well worth seeing, one sure to bring a few chuckles. What a disappointment then to see it is nothing but a reshaped collection of stale one-liners in a tired, slow-moving movie. One begins to see the desperation of the public for anything vaguely resembling humour. The dearth of good comic writers is overwhelming — Neil Simon is in fact the best known and most popular. Yet in the humble opinion of this observer, Simon has gone steadily downhill since The Odd Couple, his touch for comedy evaporating into thin air.

The comparison to The Odd Couple is significant, for The Sunshine Boys is really a re-run of the earlier play-film. This time around the odd couple is a duo of comedians, together again for one last shot after a separation of eleven years. Before their separation because of irreconcilable differences, Lewis and Clark (played by George Burns and Walter Matthau) did the same routine eleven thousand times in forty-three years. However, their sketch as presented by Neil Simon is so violently unfunny that one wonders how they got through eleven performances, let alone eleven thousand.

The skepticism continues, for Simon's characterizations are so two-dimensional that one takes everything about them skeptically. Simon is content to have them spew one-liners at us — they are not human beings, they are outdated joke machines. If at least their jokes were thigh-slapping, rolling-in-the-aisle jokes, one would be satisfied. But what we get is "imagine that, George Lipinsky died. 89 years old and went just like that, from nothing. You know what songs he wrote? Shit. No wonder he's dead." As Richard Benjamin, playing the idiotic go-between for the crusty senile "great men", said

"That's funny? Tell me, I'm supposed to laugh at that?" Matthau snaps back "Yeah, you got a great sense of humour, you laughed once, in '32." If all the jokes one has heard since '32 are like Simon's here, one wouldn't have been tempted to laugh since then.

Simon is very careful to avoid maudlin sentimentality, not to seem to celebrate vaudeville or the legends of yesteryear. That is obviously why he gives his heroes such atrocious material to work with. But maudlin sentimentality is exactly what his cheap happy Hollywood ending is. The two mountebanks mellow toward each other and are on their way to the same old actors' home, to live happily ever after. And with the millions of people who have seen the film, this obviously washes. It is sad that actors as capable as Walter Matthau and George Burns appear in such lowly stuff — they both deserve and are capable of much better. One only hopes that they had a percentage of the profits with the help of which they will move on to greater and funnier heights.

Blah musicians bruise tender ears

Walter Prystawski, violin, teamed with Monica Gaylord, piano, for an evening of violin and piano sonatas at the St. Lawrence Centre last Friday night. They were appearing under the auspices of the Young Canadian Performers series.

The opening piece was Beethoven's first violin sonata — an undemanding, underwhelming piece. The duo played it in exactly that way. Not that it was played sloppily. The notes were there and the technique was solid, except for Prystawski's sharp upper range. But they only played the notes, and never revealed the heart of the music.

Anton Kuerti is established as a concert pianist, but he also writes music. His violin and piano Sonata had its Toronto debut at this concert. I found it noisy and repetitive, my poor ears were bruised and battered by the end. The performers made boisterous noises on their instruments. It's impressive, but is it musical?

The Stravinsky Duo Concertant was much better. It started on wobbly legs but the players soon arranged themselves comfortably and let the sound flow. They were interested in this piece and showed it by playing with lively enthusiasm, something that was lacking in previous sonatas. The last movements were particularly bright, and were laudable for their clean, crisp rhythms.

The final piece was Brahms' Sonata No. 3. Again the music flowed easily. While Prystawski was overwhelmed earlier by his partner, here they achieved a pleasing balance in sound.

Overall the concert was disappointing. Most of the playing was mediocre, and little of the excitement in the music was communicated to the audience. Scarcely attractive to the devoted listener.

14th century love - infidelity to a carnival of carnalities

The Corbaccio
by Giovanni Boccaccio
Translated and edited by Anthony K. Cassell
University of Illinois Press,
$7.95

This is a book for all who fancy themselves to be in love and wish a reason to cease from such bliss. It was written, approximately 625 years ago and, notwithstanding the apparent survival of love through those amorous centuries, recounts one man's dream of all the horrors that love and its carnival of carnalities can bring.

Giovanni Boccaccio imagines himself to meet the Spirit of a dead cuckold in the land of dreams that Freud trod at the end of the last century, and the similarity of the sexual bias in both men's Oz becomes apparent. Writing much in the manner of The Decameron (which immediately preceded The Corbaccio), Boccaccio transcribes the Spirit's diatribe against the infidelities of the savagely grotesque woman who once was his wife, who now is Boccaccio's mistress.

The immense misogyny might seem to condemn women and permit men to scamper scot-free from infidelity to infidelity. The stridency of the writing, however, pours obscene flame so generally upon love as to leave no sex unsinged. Given the age of this story and given its unrelenting finger resting on such an abstraction as love, there remains no doubt about the matter — we are to take it as a moral lesson for our edification. Love is sweet, but lessons are sweeter.

But moral tales need not be all sweetness and light. John Addington Symonds, the nineteenth century historian who was not himself perfectly free of perversions unspeakable, called The Corbaccio "a profoundly disgusting composition, odious and profligate." In 1631, the Spanish Church placed it on the Index. In 1975 it was translated and published with thorough academic qualifications to dredge it from the mud of historical odium into the daylight of an annotated edition, but the vehemently unreasoning assault on love remains.

It may be that Boccaccio, swashbuckling through fourteenth century Florence, was as his writings suggest — bullheaded, voluptuous, and profane. An irrational moral tale is then justifiable as demonstrating the character of a certain genus of mankind, the indelicacy that is so at odds with what one often associates with the moral affair. It may be that there ought to be no squeamish interpretation of a book rife with hoary but delightful coarseness: "What shall I say further to you therefore about the village of Evilhole? Placed between two lofty mountains, first with great thunderclaps and then without, there issues forth a sulfurous smoke, so fetid and repulsive that it pollutes the whole countryside around. I do not know what to say to you about it except that, when I lived near it, I was offended many times by such blasts that I thought to die there something other than a Christian death." This is flatulence summed into a Full Frequency Range effect and the moral pretensions of the treatise are forgotten.

If there is a conclusion to the difficult matter of making critical sense of such an ambiguity — a good morality copulating with an evil lustiness — it is this: that there was a time when Boccaccio could toss off a mixed-up affair and worry not about the critical reception. It was enough to get it off his chest, and it may now be enough to read that tosspot in order to get something ageless off ours.

A handful of bagatelles and a fond adieu leave reviewer happy

Pierre Souvairan's recital last Thursday night was one of the most musically enjoyable evenings I've had in a long time. This Swiss born pianist, who has been a member of the Faculty of Music staff since 1953, performed six Bagatelles Op. 126 by Beethoven as well as his Sonata in E Flat Major ("Les Adieux"), Novelllette, Op. 21, No. 8 by Schumann, a Nocturne by Faure, and Le Tombeau de Couperin by Ravel. What ran through the whole recital and made it so special was Souvairan's transparent playing, one apprehended the music directly, in many performances, consciousness of the performer's virtuosity (or lack thereof) blocks contemplation of the music itself. Souvairan was a vehicle.

Which is not to say that he brought nothing to the music — the Bagatelles were played with assurance although sometimes the fast runs were not under Souvairan's control. Memorable in the Beethoven Sonata in E Flat Major was a nostalgic theme in the Andante movement which kept making abortive attempts to linger, only to be cut off by choppy figures in the left hand.

The dreamlike character of Faure's Nocturne was not sufficiently brought out by Souvairan but in Ravel's Le Tombeau de Couperin, a suite of six pieces composed in memory of the French baroque composer, Souvairan came into his own. In the delicate filigrees of the "Prelude," Souvairan's unobtrusive playing was perfect as it was in the Toccata, with its jazzy, Gershwin-like motives.

The near capacity audience managed to get an encore — one of the Beethoven Bagatelles. More concerts by this unpretentious, elegant pianist would be a treat. To hear the music instead of the idiosyncrasies of the performer is a welcome change.

A Jewish-Christian conflict stumbling through the fog

Jack Winter's The Golem of Venice at the Toronto Workshop Productions is an upsetting play: not because it is bad but because it isn't good and it could have been. It a play can ever be described in only one word, this play's word is "muffled". The comic and the didactic, the didactic and the tragic clash in a fog of ponderously heavy dialogue and poorly delivered lines.

To say the theme of the play is the Jewish — Christian conflict would be oversimplification. Jack Winter has tried to come to grips with a historical conflict in a way that shows its many sides but maintains a human approach to the "little guy" in the middle and postulates and economic analysis of the root of the animosity.

The world is Venice in the middle ages. Ostensibly the action centres around the familiar trial of Shylock and, in this case, of the widow Antonio in which Shylock is half-heartedly seeking his bond of a pound of flesh. In fact, however, the play quickly expands into a multi-leveled perspective on economics, the Jewish homeland, pogroms, what it means to be a Jew, vicious Christian zealots, pragmatic Christian zealots, ferocious anti-Christian rabbis, and practical, business-oriented rabbis. The two rabbis decide to provide for themselves, and apparently the Jewish people as a whole, by relying on a mystic book called the Kabbalah to make a "Golem" to do their bidding. The ultimate victims in the play are Jessica, Shylock and the widow Antonio who try to carry on their lives free from interference as the Magnifico and the Rabbi Gerontus symbolically unite the world of the Christians and Jews under the banner of sound economic policy and what amounts to class oppression.

The play remains relatively true to the ambiguity of Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, but often wavers one step beyond ambiguity almost to the point of obscurity. Indecision is perhaps a more accurate way to describe the conception of The Golem of Venice. What could have been a keen insight into the history of the exploitation of Jews essentially avoided the crucial twentieth century question of Zionism. When the play could have been a masterpiece of satire on economic relationships, it falls into overly didactic monologues. And when the magic of the creation of the Golem begins to lift the play into the realm of fantasy, clichés like "Something is wrong with that fellow! Besides being crazy?" break the spell.

Is all this the writer's fault? It's hard to say because the acting is just not equal to dealing with the verbal comedy or the fast-paced ideas. Had Heather Ritchie been a more inspired Portia, or Peter Millard a more glib Rabbi Gerontus, the audience would not be so bored. If Ross Skene as the Shamus had been able to deliver his lines with the right amount of matter-of-factness, then some of the best comedy would not have been lost. Even the satisfactory performances of Francois — Regis Klafer as Shylock, Diane Douglass as the widow Antonio and Grant Roll as the Magnifico are not energetic.

However, when the cast outnumbers the audience as it did the evening I saw the play, it becomes a little moralistic to say that the actors should have been more inspired. The sad thing is that there are many positive qualities in the play that would, without a doubt, be more visible with a stimulating audience response. The staging by the director, George Luscombe, of the magic scenes and the interwoven dialogues is excellent. And Astrid Janson's set is artistically intriguing although functionally distracting. But, overall, the play is a bore. And since the potential is there for an entertaining, socially enlightening comedy, Toronto Workshop Productions and Jack Winter must accept the responsibility of deciding, after the run is over, what went wrong?

Leon Major declares war on Wm Shakespeare (and loses)

Transposing Shakespeare to the modern stage is a difficult business. On the one hand, a director desires to have Shakespeare 'relate' to a modern audience, and on the other he does not want to compromise the brilliance of the original. The Theatre at the (St. Lawrence) Centre's production of Romeo and Juliet sins in the side of innovative gimmickry. There are three things in the original one does not want to compromise: the first is language, the second is language again, and the third is, finally, language. The plays of Shakespeare are first and foremost a spectacle of the English language: the honey-tongued sound of his 'woodnotes wild' has reserved for The Bard his uncontested place in the sun. In an effort to present Shakespeare in casual dress, Leon Major's production forfeits the stately grace of Shakespeare's language. The language becomes either bluster and bombast or hum and mumbles as actors attempt to make the iambic pentameter line an idiom of conversational speech. In its self-consciously casual mannerisms, Major's production is a declaration of war against the magniloquence of Shakespeare's verse. If anything, his victory is pyrrhic: the stamina of the verse is a fair maich for the combined determination of actors and director. By sinning on the innovative side, Major loses what he claims he is seeking "vitality" and "contemporaneity". The mammoth plexiglass set has a flair and versatility that surely, in its way, is a genius of modern design. However, in this instance it does not work. Its austere surface mitigates the lush, sensual atmosphere that we naturally associate with this, our most celebrated, depiction of sexual love. We are shut out from the charged intensity of these 'dog-days' of summer in Verona by the expansion coolness of the set. This all synthetic, all antiseptic tone is also projected by the choreography of the action. In the initial street fighting scene, we hear only the clanking of sabres and heel scuffing plexiglass: no hoarse voices raised in anger or any feel of embroiled humanity. "Vitality" is exactly what we miss. In his desire to swing the play toward "contemporaneity" the director inserts a sidewalk cafe into the centre of the early action. The result is disastrous; the exposition is swallowed with the afternoon tea. Again, our response is precisely opposite that intended: we are apt to conclude that Shakespeare cannot be made "contemporaneous". Major's overall conception of the play is exhausted by the inordinate length of the production: the "two hour's traffic" is expanded into four. There is little sense of mounting suspense or controlled pressure. Scenes appear to fall together as episodic fragments. The crescendo and diminuendo that should result as our focus shifts from the public enmity of Montague and Capulet to the private love of Romeo and Juliet is missing. As overall consistency flags and lacks, characters of minor stature and "comic relief" scenes gain disproportionate significance. Jennifer Phipps, as Juliet's wet nurse, dominates the stage more as the sole character with a sure-fire delivery than as a character of major consequence to the action. In fairness, Major is experimenting. And at moments, the production is almost as arresting as it is ambitious. Domini Blythe's Juliet often sparkles with genuine brilliance, but as typical of so many nice moments in the play, her performance suffers by association with Major's disconcertingly modish engineering. Rod McKuen is one of those poets that fall into a category which is sometimes referred to as "Popular". Almost always (and this case is no exception) this means, "About as exciting as a box of Tide". Alone... one of the more recent offerings by Rod McKuen, has to take the proverbial prize for "Popularity".

photographs of Rod McKuen on the beach looking "sensitive" or Rod McKuen in his house looking "forlorn" or Rod McKuen and his cat in a lawn chair looking "hung-over". Don't be fooled by the section headings: the sameness of all the verse makes them absolutely meaningless. I use the term "verse" advisedly since McKuen's writings make no use of metre and contain images that at best leave one wondering why he bothers. Perhaps I have been somewhat unfair. Some of the earlier poems which can be found in this collection, particularly "The Art of Catching Trains" have beauty and merit. They are however too few and far between to justify the maudlin self-indulgence of the rest. No wonder he's alone.

It is chock full of the same vacuous sentimentality that makes Harlequin Romances "Popular". Even the liner notes see its chief virtue in the fact that it is "... sensuous without being pornographic..." which means "Your mother will like it". Perhaps what angered me most is McKuen's ability to be embarrassing without being either humorous or moving. One critic has called this "gutsy sensitivity".

jazz

A Space — Joe Mendelson with Joe Hall and Eve Law, Sunday, Feb. 29 at 8:30 pm. Advance tickets $4, at the door $5. (No, it's not jazz, but it's A Space.) Sat. March 6 and Sun. March 7 Anthony Braxton, Richard Teitelbaum, and Fredrick Rzewski. Generally, tickets are $3 for jazz shows. This should be an incredible concert.

Mother Necessity Jazz Workshop — This weekend, the George McFetridge-Ted Moses Double Piano Sextet. Next Tues. and Wed., the Rick Stepton Quintet. Thurs.-Sat., the Bruce Cassidy Quartet. Every Sunday, the Mother Necessity Big Band with Ted Moses.

Stage 212 has unfortunately changed their program, due, partially, to lack of income from jazz-lovers in Toronto. Take note — this is likely to happen elsewhere if people don't patronize the smaller jazz clubs in town. Non-jazz shows at the Stage 212 won't be listed in this column.

George's Spaghetti House — This weekend the Sadik Hakim Trio; next week, Moe Kottman Quintet, Bourbon St. — Pete Christlieb this weekend, Bernie Kettel (guitar) Trio thru March 13. Kessel has been around for years and is not a very inspiring musician. Basin St. — The Jim Galloway Quartet featuring Buddy Tate.

On Friday at Harbourfront, 235 Queen's Quay W., the Nexus percussion ensemble will be giving a free concert at 8:30 pm. Nexus will also be participating in Saturday's New Music Concert at the Edward Johnson Building. Steve Reich, a well-known American composer, Salvatore Martirano, and Musica Elettronica Viva will be performing with various ensembles at 2 pm and 7:30 pm. Tickets are $2.50 for students, or $3.50. Though new music is occasionally abrasive for the untrained ear, I would suggest Reich for anyone interested in a taste of the stuff with a minimum of estrangement. Call 967-5257.

The Message will be performing on Fri. at the UATA Hall, 355 College St. Other musicians are invited to sit in from 10:30-3:00 am. Students - $1, others - $2. They will also be performing at the same place on Sunday for $1.50 and $2.50. (No jamming this time.)

At the El Mocambo thru Saturday — Larry Coryell. $4 cover.

And — regular Tuesday and Friday night concerts by CCMC at The Music Gallery, 9 pm. NW

Doc Watson's fingers amaze fans

Doc Watson has long been considered a legend in country, bluegrass style of guitar picking. Last week at the El Mocambo, music lovers had the pleasure of watching those slippery fingers in action. To a packed and receptive house, Watson displayed a super quick style that often brought howls of appreciation from the crowd.

The evening consisted of two one-hour sets. Playing with Watson was his son Merle and Merle's band called Frosty Morn. The band had Merle on 6-string acoustic and slide, Joe Smothers on 6-string acoustic and washboard, Bob Hill on piano and nylon guitar, and Michael Coleman on bass. Each member had plenty of chances to show their instrumental and vocal skill, and a few songs were original pieces by individual band members.

But it was Doc who set the pace and the style. Whenever he took off into a flatpicking solo, everyone was watching his fingers glide up and down the frets like greased lightning. After singing a few songs and telling a few stories, he had completely won his audience. Watson, Merle, and a bass player started each set, and after six or seven numbers, the rest of the band came out.

The most surprising thing about the band was the fact that there was no banjo player. Some people would say that a true bluegrass group has to have a banjo player. Instead, Doc used a piano player. The result was a smoother, mellower sound. There was none of that hokey, twangy super down home country style. It was just a comfortable, rollicking good time.

Doc played like a master. He is among that group of veteran performers who make what they play seem easy. The movement of the fingers is so fluid and controlled that there doesn't seem to be much effort involved. Yet the effect was far from tame. He deserved and got a long round of applause at the end of the evening.

When is a review not a review? When there's no space to print it.

We are faced with a backlog of well- and wisely-written reviews, and accordingly have taken the dubious expedient of printing them pretty much in the order they are received. This embarrassment has led to random results, with quite deserving material not being presented as it is no longer timely. So to convert this editorial space into a few shorts:

I would very much like to mention a campus production of several weeks back which deserves the nod. Peter Handke's Self-Accusation, produced at the Studio Theatre, attracted a few of the regular campus theatre-goers, not all of whom seemed to enjoy being there. Those who went with some knowledge of Handke found a production which neatly embodied his paradoxical abstractions, which can be considered philosophical statements but not dramatic ones as the term is commonly used. In the case of Self-Accusation, the two characters involved are also the audience, and those of us who came to watch found ourselves watched and obliquely commented upon. Despite the near incomprehensibility of the programme notes, and, I suspect, the near impossibility of the script, through a combination of observation and reflection the 'audience' learned at a sub-conscious level something more about their own mental processes. By and large the art of criticism fails to cope with this type of presentation, but it was a vivid intellectual experience for which those who attended were grateful.

On the other hand, the recent P.L.S. production of the Dance of Death was as much a triumph of editing as of acting, since the presentation incorporated only part of the original, and lacked on a pageant play version of the Judgement. Unhappily for the performance, there were a few souls in the house who found the Christian story of history and morals to be too ludicrous to be tolerated, even in an art-form, and insisted on guffawing throughout. In one case, it is possible to sympathize, for any production which concludes with the golden gates swinging wide to permit the descent of a white-robed Christ who is overtone of feeble alliterative verse runs a grave risk.

But the production, which conveyed very successfully the atmosphere of terror with which nature man (unlike 20th-c. cosmeticized man) viewed the universality of death, succeeded also in presenting humour and a fine sense of pattern, on which director Jim Miller is to be congratulated. The addition of mime and dance, imported from York University, added to the putrescent aroma of the grotesque first section. Running the risk of being a failure, Dance of Death instead inspired me to re-explore the Seven Deadly Sins and their meaning. It was a moving production and one well worth while.

A few recommendations for this week's viewing for those of you who still have time for frivolity: on campus this week, John's The Beggar's Opera (a favourite since the mid-eighteenth century) returns to prominence in Seeley Hall, Trinity College, tonight and tomorrow at eight. Admission is 99 cents. At U.C. Playhouse, an evening of dance with Terrill Maguire, Saturday evening at 8:30. At Tarragon, 30 Bridgman Avenue, Larry Fineberg's latest venture is an "adult musical" which is lovingly entitled Fresh Disasters and features, one would assume, the usual outstanding direction of Steve Katz. Held over at the Firehall, The Unexpected Guest is giving UADC unexpected financial reward. Slumming is good for you. Also held over is the honest and frankly charming presentation of Take Five (a Play on Women) which has compressed five disparate women into one cast and a unified presentation of women's outlook on contemporary society. Relaxing, and the performers are nice people too. It's not exactly theatre, either, but it is adequate to melt the kinder spots of the most war-filmed MCP on campus. Closer to home, two nights remaining for that old standby Dirty Work at the Crossroads at the Central Library Theatre. At the Phoenix, Homemade Theatre presents Babes in Letterland and the Improvisation Olympics on weekends. Call 922-7835 for details and reserve if you think you want to go. Last show is the Sunday matinee, Operation Finger Pinky currently at T.P.M., 16 Ryerson Ave., (363-8988) moves to Innis College March 5th and 10th at noon, and admission will be a paltry 50 cents at the door.

The Judy Jarvis Dance Theatre is in residence at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road, until Saturday/Sunday;

Saturday: New Music Concerts, Toronto's series of the fascinating and unusual in new sounds, offers at its next event in the form of two maxi-concerts, a pot-pourri of electronic music, improvisations, hypnotic drumming, a music machine, Toronto premieres and a wild assortment of traditional and novel instruments. The concerts will be presented at 2 and 7:30 p.m. at Walter Hall, E.J.B. Tickets for each event are $2.50 for students and can be reserved by calling 967-5257. Three outstanding guest performer-composers will be featured on both programs: Steve Reich, the controversial and world-renowned American composer who will have the Toronto premieres of his works performed by percussionists, including members from the ensemble "Nexus" and Robert Aitken on piccolo; Salvatore Martirano who will perform Variations on a multi-channelled electronic music machine of his own invention; and Musica Electronica Viva, an experimental ensemble of five musicians.

The Jubilate Singers, with guest artists the Toronto Youth Singers and Edward Moroney, organist, perform Durufle's Requiem, Bach's Lobet den Herrn alle Heiden, Healey Willan's Behold the Tabernacle of God, and Britten's Hymn to Saint Cecilia. Willowdale United Church, 379 Kenneth Ave., Willowdale, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $1.50 or call 742-7006.

The Eastman School of Music Wind Ensemble, under Donald Hunsberger, performs King Lear Variations by David Amram, Threepenny Opera Suite by Kurt Weill, and works by Holst and Vaughan Williams. Festival Theatre, Niagara-on-the-Lake (Toronto direct line 361-1544), 8 p.m.

Sunday: Opera in Concert closes its season with Ambroise Thomas' Mignon. Cast includes Belva Spiel, Barbara Carter, John Keane, and Ronald Bermingham, St. Lawrence Centre, 3 p.m. Tickets: $3.50 and $4.50. Program is repeated Monday at 8:30 p.m. with soloists Janet Stubbs, Mary Lou Fallis, Barney Ingram, and Yospyp Hoshuliak. Tickets: $5, $6. Call 366-7723.

Admission will be free at the Inter-Varsity Choral Festival (that's our Hart House Chorus, the U. of Guelph Choir, and the U. of Western Choir). They'll also be joining forces at MacMillan Theatre, E.J.B., 7:30 p.m.

The Festival Singers present Haydn's Creation with Ottawa's NAC Orchestra and guest singers Charles Bressler, and soprano Sheila Barnes, Laidlaw Hall, Upper Canada College, 8 p.m. Tickets are $3.50. Call 961-5221.

The Hart House Sunday Evening Concert presents a piano trio (Hidy, Ozolins, and Tsutsumi), 8 p.m. Great Hall, admission free and tickets available from the Hall Porter.

Tuesday and Wednesday: The TSO with good old Andrew Davis conducting, will present Mahler's Symphony No. 2 in C Minor (the Resurrection Symphony). Soloists will be Maureen Forrester, contralto, Roxolana Roslak, soprano with the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir. Tickets are $3-$10. Massey Hall, 8:30 p.m. Call: 363-7301.

The past two weeks have been a remarkably active period for dance in the city. And the possibilities go on and on. Judy Jarvis Dance Theatre and Company continues a modern dance and theatre mixed-bag until Sunday at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road. Students' tickets are only $2.50. (924-1745).

A week tonight the internationally famous Duquesne University Tamuritans will appear at Massey Hall, 8:00 p.m. It could be a fascinating evening if you like eastern European music and folk dance. This group of Pennsylvania college students will perform twelve different dances from countries like Yugoslavia, Poland, Bulgaria and the Ukraine. See Monday's Varsity for further details.

Also, The National Ballet is still at the O'Keefe Centre next week. Call 363-6633 for details. Kain, Augustyn, Tennant... they are all superb dancers and prove that the National does not need superstars to sustain itself.

FRIDAY: Tonight begins the week long run at the New York of Alexander Jadorowsky's El Topo and Holy Mountain. If the above mixture of mysticism and violence does not strike you as being any way to spend an evening a better idea might be the U.C. Film Club's showing of two films by the Indian film-maker Satyajit Ray: Two Daughters (7:30) and Days and Nights in the Forest (9:30). According to Bernardo Bertolucci, he was undergoing psychoanalysis when he made The Conformist. What I'd like to know is just what was his id was up to when he made his next film Last Tango in Paris. Both films are on view at the Revue from tonight until Sunday at 7:15 and 9:15 respectively. Population explosion got you down? Well then feed your worries at 7:30 with the Ontario Science Centre's showing of Soylent Green (with Charlton Heston and Edward G. Robinson—his last filmed role) and S.P.G.

SUNDAY — The Aladdin's Bazar Theatre will continue its regular program of 15 and a mystery feature at 7 p.m. tonight. The Japanese Canadian Cultural Centre will be showing films about Japan after the Second World War; the dark comedy Mr. Poo (Pu-san) by Kon Ichikawa and the documentary History of Post-War Japan as Told by a Bar Hostess (Nippon Sengashi—Madam Onbora no Seikatsu) by Shohei Imamura. Laurence—Oliver's 1947 version of Hamlet is showing at cinema Lumiere at 3:00 and 8:00.

MONDAY — The Revue will screen Harold Pinter's The Homecoming directed by Peter Hall at 8:30 tonight and again on Tuesday. The Aladdin's

Bazar Theatre has a heavy triple bill starting at 7:30 with Von Sternberg's The Blue Angel with Marlene Dietrich and Emil Jannings; Betty Boop's Rise to Fame with music by Cab Calloway (booby) and Gustav Machaty's Ecstasy with Hedy Lamarr.

TUESDAY — The Aladdin's Bazar Theatre is showing the two best films ever made from Bram Stoker's Dracula; Nurnau's Nosferatu with Max Shreck made in 1922 and Terrence Fisher's Dracula (this British film goes by the name of Horror or Dracula over here) with Christopher Lee and Peter Cushing. The Ontario Science Centre will finish its showing of Masaki Kobayashi's epic trilogy, The Human Condition, with A Soldier's Prayer at 7:30.

WEDNESDAY — If you like Jack Nicholson's acting and/or Adrian Joyce's script-writing you'll get what you deserve at the Revue with The Fortune (7:45) and Five Easy Pieces (9:30) tonight and Thursday. The Fortune deserves a few notes: to begin with it is directed by Mike Nichols (remember The Graduate?) and the lead actress is Stockard Channing. I have not seen The Fortune but I have seen this woman act. It was in a cheap and grizzily made-for-TV-movie but despite that she gave a performance that was by far the best thing this reviewer has ever seen to come out of that sub-species of film. The Ontario Science Centre is showing the American Film Theatre production of The Man in the Glass Booth with Maximilian Schell at 7:30.

LATE NOTES — The Art Gallery of Ontario will be showing a selection of Chuck Jones cartoons at 3:00 on Saturday and Sunday.

In the clubs this week Ian Tyson is at the Horseshoe Tavern with the Great Speckled Bird, the Original Sloth Band and Larry Coryell are at the El Comambo, and the New City Jam Band, a group composed of prominent Toronto studio musicians, is at the Whipple Tree Room in the Westpoint Motor Hotel.

The list of upcoming concerts is getting quite lengthy. David Bowie is at Maple Leaf Gardens Feb. 26. On the 26th, Raffi and Nancy Simmonds perform at Vic Rm 3. It starts at 8 pm and admission is a dollar. The activity remains at U of T for a few days with Leon Redbone and Tom Arpin at Con Hall the 27th, a dance at Hart House featuring Octavina the 28th, and Pogo, an Israeli rock group at Con Hall the 29th.

March begins with the Carole King concert at the Concert Bowl on the 3rd. Lily Tomlin is at Hamilton Place on the 9th, Cat Stevens is at Massey Hall the 12th, Valdy is at Massey Hall the 20th, and Maria Muldaur and Tom Waits are at Con Hall the 25th. Gordon Lightfoot starts a week long run at Massey Hall on the 22nd.

So far, April offers Helen Reddy at Massey Hall and Genesis at the Concert Bowl, both on the 1st. Patti Smith is at Massey Hall on the 15th, and the Chieftains, who provided some of the music for Barry Lyndon, are at Massey Hall on the 29th. If you really like to plan ahead, Harry Chapin is scheduled for a return to Massey Hall May 28th.

Le Groupe's dancing most prolific in Canada

By KRISTINE KING

Visitors to Minkler Auditorium (Seneca College), February 14th were treated to a rare evening of exceptionally innovative and thought-provoking dance by Le Groupe de la Place Royale.

Le Groupe de la Place Royale, a Montreal-based modern dance company, continued its tradition of making waves upon the Canadian dance landscape with two new works choreographed individually by artistic co-directors Peter Boneham and Jean-Pierre Perrault.

The excitement of percussionist Vincent Dionne was woven into both the dances; Dionne being placed onstage with an assembly of instruments to the rear of the dancers. Perrault's piece also utilized a trinity of film screens which although a uniquely, challenging approach was not entirely successful.

Boneham's dance, titled "Une Studebaker pour Jimmy", was inspired by the late James Waring (Jimmy). Waring, a good friend of Boneham and Perrault, was a prominent modern dance choreographer whose passion was the past and its rejuvenation in dance. The "studebaker" of the title represented a kind of homage to this passion.

The mystery of the title in no way reduced the validity of the dance for the viewer unfamiliar with Waring. The spine of Une Studebaker was a combination of energy and spirit. In it Boneham, through the company's eight dancers, explored warmth, joy, physical control and transport, the familiar and the unknown. Dionne provided the work with a pulse.

Une Studebaker began with the dancers dressed simply in soft trousers and t-shirts, moving quickly across the stage to heavy drumming. They became an organism around one woman dancer whose limbs had lapsed into spasms and built a comedy out of their frustrated attempts to help her regain control over her muscles.

Boneham is an intellectual choreographer who believes dancers have minds and personalities which should be allowed to surface. Also, there should be a direct generation of stimulus to the audience. Both he and Perrault encourage these points of view. They were often expressed as when a woman dancer slowed midstream to confront the audience with a humorous persona. She wore a self-assured grin and claimed a spunky strut. Similarly, all the dancers frequently displayed emotions such as joy or contentment, or their faces were seen to be gripped by curiosity.

Une Studebaker had an arresting quality which was maintained either by soothing dance and percussion or the two combined to stir both blood and imagination. At one point the hissing of cymbals and shimmer of xylophone was background to the gentle interlocking of dancers at the neck, much like enamoured birds are seen to do. Further into the dance bass and cymbal work increased to a rock (music)-like pace while the dancers did a series of quick runs and leaps. The sensation was not unlike that found in the film North of Superior and produced a spatial awareness far beyond the physical bindings of Minkler Auditorium.

This aspect of physical limitations was one major drawback in Perrault's huge work "100,000 signes". Only in this instance it was the basic physical reality of the beings in the audience. There was simply no possibility that two eyes and ears could be stretched to encompass the whole of "100,000 signes". Perrault had the company in continuous, often-fascinating movement onstage, while movies were frequently projected on a screen high above the stage and on the walls to either side. The films were used singly, in pairs or all three at once. The dancers were clad in street clothes.

"100,000 signes" was a work textured by a strong feeling for tradition, ritual and the primitive but without any foundation there or plot. The films served to foreshadow the actions of dancers onstage and through them Perrault injected time with an elastic sensation.

The quality of the films — the vacuum-like spaces in which dancers had been photographed, made them easily identifiable as dreams. The audience was seduced by on the one hand the realm of dream images and concurrently by the world growing on stage.

On film and then on stage, a relatively long portion of "100,000 signes" was devoted to an astonishing juxtaposition of violence and humour. One dancer walked along holding another at the back of the neck and then pushed the other face down onto the floor. Both this and other vocabulary, that of the dancers frantically brushing back their hair, have appeared in past works by Perrault. The latter was used prolifically in Les Monuments.

"100,000 signes" for Perrault signified a break with his past, a change of style and approach to the dancers, but like many artists who move in another direction he took with him elements of the old. The dance was for the dancers — Charles Allister, Francine Boucher, Darrell B. Cooper, William James, Suzanne McCarrey, Cheryl Prophet, Catherine M. Teekman, and Perrault — a challenge because they were provided with specific guidelines but space enough to improvise upon each performance. They proved themselves to be more than capable to do so and emerged, as in Boneham's Une Studebaker, with a refreshing sense of confidence and personality.

Dionne's percussion created varied exciting horizons in "100,000 signes" by using such instruments as xylophone, metal screen, bongo drums, bells and wooden block. A historical mood was gradually developed, with gently clinking bells that resembled the chimes found in an ancient monastery, while two dancers slowly explored each other and space. Then came the shift to a faster pace and an unmistakably tribal sound during a spell-binding interplay of dancers in couples.

"100,000 signes" ended somewhat conventionally considering the originality and innovation that had preceded. Innovation and experimentation are frightening lightropes for the artist and in the process you can both win and lose a little. A handful of the audience left before the finale, reacting either to the conventionality or the length of the piece, which was perhaps slightly trying. Nevertheless, Le Groupe de la Place Royale remains the most vital and intellectually explorative dance company in the country.

Women excel in Karate

A small but impressive group of Karate-Ka, (students of karate), from the University of Toronto Karate Program at the Benson Building picked up trophies in most every category competing this past weekend in the Toronto Invitational Karate Championships held at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute. "We were proud of everyone's performance," Benson Building and Phys. Ed. karate instructor Burt Konzak commented afterwards. "Many of our students won trophies, but those who didn't were equally outstanding and did a wonderful job of representing the implicit power and gentleness of the art of karate. I was pleased at all the comments from the other instructors that I received throughout the day concerning the ability of our students."

Konzak noted that competition is not an essential nor an important component of the art of karate, but emphasized that he and his students attended the tournament more to demonstrate the finer aspects of the art — the personal development and commitment generated, the self-control, self-discipline and respect evident in all the U of T students. These points clearly came out as was evident from the warm response given the U of T competitors by the spectators and other competitors.

Most outstanding were the performances of Francoise Lemieux, Hope Maclean, Joni Boratski and Rick Coburn. Lemieux won first place in the Black Belt Kata (Form) division. This is the first time that a woman competitor has won top honours in the Black Belt division in a major tournament. Lemieux, the only woman competitor in the Black Belt division, received the warmest applause heard all afternoon after finishing her kata.

Brown-belt Hope Maclean also turned out an outstanding performance, winning first place in both kata and kumite (sparring) in her division. Maclean picked up some of the highest scores given that afternoon in the kata competition, with one judge awarding her an 8.5 out of a possible ten.

Equally impressive was the performance of Green Belt Joni Boratski who won third place in her kata division with a graceful and dynamic showing.

First year student Rick Coburn also impressed with his third place finish in kata. Coburn, who only began studying with Konzak this past fall showed great potential in terms of the sense of discipline and precision which his technique clearly exhibited.

Women demonstrate basics at recent tournament.

Blues looking forward to OUA A finals, Marlies

By MEL RASKIN

The Queen's Cup, emblematic of college hockey supremacy in Ontario since 1903, is once again up for grabs, as the four surviving teams from last week's OUA A quarter-finals gather in London for the Ontario finals.

For the semi-finals, to be played Friday evening, an interlocking arrangement is used between the two remaining teams in the East and West divisions. The Varsity Blues, by virtue of their first place finish in the OUA A East, play the early game, getting underway at 6:30 at the new J. Gordon Thompson Arena, located on Western's campus. Blues will play Guelph who got by McMaster in their western division quarter-final game.

At approximately 9:15, York Yeomen, who smashed the hapless Ryerson Rams to the tune of 14-0, will have their hands full, when they take on the Mustangs, leaders in the OUA A West, and victors in their quarter-final matchup against Waterloo.

On Saturday evening, the winners of the two semi-final matches play off at 8 p.m. for the Queen's Cup. But this year, there is even more at stake. The Canadian University Finals are being held at Varsity Arena on March 12-14. Toronto, as host school, has automatic inclusion for the national finals. This decision was made by the CIAU for the purpose of television commitments, and of gate appeal. This format, used for the basketball finals, has been very successful.

Should Toronto win the Queen's Cup, (something it has done 9 of the past 10 years), then the Ontario runner-up, (i.e. the team Toronto plays Saturday evening), is also in. Should Blues lose the Queen's Cup Game, they'll still be in the Canadian finals along with the Ontario champion.

This tournament still means a lot to the team though. They do not want to go into the Canadian finals by virtue of having "a downgrading free ride" as a certain coach has publicly called it.

"We want the Queen's Cup," said coach Tom Watt. "We play about 40 games this season — only 20 of which are league games. No game to us is a nothing game. They're all important."

During a league match, Blues drew 3,600 at the Thompson Arena for that encounter. Promoters for this week-end's games confidently tell me they expect capacity crowds of 5,000 for both Fri. and Sat. games. They'll probably get it too. Western fans are really behind their team.

Blues last home game before the Canadian finals will be Wednesday March 3. This is a special exhibition game between the Toronto Marlies and the Varsity Blues. Admission for this exciting game, including an hour's free skating, is still just $1.00. Tickets are on sale now at the ticket office in the Hart House Athletic Wing.

Reflections in a glass puck and other stories

By JONATHAN GROSS

It has been an eventful hockey season in the interfac leagues. The word that comes to mind in describing all this mayhem is "violent". Yes this was the year of the lumber.

It is the opinion of this typewriter that although the referees did their best to curb the latent aggressions of the combatants, on the ice guerre had much deeper roots so that threats of probation and suspension were falling on deaf ears.

Students at this institution are subject to pressures that they themselves tend to underestimate. Athletics are a useful way to release some of the steam that is built up from day to day grief. Participation in intramurals is way up this year although the Vic II hockey team is not a good example.

Leafing through "My Back Pages" three rulings that were typical of the year's festivities surfaced through the muck and mire.

In January John Near of Management Studies was the one to be given probation only in a spearing incident due to the fact there was no intent to injure and only slight contact occurred. B. Young of Vic I was given a one-game suspension and is on probation as the result of a buttend. Andy Nevetta of Mgt. Studies was given a two-game suspension and is on probation due to a crosschecking penalty.

This information was revealed in the Review Board minutes. With Law school and Med school applications hanging in the air for many of the players it is no wonder that frustrations transformed into fistcuffs.

The intramural office has succeeded in curbing some of the fighting that was even more evident last year. Automatic suspensions were invoked for first offenders and if you are fingered a second time you can hang up your skates — forever.

In a continuing effort to convert make-believe hockey into something comparable to a church league Sandy Henderson and his cohorts came up with an idea for a Division II allstar game. The big game took place last Tuesday and gave a few semi-talented players a chance to wear real Varsity Blues practice jerseys and play some of the most disorganized hockey ever witnessed.

In a game that lasted far too long it was Division II A triumphing over Division II B by the margin of 5-4. There are very few superlatives to describe the play of either side. In fact there are none. There were no particular greats although Steve Hansen of Forestry looked very classy for the winners. Even Tom Watt, coach of the Blues, was caught staring, glassy-eyed after completing his customary dinner at the arena. Was he in awe of Hansen or was it the food?

Someone uttered that John Blainey of PHE B, who set up two goals for the winners, was the player of the game. He won the opportunity to rip off the sweater he was wearing. Chris Bouris of Innis also looked sharp netting two goals in a winning cause.

The game was the scene of some awful goaltending. The II A allstars hammered Brian Barry of Pharmacy as they opened up a 4-0 lead. Surprisingly enough two of the goal scorers came from the 'now defunct Vic II team. Glen Foden and

The Varsity—Bob White

Mommy, send me to university so I can make believe I'm playing hockey.

Brigg Harvey should be ashamed of themselves.

Any hockey buff who looked at the II B standings can see that there are only three teams playing better than .500 hockey. Dominated by Scarborough, it was felt that the talent was concentrated on too few teams and that with the equal representation of an allstar clash, they would be lunched, so to speak.

Wrong Beaver-Breath. Led by Steve Pitre and Paul Maric of Scarborough who combined for two nice goals and aided by some shaky goaltending by Terry Nedoshytko of PHE B, II B stormed back to tie it up. Gord Tully of New was in the nets for II B and except for the winning goal Tully played so well it could not be believed that he played for such "nebishes".

Wayne Morrisey coached the losers and could be heard shouting from the bench in his usual authoritative manner. "Skate, whoever you are." Al Fotts coached the winners because he had nothing better to do.

All in all the players had a good time and after all, that is the important thing, isn't it.

x x x

This is the saddest part of the season. It's time to say good-bye to those teams that will not be participating in the glory of the playoffs.

First on the list are the boys of New. How many teams do you know that can boast having ever sweated ripped off during the season? How many teams in memory had a coach that never showed up? How many teams come to mind when it is mentioned that more players were lost to food poisoning than anything else? The jokes go on forever. In any case it was a fun year. Shell Shocked Schwaybe Brow, playing his last game for New College, without a jersey, allowed five goals to Meds as the Green Machine lost to the Docs 5-3. Apparently they blew a lead of sorts but with a half dozen players what can you expect? Aloha Bobby and Rose.

Mgt. Studies knocked UC II out of the running with a 4-0 shutout. Ron Colucci and Bill O'Connor tallied for the victors, who now advance to the playoffs.

Knox and Scarborough II, each headed for the playoffs tied 1-1 while in the Battle of the Bums Music ended this season along with Emmanuel's with a 6-3 win.

UC I surprised everyone this year by making the playoffs.

Scarborough was shocked when they lost to them 3-1. Petropoulos did a couple for the Dreaded Red. Cute.

On a more depressing note the boys of Innis saw their playoff hopes sinking lower in the west as Forestry downed Law 3-1. The only way they can win is by downing powerful PHE B tonight. This, combined with a loss by St. Mikes B to Jr. Engineering would get them in. They needed a serious mitzavah.

Good-bye Bill Procuiner. Billy scored two in a 5-3 loss to Dents who are also rans this year. Bobby Monroe where are you? Had enough? PHE A downed SMC 2-0. Mark Ackley scored for all you football fans.

No coach but gymnasts finish second in OUA A

By RON COLLINS

The Varsity Blues gymnastics team culminated an undefeated season this year with the defeat of the York Yeoman at the divisional finals several eons ago. This euphoric state of invincibility ended at the OUA A finals this past weekend.

The Yeoman regrouped to edge Toronto for the championship. York has dominated gymnastics in this province for several years and more of the same can be expected unless other schools beef up their programs, possibly by recruiting somewhere east of the Iron Curtain.

Toronto has, according to this reporter and participant, the worst gymnastics facilities in the province and is the only team that performs without the benefit of a coach. Considering the absence of such an important element, the Blues have had a pretty successful season. Brian Euler has done a terrific job, combining the duties of a fourth year engineering student with competing and coaching the rest of the team.

Euler cannot keep up this juggling act and the team must have a full time coach. Brian had a lot to do with U of T's very respectable second place finish, demonstrating that Toronto has potential. An improved program would indeed tap this potential to a fuller extent.

At the Ontario finals the Blues handily outdistanced every team except York. The squad is composed of Chester Makischuck, Brian Euler, John Fair, John Kelly, Derek Wulff, Art Bowman and Ron Collins.

All of the Blues performed consistently displaying the balance and depth which is necessary for success. John Fair led the team in scoring, placing sixth in the overall standings. The top five were from York. Fair will be representing Ontario at the Canadian finals this weekend.

Dents students sign petition to stave off cutbacks

By JOE WRIGHT
 Almost 500 of the 600 students enrolled in the Faculty of Dentistry and the School of Hygiene have signed a petition calling on the government to reject the education recommendations of the Henderson Report.

SAC Dentistry rep Lawrence Yanover collected the signatures after distributing the petition to the 500 Dentistry students and the 100 students in the Hygiene school.

The petition states "We hereby petition the Government of Ontario to not accept the Henderson Report findings increasing tuition fees and raising the loan ceiling to $1,000. We feel that the university and our government should resist placing an increasing burden of the cost of education on the student, further reducing access of students to higher education."

The petition goes on to ask Minister of Colleges and Universities minister Harry Parrott to consider the already high tuition for dental students in light of the excellent low cost services the school provides to the community. A copy of the petition was sent to Parrott, a former dentist.

Yanover said the petition was initiated because "I was disturbed at the consequences which would occur if the Henderson Report recommendations were instituted."

"I would say most people are behind me," Yanover said, commenting on the petition, "and the only reason the other people didn't sign it was because they were absent from classes."

Since collecting the signatures, Yanover has begun to distribute a questionnaire to Dentistry students. Included with the questionnaire is a list of expected results drawn up by the Budget Planning Committee of the Faculty of Dentistry on the basis of a budget cut of $260,000. The budget cut has since been reduced to $162,000.

Dentistry dean Gordon Nikifarouk states in the budget report, "I am concerned that if the improved picture (reduction of $182,000 not $260,000) is merely a postponement of a further reduction in the subsequent years, then the Faculty will find itself in a most difficult situation."

According to the Dentistry budget committee, the anticipated $260,000 cut would have included these effects:

- a reduction of student-staff ratio in first year Restorative Dentistry from 1:16 to 1:18

- an increase of student-staff ratio from 1:16 to 1:21 (the committee notes "This makes the programme in first year unacceptable and below accreditation standards")

- a reduction of demonstrators in Oral Anatomy, Oral Histology and Pathology. "In Histology the student-staff ratio would be 1:30"

- "Quality of all clinic programmes will be seriously affected"

- "Students will receive no training in utilization of auxiliaries."

- "Oral surgery staff ratio changed from 1:7 to 1:14, this is unsafe and creates an environment where learning is seriously impaired."

- Student preparation for practice of dentistry would be below acceptable standards.

- Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Canada may in all probability not issue licences to practice on this basis without evaluation by the College."

- "Canadian Dental Association accreditation of programmes would be in jeopardy."

Yanover said that although the dentistry budget cut had been reduced $78,000, he feared more cuts for the Faculty in the future.

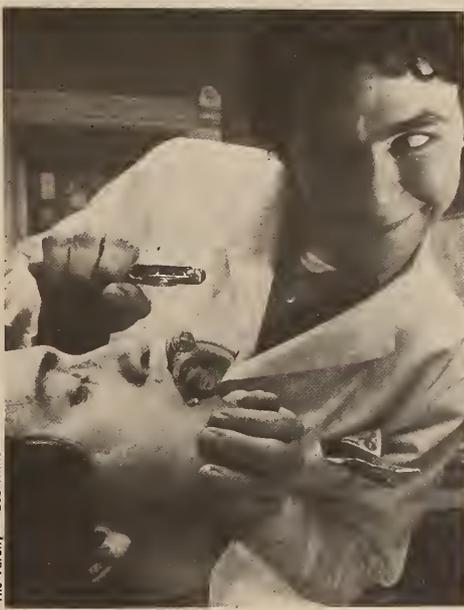

Although only a few of the questionnaires have been returned, Yanover said respondents had so far supported the idea of a possible one-day walkout to protest the cuts to the government "about two to one." "I hope we'll be able to show the government that we need more money," said Yanover. "It's not enough to just lessen cutbacks to upgrade facilities that are twenty years out of date."

In response to the 500-name petition and a letter from Yanover, minister Harry Parrott replied in a letter that "while I believe students ought to pay a higher fee, the rate of increase is still a matter of consideration. My own view is that we should return to a fee which represents about 20 per cent of the university's operating revenue."

Getting the conviction of the Henderson Report that "the direct advantages of post-secondary education accrue primarily to about one-third of Ontario's young people and that in fact the gains to these individuals may be essentially personal rather than those shared by society as a whole", Parrott states he feels "recognition must be made of the fact that students are the prime beneficiaries of their education and some reasonable proportion of the cost must be borne by them."

"I would just ask you to consider carefully what I have said and to consider with some compassion the position of the taxpayer in this province. Remember also that you and your fellow students will shortly be taxpayers," the letter adds.

Library cut slows books

By LEARYAN
 U of T's Chief Librarian Robert Blackburn has reaffirmed that budget cuts in the university library system "will affect academic quality."

The statement was made in a bulletin distributed to staff yesterday. Because the library staff has been slowly reduced over the last few years, there are not enough library technicians to keep up with the cataloguing and processing of the collection.

"The staff cuts required in this year's budget will certainly make matters worse," he added.

There is already a six month's backlog of books in the processing department of the library. The books have already been bought but they have been sitting in storage for months because the staff can't keep up.

In the long strike of library workers last term, one of the major demands of the workers was that the staff numbers be maintained at a constant level. The university refused.

Library critics have charged that it takes at least a year from the time some books are received to when they reach the shelves.

OFS estimates 80,000 unemployed in summer

By LEARYAN
 The Ontario Federation of Students estimates that 80,000 to 85,000 students will be unemployed out of a work force of 425,000 this coming summer. In a recently released brief, the OFS points out this increases the percentage of unemployed students from 8 per cent in 1974, to 17 per cent in 1975. In 1976, they estimate the rate will rise to between 19 and 21 per cent.

"Although there will be fewer jobs in the private sector, that reduction of jobs in government will be the 'real crunch,'" according to the brief. "As part of its so-called 'anti-inflation' programme Ottawa has eliminated 7,000 of the 9,000 jobs it created in Ontario last summer."

This means there might be more than 80,000 unemployed Ontario students this summer.

Further, thousands of university students will be unable to collect unemployment insurance during the summer, says the report. Many students, unemployed last summer, will not have secured eight weeks employment during the last 52 weeks. Not even the 7,000 students working on opportunities for Youth projects last year are eligible for UIC benefits.

OFS proposes the creation of jobs by both the federal and provincial governments and changes in student loans, including a rolling back of the loan ceiling, elimination of the summer savings requirement and grants for unemployed students. For

OFS, the issue is accessibility to the university for all students. "The importance of waging an all-out effort around the issue of unemployment cannot be overemphasized. As outlined, it is a direct and immediate attack on accessibility to post-secondary education."

Nationally, the number of jobs created is falling from 50,000 to 13,000 this year, says the brief. Provincially, the province created 7,550 jobs last year, and this year plans to make another 7,850. The catch, according to the brief, is that increased jobs and money goes to the Venture Capital program. "Under the scheme students (300 tops) borrow $1,000 to set up their own little capitalist enterprise."

This gives students the right to lose their shirt with borrowed money, says the brief. The brief concludes by pointing out there is no new appeals program to compensate for lack of employment through grants.

OFS supports anti-cutbacks rally

TOPICS, COMMONPLACES, STRATEGIES AND DECORUM
 THE RHETORIC OF DECISION MAKING

Michael Dixon

Are "Decision Makers" logical or rhetorical?

By DAN KEETON
 The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS-FEO) has given its "full support" to a planned "anti-cutbacks" demonstration at Queen's Park at the Federation's Winter Conference in London February 28-March 1.

The conference also ratified a workshop proposal for a one-day "moratorium on classes and/or day of education" at member institutions, March 24 and agreed to "develop grassroots support and understanding of the unity of the general cutbacks issue" through:

- "issue-oriented organizing" at the faculty and department level;
- in-class speaking;
- local pamphlets;
- working with currently "non-involved" faculty and non-academic staff.

Delegates readily agreed to endorse the April 3 demonstration against the provincial government's massive cutbacks in social services and post-secondary education spending sponsored by the Toronto-based Coalition Against Cutbacks. But opinion was divided over whether OFS and its members should attempt the proposed one-day moratorium or teach-in to promote student participation in the April 3 demonstration. The March 24 action was proposed by delegates from McMaster University's Union of Graduate Students (UGS) and York University's Council of York Student Federations (CYSF) in response to the Coalition's request for student involvement at its planned rally March 11.

Coalition representatives Barry McPeake and Ned Dymtrishyn urged the "unity of all sectors" affected by the provincial government's budget cutbacks. The Coalition is a "regrouping" of "various organizations, unions and political parties" stated the motion supporting the moratorium.

But a number of delegates questioned the amount of student involvement the cutbacks coalition could expect.

The University of Toronto's Graduate Student Union (GSU) representative, Barb Cameron said delegates shouldn't "underestimate" the need for educating students on the cutbacks issue and how it affects both students and organized labor.

U of T's Arts and Sciences Student Union (ASSU) rep Jeannie Greatback disagreed with the argument that the OFS sponsored student demonstration against post-secondary education cutbacks at Queen's Park January 21 indicated broad student opposition to the government's cutbacks policy.

"No one's really analyzed the demonstration... though we got 2,500 (students) out, we didn't get 25,000", she argued, calling for "a shift in the focus of talks" to more "discussion at the grassroots level."

Carleton University Student Association (CUSA) president-elect, Scott Mullin, said the April 3 demonstration date "couldn't be worse for getting students out."

OFS publicity officer Chris Harries countered, saying there was "a certain amount of momentum" after the Jan. 21 demonstration. "We're not operating in a vacuum," he said, stating that "labor was already moving" and "we (OFS) can help to get as many interested students as possible" to the demonstration.

Despite the tactical disagreements, the conference plenary adopted both the moratorium motion and the GSU-sponsored motion, calling for work in universities and colleges at the "grassroots" level.

THE FONG CASE: Who will decide?

What's going to happen to Henry Fong? His case has been "over" for three months, but there are more than a few signs that people are not satisfied with the verdict.

It probably won't surprise you to know that we have always considered the verdict unfair and vindictive. But now that there is a chance, admittedly a slim one, that Henry Fong can have his case reviewed, it is imperative that the point be made again. Rather than doing it here, refer yourself to the letters column below, in which we have a first indication that the fight is being taken up by people who have more power on campus than the Varsity.

Mr. Bancroft's major point is that, even though the medical school discounts the possibility of racism in the decision, the evidence given to support this denial is tenuous at best. The Academic Appeals Committee, in its report, went as far as to admit that there was reason to believe that some faculty members were biased against Chinese students, but that they could not see how it affected Henry Fong. That sort of logic smells; anything that can be done to have the case reviewed by another body should be done immediately before Henry Fong loses another year of school. He's lost two already because of all the muddling to this point.

The fight right now is two-fold. The first part is to have the Governing Council re-open investigation. This would be a significant slap on the wrist for all the bodies that have dealt with the case so far. If they don't do it, it's sheer cowardice. Despite all claims to the fair-mindedness of the people represented on the committees that reviewed the case, it is possible for entire groups of people to be compromised even before they begin deliberation, especially in such a close atmosphere as one finds at this university.

So the second fight will be on the question of who should be involved in the next review of the case. At Governing Council, student member Seymour Kanowitch gave notice of a motion that would turn the decision over to another university body. For the reason stated above, this would be unwise. The case is too notorious inside the university; there would be little chance that the same compromise would not occur again.

SAC has a better idea. Due to the notoriety of this case within the community outside the university, it would be a better idea to have the case reviewed by another, non-university body, perhaps by the office of the Ontario Ombudsman. There is simply no other way to convince the members of the Chinese community in Toronto that the case is being dealt with fairly and openly.

The people are moving, so is the government

A number of events are forthcoming. None are the work of out-of-touch radicals but of responsible workers, student organizations, city hall reformers and several prominent NDP'ers.

On March 9, the Movement for Municipal Reform is planning a demonstration at the opening of the Legislature. Their main beef is the rise in the TTC fares but other groups plan to be there too. Everyone is upset at the government's handling of the government's own financial crisis.

They all want an end to cutbacks.

On March 11, Convocation Hall is the site for a rally of concerned groups under the umbrella of the Coalition Against the Cutbacks. They too are worried about TTC, as well as the closing of Doctors Hospital, cuts in welfare, daycare and nursing homes. This list of concerns grows every day.

March 9 and 11 is only the beginning. The Canadian Labor Congress is full-steam-ahead on a mass demonstration in Ottawa on March 22, to protest the wage and price controls. They too are upset at the same government. The wage and price controls were posed as an answer to financial problems just as the spending cuts were posed as an answer. And that's not all.

The Ontario Federation of Students has endorsed the idea of a province-wide moratorium on classes to protest the decline of educational quality and availability found in current government policies. The projected date is March 24. So far Scarborough College, York University, Brock, and Trent have confirmed that they intend to make this a reality.

And Quebec workers are currently working on a general strike.

This is a great deal of energy, and it's all directed against the government in its various disguises. What is Ottawa doing in response?

Well, they've just liberalized the wire tap laws, for the police. They don't have to justify it to any one. Very important business according to most Ottawa observers.

And in Quebec, the police have been asking people to leave town, ostensibly they fear an incident at the Montreal Olympics. Most of the individuals harassed by the War Measures Act in October 1970, are being harassed again. In spite of the fact that Pierre Trudeau never managed to justify the original "threat to public order".

On the one side people are taking to the streets in solidarity against a hard government. On the other side the government is getting harder. Apparently there is such a thing as class struggle, and just as apparently the ruling class knows it better than any of us.

Dept. chairman supports Fong

To The Editor:
May I add my voice to the several on campus that are appealing to the Governing Council to reject the report of the Subcommittee on Academic Appeals that has denied the appeal of Mr. Henry Fong against his expulsion from the Faculty of Medicine.

There are many complex issues involved in this situation, among them: the rights of the individual, the rights of an institution to make competent professional judgements, the manifestation of racial attitudes and individual prejudices.

The report of the subcommittee that came before the Academic Affairs Committee was, in my view as a member of the AAC, extremely inadequate. It is a confidential report so I cannot divulge its contents here; suffice it to say that in many crucial places where it should have been definitive, it was extremely vague — phrases such as "it seems that" or "it appears that" are used much too frequently for any one to depend heavily on it to make decisions in what is a very complex case.

It is the contention of the Committee Against Racism that Mr. Fong's fate was decided against a backdrop of racism in the Medical School. This the school disputes. Even if racial factors were not involved — and the Medical School's evidence does not satisfactorily discount this — a serious question arises as to why Mr. Fong should have been expelled one month short of graduation instead of being failed if — as the school argues — he was incompetent.

Student says no to NUS

To The Editor:
The National Union of Students is a political organization which is attempting to solicit funds from students. This reader feels that a student should not be required to join a union or any political organization in order to attend university. If the N.U.S. proposal is carried in the referendum, a student will be forbidden to study at the University of Toronto unless he or she first joins the National Union of Students and pays compulsory union dues. For this reason, the N.U.S. proposal on March 10, 11, should be defeated.

Non-smoker peeved at response

To The Editor:
Yesterday, I, a non-smoker, asked a professor in charge of a class of approximately 30 people jammed into a small room to enforce the ban on smoking. It didn't take much to have him agree, but I got the nastiest looks and a small amount of verbal abuse from those inside the class. This was totally unfair.

Most non-smokers don't hate smokers, but find no reason why we should be subjected to the fumes. It's not the smokers, it's the smoke.

DEBATES ROOM

HONOURARY VISITOR:
ROSEMARY BROWN

Resolved that: Canada should encourage the presence of foreign students in post-secondary institutions.

all spectators welcome

Vote "yes" for NUS March 10, 11

Concurrent with this year's SAC presidential elections, U of T students will be asked to vote on continued membership in the National Union of Students-Union Nationale des Etudiants (NUS-UNE) at a fee of one dollar per student per year. Lamentably, students not directly involved with NUS-UNE know very little about the organization.

While NUS-UNE is a young national student organization, it is not without predecessors. In 1926 a national student federation was formed which, under several names, survived to 1969, when increasing friction between the national executive and on-campus student leaders forced an end to activities. Student leaders meeting after this collapse quickly defused any attempts at forming a new federation, because they believed that the structural problems, which were the demise of the former union (known as CUS — the Canadian Union of Students), remained too formidable to bother overcoming. In 1972, however, it became apparent that an organization with a national mandate was required, formed the National Union of Students.

When NUS was founded, it (or perhaps its founders) made two serious errors. They overestimated their initial support and they set the membership fee — 30 cents per student — too low. The result of these errors is that for the last 4 years NUS has been greatly concerned with fighting for its financial life rather than devoting all its time to pursuing its goals or dealing with national issues. As a result, few students are aware of NUS's existence, let alone its goals, structure, or history. NUS's staff of 4 simply cannot inform all students in the nation or make the kind of impression on government that the Manufacturers Association or the CMA can.

The NUS referendum at U of T is one of 16 being held across Canada this school year. They represent the rectification of the two errors previously mentioned since some are being held at institutions wishing to become new members and others (such as the one at U of T) being held at member institutions, where students are being asked to pay the new levy of $1.00 per student. University of Toronto undergraduates have been members of NUS since its inception but have never voted to join, since SAC has transferred 30 cents of its own fee (per student) directly to NUS. Since SAC cannot absorb $1.00 per student, passing the referendum will mean the addition of $1.00 to the student financial fee.

To illustrate the importance of a national student organization I will briefly outline one of the most important issues currently facing NUS and all Canadian universities. The Fiscal Arrangements Act — 1967 (F.A.A.) is currently being renegotiated. The F.A.A. and its companion statute the Tax Collection agreement provide the machinery whereby the federal government collects personal and corporate income taxes (which is constitutionally the provinces responsibility) and rebates them with adjustments for regional disparity and other considerations, to the provinces. Of interest to university communities is the guarantee to the provinces that 50 per cent of the operating budgets of secondary institutions in the provinces will be picked up by the federal government. The other half is put up by the province (grants) and the students (tuition fees). The agreement is administered in such a way that the federal government matches each dollar raised through provincial sources. Since tuition fees are the major provincial source it is profitable for the provincial government to raise tuition fees thereby increasing the amount of money granted by the federal government. Another problem is the clause preventing the federal government from increasing the amount granted beyond 15 per cent. This translates to a similar provincial ceiling. In times of runaway inflation combined with the growth of universities as we have experienced in the last few years, an increase in spending of 15 per cent represents a cut in the per student operating budget of the university. Yet because of federal policy, provinces simply cannot increase spending over 15 per cent. In Ontario we are now facing the consequences of this failure to keep pace with inflation, class sizes grow, equipment goes unrepaired and the quality of education diminishes.

Only a national student organization can deal with these problems, lobby the federal government, present a student point of view and, if necessary, organize students to fight for what we know to be correct. Such actions are just as important as our actions directed at the provincial government. Vote yes for the National Union of Students, March 10 and 11.

Guatemalan Report

Photos & Story

By BRENDA WEBSTER

An earthquake — one of the worst natural disasters of the century — struck Guatemala on February 4th, 1976. Never in the history of Guatemala has an earthquake caused so many deaths, now rising above 22,000. Amongst those killed, only one was Canadian, but many others were injured, mentally as well as physically. For all those who survived this horrifying experience, there is a hard road of reconstruction ahead, but the Guatemalans are driving forward at a surprisingly rapid rate; because of the optimism and devotion of the people, the future looks bright.

On February 21, I was invited to join a group of Canadian delegates who were to survey the destruction in various areas of Chimaltenango, 30 miles northwest of Guatemala City. We distributed truckloads of milk, blankets, and wheelbarrows donated by the Canadian government.

On our way the trucks had to wind their way over piles of rubble. One was especially high. We were informed later it contained a busload of people who had been buried alive.

Entering the first town to be aided, we found the road blocked by a fire. The drivers could not veer around it, and one of the drivers climbed out to see what the problem was. As we waited, a pregnant woman's corpse was thrown on top of the pyre. To add to the ghastly scene, her belly was slashed open and gasoline was poured onto it. She had been thrown onto a pile of burning bodies by a voluntary fireman of the town, who, may have had to throw a friend or relative onto the mound.

No one was standing watching. The men were working the fields, the women were at home throwing out the rubble brick by brick. Even the children were helping with the daily chores of washing and cooking in the rubble of their devastated homes.

Once we had passed the fire we were in the central square and began to unload food, shelter and tools. Children ran to help, and more followed when it was announced that each child who aided would be given a can of juice. Nearby, in the townhall, a meeting was in session, to decide how the donations should be distributed. We were all astounded at how democratic the proceedings were; everyone could come and go as they pleased and they were all given a fair and equal opportunity to speak.

As soon as it was established who had donated the supplies the townspeople began to talk of two Canadians who had been in their area. One, a Chippewa chief; the other a young 19-year-old French-Canadian named Yves L'Heureux.

The Chippewa had come to their town as a guest of the Guatemalan Indians. He had spent a month with them, teaching them his culture.

The Guatemalan 'cacique' said that he was amazed by the North American Indian's knowledge of medicine and the ancient traditions, and how similar they were to his own. What impressed him the most, however, was the fact that this Canadian Indian "could tell the future."

He related how the Chippewa came to his host on February 2nd and said, "I must go now," for no apparent reason. The following morning he left, and at 3 a.m., February 4th his bed was covered with rubble.

Yves L'Heureux, however, was not so lucky. He was from St. Jerome, Quebec, and had been travelling with a childhood friend through Central and South America. Originally planning to go to Columbia with his friend two days before the earthquake struck, he decided to stay on in Chimaltenango because he was fascinated by the town, its people, and their culture. He is the only Canadian known to have died.

More than 22 thousand are dead. Many more thousands are injured, starving, and freezing (in the highlands the temperature frequently drops below zero at night). Although aid is being sent in from all over the world, and especially from less affected Guatemalans, the death toll is rising daily. For the most part the people must help themselves.

The Guatemalans are not disorganized and disconsolate. They are for the most part happy to be alive and working hard to reconstruct.

Visiting specialists who have brought relief to other countries during disasters are astounded by the quick recovery these people are making.

The earthquake was devastating; the need for aid is still acute; but the time for mourning is past.

The relief crews arrive at dawn with supplies.

Rats, Rent

These days the eternal battle between the tenant more and more often. You

By ERIC McMILLAN

Seventy-five per cent of students living in residence at U of T are entitled to rebates of part of their residence fees, according to the Director of Administrative Services.

Alec Malcolm revealed yesterday the university is "over the 8 per cent guidelines in some of its residences" and is "prepared to rollback fees." Some students claim they have already been notified they qualify for rebates.

A New College resident was told she has 13 dollars coming to her and an Innis student expects around 30 dollars.

Although some charges for room and board are up as much as 20 per cent this year, the rebates are fairly low because the university is refunding the excess fees on only the "lodging component" said Malcolm. This does not include meals but does include maid service and cleaning in his opinion.

So far no student has applied for a justification of the 8 per cent increase remaining after the rebates, but "we'd be quite prepared to justify it" said Malcolm.

Two students at Ryerson's Neill-Wyck House have been reported to be seeking reviews of the rent increases there. Malcolm said students at U of T would be "out of their minds" to do the same here when the university is already offering a rebate.

Residences expected to receive the rebates include New College, Innis, Devonshire, Sir Dan, and Whitney Hall.

Last week Ruth Raziel, Senior Information Officer at the nearest rent review office, told us the rent guidelines "probably" include room and board in university residences in cases where the two were not separated for payment. "Rent is rent and includes everything," she said.

Fighting Weston

By KEN WYMAN

Having $10,000 in the bank has made Garfield Weston's tenants a little surfer of winning their long battle to keep their houses.

Well, the money's not exactly in the bank, but the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) have committed themselves to paying the salary for a community organizer for six months; picking up the tab to have architects survey the houses and estimate the cost for the necessary renovations, and a little more to help set up a co-op housing foundation, with the help of the Metro Toronto Labour Council.

But Canada Trust, which is administering the bloc of houses on Sullivan, Beverley, Phoebé, and Huron Streets, will not leave well enough alone.

They have prepared a new lease for each tenant that permits the landlord to evict on a month's notice, if the city orders more than a thousand dollars of repairs on the house.

According to the tenants, the buildings have been so badly neglected for so long, that very few houses require less than a thousand dollars worth of patching.

Canada Trust insists that it merely wants to make the repairs properly, all at once, so that it is not "nickel and dimed to death".

The tenants, mostly young single people living in co-ops and communes, are also concerned about the fate of the old RCMP building on their block. They are relieved not to have Canada's finest for neighbours any more — although they say that the neighbourhood was remarkably free of dope busts while the police were there.

But they worry about URBEX, a federal government programme to have vacant government buildings to develop joint projects with private investors on vacant government buildings. Plans for the site were drawn up over two years ago, and the prospect of redevelopment still haunts them. URBEX has been renamed recently, but the programme still continues.

So the tenants have been organizing. For the last five years, meetings have been held every time mass eviction seemed imminent. But when the danger passed, so did the community spirit.

Recently things have improved. Twenty or so of the 200 or more tenants on the block have been meeting regularly.

They've put out a newsletter, with articles in it about Weston and his conglomerate, pointing out that not only is their landlord a Canadian giant, he has ties with South Africa, where he runs the 6th largest corporation in the country, and in Rhodesia, where he publicly flaunts the embargo on trade, according to the newsletter.

And now, thanks to the CMHC's $10,000, they may be on the way to starting a co-op and buying their own houses. Some of their members think this might be a poor move. The buildings have been neglected so badly by Canada Trust and Weston that they'd be very expensive to repair. How expensive, their architects will tell them in the near future.

Alternately, they may decide to put pressure on the city to buy and renovate the houses for them as low cost public housing.

But with a little luck, and a lot of help from their friends, they may be on their way to a hard won victory.

Pity th

may be one of the winners.

University residences and co-ops come under the rent review legislation because they are not excluded under article 14 (1)(a) of the Rent Review Act which rules out non-profit housing with "rents which are subject to the approval of the Government" and "non-profit co-operative housing" as defined by the National Housing Act.

University administrator Malcolm complained about the difficulty of untangling the rent review legislation. "There must be a lot of agonizing going on around the province," he said.

Two forms must be filled out in triplicate for each of the 1,200 to 1,300 U of T students entitled to a rebate.

"I don't think residences should come under the rent review act," he said. "I hope there's a reasonable chance next year residences will be excluded."

Malcolm and Raziel seemed to disagree on whether or not the university must post notice of its ownership on residence walls. Malcolm claimed "It's been tested in at least one case that university residences do not fall under the Landlord and Tenant Act" which requires the posting.

Raziel on the other hand interprets the act to "apply to the university as much as to others."

To clarify the matter, let it be known the landlord on campus covers behind the name of "Governing Council".

Rent Reviewer Ruth Raziel advised students to apply for rent review in cases where they aren't sure whether or not the guidelines apply to them. She also noted the Act disallows anyone subletting for more than the rent specified in the original tenancy agreement.

Rent Review and You

By ERIC McMILLAN

So you've missed the deadline for appealing last year's whopping big rent hike — Sunday was the last date Ontario rent review offices accepted applications for reviewing rents increased between July 30 and December 31 of last year.

All is not lost.

If your landlord did not apply for permission to charge higher rent for that period you are entitled to a rebate for everything paid in excess of 8 per cent more than the rent charged prior to August 1, 1975.

And, you can still demand a review of rent increased by any amount since January 1 this year.

The procedure is not simple:

1. The landlord must inform the tenant in writing of any rent increase at least 90 days before it takes effect. If the increase is over 8 per cent he must apply within 60 days to the rent review office for a hearing.
2. Once informed of the jump, the tenant has 60 days in which to dispute the increase, whatever the amount. He must pick up a government form and submit it to the landlord.
3. The landlord then has 15 days to decide whether to accommodate the tenant or apply to the rent review office for a chance to justify the increase.
4. If 15 days passes without action on the landlord's part the tenant can have the increase nullified.

5. The next bureaucratic step is the setting of a date for the hearing if either the tenant or landlord has applied for a review. The rent review office tries to schedule the hearing at a location handy to both parties, at a sick person's bedside if necessary.

6. At the hearing the onus is on the landlord to prove the increase is warranted by operating expenses. The tenant wins by default but can also argue his case.

7. The rent review officer makes the final decision to raise, lower, or retain the proposed rent increase.

8. The next step is the application by the tenant or landlord to appeal the decision of the officer to the rent review board. Again the board can set the rent at whatever it decides is justified. After this, the landlord can be fined for not following the board's orders and the tenant is liable to be evicted for not paying the rent as established.

A tenant can be excused for feeling it's easier just to pay up after ploughing through the Rent Review Act and the Landlord and Tenant Act. The legislative verbiage has given rise to a number of misconceptions concerning rent review:

A lease is not necessary for action by the tenant. The "tenancy agreement" referred to may be written, verbal, or implied.

Tenants can dispute any rent increase whether or not it is over the "guidelines" of 8 per cent.

Fees for the use of facilities such as swimming pool, sauna, and parking come under the guidelines as well, if they were included in previous rents.

Rents are tied to the dwelling. If you move into a new apartment the landlord must inform you of the amount the previous tenant paid. If you suspect his figures, you can take the review route.

Signing a lease with a rent increase included does not constitute an agreement not to ask for a rent review. Furthermore, you are justified in withholding rent in excess of an 8 per cent hike, provided it hasn't been approved by the rent review office.

Ruth Raziel, Senior Information Officer at the Rent Review Office.

The Downtrodden Landlord

Please open your hearts and your purses,
To a man who is misunderstood;
He gets all the kicks and the curses,
Tho' he wishes you nothing but good,
He wistfully begs you to show him —
You think he's a friend not a louse,
'So remember the debt that you owe him,
The landlord who rents you his house.

CHORUS
So pity the downtrodden landlord,
'And his back that is burdened and bent,
Respect his grey hairs,
Don't ask for repairs,
And don't be behind with the rent.

When thunder clouds gather and darken,
You can sleep undisturbed in your bed;
But the landlord must sit up and hearken,
And shiver and wonder and dread;
If you're killed then you die in a hurry,
And you never will know your bad luck;
But the landlord is shaking with worry —
'Has one of my houses been struck?'

Reformers headed for large rally

By MIKE EDWARDS

The Movement for Municipal Reform (MMR) which had a shaky beginning following the 1974 municipal elections has taken up the issue of transit increases and are actively campaigning to have the fares reduced.

They will start their campaign with a demonstration at the opening of parliament next Tuesday at Queen's Park.

According to MMR, "This is just the first step to fighting the cutbacks." It is fully behind other groups who are also planning actions to educate people about the seriousness of cutbacks.

The MMR believes that the social service cutbacks is a direct attack on the working poor and not a program of general restraint.

The group has collected over 10,000 signatures protesting the fare increase. Although several spokesmen for MMR have stated that TTC was incorrect in announcing the increase, they have singled out the Ontario government as the source of the problem.

The Ontario government, has cut funding to cities by five per cent. The TTC was expecting a boost in funding and Metro chairman Paul Godfrey had promised concerned aldermen that the federal government had promised some relief. Since none of these promises materialized, according to the MMR, the TTC was forced to increase the fares.

MMR was aware that transit fares were to increase on February 1, and tried to block the increase in council. However, the increase was announced February 20 and implemented on the 22. Many travellers, and even the MMR were caught by surprise.

The group insists that it is not a political party, but more a federation of groups and individuals.

They hope to build on-going citizens organizations in each ward in preparation for the December 1976 elections.

The fight for a fare decrease appears to be a shot in the arm for the organization.

The Coalition Against Cutbacks, a parallel organization, has the endorsement of MMR for their rally on March 11 at Convocation Hall. The Ontario Federation of Students has also endorsed this rally and are sending a key speaker.

Meanwhile, both groups are gearing up for a mass rally and demonstration on April 3. This is the approximate date for tabling of the Ontario budget which would finalize the projected cuts in social spending.

"We must make people realize that there are alternatives to the provincial cutbacks . . . the tax structure should tax those able to pay . . ." says MMR. "The choice is not between increased regressive taxes such as sales, property and income taxes, or cuts in essential programs. The province can tax corporations to raise the necessary money to cover their $2 billion deficit this year."

MMR is headed for a repeat of this type of 1974 anti-cutbacks rally.

Pinball, not a game but a challenge

The Varsity — Brian Pei

Interest mounts in pinball. The freak here is not just another pretty face but an accomplished flipper.

By JONATHAN GROSS
 and BILL BOLTON

If George Orwell could only see this scene, man pitted against machine in a race with fate. The real challenge comes in the strong desire to beat the brainless machine and conquer all the odds.

Games of chance have been around for a long time, mostly south of the border, but they are definitely a new addition to the racing car and shooting galleries of the arcades of this city. Not to mention the bars that have equipped themselves with pong machines for the enthusiastic player. Doug McLean of Scarborough drivels away $10 a week on pinball, pong and air hockey, but to him it's not a waste of money.

The interest in pinball is so high that a pinball newsletter is published every four months, surveying all existing machines and listing the current record and record holder for all of them.

While a majority of people enjoy pinball, there is another breed of enthusiast who likes to sit in front of a television screen watching a moving text pattern.

Computerized pong or TV tennis, as it is frequently called, was pioneered by Atari of California. The game is less noisy than pinball, but better for competitive play, with the combatants knocking a video "puck" back and forth with vertically adjustable paddles.

The variations on this concept are endless, but Atari and other companies manufacturing the machines have done their best to exploit all the possibilities. There are some who feel ping pong is a better sport than pinball.

"Pong is a man's game," says high school student, Steven Wise, "there's more skill involved because you are playing directly with someone else. In this way, the machine is not a factor in winning or losing." Wise developed this $5 a week habit on ping pong during the metro secondary school teacher's strike.

The game has found its way into many bars around the city, including the Jarvis House, The Mad Mechanic and a new disco and after-hours club called Parbo's.

Richard Floody, General Manager of the Jarvis House says computerized ping pong is far superior to any other video game.

"A pub is a place where people should be able to do more than just drink. We give them things to keep themselves entertained." Shuffleboard, pool and ping pong are available to club patrons, "but," says Floody, "shuffleboard and pool are generally played in the afternoon when the live entertainment hasn't started yet." And of course everyone's making money as more club and arcade owners begin stocking their places. One night manager of a downtown arcade says his 98 machines gross over $1,400 on a Saturday night. That's a lot of spent quarters.

The price of pinball machines ranges from $700 used to $1,800 new. Bringing the machines into Canada jacks the duty tax up, since the three major manufacturers of the machines, Gottlieb, Bally and Williams are all based in the United States. Atari of California sells ping pong machines for about $900. Magnavox and other makers of television sets for the home have taken the cue and made various home versions of ping pong which can be attached to the antenna jacks of the TV set. The makeshift game is more affordable than the machine and the players are able to use remote control while sitting on their living room couch.

University student, Larry Rotstein spends every lunch hour behind a game of chance. "I hate it because it's there and I have to beat it," Rotstein may indeed be an addict.

Pinball machines are games of chance or games of skill, depending on which side of the law you may be on. The police say that only their modified games (bumpers don't and neither do flippers and the machine zoids if you look at it) are lawful games of chance. The pinball freaks take the perspective of cause and effect, effect and counter effect. Everything is controllable at any time. It's unfortunate that you need $200 worth of practice.

One University of Toronto professor says pinball may have the same psychological effect as the "Skinner Box." Developed by B. F. Skinner, author of Walden Two, the box is used for rats who, while pressing on a bar, may or may not find a reward of water or food. The number of times the rat will press the bar and the sequence of rewards has been an overwhelming pastime of psychologists. But few have studied pinball. "With the right schedule of reward," says the professor, "people will feel compelled to put in quarters."

Of course, a pinball mystique has mushroomed around these machines. Descriptive jargon such as greek shot (up the roll-overs) down-the-tubes (lost on the side), rinsky korsakoff (rolling around a hole and out the middle), lazarus (born again) and dead porpoise (falling off the flipper) may mean little to an uninitiated spectator. But to a pinball freak, they are the language of the game.

Our own Innis College with four machines is quite the hide-out for pinball players. With a number of confirmed addicts, running the college pinball terminology applied to other situations. Tilt (foul play), push-the-button (start again) and panic-flipping (over-reacting) are commonplace.

Some think pinball is political and plan to connect it to the class struggle.

As the interest in games of chance boom, there may be some prompting for competitions to ascertain the best player in the city, the country or dare we say, the world?

You'll see how we save you money.

HOW MANY SURVIVED?

Before the recent earthquake in Guatemala, World University Service of Canada was raising funds on Canadian campuses to support community development organizations and projects in the barrios of Guatemala City. These communities bore the brunt of the earthquake damage.

They are now in great need of funds for reconstruction. WUSC is asking you to help these grass-roots organizations of the poorest citizens of Guatemala City to undertake projects for the reconstruction of their communities. All the funds collected will go towards the fulfillment of projects determined by their needs and priorities. Please give generously. The people of the barrios will be counting on you.

Eerie upsets in puck playoffs

JONATHAN GROSS

David Bowie is completing a film entitled "The Man who fell to Earth". Judging by the playoff action Monday night we could produce a feature length film called "The Team that fell to the Ice". Would you believe a remake of "Face Off"?

No matter which way you would edit it it is all over for Vic, UC, and, dig this, the Jocks. Last year's Jennings Cup champs were downed by Erindale 2-1 in overtime. Nat Findlay, who managed to look gracious in defeat despite the fact that he and a few teammates were seen in the interfac office checking the Erindale game sheets for ineligible players, claimed that he was not unhappy with the game itself.

"It was straight hockey that featured lots of skating and action at both ends. What we would like to see is a different playoff setup. The present sudden death first round creates the possibility that the best teams will not be in the finals."

The point is well taken Mr. Findlay, especially when one considers the plight of the Phys Ed A team who bowed out of league competition with a 3-2 loss at the hands of, now here's the shocker, Meds.

Mark Ackley, recently drafted by the Edmonton Eskimos of the CFL, complained that the Jocks had problems with attendance all season despite the fact that the team still finished a strong second the Skule. John Bays, a recent addition to the Blues, was not eligible and three more defencemen were out with assorted ailments to add to the dilemma.

Scoring for the MD squad were Boyd, McGowan and Graham. Klimans sparkled in the nets. Brian Walters and Turner countered for the losers.

UC has been the surprise team of the year. Last year they couldn't do anything but show up and that was difficult. This year however, they made a go of it and made the playoffs, aided by a collapse of last year's finalists, namely Dents.

Monday night they made their mothers proud by taking Sr. Engineering into double overtime before losing 1-0. Scoring for Skule was Deluce. Too bad there isn't more we could say except that UC will definitely be around next year and it's good to see Skule still around. They have put together a super team that will certainly challenge favored Scarborough, who at this writing, had still not collided with St. Mike's and their fight machine.

Intermediate action is always a welcome relief from the 'rps'. Yesterday the Rabble bid a fond farewell to their hockey equipment, losing a matinee to Chem Eng W 2-1. Steve Godfrey, who sheepishly admitted to being a friend of Innis defenceman Skip Rabkin, conceded that his team lost to a squad consisting of only seven skaters. This quality vs quantity situation conjures up all kinds of great quotes from the Bible Fletcher, Hegel and whatever or whoever but we won't bother.

Two Varsity wrestlers placed 2nd in the OUA A wrestling championships Feb. 20-21, qualifying them for the OUA A (B) Conference team: Sam Turchiaro at 118 lbs. and Rob Moore at 134 lbs. Toronto was ranked 5th behind Guelph, Western, Waterloo and Windsor.

This past weekend saw these two Toronto grapplers pushed to their limit in the CIAU Championships held in Thunder Bay. Turchiaro's dynamic throws and highly polished tils earned him a 3rd as he pinned opponents from the Western and Atlantic Conferences. However, Sam lost to his opponents from the OUA A (A) and Great Plains Conferences.

Moore's performance can only be described as foxy as he trounced his opponents from every conference but the West as he was stopped by a 5-4 decision at the hands of Russ Pawlyk of the Canada West Conference giving him a second place in the CIAU finals.

Final CIAU Conference standings were: OUA A (A) 45, CWUAA 33, OUA A (B) 24, GPAC 22, AIAA 5.

177-T. Bethune (Guelph), 190-M. Kappel (Guelph), 220-G. Richey (UBC), HWT-K. Raymond (UBC).

This weekend Toronto wrestlers will compete in the junior and senior provincial championships in London and Waterloo respectively. Winners will qualify for the national championships in Montreal on March 12-14.

The Varsity — Bob White

Swimmers seek win in Waterloo

By DON WARNER

Tomorrow night marks the start of the 12th annual Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (C.I.A.U.) swimming championships to be held at U. of Waterloo.

The Varsity swim team will be seeking to capture their fourth consecutive C.I.A.U. sports, no team has dominated a particular sport to the extent that the U. of T. team has in swimming.

The great success of Varsity is a tribute to former coach Juri Daniel (1964-68), and his successor Robin Campbell, who has been at the helm since 1969. Their outstanding coaching techniques have been instrumental in attracting proven swimming stars such as Jim Shaw and Byron Macdonald, for example, to the Toronto team over the last decade.

Far more important however, has been their ability to develop fully the talents of swimmers of previously unknown quality and turn many of them into outstanding swimmers within the short span of 2-3 years. Bob Heatley, Jim Adams and Mike Hibberd to mention only a few, had never been heard of in swimming circles, prior to attending U. of T.

The coaching feat is all the more impressive when one considers the inadequacy of the antiquated Hart House facilities.

Coach Campbell's main job right now is to keep his team motivated after their surprisingly easy victory over Western in the O.U.A.A. championships two weeks ago. After Western's dual meet victory over Varsity in January, it was felt by many that the Blues would be very hard-pressed to retain either its O.U.A.A. or C.I.A.U. crowns.

However, championship meets are a different thing entirely from a dual meet. Whereas a dual meet counts only the top three places, in the championships the top twelve places count for team points, based on a 16, 13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 7, 5, 4, 3, 2, 1 scoring system for individual events. For all relay events, the points are doubled, which would mean that the winner receives 32 points for their team.

The championship meets are also different in that there are heats swum in the morning, with the finals at night.

Although disqualifications are not common, they do occur sometimes.

The most common type of disqualification is known as the false start. In individual events, a swimmer is allowed only one false start, while in relay events, one person can get the entire relay team disqualified by entering the water before the previous swimmer has touched the wall.

In the Breast and Butterfly events, swimmers must touch the wall with both hands simultaneously on each turn, while backstrokers must remain on their back while performing the turn.

Toronto breaststroker John Watt who has been D.Q.'d once this year for sloppy turns, nearly suffered the same fate at the O.U.A.A.'s, when he almost took a second underwater arm stroke before his head had surfaced.

The Blues cannot afford any mental errors such as these this weekend if they are to win another title.

Though Toronto has qualified more swimmers (16) for the meet than any other university, this by itself does not ensure a victory. The 1969 Toronto team, which had only 8 swimmers qualify, has proven that a small but highly talented squad, can capture a C.I.A.U. title.

The biggest threats to Varsity at this point appear to be Alberta, led by Derek Cairns, John Starratt and Butch Skulsky, and Western. Though Western lost badly in the O.U.A.A.'s, it will be remembered that most of the UWU team did not shave down for that meet. The Western challenge may well be much stronger this weekend.

For Varsity, big things are expected from Rick Madge, Juri Daniel, Shawn Laari, Mike Hibberd, Dave Wilkin, Greg Vanular and Bill Woolley in particular. They have all experienced C.I.A.U. and/or national competition before.

The very high quality of swimmers from other provinces, suggests that many Toronto swimmers are going to have their work cut out just to make the top twelve this weekend.

Any spectators interested in seeing the top college swimmers from across Canada, should keep in mind that the meet is only an hour's drive away in Waterloo. Events begin Thursday night, and run all day Friday and Saturday. As an added attraction, Ron Mittermaier will be there too.

Former Marlies are looking forward to Tonight's homecoming

By MEL RASKIN

Blues fans are in for a special treat to-night at Varsity Arena, as the Blues host the Toronto Marlboros of the OHA Major Junior 'A' league, in a special exhibition game, getting underway at 8 p.m.

"It's a long time between the Ontario finals, and the Canadians," explained coach Tom Watt, "and while we do practice every day, you need a game to fill that long gap and keep the reflexes sharp. I approached the Toronto Marlboros, and although they're in the midst of their own league schedule, they were very kind in consenting to play us."

George Armstrong is the coach of the Marlboros and the former Maple Leaf is taking a rather casual view of the contest. "We have a week off and this game is better than a practice." Hopefully his players will take a more competitive look at the game.

Winger Ron Harris played for the Marlies after the end of the college hockey season last year. Although he only played with them for 2½ weeks, he discussed his impressions of the Marlies prior to a Blues practice last week.

"The Marlies last year were an offense-oriented team. I'm basically a more defensive oriented player. Although I was used on penalty killing, and I did receive regular ice time, my defensive style of play didn't fit in with the Marlies more offensive approach to the game. They're a strong skating club, with a lot of really talented individual players. I think that our team, in contrast to the Marlies, stresses a system of play. Everyone has a definite role as part of that system. I think we're a good forechecking team, and this should help us against a skating club like the Marlies."

I asked Ron to compare the Marlies with the Blues. "That's really difficult," he replied. "For the most part, players on Junior 'A' squads are younger than the players on college teams. I think that the college players are stronger, but then again, they're older. On the other hand, we're students first, and there are therefore limits on the amount of time we can actually devote to hockey. Most of those who play Junior 'A' are serious about moving up to pro hockey, and they can devote more time and attention to their game. Just look at their schedule. They play far more games than we do."

Blues winger Graham Wise, played for the Marlies during the 1969-70 season. He feels that the Marlies are a solid team, and like Harris, agrees that the major difference between the Blues and the Marlies, is that the Blues stress a system, whereas the play of most Junior squads is more individualized.

"But they've got a lot of great individuals, and don't forget, they're out to impress the pro scouts who are always out in force for the Junior 'A' games, particularly the Marlie games."

On that point, Graham Wise certainly seems correct. According to this year's edition of the Ontario Hockey Association Major Junior 'A' guide, the Marlies led the entire OHA in placing more players in both the NHL and the WHA than any other team with 56 former Marlies now in pro competition.

The Marlies have really risen in the standings since Christmas," Wise added. "They're really drawing well also. I think our game will be a close scoring one; it will be exciting for the fans."

Blues trainer Mike Gisborne, who with the Blues has travelled throughout Canada, is looking forward to the game. He feels that the Varsity powerplay is quite effective, and should stymie the Marlie defenders. (Let's hope the Blues power play is more effective against the Marlies than it was against Guelph).

Dave Rooke, who is out for the rest of the season with torn ligaments in his right leg, is in the enviable position of having the Marlies play for his education. The deal was that if he signed a card they would be obligated to him. Ironically the spot he secured on the team was there only because Wise had left to go to Michigan Tech.

Dave will be viewing the game from the stands but he has some strong ideas about the game and the two leagues. "In the Juniors the scouts look for the big scorer and consequently these are the type of players the league attracts. The colleges feature a more balanced game so players like Ron (Harris) are more successful. With our defense hurting the way it is we could be in trouble against the Marlies' offense."

Besides Rooke's calamity, there are also injuries to Rocci Pagnello and Allstar Charlie Hughes, both of whom are on the shelf with shoulder separations. They should be around for the Canadian Championships.

Larry Hopkins, a former member of the Oshawa Generals, feels it is assumed that by the time a player reaches Junior 'A', he has acquired all the basic skills. Hopkins feels though, that this is not always the case. In the college ranks, he notes, skills are stressed, and a system of play is developed.

It should definitely be an exciting game. Marlies have some terrific players who are destined to make the pros, and the Blues are looking forward to the game in order to stay sharp for the Canadian University Finals. Admission for this exhibition game is just $1.00, and it includes an hour's free skating after the game. See you there.

BLUE WAILES... Blues have Skuler Kent Kryklywi skating with them. Al Potts is experiencing bursitis but he's scheduled to compete—Ed.

SAC candidates to be disqualified ?

All four SAC presidential candidates will be disqualified soon for violation of a recent SAC motion forbidding non-student participation in their election campaigns.

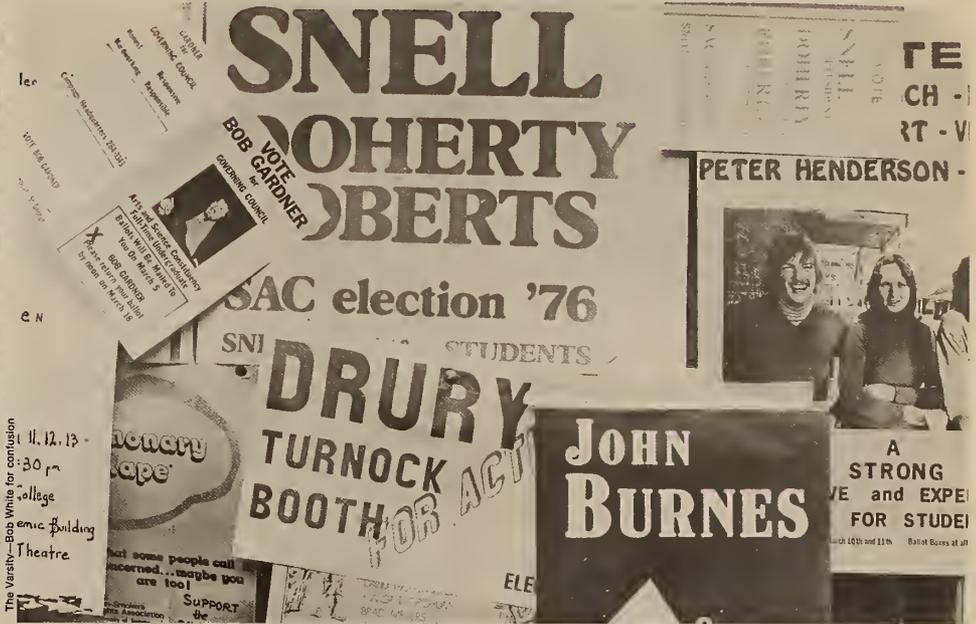

The four candidates employed the services of Central Printing Co. on Queen St. for production of their campaign posters. People unable to vote in the current election worked on the posters.

The recent motion stated that "No presidential slate or candidate thereof may employ, on a paid or unpaid basis, any campaign worker who is ineligible for any reason to vote in the current SAC presidential election."

As well, certain candidates can be disqualified for allowing graphic artists who are not students to produce work for campaign material and for allowing non-students to poster the campus. There are also unconfirmed rumors that some candidates will exceed the campaign spending budget of $400.

The SAC motion has forced withdrawal of some non-student services, most noticeably the resignation of U of T graduate Brian Nasimok as campaign manager for Innis SAC rep Bill Drury. Nasimok called the motion "silly" and complained that it seemed to be aimed only at Drury's campaign.

SAC Vice-President (Elections) Sa'ad Sa'idullah admitted "off the record" last week that the motion was both poorly worded and unenforceable.

Where will all these expensive election posters go after SAC candidates are disqualified?

TYP plagued by serious problems

By PAUL McGRATH

The Transitional Year Program (TYP), instituted to give economically and educationally disadvantaged students a shot at university education, is proud of its successes but plagued with problems, according to a recent review of the program.

The second triennial review, made public in mid-February, commits and that the program, "while seeming to consolidate its academic successes, faces some serious problems."

The independent assessors outlined the major sources of friction within the program which include charges of programme "irrelevance" by white students, conflicts between university and outside community representatives on the programme's Policy Committee, and feelings of mistrust between programme staff members and the Policy Committee.

Among the successes, the review notes that the percentage of those students completing the transitional year who were later accepted into university studies rose from 52 per cent in 1972-73 to 60 per cent in 1974-75.

Students from the programme had difficulties in certain areas of study. In first-year French, Biology and Physics, because of a heavier reliance on tapes and slides as media of instruction, some of the performances were "disastrous". The assessors remarked that the students require a "highly-structured, teacher-centered course," such as Sociology, History or Politics.

Students had large problems with the science courses in the programme's core offerings, which prompted the assessors to suggest a two-year transitional programme for those seeking admission into a predominantly scientific course load.

Despite the problems, there was an 86 per cent "success rate" in the last three years. In 1973-74 the 13 students in the programme passed 90 per cent of their university courses after gaining admission.

Of the non-successful students, it was noted that Canadian-born students (white, black and native) accounted for "close to 100 per cent" of the drop-outs.

"Very few immigrants — be they West Indian, Oriental, African or European — drop out," the report says. The last three groups reported 100 per cent success rates of students gaining admission to university studies.

Among the problem areas in the programme the assessors identified a feeling among the white students, who are in a minority, that the programme was becoming increasingly irrelevant due to the heavy concentration on black studies.

This feeling, they said "may be mistaken, but is a sign of alienation and frustration." They added that these students faced a double problem of returning to school after a few years away and facing a course load geared towards third world studies.

The assessors recommended two courses of action; the first would be to supplement the core course offerings with "cultural seminars" which would amount to segregating the class in smaller tutorials; the second to expand the course offering to include a separate black studies course, instead of concentrating on these studies inside the two present offerings of English and Social Sciences.

Some administrative problems were brought to light. The assessors outlined a disagreement in 1974 between the university and community representatives on the Policy Committee which eventually led to the reconstitution of the committee with a community representative as the new director.

The assessors felt that the Policy Committee was working at a disadvantage due to suspicion of it by programme staff members.

"Many members of the Policy Committee," they said, "felt they could no longer continue to play a useful role because of the obvious mistrust of them by certain Programme staff members."

The programme's Evaluation Committee was taken to task for "seeing only inadequacies in some staff members and only perfection in others." The committee's heavy-handedness "made it more difficult for staff morale to improve."

The assessors also recommended 100 per cent cost subsidy for all the TYP students, with room and board allowance being given on a monthly basis on the condition of good academic performance. They also recommended pressuring the government for a higher per-student grant for the programme, which is presently funded at a smaller rate than normal Arts and Sciences education.

GAA to accept latest offer

By MIKE EDWARDS

Animosities between teaching assistants and their bosses, Simcoe Hall, may be lessened if GAA members ratify the latest contract offer next Tuesday.

At a meeting last night the union executive and the bargaining team recommended acceptance of the February 27 offer. Union members are not altogether happy with that offer but as bargaining committee member, Nancy Wallack said, "given the extreme reluctance of the university administration as an employer to improve its practices, it is with some satisfaction that we see some things won with this first contract."

Wallack's speech was well accepted by the crowd of 100 at Cody Hall, although some members wanted a chance to continue the fight a little longer.

The contract guarantees no more than ten hours of work in a week to TA's with a maximum of $2,100 for undergrads, $2,500 for MA students and $2,875 for PhD students.

The offer also gives an 8 per cent raise in September, 1976.

Union president Jay Drydyk is expecting a lot of work in the coming year concerning class size. He feels that since the union has an enforceable limit on working hours, working through grievance procedures they can establish working limits on class size too. "At last TA's have some rights," said Drydyk.

In an interview earlier, Drydyk said, "Next year will be important for further building of the union, solidifying our membership behind further contract demands for negotiations that will start in May 1977."

There will be ballot boxes on Monday and Tuesday in Roberts and in the Galbraith building. Members will be asked to sign union "check-off" cards at the ballot box. However they have until April 30 to do so.

There will be ballot boxes on an irregular basis at Erindale, McLennan labs, Med Sci and Aerospace. And, the executive says they will be glad to supply boxes if there are volunteers to watch over them.

Final counts will be available Tuesday night.

Members will also be voting on dues structures along with the actual contract offer which is reprinted in full in the latest issue of the Grad Post.

Topsy-turvy: another election

Confusion is rife at The Varsity office. Following Wednesday's election in which Features Editor Ken Wyman narrowly defeated reporter Eric McMillan for the position of Varsity Editor 1976-77, a series of problems arise.

According to The Varsity constitution a candidate is not official until she or he has been screened prior to the election by The Varsity Board. Wyman, without going through that legendary ordeal, declared himself a candidate one night prior to the election. Therefore his victory is unofficial.

The matter will be referred back to The Varsity Board at their next meeting, Monday, March 8. Both candidates are agreed on the desirability of another election next week, and will recommend the same to the Board.

All staff members are urged to stay tuned to this spot for further information. Given a go-ahead by the Board, the staff will again screen the candidates Wednesday, followed by balloting Thursday.

Academic Affairs muddies the grading waters at meeting

By ERIC McMILLAN

How many A's can dance on the head of a pin?

The Academic Affairs Committee pondered this problem as deeply last night that they had to put off further consideration of the new grade point system until the next meeting. It was either that or fall asleep.

The intellectual complexities unfolded around a grade conversion plan proposed by the Associate Dean of Arts and Science Robert Farquharson.

The grading scale would assign 4.3 points for an A-plus (90-100) at the top end and zero for an F (0-34).

It was suggested that such a system would bring U of T into line with American universities and give A-plus students a slight advantage over American students who can receive a grade point of 4.0 at most.

The consistency of this argument was attacked by Professor L. E. Doucette who also charged Arts and Science with having "atrophied" and "not evolved like a living organism" in its deliberations on grading policy.

This was hotly denied by Farquharson and committee chairman William Dunphy, both of whom praised the proposed scale's "simplicity and symmetry."

Student Rep Brad Nixon argued against recording percentages in the computer and converting them to letter grades for transcripts. He called the difference between 76 (B) and 77 (B-plus) "hair-splitting."

This led Dean B. Etkin of Applied Science and Engineering to draw an important distinction between the philosophical and operational bases of assigning grades.

Etkin and Farquharson had presented a united front of engineers and artsies in support of the separate recording of percentages and letter grades. United, that is, until Farquharson realized what Etkin meant by "weighting" averages to prevent "skewing".

Weighting would compensate for a low failure which could drag down an otherwise respectable average. Grade points for failures are compressed so that marks of 35 to 49 (F-plus) would receive 0.3 grade points while marks of 23 to 34 (F) would convert to zero grade points.

Chemist M. W. Lister's contribution to the debate was the observation that "the more scientific and mathematical disciplines" have no trouble assigning exact grades. Fifty per cent means a science student has assimilated one half of the course material, he explained with an air of detachment.

Grad rep Byron Wall confessed "I simply don't understand the thrust of almost all the discussion we've had." Nonetheless, he recovered to draw the pithy distinction between "significant and insignificant distinctions."

In the end the committee took a straw vote in favour of the Etkin-Farquharson grade conversion system, with Brad Nixon virtually alone in defending a simple letter and grade point system.

Disinterested observers graded the academic performances as follows:

Chairman Dunphy, 66(C) or 67 (C-plus) for hair-splitting.

Scientist Lister, precisely 50 per cent.

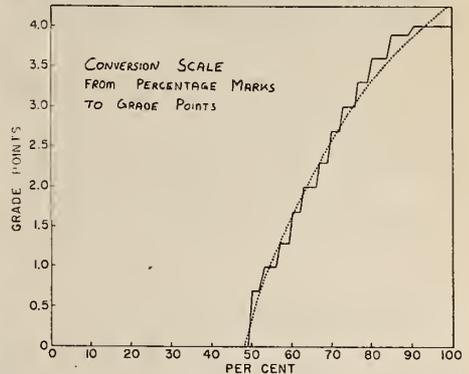

Doucette, for his biological criticism of Arts and Science, B-plus evolving into A-minus.

Farquharson, a big symmetrical zero.

Etkins, 92 (D-minus) for inconsistency.

Brad Nixon, 14 to 1.

Meanwhile, the new grade point system proceeds on probation.

Percentages here for a while yet

Those familiar but not so friendly percentage marks will be on our transcripts for a long while yet. The new-fangled and mysterious grade point marking system that has been rumoured for months won't appear until the 1976-77 session, and maybe not even then, according to Trinity registrar William Neelands.

All the gossip and debate stems from a push by several of the Arts and Science registrars who send themselves buried in a pile of marks and transcripts that grows taller and taller every year. In an effort to minimize paperwork and simplify decision making they want to convert the old method of grading to a new system based on a scale of zero to 4.3.

But the decision to convert probably won't be made before September.

The grade point scale avoids, or at least minimizes, some of the troubles associated with the old scale. For instance, a student who was late on a history essay might get a zero on his transcript. This would severely affect his year average.

In the sciences, a student rarely receives a mark below 40 even if he skips all his lectures. His final average isn't affected nearly as much as it would be if he were the history student.

The same problem occurs at the top end of the scale because A's stretch over 20 points, from 80 to 100, but B's and C's have only ten marks each.

This becomes of great importance, explained registrar Neelands, when students apply for law or medicine. "Mathematics is famous for giving lots of 90's, but only exceptional history students receive more than 85 per cent. A good mathematics student has an enormous advantage over his equal in history."

As the accompanying graphic shows, the equivalent of 60 per cent is about 1.5 and 51 per cent is 0.7. The whole range of 0 to 49 gets squashed to a range of only 0 to 0.3. The same sort of thing happens to the A's.

Letter grades can be used to solve this problem. They have the advantage of being familiar but they aren't perfect. They can't be stored on a computer or averaged without converting them to numbers of some sort and they still leave the question of deciding what an A means, or an F.

Neelands pointed out that the Arts and Science faculty office have tried converting students from percentage grades to the grade point system, as part of an experiment, and in 90 per cent of the cases there was no difference between the old standing and the new.

The students who were affected were the messy cases. Some were part-timers, others were on probation or under suspension. Most were on the pass-fail borderline.

Neelands claimed that the new system would be fairer on these students. "A lot of students are under suspension because they didn't understand the implications of the old rules. They are too confusing. Even some registrars can't understand them." He is sure that the grade point system will simplify the whole business.

Bill Denning and Ian Roxan, two student members of the Arts and Science faculty council, agree that students won't suffer if the grading system changes. However, neither of them see any particular advantages to the conversion.

Both point out that the percentage system has a great many disadvantages, especially for the borderline students and both agree that the new system will be easier to administer.

Erindale bus rides more expensive next year: Israel

By KRISTINE KING

The cutbacks crunch continues, this time hitting Erindale students who will face higher expenses next fall when they use the University bus service between the St. George and Erindale campuses. An increase in bus fares is inevitable according to Vice-Provost Milton Israel.

Erindale College and the university will in 1976-77 jointly subsidize the service to the tune of about $75,000. However, the amount is approximately the same as this year's budget and does not compensate for inflation. Hence, the increase.

The present fare on the bus service is 35 cents one-way for students and 50 cents for staff.

Israel was writing in reply to SAC Vice-president Sa'ad Sa'idullah who last September helped organize a petition to President Evans protesting last year's implementation of Erindale bus fares at 35 cents. Sa'idullah said last night that the bus service should be free because Erindale students are often forced to use services on the St.

George Campus.

Sa'idullah said that plans for an increase in the bus service are occurring in spite of the fact that Erindale College is the only section at the university which has received a net increase in its overall budget for next year. Erindale has been allotted an additional $128,000.

Sa'idullah said that when he came to the U of T in 1973 the bus service was free and that students were enticed to Erindale because it offered a small university atmosphere with the benefits that a larger institution affords. He added that Erindale library facilities are supplemented by the Robarts Library downtown and that Erindale students pay Hart House fees but it is also on the downtown campus. "We pay the fees but we can't use its services without travelling downtown," said Sa'idullah.

The university last year cancelled a bus service from Ixington subway station and students now wishing to reach the Erindale campus by TTC must use the Mississauga transit. The Mississauga fare is 30 cents and the ride, according to Sa'idullah, takes 45 minutes.

B.C. universities complacent on cutbacks

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

British Columbia universities are receiving cutbacks more favourably than students at U of T, according to B.C. Legislature backbencher Rosemary Brown.

Interviewed before a Hart House debate, Brown described western campuses as "much more conservative." As a result, students were more subdued in their opposition to spending reductions introduced in all areas of government.

Issues also are different, she said. Asked about foreign students, she replied: "It's not an issue at all. What is the issue are landed immigrants." Brown asserted that controversy over admissions has totally centered over new Canadians.

Cutbacks appear to be more severe in the province than in Ontario, Premier Bill Bennett has proposed the elimination of an entire university, which Brown's New Democratic Party has proposed for expansion. Claiming the Social Credit government "was never much concerned about education," she said University of British Columbia was probably going to be least affected, because a government politician teaches there.

Invited by SAC and the Hart House Debates Committee to be guest speaker, she attacked a wide range of government policy, both in her home province and on the federal level. Brown suggested that Prime Minister Trudeau instituted the recent communication with Quebec judges presiding in the Quibel slander case. Maintaining that senior civil servants "are only message runners", she criticized his lack of action in resolving the dispute.

Debate organizers had been worried that the resolution on the encouragement of foreign students' attendance at universities might provoke violence from right-wing opponents of immigration. None, however, occurred, as 75 passive people attended the debate.

The ayes won the debate, upholding the resolution that "Canada should encourage the presence of foreign students in post-secondary institutions." The vote was 33-10 in favour. A lengthy question period followed the debate, after which Brown spoke.

In her speech to the group, she spoke on the merits of both sides, but concluded that foreign students returning to their native lands aren't a boon to their underdeveloped homelands because they become exporters of western ideas. She saw exchange as part of a larger exploitation picture.

Native People's Week

By TINA PRANGER

and Ken Wyman "People have a weird sense of history," according to Terry Meaghe, President of the Canadian Association in Support of Native Peoples.

"When they read about the many injustices dealt to the Native peoples in the past, they are filled with guilt," Meaghe continued. "But this guilt gets them nowhere. Only when we read about the injustice of the present should we feel guilty. And thereby we should be motivated to do justice. We hope that the coming week will be a beginning of dealing justly with the First Canadians."

Meaghe was referring to the Native Land Settlements Week that will be kicked off at City Hall Sunday, March 7, at 2 p.m. Native dancers and singers will join government officials and support groups there in a giant rally to inform the people of Toronto about Native land claims.

The Inuit people, as Eskimos refer to themselves, recently laid claim to an area of northern land and ocean larger than the whole of Ontario. They say that they do not want a cash settlement, because "the land is not for sale". However, they are demanding royalty payments on all the natural resources removed from the area.

The Dene Nation (pronounced Den-ey) has also claimed ownership of large portions of the North West Territories. They are requesting recognition as an autonomous country, and no longer wish to be ruled by "governments (that) were not the choice of the Dene, they were imposed on the Dene."

"We the Dene are part of the Fourth World," reads the Dene Declaration. "As the peoples and Nations of the world have come to recognize the existence and rights of those people who make up the Third World, the day must come, and will come, when the nations of the Fourth World will come to be recognized and respected." The Dene Nation, and the land the Inuit people claim are as far from Toronto as Cuba and South America. To help bring the problems closer to home, Native Land Settlement Week programmes will be held throughout the week from March 7 to 13. One forum and debate will be held at Innis Town Hall on Wednesday at 8 p.m.

Varsity staff: SAC candidates will be in the office today at 3 pm for a question period. All invited.

SAC - rescind motion or disqualify candidates

The SAC folk think we may not be serious, but we are. If it takes the disqualification of all four candidates to change this trivial motion SAC passed last week forbidding non-student participation in SAC presidential campaigns, then we'll have to settle for it.

In debate over the motion last week, it was specifically stated that this motion would not apply to printing, but that is not what appears on paper. The motion states that any candidate who employs non-student help on the campaign will be disqualified.

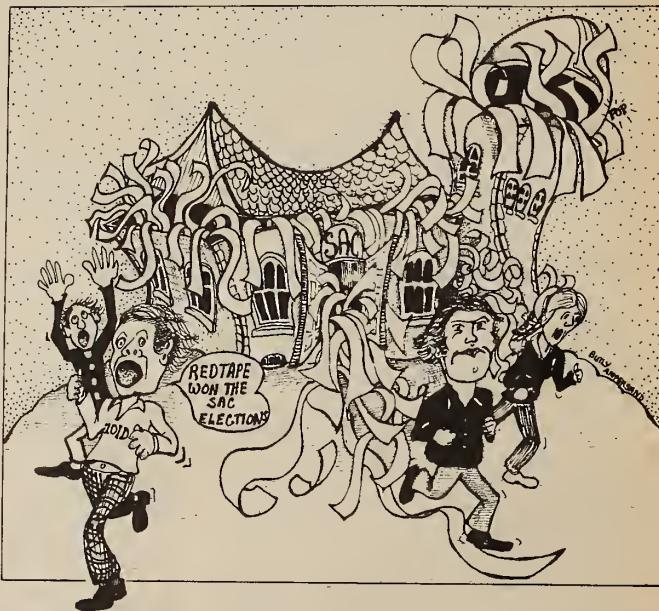

SAC is not to be blamed only for loose wording, although any government that formulated motions as swiss-cheesy as that one wouldn't last in office longer than two days. What's more involved here is SAC's apparent desire to keep those who know the most about the candidates, the SAC workers, from spilling whatever nasty tidbits they might have on the relative competency, militancy or sanity of the three in-house candidates. We already know where the Zoids stand, or fall down, for that matter.

The SAC motion says nothing about printing, so all four candidates are held culpable for using non-student labor to promote themselves.

Next, we will place phone calls to all the homes of the candidates. If the person answering the phone is a non-student and so much as takes a message for the candidate with the understanding that it refers to the election, we have another citation.

We won't apologize for making such a trivial stink, but we're responding to something much more trivial. We expect an announcement later today that all four candidates have withdrawn.

Reader defends Donald Duck and apple pie

To The Editor:

Though I'm sure your readers may have been interested or amused (perhaps both) by "Donald Duck & the CIA" reprinted from the Latin American Working Group (Feb. 25) the article is in fact objectionable on a number of accounts, some more serious than others.

Consider, for a moment, the title, "Donald Duck & the CIA". I failed to discern the premise being advanced in the use of it. Is the LAWG trying to jolt us into an awareness of some hitherto undisclosed connection (a "cover-up", so to speak) between Donald and the CIA? If so, the connection was not explored within the body of the essay . . . or did they assume that, by merely affixing the rather hoisy heading, we would automatically know what they were talking about? Anyway, with the idea implanted in our memory-banks, we were left to draw our own conclusions.

The article, as it turns out, is in large part, a review of a recent book, called "How to Read Donald Duck" (Int. Gen., NY, 1975), a book which purports to "take a serious look at the comic book heroes of America and the Free World", apparently resolving that Donald Duck is Very Dangerous. In order to show us how widespread the spectre has become, we are treated to a variety of statistics. For instance, did you know that . . . Walt Disney . . . comic strips (appear) in more than 5,000 newspapers . . . selling more than 50 million copies a month . . . "I translated, somewhere in the world today are 50 million avid readers of Donald Duck, whose minds are, at this very second, being poisoned with American propaganda.

In point of brutal fact, American cartoons are not being forced on these countries, it is by their own free choice that they have them. But the LAWG insists on making the dreadful assumption that these people are unwitting victims.

No doubt they drew their statistics from the reports of the same "sociologists, psychologists, and anthropologists" whom they effect to expose. (After all, folks, they are supported by the Ford Foundation!)

Frankly, I quite agree, television viewing would be better left unmonitored by teams of "specialists". However, I don't go along with the next (perhaps less dreadful) assumption, to wit, that the authors . . . know better . . . than the rest of us about . . . the reality base of all fantasy . . .

The LAWG adds further confusion by describing the West in such spicy terms as "monopolistic technology" and "imperialist systems", the list is long, indeed. That goes against the spirit of the book, boys, which as they are careful to note, contains "an estimable lack of scientific or political jargon". The book, by the way, is "edited in comic book style", presumably to facilitate its being read by the masses. It is the authors' intention to incite a "people's revolution" of sorts, (You gotta appeal 't' their minds!)

What the book doesn't lack is "a 12-page bibliography of Marxist writings" (the most deplorable spectrum of propaganda, anywhere), intended to prompt the "North American middle-class" into a state of supreme guilt and navel-inspection.

By placing an inordinate emphasis on the "indoctrinational side-effects" (pretty good eh? I made that one up myself) of the American cartoon, the LAWG has found fodder for its notion that Everything American is Bad.

What they completely fail, or refuse, to recognize is that America and the Free World have emerged with whatever measure of success, out of certain beliefs set out in their beginnings by the founders, and by striven-for goals. Whereas, the Third World Nations have not, as yet, revealed their goals or intentions, and it is sheer insanity to suggest that it is North America's "duty" to cater to their whims and turns of fortune.

Engineer's Ed. "Must Change"

By HUGH McQUEEN

Hugh McQueen is a professor of mechanical engineering at Concordia University. These are excerpts from his article "Engineering Education Changes Lagging Behind."

Today in the planning and management of technology the engineer must be willing and able to consider social and ecological values.

Studies in the humanities and social sciences, which are requisite preparation for such a role, do not receive sufficient emphasis in the engineering schools in Canada.

Through increase in quantity, power, sophistication and efficiency of processes and products, the engineer has contributed to society many benefits: freedom from drudgery, famine, and disease; expanded opportunity for culture and communication; and increased choices of individual development and creative activity.

However the engineer, like most members of the consumer society, generally failed to foresee the indirect 'disbenefits' which have accompanied industrial growth.

Mechanization causes obsolescence of technical skills and reorganization of industry which induces severe social dislocations.

Shoddy design and workmanship result in consumer products which function unsatisfactorily or even dangerously.

Natural resources are not rationally conserved for the real longterm needs of society but are often squandered on products the need for which was created only by advertising.

Concentration of industry and inadequate waste control are causing damaging pollution.

MACHINE POWER EQUALS IMPOTENCY

The rapidity and power of machines give rise to psychological stresses such as hypertension, impotency, and depersonalization. Society's accomplishments at directing the forces of nature have reached the level that it is truly creating its own environment, thus becoming a geomorphic threat. All society's members have the responsibility of appraising the hazards associated with the various faults of present life-styles and of undertaking political action to bring about reform.

With the general recognition of the distressing features of technological growth, the engineer has the duty to give more consideration to the indirect effects of his technical undertakings and to the socially constructive use of natural resources.

The introduction of humanities or social sciences into the engineering programme is necessary to assist the student to develop the perspective and maturity needed to meet the profession's extended responsibilities.

SURVEY SAYS

ENTHUSIASTIC NEGLIGENCE

The need for such curriculum changes has been pointed out by many members of the profession. However a recent survey indicates that engineering educators have not responded with much enthusiasm.

Most engineering instructors are prepared to neglect this area in their fervor for presenting a comprehensive up-to-date technical programme. In addition to teaching, they are so deeply involved in pursuing research or seeking technical innovations that they harbour no greater concern for the social or ecological consequences of technological change than the average citizen.

In traditional graduate programmes, the training is usually extremely specialized and tie in with experimental work. However, in recent years, considerable interest has developed in a master's degree programme which would improve the graduate engineers professional competence.

Since an understanding of sociological and political factors are important aspects of engineering practice, a graduate student should be able to elect some courses in this area.

It is particularly appropriate that he be included in this continuing education programme, since many candidates did not receive adequate instruction in this area as undergraduates.

THE CONCRETE DETAILS

The courses offered would be intended to provide depth of information and comprehensive analysis in specialized areas; they should not survey a wide range of concerns as do the undergraduate courses.

Course topics worthy of consideration include: energy and resources, information transfer and science policy, technological assessment, industrial safety, electronic technology and social control, urban environment and transportation, pollution damage and control, etc.

We can no longer ignore the necessity of including appropriate studies in the humanities and social science in the engineer's education.

Brian C. Pel

Brian Pel on:

Cutbacks: Budget cuts are undesirable but we must learn to live with economic realities, choose our priorities and minimize their impact. I am concerned that all deserving students have access to university.

Budget secrecy: The budget must be completely open so that students have a full and clear understanding of where cuts are being made. However, I have a respect for the rules of procedure. Leaking information against Gov Con rules destroys students' credibility. We need all the allies we can get.

Foreign students: We need a major re-evaluation of U of T's policy. The more developed countries have a responsibility to the Third World. I'm against quotas of any sort. Foreign students, through their interactions with Canadians, add a valuable dimension to university life.

Services: Student services are an integral part of the university and students shouldn't have to pay extra for them. The Placement Service is even more important now that jobs are scarce. Besides, these services are run on a very low budget. OHP pays for most of the Health Service. Let employers pay their share of the Placement Service.

The Community: I sympathize with people who live in the shadow of Robarts. The downtown university has a responsibility to minimize its physical impact as much as it can. We should provide as many benefits to the community as possible.

Background: Familiarity with all levels of university politics as a Varsity editor. Co-editor of Vic literary magazine. Campaign worker and photographer for a candidate in the recent federal PC leadership campaign. Experienced debater.

John M. Burnes

John Burnes on:

Cutbacks: We are in tough financial straits. We can't continue to have cutbacks. We aren't going to get any more money from the government — so we have to change the financial arrangements of the university. No qualified student must be prevented from coming to university.

Budget secrecy: Openness is the issue. If you have the information then you can use the power. Without it you are in limbo. We have got to open up the budget so that people can see the reasoning behind it.

Foreign students: I don't really feel this is a major issue. U of T is an international university, so we should encourage students to come here from abroad.

Services: Services have to be maintained. The Placement Centre and the Health Centre are priority services. It's not good enough to tell students to take a taxi down to a hospital in an emergency and it is only practical that students have one centralized office where they can apply for jobs. The same is true for the Housing Service.

The Community: U of T is part of the Toronto community. You shouldn't need to be a student to be part of the university community. We badly need a better athletic complex and students voted for it. Let the local residents use it when the space is available just as the city high schools do.

Quality of Education: It has to be maintained, or improved. You can't discuss an English novel in a class of 200 and class size depends directly on the budget that the Governing Council approves. But you can't maintain the quality of education without some tuition increases.

Background: Presently SAC representative from UC. Member of UC Council and UC Lit. Member of Hart House debates committee for the last two years. He is determined that student governors must be responsible and credible.

Gov. Council

Deciding which candidate to elect is a tough business, so this year, The Varsity has decided to take the simplest and most direct approach to the problem that we could find. We chose what we considered to be the six most important issues facing student governors in the coming year and asked each candidate, in turn, what his opinion on the matter was. We picked: budget cutbacks, quotas on foreign students, maintenance of student services, community problems in the immediate area, and the quality of education. We were unavoidably forced to edit the candidates' comments to fit them into the space available.

Robert N. Gardner

Bob Gardner on:

Cutbacks: I'm against cutbacks of essential services but we have to live with tight budgets. We have to decide where our priorities lie and adapt to them. I'm against major across-the-board salary increases for faculty.

Budget secrecy: It is imperative to open up the university budget so that Governing Council members can make the best decision. Students should have all the information passed to them.

Foreign students: A student from anywhere, from downtown Toronto to Paraguay should have the same opportunity to go to university. Lots of Canadian students go to foreign countries, why shouldn't they come here? I'm more dubious on the question of subsidization of education costs but Ontario residents pay for Alberta students at U of T and vice versa. Then why not do it for foreign students?

Services: Services have to be maintained. They don't really cost very much. The Health service only costs about $100,000 in a university budget of $170 million. The money can be found somewhere without raising fees to cover them.

The Community: The athletic complex can benefit the whole community, so why not build it? You're losing about four houses but you're going to have lots of advantages. I can understand somebody not liking a great month like the Robarts library rising in their backyard.

Quality of education: It must be maintained at the present level. We should abolish tenure and use a system based on a five-year contract with an assessment at the end. It will keep faculty on their toes.

Background: extensive experience on the Scar student council for the last two years. Member of several committees and editor of two Scar college literary magazines. Claims widespread support from Scar students and endorsements from many student politicians. Two of them deny giving it. He wants the job, badly.

Professional faculties

Michael E. Treacy

"The major issue next year is student services," says Mike Treacy. "There's no way we can allow budgetary cuts in them."

This year's SAC Finance commissioner feels "cutbacks have gone far enough," and that Governing Council is the ideal place to fight them. He favours an "antagonistic approach" so students "can make it clear that cutbacks are the wrong way to go about reducing expenditures."

But if cuts on campus do come, he knows where they should be directed. "They should try to cut physical plant," and especially Internal Affairs spending. Treacy objected to Internal's "slush money for neatsy little projects" when students were losing their own services. "The administration should put the screws on costs," asserts Treacy.

The university should not set its own tuition fees, maintains Treacy, because "I don't think the university itself has the ability to look into the overall consequences" of such a move. "Tuition fees should be closely linked to OSAP," he says, so the administration should not move into tuition unless it gains control over OSAP levels.

Treacy is particularly worried about OSAP abuse. "I see too many people who don't need the money getting it and buying stereos," he said. But he concluded that there were also many deserving students who didn't receive aid.

Asked about the Bulletin and its funding, he suggested "If the Bulletin were not here, the administration would spend the money" on other channels of communication. Terming it a "necessary organ," Treacy nevertheless hinted some reduction in funding could be made.

Treacy favours an expanded version of the administration's proposed four-point grading system, and suggested the engineering faculty as a model for a new system. Treacy was in favour of the upcoming rally opposing the TTC fare next week. However, "it's unclear whether students should go for a separate ticket price. It makes students look selfish, and when you're fighting cutbacks, you don't want to look selfish." He advocated the position that it was "an unacceptable fare increase for everybody."

Running a well-organized campaign with solid policy platforms, Treacy advocates a balanced approach to university cutbacks, with new means of fund-raising combined with broadly spread reductions in funding. A wide political background makes him a confident candidate.

Richard Hajdukiewicz

Richard Hajdukiewicz sees cutbacks and "the credibility of student representatives" as the main concerns in this election.

On cutbacks, he says "A lot are justified in the present economic light" but says some are unjustified "if the university can't function on its present budget."

First area of reduction in service would be in funding for the Bulletin, "non-essential services like maintenance" and the Graduate research department if cutbacks had to be made. Last to be cut would be staff.

Hajdukiewicz favours reciprocal exchanges for foreign students, and would insist on it except for Third World countries who do not have equivalent facilities or funds.

Louis E. Auger

Louis Auger is in favour of the university accumulating a larger debt. "We can increase debt budgeting," he says, "because students need all of the services."

In addition, he proposes the elimination of night watchmen, receptionists and switchboard operators after business hours to cope with cutbacks. But, he says, "We have to impose cutbacks generally."

He favours U of T setting its own fees because "They know what their costs are." Auger also suggests a fee according to department-costs, so different faculties would charge different fees. Auger would charge university administrators with the task of implementing guidelines instead of department heads.

Foreign students should be admitted at equal tuition in greater numbers than at present, Auger feels. This too he would let "float on the discretion of registrars." He argues that a graduated fee system for foreign students would create "a bureaucracy without a purpose." "We've got a half-defunct university and foreign students should be allowed into it."

Auger emphasizes that administration-government consultation "is not as good as it should be" and that university-set fees would encourage greater communication between the two as well as giving students more input.

He concedes however, that consultation already exists, and said that there would probably be no difference if the university sets its fees because of the government's province-wide budgeting approach. On the Bulletin and other campus reduction, he felt.

He would support any action short of violence if class sizes are increased. However, when questioned about cutbacks to alleviate classroom crowding, he replied, until he could examine the related figures, "I don't want to pass judgment on cutbacks planned right now."

On the subject of university publications he said, "I think we can do with one university paper," adding, "perhaps not in its present form."

He spoke out against leaks by student politicians, and pledged to oppose them if elected. Only if "student rights were being violated" would I permit disclosures." He condemned them as harmful to student-administration relations.

Auger reserves his best comment for Toke Oike. It alone "serves a useful purpose," he feels. He has never read the Bulletin but says "I would probably cut its budget." "I've also spoken in favour of cutting The Varsity's budget," he emphasized.

Auger's criteria for determining what are necessary university services are their proximity to the education process and their maintenance of "spirit" on campus. He calls for "an effective student newspaper" which he feels would maintain spirit.

Auger is running a subdued campaign de-emphasizing concrete policy measures. He favours instead more general approaches and said he would not side with either students or the administration on a consistent basis.

Glares and threats of trins actors aimed at matinee movie idol?

Fake accents foil scribe's sleep bid in hearty attempt at campy Beggar's Opera

The first few scenes of The Beggar's Opera — presented by Trinity College's Dramatic Society, directed by John Cruickshank, three evenings last week in Seely Hall — were worrying. Imagine one e x c r u c i a t i n g (and unintelligible) accent, pointless gesticulations left and right, a determined heartiness for which every 'Priithe' was yet another millstone and a certain ominous tendency towards didacticism — in The Beggar's Opera, no less! I was quickly beginning to feel that I could go to sleep if the characters would only shut up. The evening was saved, however, by the appearance, in quick succession, of the two principals, Janice MacDonald as Polly Peachum and Michael Kefemer as Macheath, and of Michele White as Lucy Lockit. The two women were quite admirable; their involvement in their roles, campy as they were (and as perhaps too many of those playing minor parts made them) challenged us to be involved.

Kefemer was admirable yes but even more "interesting". He has, rather blatantly, the vacuous good looks of a matinee movie idol, and so he was well suited to portray "a coquette of the male sex", as he is described within the play. His charm was increased not least by the utmost seriousness with which he approached his role.

There were a few things that were much better than we had any right to expect. Peter Banks was responsible for the remarkably evocative set design. Surely no one has ever made better use of Seely Hall's awkward spaces. The harpsichord was welcome. The orange girls (with peeled orange slices) at intermission were a good idea. Wrong century, but nevertheless a good idea. And I shall not soon forget the two children, Robin and Jessica Squiers, who took part in the dance with which the opera c o n c l u d e d . T h e spontaneity, the utter consciousness they exhibited can only be achieved by adults as a fair number of the older members of the Trinity cast proved, whether they would or no, by long hard work, long hard dedication, and a more than a touch of talent.

Pure poetry takes back seat to Canadian content

Once again the Innis College Writers Workshop has disgorged its adopted son. Writ has appeared, been sighted. In this, the seventh issue of the literary magazine of Innis, some of the strengths and weaknesses of previous volumes are apparent but the overall impression is one of non-immediacy.

Perhaps it is asking far too much, or even not enough, to hope that a literary magazine can be startlingly original when it talks over once more the age-old themes of emotional life; but in this issue of Writ one is hard put to find anything that matters in an age when the leisure time of all but the most subtle writers must be concerned with the politics of survival for the mind. The writing of both prose and verse (or poetry, as you will) follows predictable patterns of self-conscious alienation, with only an occasional flash of blunt humour. It is regrettable that most of the good writing comes from outside the city; as on other occasions, writers from California lead the way.

In this issue, to mark its fifth year of operation, Writ has included an index to its first seven numbers, and as well as finding good memories in the index I find far too much of the editor himself, who successfully escaped the temptation to be included only in the first issue. Writ by this time has enough good writers on the way that Mr. Greenwald can afford to be more selective with his own contributions, unless (as, in fact), one must admit in this case) he has a particular point to make. This issue marks a corner turned, for reviews of deserving books are tacked on to the end of the overtly literary section. While it is questionable whether Writ should be submissive to whim in its choice, as it obviously must be, the reviews given convey some suggestion of the complexity of the world of letters and ideas.

Pure poetry takes a back seat to the bizzareries of fiction in this anthology. Yet what there is worthwhile, in general. David Day's visions of life in the forests of B.C., with the vulgarities and broken hopes of men and the land in the Depression, marks a reasonable attempt to find significance in real life without being didactic, and in passing to celebrate an often-harsh Nature. Both Jeanne Lance and Carol Nast examine with a sweet eye the hatefulness of women in their need to love. And Bruce Wilson successfully presents the bill bisset record of a life of sun and sand combined with consciousness of the art problems of any good fuck poem.

It is a great pity that the students of Innis who wrote and were published here were not required to make themselves more explicit; their work is mainly too personal to have any independent meaning, and Victor Coleman to the contrary, there seems to me to be no place for the insignificant personal in a book of writing.

In the fiction, there are two worthwhile pieces and two which are largely unenlightening. David Collins' "Down Among the Wallabies" is a convincing movement of the mind; Walter Reimmler's "He's In Fresno Too," a story of an unwanted mystical experience, touches quite surely a strand of modern life. The other pieces are unfortunately locally-raised, and rely to excess on the obvious symbolism of death and despair.

Why is this peculiar failure to separate the good from the bad? Why does Writ consistently have stronger foreign writing than Canadian? I suspect that the editor does his damndest to raise local talent, so much so that this issue resembles a mutual admiration society in areas. But the fact remains that this issue of Writ, which can still be obtained in limited quantities, is not up to previous issues in depth of sentiment nor ability with language, and contains for the first time some material which is embarrassing. Undoubtedly the energy of Roger Greenwald, the editor, is paying off; but neither he nor others in the area should attempt to shore up the Canadian content if it's not really up to scratch.

How Feng Tao and comrades spotted the capitalist roaders

Second Spring will never win an academy award in the foreign film category at the Oscar awards because it doesn't have an obscure theme; doesn't exploit sexuality; and its only violence is in verbal assaults on reactionary ideas. Yet the film is a hit with a quarter of the world's population. It is because the color feature film "provides an excellent education in the realities of life" that the Chinese have greeted their newest cultural contribution so warmly. Second Spring is a political film from the People's Republic of China that has a clear message presented in an attractive, artistic form.

A few people in the world have been upset by the film's appearance, particularly the "fraternal country" that is exposed in the film as a "betrayal of Marxism-Leninism and saboteur of the Chinese people's struggle to build socialism". But why shouldn't they get upset, since the plot of the film accurately shows the attitudes of the Soviet Union towards China in the early 60's. And the Soviet Union certainly doesn't like a nation which can point to the hypocrisy in their use of the word socialism to describe their imperialist social system. The fact that the Soviet Union is so angered about it suggests that it is all the more worthwhile for Canadians to see the film.

The tale depicts the struggle of workers and technicians at a naval shipyard to build a completely Chinese torpedo boat called "Sea Eagle". Their efforts are continually thwarted by the actions of the "fraternal country's" "advisor, by the active sabotage of their machinery and tools and by the support of some of the leaders of the dockyard for reliance on foreign aid. The workers, angered by the interference, resolve to find the cause for the failure of the "Sea Eagle" through a thorough investigation. Feng Tao, secretary of the Communist Party work committee, leads the dockyard workers in their struggle against the foreign spy and in their attempt to win back one of the honest but misguided leaders, Chi Ta-tung.

As much as it is an interesting story with a clearly important political message, Second Spring can also give Canadians an interesting view of some of the principles on which China operates, principles that affect the lives of the people completely. The respect with which women are treated in China is demonstrated by the fact that the two boat designers are women and that one, in particular, actively leads the fight against foreign domination. All the workers participate equally in the decision making processes, and the Party secretary sums up their sentiments. Slogans are used to stimulate the building of unity amongst all those involved in the work on the "Sea Eagle". Those who carry counter-revolutionary political attitudes are confronted with their mistakes and helped to understand the roots of them. This is not just restricted to the obviously backward elements but includes criticism of the young woman Liu Chih-yin. When she says that the struggle of the shipyard workers is one of "the young rebelling against the old" the Party secretary replies that slogans are not enough: one must seek out the facts to defend one's position.

This is not at all a dogmatic, formula film. Beautiful panoramas of the Chinese north coast interspersed throughout the action reflect finely developed camera work. The whole structure of the play is different from the other films such as The Red Detachment of Women or The White-Haired Girl which have their foundation in the traditional dramatic combinations of ballet, theatre and opera. Second Spring is an interesting, realistic, political film which should not be missed by anyone interested in the concept of socialist realism or even just the lives of the Chinese people. The film was shown as part of a Chinese Film Festival on the U. of T. Campus last weekend.

Poetry tells of inevitable revolution (but if it's inevitable, why write poetry?)

.. We are the heirs of Norman Bethune

The revolutionary people of Canada

The revolutionary people of the world

Workers, oppressed nations and people united Together

Together we fight

Together we struggle forever

Against imperialism

Against social-imperialism

Against all reaction!

Bethune! Bethune!

You bent your back

You gave your life in this great cause.

U.S. imperialism

Soviet social-imperialism

All reactionaries

Blight and cancer of the world

People of the world will bury you!

The excerpt above, from the poem, We are the heirs of Norman Bethune, by James Reid taken from a book of the same name, sums up the optimistic spirit of this collection of poetry.

The book, published by the Norman Bethune Institute, was put out to "oppose the culture of world counter-revolution headed by the two superpowers, U.S. imperialism and Soviet social imperialism," and stand for "the culture of world revolution." The criterion for selection of the poetry was political.

The introduction goes on to say "Opposing this prevalent culture, and in struggle with it, is the glorious new culture of world revolution, full of optimism and the spirit of daring to struggle and daring to win, of daring to unite with the majority of the world's nations and people in order to isolate the superpowers and strike a blow at them."

The poems and essays include selections from Canada, China, Albania, Palestine, the Sudan, Zimbabwe, Namibia, Indonesia, the Philippines and India. All of them express indefatigable optimism and determination to fight, birthed in actual struggles.

One of the poems, from Zimbabwe, "The Enemy Are Paper Tigers" begins:

.. It was only one day

When I realized there'll be a day

Of freedom in our country

Zimbabwe;

The day we ambushed our ferocious enemy.

Another, from Clarita Roja, the Filipino poet, goes:

.. Damn the US-Marcos dictatorship

My people starve

While Imelda lives it up with Christina Ford

Thirty days after San Juanico

Usurped sweat of the Filipino people.

Rice queues longer than any vaulted

Seventh longest bridge in the world.

A poem from a Canadian woman, Christine Neilson, ends:

.. Natives and Canadians!

We are a mighty river

crashing over its banks

Bursting one after another the dams the imperialists build

Bursting through their locks and their dykes

No channel can contain us

No superpower servant can stop us

Forward to victory,

comrades!

The red banner soars over our heads!

The poems and prose included here consistently show the deep aspirations of oppressed peoples and nations around the world to throw off oppression and liberate themselves. The book signifies a new trend in literature, particularly for Canada, a trend which instead of preaching nihilism, promotes revolutionary vigour and optimism. The strength and courage of these poems provides a tool to assist readers to move forward, to break away from a culture of despair, to walk toward tomorrow.

"Smash capitalism and imperialism on a Saturday night". An advertisement for a revolutionary dance? A spray-painted slogan on a mailbox? Actually, it's neither. "Smash capitalism and imperialism on a Saturday night" is the chorus from a song that was part of a Commedia dell'Arte style sketch called The Bribe produced by the Vancouver Street Theatre around 1970. Leonard Angel wrote the scenario for the skit and often acted in it as Arlecchino. I remembered the scenario and the provocative "libretto" but I didn't remember Leonard Angel. There was nothing in his latest play, Incident After Antietam that suggested the Victoria College philosophy professor and playwright I was to interview was that same hippie Arlecchino. But it was: only he is no longer writing skits for guerrilla theatre. Instead he has written a drama of character relationships.

Commedia dell'Arte and naturalistic character investigation are as artistically distant as Toronto and Vancouver (where most of Angel's other plays have been produced). However, Angel emphasizes that the major changes in his ideas have been on theatrical form and purpose and not in overall political perspective. He still sees theatre as a profoundly vigorous social and political force, but he is more concerned now with revealing character rather than exposing structures. "Explaining psychological motivation is a political act," he says. Emotional identification, then, becomes the crucial element of the play's relationship to the audience — his previous interest in Brechtian alienation has to be set aside. However, this does not mean that the audience becomes intellectually passive. Angel is quick to point out that being part of an emotional conflict will usually lead to analyzing its

It is questions on this intimate plane that interest Angel in Incident After Antietam. Without giving away too much of the plot, I will say that the play is based on an episode from Euripide's The Trojan Woman and deals with the sexual psychology of a young confederate soldier after the battle at Antietam during the American Civil War. Through a workshop last December involving the experienced actor John-Peter Linton, Sharon Corder and Chas. Lawther, a number of changes were made that Angel feels will make the Vic Drama Club's production on March 11, 12, and 13 a far more balanced performance. Director Dorothy Hobbs and Angel sum up what we can expect by saying "the set is suggestive, but the character relationships are natural."

The naturalism of Incident After Antietam shows a new dimension in Angel's theatre activities. His other plays include The Ballad of Etienne Brule, a historical drama "celebrating Brule as a rogue" produced by the Frederick Woods Studio in Vancouver, and The Greek Play which is an explicitly political play dealing with the relationship of art and politics that was produced under John Juliani in the midst of the student struggles at Simon Fraser University during the late sixties. New dimensions and controversial opinions seem to be a large part of the character of Leonard Angel. When asked whose ideas on theatre he feels closest to, he replies that he is "primarily interested in American models." A dangerous statement in a culturally sensitive Canada, but not without some foundation. A particular trait of the Canadian dramatic scene, Angel suggests, is that styles in drama tend to center around theatres rather than writers. The result is an indistinctiveness in trends of thought on the form of Canadian theatre.

Leonard Angel is a friendly and perceptive man who realizes the need to work with other people in advancing his conception of drama. From reading the play and knowing some of the changes that have been made, at least I can say it is likely that Incident After Antietam will be more satisfying in the production at the New Vic Theatre than it was last December. But Angel has written a play that, to feel its complete impact, must be seen in production, not read.

Musical wizard charms hearers with tuneful reminiscences

I have nothing but praise for A Paean of Praise, the 90 minute radio interview with Vladimir Horowitz recently aired on CBC radio. For those of you lucky enough to have caught this special, this article may just evoke pleasant memories and for you others, maybe you'll realize what you missed.

CBC Radio producer, Digby Peers and freelance broadcaster, Don Newlands had the worst time trying to contact the 71 year-old Russian-American pianist. Horowitz only started playing concerts again in 1965 after over a decade of self-imposed isolation. A Paean of Praise is his first extended radio interview and was granted only after much hassle. Peers and Newlands had to camp in New York, where Horowitz lives. He was going to play Carnegie Hall, so Peers and Newlands tried to meet him at the Friday rehearsal — but he was unavailable.

They missed him again after the concert, because Horowitz took his good friend, Rudolf Serkin out to dinner. He was exhausted on Monday and on Tuesday, he had a doctor's appointment. All this while the hotel bills for Peers and Newlands were adding up. They called Vladimir's manager, Harold Shaw, who assured them that the interview would be a supportive one. Shaw called back in the evening after a jaunt to Montreal, and finally Peers and Newlands found themselves going over to Horowitz's brownstone near Central Park with their interview granted.

They taped from 9:30 to 12:30 p.m., during which time Horowitz played a Schumann sonata for them standing up with a cigarette dangling from his mouth. Towards the end of the evening, the maestro got a bit tired and fuzzy, but the editing renders the interview thoroughly engaging.

Horowitz, who is greeted by crowds at every airport and who attracted concert-goers from Tokyo, France, and Germany at his last appearance, was born in Kiev in 1904. Already sensational in Russia at the age of 20, he scored his first European successes in Berlin. He left his audiences emotionally exhausted, yet ecstatic.

His mother was his first piano teacher and his grandmother taught Arthur Rubinstein. Interestingly enough, he was a frustrated composer until the age of 21 (he once wrote a Danse eccentricque for a cousin's birthday party in 1½ hours).

He came to the U.S. in 1928, and he has lived in New York since then. He became close friends with Rachmaninoff 10 minutes after meeting him, although Rachmaninoff generally was a loner.

The description of his first Carnegie Hall concert is hilarious: he was terrifically nervous as all of the musical giants of the day were present.

On the programme were the four ballades of Chopin. At intermission time, he gave orders that no-one should disturb him. However, one man could not be deterred from visiting him backstage — he rushed in and kissed the master telling him to go his own way ... not to let anyone change him. "A madman," Horowitz said.

Horowitz is mainly known for

his interpretations of romantic piano music by Schumann, Chopin and others. He thinks it's an affection to always play overwhelming pieces and does not like to bowl his audience over. He sees the piano as a singing instrument, and has more bel canto records than piano.

His aim is to give to the melody line the tension of the human voice. He says that his hand position depends on the piece he is playing and the peculiarities of each composer, a statement which would send piano pedagogues up the wall. He wears little tapes around both fifth fingers to protect them, as it is these fingers which for him carry the melodic line and provide the bulk of the harmonic support.

He only practises 1½ hours a day, because he doesn't want to get mechanical, but during his sessions he always plays LOUDLY. He likes to read composers' letters, as a lot of what is written about composers is simply not accurate.

But he reads the critics less and less (maybe he is tired of the superlatives which critics inevitably use when describing his performances). He says that they treat artists as schoolboys, who either transgress or dutifully follow certain laid down rules. Music has nothing to do with words.

This musical wizard is now 71 years old but walks 40 blocks every day. Established in his ways, he only plays concerts on Sundays from 4-6 p.m. He says that way, people will be well rested for his concerts, he will be fresh, and people won't have to travel to and fro late at night after the concert. A thoughtful point since he lives in New York.

As for his coming to Canada, he's being worked on. While you're waiting, pick up one of his over 60 recordings. Or else petition the CBC to rebroadcast A Paean of Praise. Horowitz, the man, and Horowitz the musician is beyond words, but with this interview, you wonder ...

Sandwich Bach and Ravel for a lunch-time treat

Dr. Johnson, after a musically indifferent performance and being told that it could be excused because the music was difficult to play, declared, "Sir, I wish it had been impossible!" Bach's Partita No. 2 in D minor is very nearly that (Schweitzer thought the great Chaconne was impossible, at least with modern violin and bow). Christiane Edinger's performance of the work, in her February 12 recital under the auspices of the Women's Musical Club of Toronto, needed no such excuse, however. The music may be difficult and impossible, but she played brilliantly, and feelingly too. With great confidence her playing seemed to take the measure of the music; rhythmically secure while sensitively phrased, no rough bowing even in the most polyphonic passages. She has won several prizes and released a recording of Bach's sonatas and partitas (on Orion) that rivals any other, including that of her teacher, Nathan Milstein. This is her second visit to Toronto; she played at the Goethe Institute a while ago. I hope she returns soon.

The other special treat in this lunchtime feast — civilized time for music, by the way — was the late Boris Blacher's Sonata for solo violin. A daring choice perhaps for the Women's Musical Club, yet the playing roused the audience to what, for it, was near enthusiasm (the normal reaction being, I'd say, benevolence). The sonata is innovative on two counts, for its use of Blacher's 'variable meter' technique (a gradual and periodic change of meter), and for the second movement's left-hand pizzicati on open strings undercutting the solo line. Miss

Edinger was persuasive in both her technique and her involvement in this essentially lyrical work; modern music with tears without tears? With mention the other luncheon courses: The piano had a part in the remainder, and I must say it did not suit the baroque style of Veracini's Sonata in E minor. The pianist made it plod even more. The final item, Ravel's Tzigane — more truly Ravel than gypsy — gave the piano more of a role, though full-bodied violin playing led the way.

Quilico's recital was verdi good

What will likely be the finest installment in a year of interesting vocal recitals at the EJB took place on reading week Thursday. Met regular Louis Quilico, perhaps Canada's most dynamic operatic performer, filled every square inch of Walter Hall with pure baritone. The recital was titled An Evening of Verdi, and included passages from six of that composer's operas, irreverently arranged in such categories as Verdi and Shakespeare and Verdi and History (I don't think Verdi's treatment of any one of these sources differs from others). The selections were taken from operas not often performed (only three of the six have been staged by the Canadian Opera Co.), but which nevertheless encompass some of Verdi's finest moments.

Quilico's readings of all five programmed baritone arias represented such a high level of achievement that it is difficult to speak of any one or two as outstanding. My nomination of Iago's Credo from Otello seems a sensible enough guess. The ensemble setting of Act III, Scene I from Un Ballo in Maschera gave Quilico a chance to elevate his acting style closer to operatic standards, and thus his Eri tu was also something special. All of Quilico's solos were characterized by interpretive command, effective phrasing, and most of all, clean, powerful sound.

One might imagine that to be noticed at all beside a singer of Quilico's authority would be a credit to any student from the Opera Department. The six who joined Quilico in scenes from Luisa Miller, Don Carlo, and Un Ballo in Maschera often accomplished much more than this. Kathy Terrell fitted her softened voice convincingly into both the lyric role of Luisa Miller and the uncompromisingly dramatic Queen Elisabeth. Barbara Ianni sang a fine "Morro, ma prima in grazia" for the Un Ballo excerpt, her dark, round soprano contrasting ideally with Caralyn Tomlin's fresh and spirited reading of Oscar.

Mezzo Patricia Harton and baritone Mark Pedrotti sang well in their short stints, while bass John Nieboer combined a hollow, wooden voice with hopelessly stolid acting to register as the only duck in the company.

Quilico's encore, "Cortigiane vil razza dannata", may have reminded some members of the audience of his magnificent performance in the COC's 1973 Rigoleto. This was the second Quilico recital I have attended in Toronto since that appearance, and both displayed the shame of more than a few empty seats — as if there's enough of his brand of artistry.

Now... more than ever the RCMP offers a rewarding career

If you've ever considered a career in law enforcement, now's the time to talk to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The opportunities have never been greater.

For instance, the RCMP is accepting applications from both men and women, married and single. And the salary scale has increased considerably. It starts at $12,000 per year ($230 weekly) with regular increases to $16,100. ($309 weekly) in the first four years.

If accepted as a member of the Force, you'll receive intensive training in all aspects of police work such as law, investigation, first aid and community relations. Then you'll be posted to a detachment where there's every chance to put your knowledge and talents to work; to earn promotion and, equally important, be proud of what you're doing for yourself and for Canada as a member of one of the finest police forces in the world.

So if you're a Canadian citizen 18 or over and in good physical condition, think about a career with the RCMP.

Call or write your nearest office or use the coupon. We'd like to tell you more.

Bryden's odyssey from The New Statesman to Hart House Theatre

"The greatness of this University derives from the greatness of its faculty." Professor Horace Krever sent forth that ringing declaration when he was made the first recipient last fall of the Faculty Award that the Alumni Association instituted then. He went on to say, however, that many students "denigrate the role played by faculty and express irrational contempt for them. If you have the stomach for it—and I recognize that this may be impolite to say, but I shall not be intimidated—read The Varsity occasionally."

Krever claimed that students and student evaluation of the faculty make "the fundamental error of treating the University not as a place where students are given an opportunity to learn, but as a place where scholars are expected, not to stimulate and challenge the intellectual potential of students, but to teach, as public school and high school teachers teach the immature."

Krever did not mince words. But did he perhaps make the situation too stark, too simple in its starkness?

I'm sure we've all seen them, the students, the "immature" if you will, who trudging from bleak library carrel to bleak residence room have stopped dead in their tracks to wonder if things really are as they should be in this best of all possible Canadian universities. These students want to be taught and from the bottom of their hearts do not want to criticize. The reason why so many students come to the U of T is the reason why so many film companies come here: the place fits widespread preconceptions. These students want their professors to fill these preconceptions as well. They want them white-haired and ruddy-cheeked, a bit eccentric and marvellously irrelevant. Father figures without teeth, father figures who will give them a safe sense of the Great Game of Life and Education and Self.

Of course this is a trivialization. But there is some truth to it, perhaps even enough truth for it to be resisted. But the faculty are not like that now—if they ever were. If they are anything, they are 'relevant'. As the university has become a more integrated and more important part of society, faculty have become more important figures in that society. Their students are far from being their only or chief worry.

Ronald Bryden seems very much a type of the New Faculty member. He was appointed Senior Research Professor in the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama last December. He has returned here (he graduated from Trinity College) from England where he has been (sequentially) drama critic of The New Statesman and The Observer and dramaturge for the Royal Shakespeare Company.

Boredom must be a constant temptation. The question, and the first question I asked him, in a recent interview, is why indeed he has returned. He is undeniably a boon to the academic theatre community on campus but why would he give up such an apparently enviable life in London for a life here in Toronto?

In the interview Bryden reiterated the views he expressed in a full-page, front page article he wrote for The Globe and Mail Entertainment section last summer while he was still in London. He was quite simply, motivated by a profound disgust at the progressive cheapening of the meritocratic society that so many, Bryden among them, had hoped for in Britain at the end of the Second World War. The faith that Britain was indeed making itself a meritocracy, a society dominated by competitively-selected talent, "was much of the excitement of the post-war years." But what came to pass, he concluded in the Globe article, was that "the principle of merit no longer signified. What mattered was success in a society where success now ruled. Cinderella doesn't need to be clever, just determined to get to the ball."

"... On the ladder of success the meritocrats had erected swarmed the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, the East End boys with nothing to their names but energy and a Nikon. They weren't bothered about class loyalty and thrift of lifestyle. They wanted the whole thing; the stockbroker's palazzo near Ascot, the white Rolls-Royce with smoked-glass windows, the pink suede suits and gold faps on their bathtubs.

"That was what social justice in Britain in the sixties meant, wasn't it? Turning your back on the slums and northern smoke and becoming one of the beautiful people, with a Mediterranean tan and a pastel shirt? ..."

Paradoxically enough, many have expressed disgust about the revolution against merit and intelligence and conscientious and hard work in the situation in which Bryden now finds himself, namely, in the university ...

Among Bryden's responsibilities is the position of literary adviser to Hart House

Theatre. I don't know if I dare say Hart House Theatre is a paradigm of the troubled relationship between faculty and students but certainly it and its public have been badly served by the amount of freedom each has received there. Bad production has succeeded bad. Bryden might not agree; he says reports of a decline in standards are constantly bandied about but that standards are just as high as those in effect when he was an undergraduate, during the first few years of Robert Gill's tenure—a time which has come to be seen as something of a Golden Age. He does say plainly enough however, that "the Graduate Drama Centre (which runs Hart House Theatre) has a duty to the Drama Centre students, and the most valuable thing it can do is to give them the widest possible exposure to professionals at work in the theatre."

It is purely luck that the recent production of All's Well That Ends Well could draw on three professionals who were in fact students of the Centre. But in a change of direction from the all-student productions of the past few years the use of professional actors and of other trained theatre people within a student company will now be consciously promoted.

Bryden also says that the Theatre needs to involve more directors, to take the load off Marlin Hunter, who teaches in the Centre and who has directed so many of the recent productions.

He notes that Hunter feels that Hart House has failed in not doing more new plays, and quite simply in not doing more plays. A longer season may be called for.

Bryden defends the freedom of Hart House Theatre as a non-profit institution to present rather "out of the way plays" that would not find stage-space elsewhere. "Just because Hart House is becoming involved with professionals need not mean trotting out the professional repertoire," he says. Bryden has a few favourite plays of his own which he would like to see presented at Hart House. Ibsen's early plays, "the ones written when he was living in Bergen as a dramaturge," and

"his combination in them of a wide experience of the world, of life, and a sharp knowing malice that comes from living in a small place where everyone knows everyone else are remarkably suggestive of Upper Canada in the nineteenth century. They're like something out of William Kilbourne's biography of William Lyon Mackenzie, The Firebrand."

"Canadians really don't appreciate Canadian humour. But Ibsen's is the same kind. Dry, ironic, deadpan."

Bryden feels that a lot of world drama can have particular relevance to Canada. "The Great Canadian Dramatist is Chekhov". That's what Robertson Davies used to say before he became that." (Oh, I said. Do you really think Robertson Davies is the Great Canadian Dramatist? The question was ignored.) "There are a lot of old Russian plays and quite a few new ones, which fit into the Canadian context." One recent Russian play that he has just read is set in a village in Siberia. It presents the views of a new generation on the revolution but it is mostly about life in the Arctic. "Certainly there are connections there."

"The Royal Shakespeare Company presented a lot of Gorky and Chekhov. Martin Hunter and I have been talking about doing a Gorky play here."

Are there other parts of world drama that Bryden feels have been neglected by Canadian theatre? Yes, he says. American drama. "Canadian nationalism tends to exclude treatment of American drama because of a fear of putting ourselves in a 'colonialist' position. Stratford had never done an American play until it did Kennedy's Children last year. But we grew up having our finger in the American pie and there is a lot we can learn about America, and about ourselves, from American plays."

"The twenty years in American theatre between 1920-1940 were one of the great eras of world comedy. The Front Page, The Man Who Came to Dinner, the Rodgers and Hammerstein musicals: Canadians should not be deprived of them."

Bryden strongly feels that Canadian actors are more than capable of doing justice to world literature. "There is a marvellous sense of continuous professional theatre, of a continuity of actors and theatrical craft here. It is an interest in craft, in the profession, rather than in becoming the next Marlon Brando or in using the theatre as psychological therapy."

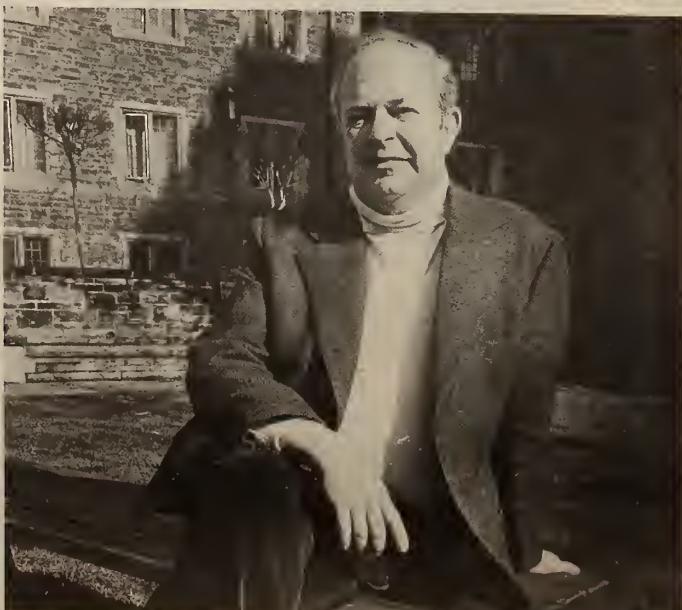

He says the Stratford Festival truly deserves the credit: "Canadians don't realize how important it is. But it is the centre for this continuity, the centre for it in North America for regional theatre certainly."

Bryden teaches one course at the Drama Centre, a course in directing. "Directing can't really be taught," but in the course students are encouraged to bring scholarship to bear on the text treated as a script for the stage. "I tell them they have to put them on. How can they make their scholarship work in producing them? What are the bits of knowledge that they have that can be used?"

"All I can say is that the class seems to enjoy thinking of their knowledge in these terms."

Bryden hopes to expand the course next year, to bring in a discussion of the history of directing and of the rise in importance of the director. He wants the students to direct plays on paper and then perhaps to indeed direct them on the stage.

Cheez Whiz's contribution to capitalism

Food industry exploits farmers for benefit of bigwigs

The Politics of Food
James Lorimer

Much of the public discussion on food in Canada has revolved round economic questions relating to prices and profits. Important though these questions are, they cannot be meaningfully discussed without a political framework based on class analysis. Such a framework has been missing from the arguments against high food prices advanced by Beryl Plumptre and the Consumers' Association of Canada.

Don Mitchell's recent book, The Politics of Food seeks to correct this situation. Mitchell recognizes that the business of food is part of the overall system within which it operates in Canada, namely, the capitalist system. In this system, he rightly perceives, "we possess power in accordance with what we own in productive property or what we produce." Questions relating to the way the food industry works are therefore bound up with the larger political questions of class, ownership of the means of production, and the role of government in this system.

Appropriately, Mitchell devotes the first two chapters of the book to an examination of the two most important "competing and unequal sectors" of "the broad agriculture and food system", namely, the farmers and agribusiness.

In the chapter on farmers, "Farmers: A Class Divided", Mitchell discusses the process by which farmers, who used to have a fairly cohesive community in the first half of the century, have now split into two classes of small and big farmers with opposing interests and politics. This has happened due to a "cost-price squeeze", caused by a rapidly increasing cost of production outpacing return, and high cost of land resulting from "competitive bidding for its use not just by farmers but by land and development companies, 'hobby' farmers from the city, and petty land speculators". The high cost of arming resulting from these two factors contrasts with a very low return. While the small farmers try desperately to hold on to their farms in the face of this situation, the big farmers have formed well-oiled organizations and have a powerful voice that the government readily listens to.

industry". The first includes lending institutions, and manufacturers of farm machinery and other products such as fuel and fertilizer. The second consists of food processors, packers and distributors. Although each of these is a separate function, agribusiness, in fact, is a highly concentrated and integrated activity, "closely knit through interlocking directorates, joint ownerships and direct subsidiaries". Much of the chapter is given to discussing two such conglomerates: the Argus Corporation, and the George Weston "empire". A pattern of interlocking directorships in a diverse network of large corporations in almost every business and industry — including the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, the Dominion Stores, Massey Ferguson, Noranda Mines, B.C. Forest Products, and Canada Packers, to mention only a few — allows directors of the Argus Corporation great influence on almost every aspect of Canada's food industry. To know this situation is to realize what a huge joke the notion of "free" competition is. Indeed, as Mitchell says, one major characteristic of agribusiness is its "oligopolistic" character. "Oligopolies," he adds, "steadfastly avoid price competition." In view of this massive power, furthermore, efforts of the consumer advocate to seek reforms in the price and profit systems without questioning the entire structure are bound to be futile.

How this business operates to affect prices of such daily necessities as bread, dairy products, meat and eggs, is discussed with elaborate data and historical background in the next four chapters. They throw light on the entire process, largely unknown to the consumer, by which these essentials reach our tables, and at what cost. To read them is to feel that we would pay much less for our food is only agribusiness had not been as overdeveloped as it is. This overdevelopment could not have occurred without the acquiescence of government. Needless to say, governmental cooperation has been forthcoming. In fact, a task force set up by the federal government unhesitatingly rejected "the public utility" or socialized concept of agriculture" in favour of "rationally managed, profit-oriented businesses." A major function of government, as Mitchell shows in the chapter entitled "The Politics of Investigation: Royal Commissions, Inquiries and Review Boards", has been to legitimize the myth of "free enterprise" by periodically setting itself up as the champion of the consumer and appointing enquiry commissions to look into the workings of the different sectors of food industry. Essentially, however, these have been "a staged and cynical exercise in Canadian politics aimed at assuring the Canadian electorate that all is well with the free market system." While government has thus diverted people's attention, corporate capitalism has continued to extend its influence.

What, then, are the prospects of an equitable system of food production and distribution that may be just to Canada's farmers as well as consumers? Mitchell sees that such a system can come only through political action which only a class-based party can provide. His pessimistic conclusion is that "there is in Canada no class-based party to respond to working-class interests, not even the New Democratic Party — in spite of its official links with the Canadian Labour Congress." This is not strictly true; Canada has a Communist Party and a Marxist-Leninist Party. Whether they will provide the response to the inequities of capitalism, remains to be seen.

HH Chorus outflanks competition in tri-college concert

Speaking from a strictly non-partisan viewpoint of course, the Hart House Chorus stole the show last Sunday night at the Edward Johnson Building when it, the University of Guelph Choir, and the University of Western Ontario Choir displayed their wares. After this, the three choirs united to perform Mozart, Willan, and Weekles.

What was interesting though, was to compare the characteristics of each choir. The U. of Guelph Choir, under conductor Fred Stoltzfus was ragged; because the various sections of the choir were not well-blended, one could hear prominent individual voices where a mass of unified sound should have been. Three sacred works by Billings were presented, as well as Three Shakespeare Songs by Vaughan Williams. Notable was the firm ending of Billings' "The Lord is Risen Indeed, a piece of joyful conviction, but poor diction obscured the Vaughan Williams.

Western's selection of material bordered too closely on "easy listening" for my taste, having, among other selections, an arrangement of "Cruel War". A fine song but it does not sufficiently exploit the potential of a large choir. However, the sound was more compact than that of Guelph, and the material sounded well-rehearsed.

Overemphasis on some consonants made "Cruel War" too self-conscious, though, and in works by Chapman and Thompson the choir was slightly flat, a fact brought out in the latter piece by the entry of the piano — which was in tune. The closing selections were Three French Canadian Folk Songs arr. Eaton, jolly pieces the choir was unable to handle because of the fast clip, and Russian Picnic by Enders, which was precisely prepared although there was not enough buildup for the end.

The Hart House Chorus, under conductor Denise Narcisse-Mair, was the only choir to present solely spiritual material (objections aside that all music is spiritual): Kyrie and Gloria from Vaughan Williams Mass in G Minor, Ave Maria by Vittoria, and a Medley of Negro Spirituals by Tippett, with an arrangement by Smith of Ride the Chariot. Although there were some impressive entries (K.K.K.-Kyrie), the Vaughan

Williams was exquisite with clipped dynamic changes, and clear diction. The hushed beginning and end of the Kyrie left one transformed by their calm. Same thing with the delicate Ave Maria — Prof. Narcisse-Mair knows how to draw a note into silence which leaves one dreading the applause. The Negro Spirituals were well under the choir's belt as they performed them at the Christmas concert, and Ride the Chariot, with its vital call and response sections, caught one up with its apocalyptic enthusiasm. "Are you ready my brothers? Oh yeah!"

The choirs then joined forces in the Kyrie from the Mozart Requiem. It left me cold, not because of a bad performance but because the lightness and frivolity of Mozart does not, for me suit the expression of religious emotion. In Willan's I Beheld Her, Beautiful as a Dove, the words were unclear, but the stretto-like entries in Weekles' Gloria in Excelsis were handled with considerable ease, considering the three choirs only had spent an hour practising together.

It's fun going to these inter-versity things. It makes you proud to be from U of T, especially with a choir of the calibre of the Hart House Chorus. Don't miss their March 14th concert in the Great Hall at Hart House. It promises to be great, with, among other things, J.S. Bach's Christ lag in Todesbanden, and Faure's Requiem being performed.

Grande-dame's recital so good, Consort cellist is knocked out

I attended the TSO — with the Toronto Consort and Gina Bachauer appearing as (separate) guest soloists — concert last week (Wed. Feb. 25). The Orchestra demonstrated that it is in top form under Davis baton.

First on the program was Haydn's Symphony No. 88. The piece, typically good-natured Haydn, is full of such of the composer's humorous devices as the irregular pulse in the "musette" of the third movement. The reading was remarkably full-sounding; even the brass section, which has endured its share of the critics slings and arrows, was holding its own.

There was much to appeal to Toronto Consort fans in the second piece, Lothar Klein's "Musica Antiqua", a work dedicated to the Toronto Consort. Far from being dull, the work is rich in ideas and full of surprises, entertaining visually, as well as aurally; and the craftsmanlike performance by the TC makes it easy to see why they have such a devoted following.

Finally, there was Brahms' B-flat Major Piano Concerto, No. 2. It is a big work, a "warhorse", and Gina Bachauer, a lady of "grande-dame" dimensions, was equal to it. She gave an extremely powerful and exciting performance. . . . there is little else to be said, short of searching for superlatives.

It was interesting to note that Daniel Domb, having handled the solo for cello which begins the third movement very well, was playing a bit sharp when the part returns later in the movement. But it was, somehow, not out of keeping with things; in fact, one might be amused by the notion that he was so knocked out by Miss Bachauer's interpretation, he had trouble finding his feet. . . . and he ably reasserted himself when the piano joined in again, to complete a fine overall performance. The audience had no trouble finding its feet at the end of things, calling back the distinguished "artists" twice to take their bows.

A sportsman's equivalent of a Harlequin romance

Fishing with Gregory Clark, Optimum Publ., Montreal, 192 pp, $8.95

I am ashamed to admit that I read in the bath. After a long day attending tedious lectures or typing endless essays, I need a long period of relaxation in a tub of hot water with a book across my knees.

But the book must be light and suitably non-academic. A mystery story is perfect and so is one of my sister's Harlequin romances if I'm in need of a good chortle. Or maybe a collection of good fishing stories in the dark of winter.

Fishing with Gregory Clark is that kind of book.

You've seen it advertised for months in the Weekend magazine. "Here's your chance to go fishing with Gregory Clark," the ad enthuses, "and add his favourite trout fly to your tackle box." It's a neat looking fly, too, black with a red tail.

There are forty of Gregory Clark's best fishing stories in this collection, all gathered from the weekly columns Clark wrote for Weekend Magazine over the last forty years.

Each tale is centered around a fishing expedition, usually some exploit in which the hero is shown to be crafty or a good fellow or the leader of the expedition.

He is always, but always, a true sportsman. If he doesn't catch the biggest fish, it's because he chivalrously helped his buddy. He's often the perpetrator of a good joke and sometimes the recipient, but he is always prepared to laugh at himself.

The hero, by the way, is the reader. Clark writes in the first person.

All these stories, whether written in the 1930's or in the sixties, follow a standardized formula which Clark devised early in his career and has employed with success ever since. It even won him an honorary doctorate at U of T last year.

The end of the line, for devotees of Gregory Clark.

The opening sentences are always bright and interesting. They lead the reader right into the story.

"Seven years is a long time to plan a fishing trip," is one opener. "Old Dandy Daniels cannot pass up a bargain," is another.

Then Gregory Clark sets the scene. The boys have just discovered a secret lake just full of leaping ten pound rock bass, or the hero's best buddy has been offered an invitation to the most exclusive trout pond in Ontario. You get the idea.

Then Clark leads into the main body of the story. The hero and his friend land a monstrous fish or spend all day in the sun and catch absolutely nothing. In each case there is a conflict of man versus the beast or man versus his life-long rival.

In everyone of these stories, there is a completely unexpected quirk at the end which solves the riddle of the plot and pokes fun at the cast. And in each case, the characters have a good laugh at themselves and go away the best of friends. Sort of a sportsman's equivalent of a Cosmopolitan reader's fantasy.

Clark's plots may not be very demanding but his writing is technically first-rate. The clarity of his style and the lucidity of his prose are an example that every writer of convoluted first year essays or turgid academic papers should follow. Unfortunately, these stories just don't satisfy.

They are amusing and they are light, but that is all. The characters are stereotypes and paper-thin. The plots are absolutely predictable and emotionally empty. They remind me of eating watermelons — sweet nothingness.

After reading two or three of the stories in quick succession, I've really had my fill and after half-an-hour, I'm plain irritated. Hand me a D.H. Lawrence someone, quick!

They are perfect as brighteners in a weekly magazine but I wouldn't read them for pleasure — except in the bathtub, that is.

ZOIDS

We are the zoids believe it or not,
 We're more liberal than Leary,
 And greener than snot,
 But our youth will not show as our views are revealed,
 For we feel that the present needs to be healed,
 The Crux of our stance rests on several main issues,
 For instance we favour recycling used tissues,
 If campus toilets and urinals are perused,
 We're certain tuition fees could be reduced,
 We hope you don't think we're acting the sleeze,
 But we feel all students should be high as their fees,
 So cast your vote for the party with taste,
 If not you're a pile of Nitrogenous Waste.

VOTE ZOID!

VOTE FOR ACTION

... ACTION supports the efforts of the Coalition Against Cutbacks and similar groups to force a change in government policy. Fight the cutbacks—get into ACTION.

... SAC must openly work to ensure that racism and discrimination are exposed and stopped.

... ACTION believes that SAC can make a better effort to change the social values which serve to enslave women.

... ACTION will work hard to overcome alienation and to create a sense of community at the University by:

- 1) Co-operating with college, faculty and other student cultural groups on campus to develop a coordinated schedule of events.
- 2) Holding forums on all major issues to allow people to express their views and learn what others are thinking.
- 3) Working to build faculty-student understanding and respect.

... ACTION wants control of the University to rest with the faculty and students. The Governing Council should not have so many government appointees on it and the appointees should be more representative.

VOTE EARLY — VOTE OFTEN — VOTE ACTION

Students have long complained that SAC has done nothing to improve the quality of the social or academic life at the University.

Now you have a choice.

You can vote for the same old SAC hacks or you can vote for ACTION.

SAC PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

VOTE

- SHIRLEY FRENCH FOR PRESIDENT
- DOUG GERHART FOR VICE-PRES. (PROFESSIONAL)
- PETER HENDERSON FOR VICE-PRES. (SUBURBAN)

WE BELIEVE A STRONG PRIORITY OF SAC SHOULD BE THE ACTIVE SOLICITATION OF STUDENT VIEWPOINTS AND A MORE ACTIVE SOLICITATION OF STUDENT PARTICIPATION IN SAC DECISIONS AND POLICIES.

A STUDENT COUNCIL MUST BE RECEPTIVE TO NEW IDEAS. WE PLEDGE TO FULFILL SUCH A ROLE IF ELECTED. EQUALLY IMPORTANT AS THE GENERATION OF NEW IDEAS HOWEVER, IS THE CAPACITY AND COMPETENCE TO ACT ON THEM. WE BELIEVE OUR EXPERIENCE IN VARIOUS ACTIVITIES AND ORGANIZATIONS WITHIN THE UNIVERSITY AND IN THE COMMUNITY HAS PREPARED US TO BE ABLE TO DO JUST THIS.

SHIRLEY FRENCH HAS SERVED ON GOVERNING COUNCIL, SAC EXECUTIVE AND THE MAYOR'S TASK FORCE ON STATUS OF WOMEN. DOUG GERHART IS SAC SERVICES COMMISSIONER AND SERVES ON THE INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING DEPT. COUNCIL. PETER HENDERSON HAS REPRESENTED ERINDALE STUDENTS ON SAC FOR TWO YEARS.

OUR CONCERNS

GOVERNMENT CUTBACKS

- We will oppose any tuition increase and work for reforms in O.S.A.P., i.e., a higher living allowance and a lower loan ceiling.
- We will press the Government of Ontario to make explicit its intentions with regard to post-secondary education.
- We will work with other groups being affected by social service cutbacks as well as other students across the province through our participation in O.F.S.

UNIVERSITY BUDGETING

- We will work to bring the crucial issue of university budgeting out of the hands of the administration and into the community forum.
- We will work with the student members of the Governing Council to initiate a university-wide discussion of immediate priorities and long-range plans.

- We are committed to small class size, maintenance of tutorials, protection of staff jobs, preservation of small branch libraries and campus services.

SAC & CAMPUS SERVICES

- We will attempt to establish a full time daily PUB on the downtown campus.
- We will conduct a student services survey to ensure that SAC provides the services you want and we will co-operate with all colleges and faculties in providing these services.
- We will prod the university into guaranteeing the quality of its services—Housing, Health Service, Placement Centre, International Student Centre and the like.

SNELL DOHERTY ROBERTS

ROBERT SNELL, a third year Victoria College student, has been active in residence, college and university student government. In 1975-76 he is serving as External Commissioner on the SAC executive, working to promote student interests both on and off the campus.

JOHN DOHERTY, in his second year at Erindale College, is active in student politics as well as being a Trinity football player. He has been a strong student voice on the Erindale College Council and an active SAC rep. Aware of the importance of clear student representation throughout the community, John will be heard.

ANN ROBERTS is in her first year of Architecture. Concerned about SAC services, she wants to bring SAC back to the students. A new source of ideas at the Council, Ann will provide the link between SAC activities and students.

SNELL STANDS FOR QUALITY EDUCATION

The quality of education at U of T is threatened by cuts in government spending. The distribution of these limited funds within the university is questionable—academic programs and services are cut while faculty salaries rise.

University Funding—Increases in class sizes, tuition hikes, and reductions in library services and teaching staff seriously affect the quality of university education.

U of T Budget—The secret budget process of the university must be abolished. The process should be opened so that students can help the university eliminate wasteful spending and work to maintain a high level of necessary services.

OSAP—OSAP should be restructured to provide grants based on students' real financial needs rather than arbitrary formulae.

Pressure for change can be applied at all levels of government. The Snell-Doherty-Roberts slate will be an effective voice for students.

SNELL STANDS FOR STUDENT COUNCIL CO-OPERATION

If SAC tells people what will be done for them it will lead to money being wasted on programs students don't want. Students should take part in the decisions SAC makes.

- College and faculty council members responsible for student services, particularly those from Erindale and Scarborough, should be members of the SAC services commission. This will ensure a coordinated and popular program of services.

- With the combined ideas and abilities of all students, good services for every faculty and college can be provided.

SNELL STANDS FOR SERVICES

Over the last year SAC services have been uninnovative and poorly organized. SAC should and can provide a well organized program of student services for all campuses of the U of T.

- an organized program of top quality free films
- a readable student directory available in the fall
- a canteen truck that operates at cost
- a regular series of Canadian speakers
- noon hour concerts and films

Never forget class struggle, reviewer urges

Man versus the developer in downtown Toronto

To be fair to David Lewis Stein's play, The Hearing, the production which I saw was only a preview. However, unless someone at the Open Circle Theatre has the insight and influence to demand a complete restructuring of its basic theme, the plays that will go before the audience will continue to be, what I consider, a politically backward defence of the right of land developers to tear up a city. Already I can hear the cries of the aesthetes that drama must be judged by how it presents a theme, not what it has to say. Garbage! When a play presents an obvious social message then the author is responsible for the theme's social effect. The Hearing obscures a crucial conflict in Toronto by degrading everyone that has ever taken an honest stand against a de-personalizing system that claims to represent the force of free choice. Besides, degradation is not the basis of good theatre.

Remarkably, Stein hardly bothers to be subtle in his slavish exercise in destroying respect for human motive. There is a veneer of social consciousness that manages to expose the hollowness of the Meadowbrook Development's application to the Ontario Municipal Board for the building of the "Toronto Towers".

Political graft and incompetence, humanitarian posturing by big business and absolute lack of consideration for the overall effect of random building construction are at least suggested. Perhaps there could be some defence made for Stein's characterization of the selfishness of the Midtown Homeowners, the conservative university professor or the hypocritical alderman. Or to be really generous let's grant that Stein did demonstrate something new in his sympathetic view of the way the internal operations of a corporation turn the people working for it into objects. But to say that a $60,000 a year president of a corporation is really a worker because he doesn't own anything substantial! Come on now! This is the 20th century not the 17th. The bourgeoisie really do control the country; workers don't.

The flow of the play is from a dramatization of a hearing of the Ontario Municipal Board to a crucifixion of human weakness. Stein attempts to achieve balance or objectivity by pointing out the bad aspects of the good guys and the good aspects of the bad guys. Objectivity, no! Shallowness, yes! Rather than inventively distinguishing between the two conflicts that manifest themselves in the kind of situation Stein writes about, he takes the easy road and merges them into an indistinguishable glob of disrespect. First, there is the class conflict of the people against the bourgeoisie. And second, there is the individual psychological conflict. In defiance against bureaucracies the main human trait is heroism. However, always underlying the heroism are elements of fear, confusion and selfishness. To balance this play means to clearly present and take a side on the class conflict and, at the same time, to investigate the battle between heroism and selfishness which motivates the individual.

The only character in this play who retains dignity is Joseph Markowitz, the down-home, funky, Horatio Alger type millionaire owner of the development company. Maybe I've really missed Stein's basic message that what the world needs are more grandfatherly, hard-working rip-off artists who like to play gin and torment their anti-nationalist young presidents. What the world probably needs are fewer plays that say that self-destruction and hypocrisy are the only motivation for human activity. And if audience fidgeting and weight shifting are an indication of anything, I won't be alone in making this statement.

It has almost become a cliché in Toronto that good acting is often found in bad plays. The Hearing is no exception. On the foundation of a generally solid and consistent cast, there were a number of particularly outstanding performances. For all my dislike of the way the character was used in the play, I was forced to actually feel some sympathy towards Joseph Markowitz because of E. M. Margolese's firm grasp of his light-hearted yet cynical nature. With Phyllis Benvenuto as his wife Celia, they pulled off a difficult scene as a not-to-be antagonized old couple confronted by their young company president. At the other end of the class structure is the revolutionary Jeannie. Alexandra Sellers was exciting as the human yet tough woman organizer. It is of greater credit to her acting that she had to put up with such facile scenes as her bursting forth with gun in hand to pronounce death sentences on all the reactionaries — a la Patty Hearst. Fine performances were also given by George Merner as J. Arthur Quinlan Q.C. and Maida Rogerson as the opportunistic alderman Madeline Grimes.

However, good acting can't save the play from exile to the land of "To Be Avoided". Stein missed the chance for a truly honest dramatic touch when he did not include himself in the justice that the revolutionary Jeannie handed out to the other politically reprehensible characters in the play.

Moore's reviewer left breathless by huge petrified fossils

Henry Moore's sculpture in wood, stone, metal and his drawings which one can visit at the Art Gallery of Ontario, make an unmistakable impression upon the viewer. Certain radical changes occur in the human form; it is simplified, summarised and distorted. It becomes breathless as a huge petrified fossil; all that was human partakes of the massive quality of the earth and rock. Human suggestions remain where holes replace vital parts as the heart, eyes or lungs. The large reclining figures in bronze, for example, suffer the dismemberment of the most highly developed human parts; again the vital organs, the hands and feet, are atrophied, amputated or pierced, the head reduced to a cypher. The strange, compelling figures suggest the very anti-thesis of modern man, something remote from Twentieth century life.

British poet and art critic, Herbert Read, explains that Moore's art is non-representational. Moore himself expresses his perspective as "shape-conscious". He describes a thorough process of purification, of "cleaning sculpture of surface excrescences" in achieving the fine-chiselled surfaces, the rhythmic and coherent line of his forms. Moore's preoccupation with form is compatible with his study and love of the forms and textures of weathered stone, of rocks, bone formations and shells. Form compromises with material; Moore expresses the living being through his material, within the apparently inanimate form.

Moore searches for a spirit, an inherent "being" in his works which is only partly revealed in actual living forms in nature. His sculpture expresses a strongly atavistic attitude. Reclining or recumbent figures appear to grow down into the earth; standing figures are rigid, impersonal and remote. More significantly, will and consciousness appear replaced by unlimited, untransformed energy; opposed to conscious pursuits of material progress, individuality and other trappings of modernity. Everything lives on a basis of unrealized, undifferentiated potential: a radical return to the source.

Moore deals consistently with dismemberment in his works of sculpture. Moore's emphasis on re-grouping of bodily energies and functions communicates the idea of disintegration, perhaps death as a preliminary to rebirth or integration into the whole. In this manner, Moore retreats from the warm-hearted ways of human responsibility, his works penetrate reality. In a comment on primitive art Moore stated in the 'Listener' that "in its intensity and vitality sculpture is a channel for expressing beliefs, hopes, fears made by people with a direct and immediate response to life". This seems to express his attitude to his own art; as serious art it is instructive, mirroring a deliberately unconscious, detached vision of human beings and their situations.

Visit the Zacks wing of the AGO devoted exclusively to works donated by Moore himself. He communicates successfully and extensively.

Sensitive folkie, electric rockster show skills to music fans

Last week at the El Mocambo, two quite different performers provided solid, enjoyable entertainment.

Monday and Tuesday, it was Tom Paxton, alone with just an acoustic guitar on stage. He has been singing and playing folk music for many years now, and has not gone the way of other folkies like Tom Rush or Joan Baez, who have added sidemen and electronics. He has never quite reached their high stature in North America, yet in Britain he is very popular, probably because of his talents as a composer.

On first appearance, he looked like a throwback to a bygone folk era — bald on top, moustache, sitting on a plain chair. Soon, however, he demonstrated that he can keep an audience interested and amused and really doesn't need other backup. The atmosphere he created with his soft, warm, soothing voice was so quiet and thoughtful that you could barely hear any bottles clanging. During the last set, he asked the audience for requests and proceeded to do many oldies like Ramblin Boy and When Kings Make War. He also read poems, one of which introduced a very moving protest song, and did pleasant, humorous songs that made us smile. He has not been heard from much because for a couple of years he recorded for Reprise and they did not bother promoting him. His most recent LP is called Something In My Life on Private Stock Records.

From Wednesday to Saturday, Larry Coryell and the Eleventh House brought their own kind of high voltage entertainment. The music the band plays is a mixture of jazz and rock, with a leaning to jazz. Coryell is an energetic, up-tempo kind of person who plays guitar in a powerful frenzy of speed and precision. His licks are fast, fast, fast. While he was on stage, the energy around him and in the audience was at a peak and never wound down until he left.

The other members of the Eleventh House provide a solid and talented backup. Mike Mandel often demonstrated how amazingly creative he can be on keyboards and synthesizer, either exchanging riffs with Coryell or in a humorous, talkative solo. Gerry Brown on drums is as energetic and fast as Coryell and provides a good balance. John Lee played a strong, funky bass. Coryell also demonstrated a thoughtful, sensitive side when he opened the sets with acoustic guitar before flying into loud electronic instrumentation. The material they played was mostly from the Level One album and their yet unreleased album, both on Arista Records.

Quebec band deserves hearing even outside Bourassa's fiefdom

"La Marche des Hommes"

Morse Code
Capitol ST-70.038

This four-man band comes from Quebec, but deserves to make it outside their home province. They sound a bit influenced by Emerson, Lake & Palmer and Pink Floyd, but are far better instrumentalists than the latter, and less technologically dominated, more human, less hyper and more rhythmic than the former.

The band is highlighted by Christian Simard, a classically inclined keyboard man who seems to prefer the piano and organ to the mellotron and synthesizer.

Daniel Lemay, whose searing, distortion-propelled guitar contrasts well with his own subtle acoustic guitar playing, along with the drummer and the bassist, mesh into a very nice rhythm section.

On this LP there's a short little disco number, "Cocktail", that was a big single in Quebec. One week after it hit the New York discos, the dancing maniacs had snapped up 200,000 imported Canadian copies at $5 a shot!

The rest of the LP neatly treads the line separating

Toronto has some very loyal, fanatic Coryell fans. For three out of his four nights, the same crowd was seated stage front, just like the last time he was in town. His popularity is steadily increasing. Sonny Forest traditional and "progressive" music. A fiddle works together with a synthesizer, grand piano, acoustic and electric guitars, and rhythm section. Nice, nice, very nice.

The only thing holding Morse Code back is the reluctance of the English-Canadian FM radio stations' program directors to play Quebecois music. They have a valid point when they say that a singing poet from Bourassa's fiefdom won't interest their listeners. But they are wrong if they apply the same reasoning to a group like Morse Code. If you hear the album you'll know what I mean.

Hoechst thinks ahead

Bowie comes full circle, performs Sinatra imitation

Last week was one full of disillusionment for this impoverished student. I learned that Jane Fonda was old enough to be my mother, this week's Ms. Right wasn't, and I went to see David Bowie. Yes, last week saw the return of the self-styled thin white duke to Toronto.

As I sat in the polluted atmosphere of Maple Leaf Gardens, I thought of the David Bowie I wanted to see. It had all started in 1972 when England's youth was recovering from Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange and the kids were conversing in "nadsat", the teen slang of the film. The music industry was stagnating as T. Rex monopolized the charts. Then after two successful singles, "Space Oddity" and "Changes", and three albums, Man of Words, "The Man Who Sold the World" and "Hunky Dory", David Bowie released The Rise and Fall of Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders From Mars. An autobiographical concept album about a futuristic bisexual rock star, it was a classic case of being in the right place at the right time. This was the real horror show platter that all the disciples of Alex and his droogs craved for. The Bowie image was soon consolidated by follow-up albums such as Aladdin Sane and Diamond Dogs.

The Bowie talked of retirement and released Bowie Live as an epitaph. It was slightly premature as he made a comeback in 1975 with Young Americans, which went gold in the U.S. Ziggy Stardust was left far behind and both the image and music suffered. His latest offering Station to Station has received mixed reviews; in a recent interview he denounced rock 'n' roll as the devil's music, admitted this final tour was only for money and that he fancied himself as the next Sinatra. Ziggy must have been turning in his grave.

So it was with considerable trepidation that I awaited the arrival of the thin white duke on stage. Bowie came on several minutes after the band, looking like a Bohemian businessman in dark trousers, vest and white shirt. He concentrated on songs from his latest album, but he did perform a good cross-section of his repertoire. The band was completely lacking in fire; there was the ubiquitous drum solo, Tony Kaye tinkled about on keyboards and Toronto's own Stace Heydon played some muddly guitar. If only Mick Ronson and the Spiders from Mars had been there. In only two songs did he show flashes of his former brilliance; "Five Years" during which he harked back to the days of Ziggy Stardust "singing songs of darkness and disgrace", and the Velvet Underground's "I'm Waiting for the Man", a fitting tribute to Bowie's mentor, Lou Reed.

Throughout the evening Bowie stood alone in the spotlight and I'm afraid to say that at times he looked and sounded like an emaciated version of 'old blue eyes'. Was this rock 'n' roll suicide? I immediately went home and lit a candle beside my copy of Ziggy Stardust.

Howie's new clean-cut image goes beyond glitter, shows even ordinary dullness can be hip with the right marketing.

Beat era coffee-house expatriates, heirs of Kerouac, take second step, fall on faces

SECOND STEP AZTEC TWO STEP

Aztec Two Step is Rex Fowler and Neal Shulman. Their debut album, released on Elektra in 1972, was an interesting and promising work. The group's name, taken from a Ferlinghetti poem, was a deliberate choice, since the beat years served as the album's major inspiration. The Ferlinghetti-Kerouac influences were obvious yet subtly effective. The overall feeling was one of a renaissance of the mid-60's New York folk scene. Jerry Yester, an original Lovin' Spoonful member, produced the album. John Sebastian played harmonica. Yester played autoharp and shared the banjo-work with Doug Dillard. Elaine "Spanky" McFarland sang back-up. The Fowler and Shulman words and music were pleasant but ordinary. Unfortunately, the concept did not sell the album, which now reposes in the bargain bins. When David Geffen reorganized Elektra Records after the WEA merger, Aztec Two Step's contract was not renewed.

Undaunted, Fowler and Shulman signed with RCA. Their first album on their new label is Second Step, which may in fact be a fatal step. They have abandoned all the people and themes involved in their first album, and what they have left is not particularly inspiring. There are some good things about this album. Neal Shulman plays a nice acoustic lead guitar, especially on "It's Going On Saturday" and "Faster Gun". There is subdued but effective fiddle work on "Walking on Air". There is one song, "Hey Little Mama", that can catch you unaware if you're not careful. The song could best be described as cocktail perversion with sadism and bondage images predominating. Oh, but it's so cute.

Aztec Two Step has engaged the aid of some good New York session people, notably John Tropea on electric guitar and Alan Schwartzberg on drums. Unfortunately, their efforts are to no avail. Tropea is wasted in accompaniment, or pointless gimmickry. Schwartzberg could have been drumming in his sleep, and producer Paul Leka must have slept through the recording sessions as well. The same trio have worked behind Harry Chapin, among others, with great success.

Rex Fowler wrote nine of the album's songs. The major theme is the death of New York City. The lyrics are embarrassing, the rhymes forced, and the mood is non-existent. Cashman and West's "American City Suite" was much more effective, and at least they could harmonize. Fowler and Shulman's vocal work is often discordant and off-key.

The lyrics are the death-knell of the album. There is naivete in the "Astral projection, cosmos connection" vein of "Cosmos Lady". There is inanity in Cinderella's jilting of "Humpty Dumpty" and his subsequent suicide. Fowler will do anything to get a line to rhyme with New York: "But if you value your life, carry a gun and a knife and a fork". You've got to wonder about anyone who rhymes "pushers" and "Dave de Busschere". I'm willing to bet that Aztec Two Step will never learn how to walk.

The Battle for Salt-Bucket Beach
 Ian MacNeill
 McClelland & Stewart, $8.95

Ian MacNeill's first novel, The Battle for Salt-Bucket Beach, is above all a truly funny book. Certainly there are flaws in the convoluted and complex plot development which often becomes entangled in itself, thereby losing some of its comic punch, but the main intention, to make the reader laugh, laugh, and then laugh again, is successfully achieved. Few Canadian writers have ever been able to point out just how ludicrous and absurd Canadian life can be, but Ian MacNeill manages to do this in a supremely comic and bawdy novel which pokes fun at our own schizophrenic national character divided between its own provincialism and nationalism.

The plot is based on the efforts of Edward Gossen, the front for a group of Toronto real estate developers, to buy up the land surrounding a superb and unspoiled Cape Breton beach so that it can be rebuilt as a resort complex. Gossen, the city slicker from Toronto, naturally underestimates the keen intelligence and greed of the local Cape Bretoners and finds himself incapable of "discreetly" taking over all the land for the Upper Canada interests.

To make the plot a little more interesting than the mere battle of city rats versus country mice, the closing of the business deals concerning the rightful ownership of Salt-Bucket Beach soon becomes contingent upon the impending visit of the Prime Minister. This young and dashing PM, who obviously creates a mania wherever he goes, is unnamed, but he is cunningly exposed as the man who "contracted gonorrhoea on a camel caravan journey through Turkestan in his youth" and thus requires frequent stops at predetermined local urinals during all public tours. The local Maoists who plan to kidnap the PM — a group of fifteen year olds — are fully aware of his weakness and successfully capture him in the museum washroom, thereby initiating the complications of the subplot.

Not satisfied with just two plot strands, Ian MacNeill populates his fictional world with unforgettable characters. Amanda Tyler, for example, the last of the great female aristocrats in Cape Breton who loves men as if they were horses, is never seen, either in or out of bed, without her riding boots and crop. Equally amusing is the Reverend Mr. MacAllister whose wife ran away with a Toronto businessman and who relearns his holy writ in order to give modern interpretations of biblical wisdom and testament. But the man whose antics are usually the most ludicrous is the RCMP inspector who loves disguises and must be broken of his habit the hard way.

Determined to capture all the "red elements" which are dominating Cape Breton, this "master of disguise" is not only arrested as a "Peeping Tom," charged with attempted rape, and, finally bitten in the pantyhose — at waist level — by a ferocious dog, he is also, at the end of the book, promoted to a more influential rank, albeit with a slightly higher voice.

The novel, then, is a funny, funny book. And, although there are a number of minor flaws and even a few sections of rather flat tiresome prose, Ian MacNeill is to be congratulated for a deliciously comic work which reveals the true absurdity latent in the Canadian character. If the potential reader is inhibited by the price tag assigned to The Battle for Salt-Bucket Beach, he is certainly not prevented from borrowing the book either from a wealthier friend or from the public library.

Reviewer eschews musical preconceptions

The New Music Concert on Saturday February 28, featuring the works of Steve Reich, Salvatore Martirano, and Mucica Elettronica Viva brought to mind the following fantasy:

One winces, one talks, another laughs inappropriately, yet another flees the hall midway. He may flee to a Beethoven symphony where he will be safely covered in the security blanket of the majority, unaware that he may possess no more sensitivity to Beethoven than the new music.

But no; he deserves the benefit of the doubt. After all, he had the courage to attend the concert to begin with. He will run home panting, unlock his door and collapse in an armchair, his trembling hands frantically pulling justifications out of the air. "It's all a lot of noise. Kids could do better. It's a con. Those guys are ..." but the "justifications" fall shattered to the floor. The broken dishes do not assuage the uncomfortable feeling gnawing at him. He must unearth it, however painful. He digs and digs. He shovels up anger. Anger? One more spadeful should do it ... Fear. Fear? Fear of confronting the unknown. Fear of coming to terms with unfamiliar sounds. After all he will have to stand on his own when he listens and passes judgment on them. The authority figures, tradition and majority, will not be there. It will be difficult indeed.

Now less hampered he is able to see the musicians in a more realistic light. They too have fears to overcome and a lot of risks to take. Like him they are constantly changing. The closeness required for people to create together does not threaten him as much. He can now become more absorbed in the sounds and less in himself.

Zingo! Here we go again. I have one brief report to make, on a grand old melodrama recently playing at the Central Library Theatre. Dirty Work at the Crossroads, a melodrama the stuff of which many Perils of Pauline scripts were made, is a classic exercise, like the work of Gilbert and Sullivan, with its constant satiric references introduced in a fundamentally frothy entertainment. This play began with the stage manager appearing on stage and exhorting the assembled multitudes to express their moral fervour in either hissing or applause. The villain, a slimy and looming-eyebrowed cad, received his lull share of outcry from the citizenry, but the stout Adam Oakhart somehow failed to live up to his true-blue image. Ida Rheingold, the girl corrupted into a college man's saloon friend, was the most morally ambiguous of all, but the men in the house displayed a formally correct appreciation for the well-flaunted garb. After more complications in the plot than were believable, a series of memorable asides from one member of the cast after another, and some delightful abuse of the most elementary rules of the drama, the illusion was finally destroyed and Professor played his last solo on the octafina. Altogether a fine evening of gut-busting comedy, played up to an extent that indicated the considerable gifts of the performers. The run has now closed, but I am advised that a similar production, The Mumberley Inheritance, will be performed at the Todmorden Mills Theatre beginning March 18. Early warning for Dudley Do-right fanatics; call 489-5200 for the juicy details.

Coming up on campus, the last gasp of the season: At Hart House, beginning the 11th, Denis Johnston's The Sythe and the Sunset, a story of the Troubles in Ireland. Box office, 928-8668. At Seelye Hall, Trinity College, the T.C.D.S. unravel The Life of Galileo March 10-13 at 8:00, admission $1 to cover the royalties. At the U.C. Playhouse the Saturday at 8:30, puppetry by the Frog Print Theatre; next week, Wednesday and Thursday at 1 and Friday and Saturday at 8:30, an adaptation of a Russian story in various styles of stagecraft — Stanislavski, Artaud, Brecht . . . interesting. Reserve, please, at 928-6307. The Puculi Ludique Societas presents the musical spectacular Samson Dux Fortissime in the Chapel at Trinity; shows Friday and Saturday and Sunday afternoon, this week and next. Reservations are strongly recommended.

At the Studio Theatre, Strindberg: The Stranger and The Pariah, tonight and tomorrow at 8:30; call 928-8705 and reserve. At Victoria College Theatre in the New Academic Building tonight and tomorrow at 7:30, Max Frisch, Herr Biedermann und die Brandstifter and Brecht, Die Kleinbuerger Hochzeit $1.75 for students $2.50 adults and from Thursday to Saturday (March 11th to 13th) Leonard Angel's "incident at Antietam" and J. M. Synge's "Shadows of the Glen" at 8:30.

Elsewhere on the great high roads of Toronto theatre: close to home, at the Embassy, an astounding Canadian counterattack on the American bicentennial, Turn Back Columbus! We Don't Want to be Discovered Again! Mondays to Fridays at 9:00 and Saturdays at 8:00 and 10:30. $6 is a bit much for untested material, but the price is slashed by half to students Monday to Thursday. Ah, the Palm Grove Lounge! At Ryerson, in the Pub, Riot 76, where tickets entitle you to free beer; this weekend and Thursday to Saturday next at 8 and 10:30, tickets $2. At the Phoenix, a real gem, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead, previews the 9th and 10th, and continues thereafter, curtain 8:30. Its director Graham Harkey maintains his deft touch, this will again be a line bankroll production for the theatre. Students $2.50 except Friday and Saturday ($4) at 390 Dupont Street.

Openings, lovely openings: Toronto Truck take on Edgar Lee Masters'

Parlisan Festival, a two-day extravaganza of music, theatre, visual arts, films, video, and poetry, will take place this weekend at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Rd. All the artists involved are interested in social change, from trade unionism, consumerism, sexuality, and tenant organizing to third world politics. Above, David DeLauney and friends give a live performance of the soundtrack of a Uruguayan film, "In The Jungle There Is Much To Do." Admission is $2 for one day or $3 for both. Call 964-6560 for more details.

Spoon River Anthology at the Heliconian Hall weekends at 8:30 (35 Hazelton), and Sleuth (O, ambition) at the Colonnade Wednesday to Sunday; 8:30 except Saturday at 7:00 and 9:30. Theatre Pass Muraillie trots out Don Harron as Russel Horsburgh in the Horsburgh Scandal beginning the 10th at St. Paul's, Avenue Road; call 363-8988 for details. Meanwhile Operation Finger Pinky raises a few things elsewhere. At the Aladdin Theatre, 2637 Yonge (483-2231) Noel Coward's Private Lives graces the stage. At the Bear Theatre, 736 Bathurst, Ionesco's The Portrait and Pirandello's The Man With the Flower in his Mouth. Wednesday to Saturday at 8:30, with a Saturday matinee at 3:00. Call 532-3242; two interesting efforts. Theatre Second Floor, 86 Parliament, presents (Turkish delight) Wednesdays to Mondays at 8:30. Beginning March 10. Call 364-4025 and ask for information at your own risk. Pepl Puppet Theatre is currently presenting The Emperor's New Clothes weekends at 1:30 and 3:00. Brunswick and Bloor, call 422-2605 or 920-8373. At the O'Keete, Man of La Mancha with David Atkinson, for one week, the 8th-13th. At the Royal Alex, Salmen and the Madness of God. And wait for it — Studio Lab Theatre is about to present Kipling's Just So Stories! At Tarragon, Fineberg's musical Odyssey, Fresh Disasters, continues. No listing for Redlight Theatre, but call 368-9094 and ask what's up.

FRIDAY: If you want to laugh, there's a Woody Allen double bill at the Revue tonight and tomorrow: Bananas at 8:00 and Sleeper at 9:40. If you prefer to cry, the U.C. Film Club is showing Orphans of the Storm, D. W. Griffith's classic about the French Revolution, with both Gishes, at Medici at 8:00. And for a bit of both, Cinema Lumiere has Hearts of the West, 7:30 and 9:30, tonight and Saturday.

SUNDAY: At the Revue, at 8:30, today and Monday, Pinter's Butley, with Alan Bates, from the play by Simon Gray. Those who are very fond of a very small part of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, or of Dirk Bogard, can enjoy them again in Visconti's Death in Venice, Cinema Lumiere at 7:15 and 9:30.

MONDAY: A Godard double tonight and Tuesday at Cinema Lumiere: the early, deliciously silly Band of Outsiders at 7:30 and A Married Woman at 9:15. The latter was banned in France at first, probably not because of its sex scenes, which are more clinical than erotic, but because of the parallel it draws between the modern French marriage and the Nazi concentration camps. One of the things Godard had to do to get it released was to change the title, which was originally The Married Woman, so his audience could reassure themselves that not everybody was that badly off. A friend of a friend gave up all his possessions after seeing this movie, so watch with care.

TUESDAY: In The series of Japanese films at the Ontario Film Theatre, way out at the Science Centre, continues with Ozu's A Hen in the Wind at 7:30 tonight. The Revue has Cassavettes' A Woman Under the Influence tonight and tomorrow at 8:30.

WEDNESDAY: The Ontario Film Theatre is showing all of the American Film Theatre productions on Wednesday nights at 7:30, a real break for fans of Legitimate Film. Tonight, Brecht's Galileo, starring Topol and John Gielgud, and directed by Joseph Losey, who directed the first stage production.

THURSDAY: A treat for Kristofferson fans at the Revue, tonight through Saturday. At 7:15 Mazursky's Blume in Love (Rape in Venice), also starring George Segal, and at 9:30, Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore, by Martin Scorsese, whose latest, Taxi Driver, another variation of the New York-is-Hell theme he did somewhat better in Mean Streets, opens tonight.

Farber and Co. pace Scar to comeback win over St. Mikes Things got back to normal in the hockey playoffs as Scarborough came from behind to down St. Mikes 4-2 on Tuesday night. Before a crowd that was small but extremely homely the Maroon Machine, this hack's pick for the Cup, outthrust an immobile bunch of shamrocks.

Phil Atrill, who coaches the boys, went with two lines for the contest not because they were his best players but because of convenience: "With a couple of guys out with injuries and suspensions, I just felt that by asking their linemates not to dress we could be more efficient."

Atrill could have been second guessed in the first half of the game as SMC jumped out to a 2-1 lead. Glenn Farber and Ian Robertson combined for a deflection to give Scarborough an early lead but Howorth and Platt (sounds like an accounting firm) tied it and put the Flying Fathers ahead. Farber and Co. were being beaten at their own game as SMC was skating their little butts off.

Things were pretty much the same at the start of the second as Scarborough took a bad penalty. St. Mike's couldn't put the puck in the net despite a large amount of shots on goal.

One thing that was missing from this contest were the usual brawls that accompany Scarborough, and for that matter, SMC contests. Baiting Bob White, who cannot go to his left because of a crippling knee injury, the surgery of which left a two foot scar on his leg, was ineffective despite his insistence on carrying his lumber at eye level.

Scarborough was tame and always backed off in touchy situations. Hamm and Taylor called a good game despite the ravings of the delirious Scarborough fans, sometimes known as the "Dirty Dozen".

Scoring in the second was Perkins for Scarborough, who, just leaving the sin bin, took a pass from Scarborough's own Dennis Potvin, Glenn Farber, and raced in to beat a surprised SMC goalie, Nick the Greek, believe it or not.

Randy Magnus put the favorites ahead with a superior blast on the shortside that beat the Greek from the point. It was his first of this ancient season. Murray Nesbitt completed the score sheet on a piece of garbage.

What remains to be seen is whether Scarborough can keep from choking against surprising Meds led by Dr. No, Mike Klimans.

In other action it was PHE B re-establishing themselves against Knox with a 7-1 shellacking. Bulkoand Downs each had a pair for the jocks. Trinity A, the IIA champs, squeaked by MGT. Studies by the count of 5-4. Irwin got two for the winners while, dig this, Mad Dog College doubled for the losers.

A couple of good games tonight for all you pucksters. First it's Innis and Scar II then it's Forestry and Pharmacy. Show up, if you can stomach it. Action starts at 7:00 pm. — ED.

Meds outgunned by New Upsets have been the rule instead of the exception in the interfac playoffs this year. Attesting to that are the mad dogs of Meds who took it on the chin from sleeper New I. In a game numbering 78-70 it was superior shooting that triumphed.

Meds could not do anything from the outside while New was continually finding the range. Meds have had an up and down season as the addition of Lorne Langer has added size but along with the height came a lot of fouls. The same goes for veteran Marc Sherkin. Sherkin and Langer put up very little points while the bulk of the scoring responsibility rested on the well-worn shoulders of Walters who gunned for 30 points, almost half of the physicians total.

Outplayed on the boards but too fast for the Docs, New was led by Rybansky who popped 26 through the rope. Tonight they go on to play Sr. Engineering who walloped hapless Dents 101-60.

Skule is definitely the team to beat this year led by Tacconelli and Ron Gratz who totalled over 30 points between them. The whole Dents program ended this week. Vlahovich had 19 while Chase had 18. The second division representatives must have fielded a bunch of epileptic blind dwarfs (courtesy of George Zajac) as they were dismembered by Pharmacy 95-22. Humme had 27 for the winners, to say the least.

In other action this week we bid a fond adieu to Mike Katz and Fac Ed as they were eliminated by Scarborough 94-72. Don Campbell had 29 for the winners while Katz and Allen runned and gunned for 18 and 21 respectively.

PHE A downed SGS 61-59 in a defensive battle that featured lots of good bodychecking. Thomson had 22 for the jocks while Fjeld sparked ashie is prone to with 18 for the Grads.

Rounding off this garbage was a game between Knox and Jr. Engineers. Hopefully we got the score right and it was the God Squad triumphing over the Skulechildren 72-66. A Fandy took it to the limit for two bits worth of points while Antonopollos and Sevek ended their season with 13 and 14 respectively. More action soon. In case you're wondering why there haven't been any interfac basketball pix all year it is because our photographers refuse to compromise their artistic pride for the lousy lighting in Hart House.

U of T Judoka Triumphs

By JOHN MORRISON
On the weekend the Varsity Judo Team, under the instruction of Goki Uemura, again demonstrated their proficiency in the art of Judo.

Facing stiff competition from many Ontario universities, the Toronto Judoka rallied to dominate all classes. Section one, white, yellow and orange, saw two Varsity judokas, Frank Sisti and Sebastian Tisberger meeting in the finals with Frank Sisti taking the title.

Section two, green and blue also dominated by Toronto and saw Rod MacRiner finish first, Carl Cooke second, John Van Adrichen third and Steve Pogzaj fourth. Section three, brown and black, found John Morrison in third place.

In the four man team competition, the team of Jack Preobrazenski, John Morrison, John Van Adrichen and Olympic hopeful Chris Preobrazenski shuf out all competition to capture the team title. Special mention goes to green belt John Van Adrichen who soundly defeated a much more experienced black belt competitor in the finals.

Makeshift defense ties moneyhungry Marlies

By JONATHAN GROSS
SPORTS EDITOR

It was a great night for comparisons Wednesday. Not only could we compare the style of play between the university ranks and the OHA but also the salaries each player on either team can expect on "graduating."

The scoreboard showed little contrast, however, as the Toronto Marlboros and U of T Blues battled to a 4-4 standoff. The crowd of 1,500 witnessed the best game of the season at Varsity Arena. The teams each showed their stuff enough to prompt the crowd to a rare standing ovation at the games' conclusion.

A few weeks ago the Blues and the Marlies got together to discuss the possibility of an exhibition game, as each team was about to experience a lengthy layoff this week. The result was Wednesday's "Non-Battle of the Leagues". Both coaches tried to play down the contest as neither team wanted to risk a possible loss of prestige.

The post-game scene in the Marlie dressing room was interesting. Mike McEwen, the best defenseman on the ice (and looking towards a pro career) was candid when asked about his emotional response to the game: "We didn't find out about the game until last Friday and this is usually a day off for us. Most of the guys were joking around until the third period. We didn't see any scouts so why go all out? Some players were even playing cards between the periods."

The value of McEwen's statement is marginal in several areas. True the Marlies were not going all out.

Rarely was a winger seen picking up his man. But this has been their problem all year.

On the other hand it was mentioned earlier that for some players there are big salaries at stake next year, so the absence of scouts may have been an influence on effort.

The Blues could not be unhappy with their performance. With a depleted defense Tom Watt was forced to move Larry Hopkins back to the blueline. "Hoppy" played well along with John Bays, Al Potts and Wayne Morrissey, the rest of the defensive corps.

In the context of the nationals scheduled for next week, the defense is still less than adequate. Watt knows this and hopefully Charlie Hughes and Rocci Pagnello will be back shortly. Dave Rooke is out for the season with torn ligaments.

The goaltending contained a mixture of luck and skill at both ends. Mark Logan and Dave Hulme split the chores and the goals equally. Hulme was impressed with the junior's shots. "They must push a lot of iron. Our forwards were coming back so they had to shoot from far out."

Three of the Marlie goals were on heavy shots that left the two goalies staring. But they also stopped a fair number of those "death blows".

It was a seesaw battle with the Marlies coming back three times from one goal deficits. Kent Ruhnke who continues to make a mockery of the U of T scoring records opened the scoring with a wrist shot from his off wing. The big captain put it upstairs past Marlie goalie Doug

Cardy after being setup by Wayne Morrissey.

This early lead was erased six minutes later as McEwen unleashed a blast that went right through Logan's glove. Bob Garner made it 2-1 when he knocked in a rebound shortly thereafter. The Blues defense had trouble clearing the puck all night; without Pagnello they are missing their best rushing defenseman. The second Marlie goal brought out these weaknesses.

After the first period Dave Rooke, who was seen speculating amongst a bevy of females, commented on the play: "Our guys are looking over their shoulder. You have to be more aggressive against an 'A' club".

The Blues took Rooke's advice and came out flying in the second. Hopkins tied it up early on a short-side wristshot, aided by John Bays and John Precious. The weak powerplay clicked midway through the third as Kaplain Kent put another one upstairs.

Lynn Jorgenson tied it up for the Marlies before the period ended with a major league wrist shot.

The third period saw the two squads trade goals. The Blues had the lead when John Bays, who is growing less and less disoriented every practice, pumped the puck past Kevin Walton in the first minute of the stanza. Walton had replaced Cardy at the same time as Hulme entered the game.

Little Gary Farelli, who combines cute looks with skating tied it up three minutes later with a cannonading explosion that measured five on Richter Scale. Farelli is one of those players that "drives for show and putts for dough", if you catch my drift.

It was a super game that everyone enjoyed. One can only wonder if Kent Ruhnke will ever make more money than Farelli and his teammates, degree and everything. BLUE WAILES... Blues outshot the Marlies 42-28... Let's do it again—

Champion Gonads say 'Up your volleyball'

The intramural volleyball season has drawn up to a close, and once again the S.G.S. Gonads have captured the division I title. Admitting that the going was extremely facile would be a blatant truism, however, since this article will be shorter on veracity than on boasting, such a point need not be made explicitly, as it will doubtless be made implicitly.

The playoff round certainly held many surprises in store, especially for the highly favoured (or runner up, that is) Scarborough boys. After losing quite expectedly to the Gonads, they were to lose quite unexpectedly to the Cinderella Erindale squad, thereby being eliminated from further competition.

As the Gonads sat patiently waiting on the sidelines, the Engineers, also once beaten by the Gonads, managed to stave off elimination by edging Erindale in three thrilling games 16:14, 12:15 and 15:8. The stage was now set for the grand finale, a rematch between the Engineers and S.G.S. Unfortunately the finale wasn't very grand after all.

Due partially to the poor organization which forced the Engineers to field an incomplete squad for half of the finals (until the arrival of the great Myron "Heartburner" Krywonis), but due mostly to the vastly superior play of the humble Gonads, the match finished with S.G.S. victorious 15:4, 8:15 and 15:5.

The Engineers' victory in the intermediate game was due of course to the ephemeral moral inspiration provided by the great Myron, who managed to stave off his team's panic at least briefly, before succumbing to the inevitable himself.

Perhaps a note of explanation is in order regarding the unusual situation existing at the intramural level in volleyball, whereby certain teams (well at least one) participating in the intramural league are superior to any intercollegiate teams in Canada.

Due to a C.I.A.U. ruling forbidding players from private clubs from participating in C.I.A.U. competition, most top calibre players have chosen to remain faithful to their clubs and have forsaken university competition.

This, however, makes them eligible to participate in intramural V.B., thereby simultaneously lowering the calibre of university play and elevating that of intramural play.

The Gonads are a paradigm of such renegades banding together to form a squad sophisticated enough to defeat any university team in Canada.

The Grads consist of: George Zajac (coach and cohort in non-psychological preparation for games) and Orest Stanko (full brother to a half-wit, or half brother to a full-wit), both member of the current Canadian National champions; Keith Doan (who gets up for games higher than for spikes) and Titi Romet (whose perpetual worried look is an antithesis to his cruel and icy interior), both members of the defending Ontario championship team; Reg "The Infamous Babysitter" Eadie (beware lest he sit on your baby), co-coach with Mr. Romet of the Varsity Blues; Henri "The Immigrant" Arnaud (France's gain was our loss), former member of Faculte des Sciences de Montpellier, university champions of France (1968 and 1969); Guy Bellemare and Paul Joe, perennial members of the Varsity Blues; and two promising rookies, Boris "Killer" Kowalsky (former professional wrestler), and Adonis "Fingers" Yatchew (former concert pianist and safecracker).

However such an impressive roster would not be complete without mention of our vivacious and voluptuous cheerleader Joanne Yachimec, without whose presence the aforementioned "gentlemen" would certainly not have behaved as such.

The S.G.S. Gonads are living proof (if one condones rampant inductive generalizations) that the intelligencia of our technocratic society is not only humble and devilishly handsome, but athletically dexterous and agile as well.

No formal complaint: all slates still running in SAC election

Students will vote for SAC and yay or nay for NUS/UNE

By SA'AD SAIDULLAH

Contrary to the impressions many students might have received in the last issue of The Varsity, all four presidential slates continue to remain in the campaign. Since no formal complaint has been lodged about alleged election violations, students will be asked to vote for the candidates of their choice this Wednesday and Thursday.

Included on the SAC ballot will be a referendum on U of T participation in the National Union of Students-Union Nationale des Etudiants.

Ballot boxes will be located in all colleges and faculties as well as other well-used buildings — Roberts, Sid Smith, MacLennan and others.

Students can vote only for a slate and not for individuals, by placing an X beside the appropriate group of names. The NUS-UNE referendum will ask the question to support or not to support a $1 increase in incidental fee to support this organization.

A turnout of 25 per cent of the student population is required for a referendum result to be binding.

Vote early and often.

Dribbles Dooley, the newest SAC candidate, representing the silent majority on campus, chats up the younger, pre-public vote.

TYP responds to article: Varg report erroneous

By PAUL McGRATH

Staff and students of the Transitional Year Programme (TYP) based at Imis College have reacted strongly to a report in last Friday's Varsity that erroneously identified an assessment by the programme's director as that of external assessors.

The programme is currently under assessment by the government to determine whether or not the programme will continue.

The university has appointed as assessors Professor Harry Crowe, former dean of Atkinson College, Vincent D'Oyley of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and Lyn Trainor of the university's department of physics.

The report quoted was the submission of the programme's director, David Nimmo, to the external assessors and was mistaken for the assessors' final report to the provincial government, which is due in April. The assessor's report is controversial and does not represent a consensus among either staff or students of TYP.

Some of the substantial disagreements that appear in submissions from other staff members revolve around the degree to which black studies constitute a significant part of the core curriculum. The director's report inferred that black studies were becoming too large a part of the curriculum.

The course outlines included in the director's report indicate that black studies constitute only half of the English core course and a small percentage of the Social Science core.

The director's report suggests that white students consider the programme "irrelevant", a point that is contested by many staff and students. The protest Varsity article received from both black and white students indicates a support for the programme that crosses racial barriers.

The programme is multi-racial, and was instituted in 1970 to give economically and educationally disadvantaged students a chance at university education. It arose out of an education programme in the black community, which before it became based at the University of Toronto had expanded to include other groups. At this point the programme caters to any person who is economically and educationally disadvantaged regardless of race or color.

The current assessment is being undertaken at the behest of both the Ministry of Colleges and Universities and the Governing Council. The questionnaire being circulated to staff members, present and former students, present and former members of the programme's Policy Committee and other interested parties includes questions on the curricular and non-curricular aspects of the programme.

In addition they are being questioned on the best institutional setting for TYP, whether expansion of the programme should take place inside the university or across the province, and how best to integrate community input with "academic supervision".

At present the TYP is the only academic programme at U of T that involves community representation on the decision-making body.

The assessor's final question seeks opinion on the proper level of funding for the programme and how to obtain it. At present, TYP, students are funded per head at less than the normal Arts and Sciences rate, although the university supplements government funding to bring the level to par.

Although the parameters of the assessors' evaluation are wide, the basic question is whether they can make a strong enough case to the government for continued funding even at its current level, which all staff agree is inadequate.

One of the topics that will be raised in the assessment is the possible duplication of services available elsewhere.

SAC mailing seeks response on cutbacks

By ERIC McMILLAN

"Cutbacks are not boring."

Repeat fifty times, and if your insomnia isn't cured, try another fifty times substituting SAC for cutbacks.

Every student represented by SAC will shortly receive in the mail a brochure outlining the student council's opposition to the Henderson-McKeough Report and asking students to clip a coupon to be delivered to the Minister of Colleges and Universities.

SAC is spending 5,000 dollars on the mailing of 28,000 pamphlets and hopes to elicit an impressive number of replies.

Reacting to charges that SAC has not taken concerted action against cutbacks, a SAC spokesperson pointed out the brochure cost took "a lot of time and effort" and lambasted The Varsity for not covering council meetings.

SAC has co-operated with the Metro Coalition Against Cutbacks to the extent of renting Convocation Hall for a rally March 11 and financial and advertising support. The council has also drummed up by SAC are 2,000 names for the Coalition's petition against transit fare increases.

The rally will feature student leaders, daycare workers, health care personnel, labour representatives, and reform aldermen as speakers.

The brochure mailed to students argues that the Ontario government is acting on the Henderson Report, which recommended 65 per cent tuition increases and decreased student aid.

Davis and Parrott to the contrary, the government has raised the loan ceiling and asked for permission to exempt student fees from anti-inflation controls, according to the brochure.

prevalent reasons for people not attending university.

Students are asked to bring the coupons to the SAC office or mail them in if necessary.

It also argues that financial difficulties are among the most

In a public presentation, SAC will then deliver them to Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities.

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — A Hawaiian man has patented a new type of casket designed especially for people who would like to stand up, rather than lay down — for eternity.

The casket is a clear plastic see-through cylinder which is lowered vertically into a hole about 32 inches wide and eight feet deep. Inventor Abner Nunes explains that by using this stand-up casket, a normal cemetery plot could hold three times as many people as most graveyards now do.

Nunes says there are several other advantages to the new coffin. The body is vacuum packed into the cylinder so that no air enters.

The casket is also see-through, so the families of the deceased can see what the departed chose to wear to their own funeral.

NORTH DAKOTA (ZNS-CUP) — A Fargo, North Dakota schoolteacher has been denied permission to change his name to the number "1069".

Michael Jerbert Dengler petitioned the courts to change his legal name to 1069, explaining that the number "Best describes the relationship I have with myself."

Dengler stated that number 1 represented his view of nature, the number 0 his relationship with time in movement through the universe, number 6 his relationship to the universe, and number 9 his relationship to essence.

Judge Herbert Maxwell said he appreciated the relationship, but said the numbers would cause too much confusion.

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — Are you ready for bread that helps you lose those unwanted pounds instead of putting them on?

Medical World News is reporting that a new kind of bread containing cellulose fibers will be out on the market soon.

The new bread contains 25 per cent less calories than most breads — yet has 25 times more roughage. Roughage is considered absolutely essential in most weight reduction diets.

One study has found that people who ate more than 7 slices of the cellulose bread each day over a 53-day period lost 5.72 pounds on the average.

The new cellulose bread is made of the very stuff newspapers are printed on. Medical World News does not mention how the bread tastes.

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — As if we didn't have enough to worry about these days, the latest issue of Scientific American reports that the force of gravity is steadily growing weaker throughout the universe.

The publication says that recent scientific calculations indicate that — as a result of less gravity — the moon is moving away from the earth, and the earth is steadily moving further away from the sun.

It's nothing to panic about, however; the magazine says that the effects on earthlife will not be noticeable at all for billions of years.

Prof ends century-old search for lost temple

CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

Copyright The Varsity 1976

A 1375-year old Egyptian temple has been discovered by a U of T Egyptology professor, bringing to a close over 100 years of international exploration and speculation.

Professor R. B. Redford, of the Near Eastern studies department, uncovered an eight-metre portion of a wall encompassing the largest temple ever built by Ancient Egypt's most unusual pharaoh, Akenaton. The discovery was made in the town of Karnak, or Thebes as it was known in ancient times.

"We just kept digging and digging," Working with an international team of 35 workers and archaeologists, he uncovered the site one day before the dig was scheduled to finish for the season. After digging without success for three months, the find confirmed Redford's "guess" on its location. "We just kept digging and digging," he said jubilantly. Sifting painstakingly through over 9 metres (29 feet) of centuries-old debris, Redford indicated "at first it was very discouraging".

But hours before the team was "thinking of packing it in" for the season, an Egyptian digger uncovered a cross-section of the wall. When the discovery was made, Redford described the team as overwhelmed. "I was up at the house looking at some pottery," he said. "When I came down they all said "mabrak" (Arabic for congratulations) and started to sing".

The wall is a portion of the temple raised by Akenaton to celebrate his reign. What makes it distinctive is that it is the largest of the eight he constructed (the rest of which have not been located), and it is built to honour the monotheistic religion he started when ancient Egyptians had been used to several special interest deities.

Upon Akenaton's death, his successor restored a multi-god religion, and destroyed structures he had erected. The 40,000 stone blocks used in their construction were used in other projects in the area. Because the blocks could be carried by one man, the temple sites became convenient and well-used quarries.

In 1967 an international team began a collection and identification of these blocks by computer. After collecting all the blocks in local warehouses, a site became important if the temples were ever to be reconstructed. Now, Redford asserts reconstruction is "definite" if adequate funding can be assured.

Recent money has been provided by the Toronto based Society for the Near Eastern's R.B. Redford checks data on location near Thebes, where temple was found.

Study of Egyptian Antiquities, private donors, the Smithsonian Institute, and the Canada-Council administered Killam Foundation.

He estimates excavation of the site will take up to ten years, "and that won't really do it all". To build the temple, almost five million pounds of stone blocks will have to be moved. Redford said a small railway will have to be built, but "it's not much of a problem".

Other problems currently plague the group.

He described how water had come up over the stones of the wall because of a high water table. When he checked the site a day after discovery, it was "massive mud", even though at the time of excavation the ground had just been moist. However, the team "could tell water was coming" and hopes it will subside by June when a new team returns.

In addition the computer has failed to organize the blocks, because of poor programming. When the project began, the temple blocks were photographed to scale and described to the computer. However, "The program was not nearly adequate", Redford said, and the blocks have been matched by eye "with a fair amount of success". He said obvious patterns of masonry and recurrent decorations were a tremendous aid.

Egyptologists have dated the site by matching temple depictions of eclipses and risings of stars with known astronomical occurrences.

Over 100 years ago, a crew of canal diggers uncovered two 20-foot high statues of Akenaton that stood in front of the temple. Until 1925 little exploration was undertaken, but that year a local inspector began sporadic excavation that continued until 1953. Then people lost interest.

Nine years ago a large portion of the temple fragments were uncovered, and attempts began anew. Blocked currency distributed by the Smithsonian Institute funded expanded efforts, which have continued ever since.

Akenaton is of particular interest to archaeologists because he was a poet-military dictator who closed down competing religious institutions to establish himself as the sole descendant of the sun god. His temple is expected to provide details of his anomalous rule as well as insights into contemporary lifestyles and habits.

Redford will return to Egypt in June to begin expanded efforts of excavation. He plans to employ four times as many men at a total ten-week cost of $7,200. Egyptian archaeologists have been hired to complete the "giant jigsaw puzzle" of fitting blocks together, and several more U of T archaeology students will be employed.

Redford hopes to uncover explanations of why Akenaton successfully crushed the unprecedented contemporary popularity of a competing deity, Amon-Ra, and the "fantastic imbalance" in popularity of Akenaton's wife Nefertiti, who is Egypt's most famous ancient female politician.

Hacks of all kinds meet on weekend

By CRAIG McCALLEY

SAC hacks were busy this weekend lobbying the provincial opposition parties on your behalf. The Ontario Liberal policy convention in Alliston was worked by President Barnes, while the NDP pow-wow heard from John Tuzyk, communications commissioner.

SAC's submission attacked O.S.A.P. as "lacking humanity" and inadequate to ensure accessibility to higher education for the academically qualified. Recently Stephen Lewis suggested on campus that higher grants to poorer students, accompanied by fee hikes might better serve universal accessibility. Tuzyk said a freeze in tuition levels should be 'focal' in NDP policy.

On university government the SAC brief called for student parity and greater community input. At present the 16 members appointed to the Governing Council by the Tories are almost exclusively representatives of the business and professional elite. SAC suggested that the government draw from specified constituencies, namely City Council, the boroughs, boards of education, the teachers' federation, etc.

SAC said that U of T's budgetary process should be less secret, in keeping with the practice of other institutions funded by the taxpayer's money. The submission called for long range planning of higher education. The Tories should come up with something that can be discussed by the public instead of skulking about with a series of ad hoc decisions.

According to Barnes and Tuzyk the delegates were favourably disposed to SAC's suggestions. The Liberals seemed surprisingly receptive, given their lack of sympathy to students in the past. They supported higher loan ceiling. The party appears more flexible now with its new leader.

Input decision this month?

A Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC) decision on the future of Input Radio is expected by the end of the month, according to SAC Communications Commissioner John Tuzyk.

Input applied for an FM licence at the CRTC hearings last January 16, the only one of nine proposals for the vacant 97.1 place on the FM dial. Also, it was the only application for a non-profit community radio station. Radio Station CHIN-FM will give its transmitter equipment free to Input when CHIN makes its move to the top of the CN whirling extravaganza on the water front. Input's new transmitter will be located above the famed dark lushing establishment, the Aquarius lounge. For those who don't drink, this means the top of the Manulife Centre.

Provided it receives a licence, Input will obtain a grant from Wintario for capital costs and renovations. The application has already been approved in principle.

Montreal discusses a general strike

5,000 Montreal area workers and students assembled at the Paul Sauve Arena last week and gave the leader of the three union centrals fuming the front commun (common front) a mandate for a general strike.

The union leaders, representing the Quebec public sector unions — the Confederation des Syndicats National (CSN), the Federation des Travailleurs du Quebec (FTQ) and the Conseil d'Enseignants (CEQ) — called the meeting to gauge rank-and-file feeling in preparation for an orientation committee meeting this Sunday which will decide on the general strike action.

The workers at the meeting who are employed in the public service were obviously enthusiastic when the possibility of a general strike was discussed. Chants of "solidarite" and "unis nous vaincrons" interrupted speakers and filled interludes while the platform microphones were being adjusted. Literature from many local leftist groups was widely distributed and read.

Michel Chartand, president of the Montreal Central of CSN, was loudly cheered when he insisted on "solidarite avant tous." Chartand said that there was little difference between the government of Quebec as an employer and the worst of those in private industry.

The CSN-Front Commun coordinator, Jacques Desmarais, said that the Quebec government's ceiling on public sector wages and the concurrent cutback of public services, is part of a world-wide trend to "rationalize" government services by reducing cost.

"But it doesn't reduce the cost for the taxpayer," he added, "because in the long run the taxpayer — the worker that is — has to pay more for private enterprise to supply these services."

Public sector employee demands lay behind the ten-day general strike that paralysed the province in 1972. At that time the common front of the three union centrals joined to press for a minimum 100 dollar a week wage for all public and "para-public" workers.

This year, the workers are asking for a 165 dollars a week minimum. As well as a package of fringe benefits including maternity leave and daycare facilities.

Meanwhile, the teachers in Montreal and other Quebec schools are trying to negotiate a new contract that would bring them into parity with teachers in the other provinces.

Desmarais has said that if the Bourassa government's economy moves outlined in Bill 64 are adapted, "almost half of the Front Commun's 185,000 public and para-public sectors' workers will be condemned to living below the poverty line."

"The boss (the Quebec government) said the 100 dollars a week demand was ridiculous back in 1972," said Desmarais, "but some weeks later, after the general strike, without fanfare, they thought again and discovered that the workers' demands were reasonable."

Desmarais concluded that "for the first time, in 1972 we were able to negotiate a wage based on workers' needs."

It was clear from the literature of the Front Commun, as well as the banners and placards of the workers attending the meeting, that more than the public demands would be involved in a general strike. Many banners protested the " Trudeau Law" that froze wage increases to five per cent per annum. Chartand, Desmarais, and FTQ speakers all urged revocation of the freeze in their speeches.

Universite du Quebec students from the Montreal, Chicoutimi and Rimouski campuses plan to walk out indefinitely in support of the Front Commun public sector workers, and ANEQ has announced that some 15 CEGEP schools will have study sessions to discuss the issue in the near future. ANEQ itself plans to come up with a definite statement of policy in the near future.

Drury by a nose?

They're at the post, but it's difficult to place your bets because all the SAC candidates seem to be wearing the same number.

The platforms on cutbacks are the most important things, and all are agreed on the necessity of fighting. Just how far they'll go is another thing. If we take them at their word, they'd all do a good job. But let's go at some of the more subliminal things that struck The Varsity staff at a recent meeting with all the candidates.

Shirley French knows what she's talking about on the cutbacks issue. She's a good speaker and would have less trouble than others convincing 70 people on SAC to do things her way. On the other hand, it's not clear what she would like to do about cutbacks, seeming as she does to stress dialogue.

She's unclear on action, and her vice-presidential candidate Doug Gerhart spends a lot of time worrying about how student action will be reviewed in the daily press. That sort of thinking gets us nowhere. Gerhart, who came on as a right-winger for most of the year, now professes to have moderated his views, although his and French's hard line on the SAC strike leaves a little doubt there.

Another plus for French is her experience on Governing Council and the SAC Women's Commission. The latter, however, is divided on support for her.

Rob Snell takes a lot of credit for being one of the most energetic people in an entirely unenergetic SAC this year. He was one of the most liberal on the question of the SAC strike, attempting to moderate when other SAC executive members were trading insults and slanders with the workers. He was unfortunately caught in the middle of the January 21 rally between a gung-ho Ontario Federation of Students and a stodgy SAC.

Playing middleman will inevitably lose a person credibility, but he must take some of the blame for the poor showing of U of T students at the rally and some of the credit for the fact that it happened on U of T grounds at all.

Sneaky isn't quite the word, but one never quite knows where Snell will go in his efforts to make the government aware of the damage being done in the university. He's quiet and not an inspiring speaker, but has the sort of subdued determination that administration and government types could take a liking to.

Bill Drury is an anomaly. His politics are the most respected over here but his ability to make next year's SAC council believe what he's saying is in question. His platform touches on issues, like racism and sexism at the university, that other candidates would not touch upon. His politics are serious, and not limited to efficient operating at the university. In that sense he's playing less of a secure game than the others and therefore his principles are less suspect.

His SAC experience is limited to four months in which he said little at times to force SAC policy. However, his stand on the SAC workers and forcing SAC action on the cutbacks, issue are commendable, and his work at Innis as a committee person is respected by all.

If the Zoids would take themselves seriously, we would. Although they have some important things to say on cutbacks and a sampling of other issues, they are remarkably ignorant on some of the more important ones. Their stress on style rather than platform is commendable for comic relief from the rest, but in the end they know little about how the university runs or what direction they would like to head next year's SAC.

Read the platforms carefully, look at the faces. Which slate inspires confidence. Which slate can you trust to represent you as militantly as possible when the time comes to oppose the government for the things they have planned.

Staff, students at TYP object

To the Editor:

We strongly object to the article by Mr. McGrath published on the front of The Varsity, Fri. March 5, 1976, "TYP Plagued by Serious Problems". The article is inaccurate. It purports to relate the findings of the External Assessment Committee. But the Committee has not yet submitted its findings; it is still investigating the programme.

What the article does do is use the personal report written by the Director of TYP to the Assessment Committee as the statement of the Assessors' findings. We must point out that the Director's Report relates his personal opinions about the programme and that the report in itself is highly controversial.

Since TYP is currently undergoing an assessment that will determine its future, such falacious publicity is extremely dangerous. We demand a front page retraction of the article and an apology to both the Programme and to the Assessment Committee.

TYP director adds complaint

To the Editor:

Unfortunately, your article on the Transitional Year Programme (March 5) was inaccurate since you claimed it was based on a report by independent assessors. What you paraphrased was the Director's Report, one of many inputs to the independent assessors who have yet to submit their report.

You were right in saying that in 1974 the TYP Policy Committee was reconstituted so that there was greater community involvement; however, it was a community representative who became the "Chairman" of the Policy Committee, not the "Director".

Council heads support French

University of Toronto students face a serious and striking deterioration in the quality of their education, while at the same time there are glaring threats to increase the cost of that education. The U of T SAC must become a forceful opponent of such trends, as the organization representing the students of Ontario's largest university. SAC must play an important role in convincing the Ontario government to live up to its own stated goal of a quality education for all academically qualified Ontario citizens.

No one person can make SAC such a force. Indeed not only must the representatives being elected to SAC this spring from every college and faculty show an active concern with these developments, but SAC must as never before attempt to garner student support on a broad basis behind a well argued position calling on the Ontario government to begin substituting action for rhetoric. Leadership too must play a role in such a process, and no greater than now is the need for experienced leadership.

Shirley French, as a former student member of the U of T Governing Council, and as a New College SAC rep and current SAC Women's Commissioner and as an active participant on such community organizations as the Mayor's Task Force on Women, has such experience.

So too do her running mates Doug Gerhart and Peter Henderson, in fields ranging from student services to the unique problems faced by suburban college students - areas which also deserve SAC's immediate attention and action.

We are pleased to endorse their candidacies for the presidency and vice-presidencies of SAC.

SAC exec et al support Treacy

To the Editor:

We the undersigned endorse the candidacy of Michael Treacy for Governing Council Constituency II.

In the academic year 1976-77 continued strong student representation on Governing Council will be necessary to work for the maintenance of student services in the shadow of ever-tightening financial constraint at this University. We feel that Michael Treacy can ably provide such strong representation for students. His experience as Finance Commissioner of SAC and as a member of several University committees provides him with an insight into the workings of this University that makes him the best candidate for the position.

Staffer slams French, Gerhart

To the Editor:

Shirley French and Doug Gerhart owe me one hundred dollars.

The money represents two weeks salary that I lost because of a strike that the two aforementioned SAC executive members caused.

The main issue of the SAC strike was never money, but the way in which it was distributed. The SAC executive, this year, took a hard stand against their own employees, not because the union was greedy but simply because they were organized.

The SAC executive, working with president Gord Barnes, Elections officer Sa'ad Sa'idullah and Finance commissioner Mike Treacy and a few other assorted anti-workers worked in union to force a strike. The whole bunch of them owe me and I intend to get my two cents worth.

The SAC strike affected many people adversely, from the workers themselves, to those interested in organizing against the cutbacks for the rally January 21. People who rely on The Varsity to advertise and promote their activities also lost out.

French and Gerhart have been opposing each other all year on various issues but they agreed on two main things. First that their workers are not worth more than $150 a week and secondly that students shouldn't have organized against the cutbacks on January 21.

What's at issue here is how the students are going to continue to fight the government's attack on students, hospital workers, the working poor and the disabled. The government calls this financial "restraint".

Tomorrow the Movement for Municipal Reform has organized a demonstration at the opening of parliament to protest the TTC increase and other such government "programs". Students have been invited. It starts at 4:30, but the SAC executive consistently forgets to remind you of these things.

In addition, the Coalition Against the Cutbacks has invited you to an informational rally at Convocation Hall this Thursday at eight.

Although SAC backs on ad about this in The Varsity, they're hardly been active in their support.

French and Gerhart say in their literature that they are strong and responsive, without saying that they are strong against unions and responsive to the government in actual practice. These are the actual policies of French and Gerhart, but they don't have the guts to come out and say it. They'd rather continue in the SAC tradition of flim-flam, double talk, slander, and downright dirty tricks that Gord Barnes, an unofficial advisor to French, can come up with.

The SAC presidential elections results may not be clear until Thursday night, but the issues are getting clearer every day.
Mike Edwards,
Non-unionized SAC worker.

Black students supports Drury

To The Editor:

As a black student of the U. of T. I see it as my duty to inform fellow black students at this institution about the coming Student's Administrative Council's election (March 10th and 11th). Black students on this campus, being the most ill-informed students, as a matter of reality, need someone to voice their claims in the higher circles of this university. Bill Drury represents the policies of the black students on this campus. We can only speak of knowing about a thing when we have practical experience with it. Being a present student at Innis College, at which Bill Drury is also a student, gives me the opportunity to see for myself the type of person Bill Drury really is. At Innis College Bill spends his time defending human and civil rights whenever there is a cause to do so. Why is it important to have Bill as President of S.A.C.? It is simply because having someone to speak for us is not as important as it is crucial. The grants given by S.A.C. to the Black Student's Union (B.S.U.) in the past have hardly allowed it to function effectively. Things will improve when Bill becomes president because he wants to increase the activity of cultural groups on campus. Even if some black students are leaving this institution at the end of this term, they should nevertheless give their votes so that Bill can help the black students who will still be here in September. I am consciously appealing to fellow black students to pass the word to every student you come in contact with. The time is ripe for us (as black people) to take an active interest in our own affairs.

Zoids clear up Varg misquote

To The Editor:

This letter is in response to the review of the candidates in the Monday issue of the Varsity. A serious misunderstanding has risen over an alleged quote by Jeff Stone,

President of the Zoid Party, and SAC Presidential Candidate. I am referring to the statement, "We must have universal accessibility to university, but the price will have to go up . . . the value of grants must go up with the tuition."

The Zoid Party would like to explain what was actually said to the Varsity reporter. Everyone must have the opportunity to go to university. The problem is who will pay for this opportunity. What the Zoid Party states is that higher tuition fees may be necessary, but if so they should not rise faster than the general inflation rate. To offset any tuition fee increases, there must be an adequate and revised grant system.

There must be stricter controls on loans and grants to make sure only those who need them, get them. For too long, we have had the situation of middle class students getting loans and just putting them in banks collecting interest, while people who have really needed grants have not gotten all they have needed.

Irv Kideckel, Campaign Manager, Zoid Party

Women's Comm: support divided

To The Editor:

As members of SAC's Women's Commission, we feel that it is important to make our feelings on the current SAC presidential election clear. Shirley French, though she has worked conscientiously and hard at her job as SAC Women's Commissioner, does not have the undivided support of her commission in this presidential contest.

Incidents in the past have confirmed in our minds that Shirley French's politics are not in the best interests of U of T women. Her involvement in the SAC workers' strike is a case in point. Shirley French is too conservative to give students the leadership they will need in the coming year.

Campaign '76: Presidential candidates get last word

Stone, Brand and ZOID

By KEN WYMAN

"The trouble is, nobody is taking us seriously," said Zoid Party Presidential Candidate Jeff Stone. "But we are serious, and we want people to get involved in this campaign."

Involvement is the key word in the Zoid's platform. Stone is concerned that there is "so little spirit here for a university this size," and convinced that SAC could do something about this apathy if it would only try.

"I went to all the Varsity football games this year," Stone explained. "The stands were only half full . . . and half of that was engineers. Where's everybody else? Most of them just don't know what's going on."

Winter Weekend, dances, and dozens of campus events lose money, according to Stone, because so little advertising is done that people have to search out activities. The result? "Too many people just come here to study. There's no sense of community and no spirit."

Stone is concerned about the declining quality of education, too. But the cure is not empty promises about action on cutbacks, he says, even though he is "far from in favour of $20 tuitions or 300 in a class in the next few years."

Stone, who considers himself a very typical student, sums up the situation with this story: "In the three years I've been here, I've had maybe one good professor. One of the bad ones . . . a department chairman . . . had a huge class at the beginning of the year, and he was impossible to understand. Everybody stopped going to his lectures. They piled into another crowded class, and sat on the stairs instead. They were so thick you couldn't walk back and forth in the aisles. By this time the department head had maybe 30 people coming to his classes. Lots of empty chairs. It just goes to show, students aren't felled by anybody. It's not the number of students per professor, but the quality of the professor."

As a result of this kind of experience Stone is in favour of reviewing the concept of tenure, getting students and faculty involved in hiring and firing, and opting for "fewer profs and more tutorial assistants."

Stone is also concerned that the quality of education suffered this year because of the library strike. He says that he "talked about students suing the university" for loss of essential services.

"I don't like to side with the workers," he said, "but they should be paid a fair wage, and the university handled this wrong. They should have given more to prevent the strike."

Stone's attitudes on other issues include: Foreign Students - The university should be for Canadian citizens, no matter what race, first. "Foreign students have ample opportunity to go to school elsewhere," he said.

Community Access: "The average citizen should be able to use the athletic complex or the library," although it might be necessary to charge a fee, or discriminate in some other way. But the surrounding community should not have a say in the design or placement of new buildings, "as long as they are on University land."

Henry Fong: "I'm not really familiar with the case at all. And I think I'm typical of the average student in not knowing any of the details."

Student Service: "Mostly it's just the kids in residence who use these facilities. Too many of the others aren't aware they exist."

And that may be the crux of the Zoid campaign, he says. People just don't know what's going on. The calendar, the student handbook, and The Varsity all need to be improved to get the information across.

Orientation should be more exciting. Major concerts and dances that are well advertised. An end to campus apathy.

Dave (Marlin) Brand.

Dury, Booth and Turnock

By KEN WYMAN

"The university resembles a manufacturing plant, turning out cogs for a mechanical society," according to Bill Drury, presidential candidate in a SAC election state that calls itself "Action."

"Students have a feeling of powerlessness faced with the bureaucracy," he says. "They're alienated from other students, and from faculty and staff as well."

Part of the solution is in good times.

"Pinball machines and dances bring people together. Some internationally known speakers might give a feeling of learning beyond, outside the classroom. If we keep having mediocre groups at concerts, we'll have a mediocre response. We should have big names for concerts, and more disco-type dances, like at the New Pub."

More co-operation between SAC and the individual college and faculty councils might help, too, according to Drury. "A central plan for the year could avoid antagonisms, and eliminate waste," he says. "These actions could include petitions, legal demonstrations, and support for the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) moratorium on classes. If necessary,

Drury wants budget procedures opened up because faculty, students, and staff should know what the priorities are. He'd like to see the U of T Act revised to "give students and faculty the majority of votes on the Governing Council. The scholars must have control of their community."

And if budgets must be cut back, Drury thinks that the faculty should be asked to take a pay cut. "We can't cut back any further on student services," he says. "Physical Plant has cut a lot of waste too. It may not be administered well, but the workers are being pushed to the limit. And the TA's are desperately needed."

Drury is convinced that "it's the way fee raises are being instituted that causes problems. The university needs more money to function. And students will fight along with the community against cutbacks. They'll fight tooth and nail."

Community involvement is important to him, because as he says, "if any one group tries to fight in an isolated manner, they're sure to lose. We need community support, and they need ours."

Bill Drury's opinions on other matters include:

Library Strike: SAC could have done more to support the strikers, "like a mass mailing to all students to ask for their support. SAC looked funny with their own staff going on strike right afterwards." Drury feels that SAC workers demands were reasonable, and points out that he arranged office space for them at Innis. He would reopen negotiations to give the workers a better deal.

Henry Fong: Drury wants SAC to push to have the case re-examined by an outside party, perhaps the Ontario ombudsman.

Foreign Students: Non-Canadian students should be treated "no differently," according to Drury. He points out that Canadian students go to university in other countries, and feels that having foreign students here benefits us. Questions posed in "is them or us" terms just don't make sense, Drury says. It should be them and us.

Free Speech on Campus: Drury is concerned about incidents like the right wing attack on a Marxist-Leninist meeting at Innis a few weeks ago. He still has "a tire iron that the Western Guard brought with them," he says. And he is convinced that university security wouldn't have prevented them any better than the private security force of the Marxist-Leninists did.

French Gerhart and Henderson

By ERIC McMILLAN

The one question Shirley French says she hasn't been asked in her campaign is how she feels being the only woman running for the presidency.

For the record, it feels fine.

And it may carry some distinct political advantages. Flora McDonald to the contrary, "I can come across as a person and not alienate people," she said.

"A lot more women will come out to vote this time. Being a woman is an asset, although I have two capable men with me."

Her running mates are fellow SAC'ers Doug Gerhart and Peter Henderson. She's sought for president because she claims "the widest experience of the three."

In fact, she has found during her campaign that she is remembered more for her stint on Governing Council last year than for SAC this year. She concludes, "Governing Council has a higher profile than SAC on all three campuses."

"SAC hasn't been the voice of students," she charges. If elected she would "keep in mind what constituents feel." "The main priority is to have a university-wide discussion of the budget with faculty, support staff, administration, and students," said French.

She warned, "There are going to have to be budget cuts next year even more than this year." She criticized the university for trying to work towards a "break-even budget" by "helter skelter cuts" instead of planning specific areas for restraint.

French blamed U of T's poor showing at the January 21 rally on SAC and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). Students were "really disgusted" by the "scare tactics" of SAC and OFS who organized the demonstration against 65 per cent tuition hikes, she claimed. Students found out later that tuitions would rise more gradually, she said. "If you come across and lie to them like that, students are going to be turned off."

After cutbacks and budgeting, French's campaign literature deals with campus services.

"SAC has not been able to organize and provide the services students want," she charged. She proposes a student survey to keep tabs on students' changing desires. Free films were big last year but not this year, she pointed out.

French claimed the recent election of Gary Sands at Scarborough College shows students want SAC-run services. "Even Drury and Snell are coming out with our services line now," she said.

French on the other issues:

Athletics: The proposed athletic complex is "desperately needed" although "the university has screwed the community" in its planning process. As SAC's Women's Commissioner French is studying athletic facilities for women at U of T and is concerned about women being disqualified from participating in some sports.

Housing: Student housing is "definitely not adequate." With planned residences at Scarborough and Erindale not being built, the government and university must be pressed for more student housing.

Summer jobs: "This summer will be the straw that breaks the camel's back. It will lead to greater demands for OSAP assistance."

Quotas: French is against quotas on either foreign students or foreign professors.

While-claiming her slate is best qualified to organize the services and action students want, French thinks its experience has been "overplayed" and "we've come across as heavies."

what action to take about cutbacks, according to Snell.

"Actually I'm in the middle," said Snell, referring to the fact that his other running mate John Doherty from Erindale is for a more radical stance about cutbacks.

Snell, and his campaign manager Robert Oliphant, talked at length about SAC inefficiencies this year.

"Gord Barnes let the SAC strike get in the way. It became the commanding issue this year," charged Snell. "When cutbacks are facing us, and even the winter carnival for that matter, it's silly to talk only about a few dollars."

Looking at the final settlement, Snell feels that he could have reached it without a strike, and a lot sooner than the others. He had tried to join the negotiating team of Gord Barnes, Shirley French and Mike Treacy, but was turned down.

Speaking on other questions, Snell was quick to point out the rise of racism in the city. "I'm really upset at the growing evidence," he said referring to stories of beatings and the breaking of windows at Innis college.

"It's extremely difficult to do anything about racism here because it doesn't start or finish at the university." He seemed sincere when saying that he would try to nullify the effect of racism on campus and find out more about the Henry Fong case. He promised to take the case to the Ontario ombudsman, if necessary.

On the question of the cutbacks Snell said he was angry at "the philosophy of the government."

"When the economy is down, you don't decrease social services," he said.

He promised to direct a lot of energy toward Queen's Park about the cutbacks.

"We're citizens," he said, "We may be here for only three or four years but we're concerned and we know more . . . listen to us and watch us."

He wants contact, in his campaign and next year. "People just don't answer questionnaires," he said.

"If SAC is going to get student opinion, the best way is talking face-to-face."

Snell, Doherty and Roberts

By MIKE EDWARDS

Rob Snell doesn't exactly regard himself as a knight in shining armour but he's running as SAC president because this year's student administration has become "isolated" and unresponsive to the student's real needs.

As a member of this year's SAC executive, Snell has become increasingly annoyed that the rest have just been "playing politics." He claims that he considered resigning several times but was afraid of losing effectiveness by "standing outside".

"They have lost sight of their own responsibilities," he charges.

Snell was asked how he would do anything differently. He responded in two ways. Firstly he gave credit to his running mates, and secondly he admitted that seeing the problem is a first step in correcting it.

Snell's two vice-presidential running mates "add an outside perspective", in Snell's words. Ann Roberts, he says, is annoyed that SAC services are brought down from above. Roberts is from Architecture and Snell agrees with Dave Brand, a forester from the Zoid party, that the smaller faculties are extremely hindered by cuts that wouldn't hurt a larger faculty. Snell and she disagree on

Irene Allison

Running on the platform of the Trotskyist League, candidate Irene Allison calls for the abolishment of the Council for student-worker-teacher control of the university.

"The Governing Council has the illusion of being a democratic body, but in reality a majority of members are not elected by campus students teachers or workers," Allison states. "As revolutionists, we use elections to get at our programme — we seek to win students to Marxist ideas."

University cutbacks are part of the international capitalist crisis, of which the Henderson report is only a small part, Allison finds. "Students don't have the social weight or power to effect change," says Allison in calling for a labor-student mobilization.

"Anyone who has any idea of working and pressuring against cutbacks on the Council is absolutely utopian," she says.

On the question of tuition, Allison says: "We believe in no tuition fees." She also emphasizes a need for open admission and a full living stipend for all students to ensure accessibility.

On the question of university-community relations, Allison says, "Our ultimate goal is socialism and only then will the university be fully democratized."

The Trotskyist League supported both the striking library workers and the case of Henry Fong. Fong should immediately be reinstated, says Allison.

She emphasizes that none of the problems currently facing the university can be solved unless capitalism is replaced by socialism. "The only way this can happen is if you have a fully revolutionized worker's party to lead the working class," she stresses.

Summarizing her platform, she concludes "A vote for Irene Allison is a vote against Governing Council and a vote for the socialist solution."

Mary Cretsi

"The raising of student tuition fees would make education a privilege and not a right," said Mary Cretsi in an interview on her candidacy for part-time student seat on Governing Council.

She is familiar with the financial problems of students since she was forced into part-time studies because of pressures from home resulting from lack of funds.

On Henry Fong, Cretsi had to admit that she can only rely on information published in the Varsity. "I think that discrimination is very bad at the university this year," she said. "I'd consider it my job to look into the charge of racism. I was an immigrant too."

On the actual credibility of student Governors, Cretsi admitted that she would only have a small voice. "It's some where we can be heard," she continued.

"We should try to persuade the budget committee to fight the government on the question of funding," she said but added that students should unite on their own as well.

"Everything is falling apart," said Cretsi referring to the general breakdown of student services. The physical plant has announced layoffs in the cleaning staff and to Cretsi this is just another indication of the effects of budget cuts.

"Students have to eat in the classes because of the busy schedules," she said, "and now they're saying it's against the rules because there's no one to clean up."

She believes that part-time undergraduates constitute an integral part of the University life. She sees a growing need for better representation in these crucial times.

Cretsi is a third year student in Archaeology. She says she has been involved in student politics "at the grass roots level" since high school.

Governing Council

The following six interviews are to assist part-time students in deciding who would represent them on the Governing Council. Students get two votes, the ballot should be in the mail box already.

The deadline for voting is March 18 at noon. If you have any trouble, phone John Evans at Simcoe Hall.

The interviews were conducted by Joe Wright and Mike Edwards.

Most of the questions were about cutbacks in various forms, but we also asked about Henry Fong, a landed immigrant of Chinese extraction who was withdrawn from the medical faculty amid charges of racism, and who, unsuccessfully appealed this decision at Governing Council.

Sandra Nimmo

"I wouldn't like to see an increase in tuition fees because it hits directly at thousands of students," said Sandra Nimmo. However, she feels that such a procedure is in the offing if the current financial situation isn't reversed.

"I think that the U of T is not suffering as much as other social services," she said. However, she feels that without other funding, such as higher fees, the university may have to close down.

"Surely the university has learned that if you cut down on maintenance costs now the costs involved in rebuilding later will be much higher," she said.

Nimmo says she has talked to a great many part-time students during her campaigning and is concerned that their particular problems are not represented. "It's very difficult for a working person to come down during the day to register and go to meetings," Nimmo wants to make the Governing Council and all the other bureaucracies more accessible to part-timers.

Nimmo attended university in New Zealand where, she says, the tuition is free provided the student maintains the grades.

Nimmo was at the last Governing Council meeting which featured a protest on behalf of Henry Fong, "It's sad on both sides. 'The University hasn't made its case,' she said.

"It's sad that a student should suddenly be forced to stop his studies, the facts are not clear," continued Nimmo. In her published statement, Nimmo emphasizes that she has learned that if you cut down on maintenance costs now the costs involved in rebuilding later will be much higher," she said.

She wants to try to work toward an education system that is more accessible.

Jon Gentry

"I'm running on the basis that continuity" from the student representation from one year to the next is valuable," says Jon Gentry in his bid for re-election to Governing Council.

A member of the Internal Affairs and Planning and Resources committees this year he says "It's only since Christmas that I've built up the required background knowledge. I don't think I should just drop out and let someone else have to start again."

"The effect of the universities revenues not keeping up with inflation through the provincial government's funding," is the biggest problem the university must face, Gentry says.

The diminishing quality of instruction and the integration of courses are two important consequences of cutbacks that Gentry feels should be opposed.

"Primarily I see my role as helping mitigate and the effects," Gentry explains.

He cautions however that "The fight against cutbacks is not really something that can be handled at Governing Council alone. It must be done at all levels, it would be foolish to just do this in isolation.

On the issue of holding tuition fees Gentry says "I think that I support an increase only to the extent that they protect course quality." "It would not be unreasonable to ask for an increase of up to $25 per course," he feels.

Characterizing the library strike as having been carried on in a spirit of confrontation rather than cooperation, Gentry says he is concerned over the strike settlement's roll-back by the AIB and its implications for university workers and the rest of society.

"Without stepping on anyone's toes," Gentry says, "as a trade unionist I will be going whatever I can to bring that matter to a head."

Joe Renda

Joe Renda feels it would be his job on Governing Council to convince the administration to maintain essential services. He feels the maintenance of library hours is a must for part-time students who can use the facilities only a night and on weekends.

As library hours have been threatened by budget cuts, Renda points out that evenings and weekends are the only times available for study to many part-time students.

He also opposes the integration of courses, which he feels places a burden on instructors and reduces the quality of education for all students.

"The number of courses cut," he notes, "will affect both full-time and part-time students." Pointing to libraries and services, he says "We should articulate our interest." If we don't have someone to take up issues the administration will do as they want."

Asked about tuition fees, Renda replies "I think they should stay as they are." If there is any increase needed, he feels it should not exceed eight per cent.

A councillor for the Italian community with the Metro Separate School Board, Joe finds "The ethnic community doesn't know much about U of T. I would like to see more work done with the outside community, more community meetings."

"The university is supported by taxpayers," he emphasizes. "It's not like the thirteenth century when the church and wealthy people supported it."

"The university is not only accountable to the government but the people, because they're paying for it," he stresses.

As a member of the Academic Affairs committee for APUS he feels he has worked to protect the interests of students in areas such as grading policy.

A graduate of York University where he was a member of the Senate,

Felix Salazar

"I will do all in my power to give students maximum representation on Governing Council," said Felix Salazar about his work if elected to a part-time undergraduate seat. He made it clear he was talking of quality and quantity of representation.

"I would like students to raise the issues," continued Salazar. He said he was running to help students in such capacity so that he could ensure there an effective voice on governing council.

Like a number of other candidates he said he was puzzled by the contradictory reports coming forward concerning the cutbacks and the case of Henry Fong. Salazar sat on Academic Affairs when the Fong case was appealed and is still in doubt about the credibility of the entire evaluation procedure in the medical faculty. "It's strange that Fong was considered a borderline case for three consecutive years," said Salazar.

"It's a terrible situation with the workers," Salazar continued, referring to the Physical Plant employees who are facing layoffs.

"The issues become more cloudy when I'm faced with contradictory statements from supposedly reliable sources," he added speaking of a proposed system of job rotation as a solution.

But Salazar was adamant about the government. "I understand that the budget decisions of the administration were very difficult, but the problem rests squarely on the back of the Ontario Government," he said. "The government is not really aware, and it appears to me that they don't really care."

Salazar has been active on Governing Council as a non-elected student assessor. He says he is aware of some of the problems of immigrant students and intends to "flag down" the issues that come up that involve part-time students.

Jobs reduced to 'improve' market: Andras

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal government eliminated the Opportunities for Youth program and reduced its summer job creation from 49,000 in 1975 to 12,000 this summer to achieve "improved conditions for the summer job market."

This was the response of Manpower Minister Robert Andras to the criticism by the National Union of Students of the federal cutbacks in student summer employment.

In a letter to NUS, Andras said the decision to terminate OFY "should be understood in the context of overall economic policies" directed towards "encouraging restraint on the part of all Canadians, including the government sector."

Reductions in government spending, including spending on summer jobs, will lead to the amelioration of general economic conditions" which will "in the intermediate and long run" improve the student summer labour market, the letter states.

The only area in which the federal government will be stepping up its summer employment efforts will be "to stimulate employment in private industry by intensifying the Hire-A-Student advertising campaign."

The Varsity—Jeen Brown

"It is the habit of students, at least in the large, fairly formal lectures, of trying to make a full set of lecture notes, the nearer to verbatim the better. Only the extraordinary student can do this successfully and still get the impact of the lecture: but it is generally the ordinary student who does it. If he is not too busy writing to hear it all, he is at least too busy writing to let his mind play on it as he hear it.

"The student is not to be blamed for making notes. He does it because it pays off at examination time, and it pays off then because or insofar as the lectures are the main and sufficient conveyance of examinable material.

"Yet it is inefficient. If conveyance of examinable material is to be the main use of lectures, it might well be more efficient to provide the material in mimeographed form."

HART HOUSE CHAPEL

Five months on: An interview with

Eric McKee, former director of the International Student Centre, was appointed the university's first ombudsman five months ago. Since then he has dealt with more than 80 cases, academic and non-academic. He detailed the kinds of things he has dealt with and some of the problems he's had in an interview with the Varsity editor last week.

Q: Will you have a report out soon?
A: Yes, there will be an interim report that I will be submitting to the Internal Affairs Committee probably at their April meeting. I think of it mostly as an opportunity to let them know that the ombudsman is alive and well, to give them an idea of the volume of complaints, the kind of things they've been, if I can at that stage, identify the problem areas that I perceive.

Q: What will they do with it? Are they going to change policy?

A: It's certainly my job to identify problem areas and to recommend changes. I doubt I will in this report but in my annual report that's very much one of the things I'll do. I may already have recommended things to certain departments as I go along and deal with the cases. As well I think there will be in the final report a summary of the types of things I've dealt with and recommendations I've made where they're not highly confidential in nature.

Q: What is your have a large policy change? You're not exactly a legal force and you're not a lawyer. Are they going to listen?

A: Presumably as ombudsman I have a certain amount of stature just by virtue of the title, but for the most part I expect the strength of my voice to come from the rationality of my arguments and the information and background I provide.

Q: Are you taking the people that have nowhere else to go? Have most of them tried other places?

A: Some have and some haven't. Some come here and want to know just what they can do about something such as "do I have a right of appeal" or "is there a grievance procedure?" Once I tell them they say "fine, I'm going to go do it" and that's it. Others come here who have exhausted every avenue open to them. Other times people come and they don't want anything done, they just want to tell someone about what has gone on, and to me that's useful, I file away the information.

Q: Who won't you go to bat for?

A: Someone who hasn't even taken reasonable steps to deal with the problem themselves. I'm not going to do for people what they should be able to do for themselves.

Q: When you go to investigate a problem, what sort of weight, either real or supposed, do you carry with you?

A: This is hard to say in terms of real weight. I carry the right to see and speak to anybody in the university I want to, to examine files, documents and other information that I feel is relevant, confidential or not. If it's relevant, according to the terms of reference, I have access.

Q: What if the decision comes down to a difference of opinion?

A: There have been a number of cases where departments have accepted recommendations and there have been instances where they have not. And then it becomes a matter of judgement. I have the right then if I feel strongly enough to make my findings and my recommendations public by handling them for instance, to you and saying "this is a press release." This can be done only in certain kinds of cases. The person involved has to agree and secondly it has to be the kind of case that I feel very strongly about or in which the issues are very clear.

Q: Has it ever come down to a direct confrontation between you and one person?

A: Yes, there are a number of cases where I've written to an administrator or official and said: "I don't think you handled this very well," or "You would have been fair or more humane to have done the following..." Some of those have been received rather coolly.

Q: Do you have a total number of cases?

A: 82 so far. I've been in operation five months and the pace is increasing. About 65 per cent of those come from students, another 30 per cent from non-academic staff members and the other five per cent from academic staff. From the students, the majority of cases are academic, related to the changing of marks, regulations, failures and so forth. For the most part, the questions I've had with marks have been sorted out informally, sometimes with a nudge from me. In other cases they're still under formal appeal.

Among the non-academic staff I've had a number of things. I've dealt with dismissals, issues related to salary administration, job classification, performance appraisals, also a few benefit questions.

Q: Have you come across any really surprising or bizarre cases?

A: Yes, but I can't talk about them. There have been a number that I never thought I would run into, quite a number. Most of them have been relatively similar, issues that would not surprise most people. There have been a handful that would surprise many people. Very often they're complicated by personality issues, even the academic ones very often involve personality clashes. There's where it's easy to sort things out, if you can separate the real issues from the personality issues and clear up the misunderstandings. Sometimes the parties involved have never been in the same room. Even then though it's astonishing how differently people can perceive the same event and remember it. What that means to me usually is if I approach a problem with the idea of assigning blame, it's largely a waste of time. So I look at simply solving the problem.

Sometimes, though, I have to be more judicial, more tough than just that, but that too doesn't always lead to a solution.

Q: Your advertisement says that this is "experimental".

A: I'm experimental in the sense that I've been appointed for 18 months, but the experiment of the idea of the ombudsman at the University of Toronto is also an experiment for 18 months. At the end of this period, the terms of reference for the office provide that an independent commission will be appointed by the Governing Council to review the office.

Q: Why do you think you're here in the first place?

A: Well, I gather that this idea originated here with John Parker, the University's labor-management

the Ombudsman, Eric McKee

McKee, eyes and ears always open, peruses another case?

relations man. He was concerned about what he saw as a very inadequate grievance procedure that non-unionized members of the non-academic staff had a very inadequate grievance procedure and so he proposed the idea of an ombudsman I think specifically for that group. As the idea developed and was circulated around the various constituencies the consensus developed that there should indeed be an ombudsman but that he should be accessible to all members of the university. The office of the ombudsman here is modelled very much on those at various American universities. It's very much a traditional ombudsman idea, with the same sorts of powers, rights and limitations.

Q: What exactly are the limitations?
A: The major limitation is that the ombudsman has no personal authority to change anything. His powers are those of persuasion and recommendation. He has no administrative authority.

Q: Have you been talking to any other ombudsmen.

A: No, I haven't. Outside of Arthur Maloney, I don't think there are any others in the province of Ontario. When I was initially appointed, his office contacted me about the question of whether or not I would deal with complaints that they received from unsuccessful applicants for admission to the university. They were somewhat concerned that there was no right of appeal and that the decision to deny them appeal was quite often a critical decision for their careers.

Q: Will there be any change in that direction?

A: Well, I don't think that's within my jurisdiction, certainly it isn't anything I could manage on a very large scale. It could become a horrendous problem and so I drew the matter to the attention of the President and that's where it rests now.

Q: Can you see specific areas that would tend to mushroom in the next while, areas in which you're finding more and more problems?

A: One of the things that I think may become more and more of an issue is the topic of grades and grading. The Academic Affairs committee is passing the new grading policy. We'll have more disputes about this; there's already some opposition to the changing of grades in an arbitrary manner; and arbitrary is often defined as anything other than rereading the material in question. I've had a number of inquiries about how to resolve disputes and about second readings.

Q: What exactly is the policy there? As far as I can understand, nobody is too sure about policy, they don't know what exactly constitutes justifiable reasoning for changing marks. Obviously, in that situation part of the ombudsman's job would be to formulate policy.

A: Well as I said there is policy being developed which includes a clause that states that bell curves and other artificial instruments shall not be used, which is general but fairly sweeping in intent.

Q: I remember, for instance last year in Professor Eayr's course, that some marks were changed without his consent. I got involved in a rather long controversy about exactly what a bell curve was and I would call what happened there a curve.

A: I would agree. Ideally I would like to say that when there's a dispute about a grade or grades that the papers or exams should be re-read and re-assessed, that the decision should not be impersonal or arbitrary and should be based on another assessment. But we run into a number of practical problems such as what you do in very large courses where there are hundreds involved, what you do when there are papers handed back and thrown out or when people have left the country. It just gets very difficult to manage it, and I must confess I don't have a solution to offer at this point.

OP-ED

Young Socialists support Drury

To the Editor:

As the elected student government, representing close to 30,000 undergraduates at U of T and with a budget of more than $300,000, SAC is potentially a very powerful vehicle for voicing and defending the needs of students on this campus.

SAC can play a decisive role in struggles against education cutbacks and can thwart attempts to limit the attendance of foreign students at university. The active support of SAC can be a major asset to campus workers and those outside the university fighting for their rights in the face of cutbacks and wage controls. (Attempts by students to gain more control over what they are taught, how and by whom can benefit greatly from the solid backing of SAC.)

SAC's potential can only be realized through a capable leadership.

The most important issue before the candidates is the question of the cutbacks. Given this situation, it is not surprising that the platforms of the Drury, French and Snell slates all express opposition to the cutbacks. But the actions of French and Snell are far from encouraging. Neither took a strong stand in support of the library workers last fall despite the fact that their strike was directed squarely against education cutbacks. When SAC workers were forced to strike in the face of a stubborn SAC executive, Shirley French was one of the staunchest anti-union negotiators. Snell voted consistently against reasonable demands put forward by the SAC employees. Neither French nor Snell supported the January 21 demonstration against the cutbacks at Queen's Park.

In contrast, Bill Drury supported the struggles of the library workers and SAC employees and attempted to get SAC to endorse the January 21 demonstration. While both French and Snell voice opposition to cutbacks, Drury's platform proposes concrete actions against them. The Drury slate has taken a stand for mass united action against the cutbacks as the only solution. After 5 years of government cuts and the failure of lobbying strategies to reverse them, Drury offers the only reasonable approach, one which experience has shown can lead to success.

Beyond the question of cutbacks the Drury slate is the only one to mention such important issues as racism, sexism and the struggle for a democratically-run university.

However demands to reinstate Henry Fong and defend the rights of foreign students to attend all faculties in the university must be part of any SAC election program. Similarly, childcare and women's studies programs, already hit by the cutbacks, should be explicitly defended under women's rights in his program.

Drury calls for a student-faculty majority on Governing Council. The Governing Council runs the university in the interests of big business and not in our interests.

Even though Drury's platform has certain shortcomings, his slate does deserve to be supported because it centers in on the key question of the cutbacks and proposes a strategy which can reverse them.

Inuit settlement calls for creation of new Nunavut territory

By COLLIN GRIBBONS
for Canadian University Press
OTTAWA (CP) — The Inuit land settlement proposal, calling for native ownership of 250,000 square miles of land and the creation of a new Federal territory called Nunavut, was presented to Prime Minister Trudeau and his Cabinet February 27, by the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada.

In addition to the new territory and land ownership, the Inuit asked for exclusive hunting, fishing and trapping rights in their traditional lands north of the treeline, a 3 per cent royalty on all subsurface and offshore resource extraction, a social and economic program and better planning and management of public lands.

"In our proposal, we ask for outright ownership of 250,000 square miles of land for the Inuit," said ITC President James Arvaluk, who made the presentation. "We didn't just pull that figure out of a hat to use it for an initial bargaining position. This represents the absolute minimum amount of land the Inuit require to preserve what is left of their culture, identity and way of life, and at the same time provide a fair means to enable the Inuit to integrate into Canadian society as equal participants."

Prime Minister Trudeau promised to "study the proposal very attentively." But he refused to commit the government to a further meeting in three months to ratify an agreement in principle, as the ITC requested.

"We will do our best to respond with every care and a sense of urgency," the Prime Minister said. "But this matter is so grave we cannot fix a date for the next meeting."

The Inuit requests are designed to help preserve Inuit identity and traditional lifestyle. But the ITC is also concerned that the Inuit be allowed to participate in the governing of the north and of all Canada on an equal footing with the rest of the population.

"We want to be self-sufficient rather than having to rely on the generosity of southern Canadians," Arvaluk told the Cabinet. "We are no longer satisfied to be colonial subjects. We want to handle our own affairs, just as the people in southern Canada do."

The Inuit settlement proposal also calls for compensation or benefits in exchange for extinguishment of Inuit claims, and measures to preserve the Arctic environment.

The creation of a new territory, which would be called "Nunavut", meaning "our land" is perhaps the most striking of the settlement proposals. The territory would be one way of allowing the Inuit to participate more fully in Canadian society, according to the ITC.

"In brief," says the 61-page summary of the land settlement proposal given to the government, "the basic idea is to create a territory, the vast majority of people, within which, will be Inuit. As such, this territory and its institutions will better reflect Inuit values and perspectives than the present Northwest Territories. The Inuit should have actual control through their voting power, at least for the foreseeable future."

Inuktitut, the English and French would be the official languages in the Territory. And Commissioners would have to be fluent in Inuktitut and English. Commissioners would be chosen from the members of an Inuit community corporation, and would have to be acceptable to the majority of the community corporation.

The Inuit need 250,000 square miles of land for four major reasons, according to the ITC proposal. The land would help the Inuit to retain their "land-based identity". It would aid the people in protecting their hunting, fishing and trapping activities and allow them to control development. Ownership would enable the Inuit to control the nature and extent of community growth. And, says the ITC proposal, it would involve the Inuit in development activities through greater participation.

Under the terms ITC is proposing, each community would be entitled to 2,500 to 8,500 square miles of land. The amount would be determined by ITC, based on the amount of land effectively used.

Any land claimed by ITC would exclude important mining operations and military bases which are already in existence. But any new development resulting in gross annual revenues of $100,000 or more would be subject to approval by the Inuit Development Corporation, a group which could make their approval conditional on Inuit social and economic participation, working conditions and environmental factors.

Proposals dealing with Inuit hunting, fishing and trapping rights would have Hunters and Trappers Committees and a Council on Game setting quotas on certain species of animals.

Only Inuit would possess rights to hunt marine animals, polar bear and musk ox. And the ITC requires that the Inuit be exempt from the terms of Migratory Birds Convention Act, which many hunters are not obeying now.

An Inuit Development Corporation would be organized to administer royalty funds and set up businesses in the north.

The royalty money, says the ITC proposal, would be used to fund Inuit participation in business and provide funds to support programs to enhance Inuit culture.

"The percentage is reasonable and fair," says the ITC proposal, "and involves no disbursement from the federal treasury."

Innis downs Scar 'B', pulls Crime of the Century

In what may be termed the biggest upset in the history of the world, Innis College defeated Scarborough II to advance to the Division II semifinals. The score was 2-1 in a game that was the scene of some of the best violence this reporter has seen all year.

Innis came into the game as heavy underpuppies. Team leader and veteran of too many seasons, Herb Willer, is in Europe at this time at a Student Economic Council conference. His absence is compounding problems at center, putting the load on the remaining duo of John Ota and Harvey Rosenfeld. Willer's sabbatical and other team maladies have turned Innis into a makeshift team with no solid lines. It was a miracle when they made the playoffs.

The clash, witnessed by a partisan Innis crowd whose cheering was good for at least one misconduct, saw no death of misdemeanors. Rarely was the sin bin empty. Scarborough has a reputation for intimidation and they "Paul Bunyaned" the Green Machine to death but not a tree fell.

Scarborough had only lost one game in a season that has been described as perfect. According to Steve Friedman, the team was playing so well that they actually beat the 'A' team in practice last week. It was no surprise that they came into the playoffs with an inordinate amount of confidence.

This frame of mind couldn't win them the game however, as Chris Bouris, the league's leading scorer and the whole Innis offense, scored both goals. Bouris opened the scoring midway through the first on a low blast that caught a disoriented Scarborough netminder in a coma.

Scarborough responded on a quick shot that caught Marv Kurz out of position, Kurz, however played a superior game and has been one of the reasons that Innis has gone as far as they have gone. Deluded by visions of grandeur, Kurz has trouble getting up for the "small ones". But he was sky high Friday night, allowing only the one shot.

Bouris ended the scoring in the second with a semi-deflection that was set up by Andy Elia. Elia along with the rest of the Innis defense, can only be described as solid gold. Bill Hopkins plays with the kind of abandon last seen in Tim Horton's early years. Time and time again Hopkins would come out of nowhere to stop a two on nobody break.

Scarborough plays a "Russian" style of hockey that features a fast break offense. Innis line up at the blueline and all the little Kharimovs couldn't get started. The losers have nothing to worry about because they can always field a team. Innis is another story because several of the veterans will not be returning next year. For them this could be "That Championship Season".

In other action on Friday Forestry completed a playoff sweep of Division II B teams with a 5-1 win over Pharmacy. The 'B' division has been eliminated in the first round raising some doubts as to the calibre of play. Dominated by Scarborough, IIB is thin on big league talent.

Forestry isn't and they will be a team to reckon with when they go on to face Trinity in the semis. Innis collides with their old buddies, PHE

B Forestry has the best defenseman in the league in Steve Hansen. Rod Minns is the best skate in the league but has trouble with two things: showing up and scoring.

The action in front of the Pharmacy goal never ended. After going out in front 1-0 the Druggies OD'd and lost 5-1.

Swimmers capture national crown

By DON WARNER

Putting it all together one more time, the Varsity Blues swim team swam to a decisive victory in the CIAU championships held over the weekend at the U of Waterloo.

Toronto took the lead with a record-setting victory in the opening event (400 Medley Relay), but were never far enough ahead during the meet that they could afford to relax until the final event had been completed on Saturday night. The final score read; Toronto 372 points, Western 322, Alberta 237 and Waterloo 164.

Though Toronto has monopolized this championship since its inception, (losing only to McGill in 1972 and not competing in the inaugural event in 1965) the entire team had to work harder than ever to ensure the victory this time.

This season had not been a season like any other prior to the OUA's a fortnight ago. The Blues suffered through their worst dual meet season in years, with only a mediocre 4-3 won-loss record, and had not looked very impressive in any of them. On the contrary, Western had notched seven dual meet victories including a triumph over Varsity in January.

When the OUA championships rolled around however, Toronto got things together for the first time this year and emerged with a solid victory. Maintaining their momentum from that victory, the Blues came up with another clutch performance this weekend, and held off a valiant bid by Western, who were seeking their first CIAU title.

For the Western team, many of whom are graduating, it was a hard defeat to take, but they certainly have nothing to be ashamed of as their season record improves.

None of the current Varsity swimmers had ever been on a losing CIAU team before, but the fact that the team had to work extra hard, made the victory that much more rewarding to everyone.

The determination of the Toronto team was evident by looking at the shaved heads of Shawn 'Yul' Laari and John 'Telly' Lyall. The only two 'chrome domes' at the meet felt that every 1:10 second could mean the difference between making finals and consolations, winning and losing. Their assessment was quite accurate, as there were numerous close races and several in which a judge's decision was required to determine a final position in a race.

The outstanding performance of the meet was turned in by Varsity's own Rick Madge, who broke George Smith's ancient (1969) Canadian record in the 400 yard Individual Medley. The little fella sprinted away from the rest of the field and touched the wall in 4:10.0 to shatter the old Canadian standard by 1.3 seconds.

Madge also excelled in the 500 and 1650 Freestyle events, where his times were 4:45.1 and 16:29.0 respectively, but in both cases he had to settle for silver medals behind Lakehead's Alan Davis, who won three individual events overall.

Toronto breast stroker Juri Daniel established a new Ontario record of 59.7 sec. in the 100 yard Breaststroke, and in the process became the first swimmer in CIAU history to crack the 1 minute barrier in that event. He also swam a splendid time of 2:12.5 in the 200 Breast, but lost the gold medal in that race to Laurentian's Roman Baumann by a scant 4-10 sec.

Other CIAU records were set by Lakehead's Davis in the 500 Free (4:36.6) and 1650 Free (16:21.2), Western's 800 Free Relay (7:08.2), and Toronto's 400 Medley Relay (3:36.7). The members of the Blues' relay were Greg Vanular, Juri Daniel, Bill Woodley and Dave Wilkin.

Mike Hibberd swam to a fine second place finish in the 200 Freestyle.

As had been hoped, Vanular came up with a big weekend, gaining a judge's decision to win the 100 Back in 55.3, and coming third in the 200 Back at 1:59.6, less than a second behind winner Paul Hughes of UBC.

Woodley came from behind in the last 25 yards to edge Alberta star Derek Cathro in the 200 Individual Medley, and record a winning time of 2:00.0. This gave the Toronto rookie two gold medals in only his first year of CIAU competition.

Mike Hibberd came agonizingly close to a gold medal in the 200 Free, losing by a hair to Lakehead's Davis. Unfortunately, he injured a toe the following day, and was in sub-par condition for the 100 and 500 Free, though he made the finals in both events, and swam a personal best of 4:51.8 in the 500 heats.

It was very fortunate that Varsity had three alumni on the pool deck who were quickly able to administer help which enabled Hibberd to swim those races at all. Doctors Pushie, Guinness and Bryon are to be thanked for the emergency first aid treatment they provided.

The two 'old men' of the team, Dave Wilkin and Shawn Laari, also closed out their careers at Varsity in fine style. Team captain Wilkin came second in the 100 Free (48.8) and third in the 50 Free (22.2), while also anchoring the winning medley relay team. Hampered by an elbow injury most of the year, Wilkin came through with the clutch races he wanted.

'Yul' Laari swam an excellent 16:55.1 in the 1650 Free, missing out on a bronze medal by a scant 1 second. He also swam very well on two freestyle relays, and placed fourth in the 500 Free. In addition to his fine swimming, Shawn's finely shaped head ensured that he would be a star of the meet.

While it was a fine weekend for Varsity veterans, everybody contributed to the victory.

Lance Aho, King of the Buifs, and his court jester Rob Goldberg were deeply perturbed as two possible successors to the throne of Buffdom were disqualified from succession by their excellent efforts which rocketed them both to high finishes in the finals. These two royal pretenders, Phil Moore and Lord Johnny B. the Watty took fourth place in three individual events; Moore in the 50 Free (22.4), and Watt in both the 100 and 200 Breast. The later overcame a painful wrist injury in recording personal best times of 1:02.2 and 2:18.2, and dreams of a medal next year. At least he avoided disqualification this weekend.

Bill Chisolm, John Lyall, Don Shropshire, Mike Hughes, Gary Jones, Lance Aho and Rob Goldberg all picked up valuable points for Toronto in the consolation finals of their respective events.

Murray Smith (a la Rosi Mittermaier) of Ryerson singlehandedly gained 34 points with great efforts in the 100 Fly (53.7) and 200 Fly (2:00.5).

Despite the fact that this was a national championship, the expected pomp and ceremony surrounding such an event was sadly lacking. There was for example, no playing of the national anthem, and there were not enough programmes distributed to spectators, which undoubtedly reduced their enjoyment somewhat. In general, proceedings were conducted in a less efficient manner than they had been at the OUA's two weeks ago.

Due mainly to the larger numbers of qualifying swimmers from the Ontario conference, college swimmers from this province can look forward to the CIAU's being held somewhere in Ontario for at least the next two years. Subsidizing a large contingent of Ontario swimmers to travel to places like Edmonton or Halifax for example, is just not economically feasible at present.

Thus, though many Toronto swimmers expressed disappointment at having the CIAU's so close to home, they will have to expect more of the same for several years to come.

Flip Turns — In the women's championships, held in conjunction with the men's event, the Toronto ladies swam to an impressive third place finish with 201 points. Waterloo led the way with 280 points followed by Lakehead with 239. Karen Legresley, Jane Wright, Ann O'Brien, Shaune Palmer, Kathy Hanley and Laura Anglin swam particularly well for Toronto. It was their best team finish yet in CWIAU competition.

OWIAA champs

By ELLE MAI-LAIKVE

The Women's Intercollegiate Fencing Finals, held at Carleton University Ottawa, took place on Friday and Saturday, February 27th and 28th. The rookie team members, Carol Langer, Marcia Ryan, Alice Chan, Elle-Mai Laikve and Penny Blake completed their winning streak as victors of both their sectionals, to become the undefeated OWIAA champions.

The results of the bouts fought against the 5 winners of the various Ontario sectionals were as follows: Western 4, Toronto 12; Brock 4, Toronto 12; Trent 4, Toronto 12; Queens 3, Toronto 13; and Carleton 8, Toronto 8; Toronto winning by one hit, 50 hits to 49.

The Individual competition was won by National fencer, Carol Langer, who deservedly gained the title of Individual Intercollegiate Women's Fencing Champion in Ontario for 1976.

Congratulations are extended to all the members of both A and B teams for their fine efforts this season. Many thanks also go to Maitre Ken Wood, for his time, endurance and perseverance. With 'Great Expectations' for 1977, signed the Team.

This is interesting. Rick Madge (second from right) is shown here in the medal presentation for the 1650 Freestyle. To the left is Shawn 'Yul' Laari who finished fourth. Shawn's mom wanted him to get a haircut so he did.

Parliament opens to angry protest

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
Although the speech from the Throne yesterday spoke of "Ontario's ability to maintain the quality of life of its citizens," an angry crowd of demonstrators opposing the TTC fare hike outside the legislature weren't quite so positive.

Four hundred protestors cheered enthusiastically as Lee Zaslosky, spokesman for the Movement for Municipal Reform, (MMR) condemned the hike as a "glaring example of misgovernment" and called for a rollback. He attacked the provincial government as well as two opposition parties for their inaction.

Zaslosky told a smaller than expected crowd that their effort created a pressure on the Tory government. "The number of people who have attended here is quite significant, I think," he said. Although organizers "had hoped the whole city of Toronto would come," he cited cold weather and the afternoon hour of the rally as powerful disincentives to attendance.

Among the speakers was SAC President Gord Barnes. He lauded those attending the rally, and drew their support when he said: "If they implement the cutbacks they're going to be out in the cold after the election".

Barnes was followed by another spokesman from the MMR, who continued the condemnation of cutbacks "in the guise of restraint". Noting Ontario's great natural wealth, he asked the demonstrators "Why then, should we have poverty?"

Among the politicians who addressed the group, novice Liberal leader Stewart Smith received the poorest reception.

Smith was first delayed and then interrupted by lengthy heckling, particularly when listeners realized their position was not being openly supported. Smith asserted that in hard economic times, social services are maintained to alleviate suffering, and that the government was only picking on recipients of these services by cutting them back. Smith emphasized that cutbacks were necessary to a limited degree, but he quickly began attacking the recent hospital closings when his words were met with loud heckling. The speech itself claimed that "The province's financial commitment to health, education and municipal programs will not be reduced".

But a general reduction in government spending was promised because "government spending at all levels is a major cause of inflation". The government pledged itself to maintaining "a healthy climate for free enterprise" and curtailing "unnecessary expansion of colleges, universities, schools, hospitals and other major capital projects".

It asserted that unemployed who have opportunities for employment will be required "to take advantage of those options and, in fact, seek them".

Opposition leaders were anxious to avoid commitment on their support or opposition to the proposals, but Smith indicated his party might move an amendment to it.

GAA vote approves contract offer

By LEA RYAN

A mood of satisfaction reigned at the Graduate Assistants' Association after Tuesday's 85 per cent vote in acceptance of the contract. 85 per cent also voted in favour of deduction of GAA dues.

GAA president, Jay Drydyk, said "There are two issues we've been organizing and fighting for during the past three years, overwork and disparities between pay scales in different departments. We have now eliminated the disparities and laid the basis for eliminating overwork through grievances. That's a real accomplishment."

GAA organizer, Diana Moeser, said they have won a good grievance procedure, a grievable ten hour work week, equalization of wages, and most important of all, a first contract. "Consider one third of those who apply for certification get certified, and only one third of those get first contracts. We've made a definite achievement here."

Moeser pointed out historically first contracts have never been great. "One of our demands, collective job security, is something few unions have. Those that do took years to win it. Now we can go on and build up the gains we made in the first contract," she said.

"The contract goes until August 1977. It gives us enough time to make sure the membership is more informed on the issues, so we'll have a lot more strength behind us," she said. "After a three year struggle, it's a real accomplishment for a new union like ours to get a collective agreement out of such an anti-union employer as the U of T. We've learned how the forces align against us. We've learned how to fight."

GAA business representative Andy Stanley said the vote reflected a mixture of satisfaction with gains and an attitude that this was the best possible contract at this time. In what was seen as one of the major issues, the GAA obtained voluntary check-off. This means members have to fill out and sign a check-off card by April 6 before dues will be deducted from the pay cheque.

Stanley said this will indicate the true strength of the union and the extent of support it enjoys, and decide the extent to which the union can be an effective voice for the interests of graduate students at the U of T.

Stanley pointed out this contract is the result of 3 years of organizing, 3 years of "fighting a university that thought it could wait us out, could cow us into submission, because of the tremendous disparity of resources. They didn't realize you can't defeat people fighting to gain something."

He added the university's stalling tactic had only increased the problems of teaching assistants in a period of economic crisis, and forced teaching assistants to stand up for themselves. Stanley sees the next period of time as one of preparation, of getting check-off cards signed, of ensuring the members know the GAA will fight for them.

From the peanut gallery

By JAY NEILSON

According to informed sources Lieutenant-Governor Pauline McGibbon said stop the cutbacks and tax the corporations — behind locked doors.

The public gallery was special invitation only, so I had to run back to Varsity for a press pass. Not making it by 3 p.m. when the doors were ceremoniously locked, I spent the half hour hobnobbing with the OPP.

I was allowed in for the grand finale. Davis made his snarky farmer's speech, as he does every year then praised the new Liberal leader — more strategy to divide the opposition. In reply Stephen Lewis said that he hoped Dr. Smith's position would be more secure than the hospitals in Liberal ridings.

It was a relief to get out and join the demonstration gathered outside. It too was a flop but at least the people involved were taking real action. The TTC fare increases and the way in which they were approved, allowing no opportunity for the masses to participate, was denounced.

Various speakers and enthusiastic hecklers deplored the cuts in social services and education, including Flip-Floppy Gord Barnes, president of SAC.

Smith made a short speech to the demonstrators about the inhumanity of it all but said nothing about what he or his party proposes to do.

Ross McClellan promised that the NDP would do all they could to fight cutback legislation in the house and in the community. He advised the demonstrators to keep up the good work and to continue to organize and build support.

Twenty busloads here, need place to crash

By RUSSEL BUCHANAN

This weekend twenty bus loads of Concordian students will be coming to Toronto to support their team, the Quebec and Eastern Canada Champions, in the C.I.A.U. Hockey Finals.

SAC, at the request of Don Chambers, president of the Sir George Williams Campus Day Students' Association, has been attempting to find accommodation for the supporters. Some 800 will be looking for a place to lay their heads.

So far SAC has arranged for about 100 to crash on the floor of University College and Devonshire House. SAC Executive Assistant John Bennett, who is coordinating the operation said, "The shortness of notice and space probably prevented the other residences from helping out so we have to turn to students to help these people out".

Bennett said that SAC is urging all students to find places for the Quebecs in their homes. SAC will be collecting names and addresses until five o'clock Friday. The Concordia students are arriving early Saturday and will be attending the hockey tournament all day and returning home Sunday evening, see page 10.

WHY LIVE A LIFE WITHOUT MEANING?

Too many of us are in places we don't want to be. Doing things we really don't want to be doing. Sometimes, it's because we can't think of anything better to do—but that's no way to live.

Since you have only one life to live, you might as well live it with joy . . . with a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment . . . and the knowledge that you are giving, not taking. Why not decide to live for the best . . . for a great purpose . . . for something bigger than you are?

If you want to change the direction of your life, you might investigate the Paulist way of living. The Paulists are a small group of Catholic priests dedicated to preaching the Gospel of Christ to the North American people. For over 100 years the Paulists have done this through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—on college campuses, in parishes, in missions in North America, in downtown centers, in working with young and old. Because we are flexible, we continually pioneer new approaches. To do this we need dedicated, innovative men to carry on our work.

To find out what road God has chosen us to walk is one of the most important tasks of our life.

Which road will be yours? For more information on the Paulists, fill out the coupon and mail today.

Despite interventions from federal officials aimed at stopping publication, the Student's Administrative Council and the Canadian Association for Adult Education have jointly published a restricted report on the educational system in Canada.

The report was prepared by the Education Committee of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, an international group of 24 countries promoting economic growth and world trade. Each year their Education Committee looks at one country. Last year was Canada's turn, and External Examiner's Report was the result of a month-long visit to Canada which included meetings with government and other interested parties and a few more months of deliberation.

The report has been in the hands of all the provincial education ministers since October 1975. The only acknowledgement of the report or a "confrontation" between OECD officials and Canadian authorities came from Manitoba's Minister of Education and of College and Universities Affairs, Ben Hanuschak, who said that the review had "already stimulated us to reassess our policies."

"The report contains a scope and depth not heretofore attempted in the history of Canadian education," he said.

Ontario's minister of education,

Thomas Wells, was less enthusiastic about the review. After the report's contents were initially made public early last month, Wells said "it has to be looked upon as a study by five people from outside Canada who were here for 30 days and some only for 15 days. It is not an authoritatively researched report on education in Canada, and it is not supposed to be the last word on education."

The report is both complimentary and critical of Canadian educational policy. While congratulating Canadian authorities for the sophistication of all three levels of the system, it is critical of the lack of community input caused by centralization of decision-making, of the lack of adequate facilities for the "perpetually disadvantaged" people of Canada, and of the extreme lack of "national goals" in education policy.

It reserved some of the sharpest criticism for the issue of democracy, summing the Canadian situation this way: "It goes without saying that under the present circumstances, and particularly with the present tendencies in school organization, a genuine student participation in decision-making is very restricted, if not practically impossible."

The report will be mailed to every educational institution in the country, as well as to other interested groups. Copies are available at the Student's Administrative Council office.

AIB challenge pending

The Canadian Union of Public Employees continue to await a court decision in their challenge of the Anti-Inflation Board's authority. At issue is the refusal by the University of Toronto to implement the terms of the collective agreement that ended a 20-day library strike here last December.

The union negotiated an average 18.5 per cent wage increase, but the university refused to put it into effect because the Anti-Inflation Board decided the increase should not exceed 12.2 per cent in the first year of the agreement.

The union was confident the agreement would be approved by the AIB because the old base rate was just $5,771, and the increase negotiated with the university would have brought them to just $6,925.

The union's optimism was based on the government's stated intent when the wage controls were introduced last fall to restrain "powerful" groups whose wage increase had been large in the past. People earning less than $7,000 were supposed to be exempt from the controls, according to the government, but the AIB ignored this when it ruled against the library workers contract.

Immediately after the AIB's ruling was made, CUPE announced its intention to test the AIB legislation in the courts. The union disputes the right of the Ontario Cabinet to assign jurisdiction over the provincial public sector to the federal government without passing provincial legislation to that effect.

The Ontario minority government entered into agreement with Ottawa on the anti-inflation program by means of a memorandum of understanding signed under Cabinet, but not Legislative approval.

The first appeal step for the union was to take the university's non-compliance with the collective agreement before a provincial arbitrator, and this was done last month.

The arbitrator's decision was "vague" according to union officials at the CUPE national office in Ottawa. The University was ordered to "uphold the agreement to the extent that it is permitted by law to do so."

Following that indecisive judgement, the Union then launched an appeal in the Supreme Court of Ontario, which is expected to be heard "very soon" union officials say.

What is at stake in the case, one of the first court tests of the federal wage control program, is not whether a province has the right to assign jurisdiction over collective bargaining to the Federal AIB. This constitutional question is being dealt with in another case involving Renfrew teachers before the Supreme Court of Canada.

The import of the CUPE appeal is simply to test whether the provincial government has a right to assign jurisdiction without enabling legislation. According to CUPE Secretary-Treasurer Kealey Cummings: "We are saying our collective agreement with the University has been violated, and that the collective agreement, negotiated under Ontario labour law, should take precedence over an Anti-Inflation Board ruling."

If the Supreme Court of Ontario upholds the union appeal, the effect would be to require the minority PC government to seek approval of wage controls in the legislature.

If that comes about, observers say the possibility of government defeat is present, but not likely, since the Liberals in the Legislature are expected to support the government and give it the majority it needs to pass the enabling legislation.

Sun, fun and $200,000 for scientists ??

A most intriguing notice has appeared in the job opportunities section of the physics building noticeboard.

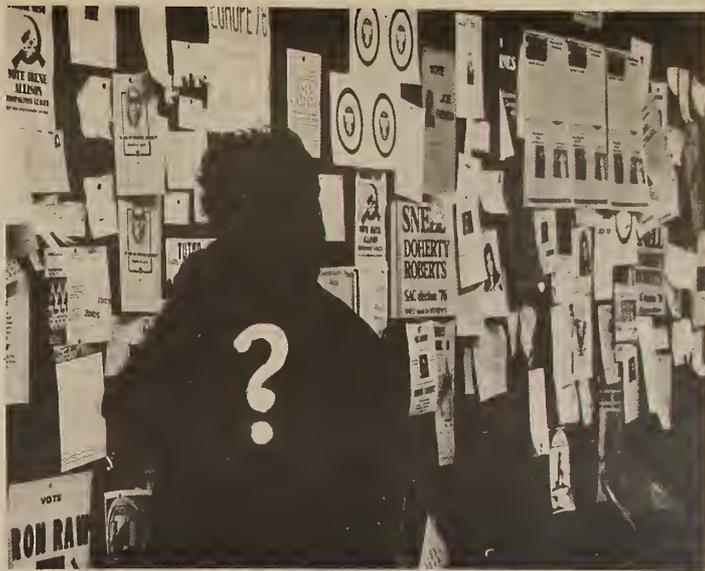

"Government looking for 25,000 scientists in all expertise," the advertisement says in an almost illiterate scrawl, "top salary, up to 200,000 American dollars a year according to capacity and personal production".

If that isn't enough to sway every scientist at U of T, the personnel officer gives a glowing description of the after-hours benefits of the job.

The hard-working researcher can relax on beautiful beaches, or play golf and tennis at the local country club. For the individualist, there are lakes to fish and mountains to climb and, the advertiser assures any potential applicant, "the weather is beautiful all the year round."

If you want the job, and who wouldn't with these working conditions, you are invited to phone Dr. Jose Rodriguez Gardemin in Medford, Massachusetts at 396-7120. There's only one catch. He's based in Havana.

Second guessing comes to an end today and tomorrow as students exercise their SAC election franchise.

Staff Meeting 3 pm today

Let's have a party, or at least talk about it. How about dinner for fully 400 of us? A guest appearance by Beland Hord-Next, some of us still feel it's a good idea to go to the CUP conference part two, in Ottawa, this weekend. There are spots being offered. Next, Paul McGrath will attempt to explain the machinations of the Board of Directors by explaining the election procedure for editor-in-chief. (Note: nominations have been re-opened).

Report wants more services, less politics

By MARSHA ROUALT
A report produced for the Graduate Student Association by a committee of four recommends the GSU give up politics and concentrate on the GSU bar and snack bar. These recommendations come out of a survey answered by 224 questionnaires out of 4,000 distributed.

"The questionnaire indicates a trend towards greater interest in services provided by the GSU rather than towards political activities," says the report. In an introduction, the report says "While over 50 per cent of the students' money goes to pay for employee performed activities, approximately 10 per cent goes to maintenance of facilities."

The report raises an issue surfacing in the current GSU elections, that of what purpose the GSU serve, said Barbara Cameron, present president of the GSU. Cameron pointed out the political activity of the GSU consisted of defending the interests of graduate students, for example for getting research grants.

"It's not just graduate students hit by cutbacks, and the GSU is involved with other groups in fighting them," she said. "Further, we have spent a lot of time and money on services. One full time worker we hired this year is working exclusively on services," she said.

"This survey recommends a return to a view of student councils not heard of since the 1950's. Services for graduate students are not an antagonism to political activity," she said. "For example, our other full time worker's main work was to strengthen the relations between the GSU General Council and the course unions. That meant local issues got dealt with by the whole GSU. And he did his job very well."

GSU fieldworker Peter Gallus pointed out the GSU has to deal with representing graduate students on important issues. Gallus cited grants and money, representation at all levels of government, and the issue of what role the graduate's supervisor should play. Another current issue is the attempt by the School of Graduate Studies to stop summer extensions on graduate work, he said. "This is effectively a speed up," said Gallus.

Faculty or Simcoe Hall: Who runs this place?

The fight between the government, the U of T administration and the faculty for the power to run the university becomes more intense daily.

Let's look first at the faculty-administration squabble. There was a time (perceived through slightly tinted glasses) when all was rosy and nothing was done without the faculty having a large amount of input. Those were the days when the university was not big business, when most of the major decisions involved academic regulations and keeping the students in line. The faculty were involved there because they had to be.

But that's no longer the case. From the administrative point of view, what do these fellows know about running a $170-million enterprise? Let them stick to their books, give them some power on the Academic Affairs committee and then let the people who know what's going on get on with what's going on. It's a business, they say, and it requires planners and scanners to keep it together.

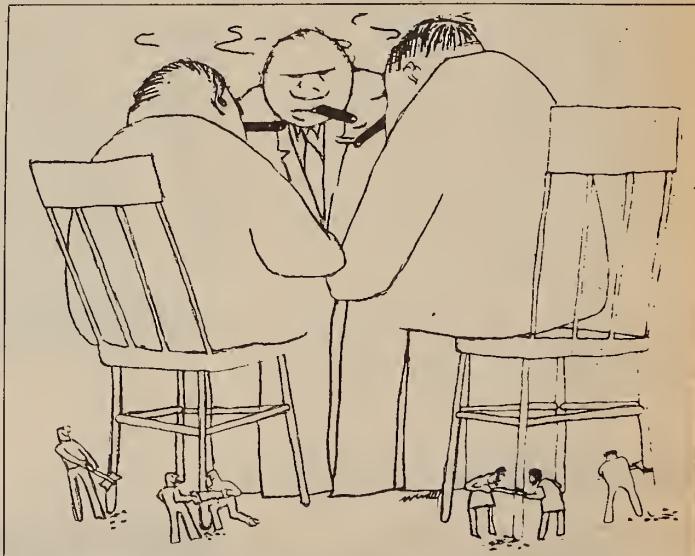

So every Wednesday morning the Simcoe Circle, the top seven administrators, get together to discuss the credits and debits, and the faculty, who are affected as much as anyone else, are left further in the cold.

They've been complaining about this for years, but it's only during this academic year that we've seen some action. The faculty proposal for two-thirds of the seats on Academic Affairs and one-half of the seats on Planning and Resources shows just how serious they are about a voice in the affairs of state and how attuned they are to where the affairs are planned.

Also, the faculty plans for unionization have as much to do with power as they do with money. Collective bargaining for wages is probably not tops on their list of reasons to unionize; much more implicit is the desire among the faculty to present a unified voice to put some pressure on the university in its planning decisions. Whether or not it's because they don't buy the government's austerity plans, or they don't like the way the university is enforcing them is unimportant. They don't like the way the university is being run and they want the power of a union to withhold services to back up their complaints.

Even though it's not exactly a life and death struggle, it has its implications for the university. But this is where the fight between the university and the government tends to confuse the matter. In all fairness to the Group of Seven, they don't run the university. They are told the annually the amount of money they will receive and are left to do with it what they can. So this faculty fight for power barks in the direction of the wrong tree.

If the faculty and the administration were fighting to see which would have the right to tell the government where to jump, we'd be in better shape. Arguing about who is going to administer the dwindling funds is pointless. There are no decisions taken at the university that don't involve in the end sums of money. Power in this case is money, if we don't have the money, there's no power to fight over.

The faculty has every right, as does any group of laborers, to band together for collective bargaining on wages and working conditions, especially when their jobs are being threatened. But looking at it as simply a matter between them and Simcoe Hall is ruinously short-sighted.

Vary accuracy "not vindicated"

To the Editor:

I'm usually unable to verify the alleged news appearing in the pages of The Varsity, so when I read on page 2 of Monday's issue that, "the latest issue of Scientific American reports that the force of gravity is steadily growing weaker throughout the universe" but that we needn't worry because the effects won't be noticeable for "billions of years", I relied at the chance to check your accuracy. The article was in the February issue (not the latest) and your ludicrous summary was certainly not vindicated.

If you were so short of news that extracts must be culled from Scientific American to fill up what would otherwise be blank spaces, you might have referred to a theory in that same article that suggests that the number of nucleons in the universe is increasing at a rate proportional to the passage of time squared. The implication of this with respect to the number of pages in future Varsities is horrendous.

If The Varsity must glean newsworthy items from Scientific American may I suggest the article in the January issue on Stomatopoda with explicit diagrams of the raptorial appendage of pseudosquilla ciata. Alternatively, the March issue contains an article suggesting that (observers on Earth) the Earth is the centre of the universe. Everything else is receding from us at the rate of 17 km per second per million light-years distance. Consider the potential revenue from issuing inter-galactic speeding tickets. Jeffrey D. Sherman U.C. 3

Innis pres clears up "misquote"

To the Editor:

The quotation attributed to me, in The Varsity on Wednesday, February 18, in relation to the altercation with the CPC (M-L) at Innis College on February 8, was not entirely accurate. I did say that we gave them (the Academic Activities Committee) the Hall free on two occasions but the inference that the CPC (M-L) "screwed us up" is not true.

What in fact occurred was some known opposers to UNITA were not allowed to enter a meeting calling for the support of UNITA in Angola because it was believed they were there to cause a disruption. As a result there have been grave ramifications for both sides, some of which are not justified.

I do not feel that the CPC (M-L) is the reason for all of our problems as they did not instigate the problem but in their own way solved it. Also I do not feel that this is a justification for the banning of the AAC or CPC (M-L) from the campus.

Former trustee defends Henry Fong

To the Editor:

I understand that Henry Fong was an Ontario Scholar when he attended grade 13 at Parkdale Collegiate. He successfully passed the first two years of the premedical school. He successfully finished three years at the medical school, and one month before graduation in fourth year, he was expelled from the medical school on grounds of incompetency. Since he had been successful in all these years it is inconceivable to me that one month before he would have graduated he became incompetent. It has been alleged that there is racial discrimination in this case. It certainly appears thus, because of the climate existing at the time in which many notable figures in the medical profession made public statements about there being too many Chinese in Medical School. In addition there was a lack of clarity throughout the case about the bases on which Fong was thought to be incompetent by certain of his supervisors. The subjective bases of criteria in general application throughout the fourth year medical clerkship were particularly pertinent in Fong's expulsion.

We cannot afford to allow any form of discrimination, especially racial, to exist in our society. If racial discrimination is applied today to Henry Fong, a person of Chinese ancestry, it will apply tomorrow to other Asians. The next day, it will come to the coloured people. Next week, it will be conferred on the Jewish. Next month it will be practised on Roman Catholics. We cannot and should not allow racial discrimination to exist in Canada.

Therefore, on humanitarian and compassionate grounds I urge the Governing Council to re-open this case, to order the medical school to allow Henry Fong to complete his fourth year and graduate.

K. Dock Yip,
 President of the Chinese
 Public Affairs Institute.

LASA corrected their "situation"

To the Editor:

Re: "Latin-American Vacuum", of February 25 (Wednesday).

We wish to point to an inaccuracy in your article.

Although the Latin American Students' Association (LASA) is aware of many situations such as "Pepe's", we wish to emphasize that not all twenty-five members of LASA are, as you put it, "in similar situations". Many of us, as was explained to you in our interview, have been granted landed immigrant status, which permits access to Ontario's financial assistance, or have been granted student visas to study here.

Gillian Bache
 Vella Wortman Chow
 On behalf of the Latin American Students' Association.

Another member delineates purpose of organization

To the Editor:

After reading your article "Latin American Vacuum" of February 25th, 1976, I cannot help but write to you since some ideas need to be clarified for your benefit and that of the student community in general.

The Latin American Student Association (LASA) was formed with the purpose of bringing together mainly students from North, Central, South America and the Caribbean. Their common goal is to establish an open dialogue with members of the student community interested in all aspects of the Latin American reality.

It is true that in almost all Latin American countries there exists repression to a greater or lesser degree depending on the country. It is also true that for some students it is a delicate matter to be linked to any type of political activity since, as you well say in your article, there might be severe political repercussions in their homeland.

Nevertheless, there are many of us that are not in that position, and who would be willing to exchange ideas about any aspect of Latin America with students genuinely interested in our part of the world.

We have not "banded together", as your article indicates, because we are being persecuted by anybody. We are a university group merely seeking intelligent dialogue and an opportunity to present to the student body the realities of our countries. Itzafel Zagul

Maoists defend meeting security moves

Several people attending the meeting refused to allow these Trotskyists cause a disruption and moved them away from the front of the hall.

7. Several members of the racist and fascist Western Guard attempted to enter the meeting but were ejected and punished. Though the Varsity article refers to these Nazi thugs as "alleged" Western Guard, thus suggesting that people were being beaten up indiscriminately, many people in the meeting positively identified them as Western Guard; moreover the Nazis later boasted on their telephone tape message how they had beaten up the communists at Innis College. Although this is a ridiculous lie it does show that they were present and why.

8. Referring to the ejection of the Western Guard the Varsity article writes "According to most reports it was this confrontation that resulted in the subsequent breaking of two windows and the painting of a swastika on a wall at the college last week. A similar occurrence took place at Bethune College at York University." Are the fascists blamed for the broken windows and the painting of a swastika? No, the "confrontation" is blamed. In fact the similarity between the attack on Innis and the attack on Bethune College is not a "confrontation" between the CPC(M-L) and the Western Guard but that both colleges have a transitional year program with a large number of black students. The example of Bethune College shows that the fascists attack not because they are provoked by the Marxists-Leninists, nor because of some "confrontation" but because they are racists and anti-communists as they have often declared publicly.

9. To quote the Varsity article "A third incident occurred when meeting security members would not allow entry to a Toronto black activist known as a sympathizer of an Angolan group the CPC(M-L) was opposed to." This so-called black activist is in fact a Trotskyist. He is one of the leading organizers of the MPLA support committee in which he has been most outspoken in voicing full support for Soviet intervention in Angola and in attacking UNITA. He actively encouraged a number of people not to attend the meeting and he then showed up himself. He was clearly told that he was not welcome in the meeting because we had every reason to believe that based on his past activities he had come only to cause a disruption. Two other people who arrived with him (one of whom we know to be a student at Innis College) were told they were welcome to attend the meeting (although we were quite aware that their sympathies lay with the MPLA). We asked the Trotskyist to leave peacefully. He refused and began to block the front door, preventing anyone from entering. He began to shout that "whites" were beating up "blacks", attempting to cover up his own bankrupt politics by creating a race contradiction. After he threatened several people to a fight, he was ejected from the foyer onto the sidewalk. Several others who joined him in the disruption were likewise ejected.

10. CPC(M-L) has never used the issue of support for or opposition to any of the Angolan national liberation movements to split the solidarity movement in Canada. CPC(M-L) consistently called for joint activities with MPLA supporters when the Angolan people were fighting against Portuguese colonialism. CPC(M-L) has vigorously opposed Soviet intervention in Angola with Cuban puppet troops and has denounced MPLA's willing submission to social-imperialism. But CPC(M-L) has never engaged in campaigns of slander against Portuguese colonialism. Trotskyists and other opportunists have against UNITA.

We have never gone to any meetings called to support the MPLA and caused a disruption. We have always held that groups should hold their own meetings and attempt to win support for their political line, not cause disruptions at other organizations meetings.

11. The Varsity next quotes a letter Russell has sent to the vice-president of Internal Affairs, Frank Jacobucci, which says that his major concern is over the "employment of private political security forces to control access to university buildings." Russell's choice of work only mystifies the situation. There are hardly any political meetings on the campus where the organizers do not "employ" some of the supporters of the meeting to deal with disruptions. This is true for SAC and for almost every other organization, as is well known.

12. In our conversation with Russell (and this can be checked with the two Innis Student Society representatives present at the Meeting) Russell exposed the real motives for his attack on CPC(M-L). At one point he said that he draws his inspiration from J. S. Mill while we draw ours from Marx. He said that what is at stake is bourgeois liberalism vs. Marxism-Leninism. He claimed he was calling for the banning of AAC in order to "defend free speech".

Russell is not interested in defending free speech. His real motive is anti-communism. It is further exposure of these West Indian opportunists that they went to such a man and asked him to keep CPC(M-L) out of Innis College.

13. The article goes on to say that Russell's letter calls for the expulsion of AAC as a recognized campus group if they do not agree to comply with the university rulings regarding security at meetings. The issue here is that AAC sponsored a meeting, that fascists and Trotskyists came to disrupt, that we prevented the disrupters from causing trouble inside the auditorium itself, and that now we are being blamed for what took place at the door, rather than the troublemakers themselves. Principal Russell wishes to protect the right of reactionaries to disrupt progressive meetings.

14. We wish further to point out to Principal Russell that the rules would not have prevented the Nazis from disrupting the meeting in 1970 when William Kunstler spoke. (In fact it was the security force organized by the meeting itself which dealt with the Nazis from disrupting and not the university police). The rules would not have prevented the Nazis from attacking the meeting held in 1971 in Con Hall in support of the people of Quebec nor would they have protected the TCLPAC meeting in 1973 from an attack by Nazis carrying chains and lead pipe. Have we ever heard Russell calling for the banning of the Western Guard from the campus? Lastly, did the rules stop the disruption of the PLO meeting in the fall of 1975, the disruption which forced the meeting to be postponed? Has Russell called for the banning of Zionist groups from campus? No. Only when AAC defends its meeting from fascists, Trotskyist and other opportunist disrupters does Russell speak: "Ban AAC."

15. Russell's campaign calling for the banning of AAC is based on straightforward anti-communism. What is more it reveals clearly how various "left" opportunists align themselves with reactionary authorities to attack Marxism-Leninism. Communist ideas and communist organizing cannot be banned from U. of T. or anywhere else in Canada. The only result of this campaign will be the further exposure of the opportunists.

Peter Gibson
Academic Activities Committee

1. An article that appeared in the Varsity on February 25, 1976, entitled "Group May Be Banned After Meeting Fracas" we believe seriously mystifies the events of February 8.

2. The meeting on February 8 was hosted by the Academic Activities Committee (AAC) and was organized by the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist). The main speaker was the United Nations representative of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). The meeting was a great success with over 250 people attending, in spite of a boycott organized by various opportunists and the consistent lies and slanders against UNITA in the bourgeois press.

3. At the meeting an objective alliance developed between the Western Guard, the Trotskyists and certain other opportunists. All came to cause trouble but supporters of the meeting were able to confine the disruptions to outside the hall while the meeting itself was orderly and peaceful and most people inside remained unaware of disruptions outside. Now Principal Russell has picked up where the fascists, Trotskyists, and other opportunists left off and has begun a campaign to ban the AAC from campus. The Trotskyist Op.Ed the Varsity on March 1, supposedly defending "Maoists' right to hold activities on campus" is a flimsy and unsuccessful attempt to conceal this alliance.

4. State organized campaigns against the communists are nothing new. Since 1969 there have been over 2,000 arrests of supporters of CPC(M-L) and more than 25 deportations. Numerous CPC(M-L) supported bookshops have been attacked. Endless lies and slanders have been circulated against CPC(M-L) by revisionists, Trotskyists, as well as self-proclaimed "genuine Marxist-Leninists". Russell's current campaign against AAC is only the latest in a long line of attacks.

5. The meeting on February 8 was called to support UNITA's line of a Government if National Unity for Angola and was advertised under the slogans "Genuine and Total Independence from Angola", "Down With Soviet Intervention in Angola", "All Firebug Troops Out of Angola". It was not a forum nor a debate. It was a meeting for supporters of UNITA, and those people seeking clarification of the struggle in Angola. Whorn enemies of UNITA, including a leading organizer of the MPLA support committee in Toronto, came only to cause a disruption.

6. Prior to the meeting about 15 Trotskyists (the Varsity article obscured their identity by referring to them as "members of various political groups") stood in front of the doorway to Innis College, thrusting their newspapers at people entering the hall, and doing propaganda against UNITA. Trotskyism has been a police organized sect for over 50 years. Wherever there is motion amongst the masses, they go there and cause confusion, splits and disruption with the most "ultra-left" slogans possible.

Non-Natives Supporting Land Claims

By TINA PRANGER

Now, with Native Land Settlements Week in full swing, the people on the third floor of 277 Victoria St. in Toronto are especially busy.

That's the office of the Canadian Association in Support of Native Peoples (CASNP), and, as Jenna Hofbauer, their library technician says, "have always been in support of the Native land claims."

Over 5,000 Volunteers are working with them across Canada to re-establish Native rights.

They emphasize that in order to achieve full rights, Natives need the support of all Canadians. CASNP's main "emphasis" is on the paternalistic attitude traditionally assumed by whites toward the Natives. Although they are a non-native group this doesn't hinder their relationship with native groups. Ed Jacobs, Acting Programme Director of the Native Centre of Toronto, says, "We are working very closely with CASNP and hope to continue to do so."

CASNP supports the Dene land claim which they see as the right to "self-determination, guaranteed long-term political security, economic independence and cultural survival."

Their organization of the informational N.W.T. Land Settlements Week shows their concern that "the future of the people of the North be in the hands of the people who have a vested interest in the land because it is their chosen and permanent home," as said in the March issue of their Bulletin.

CASNP points out that the "Dene are not asking for rights and privileges beyond those guaranteed to all Canadians, the right to be allowed to participate fully in decisions affecting their lives."

CASNP's programme of action includes locating funds for Native groups and projects across Canada, arranging financing for Native students' scholarships. They continue to act as trustees of funds for developing organizations. To inform the young public they have set up various teachers' workshops as well as a curriculum development project.

Beyond the classroom, they have public forums for general education on the cultural differences, special problems and fundamental rights of Native peoples. The Canadian Penitentiaries Service contracted CASNP provides a Native Liaison Worker to assist Native inmates and the community in the Kingston area.

Their library is noted as one of the best publicly available collections of material on Native people in Canada. Their information service is an equally thorough educational tool.

But most important they are a membership chapter, because as Diane McKay, CASNP Executive Director put it, "no organizational effort can match the effectiveness of concerned individuals. We firmly believe that CASNP's endeavours, in order to be successful, must be complimented by active support of its membership."

They encourage student participation. For instance, in the summer of 1974 they hired field workers in Saskatchewan, Quebec and New Brunswick. They also welcome the use of their library and information service.

But CASNP is not the only organization that requires support. Ed Jacobs, of the Native Centre of Toronto at 210

Beverly St., is urgent in his request that "we need all the help we can get! Volunteers — on phones, typing, working on buttons, informational referrals and on and on. Any skills you've got, we can use."

CASNP has also requested the public to write their M.P. a letter in support of the Dene land claim. No postage is required on letters to M.P.'s.

More information will be available at the Public Forum on Land Claims tonight at 8:00 at Imis College Town Hall. Judd Buchanan, the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, Oil company representatives and Native speakers will also be there.

The 18,000 Indian and Metis people of the Mackenzie Valley have declared themselves a sovereign country. The Dene Nation. Some 450,000 square miles of land in the North West Territories are involved.

"If your nation chooses . . . to continue to try and destroy our nation," said one Dene speaker, "then I hope you understand why we are willing to fight so that our nation can survive. It is our world."

"We do not wish to push our world into you. But we are willing to defend it for ourselves, our children, and our grandchildren. If your nation becomes so violent that it would tear up our land, destroy our society and our future, and occupy our homeland, by trying to impose this pipeline against our will, then of course we will have no choice but to react with violence."

"I hope we do not have to do that. For it is not the way we would choose. However, if we are forced to blow up the pipeline, I hope you will not only look on the violence of Indian action, but also on the violence of your own nation, which would force us to take such a course."

"We will never initiate violence. But if your nation threatens by its own violent action to destroy our nation, you will have given us no choice. Please do not force us into this position. For we would all lose too much."

Phillip Blake, a Native social worker, and a member of the Dene Nation delivered his warning in an impassioned speech to the Berger commission on the construction of a northern pipeline. The Dene nation includes members of the Chipewyan, Dogrib, Hare, Slavey and Loucheux tribes. Their Declaration of ownership is reprinted elsewhere on this page.

LEGAL CLOUDS, BROKEN TREATIES

Legal problems cloud the Denes's claim to the land, however. Treaties signed with them in 1899 and 1921 contain clauses that state unequivocally that " . . . the said Indians DO HEREBY CEDE, RELEASE, SURRENDER AND YIELD UP to the Government of the Dominion of Canada . . . all their rights, titles and privileges whatsoever, to the lands . . ."

"Evidence presented to Mr. Justice William Morrow of the N.W. Territories Supreme Court . . . indicates that these people were the unwitting victims of a gross fraud by the Government of Canada," according to Debbie Delancey, an Organizer for the Southern Support Group for the Indian Brotherhood and Metis Association.

Writing in the March issue of the Canadian Association in Support of the Native Peoples (CASNP) Bulletin, she pointed out that the two treaties were pushed through immediately following the discovery of gold in the Yukon and oil at Norman Wells, in the N.W.T.

"Metis interpreters for the (Treaty) Commissioners later swore under oath that they were never asked to translate anything resembling the treaties — they were only instructed to tell the Indian people that these were treaties of peace and friendship, with no mention of land surrender or restrictions on hunting and trapping," Delancey wrote.

She goes on to report that "many of the Dene refused to sign the treaties until some very specific clauses were added: that nothing would interfere with their way of life; that old people would be cared for; and that the Dene people would be guaranteed protection from white competition in trapping and would not be prevented from hunting and fishing freely on their land."

Although these promises were reported to Ottawa, Delancey claims that they were broken within a year, by Federal restrictions on beaver hunting.

DID OTTAWA FORGE SIGNATURES

There is also "evidence that many of the signatures and 'X' marks on the treaties appear to have been forged," says Delancey.

As a result of the many infractions by the government, the Dene were amazed to find out in 1959 that the government of Canada considered the treaty to be in force.

Royal Commissions and court hearings have been held several times since then to clear up the Dene land claims. In September 1973, Justice Morrow ruled that the evidence indicates that the Dene are "prima facie the owners of the land."

Unfortunately this did not settle the matter. Appeals Court decisions, and hearings before the Supreme Court of Canada may disallow the Dene claim, according to Delancey.

In his speech before the Berger Commission on the northern pipeline Phillip Blake, a Dene social worker called attention to the extent deterioration of the northlands.

"Mr. Berger," he said, "can you or anyone else really believe that we Indian people are now living the way we have chosen to live? Can you really believe that we have chosen to have high rates of alcoholism, murder, suicide and social breakdown? Do you think we have chosen to become beggars in our own homeland?"

"... Now the system of genocide practiced on our Indian brothers in the south, over the past few hundred years is now being turned loose on us, and our Eskimo brothers.

"Don't be silly," you may say. "We are sorry about what we did in the past, we made some mistakes. But it's different now."

"Look, we give you an education, houses, and health services."

LLOYD ROBERTSON AND CIVILIZED GENOCIDE

"Mr. Berger, the system of genocide may have become a little more polished over the past few hundred years in order to suit the civilized tastes of the southern people who watch Lloyd Robertson on the National.

"But the effect is exactly the same. We are being destroyed. Your nation is destroying our nation. What we are saying today, here and now, is exactly what Louis Riel was saying roughly a hundred years ago.

"... We have always treated our guests well. It never occurred to us that our guests would one day claim that they owned our whole house.

"... Does your nation's greed for oil and gas suddenly override justice? What exactly is your superior civilization? That can so blindly ignore the injustice occurring continually over one-third of the land mass in Canada? And yet barely gets reported on your TV or newspapers?"

COLONIAL IGLOOS

"One third of the land mass of Canada is under direct colonial rule. Yet you seem willing only to talk of igloos, polar bears, and snow when you talk about the north. One has to read about South Africa or Rhodesia to get a clear picture of what is really happening in Northern Canada. While your newspapers and television talk about sports fishing up here, we as a people, are being destroyed.

"... I guess the question for southern Canada is simply which side are you on? Are you on the side of the people trying to find freedom and a democratic tradition? Or are you on the side of those who are trying to frustrate our attempts to find freedom? ... And are trying to destroy the last free Indian nation?"

"Can we as an Indian nation," Blake concluded, "help Canada to once again become a true democracy?"

• The Mackenzie Delta. "The Dene were made Canadians by decree and not by their free choice. Would not their first choice understandably be to be a sovereign people?"

DENE Declaration

We the Dene of the N.W.T. insist on the right to be regarded by ourselves and the world as a nation. Our struggle is for the recognition of the Dene Nation by the Government and people of Canada and the peoples and governments of the world.

As once Europe was the exclusive homeland of the European peoples, Africa the exclusive homeland of the African peoples, the New World, North and South America, was the exclusive homeland of the Aboriginal peoples of the New World, the Amerindian and the Inuit.

The New World like other parts of the world has suffered the experience of colonialism and imperialism. Other peoples have occupied the land — often with force — and foreign governments have imposed themselves on our people. Ancient civilization and ways of life have been destroyed. Colonialism and imperialism is now dead or dying. Recent years have witnessed the birth of new nations or rebirth of old nations out of the ashes of colonialism.

As Europe is the place where you will find European countries with European governments for European peoples, now also you will find in Africa and Asia the existence of African and Asian countries with African or Asian governments for the African and Asian peoples.

The African and Asian peoples — the people of the Third World — have fought and won the right to self-determination, the right to recognition as distinct peoples and the recognition of themselves as nations.

But in the New World the Native peoples have not fared so well. Even in countries in South America where the Native peoples are the vast majority of the population there is not one country which has Amerindian government for the Amerindian peoples.

Nowhere in the New World have the Natives won the right to self-determination and the right to recognition by the world as a distinct people and as nations.

While the people of Canada are a minority in their homelands, the native people of the N.W.T., the Dene and the Inuit, are a majority of the population of the N.W.T.

The Dene find themselves as part of a country. That country is Canada. But the government of Canada is not the government of the Dene. The Government of the N.W.T. is not the government of the Dene. These governments were not the choice of the Dene, they were imposed upon the Dene.

What we are struggling for is the recognition of the Dene Nation by the governments and people of the world.

And while there are realities we are forced to submit to, such as the existence of a country called Canada, we insist on the right to self-determination as a distinct people and the recognition of the Dene Nation.

We the Dene are part of the Fourth World. And as the people and the nations of the world have come to recognize the existence and rights of the peoples who make up the Third World, the day must come and will come when the nations of the Fourth World will come to be recognized and respected. The challenge to the Dene and the world is to find the way for the recognition of the Dene Nation.

Our plea to the world is to help us in our struggle to find a place in the world community where we can exercise our right to self-determination as a distinct people and a nation.

What we seek is independence and self-determination within the country of Canada. This what we mean when we call for a just land settlement for the Dene Nation.

Meeting opposes racist attacks

By LEARYAN

Even though the Canadian state has tried to intimidate the East Indian community, it is the East Indian community which has been able to intimidate the state, said Hardial Bains.

The leader of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) was speaking at a meeting to oppose racist attacks at Cody Hall Sunday. He explained state intimidation of one of the smaller national minority communities is due to the anti-colonial and anti-federal revolutionary ideas which the East Indian immigrants have brought with them from the sub-continent.

Bains pointed out the East Indian people have always resisted the attacks of the state. In 1908, the Canadian state tried to move the East Indian community from Vancouver to British Honduras on grounds the climate was more suitable. An advance delegation sent by the community returned with a majority report saying "Even mosquitoes refuse to live in British Honduras," Bains said.

When the state inspired assassination of some East Indian leaders, Bains said, an uprising occurred, and several state agents were eliminated, one in the courts themselves.

Bains pointed out the government's Green Paper also attacked the West Indian community. He said the state has consistently pursued a policy of persecuting people who have been drawn into struggle, and gave examples of the Doukhobors in B.C., the Irish, the French, and the people of the Maritimes.

Bains said whole sections of immigrants have been brought to Canada to displace the native people in the work force. In B.C. immigrants were brought in to displace the native people in the mills at Fort St. James, and in Saskatchewan, Tibetan immigrants have been used to displace native people, Bains added.

Immigrants have also been brought to Canada to avoid the expense of training those people already here, continued Bains. "It is cheaper to import skilled workers from Britain and other countries, and it is no accident that in recent years skilled workers have been imported from Asia, Africa and Latin America."

Bains pointed out there are two approaches on the question of how to combat racism. One approach, "promoted by Trotskyists and other agents of the state" is to raise abstract slogans about how racism is inherent in capitalism and to call on people under racist attack to wage a struggle for some kind of abstract socialism. "This means if someone throws a stone at my house, I shouldn't fight back, but wait until socialism comes," he said.

The second approach, according to Bains, says that national minorities under attack should actively defend themselves. He said it must be grasped that these attacks are consciously organized by the state at definite times, and are not just some abstract characteristic of capitalism. He claimed Trotskyists are past masters of raising "left sounding slogans in order to cause maximum confusion so the people are incapable of fighting back."

Bains said the Trotskyists go into the national minority communities and raise secondary issues to serve the interests of the ruling class. "It is not the Canadian people who are racist," said Bains. The problem arises as the state attacks one section of the people, and those attacked have to fight back to defend themselves.

"Unity will arise out of fighting back," said Bains. He returned to the question of standing on principle at a time when opportunism is trying to cause confusion within the national minority communities.

"The attempt by these opportunists to mystify the contradiction between these West Indian opportunists and CPC (M-L) is an attempt to say the issue is one of 'black versus white' and not one of anti-communism versus communism," said Bains, to illustrate the type of confusion which he said opportunism created.

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ELECTION

Ballots have been mailed to the eligible voters for this year's Governing Council election of new staff and student members.

Any eligible voter who has received an incorrect ballot, or no ballot due to an error in records may contact the Governing Council Secretariat at 928-6576 in order to obtain the correct ballot.

The following are excerpts regarding balloting from the Election Guidelines 1976, a document outlining the procedures used in this election. Copies of the complete document may be obtained from the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall.

Balloting:

i) Method

- ballots will be mailed to each voter at his sessional home address as recorded in the University's record systems;
- each ballot will be accompanied by a small secrecy envelope into which the marked ballot should be sealed;
- also provided will be a return-address envelope into which the small secrecy envelope should be sealed;
- voters will be required to provide, on the upper left-hand corner of the return envelope, information sufficient to allow verification of their ballot return;
- each ballot will also be accompanied by an information sheet containing candidates' statements, information on the correct method of return the ballot, information on eligibility to use that particular ballot, and a short description of the powers and duties of the Governing Council.
- persons who receive an incorrect ballot due to an error in records will be advised in the information sheets how to obtain the correct ballot;
- persons who receive no ballot due to an error in records will be advised, through advertisements in the campus media, how to obtain a ballot;
- all eligible voters are entitled to vote using one ballot;
- members of the teaching staff who hold a non-academic appointment will vote in the appropriate teaching staff constituency;
- full-time students who are employed by the University as teaching assistants, research assistants, temporary library help, or in any other way will vote in the appropriate student constituency;

—part-time students who are employees of the University may vote in the appropriate student constituency or in the administrative staff constituency, but not in both constituencies;

—in the case of two or more ballots being received from any one voter, both being ballots for a constituency in which the voter is entitled to vote, only the first ballot received by the Governing Council Secretariat will be considered valid.

ii) Voting in multiple seat constituencies

A voter may vote for up to the number of seats vacant in his constituency.

iii) Balloting by absent voters

It is suggested that voters who will be absent from their recorded address during the balloting period arrange to have their ballot forwarded to them. Thirteen days are allowed for return of ballots.

iv) Returning ballots

Ballots may be returned through either Canada Post or University Delivery.

v) Ballot mailing lists

A list will be available shortly prior to and during balloting for inspection by any person at the Governing Council Secretariat during normal business hours.

Further to the above regulations, completed ballots should be returned by CANADA POST, CAMPUS MAIL or personal delivery to the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall prior to 12:00 noon on March 18th, 1976 to be valid.

Enquiries regarding the election may be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 928-6576.

Mermaids bag 3rd

By PAUL WEIR

Last weekend the U of T Swimming and Diving team travelled to the U of Waterloo for the CWIAU National Championships and came away with 3rd place. The standings are presently under review and a possible disqualification of a Lakehead swimmer may move the Lady Blues into 2nd place.

Thursday evening Toronto opened an early lead with the 400 Medley Relay and the 800 Freestyle. In the former the Blues (O'Brien, Wright, LeGresley, Palmer) took the bronze behind Acadia and Waterloo with a 4:22.3 clocking, while in the 800 Freestyle, Toronto collected 2nd, 4th, and 12th. Karen LeGresley captured one of the Blues' two silvers, swimming her personal best time of 8:28.9 while Shaune Palmer and Paula Glover picked up valuable team points.

Friday's heats produced personal bests for Joyce Drohan (50 Free), Stephanie Ball (200 Free), and Grover (200 Free), setting the scene for the finals that night. LeGresley started the team off in fine style by placing 3rd in the 200 Freestyle. The next event, the 200 Backstroke, provided Toronto's best showing of the meet with a 3rd (Ann O'Brien), 4th (Jane Wright), and a 9th (Laura Anglin). Rounding out the evening was a slow 4th place finish by Palmer, Grin and Bear It, Cat.

After an evening of insanity, the team was raring to go the next day. In the 400 Free fine swimmers were turned in by LeGresley (2nd) and Palmer (5th), and in the 100 the experienced Oshawinian turned in her personal best to join the cheering section (way to go Steph).

Wright, O'Brien, and Splash Anglin again demonstrated the Blues' depth in backstroke by coming 4th, 6th and 9th respectively in the 100 Back. Swimming in the 200 Breast for the first time this season, veteran Wright, alias Draino, came on strong at the finish to lock up 3rd spot, while in the consolations Kathy Hanley grabbed points by virtue of a 10th place finish. The final swim of the season saw the 400 Free Relay team manage to squeeze out a 5th in 3:57.1.

Congratulations must be extended to the divers. Under the tutelage of diving coach Ms Kathy Lane, Toronto diver Sharon McMurdo performed solidly to capture a bronze medal in the 3m diving. U of T's diving was a pleasing plus all weekend with McMurdo taking a 5th on the one metre board, and Liz Lowry picking up two twelfths.

Thanks go to all the fans who sent cards to the team, and a special invitation to next year's final goes to Anne Hewitt and the other spectators who travelled to Waterloo to watch Saturday's finals.

Veteran Jane Wright swam well all weekend. Jane competed in Munich in the 1972 Olympics.

The CIAUs: Who, Why and When

By MEL RASKIN

The University of Guelph Gryphons are the 1975-76 Ontario Queen's Cup champions. They finished second in the OUA Western Division, with a 16 game league record of 10 wins, 4 losses, and two ties. In the Quarter-finals, they beat Hamilton's McMaster University 6-5.

In semi-final play on February 27, Guelph again won 6-5, this being an overtime victory against last year's Queen's Cup champion, the University of Toronto Varsity Blues. In the championship game played the following night, Guelph defeated York University 5-4 in a see-saw battle which gave Guelph their first

This past week-end saw a 4 team elimination playoff take place in both Montreal and Calgary to determine the other two spots for the Canadian Finals. In Montreal, the QUA champion was the country's top ranked Concordia Stingers, who in the provincial semi-finals, slaughtered Bishop's University, (Lennoxville), 26-2 in two games, and then went on to hammer Lavall 12-1, and 7-2. The AUAA champion was St. Francis Xavier who had knocked off Mt. Allison and then Moncton by a score of 7-5. Moncton had earlier defeated the defending Atlantic champion, St. Mary's Huskies. In the tournament in Montreal, Concordia blanked Moncton 5-0, and St. Francis Xavier defeated Lavall 4-1. And in the finals, Concordia defeated St. Francis 5-3, for the right to represent Eastern Canada this week-end.

In Calgary, another 4 team playoff occurred. Canada West's champions this year are the Calgary Dinosaurs who defeated last year's Canadian winner, the Alberta Golden Bears in two straight; 6-3, and 3-0. The Manitoba Bisons are the champions in the Great Plains division, and the runner-up there is the Brandon Bobcats. In the Calgary playoff then, Calgary defeated Brandon 6-4, and Alberta defeated Manitoba 6-3. And in the final game, the Calgary Dinosaurs edged Alberta 3-1 for the right to represent Western Canada.

So there you have it. Toronto, Guelph, Concordia, and Calgary here for the 1975-76 Canadian University Finals. On Friday at 4, Guelph takes on Concordia, and at 8:30, the Varsity Blues tangle with the Calgary Dinosaurs in the opening rounds. Saturday at 2, sees the winner of game 1 against the loser of game 2; and at 7, the winner of game 2 vs. the loser of game 1. Sunday at 2 is the Canadian final between the two remaining winners. This will be great hockey. So make sure you're there for as many games as possible.

Vic wins meet

The Interfac Ski Meet and Mardi Gras was held last Thursday at Mansfield Skiways located in the heart of bizarre country. Fourteen teams of six competitors each battled the rains to take part in the festivities which everyone seemed to enjoy.

The meet was won by the Vic 1 squad who ski on nothing but the best. Due to the lack of Franz Klammer's and Guslay Theonis wandering this campus the meet was limited to one event, a wild and woolly giant slalom. Despite the rains the snow was good, so good that Seton Chase of Dev I put two runs together for a combined time of 72.9 to win the event by 2.4 seconds over Dave Tilson of Eng II.

Vic placed enough people up top to take the team event with the best four being Paul Hill (3rd), Bob Leonidas (6th), Tom Ujeski (11th) and Ron Payton (15th).

When it came to the presentation of the medals it appeared that the "innebricated" Molson's officials brought the wrong medals, showing up with some Can-Am awards. The snow bunnies made everything better, hopefully.

The Varsity team is at Owl's Head in the Eastern Townships this weekend for the downhill.

HISTORY SPECIALISTS and HISTORY MINORS

Graduating students who wish faculty recognition as History Specialists or History Minors and would like this designation to appear on their transcripts, should see Paula Greenberg, Department of History, Room 2078, Sidney Smith Hall, before March 31, 1976.

Note: History Specialization requires four years of study (20 credits). History Minors can be certified with a three year degree.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO FACULTY ASSOCIATION

"The Constitution of the University of Toronto Faculty Association requires candidates for President to be nominated by members of the UTFA Council. Members of the Association, however, are invited to suggest names to Council members.

Nominations are to be in the UTFA office by Friday, March 19, and the election will be conducted by mail ballot of the membership in the following two weeks. The name of the new President will be announced at the Annual meeting."

Hart House fitness test reveals all

By JONATHAN GROSS

Beware all you beer guzzlers who inhabit the Annex. Heed this warning all you burger buffs who are putting in some overtime at the local Harvey's. Joe Rabel is after you.

Joe runs the Fitness Testing Program in Hart House. Using several variables Rabel can estimate and compare one's state of body to Swedish standards, which incidentally are far higher than Canada's.

Results from the program are tabulated and the latest group to be tested under the five categories: Percent body fat, ideal body weight, aerobic power—which includes cardio vascular fitness and a stress test for work, recovery power from exertion and hand grip strength, has shown some interesting figures.

"We don't want to be scientists. We're just trying to serve as a functional motivator", says Rabel. If you've travelled the beaten paths of this campus, it is possible to observe many misshapen forms who could use a few afternoons of motivation.

These guys aren't smiling but it's no fun letting out the seams in your door either.

Although Rabel's tests show that the tested male U of T student is just slightly below average in cardio vascular fitness while retaining only 12 per cent body fat, the population tested contained only athlete types from Hart House with few outsiders. The tested females were slightly better than the males. The approximately 100 volunteers pulled 16 per cent in the body fat department which is predictable. The program could attend to the student as a fitness "report card" for the summer that would outline just how far he or she has to go to get into shape.

"Fitness is a lot of hard work but that work can also be an immense amount of fun," says Rabel who operates on appointment only at a maximum of four times a day. The service is free and a date can be arranged by calling 928-3084. The whole ordeal takes only a half an hour so you can crawl back to the library without too much study time lost. Get your ass in gear and put down that beer.

"Let facts be submitted to a candid world"

Who said it? Frankly, Scarlet, I don't give a damn. This week has been akin to a bad "B" movie for the Innis College hockey composite. After threats of grand juries, indictments and lots of cursing, the boys have been tossed out of the league for retaining two rather dubious ringers.

What can you say about a hockey team that died? If all started when Herb Willer went to Europe for an Economic Conference. Lacking strength in the centre the team went to the well and came up with Innis College flake Harvey Rosenfeld. Rosenfeld, after repeated offerings of all the women he could —, climbed out of his sick bed to play against PHE B.

Harvo played great, setting up the winning goal and generally causing problems for the Jox, who are at this moment beating the reinstated Scarborough B team 3-1 at the end of two. This was the only game Rosenfeld played for the team and the rules state that five games are needed under your belt if you want to lace up your blades. You can also play in the playoffs.

So Rosenfeld participated illegally in the climactic 2-1 win over Scarborough last Friday with his name on the roster. Dave Romanowitz, the Innis athletic rep, reports that Harvey was the major reason for the forfeit with the case of Chris Bouris being a secondary factor.

Bouris is the best player on the team. He was responsible for the team's win over Scarborough and their making the playoffs. Unfortunately Bouris quit school a couple of months ago and as he is no longer a student he is ineligible to play.

Chris was needed in the playoffs so he played as mentioned earlier. Espionage was heavy all over campus as the word was spread. Innis could not hide his presence. Bouris played in the Allstar game also, scoring two goals. This could be expected from the league's leading scorer.

How Scarborough found out is still a mystery. Blame has been spread from secretaries to our own beloved sports editor who shall remain nameless at this time. Reports of doctored team rosters and game sheets have put a bad taste in everyone's mouth. You may ask why the interface of ice didn't act earlier?

According to the rules they are not responsible for eligibility until a case is pointed out to them and this one definitely was. Innis' role is one of ignorance and passion.

Could they have pulled it off? Not without dropping Bouris from the team. But he was part of the team and without him, well it would be like cutting off your head to spite your helmet. Rosenfeld would not have been playing if Willer was around. A little fast shuffling of a deck of ATL cards could have possibly masked Harvey's identity but as the song goes "Don't risk the crime if you can't do the time". Thank you Baretta.

A half-hearted appeal was thrown out and the season is definitely over. All that remains is the possibility of an unofficial challenge to the champions. What can you say about a hockey team that like Bach, Beethoven and Bobby?

Must we? Erindale, lacking sadly in coverage this year, surprised powerful Skule in the semi-finals with the combined score of 7-4. Monday night's brawl ended in a 4-3 decision for the finalists. The game featured some lacklustre play by the Engineers who have been riding high all year until the playoffs.

The writing was on the dressing room wall, however, after they barely managed to down UC in double overtime. They lost all credibility in the last twenty-six seconds of the fight-game. The "game" was played before a crowd that included such dignitaries as defense desperates Tom Watt, and interfac mogul Dave Copp who thought the game was well officiated. An identified Skule player, who as a 4th year graduating student, depicted the game as analogous to Hitler's last hours in the bunker, lashed out with the fury of a reincarnated Bruce Lee on the head of an unfortunate Erindale combatte.

Not only did this Skuler, who shall remain nameless to protect the crown, pummel the Erindale but he also knocked a referee by the name of Dindray to the ice. The other ref took no heed of the emptying benches, which as the rules stipulate initiate a forfeit for the offending team. This makes Copp's observation somewhat frivolous.

The game was not impressive as Perkovic, Knigynsky, Muselius and Hurley scored for the winners. El Brawlo.

Scarborough made it an all branch campus final by carving up the Med team by a count of 13-3. Monday night it was Robertson who bagged two for a team that will be heavily favored in the finals. In a team vote it was Bruce Perkins that won the teams MVP over Glenn Farber and Murray Nesbitt, I think.

What can be said about Scarborough that hasn't already been said. They are not chokes and they want to win. They can skate and score with anybody and have cleaned up their act so that hockey is their main concern.

Meds have been a surprise this year and Steve Gollish had some very strong thoughts on the future of the franchise:

"We have no faculty support left alone fan support. The only equipment bought by the faculty was to replace stuff that was ripped off last year. I am also unhappy with the admissions policy of this skule as it allows students into the faculty with little regard to extracurricular activities. Consequently we get people who can hold books but not sticks."

Alright Steve! Lorne Klimans was seen crying in the shower. The shell-shocked goalie commented on the fact that there were only three players on the bench. Three more players were out for the season and another left the game rather early for tomahawking an opposing player. I'll be seeing you, in all the familiar places... Editorial Note: Vic 8, Dents D 1... The Innis Affair has raised questions that should be answered. It is the opinion of this desk that a re-evaluation of eligibility rules should be attempted with an eye to transferring more authority to the colleges. Copp and Co. cannot hope to keep track of the 7,000 participants in the program. In closing it is my pleasure to commend Innis College for putting together a fun team that definitely made my year more enjoyable. — ED

Track teams triumph in OUA A Indoor meet

By JONATHAN GROSS

Last weekend in London the men's and women's track teams competed in the OUA A Indoor Championships. Both teams took first place in a meet that has been described as poorly run by coach Andy Higgins.

The men scored 129 points while Queen's trailed with 119. Western took third with a paltry 95. Gerry Feeney won two individual events and anchored two OUA A and CIAU record holding relay teams. The 4x200m saw a new Canadian record established at a time of 1:29.2. The 4x400m was clocked at 3:19.1, undercutting the old OUA A and CIAU mark. The 4x400 team consisted of Feeney, John Ireland, Dave Colbert and Bill Warrick. Filbert Bayi, lookout.

Jim Buchanan took the long jump with a leap of 7.24 metres while Mike Dyon won the 5,000 with a good time of 14:30. Big, freshman Armand Roch won the pole vault at 4.50 metres.

Higgins was unhappy with the attitude around the meet and the officiating. Thompson Arena has a hard Tartan surface that is supposedly murder on the feet so this also added to the "foolaches". These sound like sour grapes that should come from a losing team but the Blues won so the complaints come across with a little more credibility.

The women, coached by Jim Mayo, won their first of many championships by two points over Western. Because of a disqualification for exchanging out of the zone the team lost a winning time of 1:42.8. The ladies had no seeding time in this event so they were placed in the "slow" section. Western won the "fast" division with a slow time of 1:47.2. The Blues would have creamed them and could have run even better against faster competition. This meant that their disqualified time could have been at least a second faster.

Because of this and other minor deterrants such as the tripping of Leslie Evans in the 1,000 metre, the first place spot came down to the last event. To win they had to win and place in the 300. Bev Krolowski and Jean Sparling combined for the exacta and U of T reigned supreme.

Outstanding women included National Champion Sue Bradley who downed number two Liz Damman in the 50 metre high hurdles. Louise Walker won the high jump at 1.76 metres over Sandy Copp of Western who jumped 1.60 metres.

Walker, who was competing in very poor condition, is a world class athlete who took a silver in the Pan Am games and is currently 10th in the world amongst a very strong Canadian contingent. Other superior performances were put in by Sandy Curts in the 50-metre dash (6.5 sec) and Geri Ashdown in the 1,000 metre (2:56.7).

French slate wins easy victory

Lays

Varg staffers show how to stuff the box with stolen ballots. If we could do it, anyone could.

Backed by a solid portion of this year's SAC executive, SAC Women's Commissioner Shirley French won an easy victory over second-place Rob Snell for the position of president of the 1976-77 Student's Administrative Council.

Innis SAC rep Bill Drury and Zoid candidate Jeff Stone ran third and fourth respectively.

The turnout, 3,773 votes out of a possible 26,000, amounted to 13 per cent, the same total that elected Seymour Kanowich two years ago.

French received 1,502 votes, 39.8 per cent of the vote; Snell 970, 25.7 per cent; Drury 586 votes, 15.5 per cent and Stone 558 votes, 14.8 per cent.

French and her vice-presidents Doug Gerhart and Peter Henderson ran on a slate emphasizing more active solicitation of student opinion, opposition to educational cutbacks and quality services.

French, after hearing the announcement, said the first thing she would do would be to "go to bed." Her supporters were jubilant, congratulating each other. "Now let's get down to work," said one.

"I'm speechless," said one student after hearing the results. "I thought she'd win, but I didn't think it would be that large a margin. I'm delighted."

According to scrutineers the top two slates showed strength in all places but Scarborough College, the Sidney Smith lobby and Innis College. The opposition candidates polled better in all three places.

Outcome of NUS referendum inconclusive

Students voted by a narrow margin in favour of University of Toronto's continued membership in the National Union of Students yesterday.

a one dollar incidental fee and 1.395 voted against, 46.3 per cent were pro, and 37 per cent con. There were 695 abstentions.

SAC president Gord Barnes was unavailable for comment on the referendum. For a referendum result to be unconditionally binding, 25 per cent of the student body must vote. Given the 13 per cent turnout, it is unclear what Barnes will do next, although it is up to SAC executive's discretion to decide on membership.

St. Mike's council challenges ASSU power

By PAUL McGRATH
The Arts and Sciences Student Union has once again come up against its old enemy, St. Michael's College Students Union.

The two bodies have been fighting for years over which one will control course evaluations within the college, and as ASSU comes close to final approval of its four-dollar-per-student levy for the operation of its 15 course unions next year, SMC is once again wielding the sledgehammer that threatens to stop the ASSU machinery.

In order to ASSU to have its four-dollar levy collected by the administration, it must prove to the Internal Affairs committee that its books are in order and that it has the support of the people it plans to represent.

So far it has done the former, but SMC, worried about what it sees as an incursion into their traditional rights as an autonomous organization representing SMC students, has relayed to Internal chairman, Lois Reimer, a motion passed last November at SMC's Student Senate saying that the results of ASSU's October referendum don't indicate support among the student body.

The fight threatens the continued existence of all the course unions within the faculty. All have turned out course evaluations within separate departments and most involve themselves in various degrees of political lobbying.

SMCSU president Chris Driscoll is concerned that ASSU's powers are potentially too pervasive as laid down in the ASSU constitution.

"They seem to want to be another SAC," said Driscoll, "and we don't need another one."

ASSU executive member Valia Wortman said this charge is "ridiculous."

"We don't have the power or the money for that," she said. "If we had the money to take on their responsibilities, how could we get all our different constituencies to agree on a course of action. ASSU's course unions, according to Wortman, run from conservative to radical, and stick to themselves with very few attempts at concerted action."

Driscoll charged that ASSU has been very unclear about what it means when it claims to be an "umbrella organization" for college student unions. He sees that as a major point blocking reconciliation between the two bodies.

"If they want our support, they'll have to reorganize," said Driscoll. Currently SMC is responsible for its own course evaluations. ASSU has assured them that it has no intention of overpowering them.

ASSU secretary-treasurer David Sheehan, himself a SMC student said "every time we get together, it's as if we're talking two different languages. We don't understand their disagreements and they don't understand what we want to do."

Sheehan said that ASSU has already amended its constitution to change the words "umbrella organization" to a phrase outlining ASSU's capacities as "co-ordinating and servicing", but still including the colleges within their scope.

Sheehan says that within the present setup of ASSU, SMC has "as much chance as anyone" to change ASSU's direction and power. SMC has been offered, as have all the other colleges, two seats on the ASSU general council. According to Sheehan, these seats remain unfilled.

Although there is divided opinion in SMC as to both the specific objections to ASSU direction and how to resolve the problem, they are agreed that the October referendum results do not show a solid backing among the student body.

SMCSU secretary-treasurer and newly elected president Fred Sch-wering said that the results showed students were "confused" about the issues involved. He said there were two alternatives to reconciliation. The first one would "scrap ASSU" and hand the course evaluation and lobbying work back to SAC, which would continue to take two dollars from each student. Or, and Schwering stressed this was the preferable action, SAC should bring all the groups together again to work out a compromise constitution guaranteeing autonomy for whichever groups wanted it.

ASSU is concerned that it faces extinction if resolution is not reached before Tuesday's internal meeting. It's close to the end of the year, and failure to resolve this would leave ASSU with no money and probably forced to sell its mimeograph machine.

Voting poorly organized

Although SAC president Gord Barnes waffles, this year's SAC election was marred by poor organization which necessitated last minute arrangements for balloting.

Barnes said last night SAC ended up firing Ian Roxan as Chief Returning Officer on Tuesday, the day before the election.

As a result of poor planning SAC had to pay 15 poll clerks hired through Canada Manpower. This will boost the election budget because college and faculty student council volunteers usually man the polls.

Polls opened late on Wednesday morning but by Thursday things were operating better.

SAC officials finally found out Roxan had botched the job when they learned he had not even informed local colleges about balloting spots until this week.

Barnes said he wasn't aware of any irregularities caused by the mix-up. He said the turnout, although the lowest in recent years, was not affected.

This resulted in a hurried SAC effort to patch up the polling arrangements for the two days of voting.

Barnes concluded that although the election was mismanaged "from a candidates point of view there is nothing serious enough to object to."

Rally demands end to social service cuts

By LEA RYAN
The Henderson Report has now become government policy, according to president of the Ontario Federation of Labour David Archer at a large rally opposing cutbacks in Convocation Hall Thursday night.

"As a whole this means the dismantling of a whole social security system," said Archer. "The government's anti-worker diatribe started with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. There are over 800,000 unemployed."

Eric Walberg and Lynda Lange won the Graduate Student Union election over Paul Reilly and Mary Anne O'Laughlin.

Walberg said "This means a continuation of the progressive politics the GSU has pursued, a commitment to strengthening course unions and department organizations."

particularly affected by these," Walberg said.

Walberg emphasized the necessity of continued financial support for the Graduate Assistants Association. "By the end of next year, the GAA will be negotiating again for check-off. Then they'll be financially independent. Until then, in face of the concentrated attempt by the university to get rid of the GAA, we absolutely have to give them support."

"We will definitely continue to improve services, expanding the bar and food service. We also want to open a coffee house with folk music upstairs," he said.

Faculty salaries up last year

OTTAWA (CUP) — Preliminary figures released by Statistics Canada show that faculty at Canadian colleges and universities are still paid above-average salaries, and had increases last year which exceeded inflation levels and the levels set in the federal wage-control legislation.

So far 24 institutions have reported their salary levels this year, with the average salary for all levels in 1975-76 of $20,826 representing a 14.2 per cent increase over 1974-75, well above the inflation rate.

Women continued to earn less than their male counterparts, however, with men earning an average of $24,485 and women receiving $19,413, or about 79.3 per cent of what men get. This differential is a slight reduction from the previous year, when women earned 78.5 per cent of the male average.

All levels of faculty shared in the increase, with the top category of department heads increasing 13.3 per cent to $34,991. Full professors averaged $32,052, up 12.3 per cent last year.

Associate professors increased

12.2 per cent to an average salary of $23,323 while assistant professors received $19,008, up 13.2 per cent. Faculty immediately below the rank of assistant professor, which covers lecturers and instructors, increased to $15,743 this year, up 16.2 per cent from 1974-75.

All of the increases in average salaries exceeded the 10 per cent wage control limit. All levels except that immediately below the rank of assistant professor also exceeded the $2,400 maximum increase allowed under the wage control legislation.

Dene nation calls for independence

By LEA RYAN

The Dene nation, composed of the five tribes living in the Mackenzie Valley, wants independence and the right to self-determination within Canada, according to the President of the Metis Association of the North West Territories Rick Hardy.

Hardy was speaking at a forum sponsored by the Canadian Association in Support of the Native Peoples at Innis College Wednesday night to an overflow audience composed of native people, students and oil company executives.

Hardy stressed the Dene nation does not want separation from Canada, but that they would not extinguish their aboriginal rights for any amount of money. Hardy said the federal government proposed the "extinguishing of our aboriginal rights for a cash settlement."

Explaining the concept of hereditary rights, Hardy said the first recorded proof of people living in the valley is 10,000 years old, while the first white explorers arrived a mere 200 years ago.

"The land is ours. Nobody realized the government in Ottawa was claiming our land, and our parents told us, this is our land. The people have been fighting for our land as long as I can remember," said Hardy.

"Now the government imposes other forms of government on us. Before, the people lived off the lands in hunting camps, and the leaders made decisions in consultation with the group. That was our form of government. Now the territorial council does not have any decision making power, as it is subject to the veto of the commissioner. We insist on the right to elect our own people to legislative bodies, on our right to national self-determination."

Hardy appealed to the Canadian people to let the government know how they felt and to show that they support the Dene people in their fight for their hereditary rights. "Our hope is public pressure on the government," said Hardy.

Minister of Northern and Indian Affairs Judd Buchanan was greeted with jeers and hissing. During his speech, he avoided dealing with the issues raised by Hardy, and asserted the government was not offering "purely and utterly a cash settlement."

Buchanan went on to blame the Dene people for "lagging behind" in negotiations. He said the pipeline would go through if necessary regardless of whether or not the land claims of the Mackenzie Valley people was settled.

Vern Horte, President of the Arctic Gas Study Group, one of the two applicants for the pipeline, claimed a pipeline would not disturb the ecology or the people and would provide jobs. This claim was greeted with skepticism by the native speakers.

The Director of Land Research for the Indian Brotherhood of the North West Territories Phoebe Nahanni said "the pipeline would destroy us as a people."

John Amagalik from the Inuit Tapirisat, said their present proposal to the government was for use of all land north of the tree line, 750,000 square miles, and outright ownership of 250,000 square miles, with the remaining 500,000 square miles as public lands. "This is a unique proposal as it is the first time the native people have presented their case to the government instead of vice-versa," he said.

Amagalik pointed out the Inuit lands had never been settled by treaty, and are "still ours". He said it takes 10 square miles to support one caribou in explaining why they must have the amount of territory they have asked for to maintain the Inuit way of life.

Finishing to enthusiastic applause, Hardy asked the audience to continue to show they supported the Dene nation in their demands for rights as a nation within Canada.

'Biggest ever' demo ready

OTTAWA (CUP) — March 22 may go down as the date of the biggest labour demonstration on Parliament Hill in the history of Canada, according to officials of the Canadian Labour Congress.

The 2 million member CLC has called on trade unionists and others opposed to the federal wage controls "to show their opposition to the government's attitude by holding a mass demonstration March 22 on Parliament Hill, in conjunction with the presentation of the CLC's annual memorandum".

The "memorandum" is the annual brief given by the CLC to the federal government, usually dealing with major social and economic issues which organized labour feels should be given priority.

There is no doubt that, this year, the focus will be wage controls, and the labour movement's total rejection of the program. But this won't be the first time the "memorandum" has dealt with this subject.

Last March the CLC's presentation commended the Liberal government "for its continuing outright rejection of wage and price controls to combat inflation."

The CLC told the government at that time it could expect workers to attempt to "catch up" in 1975 to compensate not only from inflation which has eroded their wages and salaries, but also to begin to redress the inequitable share of income as between wages and salaries on the one hand, and corporate and other forms of income on the other."

That prediction proved correct, as negotiated settlements in the first half of 1975 resulted in the share of national income going to wages and salaries starting to increase faster than the amount to profits, a reverse of the trend experienced in the previous 15 business quarters.

After two business quarters in which this trend was evident, and even though wages had not caught up to the comparative position they occupied vis a vis profits in 1971, the federal government then announced the policy of wage controls.

Organized labour will make its well-known views clear on this subject in its memorandum this year, and the mass rally will be an

Despite cutbacks you can still eat cake

By GARY LENNOX

Along with the Rolling Stone, the one standout among the many motorized banners that line the St. George strip, at Innis College U of T students have another place to eat that offers a fine alternative to anywhere else on campus.

Carrying on with a tradition of providing alternatives and innovations to the normal, drab course of events at U of T (as the calendar tells us, it was the first college with courses in environmental studies, women's studies and practical drama), the Innis "Pub and Food" has succeeded admirably in bringing food to the campus that doesn't sit in your tripe like fast-set styrene.

Like most people who eat on campus, I have no real credentials as a food reviewer, but I belong to the equally large school of critics who don't know art, but they know what they like.

The Innis cafeteria (that word grates somehow) is presided over by John and Marilyn McHugh, who came to Innis at the invitation of Innis co-registrar Pat Cole when the new building opened in January.

Self described as being among "the original beatniks", they operated The Half Beat until 1960, and The Penny Farthing from 1963 until 1969 in Yorkville. The expresso machine now operating at Innis came from the Penny Farthing.

They both share an aversion to "plastic food", and consequently have kept the quality of food at Innis far beyond and above anything served at the institutional cafeterias at other colleges.

The food is bought with an eye to keeping out preservatives and additives; meat from Schneiders, "always fresh" vegetables from Banford's, bread from Central Bakery and Lotman's, and "eight or nine different cheeses" from Mandel's.

Everything is prepared from scratch, and the menu changes daily. The day I went in, lunch and supper plans included navy bean soup, roast beef, chicken on spinach with cheese sauce, homemade baked beans, and bar-b-que chicken legs. The corned beef and the dill pickles are also made on the premises. Or, as John McHugh puts it: "Innis has gone from being the poor relation on campus to the well-fed one."

The staff, approximately forty students from several different disciplines, are allowed their own freedom to prepare dishes that suit their fancy.

Although the original idea for the eatery at Innis only called for a small snack bar to service the students, the excellence of the alternative has caught on to the point where a good proportion of the people who eat there are non-Innis students. John McHugh estimated that business is about "125 per cent more than forecasted."

Their plans for the future include "a real Friday night pub" and, in summer, a "licensed sidewalk cafe and a roof patio."

At least in the face of cutbacks, we are allowed to eat cake.

indication of the degree of rank-and-file support for the CLC position.

Officials with the Congress do not as yet have any tabulation of how many unionists are expected to show up for the demonstration, but provincial labour federations and trade unions are all working to organize support for the demonstration.

All the officials can say at present that they are confident the demonstration will be "massive", and of unprecedented size.

St. Mike's elections

As well as voting in the SAC election, St. Mike's students voted for Student Union executive and SMC reps to next year's SAC General Council.

Fred Schwering, union treasurer for the past two years, defeated Maurice Daniels with 309 for Schwering over Daniel's 93. Fred will be president while Peter Corcoran will serve as vice-president. He defeated Alex Fiegler 264 to 137.

The five SAC rep positions will be filled by Tony Iarocci, Phil Ryan, John Brown, Frank Beltrano and Brian O'Riordan. A total of eight ran. The turnout was slightly below last year's, just over twenty per cent of those eligible voted.

Patch up the difference quickly

If the Arts and Sciences Students Union goes under because of the current conflict between it and the St. Michael's College Students Union, the latter will have to explain to the other 8,000 Arts and Sciences students it does not represent why it has veto power over their right to have course evaluations.

That's effectively what they have right now, and they're holding it over ASSU's head because over at SMC they can't come to conclusions about what they want out of this organization.

ASSU's ability to operate its constituent course unions rests with a resolution of this difficulty. ASSU knows what it wants to do, and it's been doing it with increasing efficiency every year. They provide student input into staffing decisions, input that represents 10,000 Arts and Science students, no small part of which are SMC students.

SMCSU wants the right to its own course evaluations. No one, especially ASSU wants to stand in their way. ASSU is probably quite willing to hand over a certain portion of its received funds to SMCSU for that purpose. Why then does SMCSU stand in the way, and does it purport to represent SMC students by doing this?

In the past, there has been unhidden suspicion at SMC that ASSU is run by your run-of-the-mill hippie radicals who desire nothing more than to subvert the good relations between staff and students at this university. Without going at length into why this is of course not the case, we submit that one of the things that keeps relations on an even keel at this university is ASSU's ability to accurately portray student's reactions to what they are being taught in the classroom.

Whatever the disagreement, and it's certainly nothing that couldn't be solved by both sides determining the extent of their powers on paper, SMCSU has no right to allow their rather unclear differences to force ASSU into disbanding. And that is precisely what will happen next Tuesday if SMCSU president Driscoll doesn't get his people together and make some proposals.

ASSU has work to do. It's been doing it quite well. What it does is indispensable to the proper running of a democratic university. SAC probably does not want the job, so forcing ASSU into bankruptcy would interrupt the operations of 15 separate groups of people, all working on making curriculum and teaching more responsible to students. Those are probably SMCSU's goals. There's no reason why two organizations with the same direction should be running headlong into each other.

Ticked Off: Restraint if is baloney

Once again we are being preached restraint. This time by Premier Davis.

The thinking is not hard to follow. Inflation is caused by governments spending too much money on people, especially on the poor, the unemployed, and students.

The solution is just as simple. Cut back on this spending.

More to the point, make a show of cutting back spending.

Start by eliminating ostentatious pomp during the opening of the Legislature. Then you can funnel the savings into a quiet oak-panelled, chandeliered retreat for Cabinet ministers.

During the Throne Speech, promise to crack down on welfare freeloaders. Whether or not there actually are a substantial number of cheaters on the rolls is beside the point.

Press all able-bodied recipients of unemployment insurance to take any of the wide choice of jobs that are available in these days of unemployment running over 7 per cent. Of course, you can't weaken and make exceptions for widows and unwed mothers. And if neither parent can find a job, put the oldest son out to work, as our Services Minister has suggested.

No need to mention the lack of housing in this province. Quietly announce that the campaign promise of tax credits to lower mortgage interest rates will not be carried out.

Meanwhile, you're holding the line on education spending and municipal funding. The services that die from these budget cuts are only for students and working class citizens anyways.

When the mining companies in Ontario cry out for money, you can fork it over in tax advantages. After all, they don't cause inflation with their insatiable demands. We do.

The media can do its bit too. When a heterogeneous group shows up to protest the government's restraint program during the opening of the Legislature, it can follow the Star's lead in piercing analysis. They were written off as something akin to the Three Stooges and told they "need a choreographer".

"Commies," attacks, and now Porter

If Toronto Sun columnist McKenzie Porter weren't so dangerously out to lunch, he'd be funny.

The man's inherent anti-intellectualism has again caused him to convey to the people of Toronto a total misrepresentation of events. This time it involves a recent alleged attack on a faculty member at York University's Bethune College by members of the National Socialist Underground, a fascist group.

Although the man who claimed he was attacked is under suspicion of pressing false charges, this information did not reach Porter in time for him to defend this sort of attack as justifiable due to the "communist" climate at Bethune. In one swoop he slanders the faculty of the entire university as "long-haired, pot-smoking, blue-jean academics". In the next paragraph he takes on the whole education system. Appropos of the newspaper that offers you all the news in four paragraphs.

Porter is saying that attacks like these, while "depressing" are only to be expected in the climate. He accuses the faculty of fomenting "the students' into these attacks. Who the hell said they were students? That he should assume this is a major sign of his half-wittedness.

Porter says we shouldn't talk about things that get people upset. Don't worry about exchanging ideas, if we all agree that things are beautiful, everyone will be happy. It's enough to put you off your food, but it sure sells newspapers. The man needs a good bell in his head.

Friend corrects Varg sports ed

One would expect more from John Gross, The Varsity Sports Editor, than his editorial comment made in The Varsity on Wednesday, March 10th. "It is the opinion of this desk that a re-evaluation of eligibility rules should be attempted with an eye to transferring more authority to the colleges."

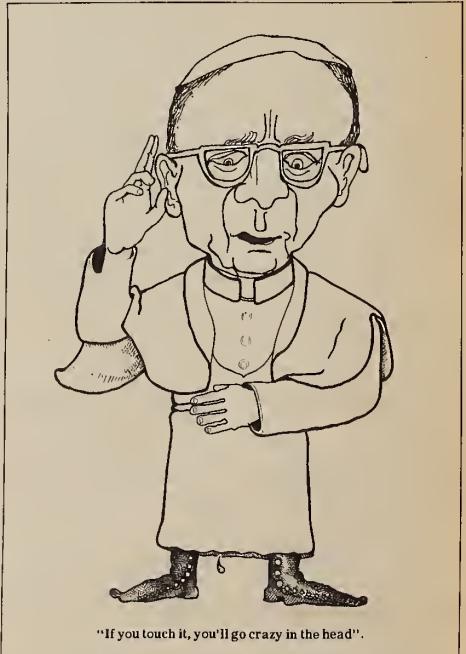

If Mr. Gross had bothered to do any research at all, or even understood the workings of the Intramural Sports Committee, he would find that all the Colleges and Faculties attended by full-time undergraduate students are the ones who make the eligibility rules. They do this by electing an athletic representative to the I.S.C., the governing body of undergraduate sports on campus. It has been their (the elected students) proposals and decisions that have resulted in our present eligibility rules and it will be their decisions that change them.

How Mr. Gross figures "Copp and Co." rule the show I do not know. What I do know is that the students control the program and not "Copp and Co."

In regard to his comment, "Copp and Co. cannot hope to keep track of the 7,000 participants in the program," they are not expected to. One would hope that the program would be self-regulating and in most cases it is, but there have been some exceptions. Innis being one.

Mr. Gross has truly missed the proverbial point in the proverbial point in the whole article: "Innis Gets the Hook, ...". The program is set up to allow all full-time undergraduate students who wish to participate, at level within their

Straying from the fold

"Il Papa" is losing his power. It's horrifying and disgusting and all that, but it appears that a good percentage of the St. Mike's student population have strayed from the Vatican line on things pertaining to that which is never talked about and performed only with the lights out.

That's right, when it comes to sex, 82.8 per cent of SMC students answering a Mike questionnaire on sexual attitudes said the Pope's recent statements on res genitalia had no effect on their attitudes.

What's happening over there? We've been on the line to Rome recently and we've been notified that action will be taken. Crack Vatican guards are on their way over to patrol SMC residences and lounges to ensure that this sort of lascivious thought is not put into practice.

Look what they're up against. 33.5 per cent of those answering said they thought pre-marital sex was moral, another 44.8 per cent said "sometimes". An astounding 69.8 per cent said birth control should be practised. A slim majority thought guidance from the church was unnecessary.

They'd better get here quick before things go too far. Even though SMC administration has done its damndest to keep both sexes in a state of "noli tangere" over the past few years, it appears to have been in vain. We trust that the administration is hip to this menace and will do its best to patrol until the guardians of public morality can set things straight.

ability range, to do so. This does not mean that part-time students, retired students, non-students, or anyone else who wishes to participate can, as Mr. Gross seems to think.

Hopefully, with more facilities (the new Athletic Complex) we will be able to accommodate everyone.

Varsity staffer slams Maoists

To the Editor:
 I read with interest the attempts by Maoist Peter Gibson to defend the actions of the CPC-ML "security" people in the disturbance at Innis College.
 Without entering into a long debate I would like to point out that Gibson is obviously covering up his comrades' thuggery with accusations of Trotskyist disruptions. Even more ridiculous is his charge that attempts to call the so-called Academic Activities Committee to account for their actions are motivated by "anti-communism".

The paranoia evident in Gibson's Op-Ed of March 10 make it clear that what he is trying to do is parlay the ill-advised attempt to ban his group into more publicity for the CPC-ML. Perhaps there have been 2,000 arrests of CPC-ML supporters since 1969 but most of those were instigated by the group themselves trying to gain publicity by attacking police etc.

Banning the group would just play into their hands but I would not blame Innis College for not allowing them the use of their facilities.

Bob Bettson
 Longtime Varsity staffer

In reply to the previous misunderstandings, concerning the supposed banishment of the Communist Party of Canada Marxist-Leninist, from this campus, let me say that as a Black student of Innis College who has been in contact with CPC (M-L) members for some time now that their attitudes are exceedingly rotten. I have nothing against them as people, but they should change their actions, if they are to be seen as progressive humanists.

At the beginning of the current school term students at Innis College, especially Black Students, were confronted by CPC(M-L) members to adopt their political line. When students rejected CPC(M-L) totalitarian position, they were labelled by the CPC(M-L) members as "talkers", "anti-activists", etc.

Black students then told them that they were poor people using this University as a means to better themselves, so that they will be able to assist their people in a more concrete manner. Black students also told them that they do not want anyone to come and force us into supporting liberation groups that sell their human dignity to others for American dollars.

We also told the CPC(M-L) members that any human being having a conscience would most probably be unresponsive to apartheid. Therefore, Black people do not support UNITA, an organization backed by the so-called South African Government. When Black students refused to tail behind the CPC(M-L) because of their undignified stands on the Angolan war, they introduced a new program, this time on the question of Zimbabwe (Rhodesia).

On this question students became very enthusiastic, but this enthusiasm quickly died when students discovered that the CPC(M-L) were only using this as a front (strategy) to get their ideology across.

Everyone knows that their ideology evolves out of the geo-political disturbances between the Chinese and the Soviets. Because of this problem the CPC(M-L) rejects the iron realities of the World in which we are living. They denounce the fraternal help the Soviet Union gives to poor countries as a form of imperialism, as if the Soviets had made slaves of the African. The Soviets do not own multi-national corporations in Africa that help more than anything else, to dehumanize Africans.

It was because of our tremendous insight in understanding the true conditions of our people, and the world, that we could not support, or in the least sympathize with the CPC(M-L). Anyway, our stand should give the CPC(M-L) no motives in disallowing Innis College students from attending a meeting at the silk inn where they pay to study. This is a great shame, especially for people who call themselves "socialists". Their actions have proved a lot, since it now seems that there are many racists, fascists, suppressionists and exploiters hiding under the name of Marxist-Leninist. By their (the CPC(M-L) actions we see plainly that they are not internationalists. An internationalist is a person who, by all means, is willing to stop the corruption created by Europeans on this world. It makes no difference who you are.

After this incident students went to Peter Russell, the standing principal of Innis College, to demand that such actions be terminated immediately. No thinking person should tolerate, much less encourage such inhuman actions. The way the CPC(M-L) members acted against Black students on the night of the UNITA rally, was not much different from the way the Western Guard would have acted. The only difference between the two is that the Western Guard do not hide their true nature under political philosophical ideologies. This is what countless others have done, and are doing.

What is most hypocritical about these CPC(M-L) members is that after the incident, they did not even have the principle to approach black students to express their sorrow over what they have done. They went about as if though they had done something morally correct. As far as I am concerned, I couldn't care less if liberals, Stalinists, Trotskiists, or whomever had assaulted Black students, because it was a wrong thing to have done.

If the CPC(M-L) were educating people as they claim, they would have been allowed into the meeting every single person who wanted an opportunity to listen to a speaker from a war zone. Especially from Angola, since there has been so much mis-information about the situation in that country. It would appear that the CPC(M-L), are not interested in clarifying the issue — if they were, they would not have physically prevented people, in particular Innis students, from attending the meeting.

Actions such as those of the CPC(M-L) reveals not only the true nature of that organization, but that of many other so-called leftist organizations. There are the same people who preach obliteration of the present state of the world, yet simultaneously uphold the repression of human freedom. This suppression in disallowing students from freely entering a meeting supposedly organized for the general public.

It is the corruption of the world that we as human beings should all strive to correct. If the Soviet Union, China, the U.S.A., or any other political system, deprives people of their basic human and civil liberties, these should be criticized by every living person. We should all as students, and as people in general, make it our duty that future occurrences such as that caused by the CPC(M-L) be discontinued especially from a liberal university campus. The true function, aim, goal and result of all education should be geared toward the elimination of corruption, of whatever sort, so that posterity will be able to forget the evils of the past. The CPC(M-L) should apologize to Black students for their actions, before being allowed to continue their activities on this campus.

These people (the CPC(M-L) even had the guts to get an Op-Ed published last Wednesday, in the Varsity, with even more misleading information. They said that "it is further exposure of these West Indian opportunists that they went to such a man (Peter Russell) and asked him to keep CPC(M-L) out of Innis College." Calling us opportunists is telling us to forget our past.

What will the CPC(M-L) achieve, by calling us opportunists? What they and others should remember is that name calling doesn't hurt Black people. If it did, we would not be around today. We went to Peter Russell not because he was a Liberal, or whatever, but because he was the principal of Innis College. Is anything wrong with that? If the CPC(M-L) were not molesting us, for such a long time, we would not have gotten solid reasons to go to Peter Russell. We could have easily dwelt with the CPC(M-L) but we thought it more principled if the people who allowed them access to use the facilities of Innis College.

The CPC(M-L) and other "leftist" groups, should understand it is the inherent right of every African, whether he/she lives in the USA, Latin America, the West Indies or Africa to possess him-herself to Africa, and his/her possession of Africa shall not be regarded as an infringement on any claim or purchase made by any race or nation. Therefore, instead of blabbing without conscious thought, the CPC(M-L) and others should know that it is natural for Africans of Cuban nationality, to defend their fatherland.

A thousand Fidel Castros could not have stopped them, because men in earnest are not afraid of consequences, and so if Fidel had tried to stop them he would have had big problems on his hands, therefore he had to join the bandwagon. The Russians owe the Africans so much, their conscience told them that from 1917, had to prove their practice of proletarian internationalism by supporting the African-Cubans also. Imperialists blood-suckers are only trying to fool themselves by giving mass mis-information about the real conditions of the world today.

The Afro-Cubans being a group of the most conscious people on this earth, and having the necessary skills needed in fighting modern warfare, had to do their duty to their homeland.

Since they are so benevolent let them bring about their own reforms, and show us bow different they are to others. We have been bitten too many times by all the other parties.

Drury calls for student police

To The Editor:

Some time ago the Academic Activities Committee held a meeting in the Innis Town Hall. The meeting was called "in support of UNITA". A number of people showed up at their meeting who had publically declared their opposition to UNITA. Because, in the view of the AAC, their only reason for attending was to disrupt the meeting, two members of the Western Guard and one organizer of the MPLA support committee were asked to leave. They didn't. They were physically removed from the building by AAC security people.

As a result of this incident, Principal Russell has recommended that the AAC be barred recognition by the university. He cites the committee's refusal to abide by the university's rule for the protection of meetings as the reason for wanting the committee barred.

The AAC maintains that it has the right to take responsibility to provide for the protection of their own meetings.

Principal Russell worries that allowing groups to provide security for their own meetings may give rise to escalating violence.

Some solution must be found to these problems. I don't think the problem will be solved by kicking the AAC off campus.

Members of the University community need to give the question of security serious thought.

One idea is for the student to establish a volunteer group of marshals. I hope the university decides to review its regulations and hold community discussions in an attempt to find a solution that will allow all groups to hold meetings without fear.

SUGAR SWEET AND DANGEROUS

By LAWRENCE YANOVER

Canadians eat two pounds of sugar a week, each. About 120 pounds a year. Just over 200 years ago, people used to eat 4 or 5 pounds a year. By the middle of the nineteenth century, this had increased to 25 pounds a year. Now we eat as much sugar in two weeks as the people of 1776 ate in a whole year.

Jean Mayer, a Harvard nutritionist, told a Senate committee that "sugar, which has been an additive is now a new food and one which the human system, at least in many people, is not equipped to live with."

John Yudkin, Professor Emeritus of Nutrition at London University and author of the book, "Pure, White and Deadly", says, "There are two key statements that no one can refute.

"First, there is no physiologic requirement for sugar; all human nutritional needs can be met in full without having to take a single spoon of white or brown or raw sugar, or its own or in any food or drink.

"Secondly, if only a small fraction of what is already known about the effects of sugar were to be revealed in relation to any other material used as a good additive, that material would promptly be banned," Yudkin wrote.

Most people find it difficult to accept that their sugar intake is very high, because they think only of the sugar brought home in a bag. But an increasing proportion of "hidden sugar" is already made up into foods by the manufacturer. In fact, 64 per cent — almost two-thirds — of the sugar we eat comes from those sources.

Leaving aside obvious foods like cakes, desserts and soft drinks, sugar is in almost every variety of canned soup, in many cans of baked beans, several kinds of canned meat, almost every breakfast food, including many "Granolas", several frozen vegetables and pre-cooked dinners, as well as most canned vegetables.

In many foods, the amount is surprisingly high. You can get some idea by seeing where sugar ranks in the list of ingredients. They are listed in order of quantity. Read the labels!

Baby foods also contain a great deal of sugar, not only in desserts, and breakfast cereal mixes. Sugar is in a large proportion of the meat and vegetables in baby foods and junior foods.

If, as seems likely, people are laying the foundation for serious disease in later life by encouraging the development of a sweet tooth in children, this may be more harmful than encouraging kids to begin smoking at the age of 12 or 15.

Many think that it is refined white sugar we should avoid and none of the criticisms apply to raw and brown sugars. The degree of refining makes virtually no difference to the harmfulness of sugar, according to John Yudkin. Raw sugar contains 96 per cent sucrose (sugar), about 1 per cent water and about 3 per cent of unwanted other matter. The final refined product is over 99.9 per cent sucrose. Brown sugar simply contains some of the molasses that has not been entirely removed during refining. It can either be made by cutting short the refining process or by adding a little brown caramel to the usual pure white crystals.

The only nutrient in any quantity in brown sugar is iron, but even so, one pound of this sugar will supply less than the daily recommended dose of this mineral. The iron, by the way, comes mostly from the tiny quantities worn off the machinery in which the sugar is prepared from cane.

Let's investigate the techniques used by industry to increase sales and profits. A quotation from a pamphlet issued by a sugar firm states "sugar works for you with each bite you eat — for your body is an energy factory with sugar as its fuel."

All food contains "energy" in that some of its components can provide the fuel for the body's workings. Sugars are quickly absorbed and absorbed and taken to the tissues. A piece of bread and butter would take a few minutes longer. This insignificant time differential is what the sugar propagandists mean when they talk about sugar's "quick" energy. This rapidly with which sugar foods the bloodstream can, in many instances, be more harmful than beneficial because of counter regulation by the body's hormonal system.

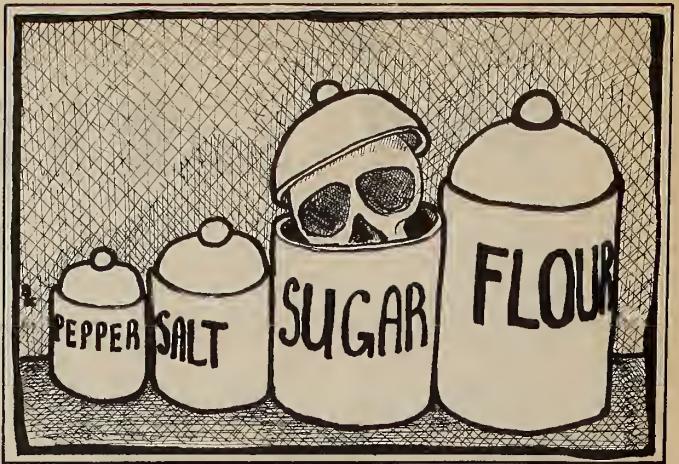

Does their insistence that sugar contains energy arise from the fact that it contains nothing else? All other foods contain energy as well as at least some nutrients in the way of protein, minerals, etc. Sugar contains energy, and that is all!

Unlike sugar manufacturers, industries which produce foods like meat or dairy products or fruit have spent a great deal of money over the years supporting nutritional studies on their products, even though these foods make up a much smaller portion of the Western diet than sugar now does.

The most intensive publicity activity of the sugar industry during the past ten or twelve years has been its attack on cyclamates. The sugar industry spent more money on research and publicity on the harmful effects of cyclamate than they have ever spent on studying the metabolic effects of their own products.

In 1953, they began to spend at the rate of $60,000 a year in U.S.A. and increased this to $750,000 by 1957. In 1964, the President of Sugar Information Incorporated, talking to the Sugar Club, said "Every man in this room is affected directly in the pocketbook, by the challenge of synthetic sweeteners."

Sugar is strongly believed to be contributing in some way to the development of several chronic diseases. It is not the one and only cause of the diseases, but whatever your heredity, and however much you may persist in other habits that produce these conditions, your chances of developing them would be significantly reduced if you reduced your sugar consumption. Chersarkin said that he "began to understand something about disease when I stopped looking for specific causes and recognized that chronic disease actually is the result of mistakes in living."

The evidence from fossil man suggests that the condition now known as dental decay, hardly occurred in prehistoric times, before the introduction of agriculture and the great increase of starchy foods like cereals in man's diet.

This disease became common only recently. There is no doubt that this is associated with the introduction of sugar as an increasing component of the conventional diet. Of course, cavities, (or "caries") can be reduced significantly by restricting the intake of sugar.

Manufactured, ready to eat snack foods, particularly baked goods, are very suspect. The fact that people have started eating more frequently in recent decades is also, in itself, conducive to caries.

Contrary to popular belief, coronary disease is not largely due to fat in the diet. The evidence shows that a strong relationship exists between sugar consumption and coronary mortality in a variety of countries. But the strongest correlation of all exists between the rise in the number of reported coronary deaths in U.K. and the rise in the number of radio and television sets.

High intakes of sugar are associated with diabetes. Dr. G.D. Campbell points out that the village-dwelling Zulus of South Africa have virtually no diabetes, while its prevalence among Zulus living in the towns is almost as high as that in the white population.

Chronic and severe indigestion, too, could be greatly relieved by a sugar restricted diet alone in 70 per cent of patients, according to some researchers. It is more successful than the average "gastric" diet. The low sugar diet seems to work because sugar irritates the lining of the upper digestive tract. Try placing sugar in a cut, it hurts almost as much as salt.

Most foods (an orange for example) contains at least a part of the nutrients necessary to begin their own metabolism. Sugar is not only valueless, but a chemical menace, for it lacks the very B vitamins and minerals necessary for its own assimilation. The body steals these minerals from other foods or from stored deposits in the body, creating a B complex vitamin and mineral deficiency.

This is a partial list of diseases suspected to be related to high sugar intake. These diseases include myopia (near sightedness), skin diseases such as seborrheic dermatitis, gout, some forms of cancer, fatty livers, enlarged kidneys, early maturation (ie. puberty) and accelerated life processes, shortened life span, decreased ability to fight infection and mental illness.

Brown Or White It Makes You Blue

THE SUGAR BLUES. William Dufty. Chilton Book Co., Radnor, Pa. In Canada by Thomas Nelson and Sons, Ltd. (paperback in early summer)

By RAY LICHTMAN

"Sugar means the refined product of the sugar cane or beet generally called sucrose. Blues means a state of depression or melancholy overlaid with fear, physical discomfort, and anxiety — often expressed lyrically as an autobiographical chronicle of personal disaster. Sugar blues is the multiple physical and mental miseries caused by human consumption of sucrose."

In Sugar Blues, Dufty claims that sugar has been used as an exotic and expensive medicine; led to the defeat of the armies of Islam and Napoleon; had its profits support the slave trade; led the exploitation of the third world; provided a foundation for the multi-billion dollar drug and mental health industries. The "mind truly boggles when one glances over what passes for medical history. Through the centuries, troubled souls have been barbecued for bewitchment, exercised for possession, locked up for insanity, tortured for masturbatory madness, psychiatrized for psychoses, lobotomized for schizophrenia.

"How many patients would have listened if the local herd had told them that the only thing ailing them was sugar blues?"

A large portion of the book is a reply to the claims of "respectable" nutritionists, i.e., those nutritionists whose salaries are paid by the sugar industry and whose statements support the profits that make sugar so sweet. All agree that sugar has no nutritive value but many "non-respectable" nutritionists hold that sugar is an anti-nutrient. Instead of being able to use minerals, vitamins, proteins, etc. for growth the body must re-route them for the processing and detoxification of sugar.

Unlike those films I saw in Hygiene class, I never left my teeth in a glass of Coke overnight, yet I still got cavities. Sugar makes the blood highly acidic. The body must reduce this acidity in order to function properly. It does this by withdrawing various minerals, particularly calcium from certain internal structures such as teeth, bones and muscles. This withdrawal leads to dental cavities, weakened bones and impaired muscular co-ordination and reflexes. Dilated reflexes might be a major cause of the carnage on our highways.

What follows is the mechanics of the sugar blues: sugar entering the blood stream causes high blood sugar or hyperglycemia. The pancreas become stimulated and a large amount of insulin is released which allows the liver to remove the excessive sugar from the blood. High blood sugar is dangerous thus the amount of insulin released is an emergency reaction and removes too much sugar from the blood, leading to hypoglycemia or low blood sugar.

Very quickly then we go from the only stated value of sugar by the manufacturers, the burst of quick energy, to the lethargy and depression of the sugar blues.

The later state is familiar to smokers of cannabis, which also causes low blood sugar leading to the familiar "stunned" munchies."

Low blood sugar is also an emergency condition for the body: it demands a response from the suprarenal glands in the form of epinephrine which causes the liver to release some of its stored up chocolate bars into the blood. Given these transitory energy states in the body, is it any wonder that we are moody, feel like we are on a see-saw, up and down, high and depressed, etc. In this physiological cycle the pancreas is usually the first to give up its production of insulin.

It should be no surprise to learn that diabetes is almost unknown in "primitive" societies and that in our society with store bought insulin, diabetes is widespread and on the increase.

Next the suprarenal glands which make the hormones that allow us to cope with sugar emergencies and stress become exhausted. This game of physiological Russian roulette also has psychological consequences. The mind and the body are no two separate entities. The human organism is an interactive whole. Mental imbalances are but one major manifestation of physical damage. The increase in hypoglycemia parallels the increase in schizophrenia.

The large food corporations continue to see profits as their major concern. Advertising continues to convince us that foods with no nutritional value are good for us. Drug companies continue to produce products that suppress our bodies' natural warning signs. By treating symptoms doctors continue to increase the alienation from our own bodies and natural defenses. The mental health agencies continue to treat psychological processes as divorced from physiological processes, thus ensuring a schizophrenic population. Finally governmental regulatory agencies continue to support these industries, and they in turn are financial backers for political parties.

Often so-called radical political analysts are labelled paranoid — they see conspiracies everywhere. Understanding the conditions created by sugar, lethargy, mental confusion and alienation, I become paranoid when, with governmental approval sugar is used in the packaging and processing of almost every food product on the supermarket shelves: in cigarettes, beer (once brewers who used sugar were guilty of "sophisticating" the brew and were run out of town), toothpaste, ketchup, the curing process of bacon, mayonnaise, etc., etc.

FACT: Total sales for the confectionary makers alone reached a record $1,977,000,000 last year.

FACT: Heart and circulatory disease kills 55 per cent of all Canadians.

FACT: In a week, a child may be exposed to 92 cereal ads, 50 candy ads, 20 or more ads for snack foods and drive-in restaurants — but there are virtually no ads for vegetables, milk products, meat or fruits.

FACT: Snacks and convenience foods are one of the areas of fastest growth in the $120 Billion annual food business (in U.S.A.)

FACT: The recently completed Nutrition Canada Study revealed that over one-half of the adult Canadian population was overweight.

REVIEW

Title of cutesy 'Fresh Disasters' is play's best epitaph

Ever since I have been exposed to his work it has been my desire to say something good about Larry Fineberg. But Fresh Disasters, his musical currently on view at the Tarragon, rendered my best intentions woefully inadequate when faced with a comedy that seldom rises above the Wayne and Schuster level of ponderous pubescent hamming generally supposed to pass for Canadian humour. So what's to be done but to throw up one's hands in dismay and let the title write its own epitaph?

In this apparent burlesque of The Odyssey with its hero cast as a super-jock trying to crawl out from under his own legend as it becomes a wearisome and painful burden to him in his middle age, Ulysses meekly stands by as the witch Circe and her blind domestic, Homer, are busily creating the myth before his very eyes. Such a theme is rich in comic possibilities as John Barth has elsewhere shown. But Fineberg sacrifices wit for cutesiness. And where we might expect some comic insights from a middle-aged has-been of a hero, all we get is an exhortation to build walls around ourselves and our mates (of whatever sex or species) and so keep out fire, famine, flood, rapine, pillage, slaughter and other — fresh disasters.

One has the uneasy feeling that the play is little more than a wish-fulfillment fantasy to return to that place which Mary Kerr's otherwise intriguing grotto-like set rather strongly suggests. Indeed, the pervading feeling is one of little boys bewailing the loss of cuddly teddy-bears, and the dreams of Peter Pan. In one of the play's few moments of genuine fun, the Lofus-Eaters, a trio of former dope-freaks transformed into trees and getting high on chlorophyll, do a number called Stuck in the Mud, with which they hilariously extol the virtues of being rooted in a goo which, like placenta, may be messy but is at least safe. Earlier, Rafe Macpherson as Critter steals the show with All's Right with the World, a song of salivating gratitude for his masochistic dependency relationship with the cyclops Polyphemus whose house-pet he is.

Granted, there is something salutary in the notion that heroics are bullshit and the world might be a better place if we gave up our images of immortality and settled for the mundane warmth of interpersonal relationships, however kinky; granted, also, that to dismiss the concerns of the world and get on with cultivating one's own garden is as valid a conclusion as any other. But it helps if you've written the rest of Candide first. Fineberg is not blessed with the double-edged wit that distances us from the sentiment, although both Stuck in the Mud and All's Right with the World do work on that level: their humour comments on itself.

Yet with the rest of the music largely reminiscent of The Fantastiks and the lyrics for the most part banal, Fresh Disasters sinks into the pathos characteristic of vapid American musical comedy, a genre whose only claim to fame is its uniqueness in raising debased taste to the level of a national cultural institution. It is to be hoped that Fineberg, even in his schlockier moments, is attempting to send-up this tradition. That is not, however, the effect. He seems to be altogether too much in love with the kitsch: as a consequence missing just about every opportunity to use the music and lyrics in the manner of Gay and Brecht — which would appear to be what the intentions of this abortive comedy call for.

The actors have no easy job of it. Blaine Parker as Ulysses is saddled with the unenviable task of playing straight-man to the entire company without even the compensation of having much of a character to do it with. Most of the time he looks as though he's not quite sure of what he's doing there: I mean as an actor, not as a character in the play. Allen Stewart-Coates as Homer, although overtly mannered in his performance, is at least better served by the author, being fortunate enough to be given what is really the only witty song of the whole show: The Thickening Plot, a smug justification of a writer's distortion of truth to serve his own ends, since truth is what survives and what survives is what is written.

Dorothy Poste, a sensuous bitch-goddess of a Circe, provides one of the high points of the production with her I'm Not Annoyed at All, a not particularly funny song which is more than redeemed by Miss Poste's comedic talents as she belts it out in the full glory of a Mae West in heat. In the dialogue parts, however, she would help herself if, from time to time, she relied less on the lines and more on herself.

As a matter of fact, most of the rest of the cast would better serve itself by a more rapid-fire delivery of the lines. This might at least relieve them of the unhappy necessity of mugging their way through the clinkers. Particularly unfortunate in this respect is Catherine Leckle as Demodocus. When, through lack of confidence either in themselves or in the script, actors try too hard, the result is not funny: it is depressing. Some of the blame for this must surely go to the director, Stephen Katz. He might have imposed a little style on his actors; the production could do with some pizzazz.

Katz's job might have been easier had he had more comedians at his disposal. As it is, he really only has one: Rafe Macpherson who, as I mentioned, before, steals the show with what is undoubtedly the finest moment in it. Descending on a swing from a trap door in the ceiling, he is Kind of a Bird (of paradise) in a gilded cage, not without echoes of Sesame Street's Big Bird gone poovy. He glories in his masochism with no apologies to anyone, his bitchy brittleness alternating with a pathetic dependency. In this scene even Sam Moses as Polyphemus is at his best. The relationship between cannibal master and feathery house-pet is the most successfully realized moment in the play.

The performances of Rafe Macpherson and Dorothy Poste are a treat for us comic-starved Toronto audiences, and should be seen despite the rest of the general dreariness.

It is at once ironic and highly appropriate that Fresh Disasters, billed as "An Adult Musical Comedy", should have been produced by The Young People's Theatre: it should also have been reserved for that theatre's regular clientele. As a children's show it might have considerable merit.

Admittedly I've been a little rough on this slight entertainment. Yet with these people passing themselves off as professionals, with Larry Fineberg suffering from, if anything, an inflated reputation, surely there is little to be gained by stroking fragile egos already overburdened by the myth of the Great Canadian Theatrical Renaissance. Perhaps, like Ulysses, it is time to crawl out from under the myth; as it may be time for reviewers to stop creating it like the blind domestic of this play.

Toronto Truck takes on Masters' melancholy moralizing

A radical departure for the Toronto Truck Theatre was their recent decision to stage the challenging, melancholy Spoon River Anthology instead of their bread-and-butter light entertainment. Spoon River is the creation of the American poet Edgar Lee Masters, and details, from within the town graveyard and from beyond the grave, the life of a small Illinois town between the Civil War and the turn of the century. The speakers are the dead, and it is their own epitaph, not that on the tombstone, that the characters spell out in laud blank verse.

To the shades of Spoon River, similar to those of the Latin poets, life is a summary thing, to be remembered as an overview of the passions, with an absolute truth of situation. Thus through his poetry Masters indicates a point of view which turns on its ear the traditional small-town values while still asserting them as a social reality. It is sometimes hard to separate out the conflation Masters makes of his own peculiar brand of despair and the harshness of life itself, and it is also hard to tell how deep his idea of America as an ideal went.

Spoon River in whole is a collection of over two hundred characters, speaking out about their lives and their entanglements with the lives of others and with the world itself. The figures of command in Spoon River are the judge, the corrupt newspaperman, the politicians, the ambitious industrialist; the figures of fun are the Chinaman, the Jewish traveller, the spoiled women, the artistic. Life is at best an exuberance of spirit, at worst a stifling of vitality. There is humanity in the horse stables, there is cruelty in kindness, there is death in the promise of eternal life. All the world-weariness of Hamlet is to be found in Masters' own desired epitaph, "I pass you the world, like an orange to a child... I can no more with you..."

The staging of such a work of art is entirely dependent on the choice of characters to be portrayed, and the shape of the production is determined entirely by the actors' use of sound. In the first category, Toronto Truck's Virginia Reh did not entirely succeed in presenting the profundity of Masters' thought; in the second, the simple and musical presentation led to an atmosphere of community which helped the production through the humorous, and often inappropriate touches that the small cast of four insisted on adding to the powerful words themselves.

Left out of the present production were the main representatives of Masters' defence of poetry; likewise his figure of Lincoln, as the motivating force in mid-America of the period and as an overwhelming symbol of heroic virtue, was diminished by the excision of those characters who eulogized him. The acting was mainly that of voice and face, supported by music well sung but execrably played. Fiona Stanton, who played most of the coquettish females of Masters' imagination, could be relied on when she played piano but on a recently-learned fiddle, was detrimental to the atmosphere of the piece. The treasure of the evening, musically, was the powerful and glowing voice of Lorraine McLelland, who controlled the stage from the introductory rendition of Old Hundred onwards.

The male leads were called on to portray a greater variety of roles, and both Anthony Bekenn as a rabid reverend and Steven Purdey as a hen-pecked husband set a high standard of convicted stagecraft. Pathetically, the audience was not capable of responding with much depth. The play has suffered from a disastrous lack of publicity, so much so that a couple of performances have had to be called off because there were more actors than audience, and there was some danger that the play would be cut short. Fortunately for local theatre-goers, the decision has been made to try for one more week to stage the show. It was galling to see a large house obviously unaware of the serious intent behind the play; there is a delicate balance among the characters, if enough are presented, to indicate the concerns of the poet in a shapely way. The high point of the evening should have been, I suspect, the self-pronounced epitaph of a 96-year-old woman, still loving life, and happy in a fatalistic way in the happiness that devoted living brings with it. This was marred by outright laughter from the audience; and the other climactic indictment of modern spiritual diseases, the recounting of a love-triangle which led to a murder, was greeted only with polite attention by my evening's audience; while the tragedy of a failed Don Juan brought sly chuckles. Certainly Masters' work is heavily moral, and is intended for those who attempt to reconcile private conscience and public mortality with human pity.

This is a fine play, staged well, but despite the efforts of its actors, by no means highly finished. It is a worthwhile effort, ambitious, and unlikely to be repeated. For the sake of the play, I recommend it.

Street life revealed by pistol - packing poet -- no ivory tower here

The Poet Cop
Hans Jewinski
Simon & Shuster, $1.95

Somewhere in Cabbagetown, everywhere in Cabbagetown, there is a big smile on the face of a serious cop. In big black boots, under the red-banded hat, walks Hans Jewinski, a Leo adrift on an avenue of spinxes, a poet who draws lines between poetry and life.

Sometimes he can be found in a high speed chase, a barroom brawl, or following his nose to the room of a dead man, but always he is stalking poems. At other times he oils his printing press with sweat, producing his Missing Link chapbooks, and still he manages to squeeze time out of a clock-work apple for his family. Somewhere in his busy day he gets his poetry written.

Poet Cop appeared in November '75, his first major publication.

Usually the poems are fast-coming, as though written on the run, and yet his needlepoint detail, often flattered by accompanying photographs, is that of a careful thinker. They are not stifled by lofty mysticism or academic withdrawal; his approach to poetry is realistic and his work does not betray his pulse which, at various speeds, is felt in each poem.

The days of the poet in the street have been tiled away on microfilm; for a unique twist Jewinski has put the streets into poetry, and into an honourable place in Canadian literature. Canadian literature needs more poets like Hans Jewinski, poets who are not afraid of living poems — in the line of duty.

Learn vibrant versifying at U of T writers' workshop

Caroline Bayard — Who are you, Jerry Lambert?

Jerry Lambert — I am the coordinating Director of Platform for the Arts, an organization which sets up tours for writers all across Canada. A few years ago my wife Arlene and I started the first national tours for poets and writers and playwrights. We got grants from the Ontario Arts Council to set up tours in high schools in Ontario. Then the Canada Council asked us to arrange tours for writers in universities all across Canada. We have started the writers' union tours some years ago but at this stage of the game they want to get their own office involved in this.

Bayard — What do you think of League of Canadian Poets? Do you feel it is a strong organization?

Lambert — It's not strong in an aggressive way but it's a substantial organization and it has commanded respect. It includes most of the reading poets as well as some of the younger ones. More and more members are getting emotionally involved, especially in the area of publishing, contracts and copyrights. There are committees within the league that are organizing around these issues.

Bayard — Is the league a union? Lambert — It's more casual. It's not such a tightly knit group as the word union would imply.

Bayard — Have some poets been hostile to the idea of a bureaucratic organization that represents them?

Lambert — No, at the beginning they were mostly oblivious. But it's changing now.

Bayard — I am trying to get a clearer picture of all the things you are involved with. Apart from your activities with Platform for the Arts you have been teaching creative writing in university workshops for a number of years, haven't you?

Lambert — Yes, I have taught at Glendon, at Ryerson, at U of T. I am organizing a two week writers' workshop at U of T this year (New College). We have got a whole batch of very exciting people coming. I am pulling it all together.

Bayard — Who are the writers involved?

Lambert — Well, I have Diane Wakoski from U.S.A., David Fadden from Hamilton, The Horsemen, P.K. Page from Vancouver for the Poetry seminar. In the novel seminar we'll have Sylvia Fraser, Andreas Schroeder and Alice Denham from New York.

This workshop is the only substantial writers' workshop in Canada. I don't mean to put down Banff but they only have one or two people there, and it's a 6 week thing, fairly expensive. But ours is the only one that has a package of teachers who are writers.

Bayard — Are you getting some money from the Canada Council for this workshop?

Lambert — No, I am not. I am getting some money from Winario though. Tuitions would normally cost $120. But it will actually be $70, with Winario covering the difference.

Bayard — What else have you lined up for this summer?

Lambert will participate in the U of T writers' workshop this summer.

Lambert — A poetry festival in Collingwood in August which I am very excited about. The Hart House Poetry Festival was a great success. I heard people there, Raoul Duguay particularly, whom I would like to see in Collingwood.

Bayard — Can you remember any students from these writers' workshops that you taught or organized? Any students who have subsequently become writers?

Lambert — I can't claim their genius — but I can mention a few who have attended these workshops as students, yes, H. Markovitz who got the Centennial award in 1967 for his play, David French. A whole batch of people are starting to come through. Wendy Lill who has a play that was accepted in a Toronto theatre is one of them.

Bayard — What's the average age of the people who register for the workshop?

Lambert — There is no average age. I had a bright 82 year old American, and I had lots of people around 16 and 17, quite a few in their early 20's, some middle-aged people too.

Bayard — Do you have to see a manuscript before accepting anybody for the course?

Lambert — I prefer to when they are 16 or so, I'm probably more hesitant than I should be, but some of the writers are quite frank, quite direct. It can be harder to take when you are younger.

Bayard — Is the writers' workshop a forum for ideas or a training session for people who want to develop writing skills?

Lambert — First of all, you can't make a functioning writer out of somebody who does not have talent. It's useless, you are either good or you are not.

But we can make specific suggestions — even though in 2 weeks you can't be comprehensive. I think the benefits of coming to the workshop are limited but important. In a sense the workshop provides editors. A whole number of editors. A writer can bring a manuscript for example and hear that his language is gorgeous but his characterization is weak, or that their plots do not fulfill any dramatic purposes. All you are getting of course is a personal viewpoint from a specific writer.

Bayard — How many people are there in each seminar?

Lambert — It depends. If it's poetry there might be as many as 30. But there are only 5 or 6 people with sizeable manuscripts. And the others have only half a dozen pages. In the novel workshop there would be less people, about 15. In a drama about 25 or 30. But when you get down to 5 or 6 you may or may not have 2 or 3 brilliant people in it. But when you have 25 or 30 people, the discussion level goes up and the bright ones dominate the conversation, anyway, hopefully they will.

Bayard — Is everybody in the seminar reading everyone else's manuscript?

Lambert — No, the person directing the seminar selects things that may be good, so-so, or not bad — he or she has sections of them written out and handed around. In my novel class last year we had 15 people but only 5 or 6 were doing readings to some length. Occasionally I gave short assignments (on stream of consciousness, characterization, dialogue, etc.) to the people who had not done much writing, so that I could get everybody involved.

Bayard — Does the writers' workshop help people getting further ahead? Has it in the past?

Lambert — Sometimes it does. There are over a dozen writers and we all have publishers, and agents. And some of us have agents and publishers in the States too. If a few of us get excited about something we'll pass it on. A number of short stories and plays have been picked up that way. Susan Findlay came from Montreal one year. She was organizing a weekly TV program there called Teleplay, and she chose a play that finally got produced not on TV but on radio that way.

Bayard — Are there CBC people who attend the workshops?

Lambert — There have been in the past. One year there was a publisher who came because he wanted to see what was happening.

Bayard — What about publishers in the States?

Lambert — A number of the people teaching in the workshop have publishers in the States, Wakoski, Schroeder, Engel, do.

Scorsese struggles with lumpy script, shows NY through cabbie's window

Travis Bickle is an ex-Marine from the mid-west. He starts driving a New York city cab because, he tells us, he can't sleep. Martin Scorsese has very carefully directed Paul Schrader's rather second rate script. Of any movie I can remember I cannot think of one where the separation between script and production is so clear. Scorsese was chosen by the producers, Michael Phillips and Julia Phillips, to make Schrader's story. Scorsese's work is tense and loaded with numerous stunning images, but Scorsese cannot help large rifts which appear in the movie due to the weakness of the script.

Robert de Niro of Mean Streets and The Godfather Part II is Travis, our cabbie. He portrays a kind of madman loner who must resolve his existence in some kind of blood-and-guns climax. He keeps an amazingly badly written diary which we hear narrated as he writes; an Arthur Bremmer touch for you homicidal maniac lovers. Travis becomes infatuated with Betsy, an upstate girl campaigning for a liberal presidential candidate, Charles Palantine. Betsy is played by Cybill Shepherd to both Travis' and our detriment. Travis thinks she is a goddess and she thinks he's (at best) funky, until Travis takes her to a porn movie (Swedish apparently, with subtitles about Masters and Johnson).

Shortly after, while Travis is working one of his sleepless nights, a twelve and a half year-old prostitute named Iris jumps in his cab in an attempt to escape her slavers, but Travis ends up pocketing a twenty dollar bill from her pimp. Travis has already told us how much he hates the scum and filth of New York; he takes this as one more reason to do so.

With all this under his belt Travis proceeds to arm himself to the teeth (Magnum 44 etc.), but to what purpose we aren't sure; the candidate and Cybill Shepherd are still hanging around.

What I haven't mentioned is that all this time we have been watching the city through the windshield of a taxi cab. Scorsese has been showing us both powerful and amusing vignettes. There are great scenes with the cabbies, including Peter Boyle, at the all-night diners. There are intriguing characters who ride in Travis' cab and do the nastiest things in the back seat. Scorsese even shows up himself as an agitated man about to kill his adulterous wife (with a Magnum). All this creates Travis' view of the city; it's not hard for him to find his scum. At the same time Scorsese has handled these scenes with the care and technique that made his more modest effort Mean Streets a great movie.

Travis has been practicing with his guns to beat the band. He works with about five of them including the Magnum. Finally he heads for the Palantine Rally with darling Cybill sifting alongside Palantine. The audience, us, is split between scratching their heads and thinking — Obey Obey this is it — But this is not the case for Travis, with drawn gun and shaved head escapes the clutches of the Secret Service without firing a single shot. Instead he goes to where Iris does her business and blasts hell out of everyone in sight except Iris, of course. This scene is supposed to be the emotional release for Travis and for us. It is ten minutes of the fluffiest, coldest murdering I've seen in a movie, no matter how many times they scream or how many times they shoot. It's tedious and painful. I found myself muttering — Why are they showing me this? Travis amazingly survives and, of all things, is not only cleansed of his murderous obsession but is also a local hero!

On the whole the script strikes me as a combination of a couple of Harry Chapin songs, specifically (you guessed it) Taxi and Sniper. It's not even a good attempt at combining them, no matter what you think of Harry Chapin (not much in this corner). The movie is as melodramatic as Chapin, but that's not a fault. Scorsese likes melodrama; Mean Streets is a good one. But melodrama needs a tight consistent plot and this plot is not consistent; it lumps and dribbles, then runs off in an incongruous direction.

Scorsese has done amazing work even with the limitations of the script; he has used the cab as an ever present image on the streets of the city. Like in Mean Streets, he manages to create, or I hope, show the intense fabric of the streets. He has done some of the nicest night cinematography I've seen as well. Scorsese has directed some very skilled performances from de Niro and Jodie Foster (Iris) as well as some terrific supporting work from Harry Keitel as Sport the Pimp and Peter Boyle as the Wizard. The only exception is Cybill Shepherd whom one New York reviewer called "Mussolini in drag".

I don't mind ambiguity in movies or anything very much, as long as it is handled as carefully as one would any other dramatic device (or dynamite). I think here it has not been resolved even by inference or mysticism. Would Squeaky Fromme have substituted scum for Gerry Ford? But unlike Harry Chapin, Travis does not keep Betsy's twenty.

Tired King brings warmth to Ballard's cooler

Carole King came to town for the first time in over six years and put on a great show last Wednesday evening at Harold's Palace. For a woman who was obviously tired, being at the end of a long tour, she brought a lot of warmth to the cold, cold Gardens. About 9,000 people saw the show, but if Bill Ballard wasn't so greedy he would have held the concert in the more intimate confines of Our Lady of Shuter Street. The sound in the Concert Bowl was actually quite good, but Carole King should not be subjected to the Gardens. As Carole wore a Darryl Sittler sweater during the last half of the show, the Ballard theme was quite strong.

King sang songs from all the many phases of her career. Her voice, although rough at times, was full and vibrant. She was in good humour, and bantered with both her audience and her band on numerous occasions. The band was composed of some very well-known and proficient session people. The ubiquitous Russ Kunkel on drums and Leland Sklar on bass and background vocals once again proved that they are a dynamic duo. Bobbye Hall on percussion and Clarence McDonald on keyboards and synthesizers punctuated King's music. Other background vocals were contributed by electric guitarist Waddy Wachtel, with Doyle Hoff on acoustic. The stellar band was greatly appreciated by the royalty in the Gardens.

King sang almost thirty songs and gave the crowd their money's worth. She performed almost the entire Tapestry album. Those songs sound as fresh today as they did over five years ago. On "Smackwater Jack" Carole played acoustic guitar but unfortunately the electric guitars tended to overpower her voice. A guitar solo that was not particularly appropriate marred the mood of "It's Too Late". King provided a very nice piano ending for "So Far Away".

Middle-period Carole King tends to not retain its distinctiveness. The songs of Music and Rhymes and Reasons are almost interchangeable. King skipped through these albums, but the band did perform a well-done version of "Sweet Seasons". The electric piano of Clarence McDonald highlighted an extended version of "Music". The nadir of recent albums, "Fantasy", was represented only by "Believe in Humanity". "Jazzman", featuring Tom Scott's sax solo was the sole number from Wraparound Joy.

King's new album seems to feature lyrics that are more complex, and songs that show that she has rethought some of her musical concepts. While "Golden Man" was done with only King on stage, the other songs featured the whole band and they really rocked. "Alabaster Lady" was a suite in four parts and varied widely in mood and tempo. "There's A Space Between Us" allowed the group to cook. McDonald's faded strings highlighted "Daughter of Light" and "Ambrosia".

Carole showed that she is a multi-faceted entertainer at the close of her show. She and Doyle Hoff sang a duet on Michael Murphey's "Boy From The Country". Sklar and Wachtel joined for the harmonies on the timeless "Will You Love Me Tomorrow" and "Up On The Roof". The energy level peaked with rollicking performances of "Locomotion" and "I Feel the Earth Move". King's encores were her new single "Only Love Is Real", featuring a Wachtel solo, the familiar "You've Got A Friend", with synthesized strings and the moving "A Natural Woman". She sent her audience home happy.

Although King has had numerous successes since Tapestry, that album will always remain as her most lasting achievement. She is a woman who has contributed both as a singer and songwriter to the history of American music. Brooklyn's Tin Pan Alley teams of Goffin and King, Sedaka and Greenfield, Liebermans Stoller, and Mann and Weil shaped pre-Beatles rock, and all of those individuals have never fallen from favour. King's new album, Throughbred is another step forward. Her music will endure, and any woman who can conquer Maple Leaf Gardens deserves every success.

Stevens LP is pretentious, obscure, absurd

Cat Stevens

Numbers: A Pythagorean Theory Tale

I just don't understand it. Why were all those people waiting overnight in line at Sam's for tickets last week? Cat Stevens is spent as a musical force. The albums he has put out in the last few years have been constantly mediocre. Even the great Tea for the Tillerman LP has not weathered well in spots. Stevens has always been an egotist. Who else would put a new song on a greatest hits album? At least Two Fine People stifled. He deserved it.

Numbers is a Cat Stevens album that is indicative of all his other albums. It is pretentious, lyrically obscure, and thematically absurd. Musically it is a ripoff, as it barely totals thirty minutes of playing time, but once again A & M has pulled out all the stops in their packaging efforts and, just as in every other Stevens album, it has its moments.

We are warned not to take Numbers too seriously. The album tells the story of the planet of Polygon, which existed to give Numbers to the Universe, and the nine Polygons who lived in the Palace. The orderly world of the Polygons has been disrupted. I don't know by what. The lyrics are all printed, and if you want to bother figuring them out, that's your prerogative. This album sets a high point for obscurity.

Now that I've got the theme out of the way, let's turn to the music. Stevens produced the album (meaning that the controlling influence of Paul Samwell-Smith is missing), and played guitars, piano and harp. Jean Roussel played other keyboards, and longtime cohort Alan Davies played guitars and sang. Bruce Lynch handled bass, and Gerry Conway played drums. David Sanborn played sax, and Art Garfunkel and Lewis Furey assisted on vocals. The album was partially recorded in Andre Perry's studio in the Laurentians. Obviously, with a line-up like that some good music is going to emerge in spite of the banality of the theme and lyrics.

Speaking of banality, "Banapple Gas" is the new single, and it demonstrates Cat's cleverness at constructing catchy choruses. I find myself bopping along with the song in spite of my contempt for it. "Drywood" is another song that sends that furtive rush of adrenaline up my spine. "Majiks of Majiks" has a full-scale Broadway opening that comes in with a good chorus hook and also provides that rush. Of course I'm suspicious of that feeling since I also experienced it at the end of the Cowbills' "We Can Fly". Another highlight of "Majik of Majiks" is David Sanborn's alto sax. "Jzero" is a cute bouncy song that you could become addicted to. The instrumental "Whistlestar" is innocuous and will make a perfect theme for a television commercial. In other words, if it wasn't for absolute clunkers like "Novim's Nightmare", "Land O' Free Love and Goodbye", "Home", and "Mamad's Anthem", I could almost like this album in spite of its vapidty.

Cat Stevens has turned out some very good songs in the last decade (e.g. "Matthew and Son", "Lady D'Arbanville", "Sad Lisa", "Wide World" and "Morning Has Broken"). He is a living embodiment of the best reason for greatest hits albums, i.e., to excise the excesses. I'd probably enjoy a Cat Stevens concert if someone gave me tickets, but I'd never stand in line for him. Chacun a son gou.

Rides to any point in North America

This is a severely edited version of an interview of Denis Johnston by Rod Taylor and John Wilson. Mr. Johnston is in Toronto to direct his play the Scythe and the Sunset which opens this week at Hart House.

Question: Did the flamboyant personalities and actions of the leaders of the Rising help or hinder you in your attempt to dramatize the subject? For example, Plunkett's marriage in Kilmainham jail the night before he was executed seems indicative of a showman's psyche.

Johnston: I think that was a melodramatic thing to do unless it was done for legal reasons; yes I can even remember at the time thinking it was a bit theatrical.

Question: Then melodrama was inherent in those events.

Johnston: Oh yes; certainly in that event.

Question: Did the historical correspondents have as clear an understanding of their situations as do their prototypes in this play.

Johnston: No. Particularly in the case of Tellely there is a distinct change of attitude. He hopes at the beginning to die gloriously in a fight to the finish. The play is historical, dramatized of course. Nobody is so clear in their views; they have to be simplified. Tellely realizes that the public and indeed his own fellows are letting him down so far as the technique of the thing is concerned, and that it was developing into the kind of comic-opera affair it was.

Question: Surely Pearse and Connolly knew that insurrection in a time of military law was treason.

Johnston: Yes, but they had quite different ideas of the ends they wanted to accomplish. Connolly, as he does in the play, says he wants to make a protest on behalf of the workers. He formed the citizen army to protect the workers from the police during strikes. He's the person who proposes negotiations.

Question: What was your thought in writing a play about history, with impersonations of real people?

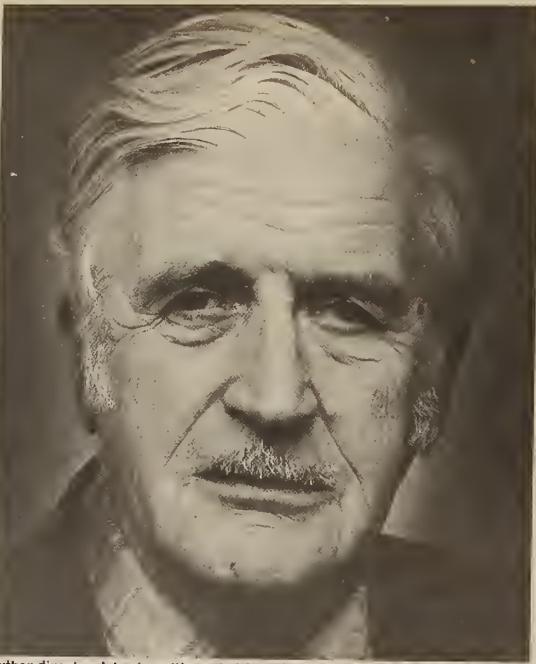

Johnston: I was interested in the facts of the Rebellion (the Rising you have to call it now for some reason) and I wanted to write a play based on human behaviour and what actually happened. Our house in Dublin was occupied by the rebels, we weren't allowed to leave; I was a schoolboy at the time. And because my father was a judge, we had the vague idea we were hostages, but nobody ever said that. The play is a picture of that particular period as I remember it, and I remember it; I was probably more in it than O'Casey was. O'Casey was sulking in his tent like Achilles, whereas I was in fact a prisoner at the age of fourteen!

Question: Palliser, the British officer, assembles the gun for the rebels that their non-event may be made into an event. What is accomplished at the end?

Johnston: Tellely and Palliser both accomplish their own ends in their own ways. But I've changed the end, you know, from the published version, not so far as the lines are concerned but in the action. Palliser, the British officer, does not stay behind here eventually. He is given instructions by Endymion before he goes: Endymion says, "This is my beloved son - Who knows more ways from Sackville Street than one." And then he tells him, "When you go, never let them see you run." And when the stage is empty and there is no one left but a dead man, Palliser does go, because he's not suicidal. Palliser is trying to overact. Tellely but he's a much more sensible man than that. The people that want to criticize this play have always taken a line about "Why did he fix the machine gun" (which I stand by) and then "Why does he remain behind and try to commit suicide?" and I've had to suggest that I don't think he would. As soon as he's alone and there's no one to see him go, he would go, having made his point. If Emer was waiting outside to see whether he was coming out he'd stay just out of cussedness.

Question: Had Shaw written a play about the Rising and how would it differ from The Scythe and the Sunset or The Plough and the Stars?

Johnston: He'd have written it from just out of the side I'm sure, and I'm Author-director Johnston: "I wanted to write a play based on human behavior and what actually happened."

An interview with Denis Johnston: anti-melodrama in Dublin sure, and have drawn political conclusions from it. I didn't. I'm not interested in the politics of it. I'm interested in the behaviour of people. Character is formed by situation and situation is created by character. I'm very interested in portraying character in a way that is not melodramatic. We very seldom see well drawn characters on the stage. I don't necessarily say these are... I've done my best to draw them well. But they've got that self-contradiction that we all have got in our behaviour. I think it's something the stage should encourage. Most playwrights today are concerned with technique and not character.

Question: It is obvious we may make comparisons between the Plough and the Stars and the Scythe and the Sunset. There is some connection between O'Casey ending his play with the British Tommies singing "Keep the home fires burning" and your ending with the British officer playing Ravel's "Le Jardin Ferieur".

Johnston: Of course. My title is the opposite of the Plough and the Stars; but I have to keep the home fires burning in this play as well. "It's a long long trail awinding" in this play begins the last act. There are only two plays that I am aware of about 1916, the Plough and the Stars and this one... to me, you see, O'Casey is first off a pacifist. "War is hell and you mustn't have it". And I don't like to see 1916 being only represented by a pacifist play. This is not a pacifist play at all.

Question: In the play Tellely says the Proclamation was received like "a poor entertainment". Is that what attracts you to these events, did you think to make them seem more than the "poor entertainment" of history?

Johnston: I think it deserves better treatment than on a melodramatic or political basis. I think, as I say in the Preface, that brave men are more interesting when they're afflicted with doubts than when they are just heroes.

Question: Is the Plough and the Stars a melodrama?

Johnston: Yes, of course it's a melodrama.

Question: Is that why you term your play an "anti-melodrama"? As a reaction to O'Casey?

Johnston: There's a lot of good O'Casey common sense in his play at the end... but I'll tell you this: I've known a lot of women who have played the part of Nora Clitheroe and they all hate it. The hanging around the neck and the begging, "Oh don't be going to the war, don't be going to the war", that's not the Irish woman. The Irish women, as they are in this play, are killers. They're much more dangerous than the men are because they're attached to their convictions to the point of ridiculous extremes.

Question: Do most pacifist plays run the risk of melodrama? Does an "anti-melodrama" require a resolution?

Johnston: Yes to both. But the simplest answer may be that resolution may be no resolution. I tend to hanker after resolution, perhaps too much. And it's very often a resolution that I don't much like. I do have this idea about plays: that you've got to be fair to your characters. If you create a character and he goes in a particular kind of way you've got to let him do so. If he proceeds to dominate the play... the only thing you can do is strengthen the other characters. You can't play false to one of your own characters... you've got to let them have their say. Otherwise you'll write a bad play.

Question: Do you speak Gaelic?

Johnston: No... and if I learned Gaelic now people would think I was doing it just to find a job. And I don't think it's a good language; it's certainly not a good language for poetry. There are always four or five dialectical pronunciations. Everybody tells you a different thing.

Question: Are you drawn to either side in the dispute in Ireland now?

Johnston: No. I don't consider myself a Christian. And I think both sides are afflicted with errors... the same errors: that the world is black and white, that the evil will be damned and the righteous saved. It is not the right idea, for it lies at the back of all those troubles.

Question: In the play Doctor

MaccCarthy gives the captured British officer a copy of the Marriage of Heaven and Hell to read. Why did you choose to use Blake particularly? Johnston: There's a lot of Blake in this play... the Marriage of Heaven and Hell is, to my mind, the consummation of what Blake's written; that heaven and hell are opposites of the same thing.

Question: You include it, then, to underline a "resolved antimony" and a denial of authority?

Johnston: Yes. It is a unity of good and evil, in which I believe. To me there is a reason for the creation of both opposites. I believe in evil as I believe in disease... it's a disease of the moral mind. So is war; it is a disease in the manner of scarlet fever and tuberculosis. And what are their purposes? They are scavengers, but it would be more terrible if we did not die.

Question: Is Dublin unique, is it a tribute to Joyce, that one may use geographical particulars in the play — such as TCD, O'Connell St., the GPO — and expect an audience to feel secure?

Johnston: It was written, after all, for production in Dublin, although it was first produced in Cambridge, Mass. In an historical play one may use actual names. Endymion of course is a real character, the only one in the play appearing under the actual name he used. He is also a character in Joyce's Ulysses, but he's not called that in Joyce. He also appears in Gogarty's As I was Going Down to Sackville Street. He was a celebrated character in my youth. He was off his head. It was often said he was a parody of the perfect English gentleman, with the sword stick, bowler and eyeglass and that sort of thing. As a matter of fact, Palliser the British officer is not unlike a sane version of Endymion.

Question: Endymion seems to be the single absurdist character in the play, and he defines himself as the chorus.

Johnston: Well he is. He is a comment on Edwardian England taken too far. Most of the things he says in this play are true. Yes, he is the chorus... this play is constructed on a very conventional shape. It's got a chorus and each of the principals has got a set piece written in blank verse.

Question: Why, at the turn of the century in Ireland, was there such an upsurge in creativity for the stage? Wilde, Yeats, Shaw, O'Casey, Synge, Joyce, Beckett... why so much in such a compressed time and space?

Johnston: There was talent there. Interest in theatre was there. And there were no plays by Irishmen unless you want to go back to Sheridan. Well there have always been plays by Irishmen, of course... we're a talkative race, and you don't have to be grammatical when writing a play. You don't have to bother too much with syntax. You just use the things that you hear, the things that you say... that's how I took up playwrighting as opposed to attempting to write novels like my daughter does.

Question: Can you tell us of your relationship with Yeats?

Johnston: Oh I got along alright... I'm afraid he didn't like me, but how could he? We were at different stages of history and literary taste. But he was very decent to me in that he gave me the first Abbey Shakespearean production to do, in the twenties. He taught the Abbey should do some Shakespeare, so he gave me Leopard of all things to do! And he also took my first play and did his best to rewrite it with me. He crossed out this and that; it was during his period of Puritanism when he despised over-writing, which he used to suffer from himself. And I had lines in my first play like, "I have written my name in fire across the pages of history" (which is alright when you're twenty-six but you wouldn't probably write it when you're sixty-six) but Yeats crossed it all out and put in, "I shall be remembered". Which says the same thing but is not so florid. And I used to say afterwards that if I was to do the same thing with his early work I would cross out "I will spread my dreams under your feet - Tread lightly because you tread on my dreams" and write "Wipe your feet before entering".

Question: Is there a "murderous Irish laughter" peculiar to that island?

Johnston: Yes, indeed there is...

Dr. MacCarthy (Michael Sidnell) sends out a few quips to Emer nic Gabhann (Felixe Fitzgerald).

The Scythe and the Sunset Charter and revolution: a look at both sides

"The best lack all conviction, while the worst
Are full of passionate intensity."

W. B. Yeats, "The Second Coming"

The play The Scythe and the Sunset opened last night at Hart House Theatre under the direction of its author, Denis Johnston; but the heavy necessities in the coordination of time and space and the Varsity's conviction that culture, like fish, is fit only for Fridays have meant that your reviewer has not been the "public" play. As a poor substitute I watched a technical rehearsal and the dress rehearsal too; but a comedy played for miles of aisles raises many a titter at the wit, and the timing is of course all wrong. With apologies, then, all round . . .

The Scythe and the Sunset concerns the principles and the principals of the Dublin Easter Rising of 1916. That event is particularly good dramatic food because it was a hopeless botch perpetrated by men of some bravery and intellectual bearing. Although Johnston, in his preface to the play, has written "My lack of personal knowledge of any of the leaders is my principal reason for not presuming to depict any of them by name or even by implication on the stage", anyone who is a little familiar with those events will recognize the impersonations of Pearse and Connolly, if not Gogarty and Plunket as well. The obvious relationship between this play and O'Casey's The Plough and the Stars extends further than titles and subject matter. Johnston elaborated on this point in the interview elsewhere on this page; and again in his preface he claims "it would be the act of an idiot for any other dramatist to measure his play against such a yardstick as the Plough." Yet because he holds the view that O'Casey's pacifist stance makes the Plough a melodrama, Johnston has deliberately crafted what he calls an "anti-melodrama". It is an interesting formulation that the pacifist play is a tragedy and the Scythe a comedy. The humour evolves not from manners but from situation and character; Johnston has written that "anti-melodrama" rejects the idea (so dear to Americans and all those whose nation was begat in revolution) that "embattled rebels are always romantic and forces of oppression always wrong". To reject this notion, says Johnston, is to appear deliberately confusing or satirical. Clearly the Scythe is not a political play; although Johnston's family was held "hostage" by the rebels in 1916, two years later Johnston attempted unsuccessfully to join the IRA. O'Casey, at the time, had quit the Volunteers but was held under guard with his mother by the British tommyes. What Johnston rejects most about the Plough is the whining Nora Clitheroe; he considers that character to be unIrish and the main mouthpiece of O'Casey's pacifism. "Whereas in actual fact the women of Ireland since the Maud Gonne era have been the most vocal part of its militancy". In the Plough we are given stum tenants' reactions to events dictated from outside the scope of the play; because the Scythe deals with the leaders, those dictating, we gain a sense of the largeness of character at the expense of suspense; for although these people are caught by circumstance, it is a setting of their own design.

The basic strength of the play's structure is the provision for focus on Irish character on both sides of the dispute, principally represented by the rebel leader, Tetley, and the British officer, Palliser. These two roles are well served in this production by Douglas Abel and Barry O'Connor. Palliser is a particularly interesting creation because he is not English, but an Irishman in the Royal Irish Lancers. These two countrymen make suitable enemies in their similarities; and they present Johnston with an opportunity to use Blake's Marriage of Heaven and Hell as a theological guide in the dispute. The book itself makes a cameo appearance on stage. It underlines Johnston's belief that "attraction and repulsion, reason and energy, love and hate are necessary". There is much that is contrary within the rebel forces. Williams, the labor leader, hopes to accomplish nothing more than a workers' protest; Andrew Leech gives Williams' the proper worker's drawl and a mechanical mentality. The character of Roisin is especially interesting in view of Johnston's description of Irish women as "killers". Alexise Stinson emphasizes Roisin's confusion and bravery; compare her to Nora in the Plough.

The first scene of the first act is a difficult one, for it fairly consciously lays a lot of groundwork, and basically seems to be a vehicle for Michael Sidnell as Dr. MacCarthy. This is an interesting character; MacCarthy serves as running counterpoint, a lexicon of Dublin wit which makes the play a comedy but seems curiously and happily out of place. Certainly the characters tire of MacCarthy's silliness but he keeps the play honest and constantly undercuts the grand poses of these historical people. Marlin Hunter does a nice bit of boffing as Captain Clattering, the only English voice in the play. He and Palliser engage in some public school banter about a trade-off and big guns which also serves to cut away suspense by laying bare army politics. Barry O'Connor as Palliser is always successful. He acts like Douglas Fairbanks, and, as a friend suggested, looks like a young Denis Johnston. He is properly disgusted and bored at the rebels' amateurism and is self-righteously indignant when his Irishness is questioned. He fixes the gun for the rebels because he understands "a thing that isn't finished has a way of stinking". An interesting segment has Tetley accuse Palliser of fixing the gun so that his countrymen can put up a decent fight. Palliser rejects the thought as melodramatic. Tetley wonders if Palliser feels guilt at being an Irishman; and we are left to wonder if sentimentality forces the Irish to be melodramatic. Johnston covers his tracks.

Shaw said Ireland's fight with Britain would resemble a "preambulator against a Pickford van". Knowing this fact serves only to give the rebel leaders a martyr's aura, and it blends well with what Shaw called Ireland's "climate of despair". Everyone shares the pathos, the Inroad to melancholia, except Clattering, and he is the only foreigner. Indeed one gets the feeling that the rising was called to give purposes to lives, to give O'Callaghan a chance to die well rather than rot away with consumption. Revolution as a prescription for 'ennui', breaking the bourgeois boredom? Tetley is very passionate in his lack of certainty and his self-doubt. His maudlin comparison to Christ may be forgiven for he clearly is in the Easter Rising and the play to find direction for his life.

Two innovative theatrical devices in the play deserve mention. The use of the lone poem as offstage music lends sensitivity to many scenes. Indeed, Mrs. Garrity, the unseen-pianist-next-door becomes an intriguing figure about whom we come to care a great deal. The other device is the character of Endymion, one of MacCarthy's patients, a strange creation seemingly based on fact. He declares himself the chorus, addresses himself to the audience, directs Palliser's escape. He is self-consciously absurd, Beckett appearing in 1916, and he rightly or wrongly is completely out of place in this play. Shaw wrote "The real Irishman is the Englishman of tradition" and this is, I think, what Johnston wants to point out with Endymion. With him as a fixture of Edwardian Dublin, revolution must seem sane.

The set by John McCrodden is the most painstakingly detailed and unified I have seen at Hart House and is worth having a look at for its own sake. The costumes are very green and never seem to soil.

Denis Johnston is tall and old and has big hands and quick eyes. He wears a tweed jacket, green trousers with a patch on one knee and rubber hunting boots. He is a grand man of letters, completely at home writing or directing "large events" and brave, doubtful men. Congratulations are due Ann Saddlemyer and the Drama Centre for convincing him to spend a wet February sharing himself and his play with Toronto. Thanks to them, and to Denis Johnston.

Capitalism or coincidence?

Business and government join hands to keep food unhealthy, profits high

Eating May Be Hazardous To Your Health

Jacqueline Verreil and Jean Carper
Anchor Books, $3.25

Here is food for thought: the food that you eat may not only be needlessly expensive, it may also be unnecessarily dangerous for your health. Reason? Why, it is none other than that worship of the twin deities of cost-benefit and profit-maximization which seems to precede everything else under capitalism.

This is the message that Dr. Jacqueline Verreil and Jean Carper convey in their expressively titled book, Eating May Be Hazardous To Your Health. The book, first published in 1974 in hardcover, is now available in paperback. Dr. Verreil is a food scientist with the Food and Drug Administration of America and, according to the publisher's blurb, "was the first to alert the nation in 1969 to the dangerous effects of the artificial sweetener cyclamate." Jean Carper, on the other hand, is "a freelance writer, specializing in consumer health subjects." Dr. Verreil was recently in the news once again on account of her researches in the effects of the food colouring known as Red 2. The U.S. government has banned its use, but the Canadian government refuses to do so on the ground that "reliable" data are not yet available to show positively that it is a potential killer.

What these two writers have to say in this book is shocking. Their main argument is that the government agencies which are "empowered to keep your food safe for consumption and free of dangerous chemicals . . . do nothing of the kind. As a result our food supply is permeated with chemicals of dubious safety." That last statement is pretty mildly put. In fact, as the book itself shows, these chemicals are murderous and the responsible government agencies are as guilty in this matter as the food industry.

It may be objected by some that this book is about the U.S., that the facts contained herein need not necessarily apply to Canada. But don't kid yourself. Canada imports numerous food items from America, and besides, what is true of the other sectors of its branch plant economy, is true of the food industry sector as well — here too the U.S. multi-nationals are present in force. Moreover, Canadian government is not much different from its U.S. counterpart in controlling (or not controlling) the use of additives in food. As a result, whether or not the honourable Members of Parliament are following Pierre Trudeau's celebrated advice to eat "la merde," we probably are.

Eating May Be Hazardous undertakes to acquaint its readers with the process by which food aspires to the condition so elegantly described in that French phrase. This process involves the addition of chemicals to food. Anywhere between 3,000 to 10,000 chemicals are used. Yet, incredibly, "the (U.S.) government does not even know how many additives are being used by whom, or for what." Food additives are used for at least 15 different purposes.

Some are used as "nutrients" to "enrich" or "fortify" food, such as bread, rice and potatoes, which had been stripped of nutrients during processing.

"For the most part, however . . . although the industry points with pride to nutrient additives, few — only 7 per cent, according to one calculation — of the additives being used have any nutritive value whatsoever." Other additives are used in such exotic capacities as "flavors and flavor enhancers," "preservatives and antioxidants," "emulsifiers, stabilizers and thickeners," "acidulants," "colors," "bleaching and maturing agents," "sequestrants," "humectants," "antitackling agents," "firming agents," "clarifying agents," "curing agents," "foaming agents and foam inhibitors," and "non-nutritive sweeteners." Only a few, very few, of these serve any real purpose, most are used for "strictly cosmetic purposes: to make food more colorful, less cloudy, thicker, smoother, more cohesive; in short, to make it appear artificially what it is not." These additives fall into three categories: some are "natural, for example spices, such as ginger and nutmeg. Others are imitations of natural substances such as synthetic vitamins. Still others are totally synthetic, invented in a chemist's head and unknown before the twentieth century."

Thus, for example, an artificial emulsifier is used to give us that smooth peanut butter, "baby food is concocted with salt and additives not because they add nutritional value but to please the taste of mothers"; even dog food is coloured with a red meat colour, not because the dog will be very happy, but because the master will be! Furthermore, "rice for years has been coated with glucose and talc which contains asbestos. The reason . . . is that the coating gives rice a glossy appearance, which presumably consumers find more appealing than the natural dull look." Oranges from Florida's "sunshine trees" are actually tinted and imitation orange drinks are dyed to look exactly like fresh fruit juice on the ground that "slightly off shades tend to be associated in the buyer's mind with deteriorating quality." Never mind if the quality may actually have deteriorated.

So you may end up drinking bad juice and eating asbestos-coated rice. You may consume nitrite, and aflatoxin, and PCB's, and MSG, and Red 2. So what? Cheer up, folks. Your food will look fresh and smooth, it will taste juicy and tender. Your drinks will appear foamy — or not foamy, as the need may be. Your ice cream will remain thick. So what if, in consuming these, you may be taking in hundreds of drugs that might be interacting within your body with unknown results?

What are a few such risks against all the benefits? As Fortune magazine said: "Although not many consumer advocates will acknowledge the fact, additives have benefits as well as risks, and any reasonable policy should be based on a weighing of the two." Eminently sensible advice to be sure. But as Verreil and Carper ask, pertinently: "when industry spokesmen toss around the term 'benefit-risk,' what do they really mean? Do they mean consumer health benefits against consumer health risks? Or consumer economic benefits against consumer health risks? . . .

Or, on the other hand, do they mean industry economic benefit against consumer health risk? The answer is self-evident: "Industry is asking us to trade the possibility of long-term risk to our health in return for shortsighted immediate economic gain for a small segment of society."

In such delectably filled chapters as "Red 2: The Abortion Pill You May Not Want" and "Cancer in Hot Dogs, Ham, Bacon, Salami, Corned Beef, Bologna, Lox, etc.," Verreil and Carper give us concrete "case histories" of the ways in which the food industry plays the so-called "benefit-risk" ratio. It is a game which almost always goes against the consumer.

That brings us to the referee — the government. Chapters like "Industry-Government Coalition" make it abundantly clear that the government identifies more closely with the industry than with the consumer. And why should it not when its decision-makers follow either a "revolving door" policy or a "deferred bribe" system? They "either come from industry or plan to go there later." One researcher, Dr. Michael Jacobson, in a study called "Who's Who at FDA," found that 22 out of 52 top FDA officials were former employees of industries or trade associations. In the absence of information we do not know what the situation is in Canada. But whatever the specifics may be in regard to the "industry-government coalition" (conspiracy sounds like a better word), it is safe to assume that the food we eat here is not too different; the dangers we face, therefore, are as great here as in the U.S.

One interest naturally focuses on the suggestions the authors have to offer regarding the ways by which consumers may end the dangers they face in such a crucial matter as their daily food. Unfortunately, this is precisely where the book is weak. The authors are clearly liberal consumer activists. They do not see the ridiculousness of saying that "it is not that government decision-makers are corrupt." To make such a statement after all that they have exposed is amazing. They simply fail to carry their analysis into the political arena where changes will have to be sought. The two authors content themselves by suggesting non-political consumer action to persuade "governmental action" to remedy the situation. One is tempted, in light of this naivete, to re-title the book: Eating May Be Hazardous to Your Health, Or, How to Make Capitalism Palatable.

However, I do not wish to knock the book completely. It contains valuable facts. I hope they will become known and result in the kind of awareness which is the pre-requisite for any effective political action. It is in the absence of such awareness that industry and government can continue to screw the public who, meanwhile, choke on all kinds of "la merde."

A look at Canadian socialist thought in the 1880's

The Politics of Labor
T. Phillips Thompson
Introduction by Jay Atherton University of Toronto Press
280 pages, $5.95 paper

Anyone who still doubts the demise of the free enterprise system should read this book. Written no less than ninety years ago, it was recently reissued in the Social History of Canada series — just in time for Trudeau's pronouncements on the New Society.

Phillips Thompson was a prominent figure in the Noble Order of the Knights of Labor, a not-so-secret society that achieved phenomenal success among North American workers in the 1880s. By vigorously organizing both female and unskilled workers, the Order terrorized the Quebec clerical hierarchy and forced Sir John A. Macdonald to appoint a Royal Commission on the Relations of Labour and Capital. While Macdonald struggled to keep Canada's toilers in the Tory fold, Thompson was writing The Politics of Labor.

Notwithstanding the blurb on the cover, Thompson's work was a Canadian reflection — not "a critique" — of American radical social thought. It expressed ideas that received much wider currency in the best-selling books of Henry George and Edward Bellamy. But if it was neither original nor influential, The Politics of Labor is still well worth reading for its sprightly prose, its rollicking appendices (including "The Labor Reform Songster"), and its encyclopaedic exposition of nineteenth-century radical theory.

Not surprisingly, Thompson's main target was corporate capitalism. The employers of his day could combine in protection of their interests, while employees usually could not. The result was profitable for the former, and miserable for the latter: "Monopoly above and competition below are the upper and nether millstones between which the toiler is crushed". But Thompson did not despair. "Capitalism", he wrote, "is cutting its own throat". Coupled with the growing politicization of the masses, the concentration of wealth in fewer and fewer hands would inevitably detonate a bloodless coup. The representatives of the toiling millions would simply march into the offices of the remaining capitalists and declare: "Gentlemen, your time is up!"

Once in control, the workers would have to face the menace of creeping capitalism. But Thompson's mystic faith in the perfectibility of human nature convinced him that the capitalist "gospel of greed and grab" could — and would — be unlearned. Inequalities of capacity would then cease to produce acquisitiveness and exploitation. In the last analysis, the masses would be liberated by education, not by insurrection: "We have to create a revolution in public opinion before we can hope to revolutionize the system. We have to eradicate the deep-rooted selfishness begotten of competition and to instill in its place a love for humanity and a strong sense of justice".

While Thompson may be faulted for over-optimism, recent criticism has focused on his supposed lack of patriotism. Writing in the December issue of Books in Canada, labour historian Irving Abella complained that Thompson had made "not one mention of Canada" in The Politics of Labor. This, in Abella's view, is "a rather pointed commentary on the state of Canadian socialism in this period, when its leading proponent writes a book on North American socialism without once mentioning his own country". Professor Abella should know better.

For one thing, Thompson did mention Canada at least once in The Politics of Labor — and in a very instructive way. Describing the new era of "industrial internationalism", in which men of all lands were at the disposal of capitalism, Thompson used as his example the French Canadians, who were then "swarming" into the textile factories and pine forests of the United States (p. 174). His conclusions were fully in accord with the Marxian axiom that "Labour is of no country". This is indeed a commentary on the state of Canadian socialism in the 1880s — but not in the sense that Abella intended.

"Capitalism is cosmopolitan", wrote Thompson. "It has no patriotism or prejudices." It will exploit anyone. Labour's only weapon, then, is international solidarity: "We in Canada have a vital interest in the coming struggle, as socially and industrially we are already a part of the American system. The overthrow of capitalistic tyranny across the line means liberty for the toiler here. Our interests are the same as those of American labor. Our aims and aspirations are theirs, our tyrants are their tyrants, and whichever party triumphs in the struggle, the result will be felt here for all coming time" (pp. 217-18).

These were roughly the same sentiments that led to the founding — in that same year of 1886 — of both the American Federation of Labor and its affiliate, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. They were later to inspire the internationalism of the I.W.W., the O.B.U., the C.I.O., and the Communist movement. And they explain why Thompson chose not to concern himself exclusively with Canada, but addressed himself to the problems of an industrial system that was (and still is) North American. As Jay Atherton's introduction makes clear, "in the 1880s this was a fairly revolutionary concept, really understood only by the labouring classes". Whatever the merits of nationalism in the 1970s, Canadian historians — especially labour historians — should beware of present-mindedness when dealing with 19th-century continentalism.

The publication of The Politics of Labor, along with his prolific and trenchant journalism, brought Thompson a measure of fame. After 1886, he was a perennial candidate in local elections, running first as a Labor Reformer, and later as a Socialist. Although he had delivered more than one diatribe against "those hotbeds of snobbery and caste feelings — the universities", in 1895 Thompson was invited to address the U of T Political Science Association. He accepted, but his views of academia were partially vindicated by the university administrators, who refused to rent the Student's Union Hall for the occasion.

Unlike most socialists, Thompson stuck to his pacifist principles during the First World War. Struck blind in his later years, he remained active until his death in 1933, his 90th year. Few figures in Canadian labour history are more deserving of a full scale biography.

Seven Beauties says it all- Wertmuller joins artistic greats in erotic death camp classic

I call to mind the names of Homer, Raphael, Shakespeare, Bach, Beethoven, Goethe, Renoir, Bergman . . . and now: Arcangela Felice Assunta Wertmuller von Elgg Spanol von Brauchig-Jobl (Having a name like that who couldn't be a genius, and she's a woman to boot.) With her latest cinematic creation, the impossibly ambitious Seven Beauties, Lina Wertmuller (as we mortal cinephiles know her — has catapulted her art into the highest realms of human achievement, indeed almost out of sight (and sound) altogether; no longer film simply, but film as film, even film as film as film.

This story of everyman as worm crawling in the dust embraces Nazi death camp and Neapolitan joie de vivre, Love that is both demonic and angelic, idealism and materialism, naive and sentimental, comic and tragic, good and evil, etc., and ultimately escapes the lot. (Words fail me; they usually do.) It fixes the limits of our human existence. 'Seven Beauties' is a film we must all live with.

Basically it relates the history of one Pasqualino Fratusa, nicknamed Seven Beauties because of his success with woman, though also because he has seven fat and yellow-faced sisters. (Once again Wertmuller's leading man is Giancarlo Giannini — romantic playing in the grand tradition of Gassman and Mastroianni, with a bit of Chaplin thrown in.) The film masterfully counterpoints scenes from his infernal adventures in collapsing wartime Germany to fleshbacks of his Neapolitan, multi-colored past; greens and greys to oranges and reds; death to life . . .

Life for Pasqualino means swaggering and leering about Naples, indulging in minimalist ambitions, protecting the "honour" of his family, a widowed mama plus the seven uglies. This last leads to disaster when he revenges himself less than honourably for the lost honour of one sister. The murder he commits lands him in the nuthouse, and eventually in Mussolini's army. He deserts, is captured, thrown into a concentration camp under the control of a grotesque female (grossly played by Shirley Stoller). This Pasqualino is not willingly led to the slaughter, however; he makes, or rather confirms, his great discovery, that survival is all. He concocts an absurd plan to seduce the monstrous commandant, which leads to a seduction scene like no other. At first he can't get an erection, but the worm finally turns, and his success prompts the commandant's great speech (alas, cut-it was to have run all the way from Plato to Thomas Mann; just think what we've missed!), to wit, that the German ideal of a new master-race would collapse, while the likes of this "subhuman Mediterranean larva" who can only procreate, would inherit the earth.

Our Pasqualino is meanwhile assailed by another philosopher, a Spanish anarchist (Fernando Rey doing his best). In his great speech Pedro extols creative anarchy, l'uomo in disordine; but loses heart (it is his balls) and gleefully and freely jumps to an apt death in a vat of shit (Q.E.D.) (It is by such subtleties and reversals that Wertmuller gets her effects, makes her points.)

Pasqualino returns to an Italy prostituted by American civilization. Capitalism pimps for every woman. In this slough, this bordello of life, he must grab what apples there are, sure as many brats as he can to inherit the earth. A frightening vision: man in uncreative, procreative disorder. How can he be saved?

Now it might be thought that Wertmuller cheapens the horrors and tragedy of the death camps by her knockabout humour; but no, she elevates it into art: concentration camp as focus of death in life, and the art lies in the concentration not the camp. It might be alleged that she indulges our sadistic, erotic and chauvinist fantasies even while seeming to condemn them; but no, this is not box-office allure, rather it morally implicates all of us, the audience. Or it might be thought that she plumps in too facile a fashion for the ultimate lesson, that it's a worm eat worm world, that you have to fight for the apples; but that is after all near the truth, especially in New York.

Wertmuller is one woman who has gone into film making and with a vengeance on her tribe. Her film, a roccoco nonstop comic-strip of life, sweeps us away by its misanthropic-misogynous energy. She is, of course, "political" — her motto: everything is political — and she makes her films for the sub-proletariat, the Third World (meanwhile we are privileged to watch them).

Her next effort — not, alas, on the New York critic as everyman — will be about Caligula. What a feast awaits us!

Laing replaces Marx, Leary as modern counter-culture hero

It's been a long time since I heard the words "counter-culture" spoken. It's been an even longer time since I heard the words "underground newspaper". And I can barely remember that long ago time when Guerilla was hawked at every second street corner along Yonge Street. In the tangle of small magazines and newsletters that overflow from SCM's newsstand, a 'new-style' underground newspaper is beginning to elbow its way to prominence. Alternative to alienation is written and typeset by the same collective who operate the Spice of Life restaurant on Yonge Street. The newspaper is discreet and professional-looking. No smudged print, no obscene cartoons here. Alternative to alienation is a reflection of the new counter-culture. Instead of quotes from Timothy Leary and John Lennon, the heroes of the new underground are Erich Fromm and R.D. Laing. There is none of the flashy excitement, none of the magnetic quality that was the hallmark of small press publishing in the sixties. The editorial page of Alternative to alienation even makes reference to one of the candidates in the provincial Liberal leadership race — and praises his opinions. This is certainly a far step from the tone of the radical press that I grew up with in the sixties. The new emphasis is on individual self-realization, through gay liberation and new forms of relationships and living arrangements. Radical political thought and action has given way to each person's individual desire to work through his own social and emotional problems. The end result of this 'new consciousness' is a paper like Alternative to alienation. The outward trappings of the sixties counter-culture remain. There is an advertisement for yet another new American Marxist journal, an advertisement for a bibliography of the Canadian working class, and even one devoted to selling the "Youth Liberation Kit" with four pamphlets including that old standby, "How to start a high school underground paper". The key to Alternative to alienation lies in the rest of the advertising. It is in these pages, filled with a myriad of sure-fire cures for the evils of modern society — vegetarianism, T'ai chi, radical therapy, gays against moralism — that the orientation of the paper becomes clear.

Alternative to alienation is a sample product of the new psychiatric establishment. It is a paper written by people who have skimmed through Karl Marx, been 'into' Jung's theories briefly, but who have memorized every sentence or stray word ever uttered by R.D. Laing. Alienation is no longer a social or economic term, it has become purely emotional. In an article analyzing the language of Bob Dylan, Ernest Barr writes, "Alienation, essentially, means alienation from the female polarity of mankind, the moon side as I call it. It means an over-externalization of the self, and a loss of contact with the inner world of feelings, spontaneity, and symbolic logic". It is all very well to throw terms like "moon logic" and "yin-yang" into articles, but these amorphous terms do not have a habit of leading the writer toward incisive critical thinking. In fact, most of the criticism seems to have been lifted straight from the pages of that same underground high school newspaper we saw advertised earlier. Ernest Barr gives us a detailed, full-page analysis of the logic behind Dylan's song "Just like a woman", but the depth of Barr's observations leave something to be desired: "Neither drugs nor clothes and jewellery can bridge the gap between the male and the female, and the alienation continues." Alternative to alienation types are fascinated by the world of symbols, perhaps as a result of their early nodding acquaintance with the work of Carl Jung. Some of their explanations of symbolism are simplistic to the point of being ludicrous. In an analysis of "One Flew over the Cuckoo's Nest" (needless to say this is a most popular movie with the Alternative collective), the writer, who happens again to be Ernest Barr, states: "There is a great deal of symbolism in the movie. At one point we see a staff member playing with a yo-yo in the background, implying that the staff is a bunch of yo-yos". Somehow, even an overdose of "moon logic" would not lend a deep understanding of symbolism to that statement.

The Alternative to alienation collective is not only interested in symbolic logic, moon or otherwise. They are also fascinated by themselves. Each issue seems to contain yet another article in the 'true confession' style. A litany of the evils of the world outside the collective, and a self-pitying autobiography of a collective member come dangerously close to being Reader's Digest-style life stories. In his article about "Defensive working", James Wark writes, "I'm starting to see through my work how I don't relate to people very well. The pattern of my work shows my feelings and what I really think. That's painful to me because if I want anything new in life, I have to change those habitual ways of expressing myself." This type of article is not only painful for the author, it is also painful for the reader. Similar to reformed cigarette-smokers, these devotees of the life-style of the Alienation collective are prone to buttonhole people in corners at parties and repeat a memorized version of their life story, up to and including the climactic point at which they became members. Now it is all very well to listen to a boring person with a message at a party, but it is quite another thing entirely for a group of such people to sit down and publish a newspaper. And that, unfortunately, is the end result of the message behind the print. The new underground of the 1970's does not produce flashes of excitement. People are working quietly, in small groups and inside their own heads. While we can perhaps be happy that these people are moving on to their form of Laingian happiness, the process does not make for a very interesting or readable newspaper.

When the most interesting part of a newspaper can be found in the headlines, something is very, very wrong. Alternative to alienation may have a more useful message than the grimy and gruffy underground newspapers I remember from my younger days, but it certainly is much harder to develop any interest in its contents or in its fate.

Two Strindberg plays explore hypnotic power of human relationships

Two one-act plays by August Strindberg, translated from the Swedish by Charles Leland, were staged March 3-6 at Studio Theatre, 4 Glen Morris, just west of the Robarts Library. In the Director's Notes mention is made of an 1884 treatise by Bernheim proposing that Hypnotic suggestion could be affected while the victim was awake, and that all human relationships were based on a desire for power.

In The Stronger two actresses meet in a ladies' cafe in Stockholm on Christmas Eve. One, Miss Y (Elizabeth Sacco) says nothing leaving Mrs. X (Judy Evaski) to do all the talking. The audience learns through Mrs. X's own discoveries that Miss Y was her husband's mistress. Further, the tulips she embroidered on her husband's slippers, the chocolate she has learned to drink, and the lakeshore rather than seashore vacation were all to suit Miss Y's taste; even their son is named after Miss Y's father. But in the end Mrs. X claims that she is the stronger for not only does she have Mr. X but she has proven herself adaptable and she isn't like Miss Y who is silent because she has no ideas to express.

This play is extremely difficult for the actors. Success hinges on Mrs. X's timing, and although Miss Evaski provides good characterization — her Mrs. X is a nattering bitch — she does not offer perfection. Success also hinges on the audience's ability to see the reactions of Miss Y throughout the play, and apart from those sitting in the tiny gallery or in the front row this was impossible.

In Pariah a Mr. X (Brian Troy), an archaeologist, is sharing a farmhouse near Malmo with a Mr. Y (Timothy McElcheran), visiting from America. Mr. X likes talking about himself but Mr. Y always wants to be left out of the discussions of character that his host launches into. Mr. X will not be denied, however, and the conversation and the plot lead to confessions or accusations of material, scholarly and spiritual theft, unwitting fraud through self-hypnosis, accidental murder, threat of blackmail, and former criminal conviction. This delightful play looks like a nineteenth century variant of Steuht, an odd game of "I'm-a-better (worse?)-criminal-than-you". The acting is excellent.

The next production at Studio Theatre will be a pair of Tennessee Williams plays which were precursors of A Streetcar Named Desire. Tickets are normally free and information and reservations are available by calling 928-8705.

Sex, violence, lead to disillusionment

Toronto Free Theatre showed a new production this week entitled Passion and Sin, which newspaper reviewers touted as an unusual but tantalizing foray into the visually bizarre. Dialogue was said to be minimal but necessary. As promised, my brain was not challenged with clever or deep philosophical comment, but my head is still spinning in response to a musical score which tried to lull the audience into a heightened sexual awareness, but only succeeded in inducing an excruciating migraine.

I would hypothesize that the esteemed playwright experimented with a new play and there was an inscribed three words — PASSION, VIOLENCE, and SEX — on flash cards, placed in a hat, and then randomly and repeatedly selected cards, adding a new segment to the plot after each choice.

Perversion manifested itself in the form of a caged being, who was later revealed to be part woman and part beast. The horror of this specter was almost outdone by a second, macabre character — a blood-splattered woman who panted and agonized at the audience as she was sexually violated by her lover-tormentor.

Violence was provided by a nervous desperado who pumped lead regularly into unseen assailants, and ultimately murdered the womanbeast.

Sex, of course, dominated the play and there was an astonishing array of permutations and combinations in partnering — son and stepmother, son and woman-beast, desperado and stepmother, desperado and woman-beast . . . You name it, they did it!

I like stimulating imagery and I do not mind ugliness if it has reason. I saw no reason for this evening's fiasco — no message was conveyed, no story was delivered, no humour or pleasure or happiness was shared. I felt abused and assaulted — an A-one sucker!

This experience was not my first disappointment in theatre; unfortunately it happens all too frequently. Quantity does not eliminate the need for quality. A production cannot be expected to have universal appeal, but after heroic effort at objective evaluation, I still can find nothing to recommend this play. After frequent disillusionment, apathy sets in. Next Saturday night I plan to watch Mary Tyler Moore reruns!

Canadian shadow premiere adapts fables and legends

Discovery Through Shadows is a rather puzzling title for a production put on by a puppet company (Frog Print Theatre, Inc.). Prior to Saturday evening's performance at the U.C. Playhouse Theatre, however, company founder Bob Tilroe and Dr. Harry McLaughlin briefly explained the historical background and the technique of shadow figure designs and their interest in adapting this art for Canadian audiences. Since this was the first performance of its kind in Canada, the audience was asked to participate by giving their comments on various aspects of the performances between the presentations. Dr. McLaughlin planned to develop a scientific questionnaire based on the opening night audience's taped comments.

Phillipi Paine's "legend fantasy", Young Standing Deer, opened the evening. Standing

Deer being a young Indian man who is searching for the truth behind a riddle in the hope that by so doing he may take his place as one of the leaders of his band. The shadow design of Young Standing Deer (designed by Barry Kent MacKay) was well articulated and his features, were finely drawn although his movements across the screen would have been more convincing had they been less jerky. The flapping wing movements of the large arctic bird and the graceful dives of the loons were more believable than those of the young man because of their smoothness. When the stained glass shapes of the shadow designs filled the screen they were most impressive, but in my opinion, they should have been held a touch higher so that the lower portions of the designs could not slip below the bottom portion of the screen. Through the skilful use of an overhead projector, beautiful images were projected on to the screen: especially impressive were the overlays of coloured images which produced the effect of the coming of dawn.

The narrator, Nikki Tilroe, was dressed as an Indian princess, and certainly her mobile face and expressive speaking voice were most enjoyable. Unfortunately, her presence occasionally detracted from what was happening on the screen since there were too many events affecting the audience at the same time.

If the Frog Print Theatre, Inc. produces this innovative and exciting work again, see it and you will be pleasantly surprised at how well the technique of shadow designs lends itself to the field of Canadian legend and fable.

Janet Kavanagh

Nikki Tilroe narrates the legend of Young Standing Deer.

Puzzled reviewer asks why no Canadian at Scarborough

Before seeing The Rimers of Eldritch I had intended raising the question of why, out of the eight plays produced this year by Scarborough College's drama students (from what I am told this figure will become nine with Frank Canoni's production of Collision Course), there has not been one Canadian play attempted. After seeing Lanford Wilson's play directed by Leigha Lee Browne last Friday, I can justifiably raise the question in a non-moral manner because not only is Rimers American but it's a lousy play. If a drama of small-minded hypocrisy was needed, Michel Tremblay's Les Belles Soeurs is far better. Or if a large cast play on social violence would fit the requirements, Lawrence Russell's Mystery of The Pig Killer's Daughter is more gripping.

A collage and flexible time technique is used by Wilson to give a continuous image of the basically evil make-up of the inhabitants of the dying town of Eldritch. The people never have to come to grips with their hypocrisy because they project all their ills and their violence on an old tramp named Skelly. The play wavers between an indictment of small town (im)morality and a mystery thriller, handling neither theme well. The kindness of Cora the restaurant owner and the insights of Skelly and the old woman Mary are overwhelmed, by the dishonesty of the others. And, since the play certainly isn't a tragedy, the fact that within a short time the denouement is clear limits any emotional build-up.

Admittedly it is hard to do a bad play well. However, without the aid of five excellent actors in the cast of seventeen and a simple but evocative set, the production would have been unbearably boring. It was always a relief when the isolating lights focussed on Cathy Loan as the sensitive Cora Groves and Brian Green as her lover Walter because they were both so naturally warm. Since so much of the play concerns the old hermit Skelly, it was essential that as fine an actor as Steve Overton play the part. He performed an extremely difficult monosyllabic monologue with a great deal of assurance — if showed; there wasn't a sound during the whole speech. Cheryl Kerzner as the 14 year old crippled girl, Eva, exhibited a freedom of movement and expression that contrasted sharply with some of the cast's rigidity.

To carry off the collage technique requires exact spacing, and it was in this that the production collapsed. The isolating lights were consistently slow. The pick-up of cue words by the actors was hesitant. And the use of affected speech by some of the actors resulted in discontinuity and fluctuating pace. It was a shame to see the talents of someone like Elaine Crossley wasted on the staging of a senile old woman emphasizing much too much oldness and not enough perceptive senility. It would almost have been better to allow some of the inexperienced actors to improvise so that there would have been fewer slow motion "Oh God. Oh God's. Boyd Neil

ARE YOU SEEKING . . .
A CHALLENGING PROGRAM?
A RELEVANT PROGRAM?
A PROGRAM FOR THE FUTURE? . . .
IF SO CONSIDER:

THE M.B.A. PROGRAM AT WINDSOR

We believe the Windsor M.B.A. is one of the finest to be found. It is a truly graduate program building on two stages of prerequisite courses which are designed to bring the student to the level of an Honours Bachelor of Commerce before entry into the candidate year. In order to offer a program of this nature, five semesters of study for graduates other than in honours business administration are normally required. The fifth semester is taken during the summer between the two academic years for students starting their program in September, but may be taken at the outset of the student's program when begun in May. Planning end course sequencing is facilitated by beginning in May.

The combination of breadth and depth of study is the finest preparation for the challenges and excitement of professional management. Management is a dynamic process in which the individual manager functions simultaneously as a planner, a supervisor, a decision maker, a budget analyst, a problem solver, an evaluator of results, a social activist — end more!

As the complexity of society increases, the need for qualified managers becomes more critical. The well-being of society as a whole and the lives of individuals is dependent on how effectively natural, technological and intellectual resources are integrated and directed. The Windsor M.B.A. Program offers a unique opportunity for serious end concerned students to acquire the background end skills to excel in their role as managers.

Admission Requirements:

Applicants who have secured an overall second class or B standing in their undergraduate work may be admitted; however, major consideration will be given to the performance of the last two years of the undergraduate program. In exceptional cases, the Faculty of Business Administration is prepared to consider other factors, such as graduate courses taken elsewhere or suitable business experience.

All applicants to the candidate year are required to write the Graduate Management Admission Test.

OR

BACHELOR OF COMMERCE PROGRAM FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Students who wish to pursue the degree of Bachelor of Commerce following a baccalaureate degree previously completed in an area other than Business Administration must complete sixty semester hours in Business Administration subjects offered by the Faculty of Business Administration at the University of Windsor. These hours are in addition to those Business Administration courses or their equivalents already taken for credit towards another degree.

Students with degrees from universities outside Canada may be required to complete additional courses

The minimum time in which this Program may be completed is twelve calendar months. For students with less than a B average the strongly recommended minimum period is fourteen to sixteen months depending upon the starting date. Entry into this program may be made in May or September. Planning and course sequencing is facilitated by beginning in May.

Upon completion of the Bachelor of Commerce program with a B average or better, a student may apply for entry into the candidate year of the Master of Business Administration program at this University.

Both the M.B.A. and the Bachelor of Commerce Programs provide for completion of the requirements of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario.

The final concert of the Array series features a special presentation of Canadian choral music by the Festival Singers of Canada under their esteemed director, Elmer Isler. The programme will be varied, with works already in the Festival Singers' repertoire, as well as new works by Crawford, Daigneault, Ford, Huse, and Vivier. That's 8:30 p.m., Walter Hall, E.J.B. Tickets are $2, and call 928-3744 for more information.

Saturday: An all-Haydn program is in store for those going to hear the Chamber Players of Toronto: his Symphonies 6, 7 and 8, as well as his Concerto in C for Flute and Violin with Robert Aitken, flute, and Victor Martin, violin. Walter Hall, 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $3 and for more information, call 922-9650.

Sunday: Final concert of the CJRT Festival Series also presents an all Haydn program. In the prelude, soprano Janis Orenstein, and pianist, Monica Gaylord perform Canzonas with commentary by conductor, Paul Robinson. Then Melvin Bernman, oboe, teams with the CJRT orchestra in Haydn's Oboe Concerto in C. Also performed will be Haydn's Symphony No. 90, Ryerson Theatre, Victoria and Gerrard, 8:30 p.m. Tickets: $3. Call 595-5281.

As the Sunday evening concert, the Hart House Chorus, under conductor, Prof. Denise Narcisse-Mair presents J. S. Bach's Christ Lay in Death's Dark Prison, Magnificat by Pergolesi, Brahms' Aber abseits wer ist's, Cantate Domino by Schutz, and the Faure Requiem. Soloists will be Carolyn Tomlin, Diane Loeb, Stephen Young, and Mark Pedrotti. That'll be in the Great Hall of Hart House at 8 p.m. Admission is free but we would advise getting your tickets early from the Hall Porter of Hart House, as it should be pretty well packed.

The Beth Tzedec Music Festival features Camerata in a program consisting of Beethoven's Trio in E Flat Major Op. 38 for Clarinet, Cello, and Piano, Russian Jewish Dance by good ol' Anonymous, and works by Bloch and Glick. It'll be at 3 p.m. but as for the place and price, you'll have to call 781-3511.

movies

Friday—The directors of Next Stop Greenwich Village and Taxi Driver each have one of their earlier films on view at the Revue: namely, Paul Mazursky's Blume in Love at 7:15 and Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore by Martin Scorsese at 9:30; both will be showing on Saturday as well. The New Yorker will continue to run The King of Hearts with a different film every night this week. Tonight's added feature is Black Orpheus. The Ontario Science Centre's science-fiction films for tonight are both based on novels by John Wyndham. They are The Village of the Damned (based on The Midwich Cuckoos) and The Day of the Triffids; that show begins at 7:30. Now here's your chance to complete your collection of Lina Wertmuller movies with Cinema Lumiere's showing of The Seduction of Mimi at 7:45 and 9:30 (8:15 and 10:00 on Saturday or 3:00, 7:30 and 9:15 on Sunday). At 11:15 on Friday night and midnight on Saturday, Cinema Lumiere will host a presentation of Peter Handke's one act play Self-Accusation directed by Richard Sohier along with a showing of W.P. Wise's latest film. A Film.

Saturday—The New Yorker is showing Jean Renoir's The Rules of the Game.

Sunday—The Revue is showing Monty Python and the Holy Grail at 6:00, 7:45 and 9:30. The Palmerston Library is running its vintage cartoon festival at 2:00, 4:00 and 7:00. The New Yorker is showing The Seventh Seal.

Monday—The Revue, for tonight and Tuesday will be showing the American Film Theatre's adaptation of Edward Albee's A Delicate Balance directed by Tony Richardson with Paul Scofield, Katherine Hepburn, Lee Remick and Kate Reid; at 8:30. The New Yorker is showing Les Ordres. Cinema Lumiere is showing Brunel's Diary of a Chambermaid at 7:30 and Louis Malle's Lacombe Lucien 9:20 tonight and on Tuesday as well.

Tuesday—The New Yorker is showing Marjoe and the Ontario Science Centre is showing Mr. Poo (Pusan) by Kon Ichikawa at 7:30.

Wednesday—Another AFT film is showing this week, this time at the Ontario Science Centre with David Storey's In Celebration directed by Lindsay Anderson at 7:30. The Revue has two films by Costa-Gavras; Special Section at 7:30 and State of Siege at 9:30. The New Yorker is showing Pymalton. Cinema Lumiere will show two films by R. W. Fassbinder; Fear Eats the Soul at 7:30 and Beware of a Holy Whore at 9:20.

Thursday—So what if the New Yorker is showing Wild Strawberries by Ingmar Bergman? Hart House will be hosting the Hart House Film Board's showing of this and last year's film productions. This year there will be films by Wyn Wise, Anne Service, and Michael Barnes in addition to two favourites from last year, Ira Levi's Images of India and the Desmond-Megna epic Furnace of Passion. The show begins at 8:00 in the Debates Room at Hart House. Why pay for culture when you can have it for free? See you there. PC

Keep your eyes open for a small collection of 'critics on criticism' which we intend to provide for your self-justification. An orgy of massive self-justification, a theology of egomaniacal idiosyncrasy, the birth of the transcendent aesthetic... and you'll get it first in this now-less-than-weekly Review, where the writers don't have to make daily deadlines but still cut it close.

The theatre season on campus is turbulent; off campus some better-than-average material. We have extra space coming in later issues, so we hope to bring you after-the-fact comments on most of the shows now current. At Bathurst Street United Church, Bear Theatre Company presents The Portrait and Man with a Flower in his Mouth Wed.-Sat., with a Saturday matinee at 3; at the same building, New Theatre sponsors The Bacchae Wed.-Sat. at 8:45 and the final production will be the Sunday matinee at 2:45. At St. Paul's, Theatre Passe Muraille presents The Horsburgh Scandal and at 16 Ryerson Avenue, Finger Pinky followed by Vally on the Editor. At the Firehall, something new called Madeleine, about possession; a thriller, opening the 16th for one week only. Toronto Free Theatre with the latest Hrant Alinak cinematic extravaganza. Passion and Sin. Tuesday to Sunday with a Sunday matinee. Young People's Theatre sponsors Larry Fineberg's Fresh Disasters which, according to our reviewer, is yet another good idea trying to make it with only a thin shell of development. Toronto Truck Theatre continues You Can't Take It With You and Sleuth and Spoon River Anthology. The Phoenix has Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern now underway.

On and around campus: At Cinema Lumiere, a transplanted Self-Accusation. At U.C. Playhouse, a recreation of Griboyedov's Chatsky, tonight and tomorrow at 8:30, admission free but reserve at 928-6307. Next week, La Musica, modern French play about a relationship after the divorce; Wednesday and Thursday at 1 and Friday and Saturday at 8:30. Hart House will have The Scythe and the Sunset throughout next week. T.C.D.S. has two more nights of the Life of Galileo, at 8; tickets $1. Victoria College emerges with a doubleheader this week Incident at Antileam and Synge's The Shadow of the Glen tonight and tomorrow at the New Academic Building Theatre at 8:30. Coming on the 25th will be the Vic. production of Two Gentlemen of Verona.

One last mention—the Indefatigable Redlight Theatre is presenting a life of Sylvia Plath, at Theatre du P'tit Bonheur, 95 Danforth Avenue, until the 14th; call 368-9094 for information. Back into the depths of the Library again. JW

Two interesting shows at A Space: Friday, March 12 at 9 pm—the Nexus percussion ensemble. On Sunday, March 14 at 3 pm—the Eric Slack New Art Ensemble. Call the Jazz and Blues Centre—929-5065—for further information.

Along with their regular Tuesday and Friday night concerts by CCMC, the Music Gallery (30 St. Patrick St.) will be presenting David Rosenboom on Sat., March 13, at 9 pm performing music for two Buchla-synthesizers and computer, with Michael Byron on trumpet. Admission $2.

Alvinn Pail will be at the Mother Necessity Jazz Workshop through Saturday. Bowie Silverman, March 16-17; Terry King, March 18-20. Cover charge is $2. On Sundays—the Mother Necessity Big Band—$3 cover.

George's Spagheti House—Eugene Amaro through Saturday. Next week Jerry Toth, Bourbon St.—Barney Kessel through Saturday; Joe Venuti through March 27. Basin St.—Dick Wellsold through March 20.

El Mocambo—George Benson (guitar), March 18-20.

The Message—Fridays at 355 College St. 10:30-3 a.m. NW

rock

Listen, people, Herman's Hermits, sans Herman, are at The Friar's Tavern this week, performing their old hits, while Ocean is at The Golden Falcon, 2240 Midland in Scarboro, performing their old hit. Bat McGrath is at The Riverboat, The Good Brothers are at the El Mocambo, Rough Trade is at the Colonial, and South City Revival is at The Nickelodeon.

This Friday, Cat Stevens is at Massey Hall followed by Vally on the 20th. On the 22nd Gordon Lightfoot performs at Massey Hall, the start of a week long run, and on the 25th Maria Muldaur and Tom Waits are at Con Hall. On April 1st Genesis will be at the Concert Bowl while Helen Reddy performs at Massey Hall and at Massey Hall on the 15th while Patti Smith, followed by the Chieftains on the 29th. LB

Pogey payments up fifty per cent

OTTAWA (CUP) — As the unemployment rate for Canada increased from 5.4 to 7.1 per cent between 1974 and 1975, the total benefits paid to members of the work force who became jobless increased from $2.1 to $3.2 billion. While most of the cost increase was paid for out of government revenue last year, starting in 1976 workers and employers will have to shoulder more of the burden.

Insurance Commission officials, the new averaging system means that, in 1976, premiums will have to cover all costs up to a 5.6 per cent unemployment rate, compared to the previous 4 per cent level. Assuming an actual unemployment rate of 7.0 per cent, officials estimate that government's share of the total cost will be reduced to 38 per cent, from 53 per cent last year.

But this reduction in government support does not mean Canadians will save money. How much is paid to people who become jobless is related to the number of jobless and how much they are paid, not to the method used to raise the money needed.

Health cuts questioned

By JAY NEILSON

Angry questions demanding facts and confused, evasive answers set the tone in the Ontario legislature Wednesday as politicians wrangled over the $50 million cutbacks in health care services.

As a result of the cuts, 3,300 active treatment beds are being eliminated and old age homes are being forced to become nursing homes, although sixty replacement hospitals are planned.

Referring to private labs, NDP leader Stephen Lewis said, "This is surely the single most startling and most disproportionate leap in costs, totally uncontrolled, totally without rationale, and an enormous drain on the public purse."

He pointed out that while the government chooses to save $400,000 cutting back public labs, private labs are being abused.

Payments made to private labs in 1975 will be about $80 million, an increase of 150 per cent since 1971. After deducting the costs of mobile units to those areas worst hit, net savings in public lab cuts could be minimal.

"I fail to understand the Honourable Miller's recitation of the fundamental problems in the system with which the government will not cope because of some distorted view of state intervention," Lewis continued.

"If it is true, in the minister's position, that somehow the system is abused by doctors, if it is true that somehow the system performs too many operations or that admission policy is too easy or that length of stay is too long or that testing is too routine and much too great a proliferation or that efficiency is down, then it seems to me an awful penalty to impose upon small communities to close down their hospitals instead of dealing with the fundamental problems of the system," Lewis charged.

Addressing Health Minister Frank Miller, Lewis said "Rather than confronting those clear abuses and inefficiencies you, as Minister of Health, have determined two courses. One, to reduce the number of doctors by reducing the immigrant population of doctors and two, by closing down hospital beds."

Liberal member Eddie Sargent cried out at one point "Where do you get the right to do that. That money belongs to the people of Ontario," is responding to a statement by Miller.

From glitter to gluttony

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — Cellar Door Productions, the promoters who handle many big name rock acts, say that some of the big name stars write nearly impossible clauses into their performance contracts.

Take Elton John, for example. When Elton is scheduled to do a show, his contract requires that the promoters see to it that a hot sit-down meal for at least 20 persons is served back-stage, featuring a full menu drawn up personally by Elton

Elton also requests large bags of Taco chips and a quart of guacamole, eight bottles of French and German champagne, with the brand and years absolutely specified, fresh vegetables and fruit for 20 and a case of Heineken beer. The Grateful Dead are no easier to please: they usually demand (and get) 60 quarts of milk; six cases of Heineken's beer; and steak, lobster and vegetarian meals to feed up to 30 people.

...Blues want that Cup

ing the line of Graham Wise and Paul "Buzzy" Sawyer, while scoring 24 goals himself. The kind of "reserve" Bill was talking about is exemplified in John Bays. Called up from PhysEd in the interfac ranks during a barrage of broken bone, Bays fitted in quickly and has been a steady performer. He's enjoyed being with the club and knows that more thinking and skating is required to keep up with the competition.

Ken Kryklywi of Engineering has been skating with the Blues recently and is just glad for the opportunity: "It's been great to play with these guys as I've never played in this calibre before." Not so for Albie Shamesh of New College. Shamesh had been a regular for two seasons before academic pressures led to his departure from the team. Now he's back and as he puts it, "I'm determined to play well". So all in all the defense looks solid for this weekend.

Playing hockey with the Blues has been a great experience for all of the players. Scott Densen feels that this has been one of his most enjoyable years of hockey. Guido Mazza feels the same way commenting, "I've learned a lot playing with a good bunch of guys." The same applies to hard working trainer Mike Gisborne. This past season has enriched his knowledge of the sport and all its physical ramifications. Athletic cutbacks have postponed the arrival of a full time trainer. Gisborne is a student who combines his work with his responsibilities to the team. Well enough of this yearbook stuff. Assistant coach Gord Davies, a former star with the Blues, who handled the club while Watt was at the Olympics, states that the team wants to prove they're the best.

"We've worked hard all year, too hard to give up now," says Gordie. Centre Bob Adoranti thinks along the same lines and replies to the doubters: "We've come a long way this year and worked hard and deserve to be where we are."

Strategy is important and Sawyer has some thoughts about Concordia. Having beaten them once he knows their weaknesses: "They have slow defenseman who can't handle the puck well. With some forechecking we can bury them." The Blues are ready for this weekend. They are a proud team that want this one badly. Graham Wise, the super left winger and conference second team Allstar, is hungry, "I don't care who we play, we'll give 100 per cent. We want to win this tournament." With your help I think they can.

Ladies Badminton

Just prior to reading week, the girls badminton team closed their long season which started in late September. Just falling short of the championship, the ladies didn't come out on top.

The young team also contained three rookies. Carol Gombita, Debbie Woolway, Janice Hoar, Leilah Edros, Wendy Stone and Lynn Ball managed to give the coach, Ms. K. Grant many a headache and heart tremor, but after each tournament we left her with the impression that each combatant had learned something.

Sometimes the girls didn't exactly learn the placement of the birdie but they came away with something. Hopefully it's not contagious. Missing third place by only two points, the coach concluded that although this has not been the most successful year for the girls badminton team at least it has given its members experiences in the socializing aspect of human relations.

Enough of that. Western was just a little better but the Blues were the best at having a good time. And that's what really counts.

Football fun?

NEVADA (ZNS-CUP) — A burly University of Nevada football player literally drank himself to death by downing large quantities of 190-proof drinks known as "flaming shots". An autopsy on 23-year-old John Davies showed that he died from consuming too much alcohol. Police say that Davies and friends participated in an initiation ceremony in a Reno bar by downing a potent drink known as "everclear" which is nearly pure alcohol.

Witnesses said that Davies would pour a shot of the stuff, light it on fire and immediately down it.

Comment: The state of gymnastics at U of T

By RON COLLINS

On Friday, February 27th, The Varsity printed an article on gymnastics which was erroneously ascribed to Ron Collins. I did not write that article, and disagree with some of its implications. However, the article raised an important issue and so as a member of the Varsity Gym Team I feel it necessary to explain the problem in more detail. I am not seeking to blame or criticize anyone, but wish to set out what I perceive to be the facts of the case.

Gymnastics is a sport which is growing phenomenally in Canada today. As the largest university in Canada, one would expect the U of T to have a fairly extensive program in this sport. Yet for some unknown reason Toronto's men's gymnastics facilities leave much to be desired. The crux of the problem is probably money, and the priorities which allocate that money.

Competitive gymnastics consists of a team of six men performing routines on six apparatus: High Bar, Parallel Bars, Pommel Horse, Rings, Vault, and Floor Exercise.

The quality of the apparatus is crucial to a gymnast's ability to put in a good performance. Toronto simply does not possess a Floor Exercise Mat, nor do we have competition-style Rings. Our High Bar was of good quality, until someone tried to use it as a crow bar. Our Pommel Horse and Parallel Bars are quite respectable, but the men's gymnastics has no adequate facilities for vaulting. One cannot expect to perform well unless one trains on proper equipment.

Queens, McMaster, Western, and York all not only possess this equipment, but they also have a separate gymnasium permanently set up for gymnastics. Toronto gives the men's gymnastics team seven hours a week reserved time in Hart House. In this respect we would like to thank the women's team for allowing us to share their practice time and facilities twice a week, since without this help we probably could not have competed at all.

Coaching is another problem which confronts the U of T team. For the three years that I have been on the team, the coach has been one of the team members who has also been a competitor and a student at the same time. These individuals, Hans Frick, and Brian Euler, have done a terrific job, but because of their other responsibilities have not been able to devote themselves entirely to coaching. Gymnastics is a sport which relies heavily on coaching, and so the job of coach is a very strenuous one. Without a full-time coach it will be difficult for the Toronto team to improve.

Next year the O.U.A.A. is starting a system of dual meets for gymnastics. This means that the U of T will be expected to host at least one gym meet. Lacking proper facilities as we do, this probably will not be possible.

I wish to repeat that I am not throwing incriminations at the administration of the U of T. The gym team fully appreciates their financial difficulties. My intention is simply to make the student body aware of the facts of the problem which their men's gymnastic team faces. The team members themselves enjoy the sport and will continue to work out regardless of these difficulties. We have had a very respectable season, finishing second in Ontario. One team member, John Fair, has just come back from representing Ontario at the Canadians, where he made a strong showing. However, if the U of T ever wishes to be better than second-best, their entire gymnastics program will have to be improved.

What a drag it is getting up

By JONATHAN GROSS

If one were to rank Division II basketball as an athletic event it can generally be gleaned that the average contest would fall somewhere between getting Joe Namath's autograph and watching Elton John play water polo.

Vague generalities, however, don't apply to the Pharmacy team as they came out smoking and created a game but inept Forestry composite 65-49 to gain admission to the finals and probably the championship.

The Demarol Demons came into the second game of this two-game total point semi-final with a nine stroke advantage. They didn't need it in a game that they took control of from the opening tip-off.

Rob Campbell, who gunned for 17, knew the Vaunted Valiums had to triumph: "Last year we were ripped off because we had a six point bulge going into the second game and blew it. This team has seven of its 'twelve players' graduating so this is a must season."

The two teams were the winners of their respective divisions, Forestry taking 'B' division with an impressive 13-1 record while Pharmacy took the 'A' side with a 12-2 mark. "Forestry played in a weaker league," says Campbell, "and their record does not indicate a parity in talent."

This may be true as the Druggists kept them out of the key and their big men swept the offensive boards and defensive boards. Mark Beckham is the leader of the lumberjacks and his 17 points were not indicative of his play as he was ice-cold from the outside. Down 41-19 at the half, Beckham reflected on the disaster: "This is the worst I've ever seen this team play."

It wasn't as bad as it sounds. The rather large cluster of Forestry fans were great supporters, even in the bleakest of times, and the players fought down to the last whistle. Beckham literally did and was ejected on a "face mashing" violation too late in the game.

The Aspirin Army now faces either SMIC B or J. Engineering in the final will undoubtedly be the favorite as a well seasoned, classy team that has nice groupies and even nicer uniforms.

In other action on Wednesday, the

Sr. Skulkers interrupted their graduating ceremonies long enough to demolish New 129-96 to take that semi-final. Gratz had 22 while Miffin did nothing but score for 36. Semantics or Syntax, that is the question. Skule goes on to clobber PHE in the finals starting Monday. I think Rybanski had 22 for New.

In hockey action Erindale is making life miserable for forecasters and Scarborough as they took the opening game of the Division I final 5-4. Life is miserable for Scarborough 'B' fans. Their shortlived reincarnation ended Wednesday night as PHE B took them 5-3 for the second straight night to enter the final against either Forestry or Trinity, or whoever comes first.

Scoring for the Dale was Bill Tatuluk, Roman Knigynsky, Kevin Crossman, Bill Hebbin and Joe Hurley. Erindale is super tuff and if Scarborough doesn't get their schtick together it could be all over for them and other assorted nuts. Perkins' new found status as team MUF got him two for the losers.

COUNCIL OF THE SCHOOL OF GRADUATE STUDIES

Toronto lost to Guelph in the OUAA semis and the Gryphons are a team that many of the Blues would like to play again. Rocci Pagnello, the brilliant rushing defenseman, is one who would like to meet the Aggies again because Rocci feels that they're the weakest team in the tournament. Other players have different reasons.

Alex Musejius is a part time player who feels that, "Guelph's win is not representative of the play this year. Their win was just a one shot thing." Doug Herridge, the hustling winger reflects on the finals as being anti-climactic because of the loss to the Gryphons. That game might have been just the medicine needed to shake the team up.

But Guelph isn't the only team in the tournament and the Blues are well aware of this. Everyone wants the championship very badly. Left-winger Larry Hopkins, who has seen some duty on defense due to injuries to Pagnello and Charlie Hughes, was adamant about that: "We came close last year, so the whole team is anxious to win."

Mike Hannan, the fiery transfer from Laurentian, is uncompromising about that, adding that the team's number one priority is victory. With the peculiar format there have been rumours that there would be "jockeying for position" if Guelph upset Concordia in the first game tonight.

This is it folks. Toronto, Concordia, Guelph and Calgary will be squaring off to determine the CIAU champion. The tournament starts today at Varsity Arena with Guelph meeting the Concordia Stingers at 4:00 pm and the Blues facing the University of Calgary at 8:30 pm.

As we talked to the Blues this week, it was obvious they're sure they can take the entire tournament. As goalie Dave Hulme put it, "We've beaten all the teams, and there's no reason why we can't go all the way and bring the championship back to Toronto."

Fellow puck-stopper Mark Logan agrees with Hulme, adding that the Blues deserve to be in the tournament. This has been a very controversial subject, as the Blues have received a free pass into the tourney because of its host status. The CIAU invoked this rule as an attempt to boost the gate. Now some other teams, notably Guelph and Concordia, are complaining about this. However, if one examines Varsity's record, he'll find that the team, despite the loss in the OUAA tourney, has beaten all of the top-ranked squads, while other clubs have had cakewalk schedules.

Logan also notes that you didn't hear this much complaining two years ago in the basketball championship, when it was Guelph who enjoyed a similar position en route to the crown.

Kent Ruhnke, team captain and recently named member of the All Canadian team wants "to go out a winner." Ruhnke, who has established many new records with his 49-goal season feels that the team has nothing to lose by winning. "If we play Concordia before the finals, that is if we win along with Guelph, it will just give us more confidence. If Guelph can beat them then so will we."

Just how are the Blues going to win this weekend? Ron Harris sees the key as being defense, stating that "... we have to play tight hockey. If we forecheck well we can force the other team to make mistakes." Linemate Frank Davis agrees, saying that with the powerful offing in the distance, "We have to keep the goals against down."

This duo, along with linemate Doug Herridge, are responsible for some of the best forechecking in the league. Wayne Morrissey, the rookie defenseman, looks forward to playing an aggressive and hard-hitting game, which has been his style all along.

John Richmond, team manager, expressed the consensus opinion of this weekend: "We have the team that will win if we play as a team."

Ruhnke is the team statesman with five years experience is of the same opinion. We asked the "sage" how this edition of the Blues compares with those of yesteryear and he responded thusly, "We're just as competitive, but the talent is not the same. There's more team effort than the individual sort."

Of course there have been a lot of injuries this year, particularly to the defense. Dave Rooke is currently sporting a thigh-high cast and is out for the season. Al Potts and Rocci Pagnello have had a rough time lately but Rooke should be ready for the weekend. Charlie Hughes will be ready, coming off a partial shoulder separation. He feels it has been a rewarding year for the team and the First Team All-star has confidence Coach Tom Watt's systems.

He asked, "One thing we need is fan support, to help us against Concordia." The Montrealers are not just bringing an excellent hockey team, but are rumoured to have twenty busloads of supporters on the 401 at this very moment. Hughes' call for reinforcements may well be justified.

The Blues main problem right now is on the blueline. With Rooke out for the year and the aforementioned injuries Watt has had a few new faces at his workouts. As Bill Fiffeld observed, "This is the first year there's been so many injuries near the end of the season but it's also been the first year we've had such good reserves".

Fife had a great year himself center-

Bookworkers two per-cent short

By BOB COLLIER

The library workers' strike settlement has yet to be settled. The pay increase they won after their strike has seen a fall from 18 to 12 and now to 16 per cent, all the result of long and complicated negotiations.

The latest increase has been won from the federal Anti-Inflation Board (AIB) which has revised its decision of last January on the basis of "additional information."

The AIB has raised the library workers wage increase from a low of 12.2 per cent to 16.48. The workers had initially settled for 18 per cent.

The AIB changed their mind when it became evident that the library workers were going to earn less than non-union librarians on campus and less than staff working for the Toronto Public Libraries.

In addition, the government is now using a more sophisticated method of assessing wage scales than the overly simplistic formulae that resulted in the January decision.

But the fight will run for many months according to CUPE National Representative Grenville Jones.

The library workers have taken their case to the Supreme Court of Ontario in an effort to make the university pay them what they consider to be their promised wage. The university is using a somewhat dubious accounting method to pay the workers less than they feel they deserve. The legal hassles have progressed through a series of arbitration board hearings without solution and may eventually reach the Supreme Court of Canada.

Among their arguments, the library workers are claiming they are not affected by the federal wage and price controls instituted last Thanksgiving Day by Prime Minister Trudeau because they are employees of the Ontario Public Service and therefore under the jurisdiction of Ontario law. Professor Brandt, the chairman of the arbitration board hearing, has supported the workers in this dispute. The Ontario Supreme Court will be asked for their decision on the matter on March 30.

Meanwhile, the library workers are still angry over their treatment by the university. Their present contract expires on June 30 this year, and conceivably, there could be a summer strike equal in bitterness to the confrontation last fall.

ASSU receives reduced levy

Following a Friday night patchup of differences between the Arts and Sciences Student Union and the St. Michael's College Student Union, the Internal Affairs Committee yesterday voted unanimously to recommend that ASSU receive a reduced per-student levy of $3 to support next year's course evaluation work.

ASSU had been originally asking for $4 per student and up until Friday faced opposition from SMCSU that threatened its operations for the next year.

The reduced fee will cut ASSU's budget by $9,000, forcing removal of some of the social events, including speaker's forums and colloquiums, that ASSU has offered in the past.

The budget compression will also cut slightly ASSU's ability to organize campus unions in the disciplines so far unrepresented. ASSU currently operates 15 course unions out of the total of 31 disciplines in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences.

Admin. discuss election rules

The Governing Council has sent a letter to all candidates warning about irregularities in this year's campaign involving "improper use of university buildings."

However, election supervisor David Warren said he could not discuss individual cases. He said there had been some general complaints about the tearing down of signs.

But Warren said none of the complaints received by the Governing Council office were serious enough to influence results of the elections.

Ballots must be returned for the elections by Thursday at noon and results will be announced next Tuesday.

Warren said the council would probably have to review election procedures. And he said that although the council has a reimbursement scheme to defray campaign expenses, the possibility of campaign spending limits might also be under review.

New chief for Varsity 77

Varsity reporter Eric McMillan managed to upset Ken Wyman in the second balloting for the position of Editor-in-Chief of the Varsity 1976-77 by a vote of 12 to 12.

McMillan, who is now the official staff choice for editor, will go to the Varsity Board of Directors for rubber-stamping next week.

Staff — come to the Varsity office today at 2 p.m. to meet the new man at the helm. Barrie Zwicker, Editor of Content Magazine, Canada's journalism review, will be on hand to partake in discussion of CUP and also to give staffers an idea of where they can put their talents to work in the outside world.

Afterwards plans will be laid for the Varsity's gala March 31st issue, the last of the season. Current fantasies include production of a special city issue, as the prototype for a new "Toronto weekly, in the grand tradition of Guerrilla and The Citizen.

Fac-Ed candidates hit by hidden rules

By BOB COLLIER

Both Pat and Liz would have been excellent teachers. They are highly motivated, academically first rate and experienced at handling students. Both of them confidentially expected to be teaching in another year, but neither of them will.

Why? Because they are two of the 3,000 applicants to U of T's Faculty of Education who, because of an arbitrary decision, have been effectively disqualified for breaking a rule they didn't know existed.

Liz's mistake was to wait until January 18 before applying to the Faculty of Education (FacEd). Pat error was to apply on a friend's unused application. Both of them acted in good faith and neither realized the mistake they were making.

Just like the other 3,000 students who have been disqualified, Pat and Liz consulted the calendar distributed by FacEd and noted that the deadline for the receipt of applications was April 1, 1976. They applied in plenty of time but neither knew that the effective cutoff date had been moved ahead by ten weeks, to about January 15.

When the FacEd Admissions Officer was questioned on Monday, he refused to explain why the deadline had been changed.

"I haven't any comment to make on that matter," said Gerald White, "why don't you ask the Associate Dean?"

Dean London was more helpful. "We had so many applicants this year that we ran out of forms in mid-January," was his answer. From that time on, he said, all applicants were told that the students who had already applied were to be given "first consideration for the places available."

London appeared surprised when told that students were relying on the April 1 deadline.

"In late January," he said, "we advised all applicants that the first 5,400 students to apply were in a preferred position." This notice was distributed after the cutoff date had already been set. It was mailed to students who had already applied.

London seemed unconcerned by the predicament in which the students were placed. He explained that the deadline is really "April 1 or the date when sufficient applications have been accepted."

This statement he said, is to be found in an Information Bulletin which was sent last November to admission officers, college registrars and high schools. It was not included in the faculty calendar.

On Monday, three college registrars on campus were asked about the new deadline. All were unaware of the qualifying clause in the Information Bulletin. Each of them assumed that the deadline was April 1 and were surprised to hear that it wasn't.

In the notice that FacEd sent out after the January cutoff date, students were advised to wait until more forms were printed. Some did as they were told and finally received them in early March.

Others looked around for friends who had changed their mind about applying. If they found an unused form they asked for it, wrote in their name and sent it to the faculty. Students who couldn't find an application easily, advertised in the Varsity classified ads. Some students reputedly paid cash if they couldn't obtain them in any other way. All these students acted in good faith.

None of them realized that the forms were numbered and if the number didn't tally with the name of the original applicant on the master list held at FacEd, they would be automatically rejected without notice.

There is no statement in the faculty calendar which indicates that forms are not transferable.

"Next year," Dean London has promised, "we will change our procedures."

Chaotic calendar changes Timetable missing

Arts and Science students returning next fall will face gigantic headaches because they have to pre-register this spring without a timetable.

This will mean chaos. With the timetable until September, students could conceivably select many courses with time conflicts.

And with limited enrollment in popular courses, the likelihood of winding up with preferred courses leading to specialist degrees could be quite slim.

Students will also find other surprises in the 1976-77 calendar, issued this week. For instance many courses will combine day and evening sections in the evenings. For those who missed it earlier the grade point average system will be brought in with marks ranging from 0 to 4.3. Less than 1.5 average (about 60 per cent) will mean suspension.

The lack of a timetable also means trouble for part-time students trying to plan their hours around their jobs.

The new calendar, with inflation fighting, hard to read type, appears to leave most courses in fact. In spite of cutbacks, with the exception of fourth year courses in some departments. The colleges have continued to develop their offerings, some added from the diminishing interdisciplinary studies department.

As the Campus turns

The Students Administrative Council has decided to support the March 22 demonstration in Ottawa against wage and price controls called by the Canadian Labor Congress.

SAC also agreed to pay half the costs of sending twenty students to Ottawa to attend the demonstration.

Literature being handed out on campus in opposition to wage and price controls includes a returnable post card to Prime Minister Trudeau protesting the controls as discriminatory and unworkable.

Pamphlets circulated by the CLC say wage controls discriminate against working people, increasing gaps between the poor and well-off. Meanwhile, profits, prices and professional fees are not controlled.

The CLC calls for an end to controls and supports regulating oil and gas prices, more regulation of corporate tax concessions, a negative income tax for poor people and increased pensions to fight inflation.

The report of the SAC Chief Returning Officer (CRO) castigates both SAC and The Varsity for inept handling of the recent SAC presidential election.

Elliot Milstein was appointed to the post of CRO on an emergency basis on the first day of voting following the dismissal of Ian Roxan by the SAC executive. His report will be discussed by SAC tonight at its General Council meeting.

The report states that "SAC should appoint its CRO far in advance of the election, and be certain that the individual they appoint is responsible and available." He also charged that The Varsity article declaring the election cancelled was "irresponsible".

Milstein points out that the turnout on the second day of the election, after he had taken charge, was more than double that of the first day. SAC will also consider at its meeting the results of the NUS referendum. According to the SAC constitution, a referendum must have a 25 per cent turnout to be binding policy for SAC. As the turnout was only about 14 per cent, SAC must approve the results which saw NUS take a narrow victory.

Following New College elections the following members were elected by acclamation:

- President — Rosemary Davis
 - First Vice-president — Mark Lukaszewicz
 - Second Vice-president — Larry Beam
 - Social Director — Rick Pieklo
 - Education Director — Karen Hansen
 - Mens Athletic Director — Mark Gardhouse
 - Womens Athletic Director — Sheelagh Fyfer
- Elected as SAC council reps were David Tenenhouse, Norman Flynn and David Jones.

The three members elected to the Mens Athletic Commission were John Blainey, Patrick Parno and Henry Wolski.

Acclaimed to the Womens Athletic Commission were Rosemary Hauser, Pam Mouser and Barb Patterson.

There was one acclamation as student member of New College Council, Murray Metcalfe, leaving one seat vacant.

New Education Commissioners are Cathy Braid, Karen Lambo, Steve Coulter and William Eagles.

There were no applications for the four positions on the Social Commission.

Another election will be held next Monday and Tuesday for the unfilled position on the New College Council and the vacancies on the Social Commission. Nomination forms will be available at the Wetmore Hall Porter's Lodge, Wednesday and Thursday.

Obstruction of hospital abortions is charged

By ANN SILVERSIDES

The legal therapeutic abortion program in at least one Toronto hospital is being threatened because of lobbying by the anti-abortion group, Right To Life, says Isabel LeBourdais.

The author of the Trial of Steven Truscott says the well financed group had a body of representatives join the Scarborough Centenary Hospital Association last year and nominate candidates from the floor for the annual election of six hospital board members.

The nominating committee of the hospital board puts forward six candidates for a three year term, but nominations can also be made from the floor.

LeBourdais says she and others interested in the continuation of the therapeutic abortion program were able to outvote the anti-abortion delegation last year. Scarborough Centenary Hospital Administrator George Glover, says he is aware of the situation.

"My feeling is that we've been used as a forum by people who are not interested in Centenary hospital or its overall program," he says.

Glover issued a press release earlier this year publicizing the hospital association, drawing particular attention to the abortion issue and appealing for community support. He says if the annual meeting is to become a forum for special interest groups, there should also be a strong community voice.

LeBourdais says she and others who became involved (Laura Sabia, head of the Ontario Council for the Status of Women, June Callwood and others) voted last year at the Centenary hospital elections for the candidates nominated by the hospital board. They did not nominate from the floor.

She says the sole purpose of the nominations from the anti-abortion representatives is to undermine one particular aspect of the hospital program, and adds that Scarborough Centenary is the only hospital with an abortion program available for women in the area.

The Centenary performs about one thousand abortions a year, says Glover, while the Scarborough General (which is affiliated with the Catholic church) has no abortion program.

Two other hospital administrators contacted said they had encountered the same situation in their hospital board elections.

Merritt Henderson, administrator of the Mississauga hospital, says for the past two years he has been aware of representatives from anti-abortion groups joining his hospital's association, attending the elections and nominating candidates from the floor.

He says so far they have not been successful in electing board members. Henderson says a year ago the chairman of the hospital board wrote to members of the hospital association, outlining the abortion issue and stating that the board did not approve of special interest groups lobbying for positions on the hospital board.

Administrator of York Central Hospital, Mr. G.C. Hepburn says he is also aware of the situation. "When attendance at your annual meeting

Campaign underway at Erindale

By ERIC McMILLAN

Yet another election. This time it's for the Erindale student council and it's shaping up as a media fight-out. The two complete slates consist of mainly Medium II workers on one side and Erindale radio workers on the other.

SAC Vice-President Sa'ad Sa'idullah heads the Medium II team and CFRE manager Glenn Jones heads the radio team.

A third candidate for President is Alex Yeung who has entered the race without an official slate.

Sa'idullah claims he wanted to resign his SAC position for the duration of the campaign because "It's unethical for me to appear to use the SAC machinery" in the contest. However, he says the SAC executive considered his resignation "uncalled for".

Nor is Glenn Jones without political connections. The Erindale's Finance Director Larry Cooper is giving the Jones slate a push and Jones said last night he would make Cooper "Director without Portfolio" if elected as President.

Sa'idullah's campaign is working under the exciting slogan "Our Responsive Attitudes Will Mean Quality Government". Responsive attitudes means getting students back into participation in the student council, said Sa'idullah.

He listed his three main planks as promoting the quality of college life, the quality of academic, and the quality of student government.

The key phrase in Jones' campaign is "Rearranging of Priorities". Jones spoke of figures he uncovered in Erindale's budget which indicate students are not getting their money's worth.

He pointed to the operating budget of Erindale's library which he claims is almost a hundred thousand dollars less than that of Scarborough's library budget although Scarborough has fewer students. He also charged Erindale spends two and a half times as much on library salaries per year than on books.

"We've got to start taking a hard look at this and start asking questions," he said.

Both Sa'idullah and Jones want to improve the social life at Erindale. Sa'idullah promises concerts, stronger management of the pub, forums, lectures, and a job information centre.

Jones said it is "of ultimate importance" to push for more residences "if we're to have any community spirit here." He also claims he has the management experience to run the pub more efficiently.

Both argued in favour of lobbying to have the Erindale-St. George bus subsidized further by the administrations of the two campuses.

Sa'idullah argued the student council cannot fight against cutbacks on its own but can work with Scarborough's and St. George's newly-elected councils.

Jones claimed the Henderson Report has been "blown out of proportion." He said, "We don't want cutbacks but students are pretty lucky in Ontario." If budget cuts start affecting the quality of education, he would be willing to fight them along with the other councils.

Little is known of the platform of Alex Yeung since he has not shown up at the all-candidates meetings to date.

The Sa'idullah slate consists of David Leslie for Vice-President and Martin Power, Sue Coristine, Ted Bryant, Gord Shantz, and Doug Alcock for directors. Although all positions are filled by independent voting, Sa'idullah said he is asking voters to "vote for us as a slate or don't do it."

Jones is not taking this approach since all the candidates are serious and could work together if elected, he said. His Vice-Presidential running mate is Mike Mozewsky and his candidates for directors are Ron Shaw, Patricia Montague, Rob Callaghan, John Kerry, and George Gall.

U of T doctors slam research cuts

By MIKE EDWARDS

A group of scientific researchers from all over Canada recently journeyed to Ottawa requesting more funds for medical research. They may not get any money but they sure learned how the government operates.

"There is a panic situation in medical research," claimed Dr. Philip Seeman at a special press conference held at Medical Sciences Auditorium yesterday. Seeman made the trip to Ottawa and is part of a group at U of T which is concerned that the federal government has frozen the budget for the Medical Research Council.

Other critics of the federal funding programs are upset that while their budgets are dwindling because of inordinately high inflation rates, the budgets of Ottawa-based research agencies have been increasing.

Interestingly, the two ministers responsible for the fiasco, Bud Drury, Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology, and Minister of Health Marc Lalonde, are currently facing a constitutional crisis on other matters on Parliament Hill.

Dr. Seeman, who is working on anti-schizophrenic drugs, and Dr. Bernhard Cnader, Director of the Institute of Immunology, are both at the U of T. They convened the press conference to draw attention to the fact that because of the government's action many prominent scientists will be looking for jobs.

"Within the last two weeks, 23 projects have been terminated, meaning the loss of 4 to 5 people on each project," said Dr. Seeman. "Already ten of our leading scientists have made plans to leave Canada," he continued.

"The costly stop-go sequence of funding leads to wasted efforts and investments," said Dr. Cnader. The main request of the entire group seems to be a long term commitment of the government to medical research. They suggested a figure of 4.5 per cent of the federal health budget.

The U of T medical faculty is well aware of the problems they face. Many prominent faculty members have joined in, hoping to present a strong lobby to the government.

There have been a number of letters appearing in the Globe and Mail recently, written by prominent university professors who object to the situation and condemn the federal policy guidelines. Former U of T president Claude Bissel wrote to the paper and accused the government of cynicism. In another letter Dentistry Chairman Professor A.R. Ten Cate deplored the short-sightedness of government policy.

"The freeze will effectively halt the flow of future manpower for health research," he said.

"The federal government must reconsider," said Dr. Seeman. The scientists are determined to strengthen their lobby in Ottawa.

"Their first responsibility," said Seeman, referring to the 50 MPs, including 13 ministers whom he and his colleagues visited last March 11, "is to stay elected." Seeman said the ministers told them if they want support they had better get organized.

Seeman and Cnader referred to the savings which have resulted from research. "It's our job to close hospitals," they said. Seeman referred to the halving of psychiatric hospital beds since 1959 due to development of different drug techniques.

The group feels that basic research in teaching hospitals is more efficient than the "In-house" research done in Ottawa labs. "We can bring advances to the bedside much sooner," he said.

"The group is asking for approximately $8 million in immediate additional funds and a long term commitment.

U of T doctors report panic situation in medical research.

jumps from fifty to three hundred, you know something is up," he says. "I'm afraid who is on the board as long as they are generally interested in the hospital and believe in it."

On the situation at Scarborough Centenary, LeBourdais comments, "The hospital is under attack because it is obeying the law. If these people are interested in changing the law, they should try to do that."

Asked to respond to this comment, Hepburn said, "Amen to that. If something is being done legally, the point is the law. I suppose if a group can't change the law, it takes on whatever local skirmishes it can."

Mrs. Laura McArthur, president of the Toronto Right To Life organization, denies that Right To Life has any official involvement with the situation at Scarborough Centenary.

She says her organization supports those with an anti-abortion stand and is happy they are "taking it up" but says the anti-abortion group involved with Scarborough Centenary hospital is a group of concerned citizens. She named Jim Bissonette, a teacher at Neil McNeil highschool, as a spokesman for the group.

Bissonette says he is actively involved in getting Scarborough residents who are opposed to the abortion out to the annual hospital board elections. He says he does not remember if he is currently a member of Right To Life.

This Friday is the deadline for joining the Scarborough Centenary Hospital Association and getting a voice at the annual hospital board elections. If you wish to join, contact Isabel LeBourdais at 46-2142. Application forms with the $10 membership fee can be dropped off at The Varsity office in sealed envelopes with "Attention Pat McDonald" marked on them. They will be delivered to the hospital by hand.

CUPE charges racism exists in Med faculty

To The Editor:

I would like to bring to the attention of the university community the following resolution, which was adopted by a general meeting of Local 1230, The Canadian Union of Public Employees on March 9th, 1976.

"As a Union representing workers of many nationalities, of every race, colour and creed, we stand opposed to any form of discrimination or racism. It is clear that in the case of Henry Fong, fourth year medical student of Chinese origin, an atmosphere of racism was created in the medical school which led to his expulsion, the first expulsion in the history of the University of Toronto Medical School. Therefore, we, members of C.U.P.E. Local 1230, demand that Henry Fong be reinstated to Medical School and allowed to complete his studies free from racial discrimination."

Copies of this resolution have been sent to Mr. Evans, President of the University, and to Mr. Harding, Chairperson of the Governing Council, along with a statement calling for their immediate action in this matter.

Soc prof calls for reinstatement

To The Editor:

We join the growing number of campus and community leaders who have rejected the report of the Academic Affairs Subcommittee of the Governing Council which upheld the expulsion of Mr. Henry Fong from the University of Toronto Medical School. It is highly regrettable that the Subcommittee chose to ignore the presence of racism in the Medical School. It did so in large part by adopting a narrow definition of this concept, according to which racism is established only by documented or confessed evidence of personal bias. The report notes, "Sometimes, for example, a prejudiced person will admit the fact of the prejudice and its impact upon his or her judgement... Merely to show that prejudice exists... does not lead to the inference that prejudice affected the judgement unless the prejudice is so common that it is probable that the persons making the judgement were affected by it." Clearly, even if few individuals would document personal prejudice in such a straightforward manner, we cannot discount the effect of the wider anti-ethnic bias and efforts to control scarce resources by an elite in a time of educational cutbacks.

Despite its conclusion, the Report's evidence provides ample evidence of discrimination against Mr. Fong on the basis of attributes associated with race and ethnic background. For example, Mr. Fong was used as an example in the efforts of the Medical School to restrict admissions of foreign-born students. A letter by Dr. Marotta to Dr. Hollenberg, Nov. 18, 1974, referred to Mr. Fong's "recurring shyness," "lack of ability to communicate," "lack of appreciation of the idiom of the language," "quietness," "reserve"—in a mixture of personal attributes and cultural stereotypes. The letter continues, "Certainly this boy would be reason enough to reinstate the interview system. One finds it difficult to conceive that this type of personality and this lack of ability to communicate would not be universally recognized by all the interviewers." In the wake of the Fong hearing, the system of subjective criteria for medical school admission, first proposed in 1972, personal interviews and reference letters comprising 20 per cent of admission credit, has been implemented by the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council. This system meets with our dismay and opposition.

Whether or not the Governing Council should call for additional investigation into his case, we believe that the best solution is now the reinstatement of Henry Fong. His performances as a fourth year medical student can then speak for itself.

Student says racism unproved

To The Editor:

Allow me to comment on the case of Henry Fong. As a part-time student of this University, I have easy access to your paper and have been able to follow the course of his appeal closely. There is in my mind no doubt that he has been treated with fairness and that the conclusion is correct. As a consumer of medical services, and knowing of the tight competition that allows only the students with the best marks to enter medical schools, I would expect from future doctors a high degree of technical proficiency. I would not care to entrust the intricate mechanism of my body to someone with marginal competence.

There is a separate quality to the practice of medicine that at one time was enclosed in the attitude of "noblesse oblige". Certainly there are many doctors, including Chinese, who demonstrate humane concern and commitment in their work, but generally speaking, it seems to me and to the public at large, that there is no consistently available equivalent of that attitude among the cadres of the medical profession. Kurt Vonnegut Jr. says somewhere that "the worst thing that can happen to somebody is not to be used by anybody for anything." We should all strive to possess that largeness of spirit, that readiness "to be used". Some professions lend themselves to the exercise of that quality more than others, and the rest of us would profit from the example. However, one hears that the particular quality cannot be taught; neither can it be evaluated. That quality of magnanimity being so intangible, it was not mentioned in the case of Henry Fong. He may well possess it in an uncommon degree. If he does, the information did not emerge during the long process of his appeal.

What did emerge loud and clear was the contention that Fong's failure was the result of racial prejudice. It is hard to believe that the busy professionals who teach in a medical school, could be bothered to consider people's skin colour, be they patients, colleagues or students, in their impartial, sometimes impersonal, striving for technical excellence and progress.

Students call for reinstatement

To The Editor:

We the undersigned students wish to voice our support for Henry Fong's immediate reinstatement in Fourth Year Medicine. We see no useful purpose in a new review of Mr. Fong's case. He has already suffered a long delay in the Academic Appeals process, and should not have to wait longer before it is finally admitted that he deserves another opportunity to complete his fourth year.

Mr. Fong's appeal for reinstatement provided ample evidence that racial and personal bias played a part in his expulsion from the Faculty of Medicine. Given this evidence, there is really no disputing his right to repeat the clerkship year. It is apparent that the Academic Appeals Subcommittee virtually ignored the importance of this evidence when it decided to uphold the expulsion of Fong. No wonder, then, that the Subcommittee's report on the appeal has not so far been sharply criticized, even by several members of Academic Affairs. The Subcommittee has downplayed the issues which should have settled the case in Henry Fong's favour over three months ago.

May we remind you that the case of Henry Fong is part of a much larger problem. If Mr. Fong has still not been fairly dealt with, then any medical student of non-Canadian origin faces a high probability of discrimination if his or her own performance, personality or "ability to communicate" become controversial in the Faculty of Medicine. The "subjective criteria" introduced into the Medical Faculty's admission policy must also be seen in this light as a mechanism wide open to racial and personal bias. We join those who strongly oppose this policy.

We urge Council to reinstate Henry Fong without delay, and to suspend the use of subjective selection criteria in Medicine pending further inquiry into the Medical Faculty's treatment of foreign-born students and applicants.

Students push further inquiry

To The Editor:

We understand that the case of Mr. Henry Fong has received widespread attention and support from various organizations owing to the nature as well as peculiarity and incidents evolving around the issue. As the highest authority within the university community, the decision making process of the Governing Council represents the style and method in which the university operates. It is most unfortunate that the decision of the Governing Council is being accused of being subjective and biased. Due to the grave incidence, the reputation of the university may be jeopardized.

Since the Council is responsible to the university community as a whole, it would be in the best interest of both the university and students that the allegations of partiality and bigotry regarding admission, the Fong case, et al, be cleared.

As a group that works towards the goal of equal opportunities for all Canadians we strongly urge the Council to re-open and further investigate the Fong case.

Fong's origin had an influence

To The Editor:

Over the past few months, the Varsity has published a great deal of information about the expulsion of Henry Fong from the Faculty of Medicine. In spite of the difficulty of fully evaluating all the evidence, it is clear that one can say that at least to some extent Fong being of Chinese origin influenced his treatment by the Faculty. Since Fong is merely asking that he be given another opportunity to attempt fourth year, and not that he be immediately awarded his M.D., I do not see any possible grounds for denying his request.

It seems to me that any and all faculties of the University of Toronto should be able to prove that any expulsion they make is entirely free of racial bias. If, as in the Fong case, there remains a serious probability of racial discrimination, then the expulsion must be invalidated.

Henry Fong and his supporters are demanding that the March 18 meeting of the Governing Council reinstate him. It would be tragic if the Governing Council does otherwise.

Student says no to Input funds

To The Editor:

and to all students)
The new SAC reps, and a lot of old ones, are about to spend $132,000 on input Radio, $82,500 as initial capital and $50,000 in the first year as operating costs.

Current donations of $50,000, subscriber donations of $40,000 and advertising of $35,000 also pay for operating costs.

Dr. Evans is patron. Influential business men such as Peter M Brophy, vice-president (Corporate Affairs) of Xerox of Canada Ltd., and Harold M Turner, director of Mutual Life Assurance Co. and Governor of the Ontario Research Foundation, amongst others, are "Members".

Input Radio is advertised as a Community Access FM-Radio with a nucleus of professionals, injecting an atmosphere of professionalism, to encourage the achievement of professional standards.

Although a few enterprising influential students may benefit from this radio, by pulling a few strings, the majority of students will never even listen to it!

As a student, I would rather the yearly $50,000 were spent on other participatory entertainment.

As for the $82,500 of capital, I would like to see it saved for a more intelligent use.

Furthermore, I refuse to subsidize a corporate community radio service with advertising to boot!

I am asking all SAC reps, Shirley French, Doug Gerhart and Peter Henderson, to legislate that the decision to finance Input Radio, with SAC funds, be made by all the students who pay into SAC.

On the basis of a 13 per cent turnout for the SAC presidential elections and even less for the SAC reps, you do not have the right to represent all the students who are affected.

Worker queues layoff decision

To The Editor:

I am writing about the proposed budget cuts and layoffs as suggested by the budget committee for the coming fiscal year.

The university operates quite a fleet of cars, trucks, etc., but why do they pay so much for gasoline? The university uses the Texaco station at the corner of College and Huron Sts., which is convenient but expensive. Their gas sells for 86 cents a gallon with a four cent a gallon discount for the university, making the price 82 cents a gallon.

There is a discount gas station on Queen St. that sells gas for 75 cents a gallon, seven cents cheaper. Since we usually fill up once a week, it would be quite a saving over a full year.

Secondly, the budget committee proposes that over 120 people are to be laid off and yet the university is hiring more campus police. There are nearly fifty police on staff now and I can't figure out why they need so many. Are the parking attendants with walkie-talkies who patrol? Are they high-salaried mail-boxes who deliver special documents all over campus? Are there so many riots, rebellions and accidents on campus that we need to justify a small army? To me, this is money wasted that could be spent on something necessary.

Finally, if so many layoffs are inevitable, how are they to be implemented? Are they to be done according to seniority, do we all put our names in a hat, or are they to be done at the discretion of the heads of departments? Employed by the university are quite a few people over the retirement age of 65. These people are on some sort of special extension, and all receive a government pension. The jobs done by the elderly souls be offered to anyone about to be laid off. To work at a lower salary is better than no salary at all, or having to join the growing number of people on the unemployment lines. Jobs are getting scarce and when you reach retirement age you should step down.

I hope these suggestions will be taken graciously by whoever needs them and taken into account by whoever enforces the decisions of the budget committee. I am certain that none of the budget committee members, or members of the administration are in danger of losing their jobs, but they should know how the average worker feels.

Varg lauded for political line

To The Editor:

It seems to me you are always receiving letters criticizing your paper's coverage or expanding various political party lines.

Well, I for one would like to compliment the Varsity for its excellent coverage of the university community and alternative coverage of other events.

Why can't you guys go daily. I'm sure you could use a larger budget and would put the money to better use than SAC could.

Op-ed Maoists again defended

Recent articles and letters in The Varsity, particularly the Op-Ed's in last Wednesday and Friday's editions, compel the Trotskyist League to restate its intransigent opposition to administration attempts to ban CPC(M-L) following incidents at Innis College during their February 8th Angola forum. Successful administration repression of CPC(M-L)'s "Academic Activities Committee" could only set a dangerous precedent for future attacks on left-wing organizations (as did the administration's banning of SDS over the Banfield incident two years ago). Despite our unalterable opposition to CPC(M-L)'s reformist Maoist politics and cowardly gangsterism against political opponents within the working-class movement, we call on all students, teachers and campus workers to join in their defense against administration attack. An injury to one is an injury to all — defend CPC(M-L)!

The circumstances of the attack by CPC(M-L) on newspaper salesmen from the Trotskyist League and the Revolutionary Marxist Group, as well as their exclusion of several black U of T students who also opposed their political line of support to the UNITA group in Angola, clearly demonstrate the goon tactics CPC(M-L) must resort to to cover bankrupt political positions. UNITA was backed by the CIA and U.S. imperialism and bolstered by troops from the apartheid South African army. Pictures of UNITA chief Jonas Savimbi adorned the pages of leading racist South African newspapers, with the Johannesburg Star hailing him as Angola's "man of the hour".

Extreme rightist mercenaries fought with UNITA and their bloc partners in the FNLA against the Soviet-backed MPLA in a decisively internationalized proxy war between the U.S. imperialists and the Soviet-deformed workers state.

During this proxy war the Trotskyist League called for military victory to the MPLA and Cuban troops against the imperialists, while, unlike vicarious nationalists like the RMG and Varsity Op-Ed correspondent John Africa) placing absolutely no political confidence in the petty-bourgeois MPLA, whose program has always been for a bourgeois Angola and which is now clearly trying to maneuver some sort of deal with world imperialism. Failure to back the MPLA in this internationalized conflict could only have led to a position of backhanded (in CPC(M-L)'s case, even open) support to the racist designs of the hated South African regime.

CPC(M-L) slavishly parrots the counter-revolutionary line of the Peking Stalinists and can only defend its reactionary positions by slanders and physical attacks upon those who seek to expose its political bankruptcy. This is the political heritage of Stalinism, both of the pro-Moscow and Maoist variants, which have for 50 years imprisoned, assassinated and slandered as "agents of imperialism" or "police agents" those who raise revolutionary Trotskyist criticisms of their betrayals of working-class struggles in the interests of continued bureaucratic rule on a program of "socialism in one country".

While explicitly backing the forces supported by the racist South African regime in Angola today, CPC(M-L) also defends Peking's offers of aid to the brutal and terroristic Chilean junta, to Pakistan's butcher Ali Bhutto and to the murderous regime of Madame Bandaranaike in Ceylon. The Maoist bureaucracy's latest "friend" the hated crook and mass murderer Richard Nixon, who was recently regaled to sumptuous banquets in Peking by the Chinese bureaucrats, while the strains of "America the Beautiful" and "Home on the Range" wafted softly in the background.

In last Wednesday's Op-Ed CPC(M-L) further accuses the Trotskyist League of being in an "objective alliance" with the fascist Western Guard!

Such stupid slanders can only serve to aid the work of the bourgeois state, in attempting to discredit and isolate all tendencies on the left. The TL's position on the fascist scum is clear and unequivocal: we oppose the "right" of these depraved sworn enemies of the workers movement and racial minorities to propagate or organize around their program of race war and genocide.

Another slander which must be dealt with is contained in remarks attributed to CPC(M-L) leader Harjial Bains in the March 10 Varsity article entitled "Meeting opposes racist attacks". In that meeting "Bains pointed out there are two approaches on the question of how to combat racism. One approach, promoted by Trotskyists and other agents of the state (sic), is to raise abstract slogans about how racism is inherent in capitalism and to call on people under racist attack to wage a struggle for some kind of abstract socialism. This means if someone throws a stone at my house, I shouldn't fight back, but wait until socialism comes," he said." This is both wilfully untruthful and patently absurd. Authentic Trotskyism, not to be confused with the pacifist reformism of groups like the League for Socialist Action or the mindless cheerleading of the opportunist RMG, has always put forward a fighting program against racist and fascist attacks. Capitalism is the root cause of racial oppression and its excrecences can only be obliterated by a victorious proletarian revolution.

Bains argues that national minorities should fight racial oppression in isolation from the struggles of the working class — he even considers this a desirable strategy. Marxists on the other hand have always insisted on the centrality of the proletariat in repulsing reactionary attacks, and recognize that only a united labor defense can be unalterably successful against such attacks. East Indian workers, for instance, as the only real guarantee of their democratic rights, should seek to link their necessary self-defense with the strength of the organized proletariat.

An example of how this has concretely been effected is to be found in the labor-black defense squad initiated by a UAW local in Chicago following a proposal from a class-struggle union opposition group (of the type politically supported by the international Spartacist tendency and the Trotskyist League), the Labor Struggle Caucus. Local 6 of the United Auto Workers successfully undertook the defense of a black family whose home in a previously all-white neighbourhood had been firebombed. Such a strategy is both effective and possible, and points the way forward to militant working class unity against capitalist attack. Supporters of CPC(M-L) would do well to take note of the work we have done in concretely fighting against racial oppression by linking it through a transitional program to its material root in capitalist society. Of course the leadership of CPC(M-L) may wish to argue to its members and supporters that a class-struggle working class leadership is not necessary to fight against racial oppression — but slanders and lies have no place in the political debates of the workers movement.

Unlike CPC(M-L) the Trotskyist League stands ready to debate its politics and stands ready to fight for the defense of workers democracy at all times. But while defending unconditionally the rights and gains of the workers movement (in particular, the gains made in the bureaucratic workers states like China and the U.S.S.R.), we seek to mobilize around a program of smashing capitalist internationally, and ending the bureaucratic Stalinist rule in China, the Soviet Union, etc. through working-class political revolution led by a Leninist-Trotskyist vanguard party. CPC(M-L) seeks to hide its counter-revolutionary program from communist criticism by falsehoods and gangsterism.

Letters to the Review Editor

Student defends Wertmuller flic

To The Editor:

I think a response is in order to the maniacally cheap thrust of your movie editor in the Wed. Feb. 11 Varsity, at the films of Lina Wertmuller.

Since he links the anti-Fascist Lina Wertmuller with Leni Reifenstahl, whose Triumph of the Will was used as a propaganda film of the Nazis, a little examination of the history behind that film is perhaps in order.

Leni Reifenstahl made that film when she was 23. She was sepi up in the fervor which was sweeping Nazi Germany then, under Hitler's charismatic leadership and that was overwhelming the thinking of many older and wiser heads.

At a time when middle-aged political leaders with decades of political knowledge and insight into the steps by which totalitarianism overwhelms a people, and sucks away the marrow of its soul, astute leaders like Winston Churchill were applauding the opening moves of Hitler (which Churchill is known to have done as late as 1936), a little compassion might be permissible for the error of a twenty-three year old.

Another detail about the Leni Reifenstahl case. After the war she was put in prison for twenty years for the making of Triumph of the Will, in a French prison. Twenty years, and I don't have to remind those of you familiar with The Sorrow and the Pity (which confirms and synthesizes masses of historical evidence) that it is statistically certain that amongst those who sat in judgement on her, who applauded her conviction, and who guarded her all during those years, were many who gave wholehearted support to the Vichy regime.

Since none of this seems to enter your reviewer's understanding of the case, I don't wonder that he derides the vision of Lina Wertmuller (and cheaply connects her anti-Fascist films to a Nazi propaganda film).

Lina Wertmuller's films are not merely technically accomplished, they are profound, complex, political analyses of the difficult times through which we are passing and with their incisive satirical bite they are nevertheless informed through and through, with the first virtue of satire, indeed the first spur that is ever provided to the satirical vision in the days of one's youth — compassion.

For all these reasons it is no surprise your movie editor finds no ground of sympathy with the Swiss-Italian directress Lina Wertmuller.

Lack of ballet coverage decried

To The Editor:

Canada's natural resources are numerous. We have 40 per cent of the world's water and much of its natural gas. Many in recent times have repeatedly expressed grave concerns over their exploitation. However, I should now like to express my own growing concern about the underexposure and lack of respect given to one of our greatest man-made resources, the National Ballet of Canada and its many talented artists.

Had it not been for my own repeated efforts The Varsity would not have even mentioned the NBOC this year. The New York Times eagerly dispatches representatives to give full reports of the exciting Canadian season but the newspaper-attached to the University of Toronto obviously couldn't care less. The dance section failed even to acknowledge the NBOC in their weekly "What's Up" column. Ignorance such as this is inexcusable. It leads devoted foreigners like John Neville, the famous English actor who is now the artistic director of the Citadel Theatre in Edmonton, to observe:

"Canadians are more interested in football matches and hockey games than they are in the development of their cultural arts." It has taken foreigners like Robin Phillips at Stratford and Celia Franca, the founder of the NBOC, to inspire and delight underserving Canadians who have done comparatively little.

The National Ballet of Canada is a very good classical ballet company. It has been recognized as such by every major country in the western world except Canada. Moreover, they have many talented artists, Karen Kain, a young girl from Hamilton, has been called "one of the most talented ballerinas in North America" by Clive Barnes. One will note that she was not called a talented "Canadian" ballerina but a talented ballerina who is just as good whether she is dancing a stunning Giselle in London or a breathtaking Copellia as she did this season in Toronto. This in my book qualifies her for the Canadian of any year award. She has excelled in the international ballet competitions in Russia, she has had two ballets especially created for her by Roland Petit, the world famous choreographer and she has appeared as a guest artist with almost every major company in the world. Yet she always returns to Canada and the NBOC, losing money and possible prestige, because she is "proud to be a Canadian artist".

Slighted writer returns jibes

To The Editor:

There are two points in John Wilson's piece on WRIT 7 which bear upon me personally, and which I therefore feel should not go unanswered despite my general policy of not replying to reviews.

It is not true that I have, over the years, filled the magazine with my own work. Except in the case of "firsts" (like the review section in the present issue), I have in fact limited my contribution to 4-6 pages of poetry or one prose work out of over 100 pages in each issue. The list under my name in the cumulative index is long because each poem produces one title listing (while a fiction writer gets the same single listing for a 30-page story), and because I have included some of my work in every issue.

I do this on principle, because I think a writer who asks others to contribute their best work (without payment) to the magazine he edits has an obligation to commit himself in the same way. This is not lost on the contributors, and I hope readers will not find it too strange that there is an editor who respects himself as a writer.

Canada settled by Irish - Cdn's...

Canadians who are of Irish descent may reflect with admiration upon the contribution which their ancestors made to the growth and character of Canadian society. The influence of the Irish in building the Canadian nation has been long and varied. They have left their mark upon the social, religious and political institutions of their adopted homeland. In fact the Irish were making their contribution to the young colonies of British North America long before the memorable event of 1867.

The First to Arrive

In the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries the Irish began to arrive in large numbers in that part of North America known as Canada.

One of the earliest of these was a settlement of Irish pioneers in the Peterborough area of Upper Canada. These Irishmen were brought out by Peter Robinson, after whom the city is named, in 1823. Roman Catholic and Protestant, they took up virgin land and left their mark in villages and townships like Cavan, Emiskillen, and South Monaghan, which remain today. Something of their actual story, a story repeated by many such Irish pioneers in many parts of Canada, can be understood by reading the vivid description of pioneer life in the decades before Confederation in the writings of Susannah Moodie.

The Irish contribution to the growth of the colonies in British North America before 1867 was not restricted to the settlement of the land. It was Irishmen whose labour helped to lay the railroad tracks, build the roads, dig the canals and lead the assault upon the forests. The lumber trade provided one of the major industries upon which the new nation would be built. Irish emigrants constructed the Rideau Canal, which, when it was completed in 1832, became a vital link in the colonies' defence system. It was the same Irishmen, and those that followed after them, who, with a ready ability to adapt to the needs of their new homeland, played an important role in the growth of the Ottawa Valley lumber trade. To this day their descendants with their own distinctive Canadian accent may be found living in the towns and villages along the Ottawa river.

The Great Famine

With the failure of the potato crop in Ireland in 1845 and the subsequent famine, the Irish emigrated to Canada in ever increasing numbers for many years. They came from the North of Ireland and from the South. They were Protestant and Catholic, Orangemen and Fenian. Some paused in Canada only momentarily before moving on to the United States. Others, less fortunate, got no further than the quarantine sheds at Cross Isle on the St. Lawrence River, where, in their thousands, they succumbed to the diseases which were a constant danger in the deplorable conditions of the overcrowded emigrant ships. Many survived the journey, however, and remained to make Canada their new home.

Gaelic: An Official Language?

By 1867 the Irish made up a considerable proportion of the population of most of Canada's seaboard cities like Saint John, Halifax, Quebec City and Montreal. Many of them, too poor to take up land, were to provide the labourers and skilled workers around which these industrial centres were to grow. The census of 1881 shows that Canadians of Irish descent or origin amounted to 957,403 out of a total population of 4,324,810. This made them the largest English-speaking element in the country. Only the French-Canadians outnumbered them. In 1893 a member of the Canadian Senate proposed unsuccessfully that as the Celtic peoples comprised such a large proportion of the population of Canada Gaelic should be adopted as another official language besides English and French.

As Confederation approached the Irish in Canada had become an important and influential part of the country's political life. Where they were to be found in large numbers in the cities and towns they were often represented in the legislatures by men of their own race. Politics, like journalism, the Irish entered into with relish and enthusiasm. Perhaps the most prominent among the early figures was Robert Baldwin. The son of an Irish emigrant, he joined with a French-Canadian, Hippolyte La Fontaine, in leading a group of political reformers whose efforts were largely responsible for the establishment of responsible government in Canada. Another early figure of Irish origin was Sir Francis Hincks. Born in County Cork, Hincks came to Canada as a young man and engaged in journalism before entering politics. He served in the Baldwin La Fontaine ministry which acquired responsible government and then rose to become Prime Minister of Canada from 1851 to 1854.

Many Irish-Canadians participated in the political events which ended in the confederation of the British colonies in North America. Among these was John O'Connor, the son of Irish parents. He sat in the Dominion House of Commons from 1867 to 1894, and held several cabinet posts in the governments led by Sir John A. Macdonald. Another was John O'Donohue, a native of Tuam, County Galway. He also was for many years a member of the Dominion House of Commons before becoming a Senator in 1884. John Costigan, whose parents were also Irish emigrants, was a member of the New Brunswick Assembly from 1861 to 1866. He was elected to the first Dominion House of Commons in 1867, and remained continuously a member of that House for thirty-eight years until he was raised to the Senate.

A name which deserves special mention is Edward Blake. As leader of the Liberal Party in Parliament for many years he might well have become the Dominion's first Prime Minister of Irish descent. Blake contributed much to the ideas and events which were to put Canada on the road to complete autonomy. As Minister of Justice in 1875 he was responsible for the establishment of Canada's Supreme Court.

As Canada entered the twentieth century the Irish tradition in Canadian politics was maintained by many able men. Two such notable examples were Charles Murphy and Charles Doherty. Murphy held cabinet posts in the governments of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mackenzie King before becoming a member of the Senate in 1925. Doherty was Member of Parliament for the largely Irish constituency of St. Anne in Montreal from 1908 to 1921. He was Minister of Justice from 1911 to 1921, a representative at the Peace Conference of Versailles and Canada's delegate to the League of Nations in 1920.

The Late, Great D'Arcy McGee

Probably the most well-known of all the political figures of Irish origin in Canada is Thomas D'Arcy McGee. McGee's story is typical of many of his Irish contemporaries who made their home in Canada. Born in Carlingwood, County Louth, he was implicated in the abortive uprising against British rule in 1848. He escaped to the United States where he turned his hand to journalism before coming to Canada to settle in 1857. McGee's experience and ability soon put him in the forefront of Canadian politics. He was a member of the Canadian Legislature from 1858, and was elected to the first Dominion House of Commons in 1867. As a delegate to the Charlottetown and Quebec Conferences he was also one of the architects of the new nation which came into being on July 1st, 1867. In his newspaper, New Era, he preached his doctrine of the "New Nationality". It was McGee with his experience of Irish nationalism who had a clearer and more systematic concept of the new nation he helped to found than any other statesman of 1867. Tragically, he was to have little chance to put his talents to use in the service of the new Dominion. While walking to his lodgings in Ottawa after a late sitting of the House of Commons on April 7th, 1868, he was killed by an assassin's bullet.

...or was it by Canadian-Irish?

Papists and Protestants
Of all the contributions made by the Irish, none have been more profound or more lasting than their influence upon the religious life of Canada. The Irish, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, have always been a deeply religious people. Many clergy who were graduates of Maynooth or Trinity College, Dublin, found their way to Canada. Some came as missionaries to the Indians and the scattered settlements along the frontier. Others came to establish their faith in the parishes, dioceses, churches, and educational institutions which are still with us today. Among the many who first left their mark was James O'Donel, a native of Tipperary and first Roman Catholic Bishop of Newfoundland in 1796. Another was Father William Walsh, who was appointed Roman Catholic Archbishop of Halifax in 1852. Born in County Waterford, Archbishop Walsh was instrumental in bringing the Sisters of Charity to the Maritimes, where they established many schools and fostered education. Perhaps better known of the Roman Catholic clergy of Irish origin was Michael Fallon, who became Bishop of London, Ontario, in 1910.

Among the Protestants were Irishmen who made a significant contribution to the establishment of the Christian Church in Canada. Benjamin Cronyn, a native of County Kilkenny, and a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, came as a missionary in 1832 to the sparsely populated settlements of southwestern Ontario, then called Upper Canada. Twenty-five years later when this area was brought into the Anglican Diocese of Huron he became its first Bishop and the first Bishop to be elected by a diocesan synod in the British Empire. Another graduate of Trinity College was John Travers Lewis. He laboured for many years in the service of the Anglican Church in what is now eastern Ontario. In 1862 he became the first bishop of the new Diocese of Ontario, and in 1893 he assumed the highest office in the Church when his fellow bishops elected him Primate of all Canada.

Educating the Irish

The Irish clergy were also pioneers in the field of education in Canada. Many institutions, whether elementary schools or universities, owe something of their origin to men whose names have now been largely forgotten. More prominent was Benjamin Cronyn, the Anglican Bishop of Huron already mentioned, who founded Huron College in 1863. Huron College provided the nucleus from which the present University of Western Ontario has grown. When St. Michael's College, Toronto, was founded in 1852 it was placed in the care of the Basilian Fathers. Since that date many of the priests who have been Superiors of the College have been Irish.

The Irish have played a leading role in the growth of Loyola College, Montreal, too. It was an Irishman and an Oblate, Dennis Finnegan, who founded St. Patrick's College, Ottawa, in 1929.

The Irish in Western Canada

Irishmen also had a part in the settlement and growth of the Provinces of Western Canada, which were to join the Dominion after 1867. Many of them must have journeyed westwards with the prairie schooners during the period of settlement, but only a few of the more notable can be mentioned here. James McGuckin was one of several Oblate missionaries sent to Western Canada. He was born in County Tyrone and arrived in British Columbia in 1863, where he spent more than twenty years working among the Indians and miners. He helped to found the Oblate College, New Westminster, and later became the Rector of Ottawa University. Another Irishman was William O'Donoghue. His contribution was somewhat different from that of his fellows, but was, nevertheless, an essential part of the independent spirit which has been a part of the growth of Western Canada. O'Donoghue was a leading figure in the Red River Rebellion of 1869-70. He served as Secretary of the Treasury in Louis Riel's Provincial Government, and was forced to seek exile with Riel in the United States. An Irishman whose influence was to be of great importance in helping the west to be brought within the orbit of the Dominion at a time when it might easily have been annexed by the United States was Sir George French. French was a member of a well-known Anglo-Irish family of County Roscommon. In 1873 he was appointed by the Canadian Government as the first commissioner for the North West Mounted Police. It was he who was largely responsible for the early organization of this now famous force.

Throughout much of the half-century which followed Confederation the Irish in Canada were generally referred to as "Irish-Canadians". This hyphenated identity was commonly adopted by many other elements which made up Canadian society. As yet they were unable to identify themselves totally with their new homeland. They were Irishmen living in Canada. They brought with them the problems and concerns of their native land, and they continued to feel themselves involved in Irish affairs. They joined in the demand for Irish Home Rule. Parnell was as much a hero to some of them as Sir John A. Macdonald. Others felt themselves involved in the struggle to preserve the union with Great Britain and protect the Protestant faith in Ireland. Gradually, however, as the twentieth century advanced this hyphenated identity disappeared and they became part of a society which was becoming more Canadian with each decade that passed. For most Canadians of Irish descent today the homeland of their ancestors is only a subject for nostalgic reflection.

Don't miss the resolution of Irish Week at SMC today, Thursday and Friday. Today is Samuel Beckett's 70th birthday. Festivities will include a lecture by Beckettologist Alec Reid and a cake-cutting by the always-pompous Herb Whittaker.

Thursday night will witness dancing and singing of the Celtic variety, followed by Friday's traditional burnout St. Patrick's Day Pub.

Phobias, Phobias

From the Touchstone

butter sticking to the roof of your mouth.

The chances that you have had, do have or can have a phobia of one kind or another are very high.

Psychiatrists, we are told, have already catalogued more than 700 of these inexplicable and illogical fears since they began counting not so long ago; and there are thousands more on the scene which still await scientific labels.

Today, there are more than 14 million Americans (and presumably an equal number of Canadians) who admit to suffering from one kind of phobia or another. Many more keep their phobias to themselves or aren't aware that their irrational anxieties have been classified as phobias.

Phobias can be treated. But psychiatrists have not been able to fully explain just what a phobia is or precisely what causes it. They generally agree, though, that phobias are misplaced anxieties arising from some unpleasant childhood experience which is reactivated by something unrelated to the phobia itself.

The 700 phobias catalogued to date vary from common and known dreads such as acrophobia (fear of heights) and claustrophobia (fear of enclosed spaces) to the relatively unknown nucleomphobia (fear of nuclear bombs) and arachnibutrophobia (fear of peanut

But whether or not you have any of these phobias, there's no real cause of alarm though. We are told that phobias are not real signs of any severe mental or psychological disorder and that perfectly healthy people can have phobias.

So here's a partial list of these 700 or more redoubtable dreads to help you find your phobia and enjoy it:

Acrophobia — fear of heights
Aerophobia — fear of high objects or heights
Agoraphobia — fear of open places
Ailurophobia — fear of cats
Algophobia — fear of pain
Androphobia — fear of men
Anthophobia — fear of flowers
Apidiphobia — fear of bees
Anthropophobia — fear of people
Arachnibutrophobia — fear of peanut butter sticking to the roof of the mouth
Astraphobia — fear of storms, lightning, thunder
Autophobia — fear of being alone

Bacillophobia — fear of microbes
Ballistophobia — fear of bullets
Bathophobia — fear of depth
Belonephobia — fear of pins and needles
Botanophobia — fear of plants

Ceraunophobia — fear of thunder
Chromophobia — fear of certain colors
Claustrophobia — fear of enclosed places
Clinophobia — fear of beds

Decidophobia — fear of making decisions

Provincial and Campus Phobias

Touchstone has observed a number of phobias which appear to be particular to this campus and to this province. These could presumably be added to the list in order to help psychiatrists in the labelling process. We suggest that they be given the following names:
Biblephobia — fear of libraries and books.

Ergophobia — fear of work
Testophobia — fear of exams
Scholarscriptophobia — fear of writing scholarly papers
Francophobia — fear of separatism and Bill 22

Anglophobia — fear of the English

The distorted faces of a murderer and his victim still stare down from the stone walls of University College, 130 years after the crime of passion.

HATCHET MURDER AT UC Ghost Still Stalks The Halls

The jealous ghost of a murdered lover still stalks the stone corridors of University College. Caretakers there, convinced they are being watched in the night have been startled by suddenly slamming doors.

Nearly 130 years after the violent campus crime, the distorted features of the victim and his murderer still stare down in stony vigil from the rough-hewn walls near the western doors of the college and the mark of a murderer's hatchet is still etched in the wooden door frame.

The UC ghost is said to be that of a European stone mason who worked on the carving of the gargoyles and water-drift terminals found in such profusion on the building's exterior. His name was Ivan Reznikoff, a pleasant enough fellow in life but perhaps a trifle too suspicious for his own good.

Here's the story:

Reznikoff had a girlfriend who was also seeing another mason, Paul Diabolos. For months the two stoneworkers feuded bitterly over here, as they worked almost side by side carving gargoyles in the corner between Croft Chapter House and the main building, near the south-west entrance.

Legend has it the grotesque visages they produced are the sculptured faces of the two stone masons.

Frequently one faces the east and the other the south, although traditionally gargoyles on Gothic churches were carved facing the west because people in the middle ages thought they would frighten away the devils of the night that came from the west after the sun set.

Reznikoff, finally discovered that Diabolos and the girl were meeting secretly in the cloistered area under the south-west entrance every night. He decided to look into the matter himself.

The college, which was still under construction, was littered with materials and tools. Reznikoff stationed himself just inside the door and waited for the two to arrive. When they did, Reznikoff was unable to keep his jealousy under control. He burst open the door and demanded a duel with Diabolos.

Diabolos, seized an axe which was lying nearby and took several swings at poor cuckolded Reznikoff. Although he missed him the first few times leaving a large gouge in the wood at the south west door, Diabolos finally killed Reznikoff and threw his body into the main tower which was still under construction. A skull and some bones were discovered after the 1830 fire, and if it doesn't actually prove the existence of the ghost, it does point to sinister activities here in the 1830's.

I've got a theory the present renovations at UC, which began in 1974 and should be completed by the late 1970's, have re-awakened in the ghost those early days when hammers and chisels were heard working on the college building. The ghost has probably associated these sounds with his unfaithful girlfriend and her lover.

A few weeks ago UC caretaker Albert Hartviksen told the Toronto Star that early one Monday morning, just after six, the UC ghost opened and closed the south-west door which is located under the sheltered cloister beside the Croft Chapter house.

"It was very still that morning and there were no people around," Hartviksen reports. "What else could it have been but the ghost?"

Tony Da Silva, another university employee backs up the caretaker's statement and obviously believes in the ghost. "You should have seen the look on Tony's face", Hartviksen says, describing his friend's strong response to the slammed door.

Hartviksen believes the ghost, which has reportedly been haunting the building since its construction days, has been disturbed by the current restoration work under way at the college.

The ghost, Hartviksen says, isn't troublesome, but he's convinced he's heard it on other occasions and that it often watches him while he's on duty in the wee hours.

When the Varsity asked him if he truly believed in the ghost, Hartviksen responded with a cryptic, "Well, who's going to deny that it's possible?"

This latest occurrence, however, is by no means the first. In the past UC students have reported meeting the ghost in the corridors of the college and one student some years ago entertained it in his room with a bottle of scotch.

150 LONG YEARS AS "A GODLESS"

by Mathilde Verhulst

A university in Toronto would "have a great influence in civilizing the Indians, and, what is of more importance, those who corrupt them," or so thought John Graves Simcoe in 1795. As the first governor of Upper Canada Simcoe was writing to the Bishop of Quebec in the hopes of seeing higher education come to muddy York.

It was also Governor Simcoe who, in 1792, on his way to take charge of the British North American colonies, suggested to Sir Joseph Banks, the president of the Royal Society of England at the time, the desirability of "a college of a higher class" which would be "eminently useful and would give a tone of principles and of manners that would be of infinite support to government."

That was the beginning of University College, essentially the first non-denominational, government-supported university in Upper Canada.

Shortly after Simcoe left Upper Canada in 1796 the provincial legislatures presented a joint address to the king asking that "a portion of the waste lands of the Crown" might be appropriated for the establishment of grammar schools, at least half of which would be allotted for a college or university.

More than 30 years of political haggling later the British Imperial Government granted the royal charter. On March 15, 1828, in a dispatch from the British Colonial Office on behalf of King George IV, 225,944 acres of crown land were set aside for "one college with the style and privileges of university . . . to continue for ever to be called King's College."

RELIGIOUS WAR RAGED OVER KING'S COLLEGE "WASTE LANDS"

A fierce religious war raged over the college as several denominations represented in the government squabbled over interpretations. The wording of the charter was so controverted they were interpreted differently by each religious faction. It encouraged the foundation of "seminaries of a larger and more comprehensive nature" for the promotion of "religious and moral learning." Needless to say, a bitter controversy over what these words meant and to what churches or sects they referred lasted another fifteen years.

The man credited with founding King's College and obtaining the royal charter and an annual university grant of a thousand pounds, was Archdeacon of York, the Rev. John Strachan, a stalwart Church of Englander.

Strachan, as the first president, ex-officio, of the new university seems to have had quite a hand in influencing founders of King's College to establish an Anglican-controlled institution. Furthermore, Strachan officially accused the Methodists of creating civil and religious disorder with respect to the university.

That was enough to draw petition from the legislature, many of whom were Methodists. These petitions eventually led to the founding of a university declared by statute to be free from denominational control.

CALLED "GODLESS BABEL" KING'S COLLEGE CONVERTED TO LUNATIC ASYLUM

In 1842 the cornerstone of King's College was laid in Queen's Park on the site of the present provincial parliament buildings.

The procession which marched up the College Ave. (now University Ave.) to the site of the proposed college was described as "the greatest procession which had ever been witnessed in Upper Canada". Leading the parade in full official dress were the chancellor, Sir Charles Bagot, the Lord Bishop of Toronto, John Strachan, chief justice John Beverley Robinson, and the governor general of the time. Military music accompanied other members of the fancy array, the Red Crosses, member of the clergy, lawyers, the 43rd Regiment and the First Incorporated Dragoons.

At the time Queen's Park was one mile north of the Town of York's northern limits.

Toronto architect Thomas Young, who was much influenced by Greek classical architecture, designed the first King's College. It was an Athenian looking structure, made of a beautiful white cut stone. By 1845 the south-east wing, and what was to be the only wing, of the ill-fated college was ready for occupancy.

So much controversy surrounded the college that the great university planned in Queen's Park never saw completion. Public funds were unavailable. Strachan condemned it as "a godless imitation of Babel." And so the college was expropriated in 1853, and for some thirty years before it was demolished to make way for the parliament buildings, it served as the female department of the Provincial Lunatic Asylum which later moved to 999 Queen St. And, to add insult to the injury of expropriation, it was officially designated the "University Lunatic Asylum!"

Nearly Amon

University College very nearly resembles ugliest buildings I ever saw", according to first vice-chancellor. The persistent inflexible Governor-General caused endless delay. John Langton, who was appointed vice-chancellor of the U of T in the late 1850's. As a building committee he recorded many of the construction details of the new university letters to his brother.

He wrote that when architect Cumberland Governor-general Sir Edmund Walker I sketch of a predominantly Gothic building. It. Declaring the new college was to be in the Head showed Cumberland and the building, example of "a palazzo at Sienna" that he Langton was disgusted.

The Governor-General, who was fickle, insisted, returned after a week's absence to another style charge — Byzantine.

If Head had not left on a tour, during Cumberland worked at a furious speed to final design and sketches, University College looked entirely different. Much to the relief of the Governor-General on his return approved design which Langton described to his hybrid with some features of Norman, of early with faint traces of Byzantium and the Italian altogether a not unsightly building.

Architects have since called the style of U things: Norman Gothic, Medieval, Norman and Romanesque Picturesque to name a UC's architecture is most accurately "picturesque eclectic," a term borrowed Gowan's book, Canadian Architecture.

In any case it's clear Cumberland borrowed features of these styles, incorporating them degrees in his overall design.

The college's construction problems, how

SS...BABEL"

"THE BASTARDS CAN'T STEAL STONE" SAID JOHN A.

The religious and political conflicts that surrounded the body of the aborted King's college cannot be underestimated. They continued unabated right up until the establishment of University College in 1856 and through the Reconstruction Act of 1853 which founded the U. of T. John A. MacDonal, concerned about the threat of the government and of the denominational colleges, which were casting covetous eyes upon the university's land, wryly observed that "We had better build our own building; the bastards can't steal stone and mortar."

The government succeeded, however in appropriating most of what was then still university property in Queen's Park. It paid the university 75,000 pounds for the old King's College building and 20,000 pounds for the library. If it had not been for the alert university authorities of the time, the government might also have grabbed the land west of the park. Luckily, in a formal remonstrance the university forced it to hand over "all the park west of the avenue."

LAND WORTH
1,000 POUNDS
AN ACRE

That land, worth one thousand pounds an acre in 1856, and rising, became the site of University College of Toronto, which was to be housed in the same buildings. At a cost of more than $500,000, an exorbitant amount by 19th century standards, UC was finally built.

On October 4, 1856 the cornerstone was laid and Frederick William Cumberland, the architect commissioned to design the new buildings, began staking out the property.

Cumberland, who already had an impressive career in architecture and engineering behind him when he left England in 1847, was the architect, in partnership with G. W. Storm, of such notable Toronto buildings as St. James Cathedral, the central portion of Osgoode Hall and the court house on Adelaide St.

He also designed and built his own house in the south-western corner of the campus in 1860 and lived there with his family until his death in 1881. That house, the first house to be built on St. George St. still stands as the International Student Centre, at 33 St. George St.

Urged on by the Senate, Cumberland left for England some time in the middle fifties to study both university and other architectural buildings and "their adaptation to our means and climate." His trip was not in vain.

In fact, Cumberland, visiting England at a time when architects were immersed in eclecticism, was greatly influenced by the gothic revival popular at that point in time. One of the most famous buildings in England then was the gothic University of Oxford museum. It seems Cumberland borrowed much from it in his designs for UC for stretches of both buildings and markedly similar.

EXPLOSIONS AND SACRED INTRUSIONS

You can see this particularly in the isolation of the chapter house which at UC was kept apart as a chemistry department to keep odors and possible explosions away from the main building, and to "prevent its intrusion on a building sacred to the humanities." Most definitely an institution in the "Oxbridge mold!"

In 1859 the newspapers called the newly completed UC "the crowning architectural glory of Toronto."

Made of a yellow brick imported from Cleveland, Ohio, the college stood in what was then open countryside. Its great Norman tower looked south across St. George St. along the western boundary of the campus had been just recently surveyed, and a lovely ravine containing the Taddle Creek flowed to the east of the college building reflecting its dream-like spires in its waters. Behind the college stretched virgin Canadian forest.

This site was chosen partially because it was far enough north of the sinful city that evil and corrupting influences would not reach on the sons of Upper Canada's well-lit citizens, who were attending the university.

In 1861 when Victorian writer Anthony Trollope visited Toronto he remarked "the University of Toronto is perhaps the only piece of collegiate architecture on the American continent worthy of standing room in the streets of Oxford."

Gutted by the Valentine's Day Fire in 1890, the hollow shell of UC cools in the winter sun.

U. C. Destroyed In Valentine Blaze

February 14, 1890 — TORONTO (Varsity) — Fire raged through University College last night destroying most of the interior and many valuable Norman features of the thirty-one year-old building, the first non-denominational college to be built in Upper Canada.

Sources estimate losses due to the fire at $364,000, insurance covering only $150,000 of the damages.

Many private and public donations, however, were reported to be already flowing in for the building's restoration this morning.

The fire, which began on the eve of the college's annual "Conversazione", a social event sponsored by students and faculty, was reported to have started accidentally when a student, carrying a tray of oil lamps through an eastern corridor of the building fell, spilling the oil.

Some of the oil caught fire and the flames spread rapidly throughout the eastern wing. Only the interior of the south-western wing which lodges the student residences, escaped the conflagration.

City fire officials have reported no major injuries. The senate chambers, Convocation Hall, the library including a 33,000-volume collection of books and the famous convocation stairway leading to the hall, have all been irrevocably destroyed. However, the stone exterior of the college resisted the flames, and the richly ornamented Norman entrance beneath the 115-foot main tower was merely blackened by smoke.

The stairway, claimed by architects to have been "worth a pilgrimage to visit" was considered one of UC architect Frederick W. Cumberland's architectural delights. Ornatly, sculptured birds and foliage and examples of the grotesque common to the Norman style, were carved in its Caen stones.

Cumberland had European stone cutters and masons brought from Germany expressly to carve and place the stones in the stairway.

The library, finished in white oak and considered by many to have been of architectural value, and the museum of natural history which was decorated in black walnut carvings throughout, are now a mass of smoldering rubble.

Last night's fire also completely devastated the college roof which had been shingled with Canada slate.

Hundreds of students, faculty, alumni, and concerned citizens gathered around the blackened building this morning, sadness etched on their grave faces.

It was indeed "a sad sight to see the once handsome building, the great seat of learning for this province, a mass of cold, hard, cracked walls and smoking embers."

As many turned sadly homewards from their beloved alma mater a cold mid-February wind seep in from the north sending chills of despondancy and regret around the few who remained to gaze at the charred college.

There is speculation, however, that restoration and renovations will begin almost immediately, funds pending.

The Varsity has also learned University authorities have requested Toronto architect, Mr. D. B. Dick, to undertake the task of reconstructing major portions of the interior of the college.

Although many of the beautiful carvings and chambers cannot be restored, authorities hope Cumberland's original designs, which borrowed extensively from Norman and Romanesque architecture, will be followed as closely as possible.

It seems that his Excellency had all along thought that the south front was to face the east. Nothing would satisfy him but so it must be and under his superintendence we proceeded to measure and stake out, Cumberland's face exhibiting blank despair for it brought his chemical laboratory where no sun would ever shine into it, his kitchens into the prettiest part of the grounds."

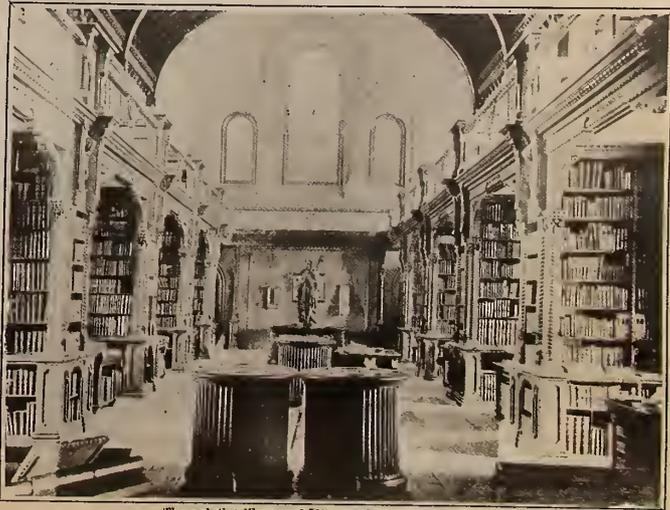

But an elm tree saved the day. It would have had to be sacrificed under the Governor-General's plan, and since Head was a conservationist as well as stubborn, he would not permit this. So, the staking out of the ground was done again according to Cumberland's original plan.

The elm tree was somehow squeezed into the plan and would fit into such a position that "it may be saved," Langton wrote, "but with the almost certainty that when it is blown down it will take some of the students' quarters wit it."

Actual costs of construction far exceeded original estimates of the buildings. This was largely due to the extra artistic detail in the stone work the architects had done.

After its completion, Cumberland and Storm requested the university authorities to pay an additional fee of between $5,000 and $6,000 for these extra services but they were refused.

Cumberland who had endured so many difficulties and set-backs in the design and construction stages of the college was so hurt at the want of appreciation for his artistic effort and affronted by the refusal, that he abandoned architecture and became involved with the Northern Railway. UC was his last major architectural work. However, his partner, G. W. Storm went on to design and build Victoria College in 1892.

The palatial library of UC, lost forever in the blaze.

U OF T'S UNKNOWN PAST

by Mathilde Verhulst

Did you know . . . that the front facade of the International Students' Centre at 33 St. George Street is actually the back of the house?

When Frederick W. Cumberland, the architect of University College, designed and lived in it in the 1860's it was known as Number Two College St. and its carriage way once led from that street to what is now the back entrance of the house.

If you walk up the lane along the south side you can still see part of the huge, magnificent doorway that once welcomed Cumberland's circle of illustrious friends which included Sir John A. Macdonald and Bishop John Strachan. To the left of that doorway was Pendarves' greenhouse; some bushes now mark the spot where it once stood.

A possible threat from an American developer who wanted to buy the land led the University to buy the property in 1923 for $210,000.

In its day Pendarves has served as a residence of two of Ontario's lieutenant-governors; the late Lester Pearson once taught history there; and immediately before its purchase by U of T it had been known as a Vetcraft Shop, a place of vocational training for disabled soldiers.

St. George No Saint

St. George Street, one of U of T's main student thoroughfares, was named not after the British patron saint, but after a French chevalier and trader.

Lawrence Quilton St. George, a French Royalist officer and chevalier of the Order of St. Louis immigrated to Canada during the French Revolution.

It was on St. George's day that he first trod on English soil; and to commemorate the fact, he assumed the surname of the saint.

After a prosperous career in a store on King St., in what was then the Town of York, St. George became acquainted with the Baldwins of Family Compact fame and later acquired a large tract of land north of York known as Oak Ridges.

He later established numerous trading Indian posts.

Flower Power in 1860's

In circle in Spadina Ave., where the U of T founded Connaught Laboratories now occupy the Old Knox College, was once known as Crescent Garden because of its many gardens and greenhouses.

The circle dates back to 1813 when Dr. W. W. Baldwin, a Family Compact member and a wealthy Toronto landowner laid out Spadina Ave. making provision in his plans for a large circle in the road just north of College St. It was considered, by 19th century standards, a bold piece of planning.

During the years preceding the construction of Knox College in 1875, a Mr. R. L. Mansfield rented the land for use as a flower garden. The flower beds and greenhouses supplied a great portion of Toronto's flower shops with blossoms and plants in the later half of the 19th Century.

Milky Way

The Borden Building on Spadina Crescent, now the home of the Sociology Department, was a dairy until the mid '50's.

City Dairy Ltd. of Toronto operated from the building which is still considered an architectural landmark of Toronto.

Before the Canadian Borden operations bought out City Dairy in 1938 and moved into the premises, it had the distinction of serving more homes, than any other individual dairy in the British Empire.

Sir John A. Drank Here

Unveiling ceremonies for the historical plaque in front of the Macdonald-Mowat House, now old Innis College, on St. George St. took an unexpected turn on October 31, 1967.

The Provincial Department of Public Records and Archives had arranged that Dr. Joan Harrison of the U of T medical faculty, and a great grand-daughter of Sir Oliver Mowat, do the unveiling as part of the centennial celebrations at the time. But the unveiling revealed not the commemorative plaque but a board scrawled with the message: "John A. drank here."

A "trick or treat" gesture courtesy of some Knox College Halloween pranksters, no doubt.

Contrary to popular belief, Sir John A. Macdonald lived in Toronto long prior to his residence at 59 St. George St. in 1876. Some 20 years earlier he and his family had occupied a boarding house in Wellington Place, situated very near Clarence Square at Wellington and Spadina Ave. The house didn't survive the city's growth.

In 1875, just a year before moving into 59 St. George St. Sir John and his family lived in a rented house on Sherbourne Street. This, too, was victim of re-development.

CUPTALK

Canadian University Press expands news coverage

By BOB BETTSON

Delegates representing the 70 members of Canadian University Press (CUP) decided in an unprecedented March plenary last weekend to embark on extensive expansion plans which involve a doubling of its budget.

The plans adding two regional fieldworkers, a national affairs reporter, and an information officer to CUP's eight-person staff were passed almost unanimously, but only after substantial debate over the setting up of regional bureaux for the west, Ontario, Quebec and the east.

CUP, a voluntary association of college and university newspapers, is now embarking on a three year plan to improve its national news service, create regional news co-ordination bureaux and add more field staff to aid member papers.

The organization, which began 37 years ago as a paper exchange and wire service without a national office, has evolved from dependence on the now defunct National Federation of University Students to an organization financed by the member papers.

During the period between the collapse of the Canadian Union of Students in 1969 and the formation of the National Union of Students in 1973, CUP was the only remaining national student organization.

The three year expansion will involve a huge increase in budget which will initially be financed by a doubling of members fees. The budget of $52,000 for 1975-76 will increase to $109,000 for 1976-77.

But CUP president Francis Fucca told delegates from the estimated 40 papers represented at the Ottawa plenary that in future the organization would have to go on a more firm financial base which would involve a per student levy, similar to the National Union of Students.

At present CUP fees are based on a formula including the paper's circulation, budget and frequency of publication. Fees for The Varsity were $1,650 this year and will likely increase to $3,300 next year.

For the first year of the plan CUP will add four staff members, expand its wire service (through Telex) and adopt a standard accounting procedure, setting off any loss in revenue from membership withdrawals with a loan.

The second year plan calls for four regional bureaux staffed full time, an additional national office staff member, further expansion of wire services and the setting up of a technical services branch.

The third year slows down the expansion, merely calling for further completion of the wire service and refining of the other additional services.

CUP's major expansion was initially approved at the 38th national conference held at Christmas in Montreal. Many members were dissatisfied with the national news service produced by four national office staff in Ottawa. They also wanted more regional cooperation and increased technical services through field staff.

However the March conference was preoccupied by a major confrontation over the pace of the expansion. Many western papers came into the conference with proposals passed at a winter western regional conference for immediate implementation of the regional bureaux.

Their plan for the setting up of bureaux staffed with half-time people was abandoned after strong opposition from Ontario papers led by The Varsity. Opponents of the scheme stressed there was no precedent for the bureaux and CUP could not manage the expansion all at once.

Eventually a compromise was reached allotting $4,000 for the west and Quebec, with maritime and Ontario papers, who don't want bureaux next year dividing $500 for regional expenses.

A major part of the expansion increase was due to a large catch-up wage increase for CUP employees from $110 a week over stages to $165 next January, which is almost equivalent to wages presently paid by other student organizations.

STATEMENT OF PURPOSES FOR NATIONAL NEWS SERVICE

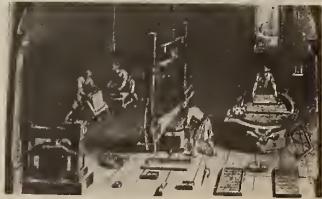

Canadian University Press recognizes that a class society exists in Canada, and the important role the post-secondary education system plays in maintaining the existing social order.

This role is reflected in the policies regarding accessibility to post-secondary education and the resulting composition of the Canadian student body, in the content of the education we receive, and is evidenced by the future positions which we are expected to occupy within the economic and social order.

Canadian University Press, as an agent of social change, must as its main priority attempt to use its national news service to provide Canadian students with information and analysis of the nature and role of post-secondary education within the Canadian economic and social system, relate the current policies of financial cutbacks being waged against post-secondary education and other social services to the general economic crisis facing Canada, and assist students in mobilizing opposition to these policies.

Further, the news service should report on and critically evaluate the role played by existing student organizations in responding to this situation, and encourage change in the leadership and structure of these organizations where they fail to recognize their responsibility to mobilize students.

Canadian University Press must also use its national news service to provide Canadian students with information and analysis of the capitalist economic system in which we all live, and to assist students in mobilizing against that system where it is found to be preserving the class structure to be oppressive to women, minorities or others within Canada.

AN OPEN LETTER TO JEWISH STUDENTS

Dear Fellow Student:

Throughout the ages the Jewish People have been called many slanderous things in various forms and disguises. However, we were rarely in a position to answer back and our history is full of unfulfilled dreams.

In 1948 our national dream was fulfilled in the creation of the State of Israel. However, the dream is not a "fait accompli" since Israel is still struggling for her existence, her recognition, and her dignity.

We in North America are in a fortunate position in that we have freedom, health, and financial security. Most of us are able to give Israel moral support and a tangible, monetary expression of that support.

We are asking for $18.00 "Chai"—Life. We are doing this out of a combined sense of the urgency for Israel, the particularly grim feelings that the past months have evoked in us, and the oneness and sometimes aloneness of the Jewish People.

Every dollar we give says, "I care". Every dollar we give says, "The Jewish People, my people, our values, our history, our religion, our culture and our country matter". It is not enough to say "my parents give". Each of us must make his/her own individual commitment.

Last year university students in Toronto raised over $20,000.00, a figure far and above any previous effort. We must accept the responsibility of at least matching or surpassing this figure.

Please give and KEEP THE PROMISE.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

Angola war not over, UNITA says

By LEA RYAN
The war in Angola is not over, declared Tony Hernandez, Minister of Information of Unita at a Saturday meeting. "It has entered the stage of guerrilla war against the Soviets and Cubans."

Hernandez said Unita was formed on March 13, 1966, out of dissatisfaction with what he termed the stagnated position of the MPLA and the F.N.L.A. "The Unita leaders agreed on a strategy of mobilizing the peasants through armed struggle based inside the country. We headed the lessons of the Chinese and Vietnamese revolutions," he said. "We knew we had to be as fish in water, among the people."

According to Hernandez, the MPLA refused to base itself inside Angola, and to learn from the peasants how to develop the struggle. "And at that time, they were already close to the USSR," he said.

Hernandez said the MPLA was an urban intellectual movement, with its leadership based in exile. "MPLA was formed as a wing of the Communist Party of Portugal. It would make raids from the safety of the country of Congo-Brazzaville, and then return, leaving the Angolan peasants to suffer Portuguese reprisals."

Unita organized camps inside the country to train cadres, Hernandez said, and organized a series of raids to obtain arms. On December 24, 1966, Unita conducted a raid against the Portuguese which gave them 4,468 small arms, he said.

"This proved the validity of hitting the enemy when he is unaware," Hernandez pointed out. Unita proceeded to carry out constant and efficient raids against the Portuguese, gaining larger supplies of arms and equipment, he said. Then they found themselves facing a new enemy, the Soviet Union, which carried out massive propaganda to discredit Unita, Hernandez said.

"The Soviet Union has played a vicious and manipulative role in the struggle for African liberation," he declared. "They have spent more aid in bribing the Organization of African Unity than one general aid." Unita proceeded to organize on a democratic centralist basis, and organized an army, women's and youth organizations, schools and health care, said Hernandez. "We fought out of the liberated zones, attacked enemy areas, and disputed areas until we won," he added.

Unita has long recognized Angola will not be independent of the rest of southern Africa, said Hernandez. The process of liberation was speeded up by events inside Portugal itself, he pointed out. The coup d'etat in Portugal by the armed forces on April 25 occurred when Unita was the only fighting force, he maintained.

The armed forces regime in Portugal wanted to set up a neo-colonial regime in Angola, but were forced to accept Unita's ultimatum by June 14, 1974. The terms included total independence, free access to all Angolan territory for the three liberation movements, and freeing of all political prisoners, including prisoners of war, Hernandez said.

The three liberation movement leaders met in December 1974, to form a united front for immediate independence and total withdrawal of the Portuguese forces, he said. An agreement was signed by all three on January 15, 1975 to establish a coalition to administer the transition to independence and to prepare for national elections.

Immediately, said Hernandez, the Communist Party of Portugal sent aid to the MPLA in order to sabotage the elections.

"Soviet military aid began pouring into Luanda to foment civil war," he added. "It was generally agreed Unita would have the support of over 75 per cent of the people if the elections were held."

"MPLA took the civil war to all corners of the country, and by February of 1976, we could no longer face 10,000 Cubans," Hernandez said. "At this time, there are 15,000 Cuban mercenaries imposing an MPLA regime on the Angolan people," he claimed.

"The task in front of us now is to use guerrilla warfare until the Cuban and Soviet military forces are completely defeated."

George Sangumba, Minister of Foreign Affairs for Unita, said the occupation army of Cubans was oppressing the Angolan population. He said 17 Cuban soldiers were executed last week by Unita women because they had indulged in rape and general terror against the population.

Sangumba said Unita had always based itself on reliance on the Angolan people rather than on an external force, and had based itself physically inside the country. He pointed out Marxism-Leninism was the basis of Unita's revolutionary theory.

NDP may force vote

By JAY NEILSON

The Ontario NDP have tabled a motion of non-confidence in the government. The motion, in the form of an amendment to the Throne Speech, was introduced Monday and will be voted on by April 5. Only five of the fifty-one Conservative members witnessed the event.

Liberal leader Stuart Smith said he was in general agreement with the motion, but said he would have to go over the motion in detail with the Liberal caucus before a final decision. He added he wished to add a two paragraph subamendment to it.

If both opposition parties voted in support of the motion they could force the minority Conservative government to hold an election.

The motion reads in part: "The legislature regrets the failure of the government to provide any significant proposals to deal with the pressing problems of:

- occupational health and the lack of adequate safeguards for the health and safety of workers;
 - need to preserve agricultural land;
 - need for a more equitable distribution of economic opportunity throughout the province, and in particular to Northern and Eastern Ontario;
 - need for job creation to offset rising unemployment;
 - inadequate housing supply, and rising mortgage interest rates."
- The motion also takes the government to task for "the mismanagement of the government's restraint program leading to:
- the failure to develop an overall policy for the delivery of health care services, especially as exemplified by the closing of small community hospitals and public laboratories;
 - the failure to respond adequately to financial needs for vital social services, particularly as exemplified by the inadequate funding arrangements offered to Children's Aid Societies."

"This legislature is opposed to the endless burdening of Ontario taxpayers exemplified both by the excessive increase in municipal property taxes which will result directly from this government's policies and by the additional concessions to the mining industry . . .

Therefore, the government has lost the confidence of this house."

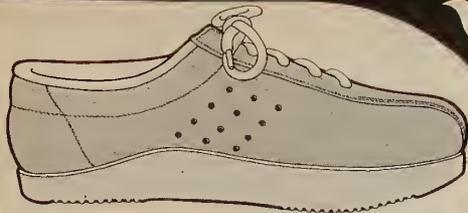

When asked later to describe the Liberal reaction, Lewis replied, "non-descript."

Scandal brews

WASHINGTON (PENS CUP) — As more multinational corporations reel under disclosures of international bribes and kickbacks, a major pay-off scandal also is brewing at home. It involves the American beer industry.

According to Business Week magazine, the Justice Department, Treasury Department and Securities and Exchange Commission are on the verge of exposing a major scandal in the brewing industry. Government sources are saying that beer companies and their distributors have made millions of dollars in illegal payments to gain favoured positions with big customers.

The Joseph Schlitz Brewing Company already has stated publicly that it has been under investigation by the SEC for allegedly improper payments. But that's just the tip of the iceberg. According to Business Week, Anheuser-Busch (the makers of America's top-selling brand — Budweiser), Millers and other manufacturers and distributors are being investigated by the Treasury Department.

MOLSON STRIKES

By PETER O'MALLEY

Canadian University Press

Molson's breweries is upset over an article recently carried in The Varsity and several other Canadian University Press (CUP) papers. The piece, which called for a boycott of all Molson's products, examined the strike at Vilas Furniture, a Molson's subsidiary, in Cowansville, 60 miles west of Montreal.

The 364 Cowansville Vilas workers have been on legal strike against the company, the largest furniture manufacturer in Quebec since last July.

The major issue in the dispute is the pay system, which provides a low base-rate with bonuses for workers who increase the pace of production beyond the specified basic level of output. Work under this "incentive" pay system is unbearable, the workers say, and leads to debilitating production line accidents.

Since news of the Vilas dispute and the Molson's boycott had been largely confined to Quebec and not received much attention elsewhere in the country, the Molson Company was quick to react when the article started appearing in the student press.

Company Vice-President, Public Affairs, G. Alex Jupp began visiting student newspaper editors in Montreal and Toronto to put the company's side forward, and to condemn the article as "the most erroneous one-sided piece of misrepresentation that has ever been seen in a university newspaper."

Jupp claimed the Molson Company "has absolutely no desire to interfere with the freedom of any paper to publish what it wishes" but that Molson's, and the student press, had been "victimized" by the CNTU affiliated union representing the Vilas workers.

His approach shifted, however, when he spoke with members of the CUP national executive in Ottawa. In a series of telephone conversations, Jupp repeatedly referred to opinions expressed by Molson lawyers that the article might be potentially libelous. He also made a pointed suggestion that CUP might be the target of a lawsuit. Because of The Varsity's involvement, he said, Molson's employees might not look favourably on the University of Toronto's appeal for funds, planned for this summer.

The main line of argument pursued in the article which appeared in the student press was:

- the Cowansville Vilas factory is unsafe and has a high rate of accidents and injuries;
- these are due to the unnatural pace of work on the production line;
- this pace is the result of the incentive pay system;
- however, fast the worker's pace, the pay level is inadequate; and
- the Cowansville Vilas management, and the Molson head office which directs their industrial relations strategy, has been intransigent in refusing to change the pay system to a basic hourly rate, as demanded by the workers and their union, the Federation of Wood and Building Workers (CNTU).

Molson's 10-page rejoinder argues:

- the safety record and pay levels at the Vilas plant are better than the average for other furniture plants in Quebec;
- the "politically oriented" union leadership is unfairly demanding the abolition of the "incentive" pay system "despite the fact that the incentive system is characteristic of the furniture industry and 80 per cent of all manufacturing plants in Quebec" including "all the manufacturing plants in Cowansville"; and
- the article relied on "factual" information given by striking workers and union officials, which is at variance with "factual" information the Company offers to give its side of the story.

The union says the working conditions and pay levels are unsatisfactory; management replies that it is better than other similar factories; the workers counter by claiming the industry as a whole provides unsatisfactory working conditions and pay levels.

The union says they will not enter a new collective agreement until the fundamental pay system is changed; management refuses on the grounds that the incentive pay system is normal for the industry; the union counters by saying that despite (if not because of) the fact that the system is general, it must be changed.

And the "facts" are in dispute, with both union and management officials citing different figures, calculated in different ways, to support their differing positions, while claiming that the other side is "misleading" the public.

But, in the Vilas dispute, there is some room for independent judgement. The company position outlined by Molson's rest squarely on the favourable comparison it alleges between the pay and safety record of Vilas and the furniture industry in general.

According to Statistics Canada figures last June, a month before the Vilas workers walked off the job, the average wage paid for a week's work in Canada was $205.07, and in Quebec $200.96. For durable manufacturing which includes the furniture industry, the average for Canada was $224.94, and $214.39 for Quebec.

As for the furniture industry, the average rate for Canada was $168.04 per week, 82.7 per cent of the general all-industries average, and only 74.6 per cent of the average paid in other durable manufacturing industries. For Quebec, the average wage in the furniture industry was $159.41, 79.3 per cent of the industrial average and 74.4 per cent of the average for durable manufacturing.

Using this method and the Statistics Canada figures, the average furniture worker in Quebec would have to receive a 35 per cent increase in wages to come up to the average paid in the durable manufacturing sector as a whole in the province.

The Workmen's Compensation Board in Quebec City, has information on accidents in the industry in Quebec.

According to WCB figures, the general rate of accidents in 1974 for all industries in the province was 26.6 per million hours worked. For the furniture industry, the rate was 72.5 per million hours worked, almost three times the general rate. The problem with the WCB information is that no breakdown is available to compare the accident rates in industries which are based on incentive pay systems and those which are not.

Consequently, there is no way of telling how much the difference in accident rates is due to the incentive pay system in the Quebec furniture industry, and how much is due to the nature of the tasks involved — cutting, sawing, sanding, etc.

The Molson's rejoinder suggests that there is nothing at all dangerous about the incentive system. Union officials, however, claim that the rate of accidents in plants operating on the incentive plan are "at least" 3 to 4 times those which operate on straight hourly wages.

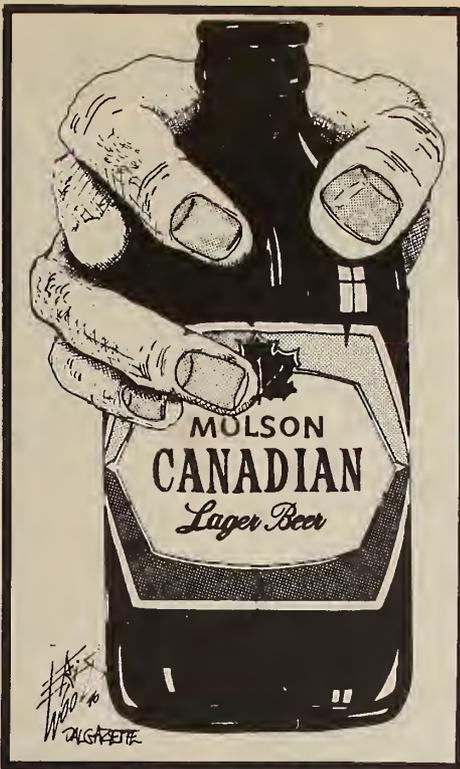

However, based on the data supplied by the WCB in Quebec City, it is possible to conclude that workers in the furniture industry are about three times more likely to suffer accidents than the average worker in the province.

Molson's PR people can rail about the "politically motivated" union leadership at Vilas and attempt "red scare" tactics all they want. The fact is that every labour organization in Quebec, if not in Canada, has gone on record as being opposed to incentive pay systems.

A spokesperson for the 2 million-member Canadian Labour Congress stated in a telephone interview that the CLC strongly opposed incentive systems, calling it a "throwback to 19th century sweat-shop conditions".

Molson's explanation of the incentive system is contained in the rejoinder: "The incentive system essentially rewards workers for their efforts expended, according to a pace which they establish themselves, in the context of a system which reduces the need for continual supervision."

But the incentive system is well described as one which "reduces the need for continual supervision." Indeed, this is the essence of the system. The "boss" doesn't have to check periodically to make sure people aren't slacking off. The pay system does the "bosses" work automatically and is omnipresent each working minute of the day.

At present there are 6 other strikes in progress in Quebec over the incentives issue. And, according to CNTU officials in Montreal, the union movement in Quebec is committed to actively supporting every worker's struggle where incentive pay schemes are under attack.

The Vilas struggle is very important, however, because a victory for labour there would set a precedent which would force other furniture manufacturers and other industries to abolish the incentive system. As one union official put it, "workers have always dreamed of abolishing incentive programs, but only recently has it become realistic to actively struggle for this goal."

What can students do? We can boycott Molson products individually by refusing to buy them, and collectively by refusing to stock them in student unions, student pubs, and at student organized functions. And, through our own media and outside media contacts, we can bring the message to others, particularly to trade unionists in our communities.

Blues silence critics,

By JONATHAN GROSS
and JOHN ROBB

It was one helluva weekend. The Blues came up with the wins when they had to and captured their eighth CIAU hockey title. Before a bipartisan crowd of more than 3,500 the champs hammered the Guelph Gryphons 7-2 in a nationally televised Sunday matinee.

How the Blues won the tourney is a long story that reads somewhat like Dostoevsky. Battling as many sour-graped critics as hockey players the Blues came back from a 3-4 overtime loss to Calgary Friday night to down top-dog Concordia 3-2 Saturday afternoon in the best game of the weekend, another extra inning affair.

The Concordia brawl was the true final of the weekend as the Stingers came into the weekend as top seeded favorites. Toronto Coach Tom Watt knew that to win it the Blues would have to shoot it out with the Stingers sooner or later.

Not only would Watt have to face the players but also the large-mouthed mentor of the Quebec champs, Bob Arseneault. Arseneault and other coaches protested U of T's presence as host team. The CIAU introduced this amendment to boost the gate and although the move was a success the losing coaches passed an unofficial vote of nonconfidence.

Friday was not a lot of fun. The party began with a one-sided Guelph-Concordia match. Not only was this reporter disgusted by the homicidal tendencies of the combatants but was also annoyed by a group of Concordia alumni. The Stingers took the match handily 5-2, demonstrating they were "powers that be".

When Dave Hulme skated out to play against the powerful Calgary Bronco Burgers everyone was buzzing with speculation. Was Watt throwing the game? Was he jockeying for position? The answers can be described in one word — no.

It's hard for a goalie to play three games in three nights, and Hulme was fairly hot. So why not? But the Blues gambled and lost. Not only was Hulme not his best but the defense was suffering from a serious case of "opening night jitters".

Led by the only veteran on the squad, Charlie Hughes, the blueliners made a couple of serious blunders en route to the loss. There were some bright spots however, as Albie Shames came up with a super effort as a replacement for the injured Rocci Pagnello. Shames is a former Blue who curtailed his athletic endeavours a couple of years ago in favor of school work.

But Albie stayed in shape and it was amazing to see him fit right in on Charlie's left side.

Another pleasant surprise in this game and throughout the series was the play of Paul Sawyer. Benched in February for a lack of production, "Buzzy" was returned as a member in good standing to the line of Bill Field and Graham Wise. Sawyer assisted on a pretty goal by Wise and the big fella pestered the Dodos all night.

The Blues led 2-1 at the end of the first on Wise's tally. Kent Ruhnke opened the scoring with number 50 on a nice bit of second effort. Ruhnke had two that night and was to go on to become the tourney's MVP although many Blues played as well.

The second act was tragic for Toronto as Calgary tallied three times, the last coming on a rather weak shot by Rick Hindmarch that passed through Hulme's legs like crystal Drano through your pipes.

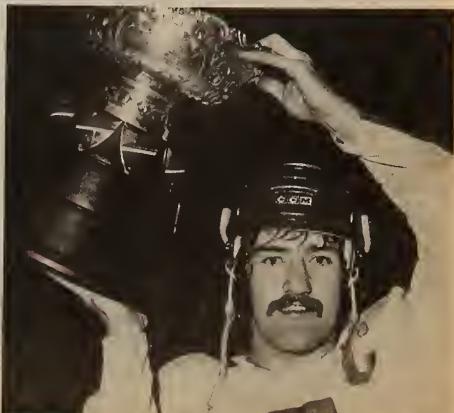

U of T fought in the third period to tie the overrated, underplayed contest. The game went into overtime and was concluded rather rudely when Wayne Morrissey, a rookie in his first national championship, cleared the puck to the CWUAA's leading scorer, Ron Gerlitz. Gerlitz made no mistake, rifling the disc into the far corner of the net.

Kapitan Kent was heard to yell in the dressing room. "We're going to win this (explicative deleted) tournament." High noon would be Saturday at 2 pm. The Blues would have to ambush Concordia if they were going to win the (explicative deleted) tourney. They had run out of "free rides".

The Blues were heavy underdogs when they faced the Concordia Stingers. The simple fact is this — Concordia had more talent. A case and point would be Randy Mohns. Marlie gurner Cary Farelli mentioned to this scribe a couple of weeks ago that Mohns is his cousin and would be here for the finals. He is the best skater on the team but is not even mentioned in the mounds of publicity Concordia forced on the press.

Farelli's cousin opened the scoring by deflecting a Bob Lagarde slapshot early in the game. It was a power play goal that started when someone was sent to the penalty box for Mark Logan, convicted of interference. The period ended at this score as the Blues were outskated and out hustled. The bright spot was Logan's goaltending and "Mark the Spark" would go on to have his best game of the year, coming into his own as the long sought replacement for former Toronto greats, Gary Inness and Bruce Durno.

Mike Relihan found this out in the second period as he was stopped point blank in front of the net. Relihan is another impressive Stinger who doesn't grab much ink. The game continued in a brutal fashion as Albie Shames was knocked unconscious, ending the night for him. Fortunately for Watt, injured Blues' star Rocci Pagnello was dressed and the bearded wonder played a great game even though he was still the owner of a very down Guelph for title

sore shoulder.

As mentioned previously the Herridge line played well all weekend and their hard work tied the contest as Frank Davis took a pass from Herridge and backhanded it behind All-Canadian goalie Jim Corsi. Paul Sawyer put the Blues ahead just seconds later and U of T had it made in the shade, or so they thought.

Down by a puck, Concordia sought to even things out by folding, spindling and mutilating the Blues. Mike Hannan was cut badly by some wayward lumber courtesy of Stinger star Dave Wilson. The two then squared off in a main event that netted the two gladiators five minutes each. Normally they would both have been shown to the nearest exit, but for the championship tourney, the rule was replaced by a "five for fighting" judgement. In any case the period ended with Toronto up 2-1.

The third period was another barn burner as Corsi's theatrics got him top billing. The Concordia goalie has an "electric glove" that is never passed. Stinger swinger Glen Tomalty tied the match up with 6:24 elapsed in the stanza. Both teams could have ended it but neither goalie would be party to their efforts.

The Blues are not a good overtime bet after losing in the QUAA semifinals to Guelph in extra innings. This defeat, compounded with Friday's debacle, had everyone feeling that the season would end that night.

At the beginning of the extra session, Concordia pressured Varsity until the Herridge-Harris-Davis connection came on to break the stranglehold. The Blues outplayed the Stingers after that obtaining several scoring chances. But Logan was not left alone. He was hard pressed to stop Ken Sinclair on a breakaway.

John Precious put the 500 Stinger groupies out of their misery when he tipped in a loose puck at 10:09 of the overtime frame. Ruhnke had dug the puck off the boards to feed Larry Hopkins, who let a quick shot go at the short side. Corsi stopped it but lost sight of the disc as it slipped behind his pads into the crease. The referee was in full view and didn't blow his whistle. Johnny on the Spot tucked it in and the crowd went bananas.

After the win Watt was pensive, "I don't know if we could have taken a third overtime loss. What could I have told them (the team)?"

Special mention should go to the resurrected defense that played with a religious fervor that only Tom Watt could bring out. John Bays was all over the ice and Morrissey more than made up for Friday night. This would be the true final as Guelph was no match for the fired up Varsity squad.

The Concordia game was the "real" final because Guelph and Calgary were only a fraction as tough as the Stingers. The only disappointed people in the arena were the 500 groupies who schlepped all the way from Montreal just to see the QUAA champs eliminated in the semis.

The show was played that evening before a rather miniscule crowd of bizzaros that witnessed another upset by the Gryphons, this one ending in a 4-2 decision. Kim Miles played well for Guelph picking up a pair of goals for a good cause.

The stage was now set for the final. It would be an anti-climactic meeting, somewhat less exciting than Saturday's heroics. This would be a disappointment to the CBC who rigged up a few cameras and a play by play duo of somewhat dubious quality to broadcast the final nationwide.

The Blues fans were not upset because they saw the champs come up with a solid team effort to pound the much-deserving Gryphons into the ground. Boasting a defense that looks and behaves like the Hell's Angels Glee Club, Guelph could put together very little offense.

Toronto went ahead in the first on goals by Sawyer and Precious. It was "Wham Bam Thank-you M'am" early in the second as Guelph scored two goals either 12 seconds to tie it up but Larry Hopkins regained the lead for the Blues just twenty seconds later, aided by one of Ruhnke's three assists.

Some mention must be given to the fourth line of Bob Adoranti, Guido Mazza and Mike Hannan. These three played with reckless abandon when called upon and their efforts resulted in two goals, accredited to Adoranti and Hannan. The scoring was ended by Doug Herridge and John Precious as the Blues avenged their loss to Guelph in the QUAA finals.

The dressing room was a joyous place. Kent Ruhnke banded the game puck to Watt and Bill Fifield, a retiring veteran of five years, hugged the coach saying, "You're one (expletive deleted) of a guy." He sure is.

Quality not quantity in Ladies' interfac meet

To be or not to be, that was the question last Wednesday, March 3rd, when the interfaculty women's fencing tourney had to be postponed due to general confusion and the fact that there were more administrators than fencers present (2:1). However, with limitless hope and fervor, another tourney was arranged for the 10th of March from 7 to 9 p.m.

The very informal atmosphere attracted four administrators (Toronto team members, Marcia Ryan, Alice Chan, Penny Blake and Elle-Mai Laikve), and five enthusiastic competitors to fight an individual's round robin. To the surprise of all present, one brave spectator, Jim Scarrow also came to the event, with the pretense of spectating, but it was believed by most present, that his intentions may have laid elsewhere. He added spirit to the entire affair, promising to kick those who lost and consume all consumables if no-one else wanted them.

The results of the tourney were as follows: Debbie Gonsalves of Victoria 1, came in first place, followed by Gail Shearer of Pharmacy II, Veronica Lam of SMC III, took third place, followed by Lee-Ann Tummon of Victoria II in fourth place, and Leslie Shinoby of Trinity I in fifth place. There was no doubt in anyone's mind that this competition stressed quality, not quantity. The tourney was friendly, yet competitive (despite what anyone there tells you) and it was obvious that these young ladies understood the aesthetic value of participating in a sport for the sake of sport.

On behalf of the fencing curator, and the University of Toronto, we can only be proud of these fine individuals and their special abilities. Perhaps a greater sector of the female population will follow this fine example and participate in next fall's interfaculty fencing tournament. See you there?

Ski Blues find Hotdog Heaven

The Varsity men's and women's alpine ski teams finished as best Canadians at an invitational meet involving top eastern Canadian teams and New England college teams. The meet, held at Owl's Head Ski Area in Quebec, was co-hosted by U of T Alumni and Molson's Breweries.

Leading the women's team was Andrea Esson individual champion at the competition with a first in Giant Slalom (GS) and fourth in the slalom. Cindy Rogers was sixth in the combined event.

The rest of "Hollywood Don's" girls came in with times sufficient to place the team second in the GS and fourth in the Slalom for a third place finish overall.

The men's team showed why they are OAAA champions as they left other Canadian teams far behind in the GS and Slalom. Graham Hess, Mark Bell, Mike Bulgar, and Al Safra finished tenth, fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth respectively. There were 110 competitors overall. The team, however, finished third behind two "stacked" American teams.

Not to be outdone, Graham Hess came up with a superlative effort in the Slalom, finishing second. Following him were Bell, sixth, Safra tenth and Grant Wilson (somewhere back there).

The team managed third in team standings six seconds behind the best leaders. Had Bulgar or Rod Behan finished, or had Wilson laid off the Safrata tenth and Grant Wilson managed an easy win. Maybe next year?

Hart House squashes

By MITCH STAMBLER

Interclub Level "D" play dominated the Hart House squash courts Thursday night as league the leading Hart House "D" team took on the visiting fourth place Valhalla Squash Club in their first and only meeting of the season.

In a locker room interview before court time, the Valhalla players, former graduates of U of T, viewed themselves as "beer drinkers but diehard squash players".

Valhalla came to U of T looking for a victory and some fourth place security. The team couldn't buy lunch however as Hart House became "the Hall of the Slain" (Valhalla translated). U of T captured all five matches to lock up a playoff berth.

Postgame comments varied. Valhalla refugees commented: "We tried to hit our opponents with our racquets but we kept missing." Would you believe "We were playing under protest." A U of T spokesman commented on the prowess of a gifted team member: "Zvonko Vranesic, a Canadian Chess master, was always three moves ahead." Profound, isn't it. Valhalla captain Joe Gates wasn't quite as metaphorical, "We was wiped . . . but the (Arbor Room) beer glasses aren't bad."

Although it is doubtful whether Hashim Khan puts as much emphasis on beer, the two teams provided some great squash action.

Philadelphia freedom

The weekend of Feb. 27-29 saw the U of T boxing team compete in the Eastern Collegiate Boxing Association Championships held at West Chester State College near Philadelphia Pa. with over 15 colleges and Universities in attendance and over 75 boxers entered. The tournament was one of the largest in the United States.

Toronto had seven fighters classified by weight from 118 lbs to heavyweight.

Jason Lo (118) received a bye in the finals as there were only two competitors, but was defeated in a close bout by a more experienced hometown boxer.

Tim Smith (147) dropped a split decision in a very exciting contest while Tom DeWolf (156) was beaten in a first round TKO by Mike Benelli, a senior from Penn State University. Benelli went on to win his division and an award for being the most outstanding boxer of the tournament.

Joe Difonzo (172) fared well against last year's champ, Joe Gery but lost another close decision.

It was discovered after the match that Gery had broken his hand fighting Difonzo. He was unable to continue.

Ralph Jansen (180), one of Toronto's hopefuls for the coming years gained a lot of experience, but lost a narrow decision to a boxer from South Carolina.

Unfortunately, because of illness, Gary Davidson was unable to compete in the heavy weight class.

Paul Ross (132) a freshman to the U of T Boxing team, fared very well. In his first bout, Ross won a unanimous decision over one of West Chester State's hopefuls.

In the final, Ross was aggressive and displayed his Irish determination to clearly outpoint his opponent from Temple University. However the decision went against him with the judges apparently split on the outcome.

The year has shown signs of a great future ahead for the boxing team. Interest and participation has increased steadily. The top coaching and leadership of Tony Canzuno has impressed the finer points of boxing upon his pupils and the spectators. Canzuno has also made his presence felt with the US boxing authorities.

John Raftery is up for a part in the remake of 'Body and Soul'.

John Raftery is "too good"

By JONATHAN CROSS

Don't be fooled by those friendly eyes. John Raftery is no sweetheart when he's in the ring. Raftery is a freshman in arts who combines boxing with books and will be seeking his fourth Ontario title in the Provincial Boxing Championships to be held this weekend at Ryerson.

John had a couple of dilemmas this season. His first problem was making the Varsity Boxing squad. He didn't. The man is "too experienced for University boxing". Consequently he did not compete with the team this season although he trained with them.

His second problem was getting to Montreal this summer. Raftery is only 19 and the Olympic Committee requires an age of twenty. The number two light welterweight in Canada will reach the plateau in December. John wants to keep training however, while looking forward to the 1978 commonwealth games and the 1980 Olympiad.

The Ontario Winter Games were held in February and the kid from Elliot Lake took the Gold Medal. With all these triumphs you'd think Raftery would be gunning for a career on closed circuit TV but he isn't, coming from an amateur boxing family.

That's right. John has three younger brothers that he handles, acting as a somewhat smaller version of Angelo Dundee. One is an Ontario Champ while the other two are northern Ontario Klingspins.

The Ontario Amateur Champ joined up with the Cabbagetown Boxing Club after coming to our fair city. He boxes a great deal but doesn't show any of the sport's ill effects in his facial structure. He is as clean as All. Not only does Raftery try to emulate the "Louisville Lip" but he also admires Light Heavyweight John Conteh. Raftery uses his left a great deal and if you happen to be downtown this weekend go and see it. He is fun to watch.

This is for all you Leaf fans. Raftery recently took a decision over Morgan Williams, the Tiger's brother. Preliminaries are Saturday afternoon with finals Saturday night and the Senior finals on Sunday. It will not cost as much as the "Thrilla in Manila."

Thousands protest wage controls

By LEA RYAN

Thousands of organized workers marched on Parliament Hill on Monday to denounce Bill C-73, the Trudeau government's wage controls. The demonstration, largest ever held on Parliament Hill, was organized by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Estimates of the crowd ranged from 15,000 to 30,000.

Delegation after delegation of workers and supporters swamped the area in front of Parliament Hill for several hours, shouting slogans and singing. One song, in French, told Trudeau to "mangez le merde". Another slogan emphasized the necessity of defeating the government. Yet another called to "Make the rich pay". Total opposition to the government was reflected throughout the demonstration.

The demonstrators came from all sections of the labour movement, from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, including auto workers, CUPE workers, and secondary school teachers. Marching and shouting in front of the Parliament, the demonstration showed the spirit of resistance to the wage controls as an attack on the working class.

A large student contingent came from Quebec, represented by the Association Nationale d'Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ), as well as delegations from various CEGEP's. Ontario students came from Kitchener-Waterloo, as well as from U of T and Ryerson.

FEUT remains in Door

By BOB COLLIER

The Faculty of Education has modified its application procedures in response to the angry demands of faculty and students.

Last night, FEUT Dean John Ricker announced the faculty will continue to accept applications until the original deadline of April 1, 1976. This year they had moved the deadline ahead to mid-January because they were deluged by so many requests for admission.

However they will continue to admit students on a first-come-first-serve basis and they will refuse to admit any candidate who used an application form issued to another student even though nowhere in the FEUT literature does it state that forms are not transferable.

Historically, Dean Ricker explained, FEUT has been able to accept almost all qualified students. For the last few years, they have received 5,000 applications for the 1,750 places. About half of the applicants change their mind and don't send in their deposit after acceptance and another 25 per cent don't show in September.

This year, the FEUT admissions office expected more applications than usual so FEUT gave preference to fourth year students. They gave them a two month headstart on third year graduates by allowing them to pick up application forms in November.

In addition, they added a qualifying clause in their Information Bulletin which stated that the deadline was to be the date when "sufficient deposited applications have been received."

They received 3,000 more queries than they expected, ran out of forms in January and invoked the flexible deadline.

Their procedures in the past have not required an assessment of the students' merits and, this year, they saw no reason to change.

Dean Ricker added that there wasn't any method by which he could judge the capabilities of a potential teacher.

The high proportion of students who change their mind after acceptance is a major headache, according to Ricker. The faculty has noted that early applicants don't change their mind as often as the others, and so, first-come-first-serve.

Associate Dean London refused to accept applicants unless they applied on the forms mailed out to them personally by the faculty. Many students decided not to apply after asking for applications and have been giving them to friends. They wrote in their own name and applied, oblivious to the fact that they were being disqualified.

FEUT numbered all the applications as they were mailed out, and if the name of the applicant doesn't correspond to the name on the masterlist, they intend to disqualify the candidate. This rule was invented last Wednesday. It is not included in any of the faculty literature.

Fong protesters fail to show up

By ERIC McMILLAN

Protesters who forced early adjournment of a Governing Council meeting last week did not show up at the reconvened Council on Monday.

Their chants of "Reinstate Henry Fong" had brought last Thursday's meeting to a halt after Council refused to appoint a special committee to investigate the Fong case.

Fong is the only student ever to be forcibly withdrawn from the final year of study in the Faculty of Medicine. In an unsuccessful appeal in January his counsel had charged a "climate of racism" in the faculty led to the removal.

Three speakers, including Fong himself, addressed Council last Thursday to ask that its Academic Appeals committee be overruled and Fong reinstated.

Fong's former counsel Peter Rosenthal claimed, "There are people graduating from this medical school that no one would say are competent... but Henry Fong is not one of these."

He described Fong as "quiet, with a stutter" and discriminated against because of an attitude in the faculty that "Chinese students can't communicate with patients."

Fong followed with a forceful, unhesitant speech which demanded "an unprejudiced attempt at the fourth medical year."

Fong was forced to withdraw two years in a row but cited examples of other students allowed to repeat their fourth year three times. He pointed out that even after graduation he would have to pass nation-wide exams and perform adequately as an intern before qualifying as a doctor.

A motion by Council member Seymour Kanowitch to appoint an investigative committee was defeated 23 to 5.

A dozen demonstrators shouted "Reinstate Henry Fong" and carried placards in a circle around the Council tables, forcing a fifteen minute adjournment. President John Evans made a last ditch attempt to persuade Fong the obstruction of the meeting would be fruitless.

When the demonstrators refused to leave the chamber and allow Council to recommence, the chairman moved that the meeting be adjourned until Monday.

During the debate of his motion, Kanowitch had argued the affair had done "irreparable damage" to relations between the university and the ethnic community. Professor Maurice Lister and Jonathan Gentry also defended the motion on the grounds that only an external investigation could make a decision likely to be trusted by the community.

Students walk out at SGS council

Student representatives on the Graduate School Council walked out of a council meeting yesterday in an attempt to force lack of quorum and prevent passage of a motion forcing graduate students to complete all course work by the time the course ends.

School of Graduate Studies Dean Ed Safarian consequently denounced what he termed "a manoeuvre so deliberate" and refused to believe the council required a quorum. As chairman of the meeting he subsequently ruled a motion of lack of quorum by Drama instructor Wayne Folks out of order.

Despite the uncertainty of whether a quorum was required, the motion was passed.

As part of a report containing proposals relating to graduate courses, the motion read "When a student has not completed all work required in a course by the deadlines for mark submission, the instructor must submit a grade of 'INC' (incomplete) for the course. If the work is not completed and a revised grade submitted by the dates following, the 'INC' notation will remain permanently on the student's transcript."

The dates for completion are listed as March 11 for first term courses, July 8 for full and second term courses and November 11 for summer session courses.

Graduate students in many departments have traditionally enjoyed flexible deadlines according to the course instructor for the completion of course material.

GSU president Barb Cameron compared receiving an incomplete to receiving a failing grade. Dean Smith said he "couldn't answer what this would mean in terms of grade point average. Grade point is of no concern to the school."

Cameron then pointed out students would be penalized by the new proposals unless a distinction was made in terms of figuring out the average: "There is no point in having an incomplete if it simply means a failure," she added.

Cameron inquired "Why does the calendar have provisions for averaging when this doesn't exist?" On a query by Safarian, Smith replied "I have often wondered why."

When the issue moved to a vote, Cameron tried to table the report, but was ruled out of order by Safarian. Student representatives then left the meeting.

Student objections to the new deadline were outlined in a position paper by John McCumber, Executive Committee member of the Graduate Philosophy Student Union.

McCumber's report states "The proposals to advance the deadlines for grades to be submitted in graduate courses, leaving no power in the Departments to alter or extend those deadlines, will undermine the general academic excellence of the University of Toronto and will discriminate against some departments, subjects, and students."

"There is currently no standardization in these matters, and the result is that departments which have emphasized course work, and in particular have relied on essays showing thorough background knowledge of the subject-matter along with careful thought, will be more heavily affected than others."

U of T Act: No change

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

Amendments to the University of Toronto Act promising an increase in Governing Council student representation will not be discussed this session by the Ontario Legislature, although the government has had eighteen months to act.

The Government Council's review of the Act, in which they proposed an increase to 11 student representatives from the present eight, and an increase to 13 faculty members from the present twelve, was presented to the government on October, 1974. Government officials indicated then that action on it would be taken soon.

This month, however, Governing Council Chairman Malim Harding received a letter from Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott in which Parrott indicated no action on the review would be taken this session.

As well as postponing any change in Governing Council structure, the delay also gives SAC additional time in which to pressure for its demand of student-faculty parity.

Last spring SAC called for parity representation to establish "a significant voice in the formulation of policies which directly affect them." The brief was endorsed and presented by most student representative bodies.

With the expected delay SAC now has a renewed opportunity to lobby MPP's, which it had done with some success earlier among opposition parties in the legislature.

Varsity board seeks director

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications for a position on the Board, to be appointed by the 14 incumbent Directors for a two-year term beginning July 1, 1976.

The Board represents the various estates in the University community and is responsible for the editorial integrity and the financial and business management of the Varsity.

Written applications should be addressed to Audrey Hozack, Chairman, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St., Toronto M5S 2E8. Applicants will be interviewed and a selection made at the Board's annual meeting tonight.

Deadline for applications is 5 p.m. today.

Applications for desks tomorrow

Today is the last chance for all interested to become editors for next year's Varsity. Eric McMILLAN has been chosen Editor-in-Chief, but there are six desk positions to be filled. Features, Layout, Review, Sports, News, City and Photos desks all need filling.

Applicants for the jobs must have submissions, including a small resume, in the editor's office before 5 p.m. today. Elections for the positions take place Thursday at 2 p.m. until all the positions are filled.

All staffers on the voters list for Editor-in-Chief are eligible to vote in the desk elections.

Staffers, also keep in mind the giant Varsity banquet and party finishing off the year. The fest is slated for Innis College, Thursday, April 1. All fools welcome.

Con U has better idea

MONTREAL (CUP) — Under the guidance of Clyde Kwok, the director of the Ford Control Center and a full-time mechanical engineering professor at Concordia University, a futuristic car known as the Concordia I is being built.

The Concordia I has a metallic silver fiberglass body with large sweeping windows and is capable of hitting speeds of 140 to 150 miles per hour.

The doors are hinged at the front bumper and lift up vertically while the whole steering system swings out of the way allowing the driver to almost walk into the seat.

Instruments like oil pressure and temperature gauges are located in the centre of the wheel but remain stationary when the wheel turns.

The parking brake is operated by a single button between the seats. The windshield is cleaned by a single wiper and the pedals can be moved to adjust to the driver's height.

The headlights are covered by slates which are closed when the lights are not in use.

Among the most unique features of the car is the suspension system invented by Norbert Hamy, an industrial designer. It allows the car to lean into a curve rather than away from it.

The car was designed last year. A model, one quarter the size of the actual one, was built first. It was studied and the concept was finalized. A life-sized one was built out of wood and was displayed at various auto shows.

The real Concordia I is being built in stages in a shop in Montreal. When completed, the car will go on 76, by Dr. Edward Ragar, former member of the New York City Council. Hart House, Debates Room, sponsored by IFA and CARF. All are welcomed. 867-9594 or 860-0199.

Legal battle hinted with essay banks

While most students worry about cutbacks in educational spending, the Governing Council has decided to dip into the till to take legal action against essay banks.

The council voted Monday to take action against the companies if its highly paid legal firm Cassels-Brock can find any basis for it.

The university will also lobby the provincial government for legislation to prevent the companies from operating.

The steps were proposed by a working group on plagiarism which was set up by the academic affairs committee. The working group made a broad outline of other action which could be taken to beef up efforts to thwart the pirate essays business.

The academic discipline code already makes the use of the pirate essays illegal with penalties up to expulsion for their use. The regulations also deal with other forms of plagiarism.

The working group recommended that teaching staff make more efforts to prevent plagiarism including increased personal contact with students, avoiding stereotyping assignments, talking to students about the ethics of plagiarism, in class essay assignments, use of seminars for evaluation.

The report also recommends the end of using a single piece of work for an entire mark and examinations in all courses counting at least one third of the mark, with exemptions for courses which have close personal contact.

Also recommended are more stringent enforcement of the academic discipline code, wide circulation of guides to plagiarism, and consideration of possible university wide English testing for all first year students to counter lack of writing skills.

However, the most strenuous effort will probably be the battle against the term paper companies which have aroused a strong hatred among faculty members.

Academic affairs chairman Bill Dunphy said "we are looking for anything we can do to cut off the companies and make it possible for them to serve students at the University of Toronto."

However, taken along with the tone of other recommendations it would appear that the committee's proposals are a response to the growing backlash against the reforms of the past few years. The calls for tougher grading practices and an increased emphasis on exams seem to follow the conservative laments about declining academic standards over the last few years.

Everything but Triffids

Everything under the sun — a blaze of tulips, daffodils and delicately coloured crocuses, plus a banana tree, orchids and a maze of prickly cacti... they're all at the Botany flower show and they're all in bloom.

The three staff horticulturists have worked for months to prepare the hundreds of plants which are on display in the botany greenhouse.

Photographers are busy clicking, gardeners are eagerly asking for advice, and cooks are studying ways to grow fennel in apartment windows. And, of course, little kids are horrifying their frightened mothers every time they stick their little fingers into the delicate orchids. You've got until Friday.

As the campus turns

Apathy won the Governing Council elections. Only a little more than ten per cent of full time undergraduates bothered to vote.

UO student John Burnes, a Young Progressive Conservative led the undergrad race with 1,405 votes. He will be joined by Scarborough student Bob Gardner who totaled 1,171 defeating Varsity photo editor Brian Pel for the final slot by 200 votes.

In the professional faculties SAC finance commissioner Michael Treacy defeated two other engineers to join med student John Floras who was acclaimed. The count was Treacy 524, Auger 400, Hajdukiewicz 95.

In the part-time student race both Jon Gentry with 577 votes and Felix Salazar with 508 votes were re-elected. They were followed by Mary Cretsi (384), Sandy Nimmo (380), Joe Renda (270), Irene Allison (50).

Graduate Students didn't even have a vote because Phyllis Jensen and David Vaskevitch were acclaimed.

Administrative staffer Gwyneth Bishop defeated three rivals for one of the two administrative staff seats on council. She had 509 votes to beat Edward Beaven (211), Ron Raw (311) and Ernie Reid (453).

Teaching staff members were all acclaimed. They will be P. Salus, J. H. Meakin, R. Baxter and H. Auster.

There were a total of 6,028 ballots cast in the election in all constituencies.

Students fearing imminent chaos because of the lack of a timetable in next year's arts and science calendar can relax.

In its zealous pursuit of the people's right to know The Varsity muckraking desk failed to anticipate the almost simultaneous publication of a registration enrollment handbook and timetable, published in newspaper form.

Our usually infallible sources deep within the U of T administration failed to inform us of this important fact.

So everybody can ignore our front page scoop last week. We apologize for any confusion the story created.

Just before ending his term, St. Michael's College Student Union president Chris Driscoll had his wrists slapped in the form of a motion to censure by the SMC Student Senate.

Five items were cited in the censure motion, among them Driscoll's recent compromise with the Arts and Sciences Students Union over their fee increase for the next school year.

Senators felt that Driscoll had carried on the negotiations with ASSU without consulting the Senate members but were not necessarily opposed to the existence of ASSU.

Driscoll's successor, Fred Schwing, was also named in the censure motion. Driscoll's vice-president, Ellen Kass, threatened to resign if the motion did not pass. It did, 9-4.

Anxious Input awaits buss or butt with baited breath

By ANN SILVERSIDES

Input Radio, based at U of T with a significant representation from the university on its board of directors, may be granted an FM license from the Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC) as soon as the end of the month, says SAC communications commissioner John Tuzyk.

Input made its application in September and appeared before the CRTC in mid January of this year. On Monday, March 10th, it was announced that, pending their licensing, Wintario will donate $80,500 to the station for renovations and capital expenditures.

What is Input radio, how will it be financed and what are U of T students contributing to it?

Input radio has applied for a community access license from the CRTC to operate on FM band 97.3. It is incorporated as a non-profit organization with charitable tax status — which means any surplus of revenue over operating costs and salaries will be put back into the station.

If Input gets a license, it will operate on a restricted commercial basis, which means brands and prices will not be named in station advertising.

The proposed program format, Tuzyk says, will involve approximately one third programming of university affairs, one third community access broadcasting and one third of programming generated from the station. The station initiated programming will also be community and university-subject matter, says Paul Soni, who assisted with the application, but it will be controlled by the station.

Music, with approximately 40 per cent Canadian content, and news will also be part of the programming. Soni says Input will have a wire service but most of the news will be local.

Plans are to have 12 full time and three part-time paid staff. Positions include station manager, program director, music director, community access coordinator, advertising manager etc. Beyond that, volunteers will be relied on to generate programs.

Soni says although Input has not yet "gone public" he has a list of 130 volunteers, 80 U of T students and 50 community members.

Input plans to establish a training program for volunteers to learn the basics of broadcasting and Soni says he has approached a number of professionals who are willing to donate their time to such a training program.

The kind of programming input plans is similar in many ways to what is already being done by Co-op radio in Vancouver, Wired World in Kitchener and Centreville radio in Montreal. The main difference says Soni, is that Input will have a core of professionals running the station so that the quality of broadcasting will be consistent.

Input differs significantly from CKCU FM, a "student FM" station recently licensed at Carleton University, because it is incorporated separately from the Student's Council. Although SAC plans to contribute significantly to the station and SAC will appoint 10 of the 33 positions on the board of directors, SAC will not be legally liable for the station in the event of lawsuits etc.

Input will most likely operate out of the previous location of Radio Varsity, 91 St. George Street, says Tuzyk.

The Varsity—Bob White

Radio mgnate Tuzyk ponders the brief

Manufacturers Life has offered a site on the top of their building on Bloor Street for a transmitter at the nominal charge of $2 a year. CHUM FM has promised to donate its transmitter to Input if Input is granted its license.

SAC INVOLVEMENT:

Last March the 74-75 SAC set up a board of directors to investigate, over the summer, the viability of an FM station operating out of U of T. It was to report back in the fall.

This fall, SAC decided that such a project was feasible and it provided $12,500 for pre-operating costs. This sum was matched by donations from other groups and has been put towards preparing the application and paying the salaries of a secretary and station manager, consulting and legal fees and office expenses.

If Input is granted an FM license, plans are that SAC will loan the station $70,000 interest free for capital costs, says Tuzyk. What this means is that SAC will buy studio equipment and Input will buy it back over a period of years.

The plans are also that SAC will grant the station $50,000 for operating costs in its first year. The sum will diminish in subsequent years.

The total projected operating costs for Input's first year are $175,000, of which approximately $122,000 will go towards salaries. The projected source of income is $40,000 from national advertising, $15,000 from local advertising, $15,000 from corporate donations (Xerox and Shell are among those who have already promised money if the station is licensed), $45,000 from subscriptions (the main source of income for Co-op radio in Vancouver) $10,000 donations from community and campus groups and the $50,000 from SAC.

Since SAC's donation will diminish each year, Tuzyk estimates that SAC's contribution averages $40,000 over 3 years. He says that in previous years SAC spent close to $30,000 annually on Radio Varsity — the closed circuit university station.

THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS:

The 33 corporate members of the station, in addition to the 10 SAC members, will consist of 6 other campus representatives (GSU, APUS, etc.) 17 members from the community, six representatives from such groups as the Metro Tenants Association, Pensioners Concerned etc., and 11 other members to be chosen by the board. These 11, says Tuzyk, will include professionals (including engineers, an architect and lawyers who have, and will be volunteering their services to the station), a few corporate members (i.e. representatives of Xerox and Shell) and members from other segments of the community.

Tuzyk says that in light of the strong representation from the university and other parts of the community, he is confident that there is no possibility of the board of directors being dominated by a corporate voice.

Notes from the second floor

The provincial government has spent so much time restraining us that there seems to be little time for normal business, or for 18-month old business for that matter.

The proposed amendments to the University of Toronto Act have been sitting on a government shelf somewhere in Queen's Park for that length of time, and the government's superb job of procrastination has bugged for at least another year student plans for larger representation on the council.

The SAC position is that it'll go for parity between faculty and student representatives but it's willing to accept the 11-student, 13-faculty composition suggested in the amendments.

We understand that governments move slowly, especially with so many important things to do, but 18 months is a long time for any group of people to sit and wait. Already this stall has cost students two years of less-than-adequate representation, and may cause problems next year.

SAC hacks have been busily lobbying the opposition parties on the subject and feel that they could win the parity composition if it comes to a vote. That's probably why the government is stalling. With all the other problems with which Davis is plagued, it would be pretty disheartening to lose a government over such a small piece of legislation.

So it remains. The government has promised that the bill will not be reviewed in the next session. At present we have eight seats on the Governing Council. The byword should be parity or bust, sometime before 1984.

a slight change in their service. This time it will be "expert editing service", "reference help", or any number of similar things. They're hard to beat, if you wanted to expend any effort in the first place.

There's no reason why the university should. Like death, taxes and top-30 music, these fast-bucks will always be with us. If the university would expend as much effort clearing up academic fraud among the faculty or attempting to treat the problems that force people to buy tailor-mades, it would be money better spent.

Chances are that there is no law on the books nor is there one they could cook up that can put these people out of business. It's been tried before, and the only result is to pad the pockets of equally fast-buck lawyers.

decision of "the best of a bad lot" in choosing a meal. Looking at it objectively, this sort of treatment shouldn't be tolerated. Students should not have to scrounge for good food. Certainly along with its plans for the Campus as Campus Centre the university could include two small outlets similar to Innis franchise using student help.

One thing that students should prevent from happening is to allow the corporate campdres at Simcoe Hall to award these outlets to one of the conglomerates such as Saga Foods. Your stomach is at stake here, and if you don't think that's important, you'd better rearrange your priorities.

If the university thinks it's in for an easy time when it comes to prosecuting essay banks, they're dismally mistaken. Some of the problems that The Varsity has had in politely telling these firms not to advertise are certainly going to come up when the university attempts, if it does, to prosecute the purveyors of bogus academia.

The university must understand that these people are in a sleazy business and they know it. The finer points of legality or morality, mean very little to them. They want to sell their papers and they've got a market. If the university steps in the wrong way, it will probably find itself the object of a few lawsuits for unfair restraint of trade, alienation of affection or something similar.

If the university presses charges against "essay banks", the entrepreneurs will be back next week with

Although it's not certain how the Innis Pub and GSU bar are holding themselves in the black, the past six months have proven that good, healthy, moderately-priced food can be found on this campus.

Sure there are people on campus who go for the mucky invitations to arterial sclerosis that are the normal agenda in campus eateries, but why should the entire campus be faced with the necessity of squeezing into one room to get the only decent meal on campus?

The Innis Pub, along with the GSU bar and cafeteria, have shown that it is possible to serve fresh, hot food in a friendly atmosphere. These are the only two spots where one doesn't have to make the usual election time is: am I willing to continue to live in the "guilt", and pretend that everything is alright? Am I going to allow my children to live in the "guilt" also? Most of us should at least try to understand that we can only fool some of the people sometimes, but we cannot fool all the people all the times. That is, whatever is in the dark, will inevitably be exposed to the light.

Most of our current problems are caused by our reluctance to grasp the local existing conditions. As people we should strive constantly not to become social evildoers and myth producers. Such attitudes can be overcome only if we strive to see more virtue in the human being, than in all other "earthly" things. Truth is what we should see most crucial to the continued existence of the human "Animal".

Students should remember that they have potentially the most creative minds in society, and should force themselves to find ways and means to help those who are less fortunate. There are many students who would like to do something concrete to help the less privileged in society, but existing conditions do not allow them to do so. Understanding this, the aim of many students is to get their degree, only to go and compete in the "rat race".

In any human group where money, or any other form of property is valued above human life, that society inevitably must decay. It unavoidably becomes decadent. That is the true nature of the law of corruption. Students can play the central role in helping to solve the countless man-made problems on earth.

This can be accomplished only when some or most people find ways of truly respecting themselves. In order to respect others, we've got to stop being hypocrites. Hypocrites are people who pretend to be something they are not when they are fooling only themselves. This can be seen clearly from looking at history for the last five hundred years.

Students, divorced from actual production in order to study, possess the highest quality and quantity of universal knowledge, past and present, and this should make it their duty to educate, whenever possible, those still prejudiced within society. We all know that there are many students who would like to do something altruistic but do not know the right way to accomplish their goal. Others even though they start to try to do something, are discouraged because of the massive continuity of frustration created by many "left escapists".

Most of these escapists are people who, in countless cases, having read a few books on Marx, Lenin, Trotsky, Stalin, Mao and other philosophers, run around shouting these philosophies as if they were religious doctrines. The general situation of most left escapists to do this is because it's the "in-thing", the style of the time. Such people are consumed by these ideologies, so much so, that they need exposure. This exposure is expressed in quarrels and fights with each other, simply to gain tactical superiority and recognition. This is exceedingly humiliating, since it's done by students who should know better.

In general, most people in our society haven't gotten rid of their hypocritical attitudes. As a result, conditions will remain the same until people decide to search for and to find their real selves. Some of us should remember that we cannot change what was or, for that matter, what is. We should not forget that all the industry of this civilization was initially built by taking other people for a ride—a very rough ride.

Many ideologies were used to conceal the guilty consciences of those men who turned their fellow man into slaves. Ideologies were used to justify the existence of keeping men subordinate to other men. This was the way they were twisted for the sole benefit of some men.

We are able now to see clearly why some people get so upset when they come in contact with the truth. The truth worries their consciences, because it constantly reminds them of their guilt. Most people don't want to feel guilty, because such a feeling is depressing.

Too many people try to suppress critical thinking in others, simply for their own selfish ends. There are many ignorant people going around telling others that they should not listen to such and such groups because those groups are not ideologically right. Things like these should never happen, simply, because they cloud critical thinking.

We can not afford to stifle critical thought, because even today we still don't know how the pyramids were built. We should remember that any civilization which represses critical thinking, if a hypocritical one, and sooner or later ceases to exist.

John Africa
Innis College

Why do some people get so upset when they come in contact with the truth? Some of the reasons are known, but some are not known to man. Human beings are very simple, yet very complex "Animals". There are some things which are known to this very intelligent animal, and there are also countless things which are thus far not yet known to him her, and it seems very unlikely that for the foreseeable future he will understand some of nature's complexities.

This article is in support of the one March 12, in The Varsity, concerning the disturbances at Innis College, on the night of the U.N.I.T.A. rally. Unlike many of these Leftist groups that believe that a "person's history should follow from his/her way of thinking", I accept the reverse definition, as many humanists do, that "a person's way of thinking should inevitably follow from his/her history." Therefore, what I am saying is that, a person's behavior should determine his her politics, and not a person's politics determining his/her behavior.

There are too many people nowadays who have been putting political philosophies in front of present realities. There are some who have taken the contradictions of the past, only to fling them at each other, not in order to understand their existing problems, but to achieve tactical superiority. In my view, all this stems from the corrupted environment we have been living in, but prefer to deny. Many people see the inequities around them, but prefer to say or do nothing about them for various reasons: Some people do not want to say anything, because they are afraid of being called names; others because they think their favorers will stop looking at them as mister mistress nice person; others are afraid of being prosecuted.

What many people should remember is that, if people in the east did not make tremendous sacrifices, they could not be living the way they are now. This is true, whatever way we want to look at it. What some people should ask themselves values on anyone." Competition of values and legitimization of these values in law and in societal practice is precisely what the political processes in a democracy are about. The statement, "Because you do not subscribe to capital punishment, I and others like me will not compel you personally to participate in capital punishment. But do not force your value beliefs on us and interfere with our individual right to practice capital punishment. We must have freedom of choice" is a grotesque distortion of the democratic ethic.

I suggest that more citizen interest and involvement in all institutions which service society will not only improve the efficiency and economy of these services, but will aid in creating a healthier democracy in Canada.

Abortion article lacks perspective

To The Editor:

The recent article "Obstruction of hospital abortions is charged" lacks a balanced perspective and is factually incorrect on some points. For example, the Scarborough General Hospital is not affiliated with the Catholic Church. Nor is the group which has taken an interest in Centenary Hospital, the Toronto Right to Life Association.

The small group, certainly not "well-financed", which has initiated a drive for membership in the Centenary Hospital Association is made up of concerned citizens and clients of Centenary Hospital who are responding to the hospital administrator's appeal for community support.

While interested in the abortion issue, these persons are also concerned with a range of other aspects of the hospital's operation. Generally, they consider Centenary a competently and efficiently run hospital but, still, one capable of improving its performance. The group believes in citizen involvement and are attempting to put their belief into action by soliciting memberships for the Hospital Association.

Ms. LeBourdais' attitude that her pressure group is the sole repository of the values of Canadian citizens and damning anyone who dares to oppose her shrill elite group, betrays a fundamental anti-democratic tendency. It certainly puts the lie to the oft repeated statement of advocates of her point of view that "they do not wish to impose their as very important. I call on the SAC, students who are involved in a political party, and individuals to apply pressure to all three parties, particularly the opposition, to delay the election so that the enumeration is after May 7. Two election hassles in one year is just too much!"

Varg worldview like "Camelot"

To The Editor:

In view of the clamour and confusion ensuing after the government's wage & price controls legislation, there is certainly need for some thoughtful analysis of the subject. Alas, none has been forthcoming (in anything I've read), and clamour and confusion continue to reign. Herewith, then, and though not supporting (in any way) the present government's position, I wish to explode some of the myths being exploited by the "other side," as in the Varsity's recent editorial "Ticked Off" (March 12).

First, it's easy to see why the editors are ticked off... they're being asked to restrain themselves from insatiable demands. Now, on the surface, I know, it appears they are fully "justified". Their case goes (in part) like this: "Here we are in our patched up blue-jeans while those mothers are f---g us dry!... Restrain, hell!... Why don't they practice what they preach?"

But to see a whole picture of things it is necessary to get below the surface. And here we discover that the sort of society the Varsity editors envisage is a kind of Camelot, where everybody is "equal"; nobody can be different, nobody can make a dollar more than anybody else, you can't treat one person differently from another (!) everybody has "equal rights" (Oh, where is George Orwell?) Now, though we're sure the Varsity staff (and some others...) will be extremely happy when they've brought this about, the fact remains that a lot of people won't, wouldn't, don't, and shouldn't! To be sure, the most confusing factor that enters the discussion is the question of "rights". The people are demanding their "rights". Just what these "rights" are has been the subject of endless debate, political and philosophical over many years, their legitimacy finally being enforced on us in the form of "Bills of Rights" (in the U.S., Constitutional Amendments). But the foundations of the myth crumble when it dawns on us that these "rights" are nothing more than wants, and, usually, immediate ones. Therefore, it is our "right" to have welfare... unemployment insurance... free education! (that's due for a revival, isn't it?). In short, it is our "right" to be supported by the Government. Now in a sense, they're right! after all, the Government does take a nice slice of our incomes every week, why shouldn't they support us? This, in fact, is the fall reasoning that these people indulge in. Unfortunately, that the law of diminishing returns has it otherwise.

These people (and the Varsity, for all its bluster) are incapable of seeing, for instance, that the reason there is a shortage of jobs is that the Government, to support its disastrous social programs, is (indeed has to!) taxing away any incentives for engendering new business and industry. Now, undoubtedly, this "cold" logic will be scoffed off the block by the likes of hard-headed economists as are employed at the Varsity.

You see (... no, you probably don't), it's a vicious circle. Never mind, keep up the scrap. You're doing a fine job!

Young PC's query NUS

To The Editor:

Since the recent NUS referendum failed to produce both a clear majority of affirmative votes and the necessary 25 per cent turnout, I strongly urge the SAC to decide against continued membership in NUS. Several points warrant attention.

1. Joining NUS provides no guarantee of avoiding cutbacks. Indeed activists' agitation will merely discredit serious students in the eyes of the public, and deprive us of potential support and consideration for positions, such as summer jobs.

2. The NUS dues, like the present SAC fees, would constitute a compulsory levy from all students attending this university. If both are so wonderful, why not give us a free choice in what we pay for?

SAC would do well to re-examine its position in the light of these.

Course critiques drawn hurriedly

To The Editor:

What's wrong with student course evaluation at the University of Toronto? In principle, nothing whatever. In practice, as it is practiced here at U. of T., I personally believe that it fails to serve the purpose for which it was originally intended.

Ideally, learning should be a constructive and creative process in which teacher and student function as a team working towards a commonly acknowledged goal. To this end I believe that student evaluation should take place in class time, openly, with professor and students participating, in such a way that goals and lines of responsibility may better be clarified.

As things stand at the moment, the evaluations are drawn up rather hurriedly in the absence of the professor and often in the absence of many of the students, therefore not representing a true consensus. In this way, derogatory evaluations, containing at times what may be irrelevant references to personalities amounting to little more than idle gossip, are sent to print without the professor in question ever having an opportunity to react or reply in any way before the evaluation has become a "fait accompli", a system which is at best unhelpful, and at worst demeaning, on occasions cruel. And once published, do evaluations really enable prospective students to make better course selections for the coming year? Surely such choices are a very individual matter which should not be based on hearsay but on first-hand experience. Students are still quite free under the present system to try a variety of courses each fall and then rearrange their class schedules should certain courses prove disappointing. Isn't this the better way?

Cox reviews presidency

Students caused Nixon "mentality"

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
President Nixon "seemed to have an imperial view of the Presidency," according to Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox.

Addressing a capacity crowd at last week's C.A. Wright Memorial lecture, Cox described his experiences as prosecutor of the man who appointed him. "I confess I found myself consistently worried that he might defy the courts — and if one president has succeeded in his defiance might not his successors follow that precedent," Cox said.

Cox outlined three points at issue in attempting to determine a definition of executive privilege. He spent much of his time attempting to refute during the Watergate proceedings. Either "the President does have privilege to maintain confidentiality of internal communication" or "privilege must yield in any criminal case where either side has a need for evidence the President holds" or "it is for the Courts to determine the extent of duty of the President to provide evidence".

Cox supported the last argument, saying "I carried the constitutional tradition to its logical conclusion." Other wise it would have conferred a king-like prerogative on the president". He remained skeptical of the executive privilege claim, but commented Presidents Jefferson, Lincoln and Roosevelt had defied the courts successfully. President Eisenhower also upheld the claim on the basis that officials need "an assurance of confidentiality to debate policy freely", he said.

An inherent weakness within the American federal system was also mentioned by Cox. "The basic premise of our system is that it may rule on constitutionality only when the question is raised in ordinary lawsuit and only when judicially manageable criterion are made available".

"As a result, there is a very significant class of constitutional issues no court can decide," Cox cited Nixon's use of troops in Indochina as a prime example.

In areas of constitutional indecision or inadequacy, "the sanctions available are wholly political and dependent on public reaction," Cox said. He maintained "The winner is always the President provided he is willing to undergo the political consequences."

He saw student unrest as a main cause of Nixon's approach during his years in office. "The destructive forces of students' activities led to the siege mentality of Nixon," Cox claimed.

The results of the Watergate crisis, Cox said, were the psychological attitudes of the public "against the imperial presidency. The central question of the United States is the problem of confidence in government," Cox indicated, because of their misuse of techniques and methods to communicate.

Concluding his analysis of the changes wrought by the Watergate scandal, Cox called for legislation to allow committees to get information they want and a check against the increased concentration of presidential power. He would not support any changes in the US constitution, he said.

Cox denounced Watergate's "core of evil" defining it as "increasing secrecy, the ability to act monarchically and the drift into an attitude that looks to manipulation."

As lessening of executive power was the only way to prevent this, he maintained.

Nevertheless, Cox seemed unwilling to place any confidence in the ability of Congress to increase its ability to legislate independently. "Congress, I think, is hardly capable of formulating important legislation without executive leadership."

Coney Island Baby is Lou Reed's latest and best

Coney Island Baby
Lou Reed
RCA

Coney Island Baby is Lou Reed's eighth solo album and it is certainly his best. Melody Maker has called it "his finest achievement... easily the most concentrated, vivid and consistent album Lou Reed has recorded in the past four years." Reed has admitted that he despises most of his past work and that he only released it to make a name, to become commercially successful so he could devote himself to other projects. Metal Machine Music was the first such project, Coney Island Baby is the second. This album is clearly an extension of his Velvet Underground days, the first solo album and Berlin. It opens with Crazy Feeling, a song which sets the tone for the album with its laid back guitar, intricate and almost subliminal harmonies, and stunning lyrics. It is a song about the girl you've always wanted to meet and has the following refrain:
I knew you had that crazy feeling

Now, now, now, you've got that crazy feeling
You know I've had that crazy feeling too.

Charley's Girl and She's My Best Friend are up-tempo numbers which maintain the subtle use of harmonics. Side one closes with Kicks, a truly remarkable track. The atmosphere is feverish and claustrophobic as Reed sings with the intensity of a junkie desperate for a fix. It's about the vicarious enjoyment people derive from other's criminal exploits, with such lyrics as
When you cut that dude with that stiletto
You did it so well — cheeeply

When the blood came down his neck
Don't you know it was better than sex.

Melody Maker describes it as being "at once totally repelling and strangely fascinating in its psychotic compulsion."

Side two opens with two songs that show Reed's legendary sardonic humour, namely "The Gift" and "Oooh Baby". The latter track captures the nightmarish quality of New York with its screeching guitar and background noise. It sounds right out of Scorsese's Taxi Driver. Nobody's Business could be the story of Reed's life, especially the lines: "It's nobody's business but my own." The title track closes the album and it is a magnificent denouement. It's a semi-autobiographical track, during which Reed finds himself alone at midnight, his soul up for sale, reflecting upon his past in hate and disgust. Three years earlier on the Berlin album he sang about a similar situation. There his solution was cold and brutal.

But when you're filled up to here with hate
Don't you know you've got to get straight

Filled up to here with hate
Beat her black and blue and get it straight.

In Coney Island Baby Reed resolves the problem, reasoning that "the glory of love will pull him through."

This album shows Reed to be more relaxed and sure of himself. He has obviously abandoned all attempts to become just another rock'n'roll star. But just remember, it's nobody's business but his own.

Bare melodies, simplistic lyrics make for half-baked encore album

10 cc
How Dare You!
Phillips Records

What with all their touring to promote their last album, The Original Soundtrack, and hit single, "I'm Not in Love", 10 cc left themselves little time to work on the inevitable and oh-so-important BIG FOLLOW-UP. How Dare You! was written and recorded in a mere three months, and it sounds like it.

The melodies are thin to non-existent, the lyrics simplistic, rarely witty, and only occasionally interesting. There is some innovative instrumental work scattered over the two sides, and the LP features their trademark, "state-of-the-art" engineering, which makes for some nice audio effects, particularly if heard through a good stereo. But clear sound and random instrumental flourishes do not produce albums of the high calibre of The Original Soundtrack.

Only two of the nine songs of this new LP are well written: "Art For Art's Sake" and "I'm Mandy Fly Me". The latter is an engaging tale of a lad who falls in love with a stewardess in an airline travel poster. A ludicrous plot, but the track is oddly effective. There are no cuts as challenging as "One Nite a Paris", as rocking as "Blackmail", as beautiful as "I'm Not in Love", or as funny as "Life is a Mineshifter" — all tracks from their previous album. How Dare You is only half-baked in comparison. With this failure under their collective belt, 10 cc will probably take their time developing their next LP. If they don't a promising career will have been all shot to hell.

YOU DON'T HAVE TO MAKE A CAREER OUT OF A SUMMER JOB.

Once upon a time there was a student who selected herself out of a summer job. Oh no, we're not just picking on girls. We've seen guys do it, too. She wanted to be an architect, this kid. So she held out for a job that had something to do with architecture. None came along that year, and by the time she decided to settle for something else, it was too late. All the jobs were gone. So was her first year's tuition.

Moral: Don't hold out for the impossible dream.

Who knows, Your Canada Manpower Centre for Students might introduce you to a whole new field. Maybe you'll like your summer job so much you'll want to make a career out of it someday.

Melodrama scores with vice, virtue, complications, and justice triumphant Melodrama, like slapstick and banana cream pie, is an absolute. One likes it—or one does not. I like it.

Faced with the quintessential melodrama, replete with verbal dexterity, scarcely-disguised double entendres, a full collection of period costumes, set, and side-whiskers, what can the spineless devotee of Ten Nights in a Bar-Room, the lickspittle acolyte of Love Rides the Rails, the voluptuary of Dirty Work at the Cross Roads do except to settle back into his seat and exclaim fervently at intervals, Shame, shame! and Don't trust him!

For the East Side Players' production of The Mumberley Inheritance is one hell of a good melodrama. Recently written by Warren Graves of Edmonton, intended as a proof of the old style play-with-a-moral, it is played with an immaculate sense of period and genre by a cast who are letter- and gesture-perfect and whose only weak points are their voices. Briefly, the plot is this: The old man, Sir Roger Mumberley, has frittered away his substance, causing his son Jack to go into voluntary exile in the Canadas, where he has been for six long years when the play commences. (These will have become quite hateful to you by the conclusion of your evening of theatre). Marmaduke Mayhem, villain of extraordinary cunning, has the rapacious intention of marrying the delightful Daphne, daughter of the household, and of possessing the Manor, in whose walls a fabled treasure lies. Mayhem's assorted villainies drive away the young suitor Rodney Stoutheart (who is a colossal bore and obviously right for his part, as well as, eventually, Daphne's), and introduce a host of his creatures into the Mumberley household. Complications ensue for two acts and everything is properly resolved. The piano player receives his due portion of applause, and the audience is well-satisfied.

Prime entertainer of the evening was, naturally, the villain of the piece. He was greeted by a properly agitated audience who poured abuse on him, only to be greeted by a snarl or a sneer. Malcolm Marlin, who ably handled the part, achieved a mastery of the small gesture which I have rarely seen on a local stage, and his skill brought a distinct depth to a character who is of course merely a function of the plot. Even in melodrama there must be some plausibility to evil. Each of the other male characters had defects of presentation which made them less than convincing from time to time. Rodney Stoutheart suffered terribly, poor boy, from his weedy moustaches, tipped up with a light application of butch wax. There was little apparent use of make-up, and Stoutheart's pasty-faced appearance failed to win him my sympathy until late in the play. Old Sir Roger was played by Jim Feather as if it was a piece of Wagnerian music he was interpreting. His voice constantly on full quaver, Sir Roger was wooden until his senility gave Feather the opportunity to dominate the action with a clear conscience. Jack Mumberley (Trevor Stanley) gets full marks for his adroit voice-work, but otherwise he had very little to do but make opportune and inopportune entrances. Crispin Cringe, the creation of Les Hewitt, was a sidekick of a new dimension. Reminiscent of a Dickensian under-taker, or Kelly's Scarcophagus Macabre, Cringe lived down to his name with a grand burlesque of the art of snivelling.

In the female lead, Linda Muir, the East Side Players have found someone able to hold the stage even under the most ridiculous circumstances. Daphne too achieves the kind of depth which allows you to see real personality in the one-dimensional creation of the playwright. Jack Mumberley's ruined sweetheart, Kate Thomas, and the maid (Wendy Thomas) had no real strength to their voices or to their presentations, except at particular moments.

Nevertheless, the minor characters cannot be faulted, for this was an excellent company production, well-drilled and rehearsed. The liaison between actors and musician (Ted Robinson) was remarkable and successfully overcame the seating arrangements which the theatre inside the Todmorden Mill necessitates.

A few minutes of conversation after the play revealed that the players hope soon to have a more satisfactory space, in a renovated section of the old building, and that this play, which has its last three nights the 25th-27th, is an entry in the Amateur Dramatics Festival and is to be adjudicated on its closing night. If the performance I saw is an example, they should receive high marks for a kind of professionalism rarely found in the city's more established theatres.

Gallows Tree shows skilful technique

The recent performance of The Gallows Tree at the U.C. Playhouse was an effective use of technique to uncover emotion. Based, with express looseness, on the alienation of Chatsky from the high society of Russia in the 1820's, the Playhouse production made its points with a hard-edged style that left the audience as alienated as Chatsky was—both from the portrait of the artificial life of balls and banquets and inverted psycho-analysis, and from the play itself.

Wit Works Woe, to give the work another of its titles, evolved from a framework and the addition of ideas. There is consequently an abundance of good ideas but a certain discontinuity in the growth of the performance. In general, though, it was a production of extreme clarity. In a series of well-timed devices, the intricate nature of language was shown, as was the sheer conventionality of the figures of the dance and the manners of the table.

The danger of presenting a play as a series of intellectual images is that your audience may not be intellectual enough, or sensitive enough, to understand what is going on. I found that those around me had not got the patience to last through the longish introductory section in which the grande valse brillante of society is set in motion, and were content to make boisterous remarks. The visual impact of the company standing motionless as wax-works, as the audience makes its way through them to find seats, set the tone of the production, and the use of both lighting and space did not fall from this high standard.

The acting was not all excellent, but it was more thoroughly disciplined than one would expect of university students. The Gallows Tree was designed as a play for disciplined bodies, and the bodies were flaunted in a variety of manners at the audience. It is fair to say that both from the bodies and the complete unexpectedness of the development of ideas, that the crowd who had begun to laugh became fascinated with the work unfolding before them. That is a tribute to the variations on a theme which the players set before us. If the play was enjoyable to an audience seeking a noon-hour diversion, it undoubtedly took on added significance to those who could trace the theories underlying a highly stylized version of this story.

Tartness can't help philosophical mush

"Remember", the representative of the Phoenix Theatre said, when I called for review tickets for Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead (through April 12), "we will have a very small house the night you come. This play really needs a full house."

It was a small house. Within 5 minutes I knew whose was the gufaw, whose the licker, whose the snort. Even sooner it was obvious the problem was something more than the lack of a full house. This production directed by Ann Antikw and Graham Harley was full of the art that flaunts art. Clever repartees. Slapstick. Split-second timing. And without, only to indulge in Stoppard's rather tiresome existential sentimentality.

Oh for common sense! For backbone! The problem may in fact have been largely in the play which is so tart and tautly witty about so much philosophical mush. Stoppard, the Seventies' G.B.S. (Great Bore Shaw) I was thinking. All that dialogue! (What fun to be a Philistine.) Some one told me that The New Yorker's Brendan Gill had even claimed that Stoppard was likely to prove the better playwright. One ought to be grateful to the Phoenix Theatre for putting this production on, for enabling one to discover one's own biases and tolerance levels. That is always interesting. No, I don't think I would like Travesties either.

WHY LIVE A LIFE WITHOUT MEANING?

Too many of us are in places we don't want to be. Doing things we really don't want to be doing. Sometimes, it's because we can't think of anything better to do—but that's no way to live.

Since you have only one life to live, you might as well live it with joy . . . with a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment . . . and the knowledge that you are giving, not taking. Why not decide to live for the best . . . for a great purpose . . . for something bigger than you are?

If you want to change the direction of your life, you might investigate the Paulist way of living. The Paulists are a small group of Catholic priests dedicated to preaching the Gospel of Christ to the North American people. For over 100 years the Paulists have done this through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—in college campuses, in parishes, in missions in North America, in downtown centers, in working with young and old. Because we are flexible, we continually pioneer new approaches. To do this we need dedicated, innovative men to carry on our work.

To find out what road God has chosen us to walk is one of the most important tasks of our life. Which road will be yours? For more information on the Paulists, fill out the coupon and mail today.

Benson's fire, magical fingers warm up Toronto audiences

George Benson, White Rabbit, Black Magic, whose fingers move faster and farther than excellence demands, complements every inch of his legendary Gibson guitar. Surrounded by his wizards Ronnie Foster on keyboards and synthesizer, George Gallo on electric piano, Stanley Banks on bass and Jimmy Madison on drums, they fill a room with the astrology of "Bitches Brew". Except for Ronnie, who's been with him for two years, the others have all joined since August, yet together they create a superb electric landscape where Benson's imagination is at home.

Fortunately, the band soloed before George appeared, because it's almost impossible to ignore the spellbinding blend of classical precision and eerie fire that leaps through Benson's fingers to warm a room with applause and ovations. The band obviously delights in driving crowds wild, but there was never the careless or unnecessary frenzy that mars much of the spontaneity of jazz. At the close of set one, the band honored him with the most original and interesting version of "Happy Birthday" I'll ever hear.

Between the sets at the El Mocambo, Benson stopped at tables, laughing, answering questions. He was sleek in a slim black suit, the host thoroughly enjoying his guests and the rewards of playing "persistently for about 13 years".

He opened set two with a soft, lonely solo, followed by fifteen minutes of "California Dreamin'". Although he didn't name them, he later sang two songs, and his strong, smooth voice and outstanding scat ability showed why he's one of the finest jazz performers alive. His voice and guitar became one, and my only wish was for a few more vocals like "Masquerade."

"Thank you, thank you very much. Here's a tune called 'White Rabbit.'" Like every piece, it was a highlight. A beautiful woman carried a well-lit cake on stage and the party was complete. After an encore and many pictures taken with the cake, the party continued in another room where Benson mentioned that classical violinist Yasha Heifetz, Art Tatum, and Wes Montgomery were three of his favorite musicians. He wants to add an orchestra to his show and praised George Gallo as a fine conductor.

While he served the cake, which was shaped like a guitar, complete with colored strings, flowers and a separate amp, I asked if he preferred playing three nights or longer in one place. "Three nights is great. The worst is two weeks cause everybody expects you to be different all the time. And we can't. We're not super-human. A scientist doesn't invent a serum every day. We're like musical scientists."

Not since Chick Corea and Return to Forever hypnotized Massey Hall in May 1974 have I experienced such an atmosphere of grace and celebration; on this occasion the celebration of a birthday and the first day of spring.

HH Chorus lacks intensity in final concert of the year

In their last concert of the season, the Hart House Chorus performed a varied programme: J.S. Bach's Cantata No. 4 "Christ Lay in Death's Dark Prison", Magnificat by Pergolesi, Aber absceit wer ist's by Brahms, Cantate Domino by H. Schutz, and Faure's Requiem. The performance was well-attended, which was gratifying as it was possibly Conductor Denise Narcisse-Mair's last concert with the Chorus.

The Bach I found disappointing, lacking, as it did, dramatic intensity. This magnificent work consists of a Singtoma followed by seven vocal movements all based on the chorale tune introduced by the chorus at the beginning. The work is arranged symmetrically: movements 1, 4, and 7 being tor chorus, 2, and 6 being duets, and 3 and 5 being solos. At the end of each movement, Alleluia is sung, and it was here that the lack of an overall conception of the work was most apparent for there was not enough tonal or emotional contrast between the Alleluia and the rest of the movement. Although the soprano and alto duet fell flat (lack of sensitivity to the interplay of motifs), the bass solo was impressively strong.

The Magnificat, conducted by Assistant Conductor, Darrell Gillespie, went smoothly, and the Brahms, an alto rhapsodie with male chorus, was memorable for the unified workings of the performers although alto Diane Loeb could not sustain an interesting tone and appeared to have some difficulty gracefully handling wide melodic leaps.

The Chorus rebounded in the second half of the programme with the Faure Requiem. The Offertorium, a quasi-da capo (chorus, baritone, chorus) section was neatly performed with an impressive second entry by the chorus, and a wonderfully spirited Amen. The Cantus was touching with its filigree of violin arpeggios, and in the Pie Jesu, the soprano (Caralyne Tomlin) effectively conveyed the yearning quality of the text.

It seems a long time off yet, but in September, keep your eyes open for information about Chorus auditions. Next year's conductor is as yet unknown but the Chorus will continue to provide the university community with consistently good performances.

Craftsmanlike Young shows sensitivity in poems on homosexual relations

Common-Or-Garden Gods
Ian Young
Catalyst Press, $3.95

Ian Young's fifth book Common-Or-Garden Gods may assault the sensibilities of many readers, but it is worth reading. Young is a self-declared homosexual who writes about erotic relationships between men, and often does so successfully. Although many wish to brush such work under the nearest rug, or even worse simply suppress it, this poet's candour and sincerity about male love affairs, and his craftsmanlike abilities as a poet to reveal them, cannot be summarily dismissed. When one considers that Ian Young has received recognition throughout North America — witness his inclusion in two major anthologies, Storm Warning and New American and Canadian Poetry — one must agree that his poetic talents should be evaluated and judged.

Most readers may feel, as I do, that homosexual relationships are a weak subject for poetry. Often artists concerned with such a potentially volatile topic are incapable of distancing themselves adequately from their subject matter, and the poems merely degenerate into manifestoes for Gay Lib. Ian Young, however, usually avoids this pitfall. His tone of irony, carefully blended with compassion, allows him to confront this topic without fumbling between artistic creation and personal feeling. In fact, he demonstrates his ability to create art rather than polemics in a humorous poem entitled "The Words", wherein a man is too afraid to tell the truth, then stumbles through some obvious and awkward lies, only to press a note into the poet's hands as he makes his escape:

"I'm
... someone who loves you for you and not for your body."

This cliché, commonly associated with heterosexual affairs wherein the male attempts to seduce the female with the most artificial cons possible, receives a new and delightful twist in this context.

Although there are other aspects to this book, for the homosexual concerns do not dominate throughout, Common-Or-Garden Gods reveals to the reader the emotions and feelings of these "invisible men" who are often looked down upon — despite talent, ability and sensitivity. One need, furthermore, not agree or sympathize with Young's sexual preferences to appreciate his admirably controlled handling of language, image and metaphor. One can ask no more of any poet. As Henry James once wrote, "We must grant a writer his subject, we can only criticize the execution and rendering of that subject." And, although Young has chosen a theme which many still consider "notorious", his execution is confident, subtle and successful. He deserves to be read.

How to market literary commodities for hog packagers or conceptual artists

The Canadian Writer's Market (14th ed.)
Eileen Goodman
McClelland & Stewart Ltd.,
Toronto. $5.95

For those of you who think Maclean's and Saturday Night are the only Canadian periodicals around, this new paperback will tell you about 358 more. Hardcore nationalists will be delighted to find there are 91 (count 'em) magazines with titles that start with "Canada" or "Canadian".

This paperback is the 4th revised edition of The Canadian Writer's Market. Anyone who writes, or thinks of writing, will find that there is a publication just waiting for your specialized talents — from Canadian Packaging to Canadian Funeral Director. There is a magazine Canadian Treasure for those interested in "lost, buried or sunken treasure in Canada" (would they be interested in a story on the James Bay project?); and Elite (The Magazine for Today's Man) will buy your erotic stories if they are "sophisticated and for the most part humorous".

But this book is more than a list, even though that is interesting enough. In the introduction you are given a run down on all the tricks of the writing trade. There are concise but informative sections on copyright, libel, style, obscenity and income tax (all of which have something in common). There is a section on writing for radio and television and a useful chapter on the mechanics of manuscript preparation.

Following the introduction is an outline of courses in journalism and creative writing at Canadian universities and colleges. Then we come to the 360 Canadian periodicals — a list which serves as an invaluable reference for potential writers and as an amusing diversion during a boring train journey. Under each periodical is listed the type and length of material it publishes and the fees it pays. There is a wide range of fees, from the 30 cents a word which Maclean's pays to the "not ordinarily paying now" of the impetuous Christian Enquirer (poignant hints of an opulent past). Some of the descriptions under each publication title are straight-forward and informative; others are more enigmatic, like File, whose "content varies drastically from issue to issue" (the secret must be to look at their last issue then write something completely different).

Unfortunately the circulation figures for the publications were not included. Oh! to know the readership of the Hog Market Place Quarterly.

Did you ever wonder who wrote "Things go better with Coke"? He must be a more widely read author than those best-selling New Testament writers. Aspiring admen will find a list of Canadian advertising agencies in this book.

The penultimate section lists the grants, medals and awards which Canadian writers can compete for and tells the reader how to qualify for such delights as The Beaver Trophy (sorry, you must live within 100 miles of Edmonton).

Super ambitious writers will find their section at the end of the book. Here is found a list of Canadian book publishers, waiting for a new James Joyce or a Robertson Davies; waiting to print by the hundreds the quintessential Canadian novel; a story filled with the torrid drama of life in contemporary Canada; a story of the profound philosophical problems besetting a people living in a linguistically divided country (which side of the sauce bottle to read first?); waiting to publish a best-seller which will make the name of its author a household word.

Wiseman confronts the artist-employee's dilemma

Adele Wiseman? These are the words and phrases that come to mind: uncontroverial, undogmatic, easily approachable, motherly, salt of the earth.

The novelist (best known for The Sacrifice, which won a Governor-General's medal, and The Crackpot released last year) is probably just what the university's troubled writer-in-residence programme has needed this year.

We really weren't supposed to have a writer-in-residence in '75-'76. Last last spring, the programme was suspended by U of T president John Evans for the coming year for budgetary reasons.

It was re-instated due to vociferous protests, not so much among the students as among the faculty. But one of the effects of the suspension has been to focus attention on just what the duties of the writer-in-residence are. There has always been a debate about whether the position of the writer on campus is for the benefit of the writer or the students, whether the university is a patron or an employer, who can expect certain contractual duties from his employee. Because the writer in residence programme was suspended as being essentially a frill, it is concentrating hard since its reprieve on at least not seeming to be that. The writer in residence is now definitely here for the benefit of the students.

Wiseman says that when she was offered the position she was told she had to deliver at least one public lecture, be around a certain amount of time (a minimum of nine hours) each week and answer any reasonable invitation to visit or lecture in creative writing classes or Canadian literature classes.

The committee of faculty members (Phyllis Grosskurth, Sam Solecki, Germaine Warkentin, Frank Watt . . .) in charge of the programme even ran an ad in the Varsity and distributed a poster around the campus, that stressed Wiseman's availability. Both the ad and the poster listed her Massey College office telephone number.

Wiseman feels that there is definitely a place for the writer on campus particularly in relation to the students. "Kids at all levels should be encouraged," she says; "there really are not that many creative writing classes. Besides that, a lot of the people writing are not studying English literature. They honestly don't know who to talk to."

She does not feel that it has been her position to criticize works brought to her. "I'm not here to pass judgement. What harm is there in simply encouraging? Time will tell the good writers from the bad." She does feel she can give advice on technical problems, though, and the benefit of a different perspective.

Wiseman agrees wholeheartedly with the committee's actions and requirements. An anomaly among Canadian writers in that she has never been a writer-in-residence before, she says that the whole thing is completely new to her, "a great mystery". But "without the basic structure that the committee has established, the writer in residence, any writer in residence, can be criticized for whatever he does."

The knite cuts both ways. Without the basic structure the university too can be criticized for what it expects or doesn't expect of the writer. W.O. Mitchell, writer-in-residence here in 1973-1974, complained that he was regarded as a "token artistic nigger", "a performing seal". "The main reason universities have them is to capitalize on a writer's reputation. If you're hot you will get lionized and the university gets good publicity. The result is that you're all over hell's half-acre."

Now that the requirements of the job have indeed been established Wiseman receives students in her office:

"The first term mostly staff and post-graduate students came. There was only a small trickle of undergraduates. This has swelled in the second term,

Wiseman was disappointed by the absence of a literary community on the campus. (For a scoop about next year's writer-in-residence, see page 26.)

however, as her presence has become known. Wiseman does confess herself a bit disappointed by the literary campus situation. "What is needed is a much stronger sense of current literary community among the students. There is The Varsity for the journalists. There really isn't anything as central for creative writers. There are not many live wires around. Certainly among 35,000 students there should be a large number of writers."

Wiseman also gives lectures. One given both at Massey College and at the Faculty of Library Science recently dealt with "Women in Canadian literature. It discussed the effect of literary activity on the marriages of a number of unnamed Canadian literary figures, male and female. Out of 12 male writers, 9 are still married to the original women. Two are not married. One is a homosexual. Out of 12 female writers, however, 7 have become divorced or are in the process of becoming divorced.

Three are still married to the original partners. Two are unmarried. One is a lesbian. Wiseman says that this really doesn't say that much about women as writers but it does say a fair amount about the relationships of the sexes and to what degree each can or can't cope with the creativity of the other.

(Wiseman could also give a fairly interesting lecture about Winnipeg as a centre of culture, a culture of which she is a member. "Winnipeg is out there all by itself, Minneapolis is the nearest town. And for seven or 8 months of the year you're crouched in your house, isolated in the middle of the snow. You can't help growing up with a strong sense of self in that kind of environment. There, entertaining yourself, educating yourself is a very real thing. The various ethnic groups that make up Winnipeg encapsulate this sense of being dug in. And yet the landscape is what we might call expulsive. It urges you to escape. Ninety-nine percent of it is the sky. You feel you could walk off it if you walked far enough. It forces you to confront ultimates, to make decisions. I know many who leave swearing they won't come back but of course they take it with them."

Wiseman has not been able to devote much time to her own work. She is doing a book on creativity examining in particular dolls her mother has been producing. "This 79 year old woman and the apple face dolls she produces to send to children's hospitals, are a symbol, a means, to discuss in a non-frightening way, creativity. Most people assume when we discuss that, that you have to be Shakespeare, you have to have been dead a long time, you have to have had your name carved in marble. But what this little old woman does is parallel to what Einstein did. She has the same sensations, she follows the same processes, she has the same motivation.

But the book is only haltdone.

She also has two plays on hand which she has stronger hopes of having published than produced. "I know most people think of me as a novelist but I have always conceived of myself as a writer. I could write anything. I have always been very interested in theatre, and I assumed that I would eventually write plays."

One of the plays, The Love Bound, was written twelve or so years ago. It is a play about the Holocaust. The other play, Testimonial Dinner, written two years ago, uses the situation of MacDonald and Riel to examine how decisions made in the past may affect the present.

Wiseman says she cannot escape the fact of the Holocaust, nor does she want to. Hence, The Love Bound. "I am by default a survivor. I am here; they — the 6 million Jews burned in the gas chamber — didn't get here. I owe something to those 6 million. The Holocaust is a fact in history. It happened. I have to realize that. Or I may be condemned to suffer it again."

Horsburgh Scandal: a delightful, unabashed morality play

Theatre Passe Muraille's latest collaborative efforts, The Horsburgh Scandal at St. Paul's Centre, is an unabashed morality play whose freshness and energy is astounding, entertaining, delightful and moving. It is also a true story.

According to his then rather revolutionary conviction that Christianity was not the private preserve of the bourgeois establishment, Rev. Russell D. Horsburgh of Chatham turned Park St. United Church into what we would now call a half-way house for teen-agers. As a result he was in 1961 convicted of contributing to juvenile delinquency with particular reference to the encouragement of sexual abuses on the church premises, served out some part of a one year prison term, was acquitted in a subsequent appeal, later reinstated to the ministry, only to die of cancer shortly thereafter. The scandal in the case refers not to the allegations of sexual irregularities, but to the persecution and suffering of the reverend at the hands of a reactionary parish (the elders of the temple), a corrupt legal system (the pharisees), and ubiquitous horde of scavenging paparazzi (the scribes). In short, Rev. Russell D. Horsburgh is a martyr. It is a grim story.

Although you'd never know any of this from the first half of the show which is a highly delightful entertainment, slightly glib but fun, with occasional sloppiness and self-indulgence in the slap-stick department. Episodic in nature, individual scenes are more like skits which, in the aggregate, lack an overall building of tension and purpose. Some tightening would seem to be in order. But then you could say the same about most mediaeval moralities.

For most of us, probably, the play doesn't really begin until the second half, when the company puts aside its horseplay and enters into a tough, hard-edged drama that is moving without sacrificing the ironic distancing demanded by an indignation relying on satire to make its bitterness felt. Passe Muraille's unique style of reportage provides a creative tension in contrast to the more inner nature of Horsburgh's individual drama.

Facing the martyr's dilemma of betrayal by those whom he tried to help, as well as the suspicion that his martyrdom is partially of his own making, Don Harron plays Horsburgh with a sensitivity, a depth, an authority and a presence that leaves Charlie Farquason about where Christ last the Devil — behind him. Harron is so impressive that the empathy created is somewhat at variance with the intentions of this style of production. While Passe Muraille eschews the drama of the soul that it considers bourgeois, so much interest is nevertheless generated in Horsburgh that the play cries out for a more substantial script as far as that character is concerned.

The show is really more like two different plays altogether. Had the company in the first half relied less on horseplay and concentrated on a dramatic level more consistent with the second half, this problem might have been solved to some extent. Nor should Passe Muraille have been afraid to give up some of its caricaturing that occasionally lapses into cutesiness; the satire intended lives boldly in the sharp-edged wit of the songs that serve both to create atmosphere as well as to comment on the action. They are admirable examples of sardonic humour; it is gratifying to be in the presence of people who do not share the usual Canadian theatre's fear of being both intelligent and articulate.

Joanne McIntyre and Janet Green manage to capture the whole spirit of early 60's south-western Ontario with a shocky pre-Beatles pop-tune: "How far can a nice girl go?" Eric Peterson and David Fox open the play like a pair of fallen angels as with gleeful acidity they musically inform us that "At Park St. United they eat clergymen for lunch!" Musician John Gray is to be congratulated for keeping the music a functional vehicle for the lyrics.

The entire cast of teen-agers, parents, church elders, reporters and legal officialdom is surprisingly played by a team of nine actors taking on an incredible range of roles in rapid succession. Concentration never lags and, with one or two exceptions, the caricatures are tully embodies creations. I'm especially fond of Eric Peterson as the maly-mouthed assistant minister who strikes me as the archetypal Canadian rather reminiscent of Mitchell Sharp.

The critical assumptions invoked in the preceding probably won't cut much ice with the folks at Passe Muraille. Nor are they meant to be a slur on what at times appears to be the early stages of a genuinely new form. It is wise to remember that it is precisely the shortcomings of mediaeval English drama, its horseplay and episodic nature, that was the unique feature which made possible the magnificent flowering of the dramatic art of the Elizabethan era. This, plus the high level of performance and production under the direction of Paul Thompson, as well as the marked absence of the pretentiousness associated with previous TPM shows, all conspires to persuade the spectator to check his critical faculties at the door and lose himself in genuine admiration.

Same old Lightfoot

Gordon Lightfoot can do no wrong. At least as far as his legion of fans are concerned.

The veteran folksinger began his annual eight day sell out appearance at Massey Hall Monday with an uneven performance, hampered by sound problems caused by some awful bass feedback.

As usual Lightfoot used his spring Toronto run to introduce a number of new songs, many never performed before, which accounts for some of the miscues.

For those who wanted a run through of Lightfoot's greatest hits there was some comfort however. He returned to more familiar ground in the second half reviving oldies such as "Did she mention my name" and "That's what you get for lovin' me."

Lightfoot's stage manner during his concert tours of the past few years has become a subject of controversy. In the established press, most critics have slashed him for what they call "minimum effort" and chastised him for muffing lines and mugging.

But, as a "peoples' press" critic, I disagree. The crowds' reaction is important. Most people are inclined to allow a performer a few goofs on stage. In fact it makes things much more human.

The new material was superb. Undoubtedly the best was the sea disaster ballad, on the sinking of the Edna Fitzgerald, an Iron ore carrier which vanished on Lake Superior last November.

At least with a Lightfoot concert you know what to expect. If you are not a fan don't bother going, he isn't going to change.

No question who to blame, so please pass the tomatoes

Perhaps the chief virtue of a one-man show is that there is no question about whom to blame. It is David Ponting, then, that I direct attention to as the 'only begotten' of the show based on the life and works of Dylan Thomas which he presented last Friday and Saturday at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall. And pass me the tomatoes please.

Ponting, a touring British actor, used slides, rather scanty taped commentary from Thomas' friends and acquaintances and his own narration and readings in his attempt to whip up the audience into a Dylan Lived For Us Died For Us frenzy.

Neither a drama nor a simple reading, the show alternated between a This Is Your Life literalness and a certain soap opera bathos. The poems were inserted chiefly for local colour and anecdotal and emotional effect at the appropriate biographical moments. I had not known that "Do Not Go Gentle Into That Good Night" was supposed to make me snivel. "Death Shall Have No Dominion" was read as we were forced to stare at a slide of a little white wooden cross which marks Thomas' grave.

Ponting's respect for Thomas was such that they included an impersonation, unredeemably embarrassing, of Dylan, stone drunk and drink-maullin, in a New York pub ("Bartender, I shay, bartender! Four. Four whiskey doubles here. . . . My wife, my wife, she's the most bee-u-ti-ful dame in the worrld, etc.").

Since the biographical orientation was so profoundly distasteful, Ponting's urbanity, his pause pause poignant pauses, his all-comprehending, all-forgiving sensibility and his cultivated physical resemblance to Thomas did grate.

What a pity it is that so many seem these days to know and gnaw over the lives of modern literary figures more so than they do over their own. It should be said: I for one do not care one way or another about Dylan Thomas' life and the alcoholism which ended it. I do not receive a frisson at the thought of Sylvia Plath breathing the gas deeply and waiting, waiting. I do not care, not particularly, that Virginia Woolf filled her pockets with stones and walked into the sea. I would not, in short, leave fingerprints all over the lives of the dead. We'll take the hard clear facts of the poetry here, sir, thank you very much.

Chamber Players round out season with sedative Haydn selections

Haydn is not a difficult composer to like. His best works have a grace and dignity that is truly moving and even his lesser works are invested with a medicinal quality (fast acting and fuftered to be mild) that makes one feel that all is right with the world.

If one can fault Haydn it would have to be on his very point: he is too unwilling to challenge his audience. He is more interested in sedating than arousing them. On this basis it is of more than passing interest that the Chamber Players of Toronto should choose Haydn for the final concert of their "A" series last Saturday.

Both music and players struck me as archetypally 'middle class' (the music inheriting this status upon the death of the aristocratic society it was intended for and the players' probably at birth).

The Chamber Players, under Victor Martin's peripheral direction, played with obvious precision but for the most part hid behind the music, never really emerging as a presence in their own right. Even the solo of flutist Robert Aitken in Concerto no. one in C major, opening the program, showed the lack of flair that was to characterize the rest of the performance.

The trilogy of symphonies that comprised the rest of the program was somewhat less than exciting. Rather obvious in their titles, "Le Matin", "Le Midi", and "Le Soir" depicted with almost monotonous accuracy on innocuously aristocratic day replete with the timid flourishing of a sunrise at the beginning and an enemic little thunderstorm at the end.

Perhaps I should clarify my position somewhat. It is not that either the music or the players were that bad. The performance was in fact quite enjoyable all things considered. Perhaps what is really the matter is that this concert had to come at the end of the series. It seems an inquispicious ending to an otherwise fine set of concerts. It was just a case of poor planning.

Para-review investigates parapsychology

I was a psychic for the FBI

If I could find a psychic who can call down the spirits of the dead, I know who I'd have a session with.

P.T. Barnum, founder of "The Greatest Show on Earth", Barnum and Bailey's Circus. The man who said "there's another sucker born every minute".

Barnum, that past master of the con game, would have had some interesting insights into the modern hocus-pocus, like "parapsychology", that so many seemingly rational people in this obsessively rationalistic age have swallowed hook, line, and sinker. To be sure, parapsychology and similar superstitions flourished in earlier times as well, but it is only in the recent past that psychics have sought (and in a few interesting cases, received) the endorsement of scientists, who have themselves become icons of superstitious faith for many people. This has put the whole game on a different level. It has enhanced the credibility of parapsychology for many people, and it has helped to make it a lucrative profession for a few.

It has also given our culture some classic monuments of stupidity and gullibility, suitably emblazoned with the name of "Science". And most important, perhaps, it has engulfed the whole wretched psychic carnival in a sticky, and virtually impenetrable, morass of fraud and foolishness, rumor and conjecture, error and confusion. Trying to make sense of what is happening in the never-ending land of parapsychology is virtually impossible. And if y chance you do succeed, you find that you would have understood the operations of the psychic miracle workers a lot sooner if you had looked at parapsychology as a case study in applied sociology, illustrating the old motto: "Never give a sucker an even break". It might well be the motto of the career "psychic".

In fact, poor Barnum must be kicking himself right now in that Great Circus in the Sky. He was born a century too late. Nowadays, there are more suckers about than old P.T. could have wished for in his fondest dreams. And today's sophisticated suckers have a lot more money to spend than the simple country folk of Barnum's day ever did.

Imagine what heights he could have risen to in today's world. Guru Maharaji Barnum. There would have been no stopping him.

But I like to think that Barnum wouldn't have done it. I think he had too much integrity, and I think he might have been out of his depth in a world where society and the circus are one and the same. His was a simpler world. When you were being had by P.T. Barnum, you knew you were being had. You could go home afterwards, shaking your head, feeling a bit sheepish, your pocket-book empty, but your self-respect and identity still fundamentally intact. Barnum was after your money, not your soul.

The humbug of the 1970's seems to be different. What a "psychic" like Uri Geller plays the old shell game with you, he is after your soul. The game is played for keeps, and that makes it vicious and totalitarian.

Parapsychology is so confused and contradictory that it's difficult to get a grip on it anywhere. As an example, look at the two articles, of October 27 and February 11, both of them breathlessly (and mindlessly) favourable, that The Varsity was somehow suckered into carrying this year.

In them, sprouting up like so many toadstools, you'll find magic mushrooms (of course), faith healing, ESP, people who can bend metal without touching it; levitation, messages from various dead saints (curiously, all of them Greek Orthodox), Kirilian photography, attempts by the CIA to read minds, and a conspiracy between the Rockettellers and the Rothschilds, entered into in 1888, to control the English and American governments "all through the 20th century" ("Oddly", says one of the articles, "both the Birchers and the Weather Underground have published documentary exposes of this 'conspiracy'.") You'll find contact with UFO's, white magic, black magic, bio-energetic fields, Timothy Leary, and the hint of an "occult Watergate". (This at least is probable, to judge by the regularity with which alleged evidence for paranormal phenomena disappears.) You'll even find things that go bump in the night. And you'll find all this nonsense compared in importance to the Theory of Relativity and the Quantum Theory. These two particular articles have no mention of fcap reading, astrology, talking plants, Jonathan Livingston Seagull, the Bermuda Triangle, or the tooth fairy. But then space was limited. Another thing you won't find in these articles, or any other parapsychological literature, for that matter, is a single solitary shred of hard evidence. And that is not for lack of space.

This is not to say that I think that all of these things are equally nonsensical. I am prepared to entertain the possibility that some of them, like ESP and UFO's, may in fact exist. But I am saying that present no evidence exists, that the way they have been investigated is generally laughable, and that the case for them has been weakened by the way most of their proponents have uncritically lumped together anything "occult" as equally probable.

Yet the people who like to entertain themselves with this kind of thing have managed to make so much noise that many people are under the impression that there is in fact evidence for some parapsychological occurrences, even if most of them are transparent quackery.

This is understandable. Confusion, deliberate and otherwise, is the hallmark of parapsychology. Its practitioners are remarkably adept at shifting ground. So-and-so is exposed as a fraud? Ah, well, but you should see such and such. A psychic failed in a set of tests? Oh, but he succeeded in somebody's living room last year. Psychology Today says Uri Geller is a fraud? Never mind, The Berkeley Barb says he's for real.

Obviously, it is impossible to refute all of the claims of parapsychology. It's rather like trying to disprove the existence of Santa Claus. Every year, tens of thousands of men claiming to be Santa appear in the department stores of North America. Any particular Santa who has been investigated has turned out to be an impostor. But no one in their right mind is going to investigate all of them. So one of them may be for real, for all we know. Nevertheless, most adults would place the burden of proof on those who would try to persuade us of his existence. Let them produce a jolly fat man with eight tiny reindeer and a house at the North Pole, and who'll have him thoroughly checked out. Then we'll talk. Otherwise, forget it.

That would be the common-sense approach.

Common sense does not apply to parapsychology. If there are thousands of people running about claiming to be psychic, we are expected to believe that some of them are the real goods, even though no given psychic is ever able to do anything paranormal under controlled conditions. As near as I can make out, this reasoning (if that is the word) is justified by some sort of strange interpretation of the law of averages. Along the same lines, if we picked a number of apples from a bushel which we had been assured was full of good apples, and found that every single one we examined was thoroughly rotten, presumably the parapsychologists would have us conclude that by the law of averages there must be some apples somewhere in the bushel that are perfectly edible. This kind of logic is beyond me.

So in this article I propose to concentrate on one particular alleged psychic, Uri Geller, a former Israeli stage magician who now claims that his feats are for real. He is a likely choice because he is acknowledged to be one of the top superstars (or "superminds", as the devout like to call them) in the psychic big leagues. He has been featured on radio and T.V., had books written about him, been tested by scientists. If his claims can be shown to be fraudulent, then it is clear that claims of lesser psychics, resting on much flimsier foundations, are placed in question, to say the least.

And Geller is also an appropriate choice because his "discoverer", Dr. Andrija Puharich, author of The Sacred Mushroom and Uri: A Journal of the Mystery of Uri Geller, spoke recently at U of T. (Puharich, incidentally, also lays claim to many other distinctions, including that of having been taken up in a spaceship by extraterrestrial visitors and that of having met the ancient hawk-god Horus while walking in the desert with Uri Geller. Gellerly confirms these events. Unfortunately no one else was present.)

Finally, Geller is the subject of a book by a professional stage magician, James Randi ("The Amazing Randi") entitled The Magic of Uri Geller. Randi's book is a devastating expose of the way Geller has hoodwinked many well-meaning but credulous people.

Geller, as many people know, claims to be able to perform a wide variety of psychic feats, such as bending spoons and keys, sending and receiving psychic impulses over distances, reproducing drawings that have been sealed in envelopes, starting stopped watches, and the like.

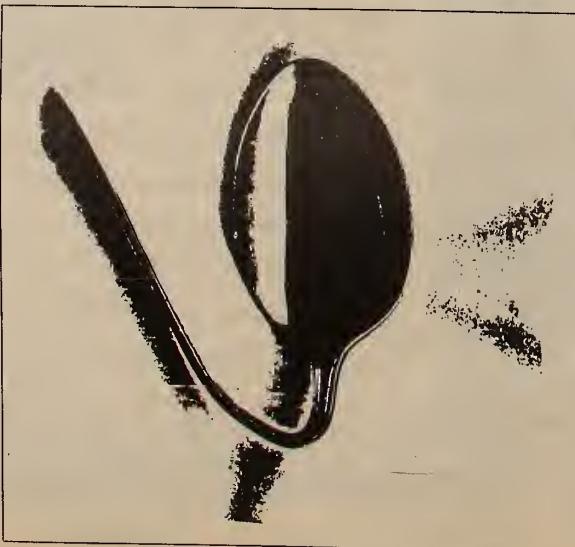

Randi explains how Geller is able to perform his feats using the techniques of the performing magician, techniques which have no "paranormal" component to them whatever. He also cites numerous occasions on which Geller has been caught while resorting to trickery. In fact, Geller left his native Israel when the press and the courts there exposed him as a fraud, ending his profitable career there as a psychic. Included in the Israeli accounts are descriptions from former assistants and his former girlfriend of the way Geller planned and rehearsed the tricks he used to create his psychic illusions. In fact, his former chauffeur now performs many of his tricks!

The explanations of how the various tricks are done are interesting, although most of them have been described in the literature of magic before. But especially fascinating, and frequently hilarious, are the accounts of how Randi and other magicians have themselves imitated Geller and done "Gellerisms" to prove how easy it is to fool those who have presented themselves as authorities in the field. For example in 1975 Randi presented himself as a bona fide psychic from Canada (Randi was in fact born in Toronto) to Psychic News, a leading psychic newspaper in England. He went to their offices, and proceeded to give the "experts" a demonstration of his powers they found so convincing that they featured Randi on the front page as a new "discovery" with marvellous powers. There was no possibility of deceit, they assured their readers!

Around the same time, Randi also performed in a laboratory at the University of London's King's College before a committee of eminent scientists headed by Nobel Prize Winner Maurice Wilkins, co-discoverer of DNA. Although he knew in advance that Randi was a performer who would try to trick them, he was able to do a whole routine of Gellerisms so effectively that they didn't know what he had done until he explained it afterwards. They were later happy to endorse his contention that an investigation of apparent paranormal phenomena is useless unless a qualified conjurer is present.

Randi also paid a visit to Professor John Taylor, a mathematician who has authored a splashy book on parapsychology entitled superminds. Taylor's contributions to the "science" are nothing short of comical. For example, he has discovered something called the "shyness effect": the fact that psychics are often unable to bend spoons, etc. through psychic means while being observed, but are able to do it when they are not observed. In fact, Taylor has let "psychics" he was testing take spoons home with them, and bring them back bent, never doubting for a moment that the cutlery had been bent by psychic brainwaves. Randi performed a whole series of "Gellerisms" before this "trained observer" without him being any the wiser.

The so-called scientific controls used

Shortage of hard evidence indicates Geller twists facts as well as spoons.

Scientists who "test" Geller's feats don't want to spoil good vibes by acting suspicious.

to test psychics are in fact nothing short of a scandal. Randi's book is sprinkled with examples. For example, there is the famous "steel room" in which Geller was tested at one point, which was not soundproof, which was not checked for bugs, which had a large unguarded hole on one side, and the lock of which was found to have been tampered with. Or the tray of cutlery which Geller was to bend, which was left unguarded in his dressing room! Or the fact that during tests Geller's assistants are allowed to roam at will among the props used for the experiments. Or the fact that Geller's mentor, Dr. Puharich, holds several patents for microelectric devices for the deaf, which are designed to be implanted in the mouth or elsewhere on the body, to receive messages which are not audible to others! Or the fact that during tests Geller's every whim is catered to, that he is allowed to run about at will, refusing or postponing attempts at any test, returning to abandoned ones, and in general doing everything he can to misdirect attention.

The reports of test results reveal not only a lack of basic experimental skill, but a considerable lack of candour as well. Randi cites a number of examples of dishonest reporting of key tests.

The whole question of authentication has been hopelessly and deliberately muddled by his followers and by Geller himself. For example, he claims to be able to reproduce drawings in sealed envelopes without looking at them. In fact, he has been able to do this trick only under informal uncontrolled conditions which lend themselves to fraud. Under controlled conditions, he has never been able to do it. Yet in boasting of this ability, Geller will claim that he has been rigorously tested! The situation is similar for all of his feats. Not a single one of Geller's alleged psychic feats has been performed under controlled conditions that meet scientific standards. In fact, Randi has a standing offer to pay $10,000 to Geller or any other person who can perform a single paranormal act under controlled conditions. There have been no takers.

The handful of scientists who believe in Geller (notice that you rarely hear anything about the vast majority who don't!) have been severely criticized for their lack of experimental skill, and for their inability to devise acceptable ways of testing psychic phenomena. This is no surprise, as Randi points out. Most of them have come from fields, such as mathematics and physics, that have had nothing to do with the phenomena they have been investigating. They have been no more qualified to investigate these phenomena than you or I, or my grandmother. Yet they have assumed, with the arrogance typical of scientists, that they are infallible, and incapable of being fooled. They have ended by making fools of themselves.

In the process of doing so, they have also managed to junk most of the basic rules of scientific method, and to construct a whole set of "special" rules for investigating parapsychology. One of these rules is that psychic phenomena can only occur in an atmosphere where the "sensitive" feels trusted. This means, for example, that a psychic like Geller who claims to be able to detect compasses may not be searched for magnets. It also means that suspicious people are not allowed to be present. It is because professional magicians give off "negative vibrations" that Geller absolutely refuses to have them present while he performs. (It has nothing to do with their being uniquely equipped to detect trickery, of course.) Yet Geller has performed in the presence of Randi and other magicians when he has not known who they were. On those occasions, he has produced "paranormal events" without noticing any "negative vibrations", with the result that at those times, he has been caught using trickery.

But the proven use of trickery is of no concern to the scientists who have investigated Geller. In fact, they have constructed another "scientific rule" that actually justifies it. According to them, the psychic, because of his need to be trusted, feels compelled to cheat whenever he can. In other words, when he does tricks without being caught cheating, they are proof he is psychic. And when he is caught, that's also proof he is psychic.

The parascientists have similarly turned failure into its opposite. They say that the fact that Geller's stunts often fail is proof of the fact that he is not a mere performer, for a performer would succeed every time! Thus, for example, the fact that Geller was unable to do anything on the Johnny Carson show (Carson, a former magician himself, made sure that conditions were tightly controlled so that there was no room for cheating) is proof of the erratic nature of psychic phenomena! A refinement of this insight was developed in a series of experiments in which astronaut Edgar Mitchell attempted to transmit psychic messages from the moon. The experimenters failed even more often than one would have expected from the law of averages. They immediately proceeded to claim a "significant" "negative success" because their results had deviated from the average!!

It should be apparent by this time that reason plays no role in the investigation of psychic phenomena. Consider, for example, the logic of investigators who are perfectly satisfied that Uri Geller is a psychic because he can perform certain feats in their presence. They are unwilling to admit that Geller might have tricked them, even though The Amazing Randi, for example, can perform identical, and even more difficult feats in their presence under more tightly controlled conditions using mere trickery without them being able to detect that trickery. Yet they are unwilling, of course, to maintain that Randi is also a psychic.

There is an amusing story in Randi's book that sums up the psychic circus beautifully. It concerns a young psychic James Pyczynski who appeared on a radio program hosted by Long John Nebel. He was reported to have uncontrollable supernatural powers, which had resulted in paranormal events happening in listeners' homes when he appeared on an earlier program. Listeners were asked to call in if strange things started happening to them while he was on the air.

For the next hour, the switchboard was flooded with reports. The calls only ceased — and quite suddenly, at that — when Randi joined the broadcast, revealing that Pyczynski was his assistant, and that the whole thing had been a hoax to prove a point.

We may safely assume, however, that most of the listeners learned nothing from their experience. The precedents are there. Some years ago, Margaret Fox, one of the founders of modern spiritualism, confessed that she had been a fraud. Most of her followers simply refused to believe her confession.

We can go even further back for another historical parallel, to the time of early Christianity, when Tertullian proclaimed what has ever since been the ultimate canon of faith: Credo quia absurdum. I believe because it is absurd. In these words is captured the very quintessence of the irrational in its glory — unblushing, majestic, and self-satisfied beyond redemption. Unreason proclaims its kingdom. "Nothing remains" as Bakunin once said, "but the triumphant stupidity of faith".

Giannini looked uncomfortable when asked about political aspects of Wertmuller's films. Perhaps he, like other observers, was unable to find any.

We must credit Lina Wertmuller's sparkling success in part to the rapidity with which her films descend upon the theatres. Breathless from dashing to Swept Away, Love and Anarchy, Seven Beauties, Seduction of Mimi, Triumph of the Will, and reruns of same, we will only have time to loosen our scarves before two more new films jam the North American box offices and film critics' columns. Given this sweep of inspired and brilliantly-executed films, it is understandable that Wertmuller's art has given rise to a cult of admirers.

But what is it in particular that engenders this rash of high lip-service toward the films? Without a doubt, Giancarlo Giannini, the male lead in most Wertmuller's films, leaves the strongest impression of any of her characters or images. He is what The New York Times terms the "homme fatale". Those striking aqua eyes surpass even the Paul Newman trademark of blue, blue, blue.

Small wonder, then, that Giannini's appearance at FACI, the Federation of Italian-Canadian Associations and Clubs, one week today, and earlier in the day at Innis College, drew not only timid gazes but forthright questions about the expressiveness of his eyes. His replies were modestly framed and he agreed that a lot of the feelings expressed, as an actor, through his facial and body movement are actually contained within.

Above and beyond his rough, Italian appeal, Giannini comes across as an extremely serious professional, and by no means lacking in intellectual skills and a kind of grave panache. To Mastroianni, he attributes a certain amount of sensibility which he has learned through studying him.

Yet Giannini brings to mind other film greats. In contrast to the difficult island scenes in Swept Away which required him to maintain a statuesque physical aloofness, we are given in Love and Anarchy the weak figure who tremblingly eats alone, yet sits amidst a troupe of cackling prostitutes in a classy Roman bordello. The latter image recalls the pathos of the scene in The Gold Rush, in which Chaplin awakes to find that the two town beauties whom he has invited to supper haven't shown up but are instead carrying on in the town saloon's New Year's Eve party. Signs of the Chaplin talent are revealed in Giannini's physical bearing in the bordello and also in the very characterization of the innocent young man, misled by a passionate cause.

Not only moments in Giannini's roles but the entire Wertmuller technique resembles Chaplin's films. Each scene in her movies is shot twice — the first time without dialogue to force the actors to fully portray emotion and action without words, and the second time with the words. Giannini remarked at FACI that a great deal of what we see is retained whereas only a small percentage of auditory impressions remains with us. He went on to justify this primary stage in Wertmuller's filming by comparing it to the impact of the early silent films.

The most obvious question was, does Giannini personally espouse the politics of his films? He became noticeably uncomfortable when asked this question since it was coupled with a question asking whether or not the films were receiving Socialist funding for propagandistic reasons. Giannini denied this vehemently and pointed out that each movie (and they are all political) endorses a variety of political philosophies.

Giannini also said that if the films represented his political tendencies, he would not have been able to play Pasqualino in Seven Beauties. No longer the passionate, idealistic innocent of Love and Anarchy, Pasqualino consistently sacrifices whatever pride and principle he may have had in his Neapolitan life with his seven sisters before the war against the Nazis, to a series of perversions and an expedient philosophy of "self-survival despite anything". Wertmuller does stimulate a "simpatia" view of Pasqualino, though somehow one feels he isn't worth it.

Thus with this variety of interpretations within the films themselves it would be wrong to stamp Giannini and Wertmuller as Socialists and leave it at that. The best one could say would be that Wertmuller surveys capitalism, proposes socialism, reflects upon anarchism's impracticality, defests Fascism and yet sympathizes with all their victims (who are either preyed upon or who inflict). Wertmuller's is a compassion for the passions of men. She cinematizes the gap between the beautiful abstract of a political philosophy and the pain, the extremes, and the corruption that grows from the manifestations of these politics.

Giannini delivered an impromptu obituary for Luigi Visconti, the acclaimed Italian film director who died several hours before Giancarlo's appearances in Toronto last Wednesday. With an appropriate reference to Visconti's contribution toward the advancement of Italian film, Giannini added a note of personal sorrow since he and Visconti had just completed a film together. Any criticism standing against Wertmuller's sympathetic treatment of Giannini's roles, despite the character's depravity, may come into better perspective when Giannini appears under Visconti's direction. Hopefully, we will recognize to what extent Wertmuller tailors her roles to Giannini's appeal.

Giancarlo Giannini certainly does have a marketable appeal. Displaying no concerted attempt to amuse or attract attention, his soft-spoken manner and stringent ideas are naturally magnetic. His "eyes of the most unholly blue" (to quote Thomas Moore) can register the gamut of expression from knowing alarm — the expression with which he regards the garland of pink flowers encircling his pelvis when he awakes from a nap on the island in Swept Away — to jaded annoyance or passion — appeared saddened and pensive to his audience on Wednesday.

It will be wearying for him to continue his North American tour, promotion Seven Beauties and the other films — a tour perhaps totally unnecessary.

New Music fans find concert lyrical and emotionally appealing

Saturday night's New Music concert at Walter Hall featured a side of new music that is all too often ignored and one of which many people aren't even aware. The audience was neither deafened by stentorian electronic sounds nor bored by intricately constructed but unapproachable twelve tone and atonal compositions, but rather was delighted by lyrical and unconventional, yet very unusual and approachable pieces.

The concert began with a piece for brass quintet by Canadian James Montgomery. Perhaps paying homage to John Cage, the musicians prepared relatively ceremoniously, but at the downbeat, instead of brass fanfare there was . . . wind. In fact, not until the middle of the first section was a "normal" musical tone heard. The performers sang through their instruments, played only their mouthpieces, used wah wah, flutter tonguing and other unconventional methods of producing sounds, all blending into an overall structure. The piece had enough contrast to keep it interesting. The fourth and final section came as a startling surprise; it was romantic in character and even ended in a recognizable cadence. The mood of the work is best described by its title, "White Fire".

"Sentire" by Sven-Erik Back was conceived as a more improvisational piece, using "a relatively free and partly optical score" which relied heavily on the performers' sensitivity, interaction and general musicality. It was brilliantly performed by the trio featuring Peter Schenkman on cello, John Hawkins on piano, and Raobert Aitken on flute. The latter was particularly impressive not only in this piece but also later in the program as both performer and conductor.

"Garden Rain", by one of the evening's featured guest composers, Toru Takemitsu, followed. It was scored for ten brass players and based on the following poem: "Hours of leaves of life and I am their gardener . . . Each hour falls down slow"

This poem provided inspiration and structure. Each hour was a short musical statement set off by a pause. Takemitsu made beautiful use of dynamics, thickness of texture, and especially of extraordinary chord voicings with moving lines and accents weaving through them, always on the point of resolution only to head in a different direction. His other pieces, "Folios" for solo guitar, and "Bryce" for two harps, flute, marimba, and percussion, were equally successful. "Bryce", in a world premiere performance, was, in my opinion, the most successful piece of the evening. Perhaps inspired by the composer's presence, the musicians gave an astonishingly subtle and sensitive performance. Takemitsu has developed a very personal style of composition, incorporating elements from many musical traditions into a very beautiful, magical, sometimes even romantic, whole. Alcides Lanza, the evening's other guest composer, created somewhat bleaker moods. His first piece, "Modulos", for solo guitar, was to me, and probably to most of the audience, judging from its reception, quite unapproachable. Call it "composers' music" or whatever, it holds little interest for an audience not equipped with scores and conservatory training. There were some interesting and perhaps new effects produced by the guitar, but overall, the piece made too little use of contrast, dynamics, and texture, and ultimately projected nothing.

Lanza's second piece, "Kron'keiz 75", was much more successful. It was the most controversial and daring piece of the evening, making use of multi-media and electronics, and carrying a definite political message. This may explain the audience's mixed reaction. It was humorous, sad, irritating, and certainly haunting. Speakers were set up around the room carrying the two actors' half-human, sing-song cries, various taped sounds, and an undelined radio broadcast. This was backed up by freely scored sounds from a ten piece chamber group, producing altogether a very powerful effect, particularly after the somewhat more subdued pieces which preceded it. The piece ended in the spirit of John Cage and brought to a close a most enjoyable and emotionally powerful concert.

Contrary to popular belief, he is not a Sicilian though his superb dialect impressed Sicilian fellows at FACI and was essential to Swept Away. This is only one facet of his sweeping professionalism.

I witnessed at FACI what began as timid curiosity and ended in fanatic crowding, snapshot-taking and autograph-seeking. His simple presence was enough to command respect but his words (he spoke totally in Italian) inflamed strong sentiments for Italy among many of the people at the reception.

Giancarolo's visit will be warmly remembered and whatever the Werthemuller-Giannini magic is, I hope it will endure.

Lou Reed speaks: is this man punk of the year?

Over the years, Lou Reed has been described as an "enfant terrible" and an "amphetamine phantom haunting the streets of New York". He has been called degenerate, irresponsible and a drug addict; at present he is involved in fifteen lawsuits totalling a million and a half dollars. Yet the man I met in the bar of the Hotel Toronto has a BA from Syracuse University, where he majored in English with a minor in Religion and Philosophy. During our conversation he alluded to Dostoevski, T.S. Eliot, Albee and Shakespeare. He also discussed photography, art, and film with considerable expertise. Could this be the man whom the readers of Creem magazine voted punk of the year in 1975?

Q. At times during your solo career you seem to have released albums with the specific intention of gaining popularity, so you could devote yourself to such projects as Berlin and Metal Machine Music. Has this been a conscious effort on your part?

Reed: Totally, yes really, as a matter of fact. It just saved me a lot of time.

Q. Coney Island Baby the first album which combines both elements, i.e. personal satisfaction and record sales?

Reed: No, it's just the first album I had my own way totally, except for Metal Machine which cleared the room.

Q. How long has Coney Island Baby been ready for release? For example, you have had the idea for She's My Best Friend for some time now.

Reed: Oh, for like ten years. Yeah, usually it doesn't take that long, to say the least. But She's My Best Friend never came together in a form that I was happy with. I guess I'm the only judge.

Q. Is Coney Island Baby then an album which contains all the songs you've ever wanted to do?

Reed: No, a lot of them took two seconds to write. But Coney Island Baby has everything the way I want it, from top to bottom.

Q. Do you see it as a direct extension of your Velvet Underground days?

Reed: In the sense that it's exactly what I wanted to do, it's an extension of my part of the Velvet Underground. I mean, I was one of four, well, one of two.

Q. What are your feelings about the Velvet Underground now?

Reed: A great but over-rated band, you know?

Q: Why did you leave the band?

Reed: Because we were going to get popular, with all the wrong things going wrong, with a lot of people around pushing it like the wrong way; the way the songs got edited on the Loaded album. It was all wrong, so when I went solo the same thing happened again, except I was ready for that kind of thing.

Q: What do you think of your first solo album in retrospect?

Reed: It's got some of the best songs I ever wrote, but the production sucks.

Q: Songs that immediately spring to mind are "Lisa Says", "Wild Child", "Going Down"...

Reed: Do you want to hear something really funny about "Going Down"? There's a magazine in America called Mademoiselle, not Mademoiselle, Ms. And they had an article, right: this woman has written this thing about the death of her kid, a kidney transplant. Apparently it was a real thing, right, a real story. They had done the transplant from her, a kidney, took it out of her and gave it to the kid. And the kidneys, you know, the body rejects the kidney. It's just a grotesque, awful story and she says right in the middle of it, and a friend showed it to me: "I was so depressed, I went home and played one of the few things I can listen to," she said, "I played 'Going Down'". I'm reading this thing and my initial reaction was that's somebody's idea of a sick joke, that's not funny to write an article like that. But, you know, it got to me to the point of checking on it. Like are those articles for real or are they bullshit, you know? And it was like for real — like, it was an extremely well written article. The woman was pretty intelligent, she was Austrian, and it was like the way her descriptions of her kid were dispassionate, which made it all the worse.

Q: And you hadn't associated your song with that?

Reed: No, it's not that at all. I associate the song with a lot of things, mainly going down for the last time; that's what I was talking about and her last time was that. It doesn't matter what it was, you know. You end up the same place, it doesn't matter how you get there. It just took me a little to say that a woman that is that refined, her intellect you know, that she would listen to something by me. You know they always say: "Who's in your audience, Reed?" and I don't know, they're on all fours out there. I don't fucking know. You look at them, I can't see out of the fucking sunglasses. There was a member of the audience, why didn't somebody ask her. Cause it was for real, cause it's too demented to think that somebody's sitting there, although I suppose it's not, you know — "let's see, how shall I earn sixty bucks per paragraph? I'll write about a kidney transplant, far out, and what will I do? I'll listen to Lou Reed when I do it. That's fantastic, who else can I work in? Sly? No, he doesn't happen." So I think it was legit. And I said like, oh, it's good it wasn't a pig.

Q: How did working with David Bowie influence you on the production side? Did it influence you at all?

Reed: No, which is not a negative on David.

Q: How did you come to work with Bowie?

Reed: It came about, you know, it just came about. I mean it was a mutual thing.

Q: Do you regret the collaboration?

Reed: No, not at all.

"Do you want me to tell you all my secrets? ... I can tell you exactly how I do it ... you can print the whole thing ... there's the conceived Lou Reed image, which will fight off everything I say."

Q: Did you take the photographs for the Sally Can't Dance album?

Reed: Yeah, sure. It's a polaroid. I have a whole stack of them. I wanted to put out a book. I've got a book that's coming out, funnily enough. It's called All the Pretty People and it's going to be on Stonehill press as of now. Poems and drawings is what it amounts to. It's kind of nice, cause I've been publishing like for these literary magazines, right — you know they're in existence for six months, eight people read them at Harvard and they go under. Like the Coldriver Review. I'm in that this quarter — I'm also in the Transatlantic Quarterly.

Q: Can I ask you about the Berlin album. When did you decide to develop and build an album around the song Berlin from your first solo album?

Reed: Oh, well, I messed it up on my first solo album. Yeah, I didn't do it right and I wanted really to do it right again. I figured, how can I get that down again and I thought I would write an album about it. I don't fucking know: I just knew I didn't do it right and I could have called it Toledo, but nobody would have been interested. I mean, cause it's as much about Berlin as it is about Toledo.

Q: Have you had any thoughts about going into film, perhaps adapting ...

Reed: Are you serious? Of course. What do you fucking think?

Q: With Warhol?

Reed: Sure. As soon as it's possible. I mean we have to be very careful.

Q: What do you think of his films?

Reed: His films as opposed to films with his name on them, which I don't like at all ...

Q: Blow Job?

Reed: There's a film where the title is the whole thing. Everybody in the audience is sitting there waiting for this guy to come. It's so fucking funny, because, who says he's even being blown? You know. People think that he is. They don't know. In point of fact he was being blown. Thing is, it's like a mind fuck. It is a mind fuck. The people are sitting there in the theatre waiting for this guy to come and the film goes on as long as Andy had film.

Q: The Empire State Building thing ...

Reed: Which was not meant to be a movie. That was supposed to be like a moving picture, in the truest sense of the word, like projected against your living room, you know, the size of a picture, and if you look at it periodically it was like a beautiful picture of the Empire State Building that was moving, like, and then dawn came, out a sight. It was not supposed to be shown in a theatre where you sat for twenty-four hours. He made the greatest movie I ever saw, for what it was worth, it was only shown once, called Four Star. Someone made a movie of Walk on the Wild Side that was one prolonged male orgy. Right across the street from RCA by the way. No credits in the movie, nothing, except in the middle of this like suck-fuck orgy, right in the middle, out of focus, they hold up my album. I was sitting there saying Thanks! you know, Thanks, that's really decent of you. I really appreciate that guys. And it was out of focus. And they were playing Walk on the Wild Side, and, what the fuck's the line? "Jackie was just speeding away" ... and they show a guy in a corvette, in Los Angeles, on the freeway! I love it, I love it, do it to me again. Jackie is just speeding away, perfect, I never thought of that. So where were we?

Q: You stated publicly that you dislike the whole Rock 'n' Roll Animal phase of your career. Why?

Reed: I dislike that whole part of it, because it was a morbidly grotesque time. It was power play, that's all.

Q: In musical terms what do you think of the live albums?

Reed: Oh, they're OK, they're good, they're really good. They're really up there for that kind of music.

Q: How long did it take to record Metal Machine Music?

Reed: Two weeks, that was it, not really two weeks.

Q: Do you have any plans for a similar album? Or have you got it out of your system?

Reed: Yeah, I got it out of my system. I don't have it in me to make another one right now, not what it took to do that then.

Q: What makes it a commendable album for you?

Reed: What do I think makes it commendable? Just that I had total control from start to finish

THE SO-CALLED FIELD OF HONOUR PART I A DUEL — LIVE, ONSTAGE

Many real life situations can be characterized as zero sum, two person, non-cooperative games; that is to say, there are two people involved, they have opposing motives or goals and what one wins, the other loses. A classic case is that of the duel. We will run a duel in public and observe the behavior of the duellists to see how well, if at all, they correspond to theoretically optimum behavior. and it's exactly the way I wanted it from start to finish, including the packaging. I wouldn't back off that thing at all.

Q: Would you say a lot of what you do is spontaneous?

Reed: No, only in a sense that I would just let a bunch of people take me wherever they were going. I wanted to get popular. Seriously, because I wanted to get popular so I'd have enough power to put out a couple of things I wanted. I've made my move, that ballgame's over. I don't care, you understand, like what happens from that point on. I would have left it at Metal Machine, seriously. I have other things, other toys I can play with.

Q: What about your poems?

Reed: Some of them are song lyrics or lyrics before they became song lyrics. Like Coney Island Baby was originally a poem in the Harvard Advocate. It's called The Coach and the Glory of Love. It had a huge rap at the beginning and five stanzas, that's what it was.

Q: How autobiographical is that track?

Reed: One hundred per cent? ... Two hundred per cent? What does autobiographical mean . . . which is like when I did Heroin, people were coming up and saying: "Hey man, you take fucking heroin." It's like did Dostoevski have to commit murder for Crime and Punishment? I mean not to say that I'm up on that level, but it's like they could only get off if I said "Yes, it's all true."

Q: You said now you're into total control. . . .

Reed: I've been into it for years, I just couldn't pull it off. There's a difference. I didn't go through all that shit for nothing. I mean I went at it very consciously, very clinically, very coldly — put it that way, even though the way I looked may not have seemed cold, you know that part of my brain was cold, saying how could I get to a position where I can shove this down their fucking throats and let them suck on it? How can I have my own way? Like how can I have Berlin not go down the drain? This concept of total control is an ancient subject in that it's something I've wanted for the longest time.

Q: What happens after Coney Island Baby?

Reed: I'll do whatever I want. Like Coney Island Baby after Metal Machine is the other side of Metal Machine. So somebody says — do you like Coney Island Baby — I say I love it, but along with that you're talking to someone who loved Metal Machine Music. So there's a problem. How do you fucking love both? Well that's it, if you buy a Lou Reed album you don't know what the fuck you're going to get stuck with.

Q: There was talk of releasing Metal Machine Music on the classical label.

Reed: Yeah, but I stopped it. I jive-assed them into releasing it. It was a set-up. Who comes off selling a top-ten schlock album like Sally Can't Dance which is a piece of shit from beginning to end. It went top-ten without a single, no less, fantastic. The worse they get, the more they sell. It's just phenomenal. So I talked them into Metal Machine Music, having it on the pop label. I even put a cover on it so it looked like a rock 'n' roll album, live no less. It couldn't be more of a sucker thing in the sense that the people who bought it were not getting what one might want. I mean because it's a minority kind of music within a minority. It was like Andy's soup can. The idea was good enough, because like Billboard's review was like: Recommended cuts — none, no vocals, sounds like car static. I loved it, I loved it. I wish someone had done it. I'll do it. It cleared the air, because like what happens with this next album? They'll say he's finished.

Q: In fact Melody Maker called the next album, Coney Island Baby, "your finest achievement".

Reed: I know it is. Because I had total control. How can any of the other albums come close! Not a prayer, because it's a dynamite album and I know it.

Q: How long did it take to record that album?

Reed: A week and a half, two weeks.

Q: Do you normally work quickly in the studio?

Reed: I do. I don't when other people are bothering me. That's why I needed total control.

Q: You seem to have changed musicians fairly regularly. Why is this?

Reed: The guys I used on my last album have been around me for two years. It's hard to hold onto musicians, they're slippery little devils. They've been around me a while; they've got to go out and play right now to earn some money. They have things like rent, families, really dreary trips. The last band is the one I really go for.

Q: You yourself play guitar and piano on this album. Do you enjoy playing guitar?

Reed: Sure! I wouldn't have done it. I'm a great guitarist in all due modesty. I just didn't see any reason to do it in public.

Q: How conscious are you of your image?

Reed: Very conscious of it.

Q: Even now when you have total control?

Reed: Sure, because I'm sitting out there thinking what do all these little buggers want. Do you want me to tell you all my secrets? Because it doesn't matter, that's an interesting thing I've found out. I can tell you exactly how I do it, why I do it and it won't mean shit. You can print the whole thing, I can give you a blueprint. First of all it goes in one eye and out the other, that's assuming they did read it. First of all, if they're smart enough to read or care enough to buy magazines, they're going to buy the record anyway. Two, there's the conceived Lou Reed image, which will fight off everything I say, because I can always say I lied, so I'm covered. It just doesn't matter at all. I've found this out, I've sat down with the kids. I've said, I'm fucking bankrupt, I don't have any money, I have fifteen lawsuits going on. What do you want out of my life? They say "You're a rockstar Lou". I love it, it's adorable. That's what it's all about. It doesn't make a fucking difference.

Things are so boring over here, somebody do something. So it might as well be me. And if not I'll go into selling shoes, instead of me. I'm better than a shoe, I'm like an all purpose tent. I'm a mental igloo, which doesn't mean anything but sounds as though it does. I mean you freeze their minds, you heat their minds, you keep them insulated, isolated. It's like an all purpose answer, whoever's listening to it is reading into it all their own things.

Back in the days of the Velvet Underground Lou Reed used to sing:

Reflect what you are

In case you don't know.

For years now, Lou Reed has been doing exactly that. Each album has been a mirror and perhaps that's why people have been afraid to look, resorting to cheap insults instead. But those days are over: Lou Reed is his own master now and there are going to be no more walks on the wild side. Ironically it was the album Transformer, the first to win him wide acclaim, that hinted of the shape of things to come, when he sang:

You keep hangin' round me
And I'm not so glad you found me

You're still doing things that I gave up years ago.

Introducing Clarks® POLYVELDT®

IN TIMES LIKE THESE WHEN NOTHING LASTS, POLYVELDT IS REVOLUTIONARY. IT LASTS.

PROTECTED UNDER PATENT NUMBERS

Clarks has invented a wholly new kind of shoe that's made to be more comfortable, more durable, than any ordinary shoe. It's called Polyveldt, and only Clarks Canada has it.

We think you've had enough holes in your leather soles, enough erosion in your rubber soles, enough peeling and splitting in your cushion crepe soles.

Polyveldt puts an end to all that. Its sole is an incredibly durable new material. In abrasion tests, the Polyveldt sole has outlasted leather, rubber and crepe. Polyveldt shoes we've tested showed barely a change in the sole after a year and a half of constant wear. The Polyveldt is lighter, so it doesn't cause the kind of fatigue other shoes do. Flexible, so it moves the way your foot does. And it doesn't mark surfaces like so many other soles do.

In addition, the Polyveldt sole has proved to excel in traction on wood, stone, tile, concrete, every kind of surface we could find. So climbing up a rocky slope or running for a bus, you're more surefooted with the Polyveldt sole.

But the most important characteristic of Polyveldt is its comfort. In a regular shoe, if you stepped on a sharp rock, you'd feel the point through the sole. In a Polyveldt, the sole accommodates the unevenness, acts as a shock absorber; and keeps your foot evenly cushioned. The shaping of the sole was determined by careful study of your foot. When you walk, your body weight shifts from side to side, putting "rolling pressure" on all the tiny bones in your feet. When this weight shift is uneven, it causes more wear on one side of the average heel than the other. But Polyveldt is made to help resist this uneven wear, keeping your foot as level as possible so as not to put too much pressure on any one part of your foot.

The upper form of the shoe is made of the highest quality leather, carefully treated and prepared by experts in leathercraft before it qualifies for the Polyveldt shoe. Thick cut and carefully molded, it rounds out the total comfort and quality of the Polyveldt.

Polyveldt is revolutionizing footwear, setting a standard that all manufacturers should try to meet.

Come in for a test run and see for yourself. We've told you as much as we can, your feet will tell you the rest.

How the rational animal tortures other animals

In a recent report Amnesty International, an organization dedicated to the alleviation of unjust torture and imprisonment suffered by innocent victims asserted that, at present, to the extent of their knowledge, Canada and the United States do not practise torture within their boundaries.

Their statement was grossly inaccurate. Every day, in the name of science, sentiment, intelligent individual beings are routinely subjected to torture. Because they do not speak the dominant language, they cannot protest their treatment.

How is it that their plight goes overlooked by many of the most ardent social humanitarians? Author Peter Singer provides the answer. They are victims of what may be called speciesism — a prejudice... toward the interests of members of one's own species and against those members of other species'. (p.7).

The book in which Singer explains and attacks speciesism and the abuses that result from it is Animal Liberation, A New Ethics for Our Treatment of Animals (The New York Review, N.Y., N.Y. 1975). It is a landmark work in the field of liberation movements; a non-alarmist, self-evident indictment of the atrocities human society regularly practices on the whole category of beings designated as non-human. Although examples of this mistreatment include fur trapping and raising, wild animal 'harvesting', cosmetic extractions and, of course the consequences of the 'expansion of man's sterile concrete dominion over the globe,' Singer narrows his attack in this particular book to the two most widespread and large-scale abuses of animals — intensive factory farming (the source of most of our meat today) and animal experimentation. For the purposes of this article-review, I will discuss only the latter.

Singer suggests that 'speciesism' the prejudice that makes 'other' animals the victims of the human being's every whim and caprice, is as reprehensible and inexcusable as racial or sexual prejudice. Like these varieties of prejudice, it is an example of the arbitrary drawing of boundaries between the in and out groups, be they interracial, sexual or animal.

Like the early proponents of any new liberation movement, animal liberation advocates can expect their share of ridicule and dismissal.

But Singer also decries the sentimental objections of some so called 'animal lovers': the person who 'adores' puppies but wears a fur coat, or the public appeasement that results when mice are substituted for beagles in a cruel and lethal poison gas experiment. Discrimination among animals in favour of those who are 'cute' reveals a patronizing, degrading attitude.

Besides being divided from people, animals have been divided into classes which correspond to the classes of people who are allowed to abuse them in varying degrees. Pets, the darling playthings and faithful companions of human individuals, domestic adjuncts as it were, are protected by minimal laws pushed for by apologetic Humane societies. Farm and lab animals are in an arbitrarily separate category, designated as such by human market interests. These beings have virtually no 'protection' and are subject to unlimited use.

Singer thinks that our oppression of animals is perpetuated by habit. We have all been taught from earliest childhood to regard other animals as being subject to our needs and pleasures, from consumption of their dead bodies as meat to the use of their living bodies to test cosmetics. A moral imperative demands that these habits be changed.

Chapter two is titled 'Tools for Research — or what the public doesn't know it is paying for.' In it Singer goes on to document, most frequently in the form of the scientist's own dispassionate report, the atrocities that go on in the name of testing and research.

If any who read this chapter believed before that there were legal limits to the amount of suffering that animals can be made to endure, be advised that torture inflicted regularly on animals stops at nothing. The Canadian Animal For Research Act states that cruel and painful experimentation is not justified unless it is necessary for the experiment. The clause is a catch 22. In the words of Richard Ryder, a British psychologist: ... In other words, the principal loophole in this law (the British) as in all equivalent laws in other countries, is simply that, although painful experiments are technically only allowed if they are "necessary", the necessity itself is rarely, if ever, questioned...

It is a self-evident result. If the pain were not a part of the experiment, it would never have been inflicted.

The agonies imposed on animals by experimentation include, in the account of the book, starving (including starving to death), water deprivation (to the point of death), burning, breaking, lacerating, bleeding, choking, psychological destruction as in inducing severe pathological anxiety, depression, ulceration, etc. As Singer explains, a New York file of photocopies of experiments collected by United Action for Animals (a militant animal rights organization) from journal reports carries labels that 'tell their own story': "Acceleration", "Burning", "Aggression (induced)", "Asphyxiation", "Blinding",

"Burning", "Centrifuge", "Compression," etc.

The horrors remain only to be described in more detail, which Singer does. Most people who have ever been exposed to psychology texts can relate a few, disguised as they are in a euphemistic behaviorist jargon that denies animals sentient experience and reduces them to the status of machines.

Our taxes support this suffering. It is our responsibility to make it our business to know — to gain access to the closed labs of the nation and, if we react to what we find there, to publicize it. Only a tiny fraction (that portion of experiments deemed to be 'significant') reaches a limited number of people (often already biased in favor of the work being done) when it is published in scientific journals. One must read between the lines of euphemistic language to get an inkling of the agony involved in these experiments.

What animal experiments, if any, are justified?

Singer relates examples of uncounted trivial and unnecessary experiments conducted for every reason from the testing of cosmetics and detergents, to classroom teaching demonstrations, thesis subject and student experimentation, to experiments undertaken with the only objective being 'to see what will happen' (the 'free inquiry', as opposed to the applied, method of scientific exploration). In the last case, the spirit of 'the pursuit of knowledge' has resulted in the subjection of living animals to incredible suffering. As Singer points out, if the pursuit of knowledge justifies everything, why not experiment on humans? The answer is, of course, speciesism.

Experiments are often designed to prove the obvious, where 'a little thought, a little observation of the environment would lead to the same conclusions'.

Vital, life-saving experiments only account for a tiny fraction of all experiments done on animals. Most experiments test the glut of new products unnecessarily introduced into a capitalist market in which more products are sold as 'new and improved' in an effort to boost

"Why are so many of us being killed in car accidents?"

It's a fact. Last year the 16 to 24 age group accounted for more than one-third of all drivers killed on Ontario roads. And nearly 40% of all drivers involved in fatal accidents were our age. Maybe we can't change the world but we can change this. We've got to slow down. We've got to live.

Think about it.

sales. Most of these new substances are unnecessary and even environmentally dangerous artificial products. Each testing of a new product results in the painful deaths of hundreds of animals, besides contaminating the human environment.

What about alternate, non-animal methods of testing? Why aren't they being developed and used as rapidly as our present state of technology should allow?

The reasons given by Singer and others include suggestions (this one given by a scientist himself) that (1) scientists don't keep up with the journals, don't know about the latest methods (is ignorance an excuse?), (2) International lab suppliers and research organizations and lobbies make it their practice, in the interests of profit and research money investment to push and protect this form of experimentation. (Once again, market economy supersedes moral considerations.); and (3) Most significantly, scientists do not look for alternatives "Simply because they do not care enough about the animals they are using." (P.8).

One might well wonder at the detached attitude of the researcher. Singer himself does not regard the researcher as sadist, but rather as a well trained professional technician in an armoral technocracy.

Singer's recommendation for experimental reform rests upon the realization that a great deal of abuse can be eliminated even before subtle, hair-splitting argument regarding the relative equation of 'the more human lives saved if animals die' variety ever becomes a consideration.

When the issue of 'animal rights' is brought up, many people laugh. Are dogs to be given the vote? They will ask. Singer stresses that by equal rights he means equal right of consideration. Acknowledging that differences exist between species does not justify disregarding the rights of non-human animals. The possession of different qualities should not automatically lead to the ascription of differing 'quality'. Difference in type does not immediately mean a difference in value.

An example proves the fallacy of the 'equal weight' argument. 'Intelligence' is most often the quality by which human-animal distinctions are made. If this is a valid justification to use, why is it considered outrageous to practice cruel experiments on brain damaged infants? As Singer points out, many normal experimental animals, including apes and dogs, are more intelligent, more independent, more aware of self, more social, have more social attachments, more 'developed' than many brain damaged (let us say orphaned) human infants.

The reason the using of humans is at least ostensibly taboo in this country (as it certainly should be) while the using of any animal is not (which is not as it should be), is, again, speciesism.

In other words, the proof of equal nature should not be a prerequisite for equal merit. "The interests of every being affected by an action are to be taken into account and given the same weight as the like interests of any other being." All sentient creatures must fall, within the boundaries of consideration, since all sentient beings, possessing the capacity for enjoyment and suffering, 'the prerequisite for having interests at all', possess interests which morally demand consideration. While plants and stones do not appear to fall into this category, animals clearly do.

Singer, a university professor of philosophy from Australia who has visited British and American campuses (as well as farms, factories and research centres) to collect material for the book has this to say about the relation of the issue of animal experimentation to the campus community.

"How can taxpayers allow their money to be used to support experiments of this kind? And how can students go through a turbulent era of protest against injustice, discrimination, and oppression of all kinds, no matter how far from home, while ignoring the cruelties that are being carried out on their own campuses?"

Those who no longer wish to ignore these cruelties, who wish to join a pressure group or who would like to share information about specific conditions on campus, are urgently invited to contact the writer of this review at 964-7960.

Ont. Municipal Board debates Complex

By RALPH CHOQUETTE

The Ontario Municipal Board heard arguments pro and con U of T's proposed athletic complex yesterday.

A city-by-law which would allow the university to surpass the zoned density for the area is before the board for provincial approval.

Governing Councillor Tim Buckley spoke in favour of the by-law. Buckley outlined the steps taken by SAC last year when he was Vice-President to ascertain student opinion of the planned building. As student referendum at the time overwhelmingly supported an increase in athletic fees to contribute towards the project.

Emphasizing the need for athletic facilities were Phys Ed administrators Juri Daniel, Dalton White and Ann Hewett.

Among the area residents who spoke against the complex were Allan McAllister of the Huron-Sussex Residents Ass'n. and Rose Smith of the Sussex-Ulster Ratepayers.

Area residents have objected to the university's plan for the last year because they feel the complex is yet another incursion of the university into their neighbourhoods. They object to destruction of houses on the building site which have acted as a visual buffer between the university and the surrounding residential areas.

Other complaints of the residents include the impact of the building on parking in the area, the "aesthetics" of the edifice, and an alleged lack of consultation of university planners with residents.

After the hearing McAllister confessed, "I don't think we won." The board's decision is expected shortly.

In the clubs, Junior Walker and the All-Stars are at the El Mocambo. At the Chimney, John Cameron runs until Saturday. Ken Tobias plays at the Colonial all week. Sweet Blindness, with Paul McGrath doing his soft show shuffle routine, will be at the New Shamrock Hotel all week. Ray Materick is playing a two week run at the Riverboat. Watson and Reynolds are at folksy Egerton's all week, bring your own quailades. At the Hayloft In The Ports of Call Black Creek will be playing. Brutus is at the Gasworks. If you listen to AM-radio then you deserve the New City Jam Band at the Forge till Saturday. The War Amps is closer. If you like comedy Bill Glenn will be at the Brunswick House, every night. Phyllis Diller will be at the Royal York.

In concerts, LaBelle are coming on April 5, Helen Reddy is at Massey Hall April 1st, and Laura Nyro will be there April 8. On April 15 Patti Smith will be onstage at Massey Hall.

At the Gardens Genesis will perform two shows on Wed. March 31st. Coming up is Of Blue Eyes, Frank Sinatra on May 1st. Maybe retirement would be the kindest solution. Speaking of firing, Paul McCartney and Wings along with his wife who can't sing are threatening to play the Gardens on May 10.

Maria Muldaur and Tom Waits will be giving one of the year's best concerts on campus tomorrow night. Muldaur has had AM hits with "Midnight at the Oasis", "Feel My Thigh" and "It Ain't the Meat It's the Motion", but don't hold that against her. Her four coincides with the release of her third album Sweet Harmony. The $4.50 tickets are a bargain; the first time SAC has had a cheap (but quality) concert this year. There are two shows - 7:00 and 9:30 - at Convocation Hall. If you haven't got tickets for Gordon Lightfoot yet, who is appearing at Massey Hall all week, there are still some obstructed seats available, aside from the scalpers, of course.

Rehearsal for The Mines of Sulphur, which will premiere at the MacMillan Theatre, EJB, April 2, also running April 3, 9, and 10. Call 978-3744 for more details.

rock movie program, including Night Lunch: altogether you can see Roxy Music, Patti Smith, Elton John, David Bowie, Steely Dan, the Faces, the Stones, the Kinks, and some that I can't even be bothered to name.

SUNDAY As usual, the library at 560 Palmerston has a program of Golden Age Cartoons at 2:00, 4:00 and 7:00; this week among many others they have the Betty Boop Snow White with the Cab Calloway soundtrack. There's a nice double bill at the New Yorker: O Lucky Man at 2:00 and 7:00, and Harold and Maude at 4:45 and 9:45. Cinema Lumiere has the A.F.T. version of Albee's A Delicate Balance, directed by Tony Tom Jones Richardson and starring Katherine Brining up Baby Hepburn and Paul Night of the Living Lear Scofield.

MONDAY Cinema Lumiere, at 7:30: Fritz (Metropolis, M., The Big Heat, I promise not to do this any more) Lang's The Ministry of Fear; at 9:15, Robert Siodmak's The Killers, which quite early on stops being an adaptation of Hemingway. The New Yorker is closed for the Academy Awards.

TUESDAY One would be hard put to imagine a less appetizing movie than Vadim's Pretty Maids All in a Row at the Revue at 7:30: it was written by Gene Roddenberry; it stars Rock Hudson, Angie Dickinson, Telly Savates and Roddy McDowell. If you live to 9:15 you can sit through Charlotte too. While you're still in a sombre mood I'll mention the Bergman double bill at Cinema Lumiere: Persona at 7:45 and The Passion of Anna at 9:20. And at O.F.T. at 7:30, Night and Fog in Japan: the title is an allusion to Resnais' classic documentary on Auschwitz. The New Yorker has Harry And Tonto by Paul Mazursky, at 8:15, and at 6:30 and 10:15 Lester's Royal Flash: the only really good part is the end, a game of Russian roulette between Malcolm McDowell and Alan Bates.

Canadian poet John Newlove is the proposed 1976-77 U of T writer-in-residence.

Newlove's selection has yet to be approved by the Canada Council which provides half of the $15,000 a writer receives for the job at this university.

Among Newlove's published poetry collections are Elephants, Mothers and Others (1963), Moving in Alone (1965), Black Night Window (1968), The Cave (1970), and Lies (1972) as well as a number of private press and limited edition collections. Newlove has been writer-in-residence at Concordia University and at Western. He has received The Governor-General's Award.

President John Evans attempted to suspend the writer-in-residence programme last spring for 1975-76. It was claimed then that the university would be in a particularly important writer in honour of its sesquicentennial. Hugh MacLennan? A French-Canadian? Marie Claire Blais? Mavis Gallant? No: John Newlove.

An article by Leo Simpson in a recent Quill and Quire issue suggested that since Robertson Davies is 'Master of Massey', the campus is more or less conceded to him as his fief. No writer in residence will be brought in who will in any way challenge that position.

Intellectuals will be split three ways. The Revue has a Bunuel double bill: The Milky Way at 7:30 and Tristana at 9:20. Native education cut LETHBRIDGE (CUP) — The federal government is challenging the right of Canadian Treaty Indians to government-sponsored higher education. University and college education has always been considered a treaty right by Indians and the Department of Indian Affairs has been paying for it, but now that it is starting to cost money the Department wants to back down.

This is the view of Lynda Little Child, President of the University of Lethbridge Native Students Association.

More and more native people are reaching post-secondary levels of education each year. The Department of Indian Affairs sponsors Treaty Indian students for all educational expenses and away from home living expenses. At least, that is what the Department has been doing.

In the spring of 1975, the Department put out a "draft for discussion only" policy paper, the E-12 Circular, which proposed changes and new policy for the native higher education program.

The section of the paper which is the most controversial suggests that Indians should pay part of their educational costs. 15 per cent of single student's gross earned income should pay part of education costs, is the policy suggested in the circular. The Department would continue to finance the other 85 per cent of the cost.

Little Child commented that 15 per cent may not seem like much, but that if a precedent is set, this percentage could be gradually increased. Indians view the government sponsoring of education as part of the Treaty agreement and that there should be no division of educational expenses. The government is responsible for all of it.

According to Little Child, the E-12 Circular is one attempt by the government to gradually implement the 1969 White Paper on Indian Policy which was strongly protested by native people.

Chiefs from Indian bands throughout Alberta have written to Judd Buchanan, the Minister of Indian Affairs, protesting the E-12 Circular and they are of the opinion that post-secondary education is included as a right guaranteed by the Treaties.

Little Child says the Minister responded by way of a form letter which stated the Department did not view the Indian student financing program as a Treaty right. Rather, it is out of the generosity of the Department that the program exists, Buchanan claimed.

In fact, all the Treaties made in Alberta, by which the Indian peoples signed away their rights to the land, have clauses about education directly between the clauses dealing with Winchester rifles and axes.

"Her Majesty agrees to maintain schools for instruction in such reserves hereby made, as to her Government, the Dominion of Canada may seem advisable, whenever the Indians of the reserve shall desire." This is part of Treaty Six which in 1896 signed over most of Central Alberta from the Wood Cree and other tribes to the government.

Indians consider this Treaty made one hundred years ago very important and binding still today.

"To the Indians of Canada, the Treaties represent an Indian Magna Carta. The treaties are important to us because we entered into these negotiations with faith, with hope for a better life with honour," writes Harold Cardinal in his book The Unjust Society. He goes on to say the treaties have not been honoured but manipulated and changed by government policy.

To Little Child the government's policy move against the university and college education program is an attempt to erode the Treaty rights.

To openly contravene the Treaties would not be a smart move for the federal government. It is the gradual change and erosion of the contracts which Indians fear.

When the E-12 Circular was put out in the spring of 1975, the government planned to make it Department policy by the fall of that year. Many native groups protested that there had not been enough consultation with Indians and consequently the implementation of a policy was deferred until April 1976.

Little Child said "The government's actions have put us in a position of reaction, not consultation." In December of last year the National Indian Brotherhood Association selected a committee of 15 native students from across Canada to prepare a counter-proposal.

"The Treaty Indian feeling is that post-secondary education is a Treaty right for all the lands we have given up. It is paid for out of history. We have a moral right to expect education in return," she said.

Sexist rags attacked

MONTREAL (CUP) — Students of the Sir George Williams Campus of Concordia University have voiced personal opinions on what type of periodicals the campus bookstore should sell. The students have strongly objected to the selling of certain magazines which they claim are sexist — Playboy, Penthouse, Oui, and Mayfair.

Regan, spokesperson for the students, stated, "We're an educational institution and we shouldn't try to peddle this garbage."

Bookstore manager Margaret MacMurray feels that these magazines should not be removed. She said that students and staff want these periodicals in the stands, and that is why they are there. "I go by the opinion of what they like to see in the periodical section," she stated.

Regan countered that "any magazine sold in the bookstore should have some academic validity." There exists in Canada a wide variety of periodicals which students are urged to read in the course of their studies but which are not readily available. These should be sold. They include such magazines as Ramparts, Our Generation, and Science Magazine to name but a few.

Regan feels magazines such as Playboy and Penthouse treat women as pure sex objects and "pieces of ass". These periodicals can be purchased in any news store and therefore do not have to be sold at the university.

MacMurray stated that "censorship is a very difficult matter. It is difficult to satisfy everyone." She went on to say that when these periodicals were removed for a few months, there was an outcry from both students and faculty, and that a petition was presented to her urging the bookstore to restock the shelves with the magazines.

MacMurray added that Playboy has been sold at Sir George for many years and "there has never been any protest to have it removed: As a matter of fact, Playboy is sold in almost all universities across Canada."

"This is a moral principle rather than a popular opinion issue," explained Regan. He went on to say that students are beginning to treat women as more than just sex objects. Regan promised that there will be future objections to the periodicals' appearance on the stands at Sir George.

"A White Man's Country"

B.C.'s Anti-Asian Riots; Government Spies Killed

By KEN WYMAN

"For white man's land we fight -
To Oriental grasp and greed
We'll surrender, no never,
Our watchword be God Save The King,
White Canada Forever."

Is it the theme song of the Western Guard? No, the seventy-year-old ditty hearkens back to a time when people, died in the streets, government agents infiltrated non-white communities, and the militia had to be called out to control a "human wolfpack that prowled the waterfront" of Vancouver, looking for a chance to attack Hindu immigrants.

British Columbia, at the time of the First World War, was openly racist. "To admit orientals in large numbers," warned the Provincial Premier, Sir Richard McBride, "would mean in the end the extinction of the white people, and we always have in mind the necessity of keeping this a white man's country."

The Chinese immigrants of the late 1880's were welcomed with editorial comments such as this, from the Victoria, B.C. British Colonist: "The Chinese ulcer is eating into the prosperity of the country, and sooner or later must be cut out."

The CPR had lured 15,000 'coolies' to Canada to build the railroad. When the work was done about two-thirds of them left the country. But a period of high unemployment fanned the flames of racism.

"On January 11, 1887, an embittered mob of 1,000 unemployed Vancouverites marched to a waterfront pier," according to Ted Ferguson, author of A White Man's Country: An Exercise in Canadian Prejudice (Doubleday, $8.95). They "refused to let 100 Chinese aboard a Hong Kong schooner disembark."

"Forty-three days later another large mob invaded two Chinese settlements, burning tents and shacks and forcing the occupants to run for their lives, leaving their belongings to the flames.

"The following year the provincial government made a bid to curb Chinese immigration with the imposition of a $50 head tax. (The tax was ultimately declared unconstitutional and erased from the law books, only to be resurrected in 1903, this time rising to $500 per person.)"

The situation got worse. Newspapers published articles and editorials condemning the "brown tide." The government negotiated "a gentleman's agreement" with Japan, limiting immigration. And in 1907 the Asiatic Exclusion League was formed.

It was, according to Ferguson, "a racist organization whose membership was an odd blend of jobless workers, and some of the province's most prominent business, religious and military leaders.

Fifteen Thousand Riot

"The league was barely six months old when its spokesmen triggered the worst race riot in Vancouver's history."

"Two thousand league organized marchers, carrying banners exclaiming Keep Canada White, and Stop The Yellow Peril, descended on city hall, then situated . . . near the Chinese and Japanese sectors. A series of ranting speeches drew another 3,000 participants, and when the angry whites decided to burn B.C. Lieutenant-Governor James Dunsmuir in effigy (Dunsmuir owned coal mines employing Asians) there were 8,000 persons on hand to watch.

"As night fell, the crowd swelled to 15,000 people. Then after a particularly volatile address by A.E. Fowler, a league zealot who eventually took up residence in a Seattle insane asylum, the mob surged into Chinatown."

"The Chinese did not even try to contend with the human bombshell that exploded in their midst," Ferguson explains in White Man's Country. "Dozens were beaten and injured, stores were wrecked and plundered, and nobody fought back.

The lack of resistance in Chinatown inspired the crowd to continue its rampage in "Little Tokyo". The Japanese, however, were more aggressive, and a wild battle ensued. The Vancouver Province reported the next day:

"Armed with sticks, clubs, iron bars, revolvers, knives, and broken glass, the enraged aliens poured forth into the streets. Hundreds of little brown men rushed the attacking force, their most effective weapons being the knives and bottles, the latter being broken off at the neck, which was held in the hand of the Jap fighter. The broken edges of glass clustering around the necks of the bottles made the weapons very formidable and many a white man was badly gashed about the arms, neck, and face . . .

"Armed only with stones, the mob could not stand before the onslaught of knives and broken bottles propelled by the Japanese while they made the air ring with 'Banzai.' . . ."

MacKenzie King was the Deputy Labour Minister then. Laurier sent him to Vancouver to investigate, and he arranged $100,000 compensation for the Chinese community, and "an undisclosed amount" to the Japanese.

"New immigration regulations were passed to make admission to Canada much harder for Asians. Stephen Leacock called the rules "as smart a piece of legislation as any that ever disenfranchised negroes in the South."

"White Man's Country . . . Desirable" — MacKenzie King

But MacKenzie King was apparently pleased. He wrote in 1908: "That Canada should desire to restrict immigration from the Orient is regarded as natural, that Canada should remain a white man's country is believed to be not only desirable from economic and social reasons but highly necessary on political and national grounds."

For the next few years, immigration dwindled and court battles over government regulations confused the problems immensely. Then in May of 1914, the Komagata Maru, a rusty, bedraggled ship with 376 would-be immigrants on board docked in Vancouver harbour. All but 17, who were Muslims, belonged to the Sikh religion, and they were not welcome in Canada. The men's turbans and full beards set these people apart even more than did their skin colour.

The press reviled them. The government challenged them on every possible legal ground. The public gathered on the pier in ugly crowds.

As the weeks rolled by in futile negotiation, the passengers ran out of food, and then water. On shore the small East Indian community rose to their defence, raised funds, held rallies. The militant Ghadr party (the word means "revolution," or "mutiny") hatched plots to smuggle guns aboard ship, and failed, and three, including the Sikh priest, were arrested smuggling arms across the border from Washington.

Immigration officers ordered the ship to raise anchor and head for India. When the Sikh's refused, they were attacked by a boatload of newly sworn in "specials." Although the raid was seriously meant, and many were seriously (though none fatally) wounded, the battle took on "comic-opera" proportions. Fire hoses and lumps of coal, along with the occasional knife and bullet from the Komagata Maru, formed the bulk of the ammunition. The government's boarding party was repelled, and, in fact, only managed to escape because one official tossed a cabbage onto the East Indian's ship. The passengers mistook it for a bomb, and stopped the flow of missiles long enough for the grappling line to be cut so the government ship could flee.

But still they had no food. The militia was called out to deal with the ugly crowds on shore. The Navy had sent in an out-moded but heavily armed cruiser.

And finally the passengers gave in. In exchange for $24,000 worth of food, they agreed to return to the East. But the sailing of the Komagata Maru by no means ended the problems.

Shoot Outs in Vancouver

A few weeks later two East Indians were shot and killed. They had acted as government informants, passing extensive information about the Ghadr plots to the immigration department. Their murderers were not caught.

A third government agent, named Bela Singh was well-known to the Sikh community which he had openly betrayed with his power.

Convinced that he, too, was a marked man, he decided to act first. Going to the Sikh temple during the funeral of one of the spies, Bela drew two revolvers, and killed the Priest (who had previously been arrested for gun-running for the Ghadr), and one other man. Seven others were wounded.

Despite the large numbers, who had been in the temple during the rampage, a fourth government spy, who had been leading the life of a double agent, decided to blow his cover, and prepared to testify that the Priest and all the others had been shot in self-defense.

He did not live to testify. Mewa Singh, a committed member of the Ghadr killed him in the courtroom. This man in turn was arrested, and following trial, hung.

A second witness came forward to testify that the killings had been in self-defense, and Bela was acquitted.

Shortly after his release, a member of the Ghadr was killed. The assassin insisted that Bela Singh had paid him $100 to do it, and promised to use his influence to get him off. Indeed, he was convicted, and sentenced to the gallows, but "his sentence was later reduced to a six year manslaughter term," according to Ferguson.

Dynamiting Spies

The Ghadr retaliated by dynamiting Bela's house. And, although they killed one man, and wounded another, Bela escaped. He beat up a grocery store owner, who he suspected had provided the bomb, and the court, apparently to protect Bela, put him in prison for a year.

On his release he snuck across the border, and returned to India . . . where 18 years later the Ghadr caught up to him. His limbs were hacked off one by one before he was finally decapitated.

The death toll in Vancouver was nine. But it was still not quite the end.

When the Komagata Maru reached India, police attempted to prevent the passengers from going to Calcutta. In the ensuing riot 26 died, and 35 were injured, 177 were sent to jail, according to Ferguson.

Today, it is all almost forgotten, in white Canada. But in B.C.'s Sikh community the martyrs to Canada's racism are honoured annually, and remembered all too well.

MARTIN LUTHER KING

Was "Conservative & Nondemocratic"

Dave Dellinger's Tales From Inside Revolutionary America

By SHOLOM HANINAN

Martin Luther King saw himself as "a contemporary Moses selected by God", and made backroom deals with the White House that "offended or puzzled" his followers, according to Dave Dellinger, a long-time civil rights activist.

Dellinger, writing in his new book MORE POWER THAN WE KNOW: The People's Movement Towards Democracy (Anchor Press-Doubleday, $4.95), gives an insider's view of the last twenty years of radicalism in America.

King was "conservative" and "ambitious", Dellinger reports, and "tried from time to time to move back into the safer reaches of a conventional ministry, but the momentum of events was beyond his control."

But Martin Luther King developed a "sense of divine appointment" as he read his press notices and received financial support from "liberal churchmen, unions and businessmen in the North, and a liberal President in the White House."

"DE LAWD"

AND THE PRESIDENT

Younger, more militant black activists in the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating Committee (SNCC) nick-named King "De Lawd". Dellinger says they were hostile to him and "his nondemocratic approach to decision-making and his tendency to rely more than was healthy on high level negotiations rather than on the grass-roots actions that had catapulted him into prominence and gained him access to mayors' offices and the White House."

"Often he came into a city already in revolt, inspired even greater mass participation by his presence and his preaching, and then made a settlement in private that offended or puzzled those who had prepared the action by months or grass-roots organizing and those who had laid it on the line as participants."

Non-violent civil disobedience was eliminated from the August 1963 March on Washington for example, "at King's insistence after President Kennedy had offered to tap substantial funds for 'responsible' civil-rights organizations."

King changed by 1967, though, says Dellinger. He took an anti-war stand, began to favour mass actions... and "a year later he was dead."

"Liberal politicians, financial contributors, and union leaders had often manipulated and betrayed him," according to Dellinger. "King continued to be wooed and courted by those who hoped to co-opt and deflect the thrust of the movement..."

"But there were others who thought that the only way to pacify him was to eliminate him. Among those who may have held this view were FBI director J. Edgar Hoover and some of his top aides."

FBI MENDE;

"PREVENT A MESSIAH"

"A month before King's assassination the FBI secretly ordered its agents and infiltrators to take emergency action "to prevent the rise of a 'messiah' who could unify and electrify the militant black nationalist movement." (Memorandum of March 4, 1968. Names were deleted from this memorandum when it became public, but there were obvious references to the death of Malcolm X and to King as a potential messiah.)"

CHRISTMAS BOMBS

Dave Dellinger knew King personally. He also knows Government repression from first-hand experience. He spent months on trial, with Bobby Seale, Jerry Rubin, Abbie Hoffman and the other members of the Chicago Seven Conspiracy.

During Christmas, 1968, Dellinger writes, "I received a Christmas package in the mail, bearing the return address of the Vietnam Peace Parade Committee in New York, of which I was co-ordinator. As I started to open it in front of the holiday fire, in the presence of my wife and four of our five children... I became suspicious enough to proceed cautiously, though not enough to take it out of the house immediately."

"Inside the outer wrapping appeared to be a bottle of Scotch in special Christmas gift box. Instead of opening it routinely, I poked around, finally peeking in through a slightly opened flap."

"I saw enough of the insides to make me walk gingerly outside and deposit it in the snow. When the box was later deactivated it turned out to contain a live hand grenade, a couple of handfuls of loose explosive powder, a bottle of gasoline, two live batteries, and a switch that would have been activated if I had lifted the top flaps in a normal manner."

"Any one of the three would have been sufficient to do the job, the bomb experts said after they had dismantled it. 'As it was, we can't understand why it didn't go off.' They stressed that this was no fly by night job, but had been turned out in a well equipped machine shop by experts. The purpose of the gasoline was to destroy the evidence."

DAVE DELLINGER — "AMERICA'S GANDHI"

POSTIES HURT IN 3 BLASTS

"In the months before I received this 'present'" Dellinger continues "three bombs had exploded in the New York and Jersey City post offices through which mail sent to me from New York normally passed. All had started fires, and in one or two cases post office workers had been badly mangled, losing some limbs, if I remember correctly."

"The federal Postal Department investigator who came to my house told me that the three exploded bombs and the one that had come to my house had all been of the same type and had probably all been addressed to me."

"He stressed that they were so sensitive that a little jiggling was enough to set them off. (If it had not been Christmas vacation from school, one of our kids would have picked it up at the post office at our mail box a mile from the house and walked up the road with it.)"

"The postal investigator told me that they were very angry because of the explosions in the post offices. His parting words were: 'Don't worry; we're going to catch the people who sent it. Don't forget that some of our people were injured.' I never heard from him or from any other official again concerning the matter."

TRASHERS AND HEROS

Dellinger also documents the wrecking of $20,000 worth of printing equipment at the offices of Liberation magazine, which he helps edit: extortion attempts by government agents disguised as black militants; a string of agent provocateurs and police informers within movement groups; the kidnapping and beating of one organizer, rescued by a black leftist who, like movie hero Shaft, climbed to the roof entered through a window, and pulled a gun on the captors.

Through it all Dellinger remains firmly committed to revolutionary non-violence. Jerry Rubin calls him "the American Gandhi". Dellinger no more approves of left bombings than the right-wing attacks he has been a victim of.

He criticizes the Weatherpeople, and condemns the "one-dimensional, cliché-ridden, pompous, and often hate-filled propaganda of most contemporary Marxist-Leninist and Maoist sects."

"Abolishing capitalism is an absolutely necessary condition for human liberation that we must not fudge or be coy about," Dellinger maintains, "but it is by no means the only condition... It is self-defeating to ignore the spiritual base from which we live our lives and wage our struggles."

More High Marks, Less Dope with TM

By SEAN MANWY

You can get higher marks, cut down on your dope consumption, and probably have a better sex life, all through Transcendental Meditation. And they have the graphs to prove it.

TM, as it's called, was founded by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi in 1955. The Guru, once well known as the spiritual mentor to the Beatles, now lives in Europe, where he is personally involved in the training of every single TM Teacher in the world.

Interestingly, he is also a university graduate, with a B.A. in physics from Allahabad University, in India.

Transcendental Meditation is a technique that places the body in a state of deep rest, without a loss in awareness of the environment. It is not, as one Toronto teacher pointed out, a religion, self-hypnosis, or a profitable business.

To prove his point, he produced a letter from a Catholic Priest in California, who wants to reassure Catholics that TM is not only acceptable, but "a guru's relationship with, and the practice of one's faith should be enhanced, rather than diminished."

An Scientific American article from 1972 goes into details of the physiological changes. In short, it shows that all the body signs attributed to hours of complete rest show up after only 20 minutes of meditation.

NO PROFIT

And Profitable? Bill Morrison, who teaches TM at one of the seven Toronto centres says that he hasn't drawn a salary since October, and the centre is just beginning to break-even. Morrison claims he's been living on the savings he accumulated during several years spent as an Electrical Engineer. He also offers data about the high rent at the centre ($800 a month), advertising costs ($1,000 a month), and rental of lecture hall space in libraries, and hotels, such as the Inn on the Park (another $800 a month).

Rates for TM training vary from $50 for a high school student, to $60 for university students, to $115 for "adults".

What do you get for your money? About nine or ten hours of instruction, most of it in group sessions. A personal mantra (the meaningless word a meditator chants slowly to help shut out the world). And free admission for life to TM lectures, and group refresher sessions.

And of course, you learn the art of totally relaxing and refreshing yourself. Twice a day, for twenty minutes, a meditator sits in a comfortable chair, closes the eyes, and chants repeats and mantra slowly. Thoughts drift through the mind, but instead of concentrating on them, or even concentrating on eliminating them, they are allowed to float. After a while, Morrison says, meditators find their minds comfortably blank, and their bodies relaxed.

Studies in university research centres show that afterwards memory retention is increased significantly, grade point averages rise, blood pressure drops, alpha wave activity increases, and energy levels improve.

Interestingly, two doctors reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association, that in a study of nearly 2,000 drug users, 98.8 per cent stopped using drugs after two or three years of meditation.

CRIME DROPS

And another study produced results that Morrison said was were so "unbelievable" that they and the researcher hesitated to release them. Twelve small American cities were selected where more than 1 per cent of the population had been trained in TM. The communities included Boulder, Colorado; Ithaca, NY; and Santa Cruz, California. Control groups were also chosen. Lafayette, Indiana, was one.

In the control communities, crime rose by 7.8 per cent, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Statistics. Close to the average increase nationally.

But in the cities where 1 per cent of the population knew how to meditate, Morrison says, the crime rate dropped 8.8 per cent. A difference of 16.6 per cent.

Morrison thinks that it's simply the natural result of a significant portion of the populace feeling good. And he believes that if that's the case, TM could stop wars, famine, revolution and racism.

A Free Lecture on Transcendental Meditation will be held at Noon Today in The Music Room at Hart House.

Next time you use the copier: Think of whom you're copying

By GARY LENNOX

"No part of this book shall be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means . . . without written permission from the publisher."

This familiar admonishment, a thorn in the side of publishers and authors alike, has been the subject of much legal and moral controversy that so far, the U of T libraries have managed to avoid.

Everyone in the university has been acquainted with courses that require the purchase of expensive textbooks only a small part of which are relevant to the course. Many have had the experience of writing research essays which use a few pages from one chapter of a weighty book.

The obvious and accepted recourse is to use the Xerox Reproduction Service at the Roberts or SigSam Library. Yet in doing so the libraries, and to a certain extent maybe even the students, are breaking the law and cheating authors out of royalties.

It is a double-edged issue which has never reached any clear-cut resolution in the courts, and one where the real criminal is an archaic section of the Canadian Copyright Act.

Under the protective auspices of Section 17 (2) of the Act, usually referred to as the Fair Dealing Proviso, copying parts of a book is permissible "for the purposes of private study, research, criticism, review, or newspaper summary . . ."

This was fine in 1921, the original date of the Act, when any mechanical reproduction was a laborious and uneconomical process. But the sophisticated Xerox copy machines in the U of T libraries have far superseded the clumsy stencil dittos of earlier years.

In 1969 for instance the University of Toronto libraries turned out 33,000 copies a month, a huge proportion of which was copyrighted material. A 1970 Canadian Authors Association brief to the Economic Council of Canada cited an example "of a professor of English at a Toronto university asking the stenographers' pool to mimeograph 500 copies (for free distribution) of 27 poems by a Canadian poet."

Ann Wall, president of Anansi publishing house, says people don't realize the effect that xeroxing has on the sales of small publishing houses.

If a high school teacher or university professor makes extensive copies from books of poetry or short stories, then you just don't sell the books, she says. High school and university sales are a staple, she adds.

A spokesman for the Writers Union of Canada says xeroxing of copyrighted material is basically done in ignorance of the situation: "But it is an unfair situation because the original creator is not reimbursed. It is a fight with technology, not a fight with people."

According to U of T librarian Sheila Laidlaw it is a problem the libraries have been "very concerned about", but aside from the concern, there is little that can be done until the Copyright Act is updated.

The Reproduction Lending Service, which operates out of SigSam and Sid Smith, offers material which is, according to Miss Laidlaw, "submitted by professors or else reprints from journals which allowed it."

But, according to Roy C. Sharp, executive director of the Canadian Copyright Institute, a student "may Xerox a single copy of a substantial part of a work for his own private research. But he may not make copies for others. Nor may libraries legally make copies and distribute them to students and researchers." He is on record as calling the Canadian Copyright Act a "horse and buggy act."

At large universities, such as U of T, libraries and professors commonly distribute xeroxed material, instead of requiring the library or the student to purchase it. Whole chapters or more substantial parts of books are loaned or given out.

Xerox of Canada, which operates the reproducing machines, has little opinion on either the legality or morality of the issue. "As far as we are aware," the public relations department replied, "our service is strictly related to operation and maintenance of the machines themselves."

Referendums make democracy a farce

By PAUL HOCH

In the past few weeks as Quebec has moved ever closer to a general strike of its entire public sector, the demand has gone up from the right wing of many of the local unions that the strike issue should be settled away from the "passions" of the general assembly in the calm rationality of a secret ballot extended over one or more days "so as to maximize the participation of the membership."

Indeed whenever student unions or worker unions or African colonies or whatever move to take action of any kind to achieve power and independence, the reply from their rulers and compradors is always that nothing must be done without a plebiscite of the entire membership.

Needless to say no one asks the existing powers-that-be to take a plebiscite before taking actions of their own. A factory owner does not normally hold a referendum before laying off workers. A professor does not normally poll his students before giving an exam.

Although Prime Minister Trudeau was elected on a platform of opposition to wage controls, he did not think of holding a plebiscite before imposing them. No, a plebiscite is solely for the plebes.

The requirement for secret strike ballots of the entire membership has been included in government anti-labor legislation in virtually every area of the capitalist world.

The reason why such ballots are so pleasing to our rulers is that it is always assumed that the silent, apathetic majority created by capitalism's instruments of mass socialization (i.e. the passive consumption of mass media, mass education and mass consumerism generally) will follow their script for passivity and vote for "no action".

At least it is assumed that since this majority is sufficiently inactive to stay away from general assemblies, they will largely get their information from the mass media (which are safely in the hands of our brainwashers).

Although this counterinsurgency program often breaks down — after all, much of the silent majority is so alienated from existing political institutions that it not only does not favor them, but wants nothing to do with them — the plebiscite requirement does make the job of the left extremely difficult.

It must mobilize not only a strong majority of the politically active, but also a majority of all those that the instruments of mass socialization have stunted and made inactive. And it must do so in the very teeth of those instruments of mass socialization (not to mention police forces) of its opposition.

Such a mobilization for voting may of course be a step toward a wider degree of political participation and activity. More generally, however, under the instruments of mass socialization of capitalism, it is rather a sop designed for the most part to discourage and even prevent real participation.

In particular, if I know that no really major decisions can be taken in the general assembly of my union without going to referendum, I can safely stay away from the general assembly because I know that if a strike ballot should come "my vote will be counted same as any other" (even if I know next to nothing about the issues). This is democracy.

In reality, it is only a parody of democracy. In fact, such a silent majority member has almost no say over how his institution is to be run. (That is decided by the existing powers-that-be.)

He has only a small veto power over efforts to change that institution, including most especially all those efforts to actually bring it under the control over the people (like himself!) who work in it. His main power is the partial power to share in his own political emasculation.

If the institutions of work or education or housing or whatever are ever to be run by the people who live and work in them, final power must be vested in general assemblies of these very people. The referenda, while pretending to be "even more democratic", in fact emasculates the people's power of the general assemblies by preventing them from making major decisions, and making it possible for the mass of the membership to safely ignore them.

With the assemblies thus hamstringed, power remains safely in the hands of the existing capitalists and their bureaucrats. Even more insidious, the leaders of unions are themselves pushed into the role of bureaucrats because they take their authority not from the general assembly in front of them, but from some mythical silent majority of the "wider membership". (Indeed, many unions, and most particularly student unions, seldom even bother to hold general assemblies.)

The situation is quite similar with regard to national elections. In these elections, real people's control over the basic institutions of factory, school and residence in which they live and work cannot possibly be at issue (since only actual assemblies of workers, students, and residents could actually accomplish this).

At most, elections can decide which bureaucrat is to have a role in controlling these institutions. The people are thus given a "say" in who shall control them. In the United States, since the contest is between two heavily-financed capitalist parties, people's control of their institutions is not even allowed to become an issue: who shall control the economy is banished from the political arena.

In Canada and Western Europe, the existence of strong social democratic parties gives people the choice of "nationalizing" part of the economy (and thus being controlled by a government bureaucrat rather than a corporate one).

But "nationalization" and control by government bureaucrats does not necessarily lead to people's control over the institutions of their daily lives. That is not something that bureaucrats can achieve for people.

Even if the bureaucrats call themselves "socialists". People's control can only be achieved by the people themselves. It can only be achieved by the people in each institution in their general assemblies, in effect, taking control of that institution. This cannot be done by referenda. It requires active participation.

Nevertheless, many well-meaning union leaders (who are not necessarily bureaucrats) remain confused about these issues. They look around at the small turnout to general assemblies and honestly believe it would be wrong to take major decisions without the participation of the majority of their memberships.

Indeed, if they are socialists they may add that it is impossible to impose socialism "over the heads" of the people. This is all perfectly true.

But the solution is not to further emasculate the general assembly by sending all important decisions to referenda. It is rather to make these decisions in the assembly itself, and thus encourage the membership to take an active part in it.

No doubt, in many cases, this would have the effect of bringing out a large mass of those most opposed to a militant union decision. But it is only in the midst of the subsequent assemblies that the majority can be not only persuaded, but activated to real participation.

Thus who favor real institutional control by the people who work and live in these institutions can accept nothing less. There is no "democratic" alternative to this: referenda are not an alternate means of achieving democratic control, they are the existing power's way of preventing it.

Here are some swim members faking smiles at a typical U of T Athletic Banquet.

Awards aplenty at banquet

By JONATHAN GROSS
A week ago today the Athletic Association held its annual athletic banquet and, called upon or not, everyone had a lot to say.

As usual awards were handed out to some very deserving athletes. Libert Castillo ended a fine career at U of T as the recipient of the Johnny Copp Trophy awarded "To the member of the Senior Football Team judged worthiest."
Castillo, a fullback, rushed for 330 yards this year while making for the Eastern Conference Allstar team for the second consecutive time. The Copp Trophy is very prestigious. Castillo was definitely the most deserving player on the squad.

This reporter had the somewhat dubious honour of sitting with the football team during the presentations. In between the frequent hullyday yells of Ken Hussey there was some good chatter on the subject of Canadian players in the CFL.

Hussey is one player who is sacrificing a lot of money to try out as a free agent with the Argos. The Blues' lineman has a financially lucrative summer position with Lever Bros. and by taking a chance at the Argo camp he loses the job. The camp is good for only room and board and a paltry $10 a day.

But like any young prospect Ken is enthusiastic: "They told me that they're going to give me a real good look. I've been waiting too long for this. Do you think I'd let a summer job stand in my way?" Judging by the way Hussey has been training, it would be advisable that no one stand in his way.

Jim Trimm was hurt this year but he was also picked up by the Argos. He was drafted in a late round but Jim attributes this to his weak reception record. As a draft selection Jim is beginning to think about money. Trimm believes as do the other Blues that Canadians aren't given a fair shot just because they're from north of the 49th parallel. "If you're any good at all you deserve good money," adds Trimm. The big end is trying to get "trim" his time in the 40 from 4.8 to 4.7.

Among the hopefuls were Rick Jeymsan who was drafted by Hamilton, Mark Ackley by Edmonton and Nick Grittani by Calgary. Mike Schovvin is a free agent for the Ti-Cats while Walt Dudar is tagging along with Hussey at the CNE.

Receiving their Bronze T's for three years of participation in football were Lubimir Alexov, Al Brencley, who by his own admission is the only U of T quarterback who never started a game and still got a Bronze T, Julio Giordani, Glenn Rosborough, Sokovnin and the Real Mike Steele.

Tom Watt came to the banquet still excited about the hockey team's triumph in the nationals. Kent Ruhnke, the most valuable player in the tourney, was presented with the Bill Dafoe Trophy. The team was responsible for the selection and it was a very wise one, considering that Ruhnke was the first player to hit the 50 goal plateau in intercollegiate hockey. Ruhnke leaves the university with a teaching degree but don't be surprised if "number 12" surfaces in the pros next year.

A Dalton White was awarded the Thomas R. Loudon Award for "... outstanding services in the advancement of Athletics." White was introduced by Watt who provided several anecdotes about the Athletic Director's long and distinguished career at this institution.

Other recipients included Chris Sammut, who snagged the George M. Biggs Trophy for all around competence. The always humorous John McManus presented the Dr. W. A. Potter Trophy, basketball's version of the Dafoe Trophy, to Doug Fox. Fox led the Blues in scoring, this year.

Soccer star Geoffrey S. Crew took the Charles E. Oster Trophy as the team MVP. Mike Hibberd took the Bickle Award, presented "To the member of the Swimming Team, combining Character, Scholarship and General Interest. Just to show you what this poolside character has achieved, it has been gleaned from the teams' scribe cum pauper, Don Warner, that when Hibberd came to U of T he couldn't cut the 200 Freestyle in under two minutes. He now does it under 1:45.

Rob Moore was honoured by the wrestling team while Steve Tobolka presented the David Walker trophy to water polo MVP, Alexander Fedko. Intranural troubleshooter Dave Romanowicz took the Sidney Earle Smith Trophy. Joe DiFonzo was lauded as the most improved member of the Boxing team, while Paul Ross was "the most Worthy Member." Last but not least was Mark McCullough who was awarded the Arthur Caplan Trophy by his teammates for proficiency on the links.

With entertainment provided by the football team the evening was not exactly "magic" but it was special in that it would be the last banquet for many graduating athletes. Is that good or bad?

Get those clubs out!

THE SLICE

Whenever I meet someone and they find out that I am a Golf Professional they immediately say "...Gosh... can you give me a tip... I always slice the ball."

I never know how to answer this question other than to tell the person that the clubhead is cutting across the line they are aiming along from right to left with the club face open.

The golf swing is very complex and un-natural and most people swing on the very opposite plane that is needed to hit the ball fairly straight.

When you swing the club, your feet, knees, hips, shoulders, arms and hands are all going to move on a full shot and if one of these moving parts moves incorrectly it can throw the club into the wrong orbit and cause a slice or one of many other bad shots.

The beginner needs instruction on how to move, feet, knees, hips, shoulders, hands and arms correctly and it takes about six months practice to co-ordinate these moving parts. The beginner who starts with instruction is much better off and easier to teach than the person who has played with a poor swing for a couple of years. What you learn first will show up under pressure so the person who has played must learn the correct moves over and as a result often needs more practice than the beginner.

There is absolutely no short cut, or miracle, or secret tip that will turn a mediocre golfer into a good one overnight. If you slice the ball you need to re-learn the proper fundamentals. The proper place to practice is on the practice field, it is impossible to think of moving, feet, knees, hips, shoulders, hands and arms while playing golf, on the course. Would you take one lesson on typing and then apply for a typing job without weeks of practice.

LINE OF FLIGHT

The line you are aiming along is called the LINE OF FLIGHT and you are standing on the inside of the line of flight by about two feet. The opposite side of the line is called the "outside of the line of flight!" A SLICER, swings from the outside of the line of flight to the inside of the line of flight with the club face open, just like cutting across a table tennis ball and slicing it to the right. If the club face is turned in or closed, the ball will be PULLED to the left.

In order to swing, your hips must turn. Your hips turn so that you can "Get out of your own way." Your right hip turns to the right on the backswing and your left hip turns to the left on the forward swing. When you turn your hips the temptation is to swing your arms around with the hips.

It is a good idea to put a tee in the ground about eighteen inches behind the ball and try to knock it over on the takeaway. This will start the clubhead straight back from the ball instead of following your hips around in a circle. The hips turn a little like a Merry Go Round, while the shoulders arms and club are swung more like a tilted Ferris Wheel. In other words the hips are turning on a flat plane while the shoulders are turning on a more upright plane.

INSIDE OUT SWING PLANE
After explaining the inside out

Scar and Phmy take it

When they woke me up for my sleeping pill I was informed that the long interfac hockey season was over and that Scarborough had vindicated this hack by taking the Division I crown in a final that had us thinking of the 1967 Leaf-Hab debacle.

Tied at one game going into the finale Scarborough came up big to down "knogynsky's Thoroughbreds" 5-4. The game was supposed to have been super. I wasn't there because of the athletic banquet. Bad move on my part.

Scoring for the champs were Perkins, Wightman, Farber, Kuksis and Robertson. Roman fired two for the losers, aided by Hebburn and Perkovic. Nobody has anything to be ashamed of. It was a well played series that featured some welcome end-to-end hockey. A relief from the bloodbaths of days gone by.

The only problem was that of an off campus final. Could this be the shape of things to come? That quote courtesy of the Yardbirds. Remember them folks?

PHE B took the Division II final with a two-game sweep of overrated Trinity. The final was pinned at 4-1 with McEchean, Downs, Seymour and Blainey finding paydirt for the Jox. Pete Irwin was all alone for the "Caped Crusaders". All the Jocks have to worry about is the ghost of Innis's past. Sleep well.

B-Ball is over for the Skulechildren as Pharmacy made another prediction good, finishing off the finals with an 81-69 win to take the Division II crown. Campbell gunned for 23 in a winning cause. Antonopolous shone for the losers with 17.

Senior Skule looks for the whole bag of cookies tomorrow in the absolute final against the everpresent Jox who tied the series up with a 78-75 triumph in the Hart House Sweat Palace Friday night.

Intermediate hockey ended yesterday as Civil 7TB were atomized by the well named Vic Ringers. The Ringers were never in doubt as they took the mismatched final 21-2. The Engineers wisely stopped the second game of the two game total goal series at the end of the second. They had someplace better to go.

Just to reveal what kind of a waste of time it was, it was revealed that Vic has a college of 4,000 while the brave Engineers could look at only four prospects. The playoffs were structured so that the teams in the finals played something like eight games in 10 nights. There's gotta be a better way.

Vic has a team that could easily have played in second division, replacing the team that folded, but coach Nat Findlay has strong opinions on the college athletic organization: "Just because the II's folded, that's no reason to blame the intermediate squad. The II's started the season with a full roster so the problem doesn't lie in numbers." Vic II folded midway through the season due to poor turnouts.

Maybe it's not important. I'm not.

Women gather tonight

Following in the steeped tradition of bad food and lots of tin, the first Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Banquet will be held tonight in the Great Hall at Hart House. It is expected to become an annual affair, replacing the usual buffet that each college provided.

This one has potential as there are 220 women competing in 20 intercollegiate sports. If everyone shows it could be a memorable occasion.

The athletes will receive special awards according to their athletic ability, leadership and administrative contributions. The two most prestigious are the Benson Award for the outstanding graduate, and the Hill-Powell for outstanding administrative contribution. Anne Hewett, this year's president of the WAA, an organization soon to be integrated with the men's, will be the guest speaker.

It will be a time for coaches & players to reminisce about the seasons in the sun they spent together. Entertainment will be provided by the Field and Ice Hockey teams, along with the Swim and Ski teams. It's all Earth Wind and Fire but the budget can barely afford Andrea Essen.

A bulletin board recognizing the Intercollegiate athletes is on display this week in the foyer of the Benson Building.

swing plane to pupils they often say "that's easy" and they swing the club sharply inside the line of flight on the backswing thinking that if they retrace their steps on the forward swing they will have the inside out swing solved.

Unfortunately the more you swing in on the backswing, the more you will loop the club to the outside on the downswing thus causing a worse outside in swing.

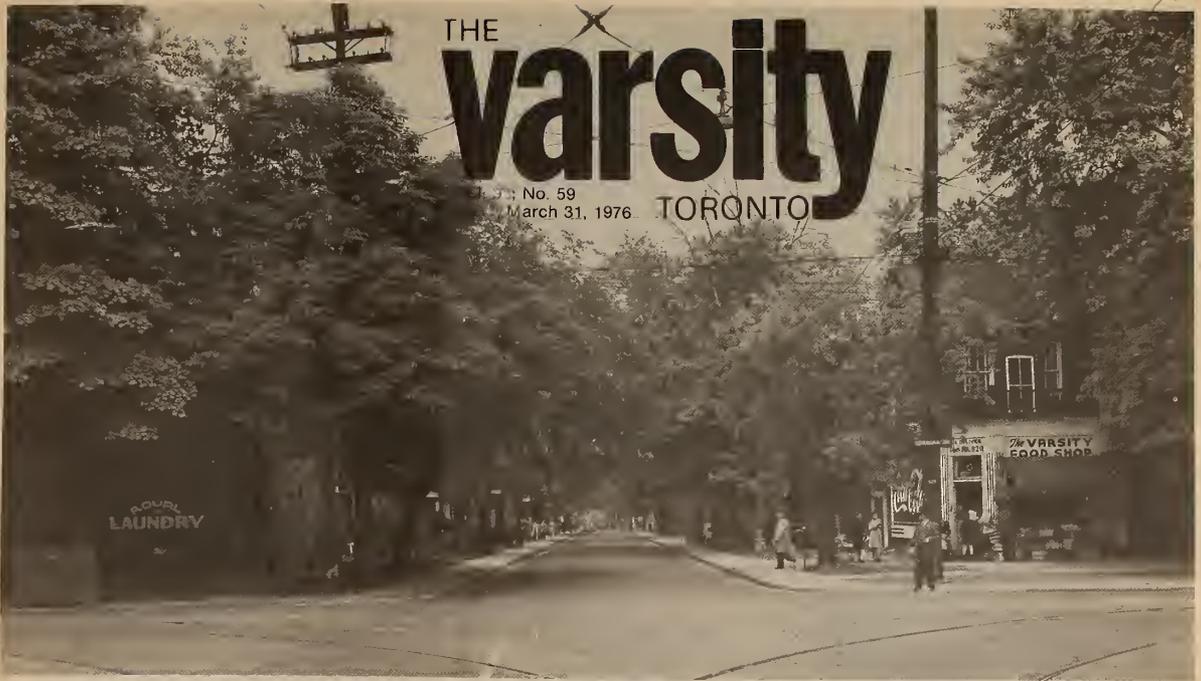

The backswing plane is different from the downswing plane. You must start the club straight back from the ball for about eighteen inches, thus giving you a fairly upright plane. On the downswing the hips are moved forward by rolling the knees and feet towards the target and the right arm moves into the rib cage and it feels as though you are pulling the grip end of the club towards the golf ball.

If this is done properly the club drops the inside and your hands move across your right toe and you will be in a position to swing from the inside to the outside of the line of flight.

This is very difficult to explain on paper so to fully understand the swing, why not come in for some instruction.

Metro cops called but Maoist vendor stays

By ERIC McMILLAN

Metro Police were called to Innis College Monday to investigate a complaint against a news vendor in the building, but left without their man when administrators realized Innis had no ruling on dissemination of political literature.

Student Peter Gibson refused to leave with his copies of People's Canada Daily News when approached by campus police. "I'm not going to be intimidated," he said. "We have every right to sell in this building just as we do in other buildings on campus."

Campus cop Tom Shadgett called downtown police "for Metro back-up, possibly with a paddy wagon depending on how many supporters these people get," he said later.

However, after a hasty conference with police, assistant principal Art Wood announced Gibson would be allowed to continue his sales in the building until the college formulates policy on the matter.

Innis College council consequently passed a motion calling for an embargo on selling informational material in the building. President-elect Robin Holmes explained, "We don't want to see Innis College become a peddlers' market. It's too small an area."

Holmes termed the embargo "temporary" until the Innis Community Affairs committee decides upon guidelines to cover distribution of materials in the college halls.

Although the Toronto Student Movement has been selling papers at Innis for a few weeks, the matter was brought to a head by a petition of 30 against news vending in the halls.

Gibson claims the issue goes back to a February meeting in support of an Angolan revolutionary party, after which the Academic Activities Committee which sponsored the meeting was threatened by Innis administration with a ban from the college. This was interpreted as an attack on the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) which is the parent party to the Toronto Student Movement and sponsors People's Canada Daily News.

Robin Holmes claims the Innis resolution against news vending "is a general policy not directed at CPC(M-L)" although "this

The Varsity | Paul McGrath

V-P Art Wood announces Innis will formulate new policy on literature distribution.

particular policy was brought to a head because of the situation that occurred with CPC(M-L)."

Yesterday CPC(M-L) members responded to the motion by distributing leaflets which charged the American and Soviet superpowers "have their agents in Innis College."

An open meeting was called by Innis representatives to let the community hear all sides of the matter and express its views, but the meeting was cancelled due to disagreement between CPC(M-L) members and Innis as to the purpose of the meeting, according to Holmes.

CPC(M-L) has gone ahead and booked Innis Townhall for a "Mass Democracy Meeting" for Friday at noon to discuss the reaction of "certain people" at Innis against the party. Representatives expressed hope that interested persons of all persuasions will attend.

Erindale hikes bus fares

By CHRIS "JOCKO" DU VERNET

Up, up and away — this time by bus to Erindale College.

Up, up, and away — this time with a 300 per cent inter-campus bus fare increase for next year.

Bus fares for Erindale-St. George commuter service will be raised from the present 35 cents to 80 cents during the morning rush hour to Erindale from St. George and the afternoon rush hour to St. George, according to a report presented to Erindale College Council.

Presented by acting principal Robin Ross, the report calls for a graduated increase over the next two years, to eventually affect transit occurring between 8:15 am and 9:15 am, and 4:15 pm and 5:15 pm. A five cent increase will be effective on trips taken at all other hours on the inter-campus service.

A three cent increase per ticket for the Mississauga Transit service, and a termination of MTC subsidization for trips to Islington subway will also result. Oakville-Erindale bus service fares will also be raised from 35 cents to $1.00, if the report is implemented.

Termed a memorandum by Ross, the report notes that O.S.A.P. regulations allow students to claim local transportation costs up to $8.00 per week, and calls attention to increased TTC fares as well as a prospective raise in MTC fares, each of which established a forty cent fare.

It also stressed "severe budgetary problems, which are likely to continue and may well grow worse" as a factor in the decision.

SAC rep John Doherty condemned the fare hikes as "prohibitive" for students who must commute. He foresaw an increase in student opposition, and eventually a possible increase in automobile use as a result of the rising transportation costs.

Doherty alleged that the council will make $4,000 profit on the hikes, but could not provide any figures to confirm it.

Calling attention to the lack of Erindale-based expenditure of student fees, which necessitated commuting, he said "most of our money is spent downtown, so the fees should cover transportation. They should cut back elsewhere."

Doherty is passing out pamphlets that term the hikes an "unfair and unjust increase", and calls on students to avoid being "forced out of school by costs". When questioned, he revealed that SAC is funding the pamphlets, as well as helping to organize a rally today.

Doherty expressed concern for administration "disregard" for cheap transit, saying "it's a top priority for us — 400 to 500 students use the Erindale-St. George service daily." "They just don't want commuters" he asserted.

Scarborough cuts US interviews

Scarborough College has cancelled interviews for Americans seeking a sociology post after they were challenged by the Graduate Sociology Students Association.

Professor Ralph Beals announced the cancellation Monday saying he did not want to embarrass any more American Candidates.

The action came after a two hour grilling of applicant Cecilia Ridgeway from the University of Wisconsin by students who are demanding Canadians be hired.

Now the search for candidates will either be called off or continue with Canadians only.

Professor John Lee and grad students association members Graham Lowe and Vicki Grabb questioned Ridgeway on why she wanted to come to Canada. They had earlier circulated a letter criticising the search committee's decision to interview Americans.

There are now only four

Canadians in the sociology department at Scarborough out of eleven faculty members.

Lee supported the decision to halt American interviews. "The natives are really restless. We've gone past the point where we sit back quietly and let American candidates lock up jobs in Canadian universities until the end of the century."

The next move will be up to Scarborough College social science chairman Lorie Tarshis.

Quebec furniture workers defeated

COWANSVILLE (CUP) — An eight-month strike at Vilas Industries Ltd. furniture plant ended here March 17 in what union officials called a "bitter defeat" for the 350 workers.

The Vilas employees, members of the Federation of Union and Building Workers Union of the Confederation des Syndicats Nationaux (CSN-CNTU), walked out after their contract expired last summer demanding the abolition of the "incentive" wage system in their new contract.

Under the incentive wage system, workers are paid a base rate for normal levels of production and receive bonuses for speeding up.

The CSN and the Vilas workers wanted the system abolished because speed-ups lead to accidents, particularly among older workers in the woodcutting section of the plant, and create intolerable working conditions.

The workers, who earned an average of $2.80 per hour plus about $1.00 on the incentive system, demanded a straight hourly rate bringing wages to about $5.60 over two years.

The Vilas company, however, a subsidiary of Molson's Companies Ltd. and the largest furniture manufacturer in Quebec, remained intransigent and refused to abolish the incentive system, arguing it was "normal" for the industry, as was the plant's high accident record.

In November a boycott of Molson's brewery products was called in Cowansville district about 30 miles south-west of Montreal, and by January the boycott became Quebec-wide as the CNTU, the QFL, the teacher's union, and other organizations backed the boycott.

But the Vilas workers voted 116-89 at a special meeting March 17 to drop their demand for an abolition of the incentive system and accepted the company's offer made last November, as amended on the recommendation of a special government conciliator.

Union negotiator Carol Jobin explained that the workers went back because they feared the Molson's and Vilas management "would close down the company completely if the strike continued" as they repeatedly threatened to do.

The offer they accepted increases the basic rate to $4.30 over three years, and maintains the incentive plan, which affects about two-thirds of the workers in the plant.

UFW calls Sunmaid raisins boycott

OTTAWA (CUP) — The United Farm Workers have signed contracts with lettuce producers in California, and announced a boycott of Sunmaid Raisins, in retaliation for that company's success in blocking funds for the operation of the Agricultural Labour Relations Act.

The first UFW contracts with the Inter Harvest Co. Inc. and the Salinas Marketing Co-operative, both large lettuce producers, provide for: a minimum wage of $3.10 an hour, the highest farm labour wage in the United States; a union hiring hall, replacing the labour contractor system; job security and protection against mechanization; strict control on the use of pesticides and other strong safety and health standards; medical and retirement benefits; and an education fund.

Early last month, work of the Agricultural Labour Relations

Board was halted by the failure of the California legislature to vote the necessary funds to continue its operations until July 1, the balance of the fiscal year. A coalition of Republicans and farm-belt Democrats opposed the measure, endorsed by Governor Edmund G. Brown.

Chief among the opponents of the measure to maintain the ALRB were the Sunmaid Raisin Growers of California. The UFW warned that a boycott would follow.

As of February 6, the UFW had won 210 certification elections, to represent close to 30,000 workers. The Teamsters have won 107 elections, covering 12,724 workers; and "no union" was the outcome in 24 elections.

However, Chavez has redoubled his efforts and the UFW is continuing in its organizing drive all over North America with volunteer staff.

Sources deep within the crumbling administration of Varsity editor Paul McGrath have revealed the paper's staff has decided to cease publishing.

Toronto's most feared morning paper is packing it in today and there seems to be little hope of resuming publication in the near future. A bleary-eyed Joe Wright, this year's tireless city editor said he is already making plans to return to the line at Continental Can.

Wright said in an exclusive interview the paper's fate is uncertain. "It's too bad we're finished, but those are the breaks," he grumbled.

News editors Mike Edwards and Kris King have already left the sinking Varsity ship and the publisher, SAC communications commissioner John Tuzyk is scheduled to be heading for U of T law school.

McGrath could not be reached for an interview. Reliable sources have revealed he is in exile, at an undisclosed bar somewhere in Toronto.

But there is hope for students. The peoples' right to know will never say die.

A new rogues gallery of decadent student journalists is already making plans to save the Varsity. Insiders revealed that ace reporter Eric McMillan is heading a team of editors in a bid to take over the helm at 91 St. George. McMillan supports the liberation of Zimbabwe.

McMillan was reticent about releasing any details of next year's plan. However, some of the personalities behind the scheme have been unmasked.

The new city editor will be genial Gene Allen, this year's culture commissar. The news editor will be Ann Silversides returning from a year of bourgeois journalism indoctrination at Carleton. The review editor will be campus legend (class of '73) John Wilson. And Times Canada photographer Caitlin Kelly will be photo editor.

Ace reporter Chris Du Vernet is being transferred from the prestigious Queen's Park beat to the features editorship. The men's sports editor will be returning, Jon Metro Police yesterday raided Varsity office, burning $3.54 found on inhabitants.

"Sports Machine" Gross will once again take book on all hockey games. In an innovation Betty Cook will become women's sports editor.

Stu Smith spends 29,866 donators dollars

By CHRIS "JOCKO" Du Vernet
It cost Stuart Smith $29,866.08 to get elected as Liberal leader, according to a financial summary released yesterday by his campaign organization.

A total of 226 contributions, fifty-eight of them over $100.00 were received. At least ten of the large contributions were from developers or construction companies, and several companies with interests in legislation applicable on the federal level contributed as well.

Campaign Manager Barbara Sullivan indicated a large number of the contributors were from Hamilton, and had contributed to Liberal campaigns in the past. She said Smith sought contributions personally, with the remaining contributors being contacted on an "individual" basis. She denied that Smith organizers had made use of Federal Liberal Party fund-raising lists.

Sullivan refused to divulge the exact amounts contributed by the donors listed in the summary, saying that organizers had made prior agreements with donors to release only their names. Although Smith stressed openness and restraint in campaigning, Sullivan indicated that the 58 donors had contributed no less than $100 and no more than $1,000 with a guarantee that no further disclosure would be made.

The list of big contributors includes beer magnate John Labatt Ltd., Noranda Mines, Greenwin Construction Co., Bi-Way Stores, Bramalea Consolidated Developments, Baymount Development Ltd., Rose Park Investments Ltd., Runnymede Development Corp.

Voice concern against cuts

The Coalition Against The Cutbacks is calling on all groups, individuals, students, trade unionists, social service recipients and workers, pensioners, welfare recipients and community groups to mobilize and demonstrate Saturday April 3 against the Ontario government's cutbacks policy.

They link that massive protest action is urgently required to turn back the wide-ranging cutbacks being proposed by the Ontario government.

Among the cuts that have stirred the greatest public concern are:
—Imposing a 5.5 per cent ceiling on all social service spending.
—Slashing $50 million from health care through closing 10 hospitals and cutting available beds in 75 more. This will eliminate the jobs of about 5,000 workers.

—Stopping the opening of new day care centres in the province after March 31. Less than one fifth of the children needing day care in Metro receive it.

—Cutting back on pensioners where over 1,500 people are waiting to enter homes for the aged.

The government's cutbacks policy will mean that many people will continue to suffer—they will not be adequately housed, clothed or fed. The government's policy shows a complete disregard for human needs.

AOSC lobbies for cheap student jaunts

So what'll it be? The Bahamas, Germany, Australia? How about a nice cruise on Swiss navy ships?

No, they don't really come on like that, but the people at the Association of Student Councils Travel Bureau are offering all that and more out of their office on St. George St.

And they'd like to offer all these places to you at a lower price, but the federal government's big foot is somewhere in the middle.

AOSC, the only venture to survive the dismantling of the Canadian Union of Students in 1969, is preparing once again this summer to lobby for a "student affinity" tariff for domestic and foreign flights.

Since the government introduces "Advanced Booking Charters" in 1973, students' ability to travel at a reduced rate has been somewhat impaired. Before 1973, students could travel with almost no booking notice at a charter rate for even a one-way flight. All that was put to an end in 1973, when a uniform charter fare was set and a requirement for a 60-day advance booking.

The AOSC lobby to the government will stress heavily that the student's lifestyle makes it impossible to book 60 days in advance and risk losing a deposit if the marks are not good enough or a job that would have paid the air fare does not pan out.

Canada is one of the less

conceding countries when it comes to student flights. Throughout Europe and in Australia students can travel cheaply, regardless of nationality on "student affinity" flights if they possess an International Students Card.

AOSC's Rod Hurd and Jerry Kalata both stressed the fact that student travel has dropped by 60 per cent since the 1973 ruling. The advanced booking regulation, plus the doubling of the fare that came with it, has put quite a dint in the mobility of the student population.

Rod Hurd has no monetary interest in seeing his business increase. AOSC is a non-profit organization owned jointly by approximately 15 student organizations, of which U of T's SAC is one.

"All we want is a decision that allows us to offer a better deal," says Hurd.

Already the machinations of lobbying are in motion in Ottawa. It will go into third gear, according to Hurd, in September.

It's a clear case of virtue triumphant." That was the reaction of Rev. Donald Finley to discovering the Institute of International Affairs' stolen bronze plaque on his doorstep at St. Michael's College last week.

The plaque, stolen over a month ago from the Institute's offices in University College was found wrapped in paper bearing a cryptic note asking Finley to relay it back to UC.

It's not happening until October but you might want to start thinking about it now. What it is is the take festival which will be bringing 1,000 students here from the University of Montreal.

The festival hopes to bring together the French-Canadian and English point of view, according to spokesman Paul McCann.

According to various interpretations, take is: an amalgamation of Trawna-Kaybec, French for okay, Joul for crazy and the ingestion of narcotic smoke into one's lungs. The festival will probably involve all of these and a few other activities.

As well as seminars on numerous academic disciplines, the festival also plans to feature concerts, art shows, craft shows, movies and even discos. They hope to draw on writers-in-residence for some session and will line up some name artists for entertainment.

They also plan to hold a program of sporting events of a non-competitive basis.

A couple of special projects include a poetry marathon with well known English and French poets and the creation of a mural as a joint project between visitors and Toronto students.

Organizers are looking for Toronto area students who want to get in on the festival and who could offer to billet Montreal students four days. They're looking for available space for the periods Oct. 8, 9, 10 and 11 and Oct. 15, 16, 17 and 18.

If you want more information on what's happening drop into the Hart House Program office or contact Paul McCann at 978-5622.

SAC reminds you to keep those cards and letters coming in. That is the ones you're supposed to return from the SAC mailing about tuition increases. They've received about 1,000 so far but they need more. If you didn't get one, there are more available at the SAC office.

Insomnia giving you problems this time of year? If so, remember there's a SAC meeting tonight in the Galbraith Building featuring reports of the old executive, the election of the new executive and the hashing out of the Spring budget.

Given the kind of communication that exists between the university and the community, Innis' upcoming "Conference on Community" may be just the thing that's needed.

As a college with a tradition of association with the community, Innis is holding the two-day conference starting Friday to deal with such issues as community resources, strengths, expectations and relations with institutional powers.

Innis is initiating next year an undergraduate program in Community Living which leads to both specialist and minor degrees. Goals of the programme are to involve students in the community and to study historical and theoretical views of the family, community and society as a whole.

Director of the program, Professor Jim Lenton sees the conference as somewhat of a precursor to next year's activities.

He points out both the conference and the program fit into the Innis philosophy of community involvement and the community involvement courses that have been offered at the college over the past five years.

The conference will offer four discussion sessions with featured panelists, to be followed by workshop groups. They are:

"Our expectations for local community" with panelists Murray Bookchin, author of Limits of the City, alderman Michael Goldrick and Toronto feminist Judy Ramirez.

"Developing Institutional Powers" featuring panelists Political Economist Meyer Brownstone, publisher Jim Lorimer, professor Gerry Hunnius and chairman Gregory Baum.

"Using human energy and reducing waste" with author Bill Leiss, Pollution Probe's Monte Hummel, community workers Jann and Joe Curry-Garcia and chairwoman Barbara Floyd.

"Developing local community strength" with Myriam Jarsky, Nivo Angelone and Jim Lenton with chairman Marvin Novick.

The fee for the conference is $5, $1 for students with food and bar facilities available at the Innis College Pub.

This space is reserved for thanks from the editor to all those who put their spirit and their talents to work during this rather stormy year. This includes not only the news, sports, review, photo and advertising people in this building, but the composition, printing and delivery people at Newsweb, Marj at SAC, publisher Tuzyk, the member of the Varsity Board and of course others. Joe thanks to you too. Don't forget to get down.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1850 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

A pox on equivocation

Where does the university end and the world begin? It seems like a pointless question, but it's a necessary one to ask when all around seem to see a wall erected to keep the world on the periphery of our consciousness.

The way is constructed in a number of ways. Students complain that national and international news inside a campus newspaper are irrelevant, that forums on topics of those types are equally as unimportant. People with unorthodox views on reality are accused of disturbing the peace and quiet of the academic institution.

It doesn't make sense. The university has always been and will always be a centre for all types of information, a microcosm of the larger world. Yet those inside it think the world is separate and distinct, even though they spend most or all of their time studying the ebb and flow of the events that make history.

Newspaper and political people on campus have a tendency to slander the student body as an uninformed or even reactionary body. This won't hold any water; Students may act aloof, but most are still curious, still alive and open to new ideas. It's all in the approach.

When students aren't being misnamed in that way, they're being called "spoiled brats" by the press at large. The coverage of the January demonstration at Queen's Park is a good indication of how we're interpreted in this outside world that we seem to care so little about.

Maybe it's for relief from the required sifting of events in the classroom that students appear not to want to know about it in their spare time. But there's always the suspicion that we study the world in great detail but refuse to put the pieces together. The worst sign of it is called "academic objectivity," that which we are taught daily in the classroom, that which teaches us to place the most barbarous acts of history "in context." Creeping equivocation is the most stifling method preached in this university. That's why it's so refreshing when an academic actually stands up and says something, anything, to show that among all this study and analysis some conclusion can be made.

We're tied to the outside world in more concrete ways a simple exchange of information. The events of this past year have taught us just how fragile these links are and how shift in the economy and in public opinion affect the university to the point of strangulation.

Here at the Varsity our work has been cut out for us. We watch the country and then when the country hits the university, we know why. World-watching is important to our understanding of the precarious situation of post-secondary education.

We discovered that the public is suspicious and resentful of the management of their money in the schools. The pursuit of knowledge is not sacred, and if the economy dives, the universities must take their lumps too, or so it goes. This sort of thinking shouldn't surprise us, we've known for a long time that the government and public conception of education is that it is firmly tied to the economy and must fluctuate its feed into the system equal to the system's ability to handle the flow. Knowledge is a commodity like any other. So you see why it's important to watch the world, it will affect your well-being quicker than you may realize.

Campus-watching follows very easily. That which is taking place in Canadian society is mirrored here in a much more brutal fashion. Courses disappear, jobs are insecure, and an administration is both crippled and strengthened at the same time.

We've watched that dual effect this year. Simcoe Hall has been put in the unfortunate position of making the large decisions outside of the Governing Council chambers, thereby strengthening their positions as autocrats. Maybe the Simcoe Circle doesn't like being in that position, but there it is. In the end how much strength do they actually have? To be fair, do they even make the decisions? Are there any decisions to be made? Decision-making is not just choosing the victims for the block, but that's all that's left them by the time the government announcements are delivered.

What this means is that we are no longer in control of our own destinies. Policy decisions, supposedly made by the Governing Council, are out of the council's reach because there is no policy without money. We do not control the money, thus we have no policy. Twiddle, twiddle, twiddle.

In the end, the only thing we can rely upon is our own ability to assess a situation and to combat injustice and mismanagement of the economy. That's why we feed the world into the campus three times a week. You can't make decisions without information, and for the most part, we don't invent the information.

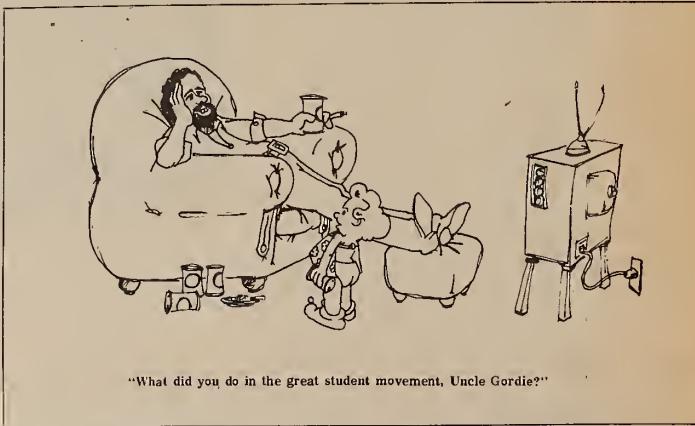

People have been talking about a rebirth of the student movement. Of course it's possible, in fact it's likely if one considers the scientific law that states "every action has an equal and opposite action." The more we are beset by minor bureaucrats telling us to tighten our belts for big business, the more we will react.

It sounds simple, but... an informed, open-eyed student body is a necessity. The faculty and administration prefer the committee work, so it's up to the students to do the lobbying, the demonstrating and, if necessary, the shouting.

If that's going to happen next year, SAC has to entirely change its self-image. Sure, students need services and a good time, but that good time cannot be guaranteed unless SAC takes on its responsibilities as a defence organization for the interests of the students at this campus and across Canada. There's a large battle waging, and if SAC isn't up to the job, you might as well kiss this place goodbye.

Hope you've had a good year and that the university is alive and well for your return in September.

"What did you do in the great student movement, Uncle Gordie?"

Gay student disputes review

To The Editor:

As a gay person and as a student of literature I want to object strongly to Ed Jewinski's review in the March 24th issue of the Varsity of Ian Young's new book of poetry. The article was insulting, uninformed and lacking in literary perception. Though Mr. Jewinski admits that gay poetry should not be put under the rug, he feels that homosexual relationships, "are a weak subject for poetry." Poor boy. His fears and insecurity about male love have kept him from enjoying Plato, Sidney, Shakespeare, Whitman, Hart Crane, Gerard Manley Hopkins and D. H. Lawrence. Mr. Jewinski also holds as a truth that poetry is totally divorced from politics, that it should not "degenerate into manifestos." With that dogma in mind, he would be hard put to it to read Dante, Spenser, Yeats, Auden or Eliot or any of our writers who have a firm moral vision. The review insinuates that gay men are acceptable only if they are redeemed from their perversions by "talent, ability and sensitivity," that gay poetry will be tolerated if the objectionable eroticism is subordinate to controlled images, felicitous phrasing and witty statement. What snobbery! How misguided about the connections between feeling and form! How grateful is Mr. Jewinski that "homosexual concerns do not dominate throughout," the book and that, "one need not agree or sympathize with Young's sexual preferences." Gay is O.K., but only in safe doses?

The obvious needs restatement. Gay love is normal Gay people are oppressed and their image is distorted. Poetry, as Susanne Langer says, is symbolic of human feeling, and if that feeling is gay the poem must make real and vivid the truth of its erotic base. Please, Mr. Jewinski, no more back-handed compliments or condescending liberalism. Read so that substance becomes subtle.

Innis student says watch out

With all the previous mass confusion created by the CPC (M-L) at Innis College, it seems that these disrupters are still willing to continue their antagonistic activities against students. On Monday, 26-3-1976, the CPC (M-L) group were back again at Innis College. Perceiving their presence could create arguments, dissension and possible alterations at a time when students are under enormous pressure to get their essays completed, and prepare for final examinations, they found it advisable to ask the intruders to leave. However, the intruders refused to leave voluntarily.

When they had refused to leave willingly, the University Security

Police were called in to ask these molesters CPC (M-L) to leave.

I refer to this as a clever strategy, since after the incident, the CPC (M-L) members came back in the same afternoon to call people names that are absolutely contrary to the facts. Martin Bracy, the leading black CPC (M-L) representative played a major role in these forays.

After these two recent disturbances, the Community Affairs Committee of Innis College, convened to discuss a motion to disallow all organizations from selling literature in Innis College (excluding Innis Town Hall), and passed the ruling unanimously. Such a ruling equally applies to the CPC (M-L) disturbers as well.

Innis College Student's Council (ICSC), also called a meeting after the conclusion of the Community Affairs Committee to discuss the same problem.

The most crucial by-law passed stipulates that no one should sell any political literature in Innis College without the permission of the ICSC.

On Tuesday morning, a little after the opening of the building, two of the CPC (M-L) members were at the ICSC's office, tending their apologies. By the same token, they managed to book the Town Hall, for a meeting for Friday 2nd April. This certainly was a clever gain. One should not be surprised if the Friday meeting will be used to create further dissensions among the Innis Students. Students beware!

Innis banning is denounced

To The Editor:

Innis College has traditionally been a centre for progressive thinking on the U. of T. Campus. But recently they have taken a step away from the path of the future and into the relics of the past. The recent banning of newspaper selling at Innis is an insult to the Innis democratic tradition. Maybe it is bothersome to walk by a newspaper peddler, but it is far preferable to not being allowed to hear and read many points of view. There are too many places already where you aren't allowed to hear alternate points of view. Innis College should never become one of them.

CPC(M-L) combats 'frenzy'

In the past few weeks, The Varsity has been full of ravings by various individuals against the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) and its student wing the Toronto Student movement. Op-Eds, letters to the editor have accused CPC(ML) of all sorts of things. One writer accuses us of being racists, the Trotskyists call us gangsters, one "long time Varsity staffer" says that CPC(ML) provokes the police so they deserve the over 2,000 arrests since 1969.

Some West Indian opportunists tried to have CPC(ML) banned from Innis College, the anti-communist principal of Innis College wants to have CPC(ML) banned from U of T, and reactionaries try to stop CPC(ML) from selling Peoples Canada Daily News at Innis College. Why all this frenzy?

Ever since Soviet social-imperialism and its Cuban puppets invaded Angola, the Canadian revisionists (P.R. men for the Soviet Union) have been behaving like "ants on a hot pan". They have been "trying" to justify this blatant act of aggression as "proletarian internationalism", "timely help against U.S. imperialism and South African puppets" etc.

But they have failed to muster much support from the Canadian people. CPC(ML) has led the exposure in Canada of the Soviet social-imperialist-Cuban aggression against Angola. To cover up social-imperialisms bloody tracks, the Canadian revisionists say that anyone that opposes social-imperialist invasion of Angola is an agent of U.S. imperialism and South Africa and thus a racist.

So they say CPC(ML) is racist. They even sent certain black racists to disrupt a UNITA support meeting on Feb. 8th so that when they were firmly ejected from the meeting they could shout that "whites were beating up blacks so see how CPC(ML) is racist."

So while it is John Africa, Delroy Reid and various Trotskyists who are moving their lips, it is the Canadian revisionists who are doing the talking. Taking advantage of this attack on CPC(ML) in the name of "socialism" and the "African people", some straightforward anti-communists have also chosen this time to try to "ban" CPC(ML). This is why all the raving against CPC(ML).

In spite of all the slanders and distortions being spread by the alliance of imperialist and social-imperialist press, the reactionary professors, the trotskyite organisations (which are straightforward fascist organisations at the beck and call of international reaction) and various other opportunists some of which claim to be "genuine" Marxist-Leninists and supporters of China on "other" issues, which have formed a united front in support of social-imperialist invasion of Angola... the issue still remains. Does one support or oppose Soviet social-imperialist Cuban invasion of Angola. Support or oppose the second anti-colonial struggle of the Angolan people. This is the fundamental question.

A similar class alliance of forces took place on the question of India's armed intervention in East Pakistan in December of 1971, aided and abetted by the Soviet Union. Under the hoax that the then President of Pakistan was a fascist, these reactionaries propagated the thesis that the Indian reactionaries had the right to organise a so-called "national liberation movement" in order to cover up the naked act of aggression against the sovereign state of Pakistan ordered by the Soviet Union.

When Mrs. Gandhi declared 'National Emergency' in India on June 26, 1975 and escalated the slaughter of the Indian people, then it was Soviet social-imperialism which tried to justify this fascist activity on the part of Mrs. Gandhi as 'defence of democracy'. Let us remember that Czechoslovakia was invaded by Soviet social-imperialism under the hoax of 'defending socialism' and in 'defence of the socialist community' in August 1968. From the time Khrushchov seized control of the state and carried out restoration of capitalism in the Soviet Union, untold crimes have been committed against humanity under the signboard of 'socialism'!

Right from the time of the death of Comrade Stalin, Soviet social-imperialism colluded with U.S. imperialism and is now contending furiously to redivide the world.

The two superpowers are contending for world hegemony and in order to accomplish this, they will go to war. The situation in Angola is part of the Soviet social-imperialist scramble for world hegemony.

Today the social-imperialists and their allies have been, on the international scale, cultivating various lies to the tune that UNITA is a CIA front, backed by the Portuguese and South African racists. This is a big lie of Hitlerite proportions in order to justify social-imperialist aggression.

UNITA has consistently led the Angolan peoples' armed struggle against Portuguese colonialism and now leads the armed struggle in the Angolan people's second anti-colonial war, this time against social-imperialism. CPC(ML) was extremely honoured that Tony Fernandes, Minister of Information and founding member of UNITA and Jorge Sangumba, Foreign Minister of UNITA participated in the celebrations in Toronto on March 13, 1976 of the 10th anniversary of the founding of UNITA and the 13th anniversary of the founding of the Internationalists (the youth and student organisation that prepared conditions for the formation of CPC(ML)).

UNITA and CPC(ML) are fighters on the same front against Soviet social-imperialism, U.S.

imperialism and all reaction.

According to the revisionists; the Soviet Union and Cuba are in Angola merely to support the cause of the MPLA against South African racism and U.S. imperialism, following which they will "disappear from the scene". According to them, the Soviet Union and Cuba are so revolutionary that they can liberate other people through armed intervention. If this is the case, then why did the Soviet Union and Cuba not participate in the armed intervention prior to 1974 and send expeditionary forces against the Portuguese colonialists?

According to their reactionary thesis, Brezhnev and Castro should have a licence to send expeditionary forces to all the countries around the world that they think have a reactionary government in power, in order to "liberate the people".

The basis of this thesis is to not support the sanctity of nations, national independence and national sovereignty. It is to support imperialism, social-imperialist and fascist intervention on a world scale and justify such intervention under the hoax that it is "revolutionary".

Do not forget that throughout 1946 to 1975, it was under the signboards of "democracy" and "freedom" and "protecting the free world" that U.S. imperialism participated in open and covert intervention throughout the world, groomed puppets everywhere, and it is still doing so.

The armed intervention on the part of the Soviet Union, under the hoax of supporting "Marxists" and

"socialists" is no different and equally unjustified.

To uphold the revolutionary principle of building friendship with the oppressed nations and peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, it is fundamental to uphold the principle of national independence and sovereignty of nations. Anyone who supports intervention under any pretext whatsoever cannot be called a "revolutionary", a "progressive" or a "democrat". This is a basic and fundamental point.

At U of T the two lines are very clear. It was only CPC(ML) and its friends who opposed the intervention and dismemberment of East Pakistan and firmly supported the right of nations to self-determination and national sovereignty.

On the question of the Middle East again it is CPC(ML) which has resolutely taken a stand against Zionism, imperialism and against Soviet social-imperialism as well as in support of the PLO. When Dayan, the Israeli general came to U of T it was only CPC(ML) that organised to demonstrate against him. On the question of Cambodia, again it was CPC(ML) who led and built the solidarity campaign in support of the struggle of the heroic Cambodian people while the opportunists carried out a campaign of silence and did not organise so much as a rally or demonstration.

Now on the question of Angola, the two lines are crystal clear. The opportunists groups promote every lie dished out by the imperialist and social-imperialist press against the people of Angola, against UNITRA.

Dem of Summer Job Blues

by BUTLY AMPERSAND THE VARSITY - U OF TORONTO © 1976

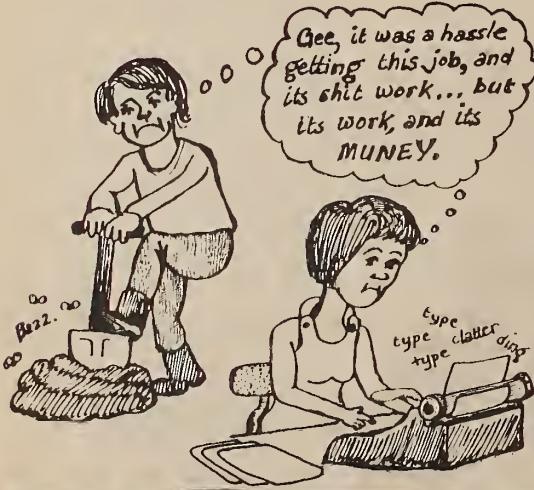

Ohh boy, time to get a summer job & earn some MUNEY!

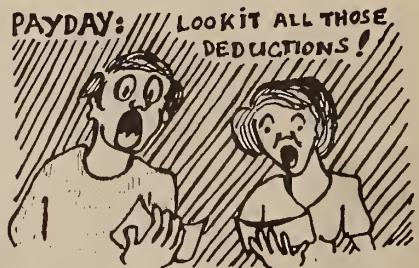

FINALLY, AFTER UMPTEN ATTEMPTS

BUT ...

Sorry kids, this is a recession we're in gotta tighten the belt.

Gee, it was a hassle getting this job, and its shit work... but its work, and its MUNEY.

PAYDAY: LOOKIT ALL THOSE DEDUCTIONS!

AND OF COURSE THERE ARE THOSE SUMMER JOB PERQUISITES

if there are any when graduate...

YEAH KID, wish I'd got an education... only way to get one of them soft jobs.

AND SO, DAY IN, DAY OUT, UNTILS

Wow! this summer went fast!

YEAH, I didn't have much of a vacation... just saved enough to pay for tuition

Hipp Chick! say I go for you intellectual university types... wanna know how much I made last year? 18,000 yep? 18,000... wanna go for a drink after work? my wife won't mind, she's broad minded... get it? HA-HA!

CREEP

No thank you, Mr. Porcine, sir.

WELL KIDS, CHEER UP, IN A FEW SWIFT YEARS YOU GRADUATE AND THEN THIS BRIGHT, WONDERFUL WORLD IS ALL YOURS ... and you'll earn lots of muneey ... RIGHT?

They can't fire you

Haven't got a job yet? Well maybe you're just not thinking big enough. At least that's the impression one gets from a recent news release from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities announcing Ontario's "Venture Capital" program for students.

Seems the people who brought you "A Place to Stand" don't want you to just stand still this summer. As part of its "Experience '76" job opportunities scheme, the government will provide interest free loans of up to $1,000 to "qualified" students who want to run their own summer business.

"By acquiring skills in the real world of commerce, some bright young people are giving Ontario top value for its tax dollars by helping to pay for their own formal education and by learning additional skills that are not easily taught in an academic environment," says Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities.

Though OSAP revisions for next year promise to liberate more and more students to the "real world of commerce" on something less than optimistic terms. Successful applicants to "Venture Capital" are assured by the news release that "Most of last year's venturers were profitable for their student operators."

So why just be content to look after old Number One this summer? Why be an employee when you can be an employer? Citing the initiative of three Guelph youths, the release reports they "not only made $5,000 a piece for themselves for their landscape design venture, but paid two other students $1,000 each to help with the office work."

Or if you must think small, you might aspire to the example of "One young Sarnia tycoon", who, Parrott notes, "reaped $10,000 profit from interior decorating."

Other successes reported are less remarkable, like two Windsor youths who made $300 each in building maintenance "with an original loan of only $260," a Toronto girl who made $500 profit with a loan of $400 and continued to make $200 a month dyeing ties, and the Elmira student who netted $900 washing cars, with a loan of $500.

Those seeking to launch a "Venture Capital" business have their plans evaluated by a local Chamber of Commerce which then passes it to a provincial panel for consideration. If the proposal is accepted, the student "must agree to follow certain standard business procedures, to make regular reports, and to repay the loan in a specified amount of time." The Royal Bank of Canada provides a full time liaison officer to help students, the release adds.

Some of the projects rumoured to be approved this year include one student who plans to buy thousands of hospital beds from an undisclosed source and install them as automobile roof racks for 1950-57 De Sotos.

Why not get into the King business this summer with a "Venture Capital" loan.

Hire-a-job if you can

Some students seem to have solved their summer employment problem easily.

They make radio commercials for the provincial government exhorting other students to persist in job-hunting.

An estimated 600,000 others face greater difficulties in finding work this summer. Canada Manpower expects it won't be able to place more than 200,000 of them through its services.

Times are tough. Especially since the federal government is reducing its summer payroll by over seventy per cent. Especially since the Opportunities for Youth program is cutting out 29,000 jobs.

Try the Yellow Pages

By BOB COLLIER

How would you like to be a puppeteer, or a hostess at Harbourfront, or a pest control officer in a horticultural exhibit? Then you'd better get over to the U of T Placement Service right away. These are just a few of the dozens of summer jobs that the Placement Service has listed in their office at Bloor and Spadina.

The federal and provincial governments are the big employers, in spite of cutbacks, and they need students for a wide range of positions. The federal government wants the puppeteer, but Ontario needs tour guides for art galleries, and ecologists to study birds in Barry Mansel. They will even lend you $1,000 to start your own business. The deadline for applying to the government is very close, so hurry.

The Placement Service doesn't just post notices from potential employers, they go out and solicit for students. Eve Paley, who is responsible for summer jobs, goes through the yellow pages in the telephone book and phones up any company that may need temporary staff. She has a five per cent success rate, she claims.

She advises students to go right to the source and ask them for a job. "You'd be surprised at how many companies are hiring this summer."

Office and labour jobs are a good place to try, says Paley. Toronto businesses often need replacements for staff when they go on vacation. They make a last minute decision and then hire people who can start the next day. Most of these jobs are posted in the Placement Service between mid-April and the end of June, but vacancies kept appearing over the whole summer.

Even though these jobs aren't always course related, they can be very worthwhile. Last year, the petroleum companies needed some hostesses to travel across Canada with an exhibit which defended their oil drilling programmes. Another group wanted students for a study of oil pollution. You can't miss.

Paley has very few listings for course-related work. The Royal Botanical Gardens in Hamilton needs a botanist, and a market research company needs psychologists.

Paley recommends that students should really work hard when they go job hunting. They should try the Placement Service and Canada Manpower, of course, but they should also be phoning up individual companies.

"You should sit down and decide what you have to offer. Don't give up, everybody has worthwhile skills or interests which can get them a job," says Paley. "Do a lot of thinking and decide how to present yourself. Then get the telephone book and sell your abilities. The days are past when companies come to you and ask."

Librarians fight on

By BOB COLLIER

The campus library workers won't be wrapping up their fight with the university administration for many months yet. They are still demanding the 18 per cent raise they won in the strike last December but they have run into a long succession of battles that has widened their battlefield to include both Ottawa and Queen's Park.

After the strike, the federal Anti-Inflation Board (AIB) lowered their settlement from 18 to 12 per cent, and then reconsidered in a precedent setting decision. "On the basis of new information," the AIB decided that the workers should really be given a 16 per cent raise.

The library workers and the national CUPE executive, have challenged the jurisdiction of the federal AIB over provincial matters. They believe they are only subject to provincial law since they are employed by the university, a public institution. So many lawyers agree with them, that they are taking their case to the Ontario Supreme Court this afternoon. They are the first union in Canada to challenge the wage and price controls, so whatever the outcome, U of T will make national headlines once again.

The library workers' contract runs out at the end of June this year, so the union executive and the university management are getting ready to start negotiating again. If the worst happens, there could be another strike this summer, but the library workers are hoping that negotiations are smoother than they were the same time last year.

Feut focks fickle finks

Faculty of Education hopefuls who used a friend's application form will be considered for admission, said FacEd Admissions Officer Gerald White yesterday.

In a major change of policy affecting dozens of applicants, White reversed the earlier decision that the students would be summarily rejected.

Since there is no statement in any of the faculty's literature which says forms are not transferable, the students took the applications from friends who had changed their mind about applying.

Students who applied after the January 15 cut-off date will now receive application forms but FacEd will still admit students on a basis which amounts to first-come-first-serve. They are the only faculty at U of T to do so.

Beauty and the Beast

Once upon a time, this city was a beautiful place. The vista at the corner of St. George and Harbord, for example, was of pleasant tree-lined avenues, as recently as 30 years ago. But then a land-hungry monster came, disguised as a creature of enlightenment and knowledge, and gobbled it all up. Now concrete fortresses, a few stunted, pollution-choked bushes mark the spoor of the dragon. Let the neighbours beware!

BEFORE (Summer of '44)...

...AND (Yeuchh!) AFTER

Future telling

By KEN WYMAN

Everybody has them: days when nothing seems to go right. Most people shrug them off. Just one of those days.

But a handful of scientists, scattered around the world, think that they can predict when 'one of those days' is coming. They claim that both good and bad days come with rhythmical regularity, and that everybody has identifiable, separate cycles of intellectual, emotional, and physical highs and lows.

In fact, the 61 year old Vice president of the Medical Research Council of Canada, Dr. Philippe Costin believes that he can use the science of "biorhythms" to predict the outcome of the Stanley Cup finals.

And researchers at the U.S. Naval Postgraduate School in California have proved strong links between intellectual high days and better than average results on students' exams.

Multi-national companies like Hitachi, United Airlines and E.P. Eddy have been using biorhythms to reduce industrial accidents and improve efficiency. Doctors are cutting down recovery time from surgery. And athletes are using them to improve their performance, according to Track & Field News Magazine.

Biorhythms are extremely easy to calculate. All you need is the date of birth and some elementary arithmetic. As a result many people are skeptical of the claims.

But advocates of the system claim that unlike astrology, biorhythm theory is based on empirical data.

Ried Bounsell, a Toronto biorhythm expert explained the details of the system.

There are three cycles, he said, and they "begin at birth and run concurrently throughout your life, never varying in life per cycle. The dynamics of biorhythm include your 23 days physical cycle, your 28 day emotional cycle and your 33 day intellectual cycle.

"There are two critical days in each cycle," Bounsell claims, "one at the first day of the cycle and one at the halfway point. Critical days are not dangerous in themselves. Rather these are days when your reaction to your surroundings may bring about a critical incident or situation. You are more accident prone on physical and emotional critical days.

"Research has shown however that this is not the case with intellectually critical days. These days represent a time to avoid making major decisions. If a problem must be resolved on an intellectually critical day and cannot be postponed, every effort should be made to think things out clearly in advance.

"It is best not to take an I.Q. test or aptitude test on any critical day," said Bounsell.

To calculate your cycles, all that is needed is the date and time of birth. Since each of the three cycles begin on an upswing at birth, figure out how many days since you were born. Don't forget leap years. Then divide by 23 to find out what day of your physical cycle you are currently on, 28 for emotional, and 33 for intellectual.

Ignore the solution to your long division problem. The important number is the remainder. For example, a person born 26 years ago today would have lived 8,757 days, including 7 leap years, if my math is right. Divided by 23, reveals that 265 intellectual cycles have been completed, with 5 left over. Thus this is the fifth day of our birthday buddies intellectual cycle.

The first half of the cycle is the high part. People are stronger, smarter and more stable. In the middle is the accident prone critical day. And then the low portion of the cycle follows, when people are more susceptible to disease, a little less swift of mind, and emotionally vulnerable.

Does it really work? For thousands of corporations that are investing heavily in calculating employees' charts, the answer is for yes.

But after months of keeping track of my own biorhythms, I can't say that they reflect the realities of my life beyond the level of coincidence.

Alberta tuition up

EDMONTON (CUP) — Instruction fees at the University of Alberta will increase by up to 25 per cent next year.

Although fees to be paid by students are yet to be revealed Bert Hobel, Alberta minister of Advanced Education, has announced the government's approval of the overall fee hike. The announcement came as no surprise to Student Union president Graeme Leadbeater who said that, after talking with the minister, he realized approval of the increase was a "fait accompli".

Lack of community support was seen by Leadbeater as a definite setback in the students' campaign against the increases. "We may have been fighting a losing battle because the public was not really behind us. With that problem cleared up we would have had a much greater impact," said Leadbeater.

Speaking to the press during the last week of February, Alberta premier Peter Lougheed said he felt justified in ratifying the fee increase because Alberta has "an excellent loan system" and the lowest unemployment rate in Canada.

Leadbeater was disappointed that the premier took this stand. "There are people in government who just don't realize what the situation is like," he said.

NUS reaches crucial stage

OTTAWA (CUP) — The fourth annual meeting of the National Union of Students this summer will probably be the most important in the four-year history of the revived national student organization.

The major issue which the expected 150 delegates will have to deal with when they meet at the University of Winnipeg May 12-16 is how the national union will serve its greatly increased membership and spend its vastly augmented resources next year.

At the start of the 1975-76 academic year, the national union had a membership of about 120 thousand post-secondary students from 20 institutions, and a budget of about $58 thousand.

Next year, as a result of a referendum campaign approving an increase in an annual fees from 30 cents per student to $1.00 per student for member institutions and the budget for the 1976-77 academic year will almost triple to approximately $165 thousand.

NUS executive secretary Dan O'Connor feels the "major overall issue" of the May meeting will be "how students of Canada are going to work together next year to deal with impending government decisions on financing post-secondary education, student aid, and the question of accessibility."

But this issue will surface in resolving the practical question of how NUS is going to allocate its new resources in providing national coordination for this work next year, "the first year in which NUS has 'reasonable' adequate resources."

An almost certain result will be increasing the number of full-time staff. Presently NUS has two roving fieldworkers and one person in the Ottawa office. Next year the anticipated budget could provide for up to eight additional people, but the exact number will be decided at the Annual Meeting.

Another question will be how to allocate the new personnel, and the possible establishment of one or two regional offices outside of central Canada.

The delegates will also have to take a position on the possible restructuring of the national organization to provide for the amalgamation within NUS of the various provincial and regional student organizations across the country.

These regional and provincial organizations are at present totally independent of the national union, and technically have no official connection with NUS.

But, since they all have virtually the same policies and objectives, and all recognize the need for national co-ordination, a series of meetings has been held in the past year to discuss possible amalgamation.

The Winnipeg meeting will have to decide what NUS' position will be on this issue. After that a detailed policy statement will be prepared for presentation and debate next fall.

Sight and sound coalesce in moments of frantic farce

With a deftness of touch underscored by the enormous chances he takes, director John Palmer has succeeded in preventing the St. Lawrence Centre's track record this year from being a perfect total of five inconsistent plays. In Georges Feydeau's famed Hotel Paradiso, transplanted into the Paris of 1922, he has used every device at his command to keep the show at a regular breakneck pace of plot, counterplot, and mutual discovery.

Blessed, as is customary, with the magnificent sets of Murray Laufer, Palmer has been less fortunate with his cast, not all of whom have the vocal and visual presence required for a successful caricature performance. But the inconsistencies in the players are nearly smothered, not merely obscured, by the dynamic texture of the sets and the costumes. Miro Kinch in her costumes has transcended the classic magazine covers of the Twenties in order to shock an audience expecting a more usual bedroom game.

Since production values dominate the Centre's version of the play, how should they relate to the action of the piece? In a farce each character is asked to be a unique moral force, and to be, in the case of Feydeau, more recognizable by his actions than by his appearance. Palmer has called on the considerable talents of Heath Lambert as M. Boniface, bourgeois-turned-Latin lover, Jennifer Phipps, as his elephantine and devastatingly faithful wife, as well as Dawn Greenhalgh in a fine role as the perhaps-ravishing Mme Cot, next-door-neighbour and moderately-willing partner in Boniface's intended infidelity. The remainder of the company were quite spotty, and one's interest, centred naturally on these three, could only be diverted occasionally.

Lambert is to be congratulated for an exquisitely cultivated leatheriness, achieved as much by his appearance as by his voice and his superlative gestures. Not yet in this season has an actor so dominated the Centre's stage after his first few lines and established a formidable personality in a hard-edged relationship with his watchers. Lambert used his voice as a tool of rationalization, as well as a voice of temptation, and withal, as a device to centre the action on himself. In such a role, with a play so constructed, it is hard to discern whether Boniface steals the show or has it given to him. Certainly one could not fault Lambert's performance, though his extravagance could perhaps be the cause of his co-actors' apparent dullness.

Jennifer Phipps, as usual, became a character in her own right in a gradual fashion, building to a larger dimension so smoothly as to be unremarkable except in retrospect. Her acting ability is obviously considerable, as well as being consistent, but in this as in other performances I found myself horribly unconvinced by her first scene. A major disappointment of the evening was David Bolt, who lacked the self-conviction necessary to our security in the purely mechanical role of M. Cot, the near-cuckold. Although the role was thankless, more vocal flamboyance and an economy in movement would have been more persuasive.

Voice is, after all, much of this play; the crucial figure is none of the respondents in the expected divorce suit, but an English ninny named Martin who is suppressed by, literally, an act of God — his damning evidence refuses to pass recognizably through a violent stammer brought on by a thunderstorm. As Martin, Ron Hastings was a tremendous favourite with all, in particular with those who find the sight of a man with a speech impediment staggeringly funny. Equally spectacular, but treading more heavily on the boundaries of taste, was Allan Royal as the massive Italian proprietor of the Hotel. The most embarrassing miscasting of the play gave Lubomir Mykitiuk, a veteran of the Centre, the role of Georges, know-nothing hotel assistant. Mykitiuk was barely audible and played his part with a slowness that lacked the slyness Feydeau must surely have intended.

This was one production in which efficient direction has triumphed over the caverns of the St. Lawrence, even when they echo alarmingly from empty seat to empty seat. This seems to be John Palmer's play, but Heath Lambert's success. The run continues until April 10, when Theatre Plus will assume residency for the summer months. Next year's Toronto Arts Productions' season is to feature as its front-runner Brecht's The Caucasian Chalk Circle and we are left to ponder just what Toronto's Big Three Theatres think we are in fact competent to view with appreciation.

Theatrical collage presents adversary roles between sexes

"It's hard to fight an enemy who has guardposts in your own mind.": this was the theme of Any Day Now, the women's liberation production put on by Tomorrow's Eve Theatre. The opening suffragette speech based on the letters and writings of Emmeline Pankhurst given by Marion Gilsenan was historically interesting and quite moving. However, Mary Giffin's rendition of similar material by daughter Sylvia Pankhurst was too obviously emotional and hence failed to convince.

The entire company (three women and one male musician) participated in the song "They're Closing Down Girl Land". The shivers that went down my spine during this number were due not only to the lyrics but also to the deceptively lighthearted approach taken by the company to this numbing song about the socialization of female children.

Gilsenan portrayed a housewife reminiscing about the beginning of her courtship with her mailman husband. This passage, taken from Alice Munro's How I Met My Husband, depends on the actress making us believe that she was once a naive young girl who waited for a letter that would never come; not realizing that the postman thought that her attention to the daily arrival of the mail was directed towards him. With a lilting and amused Irish accent she tells us this tale while hanging up her laundry. The audience (unfortunately outnumbering the actors by only five to one) shared an embarrassed chuckle over the misguided postman who doesn't realize to this day that his wife didn't make a play for him. The dramatized portion from Laurence's The Jest of God where Rachel wonders how on earth she is ever going to obtain an abortion was not nearly as successful as the monologue from Munro's work since Giffin overplayed the scene to the extent that I was unable to experience Rachel's anxiety because of the excess emotionalism.

Although the "Nice Baby" sequence where two young maîtres (played by Mary Giffin and Laurel Darnell) console each other over the loss of the "charmingly eclectic" atmosphere of their apartments due to the arrival of babies is mildly amusing, it smacks somewhat of bellyaching. There are more important reasons to be apprehensive about the effect that babies can have on one's life than how they'll alter your decoration scheme, and for that reason alone one is at a loss to understand the inclusion of this particular skill. On the other hand, Alix Kates Shulman's Mother and Daughter is a poignant and affectionate examination of the deepening of a woman's understanding of her own mother, through the experience of having a daughter.

Two show-stealers were a rousing song from the 1860's called The Housewives' Lament and a hilarious take-off of Marabel Morgan (of Total Woman fame) on the lecture route. Mrs. Morgan is portrayed by Mary Giffin as a woman who voluntarily alters herself into a "Stepford Wife" and wants us all to do the same; i.e., "If you won't adapt to, admire, appreciate and accept your man, you don't DESERVE a man!"

Dylan's song "I Shall Be Released" provided the words for the title of this production and its closing number. The company deliberately met the eyes of the audience during the finale. They read there, for the most part, shared convictions (since this was a political as well as a theatrical production) and an appreciation of the manner in which the evening's selections of poetry, song and fiction were presented. A Portrait of the Urban Experience, 1890-1930

Canada is a land of immigrants. Most of its population lives in cities. Despite these commonplaces, urban and immigrant history in this country is still in its infancy. But two new books on Winnipeg and Toronto now promise to catapult Canadian urban history from cradle to creche.

Alan Artibise's study of the city-building process in Winnipeg transcends the traditional antiquarian approach to local history. It provides, at long last, a firm base for an analytical and comparative history of Canadian cities. After sketching the origins and incorporation of Winnipeg in the 1870s, Artibise shows the unshakable dominance of a "commercial elite" in civic politics. He then examines the way in which this elite used its control of local government to protect and to further its own interests. Obsessed with the now-notorious "growth ethic", the city fathers freely spent public monies to attract immigrants, railways, and industry — for private gain.

Not surprisingly, social problems received attention from the commercial elite only insofar as they affected the race to make Winnipeg the "Chicago of the North". With great care, Artibise examines the civic response to the "challenges" of urban growth: immigration, water supply, public health, prostitution, and city planning. From his perspective as an urban reformer of the affluent 1970s, the author concludes that the civic response was wanting. Adequate housing, education, leisure, sewage disposal, and a host of other "challenges" were shunted aside by the overriding challenge to encourage population growth and to create opportunities for business profit. The resulting social division, suggests Artibise, helps to explain why Winnipeg was the first city on the continent to experience a general strike.

Yet Artibise's attitudes to the commercial elite are not unambiguous. After lambasting the elite for its callous destruction of "community life", he still retains a sneaking admiration for the vigour and shrewdness of the "hard-headed businessmen" who controlled the city. He even attributes the economic decline of postwar Winnipeg to its lack of "outstanding entrepreneurial figures". This is certainly a surprising conclusion, since Artibise has already shown that the dominance of Winnipeg derived from its position as the "gateway" (and tollgate) of the West. The ever-increasing importance of the "Gem of the Prairies" came to an end after 1914 not because its businessmen had lost their nerve, but because the settlement of the Prairies had spelled the closing of the frontier. And it should be pointed out that business "boosterism" was not confined to Winnipeg in this period. From little Belleville in Ontario to Dawson City in the Yukon, every community in Canada firmly believed — and loudly proclaimed — that it was "the Bull's Eye of the Dominion".

With the end of the boom, the "open door" to immigrants was slammed shut. Artibise provides two well-researched chapters on the immigrant "problem", but his perspective is that of a social scientist and an outsider. A far more intimate portrayal of the immigrant experience is provided by Professors Harney and Troper, who deal with the hitherto neglected question of the "foreign element" in the cities. Using Toronto as their case study, they describe the aspirations of the immigrants, their struggles to survive in a hostile environment, and their attempts to mould their traditions in accordance with new realities. Over 150 striking photographs are matched with appropriate quotations from contemporary sources, and are tied together by a compassionate and informative commentary. "Our pictures try not to take sides", say the authors, but there is little doubt as to where their sympathies lie. Harney and Troper clearly show that Toronto the Good was far from being "a homogenous and stable outpost of British society".

The first chapter of the book places the coming of the immigrants to Canada in the context of world migration patterns. It also describes the fierce competition among the rival shipping companies engaged in "the commerce of flesh". To escape the Old World, emigrants were forced to run the gauntlet of loan sharks, shipping agents, miserable steerage quarters, and rigid border regulations. Even after arriving in the city — by choice or by chance — the migrant had yet to endure the "land-locked steerage" of the foreign quarter. In Toronto, the newcomers concentrated in the Ward, an area that is now covered by the new City Hall and by the Hospital for Sick Children. Absentee landlords and an indifferent municipal government assured the squalor of the district, and wave upon wave of evangelists descended upon the already harassed immigrants. But where more affluent natives saw only microbes and moral laxity, Harney and Troper show a flourishing neighbourhood imbued with a fierce determination to survive.

If British Canadians fretted about a "foreign problem", they also realized that immigrants were an indispensable part of the drive for economic growth. As Harney and Troper point out, "The immigrants helped to bring creature comforts to the Canadian middle classes at low cost and without disruption of genteel society. Packaged cigarettes, cement sidewalks, paved roads, trolley systems, factory made clothing, all depended upon immigrant labour". The medicine may have been hard to take, but it had to be swallowed. And if immigrants provoked distaste and apprehension, at least their children were not beyond redemption. No educational or recreational effort was spared in the campaign "to make the little people of foreign lands leap eagerly into the melting pot". Once the children had been properly melted down, they would gradually lead their hapless parents "to adopt better, cleaner, Canadian ways".

The penultimate chapter of this book is entitled "Religion and Politics", but it has more to say about the former than the latter. This is unfortunate, since the hostility of the natives had more to do with the ideological than with the theological baggage of the newcomers. And although the book claims to cover the four decades from 1890 to 1930, the end of the narrative is closer to the Great War than to the Great Depression. (Luckily, these gaps can be easily filled: the interested reader should consult Michiel Horn's "Keeping Canada Canadian", in the September 1975 issue of Canada: An Historical Magazine.)

But this review must not end on a critical note. Thanks to the books of Harney, Troper, and Artibise, the social history of English (sic) Canada has taken a great leap forward.

A creature of the dailies, the reviewer, properly, is, if not the ideal audience, then at least the average one; his function is to report. The enjoyment factor of the production should be his prime concern.

The prime concern of the Strange, indeed, at event of the performing arts, is the audience's preoccupation with forming a judgement. It takes, it coughs, it yawns and then at intermission it condemns. It dismisses, it generally enjoys its sense of proprietorship over what it views. Some journalists have of course elevated this preoccupation into an occupational neurosis. "Good." "Bad." "Must be seen." "!" "!!!!" Four stars. Two stars. One-fourth star.

Erich Fromm has made a useful distinction between the rebel and the revolutionary: the rebel, he says, struggles against authority in order to become authority; the revolutionary fights authority without envy. It is all too easy, all too often, unfortunately, to see the reviewer as a rather shrill rebel.

If theatre is ritual, as we are told it is in origin and in essence, then it means participation. There are no observers. Reviews are for observers. Reviews are for audiences who come to a production, as Lindsay Anderson once said, "with the passive expectation of 'entertainment' with mouths wide open for another slab of minority culture". Reviews are for those for whom nothing much matters and so for whom anything matters—diction, this actor's or that's performance, the costumes, the comfort of the seats.

critic, on the other hand, are his own assumptions. With a more intellectual overview, he will place the production in the context of his own aesthetic, often doing considerable damage to an otherwise enjoyable and innocuous effort as a result. Ideally, critics should write only books, or appear only in such newspapers where it is clear that a criticism is not necessarily a review.

My own writings in the Varsity do not preserve the purity of these distinctions.

John Wilde

But of course, although theatres do not want to be criticized they do want to be praised: they have tickets to sell. And there are, admittedly, superficial plays which deserve to be caught up in the superficial dichotomy of 'good' and 'bad'. But in the theatre as in life there is so much that we can learn from failure. The reviewer who marches on ahead parting the waters and leading his readers now to the right, now to the left, away from that production before we have a chance to see it for ourselves and towards that, does us a vast disservice.

Why then have I written reviews? I would rather be the reviewer than the reader of reviews, yes, but it's a bit more than that. Although there may not be much value in one particular review there is in a multiplicity of them. And so I am glad to make my contribution. A number of reviews of one show usually conflict enough to make the reader realize he has a mind of his own.

As well, the problems of reviewing are the problems of journalism as a whole, as are the satisfactions. The tension between what one experiences, what one knows, on the one hand, and what one communicates, on the other, remains the same. And journalism is personally rewarding. Writing to a deadline and discovering that one has something to say and that one has to say it then and there: I revel in it. No time then for doubts and hesitations.

But doubt and hesitation do recur . . .

In one book review, I quoted I.F. Stone. "And I tell you, I really have so much fun, I ought to be arrested. Sometimes I think it's wrong of me because, you know, if you're a newspaperman, as I've been since I was 14 years old, to have your own little paper . . . to be able to spit in their eyes, and do what you think is right, and report the news, and have enough readers to make some impact is such a pleasure that you forget what you're writing about. It becomes like, you're a journalistic Nero, fiddling while Rome burns, or like a small boy covering a hell of the big fire. It's just wonderful and exciting and you're a cub-reporter and God has given you this big fire to cover. And you forget that it's actually really burning." Someone here at the Varsity cut the quotation out and stuck it to the wall of the office, with the heading, "I.F. Stone: Live Like Him". But Stone was criticizing himself: the building was burning. Imagine the reviewer and this reviewer here then wondering whether to warm himself by sitting by the fire or by hurrying to put it out.

Randall Robertson

Reviewers go to plays, or rather are sent, and then report back to head office for people who would consider going to the play. Critics go because they are already interested in a general or specific way, and they write for themselves and for anyone who takes them seriously enough to weigh their opinions.

Reviewers need have no knowledge other than their own boredom, likewise critics. But despite the reputation of the critic as a failed performer, he does after all have a greater interest in the piece, as well as the production, than does the reviewer, who only cares about his deadline and his style. Critics should not wield the power to close a show, as has happened in Toronto before now; but they should have the choice of shows to review. If the play is tedious, the reviewer will record that fact—the critic may theorize, however, speciously.

In the Varsity, with an immense press run and a presumably minuscule readership, we undertake to review but occasionally rise to criticism. Carping is not criticism, nor is adulation; but a consideration of the play and its performance in context should ideally illuminate some of those who have already seen the play and come to a provisional understanding of it, interest those who are intrigued by it, and inform the director and his company of the ways in which dramatic art has succeeded or failed. The measure of this last is inevitably the subjective viewer, but he has come with a willingness to experience, and a sensibility geared to aesthetic experience. To review, you must expose your ignorance of art and the rawness of your emotions; to criticize, you must always re-read your reviews and learn from them.

To express an opinion in only 250 words, as my editor has asked, is difficult for me at the best of times, but when it is on the subject of theatre critics I'll most certainly have to forego the usual witty metaphors and deft connectives.

Let's first reject the notion that critics are people who can't 'do' so they criticize—such an opinion usually resides with self-indulgent megalomaniacs whose interest in theatre is the extent to which it augments their personal prestige. No matter how despised for their lack of sympathy with the difficulties of playwrights, directors, actors and designers, critics must continue to demand the best—the best in terms of aesthetic construction, social relevance, experimentation and innovation. Of course, in Canada this should be tempered by the judicious realization that the 'independent' aspect of our culture is an aesthetic factor; that is, good Canadian plays getting good productions in Canada is a more significant cultural task than good productions of good American plays. 'Best' at the same time, must be looked at with sensitivity to limitations or simply with the realization that amateur productions should not be judged entirely the same as professional ones.

Critics become dishonest when they don't demand of themselves the same standards they demand of others. Peter Brook points out that the vital critic "is the critic who has clearly formulated for himself what the theatre could be—and who is bold enough to throw his formula into jeopardy each time he participates in a theatrical event". The problem is not, as Betty Laderoute, editor of That's Showbusiness suggests, that critics these days take themselves too seriously. Instead, it is that theatre professionals are seeking too much reassurance, too demand-perfection of the critics.

There should be a great bloody stink emanating from all the small theatres and large masturbatory palaces like the St. Lawrence Centre that Toronto's newspapers have no truly professional theatre critics of the caliber of Nathan Cohen or Walter Kerr. What we have are reviewers (the best of the lot being John Fraser of the Globe). What the Varsity has, in general, are reviewers. And what I have limited myself to is reviewing. Of course reviewers are extremely important but in the way that a semi-objective fairground Barker enticing people to see a particular product is important to the bearded lady. Critics must be trained to go beyond describing what happens at a theatrical event to questioning how it came about, how well it was brought about and whether or not it was important to bring it about in the first place.

Boyd Neil

What is rock, who's on jazz, and whither funk?

As winter blows its brains out around our feet, we pause to ask the musical questions: what is rock, who's on jazz and whither funk? And who cares anyway?

It's becoming increasingly difficult to classify music these days. There was a time when jazz musicians looked down their noses at "primitive" rhythm and blues. Any self-respecting rock musician would bypass the idiom with a sniff of coked-out nostrils and a cranking of the volume button on his Marshall amplifier.

Now everyone is on the r and b bandwagon. More than any other constituent of music, rhythm has come a long way in the past five years. Most of the experimentation, the growing complexity in rhythm, stems directly from the music practised by musicians in the "soul" business. Melody was never so important in rhythm and blues; the first object was to get people headed towards good social health through the moving of limbs and torso in time. More than any other part of music it was the rhythm that had to constantly progress.

The reliance on rhythm has taken music in many different directions, while at the same time blurring some of our old classifications. Since Miles Davis went totally electric from In A Silent Way onwards, the jazz people have let loose. On one hand, brilliant pianists like Herbie Hancock have honed their music down to the bare, boring essentials, all funk and no feeling. On the other hand, collections of musicians such as Weather Report have turned rhythm and blues into musicology, borrowing and expanding on 1000-year-old rhythms from Africa and slightly younger ones from South America. The result in this case has been spectacular, opening listener's ears to what constitutes the roots of the music they've been listening to since the middle 'fifties. So rhythm marches on (up and down your spine) and a recent series of recordings by what most would have termed "jazz" musicians shows just how far the amalgamation of all our musical forms has progressed. One can't call it a new form, just flirtation with all the old ones at the same time.

Stanley Clarke—Journey To Love

If one more musician says thanks to L. Ron Hubbard for inspiration on the back of an album cover I'm going to scream. When one of the most exciting musicians on the scene gets together with one of the greatest film-film artists of this century you know something is amiss.

And something is definitely amiss on this album. Let's start by acknowledging the fact that Stanley Clarke is among the top three bass players on the continent for this sort of music, right up there with Ron Carter and Chuck Rainey. He's enough to make any neophyte bassist attempt amputation. However, he has a penchant for biting off more music than he can chew, something that is quite evident in his second "solo" album, Journey to Love.

Clarke has been a number of places, at the Atlantic studios with Aretha Franklin, with Chick Corea and Return to Forever and with other music-makers too numerous to name. He's managed to bring the best along with him, including Corea, John McLaughlin, ex-Mother George Duke and Jeff Beck. Dealing with all these different people and their different styles certainly contributes to the musical confusion evident. He's obviously not exactly sure what he wants to do with his music, but he's willing to diddle around in several different styles until he comes up with something.

Side one starts out with what one might think would continue on the remainder but doesn't—good, honest, complex rhythm. The cut, Silly Putty, moves enough with all these fantastic rhythm players that one is almost blinded to the fact that the chord structure shifts not one iota. But don't hold it against them; what they do inside that one chord is quite listenable. Mention must be made again of Clarke's bass playing, in this piece moving between biting, choppy lines and the beautiful fluidity he's known for.

The title cut is a slow number with a hint of the Hubbard in the lyrics. Again Clarke's playing holds the piece together as it oozes along with plenty of that murky synthesizer background we've come to associate with Stevie Wonder. Although Clarke was not responsible for the lyrics, if you took them out of the musical context, they're not unakin to a Paul Anka penning. But back inside the music they're tolerable.

Song to John (parts one and two) are the highlights of the album, with Clarke and friends stuck quite comfortably in the jazz idiom. Part two is a magnificent number, with a very quick, complex theme played in unison by McLaughlin, Corea and Clarke, followed by eight-bar tradeoff solos. McLaughlin's are the most interesting, although one wonders just how much he's progressed over the past three years. Clarke's solos exhibit mind-blowing technical wizardry, all without any seeming sense. But when he pulls back into the theme, it's not hard to hear why he's considered one of the best. He just flies.

The record ends with Clarke's reach exceeding his grasp, in a "Concerto for Jazz Rock Orchestra." When are people going to learn that you can't stick three dissimilar pieces together with a small bridge and call it a "Concerto"? It starts out nicely with subtle chord shifts in the synthesizer background and progresses in part two to nothing more than senseless noise. Just when you thought the section had mercifully ended, they come back at it at twice the speed and twice as maniacally. This tune is not for listening, it's for laying down and avoiding.

All in all, a disappointing album from a very respected musician. Maybe we can blame it on L. Ron Hubbard, because it's obvious that it's the inspiration, not the musicianship that's gone awry.

At di Meola—Land of the Midnight Sun

We're dealing with almost the same people on this album, but it's as different as Bach and the Beatles in musical direction. Di Meola is a guitar player, one of the best, and he's imported a few of the Corea-Clarke nucleus to add the background to this album featuring his uncompromising playing. The accent again is rhythm, helped along by two or three extra section people.

Di Meola has a sound to his guitar and a way of using it that tends to defy most of our pigeon-holes. He has the musical knowledge of a jazzman, the rhythmic ability of a rhythm and blues session man and the hard biting sound and dynamics of a hard-core rocker. There are twinges of any number of influences, from Dajno Reinhardt to Jimi Hendrix. He manages to throw them all in and still convince the listener that he is a real person, not a composite ghost.

The first track, the Wizard, was composed by the conga player Mingo Lewis to display his astounding talents on the drums. If it weren't for the congas, the tune would put you under quicker than a beer stein full of Nyquil.

The title tune promises more of the same until Di Meola shocks you awake with some brilliant playing. He charges along with some licks that harken again back to Hendrix, and just when you thought your kid sister could play better keyboard, Barry Miles pops in with some breathtaking work on a mini-Moog. Those who thought that a synthesizer had no place in solo work had better change their minds.

Side Two features, god help us, a suite that works just a little better than Clarke's "Concerto." Called "Golden Dawn", it starts quite loudly, shifts into low gear for an extremely pretty middle section called "Clamer of the Tempests" and then proceeds to a whimpering end.

If the album seemed enjoyable but slightly lacklustre to this point, you'll be exhilarated by the last tune, which seems to be a sweet afterthought to a raucous album. It's called "Short Tales of the Black Forest" and features Chick Corea and Di Meola, on acoustic guitar and piano, respectively. An absolutely rivetting exchange between the two proceeds for approximately four minutes and, I venture to say, is worth the price of the album. Very few musicians give the impression on record that they can read each other's mind as well as these two.

The album is a must for those who like clear, no-holds-barred guitar playing. Not recommended for listening while shaving or clipping your toenails.

Muldaur's talent, tight jeans, wow crowd in energetic show

Maria Muldaur played two great shows at Convocation Hall last Thursday night, and the crowd loved her. Both her Toronto concert and her latest album Sweet Harmony show that Maria Muldaur has matured as a serious musical talent.

But Muldaur cannot be pigeonholed into any genre of popular music. She is at home singing spiritual numbers like Rev. Brewster's "The Eagle Stirrith in Her Nest", but she also has the energy to break out in "We Just Couldn't Say Goodbye". Energy, perhaps, was the key to the concert's success. It was even more remarkable because Muldaur and the band kept up the pace all evening.

Sweet Harmony appeared a month ago in the stores and the back-up band boasts an amazing list of performers. John Cale, Linda Ronstadt, Wendy Waldman, and Hoagy Carmichael all played along on one tune or another. The band for the stage show is also drawn from among the performers on the album. Ellen Kearney provided the background vocals (the sweet harmonies) and a sweet smile. Toronto's own Amos Garrett was outstanding on guitar; his solos always brought a round of applause. Michael Finnigan performed well on keyboards, but when he opened his mouth to sing he lost a big chunk of his potential Toronto record sales.

Muldaur, for all her energy, was obviously trying to avoid being overpoweringly sexual, although that doesn't mean there were no pelvic gyrations. Some of her energy might be attributed to the tightness of her jeans, in which she could hardly bear to keep still, much less bend over. Perhaps the only disappointment of the evening was the encore, a low-key spiritual number to calm the audience before sending them home. We would have preferred something livelier, like "Feel My Thigh".

The opening act was Tom Waits, a jazz-influenced city street poet who looks like a bum and chain smokes even in the elevated atmosphere of Con Hall. He growled out a full one-hour set, and the only slightly demented crowd loved it. Waits has been called Dylanesque; I suppose that means he can't sing, but talks to the beat of the music, and the results come out something like music. Refreshingly, Waits doesn't want to move to a cabin in Colorado.

The highlight of the night, however, was to see former Varsity rock editor, Rob Bennett, bedecked in a glitter T-shirt, picking his nose on stage. You see, there is a promising future for former Varsity hacks.

Sleuth is a dark detective game played with deadly seriousness

In the Toronto Truck Theatre's production of Anthony Shaffer's thriller, Sleuth, the question is not "who dun it?" but "who dun what?" Unlike most suspense dramas, we know who the criminals are, but the crimes are left ambiguous. The drama deals with the games people play — games in the truest sense of the word, played with a deadly seriousness, with rules, strategies, winners, and losers. Tim Forl plays Andrew Wyke, a writer who lives in a fantasy world of detective fiction and who regards life itself as a game. He meets his match in his wife's lover, Milo Tindle (Art Austin), who proves to be the most dangerous game of all. Beneath the intellectual veneer — the polite, civilized talk and the witticisms — the darker side of the game emerges. Sexual jealousies and fears build tension which eventually must break out in violence.

The play is a challenge to both actors and audience alike, and it was an ambitious undertaking for director Jack Walters and producer Peter Peroff. Both actors did justice to their very different parts. Tim Forl kept the character of Wyke consistent, yet effectively left Wyke's sanity open to question. Art Austin's role, on the other hand, demanded a great deal of variety; Toronto Truck Theatre chose well in giving him this part. Although there was a slight tendency to overplay some of the lines or speak them too fast, overall the delivery was good. The stage design was effective;

the Colonnade theatre is very small, yet the privacy of Wyke's study was intact. The only technical flaws came in some of the sound effects. Jolly Jack Tar's laughter came from the wrong side of the room, and the police siren, probably the most important sound effect in the play, was not loud enough to be as effective as it should be.

There are few plays as complex and enjoyable as Sleuth. I have not seen the film with Laurence Olivier and Michael Caine, so I cannot compare the two. But I have seen it before on stage. I recommend the Toronto Truck Theatre production for that much-needed break from studying for exams or finishing that last paper. You have until April 11. Priscilla J. Kucic

Amateur snooper confronts wooden-faced suspect: "Who mentioned murder, my good man?"

Complex, intricate Indian dancing succeeds despite technical flaws

The University of Toronto Indian Students' Association presented their first evening of Indian dances two weeks ago in the Med-Sci Auditorium. Two dancers performed, both female, with accompaniment by a seven member orchestra.

Nine dances were performed; some were religious in meaning, some not, but all were competently executed by Sudha Chandra Sekhan and the nine-or-ten-year-old Sri Vidya. At times, particularly when dancing the role of Lord Shiva, in which there were many intricate gestures of hand, foot, and body of considerable difficulty, the dancer's youth was against her; but Sudha Chandrasekhan has mastery of this complexity, and Sri Vidya is well on her way to achieving the same command.

Their excellent work was often damaged and sometimes destroyed by bad use of lighting. There were two spotlights constantly trained on the dancers, yet continually changing their diameter, and at one point changing colour in mid-dance. The house lights were continually being raised and lowered. This frequent lighting change tended to distract from the competence displayed 'up front'. My companion, who had spent a considerable amount of time in India, found the situation familiar — the front-of-house arrangements were not up to the excellence of the performance itself. Although to Western eyes the organization may have seemed insufficient, the presentation of another culture was accomplished even despite this confusion.

I hope the production difficulties will be ironed out in later presentations. The idea is excellent, and the I.S.A. is to be congratulated and encouraged to stage further events, and the student body exhorted to attend in greater numbers. Well done. H. Wilson

Ponderous Collision Course better left as burlesque fluff

Scarborough College Drama Workshop's production of Collision Course directed by Frank Canino should not have tried to be anything more than the bit of burlesque fluff the seven playlets constitute. Looking back at Walter Kerr's review of Collision Course in the May 1968 issue of the New York Times, I got the sense that of the eleven original plays the five that were chosen for Scarborough College's production plus the two additional ones were the least consequential of the lot (with the exception of Rats). To add consequence for a 1976 audience to plays that are more rooted in, rather than explanatory of their confusing age, Canino added a slide show and a documented monologue called 'Kennedy Reflections'. However, all that this accomplished was to highlight the deficiencies of producing plays for an audience to whom the 60's have already become the basis for mythology.

The anger, frustration, mass passion, and hope which the slide show visually demonstrated throughout had no parallel sentiments in any of the plays even when, as with Wandering by Lanford Wilson and Botticelli by Terence McNally, they came close to satire. Even the advertising poster had a political flavour that raised hopes for an evening of insight into the emotions at the root of the myth — and this is what is needed by people in the 70's: satirists and playwrights who can search out the essence of the age without resorting to shallow eulogy or salable nostalgia. The most consistent attempt to add depth to the playlets was the addition of the monologues with Miriam Matthews. However, it failed, as did the remarkably similar role in Kennedy's Children that just completed a long run at the New Theatre. Both used actual documented responses to Kennedy's assassination that succeeded in conveying an intellectual, but not a dramatic, sense of those days. Matthews cannot be blamed if her monologues came across as affected because the conception of the monologues was a futile gesture towards adding substance to the playlets — she did all that was possible under the circumstances.

Once I realized that the Feiffer cartoon and the slide show were pretenious pseudo-thought provokers, I could get down to the business of being thoroughly entertained by some witty skits and a fine crew of actors. The best was saved for the last with Leonard Melfi's Stars and Stripes in which not one iota of so-called 'point' came across, but there were a lot of laughs. Steve Overton as Henry James, Leslie Zuckerman as Amy Lowell, Doug Rotstein as Walt Whitman, Len Voyce as Herman Melville, Sue Dickie as Emily Dickinson and Jackie Gelineau as Edna St. Vincent Millay were all delightfully zany as they chirped their way together through Washington Square park. Leslie Zuckerman's Amy Lowell was a particularly unforgettable portrayal of a crazy old woman with her phallic toilet plunger.

Wandering with Sue Dickie, Paul Wilson and Ken Keshwah Jr. and Botticelli with Len Voyce, Doug Rotstein and Keshwah again, both have as their focus young men of draft age. In the first, a rapid-fire dialogue captures some of the tension of a man's confrontation with society on the question of Vietnam. The second sees two draftees playing intellectual cultural games while waiting to kill a Vietnamese soldier. All five actors deftly handled their tricky roles and Doug Rotstein was especially good as the droll soldier, Stu.

I put the next two plays together, Rats by Israel Horowitz and The Unexpurgated Memoirs of Bernard Mergendeiler by Jules Feiffer, not because they have sillier themes but because Celine Papizewski acted in both and she has a remarkable talent for completely synthesizing a role. Both as Bobby in Rats and Naomi in Memoirs she absorbed the characters in a way that could convey them as intensely alive. It was interesting to compare this funny sexual interlude with the one done earlier in the year because of their slightly different conceptions. This production has a Naomi that was a more ambiguous, thus effective, combination of tenderness and worldliness. But Paul Wilson as Bernard in this production was too unconvincingly immature (although in his other roles in Collision Course Wilson was very good). Rats is a parable about an experienced rat Jobbie played by Jackie Gelineau and a young rat Bobby who represent an often moving generational conflict over whether to kill a baby and see his blood flowing "like red piss from an Indian". It has as eerie comic quality that makes laughing seem superfluous.

That leaves Camera Obscura by Robert Patrick and John Rech's Momma as She Became But Not as She Was (aha, perhaps this is the clue to the 60's: too many long titles — considering one of the original plays left out was called Thoughts on the Instant of Greeting a Friend on the Street — too many words but no communication). Lack of communication is clearly the theme of Camera Obscura where Steve Overton and Jackie Gelineau try to express their love through the confusion of a five second time lag. Momma with Karen Dresher, Paul Wilson and Leslie Zuckerman is a rather sad little play about an old woman ignored by her children until they realize that she has died and will no longer be there when needed.

There is a unified absurdist tone to all the plays. The characters never collide, they unconsciously slide past each other. But where Beckett's and Ionesco's comedy is all in the form, saving the dialogue for expressing human conflict and blindness, these plays have a wistful, light, often burlesque feel that, out of the context of the 60's, obscures whatever message there may have been. It's ironic that the supposed revolutionary perceptions of the 60's may become the T.V. specials of the 70's.

Vic's Two Gentlemen was enjoyable

The New Vic Theatre's production of Two Gentlemen of Verona, Shakespeare's comedy of love, friendship, and betrayal, was filled with pleasant surprises. The cast deserves a lot of credit for their imaginative undertaking. Directed by Thomas Cmajdalka, the performance was actually a class project. Prof. John Reiventanz's Shakespeare class usually acts out a few scenes from Shakespeare's plays; this year, they decided to do an entire play. For an amateur production (most of the students had never been in a play), there were some excellent actors — Dawn Obokata (Speed), Jill Coleman (Lance), Margaret Warren (Thurio), and Eto Kutan (the Hostess). Although there was a tendency on the parts of some to speak too fast, overall they showed a solid grasp of the language and of the play itself. Richard Childs (Valentine) and Elizabeth Porter (Julia) were especially at ease with the language. The play improved after the intermission. In the first part, Valentine and Proteus were too subdued in their talk and behavior, where the play satirizes the exaggerated language and extreme behavior that lovers are prone to. The audience became very involved with the action during the second half, where the tempo picked up and the irony was emphasized. The New Vic production was a thoroughly enjoyable experience.

Oppression of minorities lurks behind rhetoric of pluralism, multiculturalism

Canada is a multicultural, pluralistic society. It is inhabited by "Canadians", French-Canadians, ethnics, and native peoples — in that order. "Canadians" run Bay Street and the others serve them.

I suppose the remarks need clarification. In a capitalist country, Charles G. Anderson tells us in his recent book, The Political Economy of Social Class, there are only two major classes: "the propertied class which owns and controls the means of production; and the propertyless working class which sells its labor power." In order to divert attention from its own position and, furthermore, to prevent the working class from achieving solidarity across all considerations of race or culture, the ruling class makes much of ethnic and cultural peculiarities among the members of the working class. What happened in North Boston where poor whites fought poor blacks on the issue of busing is a case in point.

Canada is no exception to this. Only recently have we witnessed a concerted officially-sponsored campaign holding immigrants responsible for high unemployment. Officially-propagated ideas of multiculturalism and pluralism constitute for me only one more attempt to keep people divided.

This is not to say, of course, that the various ethnic and cultural groups should give up their identity and assume the attitudes of the ruling group. Cultural matters, however, should be entirely the private concern of the people involved. They ought not to be allowed to serve class interests.

What makes the situation in Canada very interesting is that while, on one hand, so much is said (and said vocally) about how multiculturalism has "enriched" Canadian life, on the other hand, Canada's rulers have done everything to trample upon and destroy the life-styles of various minority groups, to colonize them, and to exploit their land and their resources.

Here is a typical comment from a representative of the Canadian government: "The emergence of the Northwest Territories as a political and economic force promises to be the twentieth century's greatest saga. It will include industrial developments on a scale suited to the size of the land, giving employment to thousands of modern pioneers. It will be a modern re-enactment of old frontier days — accelerated and magnified by world pressures of population, increased commercial demands and heightened by competition for mineral resources. It will be rocketed ahead by computer-oriented technology." The author of this breathless comment? It is none other than Mr. Stewart Hodgson, Commissioner of the Northwest Territories. As I read it in Hugh Brody's The People's Land, I could not help but be haunted by echoes of the words of such self-confessed imperialists and colonialists as Cecil Rhodes. This man, as you no doubt know, lent his name to Rhodesia. He saw in imperialism and colonization an answer to Great Britain's own economic and population problems. If it is no accident, of course, that I should remember Cecil Rhodes. At a time when Rhodesia is in the news and we hear daily about the injustices the "native peoples" of that territory are suffering, our attention naturally turns to Canada's own native peoples.

Hugh Brody's book is a detailed account of the way in which old and new capitalists have methodically and consistently subverted, exploited, and colonized the people and the resources of the Eastern Arctic. Brody was a research officer with the federal Department of Indian Affairs and in that capacity lived and travelled in that region. His book is an open indictment of what the capitalists have done to the Eskimos and their lands in furtherance of their material interests. His conclusion is that "Canadian interest in the eastern Arctic had a typically colonial aspect: land and people were incorporated into a growing political entity without regard to the people's own wishes." Time and again the Eskimos have been presented with a fait accompli which they have had no choice but to accept.

Initially, the three main agents of colonization here, as elsewhere in the world, were the White Man's God, the capitalist, and the police. "The police, Hudson's Bay Company employees and the Roman Catholic missionaries spent quite a lot of time in each other's company and invariably had a get-together on Friday evenings. Quite often the RCMP would do the entertaining and when they did there was always a good spread. Lobster sandwiches and the like were the order of the day." The situation, according to Brody, is not much different even to this day. As his description of the life-styles of the Eskimos and the whites in that region shows, the latter live as an in-group, dominating all decision- and policy-making, enjoying better housing and living conditions, and seldom consulting with the Eskimos in any matter. His finding is corroborated by Elijah Takkiapik, Vice-President of the Fort Chimo Community Council: "We very much dislike White people taking our land for granted. It seems that they feel that they can destroy our land any time they feel like it without even asking for permission . . . They steal the raw materials without even consulting us or giving the Inuit a percentage of what they are taking. We need to get power to control the land."

Yet what can the poor Inuit do when, as The Eskimo Book of Knowledge published by Hudson's Bay Company (?) in 1931 tells them in no uncertain terms that the policeman, the trader and the man of God have come there with the authority of the Great White King (no less) as harbingers of Law and Order, Prosperity and Civilization?

One group actually tried to refuse to listen to the "Great Mother the Queen." What happened to this group of the Plains Cree Indians is the story told in Rudy Wiebe's massive novel, The Temptations of Big Bear. Winner of the 1973 Governor General's award, this novel is a very interesting and, I might add, successful, example of using material from real events and documents for fictional purposes. Wiebe informs us in an article he wrote for the Journal of Canadian Fiction that not only are all the names of characters historic and not invented, even the material was collected from books, pamphlets, sessional papers of the Canadian Parliament, Annual Mounted Police and Indian Affairs reports, and the record of the 1835 trials.

Based on these he has reconstructed the events leading to the second Riel rebellion. The novel opens with the attempts of the Honourable Alexander Morris, P.C., Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba trying to negotiate his fourth treaty with a group of Cree Indians. He has already "successfully" negotiated three treaties whereby Indians have "finally and forever extinguished . . . all native rights" to several hundred thousand square miles of land. He had thus negotiated for his country more land than anyone else in history, anywhere on earth. Big Bear, the Chief with whom the fourth treaty is, to be negotiated, however, balks. As Big Bear faces the representative of the Great White Mother who "loves" her "Red Children as well as . . . White," he is unimpressed and proud. "I have always lived on the Earth with my people," he tells the Governor, "I have always moved as far as I wished to see. We take what the Earth gives us when we need anything, and we leave the rest for those who follow us."

Unfortunately, the White Man is not impressed. He must have this way because the Queen and Hudson's Bay Company desire it so. The book describes the inevitable destruction of the Indians' freedom and their relegation to the status of second class citizens in their own land. Big Bear, the once proud Chief, is reduced to pleading for his people: "My people are hiding in the woods, terrified — those are my children, and they are starving, driven from the land which was our own great inheritance and they are running, somewhere, in the darkness, afraid to show themselves in the big light of the day . . . Forgive them, they are hungry and terrified, forgive them! . . . I plead with you, chiefs of the white law, have pity!" The trial judge before whom Big Bear makes this plea, has only this to say by way of correction: "This land never belonged to you. The land was and is the Queen's. She has allowed you to use it." The intriguing thing about the "chiefs of the white law," of course, is that, if it helps their economic interests, they would be quite willing to oppress and colonize their fellow White Man too. Thus we have Jacques Godbout's Knife on the Table. It is a novel about the plight of the French-Canadian. Novelist Godbout is a versatile man: writer, filmmaker, painter and founder of the prestigious Liberte. He calls this novel "a Canadian novel written in French" and claims that its publication marked "the end of a 'French literature in America', the beginning of an American literature in French."

What Godbout means by this claim is that Quebecois had been accustomed to think of themselves as displaced Frenchmen. It was necessary for them to come out of that mentality, accept the fact that they were part of the north American scene and, consequently, to seek their identity right here. As the narrator-protagonist of Knife on the Table comes to realize, this search for identity involved a declaration of independence from the cultural and economic domination of the Anglo-Saxon Canadian. The narrator-protagonist is a former member of the Canadian armed forces and the novel depicts his evolution from an apolitical lover of an English-Canadian, Patricia, to a politically engaged activist. As the novel ends, he is willing to "desire the birdcage, to choose." Having once rejected institutionalized violence, namely, the army, he is now aware of, and prepared to use, "the knife . . . on the table."

As we come to the end of the novel, we are clearly aware of the novelist's sympathies. It is significant that the main action of the novel develops against a background of violence. Early in the novel, which, by the way, is in the form of a stream-of-consciousness retrospective narration by the protagonist, we find a footnote giving details of the "atomic arsenal of the United States, the most powerful nation in the history of the world." Gradually these footnotes become part of the main text. The last such information is a "news item": "FLQ'S TERRORISTS BLAMED FOR BOMB DEATH." The item ends with: "The FLQ pledged to destroy all symbols and colonial institutions, in particular the R.C.M.P. and Armed Forces by systematic sabotage. The search goes on, police said." It is only fair to point out that the novel was first published in 1965 and, since then, the police "search" seems to have succeeded.

The problem, however, remains. While official Canada talks endlessly about the pluralistic and multicultural nature of Canadian society, in reality, it continues to destroy and colonize the life-styles of those who come in the way of its material interests. Witness, for example, the threatened development of the Arctic gasoline.

The style may have changed, but has there been any essential difference in the behaviour of Canada's rulers since the times of Big Bear? One wonders.

Why does Toronto get second-rate productions?

The best theatre in both New York and London is rarely found in the so-called "commercial" theatres of Broadway or the West End, but in the large subsidized theatres like the National Theatre of Great Britain or the smaller privately owned theatres like the Phoenix Theatre Co. of New York. This is because the commercial managers, who are out for money, refuse to look at a new script unless it has been written by a popular playwright like Neil Simon or Alan Ayckbourn, or unless it calls for a (sometimes decrepit and usually miscast) star like Katherine Hepburn. The fact that these plays are often dramatically thin makes little difference as long as the turnover at the boxoffice is fat. Moreover, the shows for which touring companies are formed must be plays whose financial success is guaranteed whether or not they are critically successful. Unfortunately, many of these touring companies are simply moneymaking monsters which insist on murdering their plays. The road version of Absurd Person Singular seen here last season was a case in point. Any respectable amateur company in Toronto could have done far superior work for far less money charged at the boxoffice. Next year Mirvish, in his season at the Royal Alexandra, has promised us Peter Shaffer's Equus and Harold Pinter's latest, No Man's Land. The latter production will arrive in Toronto with the original cast and director Pinter, fresh from the National Theatre of Great Britain. The cast will include John Gielgud, Ralph Richardson, Terence Rigby, and Michael Feast. Having seen this show with its delightful company, I know what delights are in store for anxious Toronto audiences. This is English acting at its best, and Toronto, now the fourth largest theatre centre in the world, deserves the best. But what of Equus? Peter Shaffer's play about a young boy who puts out the eyes of six horses, and about his relationship with his psychiatrist, is probably the most stunningly effective piece of drama to be written thus far in the seventies. When I first saw this show at its opening in England, it was the most satisfying theatrical experience I have ever had. The actors and the play combined to inspire the audience to use their imagination; to see and not just to look; to listen and not just to hear. This assault on our senses evoked an emotional intensity that was electrifying. However, after seeing the play again recently in New York (now in its second year on Broadway) with Richard Burton in the lead role, I found that much of its early magic was missing. Certainly the play was intact in broad outline, but the subtle nuances that had made it so special in the first place were, sadly, gone. Burton grunted and growled in a very artificial fashion but the restrained passion of Alec McGowen's psychiatrist and the repressed wit of Antony Hopkins' Dysart were simply not there. Moreover, the role of the boy, which is now given a James Dean treatment, is seriously weakened when actor Peter Firth conspires to make him the most attractive deviant ever seen on stage. His lithe and gentle movements were gifts not to be forgotten. Correspondingly the rest of the cast walked through given their paycheques before the show and had no fear about next week's. But this is Broadway. What the American production from Coconut Beach, Florida, which turns up at the Royal Alex will be like, heaven only knows. Why couldn't a local company do this show? (God knows they've tried to get the rights.) Because, it's American, does that make the production any better? Why should Mirvish be allowed to buy up the commercial rights to every major show, success or otherwise, for several years after its first opening? Why have we had such a critically abysmal commercial season this year at both the Royal Alex and the O'Keefe Centre? Do the buyers actually care about the product they are getting or do they just want the money? Where are the Canadian shows which could be major successes if they were given exposure in the large commercial theatres of Toronto? You tell me and then we'll both know.

The following article is partly composed of excerpts from a prerelease schedule given to this office by the 20th Century-Fox film distribution company. Our purpose in publishing it is largely to let YOU the consumer know just what new feature films are being released this year. If that were our sole interest we could probably run this as a much shorter piece, a list of titles, names of cast and crew members, plot synopses, and the tentative release dates for these films; however, the real interest in this particular publicity handout is not so much in the films themselves (with a few exceptions), as in how the company's PR boys have chosen to write about some of their product. There are also some rather interesting patterns that appear if one looks at the subjects that are being turned into films these days.

The excerpts taken from this handout called "The 20th Century-Fox Tentative Release Schedule - 1976" are in heavy type. Although I'll try to avoid making them, this writer's comments, asides and cries of anguish will appear in light face type and brackets.

Our first excerpt really is called "Twentieth Century-Fox Presents World War II". No, I am not joking . . .

From the vast film vaults of 20th Century-Fox comes a priceless collection of documentary footage recorded (live with no overdubs) during the five years of World War II by dozens of teams of Fox Movietone News camera men and soundmen in virtually every theatre of war (interesting phrase that, "theatre of war").

The assembled footage, projected against a backdrop of contemporary rock music sung and played by the leading exponents of the sound, will comprise the unique full length feature, TWENTIETH CENTURY-FOX PRESENTS WORLD WAR II. The film will be heavily pre-sold with an all hits sound-track album (not to mention all of those veterans out there who are just dying to relive those Golden Years).

I have to interject here. I ask you now, if you were to score the soundtrack to this dog, just who and what would you use? If you say The Rolling Stones doing Sympathy For The Devil, you're taking the whole thing too seriously. Try Roxy Music doing The Thrill of It All. My only other carp with this one is that I think it rather vain on 20th Century-Fox to call the film "20th Century-Fox presents . . ." after all as far as sponsorship goes General Motors or Krupp Industries definitely deserve the lion's share of the credit.

Back to the hype. By the way, in case you are wondering, these blurbs aren't really intended for moviegoers or even Variety reviewers. They are actually meant for the perusal of theatre managers. Witness the following . . .

SKY RIDERS — a Tremendous new twist in action-adventure thrillers when master hang gliders stage a breath-stopping raid on an impenetrable fortress to rescue hostages held by a group of ruthless terrorists. Get set for "Dirly Mary Crazy Larry" box-office results again. (This one is due for release soon and get this, it stars Susannah York and Charles Aznavour.)

THE DUCHESS AND THE DIRTWATER FOX — The Dirtwater Fox (George Segal) is a rover who makes his living with his wits. But he's tenacious. The Duchess (Goldie Hawn) is a dancehall entertainer who, on occasion, has been known to dance to a different tune after the curtain comes down. They are losers who don't know it (just like you and me, folks, but we're not supposed to know it either). Together their chemistry makes for one of the merriest, happy-go-lucky films of any year. (I'll bet it's even better than last year's merry, happy-go-lucky film about losers.)

FIGHTING MAD — Western Exploitation — (no that's not a sub-heading for a Marxist analysis of world trade). Get set for that "Walking Tall" kind of action on-screen and at the box office as a larger-than-life hero (King Kong?) indomitably faces a coalition of ruthless building developers intent on wresting Texas ranch land by any means from the rightful owners.

The above film might be of interest to some diehard cineastes. It is produced by Roger Corman who will have another release this summer called Thunder and Lightning - "A contemporary bootlegging saga" - which is written by William Hjortsberg, the author of the very fine science fiction novel, Gray Matters. Speaking of science fiction a number of the films listed in the handout will interest fans of that genre, namely Damnation Alley based on the novel by Roger Zelazny, The War Wizards directed and written by Ralph Bakshi, the man who did Fritz the Cat and Heavy Traffic and The Star Wars by George Lucas who did THX 1138 and American Graffiti. The horror film in general seems to have fallen into the Rosemary's Baby-Exorcist glut.

THE OMEN — The Antichrist, in a modern-day fulfillment of the prophecy of the Book of Revelations, returns to the planet earth signalling the end of mankind. (If you can believe it, this film stars Gregory Peck and Lee Remick.)

NOISE — "Noise" is a chilling urban horror story set in New York's Greenwich Village. The denouement climaxes (denouements don't have climaxes) in a bloody tale of terror. It seems as if traditional horror stories with their appeal to the supernatural are giving way to urban paranoia . . .

BREAKING POINT — An average citizen (just like you and me) is witness to a gruesome gang killing and subsequently has to be placed under police protection in order to keep the mobsters from liquidating him. He and his family have to change their identities and go "underground" where they remain for years. The final denouement (what, again!) finds the man breaking out and going after his pursuers. Filmed entirely in Toronto, Canada (filmed here because it looks so much like there.)

If you liked Lenny, A Film About Jimi Hendrix, Norma-Jean, Lady Sings the Blues, or Jim Croce records you'll love . . .

PEARL — The troubled life of a distaff singing super-star trying to put her life together in the troubled 60's. (If you can get away with stuff like this the 70's are in deeper trouble than the 60's.)

(All in all as far as 20th Century-Fox is concerned it doesn't look all that great. I leave you with this.)

THE DAY THE WORLD ENDED — Returning to film ranks for the first time since his 1974 box office giant, "The Towering Inferno", Irwin Allen again directs his energies and expertise toward a project that only he could produce. The film is a story in which human courage and ingenuity battle for survival in the face of one of the greatest natural crises of all time — the eruption of Mount Pelee, a disaster killing 64,000 people. "The Day the World Ended", which will star major screen personalities in the leading roles, will be Allen's 1976 Christmas gift to the exhibitors of the world. (Presumably if the exhibitors of the world want a new set of golf clubs for Christmas, that's their tough luck.)

So there you have it, movie fans. It looks like another good year for the repertory houses.

Reviewer lays obsession on unsuspecting readers

Readers Digest sings harmony in the chorus of acquiescence

Gird up your loins, metaphysicians of mass society, for a no-holds-barred battle on this scribe's favorite topic: where does culture come from? Does it struggle out from somewhere in the depths of the individual psyche, a reflection of the dark changless riddles of human existence? Is it pushed forward by history, and especially good old bread 'n butter forces? What's the background music to be, maestro, Somewhere Over the Rainbow or the Internationale? What's that you say? Lacks subtlety? Never fear, gentle reader; even the most pie in the sky commentator shrinks from trying to solve such ponderous questions in a few paragraphs. The wised up inquirer should spend at least as much time deciding whether the world is fundamentally to be understood in a priori or empirical terms as she he would in checking out a used car. Much like some alleged one-owner models, in fact, the surface appearances of many answers to the above questions are deceiving.

Take a look at this month's issue of Readers Digest, for instance. The Digest is uncompromisingly cheery and bland, home of anecdotes of the boy-was-my-face-red or kids-say-the-darnedest-things variety. One of the most appealing aspects of the Digest is its reliability. Every month, for example, there is an article about seasonal changes, combining remarkably vivid prose with some speculation about the majesty of the year's inexorable round. There are always a few items about heroic fortitude against the fury of the elements; this month's versions are "Ordeal on the

In the ideology of consumer society, it's hard to tell the difference between Uncle Sam and Tennenbridge" ("For 18 hours, in below-zero cold, the badly-injured mountain climber maintained a precarious hold at the edge of a precipice — expecting every minute to drop to his death") and "Only One Came Back" ("An almost incredible saga of endurance — nearly seventy hours alone in the icy, storm-racked North Atlantic"). A variant of this genre is "Paavo Nurmi: The Loneliest Long-Distance Runner" (A legend in his lifetime, Finland's fleetest Finn drew on inner strength to see him through to one stunning triumph after another"). The sentiments expressed these and other articles leave no doubt that the Digest subscribes to a view of the world in which individual character always triumphs. Even on those rare occasions when forces beyond our control (i.e. the elements) appear to have come out on top, the Digest makes it clear that individual character still triumphs!

Nonetheless, evil, neatly divided into two categories, does have a place in the Digest's world. Type A is generally caused by misguided but more or less well-intentioned groups who mistakenly believe their share of the social pie is burnt and has a lumpy crust. March's straying sheep are the Canadian labor movement and the Scottish Nationalist Party. Both groups are firmly told their real interests lie in supporting the government, not opposing it. Unionists are apparently suffering from a delusion in failing to see that the government has all along been fighting for "the great cause of equality", a cause which the labor movement has forsaken for a reason no more reprehensible than muddled logic. Type A sinners, it is clear, will be eagerly welcomed back into the fold upon realizing their folly. Type B evildoers, by contrast, are so unrelentingly and consciously malevolent as to frustrate the best impulses of people of goodwill, and to provoke their fierce and righteous indignation. Former U.S. Assistant Secretary of State David Abshire, in an article entitled, "Is the U.N. Committing Suicide?" condemns the "tyranny of the Third World majority" in the U.N. Abshire explains that "during the first 20 years when the U.N. was led by democratic Western nations, the organization played a constructive role"; but now, "dominated by a new steamroller majority of Third World and communist countries addicted to passing outrageously one-sided resolutions, it has frequently become a hotbed of antidemocratic hostility with the United States and other Western nations as targets of never-ending abuse." Yet even after savaging the ungrateful Third World for several pages, Abshire manages to strike a note of optimism and willingness to compromise, although it may strain even his wellspring of good nature.

If all's not right with with the world, at least everything's in its place. With evil neatly and unambiguously taken care of, the Digest resumes its placid catalogue of domestic virtue, taking what might be (and probably are) described as "gentle jibes at society's foibles". Here the Digest shows its true skill in striking just the proper tone; if "Humor In Uniform" had been given an inappropriate title (how about "War Is Funny?") one can appreciate that much of its peculiar charm would have been lost. The spirit of anecdotes pervades the magazine, leaving after everything else has been forgotten a feeling of contented but moderate self-satisfaction. "Wait a minute," complains the disgruntled reader, "I've seen these articles before, and it looks to me that you're going to start into some long sermon about capitalism and false consciousness any minute now. If you don't lay off, I'm going to stop reading anything but sports."

Okay, we'll try it this way. Two soldiers, a housewife, a dentist, and a priest, were standing at a bus stop when my cousin George walked up, carrying the latest copy of Readers Digest.

"Hey, buddy," said the dentist with a smile, "did you know that magazine of one of the greatest bulwarks of capitalist ideology in the world?"

"Huh?" said George nervously.

"Sure, pal," one of the soldiers chimed in. "And if you think the Digest ain't very important all by itself, just consider that it's only part of a whole system by which people like you and me are taught to believe that capitalism and imperialism are A OK. Along with newspapers, television, advertising, a state-run system of schools and universities, it almost looks as though nothing can ever change."

"That's right, young man," said the housewife. "The women's movement has shown us all that people's real needs and capabilities are ignored and stifled so they can better serve the needs of capital."

"Well then, why doesn't anybody do anything about it?" George asked plaintively.

"I can answer that one, my boy," piped up the kindly old priest with a twinkle in his eye. "These institutions are so powerful that no one considers that things could be any different. People who feel something's wrong are convinced it's their own fault for not being successful."

"Now we get to the interesting part," the second soldier said. "The whole shebang is self-reinforcing. Capital can make sure its values are foisted off on everybody else; when people act according to those values, the power of capital is increased so it can do an even more effective job of selling itself."

"Gosh, padre," said George, "what can I do about all this?"

"Well, son," said the perky oldster with a wink, "if I were you, I'd pay more attention to school work. You know — concentrate more on your Marx, and don't let your meat loaf."

"Gee, padre, you're a regular card," George said with a grin.

College reviews: library logic or sexual obsessions?

Here they come, soaring in, one from the east and another from the west. They collide overhead and plummet down onto the desk to be reviewed. What to say then about the 1975-76 issues of the suburban colleges' literary reviews, Scarborough's Scarborough Fair and Erindale's Lamomedon Review?

What first impresses is the positive embarrassment, if not of riches, then at least of material. The Lamomedon has 26 contributors; Scarborough Fair 33. I do not hesitate to say that much of the stuff is meretricious, banal, pretentious. But the role that the contributions, good and bad, play in establishing a tradition of availability of opportunity is far more important than the individual contributions themselves. It is also probably unwise to draw rigid distinctions between the good and the bad; the contributors to these volumes are still in the process of finding themselves. The journals are simply means to a variety of widely different ends, not ends in themselves.

Secondly, these two journals prompt one to marvel at the variety of them being published on this campus. Writ has been out for about a month. The Trinity University Review came out two weeks ago. Acta Victoriana and The U.C. Review are being printed now at Coach House Press. Rune may yet be heard from.

There is perhaps a certain sameness to the journals. Scarborough Fair ends with this quotation from Louis Dudek: "University writers may be good; but they are usually not much alive. There is usually a certain lack of liveliness, of the sense of reality, the human touch, a content of common sense. It is the difference between understanding through emotion and experience and through the book and mind alone. Our sheltered poets may profit from experience to 'to the best of their ability,' but the library logic gets the best of them in the long run." I fail to see the implied relevance of this to the writers included in the issue. Their problems and the problems of the contributors to other journals are of another order: chiefly, one is tempted to say, sex, sex, sex, (loss of, need of, betrayal in, pleasure of). What is also obvious is an overriding concern with poetry, with metaphorical poetry. Prose is an endangered species.

Now to be more particular. Scarborough Fair edited by Jars Balan, features Milton Acorn, Dennis Lee and Joe Rosenblatt as well as Scarborough's faculty and students. Milton Acorn's presence is a misfit. The People's Poet's works are all too predictable harangues. "Shoot yourself or shit yourself, Friar Northbush..." one begins. I am not quite prepared to share his enmities so I do not enjoy reading him. Joe Rosenblatt's drawings, from his "Rosenblatt and Toronto" series are something of a coup. They are thankfully much less self-indulgently claustrophobically personal than those in his current show at the Gadatsy Gallery. Dennis Lee's works will appeal to his admirers. Among the student-faculty writers I was attracted by Kimberley Jordan's "Peace Offering" and Wayne McNeill's "I Wonder If Verlaime Held Rimbaud." Jars Balan's own works are not particularly memorable.

The Lamomedon Review is edited this year by Linda Kuschner. It's cheerful apparently undifferentiating diversity reassures. What struck one in the recent issue of Writ was not so much any good poems it might have published as it's rather self-righteous determination to publish only good poems. The Lamomedon has a bit of everything: haiku poems, plays, a short story from Daniel Acks of Medium II fame, even a few good works by J. P. Campbell, Greg Gafenby and Pier Giorgio DiCiccio.

Randall Robertson

Toynbee-esque vade-mecum decried

A modest history of all art of all time

Is it possible that any book with such a title of pretension can be redeemed by its contents? Particularly when that book is an 800-page, ten-dollar paperback? Doubtful at best.

The Image Maker portends, and pretends, to be an introductory explanation of the history of art — art of all lands at all times. In a way it is surprisingly successful. The text is limited to less than half the page, and a thematically-grouped mass of illustrations accompanies it. There are two groups of colour plates — faithful reproductions, it would seem. But what of the ideas of the book?

I find that to base a book on art on an anthropological definition of art may be a means to synthesize the entire activity of art into the broad groupings of cult-figures and erotic fantasies, propaganda and protest, but it is a far cry from exploring the intimate significance of the paintings and statues held up by the author, Harold Spencer, as examples of his categories. The book attempts to be the Toynbee-esque vade-mecum of the novice art-student, and it repeatedly appears to have lifted its generalizations from other and reputable authors. Only in sections such as that on propaganda can the generalizations of mass be viewed as an acceptable response to the art objects used as visual commentary in Spencer's book.

The Image Maker is currently being discounted in various art-book stores around the city, an indication that serious students of art would be well-advised to steer clear of it. In dealing with the great works of the masters, as well as interpreting Eastern art to Western eyes and commenting on Eastern reactions to the West in art, Spencer is intriguing but scarcely reliable. When he moves forward in time to the Twentieth century, both text and illustrations become more compelling and more logically arranged. The Image Maker fails, in any case, in its purpose — it is not a satisfactory general history of art. The arrangement of great works by topic was fashionable in a former century, and again has some excuse as part of a trend toward synthesis in academia; but to the beginner his generalizations are perhaps misleading, and to the more advanced general reader they are simplified without being authoritatively argued. A good buy, but only for the bulk of pages and number of reproductions.

Porno fans turn out, tear up after violent turn on Chaos reigned at the University of Toronto Film Board Screening at Hart House on the night of the 18th, when a capacity crowd, lured by the promise of sex films, and roused to a frenzy by repeated assaults on their political, economic, sexual and aesthetic preconceptions, rose from their seats, tore down the screen, and began a free-for-all in which four were injured and several windows were broken. It was eventually broken up by Metro Police.

Two people were admitted to hospital after the melee with what officials described as "wounds consistent with popcorn being pounded into their flesh by a blunt object." They refused to elaborate except to say "We're fortunate it was buttered."

"If you ask me, it's sheer irresponsibility not to have police on hand with a crowd like that," said Sergeant Gilmour of the Metro Police Riot Squad,

"they should know what films like that do to people."

Trouble began when the featured attraction, Furnace of Passion (1975), turned out to be, not the expected exploitation flick, but a shocking expose of the bread industry and a biting satire on contemporary mores. Several patrons demanded their money back, and left muttering obscenities when officials reminded them that admission had been free.

The Apartment (1976), by Anne Service, provoked scattered cries of "Down with Antonioni!" and "Down in front!" The culprits were identified and expelled, but they were only the tip of the iceberg that was to explode into violence during the longest and most daring film of the evening, A Film (1976), by Wyndham Wise and Richard Solchet.

The exact cause of the outbreak of violence is not known. According to Martin Anthony, Assistant Professor of Psychology at York University and author of The Humble Hunchback: Cinema and the Subconscious, "A film audience is particularly susceptible to subliminal influences, because they substitute the frame of the movie for the 'inner frame' or mechanism of repression that controls the subconscious sexual impulses." On questioning Mr. Wise refused either to confirm or deny that his film employed subliminal techniques.

"I find it interesting that they charged the screen rather than the projectionist," commented filmmaker Peter Chapman. "It shows that they still think of it as a kind of theatre. If you ask me, they need a few more shocks like that."

Film Board Chairman Lorne Macdonald was not available for comment. He was reported in satisfactory condition at Doctors' Hospital. Two junior executives from Warner Brothers are being held for questioning by Metro Police. Jedediah Leland

The new front-wheel drive Datsun F-10

Who says a low-priced car has to be stripped of all the nice touches? Not Datsun.

Our new front-wheel drive Datsun F-10 is fully-equipped from bumper to bumper. Even our lowest-priced 2-door Sedan is loaded with: rear window defogger, tinted glass, radial tires, carpeting, chrome window trim, bumper over-riders, wheel covers, rustproof fender liners, heavy duty battery, console and package tray, flow-through heating and ventilation.

All that comes to about $500 worth of what other cars call extras. Datsun calls it extra value.

The F-10 Sports Hatchback gives you even more special features, like an AM/FM radio, tachometer, nifty 5-speed shift and competition steering wheel. And you don't pay a penny more.

There's a value-packed F-10 Wagon too, with white-walls and fifty cubic feet of luggage space.

Now look at the F-10's super performance features: the better traction and safer handling of front-wheel drive and a rally-proven 1.4 litre engine that delivers up to 40 miles per gallon in combined city/highway driving.*

Fights Corrosion Better

The F-10 is protected with special Zincrometal rust-proofing on critical areas, for worry-free winter driving. Another plus from Datsun.

The new fully-equipped Datsun F-10 is today's best car buy for the smart car-buyer. Test-drive one at your Datsun dealer's and see for yourself.

Audience blasted at concert but it wasn't pianist's fault

The Noon-Hour Classical Concert last Thursday (Mar. 25), featuring pianist David Fallis, began in auspicious enough surroundings, with a larger-than-usual audience gathered to welcome the young artist. However the returns weren't immediately forthcoming.

One of the problems, perhaps the main one, was with the instrument, a Steinway, it was, in the North American custom, voiced much too brightly for some of the music being presented. Increasingly, I feel that the works of the German masters sound better on a European piano.

Mr. Fallis, a student of Court Stone, has a cheerful, straightforward approach, but there were some inconsistencies in his performance on Thursday. He began with Beethoven's Sonata Op. 31, No. 3, and in movements one and two, though some passages sounded well-prepared, he seemed to be fudging in other places. I like the third movement, more stable and controlled, but some of the grazioso effect was lost by a too stringent legato. The fourth was definitely the most palatable, a forward-moving driver energetically sustained.

In the Brahms Balladen, the clarion tone of the piano was, again, inappropriate for the style. Mr. Fallis displayed a good grasp of the mood of both pieces though, and the line was there. But I thought that the middle section of the "Edward", Op. 10, was drastically over-pedaled, given the room and the instrument, but then the closing section was rendered, equally disagreeably, in an almost Gouldish, dry, detached manner. (Some people are never happy.)

Beethoven might have suggested earplugs to mule piano's roar.

It was not unhappily, then, that we proceeded, piano and all, into the Twentieth century. The first piece was De Falla's delightful anecdote, "Dance of the Miller's Wife", and Mr. Fallis gave an engaging and exuberant performance. He attained still greater heights in Debussy's "Cathedral Engloutie". Though the opening was not muted enough (...!), he compensated for this in the ending, and the middle section — where the cathedral rises out of the lake — was absolutely glorious!

It came, then, as somewhat of a disenchantment to be blasted out of our seats again, in Bartok's "Allegro Barbaro", the final piece.

Yes-men releases: Lox on a bagel and carp on white

CHRIS SQUIRE
Fish Out Of Water
(Atlantic 18159)

STEVE HOWE Beginnings
(Atlantic 18154)

It was only when John, Paul, George and Ringo began producing individual efforts that we were able to realize the contribution each had made to the Beatles' sound. So also is it with the British band Yes. Although Chris Squire's membership in the band goes farther back, both Squire and fellow-guitarist Steve Howe, worked together on The Yes Album, Fragile, Close To The Edge, Yessongs, Tales From Topographic Oceans and Relayer.

Each guitarist has recently released premiere albums, and so far, it seems that Wakeman may be the only one to realize critical acclaim upon release. After ten weeks, neither Chris Squire's Fish Out Of Water or Steve Howe's Beginnings has entered the Canadian Top 100. But then, Wakeman has left Yes, and perhaps for precisely that reason: he was too good.

Saving the best for the last, Steve Howe is the first Yes-man who should be dealt with. Howe's album is faced with one major problem: it is not good! If this appears too simple a condemnation of the album, it ought to be explained that although the production and engineering is well-handled by the now-familiar Eddie Offord (Yes; Emerson, Lake and Palmer) and although the songs are well constructed and arranged, not a single note on this album is original. The guitar riffs, Hendrix-styled wailing, and strange rhythms are all things we have heard on other Yes albums. Perhaps this is the reason that the inner-liner carries the Yes logo.

But although familiarity may breed contempt for a certain musical form, Howe's album also misses for other reasons. In an attempt to "add some class" to the release, the title song is an orchestral number which after seven minutes lulls the listener into a pleasant slumber. It would have been a great number to place at the conclusion of this collection of nine tunes (if anything is melodic enough to rate the term "tune") but instead it occurs in the lead-off spot on side two. The result is that the listener cannot help but notice that all the songs have a 'sleepy' quality about them, brought about by aimless, rambling lead-guitar lines, and totally meaningless lyrics (Certainly Howe was influenced by Jon Anderson, another Yes-man whose lyrics never have made any sense.) Patrick Moraz, the new Yes keyboard-man, is not the electronics wizard that Wakeman was. Moraz and Yes-drummer Bill Bruford help out in various places on the album, but their assistance is of no avail.

To the contrary, Chris Squire's Fish Out Of Water is one of the most progressive albums to emerge in years. Bill Bruford and Patrick Moraz are both featured on this one as well, therefore it has to be the talent of Chris Squire that makes this album what it is — excellent. This reviewer does not claim to understand the reasons which would make two guitarists who worked together so long produce albums which are so distinctively different. The reason which is obvious, however, is "harmony". Steve Howe is a lead-guitarist whose electric melodies are haunting when combined with the twelve-string chords of Chris Squire. However, when given the choice of listening to one or the other, the experienced listener is probably going to prefer Squire.

The background vocals do not dominate. However if one is determined to turn the volume up loud, a harmony structure is discovered that would make every Beach Boys fan proud. Effects are innovative and tasteful. Much of the Yes-sound is present, but this album contains new melodies, new harmonies and especially new rhythms. The production is a typically Yes clean job, performed by engineer Greg Jackman. Squire also introduces Andrew Pryce Jackman, whose orchestrations complement instead of working against the five songs on Fish Out Of Water. "Lucky Seven" is this writer's favourite, but all of the tunes are good. They are all faded together as well, producing a total concept, rather than individual pieces.

When fish are taken out of water, they die. So it is that Steve Howe, without Yes, is floundering on a musical shore. But Chris Squire is just beginning to swim. Perhaps they should have exchanged album titles. In any event, we now know who to thank for much of the Yes sound, remembering that "you can't have one without the other!"

Soap opera buff reveals all, raises banner of liberation

The end of March is the traditional time for spring cleaning and for purging guilty secrets. My particular true confession is that I watch soap operas. I don't mean that I occasionally switch on the television on afternoons for lack of anything better to do. I mean that I am a devotee of these afternoon dramas. I know why Audrey left each and every one of her four husbands. I know who Phil's father really is. I can tell you who Phil was married to when he raped Diana. I could probably even tell you why he raped her, and how. All over North America people sit in front of their television sets, fascinated by the unfolding sagas of "All My Children" and "General Hospital". The time has come for soap opera freaks to join all the other groups now vying for recognition and liberation. I will no longer pretend that my television was only accidentally and momentarily tuned in to "The Days of Our Lives". I will no longer look guiltily when I am caught in front of the TV with a tear-soaked handkerchief clutched in my hand. I admit it — I watch soap operas.

Part of the fascination of the soap operas is to watch how many events can be crowded into each show. In the space of one half-hour, more excitement and drama occurs in the life of a soap opera character than I could ever hope for in my entire life. This rapid action makes for some slightly convoluted plots. Every once in a while, a re-cap is necessary to keep even the most faithful viewer up-to-date. If Paul is Bob's son, and Mary is his mother, and Louisa was only his kindergarten teacher, and Dick has turned into a drug addict who has been having an affair with Debbie's ex-husband's mistress who has been in a coma for the past six years... With plots like these, every show needs a re-cap once in a while.

The soap operas are among the last programs on television to be filmed live. The actors have only brief rehearsals, and I have seen some of the world's best improvisations happen when one character forgets his lines and freezes during a steamy love scene. Because the programs are shot live and relatively close to air time, the producers run into problems when one of the actors becomes ill or quits. This leads to one of the most interesting aspects of the soap operas. Actors come and go, but the character remains stable throughout. It doesn't bother the audience to see Jill with long black hair one day and curly blonde hair the next. They know that it is still the same Jill underneath. In order to clarify these characterizations, the writers are forced to go to great lengths in order to re-introduce characters to the audience. In "General Hospital", Dr. Hardy says to a new character by way of greeting, "Well, Terry, who left a successful singing career in New York to become surrogate mother to her two kid brothers back home, how are you today?"

The joy of soap operas lies in the innumerable permutations and sexual combinations that the writers can develop among a limited cast of characters. But the soap operas are no longer only filled with soulful gazes and bubbly dialogue. The soap operas provide an accurate mirror of the shift in society's standard of morality. Sometimes these "housewives' delights" even lead the way in innovative programming. A few of the topics that are now being dealt with in the afternoon would make even the most hardened late-night movie censor cringe.

Rape is a prime ingredient in every show's plot. So are adultery and divorce. Now most soap operas are also branching to cover drug addiction and alcoholism. Several years ago, "All My Children" ran a series of shows designed to point out the growing incidence of child abuse. The plot of the show incorporated suggestions as to how parents, friends and neighbours could recognize and deal with this problem. In "The Young and the Restless", one of the newer soap operas designed to appeal to the younger and more modern viewers, one of the sub-plots deals with incest. Homosexuality is still pretty much forbidden ground, and lesbianism is not even hinted at. Impotence has always been a prime staple in the plots of all of these shows, but only in the last few months are the soap operas turning their cameras on to the subject of frigidity. "General Hospital" began the trend to discuss frigidity almost a year ago with a character named Jane, who was unfortunately killed off in a car accident before the subject could be explored in great depth. Now many of the shows contain at least one woman who has problems with sexual response.

The soap operas dare to present these interpersonal problems that probably would never see air time in any of the prime time dramas. At the very least, these shows are admitting that people do have sexual problems, and that it is necessary to discuss these problems openly. The old standards still prevail in the soap opera's search for an answer to these problems. A surgeon on "General Hospital" discusses his impotence with his wife and accuses her, "All I need is a real woman." The soap operas still exist in a world where it is possible to make the distinction between real women and liberated women, between real men and men who have sexual problems. Soap operas reflect the new shift in morality in that they broach problems that were previously considered unfit for television audiences, but these shows do not go beyond the accepted standards. Frigidity is still considered to be a problem that could probably be resolved by a good roll in the hay with the right man. Impotence is still created by the threatening woman. The husband of the successful career woman is not man enough to keep her at home. Home, it is implied, is still a woman's place. And marriage is still portrayed as the ultimate goal of a woman's life.

Soap operas deal with the trappings and postures of the new morality, but do not delve any deeper than surface effects to seek out root causes of problems. Far be it from the soap opera writers to suggest that a dissatisfaction with a particular marriage could point to a more general and far-reaching dissatisfaction with the form of marriage itself. The solution for all marital and sexual problems remains purely superficial. Don't ask whether husbands and lovers are necessary for one's emotional well-being, or even desirable. Simply trade the old model in for a newer, more fashionable model. When the new marriage develops the same problems again, do not pause to wonder why. Throw out the old husband again, and buy yourself a new one. It is no wonder that the soap operas are so popular with advertisers, for in their vision of human relationships they display a perfect model of the consumer society. People, with all their flaws, become mass-packaged to be bought and sold in the marriage market. The soap operas show the people who inhabit the world of television commercials set into more or less human situations. The soap opera provides the same answer to the problems of modern life as does advertising — buy a new dress, buy a new detergent. If one detergent doesn't work, buy another one and throw the first out. Divorce has become the ultimate expression of the consumer.

Soap operas reflect not only the new sexual morality, they also reflect reality as seen through the eyes of a television advertiser. Perhaps the soap operas are more in touch with reality than most of us would suspect, or even begin to dream.

Hester Street — a rare new release actually worth seeing Semiology buffs might well ask: does this hat represent Old World values trying to maintain themselves in a strange new setting? Or is it just a funny-looking hat?

THE BEST OF THE FLOCK

Hester Street is a film, by Joan Micklin Silver, about Russian Jewish immigrants living in New York. It's the sort of small, relatively unambitious film in which one expects to find a certain level of perfection. Its attention to detail, and to recreating a past of a highly particularized nature, does not leave it much room for error.

In many ways one's expectations are in fact satisfied. The writing is consistently fine and much of it bears re-examination; the wit is not only enchanting but quite genuine and thought-provoking. All five of the major roles are nicely handled; Mel Howard, in particular, gives a brilliantly understated performance as Mr. Bernstein.

However, the film was not without its technical problems which, for me, were jarring, though minimally so. Both Steven Keats and Dorrie Kavanaugh seemed to have difficulties with their accents. There were moments when Dorrie Kavanaugh's inflection, in particular, tended to broaden into an almost catch-all kind of brogue.

I also had problems with Steven Keats' looks. It seems unfair to fault the casting in this case (Keats manages such an energetic and appealing portrayal, while at the same time remaining sufficiently unsympathetic — which is indeed the way the misguided Jake should strike us). However, during the marvellous picnic scene when Jake poses beside a tree, asking his wife and Mr. Bernstein for their verdict on his Americanized profile, my verdict was that he did indeed look the Yank he had set out to become, but that he had always looked the Yank, and that not even the slightest amount of affection had been necessary. Obviously, at this point in the film, there is supposed to be a discrepancy between Jake's view of himself, and the audience's, in order to support the underlying irony of the scene; but instead the audience is left vainly searching for any Old World traces in the profile which he offers for examination.

Because the film's sympathies lie implicitly with Old World values, Giff — Jake's wife, and the last to hold out for these values — soon becomes the emotional centre of the story. Carol Kane's face is the sort of face which is overpoweringly expressive, but it is also a face which fails to tell us very much. I must admit that I have always found Carol Kane's eyes a quite dangerous film commodity; with her walk-on in the penultimate scene of Carnal Knowledge, we were more aware of how strenuously Mike Nichols was striving for a certain effect, than of the actual effect itself. By the same token, the makers of Wedding in White exploited Carol Kane's features to such an offensive degree that her face became little more than a mask.

Since Hester Street is about assimilation, and since the emotional crux of the film lies in the fact that even its heroine is eventually assimilated, one expects some sort of explanation for this remarkable change in Giff's character — how is it that she suddenly finds herself holding out for Mamie's three hundred dollars? Carol Kane's face doesn't leave us with many clues — her expression is essentially the same for the duration of the film. Hers are undoubtedly a remarkable pair of eyes, but they are set within a totally immobile face. (In the contest for the Oscar, Isabelle Adjani's equally remarkable eyes would have won easily, simply because of the amazing mobility of her face.)

With all of this said, however, I must hasten to revert to my initial feelings about Hester Street as a film of no little wit and honesty, and as one of only a small handful of films worth seeing in town right now.

David Reynolds

Trio de Triste maintains standard of ensemble playing

When Schubert played his work, audiences experienced frissons of delight; Trio de Trieste's rendition was merely routine.

The way things are in Italy at the moment the Trio di Trieste must be one of the few commodities to have retained its real value over the years—and they have been going since 1933. On Thursday, in the last of the current series sponsored by the Women's Musical Club of Toronto, they played a balanced programme, featuring Haydn's Trio in E Major, Schubert's In B flat Major, with Charles Ives' 1904 Trio in the middle. Presumably the group added the Ives piece to their repertoire on this tour as a contribution to the U.S. Bicentennial celebrations—dedication twice over, for it is fiendishly difficult, Ives writing against the instruments as much as for them. But then, emphasis here falls on the transcendental, not to say transcendentalist, meaning, Ives represents the other side of American culture, the 'prophet motive'.

He entitled the piece 'Trio Yalensia & Americana—for Violin Cello Piano—Fancy Names . . . Real Name—Yankee jaws—at Mr (or Eli) Yale's School for nice bad boys!' (Ives didn't take academic niceties very seriously.) The first movement, searching and improvisatory, is meant to depict a short but profound talk by an old professor of philosophy. The second, subtitled 'TSIAJ', short for 'The Scherzo Is A Joke', recalls student antics on a holiday afternoon, and it is full of popular and student songs. The last in part recalls a Sunday service, ending with 'Rock of Ages'. Doubtless the work has a more universal meaning too. In any case, the Italian musicians took to Ives as if to the manner born, convincingly catching all its moods and pathos.

Oddly enough, it was the conventional material that fared worse—perhaps not so odd on second thoughts. It was hardly that the group falls short of professional standards of individual or ensemble playing—they have helped set them. But I found their interpretations not at all fresh or revealing, and some of their musical habits distracting. They have an annoying mannerism, with the violinist almost a tic, of springing too soon over certain notes in a phrase, I suppose with the intention of giving the music a lift and a perky, tripping quality, but with the effect of making the notes trip over one another. This jerky, Chaplinesque gait destroyed the Allegro first movement of the Haydn, while the second, Molto andante, had little what was molto; the players missed its eerie, hollow plod in the base line, and any pathos seemed forced.

If the Haydn was unidiomatic, the Schubert was routine, i.e. un-Schubertian. Comparison with the Beaux Arts' radiant performance a few months ago is less than flattering. They snatched notes, reduced the long swell of Schubert's lines to chop-piness, and the long, perhaps long-winded rather than long-breathed, Finale was insufficiently characterized. Schubert is often easy to play, while difficult to play well, the challenge all the greater because not technical.

This smacks of carping, however. The playing was good overall, especially Amadeo Baldovino's cello in the Schubert. If the performances weren't extraordinary, merely routine, at least they were routinely good, and approached the high standards set by this year's series.

A Night At The Opera-Queen (Electra)

Can you believe that Toronto's conservative and stodgy AM pop stations are playing Queen's "Bohemian Rhapsody"? Course, it was No. 1 for a virtually unprecedented nine weeks on the British pop charts, so they aren't being as brave as one might at first think. In case you haven't heard the song, Queen's lead vocalist Freddie Mercury will step up to the typewriter to describe it. "Well, it has a mood setter at the start, going into a rock type of thing, which completely breaks off into a mock opera section" (which reportedly has 180 vocal overdubs at climactic points), "followed by a vicious twist, and then a return to the theme."

The thing I noticed a few years ago when I first heard Queen was their original style; a thick guitar sound (which is warped to sound at times like an orchestra or a Walt Disney jazz band) overlaid by piles and piles of vocal harmonies.

"Bohemian Rhapsody" gives one a sample of the diversity of their music. This, their fourth album contains: three hard rockers, four takeoffs on pop music from the "Gay Nineties" and "Roaring Twenties", one fairly normal pop song of modern style ("You're My Best Friend"), a ballad (sort of), "Bohemian Rhapsody", and a version of "God Save the Queen" arranged for electric guitar orchestra.

Queen makes well-crafted, witty music that is, above all else, fun to listen to — a relief from all the overly serious, self-important music around today.

"Give Us A Wink" — The Sweet (Capitol)
Evidently sick of being

These natty nifties know how to cut a rug to the latest tunes.

labelled a "bubble gum" band, the Sweet are now trying to project a street-punk image in songs run with rats, reptile with cockroaches, and filled with other objects of disgust. So now they're bubble gum Black Sabbath.

"Action", the single off the album, is the only good song present. It's aggressive all right, but it's well put together, something that can't be said for the rest of the album, which is one long mess of amateurly played synthesizers, mechanical drumming and squawking guitars.

I greatly prefer "The Ballroom Blitz" to this droning garbage. Like ya know? "Blitz" was a cool song, real catchy, with all those scratchy high notes that sound great on transistor radios, and just nasty enough to counter-balance all that homogenous "Paloma Blanca" schmaltz that's clogging the airwaves. But with "Give Us A Wink", they've over done it. Sounds like "Metal Machine Music" to me.

"Native Sons" — Loggins & Messina (Columbia)

After an inspired initial album, Sitting In, the creative juices of L&M have been only coming in spurts. Now with two bad albums in a row, So Fine and this latest one, I think it's time they gave up.

Native Sons is so blah it makes our former mayor Dennison seem wildly flamboyant in comparison. Jim Messina's production is so polite and tidy, the session musicians so eager to stay in the background, and the duo's songs so trivial, that the LP has all the impact of a thrown marshmallow.

"Zuma" — Neil Young (Reprise)

This is the best album from Scott Young's son since Harvest or After the Goldrush, depending upon your taste.

Suma is a rough sounding LP, but that's part of the appeal. Young realizes that it's the emotion of a song that is the most important element. Unlike many musicians, including Stephen Stills, Neil won't spend hundreds of hours in a studio trying to get a song letter-perfect, because the result is often technically immaculate, but devoid of feeling. Instead, if a song captures the mood he wants, then it goes on the album, with or without bum notes.

Suma drips with emotion, as a glance at some of the titles will reveal; "Don't Cry No Tears", "Lookin' For a Love", "Barstool Blues", "Cortez the Killer". Some of the tracks rock, with Young and rhythm guitarist Frank Sampedro trading scorching solos. Of these, my favorite is "Drive Back". On other's, he performs in a quieter, country & western-style. Of these, I think "Looking' For A Love" is the best, although it's hard to choose. The only track on the album that doesn't make it is "Through My Sails", a product of the abortive Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young sessions of last spring. The harmonizing is weak and listless; that from a band that was known for excellent harmonizing. It's obvious from this song that CSN&Y is dead as a group, but Zuma reaffirms Young as one of rock's greats.

"Kate & Anna McGarrigle" Kate & Anna McGarrigle (Warner Bros.)

These Montreal born sisters moved to Cali-for-ni-aa a few years ago, where they have done a thriving business supplying songs for the like of Linda Ronstadt and Maria Muldaur. Now they've finally gotten around to doing their own album, and it was worth the wait, it's perfect.

Their whole approach is very low-key and graceful. The songs range from waltz-like ballads to blues, gospel and traditional Quebec folk. The intimate-sounding LP that results is the type best heard late at night or early in the morning, like Bruce Cockburn's.

Up from porkchops: spicy stuff for the impecunious gourmand

House-husband Yeadon agrees wrestling with pasta beats dusting knick-knacks.

'Sumptuous Indulgence on a Shoestring'
David Yeadon
Hawthorn Books, New York
272 pp, $15.80

Housework is fun. So much fun that David Yeadon gave up his job, sent his wife to work and took up residence as the family house-husband.

Mind you, he dislikes the drudgery of dusting and polishing and cleaning up the kitty litter, but somewhere he finds the time to write cookery books and illustrate them too.

Sumptuous Indulgence on a Shoestring is an exuberant book, the latest in a series which he has written on the delights of gratifying one's self-indulgence and, of course, creativity.

It's the kind of cookbook that is exciting to read. Yeadon's love of cooking shines through as he describes each succulent dish, making the reader's mouth water in anticipation.

The recipes are perfect for the student budget, too. Being an impecunious writer with expensive tastes, Yeadon has experimented with meals that can be made with the cheapest ingredients. Mind you, my shoestrings don't cost $15.80, but once you've sunk a week's wages into buying the book, Yeadon guarantees cheap, luxurious food for ever after. He has even devised a system to indicate which recipes use expensive ingredients and has written a long Introduction on buying cheap vegetables and meats to replace the standard items.

However, Yeadon is less frugal with his time than the average student can afford to be. He obviously enjoys puttering away in the kitchen for hours on end, dirtying piles of mixing bowls and utensils. Most of his recipes require a half-dozen steps, and, even though the instructions are simple, they are quite time-consuming.

The student gourmet who decides to concoct one of Yeadon's delicacies will find the corner of his shelf that is reserved for spices will need a major expansion. Yeadon is all in favour of a multitude of exotic ingredients like coriander and fennel and paprika and turmeric and, if he's making something special he thinks nothing of adding a dash of marsala or Calvados.

For my tastes, his recipes tend to be over-spiced. I'm certainly not a meat-and-potatoes man, but I do prefer dishes that have a fragrance of herb rather than the overpowering aroma that Yeadon seems to recommend. In his Omelet Fines Herbes, for instance, he adds a teaspoon each of fresh parsley and chives and a quarter teaspoon of thyme and marjoram. I cut the quantities in half, and the omelette was still too strong for me.

This isn't a book for daily use. The recipes are too complex and require too many exotic ingredients for the average hurried student. But they are perfect for a special Sunday dinner when the cook can spend an afternoon in the kitchen preparing an impressive multi-course dinner for several favourite friends.

And it's just right for the student who has conquered the pork chop and potato stage and is ready for a venture into the Land of the Gourmand.

Waiting for momento mori

Lester undermines reunited lovers with jokey, tv-commercial direction

Robin and Marian, currently playing at Hyland 1, is billed as a love story — 'Love is the greatest adventure of all' — and indeed it is, though in the context of this plot and of the film itself, love appears not so much adventurous as adventitious.

The basic idea, a very engaging one, is to put Robin Hood and Maid Marian together again twenty years after their famous and legendary times in Sherwood Forest. Robin meanwhile having been in the Crusades, Marian in a priory (she is made the prioress of Kirkley, who, traditionally, is supposed to have bled Robin to death, and then, in remorse, poisoned herself). They are changed persons of course, so their encounter is like an encounter with their pasts, with memory and forgetfulness. Robin breezily asks, on his return, what has become of Marian — he hasn't thought of her in years. For her part, Marian has put away all thoughts of the world, the flesh and Robin. Their meeting is as much poignant echo as reality. What gives it weight for us, however are the personalities of the stars, Sean Connery and Audrey Hepburn, each grown older, adding piquancy to the gap between reality and the role as heroic lover. Without them I think the basic idea would not have carried far.

But while our identification with hero-heroine is invited, it is undermined at the same time. And I wonder if that's deliberate. Dick Lester's stop-go, jokey and jaunty direction tends to prevent our taking the romance very seriously. A romantic, sylvan scene comes to resemble nothing so much as one of the T.V. commercials Lester is now so adept at making. There's a thin line between affection-identification and mockery-distancing which Lester straddles rather than walks. He mocks Muskeeteer movies and the novel, while relying on our identification with the swordsmen for his exiguous plot. He mocks disaster movies even while screwing up the tension in orthodox fashion. And now he mocks romantic adventure and the 'good guy' type, along with the Errol Flynn or Douglas Fairbanks movies and the TV serial we grew up with, yet utilizes them for what continuity of response his own movie requires.

The second half, which could have been called 'Robin and the proud Sheriff', rematches old Robin against his old adversary (played by the talented Robert Shaw — happily recovered from his bout with a shark — projecting guile and arrogance with a curl of his lips). It's a replay both they and we relish. Yet it too leaves a sour taste. The first fight is oddly hollow, low-key, uninvolving, and authentically gory — though the subsequent Wild West escape is a happy inspiration. The second, a match of champions, is a fight rather with old age.

After the film I discovered the script was by James Goldman, which explains its resemblance to The Lion in Winter another irreverent look at the comic, mundane, bickering underside to legend, an often cute but seldom acute angle on history. The irony of time — and twenty years is as good as 700 — eats into legend; not only the legend of Robin Hood, but that of Richard Coeur-de-Lion too. 'Richard and Robin' might be the title of the opening portion set in France, a bit of legend-embroidery, — displacement and debunking all in one. At least it gives Richard Harris a chance to rant in fine style as Richard I. Napoleon said that the hero is never a hero to his valet, and though Robin is no valet — he's made a companion in arms, almost a pal — his dreams of glory are punctured by the reality of the carnage and of his king's wanton cruelty. All he has left is bare loyalty, and when Richard dies, he returns home.

Robin, of course, has his own legend, and his own Sancho in Little John (Nicol Williamson puts in a surprise comic performance), whose emptiness mirrors Robin's own. Robin, it seems, is motivated not by injustice, but by the emptiness he must flee; Connery's eyes have a melancholy lost look. Goldman's script can't resist asking what it's all for . . . Memento mori sounds through it, as if to give the film a gravity it hardly needs (a script true to death if not to life). Robin indeed thinks on these things, but not much. Yet, we overhear the Sheriff declaring, he likes to flirt a little with death — i.e. he is a true romantic hero, and it is this that condemns him. The film ends with a veritable Liebestod, and some fancy symbolism.

But we don't have to ask what it all means, let alone what this film means, and I fear I've said more than is necessary. Robin and Marian is amusing, lightweight entertainment, with some fine actors walking about in it. Two small queries: Why do Robin's merry men have Scottish accents? And just what was in the potion Marian gives to the invalid nun, 'to help the pain'?

A fond farewell to my three faithful readers — Jake, who has the paper under his water dish, the editor, who proofreads the stuff, and Tim Fort of the Toronto Truck Theatre. Well, well, well. Yes, this year has given our theatre writers both compliments and the danger of death by lynching, but all in all it has been ominously quiet. After going to about sixty plays this season, I am forced to conclude that we are settling for a good time in lieu of good theatre. On campus, enthusiasm counts for the greatest part of my approval — in the world of so-called professional theatre, the play presented is most important, for the goals on and off campus are generally different. But if you are in it for money, as a professional theatre, you had in future better be professional, for Boyd Neil has a tough eye for overpaid amateurs.

The latest Toronto theatre news concerns two new theatrical ventures. Nucleus One Theatre Company intends 'to provide Toronto theatre audiences with the rare opportunity to discover important, but neglected, 20th century classics'; and they commence their efforts to match sophisticated playgoers to worthwhile productions with Ugo Bert's The Queen and the Rebels beginning April 1 at the St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road. The play will run for two weeks and features 99 Sunday matinees. Call 221-3561 for information. Also new, Theatre Compact is about to become a high-priced actuality, with a production of Da, a look at a writer's life through the shaping influence of his father. With a strong local cast (the Compact boasts that its members amass more than a thousand years of performing life) the prices will be commensurate with this strength; $4 and up. Previews begin at the popular St. Paul's, April 26 and 27. Call 922-6159.

Other good things currently available: Toronto Truck Theatre provides entertainment with Sluth, at the Colonnade, and Hay Fever, at 94 Belmont Street. Coming soon, Wait Until Dark at the Colonnade. TTT have had a prolific and apparently successful season, though theirs has been good fun more than good theatre. They do seem to have the pulse of the monted theatre-goers of the city, though. A revival, Take Five Plus, at 17 St. Nicholas Street, call 925-8930. A pleasant, unobstrepous thought-provoking arrangement dealing with the private life of the sex Woman. At Ryerson, Changes is a revue dealing with Canadian life, beginning the first and continuing until the tenth. This will be followed by Wycherley's The Country Wife, April 14, 15 and 17. Call 595-5088 for details. At Theatre Second Floor, 86 Parliament St., Steve Petch's Turkish Delight, which may be pretentious but sounds, from the descriptions I've had of it, like a stage adaptation of L. Durrell's convoluted oriental city-scapes. The Royal Alexandra, after it kills off Edith Bunker, imports the D'Oyly Carte Operetta to present H.M.S. Pinafore and The Pirates of Penzance.

Coming soon, at the Firehall, Aphra Behns The Rover, a fascinating writer, probably the first woman to earn a living in the world of letters. At Factory Theatre Lab, Ken Gass' The Boy Bishop is an effort to redeem an otherwise stagnant season. Call 864-9971; opens April 14th. At the O'Keefe, Harry Secombe and the London Palladium Show continue until the tenth; at Phoenix, Rosecrantz and Goldenstern until the 11th; at Menagerie, Pinero's The Magistrate, a classic Victorian comedy, beginning the first and running three weeks; call 534-3631. Beginning April 21 at TPM, The Collected Works of David McFadden based on the writing of the Hamilton poet.

That's all for this year. It has not been a great season; it will be a great season at Stratford, at Shaw and possibly at Theatre Plus. My thanks to all who bore with my necessarily-flexible deadlines and my occasional (!) petulance. Particular appreciation to those who volunteered work, Malcolm Davidson, Paul Wright, and especially Greg Leach. Thanks to those who were co-opted and who were faithful even unto academic death, Bruce Wall, Boyd Neil, Randy Robertson, Janet Kavanagh. Thanks to my pseudonymous staff. And as the Greek scribe said, dotting his last iota, Thank God, that's done. JW culture

University College is on the verge of announcing a course in Canadian Popular Culture for next year. Final approval, being awaited from the Faculty of Arts and Science, is expected within the next few days, and so although it is not listed in next year's Calendar, preparations are well under way for UNI 210: Introduction to the Study of Popular Culture in Canada. And if UNI 210, is well received, University College is considering developing a sequence of courses leading perhaps to a Minor Programme in Canadian Popular Culture.

The course will treat diverse genres of Popular Culture from television and motion pictures to science fiction and murder mysteries to newsmagazines and professional sport not as simple vehicles of mass entertainment, but as images and interpretations of social and personal realities society offers to its members.

Anyone interested should see Prof. Freiman at University College, Room F 205 (978-5023) weekdays between 11 a.m. and 12 noon.

Comment: Hockey and the rulebook

By PETE RETHY

Last May in Quebec City Canadian Amateur Hockey Association held its annual meeting, one of the main themes being the need to curb violence in the minor leagues across the country.

The Association members, after being influenced by the McMurtry Commission's Report on the Inquiry Into Violence In Minor Hockey In Canada, overhauled many of the rules concerning penalties in an attempt to make hockey less violent for the youth of the country.

Previously it had been observed that there was an increasing trend towards a two-fold use of the hockey stick rather than the single idea it was meant for. The main use of the stick, or rather the obvious one, is to play the game. The stick however has adopted a secondary use, being a convenient weapon which could be used to fell trees, ankles, knees, backs or all of the above.

Because of this, the C.A.H.A. decided that any stick penalties resulting in injury, or contacting a player above the normal height of his shoulders (i.e., eyes, mouth, neck, head) would result in an automatic game misconduct to the offender with his team being short-handed for seven minutes, with substitution (after goals) being allowed in only the last two minutes of the penalty.

Of all the new rules passed down by the Rules Committee so far only one has caused any problems regarding its interpretation. Rule 63(d) states that any player contacting the puck above the height of the shoulders shall be assessed a minor penalty. This rule has caused problems and raised many questions during this, its first season. By 'normal height of the shoulders' the rule is definitely in the realm of a judgement call by an official, because what is above one player's shoulder height may be below another player's shoulder height. Because of this, leagues have instructed their officials to make sure that the infraction is plainly obvious before assessing a penalty.

This however is not the major crux of the matter. The problem occurs in one isolated situation. Take the case of a goaltender reaching above his shoulders in an attempt to block a shot with his blocking pad or his arm, and miscalculating by an inch or two, thus causing the puck to come in contact with his stick and thus causing it to fall into the net.

In the average spur of the moment situation, rules are often forgotten (i.e. fighting) and in the situation mentioned above confusion would probably prevail. Should the goaltender be penalized? Should the goal count?

Many would argue that under Calling Of Penalties (Rule 33(c)), the infraction by the goaltender would be washed out by the goal. Others might argue that under the new rule the goalkeeper must receive a penalty and under Goals And Assists (Rule 60) the goal must count because it was directed into the net by a defending player.

According to the C.A.H.A. and the 75-76 rule book both of the above interpretations are incorrect because neither has read the rule very carefully. The correct interpretation of the rule rests on the idea that when a player's stick illegally contacts the puck, the play is considered to be stopped or dead, and the offender should be assessed a minor penalty. Thus the goaltender would be penalized and the goal would not count.

But enough of individual problems. The need at hand is for logical, perhaps critical analyses of the rule book as a whole to determine the effectiveness of stringent rules as a deterrent for violent play.

By examining the statistics regarding the number and type of penalties over the past few years it can be found that minor penalties decreased slightly, game misconduct penalties increased slightly, with match penalties increasing substantially over the past year.

The fact that minor penalties decreased and misconduct penalties increased as evidence in support of any theory is inconclusive. Many penalties which were minor in magnitude last year are game misconducts this year, thus accounting for these observations. However, the increase in the number of match penalties assessed in the past season is a point worth noting.

Match penalties are assessed for such infractions as attempting to cause deliberate injury and molesting of officials. (Sparring and Butt-ending are considered as attempts to cause deliberate injury.)

Thus this type of penalty is for violence considered to be at an 'ultimate' level, with fighting thought of as a lesser offence. But still, why is there more now than ever before?

Two theories lend reasons for this. First of all, referees may either be seeing more or they may think that they are, and are thus calling more. This however is inconsistent and thus the second reason may seem more logical.

The second reason is the result of a new attitude in hockey, which although present in the past is magnified in today's game.

There is no question about the fact that what minor hockey league players see on television affects their own style of play. Many performances at local rinks are attributable to what the players see the night before on the tube. Fred Horton and Brewer of the Leafs of the Sixties to the Big Bad Bruins and now to the Flyers of Philadelphia (the city of brotherly love), a tradition has developed where it is no shame in having your team play short-handed as long as you got a 'good' penalty, i.e. one where the other guy got up very slowly.

Players are accepting the increasing degree of violence in the sport because it wins games, (as the Flyers taught the Russians).

It is this increased acceptance of violence that causes more violent penalties and a rejection of the control exercised by officials. This results in more match penalties. Several years ago misconducts were few in number and throwing a punch at an official was unheard of. Today match penalties for 'Molesting an Official' have increased in such number that many minor leagues around the city call the offending player before a review board but only in the most extreme of cases.

Nevertheless, the rules are stringent enough for an official to call a tight game. Thus the rules can help in making a good game, depending on the players attitudes. If the players want a violent game, they should be content to play short-handed for the most part of it. If they want to play a clean game then the penalty box will be a lonely place.

This is the most important point. It is the players attitudes which define the sport. The rule book and the referees discretion are good enough to control the players to a point. After that point it is the players own attitudes which will make a game interesting or make it into a war.

For the sake of the game, the sooner the players realize this the better. ED - Pete Rethy-Rethy is a former Varsity Sports Editor and is qualified as a C.A.H.A. Official.

Keep your head down

By BILL WHITCOMBE
C.P.G.A. PRO

In the last lesson I explained that the line you are aiming along is called the line of flight and that you are standing on the inside of the line of flight and that most golfers swing across the line of flight from the outside to the inside causing either a pulled or sliced shot.

From where you are standing it is almost impossible to swing along the line of flight. You will cut across the line from either the outside to the inside or you must attempt to swing from the inside of the line to the outside.

Most good golfers HAVE what we call an "inside out swing". This means that the club approaches the golf ball from the inside of the line of flight and crosses to the outside of the line. In other words the club is swung across the line and it feels as though you are hitting the ball to the right of the target.

If this is done properly the ball will start out to the right of the target and curve back towards the target and this shot is called a hook. A good golfer can hit a slight hook or a controlled hook that is called a draw. A new golfer must work towards this inside out swing as it will give you the maximum in distance and direction.

After reading this you will say, "why don't we just try to hit the ball straight". Well as I explained before from where you are standing on the inside of the line of flight it is almost impossible to swing along the line of flight towards the target.

You will always cut across the line, either from "outside in" ... or ... "inside out". The inside out swing plane gives the ball a side and overspin that causes the ball to fly from right to left and this hook shot will go the farthest and straightest. Some of the more advanced players will argue this point by saying that you should "fade" the ball.

Well most people in this country do not play enough golf in our short season to ever become strong enough to do some of the tricks that seasoned tournament players do, and most of us must learn to hook the ball to get enough distance. Also unfortunately the golf books are written by players who have always been good and have very strong golf muscles. They do not seem to understand the problems of Mr. or Ms. average weekend golfer.

The CHIP SHOT is played from about ten feet or less from the edge of the green. Use a number seven iron, with the ball opposite the centre of your feet, take a short grip on the club, have your hands ahead of the ball with the grip end of the club opposite your left leg. Take a short swing, back low and through low. Use the shoulders only.

Advanced players may tell you something different but this lesson is for us beginners or for those who only have seven clubs and only play golf once a week or a few times each season.

When you swing pretend that your left hip is leaning against a post opposite your left leg and take the club back low for about two feet and forward through the ball for about two feet. You may have to adjust the amount of pressure or hit you apply to vary the distance but this is a "safe" little shot and will help those who keep going back and forth over the green.

"Apartment for rent. Hot and cold running (ants), wall-to-wall (cockroaches) nice view (of adjoining funeral parlour), furnished (lumpy bed), reasonable (?) rent. Call RIP-0000."

Sound familiar? The wording in your favourite rag may differ somewhat, but for many people the small print of classified ads is never small enough to tell the whole truth. Finding a place to live is as hard as finding a job, and for many students is as much of a necessity. Disillusioned with the segregation of residence, parental pressures, leaky roofs, or just plain loneliness, many students change residence in a yearly exodus in search of something better.

There are many options, and a lot of different factors affect personal choice in selecting a lifestyle: budget, family background, convenience. There are basically eight options open to students, or those on student incomes: Co-operative housing, communal living, sharing with a member of the same or opposite sex, fraternity accommodation, residence, living alone, or living with one's parents.

CO-OPS A CLEAN SWEEP

Housework. If the mere thought of a broom gives you a headache, co-op life may not be your style, but, for four hours of clean-up a week, you could be a member of a movement "which combines economic and democratic principles in an attempt to produce a working reality". So says a booklet which can be obtained from the Campus Co-operative Residence office at 395 Huron Street.

Campus Co-Op, which has been in operation since 1936, runs 27 houses in four divisions all of which are located within 10 minutes walking distance of the campus.

To join a U of T co-op, you must be a student at a "recognized institution of postsecondary education" such as Ryerson, York or a community college. Fees run from $800 per academic year for a double room to $980 for a single, but to obtain a single you may need seniority. Rooms are furnished and have study areas.

FREE RENT, FOR VOTE GETTERS

Jane is in her third year of Child Care at Centennial College. She lives in Rupert House in the Lowther Division of Campus Co-op housing, and loves it. Because she is Division Manager, she pays nothing for her room and board, although she holds a part-time job. Her duties include the supervision of budgets and generally seeing that houses are running smoothly. Her position is an elected one as are all co-op positions, such as House Rep and Kitchen unit manager.

Each house rep. is a member of the Division Council which meets four times a year. House meetings are held when required to discuss social events, food planning or discipline. As Jane puts it, "There's quite a hierarchy because you can't always find co-operative people."

Each co-op member is responsible for contributing to the Work Schedule which can be arranged to suit individual timetables. Four hours of work are required from each member; two in the member's own house, and two in the kitchen or dining room. This includes "Set and serve", cooking, and washing, dishes, sweeping a hallway and cleaning out the bathroom.

Some houses have free laundry facilities; each gets a daily paper. Each division has a piano and stereo and some houses have televisions; although many people bring their own stereos. Meals are eaten together in the dining hall at 400 Huron, and guests may join members for a fee of one dollar for lunch and $1.50 for dinner.

Breakfast foods are supplied to each house; members get their own breakfasts, and are expected to clean up any mess they may make. There are no set rules, no curfew and no hassles over guests or drugs, although, as Jane put it, "If someone were pushing narcotics they would be asked to leave".

"For a person who likes people, it is "one of the cheapest and best ways to live", says Jane, who has been a co-op member for three years. It is a good idea to get to know the people you are living with, she says, and let them get to know you, for the co-ops have a social life all their own. Co-op life is recommended especially to someone who comes to the city not knowing anyone, for at the co-op "there's always someone around."

COMMUNES DIRTY HIPPIES DISAPPEAR

The word commune is one that for some people has connotations of the sixties; dirty mattresses on dirtier floors with long-haired flower children lying stoned on top of them. When asked if he considers his living arrangement a commune, Bill, a fourth year Zoology student, answered: "Doesn't that mean you have to grow wheat in your back yard?"

Bill lives in a house with three other men, two of whom are teachers. He pays $100 a month for his own room, and spends about $30 a month for food. Household chores are left up to the individual members, but "no one does any work", and this is where most of the friction between members arises.

He suggests that, in view of such arguments, it is important to know the people you are going to live with before you move in. "If people rub each other the wrong way you'll talk it out rather than ignoring whoever's on the second floor", he says.

Although the members of the house have different timetables and lifestyles, they do spend time together, and the benefits of togetherness are many; There's always someone to borrow socks or money from, and rent deadlines become a thing of the past. Bill lives on OSAP, as do the majority of students on their own, and supplements his income by doing freelance art work and odd jobs. His income leaves no room for luxuries, though; "If I want to go to a movie, I don't eat that day."

BATCHING IT WITH ROOMIE

In her first year at University College, Karen is living away from home for the first time. She shares a two-bedroom in the hall"

"Apt. for Rent. Fine View from Spacious Balcony. Full Use of Yard and Garden."

apartment on Wellesley street with Alice, a fellow first-year student at Victoria College. They each pay $115 a month, and $7 each per week for food. The apartment is fairly small, and Karen finds it cramped, but enjoys Alice's company. "I find it comforting. I never see Alice during the day really so it's nice to see her at night."

The girls share cleaning, and whoever cooks is freed from the dishes. They shop together for major groceries, but don't really plan menus. Laundry is alternated every other week and is done down the block at a laundromat which is cheaper than the facilities in their building.

The building is noisy for studying, so Karen may go to the library if she needs to concentrate. Fellow tenants are loud; one appeared at their door during a party with a knife and holster. Karen disclaims this as an "isolated incident" and considers the superintendent "great".

Both girls' expenses are paid for by their parents. It leaves little room for luxuries, but boyfriends who help pay for movies and occasional dinners out. Karen enjoys the "common understanding" of living with another girl, and finds it relaxing "to have someone to come home to. Friction between the two is minimal, and arises over their respective friends, but problems are resolved through open discussion. "We usually end up laughing", she says.

As congenial as her arrangement is, Karen cautions against moving in with a "best" friend because "you expect things". Living with someone you don't know that well may lead to unforeseen conflicts, but, with consideration and concern for the partner, may turn into a great friendship.

Jim, a first-year law student, also shares with one other person, an arts and science student. He pays $100 a month for his own room, and about the same for food. "I eat out a lot." He is not new to the lifestyle, for he has lived with other people, and enjoys it, although "it depends on the person."

He shares the dishes and taking out of garbage with his house-mate, although laundry and shopping are done individually. As with most sharing arrangements, confrontation most often arises over neatness, or the lack of it. Jim stresses the importance of moving in with someone you know, and whose habits are similar, as well as intelligence, to avoid resentment or competition.

NOT SO HOPE

He found the apartment by "walking up and down streets where I wanted to live". The plumbing is faulty and the heating "not so hot", especially during the winter, but it doesn't bother him enough to complain. He meets expenses through OSAP funding and savings from the summer, and has little trouble finding money for extras.

As with Karen and Bill, he enjoys having "someone to talk to" but resents the obligation of having to cater to his partner's needs. The matter of consideration is one that arises with every discussion of such a lifestyle, living alone is probably the only way to escape any such emotional responsibilities.

BOYS AND GIRLS TOGETHER

Allen has been living with his girlfriend for four years. A third-year philosophy student at New College, he lives in a large bachelor flat on the first floor of a house for which his half of the rent is $85. Food costs are $60 a month each, and all other costs, except for medical and holidays, are split at the end of each month to avoid detailed bookkeeping.

Because living together is such a personal and subjective topic, it may be one of many alternatives, but one that has its own special hassles. Parental disapproval will depend on circumstance, but landlords may not always be eager to rent to an unmarried couple. Privacy is a problem, as with any such arrangement, but problems worked out as they arise.

RUNNING IN THE FRAT RACE

Anyone who is unacquainted with fraternities would be a little puzzled by walking up Madison Avenue, for almost every door of the huge Victorian houses has a plaque with Greek insignia. The Kappa Kappa Gamma fraternity house is number 32, and provides a residence for 11 girls. To join the house, one must be female but not necessarily a member of the fraternity. Members are given preference over others applying for room.

Denise, a second year English major, has been living in the house since January. She shares a room with one other girl and her rent is $72 a month ($80 for a single). Her meals cost an additional $66, and dinners are eaten at the house with the other house members. Breakfasts and lunches are left to each girl to get for herself from the house kitchen.

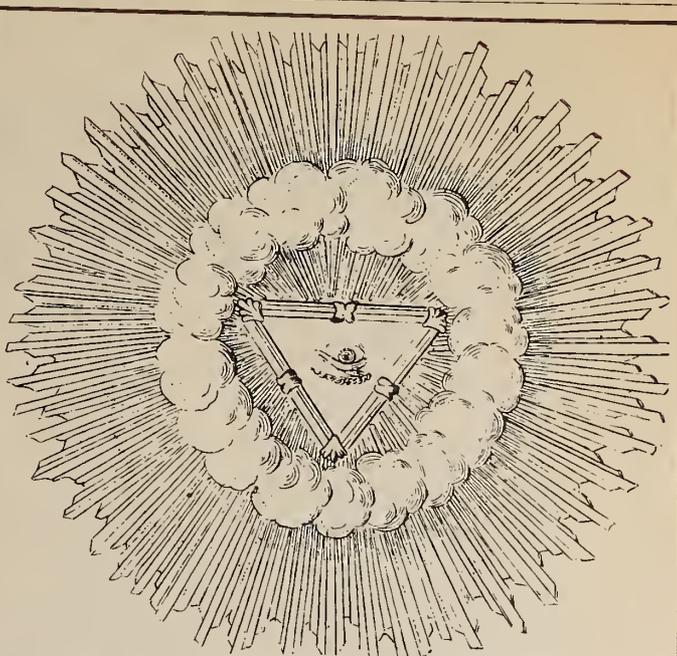

Responsibilities are minimal; the kitchen must be cleaned up after use, and each girl has to help with cleaning up once a week. There is a rule sheet, but it is "outdated" and is in the process of being changed; as is the rule against alcohol in the house. Male guests are a rarity, ("We don't have problems like that"), for consideration dictates that a man in the bathroom at 8:00 a.m. is taboo.

Denise enjoys the parties and calls them the best part of fraternity life, and likes least the lack of privacy. She doesn't mind that drugs are not tolerated, and explains that any infractions of such policies would be dealt with by the House Manager, a girl elected to the position by her peers.

INSULATED GREEKS

Sigma Chi is a male fraternity on Huron Street, and functions basically the same way as its female counterpart. John has lived there during his first year as a Victoria student, and is disillusioned. In spite of such attractions as an in-house bar and a "congenial atmosphere", he finds it "too insulated" and separated from what is happening on campus.

His fees of $520 for a double room are paid for by his parents, but his meals, at $2.75 a day he pays for through summer earnings. There are no rules as such and his responsibilities are assigned cleaning jobs, which he says are "flexible".

When asked if he would live the same way next year, he replied that he was applying to residence, to try and get more of a "community feeling". For John, the fraternity has proved to be a "glorified clique".

HOUSE HUNTERS WHERE'S WHERE

But how do you set about finding your own place? It's a process that can be long and difficult, but there are lots of places to look. The U of T Housing Service at 49 St. George St. has complete listings under co-ops, rooms, flat fraternities and apartments and is open to all members of the university. Detailed information about each listing is included and there are even city maps to help you find your new home.

There is probably no bulletin board in the university that does not have an ad for housing of some sort, especially at the end of the year. The Varsity classifieds have occasional listings, and those of the Globe, Star and Sun are comprehensive. There are locator services which will find accommodation for you, for a fee, but if you know what you want, you can always look up and down the streets for it.

You've found it! Three bedrooms, fireplace, two bathrooms, and it's $100 a month. Before you grab it, check it out carefully and check your landlord. Read your lease with an eye for detail; it is a binding contract and you are legally responsible to follow its specifications.

Conversation: Louise Walker

By JONATHAN GROSS

When this scribe first met Louise Walker it was on a frostbitten night in November. It was hard enough to stand in the dark of frigid Varsity Stadium, let alone run. But Walker had to train so she was there. All Olympic athletes go through this so she wasn't complaining.

Walker is more than just a superior athlete. The blonde-haired 25 year old is also in her fourth year as a medical student at this haven of academia. If it is possible for the lay student to estimate the work of a medical student, there is little chance of one computing the work that goes into the making of a world class athlete.

It takes a very special person to comb two careers and be successful in both. Although Louise is not yet a licensed physician she is an accomplished athlete. With all the talk of 14 year old Olympians, Walker is one who started at a later age.

She joined the Etobicoke Track Club after her first year at U of T while winning her first Ontario Junior and Canadian Junior championships. Travelling to Munich in 1972, the statuesque six-footer failed to make the finals. There was a consolation however. It was here that she met her husband of almost two years, Jim Walker, who was there competing for the Canadian Rowing team.

Jim is also a doctor who is resident in internal medicine at Sunnybrook Hospital. They're quite the talented tandem. We chatted with Louise a couple of days ago because we wanted to know just why she spends her evenings in very unfriendly stadiums. This conversation is offered as a tribute to Louise and an inspiration to those who would like to make their dreams come true.

Varsity: How does one decide to become a physician in the midst of a brilliant athletic career?

Walker: I guess I started thinking about it after my first Canadian Junior title. When I returned to my summer job after the competition everybody made a big fuss and they made me feel very important. Some of their praise went to my head and it looked like I was going to concentrate on athletics while putting less emphasis on school.

My employer, who is a good friend of my father straightened me out though by explaining that you can't compete forever. What was I going to do in five years? Or ten years? He was right. Jumping is important but I had to think about the future.

The decision for medical school was one that was well thought out. I wasn't one who applies just for the hell of it. I wanted it.

Varsity: Speaking of medicine, will the Olympics be the finale for Louise Walker?

Walker: No way. I plan on competing as long as I can. After I retire from active competition I will keep on training and hopefully, coaching. Too many athletes take from their sport and don't give anything in return after they retire. People have helped me. I want to help people.

Varsity: That's great. I understand that you've already done some promotions for a soft drink company. You were the lithe Olympian on that Coke spot weren't you?

Walker: That wasn't a lot of fun. My car broke down on the way there and they held me up so long that I missed an important lecture on the knee, something that I should be familiar with. There was also a matter of money. I'm not professional but I know that some athletes who do commercial work have money put into a trust for them. The funds go toward travelling and expenses. I received nothing and I wouldn't do it again under the same circumstances.

I've also done some work for the Olympic coin and stamp program.

Varsity: What made you get into high jumping?

Walker: I had always been an all-round athlete but that wasn't good enough. One must excel at one sport in order to be successful. Jumping was my best so that's where I went. Varsity: This may be a little bit of prying but what happened in that drug scandal at the Pan Am games when Joan Wenzel lost her bronze medal for taking an "illegal"?

Walker: It was a mistake on her part. The medical staff told us to report on all the drugs we were taking 48 hours prior to competition. Athletes are always taking vitamins of some sort before competing. Joan keeps all her pills in one jar. In all the excitement she took the wrong pill. In my opinion the drug was neither a stimulant nor a relaxant. There is room for improvement in the rules.

Varsity: Speaking of officials there has been a lot of discussion related to the OUA meet held last month in London. Most of it centered around the organizers.

Walker: It was very poorly run. I was jumping in the lowest of conditions. There was no competition and all I needed to win was a jump of 1.65 m. My personal best is 1.88. Not only that but the judges didn't even know the rules. They used a broken pole that had a centre dip of 7 cm. I was running on planks that were not the safest. All athletes need excellent conditions if they are to do their best. They weren't in London.

"Too many athletes take from their sport and don't give anything in return."

Varsity: There has been some controversy with regards to your world ranking. Care to comment?

Walker: The problem is that one publication has me ranked tenth on achievement and another has me seventh on performance. The former is valid however. Debbie Brill is ranked higher because she has jumped 1.69 but I've beaten her several times. The latter publication is from Germany and it bases its rankings on performance. The consequences of this are twofold: Not only am I ranked lower but this keeps me from carrying an 'A' card which is reserved for those ranked in the top eight. As a 'B' card carrier I receive 800 dollars a year for use in training.

Varsity: How do you feel about the facilities at this school?

Walker: We are in dire need of an indoor track. The stadium is fine during better weather but it's cold in the winter. I was down in Gainesville over reading week and what the University of Florida has is incredible. Marty Liquori was there just to point out one of the many excellent competitors who frequent the campus. One thing I'm proud of is that Canada has less facilities but still manages to stay competitive. It would be nice to imagine what we would do with year round Florida sunshine.

Varsity: Winding it down, what do you like about athletics and are you happy at U of T?

Walker: I like going to meets and seeing old friends. Travelling is great. U of T is a great place and we have one of the best track clubs around. I really couldn't go anywhere else as a freshman. There were very few women's track scholarships handed out in the States back then. Today I wouldn't have any problem...

Varsity: This sounds corny but what do you do to keep so thin?

Walker: Doctor Burkitt of England prescribes a diet of increased ruffage. This means more bran and whole wheat to keep things moving. His claims are based on African Populations that live on this type of diet. They have less intestinal problems and everything keeps well, you know.

Varsity: We certainly do, thank you.

We took a few pix of Louise in front of the Med Sci building ... It was cold.

Skule takes a title and Gross takes a holiday

It was a beautiful day. The sun was shining and spring was in the air. Wrong story. The sweat, hung like Spanish Moss in Hart House last Thursday for the big interfac showdown of the year between Skule and the Jocks.

Anybody who was anything attended. It was the social scene of the decade. Sort of a Fraker's Ball. J. S. McManus was amongst the spectators. Several times he could be seen with a rather glassy eyed stare as he preused the talent that was so evident.

The inimitable Mike Katz was present, pushing his latest venture, the Butch van Breda Koff Basketball Camp. Any lucky gunner who has $125 to shell out will get the benefit of some expert teaching in a two-week session at Glendon College. Mike will be there too.

It is very hard to outdo a Skule crowd but the Sweat Threat did some recruiting and cheered the Engineers to an 89-84 loss. Was it an upset? The two teams were evenly matched but Skule was this reporter's pick. Once again this scribe was repudiated.

The star of the game was that big Estonian, Peter Oolup. With knees that read like Bobby Orr's the big blonde dominated the boards and shrugged off defenders while tossing rink wide passes to underlings like Thomson who figured among the leading scorers.

Oolup looked like an octopus out there spreading his tentacles over the key while saving a few choice blows for unsuspecting opponents. After the game Glen Scott, Jack Armstrong type and former Blues star, commented on his teams performance.

"We beat them at their own game. This is the first time they tried to play control and we took them. With two practices all year we did pretty well."

Down 51-46 at the half, Skule jumped valiantly to fight back from 11 point deficits finally closing to one in the late minutes. They're problem was that they had no rebounding and nobody wins the interfac championship on 25 foeters.

Gratz played well as always and Emilio Tacconelli was there to make things exciting but Teupah couldn't repeat his first game heroics. Miffin was benched by fiery coach Rick Kurchyzk. The kid was cold and it may take a few months to thaw him out. Brrr.

Gotta love that Oolup. Got muscles in his shit.

Cheap Shots: This is it folk. What will be the legacy of Jon Gross? Probably Jon Gross. A couple of Apologies. Dave Hulme deserves a little more credit than he got in the CIAU's. He's going to Cop School in the fall. Book 'em Danu. Mike Sokovnin was drafted by the TI-Cats in the sixth round. I had him down as a free agent. New College stayed cool and I can dig it. I want to thank all my writers. Don Warner, Dave Crass, Raymond 'Burr' Stone, Betty Cookin, deserve some credit but we won't give it to them. Innis College was a favorite but who cares. It made for good copy.

Let's forget about this for a second. What about the Leafs? My City Editor is a Spud fan so he asked me to predict the Leafs. Excuse me while I pull this needle out of my arm. Catch you on the Flip Flop.
