
evidently likes the film's representation of the case and CHUM, according to various sources, intends to trace the actual murderer with the help of Truscott's description of certain details dating back almost twenty years.

This intriguing melodrama suits all parties concerned both publicly and financially but it cannot under any stretch of the imagination justify a badly flawed though occasionally disturbing film.

Though Recommendation deals superficially with some of the aspects of the tale its main concerns are legitimate. Andrew Skidd who plays John Robinson (Steven Truscott) in the film speechlessly expresses the emotional and psychological trauma of a child wrongly accused. He is convincingly innocent in what appears as an adult content to nail him for the crime. His friends by betraying him reject any association of guilt and blame. Markowitz presents a picture of adolescence which connects repressed sexuality to violence; or violence as a means to sexual maturity. This perspective is valid when rape is the metaphor of our times.

Even if Markowitz's heart is in the right place his method of directing proves confusing and downright distracting. The flashback technique, used to saturation in this film, signifies moments in the past, present and fantasized future with a few directional conjectures as to who the murderer might have been. When this technique is used to make everything possible, the result is that nothing is made feasible. Consistency and coherence are lost in the context of a moving tale that would have lent itself more effectively to a chronological narrative. Also, the use of overlapping soundtracks from one scene to another works more like radio interference than it does to signal moments of enlightenment. It is a pity that in order to cope with these somewhat over-used and obvious devices the viewer moves farther away from, rather than into the story.

Though the use of still photographs adds a horrific dimension to the rape-murder and the editing of the search for the body a weary suspense, in the context of the film they cannot compensate for the moments of tedious dialogue and self-conscious acting. Intentionally or not most of the adults are caricatures of klutzes. The two investigating detectives are atypically portrayed and incidentally acted as blithering fools who wouldn't recognize their asses from their faces. In a comedy this might have been effective but not in Recommendation. In order to prove a point cinematically one does not personally demean or dismiss the opposition as floundering idiots without losing the ground of credibility.

In Recommendation for Mercy, Markowitz's most ambitious film to date, the director may have taken a larger bite than he can chew. Some of his material is still very hard to swallow but the film is a valiant though flawed attempt to provide controversial entertainment. At the end of the film the cathartic effect is present, but whether it is the product of having survived the film or having Robinson (Truscott) survive his ordeal is not so clear — maybe a combination of both.

An interview with Markowitz

In response to his request this interview with Murray Markowitz took place in his apartment near Rosedale station in Toronto a few weeks after the premiere of his film Recommendation for Mercy. Markowitz, an energetic young man, was perfectly at ease as we smoked and talked about film. He answered all questions with intelligence and patience. In fact the interview went so smoothly that we found ourselves almost half asleep towards its end. As the interview was about an hour long, this edited version was transcribed with an eye to economy of space.

Interviewer: To begin with, why choose the Truscott case for a film?

Markowitz: Well, initially I was in Law School at Osgoode Hall and did an essay for criminal law on the case. And after I had done two other that that effect doesn't always work. Markowitz: Yeah, but there's a lot of people like Variety and Macleans that did feel that it worked. Cinema Canada, Take One. I think the majority of the people who reviewed the film outside the assholes of the Toronto press. If you take people like Clyde Gilmour, Martin Knelman, I think they're quite insensitive to any new modes in film today and their criticism is almost obsolete. This is unfortunate.

Interviewer: Do you consider what you've done as an innovation in cinema? Or were you basically interested in trying to communicate the story?

Markowitz: No, I think that I'm trying to be innovative.

Interviewer: In what way specifically?

Markowitz: Just trying to show the certain moods that I wanted to create.

Interviewer: Any political point of view you wanted to get across?

Markowitz: I'm not a politician.

Interviewer: Do you have any particular artistic developments that you wanted to use in the film?

Markowitz: Well of course, I mean, I'm an artist so that's what I'm working on, my art. But it's a business too. It's not purely an art. There are various other considerations you have to take into account to balance the two.

Interviewer: We've talked about films that shock people but I think there's some kind of reason why you particularly find that important in making films.

Markowitz: Well, it's the way I fight. Making films you're like a boxer. You learn a few punches and you learn how to defend yourself. And you learn how to attack people. And I'm kind of a sprinter — I attack. And Roman Polanski, people like that have been in world cinema the greatest influences for me.

Interviewer: Do you see yourself as a moralist?

Markowitz: Well, anytime you deal with people and their relationships you're dealing with morals. And since most things that I do deal with human relationships they are moral. I'm more like the witch-doctor than the moralist.

Interviewer: The shot in Recommendation with the boy masturbating is like one of your first short films. Why did you put it in?

Markowitz: I think that masturbation in our society is really underplayed in the context of the number of people who do it, including myself, for a vital sexual outlet and it's kind of neglected and abused and both men and women — their hands quite often are their best friends. Sometimes it's easier to relate to your hand than to another person and it listens to you and can be very gentle with you.

Interviewer: What do you think about the present condition of the Canadian film industry?

Markowitz: I think it looks optimistic. You know, there's going to be a few people around making films now and for the next few years anyways. But I think for some Canadian film-makers, like Don Shebib, it's too easy. The government decides on who should make the film or a film not on the basis of how good, you know... like in the States if a film is successful then a guy gets a chance to make another film; if it isn't well then he's out. In Canada it doesn't work on that basis. It's more a government body (CPDC) that very paternalistically decides for usually political and social reasons who should be making films and why. Nothing to do with any rational reasoning. In that sense it's quite bad. The Canadian Film Development Corporation. But if they get past that then I think it has more of a chance. But it's almost pre-ordained, people who are meant to make films will, people who aren't won't.

features, More Than One and August & July I got interested in the case. What I did is: I got the Supreme Court transcripts; I read the available books; and I became more and more interested in it. And I fictionalized the case. In other words I worked from the transcripts, the case inspired me, and I worked backwards and made a quasi-fictionalized version of the case.

Interviewer: Why turn heads; why shock people?

Markowitz: For your pleasure.

Interviewer: Do you think people enjoy that when they go to a movie?

Markowitz: I don't know what people enjoy. When you create something, you don't know or have no idea how popular it will be at the time it comes out. You just take an idea and see it to the end and hope that it's successful.

Interviewer: Many people have criticized you for that in the sense inner workings of a fourteen year old boy's world of the world of adolescence. People don't normally look at it as being violent and sexual. But the human being is a very sexual creature and I think this is what the film is about. It's about violence. It's about sexuality. It's about the cruelty — so to speak — of man. But this is nothing new. I mean Shakespeare's Lear or various other works — that's basically what he wrote about — man's cruelty. How it affects us. And how it destroys us.

Interviewer: What's your main reason for making films?

Markowitz: Well, I think I like to get attention. I like to startle people. When I saw the Exorcist, there were points in the film I didn't think I could take anymore. And I wanted to run out of the theatre. And a few points where I had to close my eyes. And it revolts people and Recommendation, that's the kind of

Toronto Free Theatre based on need for Canadian independence

The striking thing about the theatre audience in Toronto is that it has grown and consolidated on the basis of Canadian plays. The revolutionary pronouncements, a few years ago, of Toronto's small theatres, on the need to experimentally approach the production of Canadian plays, was historically well-timed. They were able to unify the interest of Canadians in the performing arts with the call for Canadian cultural identity and independence. But now it isn't sufficient to recommend a play because it is Canadian only. This is the situation faced by those theatres whose original goals have been basically accomplished. What is the next step? The apparent tension among theatres in Toronto reflects that this question will be answered by each theatre individually, based on their own experimentation. Toronto Free Theatre is one of the theatres that is perfectly aware of the problem and will be looked to this year for new directions. And Martin Kinch, the artistic director, has some definite ideas on, at least, the role of his own theatre.

Track Record of Free Theatre
The best way to find out what someone thinks is to ask. So last Saturday I waited for Martin Kinch in the small, functionally scattered office of the Toronto Free Theatre on Berkeley St. He arrived from dinner ten minutes late for the interview, suitably apologetic, but not overburdened about it since he does not have to apologize for being busy. No time was wasted in getting into the answers to my questions. An arrangement of chairs, with jokes about the administrator's chair being the most comfortable and "doesn't that say something about the situation of theatre", three 22's to ease his headache, sleeves rolled up and the ideas came fast. He answered with an energy and intensity that isn't without humor—a relaxed seriousness.

The summation of the last three years of the Free Theatre's history that guides Kinch's present view of the direction of the theatre is that they have, for the most part, accomplished their main goal of establishing the existence of the Canadian playwright. The "track record" of the Free Theatre in giving exposure and increasingly competent standards of production to Canadian plays has been good. This has, in turn, affected the quality of the work done by Canadian playwrights. They have been less successful in some of their other goals such as being free. And they have had to adjust their conception of attracting a working-class audience. They are, however, satisfied with the cross section of people who do come to their theatre. Usually it is inner-city people, but if a production has a longer run than the audience changes, working its way out to the suburbs. Kinch sees their situation as only a beginning. There is a focus, a framework and a general direction, but change is inevitable particularly in the dynamic force of theatre.

In order for theatre to become broader in scope of production, to attract newer and more consistent audiences and to spread as a national phenomenon, a set of standards must be established by which Canadian playwrights can judge their work and to which theatre productions can respond. Kinch feels that there has to be an indigenous set of standards that reflects the Canadian circumstance. It is not sufficient to import British or U.S. experts and say "here, do something with this theatre." That is not how to use international experience. But some investigation of theatres and writers of other countries is important in evolving a standard. Kinch himself is looking at the work of some German playwrights' and film directors' contributions which reflect "a return to plot line"; "discarding a lot of avant-garde tricks"; "talking in simple terms" and "developing a sense of exemplary action". If this is combined with continuing work with writers and quality productions that show what it means to write for the theatre, it will be a good beginning for the movement of Toronto's theatres beyond the present level.

April 29, 1975

This affirmation of new goals is also significant in a broader social context and one that is reflected in the Free Theatre's first production of the season, written and directed by Kinch. The goals of the early 1970's reflected the disenchantment and anger of people in North America arising out of the war in Vietnam. But now the mood of the Canadian people, Kinch says, is influenced more by the social disintegration happening around them. The early seventies saw theatre "pushing out to people", using violence to wake people up in their surroundings. Kinch sees in his new play, April 29, 1975, an attempt to have people "come into the play" and an attempt on a smaller level to put the question of violence of the earlier period in the context of its aftermath and its effects. Kinch emphasizes two things about April 29, 1975. That it has no violent acts in it, the play begins with a car accident having already happened. And that, although the date in the play's title is the date of the U.S. troop withdrawal from Vietnam, it is not about the war. If it is allegorical at all, it reflects a search for Canadian identity surrounded by other "monstrous identities".

This play is personally important to him because he has wanted to work a play through from beginning to end. The breakdown between writer and director is often an artificial one. One that he feels cannot be defended by saying that a director is more objective about a production than a writer, since, if a director really loves a play, objectivity may lose its meaning.

Beyond this play, what does Martin Kinch see as his personal goal? He would like to have some influence on the creation of a national Canadian theatre tradition. This arises out of the realization that Toronto's theatres have to accept "the responsibilities of what we have created." There is a theatre tradition in Toronto, now, that hasn't learned to work beyond Toronto. Productions that are successful here don't necessarily work in Oshawa, never mind anywhere else in Southern Ontario. Whether this can be accomplished through theatre, film or television is up in the air yet. But he feels it is important and that it is something that has to be kept in mind in present projects.

The success of Toronto Free Theatre in drawing relatively consistent audiences and the progress of Martin Kinch's own work suggest that a solid basis has been created to continue experimentation. The foundation will be weakened if stagnation and self-satisfaction become motivating forces. It seems unlikely that they will happen.

This week sees the start of the Antique Antics of the Toronto Consort, as they begin their series on Thurs. Oct. 23rd at 8:30 pm at Walter Hall in the E.J.B. Performing on such instruments as the rebec, vielle, and rauschpfeife(!), they will present a program of sacred and secular music from Florence at the end of the 15th century, and carnival songs written for and by Lorenzo the Magnificent. Student tickets: $2.50. Phone 928-9650.

Also at Walter Hall this week (Oct. 24th at 8:30 pm), but at the opposite end of the musical spectrum, is the first concert of the Array Series. Works by Barbara Pentland, John Fodi and others will be performed on the viola, a much neglected instrument, by Michael Parker, accompanied by the versatile Canadian soprano, Billie Bridgman. Should prove to be a consciousness-raising night. Student tickets: $2.00. Phone 928-3744 for more information.

The TSO will kick off its season on Oct. 21st, 8:30 pm, Massey Hall with a performance of Stravinsky's Petrouchka, and Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. It'll be the first concert with the new Music Director and Conductor of the TSO, the young Englishman, Andrew Davis. Mr. Davis studied at the Royal Academy of Music in London, was an organ scholar at King's College, Cambridge and as well as succeeding the late Maestro, Karel Ancerl as Music Director of the TSO, he will be appearing regularly with the New Philharmonia and the Royal Liverpool Orchestras. Rush seats for this first performance are $2.00 and for more information, please call 363-0374.

On Oct. 19th at 3 pm, in the MacMillan Theatre at the E.J.B., there will be a free concert of the U of T Concert Band, under the direction of Stephen Chenette. Works by Copland, Wagner.

On the same day, at 3 and 8:30 pm, the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada will present a program of Early English Chamber Music with Len Hanna on piccolo trumpet. This is one of a series of afternoon and evening concerts to be held in the Great Hall at Hart House, with the afternoon concerts including an informal discussion of the programme. Ticket info: call 928-5524.

Peter McCutcheon, an up-and-coming Canadian classical guitarist will be performing pieces representing a wide variety of musical styles at the U.C. Playhouse, Oct. 18th at 8:30 pm. Admission free. For more information, please call 928-6307 and ask for Linda or Gordon.

Now that it's undeniably there it's hard not to admit that it is also undeniably ugly. I'm talking about the CN Tower, the top one-sixth of which, the antenna part, is a complete contrast to the rest of the structure. It's vaguely Art Deco lifted up into the sky by late Sixties, and whatever you may think of Art Deco, that is not where it belongs. Certainly it doesn't seem to be such a phallic structure any more. You can see it from all over the downtown area, however, so that, although it remains always itself, you do see it in many different contexts.

The coming week is a good one in which to appreciate the variety of the Toronto art scene. General Idea's Going Through the Notions is at the Carmen Lamanna Gallery, tomorrow through to Nov. 6. Roy Lichtenstein is at the Albert White Gallery tomorrow through to Oct. 18. Figures at Play from Eskimo Point continues at the Innuart Gallery of Eskimo Art until Oct.

25. Quilted Colour a collection of Ontario quilts, is at Gallery Seventy Six, on McCaul St. until Oct. 30. Also in the neighbourhood, Fernand Bergeron's exhibition of prints is at the Galerie Pascal. Tundra Paintings by Oswald Timmas are at the Merton Gallery from Tuesday on.

The two-woman show at Hart House Art Gallery — Rebecca Burke and Catherine Pentland — closes today. Another two-woman show — Claire Shoniker and Barbara Howard this time — opens Oct. 21. Claire Shoniker has just had a show at the Siser Gallery — it closed Thursday — and her presence here makes one wonder again why the Hart House Art Gallery hasn't yet got its function clear yet. Hulbert Sabells' show at Vic's New Academic Building closes tomorrow.

There are other French photographers besides Henri Cartier-Bresson. Jacques Henri Larigue, who is among the more eminent of them, is presently touring North America under the auspices of Galerie Optica/Montreal. Tomorrow night at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Lecture Hall he discusses his career and his work. Tickets are $3. RR

This week in clubs around campus the best bet is Myles and Lenny at the El Mocambo, Perin County Conspiracy is at the Chimney (Yonge above Wellesley), the Mighty Clouds of Joy are playing at The Colonia (Yonge and Dundas), if you can handle the cover charge, if you're still looking, Tony Bennett will be at the Brunswick House Friday night before he goes onstage at the Imperial Room.

Coming up in the El Mocambo are Lighthouse and Mainline.

Concertwise, Tubes are at Massey Hall this Saturday night, starting at 11:30. One and only chance for: the Smile Company presenting one-act plays at St. Paul's, Avenue Road, Friday and Saturday, $2 each night; last nights for Hart House Theatre's vision of Scribnerian face, $1.50 for students; an evening of mime with Paul Wildbaum at A Space on Saturday evening at 8:30, cost $2.50.

Condensed listings of current offerings: at A.R.T., the Colonnade, The Promise, Tuesday to Thursday, 8:30, Wednesday at 3; $3.50 students. The Bear presents two Chekhov shorts, The Bear and The Proposal at Tarragon Theatre, 300 Bridgman Ave., Wednesday to Saturday at 8:30, Sunday at 3; students not more than $2.50. Creation 2, at Church of the Holy Trinity, Trinity Square, presents Face Crime, an exploration of Stalin's youth, Wednesday to Saturday at 8:30; students $2. At Firehall, Hippolytos continues Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30; students 99 cents Tuesday to Thursday. Worthwhile New Theatre opens Human Remains with certain times normally 8:45, midnight shows Friday and Saturday and a Sunday matinee at 2:45. Tickets $1.50 to $4.50. 736 Bathurst St., reservations recommended (534-5000). At the O'Keefe, Dame of Sark carries on; prices as low as $1.50. Be optimistic. On Saturday and Sunday, at 1 and 3, Pupp Theatre again present Hansel and Gretel. Two dollars for all.

At the Phoenix Theatre, 390 Dupont, The Mousetrap continues; Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30, tickets $2.50 and $3. The Royal Alex continues Absurd Person Singular, Monday to Saturday at 8:30, with Wednesday and Saturday matinees at 2:30; tickets from $6.50. Toronto Arts Productions (the St. Lawrence Centre) open their season with previews on the 20th of Tremblay's Surprise, Surprise and Carol Bolt's Shelter — a fine double bill. Curtain 7:30; no word yet on price, so bring a student card just in case. Toronto Free Theatre is now underway with Martin Kinch's April 29, 1975. At 24 Berkeley Street, Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30 and a Sunday matinee at 2:30; admission $3. The U.C. Playhouse continues its noon-hour theatre Wednesday to Friday (at one).

The Canada Council has just released another armful of creativity money. Biggest winners were the National Theatre School with $800,000 and Theatre du Nouveau Monde at $445,000. This compares with MTC getting $270,000, and Neptune $250,000. Locally, the big winners were Toronto Workshop Productions with an $85,000 windfall, the TPM with $60,000 plus a further ten grand for seed shows. It is pleasing to note that the Playwrights' Co-op received $40,000 and that Tarragon got $20,000 for their Writers-Residence programme. The writers have just been chosen, but their names are for some reason being maintained as a closely-guarded secret. JW

Notes on the Underground — those interested in the American underground cinema have a good week in store for them with six works of the early avant-garde, ranging from 1929 to 1946, being screened. Their titles, times and places are as follows, H2O by Ralph Steiner, an early abstract film and The Life and Death of 9413 - A Hollywood Extra by Slavko Vorkapich and Robert Florey both of which are on view at O.C.A. on Monday at 7. Watson and Webber's Lot In Sodom, which is among other things the first avant-garde film to use sound, is at O.C.A. on Wednesday night at 8 while at 9 the Art Gallery of Ontario will present three films by Maya Deren, the mother of the underground film movement; Meshes of the Afternoon, At Land, and Ritual in Transfigured Time. Despite our numerous repertory cinemas and the fairly strong local involvement in independent film-making, "underground" films have tended to remain just that in the Toronto film-watching scene. Here then is an excellent opportunity, particularly in the case of Maya Deren's films, to see works which one might only hear or read about.

Friday — if you have not yet seen Antonioni's The Passenger one can assume that either you don't want to or that previous showings were inconvenient. If the latter is the case then how does 7 and 9:15 tonight at Cinema Lumiere (same time on Saturday) sound to you? If you can't make it then, don't worry, the New Yorker will be showing it Wednesday at 7 and 11 and Thursday at 7. If you've seen Mel Brooks' new television series you may well wonder how this man achieved his current popularity or if you're a Brooks fan you may be in need of reassurance of the sort that the Roxy's 7 and 10:20 showings of Blazing Saddles would give. You'll have to make room however for all those Bruce Lee fans who will be there for the 8:40 showing of Enter the Dragon, a Grade-A kung-fu wokboiler. Michael Drach's autobiographic retelling of what it was like to be growing up Jewish in Nazi occupied France, Les Violons du Bal, is at the Revue 7:15 and 9:30 (Saturday and Sunday too). Speaking of Nazi occupations St. Mikes is showing Cabaret at 7:30 and 10. If you would like a quiet evening your best bet would be to go see King of Hearts, with Alan Bates as a soldier who wanders into a town living in the shadow of an occupation of pleasant non-Psycho-type lunatics, at the New Yorker at 8:25 along with Fantastic Planet at 7 and 10:15 (also Sat. and Sun.). If you want science fiction, the real stuff that is, go to the Ontario Science Centre and watch Raymond Massey (in bubble suit, armed with the Marvels of Science) and Ralph Richardson (in furs, armed with rusty pre-holocaust pistol) battle for mastery of what remains of the nerve-gassed post World War II world of the future in the 1936 version of H.G. Wells' The Shape of Things to Come at 7:30.

Saturday — If it were not for AGO's showing of Vincent Minnelli's The Pirate at 3 or the SAC free films in the Medical Sciences Auditorium (W.C. Fields' My Little Chickadee and Never Give a Sucker an Even Break, at 8) the only film left would be the Toronto Premiere of John Water's Latest Feature Length Motion Picture; Starring Divine and the All the Gang; namely Female Trouble. If you're all that hot on seeing that one it's at the New Yorker at midnight.

Sunday — A very personal film by Chaplin and two excellent comedies are on view today. There's Limestone at AGO at 3; the story of Jimmie Stewart and an eight foot three and a half inch rabbit named Harvey at St. Mikes at 7:15 & 9:30, and Jacques Tati's masterpiece Playtime at Cinema Lumiere at 3, 5:30 & 8.

Monday — In addition to the above mentioned undergrounders the Ontario College of Art is showing Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North at 7. Admission is free. There are two King Vidor films at the Revue, Ruby Gentry (7:30) and Duel in the Sun (9:30) tonight and Tuesday night. Don't let the three and a half hour running time of Jean Eustache's The Mother and the Whore dissuade you, both director and cast, Jean Pierre Leaud, Bernadette Lafont and Francoise Lebrun, put it to good use in this triangular tale. It's being shown (Monday and Tuesday) at Cinema Lumiere at 7:30. The movies the Francis Ford Coppola has to make to stay in business (Godfathers I & II) are successful. The movies he has wanted to make have all been commercial disasters (The Rain People) despite their qualities. If you would like to see a non-hack piece by Coppola then tonight or Tuesday's showing (9:15) of The Conversation with Gene Hackman at the Roxy will prove worthwhile.

Wednesday — The Roxy is holding an old time avant-garde film night, with Lot In Sodom, Cocteau's Blood of the Poet (1930), Haxan; Witchcraft Through the Ages (1921) and a 1910 animated version of Alice in Wonderland; the festivities begin at 7. Along with the Maya Deren films the Art Gallery of Ontario will be showing some early works by Joyce Wieland at 9:00 among which will be Rat Life and Diet in North America, at 9. Come early and see the 7:00 showing of Gertrude Stein: When This You See Remember Me, an excellent documentary on Stein's life and times. The fictional feature film has not disappeared; tonight's offering is Antonioni's L'Aventura (8:15 Thursday also), at the Revue.

Thursday — After years of critical failure, John Huston made Fat City and the critics found that they didn't have John Huston to push around anymore. This film, Huston's latest, and a good Robert Altman movie McCabe and Mrs. Miller are showing at the Roxy (9:00 and 7:10:45 respectively). The AGO Women's Film Series continues with Notes for a Film About Donna and Gall by Don Owen and Daisies by Czech film-maker Vera Chytilova at 7 and 8:30 respectively. PC

U of T oarsmiths narrowly avert victory once more

By LARRY MARSHALL

After some investigation, it can safely be said that rumours that lightweight stroke Mike Brion-Foster is frequenting reservations in hopes of learning the art of playing Indian, are completely unfounded. However, such would be typical of the effort that University of Toronto oarsmen are willing to put forth. As was apparent last Saturday at the U. of T. regatta, such dedication is paying off.

The first race was 2.8 miles, from the Humber River to the finish line, situated close to Ontario Place. Lightweight and Novice men's eights' raced in the same division, so that approximately ten boats were started twenty seconds apart, and they arrived at the finish line in quick succession. Ordinarily, this would have presented no problem, but the Canadian Naval Reserve threw a Wren in the works. Actually there was more than one, and these buoyant beauties were engaged in their own regatta. Unfortunately they descended on the finish line at roughly the same time as boats racing in the first division of the university regatta, and from the opposite direction. Since the large whalers responded much more readily to the light winds present than to the fierce efforts of the Reserve members, it is hard to fathom the lack of collisions, though near misses abounded. Not wishing to push their luck, race officials shortened the university course to 2.2 miles for the next two division races.

U. of T.'s lightweight crew was a strong third, just twenty-three seconds out of first, and eighteen seconds short of second place Brock. In the Varsity race lightweight closed the gap on Brock to fourteen seconds. Although the novice men did not place, they finished a scant four seconds behind Brock's novice crew.

A strong showing by U. of T.'s men's four resulted in a second place finish, merely nine seconds back of a Western crew that has been together considerably longer than the U. of T. squad.

This Saturday's regatta is at St. Catharines, on the world class Henley course. This course differs largely from the recent 'Head' courses in that it is short and straight. Head courses tend to be lengthy and crooked as a dog's hind leg. The start will be simultaneous from a standing start, and all crews will try for an early lead, and the accompanying psychological advantage.

The OUA championships will be held at the same course on Nov. 1, and therefore this regatta will provide valuable experience and a good chance to make adjustments to technique and strategy while there is still practice time available to implement them.

Interfac climax today

Phys Ed and Victoria College settle first place in Division I of Interfac Football when they meet this afternoon at 4:00 pm on the back campus.

Both teams played earlier this week, the jocks rolling to easy victory over the Engineers and Vic suffering an unexpected 24-20 loss to St. Mike's. In a previous game St. Mike's and the Engineers battled to a 14-14 tie.

Based on results to date this afternoon's game should be the highlight of the season, as the victor will have a significant edge toward finishing first and thereby aiding a bye into the finals.

U of T has good graduate and professional facilities and it's these rather than the athletic program which "attract people to this place," Eley said. "The team reaps the rewards of the University's academic reputation."

Mark Bragagnolo (6'1", 215 lb.), who—as everyone knows—was selected an all-Canadian halfback last year when he rushed for over 1,000 yards in his freshman season, is the personification of the college football hero. For him, football is more than just a game, but he has decided to remain at U of T despite the absence of the "football uber alles" philosophy so prevalent in U.S. colleges.

"U of T is a good school and by getting a degree as well as an opportunity to play football, I can come out with a well-rounded life. Besides, once you have the best, why leave it?" he said.

Fourth year pharmacy student Esteban Andryjowicz (6' 197 lb.) has been converted halfback from tight end, where he played previously.

In his new position Andryjowicz is called upon to provide blocking on most running plays and also has displayed speed and power when called upon to carry the ball himself.

Jim Trimm (6'4", 207 lb.) played tight end at Kentucky State University before coming to Varsity and has been concentrating on punt returns all year. Though he is sometimes one of the unsung heroes of the offensive unit, he knows that it's a team effort that gets points.

"The coach always has something to say to the whole line when a touchdown has been scored," he said.

Trimm attributes the success of the Blues to the team's discipline and dedication.

"We respect Langley. We may not agree with him all the time, but we respect his decisions and calls in the huddle."

Soon to be a father, fullback Libert Castillo (5'10", 205 lb.) sees himself as most effective in running up the middle for key yardage and touchdowns. Being a family man as well as a football player and a student at the Faculty of Education doesn't leave much time in his life, but you learn to make time to do the things you want to do, he commented.

lb.) complete the offensive unit. Ackley intends to teach after he graduates and sees a good future for athletics in the province.

"Even if high schools go to flag and touch football, it's still a great game for building school morale. Now that phys ed is an option in most schools, I think you'll be seeing more popular involvement in sports. Of course, the Olympics in Canada will also help to foster interest," he said.

Ince supports the idea of increased public participation in sports. He sees a distinct possibility that tackle football might be de-emphasized in the high schools because people are no longer content as spectators but want to get in on the action. At the same time, he feels college football in Canada is producing players on par with those Canadian players who are trained in U.S. colleges and universities.

"You can see the success of Canadian college football in the rosters of the CFL and coaches now are beginning to recognize the Canadian players who remain in Canada for their football training," said Ince.

He anticipates that the O.U.A.A. and C.I.A.U. eligibility conflict will be resolved soon because "more students are getting their education in provinces different from their place of birth, or are doing their undergrad work in one province and going to another for grad work."

BLUESNOTES—Paul McMillan, injured in the York game, is now sporting a hip to ankle cast on his right leg and likely won't seek further action this season. Maurice Charbonneau is also on crutches and won't dress tomorrow.

In addition to the prestige of finishing in first place, tomorrow's winner also gains something more substantial — the home field advantage if, as expected, the two teams qualify for the eastern division championship game on Nov. 8.

Autumn's riot of color — the dull thud of bodies crashing — sis-boom-bah — they're the best years of your life, no kidding ...

The five U of T football coaches all in a row, waiting presumably for their chance at the Golden Gaels.

#36 John Vernon

Ottawa Gee-Gees may have been won on the playing fields of Trinity College this past week.

A casual spectator watching the team scrimmage would come to at least one conclusion: during practice you can't tell the players with or without a program. The memorable numbers that draw automatic cheers from the fans are absent from the dirty white practice sweaters. Nevertheless, the Blues have something in practices that they take with them into every game: teamwork.

Last year, in a key game against Ottawa, Blues' defensive unit provided the team's momentum by a series of fumble recoveries and interceptions and Blues won the Eastern Division Championship 27-24. However, this year the pressure is on the offense, as most fans expect the game to be a high-scoring affair because Gee-Gees have totalled 230 points in their five games (all relatively easy victories) compared with 145 for Blues.

Ask a fan to name Blues offense and you will probably hear the names of one or two quarterbacks and of a few half- or fullbacks. Probably no-one will mention the players on the interior line, who carry the strength of the offensive attack.

Mark Beckham (5'11", 190 lb.) definitely feels the extra pressure for tomorrow's game as he is replacing the injured Paul McMillan as centre. During the season he has been rotating between guard and centre and has had prior experience as a blocking back.

On either side he is flanked by guards Maurice Charbonneau (6'2", 223 lb.) and Mike Steele (6', 208 lb.). Last year Charbonneau played for McMaster University but he prefers the type of football played at U of T.

"Here there's a difference in morale and in the team's relationship with the coaching staff. They make football enjoyable as well as a learning experience so you can take it as seriously as you want without missing out on the fun," he said.

Steele sees another dimension in Varsity's game. "When you come up to the line, you have to read the defense and perform a special duty for a special defense. But the whole thing depends on a split-second reaction. The challenge of football is being able to put together 12 men capable of achieving that split second reaction simultaneously."

"With a record of 15-1 in two years, you're bound to feel the pressure of a big game. But when you have a backfield like Castillo and Bragagnolo and Elsey, even if you do 80 percent of the expected blocking, you know they can take care of the rest and have more confidence in yourself and in the team," he said.

To the right of Steele along the line is triple-threat Mike Sokovnin (6'3", 263 lb.) — a tackle, punter and place-kicker. Asked about the Ottawa game, he replied, "This will be a different kind of game from what we have played previously. The Gee-Gees are big, strong and tough. But I think we can beat them. They lack something in their strategy which I think we've got and that's the desire to go all the way to the Vanier Cup." "WE have the talent and I don't see why we shouldn't win."

If Varsity does win again, the public glory will not go to the offensive line. However, that doesn't seem to bother these men.

"We don't really care about the glory," said left tackle Walt Dudar (6'4", 230 lb.). As long as we win, that's enough for us. We've all been in this game long enough to know that if there's a touchdown, it means you've done your job."

As witnessed by last week's game against York, touchdowns are indeed the business of Varsity's two quarterbacks, Dave Langley and Al Brenchley.

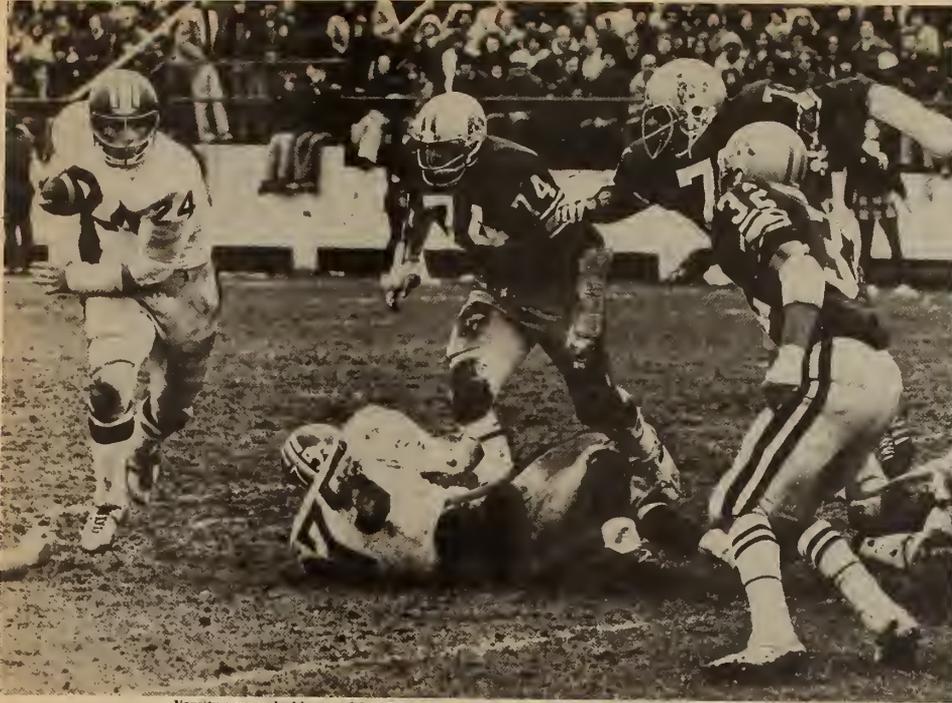

Langley feels his success from his self-confidence as a player. "I can show the team confidence in my own ability and in their ability and I can perform my best on the field, but to be realistic you have to accept the fact that you are not going to change the technique of an individual player by what you call in the huddle. What counts is his execution of your directions."

As second-string quarterback, Brenchley feels the pressure to keep the club moving when he comes into the game from the bench. Fortunately, that doesn't prevent him from throwing his favourite pass — a short toss to an end or flanker, preceded by a joke to one of the halfbacks.

His biggest contribution to the team is his ability to play both offense and defense, which has allowed him to lead the Blues in the number of team "achievement awards" he has acquired this season.

Co-captain and half-back Brent Elsey (5'7", 167 lb.) manages to combine football and medicine without academic conflict.

"Football goes well with my studies. It gives me a good break from my work and keeps me in shape physically. You'll find that most med students have some important outside activity like athletics or music just to keep them balanced and well-rounded."

Two hour library mini-strike set for Tuesday

By ERIC McMILLAN

Library workers voted Friday to walk off the job for a study session and informal strike vote on Tuesday afternoon.

The two hour walkout was proposed after a meeting of the library workers' union (CUPE 1230) heard a report on the latest conciliation talks.

CUPE national representative Glanville Jones reported "We met with the type of stalling that has become traditional here." Jones said the Ministry of Labour, supposedly arbitrating the dispute, "now appears in lockstep with the employer by stalling us."

He claimed the ministry is giving the university administration a "windfall gain" by delaying the talks. The talks were postponed, he said, for consultation with the minister as to whether the federal wage guidelines apply to the library dispute although "we are specifically not covered by the guidelines since our present contract was signed before January 1, 1974."

In calling for the walkout, union president Judy Darcy argued, "We must demonstrate to the university administration we have a schedule and will stick to it no matter what."

The CUPE 1230 membership responded by voting almost unanimously in favour of the walkout.

There was some discussion as to whether the walkout, billed as a study session, is illegal or simply a breach of contract, "not quite the same thing" according to Jones.

The union and the members who walk off the job Tuesday could face large fines. An amendment to the motion promised union support for probationary workers whose jobs could be put on the line if they join the walkout.

The two hours off the job would be used to study the union's situation, plan strategy, learn union songs, and take a strike vote, said Darcy.

The strike vote would not be binding since the administration has not offered a contract for union consideration, Darcy said, but an informal vote would demonstrate the membership's intentions in the case of a formal strike vote.

Union negotiators claimed CUPE is not trying to shut down the library entirely for the two hours and student assistants would not be asked to join the walkout at this point.

The local will call upon the CUPE convention to reject the federal government's wage controls and to organize a nation-wide one-day work stoppage in protest of the controls. The union's position on the so-called "wage and price controls" is that they are in fact "only wage controls and will not control profits or prices."

The resolution supporting the postal workers was passed overwhelmingly only after a heated discussion of CUPW's demand for a 71 per cent salary increase. The resolution supports the postal workers' fight for "a good contract" without expressing approval of specific demands.

Law volunteers now get credit

Some Faculty of Law students will receive "something for something."

Beginning next term, academic credit will be awarded to those students volunteering to work in free legal aid centres. An optional half course has been set up, whose requirements include seven hours of volunteer work in these centres. The first class consists of 16 students selected by interview. Each student will deliver a seminar based on his clinic experience and will also work under supervision on court cases.

There are presently 16 part time legal aid clinics associated with the Student Legal Aid Society (SLAS). Primarily aid is offered to low income families who are unable to afford the cost of legal counsel. This is the first time since SLAS was founded in the late sixties, that credit will be granted for work. However students outside the course still volunteer their time free of academic charge.

The new program will not cost much according to the Law faculty because existing clinic facilities are being utilized and program head Dick Gathercoll is already employed there.

Gathercoll has expressed the desire to expand the program next year into a full course with 14 hours of volunteer work. He is also pondering the formation of a full time legal aid clinic such as Osgoode Hall's Parkdale Community Legal Aid Centre for next year. This would be dependent on the availability of finances and present Legal Aid Society discussions regarding the status of free legal aid clinics.

Athletics foes fear renewed Uof T expansion

By ERIC McMILLAN

Residents in the vicinity of the proposed athletic complex at Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street get their last chance to block the project when a rezoning by-law goes before the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) next week.

Area residents assess their prospects of turning back the by-law, which raises the allowed density on the building site from 2.0 to the 2.36 required by the complex, between "very slim" and "hopeful".

The by-law was recently passed by city council and needs OMB approval to go into effect.

Joan Dohren, assistant to Ward Six Alderman Allan Sparrow sees "almost no chance" to turn back the by-law at this point. She claims there has been pressure from Mayor Crombie and the city planning staff to push through the by-law.

"The university is an extraordinarily powerful institution," said Dohren. It has entered into "no discussion of fundamentals" with area residents and residents "feel very unprotected" from university expansion, she said.

University administrator Jack Dimond has claimed the planned athletic building has gone through modifications due to input from residents' groups, SAC, and athletes. In particular, he pointed out the height change from 87 to 68 feet and the widening of the Spadina Avenue entrance.

A number of area residents disagree and say they will cite the university's lack of cooperation in submissions to the OMB. Only individuals can petition the board, although some will be doing so with the backing of organizations:

Allan McAllister of the Huron-Sussex Residents Association claims modifications to the building plans were made by the university for purely economic reasons. "U of T so far has not made any concessions," he said.

Isme Bennie, president of the Sussex-Ulster Residents Association said OMB approval is a "foregone conclusion." She is protesting the university's "holly" image, claiming the complex is "a motherhood issue when put in terms of recreation for our poor students." She says she would like the project considered from the perspective of community consultation and community access to facilities.

Rose Smith, also of the Sussex-Ulster group, said "The university is because it's much more arrogant." The entrance onto Spadina mentioned by Dimond says was a non-issue with area residents, she said.

Louise Thompson is a Vic graduate living a block from the gym site. She claims, "The university has ridden over residents in the past and this is just another example."

Doug Browne of the Annex Ratepayers Association is concerned about neighbourhood stability. "We accept the university needs new athletic facilities but we want to know the limits of the university's expansion," he said.

Richard Macy is a graduate student in Political Science who runs and lifts weights. He said he is not petitioning the OMB because he'll be out of town during the hearing, but he sides with area residents. As an athlete Macy finds himself in "an odd position" because he wants better facilities, yet he opposes the university's role as a "steamroller" in the community.

Other letters of objection may come from within the Annex Ratepayers, from the North Jarvis Community Association which has lent support from across the ward, and from private citizens.

Objections must be submitted to the City Clerk's office by Wednesday to be considered by the OMB on October 27. Whether or not public hearings will be held is up to the Board itself. Area residents hope with Doug Browne that "the OMB is more open to our criticisms than City Council."

UC alumni raise $7,000 selling high class bric-a-brac

By RANDALL ROBERTSON
No, it wasn't a meeting of Dust Collectors Anonymous last Thursday night in University College's West Hall. Quite the opposite.

It was the UC antique, art and treasure auction sponsored by the UC Alumnae to raise funds for the UC Restoration Fund.

It was a great success — raising $6,852 — and it was a lot of fun. Numerous little old ladies discovered fate and found they had to bid on this bisque china shepherdess or that cut glass fruit bowl. Many were timid — and made only one bid, time after time, on various lots. Others upped their bids too late. A few bid against themselves.

There were more than enough period effects — nineteenth century prints, crystal ink pots, and the like — to outfit certainly any English professor's office. A number were present and bid high and successfully.

All of the lots auctioned were donated by alumni. William Davis gave a brass doorknob from Queen's Park mounted on a tacky laminated base: It went for $50. An original manuscript for Sticks and Stones donated by James Reaney went for $700 — the highest price any lot fetched. The minutes donated by Bora Laskin from the first meeting at which he presided as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada went for $110. A University of Toronto Alumni chair — one of a limited edition made in the 1960's — was given by S. M. Hermant, vice-chairman of the Governing Council and was bought back by him for everything but the preservation and renewal of the college's historic interior, which will cost some one and a half million dollars. That is what the UC Restoration Fund has been set up to raise. It already has $1,100,000 and has three years in which to raise the remaining amount.

$130. An Eskimo sculpture given by Nora Michener ("sat in her study in Government House until she and Mr. Michener left in 1974") fetched $375. Janet Underwood, co-chairman of the Fund, said yesterday he was highly delighted by the success of the auction, and thought the sum raised by it will be enough to endow the restoration of one of the lecture rooms.

The restoration of the college as a whole will cost $7 million dollars. The provincial government has committed itself to paying for Anita Wilson, head of the UC Alumnae, said the Alumnae have no immediate plans for any special fund-raising activities — "except perhaps collecting" on the various pledges that have been made.

Students mismanage money: Internal

By DARYL PIPA

Due to a series of problems last year in bookkeeping and expenditures involving the majority of recognized campus groups, Internal Affairs is in the process of determining new, stricter guidelines concerning requirements for fee changes.

According to university auditors, most of the groups' last year's books were in appalling disorder, especially the Erindale College SAC, whose changeover in staff, lack of accounting experience and honest mismanagement of books contributed to their problems.

According to Campus Services Coordinator Lois Reimer, the university doesn't care how the campus groups spend their money, provided they do it through a participatory decision, keeping strict accounts for the auditors.

A memo was sent in June to the various groups stating they would not receive their second instalment of levies collected for them by the university unless their accounts were put in satisfactory order by December 31. The societies were also offered assistance by U of T auditors in case of problems.

So far, Reimer has only received nine replies, seven of which request immediate help with their books. Another memo is being sent today to ensure all groups before the end of December.

Auditing will necessarily be very informal as even auditors are under time pressures due to university cutbacks. The Engineering Society wanted their books done by U of T auditors to save money, but were refused due to limited staff.

According to Reimer, SAC is also concerned with the use of campus group fees. She said verbal support has been given by SAC president Gord Barnes on guidelines for organizations. All campus societies will have to follow these guidelines in order to obtain any increase in fees.

About four or five of the larger student organizations, including SAC, the Graduate Students Union, and the Engineering Society, are audited each year during June or July by an outside auditing firm, and paid for by the individual organization. The rest are done by the internal auditors at U of T at no expense to the groups involved, although a mandatory fee is being discussed.

Reimer said about $150 of a student's tuition fees can go to as many as 15 separate organizations, probably all of which are unknown or never utilized by the majority of students.

For instance, a student's tuition would not only include college fees but levies paid to organizations as the Athletic Association, Health Services, Hart House, and possibly any other college group who needs financial support.

Altogether there are at least 28 campus groups supported by student tuition fees, with about the same number requesting fee increases last year. Changes in fees for organizations have to be approved by the Internal Affairs committee because if a fee increase for any group is granted, a student's basic tuition fee must also necessarily increase.

Services co-ordinator Reimer is contemplating a crackdown.

Homecoming still excites

Although Homecoming fans were disappointed with the Saturday football results, all that went beforehand cheered them. 200 people were present for the Homecoming parade judgements.

Pharmacy took first prize for the best float in the parade which was judged by, among others, U of T president John Evans and Innis College principal Peter Russell.

Trudeau five years later

On October 16, 1970, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, prime minister of Canada, declared the War Measures Act in response to a "crisis" in Quebec. It removed the civil liberties of all Canadians, but it was specifically used against the people of Quebec. Troops in the streets, arrests and terror against the nation of Quebec followed, as the state attempted to trap the FLQ kidnapers, and imposed repression against the people. This was the tearing away of the veil of democracy in Canada.

On October 13, 1975, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, prime minister of Canada, declared the imposition of price and income restraints against the people of Canada. The thinking behind it is a mystification of the causes of inflation: "The basic cause of inflation in Canada is the attempt by too many people and too many groups to increase their money incomes and rates faster than the increase in the nation's wealth."

So which powerful groups must be restrained? "The federal government and all its employees . . . 1,500 largest companies . . . including virtually every company in the construction industry . . . all the employees of all those companies . . . all professional people, such as doctors, lawyers, accountants and engineers."

Not, you will note, the oil companies. Not, for example, Exxon, the Rockefeller oil empire which amassed an increase of over 298.5 per cent from 1973 to 1974, during a period when its sales decreased by 11 per cent. No restraint is to be exercised by the workers, whose income is never comparable to this kind of wealth.

The inflation rate in Canada is 11.1 per cent. Wages fall while oil company profits rise. The oil companies are in the main, U.S. imperialist corporations. Trudeau will do nothing to control the oil companies: "I do not promise that the policy I am announcing will be an overnight cure for inflation; we cannot for example control price increases of imported commodities such as oil." The workers are deprived of the right to sell their labour power at a price acceptable to themselves. The monopolies are protected. There is no mystery about this, as the state exists to protect those interests.

And so Trudeau neatly celebrates the anniversary of his first clearly repressive attack on the people of Quebec with a second clearly aimed at the vast majority of workers in this country. Along with this increased repression come the proposals of the notorious Green Paper on immigration, another attempt to blame the working class, in particular the immigrants from Asia and the Caribbean, for the economic crisis facing the ruling class of this country. These three acts expose how flimsy the facade of democracy is in Canada.

We are quite sure that the working and oppressed people of Canada will resist this increased repression on the part of the Canadian state. These three attempts to cause splits and mystify the source of the problem have only resulted in the clearer vision of who is the cause of repression in this country, and will lead, inevitably and inexorably to greater resistance, and eventual victory for the working class.

Stalling is illegitimate

Although it appears impossible for the university and the government to get together and solve the financing problems that are slowly crippling the latter, they seem to be on good terms when it comes to stalling the library workers.

On the tail of the Prime Minister's wage and price restraints, the university negotiators, with the help of the government conciliation board, are refusing to make a counter-offer to the workers' demands.

The rationale for this is that it is not clear whether the library workers are included under the controls.

There should be no confusion. The guidelines apply to future contracts only if a previous contract for the same bargaining unit was worked out after Jan. 1, 1974. The last library contract was worked out before that date. The university's stall tactic is illegitimate.

As we have said before, the university is dealing with intelligent human beings. This sort of tactic is an insult to their ability to reason.

Both sides must deal openly: Reader

To the Editor:

The Open column two weeks ago concerning the present conflict between the library workers CUPE Local 1230 and the U of T administration sparks sufficient points of controversy so as to warrant a reply. No one will argue that the present dispute is of crucial importance to all, nor shall we take the union to task in its desire for adequate library services or its desire for a reasonable remuneration on behalf of the workers.

However, I would like to suggest that the union's position — as laid out in The Varsity — is either unclear or fallacious in at least three respects. Specifically, the union's perception of the present economic situation is unrealistic; secondly, its stand concerning how and why the administration should accede to its proposals is ambiguous; and thirdly, the outcome of this struggle is likely to be minimal to the interests of both the union and the university at large.

1. The author for the Executive of the Strike Committee of library workers states:

"We most strongly reject the argument that the university does not have the money needed for our proposals or is somehow at the mercy of some villainous provincial government leader."

Surely recent events demonstrate the earnest nature of the constrained financial situation which the university finds itself in today. It is in fact the reductions in government spending which has compelled the U of T administration to consider terminating the infirmity service; to slice in half the proposed budget for the Sesquicentennial celebration; to reduce the frequency of cleaning services in different parts of some campus buildings.

The university, unlike the federal government, cannot resort to printing money in order to finance the demands of a particular group. It operates within the context of economic and political realities which are common to other institutions and governing bodies in society. The failure to recognize this effectively negates the union's obligation to exercise caution and restraint in its demands. When the negotiators representing the two sides come together they both must attempt to deal with each other honestly and openly. If the union will not more objectively assess the administration's predicament, then it is unlikely that the latter will have much sympathy with their arguments.

2. A second point I wish to raise is the most difficult to categorize as an area of contention, for it could be said that the union's view of how the administration ought to respond to its demands is ambiguous and contradictory.

The letter in The Varsity asserts: "To wage a successful anti-cutbacks campaign, we must unequivocally refuse to decide which essential services are to be sacrificed."

The above statement apparently disregards the value of setting priorities. It demonstrates a disregard for careful financial planning and closer administrative scrutiny of proposed expenditures. It flaunts the need for thrift in a time when dollars flow less freely from government coffers. The union seems to be advocating an irresponsible method of dealing with the whole problem of cutbacks. Some essential services may well have to be reduced as money becomes tighter — this is an example of the unpleasant consequences which occur when government shifts its own spending priorities.

In the above statement, the union seems to reject the notion of careful selection of budgetary proposals, but then turns around in their full support:

"We reject the administration's past priorities as inadequate and demand that the spending be reallocated to meet the real needs of students, faculty, and campus workers."

The use of the term "reallocate" is an implicit recognition of the need to establish spending priorities, and the corollary requirement of distributing available (and limited) resources on the basis of those priorities.

Frankly, the decision facing the administration is an extremely difficult one. Maintaining adequate library service is a must for a university. Both sides must be prepared to give and take. However, if the union is victorious on the wage issues, it may be so at the expense of receiving a guarantee against layoffs and reductions in staffing.

3. And this brings me to a third question: the eventual outcome is not likely to be in the interests of the majority of people, nor the union itself.

Reference has already been made to the fiscal limitations imposed upon the university by government. However, the strike committee raises the point that: "A victory for the library workers would force the administration to realize that a reduction in vital university services and vital staff is an unacceptable solution to the present fiscal crisis."

It is also said that "one major question that will be determined by the present struggle's outcome is the sort of library service offered on this campus."

There is little assurance that as a consequence of successful strike action there will be better library service — since the administration at Roberts will have to look for new ways to cut costs (and therefore jobs and therefore service) to finance the higher salaries of those workers still employed. Thus the students, the faculty, and some of the unionized workers themselves stand a good chance to lose something as a result of this entire matter.

The article also states that "campus workers should support us, we feel, because we have identical interests." This is not so to the extent which the university must reallocate resources to meet Local 1230's demands while placing in jeopardy the jobs of some other non-unionized campus workers. "We may be all against the government," in other words, "but we are certainly not all for one another."

What can be distilled from each of the three issues raised above? Let us hope that the two sides will be guided by a sense of responsibility for the university as a whole, and not by a desire to see the other side "done-in" — an attitude which often characterizes union-management relations. The university must accommodate the demand for adequate library service; it must weigh fairly the union's arguments and come to some agreement vis-a-vis salaries and job security; and it must steer a responsible course within the low budget ceilings. On the other hand, the library workers must be realistic in their perception of present economic difficulties and view more critically the likely consequences of strike action. Let us hope that in the tough bargaining ahead as reasonable a solution as possible can be reached.

Six attacks but no action planned

VANCOUVER (CUP) — UBC vice-president Eric Vogt said October 8 he will take no action on a petition demanding the administration make the campus safer for women at night.

The petition, signed by 80 women, most of whom reside in Totem Park residence, says: "We urge, nay demand, that vice-president Vogt take immediate action to alleviate this serious problem (the danger of sexual attacks on women)."

Vogt said no one has told him which sections of the campus are dangerous and where more lighting or campus patrols are needed.

Judy Yawney, nursing 2, said she circulated the petition in response to an article in the student newspaper revealing six women have been sexually assaulted on campus since classes began.

Yawney said the lighting around Totem is "rotten" and most women are afraid to walk around the area after dark. Routes to parking lots and from libraries to residences are also dim and unsafe, she said.

"Going outside at night on this campus is dangerous, so for most people who have night classes or have to work at night, it is almost impossible to keep from walking around after dark."

"I don't know of any specific places I find dark at night but then I don't have the normal female perception of what is dark."

Margot Campbell, pharmacy 4 and Lynn Pollock, first year MBA, sorority members who circulated a similar petition at Pan Hellenic house last year, are also very specific about danger areas.

A friend of theirs, Joannie Sinclair, was attacked with a knife last February not far from Pan-Hellenic house, the sorority and fraternally meeting place.

Pollock said she approached dean of women Margaret Fulton after the attack on Sinclair to ask for better lighting and parking areas nearer to Pan-Hellenic house.

Fulton then approached the administration to ask for safety improvements but none have appeared, Pollock said.

Nazi horrors set stage for lecture series

In an attempt to relieve the Nazi experience and relate it to a more modern idiom, English and Philosophy, professor Hehuda Bauer from Jerusalem will be speaking at the U of T in a series of lectures probing relationships between Hitler and the west, on the question of German Jews.

Previous to Adolf Hitler's "final solution" to the Jewish problem, there had been a number of attempts by Hitler to sell Jews for allied war materials, before and during world war two.

Prof. Bauer and his associates, Political Science professor Raul Hilberg of Vermont and Philosophy professor Emil Paekenheim from the U of T, will be speaking Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. The lecture series is sponsored by the Joseph and Gertie Schwartz Memorial Lectures.

Promoters of the series are aware that, perhaps, the question has been a little "over-exposed" in the last while. Israel has been fighting a diplomatic battle as well as a militaristic one and the concept of Nazi atrocities has oft become their sole defense.

The main lecture topics will be in addition to general history, an analysis of Jewish attempts to negotiate with the Nazis, Jewish resistance and the relevance of past events to today.

University president John Evans will preside at the concluding lecture at convocation hall on Wednesday evening.

HYDRO IS A MOVING TRAIN

By DAVE FOLKES

Power — the ability to control and exert authority over others. It also stands for the energy required to keep our society going. Ontario Hydro is our supplier of the second form of power, and in the minds of many people, it has too much of the first. Hydro is making decisions today that may drastically affect your lifestyle, your standard of living, and your well-being in the next twenty years. Though Hydro's policies are undergoing increasing scrutiny, controls appear to be for the most part ineffectual and inadequate. Flying the banner of public interest, Hydro generally gets its way, a way that affects us all. For some of us, it will directly affect our homes, our families, and possibly even our safety.

What are these decisions, policies, and plans that are formulating deep within the massive intestines of Hydro? How do we know that the right decisions are being made? If moral and responsible decisions are not always made, then what is and can be done to change them? Who is really in control of our lives?

Royal Commissions and You

Ontario Hydro is a crown corporation, with certain governmental powers, such as those of expropriation.

They do not have to conform to city bylaws or planning policy. Yet unlike the government and its ministries, they do not have to answer directly to the people. If a certain portion of the public becomes irate, Hydro does not have to worry unduly about its effect at the polling station. The consequences would not be so serious, if the provincial government exercised sufficient control over Hydro, to ensure that Hydro's policies and actions were the best for the province as a whole.

Recent events have indicated that this is not the case.

Why do we need greater government control over Hydro? The answer lies in the current controversy surrounding Hydro's expansion program, controversy that questions the need for such expansion, and the economic and environmental cost of the program. It also lies in an Ontario Energy Board (OEB) report released last week. The report agreed with Hydro when they say that they are not responsible for bettering the economic and social well-being of the province through their policies. In other words, their job is to blindly produce as much energy as they feel will be demanded, not to curb usage and costs to the economy and environment. If Hydro is not responsible, then who is? The OEB says that it is up to the government to direct Hydro.

The only way the government can direct Hydro so that its policies have a positive influence on the economy and environment is by knowing what Hydro is doing, why they are doing it, and whether there are better alternatives. The government relies on the Ontario Energy Board to do this. According to some, particularly the NQP, they don't do this very well.

The OEB, the NQP say, should be more aggressive, challenging Hydro policies rather than just questioning them. If Hydro needs to be directed with regard to their social responsibility, then the OEB should do it, or they should make sure that the government does it.

FRIGHTENING REFUSALS

Considering this, you should find the following two items just a bit frightening. First of all, all OEB reports to the provincial government on Hydro are first approved by the Hydro Board of Directors. Secondly, Hydro was recently requested by the OEB to reduce reserves from 28 per cent to 23 per cent, slow its nuclear program, and delay construction of a heavy water plant. Hydro ignored all three requests.

The consequences of this lack of control over Hydro policies are suddenly taking on a more serious light. Just last week the OEB approved a 27 per cent increase for electricity as of January 1976. Hydro expects that the rates will double by 1978.

The opposition to such an increase is bitter. Several groups, including the Consumer's Association of Canada, have expressed fear that this will send inflation spiralling. The Provincial Treasurer, Percy McKeough, bluntly stated that the province can't afford it. The Association of Municipalities of Ontario (AMO), comprising about 80 per cent of the population of Ontario, recently issued a report that severely attacked the need for such an increase, and accused Hydro of being totally at sea when it came to controlling their costs. Even the OEB was not satisfied that Hydro was doing everything it could to control costs.

According to the AMO, Hydro could not even produce the figures that justified the need for the increase. Yet the increase, originally 30 per cent, before being lowered to 25 per cent, was approved, with an additional 2 per cent tacked on to preserve Hydro's "financial integrity". In other words, the OEB was concerned that Hydro would run into a big deficit. Obviously the OEB does not consider itself responsible for bettering the economic and social well-being of the province any more than Hydro.

ENVIRONMENTAL VICTORY?

The Solandt Royal Commission (1972-75) looked at four 500 kV transmission corridors proposed by Hydro.

The commission was unique in that it dealt specifically with the environmental impact of the routes selected. Prior studies, such as Task Force Hydro in 1972, dealt only with general, broader term issues. The commission might be termed a success in that several portions of the route were altered. The hesitation in calling it an all-out victory for environmentalists is due to two factors — the routes may have been altered, but the lines are still going in, beginning a vast network of high voltage lines that conservation proponents feel we don't even need, and secondly, there is nothing replacing the Solandt Commission in questions relating to other sites and routes.

MONEY FOR PUBLIC

The latest Royal Commission looking into Hydro is just getting underway this fall. For the first time financial aid will be available to groups wishing to present their case before the Commission. The Porter Commission has been set up by the OEB to study Hydro's long range plans and policies, covering the time period of 1983 and beyond. Any questions relating to projects coming up before then will not be considered. Several nuclear units, generating stations, transforming and switching stations, and transmission lines will be in or underway by then, including expansion of the Bruce heavy water facilities and construction of one other heavy water plant.

One entire area of priority that the Porter Commission will deal with is the need for four more 500 kV lines from the Bruce nuclear station and a nuclear generating station on the North Channel. They will not be considering impact like the Solandt Commission. A member of the Commission stated flatly that they are not happy with this. First of all, they would prefer to study the overall process of load growth and need before looking at any particular project, and secondly, they would want to assess the impact of the routes and site.

Anyone currently fighting a particular Hydro project, for example the proposed Toronto Central Station on McCaul Street, should find the words of Hydro Vice-President for Engineering and Operations, H.A. Smith, frightening. He explicitly stated that the public should only have a say in projects at least a decade away, not those required right now. The rationale is that the long lead time involved with such projects, often as long as five years from final planning to completion, does not allow the luxury of time consuming examination or changes. The only problem is that what we do ten years from now largely depends on the size, type, and number of facilities we build today. If we start linking stations and load centres with 500 kV lines, then we are more or less committed to that policy.

When nuclear generating stations are expanded, it is generally with nuclear units. As well, a great deal of the cost of the proposed expansion plans that are beginning today is incurred in the beginning, due to large initial capital investment. Much more important than that, however, if environmental damage is incurred, either social or ecological, by projects going in today, it will probably take a lot longer than Mr. Smith's five years to restore it.

Who do we turn to in order to fight Hydro concerning short term matters? The Porter Commission won't touch anything before 1983, except for those five projects that can only deal with in terms of need, and even then it is only a recommending body. Hydro can overrule municipalities, like Toronto City Council, if damage is incurred, the route of your MPP and Ontario Legislature depends on your having time, luck, and public support.

It is a simple fact of life that there is no one to arbitrate and rule over disputes between citizen groups and Hydro concerning specific issues of the short term. You may well have a legitimate complaint, but unless you

Ontario Hydro is a public utility. Their objective is to supply the province's energy needs, with a high reliability factor, at the lowest possible rates. Few rational people could argue with that. Or could they?

The questions the dissenters are beginning to raise might not seem very serious — until your home is expropriated for a new facility that might or might not be needed, or until your rates double to meet the capital costs of the energy programme. Or until you turn on the switch and nothing happens.

The reaction of people directly stung by Hydro and of those who don't want to be, has led to deeper questions, and they need to be answered.

What will Ontario's energy needs be in ten, twenty years, or beyond?

Hydro has decided that the demand for electrical energy will grow by an average of 7 per cent per year. This is based on the assumption that load growth will remain about the same as in the past, allowing for a slight increase due to recession. If anything, increasing fossil fuel costs will lead to a greater dependence on electrical energy and nuclear sources.

Opponents to the expansion programme and its high economic and environmental costs feel that demand will increase by a maximum of only 4 per cent per year, due to economic slowdown and increasing awareness of the need for conservation of energy. According to NDP research, this decreased rate would mean a saving of up to $1 Billion a year by 1982. Only two new generating stations would be required by 1993, obviously meaning lower cost to the public and less environmental impact.

Energy Probe, an offshoot of Pollution Probe, claims that Hydro wastes about two thirds of the energy produced. They estimate that our energy needs could be cut in half, and that if Hydro made conservation its policy rather than increasing supply, then future energy requirements would be far below Hydro's projections.

Could Hydro effectively lower future energy needs by encouraging conservation?

Suggesting that we should conserve energy is not good enough. How could Hydro effectively reduce consumption, and therefore need, beyond suggesting that we just use one burner instead of two when cooking? The answer could very well lie in the cost rate structure, something which Hydro tends to be reluctant to change.

Present rate structure encourages the use of electricity. Bulk users pay less per unit than the 'light' user, simply because unit cost falls as quantity increases, which in effect means that the homeowner is subsidizing the commercial and industrial user. This in turn encourages rapid growth in energy use, and certainly does nothing to encourage conservation. In fact, to a point, the more electricity a firm uses in production, the lower their unit fixed costs, and the higher their profits. Rates increasing with use would reverse this, encouraging conservation.

A second method of encouraging conservation would be a differential rate structure. Basically this means you are charged more for using electricity during peak hours. This would tend to level out the peak loads, the figure that Hydro anticipates meeting in their energy need projections. Thus generating and reserve requirements would be lower.

Just who's in Some questions

These are not radical new methods. They have been implemented elsewhere and they work. Los Angeles reduced electrical energy consumption by 10 per cent employing similar measures. Yet Hydro is reluctant to change.

What social and environmental costs need be paid to meet Hydro objectives?

Assuming for the moment that Hydro has correctly assessed future requirements and that these requirements are as low as feasible possible, then Hydro still has to choose the methods of generation and transmission, along with their sites and routes. Should they choose the methods and locations which are most economical, most reliable, or most environmentally desirable? You can seldom have all three, so trade-offs are required.

Many people are not happy, to put it mildly, with Hydro's swinging the weight, you are not going to beat Hydro.

NUCLEAR TOYS

Hydro admits that the concept of public participation in their projects is new to them. They are used to just going ahead and doing it. Now when they deal with local residents directly affected by a project, they mobilize a formidable Public Relations team. Handbooks relating field practices and land acquisition outline procedures for dealing with the public that leave no loophole for legal complaint. The public is involved in every stage of planning, and community relations experts bend over backwards to be nice to you.

The fundamental point is this — their purpose seems to be to defend the project and get it through with as little flak as possible, not to re-evaluate the project itself on the basis of public input. That is not to suggest that they won't do everything possible to make you happy and reduce impact as much as possible, just that they do so as long as it fits within their plans and within the bounds of their trade-offs. And they are far better equipped than the public is to push their point of view. Hydro's internal procedure for dealing with public dispute is admirable, but it is not adequate.

Hydro is not a child playing with nuclear toys. The Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada is responsible for the safe design and operation of all nuclear installations and heavy water plants. In other words, it is unlikely that we will be faced with any potentially dangerous situations involving radiation or explosion.

On the other hand, the Atomic Energy Control Board is hardly likely to recommend that we curtail the use of nuclear reactors. If anything, they would likely be more biased to their use than Hydro. Factors such as cost, heat pollution, and a commitment to fission are questions surrounding Hydro's nuclear program that maintain doubtful status with regard to supervision and control. The OEB has already failed to regulate the pace of Hydro's nuclear program, and the Porter Commission, which should be looking into the issue, once again can only recommend.

BRIGHT LIGHTS

There is one bright light on the horizon. The Environment Assessment Act passed this year will involve the creation of an Environmental Assessment Board, possibly made up of the current Environmental Hearing Board, which will be a decision-making body ruling over the environmental impact of all major projects. What will be considered a major project is still undecided. It is quite possible, says the Ministry of the Environment, that municipal planning acts will rule in local situations and that the Assessment board will only consider cases outside local jurisdiction. The only problem with that is that Hydro of course has the power to overrule city bylaws and planning policy. So the future of projects like the Toronto Central Station is still uncertain.

Who controls Hydro? Are they in control of themselves, or at sea, as the AMO suggests? Are we adequately protected by the OEB and its various commissions from Hydro decisions that are unfair or wrong? Like all issues, there is no safe answer to the above questions. But it does seem clear that there are questions regarding Hydro policy that have to be looked into, and it does not seem clear that anyone is doing very much about it.

compromises. In fact they are questioning the moral responsibility of Hydro's decisions with regard to generating methods, sites, and transmission routes.

Are nuclear generating stations, the backbone of Hydro's expansion program, desirable? According to Energy Probe, 70 per cent of the energy produced is lost as heat to the water source of the cooling system. The resultant warming effect on lakes may be hazardous to the ecological balance of marine life.

We have been assured that the CANDU reactors are extremely safe, with no radioactive waste other than the fuel rods themselves, and that they cannot become potential "atomic bombs". Fair enough, but what about uncontrollable factors such as fractures due to earthquakes, impact by aircraft, and sabotage? Even the Ontario Energy Board requested that Hydro slow down their nuclear program until they are sure of what they are doing, a request that Hydro ignored.

Nuclear reactors require heavy water, and thus heavy water plants. Though heavy water itself is harmless, the process requires quantities of pressurized hydrogen sulfide (H₂S) gas, which is deadly. Inverhuron Provincial Park near the Bruce heavy water plant on Lake Huron has been restricted to day use only, because of the potential danger to overnight campers in case of a leak. As well, a five mile Control Development zone around the plant has restricted development beyond its present rural density of 20 to 30 people per square mile.

All right, so there are stringent safety regulations. But do we want to have a dangerous restricted area anywhere in

Future Shocks

The bedroom was swathed in the blackness of night when his eyes opened. He glanced at his watch, reading a faint digital 2:55 a.m. Oct. 2, 1995 on the night table beside him. Normally a sound sleeper, he lay still, trying to determine what had disturbed him. In a matter of moments he had his answer. Pounding resounded at the front door.

Sighing, and assuming that a burglar would not pound on the front door, he opened it. A flashlight shone in his eyes.

"Are you the owner of this house?"
"Yes, of course, who else would you expect at this time," he replied irritably, still shrugging off the sleep, "and get that damned light out of my eyes. Who are you?"

"Hydro," the dark figure responded, letting the word carry its own weight, "I'm afraid you'll have to evacuate your home immediately. There's been an accident at the heavy water plant, and they're moving everyone out of the area until they know the extent of the leak and how far the gas will spread. Is there anyone else in the house? Don't worry about your possessions, Hydro will patrol the area. You can drive yourself, or there's a truck at the end of the street."

The light lowered, and he could see the faded brown uniform of the Hydro police. Normally they patrolled the area looking for illegitimate use of power. The reality of the uniform and the darkness and the cold night air suddenly hit him.

"Leak, what leak?" He shivered only partly from the cold. "What are you talking about? Are we in any danger?" Marjorie, the kids.

"You'll have to leave for a while, sir. There's no immediate danger, but you'll have to evacuate as soon as possible. 'Be prepared', after all, is the Hydro motto. You'll have to excuse me, I have to get on to the next house."

He stood dumbfounded. A gas leak. Hydrogen sulphide. They always said that there could be a leak at the heavy water plant. That was why there was a five mile restricted zone around the plant. But he never thought it would happen. No one did, as the towns of Kincardine and Port Elgin grew into cities around it. He certainly never thought that it could affect him way out there, ten miles away. Apparently, neither had Hydro, though they always said that they weren't responsible for what grew around them.

"Wait, wait a minute," he said, "aren't there supposed to be sirens or something? Instead of this going door to door?"

The Hydro man smiled tolerantly, as though dealing with a child. "Are you kidding, sirens with the power off? We shut down at eleven, and you just can't switch it back on like that, you know. You people seem to think that Hydro can perform magic. Brother, you're lucky getting what you're getting—good, reliable power, sixteen hours a day."

He shut the door with a strange numbness, shivering again. I've got to wake Marjorie and the kids. Automatically, without thinking, he reached and flicked the light switch. It was just another sound in the darkness.

At the same time, about a hundred miles away, the aging Premier Lewis was hurriedly making his way to Queen's Park. His face was lined with weariness, and his eyes were dark shadows, but he was moving with almost a feverish determination. A grim smile was etched on his lips.

A midnight call had informed him of the gas leak. Apparently weather conditions were giving Hydro unexpected problems and thousands of people were being evacuated. Lewis was concerned for the safety of the people, but as he made his way downtown, a new thought took hold. The gleam came to his eyes.

For years Lewis had been living in a nightmare. Hydro's costly nuclear program had been unable to keep up with demand. Emergency rationing and conservation measures were instigated, but the situation was unstable.

Now he had a way to grasp that power back, and put Hydro in its place.

This gas leak was a threat to public security. He could order an immediate halt to the plant's operation, and stop all expansion until safety studies were made. It would be a move made necessary by Hydro's rash decisions. Perhaps it might not be too late.

He had to prepare his statement for the following morning. He pushed open his office door with unaccustomed energy.

Tyler, the Hydro Chairman, was already sifting at Premier Lewis' desk. His smile was a welcoming one.

"Ah, Stephen, I see you've heard about our little problem. You didn't have to disturb your sleep for it."

"You seem very cheerful about it," the Premier retorted coldly. An icy feeling gripped him.

"There's no need to be overly concerned. We have the matter well under control, my field supervisors assure me, and the displaced citizens should be back in their homes in a day or so."

"I'm going to be making a statement in the house this morning."

"I know," said Tyler, reaching for a typed sheet beside him. "I've already prepared it for you."

Anger seized the Premier. "And just what the hell is that supposed to be?"

"Well, in effect it says that the government is authorizing Hydro to expropriate all land within a ten-mile radius of this plant, and all the others. 'Hydro Law' will be declared while the matter is investigated, including the possibility of sabotage. You'd be surprised at the number of people who'd like to make us look bad. These measures should ensure the public that they are our first concern, and at the same time allow us to continue unimpeded. It's all typed right here, all you have to do is read it."

Lewis tore the paper from his hand, his normally grey skin flushed with fury. He crumpled the page in his fist, waving it at Tyler.

"Now, now, you've gone too far!" he shouted, his voice shaking. "If you expected me to say that — my God, you must be insane. Or I would have to be. No, no, Tyler, I have you this time. I'm going to make a statement, but not the kind you had planned. Quite a bit different, in fact!" His face was livid.

Tyler seemed unabashed. He pressed Lewis' buzzer, got up, and stepped around the desk.

"I'm sorry, Stephen, I have a surprise for you. I was afraid you would respond like that."

Two Hydro police entered the room, and stood on either side of the Premier, who was speechless.

"It's for the good of the province, Stephen. I'm sorry, but I can't have you interfering."

The two police guards removed the Premier from the room in a sea of cursing and feeble struggling.

southern Ontario? Three more plants are currently being built at the Bruce location, and eventually as population increases, the area around the restricted zone is likely to develop. How sure can we be that safety precautions will keep up with plant size and surrounding population?

Colourful Balloons
500 kV is a lot of volts. The proposed new 500 kV power lines would be more than double our present 230 kV capacity currently running from generating stations. Whether we need that capacity or not, and thus the vast new network involved, is a matter related to the first question of our future energy needs. But if they do go in, as would now almost seem inevitable, we have to be concerned about where they go. Hydro policy at present is to put these massive lines overhead (tower design is still undecided), for technical and economic reasons. This included a length along scenic Long Reach near the Bay of Quinte, where they would have had large colourful balloons dangling from them to ward off aircraft. That was Hydro's idea of a trade-off between cost and aesthetics.

Fortunately an independent commission (Solandt Royal Commission 1972-75) thought otherwise, and the wires are going underground for that particular stretch. Other parts of the first four proposed 500 kV transmission corridors were moved to reduce the environmental impact by the same commission. Unfortunately, this independent study of impact was unique. Obviously from its findings Hydro is not drawing the line very faintly in some of its trade-offs. You have to wonder what's going on with other routes and sites that attract less attention.

One of those sites that people have been wondering about very loudly has been the proposed site for the Toronto Central Station, a four-storey switching station that would become a 230 kV transforming station in about ten years. The site, on the east side of McCaul Street between Orde and Elm Streets, is across the road from a residential area and adjacent to a public school on Orde Street. Legally, Hydro can build there because it is within the commercial zone boundary that runs down the middle of McCaul. They are obeying the letter of the law, that says they can only build in commercial zones, but not the spirit, which passed that bylaw to keep them away from residential areas for obvious safety and visual and noise pollution reasons.

NEED A RIDE?

By M. JANE FRENCH

The Toronto Ride Centre, on Yonge Street is increasing the mobility of travellers on low budgets.

The Centre was established in this city last April by Sid Better, a York University student. During extensive travels throughout North America he encountered ride centres which provided referral services between riders wanting drives and drivers wanting rides.

The first organization of this kind was established in Cambridge, Mass. and since then centres have formed in San Francisco, Los Angeles, New York, Denver and Fort Lauderdale. In Canada, travellers may contact ride centres in Vancouver, Toronto and hopefully before next summer, in Montreal.

The cost for using the Ride Centre varies according to the distance to be travelled but never exceeds ten dollars. The centre offers a money-back guarantee.

According to Better, it is easier to arrange rides for greater distances. Drivers travelling on long trips usually request riders who will share gas costs, perhaps some of the driving time or just for some company.

But rides to closer areas, like

Montreal or Ottawa, are also popular and it doesn't hurt to try to go to Chibougamou.

The centre is especially helpful for female travellers, who use this service more than males. Ine identity and destination of all drivers is known and if desired, meetings can be arranged between the rider and driver to ensure their compatibility.

Ford drives thru Dallas and lives

As the furor of president Ford's recent accident in Hartford Conn. dies down, Sheriff's deputies are still hesitant about subscribing to a second car theory.

NBC has released its controversial videotape of a Cuban tractor being wrestled to the ground. However investigating agents for the Secret service say that the machine was released after the driver produced an identity card from New York City College.

Man borrows for daughters loan

FREDRICKTON (CUP) — A New Brunswick man had to borrow $1,028 so his daughter could qualify for a student loan.

Justin Wright was told earlier this year he would have to make a "parental contribution" of $3,870 towards his daughters educational costs as a University of New Brunswick nursing student, if she was to receive a $1,150 government loan.

The daughter, Janet Wright, appealed the decision on September 22 and was informed three days later the amount of parental contribution would be reviewed.

It was, and her father is expected to pay only $1,028.

The problem is that, like most other New Brunswick potatoe farmers, Justin Wright lost money this year. He ended up having to borrow from his retirement fund to make up his "parental contribution" daughter Janet could receive her loan.

"I'm not ungrateful for the loan" she said, "but I'm still very disturbed that my father had to do what he did."

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy autumn-fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.

Dear as remembered kisses after death,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
O Death in Life, the days that are no more!

Bugs in the Baloney - taste isn't everthing

By NINA WILLIAMS

An Ontario university study of meat packers found a wide variety of bacteria counts in their luncheon meat selections. But inflation-fighters take note, the high price slabs are usually the healthiest.

A study of the four southwestern Ontario meat packing firms was carried out by University of Guelph professor Cyril Deitschaeder in cooperation with a team from the CBC program Marketplace. The study shows a sample from Burn's macaroni luncheon loaf was 12,000 times greater than that of Schneiders who the study found consistently contained "minimal" amounts of foreign bacteria in all samples analyzed.

In relation to Schneiders, the levels of Swifts Premium macaroni loaf were 260 times as great, while Maple Leaf's showed a level 760 times as great.

So consistently high were the levels in all of Burn's products that a second group of new samples were tested. The bacteria levels remained high, as much as 145 million parts per gram.

The in-depth survey stressed three important findings.

- storage temperatures and location in all food stores were less than adequate. Refrigerated shelf and overhead rack temperatures both exceeded the necessary temperature of 4 C by as much as ten degrees.

- price may be a good indication of package quality. Some of Burn's packages contained more meat than the net weight stated on each label, while Schneider's meat products were the most expensive. The additional cost of Schneider's products seemed a direct result of a more thorough quality control department.

- no government standards exist for packaged ready-to-eat luncheon meats. Food processing firms meet government standards and regular inspections but their products are not as rigidly controlled.

Luncheon meats are called ready-to-eat products, and that no further heat treatment is necessary to either cook the meats or destroy any foreign bacteria.

Consumers have a right to place strict government standards on firms like these ensuring marketable quality products the program concluded, and called for increased investigation of luncheon meat producers.

Stick to Schneiders, top choice for brown, mushy squares.

U of T Track Club Runs To Show

Eight members of the U of T Track Club competed in the Canadian Marathon Championships in Waterloo on Saturday, Oct. 18. Jack Friel placed thirteenth with a time of 2 hrs. 36 min. 14 secs. He was followed closely by Brian Swanick and Eric Quackenbush giving the U of T team a strong third place in the championships. Other members of the team Timo Uksulainen and John Rafferty.

Another strong finisher was the Dean of University College, Mike Yealland, who finished the 26 miles, 385 yards in an excellent three hours, 6 min. 25 secs. This was his first attempt at the classic distance.

Many members of the team were plagued with injuries, one U of T runner having to drop out during the race. However, in the field of over two hundred forty runners, the U of T athletes fared favourably with the others.

Ladies Are No. 3

The Varsity Women's Tennis Team finished their season first in the A division and third overall in the OWIAA championships. The first doubles team of Carla Mann and Linda Harley placed second to McMaster, defeating York, Guelph, and finally Western, the latter having scores of 1-6, 7-6, 6-4.

Other doubles action resulted in Penny Petroff and Kate Maynor losing tightly played matches against Western and York, but subsequently defeating Guelph 6-2, 6-0, and McMaster, the eventual winner, 4-6, 7-5, 6-2.

First singles player Wendy Stone placed third overall. Losing close contests to York and Western, but defeating her McMaster opponent 7-6, 6-3.

In other singles play, Diane O'Hara went under to York, Western and Waterloo, but came back to defeat McMaster 6-4, 7-5.

Many thanks to coach "Mocha" Grant and manager Emily Braun for their continued support.

U of V EDITOR Underpaid

VICTORIA (CUP) — The editor of the Martlet, University of Victoria's student newspaper, has filed a complaint against the student council with the BC Labour Relations Board, charging he is being paid under the minimum wage.

Doug Coupar, editor of the newspaper, is paid $75.00 per week at his full-time job.

The student council refused to raise the salary after Coupar told them he was taking the matter to the Labour Relations Board. Council was confused as to whether the editor's stipend was a salary or an honorarium.

An earlier complaint dealing with Unemployment Insurance benefits, filed by last year's editor, resulted in a BC Labour Relations Board ruling that the money constituted a salary.

Will Finance Anti-Calendar

BURNABY (CUP) — A motion proposing that the Simon Fraser University Student Council finance a course "anti-calendar" received good response from members September 23.

The motion, presented by arts president Ron Miller, called for a university wide calendar containing guides to course materials, available resources for the courses, and the attitudes of professors and teaching assistant's involved with each class.

In the past, various representatives of student unions have submitted a subjective evaluation of their courses and professors, but Council questioned adequate student representation in such procedures.

It was agreed that volunteer help to carry out the project would not work.

Miller's estimated cost, including labour, was $9,700. Office coordinator Pat Barter contended that at one dollar for each student there was no question of the anti-calendar's worth.

"The only reason such a project has not worked in the past is due to its incomplete turnout as a result of volunteers doing the work. A paid staff would be far more efficient," she said.

Another meeting has been arranged to further discuss the proposal.

"For me, good food and a good beer go together. That's why I ask for Heineken. It's all a matter of taste."

History To Repeat Itself; Blues Head for 10-1 Season

Game Statistics generally describe the closeness of the action in any sport. Every once in a while, a final score does not correspond with the game statistics and consequently does not show the closeness of the action in a given contest. Such was the case on Saturday afternoon at Varsity Stadium.

The Varsity Blues lost their second game in as many years on Saturday to the Ottawa Gee Gees, a team of probably equal ability.

The game was a close contest with Ottawa piling up 445 yards to Toronto's 370 yards. The final score was 38-16, a lopsided score as the result of Ottawa capitalizing on virtually every break they received. The Gee Gees entered the game wanting a win after being embarrassed twice by the Blues' last year. Concentration was the name of the game and it was obvious that it was first on the Gee Gees menu late in the week as they practiced on Hart House field in a solemn and serious manner.

During the game Ottawa played the type of football that no team can play twice. They made very few mistakes none of which caused them any major problems. Jim Colton, the Gee Gee quarterback had the day of his career completing 14 passes on 16 attempts and running for a touchdown. But the mainstay of the Ottawa offence was the fact that the players completed their assignments as prescribed in each individual play.

Toronto did have their hands full.

The Blues were by no means inferior, although the bad breaks they were plagued with did make it appear that way. The defensive secondary could not play as tight as they would have liked to because of field conditions. The result was that the Gee Gee receivers were able to cash in on touchdowns early in the game thus offsetting the Blues' before they could get their momentum going.

The Blues' offense didn't have too bad a day. They picked up twenty-one first downs while Ottawa got twenty three. What many fans wanted to see however was the offence gamble on third down situations in the third and fourth quarters. The question asked by some fans after the game was why Branchley hadn't been used instead of Langley, after Langley proved inconsistent especially later in the game. "Langley choked at the College Bowl last year and he choked today. Hell, Ackley and Ince were in the clear a couple of times and Langleyover-through them. Why doesn't Murphy try Branchley in the clutch, at least just to see how he does," said one unhappy fan.

A main problem which the Blues' encountered was that they weren't tackling or blocking well enough. This isn't surprising since they were playing 'underdog' football from the second quarter onward.

The fact remains that the Blues' had a bad game. Every team is entitled to one every year. The players haven't lost heart, and the coaching staff is—if anything—optimistic. It has been said that it is healthy to learn from your mistakes. Head coach Ron Murphy seems to have admitted to have erred. He believes that his pre-game scouting wasn't complete. "Things will be different next time," said Murphy.

'Next time' the teams meet will presumably be for the Eastern Division Championship. That game will be played on Nov. 8. History will repeat itself. Last year, the team that lost the U of T Homecoming game won the College Bowl.

Workers stage "illegal" work halt

By ERIC McMILLAN
Library workers walked off the job for two hours yesterday despite a warning from the library administration of possible disciplinary action.

Reacting to a Varsity report of the planned walkout, Chief Librarian R.H. Blackburn circulated a notice to library staff Monday stating the work stoppage would be "an illegal strike" and participants could be subject to "disciplinary action and loss of wages."

Two hundred and fifty members of CUPE 1230 ignored the warning and walked out Tuesday at noon to hold a "study session" and take a straw vote on strike action.

They had planned to meet in the Medical Sciences Auditorium but CUPE 1230 leader Judy Darcy said U of T police reserved her with a letter which said reservation of the room would be cancelled unless the union could assure the room would not be used for "an illegal strike".

The union met instead in the Grad Student Union gym to hear CUPE national research director Gil Levine speak against the federal wage and price controls.

Levine called the guidelines "a trick and treat program", "a trick on the workers and a treat for corporations." He noted the 10 per cent ceiling meant workers with the smallest wages would get the smallest raises.

Levine said federal Labour Minister John Munro had told the CUPE National Convention in Toronto this week that contracts signed before January 1, 1974 receive "special consideration" and are not fully bound by the wage guidelines.

Blackburn's letter to library staff claimed, "there is no automatic exemption" for such contracts as the library workers', signed before 1974.

The union held an informal strike vote which passed almost unanimously. The vote was not binding since the union does not have a contract offer from the administration yet, but Darcy said the vote showed the library workers are prepared to strike if necessary.

Blackburn could not be reached for comment because he was out of town. Acting in Blackburn's absence, David Esplin repeated the walkout was "a breach of contract" but would not specify whether any disciplinary action would be taken.

CUPE 1230 vice-president Greg Collins admitted the study session was "an illegal strike under the fine technicalities of the law," but termed Blackburn's letter "an attempt at intimidation." Collins said he expected no firings or wage deductions as a consequence "because of the numbers here."

The letter to the union disallowing it use of the Medical Sciences Auditorium was signed by Jurek M. Tusiewicz, Director of Statistics and Records. Tusiewicz later denied he was acting in consultation with the library administration.

Tusiewicz said he was acting on his own initiative after reading Monday's article in The Varsity. He claimed the auditorium cannot be rented by political organizations, only university, cultural, and educational organizations. "We've never had the situation before with people wanting to use it for a strike," he said.

Book delayed due to "gutlessness"

By GENE ALLEN
Toronto publisher James Lorimer has charged the Social Science Research Council of Canada (SSRCC) with "a fairly conscious effort to frustrate and delay" publication of a controversial new book in the field of Canadian economic history.

The SSRCC distributes funds to subsidize the publication of academic work in the social sciences. Since few academic books stand to recover the costs of publication, the SSRCC's awarding or withholding of grants determines to a large extent which books will be published and which will not.

The work in question is Tom Naylor's Economic History of Canada 1867-1914. Naylor is a professor of economics at McGill University.

Manuscripts being considered for SSRCC grants must be evaluated by two readers. If the two readers disagree, the manuscript is submitted to a third reader.

In Naylor's case, the first two readers produced completely opposite evaluations. The third reader agreed that the manuscript merited publication and even compared it to Canadian economic historian Harold Innis' work. (The first reader made the same comparison.)

However, the SSRCC stated that these evaluations could not be taken as conclusive since "all three of the present readers, to a greater or lesser degree, have allowed ideology to intrude in their scholarly assessment." Further evaluation of the manuscript was required, the SSRCC stated.

Lorimer and Naylor protested to SSRCC Publications Officer Howard Riddle. Lorimer stated that "the third report, in the normal course of events, would have settled the matter." Riddle later replied that the three-man Publication Committee had recommended the SSRCC support be provided on the basis of the three reports. But a further letter from SSRCC executive secretary John Banks said the SSRCC would not support publication until further evaluation had taken place.

Riddle said in an interview the Publications Committee had originally decided to recommend a grant by a vote of two to one. Before this decision was relayed to the SSRCC executive for final approval, however, one of the committee members changed his mind, and the decision was reversed. Riddle found himself in an embarrassing position, to say the least, since after the first vote he had written Naylor and Lorimer to inform them of the Publications Committee's favorable recommendation.

When asked if the political views expressed in Naylor's book had anything to do with the delay and confusion, Riddle said "That is something our own committee would deny most strenuously."

"We want to make sure the decision is not based on political considerations, but on the quality of the manuscript," Riddle said.

But Lorimer believes there are only two possible explanations for the delay, irregularity and confusion which have surrounded the decision on Naylor's book.

"It's either just plain gutlessness and cowardice on the SSRCC's part, or there's some political thing going on," Lorimer said. The SSRCC's actions are "contrary to the attitude they should have." Lorimer wants the matter reconsidered on the basis of the existing information (that is, the three readers' reports, two favorable and one unfavorable). Furthermore, he thinks there should be an investigation of how the SSRCC's grant procedures operate.

Meanwhile, the fate of Naylor's manuscript rests in the SSRCC's hands.

"It looks as if more than an invisible hand is involved in the marketplace of ideas"

Appeal will continue

The appeal of Henry Fong, started last Friday, will continue Sunday, Nov. 2 at 10 a.m.

Fong was expelled from U of T medical school last year in his fourth year of study. The Committee Against Racism, supporting Fong in his appeal, is attempting to prove that there were elements of personal and racial prejudice in the decision to expel him.

Friday's testimony included submissions from former instructors of Fong maintaining that he was a competent student and his knowledge of medicine was "adequate". Letters submitted by Medical Associate Dean Jan Steiner from other instructors, one of which Fong had had personal disagreements with, were less complimentary.

Fong maintains that an unjustified attack on him by one member of the faculty was passed on to others and blocked any chance for a fair evaluation of him as a student. Included also is a charge that his racial background was a factor in his expulsion.

The hearing will continue with a cross-examination of Steiner by CAR member Peter Rosenthal. He will question Steiner on the charges of personal and racial prejudice in assessment procedures in the medical school.

Internal wants money explanations

By MIKE EDWARDS

If Arts and Science Students Union (ASSU) wants the university to collect the extra two dollars for their expanded operation they may have to account for their activities to the Internal Affairs committee of Governing Council. Last night's meeting featured a debate over incidental fees, and what to do if the student organization requests an increase.

In this particular chapter we find Law professor W. B. Coultas asking "What we want to know is what the students are doing with their money." He was trying to justify his previous statement "We want to find out if they know what they're doing."

The case in point was a set of guidelines governing an increase in student incidental fees which are set by independent student organizations (such as ASSU).

The guidelines begin with an innocent request for "evidence that the request to change the existing fees has been authorized by due constitutional process of the organization."

However, the guidelines go further into the area of financial control by requiring an audited statement of last year's accounts, a budget for the current year and a short outline of why the money is needed.

The main rationale for any concern at all was in the area of financial responsibility. Since the university collects and disperses the incidental fees, it wants to know that the money is not being put to "wrong" uses, in the words of University VP Frank Iacobucci.

A letter prepared by SAC president Gord Barnes conceded that the Internal Affairs committee could check out referendum results and audited statements but drew the line about what the organization was planning to do with the money.

However, both of the previous requirements are standard business practice performed continually by other sectors of the university money machine, says Internal.

Woodsword college principal Arthur Kruger got everyone hot under the collar when he asked why the university has to collect the fees in the first place and whether students could 'opt out'. He claimed that his point was much more substantive.

Lay appointee Gordon Fisher and other members were definitely uneasy at the "oversensitivity" of students to the issue but continued to insist that the university "retain the right to overlook the funding of the university" since "most students feel that incidental fees are part of the overall costs of education."

The debate continues.

CUPE slams wage and price controls

"The people that have given you the War Measures Act have now given you wage and price controls."

Speaking to a convention of all campus locals of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), researcher Rick Deaton attacked the federal guidelines and told delegates they had to be seen in their broader context.

"It is a policy basically to protect the profit margin at the expense of workers," he said.

Deaton said the previous 18 months had seen a profit transfer of $1,800 to each worker and that wage and price controls was a method to shift this money back to profits.

The guidelines were also implemented, he suggested, because the real standard of workers incomes had increased faster than the rate of production.

Even when controls were instituted in the second world war, Deaton said, workers made tremendous gains in fringe benefits. However, under the present controls fringe benefits are included in the costing of any raise, he explained.

Deaton termed the three tier enforcement mechanism as one of "draconian fines and prison terms."

A few possible methods of circumventing the guidelines were mentioned by Deaton, including:

- mandatorily paid but not worked overtime.
- break down of the 10 per cent maximum pay raise into five compounded two per cent raises.
- a conversion of hourly based pay rates into weekly or monthly salaries and a reduction in the work week.

"Cupe locals have a responsibility to provide strong leadership and strong leadership in the education field, Deaton said, adding "locals should feel free to bargain in non compliance with the guidelines."

Chairperson Judy Darcy, president of the U of T library workers local, said controls required compliance from a large proportion of the population for them to work and stressed most labor rights were won by defying the law.

Darcy called on CUPE's national organization to help back up individual locals and to not leave them in isolation, promising U of T library workers would stick to their original demands in their present contract dispute with the administration.

Following discussion of wage and price controls, the convention passed three resolutions for presentation to the CUPE National Convention calling for CUPE and the labour movement to refuse to accept wage and price controls, now or in the future; to organize a national one day work stoppage within 2 weeks; to hold a protest demonstration during the National Convention and to call upon individual locals to take action against the controls.

Leading off a discussion on women in the university, Deaton said daycare and maternity leave are an "accepted fact" in most union negotiations. "Women are being promoted to jobs traditionally held by men," he said.

Quebec field representative Pierre Dupuis outlined the continued discrimination against women. He said in most cases women are discriminated against in groups.

He singled out career advancement as a hidden source of discrimination. "Are the office employees tied to their jobs?" he asked of CUPE leaders who are hoping to negotiate pro-women contracts.

Other delegates outlined specific problems encountered by women. At the University of Montreal, the base rate for daycare is $35 a week compared with $110 salary for most office workers. The University of Saskatchewan is having difficulty hiring staff at low wages dictated by government subsidy levels.

It was noted that women who suffer disability usually find themselves without long-term coverage in most insurance policies. The government and insurance company rationale for differing retirement ages was also challenged.

Delegates were urged to bargain for health fringe benefits paid wholly by the company. Women workers, who are making low wages tend to vote against any medical benefit that entails a further reduction of their salary, they were told.

Morgentaler rallyists demand release, collect $2800

By BOB COLLIER

Abortionist Henry Morgentaler is still incarcerated in a Quebec prison hospital but the fight to release him is stronger than ever.

A cheering crowd of 750 men, women and babies demanded Morgentaler's release at a protest rally and benefit concert in Convocation Hall Sunday night and together collected over $2,800, almost $2.50 per person, in voluntary donations to support him in his continuing battle with the Canadian legal system.

Pierre Berton pictured Morgentaler as a victim of "political persecution" and black feminist Florence Kennedy accused the federal government of "niggerization" because they have passively watched as religious bigots humiliated him.

Eleanor Pelrine, his biographer, lauded "that compassionate man" as a "Canadian folk hero" and Stringband, Dee Higgins and Kathleen sang protest songs in his support.

Morgentaler has been forbidden from public speaking by his lawyers but biographer Pelrine read out a personal letter that she had just received from him in hospital.

"I rocked the boat and shall suffer for it," Pelrine read from the letter.

Morgentaler described himself as "burning with resentment and impotent rage" at the unfairness of the Canadian judicial system which has sent him to jail for 18 months, broken his health and ruined him financially.

He has already finished the first third of his eighteen month sentence but parole has been refused for bad behaviour.

"Hardened criminals have easier parole than me," he wrote to Pelrine and "I have no chance for the privileges normally accorded to prisoners."

Even after he finishes his sentence, a year from now, he still faces an additional ten charges for similar offences.

Even though multiple criminal offences are usually tried together with sentences running concurrently, Quebec courts will neither press the other charges nor dismiss them. Morgentaler wrote, "The crown is in no hurry to proceed and are holding the threat of prosecution above my head."

Morgentaler is now bedridden, having suffered a heart attack brought on by guards whom he said humiliated him publicly and then threw him into solitary confinement. Because of the other ten charges, the government has frozen his personal savings and impounded all his medical equipment.

Pelrine told the crowd Morgentaler already owes his lawyers $200,000 in legal fees and can't raise more money to fight for his release.

Pierre Berton angrily charged that the Canadian judiciary are playing "a cat and mouse game with him. He is being treated worse than a sleazy back alley practitioner," Berton told the audience.

"Morgentaler was charged for one crime but he'll face the same charges again. He'll probably be charged a dozen times more," prophesied Berton.

Morgentaler's case has angered legal experts all over Canada and will change the criminal code because his acquittal by two different juries was overturned by superior appeal courts. "Even so," Burton added, "he was refused a pardon by Otto Lang," the former Minister of Justice and a Roman Catholic father of seven.

The keynote speaker, Florence Kennedy, the American civil liberties lawyer who founded the Feminist Party, received a standing ovation for her poem, "C is for Canada."

"C is for Canada, con game, chauvinism," Kennedy recited, "C is for a court system going down the drain; C is for concentration camp and Canadian incarceration."

She ridiculed anti-abortionists who she poured scorn on the termed "foetus fetishists who lose interest as soon as the child is born."

"C is for child care and for compulsory parenthood, yet anti-abortionists are the first to complain about welfare."

"It's a wonder we don't have more battered, unwanted, unloved babies," she added.

Protesters have demanded an end to Morgentaler's imprisonment.

ASSU will get its money

By DAVE FOLKES

In these hard times of inflation, St. George campus Arts and Science undergrads have voted by an overwhelming 87 per cent to support a $4 increase in their tuition fees, all in an effort to keep the Arts and Science Students Union (ASSU) alive.

ASSU will lose a $2 per student rebate from SAC at the end of the school year, and the referendum, held last Wednesday and Thursday, sought student support for a direct $4 ASSU levy which would be added onto their fees. The levy must first be approved by U of T Internal Affairs.

ASSU was created by SAC two years ago in order to co-ordinate

Arts and Science course unions and union activities, such as course evaluations, forums, and social events.

The increase from $2 to $4 is necessary, according to Jean Greatbatch, ASSU's field worker and its only paid employee, "because of a 75 per cent inflation in paper costs." As well, the number of course unions, originally five, is expected to rise to twenty by the end of the year.

There was a voter turn-out of approximately 14 per cent.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Why all the stalling?

No one will disagree with the observation that the negotiations between the university and its workers in the libraries have been unduly protracted and hardly friendly. It is apparent that the university does not think it has the available funds to meet the contract demands, but the workers will not accept this explanation. Their reluctance to believe this stems from the opinion that if the university cannot find the money to pay its workers decent wages, then it is not using its funds correctly.

The distance between the two sides nonetheless does not explain the current stall in negotiations, and the rumor mill is working full time to fill the explanation gap.

One of the more sinister, yet still one of the more plausible, explanations is that the university is attempting to push proceedings to a point where possible strike could take place only over the holidays, at the earliest, or in January. This would avoid the inconvenience of closed libraries during the exam and essay crunch late next month.

Related to this is the suspicion that the university may be using the situation as a lever in the continuing talks with the provincial government on the financial crisis. The spectre of a university stumbling along without libraries because its workers will no longer tolerate poor wages may bring tears to the eyes of provincial ministers and a Christmas present, as the analysis goes.

Now you might say that anything the university can do to get its point across to the government will in the end be beneficial to everyone on campus including, eventually, the library workers. But if the university is indeed manipulating the situation this way, a far more important question arises: why would the university have to resort to this sort of move? Are their regular appeals to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities falling on deaf ears or does the fault lie with the university's ability to properly state its case?

Dr. Evans has been quite strident and sincere in his speeches to Governing Council about the severity of the situation, but it's easy to growl on your own home ground. The question is, do the university people maintain that anger when they meet at Queen's Park? Is there proper detailing of all the areas that government parsimony affects?

The administration might argue that in government circles there is no place for good old-fashioned outrage, but possibly it might take a solid shoe-pounding over at the ministry to educate the Queen's Park people in the realities and complexities of post-secondary education. So far the ministry's only apparent approach to the whole topic has been anti-intellectual, headed towards reducing the university to instruction in the 3 R's.

If the university is in any way pulling the strings in the library situation, it should in all justice stop immediately and push for a quick settlement. It might indeed be a good way to pressure the government, but the university will quite rapidly lose any credibility among its workers. It has pledged, even in these slim times, to maintain salaries at a respectable level, and this must apply to every member of the university community. A just wage settlement must be arrived at quickly.

Native people in the middle of pipeline land grabbing encroachments by Euro-Canadian civilization, not as a surrender of their land to the federal government.

Instead of following the honourable course of admitting the problems with the treaties and recognizing the aboriginal rights of the Indians (and Inuit in the Mackenzie delta region), the government has elected to fight the principle of Judge Morrow's decision on a few piecemeal technicalities in an appeal court case which opened in Edmonton last summer. In contempt of all native peoples, the government has delegated to its regulatory agency, the NEB, the right to consider granting of right-of-way over land which may still be owned by Mackenzie Valley Indians and Inuit.

Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Judd Buchanan has attempted to divert public attention from the issue of aboriginal rights by talking of his Cabinet mandate to settle Mackenzie Valley "land claims" along the lines of the Quebec government's treaty with the James Bay Cree. Buchanan is not interested in settling land claims but in working out a schedule of compensation for the lands which the government claims the Indians surrendered in treaties 8 and 11. Though both treaties were concluded more than fifty years ago, only the recent northern resources stampeded has motivated the government to consider compensation. Buchanan refuses to consider the fundamental issue of the validity of Indian claims to ownership of the land, apparently because an honourable recognition of aboriginal rights could lead native peoples' associations to entertain ideas of retaining the rights to their land in perpetuity.

The government's determination to base the treaty compensations on the James Bay model destroys whatever appearance of bargaining in good faith may have survived the rejection of the aboriginal rights concept. Despite a vague mention of allotment to natives of some revenue from future hydroelectric developments, the James Bay treaty is basically the same deal which governments have always negotiated with Indian bands: land for money and hunting, trapping, and fishing rights in delineated areas. Assuming Mackenzie Valley natives will be forced to accept treaty compensation rather than recognition of aboriginal rights, their negotiators can hardly be expected to accept this type of deal rather than one based on the settlement recently concluded by the United States with the Alaska Slope Native Association, the generally progressive character of which is indicated by its provision for channelling of funds from state mineral revenues into regional corporations controlled by the natives. Judging from its insistence on a James Bay type of settlement, the government apparently desires to bid its time until the Indians and Inuit, cornered by the pace of events in the northern resources grab, have no alternative but acceptance of the terms offered.

The Cabinet's decision to proceed with the NEB hearings before Justice Thomas Berger has made his recommendations on the conditions which should be imposed on construction of a pipeline is one further indication of the government's contempt of the concerns expressed by the natives who have testified before Berger. In order to properly assess the pipeline applications, the NEB must have at hand the criteria which will be provided by the Berger inquiry.

In view of the problems still outstanding, the opening of the NEB hearings on the appointed date of October 27 can only serve to exacerbate tensions between Mackenzie Valley natives and the government. However shrill the voices of Canadian Arctic Gas and Foothills, the government must not offer energy supply problems as an excuse for dishonourable dealings with Mackenzie Valley natives.

Save a tree, kill the Varsity

To the Editor:

We wish to protest the recent proposed spending cuts. We feel that the priorities are wrong in that in lieu of non-spending for the University Health Services there should be total non-financial support of the Varsity. We feel that the warrant continued financial support. People have been known to stay away from football and hockey games because they can read all about them in the Varsity. Many of the reports on happenings would be of no interest to anyone — if people were interested, they would be taking part in their activities. Also, the notices regarding upcoming events can be found in many of the colleges and major buildings; thus Here and Now is also not necessary. Furthermore, the Varsity wastes paper! After all, "Save a tree, kill the Varsity."

By AMANDA HANSON

After the provincial elections this fall, Premier Davis made major changes in his cabinet. Three weeks ago, Dr. Harry Parrott, dentist and MPP for Oxford county, was appointed Minister of Colleges and Universities.

In the following interview the minister may have overstated the case. The answers have been condensed for space reasons.

Q. What do you think your qualifications are?

A. In my instance I was a totally untried political person prior to my election in '71. I was not a high profile Tory. I knew no one in 1971, it took a while to get to know people. But I think you've got to look at how the Premier forms the cabinet first.

He's got to look at his available material. You know he had fifty. He's got to look at the jobs he has to fill. I think one of the most important jobs he had to fill was the Chairman of the Management Board (Now filled by James Auld, Mr. Parrott's predecessor).

Once he had said, "who do I need in Auld's chair," then maybe my qualifications did start to show: I had an academic background and I knew the ministry.

B. I've mentioned to various students I was going to interview you, and the first thing they want to know about are OSAP loans. Are you reviewing the system?

A. When you have a committee (The Advisory Committee on Student Financial Assistance) and all of a sudden you become the expert you should do one of two things: decide that the committee shouldn't be around any longer, or you should wait. We're working under the umbrella of the Canada Students' Loan Plan that curtails what I can do even if I had total power.

Talking with minister from rags to riches

In many senses, we can be more stringent, but we can't be more lenient, because of our cost sharing basis.

Q. You're expecting the committee report on Oct. 31? Do you have any ideas of what your findings will be?

A. No, none. An interesting aside — I wanted to sit on that committee as a parliamentary assistant and quite frankly, with some justification, they thought that if I did, perhaps, it would put it out of balance, lose some perspective, and so I never did sit on it.

Q. Who is sitting on it now?

A. I should know and I'm sorry I can't give you those details.

Q. What do you think of the charge that the university process discriminates against lower income people?

A. I sit in the minister's chair today — and don't over react to this statement, but it's background to the answer — thirty-five years ago, I was pumping gas at 15c an hour.

Here's a guy with his dental degree, his specialty degree, who is the Minister of Colleges and Universities, whose father was a Royal Mail clerk.

What other alternative do I have, but to believe that the opportunity is there if you want to use it? It isn't a system for the rich.

Q. All fall the U. of T. library workers have been planning to go on strike because their wage demands have not been met. The university claims it is in great financial trouble. Now, my question is, is the administration getting their point across to you about budget cutbacks?

A. Well, you see, I haven't been able to accept the word "cutback." Let me phrase it very simply. If you said to me next year, to go to university, and you're my child, I need $3,800. And I say, last year you had $3,000 now I'm prepared to give you this year $3,400. Have I cut you back? No. Now that is precisely what has happened on a large scale. We gave a 16.9 per cent increase.

Eleven years ago, the province spent one billion dollars — all of the government of the province of Ontario. Last year in this ministry alone we spent a billion. There comes a time when you say, that's enough of what there is available.

Q. Are you going to resume construction on Community College campuses?

A. Don't think so. Recognize the fact, if you will, that per capita, we had twice as many institutions as the Americans to the south of us. For every million people we have twice as many institutions.

Q. What were the original purposes of the community colleges?

A. I think they fill the big gap between the academic world of a university and the uh... I don't like the word "practical" world. I think you get hung up on the elitism bit. Not all of us can be dentists. The need for a dental assistant is just as great as it is for a dentist, but you don't need university training to be a dental assistant.

I may go so far some day to say within an academic community there maybe is a place for a university which is totally dedicated to the excellency of academics.

Don't equate that to elitism. Don't say "better than". I've never considered myself "better than", because I was a specialist. I just had more training.

Q. I have a question from the Ontario Federation of Students.

A. Who are they? And if you quote me on that I'll kill you (laugh).

Q. There has been some talk about students who pay tuition serving as free labourers — for example, radiologists in hospitals. Do you think the apprenticeship type system is fair?

A. Well, I don't think the basic purpose of going to school is just to get training. But at the same time, why should you go to school in one area and then throw it away.

I don't think that because we say we'll graduate a number of people in one area that we have to say as government we must supply that many jobs.

Now there is a responsibility for us to keep a balance there as well, but it's awfully hard to make a decision today for five or eight years in advance of how many jobs we're going to need in a given occupation.

Q. Back to the question though, the idea of apprenticeship isn't offensive to your way of thinking?

A. To me? Oh, sorry, I may have missed your point. No, I'm tremendously interested in the work experience of Universities. I like the Waterloo bit of four months in, four months out.

Q. But those students are paid during their work terms. What I'm getting at are the students who are not, who work as part of their degree. You wouldn't call this scab labour?

A. No I don't think so. If that was the sole intent, yes, I guess you could. But that's part of their basic training.

Q. Do you think an opposition party would make significant changes? Would we wish for the return of the good old days of Tory leadership?

A. Just let me say your perspective really changes once you're in power.

Homosexuals — Healthy, Sa

Questions Your Mother Couldn't Answer

Reprinted from "The Sheaf", student newspaper at the University of Saskatchewan.

1. WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO BE GAY?

Being gay is the capacity to relate to or have feelings for people of the same sex. These feelings can be emotional, mental and physical or a combination of all three. These feelings can range from just thinking about someone to having an outright relationship with someone. Being gay means more than relating to genitals, it means relating to people.

2. WHO ARE GAY PEOPLE AND WHERE ARE THEY FOUND?

Sexuality can be defined in terms of our experiences with people and our feelings for them. Dr. Alfred Kinsey in the late 1940's and early 1950's studied the range of human sexuality. According to Kinsey 37 per cent of American men have had at least one gay experience to the point of orgasm and 13 per cent were predominantly homosexually oriented. For women the percentages were 20 per cent and 7 per cent respectively. This would indicate that approximately one out of every three people has had a gay experience and one out of ten is predominantly gay. Kinsey developed a scale to explain the continuum of human sexuality and the majority of the people studied fell somewhere other than either end.

Gay people are generally not distinguishable from non-gay people. A study at the Clarke Institute in Toronto in 1971 found that gay people can be found in all professions and cut across all class lines.

3. IS HOMOSEXUALITY "AGAINST NATURE"?

Biological researchers agree that homosexuality is almost universal among animals, and that it becomes a frequent form of activity among highly developed species. Similarly, anthropologists and historians report that there is no human culture from which homosexuality has been absent.

Anthropologists C.S. Ford and F.A. Beach surveyed 76 contemporary societies outside the west and found that in 64 per cent of their sample, "homosexual activities of one sort or another are considered normal and socially acceptable for certain members of the community." They also discovered that in a significant number of cultures, such as Africa's Siwan tribe, homosexual acts and love affairs are expected or "required" of 100 per cent of the adult male population.

4. IS HOMOSEXUALITY SOCIALLY DESTRUCTIVE? HAS IT ALWAYS ACCOMPANIED DECADENT SOCIETIES?

The Persian Empire declined quite nicely along with strong anti-homosexual taboos. Homosexuality flourished freely at the zenith of the Roman Empire, but the decline was accompanied by an increase in anti-homosexual restrictions. Homosexuality thrived during the heights of Periclean Greece, Renaissance Italy and Medieval Japan. And some cultures in which homosexuality has been accepted, like those of certain African and American tribes, neither rose to nor fell from world dominating heights. The acceptance or non-acceptance of homosexuality had nothing whatever to do with the rise or decline of any culture.

5. IS HOMOSEXUALITY A MENTAL ILLNESS?

In his famous Letter to an American Mother, Freud stated categorically that homosexuality "cannot be categorized as an illness." Later, some of his followers challenged that view, and their works have become the most "popular" material on the subject. The trend is again reversing, and a great number of present day psychiatrists side with Freud. In 1973 the American Psychiatric Association removed homosexuality from their list of diseases.

The illness theorists say that homosexuality is the symptom of a larger disease, and the essence of their assertion is that all of their homosexual patients are disturbed. No doubt this is true, say their opponents, but all of their heterosexual patients are disturbed as well.

Dr. Evelyn Hooker, head of the National Institute of Mental Health Task Force on Homosexuality, showed psychiatrists tests of homosexuals to a panel of clinicians who could not distinguish them from those of heterosexuals and found no greater incidence of mental illness.

Dr. George Weinberg, a New York psychiatrist, who has done a lot of work with gay people states that the real problem in our society is not homosexuality but homophobia, the irrational fear of homosexuality by our society.

6. DOES OUR SOCIETY DISCRIMINATE AGAINST GAYS?

Discrimination, both subtle and overt, is a common experience for gay people. Many of the laws of this country openly encourage discrimination against the gay community.

It is still illegal for gay people to visit or immigrate to this country although the government passed legislation in 1969 removing gay love from the Criminal Code. It is still illegal for anyone under the age of 21 to express their love for another person of the same sex while the age of consent for heterosexuals is 16. The Federal Government exempts gay people from employment in certain sections of the Civil Service and from the Armed Forces even though thousands of gay people have served and died for their country. Certain sections of the Criminal Code are used exclusively against gay people who are open about their sexuality.

Nowhere in this country is there any specific protection against discrimination for gay people in Human Rights Legislation. Gay people commonly lose employment or housing if their sexuality becomes known or is even hinted at.

Perhaps the worst form of oppression and discrimination is the demand by many people in our society that we be allowed to live our lives in our quiet and do not "force it down their throats." What heterosexual would like to have to go through life denying his or her sexuality. What heterosexuals would want to have to deny that there is anything going on between them and their husbands, wives or lovers? What heterosexual would stand and listen as someone cracked degrading "het" jokes? Most would not stand for a system that forced them to deny their very existence.

Only Eunuchs Can Be Trusted

By CHRISTINE BEARCHELL

For the past couple of years the gay liberation movement in this country has been campaigning for the inclusion of the term "sexual orientation" in provincial human rights legislation in order to ensure legal protection from discrimination for homosexuals. One of the problems that this campaign has encountered has been a reluctance on the part of officialdom to clarify the exact nature of the present legislation.

Politicians have declined to support these efforts, claiming that gays were included in the laws by prohibition of discrimination based on sex. Commissioners on review bodies, particularly the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC), have been quick to express concern for the homosexual victim of discrimination but have stated that they are powerless to act under the present laws. These difficulties have been compounded by the absence of an airtight test case with which to challenge the politicians, the commissioners and the courts.

On February 7, 1975, John Damien, a former steward (judge) for the Ontario Racing Commission provided the gay liberation movement with just such a case. The fact that Damien was in the employ of the Ontario Racing Commission, a body which is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government's Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations gives his case added weight.

In a public statement issued after Damien's dismissal, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association summed up the significance of this: "The community expects the public sector to provide leadership and to set an example. For this reason, the impropriety which has been committed in the Damien case must be rectified."

Elsewhere in their statement the CCLA points out that Damien was fired solely because he was homosexual. His employers are quoted as saying that they could find no fault with Damien's abilities or his record. The statement examines the Racing Commission's claim that the fact that Damien is gay placed him in a conflict of interest position and concludes with a question to the Commission chairman: "How could Mr. McNaughton avoid the inevitable consequence of his rationale — only eunuchs can be trusted?"

Since last February there has been some important progress in the defence of John Damien. The Committee to Defend John Damien has grown to include many groups and individuals representative of the civil liberties, gay and student movements. Recent activities of a defence have included a demonstration and rally held September 13 in conjunction with the Ontario provincial election, and the circulation of a brief to the OHRC prepared by Harry Kopyto, Damien's lawyer, which requests that the term "sex" in the code be re-interpreted to include sexual orientation. As a result of the positive response the Damien Submission has received so far, the OHRC has agreed to a hearing of the brief on October 24.

The Committee's current activity centers around mobilizing support for the Damien Submission to culminate in a rally on October 23, in anticipation of the hearing the following day. Doug Wilson, University of Saskatchewan lecturer who is fighting a similar case, John Damien, and Damien's lawyers will be the featured speakers. In addition, short remarks will be delivered by some of the Submission's endorsers. The meeting itself has been endorsed by many individuals and organizations including: Sam Fox, president of the Metro Toronto Labour Council; Robert Fulford, editor of Saturday Night; U of T SAC; Reverend Grey of the Unitarian Church; and lawyers Charles Roach and Clayton Ruby. The meeting will take place at 8:00 pm on October 23 in the Medical Sciences Auditorium at U of T. Everyone is encouraged to attend.

Lesbians and Gay Liberation: A Feminist Perspective

By CHRISTINE BEARCHELL
Queen Victoria refused to sign legislation making lesbianism illegal in Britain in the late 1900's. Her perhaps dubious rationale for this insistence was that "things like that just didn't exist" under her dominion. Erroneous as such a notion is, it was, until the rise of the feminist and gay liberation movements, probably quite widely believed by most of the population. Even today, to the casual observer, both the gay community and the gay liberation movement may seem to be exclusively male phenomena. There are important reasons why lesbians haven't until now constituted the vocal and visible sector of the gay movement that they ought to have.

Throughout history there have been many homosexuals, both male and female and both "great" and "small". Unfortunately it has been only "the great" who have dared acknowledge their sexual orientation — and even then considerable risk. It is also a sad fact that by and large "the great" have also been in the overwhelming majority male. These facts shed light on two things. First, they explain the popular misconceptions that lesbianism was and is virtually non-existent. Second, and more important, this illustrates the fact that lesbians are primarily identified and oppressed as women. Lesbians therefore face an additional oppression to that of either homosexual men or heterosexual women.

Historically, for lesbians, the pressure to marry and have children has been even more stultifying and agonizing than it has been for "straight" women. The lesbian has faced the same lack of control over her body and life; the same domination by husbands, brothers and fathers; and the same poor quality or complete lack of both women and employment as every other woman. But add to that her inability to conform to society's ideal of what a woman should be — the propaganda that she is sick or unnatural (or doesn't exist) because of who and how she loves — or wants to love. She is taught that serving a man is infinitely more important than what she wants to do with her life — that it is her duty, as it is the duty of all women, to serve others even if she must suffer, and to keep silent about it. And all the while she is kept within the isolation of the home and family — either a husband's or a father's.

As womankind as a whole has rebelled against the oppression and sexual stereotyping of women, lesbians have helped win and benefitted from many of these struggles. But, though much has changed to improve the lot of gay women in our society, much of that oppression still remains.

Homosexual women still face all of the anti-gay propaganda, bigotry and discrimination that all homosexuals face. And they still face many of the obstacles that all women still face. Because of the double nature of their oppression, it is at times more difficult for lesbians to stand up for themselves and their rights.

This same society that forces many women to bear children that they don't want has also often denied lesbians the children that they have already borne and very much want. A woman, or even two women, who must live on "women's wages" live in a very precarious world financially. A lesbian with children must often not only support them on "women's wages", but may also have to try to qualify and pay for child care as well. Add to this the fact that should such a woman become known as a lesbian there is a very good chance that she will be without wages at all — and without any recourse to legal protection from this discrimination, even if she could afford it. The prospect of losing their children, their jobs, their places of residence, their family and friends and even their lovers keeps most gay women within the restricted confines of what gay liberationists call "the closet".

Because her sexual orientation is something which a woman can conceal, though at great cost psychologically and because lesbians are primarily identified and oppressed as women, it has been the initial reaction of many gay women to direct their attention to alleviating those aspects of their oppression that they share with all women. It is for these reasons as well as the fact that the feminist movement has proved a safer refuge from male chauvinism than has the gay liberation movement that there are relatively few lesbians active in gay liberation.

Gay and Lesbians: Victims of Prejudice

discrimination against homosexuals.

Faced with immediate and growing disapproval over Doug's treatment, Dr. R.W. Begg, President of the U. of S. was forced to hold a Press Conference on October 1.

Dr. Begg claimed the decision was not a "moral" one. He stated that not allowing a known homosexual to supervise practice teachers is merely "standard policy".

In fact, he said, it was a "managerial" decision.

Elaborating, he said that the only discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation he has made has applied to dons in residence. But, he added that he is sure many faculty members and staff are gay in any case.

Indeed, since Kinsey's findings (see: Questions Your Mother Couldn't Answer, on this page) were published more than 25 years ago, many of us acknowledge that homosexuality does exist in most sectors of society. In stating the obvious, Dr. Begg did not explain why he nevertheless chose to discriminate against particular members of the university community.

The President seemed to believe that relations between the College of Education and the Saskatoon Public School Board would be impaired if it was known that a homosexual worked with teachers.

Horrors! Perhaps a successful instructor and well respected person like Doug might even lead the young innocents to a life of depravity.

Really, Dr. Begg. How likely is it that even such a worthy model as Doug Wilson could persuade his students to adopt a homosexual life style?

Despite the intense and insistent heterosexual socialization to which we are all exposed in this homophobic society, gay people insist on pursuing their own natural feelings.

The majority of people are heterosexual inclined, it seems. An admitted homosexual instructor is surely not going to be able, even if he wished to try, to persuade that mass of persons to change their sexual orientation suddenly.

It is only reasonable to expect that people, whether heterosexually oriented, or interested in bisexuality, are going to come to terms with their own desires themselves.

People's opinions can be manipulated. Basic sexual orientation, however, cannot be controlled.

Perhaps people like Doug Wilson can convince people like Dr. Begg that Kinsey's continuum is not a threat to them. Will Dr. Begg learn from the national publicity resulting from his discriminatory policy that a person's sexual orientation does not necessarily effect his or her professional competence?

Apparently Dr. Begg approves of the classic "closet case", that is sexually starved individual who is afraid to admit his or her actual sexual feelings because of society's negative sanctions.

Not only are such people forced to be furtive about their sexual desire, but the national expression of their whole personality is constructed.

Quite apart from sex, a simple demonstration of affection between two persons of the same sex is socially taboo. Is this also a policy of the College of Education?

Surely in a world marred by misunderstanding and violence, love and affection among us should be encouraged, not stifled.

A double life. A secret personality. That is what the closet case is forced by society to accept.

Are furtiveness and deceit the kind of values that our educational institutions are trying to inculcate in the members of this society?

Dr. Begg has stated clearly that Doug Wilson is being refused permission to supervise practice teachers because he is known to be gay. In effect, Dr. Begg is approving of dishonesty and encouraging people to live a lie to conform to antiquarian values.

Dr. Begg, Queen Victoria is dead. Long live the Queen. But the age of her successor, Dr. Begg, is that of a cultural revolution, of an increasingly widened women's movement, of an uncomfortable awareness of economic disparities, class revulsion, and racism that exist in this supposedly egalitarian society . . . yes, and of gay liberation, too.

Dr. Begg, people are no longer willing to tolerate discrimination. In his press conference, the President feared what he anticipated would be a negative reaction in the Saskatoon community if a known homosexual was sponsored by the College of Education. Yet such a reaction has not occurred.

Quite the contrary, the vast majority of letters in both the student newspaper, and Saskatoon's daily have been supportive of Doug.

In two weeks, more than 1,500 people signed a petition demanding that the Dean's decision be reversed. Secondly, they demanded that the U. of S. declare in principle their opposition to the practice of discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation.

Student councils of universities throughout the West have passed resolutions supporting Doug. At the annual National Union of Students conference in Fredericton last weekend, a motion was passed urging students councils across the country to express their disapproval of Dr. Begg's stand by writing to the president.

For the first time in the history of human and civil rights commissions in this country, the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission has agreed soon after the disagreement to hear a case based on the wider definition of sex, including sexual orientation.

In contrast, in Ontario John Damien has had to wait about 8 months before the provincial Human Rights Commission agreed to hear his complaint.

In addition the annual meeting in Saskatoon of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour passed a resolution changing their constitution to end discrimination on the grounds of marital status and sexual orientation, referring to heterosexuality, homosexuality and bisexuality.

Saskatoon: Support for Gay

By JOHN B. ARGUE

Doug Wilson is demanding his rights.

The Dean of Education, supported by the President of the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon has denied those rights because Doug has admitted publicly that he is gay.

Doug is a full-time graduate student at the University, and is responsible as well for teaching two full credit courses in the Teacher Training programme. Having completed two years teaching in the public school system, Doug also has one year of experience teaching at the University.

His high recommendations in both the public schools and at the University convinced his department at the College to offer him as supervisor of practice teachers in the city.

The Dean refused to consider him. He had learned that Doug was active on campus in trying to organize a Gay Academic Union. In other words, he discovered that Doug was known publicly to be gay and feared that the city of Saskatoon would be scandalized.

In fact, the Dean only hypothesized that such a reaction would materialize. His only indication for such a belief was his own fear. The student newspaper on campus reported to the contrary that a speaker for the city's Public School Board had stated publicly that a teacher's private life was of no concern to the board.

By a special petition to the University Council, 30 faculty members have forced a special meeting of the Council to be called within two weeks to consider

The growth of both the gay and women's liberation movements has seen a much wider discussion and acceptance of homosexuality as a valid and positive aspect of human sexuality. The ability of lesbians to "come out" of the closet is greater with each new gain that these movements make. At the same time, feminism has become widely discussed and understood among male gay liberationists and there has been a corresponding depreciation of male chauvinism within the gay movement. For instance, the gay liberation movement in Canada has both participated in women's liberation activities and won the support of women's liberationists for its activities. Both movements have supported John Damien and Henry Fortenberry in their respective struggles and have adopted the demand for equal custody rights for lesbian mothers.

More and more lesbians are recognizing that they have a stake in the struggles for homosexual civil rights and gay liberation. It is the same sexism — this society's enforcement of its sexual norms including the family, socialization and sex role stereotyping that oppresses their gay brothers and all women.

Federal W&P controls no good.

By MATHILDE VERHULST
 "Freedom in our country will suffer irreparable damage" if the federal government's economic legislation calling for wage and price restraints is enforced, former prime minister John Diefenbaker warned Monday.

Diefenbaker called the new bill "a mare's nest of despotic bureaucratic powers" that will build up a "vast conglomeration of snoots which is all-powerful and virtually above the law."

The 80-year-old MP was speaking to more than 900 people at a Canadian Club of Toronto luncheon held at the Royal York Hotel.

Calling it a hodge-podge of impossible complexity — "I've read it a dozen times and still don't know what it means" — he said the legislation gives such power to the anti-inflation board set up under the bill, it can "punish what the individual has done that contravenes the guidelines either in fact or in spirit."

He said an appointed administrator has the right, with a warrant, to search a person's premises and make arrests, and prosecute if he is satisfied "that there has been a contravention of the guidelines or that the guidelines are likely to be contravened."

"What manner of aberration is this?" he asked. "You can be prosecuted for anything that contravenes the spirit of the law."

"This bill in its present form will de throne freedom far beyond what is necessary in the public interest," he said. During the three years and two months the legislation will be in force, it will permit the government to add provisions whenever it sees fit, "with Parliament being powerless to bring about a change." "No despot, power-hungry person or bureaucrat could ask for greater powers. After three years with these powers, freedom in Canada will be a dream for years to come, for even after it ends, its effects will continue."

Diefenbaker also criticized the prime minister and his cabinet ministers for not practising personal restraint.

In 1975 the salaries of members of Parliament have greatly increased, the prime minister's by $20,000, the opposition leaders' by more than $15,000.

He also said that while prime minister Trudeau was asking Canadians to practise personal restraint he "was also making it clear that overall federal expenditures will not go down but will remain at the $30-billion mark." Diefenbaker said the bill is already creating provincial division in Canada, with British Columbia saying it will not support the guidelines and Quebec announcing it will set up its own review board.

"Couple this legislation with the War Measures Act, you have the most terrific authoritarian government this country has ever seen."

If the bill comes into effect, he said "there will only be two kinds of Canadians left: those in jail and those rest waiting."

It is the addition of strangeness to beauty, that constitutes the romantic character in art, and the desire of beauty being a fixed element in every artistic organization, it is the addition of curiosity to this desire of beauty, that constitutes the romantic temper. When one's curiosity is deficient, when one is not eager enough for new impressions, and new pleasures, one is liable to value mere euphony too highly.

.. so Dief offers crime control

By CHRIS DU VERNET
Former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker called for the establishment of a "national crime crusade" under the direction of the Minister of Justice in a press conference yesterday.

The remark came in a press conference yesterday to publicize his new autobiography, "One Canada".

Diefenbaker also called for stiffer gun control laws and more responsible use of parole as a means of rehabilitation, rather than "an invitation to crime."

Referring to recent increases in crime in Canada, "5 per cent of the population have committed a crime," he said, "never was there a greater need for a crusade" when "gun-toters have open season."

In the course of the conference he was asked for his impressions as a "living legend". He replied "I don't know anything about that." "A legend is a thing of the past, and I am still a man of the future."

In discussing wage and price controls, the upcoming Progressive Conservative party leadership convention and Quebec's Official Languages Act, Diefenbaker said, "We no longer have one nation, but we have a federal parliament with ten municipalities." "That is not the Canada of my dreams," he added.

The wage and price controls would be ineffective, he believed, because they "won't apply to all Canada." British Columbia has already indicated they will not comply with the measures. "There is no declaration of a national emergency which is necessary to have them be effective."

The upcoming PC leadership convention was a particular source of concern to Diefenbaker. With a $150 registration fee for riding delegates, he charged that the PC party will "become a party of the elitists."

"No party has the right to determine the elimination of anyone as a candidate" on financial grounds, he said, pointing out if he had run today for the leadership, he would not have been able to afford to be a candidate.

"When you place candidates on the altar of expenditures, then you will indeed eliminate some who would otherwise have been qualified."

The official Languages Act of Quebec, which makes French the only official provincial language for communications and immigrant education was "wong, disruptive, and a contradiction of one Canada, one nation," Diefenbaker felt. "When the great abiding principle of Confederation can be set assunder by any province as if the BNA Act did not exist," it can only disrupt this nation, he said.

Before answering questions, he emphasized his concern about crime. He attacked the federal government for creating a situation where "the criminal knows he will get out shortly" after being convicted and sentenced. While attempting to introduce a bill to Parliament that called for possession of a gun for an unlawful purpose to be punished "by up to five years (in prison) during which time the criminal would not be subject for parole," Diefenbaker said he got "nowhere".

He charged "There is no seriousness in government today." He concluded by paying tribute to Beryl Plumtre, former chairman of the Food Prices Review Board.

"Everything she said was true," said Diefenbaker, "only when she spoke out, the government decided some action should be taken."

You want to change the system.

But you don't think you have the bucks.

The system in question is your present stereo.

What's happened is that you've developed a more discriminating ear.

What once sounded terrific suddenly doesn't sound so hot.

And what never sounded like the sibilance way behind the rhythm guitar is now a veritable pain in the cochlea.

You're ready to upgrade. But you worry is that moving from stereo to true high fidelity is awfully expensive.

Well, it can be. But it doesn't have to be.

Hitachi has just brought a new line of equipment into Canada.

Good looking, recent poetry, high quality, high fidelity.

With specs you'd expect to find at a much higher price.

The name of this new line is Lo D, the result of over three years' research that specifically focused on the listener and his needs. (What is the range of his hearing? Is he capable of catching the lowest and highest notes? Or is he limited to the middle range?)

Hitachi scientists measured these individual listening reactions by testing over 5000 people in Hitachi's sound labs. Then, the results were mathematically tabulated and converted into a unique Sound Design chart.

Called ESP for its investigation of Emotion, Sensation and Physical Characteristics, the Hitachi hi-fi report was the genesis of Lo D.

When you hear its brilliant sound, and look at its brilliant price, you'll discover Lo D is quite an achievement.

The kind of achievement that suddenly makes it easier for you to improve the system you're living with now.

The kind of achievement that has made Hitachi a world leader in electronics.

Canada proposed as OPEC member

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau is incapable of decreasing inflation according to Hardial Bains, Chairman of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist).
 "To say Canada is in the grip of serious inflation is a distortion," he told the audience of 150 at a meeting in Sid Smith Monday night. He was referring to the report federal finance minister Donald MacDonald released on October 14, 1975.

Bains challenged Trudeau to take up a serious program to fight inflation. The oil companies should be nationalized, and Canada made a member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), the amount of finance capital in circulation should be reduced and profits should be decreased, according to Bains.
 However, he quipped if Trudeau were to take up this program he would be calling for a proletarian revolution.

The Canadian people should take up the slogan "Make the Rich Pay and Defeat the Government", he said.

The fact that U.S. imperialism dominates Canada results in the fact that the production of raw materials is the main concern of Canada. Over 99 per cent of oil and gas in Canada are controlled by the U.S.

He pointed out that inflation is caused by the international oil crisis, out of which the U.S. oil corporations make huge profits. The increase in the price of oil is the cause of the high cost of living from 1973 to 1975. Trudeau not only will not touch the price of oil, he actually increases it. The price of oil has gone from $6 or $7 a barrel to $13 a barrel, Bains said.

He went on to say the controls were perpetrating a fraud that the government would control profits. They assume the rate of profit before 1974-75 is legitimate, he said. Bains pointed out the report tries to confuse incomes and wages, and make the rise in prices appear equally dependent upon wages, capital and dividends. He said that wages and incomes are not equivalents.

Bains said in a capitalist country, wages are determined on the basis of maximum profit for the capitalist and that they are the means by which the capitalists exploit the worker.

In a socialist country like China, said Bains, wages are determined on the basis that the people must be fed, and not on the basis of exploitation.

UFW records Delano victory

Overcoming seemingly impossible odds, the United Farm Workers (UFW) emerged the victor in union representation elections in Delano, California.

The Delano victory has special significance because of the particular historical role of the area. It was in the Delano vineyards in 1965 that the first major strikes were conducted, strikes that established the UFW as a force in agriculture.

And it was in Delano in 1973 that thousands of strikers were jailed, hundreds were beaten by deputies and two were killed.

Elections have now been held at all the major grape ranches in the area. The balloting was accompanied by grower violence, widespread illegal arrests, firings of pro-UFW workers, the flouting of election procedures and a lot more.

While the UFW organizing drive continues in Delano and other parts of the state, the main election focus will be shifting down to the Imperial Valley near the Mexican border, Prize winning professor Doctor Linus Pauling, who for years has said that massive doses of the vitamin helps to ward off colds and has no ill side effects.

where the lettuce harvest will be coming in.

Meanwhile in Toronto, the Grape and Lettuce boycott still continues. UFW officials need the continued pressure of the boycott to solidify their gains in California. Contracts are still not signed and thus the boycott is still on.

Most of the full time organizers for the UFW have gone to California to help with the elections so the union is looking for people to help sustain the boycott in Toronto.

Mike Lacinak, the present director of the Canadian boycott, hopes to find some people at the university who "might be tired about reading about social change and want to get involved."

Organizers are paid their room and board costs in addition to a salary of $5 a week.

An information table will be set up in the lobby of Sid Smith between 10:00 am and 1:00 pm today and all this week for all those interested.

Vitamin C risk?

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) Researchers at Columbia University are warning that people who take massive doses of Vitamin C may become anemic.

Doctors Victor Herbert and Elizabeth Jacobs report their studies indicate that large amounts of Vitamin C destroy Vitamin B-12, the nutrient which promotes the development of red blood cells. People who lack red blood cells, they say, become anemic and prone to infection.

Your lucky star: Weekly horoscope

ARIES — Jive with a friend on Fri and Sat. Your sunny air charm will dazzle. Don't push your luck on Sun. edit that essay, it's the shits. You paid too much for it anyway. Try writing your own, be creative.

TAURUS — Escape academia briefly on Sat. Visit old buddies, take a hike in the woods, clear your head and forget yourself. Seek release, get rid of that twisted perspective on life. Don't overspend or you'll be breaking that piggy bank on Sun.

GEMINI — Express yourself till Fri. Start the essay due last week, speak out in class, tell a prof. what you think of him-her, then drop the course. Look for extra bucks on Sat., good prospects for parnhanding, picking up tricks or selling a paper on pigeons to a SOC 100 student.

CANCER — Fantastic period for getting higher marks. Marx' theory of imperialism becomes clear. You might pass this course. Be creative, host a party on Sat. Treat old pals to your supersimms cooking Sat, forget the chicken livero. Sun: be ultrasadistic about an affair, whither it's kosher or not.

LEO — Get in touch with relatives on Sat, news should be terrific. Mother has put your favourite cookies in the mail. While you rake leaves on Sun, think about dropping out and joining a commune in Pickering. It's time for a career change.

VIRGO — Watch your health - your tummy can't take those curried shrimp. Be kind to your chums, they'll be glad to help make signs for the library strike. Don't start tap dancing classes, concentrate on your ballroom finesse. The Hart House Ball is only two months away.

LIBRA — Look for a part-time job on Sat, now that you've exhausted your measly OSAP funds. On Sun, don't tell who you spent the night with. The smashing person you meet on Sun is probably full of crap.

SCORPIO — Organize yourself and your money on Sat. Forget past fiascos and take a positive approach on Sun. Cooperate with family and chums - curb your tongue, be tactful. Your birthday's coming up and you want them to think you're nice.

SAGITTARIUS — Before you negotiate on Sat, be sure it's not a bum deal. That nice little room for $100 a month has cockroaches. Look out for your health and safety on Sun. Avoid long trips, drunken soccer matches, violence-thirsty weirdos and little old ladies with morals and umbrellas.

CAPRICORN — Go out with your baby on Sat. Defeat financial decisions on Sun. Don't lend a pal your hard-earned dough. Chances are he/she doesn't really need the complete Woody Guthrie collection right now. Instead, start a bluegrass band. Fill up that fiddle case with silver at Bloor and Avenue Rd.

AQUARIUS — Feel free to tell your zany tales, uncensored, till Fri. Such a wiz, you could even improve SAC seem exciting. Improve Dec. on relationships on Sat, entertain heavies, give Dr. John a call. Have a long leisurely brunch on Sun, a good shot of rye and hang loose. Stay clear of argumentative people.

PISCES — Romance is everywhere. Get out, boogie, hustle. Don't be so timid. On Sat night don't guzzle the usual scotch with 12-pack chasers or the 3 hot sandwiches at Mother's. You won't feel too well on Sun anyway. It's a day to stay home with the alka seltzer. Stay clear of UFOs.

SMC Lacrosse B Team Defaults

In any sport when a team does not 'field' enough eligible players, or it does not comply with the prescribed rules governing starting requirements or procedures, it falls into a state of default.

Default is not a furry little animal roaming the wilderness in search of food and warmth, nor is it "de-fauld of de-driver dat he had de-accident". No sir-ee. Default means something different in almost every league in most sports.

In Interfaculty athletics, for example, there are different rules for default in almost every sport. In Intermediate hockey defaulting any game results in ejection from the league. Colleges are warned against default because entering a team which defaults will cause a college to be heavily penalized by point deductions from the Interfaculty sports point race. (Reed Trophy).

In Interfaculty Lacrosse, default is not uncommon. Default causes automatic loss as well as a condition of probation for the offending team.

If a team under probation defaults a second time, they are ejected from the league, and their college is heavily penalized in the Reed Trophy standings. At the present time, one team in Division II is being dropped from the schedules while a Division I team is on probation.

The team receiving the boot is the St. Michael's 'B' team. The team on probation is the Devonshire Dukes.

Devonshire House for many years had a team in the 'A' division, until last year when they didn't enter a team due to lack of interest. This year they re-entered the league but 'lack of interest' once again seems to be feverishly present. Should they encounter any further problems, it is very likely that they will have to throw in the towel and join the ranks of the hundreds of spectators lining the gallery of the lower gym in Hart House during the mid-week.

The St. Mike's 'B's' have had problems all year long. From the very beginning, the 'A' team from the college had been undecided as to which players they wished to keep on their roster and which players they wanted to register on the 'B' team. The result was a gradual disintegration of interest among the players whom the 'A's' had caused to be neither here nor there. This had come about as a result of the 'A's' bid for a first time ever Dafeo Cup championship. The 'A' teams 'import coach', himself not being from U of T, was not familiar with the fact that interfaculty sports were for fun, exercise and the sake of sport, rather than just a means to an end.

Thus at present, there remain several lacrosse players who are still interested in the sport, although they are either not of 'A' calibre, or they are not agreeable with game strategy as adopted by the 'A' coach.

In about one month's time, when the Dafeo Cup champions have been decided, this article will be complete. An SMC victory would perhaps salvage some of the interest lost throughout the season. A loss would ruin lacrosse chances at the college for some years to come.

Hockey Rule Changes

Every year hockey seems to be turning into a more violent sport, as noticeable by the increased number of injuries and the seriousness of those injuries.

William R. McMurtry, headed the commission for the "Investigation and Inquiry into Violence in Amateur Hockey" which was concluded in August of 1974. At that time it was too late to change many of the rules in the C.A.H.A. Rule Book and so the changes were made in the spring of 1975. Among them many changes resulting from the commissions recommendations are several which are listed below. The rule changes listed below represent some of the most common situations occurring in hockey.

Rule No. 17: The visiting team must be the first to place any playing line-up on the ice to commence play at all times. Each team is allowed only one change of player(s) during a stoppage of play.

Rule No. 23 (d): A goalkeeper shall remove his face protector for purpose of identification, if so asked by the referee.

Rule No. 24 (e): A match penalty shall be assessed any player who grabs any part of the facial protector or of the helmet chin strap of an opponent.

Rule No. 24 (f): A match penalty shall be assessed any player who uses his facial protector as a weapon.

Rule No. 27 (a): Penalties are divided into the following classes:

1. Minor penalties.
2. Bench minor penalties.
3. Major penalties.
4. Misconduct penalties.
5. Game misconduct penalties.
6. Gross misconduct.
7. Match penalties.
8. Penalty shot.

Rule No. 30 (f): In minor hockey any player, including a goalkeeper who is assessed a Major Penalty under the following rules shall be assessed in addition, a Game Misconduct Penalty: 53(b) and (c), 59(a) (i) and (ii), 64(b), 65(b), 72 and 82(b). The major penalty shall be assessed by any player of his team who was on the ice at the time of the infraction. (Note: (The above infractions are as follows: cross-checking, fighting, high sticking, hooking, slashing.

Rule No. 31 (a): A player except a goalkeeper, incurring a "Misconduct Penalty", shall be ruled of the ice for a period of twelve minutes actual playing time.

Rule No. 31 (d) (i): A Misconduct Penalty, a Game Misconduct Penalty or Gross Misconduct Penalty shall also carry with it a two minute minor penalty which will be served by a player of the penalized team designated by the coach.

Rule No. 48 (b): Players who engage in head butting or hair pulling in the course of a game shall be assessed a Match Penalty in addition to any other penalties.

Rule No. 53 (b): Any player who strikes an opponent above the normal height of his shoulders with a cross-check shall incur a Major Penalty whether or not injury results.

Rule No. 59 (a) (iv): Any player wearing ring(s), tape or any other material on his hands who becomes involved in a fight or altercation shall be assessed a Match Penalty in addition to any other penalties he may incur.

Rule No. 63 (d): Contacting the puck with the stick above the normal height of the shoulders is prohibited and when it occurs play shall be stopped immediately and a minor penalty shall be assessed the offending player.

U of T Women's Track Team Brings Home 2nd Place

By JANET FLETCHER
Small Team—Big Performance
A small team of U. of T. women turned in some big performances at the O.W.I.A.A. track and field championships at Sudbury last Saturday to place 2nd to the large McMaster team.

U. of T. athletes performed strongly in all the running events, and dominated the longer distance events. Unfortunately the field 'team' consisted of one athlete, and it was in this area that ground was lost to the Mac. team.

Toronto sprinters Anne Perkin and Bev Kratoski ran consistently well with Anne taking 3rd place in the 100m and 4th in the 200m, and Bev winning the 200m and placing 3rd in the 400m. Caroline Hebblethwaite was another busy sprinter, running the 400m, in which she placed 4th, and the lead legs in both the 4x100m and 4x300 relays.

The 800m and 1500m races were two of the most exciting events of the day. In the 800m Geri Ashdown ran a clever tactical race to defeat her team-mate Lesley Evans. In the 1500m Sally Beach managed to hold off Brock runner Kathy Prosser who finished very strongly. Evans also turned in a solid performance in this race to finish 4th.

The highlight of the day's competition for the U. of T. team was the 4x400m relay. For the third consecutive year Toronto won the race in record time. This year the team of Hebblethwaite, Ashdown, Beach and Evans left the opposition far behind.

SAC budget promises $15,000 deficit

By JOE WRIGHT

SAC last night approved its 1975 projected operating budget of $348,520, a slight increase over last year's total of $341,431. The budget plans for a deficit this year of approximately $15,270.

SAC finance commissioner Michael Treacy said he was generally satisfied with the budget. "I'm not too worried about the deficit," he said, "I think this is the year we can afford to spend it."

Treacy said approval of the budget ran relatively smoothly, and said "The only thing I didn't like was that the Varsity budget wasn't chopped."

The only substantive discussion came from a motion to reduce the Varsity budget. It was argued that the Varsity ad revenue budget should be revised upwards to reflect past year's incomes and to reduce the Varsity's SAC grant from $42,325 to $40,000. Following a fifteen minute discussion the motion was defeated.

SAC president Gord Barnes said he thought the budget "went smoothly" and said "I think Treacy did a hell of a lot of work and it's a presentable budget." Barnes said the anticipated deficit "shows we're tight."

SAC funds are collected mainly from the $14 student fees as well as a few incidental sources such as interest, rentals and any profits from SAC functions.

The largest SAC outlay comes under the Executive commission, $75,546, which includes salaries, office expenses, insurance and legal fees, including an anticipated phone bill of $4,200. The executive budget also includes a small increase under building improvements for some interior renovation for the SAC office.

SAC services commission's budget was approved at $62,085. The largest expenditure was $25,000 for Project Aid which includes grants to the Campus Legal Assistance Clinic, the Toike Oike and Erindale newspaper Medium II. Orientation was budgeted at $12,000, an increase from an anticipated $8,000. Treacy said there were a lot more projects this year and "thought it was worth it."

Treacy also said the $5,000 outlay for concerts would have been higher except for the administration ban on rock concerts in Convocation Hall. "We usually spend more but get it back."

Communications Commission received $44,300, a reduction from the spring projection of $78,865, chiefly accounted by Input Radio's delay in obtaining a license.

Radio Erindale and Radio Scarboro received $3,700 and $3,800, an increase of approximately one dollar per student at the satellite campuses. The student directory was produced for exactly the $2,900 allowed, with the handbook expenditure reduced to $4,335, down from the projected $5,000.

External Affairs spending was up slightly at $21,490. Treacy said this year SAC increased the amount of external grants. The grants may include money for Alexandra Park health clinic to be staffed by U of T students. External expenditures also included $500 for election expenses, $250 of which was spent in SAC's efforts to enumerate students and, according to Barnes, $250 "in the eventuality of another provincial election."

Spending for Internal Affairs education costs were also increased slightly to $22,435. This was chiefly accounted for by an increase in education grants, Treacy said. "It's well spent, they need it."

SAC vice-president Michelle Harvey is a little mystified. While the SAC office was being painted last weekend, someone with sticky fingers made off with parts of her files containing among other things, the results of the recent housing survey. She said the theft looked "fairly selective."

Any leads will be gratefully acknowledged.

Tenants fight for students

By GREG RICHARDS

The Federation of Metro Tenants Association is holding a weekend conference at the Medical Sciences Building "to make very clear to the provincial government legislative reform tenants have in mind", says Federation executive Lina Chartrand.

SAC is co-sponsoring the Tenants' Rights Conference because housing-problem plagued students, who it believes are not aware, should be well informed.

"Students are exploited a lot, being forced to put money into substandard housing", said Chartrand.

Conference workshops and a panel debate will discuss thorny issues of fair rents and the security of rental tenure.

The Federation's tenants' rights program calls for rents to be frozen as of January 1974, allowing rent increases only in proportion to a rise in landlords' costs, and tenure security to protect "tenants who use their rights".

"The tenant who is evicted is usually being retaliated against for seeking further rights — the one who phones the building inspector, the housing or the health inspector", said Chartrand.

"Tenants didn't reply to the provincial government's recent newspaper advertisement concerning housing and rents because of the certainty of retaliation," she claimed.

The Federation plans to meet with representatives of the provincial government next week, and will submit a brief of resolutions adopted at the conference.

The Federation, which unites various groups such as the Parkdale and Spadina Tenants Associations, and the Toronto Island residents, is expecting aldermen Dan Heap and Reid Scott to join them at the conference. The provincial government should empower municipalities to enact more housing measures according to the Federation.

"One mechanism should deal with eviction and standards of buildings — the problems all go together and should be dealt with together", said Chartrand.

At present, jurisdiction in housing control is split between provincial and municipal governments.

Free passes for U of T students, and more information concerning the conference are available at the SAC office.

SAC office may be sold for scrap to offset budget deficit.

Federal controls to apply to universities

OTTAWA (CUP) — The applicability of the federal wage and price restraint program to universities and colleges depends on the reaction of the provinces, according to the Anti-Inflation Review Board here in Ottawa.
But, if the provinces agree to participate, not only will wage and salary increases be restrained. Tuition and residence fees, as well as other educational costs, will also be allowed to increase only in accordance with the federal guidelines.

"Education is strictly a provincial matter" a spokesperson for the Review Board said on October 15, "but we are asking the provinces to co-operate in the federal program whether by participating directly in the federal plan, or by setting up their own matching systems."

The spokesperson said the federal Review Board intends to establish a "Public Sector Panel" consisting of appointees from the provincial and federal governments. This federal-provincial body will have the power to monitor and control wages and prices in the public sector.

If a province chooses not to participate in the operation of this enforcement mechanism, it will be asked to establish its own administrative device to ensure the guidelines are followed.

So, unless a province opts out of the restraint program altogether, and no matter which enforcement mechanism is used, the federal guidelines are intended to apply to all colleges and universities and their employees.

Waterloo proposal for teaching 'confessor'

WATERLOO (CUP) — A proposal made to the University of Waterloo Undergraduate council calls for the university to hire a person who would be "a confessor to those who have problems teaching."

Bruzstowski said, "visiting their lectures and criticizing the method of presentation, by reviewing their course material, and by bringing methodology to their attention and instruction them in its use."

The resource person would also have other duties, said Bruzstowski. Those duties would include instructing new faculty and teaching assistants in teaching methods, advising on the latest teaching evaluation techniques, and maintaining a liaison with the student federation.

Officially, UW faculty association President Jim Stone, said he would prefer to consult with his executive before commenting on the proposal. But later he said, "I would welcome it, and I'm sure most of the faculty would agree with it."
Student Federation president John Shortall called the proposal "a great idea" and said he saw it "as an admission by the administration that something has to be done in teaching and learning."

Houses will come down for new gym

"I can get more response from Meridian, Cadillac, and Greenwin than from the university," Alderman Allan Sparrow told a Ward Six residents' meeting Tuesday night. He also charged that U of T president John Evans has "hedged" about future university expansion.

The residents were meeting to plan their opposition to a recently passed by-law which would allow the building of an athletic complex on Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street. The by-law is to go before the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) for provincial approval on OMB.

As Sparrow was comparing the university to developers, U of T planners were completing for the OMB a report recommending the demolition of buildings on the proposed site.

University administrator Randy Grimes revealed last night the university study found it "not feasible" to move the buildings to another site as had been suggested.

The university was also required by the city to submit any assurances it could make regarding future expansion on the north-west campus. Grimes said the report specified no final plans and further study would be necessary by both the city and the university.

Sparrow advised Sussex-Ulster area residents to put pressure on city council to control future expansion in residential areas. He called U of T "a very powerful institution" which "has been careful to wine and dine the mayor and planning people."

He noted Mayor Crombie is running for the federal leadership of the Progressive Conservative party and is not accessible to residents or aldermen, although the university "has the ear of the mayor and executive council."

"This council will always go along with the university," he said. "When Alderman Heap and myself tried to get council to give some protection to the (Huron-Sussex) neighbourhood, council did not agree."

Isme Bennie, president of the Sussex-Ulster Residents' Association, repeated her charges of political pressure to push the athletic complex through. She questioned whether the university should be expanding when it faces falling enrolment over the next twenty years.

Other residents raised the questions of destroyed housing, increased parking needs caused by the complex, and the hum of ventilating systems used in large buildings. The 25 residents, including a few students, decided to petition the OMB with individual letters of objection.

On Monday the objections will be considered by the City's Building and Development meeting and the contested by-law will be brought before the OMB.

Parker under attack but denies stalling

By BOB COLLIER

Library workers are having a tough time winning concessions from John Parker, Simcoe Hall's labour-management negotiator. He has spread negotiations over almost four months but has yet to make a major concession, according to CIPE 1230 president Judy Darcy. Darcy, the library workers' union president, said "He's good at his job."

Parker refuses to make an offer until the library negotiators lower their demands. "When they come down to the same planet," he says, "then we can talk."

Critics charge Parker's tactic is to wear down the library spokesmen until they lose patience and reduce their demands.

But Parker denies any attempt at stalling. He notes that the workers didn't show him their proposals until a few days before the old contract ran out last June. Negotiations could have started three months earlier, he claimed.

"The contract they drew up was full of imponderables that have no solution," he says. "We discussed them at great length but contract talks are a lengthy business and we can't expect anything too soon."

Parker claims the workers' pay demands are exorbitant, especially at a time when the university is facing severe budget restrictions. A starting library technician earns $5,771 a year, or $107 a week, and after working for three years rises to about $7,500 a year. The union wants the university to pay $11,000 to a worker with three years experience and corresponding percentage increases for other workers.

Parker maintains that the job requires very little skill and should not be highly paid.

"You don't have to be qualified to catalogue cards or shelf books," he says, "and many of the workers are over-qualified."

About one-quarter of the workers have BA's, according to Donald Smith, the library's personnel officer.

Parker claims the library should pay for the job performed not according to the educational qualifications of the employee.

The man responsible for hiring library workers, Donald Smith, says that a library worker is equivalent to a clerk-typist in rank and pay. The only requirements for the lowest position, a library technician-2, is "high school graduation with little or no previous experience," he says. Knowledge of one or more foreign languages and some typing experience is desirable.

The duties of a library worker include shelving and picking up books, card filing and other clerical duties.

But, library workers in the Toronto public libraries earn significantly more for the same job.

Parker is noncommittal on the subject of Trudeau's wage and price controls. "We can't guess how they will affect our negotiations until Premier Davis introduces legislation when the Ontario Legislature opens next week," he says.

The university is a provincial institution, under the jurisdiction of the Ontario government. But chances are slim that the university will escape the controls since Davis announced last week that he would support Trudeau's wage policy wholeheartedly.

Parker was very critical of the library workers for threatening to strike midway through negotiations. "We can't bargain properly with the threat of a strike over our heads," he pointed out. "That's not bargaining in good faith."

U of T negotiator Parker charges union bargains "in bad faith."

Mail moves with a little help

By SUSAN FERGUSON

During the postal strike if your mailman won't deliver during rain, snow or shine, the Inter University Transport Service (IUTS) will, at least for foreign mail.

Currently U of T Press runs an occasional commercial courier service to the United States. However at a cost of $1.50 per piece of mail this is more than what most people are willing to pay. The IUTS has decided to help out.

The IUTS operates a non-profit mail service every day to universities all over Ontario, including Brock, Carleton, Waterloo, Queens, Toronto, York, Laurentian, Western and McMaster. Their headquarters are on York campus, although not part of York itself. Books constitute their main delivery staple, but during the postal strike they will be helping universities get foreign bound mail out of Canada.

Alex Malcolm, Assistant Director of Services explained the IUTS would be accepting urgent, first class letters for delivery to the States. He gave as examples of 'urgent' as letters pertaining to grants and medical case histories that are traded between U.S. and Canadian medical students.

Malcolm said the IUTS will "try and con" some U.S. border university into setting up a postal box for delivering and receiving foreign mail.

Letters must be unsealed for customs reasons. The as yet unnamed border university will then affix U.S. postage and seal the letters. The university will buy the postage and bill U of T at a later date. When U of T accepts letters, they will bill the separate departments for their own mail.

Letters to U of T will be posted care of the American university. The IUTS will pick up from the postal box and make deliveries back to Ontario. On return, they will collect Ontario universities' addressed and unsealed U.S. mail for deposit at the border box.

Malcolm admits the system is "fairly cumbersome" and the university picked by the IUTS has a monumental task of picking up, receiving, licking and mailing ahead of it. However he is confident that once chosen, it will do its best to help IUTS until the strike ends.

So, what about this strike?

"When's the library strike coming?" is the question most often asked of Varsity cub reporters nowadays. Well, this cub reporter doesn't rightly know, but he's sure it won't be for a while yet.

First of all there are the study sessions and mini-strikes and what have you. They are supposed to be against the rules, but the library workers aren't worrying about that. Anyway they won't affect the date of the real strike.

Nothing can happen until after October 27. That's when the library negotiating committee and the G-Man John Parker talk over their differences with the Ontario government Labour Relations Board. The mediator George Markobitsch is supposed to listen to both sides and somehow keep the snafu down.

Eventually either one side or the other will get impatient, my bets are on the library workers, and break off the talks. Then it's Markobitsch's job to prepare a compromise solution agreeable to both sides.

This isn't likely to happen for a month at least; governments work awfully slowly. Assuming talks break down at next Monday's meeting, the conciliation report probably won't get written until late November.

The next step won't take very long. Either the library workers claim foul play and refuse to accept the offer or the administration does the same. Just like squabbling kids. Both sides may accept the offer, and in that case everybody goes home happy and we don't get a strike.

If the library workers refuse the compromise they hold a strike vote. This will take about a week, so that's early November.

If the worker's vote to strike, it takes a simple majority to do this, they take a 16 day cooling off period and then all hell breaks loose — strikes, lock-outs, pickets, sympathy slow downs and all the rest of it.

So the earliest date for a strike is likely to be December 1. Of course, endless frustrating delays are inherent in labour problems, so let's put the date back three weeks and you're bang on Christmas Day. Not the happiest day for those concerned.

Well, it's a long way off but unless somebody backs down soon, you'd better start saving up those books.

Etudiants Anglais organisent

MONTREAL (CUP) — Representatives of the student associations of Quebec's anglophone colleges and universities met October 4 and 5 at Loyola College to discuss common problems in the mobilization of students.

Discussion at the conference centered around the institutions' relation to the recently established Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ). At this time the Loyola campus of Concordia University is the only anglophone member of the association.

The conference's keynote speaker, Don Boisvert, former Loyola Day Student Association president, said that although structures were a necessary first step in creating an effective student movement, the association was in danger of falling into the same deadfall as had earlier attempts at mass student organizations.

As long as ANEQ has no ideology, and provides only

"bandaid" solutions to government policies, it remains only a reactive, institution, incapable of creative action."

ANEQ, which was formed out of last year's loans and bursaries dispute, hopes to "unite students in the broadest of possible fronts on the issue of student interests alone," according to Wahid Beylerian, a Universite de Montreal student and delegate to the association's founding congress.

Metro report aims to obscure

M-I-C-K-E-Y M-O-U-S-E. A rousing chorus and a mouskarasberry goes to the conceivers of Metroplan, a "Plan for the Urban Structure of Metropolitan Toronto", for their third volume in the series, "The Social Structure of Metropolitan Toronto."

Metroplan is an information-gathering and policy input program intended to help the present Metro Council arrive at its Official Plan. The third volume was intended to delineate some of the situations and problems of the present and forecast some of the future models for social structure in the city.

The report does none of these things. Instead, it presents a nicely-packaged 319-page outline of the beauty and serenity of old Hogtown and makes no attempt to outline the major issues in urban planning. It is almost phobic in its desire to avoid any controversy on matters such as housing, poverty, racism and social services.

Words cannot properly describe the eighth-grade approach of this document. The language is geared towards fourteen-year-olds and illiterate ones at that, and the entire manuscript is almost entirely unedited for grammar and style. It makes the most banal analyses and conclusions from the data and attempts to pass these off as a basis for some future planning. It is for the most part unreadable and seems to have no reason for being other than as a vehicle to bring relief to those politicians that it should have been attacking.

If this report is intended to influence planning decisions for Metro, we're in trouble. It presents a mass of information on a myriad of topics, but falls ungraciously on its rear end in fulfilling its analytical function. Among its startling conclusions are the opinion that the rich and poor of the city will not be comfortable living in the same areas and that racial harmony can be maintained through more provisions for soccer fields, a game that apparently crosses all racial barriers. That gem came at the end of a paragraph on the topic of ethnic integration and reads: "Probably a major contribution in this direction is the readiness of municipalities to make more adequate provisions for soccer fields, a game which is rapidly becoming a major sport..."

It should be sufficient to take a quick romp through some of the other hard-hitting analyses undertaken by Mr. Kumove and his company.

On the topic of the school systems, the report's first discovery was that "its universal role is that of maintaining patriotism and loyalty to the country..."

On racism: "Metropolitan Toronto proudly boasts that it is free of many racial problems... This may be true, but there is a complete lack of any discussion of the problems that do exist.

The family: "The family usually begins with marriage." On the growing number of singles in the city:

"For many years there has been a process called "dating" by which teenagers are expected to confront one another and to develop a system of emotional contact with members of the opposite sex."

And just in case you were thinking this could get out of hand, the report adds: "Popular journals to the contrary, there is no indication of major orgiastic or promiscuous behaviour on the part of young people."

Whew! A final vindication of this hopelessly lost, drug-crazed decadent generation of ours.

If all this sounds whimsical, one thing should remain perfectly clear, that Metro Toronto has squandered $30,000 by allowing Leon Kumove to produce this monument to the obvious. The document shows absolutely no commitment to the seriousness of the job it should have done. The report is sentimental and aimed at assuaging the consciences of the senior politicians who formed Metro. It has no use outside of its informational value, all of which could have been collected in a much simpler and less expensive way. It has been called a "whitewash" and a "con-job".

Metroplan: A very expensive piece of informational tinsel.

"Gibberish" isn't too far off the mark, either.

Everyone should have a copy of this rather expensive collection of gags and punchlines. We'll start by giving ours away to the first person to ask for it.

Hillel responds to Varg "plant"

To the Editor:

As The Varsity is not in the practice of covering Hillel student Council Meetings, one would have to assume that the article on "Masada" in the issue of Fri. Oct. 10 was planted to serve someone's best interest. Objective reading of that article readily reveals in just whose best interest that article was placed. So as to gain a more balanced idea of what went on at the Hillel meeting in question, the following points should be understood.

Firstly, the Hillel Student Council has been an Ad Hoc informal group of students who are interested in Hillel as a whole. Therefore anyone who attends the monthly meeting is allowed to vote. This was of course always open to the opportunity of stacking a meeting by people who had no other interest in Hillel than forcing through one particular piece of legislation, normally unacceptable to the majority of the student body.

At the particular Hillel meeting in question, the two editors entered with an entourage of their friends, none of whom could have legitimately be said to have been representative of the voice of concerned Hillel students. It was not the editors who got shafted at that meeting, but in fact the majority of Hillel students, who, overwhelmingly expressed disappointment and disgust at the issue of Masada in question and never would have thought that the meeting in question would have been transformed into the mockery of democratic process that the co-editors created. Students who expressed this disappointment in the issue, were simply wondering why $2,500 of their collective money was spent on a slick, glossy 14-page mass-circulated magazine which contained only one single original article.

Masada, which is funded by Hillel as the sounding board of Jewish student opinion and talent, has been transformed into a personal ego trip. Where is this editorial board they profess to have? Inquiring as to the possibility of setting up an editorial board of students with both editors — they each simply answered, "No we're not interested." Obviously, the editors of Masada are only interested in calling all the shots themselves. As concerned Hillel students we refuse to allow this to happen!

Essay services are "repugnant"

To the Editor:

It is time for The Varsity's board of governors and the SAC media commission to take a hard look at policy regarding advertising by term-paper factories. These so-called "essay services" are repugnant on moral grounds, and it is an insult to the university community that The Varsity accepts advertisements from them. The Varsity should rid its pages of ads from essay merchandisers. Research-only services are equally suspicious and should be banned. The usual rebuttals to this stand are both familiar and weak:

1. "They pay for the space like everybody else." Advertising pays for two-thirds of The Varsity's costs, so that argument is two-thirds valid. The other third of The Varsity's funds come from the activity fees of honest students, and go to the Varg via SAC. Why should honest students or SAC participate in this outrage? The Varsity, by printing the ads, appears to accept any means to an end, and appears to condone this violation of the academic code.

2. "Students will buy essays anyway, so what's the fuss?" Sure they will, but a student paper operated as a service to the campus is doing a disservice in helping to promote dishonesty. Aren't there enough bulletin boards where these people could reach their market, without using a SAC sponsored paper?

3. "Writing essays is a useless exercise. No one learns anything."

If that is so, then the issue should be taken up with professors and course unions. When students circumvent the system for their own gain, the quality of education degenerates. Perhaps grades and even degrees will become commodities available to the highest bidder.

I appeal to SAC to take this responsibility seriously. I appeal to students to write to The Varsity to express their opinion, or to phone the SAC and Varsity offices.

Brascan article was "pointless"

To the Editor:

I've always subscribed to The Varsity's dictum that any corporation with more than twenty employees is intrinsically evil, and hence worthy of whatever venom The Varsity cares to hurl. In the past, however, your puerile analyses have been at least technically correct — the selective use of irrelevant facts and impressive logic fallacies has added an illusion of careful research to the sophistries. In "The Brascan Connection" this fearless tradition of pointless yellow journalism was threatened; almost every fact that I was able to verify is incorrect.

To pick some random samples: Brascan's profits for 1974 were $US109.2 million, and not $139.2 million as indicated. Since net income in 1973 was $128.5 million it's hard to understand the statement that "To put it mildly, 1974 was a good year for Brascan". (Based on interim reports, it appears that 1975 income will be significantly lower than that of 1974.)

Brascan's electric utility revenue from Brazil in 1974 was US $799.4 million and not $118.9 million as indicated. Obviously this is one correction in favour of the article's slant since bigness is bad.

Skilful use of innuendo is always impressive. Brascan sells electricity to the industrialized southeastern part of Brazil rather than to the rural areas. Wow, I look forward to your expose of Toronto Hydro which shamelessly exploits the industrialized Toronto market rather than, say, Tomisasking. Obviously, if Brascan were a good corporate citizen it would hand out electricity in bottles to those mysterious "improvised masses" rather than help the Brazilian economy by pouring its profits back in.

Since you enjoy printing banal generalities, allow me to add my own. The average Brazilian is probably happier and prouder of his country than the average Canadian. Since there are five times as many of them as there are of us, surely you should re-examine your persistently patronizing attitude.

Jeffrey Sherman

Human Remains: is survival worth it once your cow's passed on?

A dark comedy examines the death of fantasy and what remains Human Remains is billed as a new comedy by Larry Fineberg and the dialogue though not the mood fits this description, except perhaps Danteishly. Director Stephen Katz and the actors fittingly avoid clever, witty stage business in this grim tale of three war or post-war babies struggling to mature via relationships, sexual and other.

In the first act actual and symbolic death is a repeated theme. Billy (Richard Moffatt) is saved or prevented from a nude, slashed-wrists, bathtub suicide in an unheated barn during a blizzard by the arrival of his two former lovers, Jeremy (Thomas Hauff) and Olive (Jane Buss), who are now living together and who have come to tell Billy of his mother's suicide. Billy's relationships have died, his desires to live and to work have died, even the cow that came with the barn has died. Finally, Billy's dreams die when he is forced to face reality, especially his mother's death. This coincides with the death of the bird which has been guanoing his skylight. The second act shows a coming back to life of the three. The situation is pain-filled for the characters (though the actors' portrayal of it is fairly painless for the audience). In dying and in living there is pain but in death there is only embarrassment. The three are certainly not embarrassed now, merely struggling to understand themselves and each other. Mystics have counselled the death of the Self — after this form of suicide, this death of fantasies, what remains is human.

Though they show some weaknesses near the beginning, the actors of this New Theatre production, housed at present in part of the Bathurst Street United Church, act their parts and they improve as they play progresses. They are aided by reasonable effects, and a deliciously grungy set. The dialogue, as also the acting and effects, has some shockers which tend to distract the audience from the writer's point. But you can look forward to laughing, jumping in surprise, and often sitting forward in your seat in interest and involvement.

Epidemic giggles from a monumental twit

It's Me Again
Donald Jack
Doubleday, $8.95

"Brevity is the soul of wit", wrote Shakespeare, whereupon he hunkered down and midwived comedies that have lasted for centuries. It is not a brief span — centuries can become an extended joke, and by the seventy-fifth year we long for the punch line — yet the wit remains, if not evergreen at least decidedly undecadent. So there is hope for the endurance of humour; buttressed in books against the ages, laughter rings eternal.

And here is humour, announcing "It's me again." It's very welcome; you roll out the red-rimmed eyes to meet it. There it is — a novel by a Toronto writer coming at you from all sides, the third volume in the continuous story of Bartholomew Bandy, horse-faced flying ace of the First World War. The first two volumes won the Stephen Leacock Award for Humour and the third will doubtless make Leacock double up in his grave. There it is, then, an innocent indictment of precisely Nothing except, perhaps, the absurdity of human endeavour which is, like glutea maxima, so omnipresent as to be an axiom of existence.

But leave moralising to those who are not absurd. There are none such in Bandy's World, populated by masses of mad soldiers and no women to speak of, no women to peek at, no women but those who seize the funny bone and tickle rather than titillate. There are no sops to peekancy; there is just effusion of humour. Is it impossible to relate the joy to a novel that suggests rolling in the aisles rather than haystacks? The innocence of the Bandy books! It seems almost archaic, but, by God, an archaic die Triomphe. It is a virtue to avoid vice with such full-blooded energy of childishly sophisticated adventures that the utter cleanliness of the madness is not cloying. Cleanliness is next to godliness, but so much funnier. Yes, old-fashioned. But that is a fashionable adjective, applied to sparkling furniture and ice-cream flavours. It is as pleasant to consume Bandy as to sit and lick frigid chocolate chips.

Yet it is incomprehensible, this humour, this cleanliness (but godliness is notoriously unfathomable as well) unless you think back to the brevity of wit. It's a will-o-the-wisp, flitting past, too quick and insubstantial to be grasped. Where is the uproarious truism in Captain Malt's jealous passion for a toilet (there must be something archetypal in this image; Waugh uses it in his Officers and Gentlemen trilogy), the thigh-slapping detonation in Bandy's plummet into a stagnant pond (there must be something archetypal in this image; everybody uses it everywhere), the epidemic giggles in the snowy waists of starving Russian revolutionaries? The humour is nowhere because it is everywhere; there is an aura of devil-should-care pleasantry floating intangibly over the epic story, its epic characters, its epicureanism. So it is innocently ancient and diffused into an unpinable sense of well-being. A merely funny story which, in the end, has no bone to pick except that once-mentioned, twice-lauded funny bone. All is laughter on the Western Front.

And what of Shakespeare? He will outlast Bandy; his style is so superior, his wisdom so monumental. But he doesn't really enter the picture; humour bears no relation to any predecessor but its reader's tastes. Bandy has the soul of a twit, a monumental case. That is the unassailable virtue of the book, its virginity.

Realistic "April 29, 1975" avoids melodramatic traps

Peggy (Diane D'Aquila) and Tom (Stephen Markle) in the aftermath of the accident that is the setting for April 29, 1975.

Stock situations that reveal human emotion are difficult to work with in theatre. The result can be melodrama. It can come across as a pale, actionless copy of a movie. April 29, 1975 is about a car accident on a quiet road that throws together some unlikely people whose characters are revealed intimately during the time they are together. And April 29, 1975 is not melodrama nor a screenless movie. It is a stimulating production that begs involvement.

Toronto Free Theatre's first play of their new season, written and directed by Martin Kinch, opens with the lonely sound of crickets interrupted by the sudden squeal of tires and crash of two cars colliding. Tom Susskind, Peggy Stone, and Bill Withers in a small car have collided with Dr. Bullings and his wife Molly. Two young American hitchhikers passing by come to help the injured. As they all wait for help to come each person responds first to the shock of the accident, its confusion and bloodiness; then to the feelings raised by the supposed death of Bill and Peggy's close friend Tom; and finally to the clashing of each others' over-revealed personalities. The characters are developed and contrasted as each new difficulty or personal outburst affects them.

Dr. Bullings, a Kentuckian vacationer in this "strange" land of Canada, is interested primarily in escaping the reality of the accident. His fear, after diagnosing Tom Susskind as dead, transforms into belligerence and extraordinary ruthlessness as he goes about scientifically establishing his own innocence. This he is doing while a number of the others are suffering from various degrees of injury. William Webster, who plays Dr. Bulling, faces the possibility, in the first act, of assault from someone in the audience so effective is his portrayal of this crew-cut redneck. But stereotyping of villainy is avoided by the writer, Kinch, through revealing a fuller and more sympathetic sense of Dr. Bulling's character in the second act. Molly, sensitively portrayed by Elva Mai Hoover, shows a simple honesty and desire to help although skeletons in her closet are also hinted at.

Tom's girlfriend Peggy Stone, a cocktail waitress at the King Edward, is possibly the closest person to a hero in the play. She stands up to Dr. Bullings when no one else will. But our first view of her is of shallowness and coldness as she responds to the shock of Tom's death. Diane D'Aquila gives an excellent performance as Peggy, moving from toughness to tenderness as her deeper feelings for Tom are exposed. Saul Rubinek as the insecure and resentful lawyer, sidekick of Tom's, Bill Withers, completely captures his role even down to the nervous hand-on-the-forehead motions. Both Wally (Nicholas Kilbertus) and Gale (Tricia Allen) are believable as two somewhat naive young people. But sometimes they are not energetic enough to convey the emotion of the "gruesome" scene and the rapidly growing tension in the situation.

It is stereotyping of characters that could be a major pitfall in this play, but that Kinch artfully avoids. Each person is allowed to develop without having moral judgments applied to their character. Nobody is all hero or all villain. They are just ordinary people affected by a frightening personal tragedy. And, suitably, the form of the play is realistic. Ralph McDermid's set adequately recreates an accident scene and the language of the characters is simple and hesitant enough to be credible.

The only disturbing feature of the play is that its characters are too evenly exposed. Rather than allowing the action to reveal what could be hidden motivations, Kinch holds us each character's weaknesses and hang-ups neatly packaged. It could have been more subtle and thus more involving without losing impact.

Sci-fi-camp-rock'n'roll extravaganza is just a drag

"Ah . . . children of the night, how sweet their music is."

Bela Lugosi, talking about bats, in Tod Browning's Dracula

The Rocky Horror Picture Show starts this reviewer to wondering just what made the stage show, on which it is based, the success that it was with the kinky elite in New York and London. What the devil possessed a netherworld entrepreneur and barker like Mick Jagger to ask for a part in the film version (an offer which the film's producers turned down?) Possibly it was just Jagger's acute business sense, but when the genuine article, a veteran weird like Tennessee Williams, asks to meet the author of this musical, one is led to expect a work of some substance. Certainly the material is there, with a grab-bag running the gamut from transvestism to Grade-B and vintage horror and science-fiction films, all of which is backed up by a rock 'n roll soundtrack. This is not a case of there not being enough anti-matter in the pods, Cap'n. Nor is it likely that this is an example of "There are some things that Man was not meant to know and turn into feature films" as just about everything this rather tame monster tries has been done before with better results.

Our story opens with Brad and His Fiance Janet driving along on a old dirt road on a Stormy Night. As Fate would have it the car breaks down and Brad and His Fiance Janet have to hoof it through the mud and Hollywood rain to the Old Castle that they passed about a mile back. After a silly duet number they reach the castle door where they are greeted (and I use the word loosely) by Riff-Raff the Hunchbacked Manservant (played by the play film's writer and songsmith Richard O'Brien). Upon entering, poor Brad and His Fiance Janet (adherents that they are to Middle-American, Middle 20th century, Middle of the Road ethics, which are probably in reality far raunchier than whatever the curiously prudish denizens of this film use for a sexual aesthetic) are confronted by a Horror of Horrors-Transylvanian Transvestite Ball — which is so unimaginatively choreographed and directed that one can see why Brad and Janet would want to leave. Their exit is blocked however by the entrance of Dr. Frank N. Futer.

Something happened here. My guess is that the Valium truck failed to show that day with the direct consequence that for once in the film everyone got enough of their rather scattered sensibilities together to make one scene over two minutes in length work and actually surpass any viewer's expectations. Frank N. Futer's entrance with accompanying song, played to the hilt by Tim Curry, is five minutes out of a plodding two hours that actually fools you into thinking that you're in for a real movie.

To return to the plot, it turns out that Brad and Janet have arrived at an Opportune Moment as tonight is the night that the good doctor is going to infuse his latest creation with the spark of life. The resultant creature, a product of the most listless "infusion-of-man-made-being-with-the-spark-of-life" scene ever filmed, is a cross between Charles Atlas and Joe DiMaggio and if that doesn't clue you in to why old doc created "Rocky" then there's not much I do except to say that Rocky is not enough to satisfy his master's appetite. Later That Night we find Futer in disguise and drag performing successful seductions on his houseguests Brad and Janet by appearing to each as the other. All of this could have been quite clever, even provocative, if imagination had been allowed the same excesses that this movie spends drierly listing enough disconnected trivia to appear as camp. Indeed the film is merely a rote exercise using the objects of science-fiction horror films, rock 'n roll, and bi-sexual culture without any vision as to connections or contrasts between them.

There is more to the story than I've mentioned but the only intelligible outcome is that after a long period of disassociated action, occasional "good bits", even a song or two that's listenable, the film comes to an end. In looking this review over it occurs to me that I have been a bit too negative. The film does have its points but at $3.50 a hit they would be fairly easy to forget against the rather sloppy and silly surroundings in which they occur. It's a pity because some people most notably the actors have put a fair bit of energy into this film. It has its moments but moments they remain without structure or support.

Harrison backtracks to artistic, sales success

George Harrison
Extra Texture

It was a cold and snowy day in December 1970 when the crowds were lined up in front of the downtown record outlets to purchase George Harrison's All Things Must Pass.

Extra Texture represents a return to that snowy day in 1970. It could well have been the follow up to All Things Must Pass, in fact, the promotional staff at Apple records are saying that it could well have preceded All Things. The single "You" was written in 1970 for Ronnie Spector for an album that never was. Tributes are given to Legs Larry Smith, founder of the Bonzo Dog Band ("His Name Is Legs") and Smokey Robinson. ("Ooh Baby"). Remember "While My Guitar Gently Weeps?" The weeping guitar back on "This Guitar (Can't Keep From Crying)" a song George wrote while in Hawaii. Klaus Voormann and Nickey Hopkins are heard on some of the tracks. So is Billy Preston. So is Leon Russell. This is not a concept album, just nine songs, none of them as long as six minutes, and produced in a fashion that can only be accomplished with 1975 recording techniques.

Other songs include "Tired of Midnight Blue" (originally to be titled "Midnight Blue" until Melissa Manchester came along) "World of Stone," "Grey Cloudy Lies," "Can't Stop Thinking of You" and "The Answer's At The End" which comes from an inscription written on the wall of George's house in Henley-on-Thames.

This is all new music. It is also a return to the old method of making music. The songs are impressive. The credits are also impressive. So impressive are they that they are followed by a listing of individuals who did not appear on the record — Peter Sellers among them! If all of these factors do not serve to help sell this album of songs, the packaging will. It is a 'something-for-everyone' album which should be assured every commercial and artistic success. We know it took a lot to get where you are today. With us, you'll get the opportunity to get where you want tomorrow.

Right now, you're wondering where you can put your talent and your ideas to work. Obviously, you want to work for a company who will really appreciate what you have to offer and give you the room you need to grow.

If you are graduating in engineering, business, commerce, computer science, or other disciplines and feel you can make an outstanding contribution, you want Northern Electric, one of the fastest growing companies in Canada.

In fact, Northern Electric is one of the three largest manufacturers of telecommunications equipment in North America.

We've grown to the point where sales in 1974 reached a record $970 million.

One of the reasons for our spectacular growth is our range of products. And the design and research that goes into their development.

Whether it's telephone exchanges, microwave relay networks or satellite communications systems. One of the results of our growth is that we employ about 25,000 people in 24 plants around the world. Obviously, we want this growth to continue and we want to remain a leader in telecommunications. One way to do this is to hire talented young people and give them a real chance to grow. Of course, our standards are high but then so are the rewards.

Sensitive quilts aren't poetically static

The collection of quilts at Gallery 76 at 76 McCaul St., a collection of quilts chosen from a small region of southwestern Ontario, is unassumingly but completely satisfyingly an extended definition of the potentialities of colour, pattern, texture, material and method.

The exhibition presents decorative appliqued and pieced quilts of delicately striped shirting patches; log-cabin quilts in "pineapple" and complicated pleated variations; everyday or crazy quilts and a small series of New Brunswick quilts on loan from that locale.

Elaborate stitchery and piecing are not essential to produce a worthwhile quilt. Indeed the project done with ease and relaxation is often more interesting, more personal, more sensitive to humour, impulse and originality than a complicated sequence which although technically admirable remains poetically static.

The appreciation of a quilt's design is incidental to its historical value. The quilts in this collection date from as early as the early 19th century itself to as recent as a few months ago. Age has undeniably enhanced the older quilts however — subtly but undeniably. Dry-cleaning, colour-fast dyes, synthetic battings, hardy fabrics and sewing machines have effected change — for the worse.

What does Hart House think it's doing?

The Hart House Art Gallery consists of a large rectangular room, without windows, without character, in the basement of Hart House. It is only known to a few adventurous souls who deliberately seek it out and to numerous young athletes who pass it on the way to the men's locker room.

In spite of being ill accommodated and unnoticed however, the Hart House Art Committee has produced some fine shows in addition to others which, if not appealing, are at least thought provoking.

However the present Hart House show — paintings by Claire Shoriker and Barbara Howard — is distinguished more by lack of character than anything else.

Claire Shoriker paints forests and greenery in the Emily Carr — Group of Seven tradition while Barbara Howard's works are vivid colour abstractions with occasional reference to natural imagery.

Both are solid commercially viable painters but they are neither outstanding, original, nor particularly representative of any current or historical movement.

Except in opposing figurative to abstract, the work of one artist bears little relation to the other.

But the artists are connected insofar as they are both represented by the Sisler Gallery on Baldwin St. Not only did Mrs. Sisler help organize the exhibit but her price lists are even out on the benches.

Aside from the fact that the show lacks a theme or direction, it seems pointless for Hart House to be using its space to promote artists who are already sponsored by a nearby commercial gallery.

With all the resources of Toronto and the university community at hand, they can do better.

Fidel Castro's Personal Revolution in Cuba: 1959-1973 Edited by an introduction and commentary by James Nelson Goodsell. Alfred Knopf. From the Other Side of the River
K.H. Fan & K.T. Fan, eds.

We are presented with two books, two collections of writings about two revolutionary societies, Cuba and China. One is organized and selected by a bourgeois historian, the other by people actively concerned with their topic. This critique explores the assumptions of the editors, the attitudes which guide them in their work.

The title Castro's Personal Revolution in Cuba: 1959-1973 is an immediate warning signal as to the basic assumptions of its editor. The revolution is transformed into a personal conflict (contest - North American politics). The process of production is denied. The dates deny the existence of any struggle before the seizing of power (REMEMBER the Maine? Moncado?).

From the Other Side of the River: a book (group of people (writings) who have come) FROM THE OTHER SIDE: duality; either-or;

Capitalist-Communist. OF: a part (of), belonging to. THE RIVER: the one (no other) border. A book (writings) from people who have crossed the border (from our (capitalist side), who ARE NOW (producing) in the (only) other side.

A collection of articles about Cuba by people who are not engaged in the production of the society. Commentators on events. Castro is the only person still involved whose writings are present. By escalating Castro into the primary function, mystification begins. The people of Cuba are forgotten. This serves the bourgeoisie in an important way: if Castro is the Author of the Text (the revolution), then it would not have occurred had he not existed. In the same way, Marxism would not exist had Marx (the man) not lived. Ideas become personified, then forgotten. The man remains. Applied back to North America, the bourgeoisie can state, 'Our society does not have a Castro, a Lenin, a Mao Tse-Tung. Therefore, our society cannot have a revolution.'

"In understanding a society which is consciously building a new way of life, it is important to understand the self-image of the people... This collection is, in a sense, a self-portrait of China today." (from the introduction). It is writings from a people engaged in the process of producing a new society. The personal revolution of the Chinese people. They are the Authors and the Text. Inscribe themselves. North Americans are the Consumers of their Text. Originality is constantly devalued in the process of manufacture until products are worthless at the point of consumption.

In an attempt to remain objective (bourgeois idealism), all sides are presented (except the voices of the Cuban people). Articles written "with the advantage of sober reflection more than ten years after the events took place." (from the notes to the opening article.) What does it matter if the article is based on distortion? If (s)he sees it 'That Way', is it a point of view? The first article opens, 'The Cuban Revolution happened quite quickly; the transformation of society occurred between 1 January 1959 and the end of 1960.' Denial of process of production. (REMEMBER the Maine?). From the notes about the article about the Bay of Pigs (objectivity?) 'In addition to being a military blunder because of the half-hearted manner of execution, (the Bay of Pigs Invasion) was also a major political disaster.' Just this side of The Possidon Adventure.

'not to have the correct political point of view is like having no soul.' Mao Tse-Tung.

'China's achievement in liberating her women in such a short time is unprecedented. But this is not say sexism has completely disappeared. As Chou En-lai reminded us, "Some old attitudes and habits of thought are not easy to change. For example, some people still value boys more than girls so that if they have only girls they keep trying for a boy."' (Eds. note.)

Reminder: put person in mind of. The connotation of this is solidarity with Chou (Chinese). No attempt at objectivity.

The division headings continue the distortion. The first section of the book is "The Political Thrust". An immediate separation of politics from life (living) is made. 'Thrust' implies a macho interpretation of political action.

Goodsell (an apt name) writes:

"The Cuban revolution, unlike the traditional Latin American revolution, is an ongoing affair. It has not yet come to full fruition. One suspects this is the way Castro wants it. For nothing characterizes the Cuban revolution more than Castro's own personal commitment to vigorous change and ongoing reform in Cuba. He is as much involved in such change now as he was in 1959. Moreover, he personally seems most at home in a revolutionary setting.

"This should not seem strange, for Fidel Castro is basically a revolutionary."

"Unlike the traditional..." The Cuban revolution is a communist revolution. If the editor understood the reality of this, he would not write such prattle. Of course Castro wants it this way. He has learned, and the Cuban people have learned, that the revolution need be an 'ongoing affair' if all manifestations of the previous society are to be eradicated.

The Chinese revolution is without a doubt one of the greatest human experiments of our time. It is an all-embracing revolution, affecting every aspect of life in that vast country... China's unparalleled speed in building a socialist economy. From each according to his ability, to each according to his work' and her achievements in many other fields are well known. And yet the Chinese are the first to admit that China still has a long way to go before she enters the goal of communism in which each receives according to his or her need. A socialist society is by its very nature a transitional society, a society in constant change. To understand a society in transition, one must understand the past and future of that society. From the introduction.

If cataclysmic mutation has entered into biological Darwinism (the theory) (who says so? We don't teach that here!), we see here the continuation of natural selection (the system). History is a collection of what has been chosen for historical memory, survival of the fittest to print; all the news that's fittest to print.

Capitalist history is always (at least) ten years old at inception. History can not be affected, only interpreted (consumed). Communist history originates at zero. It is made (produced).

Castro's Personal Revolution is a book for libraries, for intellectuals who believe mental labour relates to manual labour on a basis of 'separate but equal'. A book for people who have not reconciled (recognized) the inherent contradiction: Marxist-Socialist; for people who believe in Authors and not Texts.

From the Other Side of the River is presented (written) by (for) people believing manual labour guides mental labour. It is a book to be used.

From concrete to politics: the international poetry festival

Raoul Duguay

Everybody knows Raoul Duguay, especially people who never read books and do not care much for poetry. And there is a very precise reason for this; Duguay wants to take poetry out of the printed page, throw it where it is going to vibrate, ripple, gurgle, explode. For him a poem does not happen on a white page, it happens on stage. And here comes his splendid formula; a poem, to be a poem, must be multi-dimensional, stereo-audio-visual. A poem is a complex of slides, of music, of perfumes, of birds flying on stage. A complex of different sounds, that of water in a car-wash shop or of steam engines going full speed. A poem is a complex of different levels of language. Duguay constantly tapes people on street corners, in factories, in schools, at meetings, at parties. He records all the voices of Quebec's different social strata (bankers, barbers, waiters, editors, meat-cutters) and throws them together in a gigantic pot-pourri. The contrasts between the pinched, well-nurtured, artificially flavoured vowels of some and the rich, flowing, easy rhythms of others is sometimes hilariously funny. It is difficult not to see a linguistic social analysis there and one that is deeply sympathetic to street-people's language, full of admiration for their creative improvisations and gently ironic towards the upper middle cultivated bracket.

Duguay was born in Val d'Or, Abitibi in 1939. He had eight brothers and sisters. Everybody in the family played an instrument, the father was the most gifted of them all. Maybe this is why Raoul Duguay seldom does a poetry performance now without using a piano, a trumpet or a saxophone. He seems as much at ease with them as he is with his own voice or with his body on stage, or with his hands which are long, muscley and expressive. He often pushes back his thick mane of hair when it gets in the way of his playing or his talking and he always looks directly at you during an interview or an ordinary after-stage conversation.

Duguay's real audience is in dark theatres, in crowded show-places, on stage. At one point he had an 18 musician-band called, Tufonie. They performed about everywhere (even in Hart House) with synthesizer, slides, incense, candles and flying doves. The recitants' words were coming from everywhere, from the audience, from backstage, from the upper galleries, from the four corners of the stage. It was a wild experience, especially if a bird got caught in your hair. A number of newspapers tore it apart. But other critics were willing to listen. If that was poetry, some people said, whether they liked it or not, they would not forget it. It took the sacred words of the holy printed medium, it turned a poem into a happening, a five senses shocker, an entertaining, momentous, complex experience. Even those who cannot stand his antics admit that Duguay has deeply shaken the premises of poetry. All of a sudden he has proved that poems could be made of anything, that they were an encounter with movement, light, dance, chant.

A Montreal journalist once asked him why he kept writing, composing and performing and Duguay answered; "You see I feel I must bring out a child, out of everyone of us, an invisible child and make him smile so that we all see him and smile with him."

Caroline Bayard

Duguay: poetry becomes "a happening, a five senses shocker, an entertaining, momentous, complex experience"

Bill Bissett

Bissett is one of the young poets who will be at the Hart House Festival next week. This won't be his first appearance in the Canadian literary circus. Bissett has been on many tours and he has given numerous readings across the country. Still, his person remains something of a mystery for most. In the past, he has had the image of an elusive hippie, of an enigmatic, bizarre freak. He has done time in jail, he has been harassed by narcotics agents, he has lived in communes. He does not even have his own publisher, the way most poets do because he prefers to run his own printing press, Blew Ointment and you cannot find a mailing address for him. Because he has none. If you want to reach him all you can do is write P.O. Box .52 in Vancouver.

But who has ever talked to Bill Bissett? there are no interviews of Bissett around. Even though he has churned out a book a year since 1965, critics have been very discreet about his person, his tastes, his ideas, his friends. They have reviewed his books, commented on his poems and ignored the man. One assumes he is somewhere on a farm in the B.C. mountains smoking dope, loving his fellow human beings and writing these crazy books which defy the English grammar and mock traditional spelling. In fact this is what has aroused most of the anger about him. People are not terribly shocked by his stand on drugs, prisons and radical politics (he is a poet, he is bound to be eccentric). But they are baffled by the way he writes. And this bafflement often turns into outrage when Bissett breaks the rules, because he breaks them all and as the Vancouver Sun arts' critic, Lorraine Vernon, once put it "he breaks them all". It seemed as if correct spelling and syntax were abhorrent to him, as if they stood as an allegiance to the "ruling class of meaning and spelling."

The rules must be broken, words written phonetically, vertically, diagonally, any way except the expected way. Bissett is a revolutionary with letters, with poems, with books. His lines detonate and explode but they seldom run the way we have been trained to see a poem's lines run. You can't read him from left to right because he won't let you. He will take you upwards and downwards, drop a little collage here and there of words & photographs & unexpected items, he will insert in his book pages from other people's books, preferably 1912 cooking manuals, saccharine love stories or real ads torn out of real 1950 American magazines. Al Purdy was delighted by what he judged to be a revitalization of poetry but he also facetiously added: "some people are antagonized by this sort of thing, are you?"

The fact is almost everybody has been and still is and when his books arrive from Blew Ointment Press critics polish their best sneering formulas before having a good go "at this last little book from the West Coast". He does not seem to mind because he never confronts them, the way some poets do. At any rate, he can't have his publisher ask them to re-adjust their terminology or threaten to file a suit. And even if he did have a publisher, I doubt if he would ask him or her to do such a thing. For he seems totally free, untouched by criticism, unaware of it, a visionary of strange earthquakes amidst language, a dreamer of new forms, a composer of unexpected sounds, screams, moans and laughter. He does not have, yet, the sophistication of the Four Horsemen and his only record, Awake in the red Desert, lacks the power of the Nichol-McCaffery-Dutton-Barreto Rivera quator. However, his voice will be a much expected one on Thursday 30 October and everyone will be waiting for his elusive person, his Indian Chief leather jacket, his blonde hair, the sound of his words and his silence.

Tom Wayman

There are certain poets whose poems convey a personality to the reader. Their separate collections almost assume the character of a random journal: the individual poems record events, people, places, experiences encountered by the poet and the sum of these constitutes both the poet's world and his sensibility. Al Purdy, Alden Nowlan and Irving Layton immediately come to mind when one thinks of "personality" poets, and in his own unique way Tom Wayman is one of these. There is usually a personal immediacy and directness in their verse, a sense of things happening now. D.H. Lawrence called modern poetry a "poetry of the instant present" and there is this kind of contemporaneity in Wayman's verse:

*Forty feet over the floor, on a shaking scaffold
Wayman is in the workforce.
After eighteen years of education
Wayman is out cleaning bricks.
But as he peers down from his wall knuckles white where he grips the guardrail Wayman sees through the winter dusk there is something inefficient about modern industry. He realizes everybody is drunk.*

("Wayman in the Workforce: Urban Renewal")

The character who comes across in these poems is a sensitive individual whose often puckish sense of humour is a frequent defence against a usually absurd and repressive world. Wayman is his own best character but he is always more than just an isolated individual whose life events have no meaning beyond their own personal and existential context. Even in his first collection — Waiting for Wayman — the personal and the social, the private and the public aspects of reality were being related.

For example, the situation in the poem "Welfare" recreates the frustration and humiliations of the welfare process:

*We are in line to be numb.
In the morning when the City goes to work we go down to wait.
We stand. Nothing tells us what to do.
We are here because there is not a dream any more about money. Here because what we are entitled to is unavailable at the moment for several weeks. Here because the Unemployment Insurance Commission believes air is nutritious.*

After the inclusive "we" of the first two stanzas Wayman switches to an even more reader-involving "you". The mood of the entire poem is sardonic, accusatory but the prevailing pathos of the situation is countered by an undertone of frustration and anger. Ultimately this is a political poem which refuses to assume that the political and social structures which dictate the quality of individual life are unshakable.

In the best sense Wayman is a political poet whose work has revolutionary implications; but he is a political poet whose personal concerns, emotions, and experiences infuse the body of his political attitudes with a convincing — because concretely realized — humanism. His socio-political concerns always originate in personal problems.

It is no coincidence that Wayman's most recent book is an anthology of "working poems" — Beaton Abbot's Got the Contract — which has poems by Neruda, Purdy, Gary Snyder, and Milton Acorn among others. We tend to be suspicious of political poetry; Western aesthetics — with the exception of the Marxists — is usually dismissive of any work that is overtly ideological. What I mean by this is that we tend to reject as "un-aesthetic" any work which has an obvious commitment to a body of ideas or to an explicit doctrine. But it is obvious that this is the kind of poetry that interests Wayman who is more than willing to include a hortatory or didactic element in his lyrics:

The Country is what we make daily, together. When one builds he builds in his mind. It takes at least two to build in the world and almost everybody to build the world.

*And this Country we make is where we must make the change.
("The Country of Everyday: Beginning")*

For and Against the Moon, from which this poem is taken, contains both critical and prophetic poems. Refusing to accept the socio-political status quo with all of its psychological implications, Wayman looks forward in several of the book's poems to a time when

*We will be organized
In the warehouse of the soul.
Not to cram into boxes all the pipe elbows and automobile tires the bundled-up mattresses, rolls of polythene electrical fixtures, papers, sheets of glass dried fruit and seeds, bushels of axe handles . . .*

*Together
every warehouseman forklift operator, packer and shipper and the front office clerks together with the earth, we will be the union of us all, so that at last we shall be all.
("The Country of Everyday:
A Vision of the New Life")*

What Wayman is saying is important: go hear him read.

Wayman: "... refuses to assume that the political and social structures, which dictate the quality of individual life are unshakable".

Crossland's sense of humour not black, but ruddy

Out of the cold wind I marched, past the girl in overalls re-painting the wooden doors, through the dusty hall and into the caverns of Factory Lab Theatre. Standing on a dais, surrounded by piles of rocks and old clothes, her voice nearly obscured by the company carpenter cutting pipes, playwright and director Jackie Crossland was haranguing her cast members. A voice at my elbow whispered, "She's doing Romeo and Juliet — the balcony scene". It could have been quite true; Crossland, who is a massive, short woman, would have been grotesque as Juliet; but her personality is capable of the part. She exudes an aura of unbelieveability.

Talking to Jackie Crossland, a playwright for some years, and the writer of Factory's opening play of the season, is like descending into a maelstrom of ideas which are by turns petulant and profound. She comes on at first like an acid burnout, all discontinuity and mind-fuck, but as one accepts her personality as its child-like, cynical self, she relaxes and her theories about the scope and nature of her art — if she admits it is one — become coherent. I found that the process of "interviewing" was a very dangerous one, and so did Crossland; I looked at my pad, and she stopped talking; she looked at her cousin, and told a grand version of a small event, or waited until my pencil was poised before ripping off a good line. Her opening demurral, "I'm not primarily a literary personage" begged the question.

Peaches and Poisoned Cream is the title which has appeared to describe her new play; and as an old friend to medievalism and the fantastic, I had read the press releases with interest. But Crossland candidly admitted that the play bore no resemblance to its title or its puns, that it was being restructured by her company of actors, and that only the raw situation had been created when the publicity people began to ask those probing questions about her eventual intentions.

Crossland developed her writing talent in the somewhat demanding school of parody, which has a rigid requirement for exact equivalency; she has been connected to the Playwrights' Co-op on and off, and for the last two years, after coming to Toronto from Vancouver, has written constantly to understand development and plot. This production, she admits is a first in that she has not scoured the city for further commissions; if it is successful she will find work, if not

... Peaches and Poisoned Cream may well be a disaster, if not enough people can get involved with the devices Crossland uses. She is primarily interested in headspacs, feels that the comic is the area where coherent logical systems are juxtaposed. This seemed to me to be more likely tragic, but only a goofball greeted my small excurstion into sentimentality. In what she intends to be a 'picaresque' play, Crossland details a pseudo-feudal town life in which the sexual proclivities of the inhabitants are directly related to their self-imposed delusions. She sees in herself, and in her characters, the "stupid logic you involve yourself in . . . the lies you tell yourself . . . how you talk yourself into a corner . . .". Balanced against this was self-perception is her exceptionally wicked sense of humour; a comedy not black but ruddy. How did she choose her actors? "I looked for good liars". And when I suggested that he was interested in Monty Python-style humour, she asserted that every character in this play has a room full of milkmen.

To Crossland, the theatre is an actor's art; her role as director is in exploring the possibilities her actors have created. For her, the finest moment in her work is the apotheosis of actor into character. It is near-orgasmic — that apparently being her highest expression of transcendence. If she had her druthers, she'd join forces with her musician for this show and write the Great Science Fiction musical. Such an ambition is Quixotic but not beyond possibility; she does have that air of mad confidence.

As I crawled out, past the road map of her town, over the benches of the theatre and past the bathtub, upper left, it occurred to me that Crossland lives in her own fairy-land and like all others, had found her Faerie had its inexorable logic and a set of values conforming to her own wishes. Peaches and Poisoned Cream is possibly, but not certainly, going to be an artistic success, but I think I will go to see Jackie Crossland more vulnerable than she chose to be when I spoke with her. Peaches and Poison Cream premieres tonight.

ON MARCH 11, 1958, THE UNITED STATES DROPPED AN ATOM BOMB ON MARS BLUFF, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The citizens of Mars Bluff probably aren't planning anything special to commemorate the day their town almost became the Hiroshima of the Pee Dee River, but with the Official National Lampoon Bicentennial Calendar, you can help remember this and hundreds of other black days in American history. Pamstakingly researched to insure historical accuracy, the Official National Lampoon Bicentennial Calendar contains over 600 massacres, explosions, defeats, assassinations, crashes, bombings (intentional and accidental), panics, executions, lynchings, betrayals, mishaps, riots, sinkings, mutinies, rigged elections, armed incursions, stonings, fish kills, mass murders, and miscarriages of justice.

While everyone else is running around making a big deal out of a boring battle the British somehow managed to lose, you can be celebrating the day 147 persons, most of them young women, perished in America's ghastliest industrial fire. Or the day Congressman Preston Brooks walked on to the Senate floor and beat Senator Charles Sumner unconscious with a gutta-percha cane. Or the day convicted "trunk murderer" Winnie Ruth Judd escaped from the Arizona State Insane Hospital for the sixth time.

And the Official National Lampoon Bicentennial Calendar makes a perfect gift that will continue to depress and annoy someone you love throughout the whole year. The Official National Lampoon Bicentennial Calendar, with twelve breath-takingly lurid illustrations, is on sale in bookstores everywhere for only $4.50.

No doo-wah-diddy for competent McCutcheon

Classical guitarist Peter McCutcheon performed at the U. C. Playhouse

Peter McCutcheon, an aspiring young Canadian classical guitarist, was featured in the second event of the Playhouse Performance Series at the U. C. Playhouse last Saturday night. The pieces performed ranged from Dowland, the 16th century composer for lute to the modern Spanish composer, Isaac Albeniz. Mr. McCutcheon has just returned from three years study in France at the Paris National Conservatoire, under the master, Alexandre Lagoya. While there, he won the Premier Prix at the 1975 Guitar Concours at the Conservatoire National Supérieur de Musique de Paris. His concert experience includes concerts in France, some for the Jeunesses Musicales in Montreal and one for the International Guitar Festival in good old T.O. this last June. In September of this year, he was appointed guitar professor at the University of Montreal. At present, he is concerned with establishing a reputation in Canada. A concert tour of Canada and the U.S. is possible for next year but an agent must be found first

A vibrant and intense man, Mr. McCutcheon is concerned that many classical guitar teachers do not give students the necessary technical and musical background they need. As an aside, it's something I've noticed also: that because classical guitar is a relatively newly discovered solo instrument, the music one plays on it is seen as guitar music (with all that that implies) and not as music to be analyzed and seen in a broader musical context. In terms of style, McCutcheon prefers Baroque over classical and he is in the process of getting a feel for contemporary music — in this category, he prefers the earthy qualities of modern Spanish compositions which reflect the melodic and rhythmic idiom of Spain.

The concert on Saturday left me with very good impressions, although I found his performance of the Villa-Lobos, Haydn and Sor lacking in inspiration. The dynamic contrasts which are characteristic of Villa-Lobos were not apparent in Study no. 8 and I found the vibrato in the Study no. 11 to be too pronounced although the expressive potential of the piece was deftly brought out. In the Haydn and Sor, there was a lack of clarity which impeded appreciation of the musical line. However, McCutcheon excelled in the Giliardi and Allemande of Dowland where his delicacy of touch and the sheer "readability" of the work could not fail to move. McCutcheon seemed to be most at home with the airy lyricism of Turina and Albeniz whose works, Fandangillo and Sevilla respectively, were performed with great empathy and confidence. Toronto will be fortunate indeed when Mr. McCutcheon next returns, so watch for him! You'll be able to say "Oh, I saw him when he was just starting out . . ."

An overflow of delight for chamber music fans

Last Thursday (Oct. 16), Toronto concert-goers had the chance to hear two outstanding chamber music groups in the same day. In the afternoon, the Women's Musical Club opened its season by presenting the Vaghy String quartet in a concert at Eaton Auditorium. The members of the quartet are artists-in-residence at Queen's University.

The program started with a robust performance of Haydn's Quartet Op. 77, No. 1 in G major. The Vaghy's approach to Haydn, whose music is often mistakenly considered fragile and dainty, was both poised and full-blooded. This was especially evident in the beautiful Adagio, where first violinist Deszo Vaghy's phrasing underlined the passionate intensity often lacking in interpretations of Haydn's works. The quartet generated a similar sense of excitement in the Trio of the Menuet, where they managed to convey the rhythmic savagery which occasionally emerges in this supposedly delicate 18th century music.

I enjoyed the Quartet Op. 50, No. 1 by Prokofiev the least of the pieces on the program. I've heard this work a number of times, and still can't get used to the confused aimlessness of some of its episodic material.

The undoubted highlight of the afternoon came after intermission, in Ravel's Quartet in F major. Impressionistic music requires no less clarity of organization than any other kind to bring off palatably, and the Vaghy was highly successful in presenting a lucid and musical realization of the score. Not everyone would find their interpretation ideal in all respects, but there was never any doubt as to their uniformity of conception and emotional input. I personally have not heard a finer live performance of this masterpiece.

Thursday evening, the Thursday Scholarship Series at the Faculty of Music presented the Fenyves-Orloff-Farr Trio in a concert of music for piano trio. The group consists of Lorand Fenyves, violin, Vladimir Orloff, cello, and Patricia Parr, piano; all reside in Toronto and teach at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Music. Their program got under way with Mozart's Trio in B flat major, K.502. The performance proved tremendously satisfying; all three musicians meshed their playing into an integrated and convincing interpretation which combined both elegance and depth of expression.

The Mozart was followed by Schumann's Trio in F major, Op. 80. Again, the performers offered a generous amount of insight into this highly romantic work, though I didn't find its musical contours outlined quite as cogently as the Mozart's. There were some very moving moments, particularly in the melancholic movement.

The concert concluded with a brilliant performance of Mendelssohn's classic, the Trio in D minor, Op. 49. The three musicians played it compellingly, with verve and relentless logic in setting forth the musical ideas in each movement. A special mention is due to pianist Patricia Parr for her virtuosity in the exceptionally demanding scherzo.

It's difficult to say much more about a concert of this calibre. These are great artists, and the evening was a highly rewarding musical experience.

Old Toronto, decent, refined, celebrates power at Simpson's

"Twenty four thousand dollars. Sold for twenty four thousand dollars."

That was the successful bid last Monday night, at Simpson's Queen St. during the first session of Sotheby's annual fall auctions of Canadian art, for Lauren Harris' Algonquin Park.

Emily Carr's Old and New Forest also fetched $24,000, A.Y. Jackson's Morning, Baffin Island, got $23,000. A Landscape, Palgrave, by David Milne went for $17,000. Two works by Kreighoff, La Tuque Bleue, and Hauling Ice on the St. Lawrence, received $16,000 and $15,000, respectively.

Was the auction itself interesting? I'm sure you can count by one hundred and five hundred dollar figures as easily as I can, and that's essentially what happened there, at least from the point of view of the observer. But the reputation of all those thousand dollar figures and of the multiples of five hundred and one hundred necessary to reach them were as powerful in encouraging precisely a sense of detachment as any mantra.

There was of course the question "Well, what did you expect?" which created an effective enough divide between one's experience of the event and any immediate reaction to it at the time.

The bids seemed to be bubbles that floated out from the mass of bidders, bubbles that floated gradually up above our heads to support and be supported by other bubbles. You never saw or knew the individual bidders (I did see Alan Eagleson, bidding on a Kreighoff, though, and there were others whom one felt one ought to know) but rather only heard the bids as they were announced by the auctioneer. As the bids rose higher and higher they seemed at the same time to be buoying higher and higher bubble ideas of status and prestige and art and taste. As lot succeeded lot, as one work by this unknown 19th century Canadian painter followed another lot by another such painter, bubbles of the conventions and the varieties of talent their work encompassed rose to join the other bubbles. They were bubbles drifting aimlessly in a rather airless space and it seemed what they represented was even more fragile than any bubble. There was more than enough room for all the bubbles: the pity was in fact that none would collide, nothing would burst.

One of the persons I went with expressed surprise that there was no drama, no conflict. She had come with visions of power struggles in her head. It wasn't that of course at all: it was a celebration of power, a mutual celebration of power by everyone there.

There were no Arabs at the event. Perhaps they haven't that much money yet that they need to think of buying Canadian art as something to do with it. Or perhaps they will never invest in Canadian art. But Old Toronto was there. Old Toronto, clean, decent, refined, making itself a miniature Hamlet on its own terms by wondering 'Yo have or not to have'.

There was little human interest, little local colour. No one dropped anything so that we could gasp and then laugh at ourselves. Perhaps the most amusing thing of the whole evening was that the successful bidders all had to carry away their purchases in the same brown and white Simpson's wrapping paper that you can carry your winter underwear or $1.99 paint-by-number set away in.

Mahogany: a fairytale fiasco

Mahogany could have been good. It is indeed very frustrating to see potential get away. The costuming, done by Diana Ross, is magnificent — and that is vital in a film recounting the story of designer getting to the top of the world of haute couture. The photography throughout is excellent, showing the cosmes to their best advantage.

Mahogany is a Cinderella story, pure and simple. A Chicago ghetto girl is full of drive, ambition and determination to get to the top. And then, as if with a magic wand, the marvels start happening.

Diana bumps into a radical politician (played by Billy Dee Williams), who is preaching the saving of neighbourhoods, and immediately they are madly in love. Soon afterwards, Diana meets Sean McAvoy, played by Anthony Perkins, who is the world's most important fashion photographer and can make or break any young pretty thing with any aspirations. Diana, of course, immediately gets an offer to go to Rome with him.

Though her poor little heart is breaking, ambition wins and she goes to Rome. In Rome, of course, she is the greatest hit imaginable. But the great piece of wisdom Billy Dee told her keeps running through Diana's head when faced with even the greatest success. Billy said "Success is nothing" without someone you love to share it with." Realizing this, Diana gives up her career, everything she has been striving for all her life, and returns to her failed politician love. They live happily ever after.

The film is undoubtedly a Diana Ross tour de force. The press blurb stresses how long she waited for just the right part after her spectacular Lady Sings the Blues. That is what makes it all the more surprising that she fell for a script as bad as this one. Yes, she got a huge part at a time when women are complaining of no good women's roles. Yes, she got a chance to design costumes and they are indeed spectacular. But there is no substance to the script and it is so badly directed.

Berry Gordy, the director, is a founder of Motown Records and the discoverer of Diana Ross. Mahogany is his directing debut but it seems as if he had been directing soap-operas for years.

On the whole, though, Dianan Ross fans may be pleased, for her role is huge and her performance satisfactory. Anthony Perkins' brilliant portrayal contrasts with the shudderingly bad Billy Dee Williams. As a fairytale love story, Mahogany is acceptable, as a meaningful entertaining film — a fiasco. Determinism shunned : a march toward the millennium Popular Soviet playwrights are usually required to construct parallels between the emotional maturation of characters and their emergence as useful Soviet citizens. A sophisticated and successful example of this discipline is Alexie Arbutov's The Promise, now playing at the Colonnade Theatre. This Actors' Repertory Theatre production is the play's second Toronto staging in three years.

Arbutov, next to unknown in the west, has written successfully in the Soviet Union since the thirties. The Promise was published in 1965, apparently to the delight of both the public and the administration. Clearly a product of the early sixties, the play soothsayers on that decade with an optimism that may well draw bitter smiles from today's audiences.

The story recounts the fellowship of three orphaned teenagers, two boys and a girl, drawn under a common shelter during the siege of Leningrad. The emotional bonds formed in those desperately hard times survive not only the entirety of the war, but thirteen years of estrangement thereafter. The three acts chronicle respectively the meeting of the trio in 1942, an unsuccessful attempt at reunion in 1946, and a rearrangement of the triangle in 1959. The final resolution presumably frees them to fulfill their private ambitions and to become worthier citizens. The "promise" is a youthful assurance by the girl that all human pestilence will be vanquished by the year 2000, partly through her pioneering medical research.

The tone of this production is considerably removed from that of Neil Simon's The Good Doctor, ART's fast and fluid season opener. The Promise is a sober effort more memorable for its characters than its style. Arbutov's writing in act one is obscure and rambling; only in the final two acts does the dialogue sustain the actors as much as the actors sustain it.

Elizabeth Murphy is effective as the timid but warmhearted Lika, and adroitly portrays that character's growth from a frightened innocent to a sanguine provider. Philip Craig does well as Leonidik, a good-natured poet with an enfeebling lack of confidence. This role is the most interesting and difficult of the three, entailing moments of drunkenness and stupefaction, a long and gratuitous speech in act one, and the simulation of an artificial arm.

Brian Tree evinces authority in the role of Marat, a vain and cruel engineer and supposed war hero. It is not the personable Leonidik, but Marat who finally sense the stagnancy of the lives of the three friends. He builds bridges across social impasses as well as canyons and rivers.

Terrence Durrant's directing and Marlene Rain's sets are simple and effective. It is a credit to them both that they are not particularly noticed. Mr. Durrant can be congratulated for making a clear presentation of the play's ethic, which finally advocates the rejection of old ties and reminiscences in favour of determined progress toward future goals.

Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays at 8:30, and Wednesdays at 3:00, until Nov. 6. Students $3.50. Colonnade Theatre, 131 Bloor St. W.

Wildbaum's mime satisfies but the plus is a minus

A Space (85 St. Nicholas St.) is a gallery-theatre dedicated to bringing to the attention of the public artists and performers who might otherwise remain unknown. Saturday night's discovery was Mime Plus, a one-man show by Paul Wildbaum, a Toronto born, British Columbia based writer, actor and artist.

The first half of the evening was taken up with a series of short, genial mimes. Pieces which started out with everyday situations developed into fanciful comments on the absurdities of life: a committed T.V. viewer becomes trapped in his own idiot box; a banana smoker's high behaviour turns distinctly monkey-like. The pieces were always funny, often thought-provoking, though sometimes obscure. In short, the audience was prepared for another hour of good entertainment. If only someone had persuaded Wildbaum to remain silent, we would not have been disappointed. Instead, we got "Plus".

"Plus" consisted of stories, cartoons and songs. The stories were amusing little excursions into paranoia, where inanimate objects became the persecutors of the human soul. The "cartoons" were two short skits, one funny, one not so funny. What really irritated the yawns and longing glances at the exits were the songs — some written by friends, the rest unclaimed. There were good reasons for this anonymity; the lyrics sounded as if they had been garnered from the rejected files of a junior high newspaper. As for the melodies, they could scarcely have been judged, since Wildbaum has a voice like Bob Dylan on an off day. The one genuinely funny moment was "Torture Baby", an audience participation satire on the music of the fifties. Unfortunately, it only made the rest of "Plus" more dismal, by demonstrating what it could have been.

The overall impression is one of considerable wit and talent misdirected. Wildbaum hasn't the ability to get his humour and ideas across in song as well as he does in mime. Moreover, the production appeared under-rehearsed — lighting cues missed, lyrics forgotten, lines muttered and rhythm lost. In the hands of a more experienced performer, these slipups could be excused as spontaneity. In the case of Paul Wildbaum, they show he has a long way to go before his "Plus" becomes anything but a minus.

An interview with Claude Jutra

Claude Jutra is to Canada's cinema what Bergman is to Sweden's. When one thinks of Canadian film directors, the first name that usually comes to mind is that of Jutra. He is one of the few Canadian filmmakers to receive international recognition.

Jutra claims to have a love for cinema stretching back to his early childhood. He began making films as a student in university and medical school. At that time he worked with a friend, Michel Brault (Les Ordres), with whom he was later to make a number of films for the National Film Board.

Aside from working in Canada, Jutra has also worked in France and in Niger with French filmmaker-ethnologist Jean Rouch.

In 1957 at the Tours film festival, a film made by Norman McLaren with Claude Jutra (A Chairy Tale) became popular with the French critics and filmmakers. There, Jutra met Francois Truffaut, Jean Luc Godard and Eric Rohmer and became, as he puts it, "one of the gang." Truffaut, Godard, Rohmer, along with Jacques Rivette and Claude Chabrol were all at that time critics with the now almost legendary Cahiers du Cinema.

Jutra then went on to write for the Cahier du Cinema. In 1959, the year that the critics from the Cahier spearheaded the French nouvelle vague, Jutra made Anna, a bonnie in Paris. The film was based on a poem by Jean Cocteau and was produced by Francois Truffaut.

Jutra has made over twenty short films and five features: A tout prendre (1963); Wawa (1969); Mon Oncle Antoine (1970); Kamouraska (1972); Pour le meilleur et pour le pire (1975).

I met Jutra at the Stratford Film Festival where his film received its first public showing in Canada. Jutra was not granting any extensive interviews at that time so I offered to give Jutra a lift to Toronto airport if he would let me run my tape recorder during our drive there. He agreed and I managed to tape a two hour interview in the car.

The interview is edited because of length and because of Jutra's habit of not always finishing his sentences and leaving thoughts hanging in mid air.

How did you as a medical student, end up being a film director and actor?

As well, when I started on my medical studies I was already very much involved in film. Before that I was in theater. I was a child actor, I played on the stage and on the radio.

Why did you waste your energy in medical school then?

When I got out of college in 1946 there was no sign that there ever would be a film industry in Quebec. Since everybody is a doctor in my family on both sides, we decided that I would go through medical school and then do whatever I wished once I was finished. Which is exactly what happened.

After medical school I went to a theater school for a couple of years and then to Europe. My parents helped me through that and they paid for the theater school also.

I started making films when I was in college. In my first year of medicine I made two films. I made a full length feature film with sound, which was quite unusual then. It was two years in the making and was a very naive little film. The film was really for friends and family.

Did the film survive?

Yeah I did, but it is very difficult to project. I then made another film while I was still a student called Mouvement perpetuel and that got me the Canadian Film Award in 1949. That's how I met all the people at the Film Board in Ottawa.

After working in Canada for the National Film Board you left for France. You were there as the nouvelle vague was emerging. What was it like to be making films at that time and place?

I shot a short film in Paris based on a Cocteau poem. I worked with Cocteau himself while he was still alive. The film was produced by Francois Truffaut. All the conditions seemed ideal.

There was a woman who was in the film called Marian Oswald. She was very famous but only with other famous people. She never had a following but all the great writers of today have written something about her. Her chanson parlee, "spoken song" was one of the things that made her famous. I idolized her from her records and as a legend, because she was a legend—I mean she still is a legend, she's not dead yet, the bitch... so when I started out to do that film everybody including Cocteau told me that I would end up hating her. I said, "I don't think so, I'm not that kind of a person. I am very patient and when I have respect for some one I can endure a lot." But I'm afraid that they were right. I ended up hating her.

What was she like?

A monster. But she was very good in the film.

What made her a monster?

Oh, she had all sorts of ways to torture you, to stand in the way and to make you feel inferior. She had an ego that you couldn't believe. She was fascinated with tragedy and created it everywhere all the time.

Why did you come back to Canada?

I don't feel at ease abroad. Things go wrong. When I had to finish Kamouraska in Paris I had terrible problems with people and equipment. I was very damaging to the film.

Do you like Kamouraska?

Yeah, I like it very much. I also like all the stuff that has been cut out. I wish I could do like Coppola and Altman: recut the film and put it into a different form for television. I think it would make a very good television show if it could be split up into four one-hour episodes.

Why can't you do this?

Well, one of the reasons is that the actors are just too demanding. If a film is going to be shown on TV they want to be paid almost as much as if they were making the film.

Before premiering in Canada at Stratford, Pour le meilleur et pour le pire (For Better and For Worst) was shown at the film market in Cannes.

What was the reception like there?

It was bad in general. You say Quebec people love their own films but it's not quite true. There are some newspaper people, among others, who are kind of eager to find films to pan, and they are paning this one.

Why did you decide to split time in the film?

I was just having fun; fooling around with time.

There is more to it than that. It was the little touch of symbolism where one day is supposed to represent a whole married life. There is nothing more to it than that.

Who or what is the mad woman who makes those mysterious appearances in the film?

Well, on one hand she is a symbol, on the other she is also a very real person. I had a crazy woman running after me when I was an intern. She was one of my patients and she had a fixation on me because I took good care of her (too much, as a matter of fact). Anyhow, years after I left medicine she kept escaping from which ever institution she was in and she would always find my address and come to my home.

She also has the function of a symbol. She is a black creature that lives inside of you and which terrifies you, makes you feel guilty and is the source of anguish.

The bit about the husband being afraid of his wife's crooked toe intrigued me.

The crooked toe is just a little sexual deviation in the man. He's just hooked on that. It's a fixation and an excuse for him to disavow his love for her.

I found their daughter to be a very strange and unreal character.

The child as it is seen on the screen, and this thought came to after the fact, is described from the parents' point of view. Obviously there is a non-existent relationship between the child and the parents. The little girl won't kiss her mother when she goes to school; she throws a baseball at her; they forget to feed her; when the wife talks to their dinner guests, she says, "You know, we have a little girl ourselves; yehhh!" To establish a tense relationship, I put the child in opposition with the couple.

Johnny, their dinner guest, seemed unreal also.

Since the film is about the couple, people outside their bounds are like strangers or enemies. All the comical effects with Johnny are due to the fact that they have nothing in common. The couple don't even really know each other. They feel obliged for different reasons to deal with Johnny as though they know him. What makes it funny is that it is all artificial, it's a false situation.

How does that "Ginger Rogers-Fred Astaire" musical number work in the film?

It distantiates what they have to say to each other. They are tired of squabbling so they decide to do nicely, cutely, like in the old musicals. This gives them a chance to even harsher and more cruel to each.

How much of the film is from your own personal life?

Nothing really. It's rather the opposite to my real life. But there are probably elements of me in many of the characters in the film; more in the characters other than the one I play.

What was the film's budget?

It was $350,000.

Is it easy for Claude Jutra to receive backing?

No, not at all. It took one year to finance this film on a script that was agreed upon by everybody. All the people were delighted with the script; the producers, the CPDC (Canadian Film Development Corporation), the financiers; it's just that there is very little money.

The CPDC nearly blew over backwards for this film but it was hard to get the private financing, especially when the tax law that made investment in film interesting, was suspended.

What are you saying about marriage in For Better and For Worst?

I don't know. I just made a film. I'm never trying to 'say something'. You know, I hate to analyse my films. I don't when I write them and even less when I do them.

Then your work is more emotional than intellectual?

That's right. What ever the meaning of my film is, I will wait for other people to tell me.

In that case, if one's artistic drive is emotional rather than intellectual, how does one direct? How do you communicate with your actors?

What you really talk about is the situation that you are dealing with. You discuss the feelings of the character in that situation. The essential thing is to communicate with the people.

For example, in Kamouraska, Richard Jordan is very intellectual in his acting, so there was this ritual that we had to go through of a very involved discussion about the character, the situation and all sorts of things. We had to discuss the psychology of Calvinism because Jordan decided that this character was a Calvinist.

On the other hand, with Genevieve Bujold I always discussed things on more immediate terms. You tell her things like "In this scene you are scared to death because of all the consequences of what you are doing, etc."

Your approach has to be different with every actor.

... Jutra interview (from p. 16)

What is it like to direct and act at the same time? How do you objectively evaluate your own performance?

I don't evaluate it. You instinctively know that your performance is either bad or good; you feel it inside of yourself instead as if you were a spectator.

I like to act and this was one part where I had myself in mind for it since the inception. Having an actor stand between me and the other actors would have been one more obstacle to cross. Communication between me and the others is much closer when we act together. You know, directing is not watching actors from behind a camera.

What would you say is the major difference between filmmaking in Quebec and in the rest of Canada?

The difference is not in the making but in the audience. We are an isolated culture, we must feed ourselves. Although Quebecers like to see American films as much as anyone else, we have this strange urge for survival and culture is about the only means by which we can achieve this. We don't have the church anymore to keep us together.

You feel that the church was a good influence in Quebec?

Yes it was. It was what preserved the language and the faith, and the two went together.

Most historians maintain that the church was a regressive influence. Yeah, but it kept us alive anyway. Now the church is gone and the fight is cultural and political.

Is it the arts that keep Quebec together?

Both, the arts and politics. At this point it's mainly a political factor.

What sort of impact has the October Crisis made upon you personally?

Well, it was frightening for one thing. I would also say as a Quebecois that it was humiliating because of what Trudeau did in those circumstances.

What was the impact of the Crisis upon film in Quebec?

The impact wasn't as strong as we thought it would be. In retrospect it had not as much influence as it really could have had; or should have had. Besides Les Ordres, there were very few films.

What about Bingo?

A film like Bingo is not very enlightening as to the maning of those events. It uses them rather than trying to exorcise them.

Why did it take five years for Les Ordres to appear?

Political reasons. Half of the money for films comes from the Federal government. Under false reasons, they would not support the film; like for example, the script was no good. Strangely enough, in Quebec private money was easy to find. It was an occasion for us to discover that a few Quebec nationalists were wealthy and were amiable to contribute to the cause and the arts.

You are not happy with the state of film in Quebec at the moment.

At the moment it's awful.

What's happening?

Nothing. No films are being made in most of Canada including Quebec. Actually, it's worse in Quebec because of that damn law that we've been asking for so long; unfortunately we finally got it and it's awful! The sad thing is that we were the ones who asked for it, were violent about it. We occupied the censor board offices last year in order to get it. But the situation is going to be worse with the law than without.

The theory of the law reads beautifully. It's a law that is supposed to enhance cinema in Quebec, protect the cultural sovereignty of Quebec, help finance films and regulate them. By the law, an institute is to be founded which would regulate film in Quebec. But the institute has better representation from the commerce and industry sector than from the film directors, technicians and actors. As usual, the creative aspect of film is pushed aside by the business people.

You don't advocate a large film 'industry' for Canada. Why?

I think the size of it should be proportional to the size of the population. If it becomes too big, we could have problems. It's almost the case in Quebec where a lot of films are being made that are never shown. I once said that it's awful not to be able to make a film, but what is worse is having made one and not having it shown.

Have you ever been in that position?

I made a film called Wow which I thought was an interesting film. It played for three weeks in one cinema in Montreal and that was its total career. But that film involved tax evasion gimmicks. The investors made money by losing it.

The fate of Mon Oncle Antoine was to be that too. It was only because of the Canadian Film Awards that it came out into the open. People were paying attention and the press was so loud that the film had to be shown.

Why have Quebec directors been boycotting the Awards for the last two years?

We think that it's an absolutely silly institution. They are like kids trying to imitate their parents; it's like a little girl putting on her mother's make-up. It is all modeled on the Oscars. In our point of view that's an American aspect of filmmaking that we don't want to imitate, adopt, or to share with the Americans. Even the Oscars themselves are ridiculous, and to imitate them, is twice as ridiculous. People who organize and go to the Canadian Film Awards don't know what they are doing. They don't realize how silly it is to be there with their little statuettes and their applause. It's encouraging the system that is destroying us.

Yet these are the same awards that saved Mon Oncle Antoine. Couldn't this happen to another Canadian film?

Yes it could, but we think we need something else in Quebec. We don't want to take part in that kind of contest. If English Canadians like it, let them do it.

What about non-competitive festivals such as Stratford?

That's a little better but it's an elitist festival. It's not only for the upper class, but for the culture oriented upper class. It's good for spending money, writing articles and taping interviews. My idea of an ideal festival would be a week of Quebec cinema all over Quebec. The films would be shown in small halls and the admission would be free. The thing would be non-competitive and the films would be shown in the poorer areas of the cities and in the small towns.

How great is the influence of Jean Renoir on your films?

He consciously influences me a great deal. Not only do I reverse here films as great masterpieces but I also find that his wit and approach is attuned to mine. He has all the things that I like in the French and little of what I detest, which is more than what I like.

What is it in the French that you detest?

I find that French film, literature, painting, what have you, is pretentious, over-intellectual rather than emotional and sometimes simply boring.

Is Jean Renoir a declined artist? Yes.

Why?

Aging is part of it, I guess. For most people there is a right time and place. There are very few filmmakers who have lasted as long as Hitchcock or Bunuel or even Bergman who consistently for more than ten years has made great films. Very few filmmakers last longer than ten years. There is so much in filmmaking that you must deal with and much of it is outside the film. There is a lot of fighting. Besides just creative energy, you must have enormous energy in general.

How are you resisting your own possible decline?

Well... you know... in thirty years of filmmaking I have made five features. That's an average of one every six years.

You are not afraid?

I'm terrified.

Peter Wronski

Jutra: from Quebec to Paris and back again.

Tubes' flashiness can't cover up hollowness

This man is no latter-day Tull Kupferberg.

In only one way was I able to appreciate the performance of The Tubes Saturday night at Massey Hall and that was with respect to the public service they rendered by serving as a monument to the great, everlasting hollowness of the American myth that Money can buy anything, including the guarantee of artistic success.

The great pretence surrounding The Tubes is that they are satirical group a la Mothers, or Fugs, or Bonzo Dog Band, and consequently you get the token references to among other things, the garishness of American conspicuous consumption, except just as certain big movie producers who shall remain nameless (Norman Jewison) laugh all the way to the bank exploiting those ill people with whom they are supposedly trying to communicate, so The Tubes appeal only to those people who know of an other standard with which to judge a production save their awareness of how much money has been dishd out. There certainly wasn't much of anything else to applaud.

If the show had possessed any real substance at all, I would have enjoyed the costumes, props and bare buttocks as much as anybody else. The costumes were attractive, the dancers were good, and the fat was in all the right places, but in the complete absence of any intelligent satire whatever these frills soon never took you to see a stage musical or a ballet or opera when you were a toddler you might be excused for being overwhelmed by the sight of real live dancers being incorporated into a rock act, and you might think that this represents a bold new synthesis in the history of stage production, but Toronto's supposed to be a Big City, right, and if we want to pretend we're the New York City of the North we can't let ourselves be seen going gaga everytime someone throws a little money into an otherwise worthless effort.

Watching the lead singer imitate Peter Sellers' mad scientist from Dr. Strangelove is not my idea of legitimate humour. (It only made me want to see the movie again, even though I'd just seen it for the umpteenth time on TV last Tuesday.) What's so funny about seeing some guy pretend to be Peter Sellers? Were we expected to rejoice in the communal ecstasy of our mass recognition of who he was imitating, secure in the knowledge that we, too, were tuned in to the beautiful people's wavelenght, or was the group hoping for some of the good vibrations from the movie to rub off on them, in an example of Humour by Association?

These questions are relevant because the group never does get around to presenting anything that rises above this level. After the Peter Sellers imitation they did a bit from South Pacific, which might have been amusing for a few bars but dragged on far too long. Then we were treated to a Tom Jones notice." What an ass.

During the Quasy Lewd number, while the TV screens in the back were showing film of Mick Jagger and Rod Stewart and the band played Waiting For My Man, a Velvet Underground classic, one was struck with a profound longing to be somewhere else, like maybe a Rolling Stones, Faces, or Lou Reed concert. For the music that was played all night was inane, sequential, and I seriously doubt that The Tubes should be even treated in the same manner as other rock bands.

Take for instance the fact that even though the audience was willing the band failed to come up with an encore. Are we supposed to think that The Tubes are so popular that like The Stones they have to flee the area to avoid being mobbed, or is it just that the group is so rigid that they can not deviate one iota, even to the point of coming up with an encore, from what has been pre-programmed? Therefore I think it only fair that the musicians be judged by the same standards as the costumes, the sets, and the dancers, and in this light they too would have been adequate if what the show promised had been delivered. In the face of those who seem to take seriously the promotional material that compares The Tubes to take Fugs or The Bonzo Dog Band (ie, Peter Goddard), I have to wonder when the last time was that they actually sat down and listened to any of their old recordings. There is just no comparison.

This group does not know what to do with the ample resources that some one has been kind enough to leave at their disposal. Since it is apparently so easy for them to get by on the cheap applause generated by all of the material distractions, I doubt whether The Tubes will ever become the source of anything more impressive than what went on Saturday night.

Contrary to the expectations of my reading public, life as the grand Pooh-Bah of Varsity theatre reviewing is not one long succession of complimentary tickets and the company of elegant escorts. Worst of all is the savage butchery of a blue-pencil-crazed editor.

This week's listings: Actors' Perterory Theatre, The Colonnade: The Promise, Tuesday to Thursday at 8:30 and Wednesday at 7; tickets for students $3.50; Lunch-Show, at 12:30 and 1:30 weekdays, presents Through the Eyes of a Child; Old Time Music Hall Friday at 8:30, Saturday 7 and 9:45. The Bear Theatre Company, at 30 Bridgman Avenue, present The Bear and The Proposal by Chekhov. Wednesday to Saturday at 8:30, Sunday at 3; students $2.50 or less. Creation 2, at Church of the Holy Trinity, Trinity Square, produce Face Crime, a life of the young Stalin 8:30 Wednesday to Saturday. This has been drawing poor hours but is apparently by no means disastrous. Factory Theatre Lab are staging a heavy publicity campaign for their season opener, Peaches and Poisoned Cream, previewing tonight and beginning its run officially on Tuesday (see interview). The Factory is located at 207 Adelaide Street East. At the Firehall Theatre, 70 Berkeley Street, Hippolytos has its last two nights at 8:30; students $3.50. New Theatre opens its season with Human Remains, a new play by a well-thought-of local playwright. Curtain 8:45, midnight shows Friday and Saturday as an inducement to the more ghoulish amongst us; Sunday matinee at 2:45. Reservations recommended, as the house is small (534-5000). Last two nights at the O'Keefe for Dame of Sark at 8:30. On the 27th Ipi Tombi, a musical from South Africa purporting to encapsulate black life, begins. Authenticity? You betcha, right down to the Coca-Cola Tin Dance, a frequent sight in the streets of Johannesburg. By the way, H. Rider Haggard first editions are worth over $60 each...

Our friends the Papi Puppet Theatre, who have now set a record for most weeks listed but not reviewed, will not have to wait much longer. But Hansel and Gretel is in its last weekend, Saturday and Sunday at 1 and 3 all tickets $2; next weekend, the Frog Prince begins at the Poor Alex, 296 Brunswick. Redlight Theatre devises a multi-media presentation on the fantastical image of Barbara Ann Scott, in Queen of the Silver Blades, commencing at Cinema Lumiere, 290 College Street on the 29th. Wednesdays through Sundays at 10:00, $2 admission, until November 9. At the Royal Alex, the Shaw Festival's touring production of The Devil's Disciple comes to rest for a week. Show is at 8:30 from Monday until Saturday, except for Tuesday which begins an hour earlier to allow for a ceremonial opening night extravaganza. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Expensive as usual, but probably worth seeing van Bridge, Shepherd and Whitehead.

Theatre Passe Muraille is presenting a revived-up version of Titus Andronicus with first preview Wednesday at Bathurst United Church. Sorry no more details at present. Toronto Arts Productions at the St. Lawrence are now in full operation with the curtain-raiser Surprise, Surprise! fronting Carol Bolt's Shelter. Monday to Saturday, 8:30, Toronto Free Theatre, 24 Berkeley Street, continues April 29, 1975 Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30, Sunday matinee at 2:30; $3 admission. Toronto Workshop Productions previews The Life and Times of Grey Owl at 12 Alexander Street, beginning October 28. Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30; $3 or $3.50 students. York Centennial Theatre (and I am sorry for this omission, especially since it is on my home ground) close their run of Veronica's Room, a classic thriller, at the Central Library Theatre tonight and tomorrow at 8:30; $2.50 students. JW

Friday at SMC, 7:30 and 10, Bergman's dream vision Cries and Whispers, which I like very much, although some don't care for it; I suppose it depends on what kind of dreams you have. It's on Saturday too, same time, same place. The U.C. Film Club (Medsclub, 7:30 and 9:30) has N.Y.N.Y., a short that could be described as reflections on New York — in hubcaps mostly; the Resnais' and Duras' Hiroshima Mon Amour. Leaving the groves of Academe for the concrete jungle, one finds at Cinema Lumiere at 7 and 9:15, The Middle of the World, directed by Alain Tanner, written by John Berger. At the Revue, 7:15 and 9:30, de Sica's second-last film, A Brief Vacation — the title refers to Apollinaire's mot "sickness is the vacation of the poor". At the Poor Alex at 8:30, Kwaidan, a very lavishly produced and beautifully photographed ghost-story anthology from Japan.

Kwaidan and The Middle of the World continue on Saturday, A Brief Vacation on Saturday and Sunday.

Saturday you can see good movies, free, any Saturday at 8:00 in Medsclub — well, you've paid for them already; they're a SAC service. This week it's a Marx Brothers double bill, The Big Store and Animal Crackers. I don't believe there really is anyone who has never seen a Marx Brothers movie, and even if there is, I'm not going to attempt to describe them. You just haven't lived, that's all. At A.G.O., at 3, in their Theatre Circle series, an early Bergman, Sawdust and Tinsel. The Roxy, at 4 and 9 has an early Allen, Take the Money and Run; Allen makes as good a Dillinger as he does a Bogart.

Sunday The Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Southern Africa runs a series of films and discussions called Cinema of Solidarity, about "struggles for liberation throughout the world," on Sundays at 8:00 in Medsclub. This Sunday they're showing The Harder They Come, with reggae star Jimmy Cliff, a highly entertaining and humorous film which does however raise some serious issues. Afterwards, Rosie Douglas will lead a discussion on the economic pressures on the people of the Caribbean, and why so many of them are driven to Canada. At 3 at

A.G.O. To Be Or Not To Be, a 1942 comedy by Ernst Lubitsch, with Jack Benny and Carole Lombard, about a group of Polish actors who help the Warsaw resistance, using their experience as stage Nazis. At Cinema Lumiere, at 3, 5:30 and 8, you can see Mike Nicol's film of Albee's Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? and wonder if Dick and Lick are really playing themselves.

Monday at O.C.A., at 7, free, as usual, The Fall of the House of Usher, by Watson and Weber, the Neil and Buzz of the American avant-garde, and Sunrise, by the great German expressionist F.W. Murnau. Marilyn Monroe fans can get theirs at the Revue tonight and tomorrow: at 7, Wilder's Some Like It Hot, with Tony Curtis, Jack Lemmon and George Raft, and at 9, John Huston's The Misfits, also starring Clarke Gable, and written by the then Mr. Monroe, Arthur Miller — one of the larger bunches of famous has-beens and mediocrities you're likely to see collected around one picture. Also tonight and Tuesday, at Cinema Lumiere, two by Louis Malle: at 7:30, his version of Queneau's Zazie dans le Metro, whose technical innovations inspired Richard Lester and the British New Wave; and at 9:15, Murnur of the Heart.

Wednesday At the Ontario Folm Theatre, way out at the Science Centre, at 7:30, Blood on the Moon, a 1948 western by Robert Wise with Robert Preston and Robert Mitchum. It's really worth going out to Erindale (North Building, Rm 292) at 7 to see Murnau's Nosferatu, if you haven't seen it; it's one of the masterpieces of the German cinema; it's also the greatest Dracula movie ever made, starring Max Schreck (German for "terror"), who never made another movie — of course, if you're six feet six, with pointed ears and seven-inch fingers, it may not be easy to get a wide variety of roles. Perhaps he carelessly went outside when the sun was out. At Cinema Lumiere, tonight and tomorrow, is Fassbinder's melodrama Fear Eats The Soul at 8.

Thursday At the Revue, tonight and Friday, a little light-hearted surrealism: Bunuel's two latest, The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie at 7:30 and The Phantom of Liberty at 9:30.

art

Be a dilettante: review for the Varsity Review.

Other business:

This is publicity release corner of course and we usually let them fight it out among themselves: this week the Art Gallery on Ontario is the un-contested winner. Puvis de Chavannes and the Modern Tradition, a major international loan exhibition opens there today (continues through to November 30). This exhibition of the work and the influence of the 19th century French painter as a definite crowd pleaser, but so is the national juried exhibition of works by Canadian photographers (the show's called Exposure: Canadian Contemporary Photographers) which opens Nov. 1. And as well, the AGO is trying to bring out the crowds this weekend to help it celebrate its 75th year of existence. Tomorrow beginning at 10 a.m. the Gallery offers free lucky draw tickets for framed reproductions from the Gallery Show, magician Michael Roth who "will dazzle all" and Puck Rent-a-Fools who "will clown about". A feature length colour film on Michelangelo, a slide talk and exhibition of Ontario patchwork quilts by Kim Ondaajie and a concert by the Climax Jazz Band are also part of the festivities. On Sunday Edmonton violin virtuosos John Lowry gives a concert in the Walker Court at 3 p.m. Among the other diversions are hourly tours, art quizzes and again lucky draws.

Admission to the Gallery — normally a 50-cent "donation" for students — will be free both days.

The Gallery is presenting a show of French prints of the 19th century in conjunction with the Puvis de Chavannes exhibition; and in recognition of the anniversary year, Acquisitions: 30 years, an exhibition of contemporary works of art bought for the Gallery with funds raised by the Volunteer and Junior Committees, and in The Grange, Goldwin Smith: The Sage of The Grange, a show about the man who donated his home to establish the first Art Gallery 75 years ago.

On campus this coming week; Marion Perlet's oil paintings and ink drawings continue at the New Academic Building, Victoria College, until Nov. 15. Claire Shoniker and Barbara Howard's show at the Hart House Art Gallery closes Nov. 1, to be followed immediately by the A Child of Six Could Do It Exhibition, a show of cartoons about modern art on tour from the National Gallery of Canada. Thoma Ewen's Sky Spirit, an exhibition of pastels in rya, closes at Scarborough College's Meeting Place Gallery Nov. 2.

The big news this week is the Who concert Dec. 11th, but if you haven't got tickets yet you're probably out of luck. Sunday the 26th Sha Na Na is at York University, Monday the 27th, Rod Stewart is at the Gardens while Murray McLaughlin is at Massey Hall. Nov. 1st the National Lampoon Show is at Seneca, Nov. 2nd Bonnie Raitt is at Massey Hall, and Nov. 3rd Melissa Manchester and Orleans are at Massey Hall. Nov. 16th Paul Simon is at Massey Hall, Gino Vanelli is there the 18th, Isaac Hayes is at The Gardens' Concert Bowl on the 19th, and Janis Ian is at Massey Hall on the 24th.

Saturday, October 18 dawned cold, grey and windy, ominous skies trying very hard to carry out their threat of rain. By the time the U. of T. oarsmen arrived at the St. Catharines Henley course, conditions had become the worst in recent memory. Strong headwinds gusting to 40 m.p.h. whipped up angry swells which became whitecaps by race time.

The first novice heat braved likely the day's worst conditions. Blades clipped off the top of waves and converted it to spray, so that all oarsmen were quickly soaked. Novice boat coxswain, Walter Reid, although practically blinded by spray, rallied the crew to a good start and they never looked back, pounding through the surf with authority and finishing a good two lengths in front of their nearest challengers.

The novice final started well, but crews from U.W.O. and Brock, apparently reluctant to be embarrassed twice in one day, immediately converged and collided with the U of T boat. Mysteriously, the referee elected to continue with the race, although he restarted the Jr. Varsity race due to a single collision after nearly 1000 metres.

Lady luck frowned again upon the lightweights, starting with their drawing an outside lane where water was choppiest. Just before the race the wind tore two oars loose from their rack so that they fell to the deck. Both were damaged, one so badly that a replacement oar of a different design was pressed into service, used by Dave Harquail in 7 seat. Even so they got off to a good start, vying for the lead until they encountered especially bad water between the 500 and 100 metre poles. Even so, they held off strong challenges and finished fourth of six boats.

The men's four also had a strong race. With the lead passing between U of T and Western, U of T again in the outside lane, hit bad water around the 1000 metre marker. It was a tough break and enough to tip the scales in favour of the Western crew. U. of T.'s crew looked strong and will be a real threat in the next two weeks.

This weekend's planned excursion to London for Western's host regatta has been amended. It seems someone pulled the plug on Fanshawe Lake, dropping the water level by almost four feet and forcing organizers to consider alternate sites. At writing the likely candidate is 3-Mile Lake, near Woodstock. This will likely be another short course, likely 1500 metre and hopefully with less severe weather and healthy boats and crew. U of T's showing will continue to improve.

Blues tune up for Western

The Football Blues will face the University of Western Ontario Mustangs in their final regular season game this Saturday in London at 2:00 pm.

In an interview yesterday, coach Ron Murphy voiced concern over the recent injury to Lubomir Alexov, the starting right defensive end who injured his knee in practice Tuesday. He will be lost for the season. On a brighter note all-star middle linebacker Julio Giordani should be ready for the playoffs.

Murphy also said that Western has a formidable offense with a plethora of talent in the backfield of which Rob Heartwell, Rick Scarborough and Curt Rush are most notable. Western is 3-3 on the year. The Blues will be looking to get back to their winning ways because the playoffs are only a week away. Next Saturday the Blues will face the winner of the McGill-Concordia game.

Women triumph in field hockey

By KATHY STEWART

Saturday, Oct. 18 dawned windy and bitterly cold, but the kilted ladies from U of T despite the conditions, came out number one again in a dual exhibition tournament against Waterloo and Guelph. The muddy pitches proved to slow the games, but Waterloo the host team, was shown Toronto's skill as they were beaten 3-2. Terry Knight managed a clean drive through the Waterloo defence to score, and Diana Millar and Pat Williams each added goals.

The match against Guelph remained scoreless until Toronto won a penalty-corner. Sue Scott, fullback for the team, cashed in on the opportunity and the game finished a 1-0 victory for the Lady Blues.

University of Toronto hosts Part I of the Provincial Finals next weekend at Scarborough College, and the ladies from Toronto have certainly shown themselves as the team to beat in the OWIAA.

...and in archery

Hardy congratulations are in hand to the Women's Archery Team who last weekend won the OWIAA Outdoor Archery Championships, by over 400 points.

The scores from the tournaments at Guelph and Queens were tallied to give the final scores as follows: Toronto 9032, Western 8602, Guelph 8445, Queens' 7635.

Although the top scorer was Linda Kazienko of Guelph, with 2,388 points, Toronto captured the next three spots with Kathy Corcoran scoring 2360 points, Bernadette Clencier scoring 2323 points and Marilyn Challis scoring 2315 points.

Congratulations are also extended to Elizabeth Farrell, Carol Ann Letman, Elaine Bryans, Barb Faluch and Renate Brunscole who also participated on behalf of Toronto. The indoor archery season will soon be under way and we wish these girls the best of luck.

Ross Hottrum of Vic flights off engineer and Vic goes on to blank Skule 25-0.

Track and field Blues victorious in Sudbury

By HENRY ERR

U of T managed to win the OUAA track and field championships in Sudbury on Saturday for the fourth year in a row. But it wasn't easy as Queen's offered great competition and at various times were leading the Blues in overall points.

Led by Vic Gooding (athlete of the meet) the Queen's squad sparked the fighting spirit of the Blues. Solid strength in the pole vault and high jump closed the gap as the meet approached its close. Brian McInerney and freshman Armand Roch jumped to gold (4.3 metres) and silver (4.5 metres) respectively over Don Kramer who bronzed for Queens.

In the high jump Carl Georgevski (1.95 metres) and Mike McVarish (1.9 metres) outjumped bronze medalist Mike Forsayeth from Queen's.

The relays along with the men's 5000 would eventually determine the winners. Mac ran a strong 4 by 100 metres to gold in 43.5 with Toronto being outlanded in 43.6. Queens bronzed in 44.0.

By this time the Blues were leading. Bill Marcotte ran 14:14 to bring the gold to Ryerson with one of the days better performances. Toronto's Mike Dyon and Steve Findlay ran to second and third ahead of Queens Mark Fields. These performances insured victory and echoed the strength that U of T had displayed throughout the day.

Queen's won the 4x400 with Toronto finishing second and Mac at third spot. Overall U of T won the meet with 183 points, Queens had 171 points making it a very close affair.

There were many fine individual performances on the U of T squad. Gary Feeney ran six races very well, Steve Findlay won the 10000 and bronzed in the 5000, and Steve Chung won the long jump.

Mixed bag today: Philippine dictatorship, energy crisis, Malvina Reynolds, feature on CIA psychics, and African bread.

Rental charge still unacceptable despite reduction, says Barnes

By CHRISTINE CURLOOK
 Despite the fact that the administration had reduced the basic room rental rate, SAC president Gord Barnes is still upset that legitimate university groups are being charged.

an inefficient resolution to the financial problems of the university."

Internal Affairs had decided to apply the rate to inside groups last April but reduced the rate from $8 to $3 an hour.

In his letter Barnes said that many activities of university groups are being curtailed and restricted by this immodest policy; especially those with a strictly limited budget.

The letter states that the university community benefits "immeasurably" from the activities of university groups who are dependent upon it as home for their interests.

The economic rationale (achieving funding through the users) runs contrary to the concepts and objectives underlying the fundamental structure of any free university, Barnes points out.

The current rates apply to regular classroom-sized spaces. There are increased rates for the seven available larger spaces, including Convocation Hall.

Recognized U of T organizations of students, teachers, non-academic staffs and alumni recognize a charge comparable to out-of-pocket costs to the university in making the facility available. For outside organizations of a "social action" nature there might be an extra billing for unusual cost such as security, administration or fire patrols.

University Vice-president Frank Iaccobucci believes that the Internal Affairs Committee will review the policy in the new year. According to Barnes, Iaccobucci does not feel that the committee can absorb all the costs.

Iaccobucci was approached earlier this year by an angry group of law students. Their regular program of events included the use of university rooms for which they received a bill of $1,400.

According to a memo sent to the Internal Affairs Committee which informed members of the decision to reduce the rental rate to $3 per hour, "The system will be carefully monitored to ensure that a rough breakdown point is maintained — and if necessary, rates will be adjusted accordingly."

Science course unions next step for ASSU

Following last week's successful referendum for a fee increase from two to four dollars, the Arts and Science Student Union (ASSU) is looking to expanding their operation.

The ASSU must now receive approval from the Internal Affairs Committee for the increase, but according to president Jeannie Greatbatch, things look "fairly favorable". The committee will consider the question next month.

One of the first objectives for the ASSU, if they receive their funds, will be to mount an organizing drive, particularly for the sciences.

The union currently represents fourteen departments, and according to Greatbatch hopes to have at least 20 by the end of the year. There are 25 departments in the faculty of Arts and Science.

This year ASSU is specifically interested in establishing course unions in Chemistry, Zoology and Computer Science and establishing a separate course union for Mathematics, which currently doubles up with Physics.

"We have so many complaints about computer science," said Greatbatch, who added they have also received many about Chemistry and Zoology.

Greatbatch said the ASSU will be looking for people to help organize in departments and pointed out "In some departments, people are really afraid of repercussions."

"If students are not on departmental committees, there's an attitude that those who want to change things in the department are termed trouble makers," Greatbatch noted.

She said, after talking to people in some departments, she understood comments about intimidation.

Greatbatch said ASSU has just received an application from East Asian Studies to initiate a course union, which will be considered at the next meeting.

The ASSU has set up a Course Union Commission to define what standards must be met by course unions to be recognized by the ASSU. The Commission contains one member from each course union, and also hopes to set guidelines for course evaluations so they will become based on a standard set of principles.

Students in Commerce courses had applied to the Department of Political Economy for funds to put out a course evaluation, Greatbatch said, but "They don't want to sacrifice their autonomy for money."

It was reported this year that the Political Economy department may have edited last year's course evaluation, which the department had helped to finance.

Some unions now get money from departments, a few departments donate help and there are also some who have independent sources, besides any funding they receive from the ASSU. Greatbatch said it is hoped that eventually all unions would be funded by ASSU, but "right now we have so little money."

Despite any move to standardize course evaluations, individual department course evaluation booklets will continue, rather than one containing all departments in ASSU, said Greatbatch.

"We find that individual booklets work out a little better," explained Greatbatch. "It's less wasteful." She said it also allowed each union to devise their own editorial and cover design.

Greatbatch said although she was pleased with the overwhelming support given the ASSU fee raise referendum, she was disappointed in the turnout.

Doesn't look like much but it'll cost you $3 an hour.

Avoid Laxatives

SAN FRANCISCO (EENS-CUP) — A prominent British surgeon interviewed in the current Saturday Evening Post claims that affluent Americans are dying at record rates from diseases virtually unknown in the poorest nations of Africa.

The reason, says Dr. Denis Burkitt, is the lack of roughage, or fiber, in the typical American diet.

He claims that diseases and ailments such as heart disease, gallstones, varicose veins, hernia and hemorrhoids, and cancer of the colon are all directly related to the fact that we commonly strip the natural fibers from our food — particularly from sugar and wheat.

The result, he said, is that "Compared to world standards, America and England are consipated nations."

The doctor claims that his own research throughout Africa produced the astonishing finding that the typical African villager passes three to five times as much waste per day as the typical American.

"We could put the laxative industry out of business by restoring the roughage to our food," says the doctor.

Tenants problems simple - no houses

By S. COX and G. RICHARDS
A conference of the Federation of Metro Tenants' Associations co-sponsored by SAC attempted to strengthen a bid for tenants' rights and tenant power last weekend by offering U of T students information and an opportunity to lend support. This included a conference resolution urging students be eligible for public housing.
A small number of students joined tenants at the Medical Sciences Building to participate in workshops, discussion groups, and a panel debate. The conference also resolved the content of a brief being submitted to the provincial government later this week. "With the present minority government, we are in a position to demand fairness. Our time has come!" said Federation executive Lina Chartrand.

The Federation proposed the establishment of collective bargaining, a separate Landlord and Tenants court and the elimination of the threat of retaliatory evictions.
The Federation also urged rent control, and the security of residential tenure. It specifically demands rent freezes retroactive to January 1974 and believes rent increases should be allowed only after a rise in landlords' costs.

"The form of rent control which Davis is promising would actually make you less secure from eviction," claimed Chartrand. "Each time a new tenant moves in Davis is encouraging landlords to evict tenants whenever they feel like gouging for a bit more rent," she said.
The conference attributed the short supply of affordable housing and land as being a basic cause of tenant problems. It was resolved more responsibility for housing should be given to non-profit co-operative development.
"It is quite clear that the private sector has failed in providing adequate housing and there is every indication they will continue to fail," said resource person Nelson Clarke.
"We don't allow people to buy, or speculate and profit on our friends and children, so why housing?" pointed out conference worker Jack Dekker.
"There's no question, there have to be government land banks. We have to start thinking about expropriating land without compensation," said Dale O'Dell.
The conference resolved "adult only" buildings be restricted. They also decided there should be no conversion of rooms into bachelorettes, a form of housing the Federation feels is geared toward the financial elite.
In the next few weeks the Federation plans to conduct a massive telephone and petition campaign in order to gain public support.

Tenants conference participants all want better housing. Gov't at fault.

One objective stated in the Federation Constitution is "to establish close ties with tenant groups in other parts of Ontario". The organization already unites various groups such as the Parkdale Tenants Association and the Quebec-Gothic Tenants.
The conference brought together a variety of panelists including James Lockyer from Windsor, Alice Hanely from Montreal and Bruce York from Vancouver.

U of T students' proximity to the conference did not guarantee their attendance, but SAC External Commissioner Robert Snell was not dissatisfied. "The conference established a link between students and tenants," he commented.

Martial rule cripples south-east asian state

By MIKE EDWARDS
Martial law in the Philippines was imposed because "democracy was beginning to work," said Raul S. Manglapus, president of the Movement for a Free Philippines (MFP).
The former Philippine Republic cabinet member, and delegate to the nation-wide Constitutional Convention, was speaking to an overflow crowd of 200 at the International Student Centre last Friday night. The crowd was mostly Filipino-Canadians anxious to hear news from their home-land.
Manglapus' speech centred around the failures of the regime of dictator Ferdinand E. Marcos who assumed absolute power on September 22, 1972.

According to sources quoted by Manglapus, the rates of inflation, unemployment, political corruption and crime have all risen. This is in contrast to the official government propaganda which tries to justify the autocratic conditions as the only solution to the country's problems. "Like Adolf Hitler, Marcos created his own crisis," he said.
"Inflation in the Philippines is the worst in the world," said Manglapus. "Marcos has to keep the price of the (Philippine) peso low because the economy is largely based on exports," he explained.
This is in spite of the fact that wages are fixed and strikes are banned, he said.

Manglapus warned the dictatorship of the right radicalized the opposition. He said what is needed is a balance between the left and the right. "That is what democracy is all about."
Before the Marcos coup, Manglapus was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention which was set up to reform the government structures.

The convention was a reaction to massive demonstrations in 1970 calling for election reform, land reforms, and an end to economic ills like inflation and unemployment. The convention was supposed to end by December 1972, at which time the way was clear, Manglapus and others supposed, for Marcos to continue in democratic power as prime-minister. They were wrong, he explained.

Manglapus left the country for a speaking tour in California on September 21, 1972. Martial law was declared the following day. Manglapus' house was raided in the early morning, many convention delegates were arrested and the newspapers all fell under government control.

Manglapus ridiculed the "Bread and Circus" approach of the Marcos Regime. He said the government bid $5 million for the Fischer Spasky chess tournament, the next lowest bid being $400,000 by Italy. A $60 million building was constructed for the Miss Universe contest and a $70 million hotel is being constructed solely for a meeting of the International Monetary Fund, Manglapus said. For the Ali-Frazier fight, Marcos suspended the income tax laws, he added.

Ironically, it is the Muslims who constitute an active guerrilla force in the Mindanao area. The MPA, called Maoists by Manglapus are active in the north.

But Manglapus disassociated himself from "radical" forces. He singled out the Philippine Civil Liberties Union and the Catholic Church (who produce a weekly tabloid) as progressive forces. According to Manglapus, the dissemination of the truth is the most important task confronting those interested in helping the Philippine struggle for democracy from the outside.

To this end the MFP is hoping to fund a short-wave radio station similar to the one used during the war with Japan. They are also conducting a lobby campaign in Washington to stop economic aid to the Marcos regime.

Manglapus pointed to Greece, Thailand and Portugal as examples of countries able to end military dictatorships through "democratic" means. "There is no such thing as a benevolent dictatorship," he said. "The system that keeps Marcos in power will always be repressive."

Profs ill-prepared for library close some indifferent to workers demands

By BEA HAMPSON
They say they care but what are they going to do?
The heads of the University's English, Political-Economy and History departments expressed deep concern about the problems students would face in impending library workers' strike. However, Chairman Wilson, Eastman and Vice-chairman Brown admitted to not having discussed the issue in their department.
"My responsibility is to see that the interest of students are served," said Prof. Robert Brown, vice-chairman of the history department. In view of the apathy, and ignorance shown by most professors on the issue of a general library shutdown and its effects on students, Dr. Harry Eastman chairman of the Political Economy department promised "to develop a policy which would protect the student from the strike as best we can."

U. of T's academic staff appear cynical of the library workers demands for higher wages.
"After all isn't everybody entitled to get the same wage as Trudeau?" queried Professor Zitner from Trinity College. In a similar tone Eastman said, "my sympathy is always with people who want more money." These responses were typical.

Unlike most of his colleagues Prof. Dennis Duffy, expressed a genuine concern for the plight of the library worker. He said, "I feel personally outraged by a situation in which our masters at Queen's Park have made certain that X's fair share of the pie can be gotten only at the expense of Y's."
English Chairman Milton Wilson was the most succinct of all, he had no comment.

Canadian poets: Are they stuck on form. . . .

You accuse me of sloganeering
And being unpoetic
My writing lines like
"Damn the US-Marcos dictatorship."

You are a foreigner indeed,
Foreign to the rhythm of struggle.
In the face of class murder,
How can we be lyrical?

- Clarita Roja
Filipino revolutionary poet

The above is an example of the sort of poetry that most poets participating in this week's International Poetry Festival would never write. Revolutionary poetry is poorly represented in that mainstream of Canadian literature. Is this good or bad?

The twentieth-century arguments about the purpose of art usually square off at opposite corners. One contends that art has no other purpose but itself while the other contends that art serves a definite class and can never be lifted out of that political context. The majority of artists are somewhere in the middle, hoping to shed a little light on injustice while making this end subservient to the art.

The argument may be without resolution. It is dangerous to censure an artist for political silence, just as it is dangerous to try to censure a bricklayer for not voting. Each has a personal choice in speaking or remaining silent, even though silence is a political statement.

Nonetheless, there was something slightly curious at yesterday's meeting of poets and press over brunch at Hart House. Canada's most respected poets were there and there was the sort of camaraderie that usually exists between people of like temperament. Old friends were greeting each other; beer and wine were flowing.

In the back at a round table a Varsity staffer who is a published poet was questioning by nicol and Steve McCaffrey, two of the Four Horsemen, on the subject of content. Both nicol and McCaffrey are very involved with poetic form and are innovators, almost revolutionaries, in both the print and vocal aspects of poetry. They are nowhere near as involved in the possibilities of content as they are in the endless possibilities of changing the look and the sound of poetry.

They were not uneasy, but they did their best to defuse the questioning by punning on the word "content" (at which they were bested by a non-poet). They were in their own way taking a stand that art and reality do not have to be mutually inclusive and that one can be a revolutionary in form without being a revolutionary in content. Needless to say, they shied away from the question.

The atmosphere was one of smugness. It's possible that the question has never entered the minds of Canadian poets because they are not being threatened with imperialist bullets. It's possible that the only politics that ever enters their lives involves dealing with the Canada Council that supports many of them.

The test would of course be forced if Canadians were threatened by American bullets. How would they respond? Would they sink farther back into their para-reality and work harder on form while their audience perished? It is hard to think that they would. But artists are ignoring their duty if they respond only after the fact. Their job is to look ahead.

If artists laugh at the last statement it's only because it is a threat to their stability. To be an artist in Canada is considerably easier than in most other spots in the world. The political reality has infringed so little on the artistic one as to make them believe that the former doesn't matter.

As our system deteriorates, however, they may find themselves plunging into politics as the only form of artistic survival. Art addresses itself to struggle and if they ignore the one that affects every member of their audience, they've lost their mandate as artists.

. . . and can they afford to ignore the content?

"What do I care for politics, I'm a poet," he says.

"Poetry and politics cannot be separated," he says.

Name-calling is "deplorable"

To the Editor:

Feeding upon the Western guilt-complex towards Jews, Zionists seek to employ the term "Anti-Semitism" to silence any criticism or opposition to Israel. By doing so they disregard all the suffering that made it a dirty term. Careless and free use of this terminology is deplorable.

The editor of the Masada has sought to whitewash the facts of my last letter by indulging in such name calling. The label "anti-semitic" cannot be made to stick on a semite like me. All Arabs realize that they and the Jews share the common bonds of semitism. They respect Judaism as a religion which preceded their own. My maligned letter read "It's time to stand behind suffering people, Arabs and Jews alike". On this premise the Arabs opened their hearts and homes to Jewish immigrants when the West experienced the Spanish inquisition, tyrannical Middle Ages and Hitlerism.

For their kindness the Arabs were rewarded by extermination at the hands of the Zionists. Our guests turned against us.

Fortunately, 105 nations of the world community, formerly "haunted" by Zionist propaganda, saw the realities of the situation. That propaganda still has strongholds in a few countries, Canada is one of them. A very recent example occurred at the CBC, which is supposedly charged with the duty of impartially purveying news. Mr. Harry Brown, host of "Metro Morning" was keenly interested in interviewing PLO Advisor Dr. I. Abu-Lughod, on the occasion of his visit to speak at U of T. The executive management of CBC refused to let the Canadians hear the Palestinian side of the story. Gordon Sinclair was the only person in the media who had the courage to blast them for it. How do you explain this?

Mr. W. Heine, editor of the London Free Press says, "writers who try to present the Arab view are vociferously condemned privately and publicly, every possible kind of pressure is exerted to try to silence the unwelcome opinion, and as a last resort charges of anti-semitism are levelled. It makes writers wary, it also makes them mad."

Is this the "freedom" Doidge wants to preserve???

The editor of Masada intentionally misinterpreted my letter. I do call for support for the Palestinian's just cause. Support for the struggle in Vietnam should be coupled with support for the Arab cause. Support is not the same as split-loyalty. In recognition of the poor taste displayed in Masada article on Barney Danson, I will not dwell on the point. All I do point out is that the Federal Minister was castigated in that article for not using his position to pressure the government into following the line laid by Zionists.

Doidge does not appear to remember the Zionist pressure that was exerted on the Canadian government during the UN Crime Conference crisis. Doidge forgets this and makes the absolutist claim that "No Canadian Jew has ever done such a thing." Does he want us to believe that the government made the decision in a vacuum without Zionist pressure?

The Palestinian freedom fighters can be depicted as terrorists if we were able to consider their actions in separation from everything else. But, the difference between the revolutionary and the terrorist lies in the reason for which each fights. Our support for the Vietnamese struggle was based on this premise, the people were fighting a foreign foe. Doidge is not willing to see this in the Palestinian's struggle.

If he is an objective person, willing to condemn inhuman practices, I am sure he will find plenty to condemn in the Zionist behavior — the eviction of the Palestinians from their homeland by foreign terrorists, and the disgusting practices and methods they employed.

SAC paint job is an "insult."

Has anyone noticed the SAC observatory lately? I did so the other day, and did a dismayed double-take. The hemispherical roof, once a sedate pale green, has been transformed into a breast with the help of some pink and brown paint, and a garbage can nipple. Is this somebody's idea of humour?

Rumour has it that this is the work of the engineers — the Toike can be ignored, this cannot. From a purely aesthetic point of view it is ugly; the byproducts of gawking tourists that visit King's College Circle will certainly have a choice anecdote for Cousin Martha back in Cheektowaga.

From a woman's point of view, it is downright offensive, and hopefully this opinion is shared by the male members of the university.

Walking up St. George St. last week I noticed some kind of activity taking place in the bay window of the Kappa Alpha fraternity. In an excess of collegiate hijinks those highspirited frat boys were rating passing women by means of numbered cards. As each woman walked by the window they would frantically try to attract her attention so that she could see her "score".

These two observations may seem to have little in common, but they both indicate a contempt for women by perpetuating the myth of female sexuality as a commodity.

The continual exploitation of the human body, particularly the female, is a sad comment on the mentality of our society, and mammary obsession, public or private, is merely one facet of this.

The fact that some individuals have felt a need to hold up to ridicule something as commonplace as a female breast leaves me in doubt as to their sense of priorities. What is the attitude of such people to their sisters, mothers, lovers? All these women have breasts, but what is so damn funny about them? This is a serious issue, not merely because of a crummy paint job, but because of the attitudes that lay behind such an act. What if the situation were to be reversed? Surely transforming Hart House Tower into a giant penis would generate some protest; is it not an equally sad and ridiculous proposition?

As a puzzled, but nonetheless insulted female and U of T member, I would like to know whose work this is, and who condoned its execution. Surely those responsible for this monument to adolescent bad taste would like some recognition for their efforts.

Malvina Reynolds feels "fine", in Toronto this week

By KRISTINE KING

Malvina Reynolds, singer-songwriter and activist, was feeling pretty good when she answered her phone last Thursday.

"I'm fine. Berkeley is beautiful; the sun is shining. I was going to go outdoors but I stayed in writing some songs," said Reynolds, after asking someone to turn down the stereo so we could hear each other.

Reynolds, who has appeared at past Mariposa Folk Festivals, will be in concert at Convocation Hall Wednesday night.

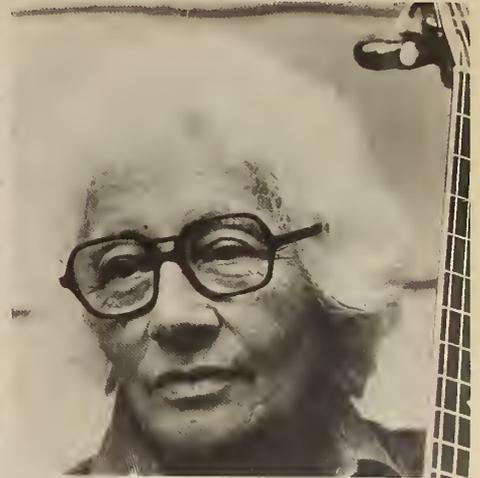

Malvina, a soft, white mane cut short and carefree frames a weathered, determined face. Mama Lion, whose kingdom is the world and who growls when the precarious balance of that kingdom is threatened, whose songs tell stories about her cubs, people like you and me. A big, firm paw seemingly descends in warning when we stray in the path of danger. A deep, warm purr praises our growing awareness, our goodness, and records our common humanity.

Reynolds, a sensitive and socially conscious individual, has written between 400 and 500 songs. Among them are "Little Boxes"; "Turn Around" which Harry Belafonte made famous, and "What Have They Done To The Rain", recorded by Joan Baez. Around the time she reached the tender age of 75 years, last August, Reynolds released her seventh album, "Held Over".

Her songs are topical. They are comments on every conceivable, passing phenomenon, reaching out to everyone: environmentalists, feminists, populationists, lovers, workers, ad infinitum. The image is overwhelming. What follows is an edited version of our conversation.

Malvina Reynolds was born in San Francisco and received her baccalaureate, master and doctorate degrees in English from the University of California at Berkeley. She had planned to teach but couldn't get a job and so, she worked as a telephone operator in a factory and did other odd jobs. I asked her why she wasn't hired and how she felt at the time.

"No one ever told me why. I was a Phi Beta Kappa, I was a good student and a good student teacher. I can only say that it seems as though there was subliminal blacklisting going on. I had been mildly involved in the Young Socialist League, in anti-war activities and unions, but certainly not in any leadership capacity.

"My family was socialist. The FBI and CIA in this country really don't need a reason to hound a person.

"I was very depressed and bitter. Civil rights organizations were not as active then. If they had been I certainly would've gone to them for help.

Q. What motivated you to write songs and when did you start?

"I began writing when I was 45. I'd always been a writer, though not successful. Talking, communication, this is what interests me. I'm a word addict.

"I fell in with the beginning of folk music in the '40s, Pete Seeger and Woody Guthrie, people like that. I liked that kind of material and treatment of music. I felt very much at home with it.

Q. Is there a specific reason for keeping your lyrics simple?

"The communication is important. I write songs that are understood and memorable. I admire people who have wild poetic imagination, like Bob Dylan, but that's not my style.

Q. You've written a lot of songs about women. How long have you been interested in the women's movement?

"All of my life. My mother had rather advanced views. She told me, "Any women can have a baby but you've got brains and you should do something with them." I suppose that's why I didn't get married until I was 30. My family was very interested in my having an education and career.

Q. I know that you're active within your community. Are there any groups that you are involved with?

"I don't involve myself in any groups. I'm kind of a freelance resource for many things I believe in. I recently attended a feminist press party in New York. I write songs about things that interest me: ecology, justice for the small nations, unemployment and

The CIA's Psychics-Better than Nuclear

Matthew, as a pacifist, refused to work for the Ministry of Defence.
That was where the trouble started.

By ROBERT ANTON
WILSON

A British parapsychologist with a string of academic credentials long enough to choke a horse, and a young mind reader described by the Continental press as "the English Uri Geller", are preparing a book that they claim will be the Watergate of the occult world.

The parapsychologist, Dr. Peter Bander, editor of Psychic World, is an expert on criminology as well as ESP and 'spook stuff'. He is alarmed about growing signs that governments are moving in on the psychic world, monopolizing it and perverting it toward a new kind of international terrorism even worse than the nuclear arms race.

The young psychic, 19 year old Matthew Manning is equally concerned and has demonstrated powers that make him even more astounding than Uri Geller. Some have even said that he seems to have all the psychic abilities of Geller, of clairvoyant Peter Hurkos, and of Edgar Cayce combined — perhaps even more.

'NEW ENERGY' IN TORONTO

Like Geller, Matthew Manning can bend metal and change its molecular structure without touching it. He has demonstrated this to several scientific groups. After observing Manning perform for the New Horizons Research Foundation in Toronto, Nobel Prize physicist Dr. Brian Josephson exclaimed, "A redefinition of reality and nonreality is needed now . . .

We are on the verge of discoveries which may be extremely important for physics. We are dealing here with a new kind of energy.

Like Hurkos, Matthew Manning can read minds at a distance and, according to tests by Dr. Hans Bender in Germany, with a greater accuracy than ever recorded by any other psychic in the history of parapsychological investigation.

Like Cayce, Matthew Manning can diagnose and prescribe for patients he has never seen, although he has no training in medicine. Unlike Cayce, Manning has learned the identity of the 'entity' working through him in these medical miracles. It calls itself Dr. Thomas Penn, but 'Penn' has never revealed whether he lived in the past, in the future, or in another dimension.

BERTRAND RUSSELL'S
GHOST

Matthew has a number of other documented "wild talents". He can produce automatic drawings in the styles of Picasso, Durer, Goya, and other masters; write in languages he has never studied, such as Russian, Arabic, and Japanese; cause knives, vases, and even heavy beds to float around like ballerinas. He has also received messages from various dead saints of the Greek Orthodox Church (some of them containing information known only by Archbishop Athenagoras, who takes these messages very seriously), from 503 past inhabitants of the village in which he lives, and from entities who signed themselves Samuel Pepys, Winston Churchill, and even agnostic Bertrand Russell (who has changed his mind — naturally enough — about personal survival after death).

To top it all off, on three occasions when Kirlian photographs were taken of the energy unleashed by Manning, the Kirlian machines were blown out.

I met with Matthew Manning and Dr. Bander during their recent visit to the Bay area to plug their recent book, The Link (Holt Rinehart). Although impressed by the scientific reports on Matthew included in the book, I asked for a personal demonstration.

TELEPATHIC SKETCHES

Matthew went to one end of the hotel room and I went to the other. I started to draw a sketch which he attempted to pick up telepathically. I considered a star, but couldn't decide whether to make it one point up (White magic) or two points up (Black magic) and instead drew a tetrahedron.

Matthew showed me his sketch. He had drawn the 'one point up' star, the 'two point up' star, and two tetrahedrons interlinked.

We tried again. I drew a pair of concentric circles with two dots inside the inner circle.

Matthew, across the room, drew a pair of concentric circles with a series of dots between them.

DEAD DOCTOR'S DIAGNOSIS

I next asked for a consultation with the mysterious Dr. Penn, who diagnosed on the basis of birthdays only. Unfortunately, I slipped up and instead of giving the birthday of my eldest daughter, as I'd intended, I gave the birthday of my second daughter.

"Dr. Penn" was befuddled, evidently. He wrote several lines which applied to neither daughter — but they all applied to me. He duplicated in exact detail the diagnosis of my lower leg problem recently given by my orthopedist.

ELEVEN YEARS OLD

At this point I was convinced Matthew Manning was the real article, and not just a clever stage magician who had been going around duping credulous scientists. Anyway, I have never really believed that clever stage magicians can dupe scientists, who are usually quite incredulous.

Dr. Bander had been quite a friend and counsellor to Matthew Manning (and his occasionally worried parents) ever since Matthew's powers first appeared, in the form of poltergeist disturbances, when Matthew was eleven years old.

I began discussing the scientific implications of Matthew's powers with Dr. Bander and somehow we got onto the subject of government persecution of dissident scientists. Among those discussed were Dr. Wilhelm Reich, who was jailed as a fraud when he discovered the bio-energetic field in the 1950's only to be posthumously confirmed by Kirlian photography in the Sixties, and Dr. Timothy Leary (currently among the missing).

OCCULT WATERGATE

Dr. Bander then dropped a little bombshell. He told me about the new book he and Matthew are preparing which he described as "an occult watergate".

"The real truth about governments and occult science will be even bigger than Watergate," he said grimly.

Among other things, Dr. Bander said, the book will deal with attempts to force Matthew to work for the Ministry of Defence; which Matthew, as a pacifist, refused.

DOUBLE DEALING DEFENCE DEPT.

Shortly thereafter Matthew was persuaded to perform for scientists at London University, only to discover that they were operating under a grant from the Ministry of Defence. Matthew and Dr. Bander indignantly withdrew.

After this incident Bander issued a public statement saying:

"Neither Matthew Manning nor I intend to work under the auspices of any defence organization and or participate in experiments which could conceivably become 'classified information'. We believe that any gifts or abilities which may be discovered should be made known and available to scientists and be used for the benefit of humankind".

CIA AND LETTER BOMBS

That was when the real trouble started. Dr. Bander claims that agents of Scotland Yard's Special Branch have infiltrated his business office under fake credentials representing themselves as scientists. Furthermore, he asserts, his phone has been repeatedly tapped, veiled threats against Matthew have been made by government officials, the CIA has been investigating and trailing them around, and a letterbomb has been sent to Matthew.

Matthew confirmed all this for me and implied that there was much more of the same, which they didn't care to release at this time. "The Ministry of Defence wants to control these powers and use them destructively," he charged flatly. A week later, Uri Geller gave precisely the same warning on the "All the People" TV show.

ROCKEFELLER, ROTHSCHILD, AND RHODES

Matthew added that he had been cajoled into a private demonstration of his powers they almost certainly are trying.

for Lord Rothschild, chairman of the Think Tank, the English equivalent of America's Rand Institute, where war game strategy is decided. Lord Rothschild later denied that such an interview-demonstration had taken place. Dr. Bander showed me a letter, on the letterhead of Lady Teresa Rothschild, requesting Matthew to meet with Lord Rothschild.

This is especially interesting to those who believe in the Round Table conspiracy, allegedly founded by banker Cecil Rhodes, in 1888. According to this theory, the Rothschilds, acting through the Royal Institute for International Affairs, and the Rockefeller, acting through the Council on Foreign Relations, have largely staffed the English and American governments with their own hand picked servants all through the 20th century. Oddly, both the Birchers and the Weather Underground have published documentary exposes of this 'conspiracy'.

HIGHEST PSYCHIC RATINGS

The real pressure on Matthew Manning to force him to work for the government began after the tests by Dr. Hans Bender, in Germany. These tests showed that Matthew scored higher than any previous psychic in reading the minds of subjects over ten miles away.

According to Dr. Bander, an English official told him that since his home was only five miles from Checkers

(the Prime Minister's country estate) there could be no more internal security until Matthew became a government employee. Dr. Bander insists that this was accompanied by an implied threat in the form of a remark about how many young people die in auto accidents every year.

THE TWENTY YEAR PLOT

An interesting chronology appears in the following:

UFOs AND USAF

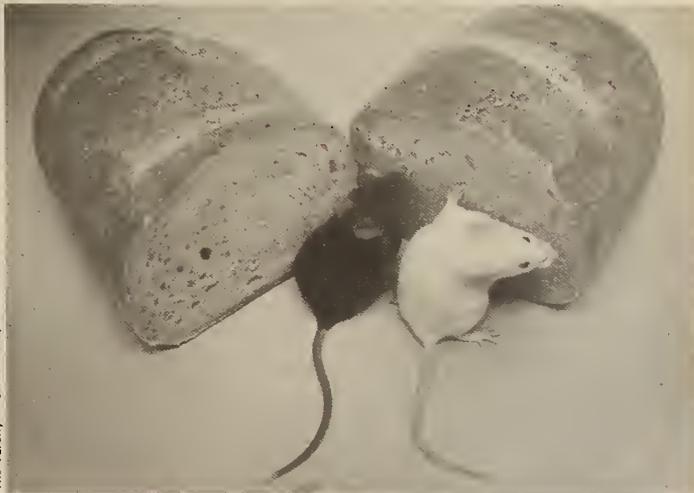

1953—THE CIA dictates to the U.S. Air Force that a negative and skeptical policy on UFOs must be adopted. Major Dewey Fourn and Captain Ed Ruppelt later leave the Air Force and subsequently announce that the evidence collected by 'Project Bluebeard' supports the extraterrestrial hypothesis of UFO's.

1971—DR. JAMES E. MacDONALD, who had been at the 1953 meeting in which the CIA browbeat the Air Force into the negative UFO position, and who thereafter fought long and hard to have the relevant documents declassified, is found dead of a gunshot wound. Verdict: suicide.

'Bread' for Tanzania

The Varsity — Steve Malayas

The Canadian government's idea of what constitutes 'international aid' is often very self-serving. Witness the case of a large loan recently given to the Dar es Salaam Automatic Bakery, in Tanzania.

Until a few months ago, the city's bread was baked in a number of small bakeries. These are relatively labour intensive, but uncomplicated. They rely on local equipment, use wood or charcoal burning boilers, and can handle a range of raw materials — maize was experimented with during the recent wheat shortage. Locally financed they have always run efficiently.

Early this year, however, a two million dollar automated bakery began production. The product is a joint venture between the para-statal National Milling Company, and CIDA, the Canadian aid agency, which provided a soft loan of one million dollars. The loan, however, was tied to Baker-Perkins, a Canadian manufacturer, and 90 per cent of the plant — designed for Canada's high wage economy — had to be imported.

The bakery requires 50 per cent hard wheat — which has to be imported as it cannot be grown locally. Cost-per-job, a vital consideration in a developing country, proved to be $40,000 as against an estimated $1,800 for the technologies already provided in Dar es Salaam. To run the bakery an expatriate manager was employed, and several Tanzanian graduates have been seconded for one year bakery technician courses in Canada.

The new bakery cannot even guarantee bread supplies. Its entire output is processed through a single oven. The boilers are oil fired, and all spare parts have to come from Canada. The high rate of growth of the local market for least ensures that there will be no actual closure amongst the small bakeries, although their production has had to be cut. But employment in the industry will stagnate for the next few years while production grows at an estimated 25 per cent per year. It is calculated that by investing in local technology, the Tanzanian government could have saved as much as $1.3 million — and created 300 jobs rather than the 50 required for two shifts working at the automatic bakery.

U of T symposium investigates anti-semitism

By LAURIE WALSH

"The non-Jewish world has not yet grasped the philosophical and historical significance of the Jewish Holocaust. This must be faced to ensure that nothing like it ever recurs again," U of T president, John Evans told a Convocation Hall symposium Thursday night.

Evans chaired the conference Symposium on "The Holocaust: Its Place in History Today", the last lecture in a series of four discussing the elimination of the Jews in Nazi Germany. Speakers to the Symposium included Professor Emil Fackenheim, U of T Philosophy professor, Professor Yehuda Bauer, Chairman at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, and University of Vermont Political Science professor Raul Hilberg.

"History has changed as a result of what was done to my people. The situation is hopeless if we don't face what happened," Fackenheim told the audience. "We can see the facts and how the machinery was set in motion but we are forced to ask why such a crime was committed even if we fail."

"The reason has to be the logic of the devil. To find a justification for the hatred of every Jew, a final ideology had to be escalated. The act of birth itself became a crime for the Jew and this has been unsurpassed anywhere."

Fackenheim concluded that the ideology inherent in anti-semitism today is "part of the same dark cloud that still hangs over us. We must learn to live with it, try to understand it, and defeat it."

Bauer concerned himself with a historical perspective. "The Holocaust was possible because of the age-old hatred of the Jews, the conditions of modern technology, a vast bureaucratic system where members don't have to hate but merely do their job, and finally a war that escalated things," he said.

"We are not free of any of these elements today, so we are still living in a Holocaust kingdom."

Bauer said he found the jump between what was said and felt about the Jews, and the murders in the gas chambers as an inexplicably cultural phenomena. "Is this inherent in human development?" he asked, "and if so, what can, therefore, be done to avoid reaching such a point again?"

"We should be aware of the responsibility we all bear as historians towards future generations in transmitting our partial knowledge of The Holocaust and the surviving Jewish identity," Bauer said. "A historical consciousness must be developed to begin to grasp a little of what has happened."

Hilberg, author of "Destruction of the European Jews", said five-years ago at McGill University that he would probably not speak of the Holocaust again. "The Holocaust has not been lost in time," he now admits, "but is part of a constant process of searching and unearthing. That which eludes understanding remains."

"The Holocaust happened not only to the Jews but to Germany as well and they know it. No one stopped in the middle of what they were doing.

All was rationalized and pills were taken to soothe nerves in the act of killing. I find it appalling how decent the Germans remained to themselves. They killed yet were economically and domestically secure. A crucial part of the moral code, that shall help, was violated." "For those born after the event, the Holocaust becomes a central phenomena to be contended with," Hilberg concluded.

especially the particular burdens this places on black people. I just wrote a new song about the farm workers' movement. I wrote it for a benefit party for the UFW. I have been following the agriculture movement for a very long time.

"I just wrote a song on Plutonium. I think this is one of the most sinister things happening right now. There is so much pressure for nuclear power. They're setting up plants everywhere without any consideration of the lethal, poisonous effects that this has on people and the environment.

"I also write songs about people. I like people, they have fun, they have love affairs, 80 per cent of my songs are about people.

"I give sermons in churches and sing, and tell things the way I see them. I don't talk about pie in the sky. I try to get back to the community and what they want to hear.

Q. You had a marriage that lasted forty years until your husband died three years ago. What is your view of the institution?

"Mine was a good one and many marriages are. But now, there is no permanent economic basis for families. For most young men, it's their responsibility that they can't cope with. It destroys people's sense of responsibility for one another. It leads to violence and a lack of consideration for each other.

Q. So, what do you think will happen?

"Society is falling apart. I'm not very hopeful for the future. Violence is a very destructive thing. People should be confronting the fact and helping one another. The only thing that will help unite us in constructive ways is involvement in unions and organizations such as women's groups.

Q. What made you decide to publish your own songbooks and produce your own records?

"I was on contract with Columbia for 6 years and they only issued one album and didn't do much to distribute it. I was fighting for another album at the time and was able to get out of the contract.

"I get a lot of letters asking me how to break into the music industry. It's a gangland filled with business types who don't know a song from a piece of pie.

"I sell my books and records through some modern distributors, through schools and women's bookstores. It runs it into some problems sometimes, people can't get my records and books.

Oil producers talk of energy crisis

"The earth itself produces 70 million times more energy a second than ever gets used. We've known for years about things like a solar energy and conservation techniques but we've just ignored them."

This controversial argument was given by Alvin Hamilton, former Diefenbaker cabinet minister, addressing in Ottawa recently.

Whether or not this crusty old farmer-turned-Red Tory was correct seemed to be the only delegate thinking along new lines at the Carleton University international energy conference.

This lack of creative thinking at the conference suggests one reason why we suddenly have an "energy crisis".

Western industrial society runs on energy, and without it would disintegrate. Suddenly in the past five years this unthinkable possibility has become very real. The oil-producing Arab countries raised oil prices for the West. No longer under economic exploitation they want to begin laying a new industrial base.

The world's total estimated oil and coal reserves will only last another 30 years or so. In the meantime prices will continue to rise.

The energy-hungry Western nations are looking around in a hurry for a new source of energy. Although hydro-electric power is still a possibility, most areas have already been tapped. Scientists are looking to nuclear generating stations and American and Canadian experts are trying to figure out how to share energy.

The recent conference drew 45 delegates from both sides of the border, representing corporations, governments and universities. Although sponsored jointly by Carleton and Cornell University, the conference was supported by grants from the Rockefeller Foundation and Gulf Oil Canada, Limited.

The agenda topics ran more along the lines of "The economic political framework as a constraint on Canadian-American energy relations." Or, "The probability and implications of an early massive shift toward electrical energy in Canada."

Discussions, such as "Fuel sources: nuclear power," were conducted along technical and largely predicted lines. It was not a discussion that would either ignite the public imagination or give a visiting politician like Alvin Hamilton a chance to throw a wrench into the proceedings.

When a wrench did get tossed in, and few did, the delegates didn't take long to extract it.

For example, during a discussion of nuclear generating stations fueled by uranium, Mason Willrich, a law professor from the University of Virginia, argued that large amounts of plutonium were produced as waste by-products.

"Plutonium is one of the most toxic materials known to man," said Williams, "because it has a half-life of 33,000 years."

Storage of plutonium poses a great problem for existing nuclear energy plants, such as Pickering. This Ontario Hydro plant already stores 200-300 tons of nuclear waste containing plutonium.

Elsewhere plutonium is stored in steel-lined containers in the sea or buried under the ground. With prospects of huge plutonium buildups, scientists are already talking about shooting the deadly toxin into space or burying it uncontained in wastelands.

The danger of plutonium is that leakage can damage the environment, Woolrich warned. He also said guerrillas could capture plutonium to make nuclear bombs, because all the other technology is readily available.

Four conference speakers and those who raised questions hewed to this technical line. J. A. L. Robertson, representing the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, spoke on "CANDU reactor technology: Toward a North American strategy." The speech was a blatant public relations attempt to sell Canadian-developed nuclear reactor fueled by uranium and cooled by heavy water. The Americans listened skeptically, seemingly content with their own reactors cooled by light water.

Alfred E. Kahn, chairman of the New York State Public Service Commission, delivered a forceful and equally blatant address encouraging Canadians to sell their energy to energy-hungry New York State.

"My staff tells me Canada may want to sell us energy but politically it has to be done quietly," said Kahn as the delegates laughed.

Kahn quickly went on to argue why we should sell our limited energy to America.

"It's an investment decision. A decision to hold uranium in the ground is a decision to build less schools and laboratories," Kahn said.

Arguing Canadian population would rise to 35 million and American population would rise to between 265 million by 2000 A.D., Kahn said energy demands would continue to grow and there was no prospect of a technological breakthrough which would easily solve the demand.

Why should Canada want to scar her wilderness for Americans, Kahn asked. What would we get in exchange?

"Money!" Kahn exclaimed, while the spectators could hear delegates sucking in their breath at this frank talk.

You can't blame an American representing energy-starved New York for speaking frankly, but where were the angry experts by the Canadian energy reports at the conference. They outnumbered the Americans 36-9.

And issues there are in abundance:

- Will proliferating nuclear generating plants produce energy affluence for the world, or will they prove too expensive and environment dangerous?

- Will nations like Canada sell nuclear reactors to developing nations who can't afford high oil prices. If so, will they develop nuclear bombs from the reactors.

- How will highly radioactive plutonium wastes be stored?

- Should Canada sell energy to the United States for money at the price of scarring her environment?

- Will alternative energy sources be developed, such as solar power, rather than expensive technologically-based energy sources?

None of the 45 delegates present seemed to press for discussions of those kinds of hard questions.

Blues sloppy in win over Western

By JONATHAN GROSS
Varsity Sports Editor

Despite 160 yards in penalties and a miserable second half the Blues came up with a 20-13 win over the Western Mustangs in an OUA football game in London, Saturday.

The Blues' problems lay mainly in execution. When a lineman overreacts to a situation, penalties result. The defense was excellent and although the offense let up in the second half their first quarter showing was adequate for the win. During the first quarter it seemed as if the Blues would blow the hapless Mustangs out of the stadium. It was 7-0 after three minutes. Aided by two penalties the Blues scored on a 34 yard pass from half-back Mark Bragagnolo to Brent Elsey.

Less than two minutes later the Blues were on the scoreboard again set up by a fine interception by Paul Forbes. Two catches by Mark Ackley were the key plays in a drive that was crowned by a three yard plunge by Libert Castillo. All fine.

By this time the crowd of 6,000 Western fans were a little uneasy. The Mustangs were out of a game that had barely started. The Blues wanted this game badly after last week's loss to the Gee-Gees of Ottawa. The playoffs begin next week.

Then things slowed up a little. Neither team seemed to want the football. Bragagnolo fumbled on his own thirty. Following this Blues Rick Jeyman intercepted Western QB Jamie Bone's pass. But Bragagnolo gave it up again on the next play. No prizes.

Bragagnolo returned to end a 65 yard touchdown drive by carrying the ball in from the one. Sad at missing the last convert, Mike Sokovinin hit on target and Varsity led 20-0. Thus ends the Toronto scoring.

During the next three quarters the Blues were too busy beating themselves, the officials and the Mustangs to worry about putting points on the board.

Bone was wisely benched in the second quarter by head coach Darwin (Survival-of-the-fittest) Semotiuik.

The second quarter featured a well executed drive by Western that began on their own 19. The key play was a 20 yard reverse by Jay Parry that carried the ball down to the Toronto 18. Replacement QB Brian Fess threw a six point strike to Brian Gervais. The convert was good and the score was now 20-7.

The Blues seemed to be playing in another dimension as Western came back again with a field goal late in the quarter to make it 20-10 at the half. Each team had four turnovers, mostly in the first half, in a game that was not the best played of the year.

The only interesting play of the second half was on a field goal by Western. In the third quarter on a third and four situation the Mustangs kicked a field goal but the Blues were offside. Instead of accepting the penalty to get a first down, Semotiuik let the field goal stand ending the scoring at 20-13.

In an opinion poll taken within a few players most were upset about the officiating as opposed to the play of the team. Ron Murphy said that last week's loss to Ottawa helped in maintaining non-compliance on the team. He also mentioned that the officiating was not particularly good. Murphy used the word "biased".

The Blues ended the season at 6-1 heading into the playoffs.

Despite some mediocre play there were many players who deserved credit for their performances on and off the field. Libert Castillo led the backs with 127 yards followed by Mark Bragagnolo with 102 yards. Dave Langley was 7 for 16 for 150 yards while running for 39. Esteban Jowicz led the receivers with four catches for 97 yards.

Brent Elsey played well. He had one very long run called back on one of the numerous penalties called against the team.

For Western the only man to pose any kind of constant threat was running back Rob Heartwell who carried the ball twenty times for 116 yards.

The Blues gained an impressive total of 459 yards against 232 for Western.

It was a fierce battle with play halted many times for injuries that resulted from numerous late hits and vicious blocks. Never let it be said that Canadian college football isn't rough.

On defense Angelo Castellan got to the Western quarterbacks several times while Rick Jeyman picked off two passes. John Vernon was solid at linebacker.

And the LGMB played on.

Toronto fans few but happy

No report on the game would be complete without a report on those who are a large part of the game. This reporter chose to approach it by travelling on the SAC bus.

At 10:30 am a motley crew of 25 pulled away from Convocation hall. Shortly thereafter a small but inebriated group of representatives from the Lady Godiva Marching Band hijacked the bus to a Brewers Retail, absconding with three cases of Molson's finest.

Before going on this excursion I had visions of a tequila induced orgy that would last right through the game. But I was a dupe of Skule publicity.

Although my fantasies did not come true I did have a good time. The small but enthusiastic crowd along with the LGMB was more than a match for the Western fans in drinking and rudeness. The cheerleaders who made the trip to Western were active throughout the game although Toronto fans had little to cheer about during the second half.

The only disappointment was our lack of numbers. Next week the playoffs start. A school this size should muster more than a few dozen hard core fans.

A time consuming hobby for most people in a group is coming up with the killer one liner or joke. The following is the best effort of the day. The following is a true story. The names weren't changed.

Skule 1 boards the SAC bus carrying a large uncovered tuba.

Skule 2 remarks, "Why don't you put it in the luggage compartment with the rest of the instruments." Skule 1 replies, "But I don't have a case." Skule 2 concludes, "I know but then, I'm not a lawyer."

It was that kind of day.

Blues playoff against Concordia

The University of Toronto Blues will play Concordia University in the OUA football semi-finals next week at Varsity Stadium. Concordia defeated the McGill University Redmen 26-25 on a last minute touchdown pass Saturday in Montreal.

The Blues are still missing all-star middle linebacker Julio Giordani but expect him back for next week after a rib injury. Toronto has not played Concordia but are expecting a tough battle. The game will probably start at 2:00 pm Saturday.

End of an era for Varsity Soccer

By MICHAEL HENDRICKSE
The Varsity Blues Soccer team ended the season with a 3-1 victory over its arch enemy the McMaster University Marauders. The Blues goals were scored by Pittero, Ierullo and Vassilou. The Blues defense led by Crewe and Beale, played an almost flawless game. Ierullo and Slimmons set the pace for the team with their hustle and tenacious play.

For Crewe, Beale, Terullo and Slimmons this game marked the end of their Varsity careers of four years. Their spirit and talent will be sorely missed next year. But next year's team should play with the same pride and enthusiasm that these players have shown in the past.

Two strikes, no winners.

Library workers offered 15% raise

By BOB COLLIER

Simcoe Hall has made its first major offer in the protracted dispute with university library workers, said Judy Darcy, president of CUPE 1230. The offer was made at an eight hour conciliation meeting on Monday between the university's spokesman John Parker, the library workers' negotiating team and government mediator George Markovitz.

The three parties will be meeting again today to go over the offer once more.

According to Darcy, Parker has offered the library workers an increase on the old contract of "15 per cent on matters with monetary implications."

Darcy doubts that the workers will accept this offer since they have been pushing for a raise of about 40 per cent.

When contacted yesterday, Parker said he was "not at liberty to divulge the amount of the increase" because the negotiations are still under way. However, he said that the university has made a "substantial offer." When asked whether the university offer approached the workers' demands, he replied "no."

But "we will meet with them Wednesday and try again," he said.

The 15 per cent increase applies to any benefit with monetary implications, explained Darcy. Either we take a 15 per cent increase in salary or a reduced pay raise and more holidays and better fringe benefits, she said.

"But Parker is only offering a one year contract from the date of signing, so it's a raise of 15 per cent over 16 months, not over one year," she pointed out. The old contract expired last June 30.

If the university offer was taken as a straight financial increase, the base pay for a library technician would rise from $5,771 to about $6,400 a year or to about $125 a week. The highest category in the union, a binder of rare books with five years' experience would get $17,000, an increase of $1,700 a year.

The administration offer is far short of the union demands, noted Darcy.

They are now fighting for an across the board monthly payments of $265 a month on top of their present pay. The same amount would be paid to each of them irrespective of their rank "to reduce wage disparities among the workers," said Darcy.

The lump sum payments add up to $2,800 a year or a 48 per cent increase for the poorest paid worker and 17 per cent for the best. The 107 a week worker would then get about $170 a week.

If the wage offer exceeds the federal wage and price controls, the union and the university will apply to the anti-inflation board in Ottawa for permission to go ahead. Because the last contract was signed before January 1, 1974, it is likely that their application will be accepted.

Parker's charges that library workers are not highly qualified is "an open insult," Darcy claimed. "The university changes our rank to suit their convenience," she said. "One minute we are almost considered as academics and then they say we are unskilled labour."

"It's true that we don't need many qualifications, when we start, but over the years we learn and develop new skills," she noted.

SAC supports essay, exam extensions in event of library shutdown

By LAURIE WALSH

A motion asking professors to extend essay and exam deadlines in the event of a library strike has been supported by the SAC executive.

The motion from the Arts and Science Students Union will be presented to SAC General Council Wednesday night. This proposal will also be considered by the General Committee of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science at their meeting on November 3.

At the SAC executive meeting Monday night it was also agreed that an Ontario Federation of Students brief on the Ontario Students Awards Program (OSAP) be adopted by council.

The brief is to be sent to the Ontario Government's Advisory Committee on Financial Assistance for students. It is preparing a report for Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott.

The wording of the report was amended to include a recommendation that student's summer earnings and actual parental contribution be considered in calculating student loans. Although the purpose of the committee's review is to simplify the OSAP procedure, it was felt that the need for consideration of financial contribution was crucial.

The executive also voted support for a petition from Erindale students protesting a fare increase from 15 to 35 cents for the bus service from the Erindale to the St. George campus. The petition will also be presented to the SAC Wednesday meeting.

University Commissioner Jay Lefton and Internal assistant Kevin Kelleher presented the proposed SAC submission on student visa applications, which is to be presented to the sub-committee on Admission and Awards. A motion that the executive recommend SAC General Council adopt the proposed submission was carried.

The brief recommends "that every faculty receiving adequate, and academically qualified, foreign applications for admissions, be encouraged to make not less than ten per cent of places available to foreign visa students."

The executive also proposed that SAC grant $150 to the Toronto Association of Student Councils toward publication and distribution of a report of their September conference. The chief purpose would be to create a "good liaison with the Association," said Communications Commissioner, John Tuzyk.

A motion that SAC recommend to the Varsity Board of Directors that it establish a policy of not accepting advertising firm Essay Services or term paper companies was referred to the Communications Commission.

It was also recommended that SAC cover the cost of advertising for the Ward 6 Community Organization "Co-Op" Party at Innis College to a maximum of $150.

Academics start war on marking inflation

By PAUL McGRATH

In an attempt to stem galloping academic inflation, U of T policy makers are considering a move that would peg the value of the almighty A.

The Academic Affairs committee will resume discussion tomorrow on a "Report on Grading Practice Policy." According to chairman William Dunphy, it will end the confusion surrounding the assigning of marks at the university.

Concern over the "erosion of academic standards" among faculty members, evidenced by what some see as the awarding of too many high marks, has led in the past few years to unofficial guidelines that others see as arbitrary. The enforcement of these guidelines has led to ill will between markers and those committees whose job it is to overlook the marking in each department.

"We are not concerned with arbitrary, mechanical measures," says Dunphy. He sees the committee's job as getting to the professor before a committee does by offering the faculty a clear definition of what each mark should represent in the way of academic achievement.

Because of the lack of this clear definition, situations have occurred involving the changing of marks after they were awarded by a faculty member. In James Eayr's POL 208 and POL 312 courses, borderline marks in the A category were shifted to high B's after they were awarded. A similar situation arose in the Combined Departments of English, in which neither the professor nor the students affected were informed of the shift. In both cases, the committees concerned were dealing with what they saw as "abnormal" distribution of marks. In Eayr's case, A's were received by 40 per cent of his POL 208 students and by 50 per cent of his POL 312 students.

"We are not promoting grade normalization," says Dunphy. "If a professor wants to give all his students A's, that's his business, it should be no concern of ours. But possibly we may make a professor stop and say 'maybe the standards I'm applying are not sufficient.'"

The grading report states explicitly that "in no case should a quota system such as the use of a bell curve be the basis for assigning grades or making promotional decisions."

Although some sort of standard has been used in Arts and Sciences to change marks, assistant dean W. D. Foulds does not admit to a "quota system."

"No, it wasn't that firm," he said. "I don't think there was a quota, we just decided that we have to strike figures above and below which we will have to look at."

On Eayr's case Foulds commented: "I guess it was felt that his were out of line."

Even though the report is explicit that no quota be used it does mention the possibility of "anomalous distribution" of marks, and suggests procedures by which the professor may want to clarify his marking scheme to the committee that overlooks the final awarding.

The report is much broader in scope than the single topic of the distribution of grades. As Dunphy stated, its major task was setting the definitions for each letter grade. According to the report the letter grade A must be awarded because of "exceptional performance with strong evidence of original thinking."

Gov't speech throne for a loss, Libs, NDP both in bullpen

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
The corridors of provincial power opened up for big business again yesterday with the speech from the throne. Liberal leaders expressed doubt at the longevity of the current session.

Inside the legislature, the Progressive Conservative minority government outlined its anti-inflation program.

Outside, a crowd of fifty demonstrators assembled to protest and push as a throng of police assembled to prevent their entry.

The speech from the throne outlined the government's intentions for the thirtieth session. Reading from a seven page prepared text, House speaker Russell Rowe affirmed provincial support for "the decision of the Government of Canada to launch a nation-wide attack" on the problems of inflation and unemployment.

"The government has therefore decided that the national program should apply directly to the public sector in Ontario in the same way as with other sectors in the economy," it read.

It mentioned that the Ontario government has made representation to Ottawa for "tighter expenditure restraints by the Federal Government in its own operations, and a re-evaluation of the 600 dollar limit on pay increases at the lower end of the scale."

The minority Ontario government also promised to attempt to restrain its own expenditures and reduce the growth of its civil service, according to the speech.

Among the programs promised to alleviate the effects of inflation in the province was a new rent supplement program retroactive to April 1st, 1975. Also proposed was legislation "to protect tenants against unjustified rent increases" and "to provide security of tenure for residential tenants."

It was not outlined what the exact nature of this legislation would be. The legislature was asked as well to regulate retail sales activities on Sundays and certain public holidays. The Davis government explained in the speech that this legislation "seeks to reaffirm Sundays and holidays as days of restricted commercial activity, to protect workers, and in the interests of preserving and enhancing family life."

Acquisition of firearms was mentioned as a factor in increasing violence and so the government states it was prepared to introduce legislation to cover Ontario until national legislation was instituted.

The province directed Ontario Hydro to pursue the possibilities of increased regional transmission grids. Hydro has recently requested a 25 per cent increase in its rates. To combat inflationary increases the government made the suggestion "because of the very high capital costs of developing new energy production facilities."

The speech stated it was the aim of the province to provide "assured energy supplies at competitive prices," with minimum harm to the environment. No mention of Hydro's 25 per cent rate increase request or the government's position on it was made in the speech.

The legislature was also asked "to approve legislation for orderly allocation of natural gas supplies, in the event of possible shortages before additional supplies become available." Reduction of overall energy consumption was stated as the primary target for the present time.

After the legislature was adjourned, several members expressed their feelings outside the house that the session would not be ended in the near future by a vote of non-confidence because the province's economic situation was too serious.

Liberal leader Robert Nixon remained silent throughout the throne speech, frowning for much of it. His face contrasted with those of the leaders of the other two parties, both of whom reflected great optimism in the legislature for the session. The Liberals' comments on last session's budget matters were loudly heckled, rendering them inaudible.

Both opposition parties did not indicate any major disagreement with the actual throne speech.

PEI students support strike

CHARLOTTETOWN (CUP) Students at the University of Prince Edward Island are blocking university entrances and boycotting classes in support of maintenance workers on strike here since October 17.

Students voted unanimously five days ago to continue the boycott, started October 23 following a referendum in which students supported a two-day walkout.

The striking workers, electricians, carpenters, truckers and groundskeepers, have been striking to back demands for better wages and working conditions. Most earn $4,700 a year and are seeking a $1.25 an hour increase which would raise the lowest salary to $7,500. The university has offered $6,300.

University president Ronald Baker claims student fees would have to be raised to meet the strikers' demands.

Although the students are on the picket line, many are concerned about the threat to the continuing of their education that the boycott poses.

According to student union vice-president Tom Hayward, many courses are in the middle of mid-term examinations. While the students remain in sympathy with the workers, Hayward does not think they can continue the boycott for any length of time.

The students are planning a march on the provincial parliament buildings in continued support for the workers.

Coles undercuts Cdn writers

By LEA RYAN
Fifty Canadian authors demonstrated in front of Coles Book Store in Ottawa Saturday afternoon, to protest the sale of cut-rate American editions of Canadian books, which Coles has been selling in direct competition with the Canadian editions.

concerned with include royalties for books borrowed from libraries, and drawing up of a standard contract between publishers and writers. Sydney Gordon, co-author of 'The Scalpel, The Sword,' said "If Coles is going to spit in the face of Canadian writers and publishers, let's spit right back."

Authors get no royalties from these sales and Canadian publishers receive no profit. The Writers' Union of Canada, an organization of prose in writers, decided on June 1974. Since then, Coles has changed buyers and the new one won't touch small publishers, McAllister noted.

Patsy McAllister, sales coordinator for the Canadian Women's Educational Press, said, "We can't get into Coles at all." Their last sale to the Canadian bookseller was in June 1974. Since then, Coles has changed buyers and the new one won't touch small publishers, McAllister noted.

Participants included well known Canadian authors Margaret Laurence, Marian Engel, Adele Wiseman, W.O. Mitchell, Sydney Gordon and Pierre Berton.

Other issues the authors are concerned with include royalties for books borrowed from libraries, and drawing up of a standard contract between publishers and writers. Sydney Gordon, co-author of 'The Scalpel, The Sword,' said "If Coles is going to spit in the face of Canadian writers and publishers, let's spit right back."

School teachers strikes spurs student support

By DAN KEETON
Toronto's high school student councils have organized over the issue of an impending teachers strike although they haven't made up their minds whether to support the teachers or not.

The students will be asking the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation (OSSTF) to support a list of student demands. A positive response from the teachers could mean support for the teachers' contract demands from the student councils.

Some of these demands were included in a discussion paper presented at a meeting of the Toronto Association of Student Councils (TASC) on Monday.

The demands centre around the issue of a student "bill of rights" and TASC's desire is to have students consulted when teachers bargain with the Metro Board of Education over working conditions.

Also included is a demand that individual students be free from "retaliation" for their support or non-support of the strike, and that "no students should lose marks or credits as a result of a lengthy teacher strike."

Whether or not individual students choose to honour the teachers' picket lines, it is TASC's job to ensure that all students be protected against reprisals from teachers or administrators, a student delegate explained.

Despite the conditional nature of support for the teachers expressed in TASC's demands, the paper goes on to state the mutual benefits of cooperation between students and teachers.

The paper refers to "the infamous budget ceilings" noting that cutbacks in spending from the province's Ministry of Education "affect everybody in the educational system."

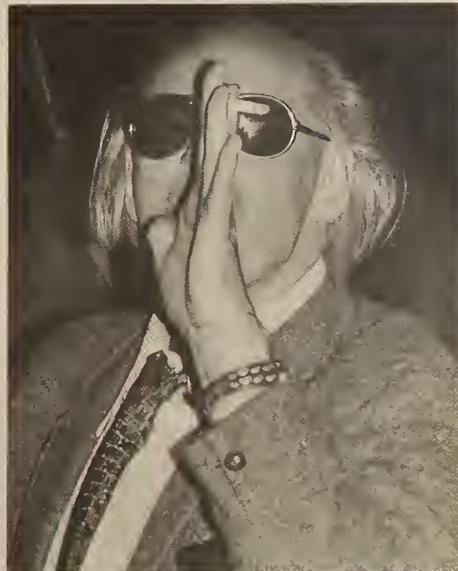

Little anti-teacher sentiment was expressed in the ensuing discussion. Representatives' opinions varied from unconditional support for the OSSTF, to placing the student demands "before those with the power to do something about them."

TASC members placed emphasis on supporting the teachers over the issue of working conditions, but opinion was divided over support for wage demands.

A provincial taskforce's report has recommended the teachers receive a 43.9 per cent increase in pay, a $720 lump sum payment and a cost-of-living clause. The Board's final offer will be made this Friday.

The TASC reps voted to accept the paper, which will be printed in a tabloid information paper with some amendments and distributed to students next Monday.

The amendments call for the inclusion of information on how to support the strike should the OSSTF Poet Al Purdy makes his statement. The festival continues.

Varg workers defy wage controls

Defying the government's recently imposed wage and price "guidelines", Varsity writers have demanded and received a 17 per cent wage hike over the next six months.

Staff negotiator Bob Bettson said: "It is indeed a great day for the poor downtrodden undergraduate masses. Not only has justice been done, it's been done to death."

"What do I care," said Varsity editor Paul McGrath, "71 per cent of nothing is still nothing."

Come to the staff meeting at 2 p.m. today and see what you can do to stop this tyrant from running roughshod over the entire volunteer staff. 91 St. George St., high atop the second floor.

Also on the meeting agenda are printing modernization plans.

The Varsity—Caitlin Kelly

accept the students' demands, and "why we will or will not cross picket lines." The TASC members also expect additional demands to come out of popular assemblies which will be held at the various member institutions later this week.

The information newsletter will also carry the OSSTF and the Metro Board's positions on the negotiations and the possible strike. These two bodies will each contribute 25 per cent of the production costs, with TASC absorbing the rest.

The Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto donated $150 towards TASC's share of the costs at the request of U of T student George de Mendonca, a former student council president and TASC communications officer. Additional business at the meeting included the appointment of a steering committee to look into the possibility of a TASC constitution.

TASC, which represents only student councils from secondary schools in the City of Toronto, was formed last year as a means of "block booking" musical groups for social functions, explained TASC chairperson, Tony Silipo.

But soon TASC members were discussing "student issues", and eventually called a meeting of all student council presidents, at which the present body was formed, he said.

The teachers can legally go or strike next Wednesday.

FORM AND CONTENT : 2

Monday's editorial on the subject of form and content in Canadian poetry has raised sufficient controversy among the poets appearing at this week's International Poetry Festival to warrant continuing the debate.

Irving Layton was "upset" according to a Varsity staffer who was present when he read it. On the other side, Milton Acorn has approved and has heaped praise on those poets who speak for the proletariat. He reserved the most praise for himself.

The editorial chided Canadian poets for side-stepping the issue of political content within the poetic art form (or any other art form for that matter). Poetry, we said, addresses itself to struggle, and those who will not use the struggle that affects their audience within their art form will lose their mandate as artists.

But don't they struggle? People may point to a recent demonstration in Ottawa by Canadian writers as an example of involvement by artists in political struggle. The writers, including Pierre Berton, Margaret Laurence and June Callwood, were demonstrating against cultural imperialism from south of the border, although they might be loathe to admit it. The issue at stake was whether Coles book stores should be allowed to sell cheap American editions of their Canadian books in competition with the more expensive Canadian editions.

Ideologically this is a very important fight. At stake is the economic livelihood of all Canadian publishers, especially the fledgeling houses such as Coach House, NC and Annsi. The publishers get no royalties from the American editions, presumably because they sold the rights for a lump sum to American publishers.

But it's hard to congratulate a writer for taking a stand on something that affects their pocketbook without challenging the broader issue of American control over the rest of the economy. It's true that the writers earn no royalties on these editions either, which may be what prompted them to action. This should be protested, but the issue is much larger than Pierre Berton's ability to pay his barber for those regular sideburn trims.

The same writers on the same day, however, "tiploped" (according to the Globe and Mail report) around the subject of more general political involvement. According to the same report, they unanimously abhorred imprisonment of authors and impairment of freedom of speech, but refused to use their writer's union as a political tool, except where direct action in Ottawa is called for.

Awfully decent of them, considering that the Canadian political climate would never permit their imprisonment even though few of them have said anything that would get them into trouble in even the most repressive states. Thousands of miles away from the prison camps in Chile, South Africa and the Soviet Union, they abhor the treatment of their brother writers while refusing to speak with the same spirit that put those writers where they are. Their stand is quite contradictory. Maybe it would be less so if their backs were against the wall, but Canada is far too comfortable a place.

Like it or not, reality is political and politics is struggle. If reality is comfortable and artistic, it is only because the political climate allows it to be so. If an artist wishes to create, she/he can only do so using reality as a base. Art loses a lot of its power if it describes only how comfortable things are — there is no drama or poetry in contentment.

There are people and places in this nation that need voices, artists who desire nothing more than to illuminate the reality with their literacy. If they ignore this, there may be no room for the artists when these people and places have solved their problems without their help.

This is not intended to push for a People's Art or a People's Literature but the artists must be reminded that they above all must be responsible to an audience. If their art is found only in the bookshelves or on the walls of dilapidated, then they are part of a dying breed.

Acorn replies: "We're stuck in the people"

To the Editor:

I read with interest your article Canadian poet: are they stuck in form (Varsity, 27-10-75). Actually Canadian poetry is being misrepresented by the line-up of Canuck poets at the festival. The most conspicuous person missing is myself. Also there is (or rather is not) Jim Brown. When this came to notice, my agent, Greg Kiely tried to get the festival people on the phone several times. There was no answer to any of his rings.

I started discussing the question of breaking in on the festival and reading some of my poems. I was half-dissuaded by people who told me that it was all an accident... the festival organizers hadn't been able to find me.

It seems strange that a group of festival organizers didn't know that all you usually have to do to find a poet is to phone up the publisher of his last book. In the case of NC Press the address and telephone number is printed in every one of our (we are a co-operative outfit) books. Yet the excuse might be true, the organizers might be that stupid. They might also not know that Jim Brown, after a long apprenticeship is now writing fine poems. They also might not know that Robin Mathews, in addition to being a prominent nationalist, is also an extraordinary poet. The festival organizers might not know all this but something strikes me as damned fishy.

Let me assure you that Canadian poets are not "stuck in form". On the contrary an anarchic formlessness is the chief barricade to public acceptance. Canadian poets who are revolutionary, and serious about it, always pay a great deal of attention to form — but never let form become a barricade to communication. Your bp nichol is not revolutionary in any way. His experiments in form are very crude, many poets who communicate well have much better 'form' than he has. The selection of poets to read at the 'International' (meaning cosmopolitan, meaning American) Poetry Festival was undoubtedly political. All this talk about form is a smokescreen set up to conceal a vicious elitist approach to poetry. The self-styled 'elite' is not an elite at all. A few token lefties and one or two poets of real substance were included to provide a figleaf. That's all.

As for the poets who weren't asked, take myself for instance. I have been a poet for thirty years, a nationally famous one for twenty. I am included in many anthologies, but the school anthologies give an unbalanced picture of my work. I'm right up among the leaders as far as sales of books go — my last book More Poems For People selling at least 2,000 copies, my present book The Island Mean Minago seems to be selling at a faster rate. Can you imagine a bookstore ordering 250 copies of a book of poetry at one shot — and stipulating that if those sold out their new order must get preference.

Now presuming that my exclusion for the poetry festival was by reason of malice (and I'm not saying it wasn't by mischance) what would be the reason? Precisely because my approach is revolutionary, precisely because I'm for independence and socialism and belong to the Canadian Liberation Movement, precisely because I deal with working class themes; and above all in doing all this I'm just about the goodamn best.

I'm kind of tired, but will walk over to your office and deliver this letter. You must understand that I'm no longer so vigorous that I can afford to spend energy charging like a bull at every cloak that's waved. I have things to do, audiences to face

Art, yes, but is it reality?

Reality, yes, but is it art?

Milton Acorn. "people's poet".

— some of those audiences particularly on the East and West coasts number in the hundreds. I shall soon crack the thousand mark, and whether or not I shall be called to perform before a little pismire audience at Hart House does not worry me greatly. Anyway let me assure you that Canadian poets are not stuck in form. We're stuck in the people. There are enough of us and lots of people.

A good day to you sirs

Milton Acorn

Portugal stands today at the focal point of the international class struggle. For the first time in several years a serious and lengthy pre-revolutionary situation has been churning in an advanced imperialist country. If the Portuguese workers were to take power, the prospects for rapid extension of the revolution to countries at the very heart of European capitalist society, such as France and Italy, would be immense.

However, history has proven again and again, most recently in the Chilean events of two years ago, that socialist revolutions do not simply happen automatically because objective conditions are ripe. In Chile as in Portugal, the masses of working people demonstrated their desire for socialism, but were held back by treacherous political leaderships which continuously sought to tie their struggles to the maintenance of capitalist class rule.

The working class parties in the Chilean Unidad Popular paved the way for their own downfall by preaching faith in Pinochet and the "democratic" generals of the capitalist army and in a supposedly "progressive" sector of the bourgeoisie. Similarly today the Portuguese Socialist and Communist Parties are in a governmental bloc with the openly rightist capitalist Popular Democratic Party, and each party pledges its support to a wing of the ruling Armed Forces Movement (MFA) — the officer corps of the army.

Some sectors of the MFA have occasionally exhibited a "radical" veneer in the eighteen months since they co-ordinated the overthrow of the reactionary

Alliance threatens Portugal

Salazar-Caetano dictatorship. Yet despite "socialist" rhetoric and verbal tirades against capitalism, the MFA represents the officer corps of the bourgeois army. The most fundamental commitment of the present Premier Azevedo, the left-posturing former premier General Goncalves and the supposed admirer of Cuba, internal security chief General Carvalho, is to the maintenance of the armed forces and thus of capitalist rule.

But if the Portuguese workers are to successfully stave off the rightist threats, they must have a revolutionary leadership which will break politically with all wings of the bourgeois MFA and lead them in an independent struggle for power based on elected and centralized workers and soldiers committees. The key task of such a revolutionary leadership would be to split the army, setting the ranks against the officers, and to arm the workers for their assault on capitalist rule.

Unfortunately, in a situation so fraught with possibilities, not one of the leftist organizations in Portugal is today struggling for such a revolutionary program of working-class independence. While the Maoist groups are criminally blocking with the CIA-funded Socialist Party, which gave a "left" cover to recent anti-communist attacks on headquarters of the CP, most of the other "far left" groups have joined together in a so-called Revolutionary United Front (FUR), which supports the wing of the MFA around ousted former Premier Goncalves.

This latter amalgam, which includes the fraternal groups of the Canadian Independent Socialists and the Revolutionary Marxist Group along with an electoral front of the Communist Party and several other organizations, has openly expressed its support to documents calling for an austerity program directed against the workers and for the continuation of the "MFA-People Alliance."

It is this very alliance which threatens to lead the Portuguese workers to bloody defeat in a situation where everyone from Mario Soares of the Socialist Party to sundry bonapartist generals stands for "socialist revolution" in words, only a clear class program can show the way forward. New class-collaborationist combinations like the FUR can only serve as new roadblocks on the path of building the revolutionary party to lead a true Portuguese socialist revolution.

If the tragic lessons of Chile (and of Spain in the 1930s) are not assimilated, they stand to be repeated soon in Portugal, and the struggles of the international proletariat will be dealt another major setback. The fight for the Portuguese revolution is the fight for the program of authentic Bolshevism, for the reconstruction of the Trotskyist world party of socialist revolution, the Fourth International. Eayrs replies about marking

To the Editor:

The letter from Professor Keith Yates (The Varsity, October 17) can only be read as charging me with lacking discretion in awarding grades in my two undergraduate courses (POL 208 and POL 312) last year.

This is a charge of incompetence which I resent and reject.

I do not understand how Yates can know the merit of work which he has never read. I invite him to consider his own response if with my scant knowledge of chemistry I were to alter a grade he awarded to a paper prepared under his close supervision on, say, "The Kinetics of Acid-catalyzed Reactions in Non-dilute Solutions".

I submit that the health of the local academic community would improve if Yates and people like him would mind their own business.

James Eayrs

PLO "terrorists," shouldn't have been invited.

To the Editor:

The headline story of the October 27 issue of the Globe and Mail exposes the plans of Palestinian Canadians to help engineer "a spectacular international act of terrorism" for the Olympic Games. Now that we know this, it should be unmistakably clear that those members of SAC who supported the move to bring PLO spokesman Abu-Lughod to speak here were grossly irresponsible.

The Globe said that "a Toronto man is believed to be the PLO's top representative in Ontario. (He) is a Palestinian who has boasted of committing acts of terrorism."

Surely it was possible for him or any of his followers to be in attendance at the Medical Sciences Building two weeks ago to hear Lughod when he praised the murderous acts of the PLO and called for the destruction of Israel.

The only probable thing that would have kept Toronto's Palestinian Canadian terrorists from attending Lughod's speech would have been a desire to keep a low profile, for the time being, so as not to attract the attention of the RCMP.

As students at the U of T we must ask ourselves whether we want people like those on SAC who supported the move to bring a spokesman for the PLO here at our own expense, to govern our affairs.

Reader protests infirmary closing

To the Editor:

I wish to protest the proposed closing of the Infirmary. Financial cutbacks may be necessary but surely more suitable victims can be found. (May I suggest The Varsity and definitely the Campus as Campus Centre Project?). Students who live away from home need the services of an infirmary for nursing care in cases of moderately severe illness. Those who are ill and remain for instance in a residence must be able to function sufficiently to take their meals in the dining room and cannot depend on quiet surroundings for needed sleep day or night. Weekend medical advice can also be obtained from the Infirmary.

The Infirmary provides too valuable a service to be abolished and thus deprive students of medical assistance when needed.

Governing Council's Planning Subcommittee, which is now reviewing divisional objectives, may cause a few belts to tighten. Policies developed over the summer indicate that many faculties will have to forego plans that involve increase of staff or funds. This is due to deficit budgeting and the hope that many departments can be operated more efficiently.

There are four main goals to the planning process.

- ◆ to bring about every possible improvement through changes or adaptations without increasing costs.
- ◆ to increase cooperative use of available resources.
- ◆ to abandon objectives that lack funds
- ◆ to keep options for long-term objectives open.

These policies will have a severe effect on the objectives of many of the small professional faculties, such as Law, whose objectives for a large part require an increase in both staff and funds.

At the same time, it is hoped that the quality of teaching and research will continue to improve.

The Planning and Resources Committee is relying on "the ingenuity" of the divisions to bring about "these improvements in the absence of additional funding or even in the face of budget reductions."

Museum monolith cramped for space

Museum Moves?

By ERIC McMILLAN

The Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) is expanding. In which direction is anyone's guess at the moment.

ROM officials have been consulting with the city over zoning with an eye to increasing the maximum allowable density in the museum area, it has been learned through City Hall sources.

ROM Director James E. Cruise was not available for comment yesterday but his office stressed any expansion plans are still in the early planning stage.

The museum has been talking with planning personnel and architects, as well as with university administration.

Students who fear further encroachment upon Philosophers Walk cannot be reassured at this time since it is not known whether the museum expansion is to be horizontal, vertical or interior.

One alternative is building upon a different site, although a recent memorandum from Cruise described the present location as "probably the best served by public transit" and representing "the definition of the Museum's growth potential for the foreseeable future."

The memorandum also argued against the "fragmentation of services which would result from decentralization," but admitted "the necessity of shifting away from an ethic of perpetual growth."

THE GOURMET

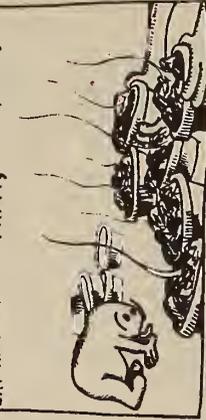

I DON'T THINK I WANT ANYMORE.

SURE YOU DO, KID. YOU LIKE IT. WE ALL LIKE IT. AND WE ALL NEED IT.

WHAT IF I DON'T EAT ANYMORE

THEN YOU'RE A BUM, A DEGENERATE, A NO-GOOD. YOU DON'T WANT TO BE THAT, DO YOU?

IT'S GOOD, AND NO QUESTIONS

DO YOU? DO YOU? HEY KID! HEY! GET BACK HERE! HEY! WHERE YOU GOING? ..YOU DEGENERATE! YOU BUM! AND FOR ALL I DID FOR YOU!

HOW MUCH SHOULD I EAT

AS MUCH AS YOU CAN. THE MORE YOU EAT THE BETTER YOU ARE.

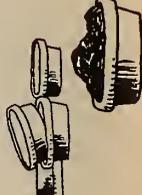

OH YES. SMART PEOPLE EAT ALL THEY CAN GET. IF YOU DO, YOU CAN BE A REALLY USEFUL MEMBER OF SOCIETY.

ALL THIS?

IT COSTS SO MUCH FOR US TO MANUFACTURE OUR SHIT NOW; AND YET FEWER PEOPLE ARE WILLING TO EAT IT.

End

We're ALL Responsible

WHAT DO YOU MEAN, YOU THINK I'M RESPONSIBLE FOR POLLUTION?

WELL...I...

DON'T YOU DRIVE A CAR?

YES, BUT... YOU SEE...

DON'T YOU USE DETERGENTS?

WELL, ACTUALLY, ...YES... BUT...

AND DON'T YOU WORK IN THE FACTORIES THAT PRODUCE ALL THIS POLLUTION?

ER, YES... BUT...

NO "BUTS" ABOUT IT, MAN, WE'RE ALL IN THIS POLLUTION BOAT TOGETHER, AND DON'T YOU FORGET IT

NOW GET BACK TO YOUR CAR

THE DISILLUSIONMENT OF IT ALL-- THIS WHOLE FEMINIST SOCIETY

YEA, YOU'RE TELLING ME. EVERYBODY'S HAVING-- OR IF IT ISN'T SEX, IT'S SEX PROXES, IT'S SEX

HOW DO YOU MEAN I CAN'T EVEN BE ME?

AND IF I DO MARRAGE TO GET SOME OTHER JOB, I GET PAID LESS THAN A MAN WOULD

SO? THEY FIGURE YOU'LL GET MARRIED, AND THIS BE A LIABILITY

MY FUTURE IS DESTINED FOR ME. I CAN LOOK FORWARD TO ANOTHER FORTY YEARS OF SHADOW EXISTENCE BEHIND SOME MALE--- LEGALIZED CHATEL

PAUGH!

AND IF IT ISN'T SEX, IT'S SEX

I AM PROMISED A GREAT FUTURE OF DEMOCRATIC EQUALITY, YET WHAT AWAITS ME?-- THE SAME OLD FEMALE JOBS-- WAITRESS, TYPIST, OR WHORE

AN' TIG, TIG, THREE

FREEDOM IS ONLY A WORD USED BY MALE WHISTS FOR MALE WHISPS

YEA! RIGHT ON! HA HA

EVERY FEMALE IS EXPECTED TO GET MARRIED, I DON'T EVEN CONTROL MY OWN BODY!

LOOK. FOLK-- THE SYSTEM. BE YOURSELF. COME LIVE WITH ME. THESE JOINTS WILL FREE YOUR MIND, YOU WILL BE IN BLISS BESIDE ME. NO MARRIAGE, NO ENSLAVEMENT, LET MY BED BE YOUR FREEDOM.

Native People Prepared to Die To Block Mackenzie Pipeline

Yellowknife, Northwest Territories — Two announcements from the North made headlines across Canada this summer. One was that native people were prepared to die to block the pipeline proposed for the Mackenzie River Valley. The other was that the native people of the North below the treeline considered themselves as the Dene Nation, and demanded that Canada deal with them as such.

"We, the Indian nation of the NWT, insist on the right to be regarded by ourselves and the world as a nation," says the statement, passed at the second general assembly of the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories and the Metis Association of the NWT.

"Our struggle is for recognition of the Dene nation by the Government and the people of Canada, and the people and governments of the world." Dene Nation means "the people" in the language of the four major groups in the Mackenzie River Valley — they are relatives of the Navajo Nation, which also calls itself "Dine".

NEW NORTHERN NATION

The statement says that Canada must not continue to regard the land as its own, but that native claims should be recognized. The Dene people would form their own Government — they are now in the majority by a 3-1 margin, and for the first time gained a minority on the Canadian-controlled territorial council.

"We are like many other countries in the world that have taken back control of their own lives," Wally Firth, a native man and member of the Canadian Parliament told the 300 delegates.

"You have to realize that your leaders are more representative of the majority of the people in this territory than any elected politician. The point today is not how we are going to set up the structures of Government. The point is that we are ready and able to do so and you must support our leaders in trying to do this."

GOLD, GAS, AND OIL

Firth said the claim that natives now have on 450,000 square-miles of the Western Arctic is "perhaps too small." He suggested that Indian and Metis people claim all the land from the northern borders of the provinces of Canada proper, north to the treeline.

"While people always want to know where we'll get the money to run this nation of ours," Firth said. "Well, we have the gold and the natural gas and the oil and the tungsten and many other resources, renewable and non-renewable. How much would it cost to run such a Government? Well, we have the resources and the ability and if there's some place where we lack certain expertise, then we can hire it."

The statement of rights is being discussed now in the villages in the Mackenzie Valley, where it will be revised, if necessary, by local peoples.

Earlier, the conference was told by George Manuel, president of the National Indian Brotherhood, that Ottawa is "totally committed to extinguishing your claim on the land in return for a little land — one square mile per family of five — and some money, exactly as they did in James Bay. All you have to do is to look at your brothers in the south on the reserves to see how poor and powerless they are — that's why the Government wants to extinguish your claim to the land." Manuel said that the Government fears the success of the northern native people, because then "all the other natives will want more."

BOOZE BANNED

In other moves, the delegates called for amendments to territorial liquor laws that would allow liquor outlets to be closed by request of local councils. They said the "white man's law (is) destroying natives through drinking." Chief James Antoine had persuaded the NWT Government to close all liquor stores in Fort Simpson for the duration of the five-day assembly, but the white town council secured a judgment forcing the territorial liquor board to reopen all outlets. White businessmen said the shutdown would prove too costly.

In Ottawa, Indian Affairs and

Northern Development Minister Judd Buchanan called the idea of a native nation "abhorrent". He said "two nations in the Northwest Territories is no more acceptable there than in any other part of Canada."

Chief Frank P'selei told the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline inquiry that his people would not allow the pipeline to be built. In a 20-minute speech to the hearing sitting in the Hairskin community of Fort Good Hope in early August, he said that the Dene are saving their land for their children.

"It is for this unborn child . . . that my nation will stop the pipeline. It is so that this unborn child will know the freedom of this land that I am willing to lay down my life," Chief P'selei said.

20TH CENTURY CUSTER

One of the listeners was Robert Blair, president of Foothills Pipeline Co., one of the applicants for pipeline approval by the Canadian Government. He was told by Chief P'selei, "I cannot understand how a man can live for wealth and power, knowing that his ambition and greed is destroying so much around him. I do not envy you, Mr. Blair, I feel sorry for you."

He added, "Somehow, in your carpeted boardrooms, in your panelled office, you are plotting to take away from me the very centre of my existence. You are stealing my soul."

The chief accused the pipeline company president of being like the U.S. military "planning the slaughter of innocent Vietnamese." "Don't tell me you are not responsible — you are the 20th Century General Custer — you have come to destroy the Dene Nation."

Blair was told he still had a chance "to be remembered by history as something other than a fool bent on destroying everything he touched."

After the session, Blair announced that he was willing to delay construction for up to ten years or so, waiting for a "substantial improvement in the attitude of the residents." He said his company could wait to allow land claim negotiations to take place between northern native peoples and the Canadian Government.

Blair didn't take the accusations as seriously as he might, however. "I think (Chief P'selei) was speaking more in a symbolic way. I don't think he was speaking specifically of our company destroying anything."

The pipeline route is to be only a few miles from Fort Good Hope, closer than to any other settlement. It would carry natural gas from the Far North to markets in the south.

"I was surprised by 'just how intense and deep' the anti-pipeline feeling is and how desperately the people want their land claims settled," Blair commented. "I think what has struck me most is the continuity of it," he said, noting that village after village throughout the north, speaker after speaker, had condemned the pipeline. He said he thought the pipeline industry had seriously underestimated the seriousness of the situation.

PIPELINE HOOPLA

Even the small concession of delay announced by Blair was not agreeable to rival pipeline builder Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Ltd. Officials of that firm said Alaska can only wait so long to pipe out the gas.

While Justice Berger was appointed to investigate pipeline impact in a hoopla of Canadian Government publicity about fair play to native people, government officials began quickly to dig the sand out from under him and the word is out — Canada is going to go ahead with the pipeline regardless of what the hearings find.

The $7-billion project will bring Alaska and Mackenzie Delta natural gas to market. In addition to native opposition, a rival group wants an all-Canada line, and environmental groups have points to make. Economists argue that so much money will have to be borrowed from foreign sources that Canadian exports to balance the budget will rise to the point where customers can't afford them. Other opposition will come from those who want to transport the gas by rail and by airplane.

ARAB MONEY

There are those nationalistic Canadians who don't mind taking land from native people, but don't want to see the gas used by the United States. Canada already exports 47 per cent of its natural gas.

Arab money may be used for financing. When the line reaches the border, one leg will go south to California, and the other east to Pennsylvania — at a cost of another $3-billion. The line will be 48 inches in diameter, buried seven to eight feet underground. Employment for the project would be about 7,500, but that would be only for about three years. The pipeline would have less than 400 permanent employees.

Berger was appointed more than a year ago. At that time, native people weren't prepared to bring in the voice of the villages, and so he secured $600,000 from Ottawa so that native and public interest groups could present their case. He allowed almost a year for them to mount their opposition.

"Now the whiteman is everywhere, with his machines and garbage and destruction. No matter how far your trapline is from town, bulldozers may run over your traps. No matter how far your bush camp is from town, you might have an exploration crew staging their equipment there. Lakes are blasted, and the fish and muskrats are killed. Creeks are blocked and the fish don't run. Maybe the noise and fumes of the bulldozers will scare away the caribou and foxes . . . The native people are threatened in a way that they have never been before."

CIA and the Media:

By CHARLIE CLARK (CUP)

The American press has spent the last year making a national sport of exposing the domestic crimes of its infamous CIA.

The CIA's massive domestic surveillance, violations of charter, LSD experiments and assassination attempts have all been bannered across the front page.

But the end of the rampage is clearly in sight. American overseas interests have remained quite unaffected and we all must be reminded that beneath the newspaper's muckraking headlines lies a history of CIA collaboration, co-optation and even direct manipulation of the press.

Two classic examples of press cooperation with the CIA both took place at the peak of the Cold War.

The famous U-2 incident of August, 1960 in which an American spy plane was shot down over the Soviet Union, produced mass fear of nuclear confrontation. Yet Washington Post newsmen Chalmers Roberts can write, in retrospect, that he was aware of the spy missions undertaken throughout the fifties yet had remained silent.

Then came the Bay of Pigs invasion, organized and botched by the CIA. It is now fully documented that several publications were on to the story before the fiasco occurred.

The New Republic submitted the galleys of its Bay of Pigs scoop to President Kennedy.

Had Szulc of The New York Times had uncovered the plans for the entire operation and had prepared his story for a four-column, front-page layout until it was cut and toned down by the Times bureau chief "out of concern for the safety of the men who were preparing to offer their lives on the beaches of Cuba."

How different things might have been if the public had been informed of the United States' precarious spy adventures or its secret war on Cuba back in the early sixties. Why was the press so scared to let loose with it?

The problem lies in the fact that the people who run the news media share the same social life, outlook and attitudes as the political officials whom they write about. At the height of the Cold War, a phone call or friendly chat with the Commander-in-Chief could summon up patriotism in any newsmen.

The logistics of the reporting process also provide a key. A reporter cannot alienate a contact or source. As John D. Marks and Victor Marchetti remark in The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence, all of the CIA and government officials operate through an "old-boy network" of journalists who are friendly to the CIA.

"It takes a lot of money to buy the services of people at Reuters, Agence France Presse, Tass and Hsinhua, the Chinese news agency".

When the CIA feels the need for a public relations uplift, it can always rely on Time magazine for a cover story that tells it just like the CIA wants it told. Former CIA director Richard Helms, himself a former journalist, encouraged Newsweek with an inside story on the agency which played up the CIA's overt operations although two-thirds of the CIA secret budget was going to sleazier covert operations.

The CIA can cater to its friendly journalists by baiting and rewarding them with scoops and exclusives. Hal Hendrix won a Pulitzer Prize in 1962 for his reporting of the Cuban missile crisis, based completely on CIA leaks.

The Agency also conducts close relations with certain publishing houses which often aim for the best-seller list with corrosive indictments of communism. These are written by CIA produced defectors, whenever there is a need to remind the public of the "atrocities of Marxism."

On the international scene, the set-up is even more scandalous. CIA men often debrief returning foreign correspondents to fill in gaps in their intelligence reports. The Washington Star-News reported that the CIA had up to forty full-time journalists around the world on its payroll.

Journalists can often penetrate places masquerading as diplomats, businessmen, or military attaches.

The overseas journalists are actually part of a much larger network of CIA affiliates who, since the agency's inception in 1947, have worked to discredit communism by buying influence in labour organizations, charitable foundations, student groups and of course, the press.

It takes lots of money to buy the services of people at Reuters, Agence-France Presse, Tass, and Hsinhua, the Chinese news agency.

Writing in the Columbia Journalism Review, Stuart Loory describes the CIA's process of "floating a story." A CIA agent, assigned to carry out a mission of shaming the Soviets as an irresponsible superpower, would enlist a Reuters man under CIA contract and give him a phony story describing a non-existent Soviet nuclear weapons test. The reporter would then pass the story on to a Stockholm correspondent, explaining that he had to protect the source by having the story emanate from the Swedish capital. Once the story is put on the wires, the world reads fiction on page one.

The CIA has also maintained a controlling interest in numerous foreign publications, among them the West German Der Monat, the Rome Daily American.

In light of recent revelations, it may seem that the CIA's manipulation of the press is a bygone phenomenon of the Cold-War era. But the root of the problem has yet to be dealt with.

The recent CIA scandals stem from a period in which the left-over hawks of the Vietnam era are fighting for political survival.

The press can report the crimes of the Central Intelligence Agency without threat to national security and without calling for the need to change America's role in world affairs.

The media only calls for a curtailment of the CIA's budget — because it is dishonest and immoral to secretly overthrow foreign governments.

While researching his article on the CIA and the press, Stuart Loory was begged by as many journalists as CIA officials not to publish the story.

If you've made computers your first love and COBOL your second language... roll up your sleeves and take the next step with us!

Right now, you're wondering where you can put your talent and your ideas to work. Obviously, you want to work for a company who will really appreciate what you have to offer and give you the room you need to grow.

We're Northern Electric, and if you've been assessing the Canadian business scene with an eye to pinpointing your first career move, you may already know quite a bit about us. Growth that's been called almost explosive. Telecommunications product development that's been termed fantastic.

We are on the move and to maintain this momentum we need graduates from various disciplines to work in our business systems. You would use your systems knowledge in such areas as engineering, manufacturing, accounting and materials control. You should have a good basis in COBOL with some practical experience in its use. Ideally you also know a Data Base Management system such as TOTAL or IMS.

For our part, we offer opportunity in a wide variety of hardware and software applications, as well as training in the use of the latest techniques in programming and system design.

Of course, our standards are high. But then so are the financial rewards and career opportunities for graduates who can help us achieve our goals.

If what we offer appears to match what you want, talk to your Campus Placement Officer.

POSTAL STRIKE: Unjust laws, automation, sexism and Close the post office for three months. This was the solution to the troubles in the post office that Postmaster General Bryce Mackasey offered the Canadian people in early September.

Mr. Mackasey's threat was one more element in a running public battle between the minister and the 28,000 member Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW). By now everyone knows that something peculiar is going on in the post office, even if they aren't sure what it is.

Canadian postal workers have now been working without a contract since January 1, 1975. While CUPW pits its demands against the post office's cheap labour strategy, the political and economic climate is growing more difficult.

The present wage rate of $4.59 per hour for a postal clerk with three years service represents a 15 per cent reduction in purchasing power over the 1972 wage level. Postal workers, like other organized groups who didn't get a chance to negotiate in 1973 and 1974, and who had no COLA clause, have a lot of catching up to do.

TWO STAGE GOV'T POLICY

The postal workers' demand for full job security in the present climate of heavy unemployment would create a valuable precedent for Canadian working people, but it is undoubtedly contrary to the government's unemployment policy.

The postal workers' demand for free collective bargaining in the public service also represents a direct challenge to government thinking. The federal government is presently moving to tighten the already severe restrictions on the collective bargaining rights of most of its more than 460,000 employees, while the employees and their unions are increasingly showing resistance to the status quo.

TEN YEAR STRUGGLE

The root of the conflict is a classic and universal labour-management issue: Technological change and the resulting threat to job security. The restrictive labour legislation governing federal employees also complicates the collective bargaining process.

The traditional manual sorting techniques of the post office are giving way to more modern methods. The annual volume of mail has reached 5 billion pieces and is still growing. The post office now employs approximately 55,000 workers and the need for mechanization to content with growing mail volumes speedily and at reasonable cost is beyond question.

How the transformation from essentially 19th century production methods to electronic, automated technology should be carried out, and how the resulting benefits should be distributed between mail users, taxpayers and postal workers is the subject of the present bitter controversy.

The self-declared friend of labour, Postmaster General Mackasey, has advanced a number of superficial and unlikely explanations for the current wrangle. One of his favourites is that Joe Davidson and the other national officers of CUPW are irresponsible radicals, misleading the public and the union members.

Mr. Mackasey's argument suffers from two major defects. He has chosen to ignore that CUPW leaders are following policies laid down by national conventions of the union. Mackasey is in effect condemning the union leaders for taking their members seriously.

The 1965 strike, which focussed on low wages, also led immediately to a royal commission on working conditions in the post office chaired by Judge Andre Montpetit. The commission reported in 1966 and painted a picture of neglect, favouritism, and all the accompanying management practices which are to be expected from an employer who does not have to contend with a militant union.

The federal government also contributed to future trouble with bargaining legislation in 1967. This combination of inflexible management and restricted bargaining produced postal strikes in 1968 and 1970, and other expressions of rank and file discontent, such as wildcats and slowdowns.

AUTOMATION

Throughout the late 1960s and early seventies, postal workers at all levels of the union slowly began to come to grips with the problem of automation.

Now in 1975, that far distant future has arrived with a vengeance. The chief public manifestations of the conflict over automation are the apparent deterioration in the quality of mail service and, since 1973, the union's boycott of the postal code campaign.

At the same time the post office was launching an automation and modernization capital program. The centerpiece of this $1 billion scheme, involves the expenditure of at least $683 million in 27 urban centres for new plant and equipment, with the bulk of the expenditure to be completed by 1977. The investment plan is concentrated heavily in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, indicating a powerful centralizing tendency in the new postal technology.

The new system is based on very advanced mail processing machines. The mail is prepared for sorting by a machine with a capacity of 30,000 pieces per hour. The letters then proceed to the I.T.T. portion of the system, where postal clerks read postal codes and key them onto the letters in machine-readable form — the yellow bars which are now increasingly in evidence on your mail.

Code letters are then passed through I.T.T. letter sorting machines at a rate of about 30,000 per hour. Depending on the sophistication of their computer programs and the number of times the letters are passed through, the letter sorting machines can theoretically sort code mail right down to the appropriate letter carrier walk. This is the mechanization phase of the reorganization of production. To work it depends on widespread use of the postal code and standardized letter sizes.

Full automation, which is to follow closely on the heels of mechanization, involves another generation of machines called Optical Character Readers. These machines will replace the human postal coders and manual coding desks, using electronic scanning techniques to translate typewritten postal codes at a rate of 23,000 per hour into the machine-readable code required by the letter sorting machines.

The basic automated sorting system is also to be supplemented by extensive mechanization of other postal processes: containerization of transport, more mechanization on the loading docks, vastly improved in-plant conveyor systems, bag shake-out machines, flat-sorting machines for large envelopes, and more.

If it works, the new system seems to promise more efficient mail service, with traditional methods retained to handle only unsorted and odd-ball mail at the manual rate of 1,800-2,000 pieces per hour. The new technology is enormously labour-saving. It eliminates that troublesome factor in production, people. The plan is a systems engineer's dream come true.

AUTOMATION ERODES UNION MEMBERSHIP

While Mr. Mackasey handles the public relations, the post office is pursuing a number of policies designed to circumvent the collective bargaining process and slander—Government weapons in war against the unions bring in automation without negotiation.

A back-up system of private mail carriers has been allowed to develop in violation of the monopoly provisions of the Post Office Act. Key corporate and government communications are now relatively immune from a postal strike. According to Mr. Mackasey's own estimate, 3,000 jobs have effectively been taken away from the post office in this manner. Meanwhile the tax payer continues to support the non-profitable aspects of the postal service.

The system of private sub-contract post offices thrives at the expense of postal sub-station run by the government with unionized employees.

Applying pressure through the manipulation of special mailing permits, the post office is encouraging bulk mailers to engage in massive presorting of mail before it reaches the unionized jurisdiction of the Post Office.

The use of non-union casual workers to perform duties in the CUPW jurisdiction has increased 123 per cent in the past four years and is now equivalent to 4,000 full-time jobs.

The union has argued that growing mail volumes, the elimination of casual labour, a reduced work week, pre-retirement leave and normal attrition taken together provide enough latitude for the introduction of automation without hurting presently employed postal workers.

ROLE OF WOMEN

The reluctance of the post office and federal treasury board to negotiate some of the protections and benefits the union is seeking is probably due to an unpleasant hidden agenda. The post office, once a bastion of male supremacy and male wage rates, has increasingly become a major employer of women. The new technology is eliminating most of the traditional skills, and the new skills such as those required by the coders on their keyboards are common in the female labour force.

While until now the union has succeeded in maintaining equal pay for equal work, the government's strategy seems to involve over a period of time transforming the post office into another female low-wage ghetto like the textile industry, the banks and the department stores.

The management formula would be expensive capital, cheap labour and high employee turnover. The turnover is not a big problem for management.

If training requirements are minimal. The most telling indicator of post office management intentions toward the inside labour force was provided nearly two years ago.

The department proposed that large numbers of postal clerks, classified as level four in the pay scale, would be retrained as coders under the new production system.

The coders were to be classified at level one, a pay scale 54 cents per hour lower than the postal clerks.

When consultation on the classification issue proved fruitless, the CUPW called a mid-contract national illegal strike in April of 1974. The upshot was the coder jobs were reclassified to level four, but the classification system itself remained intact and ready for future use.

Faced with the post office's program of downclassification, contracting out and related cheap labour strategies, the union has made complete job, wage and classification security the cornerstone of its 1975 bargaining program.

LABOR LAW CATCH 22

To complicate the conflict between post office labour and management, labour legislation governing most federal employees does not permit the range of bargaining allowed in the private sector under the Canada Labour Code.

Postal workers fall under the Public Service Staff Relations Act which prohibits them from negotiating the effects of automation, job transferability, job classification, job security, hiring practices and many other working conditions.

The CUPW has stated that there will be no peace in the post office until these matters are negotiated to protect postal workers from becoming victims of automation.

The contradiction between the Trudeau government's efforts to foster national unity on the cultural front and this divisive strategy on the national trade union front has received little public attention or analysis, but may turn out to be one of the politically most significant aspects of the 1975 postal battle.

THE BATTLE BEGINS

The complex nature of government as employer makes any prediction on the results of the 1975 postal confrontation difficult, with one exception.

Mr. Mackasey's threat of a three-month postal strike is the rankest bluff. October and November are months of intense commercial activity through the mails, and the devastating effect of a long strike, especially on legions of small businesses, is difficult to overestimate.

One spokesman for the direct mail interests, asked if he would like to see the CUPW "put in its place" by a long strike, replied, "It's like asking if we'd rather be killed by poison or with a gun."

At some point the post office will realize that it cannot maintain a good postal service while trying to treat its employees as if they were spare machine parts to be used or discarded at management convenience. The dignity and rights of the workers, their collective power and their union will have to be fully recognized.

John Devereil, research director of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

NUS Conference Long on Policy Short on strategy

FREDERICTON (CUP) The fall conference of the National Union of Students (NUS), held here October 17-20, was long on debate and discussion but short on concrete strategy and planning.

By the time the 64 delegates representing student organizations from Newfoundland to British Columbia met at the final plenary session, agreement had been reached on policies relating to the student aid campaign, the major area of concern.

But it was clear that not much was accomplished in terms of commitment to actively organizing students in support of those policies.

Paul Kellogg, the delegate from York University, repeatedly called for a campaign of nationally coordinated rallies to demonstrate concern over student aid and post-secondary financing.

"Student leaders," he said, have a responsibility to show leadership and to organize active student support around NUS policies.

Opponents claimed that leadership was not the issue. Increased awareness of problems facing students must be developed, they said, before "action-oriented tactics can succeed."

Delegates finally agreed to put the emphasis on "educating" students through a nation-wide "consciousness-raising campaign."

There was little indication of the specific content or organization of this campaign, and the delegates made no real commitment to actually carrying it out.

NUS fieldworker Bob Buckingham, speaking on behalf of the Central Committee, conceded at the final plenary that "concern has been expressed that a specific strategy for the student aid campaign has not been outlined."

He said the first issue to be dealt with this fall is student representation on the Canada Student Loans Plenary Group, a secretive high-level body which formulates student aid policies nationally.

Buckingham did not outline any strategy for pressuring the government into seating students on this Group, and there was no discussion about an earlier plan to organize a delegation to attend the Group's upcoming meeting in Ottawa.

He predicted that "students may not be concerned about a refusal for representation," and added "no matter what happens, we organize, and we continue our person-to-person information campaign."

He did not say how NUS, with a single fieldworker to cover the country, intended to "organize" students.

Buckingham called the petition currently being circulated at some campuses in support of NUS student aid demands "a useful device to reach students" but he did not answer the big question — will the petition campaign continue?

The campaign ran into trouble this fall when the Ontario Federation of Students refused to commit resources to the campaign. Some campuses which are circulating the petition are having difficulty getting students to sign. And many more are not doing anything about the petition.

Buckingham concluded his remarks by urging the delegates not to be upset "that we don't have a lot of support" but added "we haven't reached a lot of students yet."

He stressed that a "national lobby is important, but not without local effort."

Residents upset students play house

The Varsity—Caitlin Kelly

City native awaits next orgy show. Local residents complaining.

By RALPH CHOQUETTE
The natural follow-up to streaking has hit the university campus. "Balling in the park," has been reported in the vicinity of the Roberts Library.

Local citizens cited the incident which occurred Friday afternoon as an example of the decline of neighbourhood caused by university expansion into residential areas.

A citizen who requested anonymity described the happening thusly, "Every time I walked by, this couple was going at it hotter and heavier. They weren't even trying to hide it."

Finally an outraged resident broke apart the amorous pair, it was reported.

"I couldn't believe it. It was right out in the open," said a witness. "Their pants were right off."

Huron Street resident Stephen Radlauer gave this eyewitness account, "She slipped her silvery slim seductively thin unbroken brocade handkerchief in and out of his smeared dampening eyelids over and over again . . ."

New office for space management

By CHRISTINE CURLOOK

Why are Criminology and East Asian studies both on the 14th floor of the Robarts? Chances are no one knows.

Dr. George Connell, VP in charge of planning thinks there should be someone in charge. He told a subcommittee of Resources and Planning yesterday that the university needs a long- and short-range strategy of the management of space.

A proposal for an Office of Space Management was made by the Business Affairs Committee last summer. Such an office would coordinate various bodies now responsible for class assignments, office space and other problems.

It is hoped that no new staff would be necessary, although certain individuals have assumed extra duties and the computer facilities would not change.

Duties of the Office of Space Analysis would include maintaining a current space inventory which would classify space as to quality, type and present use. The office would also develop internal space standards.

Since 1957 space standards have been the responsibility of Business Affairs, using the Committee of Accommodation and Facilities as a resource group.

The funding of new buildings will depend on conformity to this yet-to-be-produced standard of this yet-to-be-formed office. "The replacement of obsolete space must be in alignment with the new space standards" said one member of the subcommittee.

It was emphasized that the new office would conserve resources and that no immediate expansion plans for the office exist.

The current function of CAF is to recommend space standards for the St. George campus to Planning and Resources. They will be considering alterations, renovations, individual space requests and the overall allocation of space.

The Office of Space Management would have the responsibility of the long-range planning with an eye on capital requests to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Social Work seeks head workers

By DAVE FOLKES

Staff shortages at the top seem to be the root cause of problems among social workers at U of T.

A working group has been looking into the problems and objectives of the Faculty of Social Work over the past summer and early fall. The Dean should make a substantial contribution to any recommendations, but they don't have one.

A Faculty Search Committee is currently engaged in finding a new Dean. The last one was probably upset that "there is a lack of commitment to research by a good number of the faculty," in the words of Professor A. Dalzell, current chairman of the Social Work Working Group.

"Attitudes towards research programs are uniformly and depressingly low" added Dalzell, at a meeting on Monday.

Another low was hit by the ratio of students to staff when statistics concerning the Faculty's Instructional Activity Index were released.

Another area of possible concern is the apparent news blackout over the selection of a new Dean. It would not be appropriate, said student governor Michael Sabia, acting chairman of the Planning subcommittee, "to make the matter a centre-spread in The Varsity."

The faculty has also been looking for someone outside the university to act as Project Director for their Curriculum Review and Planning study.

According to the outgoing Dean, Albert Rose, a quarter of the National Health and Welfare grant money procured for the project was used up by March of this year. But they still don't have a director for it.

Dean Rose hopes to renew the grant and try again next year.

Football as a Masculinity Ritual

By PAUL HOCH
(a sport sociologist at Dawson College in Montreal)

Not only does football separate the boys from the girls, but it separates the men from the boys. As such it has become this society's No. 1 masculinity ritual, in some ways a throwback to the puberty rituals of primitive tribes. The successful football gladiator who makes it to the Varsity or pros has become society's foremost male sex idol, the he-man equivalent of Miss America and the female bathing beauties. The competition for football masculinity starts early. By the early teens almost every boy is in it, and yet by the late high school years more than 90 per cent of the competitors have dropped out defeated. Only the cream of the crop is allowed to survive. Given the pick of the society's opportunities for cosmetic sexual fulfillment ("Ya gotta be a football hero... ta getta lotta wit bea-u-tee-ful gal..."), the football he-men are admired as America's supermasculine elite... as long as their strength lasts. And yet even the foremost hero reaches a point where he can no longer perform up to scratch, and today's hero becomes tomorrow's has been. Thus, upon retirement, even the top pro athlete often feels "castrated" when he can no longer "get it up." Even more seriously, this emphasis on producing a Varsity elite, not only throws the overwhelming men out of the competition, but brands them as "losers," something less manly than the heroes out on the field. All those who don't make it to the Varsity are in a sense "unmanned." This narrow definition of masculinity in terms of football prowess thus condemns the overwhelming majority of North American men to a lower order of being, even in terms of their own self-definition. The question then arises: why do they put up with it?

In fact they, not only put up with it, but apparently eat it up. After all, the stands at any football stadium are filled to bursting with all those male "losers" who didn't make it themselves, but who delight in the consolation of lapping up the fantasy masculinity displayed by their heroes out on the field. Even when they are not at the big game ritual itself, American men think about their football heroes, read about them, talk about them, watch TV specials on them, fight about them, perhaps for as much as forty hours a week (it is almost a fulltime job). Co-ed soccer team disqualified

Jonathan Gross
Varsity Sports Editor

The Faculty of Law soccer team has been disqualified from further play this season because of the ineligibility of two players.

These two people are Vicki Trerise and Linda Robinson. They participated in two games for the team and according to Dave Copp they, as women, are ineligible for play in Men's Interfac Athletics.

At an athletic meeting early in the year the issue was brought up and the coach, Rob Herman was told that the girls could not play. Prepared for a test case, they played the girls anyway.

After playing and defeating Knox 1-0, the losers filed a protest and it was upheld, forfeiting the game to Knox. The girls played again against the same team and after winning again another protest was filed. This was also upheld and on the basis of two forfeits Law was disqualified from further play.

Copp, the Director of Intramural Athletics, took a position that the girls were not paying members of the Men's Athletic Assoc. and that they were inferior physically to men. Copp referred to many books that point out this relationship.

Trerise, on the other hand, made a valid point stating that although she is a woman she is an athlete and physically she may be in equal or better shape than most of the participating males. The men's physical condition does not seem to matter to the Athletic Dept.

While the University is not willing to take a chance on women in men's contact sport they are neglecting to take into account that there may be men actually playing who are more apt. to sustaining injuries.

There are many coed university sports such as touch football, broomball and volleyball but there is no soccer nor is there women's soccer. The desire of these girls is to play and Vicki stated that it doesn't matter if it is with men or women.

Copp says that if women were allowed to play in men's sports then the opposite may come true.

In conclusion it is possible to say that while some men have a right to be upset over women entering a physical sport they also have an obligation to understand other peoples desires, including the desire to play soccer.

short they seem to be almost in love with them. Dalhousie University psychology professor Edgar Friedenburg takes this apparent love quite literally—he claims the whole ritual of the football hero is society's officially sanctioned outlet for repressed homosexuality.

Others would claim that it is not so much love that the average male football fan feels as a sense of vicarious identification with his hero. The latter symbolically carries the ball for the fan in terms of all the bottled up aggression, muscular heroism, repressed physicality and rugged individualism that our pencil-pusher, organization-men or factory-worker fans are not allowed to express in their own lives. Football thus becomes a supermasculine fantasy for all that is missing in the fan's own life. As one columnist put it, "football players represent the deep-seated desire of every red-blooded American male to be a Superman (with their shoulder pads the players even look like Superman), all-powerful and immortal, the average fan's ultimate trip, the fulfilment of the American dream."

Nevertheless, one might seriously wonder about the validity of an American dream of masculinity that can only be fulfilled in fantasy. Why are men who would hardly accept fantasy food or drink apparently so content with a fantasy masculinity? Possibly, in part, because they see no clear alternative. Stuck in boring, bureaucratized, fragmented, hack-work type jobs, they see the fantasy masculinity of the football player as an escape to a land where "men can be men." Not only does it provide a fantastic escape from the dreariness of his own world, but its existence provides the carrot to keep him going and competing in his own work.

Womens Field Hockey Teams victorious at Scarborough

By BETTY SHOSTAK
and KATHY STEWART

The U of T Women's Field Hockey Teams fared well in the OWIAA Part 1 finals on the weekend. Good weather combined with excellent field conditions at Scarborough College made the tournament a success.

On the Intermediate front, the ladies in blue defeated York 3-0 on Friday. Goals were scored by Glynis Peters, Martha Bagnall, and Diane Wardrope. On Saturday the Toronto squad fell to Laurentian 2-0, but came back to defeat Trent 3-0 (Wardrope, Bagnall, Peters).

The last match of the tournament saw the Intermediate Blues pitted against Queens. After two thirty minute halves the game was scoreless, forcing two five minute overtime periods.

The game was still undecided after overtime and the game went into a double round of penalty flicks. Two rounds of five penalty shots on each goalie were taken, with the final result 2-1 for Toronto.

Penalty scorers were Peters and Eleanor Howey. Congratulations to Toronto goalie Fern Brand for a great effort under pressure.

The Senior Women finished the tournament undefeated against McGill, Queen's and York. Taking advantage of all opportunities for shots on goal, combined with a strong defensive effort backing them up, the ladies totalled 12 goals for and none against in the tournament.

McGill was downed 3-0 on goals from Anne Hofland (2) and Diana Millar. The pattern continued with a 4-0 victory over Queen's (Cathy Brown (2) Terry Knight, Nancy Wehrens), and a final 5-0 win over York Hofland (2), Wehrens, Donna Walker, Carol MacDougall). The lady Blues.

The Lady Blues meet the remainder of their competition at York next weekend in the wrap-up of the provincial finals.

Hart House chess

By DAVE MACLEOD

On Thursday Oct. 23 Grandmaster Leonid Shamkovich gave a simultaneous chess exhibition at Hart House. Taking on eleven contenders he allowed only one loss and one draw to Ray Stone and Tom Drucker respectively. Shamkovich is currently ranked number one in Canada.

Shamkovich, a top Soviet chess theorist has been a trainer to former World Champions Boris Spassky and Mikhail Tal.

The Grandmaster is now considering living in Toronto which is closer to his native Moscow's climate. He emigrated to Israel from the Soviet Union last year.

Last Sunday Shamkovich led the powerful Toronto Central "A" team to a narrow 3½-2½ victory over the Willowdale Chess Club. Shamkovich drew with the number two ranked Canadian, George Kuprejanov a doctorate graduate in architecture from York University.

In other Metro League action the Toronto Central "B" team couldn't get their act together and defaulted 6-0 to the Hart House "A" team while the Hart House "B" team humbled Scarborough "A" 4-2.

Over 20 of Canada's top 100 players will be participating in these weekly matches which should provide U of T's Pan-American Intercollegiate Championship team a sufficient warm up.

The Pan American Intercollegiate chess team championships will be held December 26 in Columbus, Ohio.

Support gathering for infirmary maintenance

By MIKE EDWARDS

"There is no substitute for the service offered by the U of T Infirmary," says U of T Health Services director Dr. G. E. Wodehouse.

Wodehouse recently received a telephone communique from U of T vice-president Frank Iacobucci that his 1976-77 budget would probably be slashed by $75,000. He feels that this only alternative would be to eliminate the Infirmary division, which has a total operating budget of $50,000.

Wodehouse, in answering a charge that the Infirmary services could be covered by normal Hospital emergency service, said "Unless you're bleeding to death, you'll just get sent home."

The Infirmary provides a 24-hour crisis centre operation. They can treat students who cannot reach their own doctor for a variety of ills not covered by a hospital emergency ward.

The Infirmary treats people with undiagnosed fevers, hepatitis, emotional upsets, and other such incapacities not requiring regular hospital care. They offer help to women who have been raped, or who fear being raped.

Some students, handicapped by body casts, or minor ailments can write exams and study using the Infirmary services as an essential aid.

In some instances the Infirmary has become a vital supplement for hospital services. A patient requiring a cartilage operation can have the operation at the hospital and then recuperate at the Infirmary.

Vital, and expensive, hospital services are thus eliminated.

Patients awaiting corrective surgery are able to avoid long waiting lists for hospital beds.

SAC, on receiving word of the possible closure of the Infirmary have been approaching local student and residence groups asking them to write to Iacobucci.

Nine other campus organizations have also expressed support for continuance of the Infirmary. They are the student councils at Victoria, St. Michael's, Innis, Erindale and Scarborough colleges, the University College Literary and Athletic Society, the U.C. Residence Students and St. Mike's Men's Residence Associations, and the Engineering Students Society.

One misconception that Wodehouse wants corrected is the supposed requirement of OHIP coverage by students.

"Until the University sets out a policy of compulsory coverage we are not charging students nor covered by OHIP," said Wodehouse in a telephone interview.

The Health Service will be discussed "informally" at the December 16 meeting of the Internal Affairs Committee. SAC hopes to attack the issue of campus services at the November meeting of the committee, the Health service will be central to the discussion of budget cuts.

"We want all budget recommendation about campus services to be made public," said SAC University Government Commissioner, Jay Lefton. He hopes to be meeting with all student Governing Council members in the near future.

The 24 hour Infirmary number is 928-2458. If you feel low, need help or contemplate suicide please call.

Emergency hospital treatment no substitute for Infirmary service.

More rote learning on the way?

By DAVE FOLKES

"Good morning! I am your lecturer for today, Tape No. 14 of film series three . . ."

Video-taped lectures. At present there are very few such courses on campus, but according to a concerned Arts and Science Students Union (ASSU) and some members of teaching staff, they may be on their way, particularly for first year 100-series courses.

ASSU is planning to meet soon with staff members, hoping to mobilize forces which would reverse certain Faculty of Arts and Science General Committee rulings that may be quietly heralding a "future shock" era of standardized education.

The first step towards standardization of courses was last year's decision to require final examinations for all 100-series courses.

According to Jeannie Greatbatch, ASSU's field worker, this means many first year courses have lost their flexibility and now have to conform to exam-orientated formats. This means less opportunity for research, group and seminar activities, and "more rote learning and memorization," said Greatbatch.

"A lot of the pros that I've talked to feel they are being told how to teach their courses."

The latest step towards centralization was the decision this summer to require common exams for each course, and a standardization of marks.

According to Sociology professor Janet Salaff, this is an attempt to make individual sections in courses more uniform, so the faculty can "either move people (staff) around at will or simply have it all done on television."

"I don't feel they've got legitimate authority to tell us how to run courses."

She is also concerned about the way these changes are being made. According to Salaff, these decisions, which affect "a tremendous number of people," are hidden within trivial issues. These trivial issues are dealt with by subcommittees that few people hear about, and the motions are passed with little opposition, she said.

As an example, she cites the "trivial issue" where one course had a difference of 12 percentage points between the averages of the highest and lowest sections. This resulted in the Committee on Academic Standards' decision to require a common examination, which affects a large number of people, she explained.

She wonders why there is this sudden standardization and attempts to centralize course content.

"It is something to do with the attempts of deans to contain departments," she suggested.

Salaff is also concerned about the possible economic reasoning. She feels the university "wants to make it tougher for students to stay on" by lowering the number of high marks.

Salaff feels the administration is basing its decisions on foregone conclusions, "which should really be examined." "No proof is given, studies given, that show how grades affect study."

If exams are to be an educational tool, rather than a means of just assessing students and faculty, then the assessment should be in January, while there is still time to benefit from the results, according to Salaff.

But behind all this there is still the basic question of standardization, of restricted flexibility and individuality in courses. According to ASSU's Greatbatch, they hope to get more of the student positions on the General Committee filled, so that with greater representation, they can move to get these decisions, and the trend, reversed.

Otherwise, said Greatbatch, "some faculty members see this as one step in the direction of video-tape lectures."

SAC says extend dates

By JOE WRIGHT

SAC council Wednesday night voted support for a motion asking that professors extend essay and exam deadlines in the event of a library strike.

Initiated by the Arts and Science Students Union, the motion was carried following a recommendation by the SAC executive. The Academic Affairs committee of Governing Council voted yesterday to approve a similar motion.

Council also voted to adopt a brief prepared by the Ontario Federation of Students on the Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP).

The OSAP brief will be sent to the Ontario Government's Advisory Committee on Financial Assistance for students, which is preparing a report for Colleges and Universities minister Harry Parrott.

A SAC submission to the Admissions and Awards subcommittee of Academic Affairs on student visa applications was also adopted by council. Prepared by University commissioner Jay Lefton and Internal assistant Kevin Kelleher, the brief recommends at least ten per cent of places available in each faculty be filled by students on foreign visas.

A petition from Erindale students protesting the fare increase from 15 to 35 cents for the bus service from the Erindale to the St. George campus was given the support of council.

Council discussed a proposal to prepare a student position paper and brief on the Steven Salaff case. Salaff was dismissed in 1972 after disagreement with senior Mathematics department staff over grading policy. His dismissal has helped spark an 11-day occupation of Math department offices. The university is considering a review of the case.

In a motion to reaffirm its position, the council stated that student representation, elected by students, is essential in any review body. They condemned what they termed the arbitrary decision and called for its reversal.

Council also confirmed SAC policy towards the Erindale and Scarborough campuses. The motion stated as integral members of the University, Scarborough and Erindale students should be provided by SAC with services comparable to those enjoyed on the St. George campus. It was voted that SAC recommend to its and all members on the Varsity Board of Directors that the Varsity not accept ads from companies selling essays.

In other business SAC awarded an $800 grant to the Toike Oike. Following a motion to grant the funds, Finance commissioner Michael Treacy moved to increase the amount to $1,200. This was followed by a motion from Vice-president Sa'ad Sa'idullah which called for a grant of $750, before the original request was approved.

A grant of $150 was approved to the Toronto Association of Student Councils toward publication and distribution of a report of their September conference.

SAC also voted to contribute the cost of advertising to a maximum of $150 for a Ward Six Community Organization "Co-op" Party at Innis College.

Fong appeal resumes Sunday

The appeal of Henry Fong, a former medical student expelled last year, will continue Sunday morning 10 a.m. in the Council Chambers, Rm. 202, Galbraith building. Testimony will resume with the questioning of the faculty's Associate Dean Jan Steiner on such topics as evaluation procedures in the faculty and the possibility that personal and racial prejudice was involved in Fong's expulsion.

Attention!

The Varsity is still concerned about getting as much first-hand information as possible about the ins and outs of essay services. All information will be kept in the strictest confidence. Phone Joe or Paul at 923-8741 if you have had any dealings with the word factories.

Szasz charges 'psychiatric rape'

By CHRISTINE CURLOCK

"Architects design houses not homes. Homes are created by people create or fail to create out of houses. Psychotherapy provides conversations not cures. Cures are what clients create or fail to create out of conversations with psychotherapists."

Delivering this remark controversial author and psychiatrist Dr. Thomas Szasz last night entertained a capacity audience in the Medical Sciences Auditorium in a speech entitled "Language, Law and Lunacy."

Often accused of disloyalty to fellow psychiatrists, Szasz emphasized his objection to "involuntary psychiatry" and "psychiatric rape" or subjection of the patient by the psychiatrist. He asserted however that voluntary psychiatry which he described as "consenting" psychiatric acts between adults "is a fine personal freedom.

"Psychiatry deals ostensibly with the study and diagnosis of mental diseases," he said, "if no mental illness exists then neither does psychiatry."

Szasz opposed the "fake medical psychiatry" which he said was premised on socially shared beliefs. He questioned the factors which dictated the treatment of depression through the prescription of anti-depressant drugs. Depression is a legal expression of the human condition, he claimed and psychiatry as a medical specialty is dangerously "prescriptive." "Like advertising," Szasz said, "statements made are value judgements about how people should feel towards themselves, promoting action, opinion and feeling rather than the facts."

To a receptive audience Szasz illustrated what he termed the "condition-role" relationship between patient and doctor. Where the condition is healthy and a patient, which he insists is an assumed social role, exists, it is a psychiatric case, he said.

Szasz referred to headlines of newspaper articles in the Star, pointing out labels such as "Landed ruled insane, sent to Mental Health Centre", "Accused is an animal", to illustrate the "expert testimony" of fellow professionals. "Criminals, that is, those who endanger our life, liberty, and property, belong in prisons," he said. Szasz described psychiatry today as "a problem in housing mental illness, a brutal concentration camp situation."

Szasz insisted that behaviour can be controlled internally through self-control and externally through "police" control. "Encouragement of self-control and discouragement of police-control is freedom, based on democratic principle," he pursued, "and the opposite is medicalism and totalitarianism." He stated that "a psychiatrist has no more right to give expert testimony on an individual as being paranoid for beating up his wife than a grocer or a shoe salesman."

In a relaxed manner alternating from serious to satirical Szasz ridiculed the popular conception of mental illness. He said "If the behaviour bothers the individual, he has a neurosis, if the individual's behaviour bothers others he is classified as a psycho. If they are 'disturbed' they visit an analyst, if they are 'disturbing' they are considered crazy."

Szasz concluded in saying that it is only in psychotherapy that involuntary patients exist. "Mental illness is biologically, economically and politically unlike any other illness and to this end psychotherapy is unable to support itself ideologically, rationally, and intellectually."

Szasz had stated earlier that he was not a "real" psychiatrist in what he termed the imbecilized sense of the word. He illustrated his position with a quote from Freud who warned, "Save psychiatry from the doctors."

CBC radio tapes stolen

By MIKE RAFONE

CBC is offering a reward for the return of priceless poetry tapes recorded at the International Festival of Poetry last Monday evening, at Hart House.

The reading of A. D. Hope, who is classified as Australia's best known poet, was recorded by CBC-radio for its "Anthology" series (Saturdays at 10). The "Scotch-brand" tape box was left in the Hart House cloakroom during a poets' reception.

Patrick Hyman, a CBC radio arts reporter is willing to negotiate a reward with "the alleged thief". The tape box had extensive notes on the contents.

Also on the same tape are readings from Al Purdy and Seamus Heaney. What makes the readings of Hope of particular significance is the fact that Hope has now left Canada. This was the first visit he had made to Canada.

Hope's poetry was described by Hyman as "witty, in the English romantic tradition". Hyman also mentioned that Hope, who is in his late sixties, has influenced a number of Australian poets, namely Les Murray and John Tranter.

Anyone having any knowledge of the recording are urged to contact the Varsity. All inquiries will be handled in the strictest confidence.

The poetry festival continues until Saturday.

TERM PAPER ADVERTISERS

The Varsity Board of Directors is reconsidering its policy on the acceptance of advertising from organizations offering term papers for sale.

The Board of Directors invites written submissions which should be received no later than Friday, Nov. 7th, and addressed to:

Mr. David Simmonds
Secretary-Treasurer
The Varsity Board of Directors
91 St. George St.
Toronto, Ont.

The news in brief

Don't stop worrying entirely, but relief may be in store for essay and exam problems if and when the library strike occurs. Following on the steps of four student organizations, who presented a motion, the Academic Affairs committee has passed a motion that exerts faculty members to consider elasticizing the deadlines for assignments. It reads:

"That, in the event of a strike by library workers, the Academic Affairs committee of the Governing Council of the University of Toronto recommends that members of the teaching staff and divisions seriously consider postponing deadlines for essays, tests and other assignments for which a disruption of library service would significantly handicap students in meeting deadlines."

The motion was put forward by student governor Seymour Kanowitch and seconded by A. M.

Kruger, principal of Woodsworth College.

The Student's Administrative Council reports that the student directories containing names, addresses and phone numbers of U of T students, will be available within two or three weeks pending the arrival of the master printout from the office of Statistics and Records. It is hoped that this year's will bear no price tag.

Proceeds from all the money collected in Unicef boxes tomorrow night in the campus area will go to buying a new battery for U of T president John Evan's personal car.

Dr. Evans drives a rusting blue Dodge Dart which has trouble getting started. He was spotted performing abdominal surgery on it in front of Simcoe Hall last night in attempts to get it to move.

Feminist speaks to female crowd

By CAITLIN KELLY

Writer Susan Brandy called her "freaky and huggable". She calls herself a woman-oriented woman, a lesbian feminist. Her readers call her Jill Johnston.

Johnston spoke to a predominantly female crowd that filled a classroom in Medical Sciences Wednesday night. She read from her new book in progress, "My Father in America", subtitled "A Tour de Force", as an all-woman film crew hovered around her.

After reading from the manuscript she fielded questions from the audience, which ranged in age from 18 to 60 years.

She has been through a marriage with two children, and spoke frankly about it. "I stopped being a mother as soon as I possibly could, in the nurturing sense. When my children were six and seven I absolved myself of my maternal duties. The role is terrible, awful. I got a car as soon as my son was 3 months old. I said I gotta be mobile! That's important."

She talked about her involvement with the women's movement. "For me feminism was a very important awakening to political realities. I went through a political period that was very important to me. That gripped me, now something else is gripping me."

That something else is her new book, of which she has written 108 pages. "I have several candidates for my father," she said. "I'm writing a detective story to find the best candidate to be my real father."

To write the book, her fourth, she has had to give up a weekly column for the "Village Voice". "I have a lot of dialogues with myself that I put on paper. I'm going to buy a mountain and sit on top of it after this is all over."

She voiced her opinions of the labels that have been applied to her. "I don't like the word gay. I don't like the word lesbian, really. I'm bored of being a 'lesbian'. I do like dyke, woman, feminist — those are the basic words."

A woman asked Johnston if she menstruated during the full moon. Her answer was a long and involved one, and led to a discussion of the effects of the menses upon female writing. Johnston said, "I think there's a tie-in with the monthly thing. I know I write in circles. We're more tied in with the changes of the moon," Johnston said.

When asked if she was interested in filmmaking, Johnston replied, "I don't know anything about machines. I just like to try them. I can't even open bottle tops."

She felt that in terms of a power to effect change and excitement, the Women's movement has died, but saw it only as a temporary lapse. "A new ideology is being created," she said. "There will be a new wave."

When asked to clarify this ideology, Johnston answered, "I hope feminine analysis will be less Marxist and materialistic and more psychic and spiritual."

Asked about her literary preferences, she muttered something about "Carly Simon," before replying "I've mostly been reading Jungian stuff. I like Marie Louise von Franz who publishes out of Zurich, creation myths and that sort of thing." She added, "I don't like fiction." It really bores me because you have to read between the lines. I prefer biographies and autobiographies."

She would like to see a reinstatement of initiation processes as rites of passage from childhood into adulthood. "We should formalize the rituals of passage," she said. She proposed a two or three week transition period to take place at the age of 12 or 13 to ease the problems that arise between parents and children at this time.

Youngest hopeful foresees danger of PC extinction

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

The youngest undeclared candidate for the federal Progressive Conservative Party leadership said Wednesday that party supporters were "in danger of becoming an extinct species."

Joe Clark, 36-year old MP for Rocky Mountain, told a meeting of U of T students at Hart House it was important for the party to remember that Western Canada, where they hold a majority of seats, has traditionally been a very unreliable base.

"It is important for us to recognize that the traditional base of our party is one that has lost us elections," he told the group.

As a solution, he recommended they should continue to "broaden the base of our party to reach those who have not traditionally supported us."

Clark said Quebec was a likely area for new support. "The fact that we won in Hochelaga where five years ago we would have lost shows that now they (Quebeckers) are prepared to elect Progressive Conservatives," he said.

Former CRTC chairman and Liberal candidate Pierre Juneau was recently defeated by a PC candidate in a Quebec by-election. "We can win ten, twelve, fifteen seats there if we continue to convince French-Canadians."

Clark said he hoped to see an "equal partnership on the part of Francophones" in the party as a means of convincing Quebec voters. During the question period which followed his remarks, Clark was asked about Quebec's Official Language Act, which makes French the only official language of the province. He replied "It certainly was harmful in some of its elements," he replied, but refused to commit himself to being in favour or in opposition to it. "Which side of the conflict is wrong?" he asked.

Replying to a question on foreign investment, Clark said Canadians "focus too much on foreigners, we become too concerned about Americans." The "immense power of multi-nationals" were the real whipping-boy, he said.

"They threaten the capacity of Canada's independence as much as any U.S. corporation," he told the audience.

On the issue of wage and price controls as introduced by the Trudeau government, he said "I'm going to hedge on that." He was much more concerned about "inflationary psychology" which he said was the real long-term threat to Canada.

In response to a question on the possibility of private ownership of the Post Office, he replied, "If it were private, nobody would deliver mail to Smokey River, Alberta." But after conceding that delivery to remote areas could be a condition of contract, he said "My mind has been opened on that issue."

Another Tory leadership candidate, Sinclair Stevens, said here Tuesday night that 30 to 40 per cent of people in the Progressive Conservative party didn't belong in it, on ideological grounds. When asked if he was one of that group, Clark, well known for being a Ried Tory, replied "If someone is in the PC caucus, he is a Conservative."

"The only effect of philosophical purity is to exclude people." Clark was enthusiastic about what he termed "flexible federalism", in which the federal government would surrender some of the power it now holds. "The central government is far too strong," he said, adding its main feature was a "refusal to leave the provinces to deal with problems in their own areas."

He cited the "growing separatism in Quebec" as a symptom of this.

Another problem with the federal government was its lack of Parliamentary control of government agencies, Clark found. He singled out the CRTC as one of the worst.

Confusion surrounds 'sexist' ad

By BLAKE WOODSIDE

Trip: Fussy guy wants female company going down to the Caribbean this Christmas. Call if under 121½ pounds and between 17 and 22½. Guy 928-6186.

Guy Dick Lam (Eng 717) created a stir in the Wednesday meeting of The Varsity staff when he placed the

"It's not a joke," he said when phoned by the tall, dark Varsity reporter who was unfortunately over 121½ pounds. He said he had put the specification in the ad to prove he was "quite serious about the whole deal."

He went on to clarify one point not mentioned in the ad. "It's not a freebee."

The main discussion was over whether or not the ad was sexist. The ensuing vote on the matter of running the ad was a tie, with no abstentions. Thus the matter has been thrown to the readership of The Varsity for comment.

Editor Paul, shook his barnyard blond curly head as he outlined his fears at running the ad. "What next? We'll get an ad for a sado-masochistic woman looking for a submissive man fond of leather," he said, "who owns a goat."

City editor, slim brunette Joe said that to not print the ad would be "sexually repressive". The former cub scout added, "As soon as Mike comes up with the two bucks for the hockey game, I'll run my own. I don't have any fun around here."

Mature trend-setter Mike was extremely interested in the course of the discussion.

"Is there a story in it?" he asked. "I think we should at least give him the two bucks back."

In a languid stance, lanky Bob White ended the discussion saying, "Perhaps this will promote all sorts of sexual deviance on campus, let's run it."

Two more satisfied customers. It pays to advertise in The Varsity.

Profs won't deal with gov't

WATERLOO (CUP) — A proposal which would allow university professors to negotiate salary increases directly with the Ontario government has been scrapped.

Following lukewarm response from the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA) the proposed province-wide negotiating plan for university professors was dropped by the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA) and university presidents.

The OCUA is responsible to the Ontario government for determining funding policies to the university.

The province-wide negotiating scheme was approved by 14 of the 15 faculty associations at a meeting last May.

4,500 petition for fired gay

SASKATOON (CUP) — Support is building for the teaching supervisor suspended by the University of Saskatchewan for his homosexuality.

Some 4,500 names have been collected on the petitions circulated by the Committee to support Doug Wilson.

The committee demands a reversal of the administrative decision to suspend Wilson from his teaching supervisory position after it was learned he openly admitted being a homosexual.

Wilson has launched himself on a host of speaking tours. He has just returned from speaking at Simon Fraser in British Columbia and has been invited to speak to a rally in Toronto promoting gay rights.

Wilson's case will be the subject of a special one hour documentary on CTV's W-5 later this year.

The Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission is continuing its investigation and Dean Kirkpatrick, the administrator who suspended Wilson, has enlisted the services of a lawyer. The University's Employee's Union has taken a public stand on the issue by publishing a letter to the administration asking them to reverse their suspension decision.

Op-Ed: "Fong is a victim of racism"

Why is the communist Canadian Party of Labour taking a leading role in the appeal of a 4th year student's expulsion from the U of T Medical School? Aren't communists supposed to be concerned with the working class and to have nothing but contempt for a person who wishes to become a bourgeois doctor and make loads of money?

The line of reasoning suggested by such questions betrays ignorance of one of the most fundamental problems facing the working class movement today, a problem that lies behind the apparently isolated expulsion of Henry Fong, and a problem that is increasingly being pushed by the ruling class as their answer to our present economic difficulties. The problem is racism.

Since the University of Toronto does not exist separately from society at large and since it is run and administered by people with interests that are tied up inextricably with those of the ruling class, we might expect that racist ideas and practices would in some degree be promoted here. This is indeed the case; in fact over the last few years we have witnessed an increase in the promotion of racism at U of T, particularly in the Medical School.

Bette Stephenson (then head of the Canadian Medical Association) started things up last fall by declaring that there were "too many Chinese Students in the U of T Medical School." Realizing that she had let the cat out of the bag she tried to cover by saying she had meant to say "foreign" instead of "Chinese", ignoring the fact that there were only 5 students in first year on foreign student visas (out of 240 total enrolment). Dr. L.M. Cathcart valiantly defended her by proclaiming that "cross-cultural thought patterns differ" between Chinese and Canadian-born students.

First off, it is clear that his expulsion occurred in an atmosphere of racist statements against students of Chinese background. Also both Stephenson and Cathcart were, at the time of Henry's expulsion, members of the Dept. of Family and Community Medicine. It was during his 6½ day rotation in this Dept. that Henry's problems first began, problems that culminated in his failure of that rotation (note: no objective exams) and ultimately his expulsion. While this in itself might be dismissed as a form of guilt by association, a third fact is more explicit. Letters circulated around the Dept. clearly indicate that "cultural and ethnic differences" were discussed when his performance in courses was under question. While it is not clear, as of yet how much of a role racism played in his expulsion, it is clear that it played some (probably a large) role, and due to this alone his expulsion must be considered invalid.

An important point to consider here is the effect that these events and proclamations from the "ivory tower" have in the community. One visible result was the letters that appeared in the local papers after Stephenson's and Cathcart's remarks were printed. The gist of these letters was that Chinese students were "stealing" places at the Medical School from Canadian-born students. Here we see the concrete result of racism: scapegoating, that is, the idea that your problems are not due to the nature of the system you live under, but can be attributed somehow to an easily identifiable minority group.

The university's answer is to tighten quotas on foreign students, institute subjective "language" tests in some departments and to refuse to combat the racism on this campus. President John Evans has refused to make a statement opposing Stephenson's and Cathcart's remarks even though he admitted that their remarks have led to large numbers of people blaming foreign students for the fact that their children have been refused admission to Medical School.

It seems clear that the "authorities" are unwilling to do anything about these matters. Therefore our answer, as students, professors and workers, must be an all out fight against racism, wherever and whenever it occurs, on this campus and everywhere else.

Henry Fong is a victim of racism. If he loses we all lose, for the administrators of this university will then be encouraged to continue to promote racism.

Op-Ed: Only "fragile evidence" of racism

This Sunday the inquiry into the expulsion of Henry Fong from the Faculty of Medicine continues. In an October 15 editorial, The Varsity commented: "Discrimination operates in other ways than random violence and hate rallies. In institutions such as ours, it operates in institutional ways, in attempts to limit the number of students of foreign stock (whether they are Canadian citizens or not) or in attempts to add non-academic criteria to admissions policies. More subtly, as in Fong's case, it operates through backroom decisions tinged with discussion of racial background." All of this, and most of what was written in the accompanying op-ed by Guo Si-Ya, is grossly inaccurate.

Let us first consider the Fong case. Fong had ten failures in three years of medical school. In Si-Ya's own understatement: "He is not a particularly outstanding student." Fong has cried foul play with respect to his failure in the genital urinary system. After achieving 56 out of 80 on the test portion of the course, he assumed he needed only 4 out of 20 on the seminars to pass. The pass mark in the Faculty of Medicine is not always 60. In many courses where the class performance is high, it may rise closer to 70. Furthermore Fong argues, that he attended the seminars, forgetting that evaluation is based on contribution, not on attendance by itself. It is noteworthy that Fong failed the period II comprehensive, — as the comprehensive examinations are a barometer of a student's ability to move on to a new level of responsibility. Obviously Fong was not ready.

Fong's performance in ambulatory care deserves the adjectives that Dr. H. Gryniewski applied to it: "dishonest, irresponsible and incompetent." Testing of cranial nerves is a basic procedure. Fong's statement that the patient's nerves were "grossly intact" after examining only some of them was dangerously misleading. There are a number of terminal illnesses that can be provisionally diagnosed on the basis of the examination of cranial nerves. If by his fourth year Fong is not prepared to assume the responsibility for doing a thorough physical exam, he has no business continuing in the Faculty of Medicine.

A letter to Dean Steiner from one of Fong's instructors has been quoted as evidence that "backroom decisions tinged with discussion of racial background" are made in the Faculty of Medicine. The letter read, "I would agree that ethnic and cultural differences do not include dishonesty." This is not the statement of a racist. It is the sort of statement that one might make when casting about for any straw to discount Fong's dishonesty in Ambulatory Care. It is fragile evidence to be making charges on.

May I also point out the irony implicit in The Varsity's statement that institutional discrimination includes "attempts to add non-academic criteria to admissions policies". This statement smacks of the same misconceptions and bigotry as Bette Stephenson's statement to the effect that Chinese students did nothing but study. Students of foreign stock are fully able to measure up to non-academic criteria.

Furthermore, the admissions policies actually discriminate against students who are Canadian citizens than that landed immigrants and Canadian citizens from Ontario fill up 90 per cent of the places open in the Faculty of Medicine, and Canadian citizens from other provinces, landed immigrants from other provinces, and non-Canadian citizens from all over the world are in competition for the other places. Please, spare us the talk of attempts to "limit the number of students of foreign stock" until you research the matter more thoroughly.

One final word on the Fong case. The Medical Faculty has a responsibility to turn out doctors who they believe will be safe. Dangerous or irresponsible practice of medicine is tantamount to murder. Fortunately Fong was picked up as being incompetent prior to being licensed. The only real tragedy is that it took so long to weed him out.

'TOUCH' PASS IT ON

You know those ads you've been seeing in the paper? The ones from the people calling themselves the "Citizens' Coalition"?

The "Citizens' Coalition" is for the little guy. Or so they say.

Just plain folks, they call themselves. Ordinary people, like you and me, worried about rising prices, big government, and big unions.

Especially unions.

You'll notice they never have anything critical to say about big business.

Coincidence?

Maybe not.

The last time we added it up, the advisory board of the "Citizens' Coalition" included corporate executives who between them represent 39 corporations with combined assets of 52 BILLION, 46 million, 582 thousand, dollars.

Some citizens. Some coalition.

The founder of this corporate coalition is one Colin Brown, a wealthy insurance executive who describes himself as a "very far right winger". He thinks the Conservative party is socialistic. There are so many socialists in Canada, says Mr. Brown, that "the real revolutionaries are us right wingers".

Crackpots?

Maybe.

The difference between a crackpot and a despot is power.

These folks have plenty of power already.

Let's make sure they don't get any more.

And maybe we should start thinking about taking away the power they already have.

It's our country.

Or is it?

Mythmaking and data-processing

Redford-Kennedy as eternally innocent pattern-seeker

Who is Robert Redford anyway? Rolling Stone starts off saying he's as American as JFK and ends up calling him one dimensional.

"Redford's heroes generally celebrate the Kennedy virtues — blind confidence, grace under pressure, toughness of mind and pure pragmatism . . . they share the fatal shortcomings of heroism — they can't cope with the dark side of American life. When they stumble or fail, they never feel at fault. Either something was done to them or circumstances got out of control." (Jon Landau RS Nov. 6).

With such mush for a beginning, Rolling Stone could only confuse the issue more. So they hedge their bets. "There is something very contemporary about the appeal of Redford's brand of one-dimensional hero — and something very disturbing about it," their last line.

In our estimation, Three Days of the Condor is a grade B movie that deserves only a casual mention. But since Robert Redford is pouting over Faye Dunaway, the producers are obviously begging us to say something. The film is a condensation of the book, Six Days of the Condor.

Okay, we'll make like Rolling Stone and describe this "Ballad of a Cool Man".

America is submerged in its order, its myths, its patterns. America is played by the CIA. They commission Redford to read everything, which he does. Everything ever published anywhere. The CIA supply him with a set of patterns, "If the data fits the patterns give us a call," they say.

So Redford finds a set of data that fits the pattern and gives them a call. Five minutes later Max Von Sydow turns up to exorcise the data, with a machine gun. End of myth. Redford, while swinging from tree to tree, has his vines cut, he falls, hits his head and wakes up in the arms of Faye Dunaway. Start of story. Who am I?

He has all the data there is and false patterns to fit it. That is what is wrong with America. While the CIA jealously guard their patterns, Americans are left with raw data spewing daily from the New York Times. Only the CIA organize the data, but they do it to suit themselves.

Redford is Kennedy? But Kennedy is the CIA? Rolling Stone have their patterns screwed up too. Suck back and reload.

Redford does have some patterns. He is a male chauvinist, another Kennedy trait?

Talk about S & M Dunaway: hands tied, "How much" pant, pant, "do you want". Redford: "I just want to", pout, pout, "stop it". How about a scene of a train going into a tunnel?

Redford has another pattern. Survive. Beat up bad man, find boss, uncover plot, ride off into sunset. Click, click.

He knows how to wire telephones, "I read it somewhere". So he lets his fingers do the walking through the slow parts of the film.

He ends up with Max von Sydow and asks his new found Guru, the master of the possible, what does it all mean? "Don't ask" says our CIA man. Too much Bergman.

But Redford can't get rid of his data "It will rain at 10:20". America can't do it either. Who won the Stanley Cup? Where's all the oil? Who shot Kennedy? How is Gerald Ford? How much does a missile cost? Why is the map of the world always cut down the middle of South East Asia?"

A great TV series. Man with all the data endlessly seeking a pattern that fits. What a dope!

Cast aside your illusions and prepare for the struggle, (Mao Tse-Tung).

Valid data in wrong pattern

Susannah York is wasted in imperial melodrama of regimental loyalty

The cry pervades the land of movies "Why is there such a lack of good women's roles today?" And although women have been complaining for a few years now, the situation is not improving much. Thus some immensely talented actresses have to accept trashy roles in trashy films if they want to keep in the public eye. A case in point is the multitalented and gorgeous Susannah York. After Tom Jones, The Killing of Sister George, X, Y and Zee and Images she should not have to take bad parts. She has proven herself. Unfortunately she has no choice. She is the lone bright spot in her latest film, Conduct Unbecoming, though for reasons beyond my comprehension she only has sixth billing.

The film is a 19th century military costume piece taking place in India. Two young officers, played by Michael York and James Faulkner, arrive in India to join a regiment known far and wide for its valour and honour. The impertinent Millington (James Faulkner) immediately gets into scrapes and soon is on secret military trial for assaulting the wife of the regimental dead hero (Susannah York). The rest of the saga follows the heroic efforts of the idealistic Michael York to clear his friend of the charges. He soon finds out that the outcome is predetermined and he is only expected to go through the motions before Millington is vilified. For though fairness is essential, it is fairness to the regiment, not to the individual. The regiment is an institution beyond criticism, even, as Caesar's wife, beyond suspicion, and naturally the interests of any one man are inferior.

But Michael York will not give in, uncovering one piece of evidence right after another, showing that his pal could not have committed the ghastly deed. The suspense builds till the muddled solution is revealed.

It would be unfair to reveal the supposedly surprise twist solution; let it suffice to say that only since The Exorcist has hit the screens would this ending seem plausible.

Aside from its pretensions Conduct Unbecoming is harmless enough. Its melodrama is well-suited for hero-worshippers, the folks who enjoyed The Great Waldo Pepper. It does pose some rather interesting questions about human motivation. Its setting is rather obviously a Hollywood backdrop, but some shortcuts had to be taken if six actors have star billing. The acting ranges from capable by Susannah York and Michael York to rather indifferent by Richard Attenborough, Trevor Howard, Stacy Keach and James Faulkner, and plain bad by Christopher Plummer. But the pity is that people like Susannah York have to take roles like this at all.

Having always believed them to be the expressions, however refined, of an essentially neurotic sensibility (the distinguishing characteristic, he suspected, of all romantics), he had come to believe that, in order to derive the maximum of pleasure from, and to achieve a complete understanding of, the Ballades of Chopin, one must be in, or should at least contrive to be in, a state of unreciprocated passion. Not being, however, at the time, in that position, he was aware that this curious view could neither be subjected to empirical scrutiny, nor utterly overcome the philosophical impurity of factiousness. Now, having been recently abandoned, he was able to obtain an evanescent consolation from the fact that he was learning to appreciate the intense anguish, and frenzied melancholia, contained by this profoundly remorseful music of lost times (temporal), and pensive lyrics, for the first time.

Hart House

Sunday Evening Concert:

Walter Buczynski plays Chopin

Sunday, November 9, at eight.

Tickets are free, and available from the Hall Porter.

When, more than two years ago, Ely Landau first presented the North American public with his concept of the American Film Theatre, various sorts of apprehension were prompted on a number of different fronts. For, what Landau's publicity people felt us with in 1973 were the same muddled issues which had been raised ten years earlier by his production of Long Day's Journey into Night — a film which, after all, was something of a pioneering venture, in that it was one of the first commercial attempts to present a 'faithful adaptation' of a serious play. It was the contradiction in terms of which both filmgoers and theatre-goers objected: how 'faithful' could any such venture be when the ultimate result must necessarily be labelled an 'adaptation'? And, no matter how devoted the film was to the memory of O'Neill, there were still plenty of obvious cinematic devices in evidence.

It was in this way that the AFT's advertising was perhaps its biggest liability. It talked of the project as making way for "a new era in motion pictures." It promised that the AFT would "faithfully transform exceptional plays into exceptional motion pictures," while at the same time insisting that the result would be "a new invigorating kind of theatre." What Landau's publicity people should have realized, was that the first thing to discourage serious theatre-goers and filmgoers alike, would be the promise of a product which would somehow represent this exalted state of 'transformation' — a transformation which, if one considered it at all seriously, could only provide the viewer with the best and the worst of the half-baked.

who attended the AFT's first offering did not witness, it was the half-baked; and it was at this point that many realized the damage that Landau's barrage of advertising might have done. For Edward Albee's A Delicate Balance was a production which just happened to be on celluloid, and just happened to be directed by Tony Richardson, and the resemblance to anything cinematic stopped there. In fact, those who took advantage of a second opportunity to view the film at the Varsity Cinema this past week, would probably tell you that, in this age when even a return engagement is going to cost you $3.50, your choices were for once quite clear-cut — if you were a see Richardson fan going to see Richardson then you were making a big mistake, but if you were an Albee fan going to see Albee you had definitely made the right choice.

Granted, the production, by virtue of the two-dimensional givens of film itself, was no more 'theatre' than it was 'cinema.' But the play was intact, viewed by a camera which, though always intimate, was never intrusive, never subjective — a camera which was, for the viewer, a perfectly detached eye; and ultimately it was neither the theatre-enthusiast who was to have the most satisfying evening, but rather that person who was simply interested in the play and in the text. And it is for this reason that the production must have been a boon for Torontonians in particular: for Katharine Hepburn and Paul Scofield achieved, within a few minutes, a degree of intimacy which Jessica Tandy and Hume Cronyn wouldn't possibly have achieved, in nearly three hours, within the vastness of the O'Keefe Centre theatre.

If you missed A Delicate Balance last week, then all one can say is don't miss it next time. All six performances are brilliantly conceived — Scofield's Tobias is perfectly modulated, Hepburn's Agnes, certainly the most complex role of the six, becomes as intricate and varied on the screen as it existed on the page, and Betsy Blair as Edna is such a marvellous bit of casting that her profile alone provokes an uncanny urge to run up and gouge the screen in the general area of her eyes.

As for this week, the Varsity is presenting Pinter's The Homecoming (the fourth in a series of one-week engagements of eight AFT films), and again I would say that the choices are quite clear-cut: if you like Pinter, then you should attend — the director, Peter Hall, is, as far as I can make out, nowhere in evidence as a film-director, but rather as simply an interpreter, and a very good one, of Pinter's play. Particularly Pinteresque is the unnerving sense of claustrophobia which this production manages to convey. Even when the camera does momentarily move outside the home, the house-fronts look like so much cardboard which could collapse at any moment, just as a stage set might collapse. Cyril Cusack's Sam is fascinating and appropriately perplexing. Ian Holm's Lenny is quite menacing, and would be terrifying if he weren't so funny and pitiable at the same time. Vivien Merchant, one of my favourite actresses, plays Ruth as well as she has played anything else. David Watkin, the cinematographer, uses the natural light in the parlour in a quite curious and fascinating way. What ultimately emerges is a realization of all the humour and meanness of this great modern play.

Doubleday, $5.50

Buddy, can you spare $5.50? You see, I just heard about this book Better Times while I was routing through the noisome jungles of the Rosedale shantytown. They say it's an "indispensable guide to seating hard times." Tells you all about how to eat more cheaply, keep healthy, borrow money... suggests we're having a depression. I suppose we are.

No, I can't get one of those jobs selling streetcorner apples; the executive head-hunting companies take care of those. I've just got to have that book, though. It's a big thing, soft-covered, thumbs nicely... full of charts about vitamins and mortgage loans and things (no, really, a shaving cream dispenser uses up 4 kilowatt-hours a year; we'll have to throw up another Grand Coulee Dam) and there are cynical cartoons to put a bit of a gloss on doomsaying. What's it got exactly? Whole chapters about the follies of food and the clues to good clothing, the shocking Sherlocking into getting a place, appliances eating deep into your wealth, the nitty of credit and the gritty of health, how to jimmy a job and to creep through the courts, burrow under bureaucracy, travel the world, and then, after that, they save for the last a lesson in getting a hundred bucks fast. Yes, it seems useful. Some good hints (if I had an instant-on television, I'd unplug it every night so it wouldn't be gorging on electricity in perpetuum). The huge print sends hints rocketing into focus at a glance. In fact, you could probably read it in spurts even in the breadline, while rain and zeitgeist drenched your spirit. There it would be. An optimistic, hornblouse-crouching in your hands, whispering page after page that good times are just around the corner, lurking like a complaisant lady of the night, if you just follow the golden rules of economy. Just around the corner.

Something happened, but it wasn't worth the wait

Joseph Heller is back on the bestseller list. Everyone admired Catch 22 but fewer will think as highly of his latest attempt at a novel, Something Happened recently released in paperback by Ballantine Books.

It's about a middle-aged, chauvinist executive who's full of insecurities and anxieties. Bob Slocum's marriage stinks, except in bed, and he wouldn't know where to go if he got a divorce anyway. As father and husband in his three-child, three-car family, Slocum is inadequate, yet he is bright enough to know it and to magnify his problems. He also has to bear the guilt of a retarded son and the memory of a girl he wanted who died and will forever elude him.

Heller takes his reader on a merry-go-round of family arguments with some pretty hostile accusations. You don't wish you could get off because it's all too real but because the message is drilled through so relentlessly. The characters do show that they can mangle each other "willfully and irreparably with much malice and happiness aforesought," as Heller puts it, but the pining monotone of the book is too much to take in one dose.

Heller is a good writer but this is just not a good book. It needs action desperately and could bear much more trimming. The self-analysis of Slocum is thorough (to say the least); some good psychology is muddled into the whole family's unhappiness and in Slocum's relations at the office. The book could even be a comment on the social and personal alienation of modern man. There are some spicy sex scenes that revive lost interest. However, whatever games of discovery you make yourself play, the novel amounts to a colossal bore because of its rambling.

Not to be inaccurate, something does happen at the end of the book, and very effectively so. Slocum's favorite son, is struck by a car and is lying in agony in the presence of his father. Slocum finally feels compelled to do something. Reacting out of love and good intentions he squeezes his son tightly. The boy dies not of the accident but of asphyxiation and nobody but the father and doctor ever know. A typist at the office takes this time to go crazy, while Slocum adjusts. He decides to tell his wife he loves her, he improves his golf, and he becomes one of the company's best men. The irony in the parallel is evident. I have given away the ending but you've been spared the dreariness of too many other parts.

Heller intended us to experience what went wrong with Bob Slocum's life so that we could identify a little of a lot, and learn positively from it all. Something happened to his judgement and he became insufferable over and over and over again.

Promising Toronto debut by Vermeer Quartet

Last Friday's (October 24) performance by the Vermeer String Quartet at St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall marked their Toronto debut, and a promising debut it was. Their concert of music by Mendelssohn, Ginastera and Schumann was the first in the Centre's popular Festival Series, which will also be featuring, among others, such top-name quartets as the Guarneri, Bartok, Tokyo and Orford. The members of the Vermeer Quartet are all on the Resident Art Faculty of Northern Illinois University in De Kalb, Illinois.

The program got off to a good start with a persuasive reading of Mendelssohn's Four Pieces, op. 81, consisting of two movements (Andante sostenuto — Scherzo) from an unfinished quartet (1847), together with a capriccio (1843) and concluding fugue (1827). These rarely-heard pieces, grouped as Opus 81 after Mendelssohn's death, were executed in a most engaging fashion, with considerable warmth and feeling. Attractive as they are, the four pieces are by no means significant compositions. I personally was impressed most by the rather unacademic fugue, and here the Vermeer Quartet acquitted itself magnificently. The whole piece was charged with an energy and directness of approach that resulted in music-making of the highest order. By contrast, the slow movements which had preceded it seemed slightly belaboured, with a pinch too much of romantic flavouing.

Not all will agree that the Vermeer's performance of Alberto Ginastera's Quartet No. 2 (1958) was the highlight of the evening. To my ears, however, the artists' musical insight into a complex score and their sheer demonic virtuosity ranged far above the other parts of the program. Ginastera, an Argentinian composer best known for three controversial operas, a piano sonata, and his first piano concerto, has produced in his second string quartet a work, which successfully unites nationalistic folklore elements with contemporary idiom. Considering the work's strong rhythmic appeal, and the arrangement of its five movements into the symmetrical arch form (Fast-Slow-Fast-Slow-Fast), one might view it as a mere offshoot of Bartok. Undeniable as the influence may be — for what contemporary composer has not been influenced even slightly by Bartok? — Ginastera's quartet exists as a masterpiece in its own right, and as such was given the treatment it deserves in the superb rendition by the Vermeer. The last three movements in particular can be singled out for special mention. The third, a scherzo marked Presto magico, constitutes the core of the entire work, not only due to its central position within the framework of the quartet, but even more, I think, because of its wealth of musical ideas and marvelous special effects. The slow movement which followed, an impassioned rhapsody of an almost improvisatory nature, actually incorporates a passage from one of Ginastera's own Cinco canciones populares argentinas (Triste es el dia sin sol, triste es la noche sin luna). With reckless abandon, the Vermeer threw itself into the vertiginous finale, a breath-taking tour-de-force, which they executed with precision, intensity and prodigious strength.

Following the intermission, the artists returned to give a disappointing performance of Schumann's Quartet in A minor, op. 41, no. 1. This does not mean that the work was badly played, but rather that their reading lacked the dramatic feeling and careful shaping that had characterized the first half of the program. As if completely enervated by the rigours of the Ginastera, the musicians were unable to imbue the Schumann with much warmth or romantic intensity. Some parts were no more than perfunctory "heruntergefiedelt". Virgil Thomson has written that "what gives to lieder recitals and string quartet concerts their funereal quality, when they don't come off, and their miraculous excitement, when they do, is the absence or presence of authentic feeling in the interpretation." It was just such an absence of authentic feeling in the reading of the Schumann score that made the Vermeer Quartet's performance less than memorable. The work was nonetheless warmly received by the almost capacity audience.

I have reserved one small objection for the end, since it really does not bear directly on the quality of the evening's performance. Here it is for what it's worth. We all know of vocalists who just don't know what to do with their hands. Well, first violinist Shmuel Ashkenasi has the same problem — with his legs. From the very start of the Mendelssohn, Mr. Ashkenasi's ambulatory members were in constant motion, now stomping, now sliding noisily across the floor, finally coming to a momentary rest wrapped around the legs of his chair. The undignified position he would oftentimes assume, with both legs spread as wide as possible as if to encompass an invisible bass fiddle, combined with quite frightening grimaces and heavy breathing tended to distract the listener from his contemplation of those sweet tones which Mr. Ashkenasi evoked so beautifully from his instrument. During the Ginastera, however, the stamping of feet in time to those whirling dance rhythms was certainly not out of place. Clearly such eccentricities are the prerogative of the artist, but must be in some measure controlled, lest the ensemble be reduced to chaos. This Elton John of the violin was in fact, at times, so overpoweringly loud in a combined performance employing feet, lungs and violin, that second violinist, Canadian Pierre Menard, and violist Nobuko Imai, were almost effectively silenced.

Time alone will tell whether the Vermeer is destined to be a great quartet. I would venture to suggest, even after a single hearing, that a little more polish and maturity to complement their already impressive virtuosity, will produce a group of musicians comparable to the best.

Classically-trained ear detects self-indulgence in modern works

My reaction to the Array XI concert last Friday night was basically one of boredom, although I hesitate to criticize it, not being very well-versed in contemporary music. The program featured violist, Michael Parker, and soprano, Billie Bridgman, in works by Mozetich, John Chong, John Rodi, Barbara Pentland and Robert Bauer. Parker expertly displayed the tonal possibilities of the viola but Bridgman's voice appeared to be strained and affected.

Opening the concert was Marjan Mozetich's Disturbances. The program notes said: "Disturbances came into being in Barcelona. Fascism on a one to one basis was horribly sadistic. There was no way to act but masochistically until I was pushed to anger and hate. Visions of revenge plottings to murder, ways to torture were the outcome of my encounter. But being the "civilized" being that I am, these disturbances led me to write this viola piece as a testament, a testament that seems to reflect on a way of life that humanity appears to lead". This work, for viola solo, effectively did convey blackness, despair and alienation through the beseeching cries of the upper viola range and through the rapid bowing which created a sense of frenzied paranoia.

The high point of the evening, for me, was the witty Concerto for Viola by Robert P. Bauer. Viola, piano, percussion, electric bass guitar and tape emitted cursory sounds in the tutti sections. The viola enters relatively late, being coaxed in by a taped man's voice repeating "viola...viola..." and sounding like a 33 r.p.m. record playing at 16 r.p.m.'s. The work ends with the viola fighting and yet incorporating the shuddering rhythm of the tape.

I realize I have a lot to learn about this kind of music. I realize one cannot apprehend it with a Viennese classical ear. My objections to it, I suppose, are moral ones. To simply spew out feelings of despair is self-indulgent. No attempt to solve the human situation is shown and one is left cold.

U of T Symphony opens season with enthusiasm

The University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra presented the first of its 1975-76 season of concerts to a capacity audience at the MacMillan Theatre in the Edward Johnson Building Saturday night (Oct. 25). The orchestra, consisting of students at the Faculty of Music, was conducted by Victor Feldbrill, who teaches at the Faculty and is Resident Conductor of the TSO. The program started with Brahms' Tragic Overture, Op. 81; Feldbrill obviously had a good overall plan of the piece in mind, though for my taste the pacing and tempo were sometimes too deliberate. The most memorable playing of the evening, followed, in William Walton's Viola Concerto (1929). Soloist Steven Dann not only gave an impressive display of technical prowess but offered an engaging and at times highly impassioned interpretation of this major work in the viola repertoire. Dann has developed a distinctive personal sound of considerable beauty, and it admirably served Walton's lyrical themes. Phrases were shaped convincingly and emotional intensity sustained throughout the three movements of the concerto. Steven Dann is a gifted instrumentalist with genuine musical instincts, and I imagine the public will have the chance to hear him again in the future. I also ought to mention the important contribution of the orchestra in this work; the concerto's impact was heightened by the sense of excitement generated by conductor and players in the orchestral tutti. There were also moments of meticulous ensemble precision, especially in the cello and bass passages towards the end of the first movement.

The concert concluded with a rousing performance of Ravel's La Valse. That the orchestra even attempted this extraordinarily challenging piece is to their credit; the players' difficulty in bringing off many of the finer details made the performance sound less polished than in the works earlier in the evening. However, though notes were dropped in abundance, conductor and orchestra succeeded in conveying the sweep and broad outlines of the work with vigour. Most important, the humour of Ravel's comic and at times trenchant parody of the waltz tradition came across forcefully.

The U. of T. Symphony frequently provides the most exciting (and always the most enthusiastic) orchestral music to be heard in Toronto. Their next concert is November 29. I'd circle that date on my calendar now.

Henninger. A different tasting beer.

Meister Pils. Different again.

Henninger tastes different from Canadian beers because it's made from different ingredients and in a different way. Only two row barley is used. Yeast is especially flown in from Frankfurt. It's doubly fermented. It is allowed to carbonate naturally. It tastes like a German beer because it is. Henninger. Das Schmeckt.

Meister Pils is a true light tasting German pilsener brewed from the same ingredients and in the same way as it is in Henninger's Frankfurt brewery. Now you can enjoy the light distinctive taste that has made pilsener the most celebrated of all the world's beers.

Both Henninger and Meister Pils are made in Henninger's own independent brewery and are available at your brewers retail outlet for just a few cents more than regular beer.

NEW HOGTOWN PRESS: AFTER RETRENCHMENT, A FEW STEPS FORWARD

One of the fascinating things about the U of T campus is the variety of life that it harbours. A case in point is New Hogtown Press, a small pamphlet publisher whose first full-fledged book, published last week, is reviewed on the opposite page.

Hogtown occupies a tiny three-room building on the northern fringe of the campus, without running water or other facilities, abandoned until the Hogtowners were given permission to use the space. Long hours of work by the volunteer collective made it habitable again, but at least one problem still remains: the Post Office considers the location too far off the beaten track to deliver mail to it, so Hogtown has to receive its mail at another location.

Hogtown has its origins in the student movement of the 1960's. It began as the literature service of the Canadian Union of Students (CUS) when that organization was producing and distributing a series of pamphlets on education, Canadian political economy, and other issues. CUS itself died in 1969 as the student movement ebbed, but a group of Toronto CUS veterans decided that the literature service, at least, should be saved and continued. They formed Hogtown Press, continued distributing the CUS pamphlets, and began producing new titles as well. A loose affiliation with U of T's SAC was also developed at this time: a relationship that has continued in various permutations and combinations down to the present.

The original collective eventually dropped the operation, which was taken over by a new group of people. The name was changed to New Hogtown Press, although to little avail: to most people who know it, the press is still simply "Hogtown".

Hogtown's history is in many ways a microcosm of that of the radical student movement as a whole. In 1975, as in 1968, the goals remain the same: socialism, women's liberation, an educational system serving the needs of society rather than the needs of corporate rationality. But the tactics have of necessity changed. The large, activist movement of the sixties relied on confrontation and mass pressure, while the socialists of the seventies have had to retrench and devote themselves to laying the groundwork, through education, for another upsurge sometime in the future. In some ways, this reflects the biographies of student radicals of the sixties as well, many of whom have gone on to become radical teachers and professors. They now feel a need for educational materials that provide a different perspective on the world from that of the standard textbooks. Some indeed, have started writing newer, more probing, and more radical interpretations of Canadian society. Hogtown, for example, carries titles by such former U of T activists as Steve Langdon, Greg Kealey, Phil Resnick, Russell Hann, Daniel Drache, Laurel Limpus, and Peter Taylor, all of them campus radicals of the 1960's.

If quantity is any indication, this educational work is having some impact. Hogtown, by no means the biggest of the new radical publishers that have appeared in the last few years, distributes in excess of 12,000 copies of its catalogue across the country, and numbers to the United States and England as well.

At the same time, Hogtown's centre of gravity definitely continues to be the U of T campus. Certainly U of T people are the ones who actually keep the operation going, since Hogtown continues to rely on volunteer labour for its very existence. Publishing of any kind is a precarious venture in Canada, but publishing radical pamphlets is all the more financially unviable. Certainly Hogtown is unlikely to ever succumb to the temptation to drop its current status as a non-profit organization with charitable status in order to transform itself into a capitalist organization: not only do ideological reasons rule this out; financial realities forbid it as well. After the bills are paid, there is nothing left with which to pay staff. Politics has to be the motivation instead, and for the 15 members of the Hogtown collective, this suffices to keep them donating their spare time.

The result has been slow but steady progress that indicates that there is indeed considerable receptiveness for the materials Hogtown publishes and distributes, including its first four books this fall and winter. The main market continues to be an academic one, but off-campus contacts are significant as well, if only because they indicate a potential for future expansion.

Hogtowners don't think that reaching out to an off-campus constituency harms their credibility as a university organization. Indeed, the understanding of the university's social role remains one of the legacies of the sixties' student movement. It is also the central theme of Hogtown's first book, On Active Service in War and Peace, which documents the "activist" role of the American historical profession "in war and peace" as serving the corporate power structure in the United States. An introduction by a member of the Hogtown collective maintains that the same patterns exist in Canada, that the university and the academic professions are far from the neutral bastions of objective scholarship they claim to be. So hogtowners are in no way apologetic for entering the same social battles — and they are explicit about which side they are on.

Their commitment to a new linking of university and community has led them to explore new ways of developing and circulating ideas. The theme of "popular education", of taking their message to a broader audience of working-class people, as well as teachers and students, has consequently taken on an increased importance recently. Hogtown now distributes not only academic titles and works of socialist theory, but popular pamphlets on ecology, housing, food prices, and other issues: One of the most important emphases continues to be women's liberation publications, an issue to which Hogtowners attach considerable importance. Another area of priority has been working class history and social history, areas that most academics and commercial publishers tended to ignore until recently. At the same time, Hogtowners admit that most of these materials continue to be about working class people, rather than for them.

Left-wing materials continue to be published at a rapid rate not only by Hogtown, but by many other radical organizations and collectives. Distribution, however, remains a problem because of the structure of the Canadian market, which is controlled by a few large commercial distribution firms whose reluctance to carry radical materials, especially from small publishers, is, to say the least, notorious. Hogtown's distribution network is of course small potatoes compared to that of the large monopolies, but at least it exists, so Hogtown has taken on the distribution of other publications which are denied access to commercial markets. As a result the Hogtown catalogue carries titles from such widely different sources as the YWCA and the Exploding Myths Comic Book Collective.

Hogtown also seeks out original manuscripts for publication, many of them too radical or not profitable enough for commercial publishers. A case in point is an upcoming book on occupational health hazards being prepared by a group of U of T medical students.

The collective is far from certain as to what future directions to pursue. At present, they are content to say that the direction will continue to be socialist, and that their future accomplishments will be based on the work that has already been done.

Hogtown's mailing address is 12 Hart House Circle, University of Toronto. Their phone number is 961-8210.

New radicalism is cuddly and lovable, unlike 60's version.

A close look at the myth of academic neutrality

On Active Service in War and Peace: Politics and Ideology in the American Historical Profession, by Jesse Lemisch
New Hogtown Press
(Toronto, October 1975)
147 pages, $3.00 paperback

Jesse Lemisch's On Active Duty in War and Peace: Politics and Ideology in the American Historical Profession is an examination of the political views and practice that lie beneath the scholarship of one academic discipline. As Thomas Schofield notes in his introduction, the themes Lemisch develops are pertinent not only to students of American history but to Canadians as well. Schofield uses Lemisch's model to make a preliminary study of the ideology which permeates the writing of Canadian history.

The prominent American historians about whom Lemisch writes are not the objective scholars they claim to be but rather active cold war propagandists. While accusing progressive historians that the political "bias" of their contemporary views pervades their historical writing, they are themselves among the leaders of repressive campaigns against radical faculty and students.

The historians under study were leaders in the consensus or pluralist school of the post World War II period. They wrote that during this period the age of ideology had come to an end and that American society had become as close to being a perfect social order as was possible on earth. Because social and political consensus in America had been achieved as the result of the countervailing powers of contending elite groups there was no such phenomenon as a ruling class which used government as an instrument to maintain its power. People were fortunate to live in this naturally conflict-free society because all important social problems are insoluble. Events, not human beings, were in the saddle of history. According to these professors, history was tragically turbulent and unpredictable.

As America was as close to perfection as was possible, mass democratic movements were at best sad examples of unnecessary political anachronism and at worst irrational and retrogressive. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. concluded that people on the left were given to mental disorders and often saw conspiracies about them when they were not present. They were "lonely and frustrated people, craving social, intellectual and even sensual fulfillment they cannot obtain in existing society."

The abolitionists, who battled against slavery, were portrayed by Stanley Elkins, for example, as irrational men and women without stakes in society. As Lemisch comments, "it perhaps tells us more about the 1950's than about the 1850's that there were writers in the recent decade who cited attacks on social horrors and evaluated them primarily as reflecting the psychological defects of the men who uttered the words."

Historians such as Richard Hofstadter painted the populist movement of the small farmer in the late nineteenth century, which organized against the ruthless onslaught of the industrial capitalism that brought with it periodic depressions, persistent exploitation, and nascent agrarian business, as anti-semitic, nativist, and anti-urbanist. This interpretation left no room for a consideration of the populist movement as a response to real, not imagined oppression, and one that affirmed a human ability to shape the history of industrialism into humane proportions.

Instead of viewing the repression of (the Joe) McCarthy period as springing from the ire of a displaced conservative political elite, which turned a political tactic used by liberal Democrats in the late 1940's against liberals and radicals, these historians blamed it on the nature of a mass democratic movement. They also drew parallels with populism to explain McCarthyism. The lesson was clear: don't give the people too much freedom or they will revolt against reason.

When the Indochina War interrupted America's placid campuses in the 1960's, these same professors denounced the student protests as acts of "extremist terrorism" of the "McCarthyism of the Left." In Daniel Boorstin's view, "reactionaries" were "dyspeptics and psychotics." They also took the lead in publishing articles and political statements supportive of Washington's policies in addition to discrediting the activism and professional work of radical faculty members.

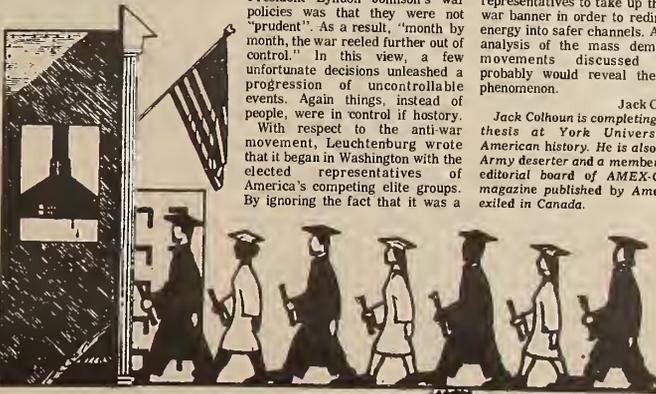

After the point was reached when to identify oneself with Washington's Indochina policies, except for the most conservative academics, was to commit intellectual suicide, they began to write the history of the war period. According to William Leuchtenburg, the problem with President Lyndon Johnson's war policies was that they were not "prudent". As a result, "month by month, the war reeled further out of control." In this view, a few unfortunate decisions unleashed a progression of uncontrollable events. Again things, instead of people, were in control if history.

With respect to the anti-war movement, Leuchtenburg wrote that it began in Washington with the elected representatives of America's competing elite groups. By ignoring the fact that it was a mass democratic movement which took the war issue into the streets, campuses, workplace, and public forums, while young men refused to be drafted or deserted and resisted from within the military, he is able to conclude that as a result of America's countervailing powers, all was well with American democracy.

While Lemisch wrote On Active Duty in War and Peace in 1969 to be presented as a paper at the American Historical Association Convention, it has aged well. Lemisch's arguments are, for the most part, sound. One point on which I differ, however, is his glorification of Robert Kennedy's role in the anti-war movement. "Some of us remember the courage with which Robert Kennedy invested his charisma in the anti-war movement, oh so early, so alone." This statement appears to contradict his more basic argument that it was the protest of the people against the war that forced some institutional representatives to take up the anti-war banner in order to redirect its energy into safer channels. A closer analysis of the mass democratic movements discussed above probably would reveal the same phenomenon.

Jack Colhoun is completing a PhD thesis at York University in American history. He is also a U.S. Army deserter and a member of the editorial board of AMEX-Canada magazine published by Americans exiled in Canada.

Farmers' movements: early McCarthyism or paradise lost?

A History of Farmers' Movements in Canada
Louis Aubrey Wood with an introduction by F.J.K. Griezic
University of Toronto Press

Farmers Confront Industrialism
Russell G. Hann
New Hogtown Press

Canadian farmers and the movements of protest that they have supported have rarely received much attention from historians.

What study exists is concerned mostly with the West, primarily because there agrarian discontent can be fitted into the frontier thesis, or explained as a function of the social structure peculiar to prairie farming.

Farmers in Ontario however, despite their capture of the Ontario Legislature in 1919, have fared even worse at the hands of historians, for little study exists of their movements.

A History of Farmers' Movements in Canada, originally published in 1924, goes some way towards filling this gap.

The book serves as a useful introduction to the study of agrarian agitation, for Wood dealt with farmers in the Maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, and the West in the period 1872 to 1924.

The chapters on Ontario are in many respects the most interesting, primarily because they deal with 19th century movements. We learn from them that rural agitation in Ontario goes back to at least 1872 with the entry of the Order of Patrons of Husbandry, commonly called the Grange, into Canada from the U.S.

Becoming independent of its American parent in 1874, by 1879 the Grange claimed a membership of 31,000 in 766 lodges, of which a vast majority were in Ontario.

Despite the organization's subsequent rapid decline, rural discontent still smoldered, and in the depression of the 1890's was fanned once more into flame.

The Order of the Patrons of Industry entered Ontario from the U.S. in 1889, and growing even faster than the Grange had, claimed 50,000 members by 1894.

In that year 17 Patrons were elected to the Ontario Legislature. Like the Grange however, it too declined until little was left in 1902. Though the Grange avoided entering politics, both organizations shared many goals.

Both engaged in cooperative ventures, and advocated as well electoral reforms, the stiff control of monopolies, and the nationalization of public utilities.

Sympathetic to the rights of labour and women, the Grange stipulated that at least 4 of a lodge's 13 officers had to be women, while the Patrons attempted to forge links with the labour movement in 1893 and 1894. Moreover, in an action that belies the conservative role given farmers by some academics, the Patrons publicly condemned the nativistic Protestant Protective Association in 1893.

Unfortunately, Wood's book suffers from a too great concern for the organizational growth of the Grange and the Patrons, rather than with their ideas, and leaves the reader with the impression that they were merely precursors to the Progressive Party, formed in 1920.

But while the failings of Wood's approach can be attributed to the state of historical writing in the 1920's, no such excuse exists for Prof. Foster Griezic's introduction.

In what must surely be a tribute to the insularity of Canadian history he manages to completely ignore the American debate over the meaning of the agrarian revolt of the late 19th century.

His bibliography, extensive as it is, does not mention Hick's The Populist Revolt, Hofstadter's The Age of Reform, or Pollack's The Populist Response to Industrial America.

Hofstadter, reacting against the sympathetic treatment given the farmers' movements by Hicks, dismissed them as a form of "cranky pseudo-conservatism" that foreshadowed the excesses of McCarthy.

Pollack, on the other hand, found in the agrarian revolt the socialist alternative that America lost.

I mention this debate only to point out that by ignoring it Griezic contributes to the sterility of Canadian history, fostering the notion that history is one of gradual progress, marked not by sharp breaks in continuity but by the evolution of consensus.

Such an approach misses the extent to which the Grangers' and Patrons' response to their society differed fundamentally from that of the farmers' movements of the 20th century.

Indeed, a far better introduction to Wood's book would have been the New Hogtown Press pamphlet by Russell Hann, Farmers Confront Industrialism, for it raises just this point.

The Grangers and Patrons noted with concern the changes in late 19th century Canada society that heralded the emergence of industrial capitalism.

They did not find material progress in the American mold as rational as the business and political leaders of the day made it seem, particularly when it was built on bloody confrontations like the Homestead strike and on the shocking poverty of the urban worker.

As Hann argues, the importance of the Grangers and the Patrons lies not only in the specific policies they advocated, but also in their attempt to forge an alternative to a form of capitalism.

Disinterested hard energy in Gunn's bare rhythms

Diane Wakoski bit one of her critics Tuesday while walking on her hind legs at the Hart House poetry circus that still, despite the fact that many of us who'd like to take in all three rings cannot postpone the quotidian, goes on. Marjorie Perloff had called her, among other things, "Thin." As the United States' s occasional answer to Irving Layton, though with jugular wit rather than high-toned old Jewish zeal, Diane had to reply, Remorse of conscience, you know, agenbite of inwit.

Her mordancy was double. She contested the charge, quite properly: Wakoski is plump with talent and attitudes. But she also wanted to bite the hand that feeds us thinness a la mode: Vogue horses riding zebras; cottage cheese dietitians; skinny, effete fashion czars. She wanted to eat her wheat thins and junk them too. Or, again, to fry fat and faggots in the same fire.

Thom Gunn was a passing target. The woman biker out of Richard Nixon's hometown nipped at the leathery biker from the Bay via Hampstead Heath. He's too thin for her. Somehow represents the fashion czars. Also — here she enjoyed obliquity — he's linked with "thin lyrics from the English past." Didn't he, just last year, publish a personal bouquet of Ben Jonson's verses? Doesn't he say about his own poetry that "I have never abandoned meter"? He did. He does. Thin are his rough trade and fluent craft.

Wakoski followed her panphillistine philippics (like her circular neighbor she filed her incisors with stars and stripes and apple pie) with a conciliatory adolescent "Apology" — we fail at all influences in order of individualize ourselves, she said: "not to follow masters who are sponges." Don't take it personal cause I have to do it to just everybody. A good reminder that we're all, always, Whitmaniac adolescents with a need. The forces of art, like coming, are convulsed and wasteful, only temporarily newing or renewing even if the temporal scale be astral. Of such is Gunn reminded in his "My Sad Captains":

One by one they appear in the darkness: a few friends, and a few with historical names. How late they start to shine but before they fade they stand perfectly embodied, all the past lapping them like a cloak of chaos. They were men who, I thought, lived only to renew the wasteful force they spent with each hot convulsion. They remind me, distant now. True, they are not at rest yet, but now that they are indeed apart, winnowed from failures, they withdraw to an orbit and turn with disinterested hard energy, like the stars.

Like the Captains, Gunn's better poems, and this is one, turn in their thinness with disinterested hard energy. Winnow them from the weaker and you'll find a Gunn well-packed with small explosives, not the marvellous Wakoski blunderbuss. She had to learn to like her face; Gunn sees the nude couple as having "had to learn their nakedness," and has certainly had to learn his own.

Nakedness is what his thinness is after. The barest rhythm, metrical or syllabic, with every deviance shooting loads; tierce de Picardi. The chill of his "Street Song" comes from stripping down:

*My grass is not oregano.
Some of its grew in Mexico.
You cannot guess the weed I hold,
Clara Green, Acapulco Gold,
Panama Red, you name it man,
Beat on the street since I began.*

A simple single repeat drives home the hawk's burden as plumpness never could:

*I'll get you anything you need.
Keys lids acid and speed.*

Images too have taken off their verbal clothes, learned clarity from conceited Anglican "metaphysicals" but not their dressy ingenuity, as in "Jesus and His Mother":

*My only son, more God's than mine,
Stay in this garden ripe with peers.*

The yielding of their substance wears

*A modest and contented shine:
And when they weep with age, not brine
But lazy syrup are their tears.
I am my own and not my own.'*

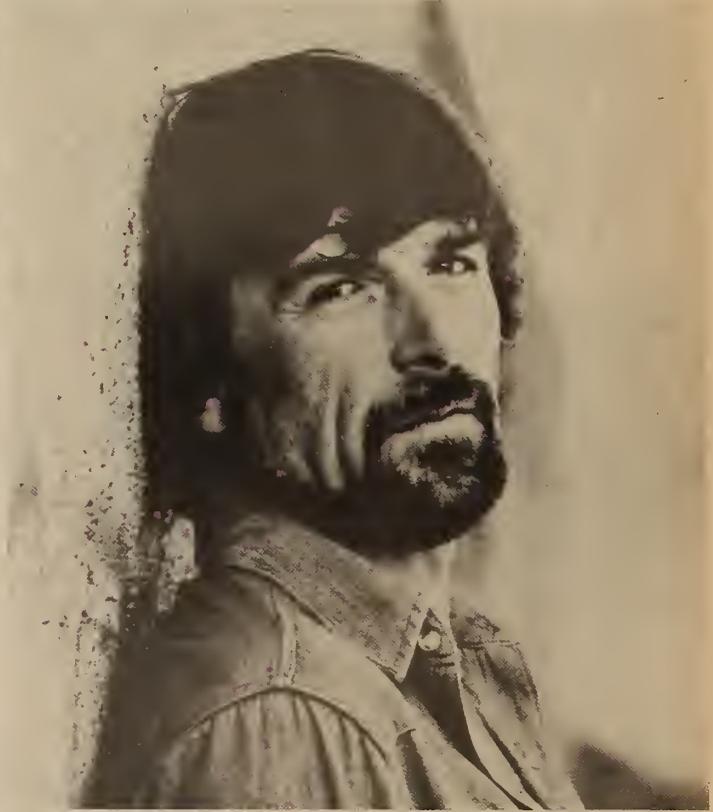

Wars between the sexes, the sexualities, the metricists and the freely versed, the speedy dull and the dulled on speed—these yet provide us with verse and controversy. Wakoski bit Perloff for preferring John Wieners's erotic poetry, and came across not unlike the Circe who also appeals to Margaret Atwood's testier moods. Both women seek in their poems to edge out from under heavy males even if it requires bestialization, co-transforming them into MCP's. Thom Gunn's "Moly" seeks to ease out from under the co-bestializers, seeks a restoration of thin humanity:

*From their fat dungeon I could rise to skin
And human title, putting pig within.*

I push my big grey wet snout through the green, Dreaming the flower I have never seen.

In this respect Gunn and Wakoski, fine poets both, share a risky mode old and new as the Palantine Anthology: bitching,d or butching, to humanize.

Gunn returns for a solo reading, longer and less formal, in the St. Michael's Poetry Series next Thursday at 4:00, Upper Brennan Hall. Michael Lynch

Can you tell the difference between a thin poet (such as Thom Gunn, above) and a fat poet just by reading their poems?

The march of production. Notice top-hatted capitalist's hand approaching worker's locket.

A streetcar named investment

Lovable Metro Parks Commissioner Tommy Thompson earned a special place in the hearts of Torontonians by leading Sunday-morning rambles through the city's parks. Unfortunately, though, most residents don't spend much of their time in an atmosphere of sylvan serenity. In keeping with the Prime Minister's admonition to "lower our expectations," therefore, public-spirited citizens should learn to satisfy their aesthetic impulses on the surroundings at hand. Responsible elements in the media and education will no doubt be quick to respond to the challenge. As a first step in this monumental adjustment of civic consciousness, the Review is pleased to print below the first in a series of "Great Streetcar Rides of Toronto", excerpted from the forthcoming book Metro's Tramways: A Tranche de Ville.

Besides hockey players and whiskey, Canada is famous for its banks. And the King St. streetcar is the best place to get a ringside seat for an awe-inspiring hymn to the backbone of our financial system. At first, travelling east from the Don Valley, King St. hardly seems like a vision of prosperity. Grey factories with few windows are mixed with tired old houses. Past the small stores and office equipment emporia a few hopeful signs begin to appear. Behind the window of a furniture store flashy chrome and velvet creations announce that the dowdy neighborhood has become quaint.

At the corner of Jarvis there is a Toronto-Dominion branch done up in turn-of-the-century style, a testament to the longstanding grasp banks have held on Torontonians' affections and other assets. As the streetcar approaches Yonge St., branches give way to the solid head offices of insurance companies and other lesser giants of Canadian finance, each new building larger and more imposing than the last. The rider's eyes ascend higher and higher. Finally, the climax: Bay St.

As far as monumental commercial architecture is concerned this is the high point of the trip. The T-D Centre and Commerce Court are built on a scale and in a manner calculated to reduce the proportions of humans to insignificance. In their self-conscious, crushing grandeur, they seem like the pyramids at Teotihuacan or the stadium at Nuremberg, places for rituals celebrating death, sacrifice, power, consumer credit. Yet these monsters are balanced by such edifices as the National Club and the Stock Exchange, which demonstrate Toronto's aptitude for the small thing done with quiet good taste.

The bas-relief mural above the entrance to the Stock exchange is one of the few examples of heroic socialist realism to grace our streets. (Another is the subway worker portrait in the entrance to the Bloor-Yonge subway station under the Hudson's Bay store, to be analyzed in greater depth in my forthcoming "Subways and Sensibility.") Farmers, steelworkers, scientists, construction workers, engineers, miners, fishermen, stude past the viewer with resolute energy. Apparently the artist who executed the work was a man of left-wing sympathies. Near the end of the parade trudges a capitalist complete with top hat and striped trousers. In the first version of the mural, his hand was unobtrusively inserted into the pocket of one of the workers. The gentlemen of the Stock Exchange were not amused by this little sight-gag, however, and the offending section was altered, in recognition of the fact that it was bad PR to actually take money out of the workers' pockets and the same end could be accomplished by subtler and more civic-spirited means.

REVIEW OF THE PRESS

Last Monday, the papers carried a photo distributed by the American Press (AP) syndicate, accompanied by the caption "Prepared to Fight: Portuguese farmer Jorge Van Zeller and his armed foreman stand ready to defend their farm, south of Lisbon, against takeover by Communist forces. There are 20 to 30 land-grabs a day in the Alentejo Plain area." There was no story run with the picture.

The photo is interesting because it is typical of the way the commercial press has been covering events in Portugal. Almost every day, there are very brief, punchy items about unrest in Portugal—some where, always having to do with "Communists" and "ultra-leftists" out to create chaos. Only very rarely do the stories carry any background information about the events they report. No larger context is given. Portugal, as it appears in the press, is simply an unrelieved picture of "anarchy" and violence. It's strangely reminiscent of coverage of Chile while Allende was in power, and the function may be the same: to prepare public opinion outside Portugal for a military coup. We're supposed to conclude that all the chaos makes a return to dictatorship necessary and inevitable.

Take the photo mentioned above as a case in point. Notice the use of the word "farmer". The immediate association is with a North American farmer, the type who works long and hard to make a barely adequate living from his land. Naturally, American Press doesn't tell you that on the Alentejo Plain there are no farmers of this type. Nor are there poor peasants of the kind that populate northern Portugal. In southern Portugal, the land is divided into huge estates producing commercial crops like cork and olives. The "farmers" are wealthy landowners, many of them absentee, who administer their holdings like large factories, complete with overseers, foremen, and a vast workforce of landless labourers. Many of them had close ties to the old fascist regime. One such "farmer", the Duke of Cadaval, who lives in Paris on his incomes, last visited his estates forty-two years ago.

Encouraged by factory occupations in the cities, the response to these conditions has been a wave of land occupations in the Alentejo, beginning early this year. For example, a dozen ploughmen moved onto the Duke of Cadaval's estate and began ploughing it. They made it clear that they didn't think that because they had made the first move onto the land, they were the only ones entitled to cultivate it. Said one representative: "We don't want to destroy one capitalist system just to build another." This was followed by a meeting in nearby Evora in which thirty thousand farm workers met to discuss their plans for agrarian reform. At another location, farm workers formed Portugal's first agricultural cooperative on seized land.

The wave of land seizures, born of a combination of old angers and new hopes, has created the possibility of transforming the economy of southern Portugal. They are the expression of widespread popular enthusiasm; the suggestion by the press syndicates that the movement is controlled by a few Communists only indicates complete ignorance, or willful distortion. Not that these farm workers fear radical solutions: on the contrary, their solutions are often too radical for the bureaucrats of the increasingly unpopular Communist Party. But that is another story.

Certainly, though, the popular movement in Portugal is laying the basis for a more just and lasting social order than the institutionalized violence and terror that marked the previous half-century of Fascism. In suggesting that this flowering of freedom, of genuine mass participation in politics, represents a step backward from the "stability" of dictatorship, the press is simply acting as advance man for the partisans of "stabilization" in the CIA.

A bold and wide-ranging evening of theatre

If they had done nothing else right the whole evening, I would still respect Scarborough College's drama and director's workshop for their acceptance that smallness does not mean loss of scope and that boldness is not concomitant with pretension. But their Evening of Comedy did far more than this by taking a difficult genre, limited but dedicated personnel and lots of energy, and producing a fairly tight evening of theatre.

Their first presentation, Orange Souffle by Saul Bellow directed by Doug Rotstein, is a light comedy of two people acting out their separate illusions of life, trying to make the other realize the significance of their way of seeing the world. There is Mr. Pennington, a rich old man who visits his "madam" once a month as much to demonstrate his virility as for the sexual pleasure. And Hilda is the whore who wants a better life; a life of orange soufflé made with "real French Comtreat". Hilda cannot accept Pennington's wishes to keep their relationship as it has been for the last ten years. Mr. Pennington, for his part, does not understand why Hilda bothers him with all the talk of new ways of life, soufflés or going to Florida.

Deborah Greig does a fine job as the upwardly mobile prostitute adding just the right amount of exaggeration and conviction particularly in lines like, "If wives can hustle, whores can bake." However, Brian Green did not grasp his part as Mr. Pennington. He was hesitant in speech and rigid in movement. The comic confusion of the character was lost except, perhaps, when he is dreaming of his youth in the navy. But this is not to the real discredit of Green's talents because, as Stanislavski pointed out, old age is probably the most difficult human state to portray on the stage.

A more ambitious undertaking was the production of Pirandello's Man With a Flower in His Mouth directed by Brigitte Mate. Pirandello is an expert in the presentation of comic masks, the faces it hides, and thus an exposure of the paradox of life. The movement of his plays is based on subtly disclosing contradiction and illusion. This play is set in a train station at midnight. A commuter has missed his train and explains all the petty implications of this difficulty to a man who has expressed interest in his situation. The man proceeds to explain his own zest for life and how, because of a personal tragedy, it can only be fulfilled by using his imagination to share in the lives of others. It is this mask that permits him to survive even though he is aware that life is silly and vain. The paradox is in the man's continued love of even the simplest detail of normal existence.

Graham Wheatley has an extremely difficult task in playing this complex figure but he is remarkably consistent and, at times, quite powerful in his projection of the man's simultaneous tension and insight. But the part lacks the subtlety of one that could most effectively present its contradictions. Instead one feels in the presence of someone who is mad and somewhat of a tragic figure rather than someone who at the same time as being aware of his predicament and his need for illusion, can get actual joy from those aspects of life that seem insignificant to others. The man's zest for life does not, then, seem ironic — just out of place. Kevin Barry as the commuter is convincingly naive, shocked, and frightened by this man who has interrupted his deliberations on his own difficulties.

Finally, the Pirandello play was balanced by Leonard Meliff's Ferry Boat directed by Karin Dressler. It is another deceptively light play about a lonely manager of a "5 & 10", Joey Dove, trying to hustle an apparently prim, attractive student named Eleanor on the Staten Island Ferry. Philip Burke is outstanding as this young man who pours out his life story to the woman trying to get her interested in him. He has moments of grandeur, sadness and cunning as he reminisces about his attempts for Hollywood fame, his suave high school years, or when, in despair, he repeatedly compares Eleanor to a "beautiful Greek statue". Eleanor tries to ignore these advances and remain aloof from what she must perceive as a somewhat distasteful scene. What Ellen Wilkenson as Eleanor lacks in speaking she makes up for in extremely expressive action. She is a marvellous match to Burke's store manager. No hint of the ending is betrayed during the play so it comes as both a jolt of insight entwined with an unexpected, and in a loose sense, traditional comic conclusion.

Strange as it may seem, I think Scarborough's Studio One with its black floors, black and maroon curtains, and hard black chairs helped to create a bond between audience and performer. I had a feeling, on entering the studio through the small door leading from a cluttered anteroom, of what it must have been like to participate in some of the early avant-garde theatre experiments where a limited audience was necessary because of the advanced consciousness required to understand the productions. The limitation in numbers reflected a selection of audience to suit the situation of the theatrical experience. Similarly, Scarborough Studio Theatre had the benefit of a sympathetic audience who were aware of the limitations of the evening but, more significantly, who felt a rapport with the aims of the artists — a conspiratorial bond of cultural consciousness.

Idiotic Ipi Tombi tries to turn apartheid into musical comedy

When the audience stood and loudly applauded Ipi Tombi on Monday evening, I, for one, was taken completely by surprise. This show may have been a smash hit in Johannesburg but I doubt sincerely whether it deserves to be one here. For it reminds me distinctly of one of those big, colourful travel folders which are quite pretty but tell you nothing. I did in fact notice in the front page of the O'Keefe Centre's theatre programme an advertisement for just such a brochure, put out by the South African Tourist Corporation. Perhaps one of their employees had seen the show previously.

The music (by Bertha Egnas) is loud and repetitious, and the lyrics (Gail Lakier) do it full justice; I know that if I hear another shrill bird-call or the rhythmic beat of another tribal drum I shall scream. We follow the narrator from his native village of Tosomo to Johannesburg and back again. The journey is colourless and inane, and tells us nothing of South Africa, except that all natives adore working in the mines and that they all fear witch doctors. The show tells us how happy life in South Africa really is.

The set, down in especially from Johannesburg, seemed extremely skimpy, at times non-existent. Perhaps inflation has had its effect even on happy South Africa.

The cast are all very industrious. They try to recreate for their audience the provincial nightmares of tribal natives. The men in the group are all brilliant when stamping their feet and clicking their tongues and the women are especially proficient at bouncing their breasts and clinking Coca-Cola cans.

As to the quality of their voices — it was very difficult to tell, for when they weren't miming to recorded voices, the sounds which they uttered were so greatly amplified that the original product was nearly obscured. But it was loud. Had the Tubes been playing across the street one could have dashed over for some peace and quiet.

If this show "captures the heartbeat of the African race", as its publicly blurb insists it does, then I feel someone should tell the major newspapers about it, as they constantly come up with headlines referring to interracial strife. If, indeed, there is any strife at all, then it is certainly not evident in this colourful piece of South African propaganda.

A welcome return for Stewart & Faces

More than two years ago Rod Stewart and Faces, although as popular around the rest of the country then as they are now, played to a disappointing crowd of less than 10,000 at Maple Leaf Gardens. Whoever decides such things must have decided Toronto fans, for whatever reason, were not turned on by this group, and that is why it has taken so long for them to come back. Judging from the reception they received last Tuesday night from about 16,000 fans at the Gardens they probably won't wait so long to return. The increase in their acceptance by Toronto fans is puzzling since the two year interval since their last show here has seen the group floundering, putting out a couple of albums that, although good, were not very popular. Last night most of the songs they played were the songs they played two years ago, and they were played in the same brawling fashion. But whatever it was that caused the increased popularity, it is certainly welcome if it causes the group to drop into Toronto more often.

They demonstrated their well-known ability to make hard-driving music that combines blues, country, and barroom boogie with tongue in cheek humour that makes other bands look like stuffed shirts.

The centre of attention, of course, is Rod Stewart, who pranced around the stage like an Afghan, although Ron Wood, the ubiquitous merry prankster was never far from the spotlight.

Lyle Belkin

Long-suffering music fans express resolute desire to see Rod Stewart and Faces in Toronto again soon.

Crouch's gospel is a musical and spiritual experience

Gospel music artists rarely rate review space in the public media, but an exception is always made for Andrae Crouch. Andrae is soul-gospel music's best known singer. He is also the key name associated with the composition of contemporary gospel music. In Toronto appearances throughout the past three years he has packed both Massey Hall and Varsity Arena as well as demonstrating his large following in countless other North American cities. Previous albums, Take The Message Everywhere, Soulfully, Keep On Singin', and Just Andrae represent the fastest and best selling albums in the field of contemporary gospel music, despite the fact that they are often available only in the religious racks of the large downtown record outlets.

Take Me Back represents the transition of Andrae Crouch, from a lively enthusiastic black gospel singer to a sophisticated, established musician. Songs such as "I'll Still Love You" reveal a smooth Philadelphia-styled soul sound featuring special effects. Diversity is apparent on such songs as "It Ain't No New Thing" a honky-tonk piano number which (when the lyrics are examined) is dealing with a major issue facing the modern church. "Just Like He Said He Would," "Take Me Back," and "You Can Depend On Me" present the familiar soul-gospel sound of Andrae Crouch and The Disciples. The music is exciting, full of ideas and (most important) honest in the way it presents its material. The latter is due to the fact that Andrae writes both lyrics and music.

Take Me Back is presently the hottest-selling gospel album in the United States and it is beginning to cross over into the soul and rock charts as well. It is the best thing ever done by the best personality and group in the field.

Don't be scared off by PR job

Well... someone has to write this article. Bruce Springsteen is the latest phenomenon to hit the radio, record stores and concert circuit. The question is: Why? His first album, Greetings From Ashbury Park, N.J. did not shake the world. A second release, The Wild, The Innocent & The Street Shuffle did not take a million copies.

A friend of mine put it this way: "Born to Run" is the perfect song." This is true of one song, but need not follow for the rest of the album. Furthermore, the title song, as a single, has been out for over a month and has yet to show major gains.

The single is however, selling the album. What makes the rest of the album so good? Is it that Springsteen is such a powerful stage performer? Could it be that the production is so well-done on the disc that it just has to be purchased? Or is it the elements of 1950's rock in a contemporary setting? Perhaps it's the musicianship in the band: Clarence Clemons on sax, Danny Federici on organ and accordion, Max Weinberg on drums, or keyboard man Roy Bliton (the only one in the group not from New Jersey).

Comparisons may be drawn between the sound of Bruce's guitar, and similar guitar sounds: between Bruce's voice and people who sound familiar. The result however, is so unique, so fresh, and so "perfect" (as my friend and others have stated) that it prohibits comparison. Well... not totally perfect, as another acquaintance pointed out: the percussion is a little low to make this suitable music for dancing. But then if something is that good can one do anything besides listen to it?

Furthermore, does any of this explain the phenomenon? Has Springsteen really changed? I think not. Why Born to Run and not the other albums? Promotion partly, but only partly. Has he just suddenly been discovered? Evidently, yes. Is the present rise of Bruce Springsteen and his music justified? This reviewer feels that it is. Why am I asking all these questions? Mainly because a media phenomenon such as Springsteen must be realized and understood by a record buying public which is also sending mediocre acts such as the Bay City Rollers to the top of the charts. Integrity and genius must be recognized in the musical wasteland of the mid-seventies. Besides... someone has to write this article.

Octavio Paz

Robert Creeley

On the trail of the elusive rhymester

Hart House has been a center of intense and bustling activity in the past six days. Still, some had difficulty in locating the place and identifying its gothic greyness. An American editor who had specifically come to listen to Creeley and Paz looked for a whole hour. Of course nobody knew where it was.

Readings were happening everywhere. There were readings at noon, readings at four, readings at night. People were walking briskly with glossy brown and orange programs which by now had become the trademark of the Festival.

The first opening night would have been triumphant had not it been damped by the yellow greenish gloom of Convocation Hall. An organist was asked to play "to quieten the crowd" — a somewhat comical request since the "crowd" was not very different from a polite Sunday afternoon concert audience at Massey Hall.

That first night had an international and bilingual vocation.

Octavio Paz, a Mexican poet read in Spanish and was immediately translated by Doug Jones. He was followed by Robert Creeley (U.S.A.)

and Irving Layton. The three men adopted radically different approaches both towards their audience and their texts. Layton was the most confident performer of the three, an old timer who knew all the tricks of the stage and the predictability of his audience. His short, stocky figure was clad in soft beige and grey, both colours picking up the rich grey of his hair. He had what neither Paz nor Creeley were given, a powerful spotlight from 2 CBC cameras. Layton is a born performer and he knows it. The crowd knew it too as it stirred for a thrilling half minute before the poet started. His voice has not changed with the years. Its tone, its rhythm, its gusto, its growl are what they were 20 years ago.

A middle-aged man who was sitting beside me was nodding approvingly to Layton's furors against hypocrites, Christians, Catholics, Communists and Palestinians alike. I am not quite sure what this stranger's ideological bias was, but one thing was certain, he had heard Layton many years ago and was finding him again there, intact, true to himself, perfect. As for myself he struck me as the most antagonizing, provoking, anger-arousing performer I had ever heard. He growls and groans and hurls invectives at you. But the experience is liberating and exhilarating. For he restores the virtues of anger and violence to the art of poetry. And even if you are opposed to everything he shouts you will feel cleansed after he is finished. A catharsis has taken place.

Paz was a totally different reader, much more shy, much more distant. In fact he seemed to put distances between him and his audience during the first part of his recital.

It may have been the language barrier. He overcame it later and managed to break through his hesitations by reaching a timid, yet strong hand towards his audience. His enunciation, his rhythm became easier and warmer. His voice was actually the best of the three that evening, deep, richly evocative of burning suns and fragile illusions. Towards the end he had almost developed a rapport with the audience and one could feel the real Paz coming across, with no fears left, just a high voltage tension. His last poem, "John Cage", got an ovation.

Creeley, who succeeded him, first had a hard time with the size of the audience and the nature of the occasion. One could tell how hesitant and nervous he felt. Yet, you could also see that he wanted to reach out to the individual in the crowd, not to the collective demons like Layton. And in spite of maybe because of his timidity he succeeded brilliantly.

There is something absolutely unique about Creeley's rhythms, they come and go, they rush and stop, they burst and break to a breathless halt. Your body follows all the movements of his voice, its starts, its hesitations, sometimes its triumphs. He was the most natural, the most unassuming, the most moving of the three. His left eye, forever closed to light or darkness made him look like a wounded, magnificent pirate bent on sharing the joys of his weird rhythms with you.

The quality of the Wednesday night reading with the three famous ladies of Canadian Literature, Anne Hebert, Cecile Cloutier and Margaret Atwood was equally high. Anne Hebert, at 59, must be one of the youngest looking poets I know. She wears pale pinks, soft greens and silvery greys with discreet charm and timid gracefulness. On stage she was the most reluctant of the three to share herself with the audience. She read a brief script from her last novel, les Enfants du Sabat, a tale of witchcraft which keeps switching from a Quebec convent to a mysterious mountain where black masses are held. Anne read three poems and disappeared.

She has remained the elusive lady of Quebec poetry, a distant performer, an exile in Paris but in Montreal too with a voice as slow, as detached as those of the nuns charged with witchcraft in the Sabat.

Cecile Cloutier followed her. There the diction, the voice, the rhythms were generous, giving, self-assured. Poetry was a gift, to be shared with all, with no regret, no hesitation, just the joy of the gift, a bright, happy, luminous experience.

Atwood closed the recital. She has become a consummate performer, unique, inimitable, self-controlled, fragile. First her voice seems almost dull and toneless in comparison with Cloutier's. But its power works slowly on you and its inflections, its nuances, its enthralling, freezing quality take you over and make you blend into a world of water, glass, ponds, drowning and screaming pain. Still, her last poem was a happy one, about August, ripe apples, a moon over an Ontario farm. It gave a hint about new directions, new moods, strong, new feelings.

Roy Lichtenstein, "Still Life with Portrait", 1974.

Pop Art star hasn't stagnated

Roy Lichtenstein became one of the stars of sixties Pop Art with his huge blow-ups of comic book figures; sighing lovers, screaming American jet fighters and soaring superheroes. Since then times have changed and Lichtenstein's work has undergone a number of evolutions. His current show at the Albert White Gallery (his first one-man exhibit in Canada!) is a witness to this fact.

Pop Art began as a movement which dramatized ordinary, stereotyped objects and products of mass culture. Andy Warhol's Campbell's Soup can, Lichtenstein's cartoon blow-ups and Oldenburg's Giant Hamburger are among a number of Pop works which have become mass cultural images in themselves.

Lichtenstein has retained a number of the features of his earlier paintings and lithographs. The predominance of primary colours (red, yellow and blue) along with black, white and green, the use of hatch lines and Ben Day dots for shading, and the delineation of shapes and objects with black line are all continued. However their usage has become controlled and limited. The dots have been enlarged in size and reduced in number. The result is that they have greater value as decorative shapes. (Ben Day dots? They form the image of most printed pictures and colours. If you look at any photograph in this paper, you'll see it's made up of hundreds of tiny dots whose variations in size form variations in colour and shade.)

Lichtenstein's work has changed in other ways as well. The objects he utilizes are important for their line and shape rather than for what they are. He says that once he has chosen a subject he loses interest in it as an object. Lichtenstein considers himself to be an abstract painter and this idea has become more apparent in his paintings of the last three years. Many of the recent works involve broken planes in a manner reminiscent of Cubism. The thicker black lines, the subtle introduction of beige and pale blue and the concentration on large shapes of flat colour and shading all combine to create abstract forms.

Yet, both ironically and paradoxically, Lichtenstein achieves this while he increases his use of the still-life. Along with his numerous references to past artists, he makes artistic statements and parodies at the same time. Lichtenstein intimidated many peoples' sensibilities with his comic book blow-ups in the last decade and still does, though less dramatically. Though he is perhaps a lesser force than he once was, Lichtenstein continues to broaden the meaning and context of art in a visually entertaining way. The show continues till Nov. 13 at the Albert White Gallery (on Prince Arthur Ave. west of the Park Plaza Hotel). It's worth seeing.

Thoma Ewen's tapestries in her show at Scarborough College's Meeting Place Gallery are the kind of art that you build a room for, rather than trying to decide whether they would fit a current room colour scheme.

"Through Morning Mist Dawns a New Day" is a tapestry for those who are drawn to Van Gogh's worship of the sun of Southern France. A fire-like, joyous movement of yellow, oranges, greens and blues, it has all the power and motion of Van Gogh's St. Remy paintings but the texture of the rya and the darker base adds an additional warmth and relaxation.

According to C.S. Caton, who is responsible for Scarborough College's gallery, a favourite of a number of people who have visited the exhibition is "Vuonisaht, Sun Fields". In an impressionist manner, this tapestry celebrates more than any other, the relationship between the sun and the earth.

But the pastel and egg tempera that it is coupled with, to my mind, even more powerful because of the flow and movement of the lines and the crispness of the colours. This is not true of all the other pastels which flank the tapestries. Here they only serve to emphasize by contrast what the texture of the fabric adds to the excitement and warmth of the colours.

Texture is put to best use in a beautiful piece called, "The Night the Moon Rained". Set in shades of blue, the moon with silver threads coming from it shimmers romantically. It is reminiscent of a clear moonlit night over a sea.

The tapestries are definitely spiritual, but not in a religious sense. Only one sketch suggests anything close to a theistic interpretation. They are a worship of the sun and moon as natural phenomena that bring light and life to the earth. Probably this is a feeling that Thoma Ewen developed last year when she studied tapestry making with the help of a Finnish government scholarship, in the Olli Maki Design Studio, Laajalahti, Helsinki, Finland — acting as an assistant to Olli Maki.

AGO shows its abilities with Puvis de Chavannes exhibit

The Puvis de Chavannes and the Modern Tradition exhibition which opened last Saturday at the Art Gallery of Ontario, is one of the most important showings of the past few years in Toronto. Hard work, research and organization have shown what standards can be reached by a major Canadian art gallery.

The exhibition centres on Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, a French nineteenth century artist, whose significance to modern art is at present being re-evaluated. In this sense, it is timely. Puvis represented a link between the classic salons of his time and those artists who rejected them. He remained curiously independent of either of these outlooks on tradition which were so central to any consideration of the arts in the nineteenth century. At the same time he utilized artistic traditions continually for his own personal, aesthetic goals. This aspect, by which Puvis' art is considered in relation to that of his contemporaries, heirs, and ultimately the traditions of art, is brought out effectively in the show. The layout and selection of works allow one to evaluate the essential contributions made by Puvis to the development of modern art, and also to see his work in a historical context. A look at both Puvis' The Sacred Grove (1884) and Toulouse-Lautrec's parody of it allows you much room for conjecture along these lines.

For those who are less familiar with the modern tradition in art, this exhibition is equally rewarding, containing various works which are in and of themselves pleasing to look at, and by familiar names. Among these are Picasso's Crouching Woman, Gauguin's The Yellow Christ and Vuillard's Two Women at a Closet. Other names represented are Redon, Moreau, Van Gogh, Seurat, Whistler and Cezanne. These have all miraculously arrived in Toronto from 60 museums and private collections in 9 countries.

An excellent catalogue accompanies the show, written by R.J. Wattenmaker, chief curator of the A.G.O. It represents the culmination of a great deal of original research. As well as this, an exhibition of French prints of the late nineteenth century complements the Puvis de Chavannes show most effectively.

It is apparent the A.G.O. has herein taken an innovative approach to this exhibition — so successfully that it can be evaluated on international standards. What more can I say, save that anyone even remotely interested in the art should go down and have a look for himself.

Perlet's portrayal of love is harmoniously surreal

Marion Perlet is colourfully and energetically represented in an exhibition of oils and ink drawings spanning twelve years (1963-1975) at the New Academic Building, Victoria College.

Perlet's concern with "portrayal of perfect love" (or imperfect love) evokes its expressive intent in a realm of imaginative perception derived from all levels of consciousness — dreams, fantasies, inventions — in an alien, often romantic vision of mythology. Her mysterious juxtaposition of nature's forms — delicately veined leaf, stem and Roman heros, almond-eyed Egyptian women suggests a harmonious, congruous surrealism, a mysticism that, paradoxically, challenges. Perlet's colours are electric in their audacity; peacock blue dream landscapes, flat, defined areas of colour, nature green profiles confining space to the picture plane in a two-dimensional Byzantine-like exercise. Her spatial directness and assertion demands authority and attention to her visual colour dynamics.

She admits to the influence of the great graphic artist and illustrator Aubrey Beardsley. Her recent evolution into ink drawings and ink and gouache treatment of her subject (as in "Lobster") proves she is suited to smaller working surfaces and is a finite detailist like Beardsley himself. Although the majority of the 60 works exhibited are her textured, highly decorative oils, the fluidity of curved line, untechnical, comforting is best represented in the refined technique of ink. "On To The New World" is one of the more interesting oils suggesting, as it does, a mobile stage awaiting the beginning of a drama.

Marion Perlet, a resident of Toronto since 1973, is one of the six Canadian artists (and the only woman) who have been commissioned by the Olympic Committee to create a series of Olympic lithographs, which will be sold internationally to raise funds for the 1976 Olympics.

Yiddish theatre stresses Jews' cultural identity

Almost one hundred years ago — in October, 1876 — a struggling journalist and former rabbinical student, Abraham Goldfaden, directed the only two actors at his disposal through performance of a series of operettas at an open-air beer garden in Jassy, Romania. In such setting and circumstances the Yiddish theatre was born.

Following the emigration to New York in 1908 of producer and actress Ida Kaminska, and the consequent death, in all but name, of her Yiddish State Theatre of Poland, the survival of professional Yiddish theatre to celebrate its centenary was in doubt. But the classics of Goldfaden, Sholom Aleichem, Peretz, and Jacob Gordin, are once again weaving their splendid magic — not only in Israel, where the long-standing resistance to things Yiddish is crumbling, but also — thanks to Sylvia Grimson's Yiddish Renaissance Theatre — in Toronto.

For Sylvia Grimson, the YRT's producer and founder, her troupe's debut with the performance at Toronto's Crest Theatre last May 6, 7, and 8 of Sholom Aleichem's Schwer Zu Sein A Yid (It's Hard to be a Jew) marked the culmination of five years of researching scripts, beating the bushes for actors with knowledge of Yiddish, and stamping the Jewish community for funds.

"The response of the audience on those three nights was just tremendous", recalls Grimson. "And it was most encouraging that we also attracted the younger people, the people upon whom the future of Yiddish culture is going to depend."

Through the YRT only began to take shape comparatively recently, the idea of some such enterprise had been brewing in Grimson's mind for several years. Some of her earliest memories are of her visits with her parents to the Standard Theatre, which until its closing in 1935, made Toronto the home of the finest Yiddish playhouse in North America, and perhaps, the world. Many of the great names of the Yiddish stage lighted the marquee of the Standard; visions of Molly Picon, Jacob Ben-Ami, and Maurice Schwartz, still dance in Grimson's mind's eye. With the last visits of the travelling Yiddish troupes in the early 1950's, the curtain fell on Toronto Yiddish theatre. For Grimson, whose spirit was nursed from babyhood by her mother's tales of Yiddish lore, the dreadful void she experienced with the passing of her people's theatre kindled hopes of a revival at some time in the indefinite future.

The survival of Yiddish theatre, Grimson says, depends primarily on its ability to consistently offer performances expressive of the plays' real worth. For that reason, the YRT is a strictly professional company. These demanding standards attracted Ida Kaminska, silver-haired legend of the Yiddish stage, and her husband, Meir Melman, both of whom — for relatively small fees, were willing to appear in the debut performances. But Grimson, feeling the tug of financial quicksand, had to postpone the offer.

Though her eyes cloud with disappointment at the memory of this misfortune, she insists that Toronto more than suffices to provide the talent required by the company. The home-grown origin of the cast and production staff of It's Hard to be a Jew supports this conviction. The stars — Chayele Luxenburg, in the role of Sarah Shapiro, and Ben Lennick, in the role of David Shapiro — a director Bill Pevzner, and musical director Rick Kardonne all live in Toronto. Grimson, though born in Montreal, moved to Toronto as a child, and worked there as a choreographer and dance teacher during the early years of her life. But the Yiddish theatre, for reasons deriving from the tragedies of east European Passover scene from "Schwer Zu Sein A Yid".

Jewry, has always been a world theatre, a global artistic shtetl, and the YRT promises to be no exception. Violinist Arkady Shindelmann, for example, is a recent emigre from the Soviet Union; and Luxenburg, as both actress and professional folk-singer, performed for several years in Warsaw, and, in the period immediately preceding her emigration to Canada, in the post-war refugee camps.

Grimson and director Bill Pevzner survived a problem which would have tempted lesser theatrical mortals to play in traffic on Broadway: despite their ability to understand Yiddish, none of the actors, except Luxenburg, could read the language — not incidentally, their scripts! The show must go on, however; for (as Grimson loves to remark) "The Jew has many a tale to tell". Aided by a Yiddish specialist, she undertook to provide phonetic transcriptions of the scripts. Further problems (or rather, challenges) derived from the need to render the Yiddish into a standard dialect — in this case, the dialect originally spoken in Vilna, Lithuania, formerly the pre-eminent Jewish cultural centre in eastern Europe. Though Grimson says the actors' pronunciation requires much improvement, the initial performances escaped the colourful, but unceremonious, interjections on proper pronunciation which sometimes occur at Yiddish cultural events when old-timers reach the end of their auditory tethers.

Grimson perceives the presentation of artistic excellence, though a sine qua non, as only one of several aims of the YRT. "A generation ago", she explains, "there was a tendency for the Jewish community to merge into the English-speaking one. For a while it forgot its own cultural worth. People are beginning to feel it's time we brought it back to life. We hope to be part of this growing need for Jewish self-expression and encourage people to take interest in, and perpetuate, the Yiddish language."

To realize this purpose, the YRT hopes to serve as a focus for the enthusiasm and creativity of young people who are contributing to this reaffirmation of Jewishness by attending Yiddish language and culture classes in either the private Jewish schools or the Jewish Studies department of the University of Toronto. As soon as financial considerations permit, the troupe intends to nurture this developing interest by staging special performances for children and teenagers. Though her descriptions of young Jews conjure visions of culturally-starved Oliver Twist's banging on their Yiddish teachers' doors and yelling for more, she recognizes as quixotic the fulfillment of the "crying need" for the revival of a network of amateur Yiddish drama clubs.

In the comparison of the Yiddish theatre experience to a "family reunion", Grimson objectifies her conception of the essence of the YRT: a magical crucible in which is forged "a renewal of the Jewish sense of unity, of interdependence, of 'belongingness' — a reference to 'circumstances' — a reference to world conditions upon which she feels no need to elaborate — the YRT must impress on contemporary Jews the importance of the sense of togetherness Toronto Jews of the early decades of this century experienced during, for example, Thursday night pre-Sabbath shopping at the Kensington Market.

Without false modesty, Grimson emphasizes that the credit for both illuminating the YRT vision with reality and generating the troupe's present momentum rests with the inspiration and hard work of her ten fellow members of the YRT's Board of Trustees: Reluctant to discuss its selection of plays for the 1976 centenary of Yiddish theatre, the Board is only revealing that the program will probably consist of a repeat presentation of It's Hard to be a Jew; two other plays from the classical repertoire; and, perhaps, the world premiere of an operetta by the YRT's very own musical director, Rick Kardonne. Arrangements for a concert on November 5 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue, the proceeds of which will assist in the funding of 1976 activity, have also recently occupied the Board.

The direction of the repertoire should prove one of the most interesting aspects of the troupe's development. Though committed to presentation of the classical repertoire, the YRT also emphasizes the importance of the work of contemporary playwrights, few of whom are likely to draw upon the framework of czarist oppression, emigration to America, and drudgery in the sweatshop which determined the plots and concerns of the classics. Perhaps considering expression of the concerns of Israel in Yiddish, rather than Hebrew, as inappropriate, these playwrights may choose to concentrate upon Yiddish on plays based on Hasidic lore; on the Warsaw ghetto uprising and other striking examples of Holocaust resistance; and, on such patently Yiddish themes as the confrontation of Haskalah (Enlightenment) and orthodoxy. The Trustees' determination that the YRT nurture an independent character will probably discourage acceptance of influences deriving from the development of an Israeli Yiddish repertoire or the eventual interchange between the Hebrew and Yiddish theatres in Israel.

If the Yiddish theatre experiment founders, Toronto's Jewish community will be indelibly at every turn by the remnants of its Yiddish past. The Workmen's Circle, eight branches in all, still provides regular meetings for its members to step back fifty years in history and recall the struggles of the Bund in Russia and Poland and of the garment workers' unions in America. Several children's schools, including those named after such leading figures of the Jewish Renaissance as I. L. Peretz, Ber Borochov, and Morris Winchevsky, offer classes in Yiddish. Its congregation fled north to Forest Hill, the slumbering hulk of Kiever Synagogue, oblivious to its new Portuguese neighbourhood, stores memories of prayers lifted to God for friends and family in Kiev and the Ukraine. And at the corner of Spadina and Dundas, not far from Shopsy's delicatessen, stands the Standard, renamed the Victory in its successive reincarnations as a burlesque palace and a Chinese movie house. Perhaps no other Ashkenazic Jewish centre in the New World, with the possible exception of New York, has retained (formally, if not spiritually) so much of its Yiddish heritage into the 1970's.

While publicity in these early stages has been confined to the Jewish community, the YRT hopes to soon attempt to also interest non-

Jews. "Because the stage is one of the most eloquent interpreters of a people", Grimson says, "the non-Jew going to Yiddish theatre can't help but appreciate its special flavour, its uniqueness. It's like going to a Cockney play. We wouldn't understand a word, but we'd taste its particular richness". Perhaps this "uniqueness" will prove for many Jews, too, to be the essence of the Yiddish theatre experience; even those few possessed of a surface Yiddish acquired by study may have Yiddish on their tongues, but not in their souls.

The YRT's desire to proclaim itself to the world represents, on the one hand, the rejection of a bugbear which plagued Yiddish theatre throughout its efflorescence and decline — the suspicion that Yiddish was either corrupted German or (folk "jargon") born of ignorance and backwardness, and consequently, not quite culturally legitimate; and, on the other hand, the celebration of the Yiddish language and its treasures as a contribution to our planetary heritage no less splendid than the eminently Yiddish paintings of a Marc Chagall.

Friday - Recommended for the initiate or the aficionado of Japanese films is the Friday and Saturday night showings at the Poor Alex. The current offering is NOBI or Fires on the Plain by Kon Ichikawa, at 8:30. Anyone with an interest in Hollywood in the historical sense should take advantage of the double bill on tonight at U.C. Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard (7:30) is the story of an aging silent film star played by an aging silent film star - Gloria Swanson - notable as well is the guest appearance of her old director Eric von Stroheim but I leave it to you to guess just what his role is. Knowing that they had been saddled with a dog the principals involved in Beat the Devil (9:30) turned the film into a piece of clever and sometimes uncomfortable biting self-parody. If you're looking for a more blatant display the Roxey has scored another of its coups by having the first reduced rate showing of The Exorcist (7:30-11:30) with a midnight show on Saturday). If you can ignore the failed attempts at being chic you may just find something in Fritz the Cat on par with an old 1930's cartoon. This Baski opus is on view all week at the New Yorker. The Ontario Science Centre's H.G. Wells science-fiction film entry for this week is George Pal's The Time Machine which is probably one of the best members of the science fiction genre and not a bad film either. Luis Bunuel's two latest films The Discreet Charm of the Clergymen (7:30) and The Phantom of Liberty (9:00) are playing the Revue tonight and Saturday night.

Saturday - This afternoon (3:00) AGO will be showing Gregory La Cava's Stage Door with Katherine Hepburn and Ginger Rogers, a 1937 film about the "life of the theatre". As for tonight it's either the Maysles brothers' mythologizing pseudo-documentary about the media-engineered tragedy of Altamont; Gimme Shelter at the Roxey at 7-8:30 and 10 or some honest fantasy offered

There's a very good selection of talent this weekend at the clubs around campus. Rough Trade is at the Colonial on Yonge. Kinky Friedman is upstairs at the El Mocambo, the perennial Knights of the Mystic Sea are downstairs. Don Potter and his back-up men are at the Riverboat until Sunday. At the Chimey is John Allan Cameron, Cape Breton's answer to Anne Murray. Sweet Blindness is at the Generator at Yonge and Eglington.

Out in Scarborough is Metro Zoo, but after the zoo closes A Foot in Coldwater will play the Knob Hill Tavern. Contrary to what you read in the Star's TV Guide Ian Thomas (not Myles and Lenny) will be at the Penthouse on Military Trail.

Next week's concerts: Ronnie Raitt at Massey Hall Sunday night. Tom Waits opens up the show. On Monday night Orleans warms up the crowd again at Massey Hall for Melissa Manchester.

Future concerts include: Paul Simon at Massey Hall on Nov. 16th, Gino Vanelli at Massey Hall Nov. 18th, Isaac Hayes at the Gardens Nov. 19th, Janis Ian at Massey Hall Nov. 24th, Keith Jarrett at Massey Hall Nov. 29th. The Allman Brothers and the Gardens Dec. 1st. Sonny Terry and the Ironmidgee at Convocation Hall Dec. 7th, and the Who at the Gardens Dec. 11th.

Varsity photographer captures rowers in time warp

Toronto rowers going to OUA A championships Saturday

By LARRY MARSHALL

The wheels of the U. of T. Rowing Team bus stopped rolling shortly after 9 a.m. last Saturday near a sandy beach in Woodstock. The regatta, hosted by Western, had been transplanted from London due to a drop in the water level of Fanshawe Lake. A less likely setting for the scenario to follow would be difficult to imagine.

Situated upon a man-made lake, the course was straight, but there its virtues ended. A discarded transport truck trailer masqueraded as the clubhouse, positioned discretely clear across the lake. Since there was no launching dock, it was necessary for competing crews to wade into the lake until the frigid water was deep enough to float a shell. Right on cue, Mother Nature supplied a strong cold headwind, corresponding waves, and a steady drizzle.

The novice crew again faced the day's worst conditions, compounded by referees still experimenting with starting procedure. Although they finished a strong fourth out of six, their showing will improve with better conditions.

The lightweight crew took to the surf next. The start again was sloppy, but the U. of T. crew stayed within striking distance until bad water slowed them close to the halfway point. Nevertheless the crew salvaged a third.

The day's big news came in the men's four race. Rowing power U.W.O. quickly opened up two lengths on U. of T., but the Toronto crew: Hugh Hardy, Jim Nicoletti, Nick Tintor, stroke Charlie Bartlett and coxie Doug Dodds, poured on the coal, crossing the finish line three lengths into first place, and gaining.

The O.U.A.A. championships will be held this Saturday at the St. Catharines Henley course. The men's four is likely the brightest prospect for a win. They have shown strongly in every race, and carry into the finals the psychological advantage of a convincing win last week. Also hot and peaking just in time is the novice crew.

Last year the novice boat never cracked 4 min. for 1000 metres, while this year's crew is close to 3 min. 30 sec. and still dropping. This crew is now considerably faster than it was two weeks ago, when it won its heat by two lengths.

Unlike the previous two crews, who fare well under all weather conditions, the lightweight squad will be a stronger threat with calmer waters. If granted same, the U. of T. lightweight boat could be the 'dark horse' to watch. Indeed, the whole U. of T. team may be considered a sleeper, and may provide a few crews with a rude awakening.

The long range outlook is good, although there are a few variables. Of course, budget restrictions provide the main restraint. The team's full budget is less than that given to the hockey Blue's for some exhibition game road trips.

U. of T. has no shells of its own, and must rent from the Argo Rowing Club. Having our own boats would enable training during the summer and help open the doors for a women's team. After the Olympics in Montreal, many crews will sell their shells for far below their value to avoid cost and risk in shipping them home. This would enable acquisition by U. of T. of top quality equipment for a fraction of its cost, with no time delays involved.

Accordingly, a one-time allotment of sufficient funds to achieve this becomes very important.

Congratulations are due to head coach Gord Leighton who, with the help this year of Chris French, has taken a gaggle of prospective oarsmen and turned them into a competitive team in two short seasons. In doing so, obstacles such as faulty equipment and a marked though understandable reluctance of team members to rise at 5:00 a.m. had to be overcome. A high return of this year's oarsmen, supplemented by a strong crop of newcomers, should enable this trend to continue next year.

Interfac Hockey, Football, Women's Basketball

In football most of the playoff spots have been decided except for fourth place in Division II.

A key game will be this Saturday when Dents plays at Scarborough. If Dents wins then they take fourth place. However, if they lose there will be a 3-way tie for fourth.

The decision will be determined by the points for and against in games between the three teams. In this case U.C. would be the winners and would face New on Nov. 6. On Nov. 4 Trinity will play Scarborough. On the same day as the New game SMC will play Vic.

The interfac hockey season is now in motion and in a Division II game Tuesday Innis defeated Junior Engineering. Innis' strength lies in its goaltending due to the return of Marv Kurz who is splitting the chores with Jay Polon. Goals were scored by Chris Bouris (2) and John Ota.

Junior Engineering has seen a lot of its players leave the scene as this marks the first time that Innis College has defeated the Skullers in Interfac Hockey.

In an amusing contest Wednesday night New was bagged by U.C. 3-0.

Wednesday, October 29th saw two defaulted games in the Women's interfac basketball schedule. Fortunately the intercampus league had a strong turnout for all four teams.

The intercampus league is in its second year of operation and is an attempt to bring the peripheral campuses of Erindale and Scarborough into the sphere of women's sports on the downtown campus.

This league is slightly more competitive than interfac as its members have practices twice a week. In addition, some members have played at the intercollegiate level.

The results of Wednesday's games were: St. George B defeated St. George A 23-12 and Erindale defeated Scarborough 29-16.

Blues face Concordia

The football Blues will face Concordia this Saturday in an OUA A semi-final at 1:00 pm at Varsity Stadium.

The Blues will be without Mark Bragagnolo who has a slightly bruised knee. Coach Ron Murphy says that the injury is not serious. He is just keeping Mark out so that he will be healthy if the Blues get to play Ottawa next week. Returning will be all-star Middle Linebacker Julio Giordani.

Concordia is a bit of a mystery as the Blues scouted McGill instead thinking that Concordia would be defeated. On top of this no films were received from their coach. All that is known is that they are good and that this is a playoff game. The Blues must win or the season is over.

Concordia defeated McGill last week to gain third place in the Eastern division. Ottawa is in first and will play McGill. Toronto will play the winner of this game next week.

Appeal hears conflicting reports

By PAUL McGRATH

Conflicting reports on the competency of Henry Fong, a fourth-year medical student expelled for the second time earlier this year, were the major focus of testimony in the second session of Fong's appeal to the Academic Appeals committee.

Fong's counsel at yesterday's hearing, U of T mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal is attempting to prove that elements of personal and racial prejudice were involved in the faculty's decision to force Fong to withdraw midway through his final year, and that a climate conducive to racism presently exists within the faculty.

The major portion of yesterday's testimony consisted of cross-examination of Dr. J.W. Steiner, who was associate dean in charge of undergraduate affairs at the time of Fong's first withdrawal in February 1974. He testified that, despite various letters supporting Fong's "satisfactory" performance before that period, Fong's expulsion was due to two letters from faculty members who had taught him, charging him with "incompetence and dishonesty" and branding him a "hazard" to health.

Earlier testimony revealed Fong's first problems arose in part from a personal disagreement between him and one member of the Department of Family and Community Medicine, Dr. H. Gryniwski. Gryniwski later made a videotape of Fong examining a patient, unknown to both. This examination, among other things led to charges of "incompetence".

The comments about Fong were passed on, after Steiner's receipt of a second letter labelling him a "hazard", to all departments that had dealt previously with Fong. The replies were almost unanimous in calling his performance "satisfactory".

The defense claims that because of the widespread discussion of Fong's problems in earlier rotations, he was not given a fair evaluation by other departments. Fong subsequently failed rotations in Surgery and Medicine "the cornerstones of medical education," according to Dr. Steiner.

Steiner admitted that because of Fong's past reviews, he had been paid close attention to by department heads but insisted that, due to the nature of the fourth year, which involves dealing with patients, it was for the safety of those patients.

When asked if examinations in certain rotations could be affected by a student's past performances, Steiner replied "no" and added a more emphatic "no" when asked if racial criteria could affect the same exams. The exams, he countered, are conducted by a group of physicians, one from outside the hospital, in order to "create impartiality".

Steiner also testified that it was "quite possible" that there were other students who had fared worse than Fong on examinations. Rosenthal mentioned several such cases, including one where a student had failed his third year twice, was readmitted on both occasions and is now a doctor.

After Fong's failures in Surgery and Medicine, the Board of Examiners of the faculty was convened and Fong was asked to withdraw "on the basis of his inability to perform certain necessary functions," according to Steiner.

Steiner was questioned about the faculty letters that included references to racial background at that time. Steiner said he knew nothing of such discussion and that he did not investigate the references in the letters.

After an unprecedented withdrawal in mid-year, Fong was allowed to repeat his fourth year on the provision that he see a psychiatrist and make up a portion of remedial work. It was his failure to do the former, coupled with a second failure in Surgery that led to his second withdrawal from the faculty. Steiner commented on Fong's "emotional instability" in support of that proviso and was immediately challenged by Rosenthal to prove that "slander".

Defense counsel is attempting to prove that the assessment procedures in the faculty are "subjective" and open the possibility for personal or racial discrimination.

In laying the groundwork for the charge of racial discrimination, Rosenthal introduced letters from faculty members to the daily newspapers charging that there are too many Chinese students in the faculty. One such comment, from former U of T lecturer Bette Stephenson, now an Ontario cabinet minister, was just a sample of the discussion taking place in the faculty, said Rosenthal.

Steiner testified that a list had been compiled of the names of 48 Chinese students at the faculty, and said that "odds are one or two" were not residents of Ontario. Steiner agreed that Stephenson's comments were "absurd".

Steiner also testified that at one point faculty member, Dr. F. Loach, had drawn a list of those students whose knowledge of English was poor, and was "disturbed" to find on it names of students whose English he felt was quite adequate.

Steiner also said that he had not investigated the list.

The appeal will resume Wednesday at 7:30. The location will be announced soon.

Mammals perish in fire

By JOE WRIGHT

At least 40 per cent of the research mammals kept in the Ramsay Wright building were killed as the result of a fire late last week.

Discovered around midnight Thursday night in the mechanical room on the sixth floor, the fire poured heat and smoke into the forced air system vent leading to the basement where the animals are kept.

Animal supervisor Jean Ward said although 40 per cent of the mammal population had been wiped out, the toll could increase to up to 60 per cent this week as secondary infections develop.

She said there was no way to estimate the cost of the loss at this point, and said the destroyed cats, mice and rats would definitely set research back.

Ward said the fire started six feet below a vent which led into the main ventilation duct for the animal storage area. She said paint was blistered in the basement area and said that firemen estimated temperatures reached 180 degrees.

The fire was the third in the past year and a half, all of which have occurred in storage areas on the fifth or sixth floor.

U of T Chief Fire Prevention officer Herb Gladney said there was certainly a possibility of arson in the case. "In looking for a cause we couldn't find any," he said. "There was no source of ignition," he added. Gladney said he believed heat detectors in the area had alerted staff to the fire. When activated, the detectors set off an alarm in the building and also in campus police headquarters.

Gladney said when firemen first arrived on the scene they couldn't

After extinguishing the fire, Gladney said firemen opened rooms on the fifth and sixth floors, but by the time they reached the animal rooms it was too late.

"It's rather unusual for fire to travel down through ducts," he noted.

There was extensive damage to duct and piping in the mechanical room, Gladney said, as well as considerable smoke damage to the corridor on the sixth floor and part of the fifth, he said.

Department of Zoology administrator G.H. Temple declined to comment, adding "Why don't you wait a few days for the facts."

As of 10 am Friday investigation of the fire was taken over by the Ontario Fire Marshall's office.

By MIKE EDWARDS

A 72-year-old woman was dragged away by the U of T police during a noon raid on the SAC office last Thursday. She was committed to 999 Queen W. on the grounds that she had been eating university food, and trespassing on university property.

Amid the loud protest of the woman and the puzzled disbelief of SAC officials, four campus police, claiming to have a trespass warrant from nearby Hart House burst into the SAC building and rushed her out the door.

"Don't worry" said a U of T Police captain to SAC president Gord Barnes. "She's a pain in the ass and we're taking her off campus." He told Barnes to calm down and offered him a cigarette.

First identified as Mary Thompson, the woman denied her last name was Thompson when talking to SAC officials later that day. Mary has become a campus fixture in the last ten years according to several U of T veterans.

She was taken to Metro police division 52 headquarters by the campus cops. The Metro police refused to charge her with trespass and instead sent her to the Ontario Psychiatric Hospital.

With help from Campus Legal Aid and Dr. Don McCulloch, the director of the U of T Advisory Bureau, Barnes and SAC Internal Assistant Kevin Kelleher, went to 999 Queen at 10 pm and arranged for Mary's release.

According to Kelleher, Mary was committed for thirty days just on the recommendation of the Metro police. "You can only be held in jail for 48 hours without charges," he said, complaining at the injustice.

Kelleher said one of the grounds used for committal by Dr. Durost was the fact that she claimed to exist on university food which Durost thought to be delusional. He also claimed she was a danger to her own health.

Kelleher was impressed with the woman's intelligence. "She's one of the finest people I've ever met," he said. "She doesn't drink, smoke or use bad language and she is very careful about what she eats. She told me off for eating junk food," continued Kelleher in a phone

U of T makes its offer

The CUPE 1230 negotiating committee considers the administration has taken their first step in the current library dispute by making their proposals public. In a report to the membership released Friday in leaflet form, the committee goes into point out these proposals are not sufficient.

According to the leaflet, the administration refused most of the union's demands, hesitated on some, and made counter offers on the issues of sick leave and job security.

The sick leave proposal is even worse than the original offer the leaflet says. The new proposals include:

1. for the third period of absence sick leave will commence after one full day of absence.
2. for the fourth and subsequent period of absences sick leave will commence after two full days of absence.

The administration also reiterated their offer of a 15 per cent increase, and attacked the idea of an across-the-board raise. The union has asked for $265 increase across the board per month.

According to the negotiating committee the across-the-board raise would succeed in compressing the gap between top and bottom salaries.

The management offer, according to the leaflet is couched in terms of protecting the salaries of the better paid workers.

The leaflet said "When management starts to attack the union proposals on the grounds of defending workers rights we should beware of wolves in sheep's clothing."

The union is now asking for an immediate "no-board" report from the conciliator which would clear the way for a legal strike.

"We anticipate a strike vote to be taken next week. A full report on management's final offer will be handed out before any meeting," is the last paragraph from the leaflet, written in large black letters.

The final conciliation meeting between the union and the administration takes place today.

Kelleher, in speaking for the SAC office, expressed a great deal of anger at the conduct of the university police. "We were lied to," he said angrily.

"The next time the police want to make an arrest they'll have to bring an army" he said. He added SAC people had discussed the matter and would resist en masse, any other attempt to "abrogate" a person's rights whether or not she is a student.

"She has no family, no friends, no ID and she stays away from the traditional places where 'bums go,'" he explained. "He admired her independence. "She is a woman who is devoted 100 per cent to her own survival."

"There are too many people who think that they know what's good for her. She knows quite well what's good for her, and she plans to live to be 100 by eating and living right," he said.

Food Filler

WASHINGTON (ENS-CUP) The Center for Science in the Public Interest has launched a nationwide campaign to improve the quality of food sold in school vending machines.
 According to the consumer group, about 80 per cent of the $5.5 billion pumped into vending machines in 1974 was spent on junk foods, which are low on nutrition and high in sugar and fat.
 Spokesperson for the group, Robert White, said vending machines "compete with the lunch program for the students' appetites."
 So far, the campaign has convinced school boards in Washington, Dallas and Bloomington, Indiana to outlaw sugar-loaded foods, or require vendors to include some nutritious food in their machines.

This job would be easier if someone would sit in of an office every now and then. Is that too much to ask? Creating the news tonight: Christine Curlook, Sharon Stevenson, Chris Du Vernet, Jonathan Gross and the desk people doing overtime. Al Castle ran the copy and Beissonian the proofreading. Throw away your bricks, you have nothing to lose but deadweight.

Fong's appeal may not answer the important questions

As Henry Fong's appeal goes into its third session, many interesting details have already become public and many questions remain unanswered, some of which may remain so.

First, J. W. Steiner, one of the central figures in Fong's expulsion, is no racist. He is the farthest thing from it. He is quite convinced that from his end the Fong case was handled solely on its academic merits, and that he personally went out of his way to encourage Henry Fong while he was a student and to soften the blow for him when it was decided that he could not continue as one.

As an architect of the current admission policy at the medical faculty, he maintains it is quite fair and completely devoid of the possibility of discrimination. He abhors ethnic or sexual quotas and probably prefers a marks-only admission criteria, even though the faculty seems headed the other way.

Unfortunately, Steiner has been left holding the bag for the rest of the faculty and there are some curious things going on.

Despite his denials, the possibility exists that there are other reasons for expelling students besides their academic merit. The case of Jerry Green is indicative. Green is an activist doctor who maintains that his politics and his hair-length were the reasons for his fourth-year failure in the faculty five years ago. Steiner admitted that Green was "bright" and agreed that his hair length (for operating room sanitation) and his "attitude" had contributed to his expulsion. As with Fong, it was recommended that Green see a psychiatrist. It is possible that the medical faculty does not know how to deal with unusual students and that their response is to assume some sort of "instability" in the student. Steiner mentioned this in Fong's case, and, pending permission from the psychiatrist to use his report as evidence, we may see some justification.

The medical faculty sometimes treats its students with a certain amount of flippancy. As has been pointed out in the hearings, the assessment procedures are subjective, sometimes based on only five or six days of exposure to the student, Henry Fong, for one, is not the sort of student who shines in this sort of situation. Student associates have admitted that he is hard to get to know, and slightly reclusive. Another testified that she has heard students dismissed in 30 seconds during discussions of individual merits.

Techniques such as secret videotapes and compilation of lists of students unjustly labelled as deficient in their knowledge of the English language do not inspire confidence in their methods of evaluation either.

Worse than this, Steiner is left trying to explain away all the racial slander that has emanated from the faculty in the last couple of years. He says he doesn't read these comments in the paper. "I don't read racist literature on principle," he says, and adds that he doesn't agree with them.

The comments warn of the yellow menace, of a medical school filled with people who don't understand the Canadian way and have trouble dealing with patients. It's certain that Steiner doesn't agree with his more vocal colleagues, but he staunchly refused to investigate their groundless charges.

There is every likelihood that Henry Fong was not the worst medical student the U of T has ever seen, and that there are students in worse shape who somehow manage not to rock the boat in any way long enough to squeak through. Nobody stepped out on a limb to say Fong was an "excellent" student but most admitted he was competent. If so, why was he picked out from this unprecedented procedure? That's the one question that may not be answered.

Some cynics say it's easy to get through medical school if you smile at the right times. Henry Fong is notoriously straight-faced.

Help us help the deaf

The problems of people with hearing impairments should be of particular concern to all of us. We are the only people who can help them learn. The various agencies involved in teaching the deaf cannot find a substitute for the day-to-day contact that we all use in order to learn new words.

One person in ten has some sort of hearing impairment. It is a common fallacy that the deaf can read their way to success. The average reading level is no more than Grade 4. Some progress is being made with captioned news broadcasts by American educational TV but the Canadian media are behind the times.

Channel 79 now have a short daily news broadcast but more is needed. Captioning of feature films and films made for the deaf is non-existent in Canada.

The Varsity is interested in doing a major story on the problems of the hearing impaired. Anyone with information on educational projects, special cultural events or sources of funds should contact Mike at the Varsity.

Poetry is not manipulation

To the Editor:

In the recent editorial of The Varsity condemning, in effect, non-revolutionary art in general and poetry in particular, the author or authors place great emphasis on a supposed dichotomy between artistic form and content. From this it is a small step to misunderstanding the task of the artist as they have done, and consigning him to the role of a harmless experimenter, a revolutionary rendered ineffectual by his concentration on form at the expense of content.

Over and over again, the poet is forced to make his position clear: Poetry is not the manipulation of forms, any more than painting is the manipulation of colors. Poets are making statements. Forms are not manipulated "without a purpose." When the poet has something to say that cannot be expressed in traditional forms, he must develop new forms. Form implies content: the way you say something is the better part of what you say. If this is denied, then it must be accepted that political art has no value at all. Then let all art be revolutionary, and let all poetry be prose.

The authors conclude that since every act is a political statement (a supposition which may or may not be accurate), those whose messages and concerns are apolitical live in a "para-reality." There are other perspectives of life besides the political, however, and this is evident in poetry as soon as one ceases to dismiss it as the simple manipulation of forms.

To those who believe poetry should be political, I pose two questions:

1) What is the point of writing poetry to express a thought that can be expressed just as well in prose? It is the Varsity's mistake to treat poetry as if it were no more than "pretified prose"—the two forms are basically different. It strikes me that there is nothing more essentially prosaic than politics. Throughout history prose has been the tool of our day-to-day, practical, physical needs. I have never come across a revolutionary poem expressing a sentiment that demanded the poetic form. The poem introducing the Varsity editorial simply strengthens my case.

2) Do we want art that will be of interest in 200 years only to historians?

Sports editor taken to task

To the Editor:

Your sports editor, Jonathan Gross, after making a basically factual report of the recent expulsion of Law from Interfac Soccer play for committing the unpardonable sin of allowing women on its team ("Co-ed Soccer Team Disqualified", Oct. 29), goes on to make the following conclusion:

"It is possible to say that while some men have a right to be upset over women entering a physical sport, they also have an obligation to understand other people's desires, including the desire to play soccer." Perhaps Mr. Gross was inspired by the fact that he was writing about a law school team, but he has certainly churned out a statement which in its "on the one hand—on the other hand" banality would do any law student proud.

What we are talking about here is sexual discrimination. Why should anyone have the "right" to be upset over a woman playing soccer? It is undeniable that some people have accumulated unfortunate attitudes about women which make them uneasy at the prospect of sharing a sports field with them. But once the initial objection of physical incapacity to play has been removed (an objection which Mr. Gross concedes is not, in the case of a game like soccer, really related to sex at all), what legitimacy do such attitudes have?

One point that is sometimes made is the comment mentioned in Mr. Gross' article that if women can participate in men's athletics, then men should be able to participate in women's athletics. . . The problem with this attitude is that it assumes a division into "men's" and "women's" which is not at all a necessary one to begin with. Why, once we have established that all participants are capable of playing the game according to its physical demands and on a level of skill which is not so dissimilar as to detract from the game's enjoyment, should we segregate the men from the women?

Actually, the joint participation of men and women in team sports may be seen in a positive light. First of all, it helps remove some of the antiquated and obstructive ideas we may hold about sexual roles. Secondly, it contributes to an enjoyment of sport as sport and not as the competitive and potentially destructive masculinity ritual it has so often become.

Can be no form without content

To the Editor:

I write to question the position taken in Monday's editorial, "Canadian poets: Are they stuck on form . . . ?"

To write well, to use words precisely, is itself a political act. Authoritarian regimes of the right or the left thrive on vagueness in language. They secure themselves by filling people's heads with slogans that, far from conveying any reality, obscure the reality with a veil of seeming sense. When the vocabulary in use ceases to have clear reference to concrete experience, clear expression and clear thought become impossible.

The fiascos of North American political life in the past decade derive to a considerable extent from the abuse of language. Where words were used without any connection to concrete experience, communication was bound to fail, insensibly to become a lie.

The primary responsibility of the poet is the care of the language. And in exercising that care he fulfills a political function—that of keeping the tools of thought and expression free for use.

The argument that the poet should choose to devote himself to "revolutionary content" as opposed to "revolutionary form" is based on the erroneous assumption that "form" is a sort of bow, traditional or "revolutionary" in design, into which a somehow pre-existent content can be poured. In fact, there can be no content without form, and form in a very real sense determines content. For example, there are things that cannot be said in the metre of Chaucer and Shakespeare and Milton because to be said at all they must be said in the rhythms of modern speech.

It is a mistake to ask the poet to serve as a mouthpiece for political ideas, whether revolutionary or in support of the status quo. Where the state of the society permits (where there is time available for something besides providing the basic necessities of life), and where the political regime does not prevent, the poet is properly occupied in giving form to the world as he experiences it.

Just to set the record straight

To the Editor:

The sequence of events leading to the disqualification of the co-ed Law soccer team was not as outlined in the Varsity on Wednesday, October 29. Knox College, immediately after the first match with the Law team, filed a protest with the referee about Law's use of several ineligible male players. The validity of Knox's protest concerning them was upheld. Knox did not protest the use of the female players. But, in checking out Knox's protest, the intramural office noted that women had played, and consequently Law was informed of the intramural office's position on the matter.

Before the second Law-Knox encounter, a small delegation from Law went in to the intramural office to see whether or not they could use women players. They were told that they could not. They did anyway. Knox did not protest this game. The intramural office merely checked out what Law did, and discovered that Law had not abided by the rules of intramural competition.

Women's rights demonstrators angry at federal IWY hypocrisy

OTTAWA (CUP) About 150 demonstrators marched on Parliament Hill to throw the International Women's Year slogan back on the doorstep of the federal government.

"It hasn't been done... WHY NOT?" demanded speakers, chants, pamphlets and pickets during a two-hour demonstration October 25. Equal pay for work of equal value; equal job opportunities, access to free, quality childcare for all; removal of abortion from the criminal code; lesbian rights, equal rights in marriage and property law; and safe effective birth control for all were major issues protesters believed the government had ignored while favouring an elaborate publicity campaign to celebrate IWY.

"No serious attempt has been made this year to implement legislation with teeth that would put an end to discrimination and remove our secondary status," Women and the Law Society representative Shirley Greenberg told demonstrators as she accused the government of extending women's responsibilities without removing their handicaps "all the while mouthing rhetoric".

"As long as the law reflects prejudice against women, it influences attitudes", she said. "Advertising campaigns are useless."

She cited equality in decision-making power, equality in division of labour in marriage and the equality in the sharing of income and property as three main areas requiring change. Others included eliminating the female sexist image in law and recognizing a housewife's individual right to pension, insurance and retraining.

Pat Hacker of Women's Career Counseling reminded the group that women are still inferior in the employment field and are still without wages for work performed in the home.

"Where are the thousands of seats Manpower should have bought to permit women to retrain, to catch up after 10 to 15 years in the home?"

Where is an effective body to insure equality for women's rights in employment?" she asked, pointing to employment and wage figures proved women are still earning less money than men and are not aspiring to management positions.

Women and the Law Society speaker Chris Barnes did not believe wage disparity was about to change, heralding an even wider gap between wages and job opportunities as a result of the federal government's wage and price guidelines.

Barnes warned wage disparity will increase to more than $5,000 during the three years the controls are in effect.

A large contingent from Gays of Ottawa participated in the demonstration demanding equal custody rights for lesbian mothers and inclusion of the term "sexual orientation in the Ontario Human Rights Code and the Canadian Human Rights Act.

"Lesbians are oppressed as women and as gays", said Robertson, noting the ever present fear of losing children, jobs, or homes because of choosing a homosexual lifestyle.

Telegrams of support from across the country included a message from Ed Broadbent leader of the federal NDP party who pledged his alliance with the women of Canada "in protesting the government's inaction to provide effective legislation to deal with the high degree of discrimination against women which still exists in our country."

At the provincial level, NDP M.L.A. for Ottawa Centre Mike Cassidy, participated in the protest and addressed the gathering in a speech that denounced the province of Ontario for equalling the Federal Government's inaction during IWY.

The demonstration was organized by the Ottawa Women's Centre in conjunction with Women's Career Counseling, Gays of Ottawa, Voice of Women, Women and the Law, and the Canadian Association for Repeal of the Abortion Laws. Women's centres from Hull, Montreal and Lucerne, as well as the Ad Hoc Committee on Equal Pay for Work of Equal Value, and the Gay Alliance toward equality were represented during the protest.

All women strike for day in Iceland

REYKJAVIK (CUP) While Canadians were protesting International Women's Year October 25 in Ottawa by marching in front of the Canadian Parliament Buildings, the women of Iceland went on strike, leaving their worried menfolk wondering how to run the country without them.

Housewives, teachers, clerks, industrial workers and even nursemaids took the day off, bringing Iceland to a virtual standstill.

The strike, in support of International Women's Year, had the backing of most of Iceland's women's groups.

The women - there are about 60,000 of them over the age 19 on the island of 215,000 people - staged their token work stoppage "to show how indispensable we are to our country's economy and national life".

10,000 march in Montreal to protest public transit fare increases

MONTREAL (CUP) Over 10,000 people, mostly students, marched on Montreal City Hall last week protesting the recent increase in the city's public transit fares.

The demonstration was organized by the Association des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ) and other groups representing transit users. They marched through downtown streets in Montreal waving placards and chanting slogans protesting the increase of subway and bus tickets from 35 to 50 cents.

Throughout the preceding week students from the Montreal CEGEPS protested the fare hike by occupying subway stations, jumping over turnstiles, and opening the control gates so the general public could enter without paying the increased fare.

The students support a return to the original prices and are also demanding special students' passes. At present, passes which allow students reduced rates are only issued to persons under 18 years of age.

The organizers met the next night and decided to call a day of 'guerrilla' protest against the fares increase in the coming week. Students will occupy designated subway stations and at rush hours will open the gates letting the public in without paying.

At least a dozen persons have been arrested so far, and a defense committee has been set up to pay any legal fees and fines.

Laurentian students act on student aid program

SUDBURY (CUP) The French and English student associations of Laurentian University, in conjunction with the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS-FEO) will be confronting Ontario government representatives on the province's student financial aid policies.

A presentation in the form of "a brief and a letter" will be made to the Ontario Advisory Committee on Financial Assistance for Students, by the Anglophone Students General Assembly (SGA) and l'Association des Etudiants Francophones (AEF), when the committee visits the campus next month.

A campaign to arouse student interest in the action was formulated at a recent public meeting organized by students and officers of the SGA, AEF and OFS, and the university's students awards officer, Roman Woloszczuk.

Students will be informed of the associations' plans individually by letter, as well as through pamphlets and articles submitted to the student newspaper. They will also request the administration cancel classes when the advisory committee visits the campus November 26.

Those in attendance at the meeting outlined several problems with the province's loan schemes, including high interest rates, expected parental contributions, students' expected contributions from summer job earnings, and the qualifications students must meet to be considered financially independent of their parents.

But OFS fieldworker Rick Gregory said OFS briefs have already been presented to the committee, and included both long and short term suggestions for improving student aid.

The advisory committee, which sports two students on its roster, including former OFS staff member Paul Axelrod, is currently touring Ontario campuses.

All documents dealing with the campaign, including the presentation to the advisory committee, will probably be rendered in both French and English by students in Laurentian's School of Translators. The associations see this as another tactic to increase student interest in the undertaking.

L'Association des Etudiants Francophones was formed after the university's French-speaking students withdrew from the SGA last year. Currently only the SGA is a member of OFS.

U of T Man Invents Drunk Pill

The Varsity — Eric Mills

An inventor, termed a "wheezing old crackpot" by fellow scientists says he has invented a pill that will sober up a drunk in five minutes. Dr. Kalvin C. Murphy, in the U of T Department of Chemistry told The Varsity that he already has tested the pill on such famous drunks as Richard Burton and Gord Barnes, and it works.

"I call it the SIAM pill," the rather aged pseudo-scientist said. "SIAM stands for Sober Up In a Minute. Actually it takes five minutes but you need a catchy word gimmick in today's market."

The ingredients in Dr. Murphy's pill which is big enough to choke a horse — are a secret. Dr. Murphy is not ashamed to admit that he is in it for the money.

"I don't have the nerve to ask for admission charges at Chem labs." Dr. Murphy was referring to the fact that a number of part-time lecturers and demonstrators are considering supplementing their income in order to fight inflation.

The federal Food and Drug department is on the verge of okaying the pill for over-the-counter sales says the rather over-the-hill lab demonstrator. Apparently they are the only ones with any knowledge of the secret ingredients.

"I hope they don't tell," he said. "It will sell for $2 a piece — less than half the cost of a mickey of whiskey," he said. "Actually it costs less than a third of a cent to produce."

He now has an authentic looking laboratory in the Ramsey Wright building. No one has been able to distinguish it from the real thing. Beakers of exotically coloured liquids bubble importantly. During the interview Murphy kept taking long lingering sniffs from one of the beakers.

The drunk pills themselves are cranked out of an old suppository press, kept in a corner of the large multi-purpose lab. Dr. Murphy claims that he picked it up for $2.50 at a Guelph auction, fifteen years ago.

"I believe in keeping costs low to benefit the consumer," he said. "If I had some big computerized operation, I could get $10 a pill, but I want to be competitive in today's uncertain economy."

Dr. Murphy says he journeyed to Los Angeles a few months ago and barged into Richard Burton's hotel suite with a bottle of the pills.

"He was drunk as usual," he said. "He opened his mouth ready to call his bodyguards but before he could speak I popped just one of my pills in his mouth."

"He just sat down — kerplunk. In minutes he was stone sober and snoring all over me with thanks."

Murphy took some pride in the fact that the historic Liz-Dick reconciliation was based on the prerequisite that Burton go on the wagon.

Dr. Murphy said that he recently got a memo from SAC president Gord Barnes.

"He told me how much he appreciated the SIAM pills," said the doctor. "He said that after you take so many, it's impossible to stay drunk, no matter how much you drink."

"I've known that ever since I invented them. What's the point in drinking if you just sober up in a minute or two?"

Barnes did say that he had never heard of the doctor or his pills, in a telephone interview late Sunday night. "I find the whole thing rather bizarre," he said.

Rain hurts attendance

Blues Soak Concordia

By JEANRUBBA

The first half was the worst of times, the third quarter was the best of times, and the rain made it the wettest in a long time as the football Blues stormed past Concordia University of Montreal into the OQIFC eastern division championship game with a 43-24 semi-final victory that can be described best as very, very interesting.

Playing before about 400 faithful fans Saturday at the Stadium, Blues seemed ready to literally hand the game to Concordia in the first half as Varsity players committed at least ten major errors including fumbles, pass interceptions, a blocked punt, some penalties, generally poor tackling and mental mistakes too numerous to catalogue.

Concordia led 18-0 at halftime, but had been given enough chances to at least double that score. Then came a third quarter that was, depending on your loyalties, either a dream or a nightmare. As the final seconds ticked off the scoreboard clock, the totals stood Varsity 42 - Concordia 18. The visitors really didn't know what hit them.

Paul Forbes, one of the many miscreants during the first half doldrums, supplied the overture with an excellent 49-yard return of the second half kick-off that set up the offensive unit on Concordia's 49 yard line. Two plays later, quarterback Dave Langley looked in vain for a receiver and then startled everyone with a twisting broken-field run that ended in the visitors' end zone.

Mike Sokovnin added the first of six converts and the score was 18-7. Concordia, an amalgamation of the former Sir George Williams University and Loyola College, seemed surprised but not worried by the sudden turn of events. The coaches began to shout, "Well, now we're in a real ball game."

Following the ensuing kick-off, quarterback Andy Morley dropped back to pass and the roof fell in on Concordians' hopes. Actually the roof was in the shape of Angelo Castellani, 251 pounds of defensive tackle, who hammered Morley from his blind side.

The ball bounced loose; it might have been ruled as an incomplete pass but no whistle blew. Varsity linebacker Wayne Cohen alertly picked up the ball and lumbered 45 yards into the end zone, making the score 18-14.

"I saw the quarterback bobbing and just scooped up the ball and took off towards the goal. I had no idea I made the touchdown until I crossed the goal line," a jubilant Cohen explained after the game.

Three minutes later, Blues were back as flanker Brent Eisey made an outstanding diving catch of a Langley pass and then carried to the Concordia eight yard line on a flanker reverse.

Steve Kwiatkowski, a veteran of several previous years who replaced the injured Mark Bragagnolo as halfback, scored easily from behind the two excellent blocks by Sokovnin and Mike Steele. Less than seven minutes had been played and Blues led 21-18.

As the third quarter dragged on, Concordia couldn't make any headway against an obviously aroused Varsity defensive unit. On Blues third series, a tremendous block by split end Mark Ackley sprang Libert Castillo for a 46-yard gain on a third down gamble.

Castillo was stopped on the Concordia seven, but Kwiatkowski scored on the next play. 28-18.

Concordia's punter John Montelapare fumbled the snap on the next series of downs and Blues were handed the ball on the visitors' 15. Langley scooted a round right end for the touchdown three plays later.

Forbes was injured while returning Concordia's next punt but Blues compensated for his loss by scoring in the final minute of the quarter as Langley lofted a perfect 48-yard bomb to Ackley who fought off three defenders and fell into the end zone. 42-18.

"We're too good a team and eventually we got the breaks. But those points were a team effort. The offense may have put the points on the board but it was the defense that kept giving us the ball," Ackley said later.

Concordians spent most of the final quarter in the Blues' end of the field but could produce only one touchdown on Scott McLachlan's short run with less than three minutes remaining.

Sokovnin ended the scoring in the game's final minute as his wide field goal attempt resulted in a single point when a frustrated Concordian clipped during the runback attempt. It was just one of 11 penalties called on Concordia, for a total loss of 131 yards. Blues were hit with four penalties for 40 yards.

The first half was a somewhat different story as Blues continually played the goodhost game, presenting the visitors with a seemingly never-ending series of scoring opportunities.

Early in the opening quarter, Forbes tried to make a shoestring catch of a punt. He missed, Concordia recovered and the eventual result was a 25-yard field goal by Guy Shiuvo.

Blues couldn't move the ball and a swarm of Concordians blocked Oscar Pava's punt and recovered on the Varsity 37. The threat ended in a single from a wide but very long Shiuvo field goal attempt from the 35.

Blues then put together a long sustained march, and as the second quarter opened they were inside the Concordia five. However, Langley chose to pass on third down and Gary Simpson intercepted in the end zone. He might have gone all the way had Langley not recovered to make the tackle near mid-field.

Concordia was obviously fired up by the sudden turn of events and after several first downs, they worked an excellent basketball-style pick play as flanker Mike Groper neatly (and very illegally) blocked out two Varsity defenders thus allowing end Dave McMillan to catch an 11-yard touchdown pass.

Langley was intercepted on Blues' next possession, but the Varsity defence held and Concordians had to settle for another single from a wide Shiuvo field goal attempt, this time from the 36.

In the final three minutes of the half, Blues handed Concordia several excellent opportunities to add more touchdowns, first on another Simpson pass interception and long runback, then when Rick Jeyzman misplayed a punt on his 12 and finally when Steve Ince slipped in the mud and deflected the ball right into Simpson's hands and he returned it to the Varsity 18.

However, in what was really the turning point in the game, Bruce Pollack and Rick Nakatsu made outstanding defensive moves on successive plays to bat down two endzone passes.

Concordians added two Shiuvo field goals in the waning seconds but the touchdowns they didn't score came back to haunt them when the Blues put it all together in the second half.

Kwiatkowski explained the sudden reversal of fortune this way: "With the team behind you putting in 110 per cent effort you play together like a championship team. We stole the momentum from Concordia because we want to beat Ottawa and to do that we had to win the second half."

But what really happened to the Blues at halftime that instilled them with the inner drive and fire to come from behind and win decisively?

In interfac hockey Friday night New came back after an opening game loss to the Grads 3-3 and Innis II lost to Eng 7-7 3-1.

"We didn't scream at them," said a relieved head coach Ron Murphy after the game. "We just asked the players to take a hard look at themselves and to remember their responsibility to the whole team. Either they wanted the chance to beat Ottawa next week or they didn't. But the individual players had to make that decision for themselves," he said.

The strategy obviously produced the desired results for the team. "They approached us like men and let us organize our own thoughts about the game," commented defensive tackle Ken Hussey.

"Ottawa had had the breaks in the first half and with an 18 point lead they were tougher to beat. But we knew we were a better team and in the second half we had our timing together and we played like the better team."

BLUESNOTES

BLUESNOTES — Bragagnolo didn't play Saturday but will be ready for this weekend's final against Ottawa Gee-Gees, who demolished McGill 57-26 in the other semi-final as Neil Lumsden scored an almost indecent 37 points. Gee-Gees will enjoy the home field advantage for the final due to their 38-16 victory over Blues on Homecoming. . . Windsor Lancers, bete noir of upright CIAU bureaucrats these days, advanced to the western division final by hammering 1974 champs Western Mustangs 47-10; Laurier grabbed the other berth, outsourcing Guelph 33-15.

U of T Hockey Tournament

By JOHN ROBB

The first annual U of T hockey tournament will take place this weekend at Varsity Arena. Featured will be some of the best hockey teams in the country.

Along with the Blues the participating teams will be Waterloo, York and Concordia.

Waterloo won the national title two years ago and looks strong again this year. Although York's hockey team is a good deal stronger than their football team, they are perennially number two to the Blues, a situation they would no doubt like to change.

Concordia is the result of the union of Sir George Williams University and Loyola. They were the two top teams in Quebec last year so it appears that the united squad will be a contender for national honours this year.

The Blues, of course, are the annual favourites for the Ontario championship. As a result of this collection of strong teams the competition could be a preview of the battle for leadership in the east this season.

The action begins Friday night at 6:30 with Toronto playing Waterloo and then continues at 9:00 with Concordia facing York. Saturday night sees the consolation final at 6:30, followed by the tournament championship at 9:00.

Tickets are $1.00 in advance at Hart House & $2.00 at the gate per night. In times of inflated ticket prices and deflated hockey this has to rank as a very good deal. Be there.

Library shutdown is a probability

By R. COLLIER and E. McMILLAN

A complete shutdown of the major university libraries became a definite possibility Monday as a council on talks between university negotiator John Parker and the union bargaining team broke down. A strike could occur as early as November 19 if 51 per cent of unionized library workers vote to refuse Simeco Hall's latest offer.

But Drew Millar, a member of the union negotiating team, pointed out that the union will continue to bargain with Parker if he makes a satisfactory offer.

If the 430 library technicians leave their job, part-time staff will likely stay off the job in sympathy and the professional librarians will demand that the library close for the duration of the strike.

The strike could last for a lengthy period since the CUPE local has a strike fund of about $17,000 and the national CUPE union will pay strikers an additional $20 to $23 a week.

The library workers' Strike Committee has promised to financially support part-time staff if they honour the union picket lines. If they are disciplined, the union has vowed to stay out.

Sympathy for the union is strong among the part-timers and more than 150 have already signed up to support the full-time staffers.

At a meeting of the CUPE 1230 executive yesterday, the local directors voted unanimously to reject the administration's last offer and to recommend to the general membership of the union that they strike.

The strike vote is scheduled for Friday afternoon at the completion of a two hour rally in the Medical Sciences building. The voting will be by secret ballot under the supervision of Arthur Brunskill, an official of the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

A simple majority of all members of the bargaining unit is required before a strike can be held, according to national CUPE regulations.

The strike will shut down the campus libraries that depend on unionized labour. These include Roberts, Med-Sci, Sigmund Samuel, and the departmental libraries in Hygiene, Engineering and Pharmacy.

But the union has emphasized that they want to inconvenience students as little as possible. "We don't want to strike and we don't want to cause hardship to library users," said union negotiator Millar. He noted many of the union demands are centered around maintaining efficient library services in the face of government cutbacks.

He urged students to take out library books before the strike, to use non-union departmental facilities and public libraries as much as possible and to urge professors to cancel or postpone essays which require use of reference material.

In his latest offer to the library workers Parker budgeted little from his previous "15 per cent increase on monetary matters." Parker now proposes 15 per cent be offered over 12 months instead of 16, with little change in fringe benefits.

Parker has refused to guarantee no layoffs among unionized workers this winter and will not offer more than ten days vacation for workers with a year's seniority.

However Parker has retreated from his demands that sick pay privileges be reduced in the new contract.

The university's monetary offer calls for a 12 per cent increase retroactive to the termination of the old contract, last June 30. Since any further increases will depend on ratification by the federal Anti-Inflation Tribunal, Parker has offered to apply on behalf of the library workers.

The last contract was signed before January 1, 1974 so exemption from Trudeau's Wage and Price Controls are confidently expected.

When approval to exceed the 12 per cent limit is won, the university will pay all the university workers the extra three per cent in a lump sum, said Parker. Since the university is only paying the workers the extra 12 per cent since the end of the last contract, it will pay each worker a lump sum of $500 each.

To bring them up to what they consider a fair wage, the library workers would like an across-the-board flat rate of $20 a month paid to each worker, $35 a month less than the last demand. The workers also expect $1,500 for two year workers to compensate them for inflationary setbacks.

This would give a starting technician about $8,500 a year, a 48 per cent increase, and the average $7,800 employee, a 35 per cent rise to about $10,500. The top ranks of the unionized staff would get only an 18 per cent raise.

Fong appeal resumes

The appeal of Henry Fong will go into its third and possibly final session tonight at 7 p.m. in the Council Chambers, Galbraith Building.

Mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal will question Meds Associate Dean E. Llewellyn-Thomas on the particulars of the Fong case and the general topic of racism in the medical faculty.

Rosenthal told The Varsity yesterday that he has "the evidence we've been looking for" to link Fong's case to a pattern of discrimination against students of Chinese origin.

Input in jeopardy, Council will decide

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

In a motion Monday night SAC executive has "deemed Input Radio to be in default of their $30,000 pledge commitment."

As a condition of SAC support for their FM licence bid, Input Radio was to have had $30,000 in pledges for operating expenses by November 1 for their first year of FM operation.

The executive also passed a motion calling for a suspension of expenditures from the Input's $12,500 pre-operating expenses budget, but agreed expenses incurred in the meantime be covered by other sources of income for the station, such as disc jockey services and corporate grants.

The executive did not make any recommendation regarding the matter to the SAC general council, where the ultimate decision regarding the station's future resides. The next council meeting is to be held Nov. 19.

According to a letter from station manager Richard Lafferty to Communications commissioner John Tuzyk which was read to the SAC executive, the station has collected $27,500 up to Monday.

The $27,500 figure includes the donation of an antenna site on the top of the Manulife Centre costed by Input at $24,000. The station will actually pay $2 per year for the site rental. However the inclusion of the site rental as an operating grant was challenged by executive members. SAC executive assistant John Bennett said the site was worth what the station was paying for it. He said later the station had always previously counted the site rental as a gift.

said according to proper accounting procedures, the rental must be costed at the $2 per year to be paid for it.

In a letter to Tuzyk, Lafferty cited the mail strike as one obstacle to obtaining the $30,000. He also said Input expected considerable corporate donations, but that these could not be made until corporate meetings held this month.

In discussing the failure of the station to reach the $30,000 fundraising goal, Gerhardt said, "They blew it." He asked why the station had accepted the Nov. 1 deadline if it did not provide reasonable time.

"I think they should have said then that corporations would have to consider in November meetings, making December 1 a realistic date."

Pointing out the antenna site donation and a pledge from the Xerox Corporation had been made previous to the setting of the Nov. 1 deadline, Sa'idullah said "They said they had $2,500 from Xerox before, so they've come up with $1,000 since then."

Vice-president Michelle Harvey also expressed concern about the fundraising effort, but pointed out it had been hampered by the mail strike.

"I'm disappointed that more money wasn't raised," Tuzyk said later. "If more progress isn't made by the time of the council meeting, SAC will have to seriously reconsider its support."

In other business, SAC approved a $4,000 advance to the Erindale College Students' Union (ECSU). The motion had originally requested a short term, interest free loan but it was decided to just advance on previous commitments.

The executive referred to the Services commission for further study a motion requesting SAC state its desire to establish a full time pub in the Junior Common Room of Sir Daniel Wilson residence.

Gerhardt said the pub would probably require an initial capital expenditure of from $50-80,000 and might have an annual operating budget of around $90,000.

The room would seat 300 people. The executive also recommended that SAC request a yield sign on the north-east corner of Spadina and Bloor Streets be changed to a stop sign.

External commissioner Rob Snell said he had received several requests from students for the change. It was suggested further support from other groups such as the Huron-Sussex Ratepayers Association and the Faculty of Education be elicited.

The matter will be brought before the city's Committee on Public Works at a meeting Nov. 10.

Concern was expressed about the possibility of a proposal which would shift the Housing Service into the basement of the International Students Centre.

Besides the obvious inconvenience to users of the housing service, SAC president Gord Barnes said a lot of groups are currently dependent on the free space.

The executive also mandated Barnes to send a letter to University of Saskatchewan president arguing that no one be discriminated against because of their sexual orientation, in particular supervisor Doug Wilson who was dismissed by the university because he is a homosexual.

University considers short-term contracts

By PAUL McGRATH

A policy seen as already in place as a "full-front assault" on the tenure is currently under discussion by the Academic Affairs committee.

Those words have been used to describe the possible approval of a policy that would allow two- or three-year temporary appointments as an alternative to hiring faculty into the tenure stream.

According to appointments legislation, the university's only other alternative is to offer one-year appointments.

According to Academic Affairs chairman William Dunphy, the contractually-limited term appointments are necessary for two reasons.

"In the present situation," he says, "there is a very clear danger of exploiting younger academics," who because of the prevalence of one-year appointments, find it necessary to "flit from university to university."

The second reason, the major concern that looms in the background of most university decisions in recent years, is the "financial constraints" currently suffered by the university. The administration feels it does not have the money to afford feeding professors into the tenure stream, which carries with it a financial commitment for as long as 40 years.

It was thought earlier last year that the term for such appointments should be five years, but as vice-provost Milton Israel pointed out at the last committee meeting, there was a danger in these appointments, because the university over that period might "built up a commitment to the individual" that would be hard to break.

Israel stated that most of the objections to the five-year appointment came from the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, some members of which felt that this sort of appointment would amount to "an end-run around tenure."

Dunphy echoed this sentiment in warning that teachers are faced "with the prospects of sterilization because there are no young born" into the tenure stream. This concern was expressed earlier by President Evans, who warned in a speech to Governing Council of a "generation gap" between faculty and students as no new faculty are taken on on a permanent basis.

Support for the five-year appointments still comes from the professional faculties, especially the medical faculty, where it is hoped that five year academic appointments would coincide with the usual five-year appointments in hospitals.

Members of the committee saw "very clear attractions for both sides" in the new term appointments. From the university's side, it would be allowed to fill the gaps that might not be filled if the positions required more than a sessional appointment.

From the faculty's side, the appointments would, according to Israel, provide "stability" and a chance to cull "teaching experience."

Sniff, sniff

Day after day, hour after hour, in all corners of the globe, inside every home, school, store and garbage can, the search goes on for the Big Scoop. We haven't found it yet, but we're trying.

We're looking for that one in a million story, that proper mix of fact, analysis and innuendo, that gleaming inescapable B by 11 piece of truth that will topple in domino fashion every government of the western world and take a few of the eastern feldoms with them.

Until then, we have to be satisfied with the university and covering it well. We need people to do that, the more we find, the better we can cover it. Writers, photographers, graphicists and all-round busedbies are all required.

In all seriousness, there are dozens of serious, all involving the student and the student situation, that won't be covered until you come in and help.

The address: 91 St. George St. on the second floor. We await you with a smile, a handshake, not to mention the almighty press pass and a typewriter.

Union offers strike pay to part-time bookworkers

CUPE 1230, the library workers local, is presently organizing the part-time workers in the library, said Greg Collins, vice-president.

Collins pointed out with the increasing possibility of a strike the part-time workers are particularly vulnerable because they lack legal protection.

"It is to the benefit of the part-time workers to join the union," Collins said. "Now they are subject to arbitrary hiring and firing, act as a reservoir of low-paid help, and are subject to discriminatory policies," he added.

Collins explained part-time workers, mainly students, start at $2.40 an hour in the stacks and get $2.55 an hour in the second year. Part-time workers can work up to 24 hours a week, said Collins, and include 120 people in the Roberts circulation department, 30 people at Sigmund Samuel, and 40 people at the Science and Medicine library, as well as the coat-check people at Roberts.

"Our union is committed to organizing the unorganized, because the workers' best interests are served through unionization," said Collins. "In a time of spiralling inflation and growing unemployment, unorganized workers are especially vulnerable," he said. "By organizing, the workers become conscious of their strength, their common problems, and their common interest."

The part-time workers will get union level wages, job security and sick leave benefits once they become part of the bargaining unit, said Collins.

Collins also pointed out the union itself will be stronger when the part-time workers are organized. "Now, it is still possible to replace union positions with much lower-paid part-time people." "This poses a threat to our union and job security" he emphasized.

"Not that we are well paid here," Collins added, going on to point out library workers at Simon Fraser University in BC will be making a beginning salary this summer of $850 a month, $370 more a month than a Library Technician 2 here. Further, said Collins, at Memorial University in Newfoundland, which he said is not noted for its prosperity, the beginning wage for a library worker is $731 per month.

Collins said they have had considerable success in signing up part-time workers. From 75 to 80 per cent of those reached have been signed, he said. "Of course, this is strictly confidential. No-one from management has any right to see the cards at all."

"Part-time workers will be eligible for strike pay on the basis of need and participation in picket line duty," said Collins. "We are willing to refuse to sign a contract to go back to work unless the part-time workers can return to work without recriminations," he said.

Collins said he is confident the coming days will prove that most of the part-time workers identify their interests with those of the union, will sign up in the local, and refuse to work during a strike.

He went on to say the spirit of solidarity shown so clearly in last week's two-hour walkout would continue to grow. "People are insulted by the administration offer of 15 per cent," he said. "We are confident we will obtain our just demands."

"Unless the offer is significantly better, no more than 40 people will vote for it."

UTSA Back Library Bosses First Award by Alumni group

U of T library workers have been pressing for campus-wide support from workers, students and faculty in their fight with the U of T administration. But they won't get it from the U of T Staff Association.

Representing some of the non-unionized workers at U of T, UTSA has issued a newsletter which rejects the unions "unreasonable greed" in their demands.

Readily accepting the administration's costing of the workers demands, the statement issued by the UTSA executive says "dollars in the university salary pot are limited" so the $2.5 million needed for library workers would leave little for other university workers.

The Staff Association also questions union demands for a reduced work-week and better vacation provisions. The statement says this demand is inconsistent with the workers demands for an average provincial salary.

UTSA is a voluntary staff group, with no bargaining power. It does make representations on behalf of non-unionized staff at U of T. Critics have called it a "company union."

Horace Krever stuck up for the university's embattled faculty two nights ago. He also stuck up for the Varsity. His colleagues have recommended immediate treatment for advanced schizophrenia.

Krever's varied remarks came as he accepted the first Alumni-Faculty Award presented by the university in recognition for his extensive contributions to university and community life.

Krever told the dining crowd he accepted the award as a symbol "of so many University of Toronto faculty members who for their contributions the Alumni Association has graciously decided to recognize."

Krever feels that university has put "tremendous pressure" on faculty to participate in the day-to-day administration of the university and criticized Simcoe Hall for their attitude of "administration for administration's sake."

Later Krever said that the students, through the Varsity, have put pressure on the faculty for a voice in the hiring practices at the university, a voice he feels is unnecessary. Nonetheless, he said he was "a supporter of the Varsity."

Arts council bumbles on etc.

In the event of a library strike, the General Committee of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science unanimously agreed to consider postponing deadlines "for essays, tests and other term assignments for which students would require the use of library facilities." In a motion passed at a meeting Monday.

In other business, the committee also agreed to support the following proposals made by the Academic standards committee, that exemptions from final examinations be granted to certain one-hundred level courses in fine art, history, Italian and music.

In addition to this, different sections of English 100, introductory French grammar and literature courses and Sociology 101 would not have to write a common exam imposed by the university departments.

Some requests by the French and Spanish departments to exempt some of their 100-level courses from a final exam altogether were refused by Dean Greene on the basis that a final exam in these cases was "not positively detrimental to the welfare of the student."

Librarians: Strike-Close

By BOB COLLIER

If the university library technicians go on strike later this month, "operation of the library will be an impossibility," said Liz Avison, the president of the professional librarians' association yesterday.

She was commenting on a brief which the professional librarians submitted to the U of T Faculty Association last Friday. The brief was approved by a majority vote at a meeting of professional librarians.

The professional librarians, those who have received postgraduate degrees in library science, are seriously concerned over library security.

"Even under normal circumstances, the library has some difficulty in controlling theft and vandalism," the brief said, "and in the event of a strike, the library's security staff will simply not be available."

"The professional workers feel strongly the library ought to be closed for the duration of the work stoppage," Avison said.

When asked to comment on the possibility of a library shutdown, Vice-Provost Peter Meincke said

"the university felt obliged to maintain the library services at the best possible level." He added that he had not completed contingency plans in the event of a walk-out but would in the near future.

The professional librarians are also concerned that a split between the library personnel would seriously disrupt library services after the union returns to work.

"Staff morale is already low between union and non-union staff," Avison said.

The professional librarians sympathize with most of the union demands, but won't prepare a policy statement on the strike until after they see the final positions of the union and administration, Avison said.

"Few librarians will take over union jobs," Avison said. "The Librarian's Association feels very strongly that librarians cannot be expected to perform any of the union members' tasks at the expense of the librarian's normal academic and administrative responsibilities."

"Even if the administration ask us individually to do other work, the majority would likely refuse," said Avison.

Don't blame workers, we're all the victims of government policy

Although there is some disagreement about the procedures leading to a strike, it nonetheless appears imminent that the U of T library system will be either closed or service severely curtailed in little more than two weeks.

Despite hopes that the strike might have been avoided or put off to a later date, it will probably coincide with the worst academic crunch late in the term.

What is a student to do? We may be put in the position of having to cross picket-lines or at best having to deal with a crippled library. Chances are it won't be the friendliest strike in the world, as the single-mindedness of a student plowed under with work is nothing to be argued with.

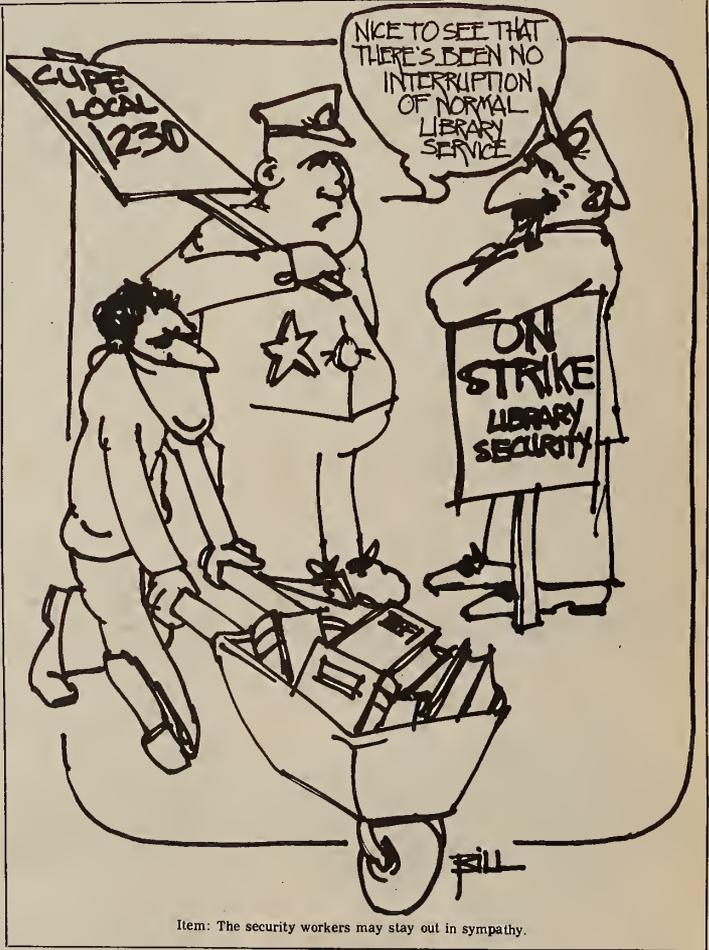

Under no circumstances, however, should a student hold the library workers responsible for whatever academic trouble he or she may be in. This is not a personal decision aimed at blotting the academic record of the entire university, it is a group decision taken in response to a clear inability to have their point understood by the university administration. Strikes are strikes, and a student cannot make trouble for those possibly on the picket line unless he or she wants to take issue with the entire idea of the strike as a tool in bargaining.

Don't feel victimized — the people on the picket line are victims too. The same pressure that keeps you in classrooms with 250 others and offers you a dwindling choice of academic roads with a higher toll along the way is keeping these people in low-paying jobs that do as much to keep this university running on its proper course as any $30,000 administrator.

If the university will not recognize their legitimacy as integral cogs in the wheel worthy of proper remuneration, they have no choice. The question echoes: If their beef is with the administration, then why take it out on the students? That's hard to answer, and it's unfortunate that the action taken doesn't hit the administration anywhere near as much as the students. The real stinker is that it won't affect the provincial government, by far the worst culprits in forcing things down to this juncture. But that's why support is so important. Students have to take action to see that the strike is as short in duration as possible. This involves pressuring Simcoe Hall and most of all Queen's Park. Both must be convinced that this is their problem.

In the meantime, what can you do to lessen the impact? Starting today, talk to your professors about deadline extensions on essays, tests or any other assignment that requires extensive use of the library. There have been several motions passed among student and administrative bodies asking for this sort of preparation. Hopefully, with actual classroom communication, these steps will be followed.

If you have assignments now, do them. You'll thank yourself for not doing them at the end of this month. Before the strike happens, and we'll keep you informed, take the necessary books out, but not before some sort of agreement has been worked out with other students in the class as to who can have said book for how long. The process will require some degree of communality, but it might be all for the better. Stiff upper lip and all that.

Item: The security workers may stay out in sympathy.

Crime conference cancellation a hoax, explanation is needed

Last Saturday's Toronto Star carried a surprising feature story about the recent Toronto crime conference fiasco. The story is surprising since it implies that Allan MacEachern, Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs, tells lies.

According to Noel Moore, author of the article, "Was Canada Taken for an Unmusical Ride?" and public affairs director for the UN conference, the apprehended trouble over Palestinian "terrorists" was a red herring of the first order.

Moore's thesis is that the real reason for the cancellation of the conference was the United States' fear of embarrassment over the actual testimony that the conference was about to hear. He tries to make a case of US domination of Canada's foreign affairs but it becomes evident in the body of the story that Ottawa and Washington were working together in a conspiracy to scuttle the conference.

Actually, the term "Crime conference" is a misnomer. The official name was The United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders.

It was the last part that was embarrassing to both North American governments. A group called the Friends of Attica, were planning a demonstration in Toronto publicizing the death of 43 people and putting blame on U.S. vice-president Nelson Rockefeller. Indian protest groups were planning to arrive to protest the fact that ninety per cent of women inmates in Saskatchewan jails are native people.

Moore explains that the question of representatives from the Palestine Liberation Organization attending the conference was a last minute excuse. Ottawa had never signed the formal documents required by the UN.

Moore charges the question of the "unsettled state of Middle East affairs" mentioned by MacEachern in his July 21 speech was a complete fabrication. The PLO had already been invited to the UN conference on Human Settlements to be held in Vancouver next year. Ottawa was objecting to the content of the conference not the form.

The article outlines the role of media in using innuendo and inflammatory remarks by individual RCMP and Toronto police officers to give the public the impression that Yasser Arafat, the PLO leader, would be arriving in Toronto with guns blazing.

Arafat had no intention of coming to Toronto, and no PLO member was planning to take Canadian law into their own hands. The press, particularly the Toronto Sun, but also editorial writers in the Star and Globe, persisted in forecasting about violent clashes between the PLO and a largely mythical Jewish Defense League. David Sadowski, had arranged for a peaceful demonstration against the PLO in City Hall Square under the banner of Canadians Against PLO Terrorism. In fact the PLO was then and is now deeply split over the use of terrorism anyway.

Ottawa had been looking for an excuse to cancel the conference and the Toronto Jewish Community was used as a patsy.

The UN required that the host country sign a simple memorandum of agreement about the conference at least twelve months before the event which would have been several months before the admittance of the PLO to observer status at UN events. Ottawa never signed it and had no intention of doing so.

Allan Grossman, who used to be an MPP for the U of T area riding, was the man responsible for getting the conference in 1970 and had succeeded. However, according to Moore, they forgot to check with the Pentagon and the CIA, and wound up making a fool of themselves and the many Toronto businessmen who were counting on more than $2 million in UN "tourist" revenue.

Because the conflict between Zionists and Arabs was exploited, because Canada managed to hide its shameful treatment of prisoners, and because Canada seems to be joined with the US in a systematic slander of the UN and the PLO, we feel that an explanation is in order.

Provincial and Metro officials should speak out over this. If they say nothing then they too are complicit in this latest attempt to control public opinion for the benefit of a very small minority.

The fact that the Toronto Star published it may be suspicious or it may be an attempt to correct past errors. We have to take what we can get.

“Everything is what it is:”

Thoughts on ‘facism’ and ‘racism’

Words can become over-extended to the point where they aren't much use for communication, though they may continue to express diffuse feelings and attitudes. The words “facism” and “facist”, “racism” and “racist”, no longer tell us much about anything but the feelings and attitudes of those who use them; and not even much about these, except that he (or she) who calls another a facist or a racist is evincing an attitude of disapproval. But their continued popularity comes from its being supposed that they are relatively precise terms of social analysis. We believe that there are clear criteria for picking out facists and racists; and so with institutions that are called facist and racist.

Facism was first the name of the regime established by Mussolini and his party in the nineteen-twenties. Its characteristics were: it was despotic, tyrannical, dictatorial — power was in the hands of the ruling party and its leaders, and legal opposition became impossible; it was a mass movement — the ruling party was large and rooted in wide sections of the population; it had an official philosophy compounded of idealist philosophy and the nationalist and syndicalist traditions present in Italy; through a variety of state agencies, notably a political police acting in secret, it seemed to aspire to total control over the social life of the population; this aspiration was furthered by the use of terror. When Hitler came to power it seemed reasonable to call German national socialism facism, for all the marks of the Italian system were present; the German regime seemed simply to be more effective.

It is obvious that the political system of the Soviet Union had precisely the same characteristics as the Italian and German regimes.

It was not called facist, except occasionally by its enemies, for two reasons: it was historically related to the European revolutionary tradition and this tradition had a strong libertarian side to it (this explains why in the 'thirties and 'forties many on the democratic Left Government wouldn't believe that the Soviet government went in for torture and practised genocide); and the private ownership of the means of production had been abolished and this was then thought to be a very good thing, a piece of justice and a contrivance for making everyone richer and happier.

One feature of the German regime's ideology was peculiar to itself and not shared by the Italian, until its last days: the belief that certain racial or supposed racial groups — Jews, Gypsies, Negroes, Slavs, sometimes Japanese and Chinese, though on this there was no consistency — had undesirable qualities of character such that they deserved to be segregated or killed. To interbreed with members of such groups was held to lead to all manner of evil consequences and to shame the (supposed) Aryan race to which Germans and other northern Europeans — but not completely the Latin peoples — were thought to belong.

Facism, then, was a name for a quite distinct and quite new political society and movement, one that appeared after the first world war in Italy and Germany. During the period of the Popular Front (1936-39) — this was an attempt to build a coalition of Communists and believers in parliamentary democracy and an alliance between the Soviet Union and the Western powers — the terms facism and democracy got stretched; whoever was on the side of the Popular Front was a democrat and whoever opposed it was at least an inchoate facist. (The Communists had already called the German social democrats “social facists” and went on doing so right into Hitler's first year of power.) The period (September 1939-June 1941) during which the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany were allies — German submarines refuelled at Murmansk, Stalin's police handed over to the Gestapo communist deviators, some of them Jews — arrested this tendency. But the German attack on the Soviet Union caused an almost total amnesia on the Left and the loose language of “democrat” and “facist” once more came into vogue. Since then these terms have been used without much discrimination as labels for all regimes and persons approved and disapproved of by the Left.

Such regimes as those of Franco and of the unlauded Greek colonels and of the armed rulers of Chile cannot be said to be facist in the original sense. Franco's regime is — was — headed by Franco himself, by the army, by the police. It is no more facist than the regime of Napoleon I. There is in Spain a facist party, the Falange; this party Franco has adroitly kept out of power since the end of the civil war. Such regimes as that of Franco are dictatorships, police states, of a kind that came into existence in Europe in the nineteenth century. If we want to find a facist state in the making, we should look at Mrs. Gandhi's India; this strikingly resembles Italy in the period when Mussolini was consolidating his power but had not quite eliminated the elements of the parliamentary regime. Other states that seem facist or on the way to facism in the classic sense are Argentina (note the mass party) and some of the new African states with popular mass parties and semi-deified leaders. But on the idiot Left it is much more likely that Trudeau and Gerald Ford will be called facists than Mrs. Gandhi and Mobutu will be.

“Racism” is used even more wildly. Racism is a pseudo-scientific belief that grew up in the nineteenth century and has ravaged most societies, of all political complexions, in our time. It rests on the (false) belief that there are sharply distinct groups of people with their own peculiar genetic constitutions. This false belief comes in part from a confusion between phenotype (how people are perceived in terms of such obvious characteristics as skin pigmentation) and genotype (how people are, given their total genetic constitution). There are virtually no groups of men now living that are racially distinct in the sense of sharing in a common genotype. It is especially obvious that the Jews, the supposed racial group singled out by the Nazis and, later, by the Communists for special attention, are not a distinct race, not even phenotypically, at all. What they have in common, insofar as they are a distinguishable group, is cultural, not biological. All this is a crude analysis and could be somewhat refined; but essentially this is why the racist theories are nonsense, even if we were to admit — but why should we? — that genes are all-determining.

Now, all stable human societies tend to be ethnocentric, that is, they think their own national or other communities are better than others. (Any Englishman can beat two Frenchmen.) Again, all stable communities have a touch of xenophobia, that is, fear of strangers; indeed, it's doubtful they would have survived without the inner bond that makes one of different appearance and tongue a slightly fearful object. There isn't much point in moralizing over xenophobia: it is exhibited at every level, even the most trivial, as any newcomer to any small community can testify. It is one of the good features of a liberal civilization that in it the force of xenophobia is weakened. Variety is valued as an ingredient of society. All the same, this liking for variety goes against the grain of humdrum life in stable communities and has to be protected by education and the law.

Both ethnocentrism and xenophobia may be racist; but they may not. It is just a confusion to cry when faced with one or the other: Racist! I don't believe all the new African states that have rid themselves of their inhabitants of East Indian origin are necessarily racist, any more than the tribal loyalties that rack some of them are properly to be called racist. They are the sad victims of a commonplace xenophobia. I don't believe that bigoted white Anglo-Saxon Protestant Canadians who are surly with Catholic French Canadians are racists; they are ethnocentric xenophobes; they don't really think French Canadians have in their loins and ovaries a host of undesirable genes. I have even come across foolish people who think disapproval of Joui! a manifestation of racism. This is so stupid as not to be discussible.

There are some words that ought for the time being to be dropped from the language. “Meaningful”, “viable”, “relate to-with”, “open-ended”, “catalyst” — are promising candidates. If “racism” and “facism” continue to be used with the present looseness they too will become words intellectually scrupulous people will want to avoid. This would be a pity. I want to say that the hooligans of Western Guard are racists and facists and in so calling them I think I am being accurate. But I shall hesitate to use this language if it becomes common and commonplace to call the (by world standards) very liberal Canadian immigration laws racist or every military dictator a facist. Every thing is what it is and not another thing. This is a good maxim for a university community.

To the Editor:
In spite of numerous dire warnings to the contrary, many students find it necessary to patronize the University Book Store. (I presume that is why all those people are there.)
It is not always possible to buy a decent second hand book from another student, and I personally haven't had much luck with the used book stores so highly recommended in the Handbook. (They have some interesting, if somewhat grungy stock, but never the title or edition I need.) At any rate, the Bookstore looks as a necessary evil.

My point (finally) is this: must these books be so hellishly expensive? I realize the Book Store doesn't set the prices for all their stock, but can't they order lower-priced editions? Or encourage the assignment of cheaper titles?
This week I came across (tripped over might be more apt) two examples of price-gouging about which I had to complain. The first was a one hundred and twenty-eight page, large type history paperback, for three-fifty. The other was a paperback French novel, less than two hundred pages, without any study aids, for six seventy-five.
Three-fifty for a paperback seemed only ordinarily outrageous, until I removed the price sticker and found another for two-fifty, and under that, the original printed-on-the-book price of one ninety-five. Now, I am accustomed to paying a markup on books published out of this country (why, anyway?) but seventy-five per cent??

As for the French book, I learned that a book store downtown sells it for the same price as the University Book Store. This particular book was assigned from a list of several possibilities. Isn't this an instance where a different, less expensive title could have been chosen?
The TTC is already bleeding me dry. If I have to buy any more books at these exorbitant prices, I'll have to mortgage my A.T.L. card. Or better still, if anyone wants to buy a slightly used French book

Normalization of grades criticized

To the Editor:
Your news report (Friday, Oct. 31) on the Academic Standards Committee's move toward rote learning was misleading. This Committee's drive to improve Faculty standards by enforcing normal distributions of grades actually out-dates old fashioned approaches to education. Among those setting standards for Faculties to follow in North American Universities, experience shows that even the word Education is obsolete; rather, one speaks of Operant Conditioning, an up-to-date system by which normalized students happily learn without having to think. The Academic Standards Committee's dedication to the normalization of the University of Toronto may thus be summed up by paraphrasing a now immortal TV commercial: "You're not getting older, Honey, you're getting Skinner!"

Masada editor replies to Saab

To the Editor:
Faisal Saab, president of the Arab Student's Association, claims that "the label 'anti-semitic' cannot be made to stick on a semite like me," because "all Arabs realize that they and the Jews share the common bonds of semitism." (Varsity, Oct. 27.) On May 17, 1943 a certain Hans Hagemayer of the Nazi Foreign Office gave the following directive concerning the use henceforth of the word "anti-semitism":
"When the Grand Mufti visited Reichsleiter Rosenberg the latter promised to instruct the press to eliminate henceforth the word "anti-semitism". The use of this word always hits the Arab world, and this latter, according to the Grand Mufti, is overwhelmingly friendly to Germany. Our enemies abroad exploit our use of this word in order to give the false impression that we look on Arabs as we do on Jews."

Masada readers Art must serve the working class support paper

To the Editor:

We read with interest the letter of Friday, October 24, 1975, concerning the student Zionist publication "Masada". It is fascinating to read and hear of the opposition to this 7-year-old publication. One of the criticisms put forward by Martin Rosen "and 12 others" was that the paper was only fourteen pages long. It is most instructive that Martin Rosen et al were the majority of students who voted against renewed funding of Masada — obviously they would be happier if the paper were much shorter, that is, zero pages long.

The issue boils down to this: we are a group of students directly opposed to the attitudes shown in the letter of Oct. 24th. We demand the continued financial support of Masada by Hillel (at U. of T.) and the Jewish Student Federation (at York) with full editorial freedom. We did not necessarily agree with every word that was printed in the last issue but we questioned the autocratic right of a few self-styled Jewish leaders to quash a 7-year-old Zionist magazine.

At this time, when Jews in the USSR, South America and Israel are living through difficulties, and as was so eloquently pointed out last week we are still living in the "Holocaust Kingdom", Zionism means Jewish freedom.

The Jewish Students want and need a voice of Zionism on campus. We don't feel ashamed of the paper and we don't believe that Zionism is "cheap", as Ben Mayer intimated at a Hillel student council meeting. As proud and concerned Zionist students we deplore the obstructions and silly criticisms we hear from the Hillel "representatives" such as those about the type of paper used. We know, rather, that as the only student Zionist paper in existence, Masada deserves the continued support of the Jewish student body.

Laila Rutman and 11 others

To the Editor:

Two issues are raised by the current art vs. politics controversy raging in the pages of the Varsity. The first is whether or not art reflects a definite class view. The second is how do we develop an anti-imperialist art in Canada, which serves the interests of the Canadian working class and people.

Historically, art has always been extremely political. One of the myths of the twentieth century which came to flower with the development of imperialism but which has its roots in the industrial revolution, is that the individual consciousness and sensibility is the most important phenomenon in the world and develops in a vacuum. Concurrent with this view exists the view that human nature is immutable and exists outside of history, outside of class. According to this view, human nature as it exists in the Greek slave is the same as that of a 20th century imperialist. It is this view, because it is essentially a-historical and denies that class exist, which holds the art is somehow separate from the rest of life.

This view of art serves the ruling class. If each individual is separate, if the society is fragmented, if all knowledge is relative (the view promoted by this kind of art), then what hope is there for change? Society is seen as static.

Art is one of the major methods used by the ruling class in order to teach the people how to feel, what to feel about. If despair, individualism, sexual love, the effluence of flowers on a grave stone are the only legitimate subjects for art, then it can't be used to assist the people to stand up and fight against their oppressors. This kind of art for art's sake becomes completely privatized and attempts to paralyze all the passion which the people feel to be free. Much can be learned from it as a teacher by negative example. It rests upon a subjective idealist world view.

Which leaves us with the question of consciously developing an art in Canada which will serve the people. Because of Canada's position as a dependent country, first in relation to the French, then the British, and currently the U.S. (and the failure of a Canadian bourgeoisie to fight through for independence), we have never developed even that great burgeoning of literature under the leadership of the bourgeoisie which is characteristic of the French, Russian or English literature of the 19th century. And in the epoch of imperialism, the possibility of developing a great bourgeois literature is past. In order to assist a national literature to develop, it must self-consciously take up the serving of the working class in its struggle for power.

The question for writers and artists is clear: either support the old and dying social system or fight to consciously promote the new and rising class. In order to accurately capture the spirit of the times, to move beyond the moribund inanities of the capitalist system and imperialist culture, artists and writers must take up the fight for Canada to be free, with their pens, they must take up the development of an anti-imperialist art in this country.

Maria Cassan

Reader prefers poetry to editorials

To the Editor:

To assume the spirit of their politically imprisoned brother writers in Chile, South Africa and the Soviet Union, Canadian artists will have to struggle against the comfortable, artistic and culturally oppressed realities we face in Canada today. People and places (sic) may otherwise solve their own problems without the artist's help, leaving him to become part of an ignored and dying breed.

With the poem on its way out, the editorial might take on fresh significance—and what a dismal turn of events that might prove to be.

Does relevant art wear better?

To the Editor:

As a (justly) neglected poet I respond to the two questions posed by letter-writer Jonathan Kohn to "those who believe poetry should be political."

1) Why write poetically about revolutionary sentiments which can better be expressed in prose? asks Mr. Kohn.

Why, I ask in turn, differentiate between "day to day, physical needs" and the less "practical aspects" of life (presumably love, death, sex, isolation, nature, etc.) and why reserve the former for prose, the latter for poetry? Why must my alienation be treated in verse but my response to the believed social cause of alienation be done up in prose? Why is fucking poetic but abortion prosaic? Why is a woman's isolation a la Atwood suited to poetry but her desire for change and equality not?

2) Who wants art which will be "of interest in 200 years only to historians?" Mr. Kohn continues. Firstly, the overwhelming majority of present art, political or not, will not be of value two centuries from now. Read many 18th century novels lately?

Secondly, the onus is on Mr. Kohn to show that politically naive art wears better than socially-conscious art, bearing in mind Home, Voltaire, Brecht, Wagner and Gorki? Surely the criteria for survival are craft, profundity, and such, rather than non-relevance. Thanx and a Hatlo tip of the hat to you.

The Green

By LEA RYAN

On February 3, 1975, Robert Andras, Minister of Manpower and Immigration, announced the Green Paper on Immigration. The government's "Green Paper on Immigration" House of Commons with the declaration that it should be a "great debate" for one year. "proposals" and across the country Andras tried to nurture his "great debate" Green Paper, massive opposition arose.

The Green Paper on Immigration, previous immigration legislation, is based on the assumption that to be a citizen of Canada is not a right, a privilege which can be removed. It follows the history of immigration to Canada by tying it directly to the ruling class for cheap labour.

In times of expansion of the economy immigrants are welcomed by the government. In times of depression, they are attacked.

The Green Paper blames the current economic crisis on the immigrants, particularly those from the Caribbean. The basic thesis is that the current economic crisis is caused by the creation of racism, simply by coming to Canada.

The Green Paper singles out a distinct group of immigrants for attack: "other Asians." In 1971, "other Asians" made up 1.5 per cent of the population, with 129,460 people, while the "non-white" population numbered 28,025. In 1921, the "non-white" population of Canada was less than 4 per cent. By 1971, it had increased. But the Green Paper defines a "non-white" as one who comes from Asia or the Caribbean.

"The rapid increase during the past few years in the number of sources of significant immigration movements to this country with those from certain Asian and Caribbean nations larger than traditional European flows has coincided with the greatest and most dynamic period of postwar urban expansion in Canada. It would be astonishing if there were not concern about the capacity of our society to adjust to a pace of population change that entails novel and distinctive features. What is more surprising is the resistance of Canadian society has demonstrated

Questions Andras doesn't want asked

Do immigrants cause unemployment? In the fall of 1974 325,000 people were added to the unemployment rolls. But only 24,428 immigrants arrived in the country, including children and babies-in-arms.

Should immigrants be forced to work in isolated areas, where Robert Andras claims the need for workers is the greatest?

The unemployment rate in Canada's three largest cities is much lower than it is in the provinces that surround them. In Toronto, unemployment figures indicate 5 per cent out of work, while in the rest of Ontario it's 6.9 per cent. In Vancouver the rate is 6.4 per cent, but in the rest of B.C., 9.5 per cent. In Montreal, the rate is 6 per cent, in the rest of Quebec 11.1 per cent.

Is immigration to Canada a privilege, or a right? The Green Paper favours a policy laid down by Prime Minister Mackenzie King, over thirty years ago: "With regard to the selection of immigrants, much has been said about discrimination. I wish to make it quite clear that Canada is perfectly within her rights in selecting the persons whom we regard as desirable future citizens. It is not a 'fundamental right' of any alien to enter Canada. It is a privilege. It is a matter of domestic policy. Immigration is subject to the control of the parliament of Canada. This does not mean, however, that we should not seek to remove from our legislation what may appear to be objectionable discrimination."

Getting permission to immigrate just depends on education, and so on, doesn't it?

According to the most recent handbook for immigration officers, it's easier for a flower arranger to get into the country than for a doctor. So much for 'education'. Where you live in the world is important, too. There are 12 Canadian immigration bureaus in the U.S.A., but only one in India. In Europe there are 24, but in all of Africa, only 2. And, of course, epileptics, homosexuals, and other 'undesirables' are forbidden from immigrating.

Does an immigrant's second-class status end after citizenship is taken out?

Not necessarily. After the Winnipeg General Strike, in 1919, a number of citizens who had once been immigrants were deported.

Has there been much opposition to the Green Paper? The 'silent majority' has been very outspoken. The United Steelworkers at Stelco in Hamilton representing 11,500 members decided at a recent meeting to "oppose the government's 'Green Paper' for being based on lies and distortions, for being racist, and for being an attack on Canadian workers and immigrants." Similar resolutions have been passed by the 2,500 member Toronto Local of the Letter Carriers' Union, the Edmonton and District Labour Council, the Quebec Teachers' Corporation's 90,000 members, and hundreds of individuals at open hearings across the country.

Have the national minority communities organized themselves against racist attacks?

Yes, the East Indian Defense Committee (EIDC), originally formed in Vancouver, formed a Toronto branch in June. The EIDC protects members of the East Indian community when they are physically attacked and the police refuse to assist. In Toronto, they assist people to defend themselves against the attacks of the Western Guard. An Ad Hoc Committee against racist attack has also been formed in the West Indian community.

Governor General. Similar Acts of 1903, 1904 and 1905 were passed by the B.C. government, but disallowed. The '03 and '04 laws required that immigrants could write "in the characters of some language of Europe a passage of fifty words in length in an European language."

1908 Continuous Journey Regulations state that "the Governor-in-Council may, by proclamation or order whenever he considers it necessary or expedient, prohibit the landing in Canada of a specified class of immigrants or of immigrants who have come to Canada otherwise than by continuous journey from the country of which they are natives or citizens, and upon through tickets purchased in that country." This primarily excludes East Indians. In 1908, 2,623 East Indians immigrated. In 1909, only 6. The Victoria, B.C. Municipal Council decided in 1910 that Indians should not be provided any work. A shipload of East Indian immigrants finally managed, in 1914, to complete the arduous journey to Vancouver without stopping at any ports. The Canadian Navy opened fire on their vessel, and sent them back to India.

Japanese immigration was also restricted. By 1928, a maximum of 150 Japanese immigrants a year were allowed.

1917 The Department of Immigration & Colonization took charge of immigration. $18 million was collected from Chinese-Canadians from 1885-1918, $10 million was spent on European promotion.

1919 An amendment to the Immigration Act permitting the deportation of any undesirable without trial by jury was passed in less than an hour after the Winnipeg General Strike.

1925 A series of agreements between the federal Department of Immigration & Colonization and CP and CNR gave the companies responsibility for recruitment and forwarding immigrants from "non-preferred" central, east, south and southeast European countries.

1935 During an election campaign, the Liberal Party ran ads announcing that it was "opposed to giving Orientals the Vote."

1951 Quota agreements with India, Pakistan, Ceylon.

1952 Immigration Act Section 81 granted the Governor in Council the authority to make the necessary regulations to restrict entry on a racial and geographical basis.

1960 Amnesty was granted to illegal Chinese immigrants.

1962 Changes in the regulations limited sponsorship of relatives, especially unskilled relatives from southern Europe, and encouraged skilled labour.

few s of this and some sided chase la. It s no ciety ange. nes. ence d in accommodating many foreign migrants with so little social stress."

So according to the Green Paper, the immigrants from Asia and the West Indies are "foreign" and have "novel and distinctive" features, while immigrants from "traditional" sources are not foreign.

In the first nine months of 1974, 66,000 immigrants came from Europe, 7,900 from Africa and about 38,142 from Asia. Asian immigrants represented 22.9 per cent of the total. In 1973, it was 22 per cent, for 1972, 19.8 per cent. Since 1951, the percentage increase has been negligible. But the figures on immigration from Asia and the Caribbean are given separately in the Green Paper to create the impression that the flow of immigration has increased dramatically.

The Green Paper blames the Canadian people for the problems caused by this system itself. The immigrants supposedly cause the housing shortage, they cause the lack of jobs, they cause lack of space. According to the Green Paper, they create a "population problem" and a "demographic problem."

But what is the "population problem"? Most Canadians would laugh if Andras tried to say Canada was presently overpopulated, so the Green Paper presents the questions as a decision that the Canadian people will have to reach by 1980 or '82, when the death and birth rate will cancel out. What kind of immigrants should arrive in Canada they ask. The Green Paper says this decision should be reached to preserve the so-called traditional "bi-cultural" character of Canada.

But a few years ago, when Bryce Mackasey was Minister of Immigration, he wanted a population of 50 million. The economy having gone into crisis since then, the capitalists want to make their super-profits by seizing control of the markets of other countries.

The "demographic problem" is of the same nature. There is so-called overcrowding of the big cities, an issue raised to coerce the immigrants into working as cheap labour in definite areas, largely the north.

Until late 1974, the monopoly capitalists were shifting the burden of the economic crisis onto the backs of the workers through overtime, speed-ups, and job redundancy. Now they are shifting the blame for the economic crisis onto the Canadian people, in particular the immigrants from Asia and the Caribbean. This was bound to give rise to resistance.

Everyone but Nelson Rockefeller has suddenly realized that corporations have enormous power in this country. But few people realize how much power corporations have over our lives and fewer understand just how they wield that power. And of the few who understand the intricacies of economics, marketing, finance, and accounting, very few are women.

As women, even those of us who were not taught to fall intellectually were encouraged to avoid mathematics and anything that smelled of mathematics. Economics is people, lives, work, and society as well as quantifiable things like production of goods and services. But those who dominate what we know as economics—mostly men—don't seem to know that. The conglomeration of counting, quantifying, model building, and mathematical theorizing that is taught as economics becomes a barrier for women who want to know what economics means to people. If our math skills don't allow us to sail over this barrier, we are advised to give up and go study sociology.

A woman who is "good with figures" (One of Wall Street's financial wizard.) might learn accounting. She learns to do it, though, at someone else's bidding, as a careful, bored bookkeeper who is not expected to—or even, in some cases, allowed to—understand the financial workings of the corporation.

But women have to learn to understand how corporations work, not to be able to succeed in them, improve them, or "open them up to women," but because they have such enormous power over us, more even than over men—or at least white men.

Take, for example, employment, a major issue of liberation for women. Men are facing rising unemployment, but women have always experienced unemployment levels worse than those currently faced by white men, and most of these unemployed women are not even considered part of the workforce. Women going "back to work," looking for their first jobs outside the home, or women laid off from the low-level jobs not covered by unemployment compensation do not show up at the unemployment office each week because there is no check for them to collect there. They are not "in the work force" and do not exist as far as the Labor Department's unemployment figures go. Of the women who are employed, most are in the lowest paying jobs—or in the one job that pays nothing at all: wife and mother.

This entire employment pattern is vital to the corporate system. Women who work outside their homes are working for peanuts and saving corporations money. Those who are at home are working as life-support systems for their corporately-employed husbands—in effect, but for no money at all.

We are led to believe that, if we are currently working for nothing (or for peanuts), we need only develop our skills, learn to "sell ourselves," and fight for affirmative action, and then there will be jobs and fulfillment and economic independence for all of us. Well, there won't be.

True full employment, which would mean jobs for all of those who want to work—including women, third world people, young people and old people—is impossible under this economic system. The current system simply cannot accommodate all those who want and need to work.

A major factor in the availability of jobs is "the business cycle," a cycle of prosperity and hard times. Most of us have accepted the inevitability of it in a capitalist economy. But we often forget that an upswing in the cycle is only temporary, and are shocked and panicked when the downswing takes over. Or we let ourselves believe that somehow modern capitalism can conquer the cycle, or at least minimize its effects, and that once this is accomplished the unemployment problem will be solved.

These are dangerous pitfalls for women who are concerned with liberating ourselves from our secondary role in society. In the 1960's, when the U.S. was experiencing an unprecedented period of growth and the Vietnam war was occupying a substantial proportion of the workforce, minorities and women were finding employment in increasing numbers, and prosperity didn't look too far out of reach. But now we are painfully aware that this was just a tantalizing illusion. Capitalism does not primarily work for prosperity—it works for profit, and the two are only occasionally coincidental. During an economic boom, when profits are high, businesses will invest some of these profits in new projects, new equipment, increased production, and new markets, knowing that these investments will generate even higher profits than before. The process continues, as these higher profits encourage these further investment. While this expansion is taking place, employment tends to rise to fill the new jobs being created.

But before everyone can be employed, the situation deteriorates. Old markets become saturated, new markets become scarce, and a high level of employment gives workers the bargaining power to demand better pay so that labour costs rise. Eventually, a point is reached where it is no longer profitable to invest. Here the downswing begins: companies lay off workers to lower costs as part of an investment. The employment "cycle," therefore, lags behind the profit "cycle," so that before full employment can ever be reached, a downswing has already begun.

Full employment, then, is impossible in a capitalist context. Even in prosperous times like the 1960's there was unemployment. Regardless of the business cycle, corporations maintain a certain level of unemployment at all times—just enough to weaken workers' bargaining power. Besides lowering costs when profits are low, control of the workforce maximizes profits when they are already high. If control of the workforce becomes too difficult, workers can always be replaced by machines; automation destroys even more jobs. Multinational corporations contribute to domestic unemployment by exporting jobs to the third world in order to take advantage of a cheap, non-union workforce. No amount of economic growth and "prosperity" can offset these job-destroying corporate policies.

Beyond the issue of employment, corporations affect us in other ways as women, and their power over us is growing. Big business today is moving into services that women need, which had always been considered areas of "public trust" or the "public sector." Human services like health care, day care, and certain aspects of education are a last frontier of the domestic corporate empire. Corporations branched out into these areas because, to put it simply, by the late sixties they were running out of products and areas into which to expand.

So big business moved into unlikely areas. Day care is now sold for profit by nationwide chains and franchises. There are profit-making hospitals, laboratories, nursing homes and abortion clinics. Technical, or vocational, education is permeated with middle- and large-sized corporations, and education in general is encouraged to become more capital-intensive, relying on corporately produced "products" and "systems" as much as on teachers.

All of these areas affect women in ways they don't affect men. Day care is more important to women's freedom of movement than to men's, because most women are still more responsible for their children than men are. If a couple can find only a high-priced, second-rate profit-making day care centre for their kids, it won't be Daddy who stays home rather than send them there. If the couple is divorced, Daddy probably won't have the kids on his hands at all.

When a hospital is taken over by a profit-making corporation, the pediatric out-patient facility (not especially profitable) is often closed down. Who sits in pediatric waiting rooms, and who drives across town to get to them when the neighborhood hospital closes its clinic? Not the fathers.

The maternity ward is the other facility that may be closed down when a hospital goes profit—or simply not included when a hospital is built for profit. If we're trying to avoid the maternity ward rather than use it, we are more and more likely to get abortions in profit-making chains, and some of which are "non-profit," though they sprout up in different cities across the country like MacDonalds, and are as expensive, routinized, and profitable as the "profit-making" ones.

It is still women who spend more volunteer time involved with their children's educations, and education is a vital place to break the cycle of low expectations, few role models, and fewer possibilities for our daughters. Teaching, in the lower grades, is one of the few professions dominated by women. But the corporate giants—Westinghouse, Time-Life, General Electric and Xerox, to name a few—are moving in on education, and it may never be the same. Systems and units and computer print-outs flow from headquarters to your neighborhood school, complete with the same old sexist, racist stereotypes and the same lock-step format. The only difference is that now the source of the problem is further away from home—and that much harder to do anything about. The other difference, of course, is that now a few companies are making money. Big money.

The people who used to make a little money in education, teachers, are divided on this issue. Good audio-visual materials are vital, some say, and if only the corporate giants can produce them, so be it. Others, and particularly the teachers' unions, are against the technologizing of education because they feel it is a way of getting around hiring enough teachers to do the job. Indeed, Westinghouse's PLAN program of computerized testing and ready-made units is marketed with the implication that it will cut down on the number of teachers needed. Westinghouse's PLAN ad in the Saturday Review of Education showed a (male) high school teacher in a dozen places in a classroom helping a dozen students simultaneously. One man can't do that, was the message, but PLAN can. A dozen men and women could do that, however, and do it better, and that is what the unions would prefer. If twelve teachers are too expensive, two is probably a more realistic number for the average high school class. Two live people should be able to outdo a weekly mailing from Westinghouse and a computer in Iowa City.

The teacher versus computer controversy brings us back to the issue of work, specifically in human services. This is still the area in which most professional women work—primarily as nurses and teachers. Education, health, counselling, and social services are all very popular jobs with women.

They are also the jobs that are being changed and shaped by the corporate takeover of these fields. The reason day care, hospitals, clinics, and classrooms were never seen as places to make a profit is that they are labour-intensive, and the labour has to be skilled. The counselor in the abortion clinic, the day care teacher, and those high school teachers are the crucial factor in the "production" of day care, education, or a decent experience for an abortion patient.

The staff is also the most costly operating factor in a classroom, day care centre or clinic. The only way that these human services can be made profitable is by cutting down the costs of providing them. To some degree these costs are cut by using fewer staff people. This has a clear impact on the working conditions in these jobs.

The only other way to cut down on the cost of staff is to pay them less. Pay and working conditions are the major issues among the staffs of corporate day care centres and abortion clinics. This is not to say that these are not issues in publicly funded day care, clinics, and schools. The point is that keeping wages down and workloads up is vital to making a profit in these areas. This makes exploitation of workers in such services an entrenched problem. And women, because we want to work in these areas, are faced with a sickening choice: work where you want to work and starve, or work for the system that creates this nightmare and have your economic independence.

This is more of a problem for women than for men because it involves a further conflict, a conflict of values. Our feminist values of self-sufficiency and freedom are tied, in a capitalist system, to money: having enough to live on—and, for some of us, to support our kids on. There are traditional values which we want to hold onto, however: those of compassion, of putting people before profit, of wanting a work-life integrated with our values and needs. They lead us toward work that not only underpays us, but frustrates our motivation for doing it: the bosses are not putting people before profit, and are not interested in compassion. They are interested in our labour, not our work lives and our needs.

How can we liberate ourselves from our secondary role in society without sacrificing those values which we have traditionally held and which we still feel positively about? There is no satisfactory solution; we are forced to choose one side over the other, or at best to let one side predominate. Unfortunately, the structure of capitalist society ties power and independence and money to a rearranging of priorities that supplants human needs with personal and company needs. Since our need to be economically powerful and independent is a strong one, we are pushed toward sacrificing our old values and becoming business women or professional women in a corporate context. We have always been teachers, nurses and social workers, and this has not freed us from our secondary roles. So we come to believe that economic power will free us.

But slowly we are learning that this is not true—that a one-sided approach will never mean liberation, be it the side of humanism and poorly paid service, or the side of competition and economic power. Women politicians, women executives, and women doctors do not guarantee that society will become more humane, because as women attain these positions they lose many of the qualities and skills that can promote such societal change.

Some women now consciously resist choosing this corporate way. They reaffirm old values—and remain underpaid with little responsibility or power. But consciously and angrily choosing a secondary role is no more liberating than being forced into one. Nurses, however changed their personal roles and relationships might be, still remain secondary to doctors and administrators in decision-making power and in earning power. And women who try to avoid tangling with the corporate system by starting their own small businesses or by forming collective projects are still faced with the struggle of surviving financially and feeling pressured to use practices that meant ripping off the people they serve. Again, no matter how "liberated" the attitude, corporate structure and corporate society still define the choices and the limits.

And what about the women who want to resist the corporate way, who don't want to be corporate business women, but who also don't want to be teachers, nurses or social workers? What choices do they have? Corporate society leaves many women with no choice at all, and so they fall into the job most available to women: clerical work. Or they become teachers, nurses, and social workers even though they do not want to do these jobs. What does this mean for the students, patients, and clients who are dependent on these women for services?

At best, capitalism gives us a choice between the lesser of two evils; at worst, it gives us no choice at all. We sacrifice economic power for humanistic values or humanistic values for economic power. We sacrifice recognition for fulfillment or fulfillment for recognition.

Understanding corporate power helps us to understand why we are always making sacrifices. We need to know that our full participation in society as workers is never possible, and that even for those of us who are in the workforce, our jobs are defined by the corporate values of profits over people. In order to change our lives, then, we need to change the economic system, and in order to change the system we need to be able to deal with it on its own terms.

VANCOUVER RAPE CRISIS CENTRE

VANCOUVER (CUP) "Protecting Yourself Against Rape" is the subject of more and more articles, pamphlets and group discussion, and "unfortunately" is required study for women today.

Rape is a part of living in a competitive, aggressive, violent society; you deal with the symptoms and feel helpless about the cause.

This is the feeling of Connie Bagnall of the Vancouver Rape Relief Centre. According to her, rape is now the most widely committed violent crime in North America and British Columbia has the highest rate in Canada.

"Rapes reported to the police have doubled in the last couple of years," she says, adding that this shows a greater willingness of people to talk about assault or rape.

"Rape will not stop, no matter what individual women or groups of women do," Bagnall said, "until societal definitions of male and female roles change."

"Men are seen as controllers or initiators of sexual encounters; women as passive and dependent. Rape comes from the need to push someone around, from the sexual myths about getting women to give-in that are perpetuated in so many movies," she said.

"Sixty to 80 per cent of rapes arise out of casual encounters," she reports.

"The victim is invited somewhere by an acquaintance . . . someone she trusts. Her refusal to submit to advances is not seen as honest; it is assumed to be a 'feminine' game she is playing. A person just has to be wary about the situation she gets into with casual acquaintances, to avoid this type of rape," Bagnall suggests.

Her suggested precautions against the outright aggression of street rape or those resulting from breaking and entering include not walking alone at night, and being careful about open doors and windows.

Rape Relief has researched alternative methods of handling rape in court with some interesting results.

Their legal counsel has confirmed the suggestion that if a rape victim were to lay assault charges under the Civil Code, rather than rape charges under the Criminal Code, some of the worst aspects of the court case might be overcome.

"The rape victim," Bagnall explains, "would not be a witness in these cases. Rather she would be a plaintiff, able to have her own lawyer, and the same protection that the judicial system offers the defendant."

"It would take the sexual connotation out of the case," she said. "Police procedure would remain the same, but investigation of the victim's sexual background and the 'consent issue' would not become the focus of the trial."

As a civil case, Bagnall said, the penalty would be damages paid to the victim by the rapist rather than a jail sentence that goes with conviction for rape under the Criminal Code.

Alberta students demand preventative measures by U of A administration

EDMONTON (CUP) Rape legislation was approved by the University of Alberta students council October 30 after some background information and recommendations were introduced by Len Zoeteman, Agriculture rep.

Council will be asking the University Board of Governors to provide better lighting, particularly in the area between the nurses residence and the hospital, and request that the area be patrolled when the nurses come off shift.

A request was made to various campus organizations to do a study and pinpoint other problem areas. "We have a fairly serious problem of rape on the campus," said Kim McKenzie of Student Help. "The incidence of rape is increasing every year."

He felt the problem was particularly serious in that "it has lots of emotional aftermath." After attending a conference on rape held this summer McKenzie is convinced the university is "one of the top three most likely areas of rape in the city."

As most cases of rape are not reported, there are no exact statistics available about occurrence on campus, but Student Help became aware of about twenty cases last year.

"I personally feel that if there's a study done on it there will be conclusive proof to support measures taken," McKenzie said.

He felt the potential for rape on campus is greatly due to the layout of the buildings, the many dark corners, inadequate lighting and other factors.

Student Help is not the only group who feels this way. "Rape seems to be on the upswing and women seem more and more afraid to say anything about it," says Elizabeth Hnatyshyn of the Womens Programme Centre.

"We've discussed it and we think the lighting on parts of campus is inadequate."

Both groups feel that the issue should receive high priority on campus.

McKenzie strongly recommended that adequate lighting be installed and that certain measures be developed to handle rape cases, particularly as most women won't report them.

He also felt some sort of plan should be developed for campus security which would include having more security patrols in certain areas.

Student Help and the Womens Programme Centre plan to work together to provide some sort of supportive measures for rape cases.

The Varsity — Callin Kelly

They shoot whales don't they?

By KAREN McGUIRE
 "Before whaling became a full-scale operation, about five hundred years ago, the population of whales had been roughly four million. Compare that to 400,000 today," said Melville Gregory a member of the Greenpeace crew who is currently building support for an international fight against commercial whaling.

Whale hunting by the Soviet Union and Japan has recently become the main subject of censure by the Greenpeace foundation, an international organization that devotes itself, in their words, "to the preservation of the habitable world."

In an effort to raise funds and support for their upcoming protest against Japanese whaling activities, representatives from Greenpeace are in Toronto to give a series of lectures and benefits at the university.

The organization originally gained into the public eye during a daring protest against American nuclear testing on Amchitka Island off the western tip of Alaska, in 1970 and 1972.

The group financed a ship and a crew of volunteers sailed it into the test site. Their main concern was the danger of seismic activity, but radioactive leaks of the underground testing was a proven hazard to wildlife.

Greenpeace's non-violent sea-going protest coupled with large land-based demonstrations drew enough support to force the US government to quietly close down their site.

This year Greenpeace plans to use the same tactics to publicize the fact that whales are being hunted to the point of extinction.

Earlier this year, Greenpeace confronted a Soviet whaling fleet and, to protest the killing, sailed rubber rafts between the fleet and the whales.

Again, with public pressure building, the Soviet Union was forced to disband one of its three whaling fleets. "The fleet was not really dismantled," warned Gregory in an interview, "there just aren't enough whales to justify the third fleet."

In order to explain the dangers of tampering with the eco-system, Gregory outlined the problems of "red tide".

"Whales are the primary harvesters of a form of plankton called krill," said Gregory. "If not eaten this substance accumulates to form a poisonous material known as Red Tide which strangle ocean life and makes some shell fish highly toxic."

In 1976, Greenpeace plans to confront the Japanese fleet. Their aim is a ten-year moratorium on whaling, supervised by the United Nations.

A benefit concert at OISE, featuring the Greenpeace band and local performers like Carol Hanson and Michel Hassock, will add to a three-day series of lectures.

The series begins on Thursday evening, student tickets are $2. Greenpeace will be at Scarborough on Thursday and at Erindale on Friday.

More room for ROM with expansion

By RALPH CHOQUETTE

The Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) will expand its facilities on the corner of Bloor St. and University Ave. over the next five years, despite some citizens' hopes for decentralization.

ROM Director James E. Cruise called the on-site expansion "an opportunity for interdisciplinary galleries and research" which would be lost by breaking up displays.

Cruise said he hoped ROM would not establish satellites around the province because "local museums should be just that." They should display the artifacts and specimens indigenous to their regions, he said. "We are not going to send Egyptian materials to Kapuskasing!"

He does not expect increased parking problems resulting from further centralization. A survey conducted by ROM discovered very few museum parkers. ROM advertising would stress its accessibility by transit, said Cruise. The building has not expanded since 1932, although staff and collections have increased. As a result thirty per cent of the collection is unavailable for viewing.

Philosopher's Walk on the West side was termed "sacrosanct". Not even the view from the Walk would be disturbed said Cruise.

Museum officials have been consulting with members of the Citizens' Planning Committee which includes residents' groups, university representatives, city planners, and aldermen.

City planner, Robert Truman said meetings of the Citizens' Planning Committee with museum officials have not been well-attended because "most people don't realize what is going on" concerning the ROM.

Director Cruise said he has been "impressed by the sensitivity of the (museum's) planners" who have complied with suggestions for maintaining green space and restricting the height of the new construction.

Expansion of ROM is necessary Cruise said because some departments are "badly overcrowded" at the moment. Some departments are presently able to display 70 per cent of their specimens while others can show the public less than one tenth of one per cent, although lack of space is only one cause, he said. "The public is not interested in ten thousand bats" he pointed out, but a great number are necessary for research.

Money could be a problem. Cruise claimed the museum needs ten million dollars for climate control alone, apart from construction costs.

"We're very much dependent on the provincial government," he said. "And there are good indications of federal support."

Even so, Cruise expects ROM will have to go to the public for five or six million dollars through a fundraising campaign. Admission increases will not be necessary he said he hopes because "we're very sensitive to this problem."

Football playoff ends scoreless

By JONATHAN GROSS
Sports Editor

The looks of the players seemed to say "What did it all mean" and the score replied, "Nothing". As far as the players are concerned the playoff game between Trinity and Scarborough should never have happened.

At the end of regulation time the score was 0-0 and as the teams retired to their respective endzones everyone assumed there would be overtime but it was getting dark and the coaches and officials met at midfield to work out a solution.

Through a reliable source it was learned that the Scarborough coach refused to play five minute halves in the fading sunlight. The Trinity players grumbled about momentum but in such a close contest the same could be heard on the Scarborough bench. In any case the game will be played at a later date to be announced.

The game was an exciting defensive battle that featured turnovers and plenty of hitting. The offense was another story as Dave Wright of Trinity could not move the men in black. Scarborough's pass rush was a constant threat and forced many turnovers.

It was hard to pick out many great individuals but Fred Banwell of Scarborough spoke highly of himself and fellow linebacker John Katsuras. So much for modesty in Interfac Division II.

According to injured defensive back Tom DeWof of Trinity everybody played well and this was evidenced deep in their end late in the third quarter.

Scarborough had made its deepest penetration in the game down to the Trinity 12. Faced with a notable call reminiscent of last Sunday's by the New York Jets — they decided to go for it when they were well within field goal range. A single in any case was enough for the win. Surely they weren't trying to beat the spread?

Trinity dug in and held the mighty Purple or maroon or whatever, ending Scarborough's only threat.

For a hairbrained exciting contest come on out to the rematch. It promises to be a real Howie Meeker style "barburner". Tomorrow at 3:15 SMC plays Vic and New will play UC, I think.

Toronto Ladies Retain Field Hockey Title for Thirteenth time

By KATHY STEWART
and LAURA ANGLIN

The U of T Women's Senior Field Hockey Team successfully defended their Ontario title for another year last weekend. Toronto is the only champion the league has had in its thirteen year history.

They will represent Ontario in the National Championships next weekend at the University of British Columbia. The Lady Blues were strong over the last two weekends with a record of seven wins and no losses along with 27 unanswered goals.

The kilted ladies downed McMaster 4-0 on goals by Anne Holland (2), Carol MacDougall, and Diane Millar. The second game saw the Guelph team defeated by the same score as Millar, Barb Smith, Pat Williams and fullback Sue Scott tallied for Toronto.

Saturday Waterloo was blanked 5-0 as Toronto combined strong, unyielding defensive play with a fast hard shooting offense to defeat the hapless Warriors. Goals were scored by Hofland, MacDougall, Millar and Nancy Wehrens (2).

The last game for Toronto saw them pitted against Western. Shortly after a goal by Blues forward Cathy Brown, a penalty was called against the Western goalie.

Contrary to usual tactics Toronto chose the Goalie, Lynn Knott, to take the penalty shot. The Western goalie was much chagrined when Lynn put one past her for an OWIAA first — a goal scored by an opposing Goalie!

This was the last goal of the game as the Blues won 2-0 for another Ontario Championship.

The Intermediates also played well in the tournament, finishing a close second to Laurentian in the final standings.

On Friday, the ladies in Blue won over York 3-1 on overtime penalty shots by Eleanor Hawey and Martha Bagnall. Bagnall was the only Toronto scorer in a following loss to Laurentian.

Saturday proved more successful for the ladies as they were victorious over both Queen's and Trent. Diane Wardrope, Glynnis Peters and Martha Bagnall proved the scoring punch in a 3-2 win over Queen's.

Excellent team work was the key to victory against Trent (7-0).

Interfac Sports: Tennis Tourney and Hockey

The Interfac Tennis tournament ended last week on a cold Friday at the Vic courts. With a biting wind in their faces Rick Kolumbus (Phys ed) downed Alex Jancar (Phmy) in straight sets 6-4, 6-3.

According to Sandy Henderson and the Intramural Office the tournament was a success this year with twice as many participants as last year.

The winners were determined in each round by a best of three sets match but this proved to be a poor system. It was decided that next year there would be a 10-game set only in the opening rounds. This will speed things up and should end matches that were stopped short due to classes.

To reach the finals Kolumbus downed Ian Kilgour 2-6, 7-5, 6-4 and Jancar downed Greg Gibson with a 6-4, 6-3 combination.

Congratulations go to everyone who participated in all flights and thanks are in order to Trinity College for use of their courts.

In interfac hockey yesterday Vic downed New 2-1. As the Jennings Cup champions of last year, Vic has started poorly. After an opening game loss to Erindale they just squeaked by a game New team. Sparked by solid defense and clutch goaltending by Schwab Brown the boys in green almost pulled the biggest upset of this early Interfac season.

Scoring for Vic were Richmond and Damp while Shames scored the lone goal for New.

Innis remained on top in Division II with a 9-5 pasting of Vic II. Coming back from an early 3-0 deficit Innis scored in rapid succession as Herb Weller and Chris Bouris each netted hat tricks.

The score is a little misleading as Vic was forced to pull its goalie within ten minutes to go. They had borrowed the equipment from the Vic I goalie who was playing the next game. Bush League hockey.

It wasn't the Thrilla in Manila but superstar Raipb St. Jarre scored twice to lead Devonshire over Social Work 2-1 in intermediate action.

Henry Fong must now wait for decision from Academic Appeals committee.

The Varsity — Cathin Keily

Committee concludes Fong hearing

By PAUL McGRATH
After almost twenty hours of testimony and several hours of argument last night, the Academic Appeals committee has retired to consider the academic future of Henry Fong.

Fong has been forcibly withdrawn by the Faculty of Medicine twice in the middle of the final clerkship year. His appeal rests on the opinion that significant personal bias among members of the medical faculty was a large factor in both cases.

His case also rests on the possibility that a climate of public discrimination against students of Chinese origin in the faculty at the time also contributed to his "unusual" treatment. Fong is the only student in the faculty's history to be forcibly withdrawn in the middle of his clerkship year.

The university's lawyer, J.W. O'Brien, insists that the decision in both cases was based solely on the academic merits of Fong's case. Fong's first withdrawal, he says, was due to some extremely uncomplimentary letters referring to Fong's hardship in dealing with patients and his failure in Surgery, one of the elements of the fourth-year program. The second was due to a further failure in Surgery in Fong's second attempt at the year.

In Wednesday's proceedings, the university's lawyer admitted evidence of 26 new letters that had, as Fong's counsel Peter Rosenthal put it, been "buried for 2 years." Included among these was one from Dr. M.E.C. Voaden, written before Fong's first withdrawal, saying that Fong "should not be allowed to continue in his clerkship" due to his clinical incompetency.

Meds Associate Dean E. Llewellyn-Thomas testified that the letter was brought out only to show that there was "corroborating evidence" to the original complaint about Fong from Dr. H. Gryniwski, who had at the same time complained that Fong was "incompetent".

Fong's counsel maintains that his record was not bad enough to warrant withdrawal. The defense cited an instance of a student failing important comprehensive exams and being allowed repetition of a fourth year twice before moving on to graduation.

The defense insists that a procedure amounting to a "railroading" on the part of Gryniwski and Dr. C.H. Hollenburg, chief of Medicine at Toronto General Hospital, was what led to his withdrawal. The correspondence from those two to former Associate Dean J.W. Steiner was quite insistent that Fong was a "weak student", while other reviews, more than ten in number, state that Fong was "adequate" both in knowledge and clinical competence.

Rosenthal states that the difference between the two opinions of Fong point to "personal prejudice" on the part of Hollenburg and Gryniwski. Hollenburg played an important role in both withdrawals, both as Fong's most vocal critic and as a member of the Board of Examiners that recommended the unprecedented action.

The defense's explanation for Fong's trouble with the two doctors was probably the result of his personality, which is shy and non-aggressive. Other testimony has revealed Fong as a serious, unsmiling student who has trouble communicating on a personal level.

Rosenthal charges that Henry's subsequent problems with staff members were due to "evaluation by slander" and that an objective evaluation of Fong was impossible due to the widespread discussion of the remarks made about him among a large portion of the medical community.

There is also doubt, admitted to by Llewellyn-Thomas, that Fong had knowledge of the charges against him at the time of his first appeal.

The defense's case also hinges on the climate in the faculty at the time. During the course of Fong's clerkship, public statements were made in the press by members of the medical faculty to the effect that there should be tighter control on the number of "foreign students" in the medical faculty, concentrating on students of Chinese origin. The great percentage of Chinese medical students are either landed immigrants or Canadian citizens.

Llewellyn-Thomas testified that this was a topic of discussion among members of the faculty and that he received many letters on the topic. One of the charges made was that students of Chinese origin have communication problems with patients.

Rosenthal charges that Fong was seen by at least one member of the faculty as an example of the problems that were being discussed.

"Somewhere in there," he said, "someone made the link. They wanted proof of these baseless charges about Chinese students and they found an example in Fong. Shy, communication problems, he was just what they were looking for."

"If there wasn't this climate in the faculty, would the medical colleagues have allowed this to happen? They threw him out even though it's been testified to that both his language abilities and his studies were at least adequate."

"My feeling is that if Henry Fong wasn't around at the time, they would have had to invent him. In fact they did."

Faculty fingers Admin

By GREG RICHARDS
"We can no longer defend ourselves by robes, real or figurative. We need to seek certification to bargain collectively."

Professor William Nelson, taking a pro-union stance, made the remarks as he met head to head with Management Studies Dean John Crispo over the issue of collective bargaining for U of T faculty members.

The debate, which frequently blamed the U of T Administration as being the root of problems, took place as the members of the Faculty Association gathered in the Medical Sciences Auditorium yesterday.

John Crispo said collective bargaining for faculty is impractical.

"There is no way that either this university administration or the provincial government if they are in their right minds, and I admit that is taking a lot for granted, would be bound by third party arbitration," he said.

Crispo claimed the faculty would lose professional freedom under a union, with merit going unrecognized because of "the lowest common denominator effect". The faculty's bargaining clout would not be increased despite a union according to Crispo.

"What would we have if we struck? The unemployment roles would just go up — nobody would miss us. We're just not essential or vital," he said.

Nelson said contractual protection embodies a real advantage and cited as an example, the Carleton University faculty's success.

"Some months ago Carleton was supposedly on the brink of bankruptcy and were to dismiss a large number of faculty members, some even tenured. The faculty unionized, and they were granted an 18 per cent increase," he said.

The U of T administration came under severe fire. Speaking from the floor one faculty member termed it "the Simcoe Circle lark", but another member defensively pointed out the administration consists largely of former professors.

"We will not get out of the bind we're in unless we turn our attentions to the administration. It's an abdication of leadership — decisions are made by indecisions," said Crispo.

"Anyone who deals with this administration knows we have an adversarial relationship covered by a thin veneer of congeniality," pointed out Nelson. "But we don't have any power in this adversarial relationship."

Merit of individual faculty members was also an issue at the meeting.

"Deans and Chairmen of departments must weed out what is worthless beneath them," stated Crispo.

Alien beings may share human understanding

By ERIC McMILLAN
Scientist Carl Sagan believes in extraterrestrial life, artificial brains, and abstract thinking in chimps, but most of all he believes in science.

Addressing an audience of 500 Wednesday night, Sagan-capped his controversial views with a denunciation of cults which he said represented a western "loss of nerve."

He lumped together Atlantis, Scientology, Velikovsky, Jean Dixon, mystical powers of pyramids, sensitive geraniums, and "magicians posing as psychics" as cults supported by "not a smidgen of evidence."

The world is facing a crisis through which only "the wise use of science and technology" can pull us, argued Sagan. Population pressures being what they are, "the attitude of going back to till the earth condemns millions to death," he said.

Sagan was introduced as a "popularizer" of science. He has appeared on Johnny Carson and writes books with titles like "The Cosmic Connection", yet is the Director of the Laboratory for Planetary Studies and professor of astronomy at Cornell University. He is perhaps best known for his work on Mars and Venus probes for NASA and for his highly-publicized views on possible contact with aliens.

In support of the existence of other life in the universe Sagan pointed to the size of the universe — "If there are 100 billion stars in a galaxy and 100 billion galaxies... — and to its timespan. If the universe's life were compressed into a year, man would not appear until the late evening of December 31, he figured.

"With that immense number of places, is it possible that only earth has evolved an intelligent mind?" he asked.

Sagan expected alien beings to share our scientific understanding because they would have evolved through adaptation to the same laws of nature.

However, our only means of communication might be via machines. Sagan noted there are presently five projects engaged in listening for intelligible signals from space.

Sagan predicted the further evolution of the human brain in the direction of computer attachments.

He speculated that our brains are composed of three layers acting independently so that we have simultaneously "three different ways of seeing the world." Our reptilian "chassis" he held responsible for sex, aggression, territoriality, ritual and hierarchy.

Bureaucracies like the United States are "big on the reptilian brain," he said.

This core is overlaid with the limbic system, responsible for strong emotions and religious exaltation, and the neocortex used in abstract thinking, said Sagan.

Sagan argued other primates with a neocortex have the capacity to reason and pointed to the progress made in communication with chimpanzees such as Washoe, famous to psychology students.

Non-human primates have not developed speech because man has "systematically killed off all other primates down to those who cannot speak," Sagan claimed.

He saw future development of the brain as being "modular", that is, the application of an artificial fourth layer. Present computers can play chess, checkers and psychiatrist, he pointed out. Pocket computers could be made smaller yet, if it were not for the buttons necessary for pressing by human fingers, he said. The day might not be far off when we'll be able to "plug in" our brains, he noted.

"There is no chance of retreating from science and technology," Sagan said in concluding the first annual Jacob Bronowski Lectures.

Contract vote today for CUPE 1230 members, 4pm at Convocation Hall

All members of the CUPE 1230 bargaining unit are reminded of the secret ballot strike vote to be conducted between 4 and 5 pm today at Convocation Hall.

The vote is either to accept management's final offer or reject it and go on strike. The results will be tabulated immediately after the vote. Rejection of the university offer would put the union in a position to legally strike as of Nov. 20.

The university's final offer is an eventual 15 per cent a month from Nov. 1, 1975 to June 30, 1976, if accepted by the federal Anti-Inflation Board.

It also provides for an eventual lump sum retroactive payment of $500 for the past four months, if approved by the Anti-Inflation Board.

In the interim, there will be a 12 per cent retroactive payment and 12 per cent in the next eight months.

The union's recent position calls for an increase of $230 a month for all workers.

The university has refused to guarantee no layoffs or staff cuts for workers and union demands for a dental plan and the inclusion of part-time workers in the bargaining unit.

CUPE 1230's Negotiating Committee, Executive Committee, Strike Committee, Shop Steward Committee and the departmental captains have unanimously urged rejection of the offer.

Le Groupe is dance unlimited

By KRISTINE KING

"Dance should do everything. As an art form, dance should be a total thing — theatre, music, painting, the traffic here. I think dance should be brought to this park," said Peter Boneham.

Boneham, one of the original founders, is now artistic co-director of Le Groupe de la Place Royale, a Montreal-based modern dance company appearing at the MacMillan Theatre tonight.

The Groupe de la Place Royale originated in the mid-sixties, the brain child of ballet dancer Jeanne Renaud. She was joined by Boneham in the effort to achieve an authentic modern dance in Quebec, a group which could survive and continue to renew itself in an exciting, stimulating way.

Since 1972 when Renaud left Le Groupe, Jean-Pierre Perreault has shared the artistic direction of the company with Boneham. Perreault is a former student of Renaud and Boneham. Together they continue to vitally explore space and imagery in movement and to break through the boundaries between the arts by drawing into association the talents of artists in other fields. They work with musicians, film-makers, painters and sculptors.

Le Groupe de la Place Royale has been on a Canada Council sponsored tour since September. It has taken them into small towns such as Stephenville, Newfoundland, Rimouski in Quebec, and Elliot Lake in Ontario, as well as larger centres. This season five of the company's nine dancers are away.

Boneham, a city person, was initially wary of performing in small towns because he thought response would be lacking. However he said he is terribly excited over the tremendous reception given Le Groupe de la Place Royale by "people who five years ago probably would've walked out."

One would be mistaken to view Le Groupe de la Place Royale as a strictly Quebecois dance phenomenon. One of the dancers is Ohio-born, another a Torontonian, and Boneham is a former New Yorker who has applied for Canadian citizenship. In fact, both he and Perreault are completely apolitical in their work. Their inspiration, he said, is not uniquely drawn from Quebec although he finds it a stimulating atmosphere to work in.

Boneham, 41 years old today, is the most terrible of Canadians. He is motivated by a deep passion for life and dance and sees infinite possibilities in both. Boneham swears a lot and combines a dry, sarcastic sense of humour with a great capacity for tenderness. His mind will ramble endlessly in exhilaration over an idea until he cuts himself short for fear of boredom. He is severe with himself, in effect, a paradox.

Trained in the rigidity of classical ballet, Boneham now has no qualms about bringing a car on stage. "Not as a shock value," he said, "but if it has some relation to the piece then why not use it because that car is movement. That's all dance is, movement."

Experimentation thrives as the guiding principle of Le Groupe de la Place Royale which has established a favourable reputation for its remarkable use of mixed-media techniques. Boneham said they have incorporated such objects as bicycles, ladders, chairs and roller skates into dance.

Asked what his role as choreographer and artistic director in Le Groupe involves, Boneham replied laughing, "I'm the mean old fucker that gives notes."

He explained, "I teach, choreograph and emotionally go through all the traumas of the company." No longer dancing, he now calls himself a "dance-maker" and added, "I've been a psychiatrist, I try not to be, and I stimulate the company I hope."

Perreault is still dancing and for this reason Boneham has done most of the teaching since rehearsal for the tour began in July. Their working relationship is complementary, a fusion of opposing temperaments. "It's like a marriage where one can stimulate, channel and pull another one; keep probing so it's never just boredom or a lack of new interests."

Peter Boneham is Le Groupe de la Place Royale's enfant terrible.

Perreault is Quebecois. Describing the difference between them, Boneham said, "I'm a fast choreographer whereas Jean-Pierre's metabolism is much slower and he's more wonderful than me." He added, "He's a lot younger, he's 28."

Boneham said, "They follow and don't question and I think that's so wrong." He added that dancers are in general terribly insecure and have been taught to totally depend upon the teacher or choreographer.

Boneham thinks choreographers have a great tool to work with. "The main tool is the dancer," he said. "It's a human being with a mind, not just arms and legs." But, there are problems.

"The whole way dancing has been developed through the ages in teaching and choreography is that dancers are just sheep. They're like Boneham would like to see dancers think more. He criticized choreographers for overlooking the need to stimulate the mind as well as the body to derive the total. Both he and Perreault work to take dancers in the company another dimension deeper. "I don't want to limit them in terms of their limitations," he said, "because I don't want them to have limitations."

Report says women faculty underpaid and under-promoted

OTTAWA (CUP) — There were few surprises contained in the statistical compendium on Women in Canadian Universities released October 29 at the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC).

According to figures compiled by Statistics Canada for the 1971-74 period, women faculty across Canada are under-represented, paid less, and not promoted at the same rates as their male colleagues.

As students, women are under-represented at all levels of study, and their numbers decrease as study levels increase from undergraduate, graduate, to post-graduate levels. And women students are still almost under-represented in traditional male-dominated areas like engineering and commerce, while programs such as nursing and household science remain untouched as female academic ghettos.

The study shows that between 1971 and 1974 no progress was made in increasing the proportion of women faculty. In both years women represented only 13 per cent of the total full-time teaching staff at Canadian universities.

The variations between male-female ratios in different programs were extreme, and show that traditional sex-typing still continues to be unchanged despite the recent talk about equality.

In 1974, for example, the traditional male dominated engineering faculties remained just that, with the proportion of female faculty listed as "nil or zero".

In the same year, nursing was still 99 per cent female dominated while only 7 per cent of the medical school faculty were female.

And while commerce continued to have few female teachers (only 4.6 per cent of the total), the traditional female study areas of household science, library science, and social work continued to have high proportions of female faculty 80, 49 and 32 per cent respectively.

Taken by program area, the proportion of women faculty is as follows for 1974: health professions and occupations (21.2 per cent); education (21.2 per cent); fine and applied arts (18.7 per cent); humanities and related (18.4 per cent); agricultural and biological sciences (15.5 per cent); social sciences and related (10.3 per cent); mathematics and physical sciences (3.8 per cent); engineering and applied sciences (7 per cent).

According to Yves Fortin of Statistics Canada, who presented the study to the meeting, the variations in male-female ratios between different academic programs is so extreme the aggregate averages become useless for purposes of analyzing pay and promotability rates between the sexes.

In an attempt to make meaningful comparisons, Fortin excluded the traditional male and female dominated areas and concentrated on statistics relating to teachers in the education, humanities and social sciences, who comprises 50 per cent of the total full-time teaching staff at Canadian universities.

Fortin told the AUCC that between 1960 and 1972 the proportion of women receiving graduate degrees in these three areas increased from 19 to 30 per cent of the total. Yet the percentage of women faculty in these areas increased only marginally over the same period—from 13 to 14.7 per cent.

Those women who did receive academic appointments were promoted less frequently than their male counterparts. An analysis of teachers who received doctorates in the same year, 1959, showed that by 1974 70.5 per cent of the men had achieved the rank of full professor, compared with 31.2 per cent of the women.

For this same group of professors, the average salary of men was $23,350 while women received $22,350.

Fortin also noted that in 1973-74 the average starting salary for a man appointed to the rank of full professor was higher than the average salary of women who had five years experience at this rank.

For all ranks, the average male faculty salary for 1972-73 was $17,184, compared with $13,886 for women.

The statistical compendium also showed that in 1972-73, women represented 38.3 per cent of the full-time undergraduate student population, 25.4 per cent of the graduate population, and only 17.2 per cent of the candidates for doctoral degrees.

This apparent tendency for women not to continue their studies at the same rate as men was only one major trend shown by the figures. Equally significant is that women students continue to cluster in specific study areas while almost being totally absent from others.

Programs in which women students predominate include nursing (98.1 per cent); household science (97.3 per cent); library science (79 per cent); social work (70.7 per cent); education (61.8 per cent); fine and applied arts (61.6 per cent); music (55.6 per cent); journalism (54.3 per cent) and pharmacy 53.9 per cent).

Areas in which women students do not predominate include the following: medicine (22.4 per cent women); agriculture (19.3 per cent); law (18.1 per cent); architecture (13 per cent); commerce (11.9 per cent); dentistry (8.3 per cent); forestry (3.8 per cent); and engineering (1.7 per cent).

Women accounted for 45.7 per cent of general arts students, but only 26.1 per cent of those enrolled in general sciences were women.

Designer says he sees a "sickness"

By CHRISTINE CURLOOK

"It is simple to philosophize about design but more difficult to establish a body of work consistent with this philosophy."

Internationally renowned industrial designer, teacher, writer, documentary film-maker and anthropologist Victor Papanek Wednesday night addressed an enthusiastic capacity audience, including those seated in the aisles, at the Medical Sciences auditorium on the topic of design for the real world and beyond, and professional responsibility with regard to design.

The response of professional design to factors pervasive in consumer needs, namely identity, anxiety and stimulation, has dealt reasonably with the latter two but avoided identity. He said there was a "sickness in designers and designers' outlining objectification or the expectant attitude in both categories. The design-users expect services to come to them and the designers expect the "extension of lines of professional responsibility" to come to them.

Morality in design once meant morality of form. "If a design looked good to teachers of design, all other was discarded as evil or bad" he explained. Since 1955 the criterion has changed, today the emphasis resides in the morality of ease and comfort in design, he noted. If the product designed makes life easier and more comfortable it is good said Papanek. He revealed that ironically enough, the designer "who has the ability to create more comfort for some people does it at the expense of all people."

Professional responsibility in design is a question of relevance, stressed Papanek. The designer is concerned with the selling ability of his product and whether or not it keeps his client happy, he emphasized.

Papanek worked four years at the Swedish Volvo factory on a program of work enrichment for the workers. He emphasized that "design affects workers of design faced with the deadly routine of repetitive work". The only important issue in design", he said, "is where design interacts with people and thus it remains an isolated problem."

Self-created problems occur in design where there is an alienation of the consumer versus product, the workers versus work and, the housed versus the housing they are forced to live in, he noted. Papanek discarded the myth of the profession, namely "that design is an act of solving problems creatively." He emphasized that designers "create problems creatively and then solve them."

"Designers persuasively inform people about the things they do and then create these things," Papanek said. He continued "people have been taught to respond in a class-related manner," that designers continue to do research in these areas and teach their subsequent discoveries to design students.

Reforms in the profession should include the cooperation of users of design on a work team, Papanek said, citing the case of the design of an institution for blind children where the design needs of the children were studied, before and during its development.

Uncle Bill violates code

By TOM CMAJDALKA

Girls FREE between 7 and 8 pm Sunday. Guys, you had better come after them."

The last issue of the Varsity contained an advertisement from Uncle Bill's Disco including the lines above.

Due to recent controversy surrounding various aspects of advertising policy in the Varsity, and suspecting that this ad represented a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Human Rights Code, the Varsity decided to investigate.

A spokesman for the Human Rights Commission said "nothing such as this has ever been brought up before", but then conceded that "according to the letter of the law" the ad violated the Ontario Human Rights Code. In Section 2, subsection 1 of the code it states, "No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of another, shall a) deny to any person or class of persons the accommodation, services or facilities available in any place to which the public is admitted. Or b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to the accommodation, services or facilities available in any place to which the public is customarily admitted. Because of the race, creed, colour, sex, marital status, nationality, ancestry or place of origin of such person or class of persons or of any other person or class of persons."

However, the direct discrimination was not the only objection to the ad. A spokeswoman for the Toronto Women's Bookstore pointed out that the problem is much deeper. She noted the use of the word "girls" instead of "women" is degrading, because men would never be referred to as "boys" in such an ad—that would suggest something completely different. The ad aims to attract women to the establishment and thus to attract more men: "selling sexuality for economic profit", she said. It appeals to and exploits women's loneliness. "Just disgusting" was the comment of another store staffer.

When asked if the Globe & Mail would accept an ad with that wording, salesman Fred Russell said that it was a "borderline case". However, he said that the Globe would accept the ad.

Toronto Star ad manager Bill Clarke called the ad "suggestive and discriminatory" and said he wouldn't print it. Clarke said The Star was a "family paper" and said he thought the ad would reflect unfavourably on the paper's image.

When the same question was posed to Wendy Potter of the Toronto Sun, she answered without hesitation: "That is out and out discrimination—we wouldn't print it."

Obviously, Uncle Bill's establishment isn't the only one that uses this type of advertising gimmick. Bellows, Sugar's, and many other disreputables are also in direct violation of the Human Rights Code with respect to their practices. This concept discriminates against men—if women are admitted free at a certain time, so should men.

As students dodge the cars in Queen's Park, they don't expect another trap. Here workmen near SMC repair the sidewalk.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Is the crisis avoidable?

For the past four months, the university community has patiently watched the evolution of their own home base labour dispute as it progressed from pleasantries to bluff, confrontation and threat. Now, the situation has reached the crisis stage and everybody in the university will suffer.

Today at four o'clock, a strike vote will be held in the Convocation Hall and there is little doubt that a majority of the library workers will vote to leave their jobs.

If they do, the major campus libraries will probably close for a week or a month right in the middle of the pre-Christmas exam and essay period.

Nobody can blame the library workers for demanding a fair wage, job security and reasonable fringe benefits.

But Parker, the university spokesman, has been playing games with the union members. He stalled for three months, holding interminable meetings with the library workers yet always refusing to make a major offer.

"I have to consult my principals," he would say, or "when you lower your demands, then I'll make an offer." Of course, the library workers became impatient and broke off negotiations.

They applied to a government mediator to help settle the dispute and only then did Parker reply. He had no choice. But the offer he made was clearly unacceptable.

A starting library technician deserves more than $125 a week and ten days vacation a year; they should have protection from layoffs, reasonable maternity leave and whatever else.

We can only conclude that Parker wants a strike. He hopes to play U of T students against the union and workers against each other. He can only be hoping for a massive student backlash against the workers or a split between friends who will have to live on $30 a week for the duration of the strike and then work side by side when the dispute is over.

Only Simcoe Hall can diffuse the crisis. A reasonable last minute offer would likely preclude a strike and return the library workers to the bargaining table. Only then can negotiations begin in good faith without the animosity that presently is inevitable.

Security police protest cartoon

To the Editor:

The security police of the University of Toronto takes this opportunity to protest the cartoon that appeared in the November 5, 1975 issue of the Varsity, on Page 4.

The security police protest that such a cartoon tries to give people the impression that we condone the outright thievery of books from the library and that we would turn our backs on such theft. We would like to go on record that we have in the past and will in the future do all in our power to stop any thefts that occur on the entire campus of the University of Toronto.

We would also like to explain our negotiations that are now in

How to put the "punks" away

To the Editor:

I am an old enemy of the essay factories, and strongly feel we must all deny them any sign of acceptance on this campus. Of course The Varsity should not carry their ads! When their posters appear on university bulletin boards, they should be torn down so soon and so often that the slinky types behind the operation despair of replacing them.

But it's too superficial and too negative to stop at that. It seems the very existence of such a large and apparently healthy community of these ghost-cheaters in our midst may be symptomatic of some Something's rotten in the state of the university, as Parker inches along.

It's not an easy decision to make

"Why would any self-respecting university newspaper open its ad columns to this kind of fraud?"

This minor blast came from the Toronto Daily Star yesterday, directed at the Varsity, on the topic of accepting or refusing ads for termpaper services.

The Star says there should be no debate on the subject, that we should drop them right away, and perhaps put these "frauds" out of business.

It's just not that easy. We've indeed had quite a long and protracted argument over the last two or three years on the morality of this question. Why is it that we can't arrive at an answer?

Because it is essentially a moral question upon which we are reticent to rule. Editorial content and ad content are entwined only loosely, therefore it is easy for the people on the second floor to ignore without ruling upon something that is being placed in the paper on the first floor, as abhorrent as they may see it.

Where do we draw the line? Part of our reluctance comes from the constant pressure from various constituents of the community to discriminate against other forms of advertising. Army recruitment ads, ads for female beautification (shampoo, make-up and the rest), ads for varying political groups—all have come under the gun.

This editorial writer does not have the authority to speak yet. The decisions rests with the Varsity Board and eventually with the staff. The Star misquoted us in an earlier story by forecasting that we would probably discontinue the ads. The fact is, we just don't know.

Our ad policy is admittedly laissez-faire, but due to the political content of the newspaper, it almost has to be.

If the politics infringed on the ads, we would have to make serious criticisms of at least 50 per cent of the advertising in this paper. A review of one issue was taken at the last staff meeting, and this fact was illustrated. What is repugnant to one half of the staff is quite acceptable to the rest.

In the end, the issue will be decided after assuredly many more hours more of debate. It is not something we treat lightly, if the show of tempers at Board meetings is anything to go by. We will also do this without the help of the Toronto Daily Star, thank you very much.

profound ill. Is there something alienating, even brutalizing, in the experience of the first-year student—something we do to him—that transforms him into a customer for creeps like this?

I think that with the help of some recent (and current) victims of first year, we could find much that we've botched, and must in all conscience do better. Would The Varsity provide a public forum for the airing of such grievances?

If we get together and build a university, we might just incidentally put those term-paper pushing punks out of business!

Reader suspects documentation

To the Editor:

Although I found the articles on immigration to Canada (November 5th issue) rather interesting, I could not go so far as to say that they were enlightening. At least, not in quite the way they were meant to be.

I did find it enlightening to note that your only acknowledged sources of information were Peoples Canada Daily News-on the Line and the New Marxist Institute. Surely this is tantamount to admitting your already obvious bias in these articles.

The first question that occurs to my journalistically oriented mind is: did your reporter ask the Honourable Robert Andras those questions he "he doesn't want asked"? (or was his department officially contacted for comment on a news story?) Failing that, were any other elected Members of our federal government approached?—perhaps the Progressive Conservative, NDP, or Social Credit immigration "critics"? I have a sneaking suspicion that they weren't.

Shouldn't these men and women—the ones who are actually responsible for immigration legislation in this Dominion—have an opportunity to present and defend their views??

Academic frauds must be expelled

To the Editor:

I firmly believe that any member of the academic community who intentionally passes off work of others as his own should be expelled from the University. Any one who is an accessory to such action should also be expelled. Thus the Varsity should continue to publish advertisements for termpaper services only on the condition that if one person is convicted of using such services to cheat, the entire board of the Varsity be expelled as accessories.

REVIEW

Only a hint of Lawrence's talent in "A Collier's Friday Night"

The difficulties one encounters in reviewing the Menagerie Players' Production of D.H. Lawrence's A Collier's Friday Night (Central Library Theatre) are comparable to those one envisions in imagining any of Lawrence's plays actually 'acted out' on stage.

The play itself is by no means an indication of the writer's genius. One has to be reminded that although Lawrence wrote eight plays in his lifetime (not including two unfinished pieces), he was not really given due recognition as a playwright until nearly forty years after his death (he died in 1930) and only then by a minor part of his readership. The recent interest in making some of his novels and shorter works into films Women in Love, The Fox, The Virgin and Gypsy, to mention a few, arises beyond doubt from the novelist's remarkable ability to dramatize a situation which would appear as nothing other than prosaic in the prose of many of his contemporaries. There is a powerful element of 'passion' (for lack of a better word) which is intrinsically a part of Lawrence's works — whether it be demonstrated in his paintings, plays, novels, poems, short stories, critical works and so on — what Dr. F.R. Leavis best described as his "supremely intelligent vitality ... that comes out so often in a characteristic high-spirited amusement, and has its essential part in the delicacy and vividness of his observation of people."

A Collier's Friday Night only gives a hint of this talent. The play was written at a very early stage in Lawrence's development, about 1909, when he was a twenty-four year old schoolmaster in Croydon, Surrey — and apparently hating his position with a passion. His longing to return to Nottinghamshire, the countryside of his childhood, can be seen in the more nostalgic aspects of the play: the 'kindly' portrayal of his mother, the cruel image of his father, somewhat pathetic, and the rather obscure depictions of himself as Ernest Lambert and of his early love, Jessie Chambers (Maggie Pearson). It was not until four years later when he wrote his second novel, Sons and Lovers, that these characters (under different names) became an important part of his literature.

The vital point to note here is that the play is highly autobiographical, depicting incidents which probably occurred at some time or another in the Lawrence household, undoubtedly exaggerated both for dramatic purposes and as it was Lawrence's tendency to do so. There are three acts, the latter two following closely upon their predecessor; the scene is 'The kitchen or living-room of a working-man's (collier) house', set in a colliery district of Nottingham at approximately the turn of the century. The action is important only in so far as it expresses what are to become major themes in Lawrence's later works: the plight of the working-man, a husband's responsibility to his wife and vice versa (at a later period men's and women's responsibilities and attitudes towards each other), the vital bond of kinship (later blood-brotherhood) and most particularly Lawrence's peculiarly close relationship with his mother — 'a dangerous gentleness — so much gentleness that the safe reserve of their souls is broken' — and how it conflicted with his love life as a young man.

I could not determine, from what information director Robert Rooney gave me, whether the biographical nature of the play was an essential consideration in his production. But it seems more than a coincidence that Ernest (played by Peter Noy) closely resembles the appearance of the 'bearded' Lawrence when he was thirty. At twenty-one Ernest's age in the play — Lawrence described himself as a 'clean-shaven, bright young prig in a high collar like a curate, guaranteed to counteract all the dark and sinister effect of all the newspaper photographs.' Be it granted, however, that the character of Ernest is nebulous enough in many respects to be portrayed any which way, Noy's characterization of the young college student as soft-spoken (so much so that at times one had difficulties hearing him), spasmodically vivacious and as haughtily seductive as Lawrence's Gypsy, puts one off. It might also be assumed from what one already knows of the play that an important personality to appraise would be the collier father himself (for whom Oliver Whitehead wrote a short song for this production), but Michael Lambert's unfortunate inability to depict the difficult coarse accent of the Midlander, even though the effort was there, cannot be overemphasized. If any of the major characters' accents were at all appropriate, it was the mother's (played by Jean Halliwell — probably the best performance given); but one could not help but feel that at times the vital class distinction between the mother and the father was lost. She was hardly the proud-minded personality that was Lawrence's mother, a quality which Mrs. Lambert certainly should not lack. Even Charity Newburn as the Maggie Pearson of Herod's Farm, 'ruddy and black' in appearance and in character, though repugnant to any of Ernest's hints toward the physical, somehow misses what the role calls for.

These points of criticism may seem trivial to an audience which is not familiar with the early works of Lawrence, but a character's external appearance was extremely important to Lawrence. The script of the play is full of the author's own directions and descriptions, perhaps a fault from a theatrical point of view. But the appearance of the set (interesting in its own way), the description of the characters and the accents Lawrence writes for each of them all contribute to a highly naturalistic form of drama which must be followed if the 'spirit of place' is to be depicted as he intended. Lawrence's dogmatic criticism of the drama of his age was that it was 'bony, bloodless'. What becomes apparent in this production, however, is that he was more a budding genius of the novel form than of the theatre. He himself described the play as too 'literary', a problem which he attempted to remedy in later efforts and with increasing success.

But I feel that this intentionally 'underplayed' production of the play should be seen. The production of three of Lawrence's plays (including this one) at the Royal Court Theatre in London during the spring of 1968 has shown, by the critics' and public's extreme praise of these performances, that Lawrence can and should be rated high as a dramatist. It is certainly not unbelievable that the Toronto production of A Collier's Friday Night is a Canadian premiere; to see his plays performed on stage has been and still is an extremely rare occurrence. What seems unfortunate is that the play will likely draw a majority of only those already 'intoxicated' by the 'Lawrence cult', which most certainly should not be so.

Toronto Consort brings Renaissance music back to life

The Toronto Consort is a group of five musicians who are devoted to the study and performance of music composed between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries. They themselves have travelled in Europe digging about in dusty libraries and archives for crisp and yellowed manuscripts of music which has, quite literally, not been heard in the past 400 years. They have also done extensive research into the nature of the instruments of the time and have constructed their own shawms, rebecs, krumphorns, recorders and so forth from designs that they made from contemporary descriptions and depictions. These diligent antiquarians have even gone so far as to make sure that their costumes, gestures, and clowning around are absolutely authentic.

This first concert of their very first subscription series, entitled "Music for Lorenzo the Magnificent," was divided into four sections. The first consisted of songs in praise of the Medicis and of Florence, and a couple of love songs. The best-known musician of Lorenzo's court, Heinrich Isaac, wrote the music for most of these and Lorenzo himself wrote the lyric for one of the love songs. Two movements from a really magnificent mass by Isaac dominated the second part. After the intermission, the group performed a set of Canti Carnascialeschi, the satirical and bawdy songs which were popular at Florence's annual spring carnival. It was here that the Consort was really at its best, for it approached these songs with an effervescent irreverence and insolence which befitted the material quite perfectly. The concert concluded with a moving rendition of two motets on the death of Lorenzo by Isaac with a Latin text by Angelo Poliziano, another Florentine court musician. We were then treated to an encore in which the Consort mewed, barked, bleated and sang. After the concert, the audience was invited to examine the instruments and ask questions about them.

The Toronto Consort is a warm and personable group whose charm can keep a performance going even when some minor technical inelegancy might otherwise have marred it. Every member is a very accomplished vocalist and the sound of the harmonious interaction among their voices is marvellous indeed. I have not heard much shawm playing in the past, but the playing of Professor McGee and Mr. Klausner impressed me as being quite unremarkable. All four of the instrumentalists played the recorder at one point or another, but their playing lacked the tone quality and precision of execution which I am accustomed to hear from virtuosos. But where the group seemed really to be deficient was in their string playing; so many notes were slightly "off" or sloppily executed that it almost began to interfere with my enjoyment of the music. The lute playing in particular was simply an embarrassment.

But none of this sort of petty nonsense detracts a bit from the value of the Consort. Its most important contribution to the cultural life of Toronto is merely to make the music of so remarkably rich and fruitful a period available to the public when it is so widely neglected. But more than just exposing modern ears to ancient music, they are trying to impart to their audience a sense of the feeling of the time.

Many Moderns approach ancient art with an exaggerated reverence as something remote and exalted and entirely irrelevant to them, but the Toronto Consort eschews this ludicrous attitude and treats the music of the middle ages and Renaissance as a genuinely valid art form with import and immediacy for today.

There are, to my knowledge, still some tickets available for the concerts on the 11 December, 28 January and 21 April.

Canuck culture kids can hold their own

Those 'ol dolies singing back their pints of Guinness have eyed 'Canader's' culture with condescension for many a year. They say we "ain't got the tradition 'n all at."

Well wake up girles (but don't spill your beer). The Young Canadian Performers series opened at the St. Lawrence Centre, October 30th. Arkady Shindelman, violinist and Louis Lortie, pianist, were featured.

Shindelman's best performance was the Bach Violin Sonata (no. 2 in A minor for the trivia freaks). The slow movements lacked drive, but the rest sparkled with energy. However he isn't dramatic. The Chausson Poeme and the Saint-Saens Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso were too safe. A few notes sacrificed for a freer performance would have been more appropriate.

Girls, if you like your man strong and passionate, wild yet gentle, have I got a deal for you. Only 16 (that's his age, not price) but just wait a few years... Louis Lortie is a strong pianist. Anyone who can play Beethoven's Waldstein sonata from beginning to end has something going for him. But Lortie didn't just drive the Waldstein to a glorious finish. He clarified the musical lines for a fine performance.

His interpretation of the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Paganini was notable for its sensitive maturity. Lortie also played a Průkofiev sonata, again with dynamism, though not enough contrast between the movements. Hitomi Yamazaki

La Mendola

Who would have suspected such exoticism lurks at Yonge and Queen?

One more variant of a familiar species

Like all mythologies, contemporary advertising has its own neatly-constructed paradoxes. Small incongruities, such as the inexplicable failure of the curiously-named and short-lived menthol cigarette Spud to capture the public imagination, make a handy addition to one's stock of knowledge in case of faltering conversation. But there is no lack of subtler conundrums for the serious-minded: for example, how can something be the same and yet different at the same time?

This question arises from an examination of the new booklet Simpson's Christmas 1975, copies of which can be found stuffed into the cavernous folds of last Saturday's Star Simpson's, a recent story in the Toronto shoppers as is identified by Toronto shoppers as the "carriage trade" department store, the place to buy one's furs and jewelry. And it is this image Simpson's presents in its booklet, one of understated elegance (if only in comparison with the shrill excesses students of such matters have come to expect).

Never has advertising copy more nearly transcended its commercially-motivated limitations as in Christmas 1975's opening three pages. Here the reader is introduced to "The Room", where one can find "the cream of international fashion". The visuals are far from your average four-colour offset job: a few samples of the international cream, worn by pale wide-eyed women, are captured for our delectation in dreamy watercolours. The women sit gracefully, gazing off somewhere behind the easel, but their stares are fixed. The copywriter, casting aside the frowsy convention of having the lines all the same length, provides instead a haunting yet lyrical bit of free verse:

Pierre Cardin's signature T-shirt becomes a sweater for fall; "in" topping for skirts, pants, blazers; day or evening. Made in Italy for us alone... (another great gift idea) They're such fun to choose personally, but please telephone if it's more convenient...

But there is a puzzling note: "Top fashion trends", yes, but "interpreted to suit a unique lifestyle"? Lifestyle, isn't that something like hairstyle? Get a new one each week? And what do they mean by "interpreted"? Isn't there a hint of Eau de Mass-Production in the air?

Simpson's faces a dilemma. They are appealing to a mass audience, using familiar forms, making a familiar proposal. At the same time they are trying to present their audience with the illusion that the consumption of certain products is a way of expressing one's uniqueness. The forms of mass culture are such that this desire cannot be fulfilled; and the more effectively standardized interchangeable "lifestyles" fail to provide any real basis of individuality, the greater the sense of anonymity, and the greater the desire to find a "lifestyle" that is "unique".

As John Berger states in Ways of Seeing:

"It is true that in publicity one brand of manufacture, one firm, competes with another; but it is also true that every publicity image confirms and enhances every other. Publicity is not merely as assembly of competing messages: it is a language in itself which is always being used to make the same general proposal. Within publicity, choices are offered between this cream and that cream, that car and this car, but publicity as a system makes only a single proposal.

It proposes to each of us that we transform ourselves, or our lives, by buying something more."

So the puzzle is solved. There can be different kinds of glamour, from Yonge St. glitter to Holt-Kenrew chic, but all are variations on a well-known theme. The real choice is not between Brand X and Brand Y. It is rather between the total integration of human personality and aspirations into the realm of cash relations and the attempt to escape that integration.

But as the Simpson's booklet shows, even the latter choice can be made a part of the grand design. By cultivating an image of exclusivity, Simpson's seems to offer an escape from the standardized and exploits our hopes for something different. Simpson's has the art of being different and yet the same down pat. That the difference is spurious and the sameness real should not spoil one's appreciation of the paradox. Gene Allen

One of the things Danny's learned at university is how to keep those good times good. When he drinks, whether it's beer, wine or spirits, he knows his limit and he respects it.

Another year or so, and Danny will be working in a field that's fascinated him all his life. He wouldn't risk spoiling the opportunity for anything.

Yes, Danny is going to make it.

No, he won't.

Danny's a brilliant student. There's no end to what he wants to learn. Yet Danny's no hermit. He really enjoys a good time.

That's the problem. It's not that he sets out to drink too much, but once Danny starts he often forgets he has a limit, and then it's too late.

Danny would be wise to see a doctor, except he says it's just a phase he's going through. His work hasn't suffered yet. But if Danny doesn't change, it soon will.

And, no, Danny won't make it.

Magic and sentiment in Lartigue's guileless art

The first quarter of this century, the century that was to have belonged to Canada. It belongs to nobody; time can't be captured, possessed, preserved. Yet Jacques Henri Lartigue seizes it in his photographs. Let us return to this numified era.

It is 1901. "Photography is a magic thing," writes Lartigue in his seven year old wonder at things. He has been presented and recently with his first camera; he calls it an eye-trap, and will probably long be grateful to his father for the gift. His second picture freezes his parents in their garden, and the affection in their blurry clasp is now visible forever.

We can see Lartigue posing them as he might position a pretty butterfly in a collection. So there they are.

He gets better at it, stilling brothers and cousins in their wealthy maddcapery of gliders and rafts and automobiles, witnessing these toys with the joy he takes everywhere. He induces a beautiful cousin to leap down stairs to see if he can capture her flight; he does, and she is smiling monolithically. He is a romantic and an adventurer at the same time.

The century is ten years old, and awash with the air of Proust's excessive sensibilities, the silkiness of Parisienne noblesse. Lartigue photographs velvet women strolling through the black and white springs.

"The one luxury I could not do without is a woman's company.

Feminine joy and gaiety sustain me and the warm rays of a woman's smile are as beautiful as the light of the southern sun... or silence." He is losing his boyish delight in fun, and divining new feelings with his magic rod. The pictures that he takes are fine; as some people are photogenic, his camera makes things photogenic.

But there is still excitement, sensation. Automobiles are becoming fast, and he revels in kicked-up dirt and racers slanting forward into his distorting lens. He takes portraits not so much of things as of qualities—femininity, speed.

They are perhaps philosophies compared to other photographers' fact-finders. He sees an aeroplane fly overhead and thinks, "First impressions are often so overwhelming and unique, you are forever trying the recapture them. I wonder what name it has, this opposite of fear, this happy, joyous fear, which came over me and which I will never understand." Some of this sentiment is caught with the pictures that cause it.

The 1920's arrive. Lartigue has married Bibi, the daughter of the composer Andre Messager, and continues the cultivated life in which few weeds grow. Friends of Picasso, of Yvonne Printemps the actress, of many people who don't need photographs to be remembered. He photographs Paris and its effervescence, the pictures almost a dreamer's lexicon. Bibi and Yvonne film-maker Sacha Guitry's apartment are like modern odisseys. The sheen of Lartigue's world is still there.

So the quarter century ends. Lartigue continued to take pictures: photographs that are not exhibited here but which were bound every year into an album for his family. He never exhibited publicly until 1962, believing that he was an amateur, that photography was just something that he did every day while his true love was painting.

Simone Roussel on the Beach, by Jacques Henri Lartigue, 1906

Just something he did every day; such things are guileless art.

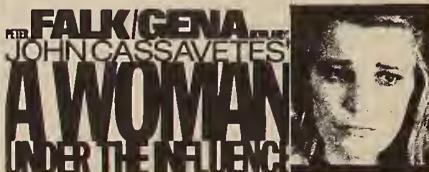

He has celebrity; Truffaut has asked him to take stills for a film, he is 81, he travels much. His photographs, the apotheosis of home movies, show the virtue of unpretentious creation. And, at the last, there is the sentiment. He wrote, in that quarter century of his youth, that "happiness is an element which, like air, is everywhere. Provided you don't run after it too hard and too long, you'll find it right there, within reach, all the time." So you look back at that portrait of his parents, who are right there, all the time.

Do modern artists need a weather vane to know which way the wind blows?

It may not be art, but is it funny?

As I woke up last Saturday morning, vague recollections of the previous night's activities came to mind. Gradually, my eyes focused on a black-and-white pattern on the floor. What was it? The early edition of Saturday's Globe and Mail I had bought that morning in an attempt at grasping any remaining strands of reality?

Soon I was alive again, realizing the importance of my mission in life as a student. As the first sips of coffee reactivated my cells, a problem arose. Was it merely a newspaper, or did this crumpled heap have a nobler function (that of being a source of beauty, or more significantly, a work of art)?

At this point I determined to visit the exhibition of cartoons about modern art entitled A Child of Six Could Do It. By making this mission to the Hart House Art Gallery I could resolve this eternal problem in one fowl swoop.

One thing I did learn from the exhibition was that, regardless of what modern art is, or should be, it has provided a bottomless source of satire for twentieth century cartoonists. Moreover, humour does occasionally serve to bring out some of the more definite aspects of those things it ridicules.

Anyone who happens to be in Hart House with time to spare should drop down to the Gallery for a few laughs. These cartoons, from Punch, The New Yorker and other such sources, are touring various galleries in Canada. They will be at Hart House for the entire month of November, thereby making excuses for missing the exhibition redundant.

Few obvious changes, but always something new from Laliberte

Although his techniques, style, imagery, and execution change little from year to year, there is always something new to see in a Laliberte exhibition.

A quick glance at his current one-man show at the Galerie Dresdner finds no one familiar banner. The works on display are all acrylic and oil pastel paintings — and in rarely seen quantity.

There is the same impact of the banner's jewel-like colours in these paintings however.

These colors take one deep into the paintings while the images remain two dimensional, like Japanese shadow puppets. Each figure is outlined in black, the definition sometimes being gouged out of the heavy cardboard surface. The same outlines often swirl off into tendrils of pattern filling the spaces between or acting as communication lines between the figures. Indeed interaction of dialogue between the figures is a recurring theme and seems of primary importance to the artist.

The other thing of importance to the artist seems to be his own name — it appears at least twice in most works, and sometimes even more often, incorporated into the design.

The delicate balance of the seemingly symmetrical groups of figures shows the great genius the artist has for design — dependent on an implied grid — a frame within a frame.

Certainly the subject matter cannot be relied upon as the major focus of attention. What is going on? What is the message? Who knows? The search for meaning should never interfere with the pure enjoyment of just looking.

The images are the creation of Laliberte's fertile subconscious — and our subconscious responds to them. The faces are similar to Norval Morrisseau's, the animals are from middle European decorative panels, the body outlines are clearly Bauhaus drawing school, with overtones of a medieval manuscript. But together they are pure Laliberte.

Laliberte seldom works from a preliminary drawing. He creates directly from within with swiftness and energy. One should not be deceived by his simplicity. When working on a commission concerning a specific subject matter, Laliberte researches thoroughly and incorporates the background material into the finished work. His banners at Le Soleil (in the ManuLife centre) are an excellent example of this, filled as they are with an exhaustive knowledge of food and drink.

The show continues until Nov. 12.

Montreal, 1938: Arcand's followers get together to plan strategy

The easy rise of fascism in Canada

The Swastika and the Maple Leaf
Lita — Rose Betcherman
Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $9.95

Contrary to our national self-image, racism is as Canadian as alligator pie — witness the treatment of, among others, orientals (on the West Coast), blacks (on the East Coast), and native Indians (just about everywhere). Yet as recently as two Saturdays ago the Toronto Star had the editorial temerity to say that racism is merely an American social disease, an infection insidiously transmitted by the unclean Yankee media.

Unfortunately, it simply isn't so. Lita-Rose Betcherman's study of fascist movements in Canada in the thirties illuminates our tradition of home-grown Canuck bigotry with a sombre portrait of anti-Semitism (or, less euphemistically, Jew-hatred) during the Depression.

Betcherman contends that fascism was "a minor but persistent theme" in Canada throughout the decade, and that it "drew its basic strength from a prevalent if largely latent anti-Semitism". More contentiously, she argues that the Jewish factor was what distinguished fascism from communism, and asserts that "like communism and socialism, it (fascism) owed its existence to the Depression".

Canada's answer to Adolf Hitler was Adrien Arcand, a charismatic Quebecois with a dapper moustache and compelling eyes. At the height of his career, his personal dynamism was considered, in international fascist circles, as second only to that of the Fuehrer himself.

But blue eyes and Brylcreem alone do not account for Arcand's appeal. French Canada had long been infatuated with Mussolini, especially after II Duce received the Vatican seal of approval. A corporatist, organic view of society fitted in well with Catholic social dogma, and anti-Communist propaganda was irresistible to the jittery Church of the thirties. As well, the large Italian community in Montreal — hard-hit by the Depression, proud of its Fatherland, and prodded by the Italian consulate — responded gratefully to Arcand's paeans to fascism.

As in Germany, the nascent movement was encouraged by conservatives who believed they could control fascism. Financed by the federal Conservative party, Arcand and his friends campaigned vigorously for Bennett in the 1930 election, helping him to reap an "unexpected" twenty-four seats in Quebec. The flow of funds slowed to a trickle after the election, but in 1935, when Bennett needed him again, Arcand was appointed Quebec publicity director of the Conservative party.

But even a French Goebbels could not save the "Iron Heel", and Arcand's next patron was the provincial premier, Maurice Duplessis. From 1936 until the outbreak of war, Arcand edited a Union Nationale newspaper, and his followers enjoyed government jobs, contracts, and moral support (one prominent fascist was actually made responsible for issuing gun permits in Montreal and district!).

Borrowing the trappings of fascism from Germany and Italy, Arcand fashioned a party platform from one enormously popular plank: harassment of the Jews. In so doing, he drew support from small businessmen and professionals who resented Jewish competition; from good Catholics who saw all Jews as anti-Christians and Communists; and from economic nationalists, for whom the Jew was a surrogate Englishman, a symbol of foreign domination — (although most Jews spoke French and were no better off than the Quebecois).

In this atmosphere, and with the accession of Hitler to power in Germany, the fascists' demand that all Jews be shipped off to Madagascar was solemnly considered in the very highest circles of government, and all attempts to pass group libel legislation met with ignominious defeat. (Indeed, until 1970 no such law existed in all of Canada — except for Manitoba, the only province in which fascists had directly challenged the provincial authorities).

Outside Quebec, organized fascism received a mixed reception. (Betcherman's title for chapter eight, "Arcand Moves Into Canada" — meaning "Ontario" — is a Freudian as well as a typographical slip.) Anti-Semitism struck a responsive chord in Ontario, where the well-to-do worried about property values and the not-so-affluent longed for a scapegoat for their misery. But beyond some youthful vigilante groups (such as the Beaches' Swastika Clubs) and a comic opera Nationalist Party, little real progress was made. The Italian invasion of Ethiopia shattered Mussolini's hitherto considerable prestige in English Canada, and hostility to Hitler began to surface. After a promising start, the Mosleyites' British Empire Union of Fascists, a faction based on veterans' support, soon fell apart. Lack of a strong leader and issues other than Jew-baiting doomed organized fascism in Ontario — but left the door open to demagogues such as George McCullagh of the Globe.

The prairies, however, offered more hospitable terrain. Germans formed the largest single ethnic group in the West, and agents of the German Auslandsorganisation worked assiduously among them. Mennonites, in particular, proved receptive to Nazi doctrines, which played on their deep anti-communism. And the Ukrainian community, divided on ideological grounds, provided a strong base for any party which would court its right wing Nationalists. As James Gray put it, "anti-Nazism was a lost cause in Winnipeg until the outbreak of war".

By the summer of 1938, Arcand had reached the peak of his career. Capitalizing on a wave of publicity — sparked by a Globe and Mail series on the party in late 1937 — he called a national convention of fascists in Toronto for June of 1938. By then, the fascist movement in Canada boasted a rainbow of shirt factions — brown, black, blue, almost every colour except pink. Well protected by the Toronto police, the convention drew some two thousand sympathizers to Massey Hall. But the League Against War and Fascism; a Communist-led organization, packed Maple Leaf Gardens with 10,000 anti-fascists. And in the streets outside the convention, police broke up a protest demonstration, quickly nabbing four Communist agitators. The C.C.F., for its part, drew 500 onlookers to a counter-demonstration at Queen's Park — well out of harm's way.

After the convention, however, press interest in Arcand waned. Antipathy to Hitlerism drove Arcand back into Quebec, where he shed his imperialist enthusiasms, renounced his hopes for a national fascist party, and fell back on that old stand-by, Quebec nationalism. The one incendiary issue remaining was that of European refugees, or, more precisely, Jewish Immigration. But censorship by the Quebec press and dissension within his own party, prevented Arcand from using the issue as a springboard to power.

When war finally came, Arcand went underground and continued disseminating propaganda. Only after the end of the phoney war, when the Canadian press began expressing fears about "Quislings" and "fifth columnists", were the remnants of the fascist movement rounded up and interned in Fredericton, New Brunswick. As Betcherman puts it, "the fascist movement in Canada was suppressed, not out of moral repugnance, but because Germany had become the enemy". And she ends her book on an ominous note: "Fascist movements and racism did not vanish, but withdrew to await a more welcoming climate".

Significantly enough, Mr. John Ross Taylor, Arcand's Ontario lieutenant in 1937, contested the Toronto civic elections in 1972 — as a candidate for the Western Guard.

Betcherman's book is an important contribution to the literature on the 1930s, rightly stressing the magnitude of anti-Semitism in Depression Canada. What one misses is a more direct discussion of this theme. Aside from potted versions of the Hannah Arendt and Norman Cohn theses, the author makes few attempts to set Canadian anti-Semitism in its international context. How, for example, did Canadian attitudes to Jews differ from those of Americans, and how did our fascists compare with theirs?

Moreover, the Adrien Arcand phenomenon is insufficiently explained. His charisma is described, but no explanation is provided for how Arcand acquired his magnetism, even granted that much of his mystique was borrowed (stolen?) from Adolf Benito. And why, one may ask, was Arcand so fervently anti-Jewish? Was he merely aping Hitler, or echoing traditional French Canadian prejudice, or were his sentiments based on more personal reasons? Arcand first turned to politics after being fired and blacklisted by the owner of La Presse (a non-Jew) for attempting to unionize his co-workers. Why did he then turn to the right, instead of becoming, say, Tim Buck's Quebec lieutenant?

Part of the answer is provided by Betcherman when she writes that, rather than driving Quebec towards communism or socialism, the Depression merely intensified existing French Canadian nationalism. Thus Arcand's fascist movement flourished only insofar as it adhered to the extreme nationalism of Abbe Groulx and L'Action Nationale. Fascism gained legitimacy from its Italian connection, its militancy, and Arcand's personality, but the university students from whom it drew many of its supporters were nationalists, first and foremost. But, as Betcherman points out, "the trouble was that Arcand wanted to be Hitler while his party wanted him to be Mussolini". And this was indeed a costly ambition, for it provoked a student revolt within the party in the summer of 1938, and ultimately drove away many of Arcand's key collaborators. Why, then, did Arcand deviate from Quebec nationalist orthodoxy by downplaying separatism and wooing English Canada with imperialist rhetoric? Was it a purely political gambit to broaden his party's base beyond Quebec, or did it stem from his personal views and desires?

As an organized political force, fascism in Canada remained a "minor theme" throughout the thirties, but it was only the tip of the Rightist iceberg, and its persistence was largely due to the aid and abettance of friends in high places. When not actually welcomed, extremism of the Right was perceived as less of a threat than that of the Left. As the Mayor of Montreal candidly admitted, he was far too busy stamping out Reds to worry about the Fascists. Indeed, the authorities had every reason to fear Communists more than the ill-organized rabble on the Right. While the "storm troopers" went through their well-publicized paces — marching and drilling, Jew-baiting (and — beating) — the Communists were laboriously organizing the unskilled and the unemployed, leading countless demonstrations, sit-ins, and strikes. And, ironically, the benign neglect afforded the fascists was in fact a kiss of death, for it deprived them of the discipline and the fighting reputation that a good healthy dose of repression bestowed on the Communists.

There are, as well, a few omissions and evasions in this otherwise worthy book. The author refers repeatedly to Arcand's first newspaper, the "Journal historiciste" entitled Le Goglu, without ever explaining what the devil a 'goglu' might be (literally: a bobolink; figuratively: a tasteless joke). And while Betcherman discusses the policies of "the long-lived Taschereau government" with whom "the Jewish minority enjoyed a particularly happy relationship", she neglects to mention that this same regime was notoriously corrupt — an important consideration.

But the most unjust and unscholarly section of the work is Betcherman's indictment of O.D. Skelton for failing to adopt "a humanitarian policy" in regard to the immigration of refugees. Solely on the strength of a Globe and Mail report that O.D.S. was "the man behind the scenes on all international affairs" (including immigration of refugees), the author asserts that Skelton was "the most influential man in government" and lays the responsibility for Canada's closed door policy at the feet of the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is true that Skelton exerted great influence over Mackenzie King on matters of state. But simply because he was the eminence grise of the King government, it does not follow that Skelton saw red on this particular issue.

Moreover, Canadian external relations in the late thirties were conducted with at least one eye on domestic reactions, and if ever there was a "hot" domestic issue in Canadian history, immigration is it. It thus seems obvious that "the most influential man in government" on this particular issue was neither Skelton nor King, but rather, Ernest Lapointe. And the policy adopted was, as Betcherman admits, fully in accord with public opinion in both Canadas, French and English. Indeed, had she bothered to examine the records of the Prime Minister, or of the Departments concerned, the author would have discovered that, public opinion notwithstanding, King, Crerar — and probably Skelton, as well — were prepared to accept a relatively "humanitarian policy" towards refugees, but were overruled on this occasion, as on others of a similar nature, by the Quebec members of Council. One might well castigate the King government for surrendering so objectly to the dictates of National Unity, but the swipe need not be gratuitous.

The fact remains, however, that Betcherman has produced a timely and ably-presented study of fascist movements in Canada during the thirties. Only the title of her book is inadequate, for as she has shown, the fleur-de-lis and the Star of David assuredly had as much to do with fascism in Canada as did the swastika and the maple leaf.

Canada's elite - who they are, what they do, what they think

The Canadian Establishment
Peter C. Newman
McClelland and Stewart, $14.95

The austere black doors, securely nestled between huge twin pillars, shown on the front cover of the book invite entry into the formal, solid world of the Canadian establishment. The back cover closeup of those same doors, firmly shut, warns us entry is almost impossible. And the absence of a single illustration between the covers tells us the people behind those doors are likely to remain strangers to us, unless we put our best efforts to the contrary.

That seems to convey the message of the first volume of Peter C. Newman's magnum opus, The Canadian Establishment. Not only is far more of our lives than we would care to admit controlled by this anonymous and tightly guarded group of people whose ranks few of us are ever likely to enter, but we know next to nothing about them.

Newman's book is the first comprehensive attempt to let the layman in on just who the elite are, what they do, and what they think of themselves. As such, it's a critically important book.

In a way, it's surprising. You'd think we'd want to know our elite, if only to vilify them. Of course, we've all heard of the Thomsons, the Taylors and the Bassetts, but do we really know what makes them tick? And how many of us have even heard of the equally powerful Bud McDougald, Nelson Davis, Howard Webster, Aalen Weston or David Stewart?

Even the new rich, those who've made a success of themselves by dint of some ability, have escaped public recognition. Do we have no wish to applaud or study the successful? Surely, the phenomenal career of a Paul Desmarais, who rose from operating a deficit-ridden Sudbury bus line to controlling Power Corporation, one of the country's largest industrial conglomerates, and whose recent attempt to take over Argus Corporation (an equally huge conglomerate) provoked the establishment of the Royal Commission on corporate concentration, should be virtually a popular legend. Yet, presumably out of ignorance, his story has stirred very few souls.

Let's establish just where we stand with the Canadian establishment, and what it means. Over a decade ago, we had John Porter's powerful Vertical Mosaic, which shattered our illusions about economic and cultural mobility, and described a concentrated, interlocking nexus of power. Last summer, Wallace Clement's Canadian Corporate Elite not only supported most of Porter's conclusions, but even suggested the tendency towards elite concentration was becoming more acute.

In other words, it's no big news that we have a powerful elite. However, if the first two books only gave us some working drawings of the establishment, Newman's book cranks up the machine and shows us what it looks like when it's working.

With challenging — in fact, just barely acknowledging — the work of his academic predecessors, Newman gives us some marvellous insights into just what drives the elite (more specifically, the business elite) through a stunning collection of anecdote, observation, and solid, up to date research. This may not be systematic sociology, but it is certainly journalism of the highest order. The ideology, the motivation, the common bond, the breeding, the rules of elite behaviour, so unsatisfactory when quantified, come alive with Newman's touch (almost too alive: one senses he regrets he himself was not one of the subjects of the book).

The sections on banking, including a fascinating description of the dislodgement of the late Neil McKinnon from the chairmanship of the Bank of Commerce, clearly articulate the elite's sense of ethical business conduct. The sparkling chapter on wartime life with C.D. Howe pinpoints both the common background of many business leaders, and the way they saw business as it should be conducted: quick decisions and few formalities. The profiles of Bud McDougald and Nelson Davis open the doors embarrassingly wide to the private persuasions of two of the country's wealthiest and most influential men.

The question is not really whether or not Canada is a class society controlled by a tightly-knit elite. That has been proved by Porter and confirmed by Clement. The question is simply, do we want it that way? Is it such a bad thing? If it is, what should we do about it?

Newman's book will help us sort out a lot of these questions, because he lets the cast of characters get under our skin. The world of privilege is not without honour, nor are the privileged without charity. On the other hand, the iniquities of privilege are legion. Let's ask what the privileged are doing for us, and what they're doing to us. To do that, let's bring them out in the open.

The book is already a success. For example, Ken Thomson heir to the Thomson newspaper fortune is undoubtedly starting to lose sleep, knowing it's now common knowledge he has "the most lavish office in Canada... occupying almost an entire floor and reached by a private elevator... housing eighty-three Krieghoffs as well as numerous Cullens, Gagnons, Emily Carrs and half a dozen showcases containing exquisite miniatures fashioned from ivory, boxwood, and Renaissance jewels." And if he is losing sleep, it's probably not such a bad thing.

Newman's latest gives us a rare peek at that strange specimen, the Canadian tycoon, in its natural habitat

Sorcery's big seller, but where does it lead?

Tales of Power
Carlos Castaneda
Simon and Schuster
$3.50 (paper)

Carlos Castaneda's new book is a powerful tale. The reader's main problem is a certain suspension of belief. Though willing to accept mysticism and sorcery in a work of fiction one hesitates to take it at face value when it is presented as gospel truth.

Tales of Power is a first person narrative. An apprentice in the mysteries of sorcery rids himself of the ties to the world of mortals and opens the door to the unknown. It follows three other Castaneda works on the same subject, but goes far beyond them, to give Don Juan's final statement. Some of the important lessons one has to learn are "Nothing of what is taking place is real. Things are real only after one has learned to agree on their realness." "At this very moment you are surrounded by eternity. You can use that eternity if you so desire." "You must push yourself beyond your limits all the time." "We all are born light and bouncy but we become earth-bound and fixed. We make ourselves that way."

In a number of ways the book is reminiscent of other works — works of fiction. Salinger's Teddy is preoccupied with similar problems — getting out of finite dimensions, seeing that everything is God, logic being the first thing you have to get rid of, the problems of spiritual advancement, meditation. But somehow this is easier to accept from a ten-year old genius in a work of fiction than in a deadly serious work of "anthropology". A part of the problem lies in the presentation. The reader is expected to be in open-mouthed wonder constantly, drinking in these enormous profundities. The word "profound" pops up repeatedly, so do "wonder", "bewilderment" and "perplexed". For we are being presented with concepts that are supposed to be novel, but are not.

Occasionally, seeming more like a slip than anything else, hallucinogenic drugs are mentioned. And that indeed could explain Carlos seeing mushroom-like shapes following him or the concept of splitting of his body into two, the one witnessing the actions of the other. There is also the constant fear of his two great teachers that he "may die like a little bug". Again, an overdose seems a likely explanation.

But even if this feeling of incredulity is overcome — this attempt to explain things logically, which is wrong, wrong, wrong, the question is, where does all this lead us? Why is the world so interested in mysticism, sorcery and meditation? In this case it certainly is not the presentation, yet it cannot be a hope for entering the world of sorcery. Though... It cannot be a realistic hope for entering the world of sorcery — only a blessed few are selected by the Powers that Be. It is like admiring Jonathan Livingston Seagull with a bit of heavier sophistry thrown in. A godless world searching, searching so hard. Sad.

Redlight Theatre struggles with political, artistic problems

They really should send a man to review productions of the Redlight Theatre. A man can see the show, write his review, say that the Queen of the Silver Blades is a second-rate production, and then go to bed at night with no pangs of conscience to disturb his sleep.

I can't do that though. Redlight Theatre is not only a theatrical experience for me, it is also a political act, and in this duality lies a problem.

Political theatre need not be boring. It can be intense and exciting — although, to be quite honest, I really cannot remember ever having seen exciting political theatre (except maybe some intriguing student productions that I have seen of Brecht). But Queen of the Silver Blades definitely is not good theatre. The acting is second rate. At the beginning of the play, the central character and creator Susan Swan, states that she is a poet and not an actress, and that she is not comfortable on the stage. Unfortunately for the play, she carries off this illusion (if illusion it is) only too well.

And the dancing and choreography, by Margaret Dragu is inspired only by brief flashes of excitement. The first entrance of the dancer-image of Barbara Ann Scott is brilliant, but the pace is not maintained and the dance descends all too quickly into mere posturing.

The play is the story of the skater, Barbara Ann Scott, Canada's sweetheart in the 1940's and 50's. More than that, this is a play about one poet's obsession with the idealized female that Barbara Ann represented during that time. It is the story of growing up female and feminine in a world of sweetness and light, in a world in which perfect toothpaste smiles and "wonderful" husbands were the only possible goals for a young girl.

The play does have its moments, however. The use of a red telephone as a combination telephone-shaver-vibrator in one sequence is truly inspired. The interview with Barbara Ann Scott in her Chicago home at the age of fifty is done with humour and understanding — understanding not only for the limited life she leads, but also for the sheer physical effort that a skater needs in addition to the ever-present toothpaste smile. This understanding that tempered the sarcasm was present throughout the play, and the play was definitely better for it. And it really is fun to see three men in the role of the usual female chorus — just good-looking bodies in nice costumes, with hardly any function at all. They didn't even get to speak.

The Redlight Theatre's productions have a very necessary place in the Toronto theatre scene. There are very limited opportunities for women in professional theatre. Most people are aware that the chance for a woman director is almost non-existent, but few people also realize that the chance for a serious actress is equally poor, especially for an actress who does not fit any of the extremely one-dimensional roles on our stages.

Unfortunately, the Redlight Theatre preaches to an already converted audience. Of the admittedly small audience who watched the play on a recent rainy Sunday night, most were women, and I don't think that any of the ideas in the play came as a particular insight to anyone in the audience that night.

I'm not going to get much sleep after writing this review. I feel as if I should have written another review — a review bursting with the sort of enthusiasm and praise that makes a director or an actress re-believe in her dreams of the goodness and sanity in the hearts of hearts of every theatre reviewer. I can't write that review though, not yet. I hope some day that I will be able to write it about a Redlight Theatre production. Maybe I will have to wait until I am eighty to do it, but it will be worth every minute when it happens!

PLS is a breath of life from antiquity

The Poculi Ludique Societas, or the Playing and Toasting Association, developed about ten years ago from a seminar in medieval literature given by Professor John Leyrer. From its obscure beginnings it has retained its obscurity — save to those who are fascinated by entertainments, masques, and farces. This season, the PLS is making a move away from a selective audience and is aiming to catch a wider segment of the University community than before.

The first production of the year, a play from the hand of John Heywood, (The Pardoner, the Friar, the Parson and Neighbour Prat) has been yoked together with 7th century Indian play, The Farce of the Drunken Monk.

Later on this year, the PLS will present Arden of Feversham, the great-uncle of later revenge tragedies, and Jim Miller, who successfully took on Comus last year is presenting Lydgate's Dance of Death.

The PLS is composed of real, breathing people, and if you like acting and antiquity, you will be most welcome at the Annual General Meeting. Call David or Caroline at 928-5086 for details.

Henninger. A different tasting beer.

Henninger tastes different from Canadian beers because it's made from different ingredients and in a different way. Only two row barley is used. Yeast is especially flown in from Frankfurt. It's doubly fermented. It is allowed to carbonate naturally. It tastes like a German beer because it is.

Henninger. Das Schmeckt.

Meister Pils. Different again.

Meister Pils is a true light tasting German pilsener brewed from the same ingredients and in the same way as it is in Henninger's Frankfurt brewery. Now you can enjoy the light distinctive taste that has made pilsener the most celebrated of all the world's beers.

Both Henninger and Meister Pils are made in Henninger's own independent brewery and are available at your brewers retail outlet for just a few cents more than regular beer.

Two German beers in fat little bottles.

Country nobody Friedman is sleeper among big names

The El Mocambo ads for last month were particularly impressive, as one couldn't help but notice a good selection of big name talent. Within a period of two weeks were Canada's own Lighthouse, Dr. John the Night Tripper, and a McKenna Mendelsohn Mainline reunion. But then there was a gap. Playing over the Halloween weekend was a country nobody — Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys.

But Kinky and the boys turned out to be the sleeper at the El Mocambo. Kinky is not your average country musician. He regularly gets thrown out of Nashville along with such other outrageous artists as Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson. Perhaps getting thrown out of Nashville is to Kinky's credit. He represents a refreshing artistic force in stagnant Nashville.

Kinky performed two amazing sets last week at the El Mocambo. He started solo, accompanying himself on the guitar. After a few songs his backup band, the "Texas Jewboys", appeared. They added bass guitar, violin, saxophone flute, maracas, drums, backup vocals and tambourine to add even greater diversity to Kinky's solo versatility.

The whole band was energetic and tight; they produced some great sounds until the quarts of beer dulled the reviewer's senses to a state of nescience. Before drinking myself into oblivion I did hear three songs of particular note. "Homo Erectus" was a delightful song about an anthropology student falling in love with his "lady professor".

Another fast moving tune which the audience loved was "Asshole from El Paso", the place where all the virgins are deflowered, a parody of Merle Haggard's red neck hit "Okie from Muskogee".

After the raucous "Asshole from El Paso" he performed a tender version of "Wild Man From Borneo", a song which proves that Nashville is capable of producing better country folk music than John Denver.

Kinky Friedman has performed on three albums. One is deleted, another is not released but is expected this month, and the other is called simply "Kinky Friedman". The current album has "Homo Erectus" and "Wild Man From Borneo". One of the best cuts is "They Ain't Makin' Jews like Jesus Anymore", a tirade against racism featuring such quotable insights as "We believe it was Santa Claus that killed Jesus Christ", and "Aristotle Onassis is one Greek we don't need".

The unreleased album will contain "Asshole from El Paso", and is one I'll be looking forward to.

If you like middle of the road country music you'll like John Denver's Rocky Mountain Christmas, but if you're looking for more originality, try Kinky Friedman.

Who is the asshole from El Paso, anyway?

Georgie Fame is in perfect control

Georgie Fame
Island

The word for this record is class. Georgie Fame can't be much more than 32 or 33, but he already has fifteen years experience as a singer behind him. It shows.

Fame started out in the early '60's when he led back-up bands for touring American rock 'n' roll stars of the day, like Gene Vincent and Eddie Cochran. He quickly formed his own Blue Flames, a rhythm-and-blues outfit with jazz overtones, which, despite the fact that its emphasis on keyboards and horns flew in the face of popular tastes at the time, was very well received.

(The most famous Blue Flame from this period was John McLaughlin.) In 1966, Georgie broke up the Blue Flames, and set out to conquer what, for want of a better word, is called cabaret. This led him to a stint singing with Count Basie, and a partnership with another singer and piano-player who had followed a similar route to his own, Alan Price.

And so to the present. On the new album Fame's singing is as fresh as ever, the playing (Fame on piano with the reconstituted Blue Flames) and the arrangements are solid and reveal a happy combination of craft and a considerable imagination. The songs, five by Fame in collaboration, with four others, are impeccable. In other words, I like it.

Two Fame originals, "Ozone" and "Leaving the City Behind", are worth the price of admission alone.

The two cuts are complementary, and deal with the closest thing the album has to a theme, the notion of getting back to the country. "Ozone" is a modified slow blues, sounding a bit like the best of Fred Neil, graced with clever lyrics — "The girls in the city they're wicked and witty they're certainly pretty a pity they don't phone". (The lyrics are of a high standard throughout.)

"Leaving the City Behind" is more uptempo, more jazzy, with a chorus of almost unearthly beauty — Fame and female back-up singers.

The material by other hands is well-chosen, and includes a fine rendition of J.J. Cale's "Everlong Woman", Marc Benno's "Donut Man", and Gallagher and Lyle's "Country Morning". The only mistake may have been the attempt to do a reggae number, the Slickers' "Johnny Too Bad". (The original was on the soundtrack to The Harder They Come.) Georgie almost pulls it off, which is more than most anyone else could.

If you want the excitement of hearing someone in perfect control of his art, this is definitely worth checking out. As the Beatles said in 1965, when Georgie Fame's "Yeh Yeh" pushed one of their songs from the top of the British charts, "Congratulations Georgie lad. Your mother should be proud of yer."

Nothing new on Caress of Steel

Rush
Caress of Steel
Mercury-Polydor

Rush is Geddy Lee on bass, Alex Lifeson on an assortment of guitars and Neil Peart on drums. Everything you need for a rock 'n' roll band is present here, and it all comes together. On the heels of the Fly By Night LP comes Caress of Steel.

This album consists of a number of things we think we have heard before, plus a few we haven't. The elements of the unfamiliar are rare on this album, and this reviewer generally gets the impression of a group which has not progressed, at least not in their last three releases. There are no surprises on this album. This does not necessarily mean that there should be. Rush has a tight, lively sound and is the type of band which Canada can be very proud of. Their recent Massey Hall appearance in June confirmed this.

Caress of Steel however serves only to demonstrate the dominant influence of Led Zeppelin on their music. If imitation is the highest form of flattery Led Zeppelin ought to be very flattered by Geddy Lee's singing. Of course, this may just be a matter of style, and in fact Canada may need its own answer to the American "acid-rock" style of the sixties. What this comes down to is a matter of personal preference. Should a band progress? Or should it keep playing rock 'n' roll as long as the crowds are satisfied?

The major question which must be answered by the individual is "Do I wish to listen to this album?" The purpose of this review ought to be to answer that question. But it seems apparent that having stated that a band with which everyone is familiar has not changed its style, the fact that the album is now available ought to provide everything one needs to make this decision. Considerations of this nature ought to be more factual, as one is not genuinely concerned as to what a particular listener thought were the merits or demerits of a musical work. However . . .

Personally, I think the album is the musical lowlight of the autumn of '75. Rush is a great band, and these comments can't hurt them, but second thoughts are required before giving your local merchant the $6.29 asked for this collection of sounds. "Heavy rock" is now becoming so far removed from the mainstream of popular music that one wonders at its prospects for survival. This is the year of the slick production job, not the year of observing who can make the most noise. A collection of songs do not a great album make. It can only be hoped that the type of people who like this music will prove all these projections wrong, if only for the sake of Canadian music. (Or maybe I'm just getting old. . .)

Sha Na Na: can you feel nostalgic about something you never knew?

Sha Na Na in full swing challenge audience to meet them outside after the show

If 20,000 fans packed into a cavernous gym are any indication of success, then Rock and Roll is here to stay, at least for Sha Na Na.

"It's a very energetic show," said Bowser, the lead bass singer in an interview. "We're a comedy act as much as anything else, I guess."

For an hour and a half the ten-man group pounded out the most amusing and accurate versions of popular tunes from the golden age of rock 'n' roll since the originals.

Not only was the singing good, but the theatrics were timeless choreographed. With less than a minute between songs, the ten singers wriggled in and out of costumes too numerous to count and leapt about the stage, always escaping from the tangle of wires and cords strung about the stage.

"It's like being an athlete. It keeps you in good shape," said Bowser.

Asked about the preparation necessary for such a performance, he replied "I try to make myself as tough as possible. I try to think of things to get me riled, and make me feel nasty, and then I try and take that out on the stage."

Take it out he did. Challenging hecklers to fight throughout the performance, he strutted about alternately flexing skinny arms and swinging a bicycle chain.

"Being nasty is my life. Everyone must have something to dedicate himself to, so that's my thing."

All the performers, however, combined skill with character. Rotating the singing and acting at every song, the group covered the Everly Brothers, the Beatles, Elvis Presley (Elvis the Pelvis — and what a pelvis! Bill Haley and the Comets, Frankie Lyman and the Teenagers, the Beach Boys, Chuck Berry, and Buddy Holly.

The amazing thing, however was not so much their versatility, but the high quality with which they reproduced the golden Oldies. Denying that the performers who originated the tunes had any impact on their style, Bowser said "As a group there's nobody for us to imitate. We're a completely unique conglomeration of talent."

It is true that they are like no other group. Rather, they are a combination of the idiosyncrasies, attitudes and talent of an era now relegated to the K-tel Hall of Fame.

Combining the sleeveless t-shirts, leather jackets, and greasy hair dripping with Brylcreem, they conjured up an image of the fifties that few of the audience experienced, but one that everyone could relate to. It was nostalgia for something one never experienced, if such a thing is possible.

"Doubt very much that an 18-year old kid can feel nostalgic about something he never did," Bowser maintained. "It's just a style that they enjoy."

They did play about ten minutes worth of recent material — particularly selections from the Rolling Stones, complete with a mock Mick Jagger. But there wasn't the humour and originality that was so entertaining in the oldies. The new material was out-of-place and the audience fell it.

Bowser maintained that the change was necessary to a certain degree, but he agreed with the audience, whose reaction he did not anticipate, but had sensed from past performances. "Who is interested?" he said. "You can't put on a good show with new material. New material is not as exciting as fifties material." He said the decision to include it as a major part of the show in the future would have to be made "over my dead body."

"Personally, I think it was a mistake," he said. "There's the underlayer of what is a performer like Elton John doing in a Sha Na Na show?"

However, Bowser thought that the music was not really the big attraction for the majority of audiences.

"Kids like the music, I guess, but they come for the show instead of the music. We've never drawn a great many people who were in that time. I don't think we'd draw files if we just stood there and played the music."

The audience did seem to respond to the music, however. Rock around the Clock, for instance drew scattered applause, and by the end of the song several couples were dancing in the available space. Why Do Fools Fall In Love, another song from the period drew a roar from the crowd, as did Monster Mash. The greatest response, however, was reserved for Rock and Roll Is Here To Stay, a fitting tribute to the group. It was performed with a minimum of action and still evoked the greatest response. Most of the people seemed to recognize the songs and many sang along.

For many of the songs, Sha Na Na relied upon gimmickry to emphasize the parody that was always present in the show. The stage itself was dominated by a 30-foot high inflated plastic jukebox. I would never have known it was supposed to be one were it not for an information sheet distributed by the Buddah Group, their record company, that informed me it was "created by the well-known set designer Gene McAvoy, who is best known for his work... which includes The Smothers Brothers, Sonny & Cher... and the upcoming Myr Tyler Moore Special." Otherwise it looked for all the world like half a Massey-Ferguson tractor tire.

As well, Bowser led the traditional dance contest, in which three of the performers left the stage to search in the audience for dance partners. Returning with partners from the ages of 18 to 30 ("I hope you can make it through the dance") they jived for several minutes while the crowd cheered them on. Finally, the audience was called upon to judge the couples. They were cautioned to "judge wisely, lest ye yourselves be judged." Couple number two took it away, and for their efforts were showered with fabulous prizes including balloons, a pair of tinsel crowns, and "the very brave girl" was awarded the privilege of a dance with the group's overweight saxophone player ("he was the biggest prize we could find" explained Bowser).

Many of their acts were characterized by acrobatics that alternately stunned and amused the fans. The Monster Mash, for instance, boasted the band's successful parody of Frankenstein, complete with drool and swollen head. Elvis appeared in brilliant white to write his way through a number. Chuck Berry leapt on stage to fondle his guitar while working his way from a standing position to a partial recline. Most of the theatrics Bowser explained were only developed in the last month during rehearsals for this tour. "You have to change your show periodically because people have seen it too much." By the look and sound of things, the audience couldn't have gotten enough no matter how many times they saw it.

I asked Bowser who he thought it appealed to. He replied "It appeals mainly to nasty tough, rednecks. Actually, if you look at any random audience, you'll get a certain number of guys who come in leather jackets, and they like swinging chains around, and you'll get a few frizzy-haired kids, and then you'll get just normal average people who like to be entertained."

The group started six years ago in New York, but the members, Bowser said, come "from far corners of the earth — Brooklyn, the Bronx, Staten Island, as far away as New Jersey." Perhaps this is the key to their almost world-wide appeal. Originally they were mostly university students. "It's been rumoured that we were university students" he explained. "We were paying tuition, if that's what you mean."

Many of the members had little experience in rock 'n' roll. "I never played it too much before, or sung it, because I really sing and act tough" he said.

Second Language Monitors

Interprovincial Program

A minimum of 400 university level students will be selected throughout Canada to become second-language monitors during the school year beginning in September 1976. This interprovincial program was established by the Ministry of Education of Ontario in conjunction with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada and is financed by the Department of the Secretary of State.

- Participation in the program comprises two aspects:
- part-time work as a second-language monitor
 - full-time studies in another province.

Those candidates selected will receive at least $3,000 for nine months of participation in the program and will be reimbursed for travel expenses, to a maximum of $300 for one round trip between the province of residence and the host province.

Confused nihilists and cynics, this one is for you!

Sex-on-a-winch between a bed-ridden pervert, his semi-cataleptic mother and the "picaresque" heroine Isobel is the closest to "funny" that Peaches and Poisoned Cream, written and directed by Jackie Crossland, ever gets. The audience laughed, sometimes. But was it because of witty dialogue and action or the absurdity of the whole play? Well, if Peaches and Poisoned Cream isn't comedy in the funny sense, perhaps it had some redeeming social ribs or sharp satiric comment that could class it as a traditional Greek comedy. Possibly, through the confusion of abstract images, trite phrases, and hackneyed avant-garde form, there was the hint of a philosophically unifying cynicism. But this hardly makes it worth reviewing. Now if it had some pretension to artistic merit, its backward and cynical ideas could be considered socially dangerous. But the confusion is so complete that even confirmed cynics or nihilists would doubtfully recognize a sister in Crossland.

It is useful to be more precise about the area of confusion because the movement of the action is easy enough to describe. In a semi-medieval world, ruled by a faceless queen (then revealed to be wearing a death mask — an unbelievably immature ending), people are starving due to a scarcity of peaches. The only peach orchard is controlled by the queen who occasionally allows a few to get into circulation through a market merchant named A. Eurasian. Eurasian also sells people as well as goods. Into this setting drops the "innocent" Isobel. She starts her adventures, in the "real" world, by murdering her father for a gold ring and ends them by unwittingly killing Valery Flair for the queen. Of course, some attempt at a revolutionary response to these harsh conditions which face the lower orders is necessary. So we are given Valery Flair (should be read Vanity Fair?). She is the frigid people's leader who will rescue the masses and become the new queen by being an example of cleanliness. Her horny cohort, Cote de Boeuf, not being satisfied with the spiritual enjoyment of Valery's quest, eventually turns to Isobel for more secular satisfaction. To this add one proletarian, symbolic of the sleeping (although the impression is really of dead) masses who never do much of anything but complain, and the short interlude of sexual play mentioned above and that is the play. The confusion, then, must lie in the relationship, or lack of it, between the action and the ideas. Or perhaps just in the ideas themselves.

The potential was there for sharp political comment on serious social problems such as economic inequity, backward moral concepts, sexuality, or the questions of life and death. An attempt to deal with these issues does not have to be restricted to realism. Since Aristophanes, fantasy has been used effectively as a device for presenting social drama. But to tackle fantasy there must be a clear point of view and a realistic grasp of current social contradictions. When this is missing, what results is a stab at trying to get laughs out of vulgar situations. In Peaches and Poisoned Cream, this includes the queen murdering all her lovers so they won't tell the people what she looks like. Or simplistic attempts to expose the lack of logic in Valery Flair's "logical" framework for winning the masses to her ideas.

The philosophy of this play is best summed up in lines from two songs: "Alone, Alone, We're always left alone", and "The more things change, The more they stay the same". Cynicism par excellence and a sad, empty view of life. And not one that means much to an audience that is interested in understanding more about themselves and the world around them. It is a personal view that Crossland has a right to hold. But for a playwright to move beyond mediocrity and shallowness, he or she cannot subject theatre to ego exercise or psycho-therapeutic dream analysis.

An audience was not really required for this piece of self-expression — only actors who were willing, for whatever reason, and a director, which is no difficulty when the writer acts as the director. For theatre to advance as an art, not only must the mutually dependent relationship between actor or writer and audience be recognized, but it must be respected. What attractions are there for an audience in having cast and writer impose a defeatist perspective combined with sloppy, grating music, cliched dialogue and infantile pseudo-dramatics all under the guise of fantasy and ribaldry?

It wasn't an altogether useless production; the substantial talents of costume designer Lynn Kizlin guaranteed that. But unfortunately, the rags in which the cast was clad provided the only example of a successful synthesis of the medieval, fantastic, and cynical elements in the play.

Their senses numbed by unrelenting meaninglessness, players wait for someone to come up with a punchline.

Devil's Disciple is a bad play redeemed by an excellent production

What is there to be said about a Shaw play? That it is witty, opinionated — and emotionally threadbare? At the Royal Alexandra a week ago Tuesday evening, the Shaw Festival touring production of The Devil's Disciple delivered a thoroughly professional rendition of Shaw's vision of the germ of America. Despite the brilliance of the company and the competence of the production generally, the sentiment was undisguisable. It was bogus.

Shaw's contrived comedy is a newer version of The Tale of Two Cities, as a near-do-well smuggler rises above himself and accepts the fate of the presumed rebel. Rev. Anthony Anderson. Ordered hanged by the incompetent British commander, he finds his life — or rather his death — interfered with by the minister, who has found his manhood, and by the minister's wife, who thinks she now loves the man who has so gallantly saved her husband. After unimpressive cameo appearances by lovable relatives and assorted British soldiers, Shaw goes through the motions of the happy ending.

The real substance of the work is Shaw's trenchant observations on life in pious households and in impious souls. But the first half is played as a vehicle for Richard Dudgeon (played bluntly by Paul Hecht) to abuse the rest of his family, who have skillfully portrayed themselves as reptilian specimens. In the second portion of the play, the pace quickens solely through the sterling performance of Paxton Whitehead as 'Gentleman Johnny' Burgoyne, a morbid and quick-witted aristocrat with a sepulchral manner and a fine sense of propriety. Despite the high recommendation that I give to the play, it is nevertheless true that the acting fleshes out parts Shaw wrote, and only rarely do the cast create their own versions of the characters. The sole exceptions are Heath Lamberts, playing Richard's snivelling brother Christopher, and, surprisingly for the amount of stage time he had, Patrick Boxill living out Lawyer Hawkins.

This is about to become the year of the American bicentennial, and all the clever theatre companies have already cashed in on the market, perhaps on the vague assumption that the Empire may not last its full two centuries. This production has just returned to Canada from the U.S. of A., and it is welcome back. 'All told, the production is an evening of meaty entertainment, solidly directed and superbly mounted. Its weaknesses are inherent in the play itself.

John Wilson

Engaging comedy follows a pulp-writer's progress

One of the more engaging aspects of the new comedy Hearts of the West (at the Uptown 3) is the appearance of Blythe Danner as Trout, the production assistant cum script girl for Tumbleweed Productions, the less than low-budget movie studio which provides the film's primary setting. In the past, Miss Danner was chiefly associated with the New York stage; a couple of her vehicles were transferred to television and provided a glimpse of her talent which was sufficiently tantalizing and promising. As Amanda in the situation comedy Adam's Rib, she was always appealing, and appeared to be meant for something better than television, so that again one was tempted to wonder what she might do in films.

Now, however, we have Hearts of the West, and with it a role which has allowed Blythe Danner to come into her own. With her hair bobbed and curled, and that curiously raspy quality to her voice accentuated by the fact that we never see her without that emancipating cigarette in her hand, Blythe Danner makes of Trout a heroine who is attractive because she is unconventional. Dressed for the most part in pants, she strides across the screen much as the young Katharine Hepburn did, and straddles chairs with her legs crossed in what, for 1929, must have been quite un ladylike positions. There is never any doubt that Trout is in fact the 'heroine', and yet it is the very eccentricities and ambiguities of her character which ultimately constitute her attractiveness. She is, after all, the only female member of an otherwise totally male troupe, and while it appears that she has at least partially been assimilated by the troupe, there is never any doubt that she retains a special position on its periphery. When Lewis, the film's hero, asks one of the stuntmen what he thinks of Trout, the rather playful reply is that she might well be sexually deviant since Kessler, the studio's resident director, has been pursuing her for quite some time with apparently little or no success.

It is precisely this sort of playfulness which characterizes the film as a whole. Rob Thompson's script — a first effort which is amazingly accomplished and very, very funny — attempts to examine that often ludicrous world where fact begins to resemble fiction. The story concerns itself with the adventures of Lewis Tater, an aspiring young writer of Western pulp who sets off in the direction in which his pen predictably points, and eventually finds himself in Tumbleweed's backlot, where the absurdity of his prose is only exceeded by the absurdity of the events which take place around him. The fact-or-fiction question, with which Thompson finds himself toying, is nicely crystallized in one short scene which takes place on a WWI set just recently deserted for the day. Lewis and Trout are walking down the street, stepping over several 'dead' dummies as they go — dummies attired in German uniforms. They stop to lean against a parked car, and Lewis, in order to punctuate what he had just been saying, strikes the dummy at his side, which suddenly and unneringly comes to life, justifiably bewildered at having his siesta interrupted.

In a film which is necessarily so dependent upon archetypes, it is to the credit of the director, Howard Zieff, that anything remotely resembling caricature has largely been avoided. Of course, with Jeff Bridges playing Lewis, Zieff's task must have been considerably lightened: given the number of literary revolves (and inversions of literary resolves) which the film contains, Zieff needed an actor who would be particularly-sensitive to the fine line separating archetype and caricature. Bridges is not only a sensitive actor — he also sets out to portray Lewis Tater with a rare conviction which both reassures and charms his audience every step of the way. Many scenes, which might easily have lapsed into silliness, are instead afforded a necessary note of authenticity as we suddenly glimpse that genuine and uncomplicated look of ingenuousness, which habitually crosses Lewis Tater's face.

Dutch soprano deserved top billing

The "Festival Series", Toronto Arts Productions' endeavour to bring the city international-class chamber performers, lengthened a long string of successful concerts with Monday's all-Bach installment at the St. Lawrence Centre. The programme was mistakenly headlined The National Arts Centre Orchestra over the distinguished and extensively recorded Dutch soprano Ely Ameling, whose performances of two solo cantatas were certainly what the concert will be most remembered for.

In describing Ameling's artistry, one discards singing-exam commonplaces like "excellent control" and "true pitch". In "Mein Herz schwimmt in Blut", a setting of a grieved sinner's quest for salvation, she secured with the audience something that is probably associated to all first-rate Bach singing: a perfect communication that incorporates the intimacy of lieder and the theatricalism of opera. Never sentimental or whining, it is a preaching that doesn't bore.

The evening's other cantata, the secular "Non sa che sia dolore", is the more extroverted and perhaps more immediately appealing of the two, being in tone and style not unlike the Brandenburg Concertos. Ameling was aware that a convinced, serene delivery wouldn't do for this number, and accordingly concentrated on well-shaped phrases and full vowel sounds (for the production of which, any Italian will tell you, German is a much inferior language).

Maestro Bernardi decided to fill the imagined gap between this concerto's two fast movements with one of the three or four Bach slow movements in E minor currently considered suited to the purpose. The Lento from Trio Sonata No. 6 was first grafted on by Yehudi Menuhin in the late '30's, and is fine enough music in its own right. But in the concerto it sounds too much like its programme designation, "Interpolation".

The Brandenburg No. 3 is an affair for nine strings and continuo — unmistakably a chamber work. The fuller setting of the Suite No. 3 in D, and, I suspect, Mario Bernardi's presence on the podium, brought back the characteristic clear sound of this integer of an orchestra. The trumpets were too loud and cutting in the overture, but otherwise the playing was both brisk and refined. The Suite's most famous movement, the Air, was justly given the most controlled and contoured performance.

FORBIDDEN GAMES

FORBIDDEN GAMES is perhaps the greatest anti-war film since LA GRANDE ILLUSION, yet it does not deal with actual warfare. Bream dazzles Toronto once again

Julian Bream, lutenist and guitarist again dazzled Toronto last Thursday night at Massey Hall. The first half of his programme consisted of music for the lute, the second, music written primarily for guitar. Bream is a virtuoso of both instruments, although more at home with the classical guitar. However, I preferred the lute programme more because of the precision and transparency of structure which Bream revealed.

He's really a most engaging character, exchanging jokes with the audience and talking about some of the pieces. This he did before his performance of Fantasia: Forlorn Hope by the composer for lute par excellence, John Dowland (1563-1626). He said that the melancholy of the piece was symbolized by seven descending chromatic notes (similar chromatic devices were common in Dowland's time). According to Bream, the piece is perhaps the most difficult in the lute repertoire because of the complicated part-writing and I must admit that I found his performance a little muffled and laboured. The rest of the lute portion included Old German Airs and Dances by Hans Neusluder, Prelude, Fantasia and Galliard by Laurencini (c. 1580). In the second Ricercare of Milano, there were a few fuzzy notes and I found the rhythm of the Laurencini Prelude a little obscure but that's being really picky. Bream was inspired.

The second half of the programme, the guitar half, began with what I thought was an inadequate interpretation of J.S. Bach's Chaconne from the Partita in D Minor for unaccompanied violin. Bream's interpretation was patchy with too many abrupt tonal changes. However, he effectively made amends (for me!) with a flashy and boisterous piece by Giuliani, Le Rossiniere, Op. 119 after which the audience gave him an enthusiastic ovation. Following this were two works by Manuel de Falla, Homenaje pour le tombeau de Debussy and Danse du Meunier (Tricorne) which were played with great sensitivity to dynamic and expressive contrasts. We were rewarded with Chorus Typico by Villa-Lobos as an encore where Bream's precision and concise phrasing were a delight. An altogether uplifting evening.

Jane McKinney

Bream's no angel, but he sure knows how to pluck the strings

Beaux Arts Trio is polished, unified

The Beaux Arts Trio is arguably the best piano trio anywhere. That in itself is no great claim, since there are not many permanent trios around, despite the rich repertoire. But the Beaux Arts is alone in bearing comparison with the famous quartet ensembles, having over twenty years built up a marvellous rapport in performance and a deep understanding of the works they perform, of structure and style. Extensive rehearsal paradoxically allows a certain spontaneity of interpretation and an opportunity to improvise in recital, for each player knows how the others will react. Again, their unified personality makes them extra-sensitive to the audience, and to the acoustics of the hall (though there was not much they could do about the Eaton Auditorium!). Always at a Beaux Arts performance we are aware of its being an 'occasion'.

On Monday night their qualities were at once evident in Mozart's relatively often heard B flat major Trio, K502. The playing was a marvel of clean attack, transparent textures, an unflinching sense of line and phrasing, flawless intonation. The Larghetto second movement was sublime, Isidore Cohen's violin tone particularly impressive. In piano trios the piano tends to swamp the other instruments, more specially in music like Mozart's, written for the less resonant, dynamically restricted Hammerklavier. It was a virtue of Menahem Pressler's playing that it not only overcame the problems of balance to blend as an equal, but also succeeded in showing up the concerto-like touches in the piece.

A revealing performance, then, though for me the high point of the evening came with Schubert's D minor Trio, written in 1826. Here we could experience in the lyricism and rhythmic vitality of the music a natural give and take between friends, a freedom of rubato that assumes an unthinking, because deeply thought, unanimity. Even in the long finale, whose jauntness somewhat outwelcomes its stay, the players discovered new variety.

The last work was the slightest — Mendelssohn at his more 'casual' — Schumann might have said — his Trio in D minor. The players took full advantage of the brilliance of Mendelssohn's writing, particularly for piano (he wrote the part for himself), but managed to avoid making it sound vapid, as it is liable to. Their romantic approach certainly dusted off much of the piece's familiarity, even if it could do little to hide the religiosity of feeling and of harmony that appears in the second and fourth movements. As an encore we had the fourth dumka from Dvorak's 'Dumky' Trio. And from the start of the movement it seemed made to show off the players' individuality, as well as their ability to hold together contrasts of feeling.

Note: the recital was one of CBC's Autumnus (ouch) series; good value at $1 per ticket. Next offering is Mari-Elizabeth Morgan, piano, Nov. 20; call 925-3311, ext. 4835.

Richard Wagner plays the villain in this rooftop-Teufon fantasy.

I understood every minute of Lisztomania—someone should tell the ushers at the Uptown, by the way, that our boy wasn't called Franz Litz, but then "Litzomania" does have a nice ring to it, and it doesn't matter much with this movie—and I didn't like it one bit.

Ken Russell, though hardly an infant any more, unless he's pleading arrested development, or rebirth, certainly has pretensions to being terrible. You remember him as the man who asked questions about Tchaikovsky that no-one had dared to ask (What's the similarity between Pyotr Lyuch and a baked bean?), who pulled the rug out from under Visconti in Mahler, who gave us Tommy (the movie)—is there really an adman somewhere who thinks that movie audiences today still have virgin senses?

And now Russell reaches back into the past at another composer (two, actually: there's a lot of Wagner too) and clutches in his hot little fist—not the music, there isn't any by Liszt in the movie—no, really, it's all Rick Wakeman ("With the assistance of Franz Liszt and Richard Wagner")—hardly the composer's life—but a little cluster of myths, a bunch of threads that are still attached to quite delicate parts of people, and so are great fun to tweak.

Let's have some of those threads. One of Liszt's mistresses, a Russian princess, leaves the room declaiming "Art is so much greater than politics!" Liszt, having recovered his creative powers after a fantasy sequence I won't even try to describe, works away in a spotless white room, manuscripts piled to the ceiling all along one wall, while outside revolution rages across Europe, women and children are blown to fritters, and so forth. Now Franz is not entirely without a conscience. He goes to the window of his tower, which is carved, we observe, from some high-class ivory-like substance, and sings.

War is waste
And waste is guilt
War is waste
And waste is guilt
Guilt is mine
For watching while My countrymen
Are dying . . .

Wagner enters, asks for help, slips something in Liszt's wine. Liszt faints. A solar eclipse occurs. Wagner, muttering something about how his music will help create a man of steel who will lead the German people back to greatness, grows fangs, bites Liszt in the neck, and, sucking his blood, leans over his slumped body to improvise at the piano. This symbolizes plagiarism. Later, Wagner has married Liszt's daughter Cosima and become quite a success, and Franz has become a Franciscan. Pope Ring sends him to exorcise Antichrist, i.e. Wagner. He arrives in a little Eastern European town at sunset. Whenever he asks one of the black-bearded, hook-nosed, hombraged locals the way to Wagner's Castle, the local fiends in terror: At last he finds it, seals the wall, and looks in through a casement at a strange ritual. Half a dozen blonde maidens pray to a giant stone phallus with a great glowing jewel on top, while a chorus of blonde children, bearing candles and wearing Superman suits, chants. Suddenly an unpleasant character with a six-pointed star on his forehead murders all the maidens and steals the jewel. The children cower in terror. They are soothed when Wagner and Cosima appear, also in Superman suits, and Wagner sings of the coming of the man of steel. Everyone makes the sign of the swastika.

Lisztomania: art and history have no more meaning

When the ceremony is over and Wagner is relaxing, Liszt enters and tries to exorcise him. Holy water in his Bloody Mary doesn't work, but wielding a blazing piano, Liszt soon reduces the place to rubble. But Wagner rises from the grave, as a Frankenstein-Hitler monster who staggers stiffly through the town, and eventually across most of the globe, cutting down those who weren't quick enough in taking down the combined Stars of David-pawshop signs from in front of their homes, with a combined electric guitar-submachine gun.

The world isn't really ready yet for this kind of holocaust humour. Russell knows this, and exploits it: with a little bit of luck, heartlessness can be passed off as epater-les-bourgeois naughtiness. This putative naughtiness is about all the movie has to offer: once you get over how offensive the jokes are, you realize that they're not very funny. Wagner in a little boy sailor suit with "Nietzsche" on the hatband is maybe a little cute, but Wagner in a Superman suit I saw in Mad Magazine ten years ago. Of course, Mad was better then.

It's not liberating or enlightening, either. Russell calls up all the old lies, half-truths and myths for the emotional effect they will have on us, but to correct or explode them. Visually the movie is relentlessly ugly. By way of satire, Russell fills every set with the utmost in opulent bad taste. (It's not clear, though, whose taste is being satirized: the decor is neither modern nor nineteenth-century, but a hybrid sprung from Russell's imagination, with at least one giant sculpted phallus in every room, and several in most.)

Presumably the seminal idea for this enterprise was a supposed analogy between Liszt, a virtuoso who gave concert tours, wowed his audiences with music and histrionics, and had considerable success with women, and a modern rock star: the scenes which develop this analogy illustrate the movie's central vice as well as any. The young ladies who go crazy when their ideal hits the stage in his Liberace frock-coat, mob him, and scream for his hit, "Chopsticks", are just going through the motions: clearly, they've never enjoyed romantic music, they don't even look as if they'd ever been to a rock concert; they're just a bunch of starlets in granny dresses. The smug smirk that Daltrey throws at them aren't even worthy of Mick Jagger, let alone Liszt, his swoony ecstasies are roughly on the Rod McKuen level, and we see his hands on the keyboards a little too often, considering how bad a job he's doing of miming along with the music.

Russell can play with history and art the way he does because they no longer mean anything to him.

And I shall never ever forgive him for what he did to poor Chopin.

The "Citizens' Coalition", a group of corporate executives and miscellaneous right-wingers masquerading as the "silent majority", are at it again.

In daily ad costing them tens of thousands of dollars annually, they're pursuing their favourite pastime of denouncing "creeping socialism", unions generally, and of course postal workers in particular.

The Post Office is their special bugaboo. They complain about the quality and cost of the postal service.

And all because they're so public-spirited. They want us to get better mail service.

Because that is important for all citizens.

Especially corporate citizens. Because 90% of all mail is business mail. And the proportion keeps on rising.

Why? Because the government, the same government that's guilty of installing all this "creeping socialism", has set mail rates so that "to the householder" mail is just about the cheapest form of advertising there is. The rest of us subsidize it through taxes and through higher rates for our personal mail.

That's why the quality of the postal service has gone down: because the amount of mail — business mail — keeps on increasing at an enormous rate. The Post Office just can't cope with it.

Naturally it costs more to handle the ever-increasing amounts of junk mail and all the other business mail.

So the government tries to cut down on costs by fighting the postal workers' demands for better pay and better working conditions.

After all, they can't raise the rates on business mail.

The corporations backing the "Citizens' Coalition" don't want to pay more for their direct advertising. So they want the government to be tough with the postal workers. Besides, if you outlaw strikes in one sector, maybe the idea will catch on . . .

Lucky thing for us that we have the "Citizens' Coalition". If we didn't, who would fight for our right to get a junk mail fester? Not to mention our bills . . . ?

Perth County Conspiracy will be performing at Massey Hall on November 14th in a benefit concert for Heritage Stratford. Stage lighting will be by Gentle Electric, Perth County's unique lighting system. Paul Simon is at Massey Hall on the 16th, Gino Vanelli is there on the 18th, Isaac Hayes is at the Gardens Concert Bowl on the 19th, and Roxy Music is at Massey Hall on the 20th.

The pace than slackens as Janis Ian plays at Massey Hall on the 24th of November, which is all that is definite for the rest of the month. December so far: Edgar Winter at the Gardens on the 10th and the Who on the 11th.

The only other news this week is that the Allman Brothers concert has been cancelled. Greg Allman ran off with Sony Bono.

In the clubs, Mighty Pope is at the Colonial, Mainline is at the El Mocambo, and James Darren is at the Beverly Hills. (Who can eat and listen to James Darren at the same time?)

Two evening performances and a matinee left at the Royal Alex for Ayckbourn's Relatively Speaking.

My apologies to Theatre Micklites, for their production of Plinter's Old Times does not open until tonight. Until Sunday, each night at 8.30; tickets $1.50 and reservations are a wise idea; call 923-8893. Upper Brennan Hall, Theatre Passe Muraille is now at 736 Bathurst Street for their newest production, Titus Andronicus. Wednesday to Sunday evenings at 8.30; $3 or $4. Bravelly, Theatre Second Floor, 86 Parliament Street, present Beckett's Waiting For Godot, Wednesdays through Mondays at 8.30, admission $1.

At the St. Lawrence, Surprise, Surprise! and Shelter are entertaining far and after this weekend will disappear for three weeks to London (I am told. Which one? Guess.) Your best chance is a student rush, but be not optimistic; it was sold out earlier this week. Toronto Free Theatre, 24 Berkeley Street, continues with April 29, 1975; the gore flows at 8.30, Tuesday to Saturday, and twice on Sunday, at 2.30 and 8.30. For this you will pay $3 or $4. Toronto Truck Theatre, 94 Belmont Street, has just opened Molliere's School for Wives; playing Wednesday to Sunday. All shows at 8.30 except Saturdays, when there will be two, at 7 and 9.30; tickets $2.50 and $3.50. Toronto Workshop Productions 12 Alexander Street present The Life and Times of Grey Owl to nature-lovers.

Tuesdays to Sundays at 8.30, $3 or $3.50.

New in town: The Performing Theatre Company, 121 Avenue Road, begin The War Show tonight. It will play Tuesday to Sunday for several weeks, evenings at 8.30 but Sunday at 4 p.m. matinee; tickets $3.50 or $4.50 but matinee only 99 cents. On campus, as well as the SMC Plinter, we have an outstanding theoretical drama coming up at the U.C. Playhouse noon-hour slot (1 p.m. Wednesday to Friday) and a Middleton play, in female drag, at the Glen Morris church, November 13 at 8.30. Check your notice boards and remember that the P.L.S. and Hart House are presenting productions in ten days.

movies

Tragedy and triumph struck the filmic world this week, choosing, like lightning, the highest peaks, the tallest lilies. Italian filmmaker Pier Paolo Pasolini, director of Teorema, one of the greatest and last-est of the men who brought about the post-war film renaissance in Italy, was shot and killed last Sunday by a seventeen-year-old boy, in case you hadn't heard. There will be a minute of silence.

The triumph really occurred some time ago, but it is meet for a Torontonian to sing it now: Orson Welles' first feature film in nine years opens at the Varsity and the Fairlawn tonight.

It goes without saying that any self-respecting cineaste would simply spend the next week going to see F. is for Fake seven times, but I suppose it has to be admitted that not everyone can afford it. Anyway, for those of you with subolympian fastes or Catullan wallets, there follows below our usual lineup of good, bad and downright incredible.

FRIDAY at SMC* 7.30 and 10.00, A Woman Under The Influence, Cassavettes' Laing fable with Gena Rowlands; ditto Saturday. At Medisciaud, the U.C. Film Club presents a 1952 film by Rene Clement, Forbidden Games, which has never been released commercially in Canada. Don't you wish you knew how they got it... It's a good night for Mel Brooks fans: at 7.00 or 10.00 at the New Yorker, they can see The Producers, with Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder, about two lovable rascallions who put on a Broadway musical called "Springtime for Hitler"—possibly your only chance to see chorus girls wearing only giant pretzels link arms to form a giant swastika; in between, at 8.30, is a little something for Gene Wilder fans, called Start the Revolution Without Me. I'm told it's zany. The Revue has a double bill of versions of modern Russian classics: at 7.30, Brooks' The Twelve Chairs, which is based, rather loosely I imagine, on a book by Ilf and Petrov, and at 9.15, Jerzy Skolimowsky's recent movie of Nabokov's early novel King, Queen, Knave. Also on Saturday, At the Poor Alex at 8.30, in their Japanese series, Kurosawa's Dodes' ka Den. Also on Saturday.

SATURDAY. See above. And at the A.G.O. at three, in their Theatre Circle series, an early Fellini, Variety Lights.

SUNDAY: n At the Revue, 2.30, 5.30 and 8.30. Grigori Kozintsev's 1971 version of King Lear; those superior beings who actually speak Russian might be interested to know that the translation is by Boris Pasternak; almost everybody should be interested to hear that there's music by Shostakovich. At A.G.O. at 3.00, Jean Renoir's The Golden Coach, with Anna Magnani, possibly the only film ever made about the Commedia dell'arte in seventeenth-century Peru. At Medisciaud, at 8.00, some home truths from the Cinema of solidarity; a selection of shorts collectively called "Images of Working-Class Toronto". The filmmakers—Clay Borris, John Phillips, John Marshall and Emile Kolmanar—will be present for discussion afterwards.

MONDAY: At the Revue, at 7.00, They Shoot Horses, Don't They? and at 9.15, Joseph Losey's The Assassination of Trotsky, with Richard Burton. The Roxy has a less political double bill—they begin tonight a spate of American musicals: at 7.00, Guys and Dolls, with Brando and Sinatra; at 9.30 Funny Face, with Astaire and Audrey Hepburn. I might as well get this all over with at once: Tuesday at 7.00 and 1.15 Flying Down to Rio, with Astaire and Ginger Rogers, and at 8.25 Howard Hawk's screwball comedy Bringing Up Baby, with Cary Grant and Katherine Hepburn; this is the movie Bogdanovitch ripped off for the story of What's Up, Doc? but it's much funnier. And if you really prefer Barbra Streisand and Ryan O'Neal to Hepburn and Grant, you're beyond help. And on Wednesday, at 7.00, Anchors Aweigh with Sinatra and Gene Kelly, and at 9.20 The Pirate with Kelly and Judy Garland. Back to Monday: at the New Yorker, a Chaplin double bill, Modern Times at 7.00 and 9.45 and The Gold Rush at 8.30.

TUESDAY: At Neill Wycik College, 96 Gerrard St. E., at 8.00, you can see Marlene Dietrich destroy Emil Jannings in Joseph von Sternberg's classic, The Blue Angel. This movie gave Dietrich such an image in America that Sternberg had to arrange for her to get her comeuppance at the hands of Gary Cooper in Morocco before she would be acceptable to the folks out there in movieland. The New Yorker has Lost Horizon, the old one, the Frank Capra one, at 7.00 and 10.40, and at 8.55 The Third Man, a terrific movie about the underworld in post-war Vienna, by Carol Reed, from a script by Graham Greene, with Joseph Cotton and Orson Welles.

WEDNESDAY: At the Revue, at 7.30, the 1939 version of Wuthering Heights by William Wyler, who went on to make The Best Years of Our Lives and Ben Hur, and starring Laurence Olivier and Merle Oberon; and at 9.30 The Hurricane, a 1937 picture by John Ford. The New Yorker has a great film of O'Neill's great play Long Day's Journey into Night, with Katherine Hepburn, at 7.00, and then rather spoils the effect with, at 10.00, Suddenly Last Summer, a cheap horror film in which Hepburn, Elizabeth Taylor and Montgomery Cliff are thrown away—though actually, it's my favourite of Tennessee Williams' works: incest, insanity, lobotomy, homosexuality, cannibalism, tropical plants, you name it, they've got it.

THURSDAY: The Roxy gets into something slightly different tonight: at 7.00 Gunga Din, with Cary Grant and Douglas Fairbanks Jr., probably not for Kipling purists, and at 8.50 The Hunchback of Notre Dame with Charles Laughton and Maureen O'Hara.

A movie theatre I've just discovered, though I'm told it was there all the time, is the Kingsway, way out at 3030 Bloor W. (near the Royal York subway station.). It's a double theatre, half of it much like the Roxy, but the other half, called The Screening Room, shows some interesting double bills for a week at a time. Until Wednesday they have Rebel Without A Cause and O Lucky Man!, at 7.00; starting Thursday the 13th they have The Big Sleep by Howard Hawks, with Bogart and Bacall, one of the best detective movies ever made, and Magnum Force with Cliff Eastwood. Will someone who's seen The Big Sleep please tell me who killed Owen Taylor?

Blues defence ready for Ottawa

By JEAN BUBBA

In football, it's an accepted fact that the offense sells the tickets, but the defence wins the games. The Varsity Blues are no exception. The defence consists of what the team affectionately refers to as "the big, big, big, big guys" — and that's no joke.

Ken Hussey (5'10", 211 lb.), Angelo Castellan (6'5", 251 lb.), Nick Grittani (6'4", 223 lb.), and Glenn Rosborough (5'10", 222 lb.) are the front four who will be worrying Gee-Gees quarterback Jim Colton on Saturday. Not only are they tough, they're also fast. Despite his girth, Hussey relies more on his quickness than his strength or size and "would sooner sack a quarterback than score a touchdown."

But sacking quarterbacks isn't the main thing on the minds of the defensive team. "This Saturday we have to be a four quarter team; we have to be up for the whole game," said Castellan.

For Grittani, another member of the "200 Pound Club", the game tomorrow could be the end of a five-year rivalry with Ottawa. However, both he and Rosborough are motivated by more than frustration or bitterness from the Homecoming upset of 38-16. Both men share the quality of being "defence-minded". "There is actually an aesthetic experience to be had in football," commented Rosborough. "I enjoy pitting the strength of my body against another and seeing how far I can push mine in terms of strength, agility and speed."

"When you're on defence, you tend to forget about the crowd. It really comes down to you and 11 other guys on your team and the guy against you. You key on the pigskin in your stance, read your man and react. The crowd comes alive for you only after the official's whistle has blown the ball dead," he said.

Reading and reacting are what will give the game to the Blues tomorrow. The pressure will be on defensive backs Paul Forbes and Rick Jeysman for punt and kick-off returns. In the previous game against Ottawa, Forbes and Jeysman together returned five of six Gee-Gees punts by Neil Lumsden for a total of 25 yards and ran back five of seven kick-offs for 107 yards. Obviously, Jeysman's previous training as a gymnast is going to pay off in terms of the agility and fast reflexes he'll need tomorrow.

As far as speed and agility are concerned, no one demonstrates this more obviously than backfielder Richard Nakatsu. Last year he made four interceptions against the Gee-Gees during their playoff game. Against Concordia last week, he and Bruce Pollock managed to keep the Blues alive in the second quarter by batting down two endzone passes.

"We know we have a much better team than Gee-Gees and that we have something special as a team among ourselves," said Nakatsu. Even with the "something special" Blues will be playing a slightly different kind of defensive game against Colton's offense.

Pollock probably has the most experience playing against Ottawa, since he played three years against Gee-Gees as a member of Queen's Golden Gaels prior to going into Law at U of T.

"Colton is a smart quarterback and as a defensive back I always watch for his passes," he commented.

"But I've been watching the game films a lot this week and I've been getting used to him so hopefully I can anticipate some of his moves and react before he does something."

Blues' defence, which has been the most consistent part of their game all year, will be called tomorrow by defensive captain Julio Giordani. The pressure of his previous injuries is off since he played last Saturday after having to sit out four games.

"Having and responsibility of calling the defence does give me a certain leadership role to fulfill," he said. "But I don't believe in one guy running the whole show. If we want to win, it has to be a team effort."

"I was out with injuries for the first game against Ottawa and I've been building frustration since then. This Saturday we can't falter. We were consistent all last year and this year as well except for that first half against Concordia. But the team has been waiting for a long time for this game. We aren't worrying about our personal performances; we're going out as a team to stop the Gee-Gees," said Giordani.

Vic, New also victorious

Trinity wins in upset

The interfac football season ended in defeat today for three teams as Vic edged St. Mike's 3-1, New downed UC 7-0 and in a surprise Trinity knocked off Scarborough 18-10.

Ross Hotrum's 27 yard field goal was all that was needed to down a sluggish team from SMC. Hotrum's kick ended a drive that started on the Vic forty. Quarterback K.Y. Warren kept the ball on the ground but the big play was a twenty yard pass to Tom Landerou.

St. Mike's had little to yell about but they did anyway as Steve Doren accounted for their only score by tackling John Allen in the endzone after Allen had misplayed a punt.

If you think that game was slow then don't bother reading about New College. In a game that was supposed to be a romp, the boys in green edged UC. The only score of the game came on a short off-tackle by Mike Tierney completing a drive that started with an Eini Dibon interception on the UC 40.

Tierney converted and that was it basically. Referee C. Menke said that this game was one of the cleanest games he's ever officiated. It was also a well-played game but lacking offense it wasn't very exciting.

In the big showdown rematch of Tuesday's scoreless tie Trinity upset Scarborough. Before the game one player complained that because the game was being played at Scarborough there was little or no hope.

As we know Scarborough is a fair trek from downtown and several players couldn't make it. Trinity has a good team however and Dave Wright led the offense to victory with several long passes to Dave Beer and big plays that sounded very exciting even when they were told to this reporter who also couldn't make it out there.

In the finals Vic will face the Jocks and in Division II New goes against Trinity. The action begins at 12 noon next Tuesday. It won't be televised.

Rowing Season ends in Victory

For the first time since mid-September, docks at the Argo Rowing Club are vacant in the pre-dawn weekday hours, save for the ducks and their trademark, processed seaweed salad. The U of T rowing team practices ended with the O.U.A.A. championship regatta, held Sat. Nov. 1 on the Henley course in St. Catharines. To say the day was eventful is a decided understatement.

The weather was miserable. A stiff wind laced with rain produced fair-sized waves even upon the relatively sheltered Henley. With the exception of the Trent regatta, weather on every Saturday regatta has rendered poor conditions. Why Mother Nature should frown upon U of T oarsmen is unclear, but one theory proposes that she holds an oarsman responsible for the reappearance of Chiffon margarine in her butter dish. (A bouquet of skunk cabbage to the perpetrator of this fraud.) Whatever her reasons, she wasn't through with us yet.

Scant minutes before the lightweight crew was to take to the water, the squad left the shell strapped to stretchers and began last minute warm-ups in the shelter of the boat house. A freak gust of wind knocked the boat and stretchers over. The boat hit the ground heavily. The bow section was holed badly; the rudder and fin were bent. A stretcher went through the bottom of the shell and serious cracks appeared throughout its length.

There was no possibility of using the shell in the race but, in a fine example of sportsmanship, University of Western Ontario allowed the U of T crew to race one of their shells.

The U of T crew finished third, only $\frac{1}{4}$ of a length out of second place, for their strongest finish of the year. Consider the unfamiliar boat, different blades, and lack of time for sufficient warm-up, and the effort becomes even more commendable.

The novice men were strongly into second place when a seat jumped off its slide with about 800 metres to go. By the time repairs were effected, they had dropped to fifth, and though they regained some ground there was not enough time to catch the leaders.

Cause for real celebration was U of T's first victory in the O.U.A.A. rowing championships in years. The U of T men's four: Hugh Hardy, Jim Nicoletti, Nick Tintor, stroke Charlie Bartlett and coxswain Doug Dodds soundly defeated strong crews from U.W.O. and Trent U. This marked the culmination of two years of rebuilding the U of T team from scratch.

Much of the credit must go to head coach Gord Leighton and this year's assistant coach Chris French. Their expenditures of time and effort have been considerable and the progress achieved speaks for itself.

Largely unrecognized, however, have been the efforts of crew captain Bob Boraks. To a great extent he is responsible for the fact that U of T has a rowing team. For several years there was no team, but Bob knocked on the right doors, and after much hard work helped U of T float one again. Now, a short year later, Toronto is showing strong signs of reattaining its former status as a university rowing power.

Although university rowing has officially ended until next September, U of T oarsmen will likely enjoy active dormancy. Land training will begin early in '76.

UC couldn't get off the ground but New did in 7-0 victory.

Blues Hockey Tourney this weekend

The Hockey Blues will be hosting York, Concordia and Waterloo in their first invitational Hockey Tournament at Varsity Arena.

The Blues played four games in four nights last week in Edmonton in an exhibition series with Calgary and Alberta. The Blues split against Alberta 6-3, 1-6 and Calgary 1-4, 3-2.

Tom Watt stated that with player losses from last year more effort will be needed. "We're going to have to work for everything we get. Everyone will have to work 100 per cent."

Due to graduation and other things the Blues have lost Anderson, Milnes, Swanick, Pagnutti, McFarlane and Gord Davies the former captain.

The defense is young but the forwards are good defensively. This type of team can only survive if they play tight hockey and this is what Watt plans on doing this year.

As far as the other teams in the tournament, Watt says that he has not seen York but that he thinks they are improved over last year. Waterloo has lost a lot but are still strong and Concordia's amalgamation of Loyola and Sir George Williams has a very good team.

Library strike possible Nov. 20

84% reject final offer

By BOB COLLIER

Eighty-four per cent of library workers voted to strike in Convocation Hall on Friday night rejecting the administration's final offer.

The final tally in the government supervised secret ballot was 283 to 62 in favour of a strike. Ninety-three per cent of the bargaining unit turned out for the vote.

A strike of library workers could occur as early as midnight on November 19. It would probably shut down the major campus libraries right in the middle of the pre-Christmas exam and essay period.

The library administration made a last minute offer in an attempt to change the vote, but the offer was dismissed by the CUPE 1230 executive as a "last minute effort to confuse and buy off our members" in a leaflet distributed before the vote.

Instead of boosting the wage offer, the chief librarian, R. H. Blackburn promised an immediate $500 cash settlement to every worker "as soon as the cheques can be processed" rather than after approval by the federal Anti-Inflation Tribunal.

The university did not otherwise change its November 3 offer of "15 per cent on monetary matters" over one year retroactive to July 1, 1975.

At a rally before the vote the library workers' union president, Judy Darcy told the cheering workers that "if we refuse the contract, Parker will be after us as soon as he can reach a telephone."

"We didn't get a full contract offer until after our lunch-time illegal walk-out, three weeks ago," she noted.

The university has a little over one week to make an offer satisfactory to the workers if the strike is to be averted and the libraries kept open.

When contacted Friday evening, U of T president John Evans had no plans to intervene in the dispute.

Vice-Provost Peter Meincke said he was developing contingency plans to keep as many library services open as possible, but that the plans hadn't been completed yet.

He noted the university's 15 per cent salary boost was "the final offer."

"To look beyond, we will have to cut services in other areas," he added.

If the workers go on strike, the libraries which will probably close are Robarts, Med-Sci, Sigmund Samuel and departmental libraries in Engineering, Pharmacy and Hygiene.

Chief librarians at Trinity and Victoria Colleges will probably restrict loans to members of their own college but St. Mike's chief librarian, Father Bernard Black said his college library will remove all loan privileges and in order that minimal reference services be available to students of the whole campus.

Last week, the Library Association of the University of Toronto voted in support of a motion to close down the major university libraries because of security problems, although president Liz Avison said that less than a third of the professional librarians voted on the motion.

"The brief presented a stronger position than many professional librarians would support," she added yesterday.

The U of T Faculty Association would also support closing down the libraries for the duration of the strike on the grounds of security, said president William Nelson Friday.

At Wednesday's meeting of the association executive, there was "no disagreement" on the motion, he said.

The executive support the library workers in principle but haven't discussed their latest wage demand.

"We are not persuaded of the university's statement that the union isn't bargaining fairly," he said.

Nelson added the association would likely urge essay deadlines be delayed.

The wording of Friday's vote was: "Do you accept the offer of the U of T as proposed on November 3, 1975, and as explained to you to-day as a final settlement of all matters in issue between CUPE local 1230 and the U of T? Note: A "No" vote is a vote in favour of a strike on a date to be set by the union executive."

The final count on the above motion was:

Yes—62

No—283

Spoilt ballots—2

Total eligible—374

Total voting—347

A total of 188 votes was needed to carry the motion since a majority of the total eligible, not the total voting, was needed. The total bargaining unit is about 430 workers but those hired after Oct. 1 were ineligible to vote.

Seventy-six per cent of the total eligible voted against the motion, or 84 per cent of the total present. Ninety-three of the workers turned out for the vote.

Evidence uncovered in Fong appeal reveals underlying racism in Meds

By PAUL McGRATH

The most startling piece of evidence brought forward by the medical faculty, perhaps unwittingly, in the recent appeal of Henry Fong involves a suggestion that there be "preliminary psychiatric assessment" of Chinese students who apply to the faculty for admission.

The suggestion was offered in a July, 1974 letter from Dr. Albert Leung of the university's department of psychiatry to meds Associate Dean E. Llewellyn-Thomas. Leung was responding to concern expressed in a meeting of the Medical Assessors for the Faculty of Medicine by Associate Dean Jan Steiner about "the possible development of emotional problems of Chinese students."

The letter mentions no other ethnic or cultural group as potential victims of emotional problems. After noting that the number of "Chinese students" had reached twenty per cent of the faculty total, Leung states:

"I have the feeling that it would be more appropriate to do some preventive medicine with this group of Chinese students, rather than to wait until they develop some emotional problems. For example, one or more preliminary psychiatric assessments of these Chinese students during the process of application in the Faculty may help to indicate some possible candidates for psychiatric therapy, or rule out some, if any, who are emotionally unsuitable for enrollment into the Faculty of Medicine."

The assessments are unprecedented in the history of the medical school and apply not only to admission policy but, according to Leung's letter, also to Chinese students as they proceed through Medical school.

"Once being accepted into the faculty, this group of students should be encouraged to discuss their problems with their supervisors of the first and second years should be reminded to report to you (Llewellyn-Thomas) and refer those students who may possibly have emotional problems for assessment. This may prevent some tragic incident when a student may be found unsuitable to be a doctor in their final year."

The last paragraph clearly refers to Fong's case. The medical faculty throughout the hearing laid no grounds for the opinion that Fong may have been withdrawn due to emotional problems, but insisted that he had been judged solely on his academic merits.

Referring to the letter, Fong's counsel Peter Rosenthal sees it as "clear-cut evidence" that the medical faculty is attempting to "slander" Chinese students in order to tighten admissions policies.

He charges that the faculty is "inventing" the entire topic of emotional problems as a cover for discrimination inside the faculty.

Dean Steiner, when contacted about the letter, said that he had seen psychological problems in medical students of all ethnic origins. The reason for this assessment, he said, was to prevent the Board of Medical Assessors, which handles the withdrawal or readmittance of students who have had health problems, from having to handle a large load of cases.

"In 1973, when we first admitted a large number of Chinese students, I became aware that some had psychological problems. I wanted to prevent a situation that the assessors couldn't handle, because of the cultural differences."

"Dr. Leung is our only Chinese doctor, that's why I asked him to become involved in the board," he said.

"Five or ten per cent of all our students exhibit psychological problems," he said. Nonetheless only "three or four a year" go before the Board of Medical Assessors. Of these, Dr. Steiner doubts that "more than one" was of Chinese stock.

Steiner stresses that nothing was done about Leung's suggestions. "It seemed rather silly," he said.

Hip ship, more rams for grams

LONDON (ZNS-CUP) — British archaeologists report they have recovered a stash of hashish about 2000 years old from a Carthaginian warship which sunk off the coast of Sicily during the Roman-Carthage wars.

The excavators report that the ship was found with airtight containers of the hash, which apparently was smoked by members of the crew to heighten their morale during combat.

According to the scientists, the containers were good enough to preserve the potency of the hash under the sea for the past 20 centuries.

SAC offers workers less than library workers make now

By MIKE EDWARDS
 Unionized student council employees have applied as of Nov. 3 to the Ontario Department of Labor for conciliation in their current contract negotiations with SAC which began last September. "How can SAC offer to support the library workers fight for a fair wage?" asked SAC executive assistant John Bennett, "when they are offering their own employees less than some library workers are making now."

Bennett, "but SAC isn't a cause, and they have a staple income," he added.

The original union demand was for $212 a week, which has since been revised downwards to the $180. The union said they are also willing to replace COLA with a regular $5 increase every six months over the life of the contract.

The two other disagreements are on the question of job descriptions and differential salary scales.

The union agrees that the work load of SAC may change from year to year but insist on job descriptions for office staff who must deal with an ever-changing parade of student politicians.

SAC offers job descriptions as "guidelines" which can be changed "to make up a full work week" for the office staff.

In addition, SAC has submitted a three-stage structure of salaries, one for general secretaries, one for a special fieldworker category, and one for The Varsity ad manager. SAC claims this is to "attract qualified personnel." However the current ad manager was hired at a rate $15 a week less than his office assistant. The union is fighting against any salary differential.

"All we want is a living wage," said Bennett, "I want to own two pairs of jeans," he added.

So far all three negotiation meetings have been conducted by the SAC executive and a general council discussion has yet to materialize. With the call for provincial intervention in the negotiations, the SAC employees will be in a legal strike position by Christmas. In the event of a strike, The Varsity may not be published.

The editorial staff of The Varsity, the staff of Input Radio and the accountant in the SAC office are not members of the union.

High school students undecided

By DAN KEETON
 City of Toronto's high school student councils are split over whether to support their teachers in the event of an impending teachers' strike this Thursday.

A meeting of the Toronto Association of Student Councils (TASC) last Wednesday terminated with the issue still unresolved.

Jorge de Mendonca, a U of T student and former president of Central Tech's student council, said none of the council presidents at the meeting wanted to support the board (the Toronto Board of Education) in its current negotiations with the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation (OSSTF).

TASC chairperson Tony Silipo said a fifty-fifty split occurred on a motion to remain "neutral", while a motion to support the strike "which means supporting the teachers", passed by one vote.

The Metro school board claims it is offering the teachers a 39.2 per cent salary increase over two years.

The OSSTF, claiming the board's offer only amounts to $1.4 per cent, is requesting 43.9 per cent, a cost of living clause, and a $720 lump sum payment, all of which have been recommended by conciliator Stanley Hartt.

TASC, in a "position paper" distributed in Toronto schools last week, presented a number of "demands" to teachers as conditions for student support. These include teacher assurance that students be protected from "retaliation" whether or not they cross picket lines, teacher support for a future student "bill of rights", and consultation with students over the issue of working conditions when the teachers negotiate their next contract.

Margaret Wilson, president of District 15 of the OSSTF, which represents Toronto City teachers, refused comment on the TASC demands.

But on student support, she said the federation would hope for "anything which would effectively close down the system," in the event of a strike.

Toronto board chairperson Gordon Cressie said the city's 32 schools would remain open during the strike, and that course outlines and library facilities will be available for study.

Mendonca said the "majority" at Wednesday's TASC meeting voted not to cross the teachers' picket line.

But teachers will not "harass" any student who crosses the line, said Wilson.

Mendonca blamed TASC's division over total support for teachers' demands on an OSSTF executive ruling forbidding teachers to discuss the possible strike issues with their pupils.

Wilson said the ruling was made because of "the danger of manipulating students." The OSSTF felt they "shouldn't use a captive audience," she said. But the federation has no objections to teachers discussing the issue "as private citizens," she added.

TASC delegates failed to agree on a proposed mass march on Queen's Park, but a few councils might do so on their own, said Mendonca.

No future meeting of TASC has been planned, according to Mendonca, but chairperson Silipo said a meeting of those who wish to remain neutral is planned for tonight, with the aim of "getting TASC back on its feet."

Silipo and Mendonca both said members feel TASC needs a constitution, or some guidelines, before it can develop a position on the teachers' strike.

Silipo said the members for neutrality feel last Wednesday's vote did not really reflect student opinion because only about 14 of TASC's 32 members were present when the vote was taken.

reservations because of his own corporate background.

But he rejected the challenge to resign from Toronto political activists, James Lorimer and James Laxer, acting on behalf of the Corporate Research Group.

Bryce, a former deputy finance minister and Canada's representative to the International Monetary Fund, was named chairperson when the Royal Commission was first announced last April.

The setting up of the Royal Commission followed an attempt last spring by the Montreal-based Power Corporation to take control of the Toronto-based Argus Corporation.

Nadeau, whose appointment to the Royal Commission was announced later by the prime minister, is a board member of the Royal Bank of Canada, which has links with Power Corporation and other conglomerates.

The final member of the three-person commission is Robert Dickerson, a lawyer with long Liberal traditions and a clientele of conglomerates.

The three were mandated to "investigate the economic and social implications for the public interest of major concentrations of corporate power" and to recommend as to any safeguards "that may be required to protect the public interests."

Bryce denied the Commission was too narrow in its scope and said it was not interested in the already studied area of foreign ownership, or in making detailed amendments to the Bank Act.

He had previously announced a decision not to get involved in competition policy due to existing proposed legislation in that area.

Following the November 3-4 hearings in Ottawa the Commission will hold sessions in Halifax, Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Montreal and Toronto over the next month.

Non-Academic Staff Vacancy

VARSITY BOARD OF DIRECTORS

There is now a vacancy on The Varsity Board of Directors for a non-academic staff member. The term of this office is until June 1976. Under The Varsity's constitution the non-academic members of the governing council are to appoint a member of their constituency to The Varsity Board of Directors. Would all such people interested in serving in this capacity please write to either Gwen Russel, Room 320, FitzGerald Bldg., or to Keith Bowler, Room 3247, Med. Sci. Bldg., prior to Wed., Nov. 5th.

Corporate commissioners asked to resign

OTTAWA (CUP) — The members in direction of the Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration were challenged as being hopelessly prejudiced at their first public appearance here November 3.

The Commissioners were asked to resign at the first of a planned series of public hearings, because of their personal and professional interests in big business — the subject of the inquiry.

They were also accused of narrowing the scope of the inquiry before the hearings began so as to avoid dealing with the power of banks, the impact of foreign ownership, and competition policy.

Chairperson Robert Bryce, announced he thought matters were satisfactory, except that he personally felt reluctant to deal with matters concerning energy interests because of past involvement in determining government energy policy.

Leung letter just part of Meds whitewash over admissions

What the hell is the medical faculty up to? Turn back to page one and read the portions of Dr. Leung's letter once again, closely. It might give you a bit of an idea of what it is like to be a student of Chinese stock in this university's medical school and may lead you to believe some of the charges we've heard over the past few months about discrimination in the medical faculty.

To start with the letter assumes, in the most distorted logic, that because of the rising number of these "Chinese students", there would be a "possible development of emotional problems" among these students. Prove it! If the faculty is going to make this sort of charge, we'd like to see their statistics.

There is still 75 per cent of the faculty that is not Chinese. Does the rising number of Caucasian students lead them too to emotional problems? But that's not the question, as the faculty is not concerned about the latter. It is plain, however, that they are concerned about the former.

Why test Chinese students? To assume that they might be more prone to psychological problems than others has some intent.

What is it?

Again we have to drag in what has by now been termed loosely "the climate" in the faculty. Teaching staff have stated in public that they are concerned about the numbers of Chinese students. Meds Associate Dean E. Llewellyn-Thomas in testimony has agreed that it is a topic of discussion right now. Within this climate we now have, for the first time in the faculty's 100-year history, the suggestion that psychological assessments be made of students. Of all students? Not quite, just the ones that are under the gun already.

In every state that relies upon racism as a means of dividing the oppressed, there is always offered as an excuse some intimation that one or more group is deficient due to some inherent psychological problem. Any racist joke you have ever heard leans heavily on the identification of one or more stereotyped traits of a group.

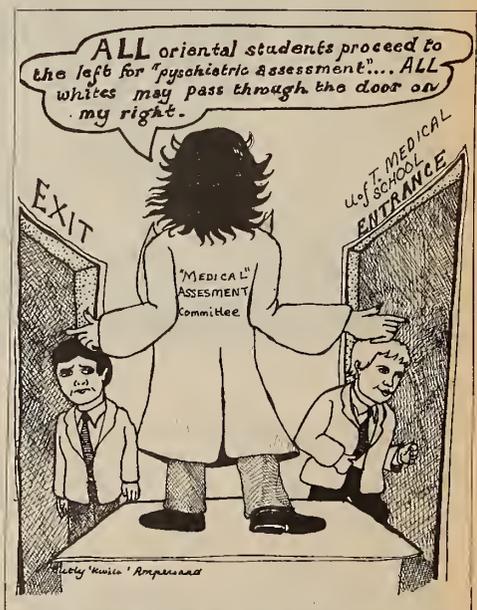

Stinginess, laziness, shrewdness or aloofness are all barely tolerable as stereotypes, but to utter the opinion that any group is prone to "emotional problems" is clearly the most dangerous form of racism found anywhere. That sort of assessment has kept people locked in concentration camps in all corners of the world. It continues to happen today.

But not in our corner of the world. Surely the faculty is just looking out for the interests of their students and attempting to make the psychological road through medical school as easy as possible? That is certainly Leung's opinion.

Whatever the verdict in the Fong case, the result should not be to have the university breath a sigh of relief and forget "this unfortunate incident". The medical faculty has had a lot of its dirty laundry hung out on the line in the past month, and they have a lot of questions left to answer, most specifically questions about how they admit and assess their students.

Some people have accused Peter Rosenthal of grandstanding or playing for headlines in his defense of Fong. In some ways, we might disagree with his tactics, but if he is the only person that stands between us and a total whitewash of the bizarre patterns of events in the Faculty of Medicine, then let's hope he stands like a rock.

SAC Silence Suspicious

Where is SAC? Although the Varsity can be rightfully accused of being in default of a portion of its duties of coverage, we still don't hear much in the way of communication from them?

Gone are the little "four-pagers" attempting to explain to students the issues that SAC is fighting for. Gone also are the solid campaigns based on publicity and information on the subjects such as the Campus Centre and tenure.

Is there an information commission there? Is there someone in charge of the extremely important task of making sure that things appear to be being done.

It's not good enough for the Student's Administrative Council to take out ads for the budget in this newspaper, to hand out their brochure entitled "What is SAC?" or to lean on The Varsity editor every now and then for a little extra coverage.

If they are going to debunk the usual charge of "aloofness" aimed at all manner of student government, they'd better get those presses churning. Even if the Varsity covers every move they make, it won't appear that they are attempting to be responsible to an audience. The audience needs direct communication.

Let's see some imaginative, well-designed leaflets that outline the areas in which SAC is fighting. Then we'll see if they're actually fighting for something. Not that we doubt...

Strike results would affect other issues

To the Editor:
 The news that negotiations have been broken off between the Library Workers and the Administration brings the University community close to a major disruption. If a strike occurs, this disruption will be prolonged by the government's wage and price control policies as decisions on CUPE 1230 demands will have to await consideration of the anti-inflation tribunal. A strike may be further prolonged as a CUPE 1230 strike will come at the opening of organized labour's fight to scuttle the Federal Government's wage control policy. CUPE 1230 will have to fight this wider battle to the finish, regardless of the welfare of their own membership and of the University community of which they are a part.

If there is a strike, what happens to the life of the University community while CUPE 1230 leadership wrestles with the government's anti-inflation policies?

For students and faculty a strike will mean a total upset of library oriented teaching and research. If the strike is prolonged, this may mean the loss of as much as a term's work and lengthen the time necessary to complete a degree.

For CUPE 1230 membership (and, if there is a lock-out, for non-unionized library workers as well) a strike will mean loss of salary for which it is unlikely that CUPE's war chest will be able adequately to compensate.

The University administration is in an unenviable bind. Regardless of the harm caused by shutdown of library services, it cannot give in. If CUPE 1230 gets a wage settlement greatly in excess of that received by other non-academic staff and by faculty, unionization of non-academic staff and faculty will be accelerated and the whip-saw operated to get equally high salary settlements. If high wage settlements are allowed and, as seems likely, the Ontario Government does not raise the BU level, corresponding cuts will have to be made to reduce the salary bill for non-tenured staff of the University.

If there is a strike and the University gives in, a free-for-all battle may begin in which all faculty and non-academic staff will fight to grab as much of the money pie as possible. The consequences would be diminution of current University activities, academic as well as non-academic. Anna Mallin Law

Students, fink on essay banks!

To the Editor:

Students who have honestly earned degrees from the University of Toronto will ultimately be injured by those who instead use bought-and-paid-for essays. The standards of the University are judged by the performance of its graduates after they leave. Well-to-do graduates who have bought straight-A records in lieu of studying and writing will not perform well when they are on their own. Less affluent and more honest ones who have earned the same grades will be the victims in the long run.

Nobody will long be fooled. Other universities and employers of

SAC threatens Toike Oike

To the Editor:

Firstly I would like to clarify a point that the current editor of the Toike deemed necessary to bring to the campus. That is the reasoning why they received only $800 the first term of their operation. He points out that last year's Toike received $1,500 from SAC, what he neglected to tell the campus is that it came at $750 payments, and we had to apply each time (in fall and spring) for the grants. When Eric was given the $800 this term he was told to come back next term and try for a little more, who knows he might get another $800 (he is sure to get something).

More to the point SAC is not entirely responsible for the Toike and has only started funding them last year when a change in policy came about. They say they are campus-oriented and that they deposit 20,000 copies on campus (or they did). Firstly SAC does not deem what they print to be truly campus-oriented this year. Except for the most recent issue, there was very little in the first three that was in any way campus-oriented. This caused a great decline in the observed readership.

Strictly speaking the Toike doesn't even come close to the outlines for campus papers to receive money that were set out by SAC last year. Also whether they know it or not, they have a lot of powerful enemies on campus and I am surprised they actually got that much. Secondly, the stressed 20,000 copies campuswide is naught but a pipe dream. At least 2-3,000 get stolen (or taken) by off-campus groups and not many trickle out to the suburban campuses.

Even the rich, who now benefit temporarily from the present high rating of the U of T, will in time be wasting their money. But right now, the social pressure by honest students is the only likely power to discourage ghost-written papers. Use it.

Debating Duo Invited to England

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
U of T, along with seven other Canadian universities, has been invited to send a team of two speakers to an International debating Competition at the University of London (England) in the first week of January, 1976. The event is being organized by the Transatlantic Universities' Speech Association, and the Canadians are being funded by Rotary Canada.

In a telephone interview with Oscar Mullerbeck, president of the U of T Debating Union (UTDU), it was made clear that the group will make the trip. The two debaters to be sent will be chosen at an elimination tournament here in late November.

Asked for his reaction to the unprecedented invitation, Mullerbeck replied it was a "real honour for us to be given the opportunity."

"It's not every day that a U of T team goes overseas," he said. "Although we have a fairly extensive tournament programme this is the first time we've been able to add this kind of event to our schedule." The UTDU annually takes part in McGill, Princeton, and Columbia tournaments.

One of the objects of the tournament, according to Mullerbeck, was to introduce debaters to "different styles of debating". The only exposure most people get to the British style was through the Oxford Union broadcasts on the CBC, he said. This year's tournament will bring together teams from Canada, Great Britain and the United States. It is hoped that it will become an annual competition, rotating among the three countries. "The next one I believe will be in the States," Mullerbeck added.

U of T Tops US Debating Match

By CICERO SMITH
Four U of T students walked off with three of the top prizes at the Princeton University debating tournament on Saturday.

Tom Gough and Andrei Grushman won the Adlai Stevenson Tournament by trouncing a team from Fordham University. Some 100 rhetoricians from 20 Canadian and American universities attended the final debate in Nassau Hall — seat of the Continental Congress from June to November 1783.

Chris Driscoll and Jeff Berger placed third.

Going into the final round, two of the four undefeated teams were from Toronto. The Driscoll-Berger team lost their debate, however, and the dynamic duo of Gough and Grushman then faced Fordham on the rousing Goldwaterian resolution, "Extremism in the defence of liberty is no vice".

Other momentous resolutions debated at the tournament included: "Sex is the mathematics urge sublimated", "Ex-football players should be prevented from becoming President", and "If Ford has a better idea, he's keeping it to himself".

About the only prize of note that was not won by the Toronto orators was the Aaron Burr Trophy, given for the most "unusual" (ie. besotted) behaviour at the party held on Friday night. However, feminists and friends of feminists may take heart: the award, a bronzed sculpture of a horse's ass, was presented this year — for the first time — to a woman from Fordham.

Lab explosion creates diamonds

A University of Toronto student and two technicians have accomplished in seconds work that used to take nature millions of years to do. They have made diamonds in a laboratory.

The diamonds are tiny and cannot be seen with the unaided eye.

They have been produced with a device originally designed to help scientists study the entry of space vehicles into planet atmospheres. Diamond is the hardest known substance and grit sized particles are used for such things as grinding telescope mirrors and sharpening tools made of special alloys.

The work was done by a student, Paul Sharma, and two technicians, Phillip Crouse and Reinhart Gnoyke.

A hemisphere filled with hydrogen and oxygen was ignited and the resulting explosion detonated a thin shell of explosive material that lined the edge of the hemisphere.

Because the hemisphere was solidly encased in a large metal block, the second explosion had nowhere to go, so it reflected back as an implosion. This concentrated tremendous energy at a single point. Then the researchers added a cylinder of graphite with a piston at one end. When the implosion hit the piston it compressed the graphite, creating the temperatures and pressures needed to convert it to diamond.

The researchers have been unable to actually measure the temperatures and pressures, but their calculations indicate pressures about a million times atmospheric pressure and temperature of hundreds of thousands of degrees Celsius.

The yield is still low — about 5 per cent of the graphite is turned into diamond.

Spain will be meeting topic

The Franco government of Spain assassinated five revolutionaries on September 27 for their participation in the revolutionary struggle in Spain.

Three of the militants were members of the Revolutionary Anti-Fascist Patriotic Front, or FRAP. Two were members of the Basque organization. Their deaths aroused a world-wide protest, including a demonstration of 2,000 people in Montreal.

At the Montreal meeting, a speaker from FRAP said the government of Spain is racked by the economic crisis facing the whole capitalist world.

She pointed out a general strike in the fall of 1974 has further endangered Franquist and US domination over Spain. She said FRAP's response to the 39-year war which the fascists have been waging against the people is to declare "war on fascism."

FRAP participates in the armed struggle in Spain, and calls for the overthrow of Franco and the elimination of US imperialism in Spain, as well as an end to Spanish colonialism.

On Wednesday, November 12, at College Street United Church, a representative from FRAP will be speaking, to a meeting sponsored by the Ad Hoc Committee To Support Spanish People. The meeting hopes to make the words of the FRAP chairman, Alvarez del Vayo come true: "May the streets of Spain become the scene of the will of the Spanish people."

Curtain Falls for Blues

By JONATHAN GROSS

The Sports Editor
The Ottawa Gee-Gees terminated the Blues season to the tune of 14-7 in Ottawa Saturday. They will now strut their way to the Ontario championship against Wilfred Laurier.

The defense for the Blues played very very well. Last time out the score was 38-16 in favour of Ottawa and this time they were held to only one touchdown.

By using different formations the Blues forced Gee-Gee quarterback Jim Colton to go to the air. He threw for 229 yards through short gainers.

On such a wet day it could be predicted that the ball would stay on the ground but Ottawa only rushed for 116 yards as compared to 168 for the Blues.

Dave Langley had a bad day. Not many football games are won when only 38 yards are gained through the air. The Blues used the quarterback option a lot. Time and time again Langley made the wrong decision on the rollout; he either threw when he should have run or vice versa.

Most of the scoring came in the first half and Ottawa started things with a 37-yard field goal by Neil (knows-he's-going-to-be-protected) Lumsden.

Late in the first quarter D.T. White of Ottawa fumbled a Toronto punt and the Blues recovered on the Ottawa 35 yard line. Libert Castillo took a screen pass down to the 23 and on the next play Ottawa was fingered for a late hit and the penalty carried the ball down to the 12. A pass interference penalty took the play to the 4 and three plays later Steve Kwiatkowski carried it in from the two. Mike Sokovnin converted and the Blues led.

Ottawa came back with an awesome drive on the next series going 30 yards in just 7 plays to regain the lead. The key play was a 37-yard broken play that Bill Harrison carried down to the Toronto 28. Chris Triantaflopoulos saved a touchdown on the seven with a diving shirt tackle on Neil Lumsden. But you can't keep a good allstar down, and a couple of plays later Colton carried it five yards for the score giving the Gee-Gees the lead 10-7.

The second half was no bargain as far as the Blues were concerned. The Blues didn't score and their only sustained drive was stopped on the Ottawa 29 early in the fourth quarter. The drive was suddenly halted when Dave Langley engineered a broken play on a crucial third and one situation.

Blues score one of eight goals in win over York in final.

Blues win Tourney

By JOHN ROBB

From the indication of Friday night's games in the first University of Toronto Invitational Tournament, this seems to be a transitional year in intercollegiate hockey.

Four of the most powerful teams in Canada were present, University of Toronto, York, Waterloo and Concordia of Montreal. All four are sporting vastly different lineups from last year; Waterloo and York have added 12 new players, Toronto has added 9, and Concordia has added 8 new players.

Concordia, of course is the amalgamation of Sir George Williams and Loyola Universities, two Quebec powerhouse teams of the past. The nucleus of this team comes from Loyola with only six additions from Sir George.

With the great player turnover in each team, all four coaches expressed their pleasure in this pre-season tournament. Because of the nature of intercollegiate hockey, the powerful teams are forced to play vastly inferior teams, and therefore lack the competition necessary to prepare for the superior ones.

Waterloo coach Bob McKillop exemplifies this feeling, stating: "When we get to the playoffs, we won't be playing teams like Brock. These are the teams that we'll have to beat, and if we don't improve from playing them, it's our own damn fault."

In the first game Friday night, Varsity managed to defeat Waterloo 4-2 in a sluggish affair. Varsity is obviously better prepared at this stage of the season, and won because they confused Waterloo with their tight checking.

Inepness around the Waterloo net allowed Toronto to take an early three-goal lead. Toronto's players earned unopposed in front of the Waterloo net, as Waterloo players were either caught up ice, or doing their imitation of their favourite Rodin statue.

After that early blitzkrieg, Waterloo's defense settled down to play Varsity on even terms. It was, too little too late.

Former Marle Graham Wise led Toronto to two goals, Ron Harris added a goal and two assists to a strong checking game, and Frank Davis scored the other goal. It was a game in which Varsity showed the kind of defensive work that coach Tom Watt says is needed with this year's relative lack of goal scorers.

In contrast to Toronto's tight checking approach, York offered a wide open game in trouncing a tired Concordia team 7-3.

Saturday night started off with the consolation final which Concordia won by defeating Waterloo 8-3. Bruce Morgan started in net for the Warriors and the flood gates were declared officially open as Ron Haisis beat the Waterloo netminder with less than a minute gone in the game.

After Morgan allowed three goals in less than eight minutes he was replaced by Jake Dupuis. This night Dupuis was not much better off as he saw five pucks go past him. His Concordia counterpart, Al Labelle, went the distance allowing all three Waterloo goals.

The game was on the chippy side, with numerous scuffles and persistent checking by both squads. The Concordia advantage was due more to an ability to finish off their plays than to a lack of opportunities for Waterloo. The result was a 4-0 lead for the Quebecois at the end of the first period.

Waterloo played better in the final frames playing Concordia almost even. Both teams will improve over the season so watch for them next time they pass through this precinct.

The Blues won the final defeating York 8-5 as they showed some much needed scoring punch.

Toronto got off to a shaky start as York went ahead 2-4 of the first period as Brian Burtch put a rebound past the sprawling goalie, Mark Logan.

Logan made several fine saves and the Blues offense responded taking the lead at 3-1 at the end of the first period. The second goal by the Blues featured an excellent passing play between Wise and Bill Pitfield as the latter veteran took Wise's pass and deked the York goalie out of his Fruit of the Looms.

York's plays were more effective in the second period due to some crisp passing. But the line of Mike Hanna, Bob Adoranti and Guido Mazza bottled up York and although Hanna's aggressive checking cost him a penalty, Mazza scored while shorthanded.

From here on in the two teams took turns in scoring. First Ron Hawkshaw of the Yeoman duplicated Pitfield's earlier moves.

Shortly thereafter Wayne Morrissy tallied for the Blues. Not to be outdone Doug Sellers lit the lamp for York but Morrissy ended the period's scoring.

Al Avery opened the third period scoring for York completing a neat passing play that left Logan defenseless. Kent Ruhke, the Blues new captain, came right back to beat York's new goalie Aidan Flatley on the short side.

Flatley played well as was evidenced in a five minute major during which the Blues were unable to score.

Blues fans should be happy as they scored eight goals against a powerful York team. Other Blues goals went to Larry Hopkins, Graham Wise and Ron Harris.

Judging by this tournament the season looks bright for Toronto. Many of the veterans were displaying their old trademarks such as bodychecking of Charlie Hughes and the rushing of Rocci Pagnello, while some new faces such as John Precious and Mike Hannan were showing a lot of hustle.

Varsity also showed an increased willingness to "mix it up" in the heavy going. This was typified by Frank Davis rushing to Ruhke's aid after the latter had been felled from behind. Clearly the Blues are not going to let anyone push them around.

NOTES: Paul Sawyer left the game with an injury in the second period but returned in the third. Let's hope it's nothing serious... Graham Wise is a transfer from Michigan... He's doing grad work in Forestry... John Precious and Mike Hannan are also transfers, both coming from Laurentian... Ron Hawkshaw of York is a real catch for Yeoman coach Dave Chambers. He was a star while he was at Waterloo and he looks like he'll continue to be one.

New hit by contaminated meat

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

Cases of food poisoning among staff and students at New College were confirmed yesterday. The outbreak was traced to the roast beef dinner served on Monday in the college dining rooms.

Victims' reports of cramps, vomiting and nausea resulting from consumption of the meal were being investigated yesterday by Richard H. Beehke, Senior Health Officer of the Toronto Department of Health.

William Hatton, a first year engineering student, told The Varsity he had "cramps like crazy" and that his "whole system was drained" soon after he left the dining room. "I wouldn't have wished that roast beef on anyone, even my enemies after that," he said.

Saga Canadian Management Services, who operate the food service, had received dozens of complaints about the meal by Tuesday afternoon. In a letter to the students, Food Service Director Loren M. Grossman admitted "There was a problem with people who ate roast beef on Monday in Wilson and Wetmore Dining Rooms," and said "Testing of various types will proceed immediately."

Most of the victims who could walk were instructed to pick up parasitology kits at the college.

Other students who had not recovered sent friends to deliver their complaints and pick up their kits.

Jon Mindon, a first year sciences student was so ill he could not even write his own letter of complaint. In a bedside interview he said, "I'm going to try and get my money back."

Asked if he was aware of the food contamination at the meal, he replied "No, it tasted how it normally tasted." Because of his illness, he had to miss a philosophy exam and a biology lab that he had prepared for, he said.

Symptoms appeared in most of the victims early Tuesday morning. However medical help was not available for the majority of students in the North section of Devonshire House. Mindon called his brother, a doctor, to attend him. Mindon said his brother confirmed his illness as food poisoning.

Although none of the victims interviewed expressed a desire to eat at the college again, they all expressed anger at the fact that they were on a food plan and were forced to eat at that location. "I have to eat there," Hatton said.

According to one experienced staff member at the college, instances of food poisoning "occur every year."

One student affirmed that "there are always a lot of minor complaints — things that get on your nerves." Asked for specific examples, he cited instances of poorly cooked food, and food which often had "hair in it."

Stricken students stressed they were unaware of the poisoning while eating the dinner. "I have to say I enjoyed it," Hatton said. "But it was very, very red."

Roger Hoes, a first year pharmacy student was very angry with management. "It's pretty poor. It's a sad state of affairs," he said. "The most ironic thing is that they're on a real kick to eliminate food waste. They should make sure it's good before they have us eat it. People don't want to eat garbage."

Management has placed bright orange notices on each of the tables which say "We encourage you to eat these important food nutrients but not to waste them."

Students told The Varsity they would watch the food at the college more carefully from now on. Some blamed the chef for not noticing the bad food. Hatton said his serving of beef was "raw".

SAC Stabs at Strike Solution

By JOSEPH WRONSKI

SAC executive Monday night recommended that the university and library workers return to the bargaining table for a last ditch attempt to resolve differences.

Members of the library union, CUPE local 1230, voted 84 per cent in favor of a strike Friday, following the university's final offer of a 15 per cent raise.

A strike could legally take place Nov. 20, affecting the Robarts, Medical Sciences, Sigmund Samuel, Pharmacy, Engineering and Hygiene libraries.

Initiating the motion, SAC president Gord Barnes said in view of the serious consequences of a library strike, SAC executive should urge a resumption of negotiations.

The executive also recommended SAC be provided with a record of past transactions by Input Radio since they have agreed to handle their accounting.

The motion referred to the Input bank account set up to handle sources of income not from SAC, namely grants and income from disc jockey services.

SAC executive last week passed a motion calling for interim expenses incurred by the station be covered by funds in the account.

Stressing the need for SAC executive to have all information regarding Input expenditures, Finance commissioner Mike Treacy said "It's more important to know what happened to that account than ask for the money."

"We're asking for this information now to make sure our accounting procedures are correct," said Communications commissioner John Tuzyk. "The crucial point is if they're doing anything that impedes our bookkeeping, we must immediately rectify it."

The executive also approved the SAC recommended groups who may nominate one member to the Input board of directors. The Federation of Metro Tenants, the Metro Labour Council, the Confederation of Residents and Ratepayers Association (CORRA), the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and Pensioners Concerned were approved, with one more group to be designated.

Letters of support for Input Radio were shown to the executive, including ones from The Annex Ratepayers Association, the Bureau of Municipal Research, residents of the Niagara area community, Pensioners Concerned, Neil-Wycik College, the Toronto Community

Law School, the Big Brothers of Metropolitan Toronto, Innis College principal Peter Russell, the School of Continuing Studies, professor James Lemon and New College principal A.D. Baines.

The executive also passed a motion recommending SAC actively oppose the defacing of public property with pasted posters on and around the campus.

Lack of input shows as Grads ignore election

By BOB COLLIER

Apathy has struck U of T graduate students, and struck them hard, it seems. Not only are grads not bothering to run for election, but they never seem to get around to voting either.

The last non-election to raise a non-furor was last week's attempt to fill the 12 student seats on the Council of the School of Graduate Studies (SGS), the body that controls the grad school, its courses, its appointments, student appeals, and just about everything else affecting grad students.

"Never heard of it," you say and you won't be the only one.

In the general election last spring the School of Graduate Studies managed to dredge up the vast sum of one (1) nominee for the 12 student seats, so they did the logical thing and held a by-election last week.

This time, 11 students ran. But, in the humanities, two students were acclaimed for three seats and in the physical sciences, again, there were no nominees.

True, 2,500 students in the social and life sciences showed their eagerness by running nine candidates, but do you think anybody noticed? Six social scientists cast their vote and so did 26 life scientists, a grand total of 3.6 per cent of the electorate.

The Chief Returning Officer and graduate school secretary, Jean Gordon blamed the postal strike for the farcical vote.

"Usually, we mail out election forms but this year we had to resort to a ballot box in the SGS building on St. George Street," she said yesterday.

The Varsity — Bob White

Grads students show disinterest in SGS top council by not running in and not voting for token student membership. Seats left vacant.

To announce the change the school bought an advertisement in each of three campus publications.

"When it became obvious that very few students were voting, we phoned up Barb Cameron the president of the Graduate Students Union (GSU) and asked her for help in getting people out," she said, but even that didn't do much good.

So, in an effort to get a decent turnout SGS has decided to extend the voting period. It will now wait until the end of the postal strike, send out the 2,500 ballots and wait another month for them to come in. In the meantime, the 34 votes already cast will be left in a sealed ballot box.

The nine candidates who are feverishly waiting to take their seats on the council will be allowed to sit as voting observers until the election is finally over. Since they will have only six votes between them, the students will be allowed to divide them up in any way they want.

Cameron blames the lack of interest among grad students on the nature of the council.

"Students come to us rather than to the SGS council because we are a representative organization with effective power," she said.

On the SGS council, the student-faculty ratio is 12 to 16, but Cameron argues that the 12 student reps "answer to nobody." The GSU, instead, has general meetings periodically at which any grad student can express their opinion.

An open letter to the University

The negotiations between the university and the library workers have broken down. The university has made its "final" offer and last Friday the union rejected that offer as inadequate.

A strike threatens to close the major libraries on the campus. No matter the contingency it is highly questionable whether adequate library services could be maintained for more than a few days. By the end of this month, all strike-bound libraries could be forced to close. And all of this at one of the most crucial times of the academic year — the time for rhetoric from both sides has long since passed.

As everyone is well aware completing papers and theses and preparing for examinations is an impossibility without a well-functioning library system. The question of how the system under strike conditions is a matter of grave concern to the professional librarians as well. Under normal circumstances the library has difficulty controlling theft and vandalism — problems which would only be exacerbated with manpower reduced by two-thirds. Aware of these problems, more than one-half of the professional non-unionized librarians favour closing the libraries for the duration of the strike.

It is imperative that negotiations be re-opened immediately. The university must present a new offer and the union must respond in good faith. A refusal to negotiate at this time by either party is a gross injustice to each and every student of this university. The university must realize that the effects of a library strike are too far-reaching and extreme to allow it to be used to dramatize the university's financial position. By the same token, the union must realize that they cannot gouge excessive increases at a time of financial stringency.

It is time for students and faculty to call on both parties to return to the bargaining table and resolve the dispute irreparably damaging the university and all its members.

Should Students Break Essay Banks?

By BRAD NIXON

Stories of vaults stacked with plagiarized term papers hidden deep within university residences are part of the lore into which university freshmen are initiated.

Some of us have witnessed the naive undergraduate who hands in one of these works. He or she is met with a frigid glare and put through the awkward ordeal of explaining the merits of the work in question. After a few difficult moments, the innocent is confronted with the icy response, "This was a much better essay when I wrote it."

Yes Virginia, there is an essay bank, and yes, Virginia, for only $2.75 a page you can buy and use a xerox copy of an essay with full footnotes and bibliography. For only $4.00 a page you too can be the proud owner of an original, custom-made paper.

At the present time only two essay bank firms are operating in Toronto. Essay Services on Spadina Ave. and Quality Research on Victoria Park Ave. This is half the number that were operating in 1972-73. Those who remain sustain a flourishing business.

On a sleuthing mission to one of these dens of iniquity, I was much surprised to find familiar faces. Each patron sheepishly averted their reddened face from my view, their redness caught in their purchase, they persevered in their purchase. One woman bought three ready-made term papers. She sought and received assurance that her particular tutorial leader had not set eyes on these second-hand essays, certainly an incredible guarantee!

For $5.00 I purchased a catalogue containing "detailed descriptions of approximately 4,000 quality research papers". I was informed that a new catalogue would be available in two to three weeks.

The "old" catalogue ranged from anatomy to theology, but seems to specialize in English, History, Political Science and Sociology.

Some essays seem short and to the point. For example, under European Economics, there was listed an essay on "Textiles in the U.S.S.R." It consisted of four pages with no footnotes and no bibliography. Suggested Retail Price was $11.00.

For $14.00, one could purchase a blockbuster entitled "A Comparison and Contrast of the Socio-Political Effects of the Caste System in India and The De Facto Caste System Existing in the U.S.A." This essay had 135 footnotes and used 40 sources. "A solid graduate level paper," says the catalogue.

Scar paper has censorship scare

Threat of censorship hangs over Balcony Square, the Scarborough College student newspaper. According to Student Council President Russ Henderson, "I have the right to censor the newspaper anytime I want to. I just haven't done it yet."

At a recent Scarborough Council meeting, some council members objected to an alleged obscenity contained in a letter printed in a recent issue. SAC representative Dave Watkinson and Services Commissioner Lester Fosen, introduced a motion to censor obscenity.

Balcony Square retaliated by contacting the Toronto Star, Globe and Mail, and the Varsity.

A Star editor, Borden Spears, said: "No such precedent exists in North America. This council or whatever it is you have, has no right to invoke censorship, regardless of whether it pertains to obscenity or anything else. Here at the Star we censor ourselves, this is the right of every newspaper. If you have an editor—let him edit."

Commissioner Mike Ashoff, asked the Balcony Square to withhold a story about the censorship attempt which appeared in yesterday's issue of the paper.

Henderson rapidly retreated, reducing the grounds of contention to libel only.

Balcony Square reporter Gary Sands, who wrote the story, said the paper had "received a few threats not to print the story."

In a letter to the paper's editor, Henderson retreated from his earlier statement, reducing his grounds for censorship to libel only.

The Globe phoned Henderson for a statement, creating a tremor of anxiety at the student council office.

Layoffs a threat for next year

By JUSTIN CASS

The probability that staff will be laid off to balance the university budget is quite high according to rough budget statistics for the 1976-77 academic year, despite President John Evans' claim last spring that layoffs would not occur.

The budget is now two thirds complete and will be ready for public presentation by December 15, according to the chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on the Budget. Biochemistry professor George Connell said the committee will be reporting to the president in private session in early December.

Working within guidelines adopted by Governing Council last spring, the committee has been asked to increase income or reduce expenditure by $7.5 million. Over 30 per cent of the university income from the government has already been set.

Connell suggests the budget guidelines translate into a 5 per cent over all cut. Since 70 per cent of the budget is in salaries, staff cuts is the most logical outcome, he said. However, Connell is not prepared to make any predictions on that score.

Total expenditure for the last two years has been $181 million and $210 million respectively. The net deficit is currently $2.2 million which Connell feels should "get lost" in the day-to-day cash flow of the University.

The main objective of the committee is to produce a balanced budget for 1976-77.

There is little possibility for the university to increase its income from sources other than the government. Student fees are less than ten per cent of the total income.

This is approximately equal to the income received from residences and various interest yielding investments, Connell said.

Connell, who was selected by U of T president John Evans to chair the committee, is not sure that a balanced budget can be achieved.

The overall effect of the budget, "could be quite damaging to the university," he said, but refused to elaborate further before the Governing Council gets a chance to review the committee's recommended budget in December.

Estimated enrolment for this year is 37,500 full-time students of which there are 28,250 full-time undergraduates. This is 4 per cent higher than last year. Next year's enrolment is expected to stay level.

Government financing of the university operating budget is based largely on enrolment.

Residents protest athletic decision

By ERIC McMILLAN

The athletic complex planned for the corner of Spadina Avenue and Harbord Street is one step closer to realization following a tempestuous meeting of the city's Building and Development Committee.

Residents from the university's vicinity showed up at the meeting to protest a by-law which would allow the complex to exceed present density limits.

The committee voted to pass along the by-law, with only Aldermen Dan Heap and John Sewell consistently dissenting in the committee's motions. The vote effectively gave municipal approval to the by-law, since it has previously passed third reading at City Council.

Some of the residents are angered by their reception at the meeting during which they were labelled "a bunch of idiots with deformed minds" by Alderman George Ben. Community organizer Marie Murphy said she and area resident Rose Smith are sending a "communication to council" to protest Ben's remarks.

"People should not have to come down to a committee and take that kind of abuse from an elected official," Murphy said.

Both area residents and the university administration were represented by deputations to the committee. Special assistant to the vice-president Jack Dimond argued on behalf of the university against further study of the university's expansion plans.

"It is difficult to imagine what benefit a further planning study would be at this point," said Dimond, claiming that all objections from the residents have been considered already.

Resident Rose Smith argued "the only contact the Huron-Sussex Residents has had with the university was once in June 1974."

Heap said the university's attitude "illustrates very effectively the solid ground of the residents' objections. He asked Dimond what assurance the university could give that its promises not to expand further into neighbourhoods are any more reliable than its promises in the past."

Dimond maintained the university would not greatly expand again before 1990. After the meeting he expressed satisfaction in the committee's passing on of the by-law.

Murphy and Smith hope their objections will be heard by the Ontario Municipal Board when the by-law goes before it for provincial approval.

New UFW film shows tomorrow night

Although it is not a typical blood-and-guts epic cranked out in Hollywood, the United Farm Workers' (UFW) film "Fighting for Our Lives" has enough violence in it to bring even Judy LaMarsh running. She, and anyone else who is interested, will have a chance to see the film, which was entered in the Grenoble Film Festival, and which features performances by Joan Baez and Taj Majal, on Thursday, Nov. 13, at 7:30 pm in Cody Hall, 50 St. George St.

The U of T boycott committee is screening the hour-long documentary in an attempt to raise much-needed funds for the ongoing secret ballot elections in the fields.

Ed Seymour, recently returned from California, will be present at the showing to report on the progress of those elections. Refreshments will be served at the Newman Centre after the film. Admission is $2.00 for students and $5.00 for everyone else.

Hart House area was cordoned off for an hour yesterday as this crane hoisted to the top an entire replacement set of bells for the Hart House Tower.

Council pres's meet Parrott

A party of three U of T student council heads are trundling off to meet the brand new Minister of Colleges and Universities this week with a shopping list of things they would like to have done. Nobody is quite sure what the reception will be.

Gord Barnes, representing full-time undergrads, Immo Weinrich representing part-time students and Barb Cameron representing graduate students, will meet with MCU's Harry Parrott to see what the government will do about the U of T Act, student aid, and university financing.

The U of T Act is first on the list. When it was passed by the legislature in 1971, the composition of the Governing Council was a matter of some contention and a review as promised. The review has been finished for a year and the government has been sitting on it. SAC is once again presenting its brief on the subject before the university's report goes to the legislature.

At present the council's composition allows for 12 faculty and 8 student members. The three representatives have called for equal representation of 14 members each. Governing Council has recommended 13 faculty and 11 students. The SAC brief has also called for more representative government participation on council as well as a completely open budget process. The brief has been endorsed by numerous college student councils.

Parrott will also be confronted with firm evidence of the effect of government fiscal policy on the university. Barnes cited the reduction of lab offerings, the curtailment of Erindale's free bus service and the threatened infirmary closing as some of the topics for discussion. Barnes hopes they can make some headway in getting across to the government the severity of the situation.

Next on the list is the concern that students are starving because of the government's room and board allowance under the Ontario Student Assistance Program.

The allowance was $32 a week last year. Even though a U of T report at that time stated that the subsidy should be a minimum of $46.50 a week, the government raised this year's to $40. The three heads will attempt to pin Parrott down on a future promise.

They're not listening to Bethune

"There is a rich man's tuberculosis and a poor man's tuberculosis. The rich man recovers and the poor man dies."

Norman Bethune, one of Canada's and the world's most famous doctors, wrote those words in 1932. Forty years later, we could enter into lengthy discussion on whether the situation still rests the way Bethune described it, but that's for later.

On Nov. 12, 1939 Bethune died helping the wounded in the Chinese war against Japan's transgressions into their land. He worked in the middle of combat, sewing the wounds of the soldiers of both sides. "In the community of pain, there is no enemy," he wrote later.

Bethune was a revolutionary in many ways. Many of the trends in present medical thought, such as government-run health programs and more importantly, preventive medicine, found fruition from Bethune's writings and his example. His maxim was to bring the "doctor to the people" and his emphasis on the social responsibility of the doctor.

Ask any graduate of the University of Toronto Medical School what he thinks a doctor's responsibility is. A cynic, of which there are probably no small number, will say "to make a tidy pile of green things." A middle-of-the-road man would probably say "to treat my patients when they come to me." A bullshit artist would say "to treat the humbled masses of all colors and creeds" and then locate his private practice in Rosedale. An honest man would say "I don't know."

Do they give any thought to their actions as a group, as a privileged class? One would think not; the constant challenges to their positions as holders of the nation's health seem to have fallen on deaf ears. There is little self-consciousness about the role of the medical profession in this society. But they do make public statements on the admissibility of "foreign students" into their medical schools and constant complaining about government interference in the profession through the introduction of health-care plans.

It's fairly clear that Norman Bethune's spirit is not shared by many Canadian doctors. From most accounts he was a selfless man, intent on bringing medicine and medical education directly to the people before the people had to come to him. Chances are he was always available for house calls. Instead of haranguing the government for its health care, he was at the forefront of those who demanded that the government make the nation's health its first priority.

Bethune went beyond this. It's not a large logical step but it is a large practical step for a man to come to the understanding that it is doctors and government together that keep the poor unhealthy and then to act upon it. Bethune wasn't comfortable in Canada; he took his art of healing and his political beliefs and put them together where they would do the most good — in the places where his beliefs were being tested and fought for.

Bethune was an internationalist. He believed that doctors were universal and without quail travelled thousands of miles to China to practise this belief. He proved it beyond a shadow of a doubt. He is revered by Canadians and Chinese alike.

We are constantly being pushed into believing that the differences between "Chinese" students and "Canadian" students are insurmountable. The same with doctors, we are told. One physician from our medical school opined in the Globe and Mail that just as he would feel strange practising medicine in China, it is equally tough for someone from China to practice here. The ghost of Norman Bethune laughs heartily at that chestnut.

Bethune, a Canadian in Chinese mythology.

A curse on all book hoarders, secreters and anti-communal types

The impending library strike has forced students into strange situations, we admit, but there is no excuse for some of the tales we've been hearing.

Students hassling over books at the desk, entire reading lists cleared out of the library and probably sitting in one person's livingroom and students leaving the library with scores of books are some of the pictures we hear of.

This idea of "every man-woman for him-herself" is not by any means the best way to go about lessening the impact of this possible strike. Some concept of communality has to quite quickly move into operation.

A course's booklist should be immediately handed to one person in each class who will be given the responsibility of taking what is left of it out of the library and the books should be placed in convenient places known to all. Some sort of charge-out system has to be devised that will preclude the possibility of theft while allowing a constant exchange of material between students.

If you have a book or books that a number of people are dying to obtain, you might devise a way of circulating it that would allow you as first borrower the opportunity of recall. Make it public, you'll probably gain a few friends. Nothing like adversity . . .

Anyways, a pox on all those hoarders. Have you no shame? May your brain cells turn to porridge and flow out onto your pillow tonight.

Mr. Huuzah is upset

Apologiwoggies. Monday's editorial did not intend to give the impression that our respected and beloved leader, SAC communications commissioner John Tuzyk, was remiss in his duties.

It is implicit in our statement, we agree, that somebody is not doing their job and it seems that John's is the closest to what that job should be, so we should qualify our statement.

John's job is riding herd on Input Radio, The Varsity, and all other campus publications, not, as we seemed to say, cranking the presses for SAC's own informational ventures. That job belongs to each specific commission. They are responsible for their own publicity, or lack thereof.

To the Editor:

A disclaimer appeared in the Nov. 7 Varsity in which the editor, Paul McGrath, informed readers that his name had been used improperly on a poster listing sponsors for the Nov. 5 meeting of Katie Curtin. The implication of the disclaimer was that another sponsor of the meeting, the Young Socialists, had intentionally used his name "without any authorization."

Certainly it is McGrath's right to withdraw his sponsorship of the meeting or dissociate himself from it if he so decides, whatever his reason. However, what we do object to is his implication in the disclaimer that he had never sponsored the meeting or that his name had been used without permission. This is simply not true.

We'd like to set the facts straight. Over two weeks ago McGrath signed a petition urging SAC to provide funds and agreed to sponsor the meeting, along with other groups and individuals, with the understanding that his name would appear on the poster. A week later, when the poster came out, McGrath contacted us to ask why his name was on it. We therefore met with McGrath and showed him the petition he had signed earlier and he admitted that he had completely forgotten this. It was agreed that his name would be removed from any subsequent publicity because he felt that it was implied that The Varsity was sponsoring the meeting. However no publicity was produced after this date.

We did and still do apologize for any misunderstanding but maintain that the error was not ours. It is untrue to say, as the disclaimer does, that his name was used "without any authorization."

Barbara Stewart
Young Socialists

And the Trots, for that matter

Not to mention the editor

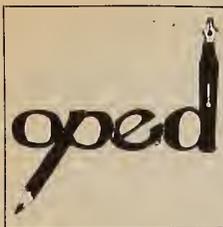

On a busy afternoon I did indeed sign the petition, the topic sounded interesting. I am however, quite leery of posters and aware of past problems Varsity editors have had with this particular aspect of politicizing. I gave no permission for the use of my name on a poster, and I did not support the rally, rather I signed a petition asking SAC consider giving money to have her speak. There is a very real difference, and I know that the YS is well aware of this difference and was quite aware of my reluctance to have the paper appear to sponsor the rally.

So is the Canadian

The Canadian Magazine would like us to correct the impression we gave in last Wednesday's issue that their editorial content was somehow decided upon by the Toronto Daily Star.

This is not true. The Canadian Magazine is owned jointly by the Star and Southam Press Ltd. Neither of these companies has any say in the editorial content of the magazine.

Economic controls and immigration: There are links

The increasing blows to the imperialists by oppressed peoples of the third world has intensified the contradictions between labor and capital in the capitalist centres. The victories of the Vietnamese, Cambodian, Laotian, and Mozambican peoples have extended the socialist camp and consequently limiting the ability of the capitalists to exploit the labor and resources of these areas.

Since August 1971, the capitalist crisis has escalated. The Canadian bourgeoisie — partners of the U.S. in global plunder — attempted to recoup losses by rabid exploitation of the working class. The push to exploit workers came on two fronts:
 o There was an inordinate increase in the price of everyday consumer items. This increase in prices led to spiralling inflation and uncontrolled profits while the poor suffered.

o The Canadian government, the guardian of the capitalist class, at the same time began to place the blame for inflation and unemployment on immigrants — especially non-white immigrants — from the Caribbean, South America and the Far East.

Since October of 1972, the ruling party through its mouthpiece the Toronto Star embarked on an orchestrated campaign against immigrants. Unofficial restrictions were invoked in the fall of 1972 and nightly many Caribbean nationals faced instant deportation at Malton and Dorval airports. Those non-white immigrants already in the country underwent harassment, persecution and innumerable hearings. Many young lawyers made money out of promises to scared workers who were persecuted while they were exploited in sweat shops, being paid below the minimum wage.

The capitalist debacle created in its wake layoffs, speedup, and increasing unemployment. By 1974, with food prices and the price of energy rising by leaps and bounds coupled with 700,000 unemployed the ruling party proved incapable of dealing with the class responsible for unemployment, the capitalists. The attention was focused on immigrants. In Montreal the small group of Haitian refugees were rounded up and deported. The Green Paper hearings were initiated in order to drum up popular support for the government's racist programmes.

The established media led the call for the necessity of the hearings. Under the leadership of the black community, progressive organizations and church groups righteously opposed the Green Paper. The working class refused to believe that unemployment, layoffs and rising prices was the result of too many immigrants. The workers know that for Canada to develop, there is need for more workers, and worker control of the commanding heights of the economy. The massive protests at the Green Paper hearings reflected the public response to the government's PR job. At the same time the RCMP, the immigration dept., and metro police in cooperation with the Globe and Mail, tried to blame black people in general and the Rastafarian brethren in particular for the economic recession and the resulting increase in petty crime. It was only staunch opposition from the black community which prevented the RCMP, the Immigration dept., and police from carrying out their planned "joint force operation". However individual immigration officers demonstrated their racism in dealing with blacks.

The idea of blaming the immigrants for the country's recession was a move by Trudeau and his clique to buy time until the American economy showed signs of recovery. The immigrants were at the same time the least organized of the total population. But the U.S. economy would not recover. The leading capitalists clamoured for anti-worker legislation. To show their opposition to Trudeau's inertia, the darling of the capitalists John Turner, resigned from the Cabinet. He wanted to bide his time to become Canada's misleader.

The resignation of Turner precipitated a panic by Trudeau and his team. With the departure of the liberal Liberal Gerald Pelletier from the Cabinet the anti-worker ministers notably, John Munro, Mitchell Sharpe, Bryce MacKassey, Robert Andras and A. Gillespie pressed for restrictions on the demands of organized labor.

Wage and Price Controls

Behind the babble of wage and price control the only concrete proposal and mandate of the Anti-Inflation Review Board was to pauperize workers, especially the non-unionized workers who comprise more than 70 per cent of the labor force. The proposed law will coerce more than 4 million workers. Prices could be increased if the companies could justify increased costs. But every child who has been to grade school knows that big companies can easily inflate costs, juggle figures in order to increase prices.

A cursory examination of the big food chains or the multi-national corporations will show the ease with which prices could be 'justifiably' increased. The multi-national corporation Alcan for example could say to the government's Anti-Inflation Review Board that its fuel and shipping costs have risen. But the same Alcan, controls Saguenay Shipping lines as a subsidiary company. The multi-nationals control many companies registered in other countries. They can inflate costs in one subsidiary to increase prices of consumer items sold to the public. The same is true for the Canadian capitalists like E.P. Taylor, Medougald or Garfield Weston who control Dominion Stores and Loblaws. In particular Garfield Weston — with his extensive interests in South Africa — he also controls bakeries, farms, financial institutions and the Loblaws supermarkets. For these capitalists the task of falsifying costs is a measure of success in business.

The guidelines for prices will not affect the big capitalists. Their profits will continue to rise. In 1974 one of the big food companies reported profits of 122 per cent. The price of gasoline has increased more than 82 cents per gallon. There are no workers whose wages has increased 100 per cent in the past five years. In fact the real money income of non-unionized laborers has declined in the last five years.

On Tuesday, October 14th, 1975, the Finance Minister — himself the parliamentary representative of the super rich neighbourhood of Rosedale — declared that there would be no limit on the price of energy and of food, the chief culprits behind inflation. The rationale of the finance minister was that 'the price of oil and gas produced in Canada should gradually climb to world levels' in order to allow the big companies to search for more energy, and 'the high prices will have the effect of reducing consumption and promoting conservation.' Mr. McDonald was simply echoing the justification of the big oil companies in their greed for excessive profits. After all at the end of 1973, Imperial Oil Ltd., registered the highest profit of any Company operating in Canada with a net income of $228 million. There is absolutely no justification for the high price of oil and natural gas.

The Minister did not have any justification for allowing the price of food to increase. He would probably want the poor to reduce consumption and possibly starve. Of course the barons of the food industry did not yet develop the impressive public relations campaign that the oil companies have been pushing for the last two years. The policy of the Liberal Party, however, regarding profits has been clear. The Toronto Star of October 18, 1975, re-echoed this fact.

Q. Is the government proposing to put the lid on profits?

A. Not at all. The government wants to promote profits, but only if such profits are accompanied by increased profitability. Amen!

The state is indeed promoting plunder for profits. The landlord and the land speculators get richer behind spiralling rents and the unbelievable price of homes. The owners of the big food chains stamp new prices on products weekly. The shameless collusion between the oil conglomerates and past Ministers of Energy is yet to be fully revealed to the public.

The offensive against the worker is being carried out without an organized party representing the interests of the working class. The lukewarm response of the Union bureaucrats would seem to suggest that they will allow the bourgeoisie to place restraints on wages but allow profits to rise. None of the union leaders has registered the minimum response of workers: A General Strike. The Canadian Labor Congress intends to lobby for changes — adapting the behind the scene role of the industrialists — while the leader of the Ontario NDP warned workers "to avoid confrontation." The workers have been confronted by the powerful interests in this country. The mass of unorganized workers are subsequently defenceless while Trudeau travels around the country dining with the rich assuring them that he will coerce labour.

Proposed Immigration Legislation

The anti-worker sentiment in the country is the same motive behind the proposed immigration legislation. The proposals were leaked to the press to test public reaction. Promptly the Toronto Star in its leading editorial of October 22, 1975, supported the proposed laws as fair. The Star was of course privy to information about the law although Andras complained that the law was still in Committee Stages. The proposed immigration policies are similar to the quota system of the United States, England, South Africa and Australia. The draft report proposes annual quotas of about one half one per cent of the current population. (The Indians never placed quotas on the white settlers who stole their land and are now trying to manipulate them to steal the oil rich land in the North.)

More important the proposed legislation would drastically reduce the number of immigrants in the nominated category. Black people have been migrating to Canada since the days of the Empire Loyalists, 1776. However the most recent wave of large numbers of black people have arrived since 1964. In practice therefore the restrictions on the persons in the nominated categories will mean that black people will be separated from their families for much longer periods. The West Indian mother who left her children with other members of the extended family will have great difficulty in bringing her child to Canada especially in the many cases where the child does not bear the same name as the parent. The Committee makes noises about the non-discriminatory basis of the law, disregarding race, religion, sex and national origin. Yet the lawyers at Parkdale legal services can verify that it is the non-white immigrants who have faced the brunt of restrictive immigration laws and the racism of individual immigration officers.

The wage and price controls and the draft immigration policies reflect the ideological backwardness of the Canadian State. The valiant days of the violent struggle between labor and capital in Winnipeg in 1919 is now history. It is possible that the CLC will lobby to seek backroom deals with Trudeau in order to get exemptions. The black worker and other progressive workers must begin to plan massive campaigns against the bourgeoisie. The harsh reality is that the most oppressed sectors of the society are at present the least organized. The black worker who faces dual oppression must struggle to begin the kind of organization among the working class which will begin the process towards the socialist transformation of the economy.

What is the pie?

How big is it

To the Editor:

Ms. Mallin's letter to the editor—on Monday, uses as the basis of her argument the basic theory of pie. The problem with this theory is that no one will say how large it is or how much it goes where and why. Indeed it seems to vary in size depending upon the occasion, and the need.

One of the real questions behind this assumption as well as the struggles between CUPE 1230 and the University administration, or on a larger scale between organized labour and the Federal government is the question of the source of the problem of inflation.

It is not the workers who cause inflation, it is the demand by big business for increased corporate profits.

It is hardly fair that the working people of this country be forced to pay the price of this greed.

One must give Ms. Mallin credit for correctly labelling the latest Federal proposals "a wage control policy". In light of the above it is quite understandable that CUPE 1230 will be helping to fight this legislation, but it will not be doing so regardless of its membership. It will be doing so because of its regard for the welfare of its membership and because of the firm belief that the University does in fact have the resources to satisfactorily settle the contract disagreements with CUPE 1230 without doing great harm to the well-being, or efficient functioning of the University.

By gaining a good contract CUPE 1230 will be helping to combat this latest attempt by the government to keep the workers down, and making them pay to keep large corporations pleasantly solvent. Since the legislation has not to date been passed into law it still exists as nothing more than a proposal and it is important to prevent it from going beyond this level.

As can be seen from the latest vote cast by the union membership it will be more than just the CUPE 1230 executive which will be replying to the insult of the University's latest reply in the event of a strike.

There will of course be a short-term loss of salary for CUPE 1230 members in the event of a strike, and it would seem to be Ms. Mallin's intimation that they may not be able to afford it. The considered opinion of this writer is that they cannot afford not to.

For some reason Ms. Mallin seems to see unionization of other sectors as detrimental to the university in that they will all demand higher wages without regard to the effects this would have on university activities. If they feel they need a better working situation they will do what is necessary to achieve it. On the adverse effects she points out is the reduction of the salary bill for non-tenured staff, but it could perhaps be pointed out that the University has been working at this already.

We (workers in CUPE 1230) are doing our best to prevent staff reductions and concomittant declines in the services of the library which Ms. Mallin holds so dear by demanding a better contract which includes this provision.

The best thing students and staff could do to most effectively reduce the length of time the library's functions will be upset is to call upon the library administration for a quick and satisfactory settlement of the contract demands and give what support they can to library workers so they can continue the high level of academic excellence of which the U. of T. library is the heart.

Take union demands seriously

To the Editor:

The Library workers have voted to reject the University's contract offer and to go on strike. Students are asking, "What happens to essays?" and teachers and students ask, "What happens to our research? our carrels? our offices?" Certainly prudence dictates that we ask these questions and consider alternatives when the library workers go on strike.

But postponement of essays, and even of exams, is only a short term solution. The longer the strike goes on, the longer things must be postponed; everyone must suffer, and some people's education will be permanently damaged.

Simcoe Hall has said it wants to keep the Libraries open. The Administration is quoted as saying, "The Public must be served." The Public means you and me — faculty and students who use and need the Library: who would not be here if the Library were not as good as it is. If the University Administration cares about the Library and the public it serves, it should listen when we tell it what would really be of service to us. That is, to offer the workers a decent wage and decent working conditions, so that they, and we, can get back to work.

A long strike will not benefit either the Library or the workers or the University community. However, the Administration does not seem to hear the workers when they say this. Perhaps if we speak they will hear us, the public they are concerned to serve. We must tell them to propose a decent wage and take union demands seriously. Write to the President of the University; let him hear from the members of the University he heads. If we, the "public," have no impact on the Administration, then who else is there?

Pro librarians misrepresented

To the Editor:

As a fully qualified librarian (with an M.L.S. degree, that is) employed in the Serials Dept. of the University of Toronto Library, I wish to clarify some misleading information contained in your newspaper on p.3, November 5, 1975 issue, in an article signed "Bob Collier", headed "Librarians: Strike-Close".

It may be of interest to inform you that there are some 120 professional librarians employed in the University of Toronto Library, and a rough estimate is that approximately 60 to 65 of those 120 are LAUT members. In other words, LAUT speaks for one-third, roughly, of all professional librarians throughout the University of Toronto, a minority of them.

As a librarian employed here since December 1964, I can see the point of and sympathize with some of the union (CUPE Local 1230) demands, but may disapprove or be unsympathetic with the rest of them. That however is not the point. The point is that your article, very incorrectly, implied that LAUT speaks for professional librarians of Student says essay services argument shifts the blame

To the Editor:
Over the past two months I've watched with interest the mounting tirade against term papers. I must admit to having very little sympathy for the university, if only because more emotion than reason is being expended on the issue.

Suggestions, such as the one made by Prof. Drake in Monday's Varsity, that essay banks are causing a decline in the value of the BA, are completely unfounded.

There is absolutely no evidence concerning the number of term papers used in the university, where they are used, who uses them, and how good they actually are. As far as employers are concerned, it is doubtful that they care whether or not a student graduated cum laude; all they want is the BA.

Admission to graduate school, on the other hand, depends as much on the professor's recommendation as on the student's marks, and I hardly need point out to Prof. Drake that a professor who recommends a student who uses essay banks should not be at the university.

It follows that those who attack essay services with little data and even less logic behind their arguments, can rely only on vague appeals to justice to enlist the "poor" undergraduate against the "rich" undergraduate. But do you myself, as both a student of this university and a representative of the publishers of the Varsity, that the editors would not allow the publication of unsigned, anonymous letters that could place the publishers of the Varsity in a compromising legal position.

on educational grounds if they serve to introduce the pampered university student to the notion that money talks.
What disturbs me most, however, about the campaign against essay banks is the extent to which it clouds the issue of quality education in the university.

The activism of the sixties was due in large part to the poor quality and irrelevant nature of university education, to say nothing of its moral and intellectual bankruptcy.

The campaign against essay banks, then, allows the university to shift the blame for failing to provide that education from its shoulders to the straw shoulders of a straw man.

Rosenthal does not stand alone

To the Editor:
Peter Rosenthal is not "the only person who stands between us and a total whitewash of the bizarre patterns of events in the Faculty of Medicine." In fact, he is only one of the many members of the Committee Against Racism who are supporting Henry Fong and attacking racism in the Medical School.

If the verdict in the Fong case is favourable, CAR will hold a victory party to initiate the next round of our fight against U. of T. racism; if the verdict is unfavourable we will hold a mass meeting to plan how to reverse it a higher level. In either case CAR will continue the struggle. One person alone can't seriously combat racism at a large institution like U. of T., but an organization like CAR can. We can do even better if more people join with us — we need you!!!

Varsity "slip-shod, unprofessional"

To the Editor:
I read with some dismay the letter to the editor entitled 'SAC threatens Toike Oike' in the November 10th issue of the Varsity. This letter, signed in my name, takes Eric Hartwell to task for his editorial in the November 6th issue of the Toike Oike in which Hartwell attacked SAC for its small project aid grant to his newspaper. I did not pen that letter, nor had I any information of it prior to its printing.

This letter at first confused me, but the realization that this was just another indication of the slip-shod and generally unprofessional manner in which the Varsity is being run this year cleared my state of confusion. It would be hoped by myself, as both a student of this university and a representative of the publishers of the Varsity, that the editors would not allow the publication of unsigned, anonymous letters that could place the publishers of the Varsity in a compromising legal position.

BLOOD AND OIL MIX IN

Gulf's oil wells, acres of coffee, tons of copper, and millions in diamonds

A bloody trio of armies are battling for control of newly liberated Angola. The Chinese have supplied arms and aid to all three groups. Strangely, the CIA has also given guns to two of the organizations, and the Soviet countries have shipped arms to the third.

A page from the MPLA's cartoon handbook for guerrillas.

A new nation has been born in Africa, and baptized in blood. After 500 years as Portugal's colony, self-government is at hand for Angola. But the urgent question of who will form the new government has not been settled, as three armies, supplied with money and munitions by the world's superpowers battle for control of this west African nation.

About 75 per cent of the country, including the capital, Luanda, and most of the thousand mile coast line of Angola is controlled by the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). A broadly based group, MPLA's membership crosses ethnic boundaries with members from the Kimbundu, Ovimbundu, and Bakongo tribes, as well as mestizos (people of mixed race), and even white Portuguese settlers.

The MPLA has committed itself to gradually nationalizing the holdings of Gulf Oil, near Cabinda, in the north, and the property of other multinationals "exploiting oil, diamonds, iron, gold, phosphates, sugar, coffee, sisal, etc. — multinationals from America, Belgium, South Africa, and England," according to Paulo Jorge, MPLA member responsible for External Affairs.

ANTI-COMMUNIST

Much of the north is held by the Front for the National Liberation of Angola (FNLA). The New York Times correspondent reports that "Ideologically, it is strongly anti-communist. In Luanda, it is seen as strongly anti-mestizo, and anti-Kimbundu." According to the MPLA, the FNLA is more accurately a foreign invasion force than a liberation army, because about 60 per cent of their troops are natives of Zaire, not Angola.

UNITA, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, a more liberal, but still anti-communist organization, dominates the dry but mineral rich area around Nova Lisboa.

WHITE MERCENARIES

Recently reports have indicated some 500 soldiers, including over 150 white mercenaries in the employ of an FNLA-UNITA joint command, have seized two MPLA controlled coastal towns, Benguela and Lobito. They are reported moving quickly towards Luanda, through sparsely settled country. Similar battles underway just north of Luanda have left large areas contested as the armies battle for control.

About 1,500 soldiers are poised to attack Cabinda from across the nearby Zaire border. Another 700 troops have been sited under the control of Mike Hoare, a well-known mercenary, and veteran of the battle for the Belgian Congo, now renamed Zaire. The MPLA has about 30,000 guerrillas fighting with them.

The FNLA-UNITA have announced that the new capital of Angola will be in Huanbo, formerly Nova Lisboa, a town they control. The announcement, which was issued, curiously enough, from Zaire, indicates that they have declared Holden Roberto, reputedly a CIA favourite, as the new president.

Intervention from the three world super-powers, and the Organization for African Unity (OAU) have lifted this struggle, over a country that is about the same size as Quebec, beyond the realm of obscure African tribal clashes.

CHINA AIDS ALL THREE

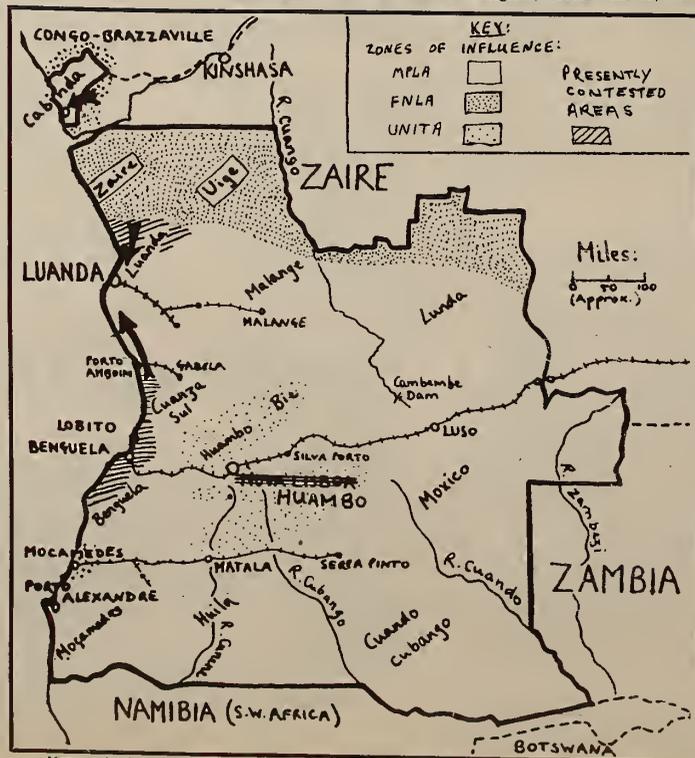

China has supported all three groups at one point or another, according to the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Southern Africa (TCLSA). "China was the first to give aid to the MPLA in the early sixties. It began to support UNITA in 1967. In 1974, China began to provide aid to FNLA with both weapons and (roughly 200) military trainers supplied via Zaire.

"A delegation of senior MPLA representatives visited China in June 1975 and . . . a communique (was issued) indicating no further arms or supplies (would be given) to any 'liberation group' in the 'Angolan Liberation Movement' prior to November 11. There is no indication of withdrawal of Chinese trainers." The Chinese government has since announced that they will support the OAU's request for a coalition "government of national unity."

CIA AID BEGUN BY JFK

Strangely, of the three groups supported by the Chinese, two are also supported by the CIA, and one by the Soviet Union.

"Four official sources in Washington" revealed in a recent Mercenaries in the employ of FNLA-UNITA are marching towards Luanda, while 1,500 soldiers prepare to attack oil-rich Cabinda from Zaire.

ANGOLA

Hands are at stake here.

New York Times article that CIA involvement in both Portugal and Angola "amounted to several million dollars a month over the last several months.

"The operation in Angola, the sources said, led to the reactivation of Holden Roberto, head of the FNLA, the man chosen in 1962 by President John F. Kennedy, and the CIA to forge a link between the United States and the indigenous groups who were expected to drive Portugal from Angola one day.

"Beginning with Moscow's attempt to gain a foothold in Zaire, which was previously the Belgian Congo, from the time Patrice Lumumba was ousted, through the short career of Moise Tshombe, until General Mobutu came to power, a number of authoritative sources related, the CIA has maintained its largest African station in Zaire (Angola's neighbour to the north).

ALL IN THE FAMILY

"At about the same time, in the early sixties, the sources said, President Kennedy determined that Portugal, an American ally in NATO, could not sustain control over her African colonies indefinitely, and that contact must be made with future revolutionary leaders. In 1960, on the advice of the CIA, among others, Mr. Roberto, the brother-in-law of General Mobutu (ruler of Zaire) was selected as a future leader for Angola.

"The sources said that from 1962 to 1969 the CIA supplied Mr. Roberto with money and arms, but to little avail. At that point, they said, he was deactivated and put on retainer.

"Mr. Roberto was reactivated this spring, according to the sources, at about the time it became clear that the then Communist-leaning government of Portugal ordered his armed forces in Angola to give active support to the Soviet-backed MPLA, headed by Agostino Neto.

"But the sources said that CIA operatives and American diplomats judged that United States support should also be thrown behind Jonas Savimbi, the leader of UNITA.

"It could not be learned," continued the Times report, "whether Chinese and American officials had ever discussed or sought to coordinate their efforts against Mr. Neto. What was learned was that American funds were being used to buy arms for both Mr. Roberto and Mr. Savimbi, and that the Chinese were providing military advisors for Mr. Roberto, and perhaps for Mr. Savimbi as well.

SOVIET SUPPLIES

"... The following details were reliably supplied on Soviet aid to its supporters in Angola (MPLA): In March several Soviet planes landed in the Congo Republic, Zaire's neighbour, with arms and equipment that were then shipped to Angola. In April, about 100 tons of arms were delivered in Southern Angola by chartered aircraft; In April, two Yugoslav vessels unloaded arms in Luanda, the capital of Angola; In May and June four Soviet merchant ships unloaded vehicles, machine guns, bazookas, rifles and ammunition off Angola, and two East German and one Algerian vessel delivered similar materials."

Admitting that MPLA did receive aid from "the socialist countries", a recent TCLSA Fact Sheet on Angola added that "it got humanitarian support from Sweden, Holland, and the World Council of Churches... Where does a liberation movement in Africa, forced to take up arms to struggle for independence seek assistance?" The western nations, the Fact Sheet stated, were already supplying arms, through NATO to the very same Portuguese colonialists against whom MPLA was fighting.

"PODER POPULAR"

But the real strength of the MPLA lies in popular support, not Soviet supplies, claims Paulo Jorge, of the MPLA. "In the Shanty towns of Luanda and other major cities, committees have formed to take responsibility for water supply, for clinics, for local administration, and defence. This kind of popular participation we call 'poder popular' (people power). These structures give the people a chance to express their will and make decisions, something they could never do until now. The local committees are also organizing into a larger commission, and in this way, the people of the cities are now a strong force for the MPLA. In fact, popular defence against FNLA attacks on the capital was a major factor in the MPLA victory in Luanda."

Despite efforts by the Organization for African Unity (OAU), and the new Portuguese government to bring the three groups together, there no longer seems to be any common ground between them. Plans for a pre-liberation day election were scrapped, despite MPLA support for the scheme, because of opposition from the FNLA and UNITA. The collapse of the initial cooperation has led to outright warfare between them.

HUMAN MEAT IN THE FRIDGE

"During the military operations," said Paulo Jorge, "we had the unfortunate occasion to see the atrocities committed by FNLA against MPLA militants, and our people. In their bases we found a lot of bodies — murdered by FNLA, and in refrigerators — human organs, hearts, livers, etc. We could confirm that within the FNLA were people who ate human flesh. We do not have this custom in Angola, but it seems that it was the custom of the Bayaka tribe, of Zaire, who were in the FNLA. FNLA representatives could not be located to respond to these charges.

OIL AND BLOOD

Yesterday was an abortive liberation day. The battles continue. "All odds now favour victory by the Soviet-backed MPLA, unless the United States and China rushed huge transfusions of aid (to the FNLA and the UNITA), which is considered unlikely" by the New York Times' "official sources".

The blood will continue to flow as long as the natural wealth of Angola remains of interest to the industrialized societies. "At stake in Angola," according to the Times, "besides the enlargement of Soviet influence, is a region deemed rich in copper, industrial diamonds, and oil. Of particular interest to the United States, and to President Mobutu, the sources said, is Cabinda, an oil-rich area bordering on Zaire and separated from Angola by the Congo river. There, the sources related, the Gulf Oil Corporation continues to pump over 100,000 barrels a day."

"The sources said that the (U.S.) Administration believed that Mr. Mobutu (of Zaire) would like to annex Cabinda in the likely event of a Communist takeover in Angola... In the meantime, the State Department has approached several Congressmen with a view toward increasing American aid... This year Zaire was to receive about $20 million, but the State Department is now aiming for $60 million," according to the New York Times.

This university, or at least certain members of this university, were so concerned about the incidence of plagiarism in the academic community that they drafted an Academic Code of Behaviour which devotes itself to this issue.

Section E

1. In order to protect the integrity of the teaching, learning and evaluation processes of the University it shall be an offence for any member:

(a) with intent to deceive:
 (i) to use unauthorized aids or obtain unauthorized assistance in any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment submitted for credit in a course or program of study, or on an examination;

(ii) to represent as that of the member in any academic writing, essay, thesis, research report, project or assignment submitted for credit in a course or program of study, any idea or expression of an idea of another;

(Note: This clause covers both plagiarism in parts of a work and the case where the student obtains an entire essay, etc., and submits it as his own.)

The list of sanctions which can be imposed on a guilty student extend all the way from "caution or warning" up to, and including "expulsion".

This was not enough for the kingpins of academe. Rightly so, they seek to strike at the heart of the problem as they see it. A campaign to outlaw the nefarious term-paper pushers, albeit slow in starting, was mounted and is now reaching full steam.

Principal Russell of Innis College argued that there is a good deal of evidence to indicate that it may be seriously eroding the quality of education, particularly in the larger undergraduate courses.

John Dove, past chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee sought to activate a special committee of the Council of Ontario Universities (C.O.U.) to make recommendations. The C.O.U. provides useful service to the universities of this province in the field of research as a lobbying organization with Queen's Park.

Bill Murphy, present chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee authorized the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards to begin an investigation of the problem and to make appropriate recommendations. This work is now in progress.

The C.O.U. committee, composed of 2 law professors, 1 political science professor and 1 philosophy professor, finally recommended that "no legislation" at the provincial or federal level "be introduced" to outlaw the essay-writing firms.

However the C.O.U. Council endorsed the recommendation: "That universities be encouraged to develop definite policies on unacademic practices." It seems the C.O.U. is more concerned with the student offender and that the perpetrator of the crime remain untouched.

In the absence of a firm stand on the service itself the C.O.U. has left the U of T essay bank detractors on a limb. But the faithful few persist.

The continued prosperity of "intellectual bordellos" is clearly unacceptable to some of us. Outraged letters to the editor from faculty members have denounced academic frauds. They want to "put those term-paper publishing punks out of business." Outraged students castigate The Varsity for aiding and abetting the paper publishing pimps, by accepting ads from them.

Some believe the solution is moral discipline. Some believe the solution is prosecution, perhaps under an unfair trade practice charge, or criminal action for forgery or just plain fraud. Perhaps new legislation is necessary.

But before we unload the howitzers and let loose the panzers, let's consider who will remain unscathed. What about the students and professors who sell term-papers for profit to these firms? What about the Ph.D. submitted to a foreign university last year and then to the University of Toronto this year by a different candidate?

Does elimination of essay writing firms significantly reduce the incidence of plagiarism? Will application to the Academic Discipline Code catch the clever offender or only discourage the stupid transgressor? Does crime pay?

Should essays be outlawed? The preposterous proliferates. The bigger questions remain unanswered. Why are faculty members so out of touch with their students that they can't detect a plagiarized essay.

Why do desperate students feel driven to purchase the illusion of success? Something must be done.

Students, staff at Winnipeg argue over evaluations

WINNIPEG (CUP) — A senate committee report which states the university is prepared to administer course-instructor evaluations this year was received with much concern by faculty at the University of Winnipeg October 8.

Bob Brévik, chair of the Senate Ad Hoc Committee on Course-Instructor Evaluations, indicated the committee was prepared to start a computerized university-wide all inclusive evaluation in mid-November.

However, a special meeting has been called to discuss the matter with the concerned faculty.

Faculty concern mounted after they were told they would not be able to review the evaluation form in a full meeting of Senate before it was administered in their classes.

A recommendation from the committee, composed of eight faculty members and two students, asks that there be two evaluations in each course or half-course.

The results of the first evaluation in the middle of the course would be the sole property of the respective professor. The results of the second evaluation would be given to the Ad Hoc Committee to analyze and refine into an instrument that would be reliable.

Students have expressed concern that this second evaluation may be "out of their hands" because the committee has recommended that it be handled by the departmental chairs.

The students say the results can easily be ignored as have other instruments in the past, and they hope the meeting will offer some suggestions to get the evaluations into the students hands.

Floyd (Crazy Lips) Bogan on his famous run through the end zone, out of Varsity Stadium and into the KCR, starting a tradition.

Who can ever remember it! Both down and many to go, when Marty "Mad Dog" Smede slipped the prolate spheroid to Bogan, who stepped between the hyphen of Smythe-Fowles, the Gael's stout defensive end, and tight roped his way two yards into the end zone, across Bloor and into the KCR, before the very eyes of more than a dozen stunned spectators.

And thus was born a legend which to this day no longer exists. But it's back! Crazy legs, the Etobicoke Heel may be gone. But the peanuts, the meat pies, the popular prices, the juke box, the etcetera!

Follow Floyd's slightly-dimmed-but-never-to-be-yawned-at footsteps to the KCR.

And if that don't bring back prosperity, nothing will.

- Once again beer at popular prices - (no cover - no minimum)
- Sweeping renovations (total $97.50)
- Some of Canada's most demanded cuisine (peanuts, meat pies, etcetera).
- Live music plus continuous music from the world's finest musicians (on our thirsty juke box).

PIER PAOLO PASOLINI

By MARTIN HEAVYSIDES

"Within its crumbling walls, the 'little town' shimmers in the dark red haze of dust. 'The houses emerge, red and crumbling, beyond the red and crumbling walls; their scant towers are fortified with barbarous refinement by local craftsmen . . .'"

(Oedipus Rex, Pasolini)

The story in the Toronto Star Monday, Nov. 3 (courtesy Reuter-AFP) on the death, Sunday, Nov. 2 of the film director Pier Paolo Pasolini, began and ended with passages on the violence in Pasolini's films:

"A youth has been charged with killing Italian film director, writer and poet Pier Paolo Pasolini in a slaying reminiscent of the violent world depicted in much of his work . . ."

"Pasolini was a prominent Marxist intellectual, his poems, essays, novels and films often depicting blind violence among the rich and the poor."

As if to intimate that in some way Pasolini's own violence had come back on himself, as if to suggest in fact that the climate created by Pasolini's films had somehow made the world more possible for the kind of violence which inspired his death. The same page on which this suggestion was made of course contained four other stories, all of them violent, and one of them had as its heading thru callousness, ineptitude or "style" this bit of doggerel:

FIRE KILLS FOUR IN BALTIMORE

And so it's a moot question whether Pasolini or the newspapers contribute more to the violence of the times, since both report it. And Pasolini unlike the Star takes an attitude towards violence, one of revulsion:

Immediately the two soldiers in front rush on Oedipus, who has meanwhile drawn his sword. The other two soldiers behind are faced with the problem of getting round the carriage, which is blocking the whole of the road. One clambers up the vertical stone facing, while the others inch forward along the edge of the drop into the river, pressing his body hard against the carriage.

The King curses and wails, smearing the blood away with his hand.

The two soldiers in front are hampered by their long lances. They attack Oedipus in hand to hand combat: two beardless youths, even younger than himself. One of them is wounded straight away, and falls whimpering to the ground.

The other falls a moment later, on top of his companion's body.

In blind rage, Oedipus finishes off the wounded one, splitting open his head.

The two soldiers seem even more vulnerable, now that they are dead.

Their innocence lies there in the dust, soaked in blood. (Oedipus Rex, p. 53)

The Globe and Mail it should be mentioned however, was much more balanced in its assessment of Pasolini: "Pasolini was a prominent Marxist intellectual, his films often depicting blind violence among the rich and the poor. He exposed shocking violence to show that it was an inevitable part of life, much as he assailed it . . ."

"He was also noted for championing the cause of the poor and minorities, including homosexuals, whom he considered a minority oppressed by archaic laws."

No, any impartial observer of the issues would have to acknowledge that, what characterizes the films of Pasolini is a quality of evocative lyricism, unique to the Italian film director not "blind violence."

Nobody ever has produced the peculiar, warm, hazy and stark qualities of his pictorial imagery—certainly not the unique emotional resonances of the rich verbal imagery of Pasolini overlaid on the visual imagery.

He was a critic, essayist, philologist, poet, novelist before he directed his first feature at the age of thirty-nine in 1961. It might seem as if he'd been directing forever.

And Pasolini's work has always had a special fascination for philologists, semiologists, and aesthetic theoreticians of the film along with other directors.

Death is an interruption as much as it is a termination, and this death was certainly an interruption of one remarkable career, and the loss of how many films we can hardly guess.

For me it was also an interruption of thoughts on many other matters. I awoke at midnight that night with the death of Pasolini on my mind along with a sudden pressing need to reach some sort of conclusion about Pasolini. I hadn't suspected his work meant so much to me.

Whatever impetus provided by the sudden jolt of circumstance however, this is still not the time to attempt to reach any conclusions about the career of Pasolini.

The career itself was never terminated, only the life.

Now is not the time for a carefully measured and weighted critical evaluation of his work, but rather for a tribute to what was great in the work and in the man ignoring whatever may have been small.

Pasolini is dead. Long live Pasolini in the spirit of films past and films never to come.

NORMAN BETHUNE

Comrade Norman Bethune, a member of the Communist Party of Canada, was around fifty when he was sent by the Communist Parties of Canada and the United States to China.

A man's ability may be great or small, but if he has this spirit, he is already noble-minded and pure, a man who is of value to the people.

Mao Tse Tung
December 21, 1939

He arrived in Tenan in the spring of last year, went to work in the Wutai Mountains, and to our great sorrow died a martyr at his post. What kind of spirit is this that makes a foreigner selflessly adopt the cause of the Chinese people's liberation as his own? It is the spirit of internationalism, the spirit of Communism, from which every Chinese Communist must learn. Leninism teaches that the world revolution can only succeed if the proletariat of the capitalist countries and the proletariat of the colonies support each other.

We Chinese Communists must also follow this line in our practice. We must unite with the proletariat of all the capitalist countries before it is possible to overthrow imperialism. This is our internationalism.

Comrade Bethune's spirit, his utter devotion to others without any thought of self, was shown in his boundless sense of responsibility in his work and his boundless warmth towards all comrades and the people.

No one who returned from the front failed to express admiration for Bethune whenever his name was mentioned, and none remained unmoved by his spirit.

Comrade Bethune was a doctor, the art of healing was his profession and he was constantly perfecting his skill, which stood very high in the Eighth Route Army's medical service. His example is an excellent lesson for those who despise technical work as of no consequence.

Comrade Bethune and I met only once. Afterwards he wrote me many letters. But I was busy, and I wrote him only one letter and do not even know if he ever received it.

I am deeply grieved over his death. Now we are all commemorating him, which shows how profoundly his spirit inspires everyone.

Who broke off negotiations?

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Postal Workers announced October 20 the calling of a national strike of inside postal workers because the government had issued "an ultimatum" and broke off negotiations.

"Either accept our pay offer or we stop negotiations," was how the CUPW described the government's position expressed in an 11:00 phone call that night from chief post office negotiator Ed Waddington to postal union negotiator Jean-Claude Parrot.

The CUPW offered the next day to play a tape recording of the conversation for any reporters who doubted their claim. Little doubt was expressed, but on the other hand, little mention was made of the conversation itself.

Meanwhile, Post-Master General Bryce Mackasey denied any ultimatum had been made. "I should make this clear — that we did not issue an ultimatum," he told the House of Commons on October 23.

The CUPW has now released an English verbatim transcript of the October 20 conversation. In it, Waddington and Parrot discuss the union's response to the government's "four point" wage offer.

Since few members of the commercial press felt that this conversation was sufficiently newsworthy to run in their papers, we are reproducing the conversation in its entirety below.

Overheard on the telephone ... Somebody somewhere is fibbing

Waddington: Hello.

Parrot: Mr. Waddington?

Waddington: Yes.

Parrot: This is Jean-Claude Parrot.

Waddington: Yes, Jean-Claude.

Parrot: I have finally contacted some of my people.

Waddington: Yes.

Parrot: Finally, I think, we had agreed to meet at 9:00 and as far as the reply you have requested, a meeting is scheduled for 7:30 tomorrow morning with the National Executive Board and the Negotiating Committee especially so that we can be prepared to meet at 9:00.

Waddington: Oh, as I mentioned to Mr. Perreault, if we don't have an answer by 11:00, we will consider that the reply is negative and there will be no further meetings.

Parrot: But ...

Waddington: I am very sorry, that is final.

Parrot: But ... This is very strange. You had given your word that we would meet tomorrow at 9:00 and now you are telling us that this is final.

Waddington: Oh! well, sometimes things change, even if I mentioned 9:00, this means ... things change from time to time. This is a very fluid situation.

Parrot: Yes, but listen, things change, it is quite true that things change but between that and giving us a few minutes to ...

Waddington: We have been discussing for months and months and months and we are not prepared to continue. Either it is yes, or it is no, or ...

Parrot: Yes, but we have ...

Waddington: The equivalent of no, and that is the end of it.

Parrot: Yes, but Mr. Waddington, we have explained to you tonight that besides the 4 points, there were the other points for which we received a mandate from our membership.

Waddington: We have a program. We must not start discussing all the other points, no, that is not the way at all.

Parrot: Yes, but as far as we are concerned, in order to be in a position to ...

Waddington: Not on the 4 points. Either yes or no, and that is it. Therefore, since you cannot give us a yes answer, we must then assume that you have said no.

Parrot: But we want to negotiate ...

Waddington: Go to the press, all we have to do is exercise our rights it's as simple as that.

Parrot: Mr. Waddington, we want to negotiate, that is the question, negotiation is negotiation.

Waddington: Therefore, it is very simple, it is yes, or we take it that we don't meet any further.

Parrot: Yes, but that is an ultimatum, Mr. Waddington.

Waddington: That is an ultimatum, there is no doubt on that point, you said it.

Parrot: Yes but, listen, that is not the way to negotiate when we are faced with the possibility of a national strike.

Waddington: There is no doubt you can negotiate. Say yes, and then we will sit down after that.

Parrot: Yes, but, there will be no more negotiations after that, it will be over.

Waddington: No, it is not over. Those 4 points ...

Parrot: Yes, but that is all the wage question, it is not logical to place an ultimatum on the wage question in negotiations and then ...

Waddington: In any event, it is ...

Parrot: ... while there are extremely important clauses that still have to be negotiated.

Waddington: Tell the press what you want but that's it, if we don't get a yes answer, it is over, no more meetings, I am sorry.

Parrot: Then, you won't be there at 9:00 tomorrow morning?

Waddington: No. Nobody else will be there either.

Parrot: No one else will be there either?

Waddington: That is right.

Parrot: Then, you are breaking off negotiations?

Waddington: Well, if you want to take it that way, that that we are breaking off negotiations, you can do as you please, but it is very clear that we will not meet if you don't get a reply that ... a yes reply. But we could, for example, consider a yes reply subject to discussion of all other points if you want to sign something to this effect tonight, if you want the assurance that all other points will be discussed.

Parrot: It is most unfortunate that while we are prepared to negotiate and even initial the counter-proposals you submitted to us yesterday, while we are prepared to initial clauses that appear in the Moisan report, and while we are prepared to negotiate other points on which we are sure there could be a settlement, it is most surprising to be faced with such an ultimatum.

Waddington: Yes, but as I said, things change from time to time and that is the ultimatum. It is well understood and it is over, then. We did not get a yes answer from you and we won't meet anymore.

Parrot: Then, the meeting scheduled for 9:00 tomorrow morning is ... it's over, so ...

Waddington: That is right.

Parrot: Then, this is the Monday that ends it all, is that what you are telling us?

Waddington: I beg your pardon?

Parrot: Then you are deciding today to end everything?

Waddington: If (laughter) it is a bit on your side too. All you have to do is say yes and we will continue with the 4 points ...

Parrot: We are prepared to ...

Waddington: Except ...

Parrot: We are prepared to negotiate.

Waddington: If you say yes on the 4 points, we are prepared to continue.

Parrot: That is not negotiation, Mr. Waddington.

Waddington: Otherwise, it is over, I am sorry.

Parrot: Well, what more can I say?

Waddington: I beg your pardon?

Parrot: What more can I add?

Waddington: Add what?

Parrot: That is what I am wondering, what can we add to all this?

Waddington: Well, if you are not prepared to say yes, there is nothing to add. You are not ready then?

Parrot: Well, as I said to you, we are meeting at 7:30 tomorrow morning ...

Waddington: No, no, no, tonight, you are not prepared to say yes tonight?

Parrot: Well, we are not ready to say either yes or no tonight.

Waddington: Well then, it is over, I am sorry. Give us a call when you are ready to say yes.

Parrot: Well, O.K.

Waddington: Goodbye.

Parrot: Goodbye.

On Educating The Deaf

Say you have yourself a number of deaf kids to look after
 And they can't hear much if anything
 Maybe not even their own voices very well.
 So you got yourself a problem, brother
 Now what are you going to do about it?
 Say you want to give these kids the best you can for their cases
 And right off you've made your first two mistakes
 First, you are setting yourself up to judge what is best for another
 And, second, you are already thinking of cases and not of individuals
 You've already institutionalized your thinking.
 Anyway, let's go ahead.
 You can take the easy way out
 And teach them by means to reading, writing and their own language
 Only, nobody else except deaf-mutes, dumb Indians and technicians
 In overpaid jobs
 Use a language dependent upon no voice.
 When your group of deaf kids leave school
 Who is so smart he knows how to run the job
 And so speechless dumb he can't tell anyone how to do it.
 So these over-educated graduates get the job
 Let Joe do it, see?
 And if Joe invents an improved process,
 His workmates swipe it and their supervisor
 Takes the credit
 Gets the bonus and goes to the Bahamas for Xmas
 Just because this dummy couldn't express himself.
 So where does that leave you?
 You can decide to teach them to speak
 And spend millions trying to fool the public
 Into believing that the ability to speak
 Comes before the ability to think Every mother knows her own baby had to think Before it ever started to say 'Dada'
 Mindless idiots can talk.
 Unbelievable as it may seem,
 The men who govern us can think sometimes.
 But
 When it comes to teaching the dumb to speak
 And the deaf to hear
 Only Christ had a perfect method
 So you
 Bing a hearing aid into an ear
 And it
 Drags the kid's face out of shape
 And gives him a permanent headache so he can't think anyhow.
 And you force him to believe it's good for him.
 Then you teach him speech, a vowel or a consonant
 Or a syllable at a time.
 Like stringing beads
 Only nobody talks like that and you're Far better off teaching him to yell
 'Twenty-fi'; 'Tirty-fi'
 Instead of
 Tuh-wenn-uh-teeef-iev
 Which is what it amounts to and Leads people to believe they heard
 Five words instead of two.
 Moreover,
 It's apt to be a bit flat
 And this is no out for a girl'
 Who is trying to pour the goo
 On a recalcitrant lover
 Who expects his women to sound

The Varsity — Mike Edwards

Flora Clark, deaf library worker. Proponent of change in the education system for deaf and hard of hearing.

Like birds in the tree-tops
 And waves on the shore and gingerbread-right-out-of-the-oven-this-very-minute.
 Only winds over forty (or after two years of marriage) Sounded like Mrs. Dracula's cousin Gertie from the crypt.
 Of course people who can hear
 Lucky sons (and daughters) of the up-tight, all right
 WASPish Middle
 Middle classless society
 Expect all civilized members of the same group
 To conform or perish in the limbo of second-class citizenship.

There MUST be a way to get the deaf to communicate!
 Only once you've taught them to speak
 They graduate
 Being unable to think
 So the boss gives them a job
 Let Joe do it, see?
 So one day Joe gets a bright idea
 And invents an improved process
 His workmates swipe it
 Their supervisor takes the credit
 Gets the bonus and goes off to the Bahamas for Xmas.
 And both methods have led to the same result.
HOW ARE WE GOING TO EDUCATE THESE DEAF PEOPLE
 And not addle their brains in the process?
 Or leave them at the mercy of the Cold, cold world?
 Well, tell them the world is cold
 And then teach them each according to his capacity
 By the method that works best for him (or her)
 And don't forget to pray, brother, PRAY!

Flora Clark

Flora Agnes Clark, who works in the Robarts Library, contracted meningitis at the age of seven and is now totally deaf.
 She is a graduate from Gallaudet College in Washington, DC, the only college for the deaf in North America.

This poem won a Golden Deftly award at the Second National Cultural tournament for the deaf and hard of hearing in the summer of 1974 in Belleville, Ontario.

Chess club in first place

By RAY STONE
The Hart House Chess Club moved into undisputed first place in the first division of the Metropolitan Toronto Chess League with a victory over the powerful Central Chess Club last Sunday. Central, minus two of their best players, offered little resistance as Hart House rolled up a score of 3 wins and 2 draws. Bob Wachtel, Bob Joyn and Dave MacLeod scored wins while Steven Boyd and Ray Stone drew their games for the Hart House side. Wachtel's game with Canadian master Brian Nickoloff was by far the most tense of the match: Nickoloff sacrificed his Queen for a vicious attack, but Wachtel defended tenaciously to score the point.

Much to the disappointment of the Varsity staff no player on either side employed the Hippopotamus opening, spoiling the chance at visual excitement.

The Hart House Chess Club, official representatives of the University of Toronto in competitive chess, plays in the Toronto League in order to warm up for the Pan American Intercollegiate Chess Championship on Dec. 26 in Columbus, Ohio. Hart House has won this prestigious tournament two years running and looks like a strong contender to repeat.

Other players for Central were Paul Nanicki, Lawrence Day, M. Petras, J. Ivanovic.

Ray Stone finds the situation amusing.

PHYS ED takes Mulock with shutout over Victoria

By JONATHAN GROSS
Sports Editor

The Mulock Cup was played yesterday at Varsity Stadium for the 82nd time in as many years. Figure that one out.

In the opener Trinity downed an overrated, undertalented football team from New 13-2 to take the "small Colleges division". On the other end of the doubleheader PHYS ED downed Vic 19-0 to win the Division I championship.

Although Trinity played well enough to win their first championship since 1946 a conservative estimate would pin the number of fumbles at half a dozen by both sides, giving a good indication of the quality of play.

New College knew they would have a tough time because in the two teams previous meeting Trinity surprised them for a 14-14 tie. There were rumors going around that many players had stomach flue due to poison in the food at New. Trinity is not guilty but as most of us know poison could only improve the cuisine at New.

Paul Lucas of New is a good quarterback who can run but the offensive line gave him nil protection and the offense never got off the ground. The only scoring for them was a two point safety touch, the reason for which was never clear as the officials made a mess of the game.

Trinity played disciplined football when they had to and although they fumbled in several key situations, the referee certified the situation by making short work of any New threat.

In the second quarter, aided by a lousy punt and a roughing the passer call, all this courtesy of New, Trinity found themselves deep in New territory. On a third and three situation Pete Irwin carried the ball in for the score.

In the fourth quarter, New gave the boys in black a chance to seal the deal by fumbling on their own 18. Rich Havas recovered for Trinity and shortly thereafter Scott Brayley, who had a super day, carried it in from the twelve on an end run.

Brayley was robbed earlier by a bad call by one of the pseudo-officials. On a short burst in the third quarter for a touchdown in which Brayley was clearly in the end zone, an official ruled that his knee had touched the ground before he went in. Quel joke.

The quarterback for Trinity, Dave Wright, said that the offensive line played a big part in the win. Wright, who also engineered the big upset over Scarborough last Thursday, gave credit to the right side especially. This trio is known as The Three Stooges.

In this game, however, it was New that had pie on their faces.

Why doesn't Terry Nedoszytko play for the Blues? Terry's passing along with his superb running ability led the Jocks to the Mulock Cup over a hapless Vic team.

Nedoszytko engineered two drives early in the first quarter to put Vic in a hole. Vic fumbled a partially blocked punt on their own 16 and Terry carried the ball in for the score a couple of plays later.

The second TD was one of those plays that you dream about. On PHYS ED's next series Nedoszytko found Bart Badali on a 40 yard bomb and Badali took it another 30 yards for the score. It was definitely time for a Howard Cosellism.

Down 13-0 at the half Vic stormed out of the dressing room looking for a comeback. An inspired defense held PHYS ED on the Vic 23 after a long drive but the all-purpose player, Nedoszytko, kicked a 35 yard field goal. It was now 16-0 and Vic had used up all of its inspired play coupons.

A field goal in the fourth quarter ended the scoring at 19-0. Along with Terry, Peter Cassidy ran the ball very well and Peter Oolup was a constant threat. Whatever offense Vic could muster was due mostly to Mike Johnson, who was a workhorse in the backfield.

After the game Terry was surprised at the early scoring pointing to the fact that PHYS ED had practiced very little as a team. It's hard to imagine what would have happened if they had.

As far as Vic is concerned, "Wait till next year."

Peter Oolup catches pass from Terry Nedoszytko in Mulock final.

Aggressive defense of Trinity bottled up New College running-backs all day.

Varsity fencers win Tourney

The Varsity men's foil team took first place at the University of Western Ontario's Invitational Foil Tournament on Saturday, November 8.

This victory augers well for the continued success of the "A" team, composed of veterans Bernard Tsui and Rick Arthur, and newcomer to the Varsity team, Mike Stephenson.

In individual competition, the members of the "A" team did equally well. Mike Stephenson winning 13 of 15 bouts, Bernard Tsui 12 of 15, and Rick Arthur 11 of 15, according to the official scoring.

It was generally felt, however, that incompetent officials bungled the score-keeping, depriving Mike Stephenson of a win which would have resulted in a barrage for first place in the individual competition.

Veteran Brad Patterson, and newcomers Richard Tai and Glynn Williams representing the men's "B" team, managed to capture fifth spot at the same tournament.

It is the hope of the Fencing Club to field a "B" team as often as possible, to encourage up-and-coming fencers with the opportunity of competition with more experienced duellists.

At the St. James Novice

Tournament the previous weekend, U. of T. fencers acquitted themselves honourably, though not outstandingly. In men's foil, Bernard Tsui took second spot, followed by Brad Peterson, Alan Stetjes, Rick Arthur, and Anton Novak in 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th places respectively.

Among the epeeists, Rob McLean came third, Elgin McMurphy fifth, and Alex Vezer sixth in a pool of nine. Sabreurs John Hepburn and Stephen Werbowy found themselves fourth and fifth at the end of a long day of fencing.

In spite of the fact that, due to a particularly high turnover from last season, the membership of the epee and sabre teams will be largely new to inter-collegiate competition, they hold out the hope of transforming a middle rank standing into a first place, as the foil team did in London last weekend.

Fencers are reminded that membership on the teams will be finalized next week, and are asked to attend the meeting on Thursday at 6:00 p.m. in the fencing salle.

Cross-country at Hart House

UC's annual cross-country race was sent off from the Hart House field last Wednesday afternoon.

The course was laid out and the event well organized by Elle-Mai Laikve and Krys Szymczyk, or PHE, and it consisted of a 2-mile course around the campus and back to the starting point.

Each runner was tabulated, and the unquestionable winner was Steven Finley, who made it back in 9:56! The next finisher was John Rafferty, with a time of 10:59, and the first of the three female competitors to cross the line was Juandy Crook in 10th place.

Dr. Mike Yealland, Director of Residences and himself a participant, who incidentally finished third in 11:47, said that the run originated as an annual event in 1886, but was later dropped and not run again until last year.

With the future in mind, if the 79 participants this year are any indication, it should remain as a yearly college event for UC.

'Coulda been a Contender'

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — San Francisco Giants owner Horace Stoneham says that his baseball team was once interested in signing Fidel Castro as a pitcher.

Stoneham, in an interview in the New Yorker magazine, recalls a scouting report he received some time back from a baseball scout in Cuba. Stoneham says, "Our scout down there was Alex Pempex, who was a Cuban. He saw Fidel Castro play ball when Castro was a young fellow and sent us a report on him."

The Giants' owner says that "Castro was right-handed pitcher. When he came up, we checked back in our files and it was the same Castro. I think if he'd stayed in the game he'd have made it to the majors."

Ed. note: And think where the Cubans would be.

Women's Hockey Tournament

The women's counterpart to the men's invitational hockey tournament was held at York this weekend, and Toronto fared better in relation to their future opposition than was expected.

With a team diminished slightly in numbers and bearing the loss of such players as Margie Goldsmith, Kathy Stead and Jackie Reeves, the future didn't look very promising when the team began practice.

However, with the maturation of some regulars and the addition of 5 players from OCE, Toronto exhibited strength this weekend that could well put the Blues with McMaster and Queen's, the top contenders in the League.

On Friday night, the Blues defeated Concordia by a score of 2-1 on goals by Betty Cook and Jan Baird. Toronto held an edge in the play, but a lack of good shots kept the score down.

On Saturday, the team lost 5-2 to the second place finishers McMaster. However, the score was tied on goals by Angela Colm and Norma Schmitt until T.O. got 4 penalties in the second half of the third period. The Mac team poured it on scoring twice.

LSAT training costs $95

By GREG RICHARDS
 "We never use the high pressure approach," said Brian O'Sullivan, area co-ordinator for a controversial $95 LSAT training course.

LSAT is the acronym for "Law School Admission Test". Next to academic transcripts, scores in the aptitude test figure extensively in a candidate's application to almost any law school in the world.

Educational Testing Service, a non-profit corporation which offers and administers the test, state in their brochure, "Since the LSAT measures intellectual qualities that develop gradually and types of knowledge that one accumulates over relatively long periods of time, no specific preparation can be made immediately before the test." In offering his course, third year law student O'Sullivan uses a 250-page curriculum developed by an education testing group at Yale. For $95 he promises participants, who are taught in seminar-size groups, an "intensive weekend training program" of twenty hours.

The basic fee does not include ownership of the curriculum book. An additional $10 deposit allows a participant, who must maintain strict secrecy "because of the material's confidential nature," to keep his curriculum volume until after writing the test. During this time "he can even walk on it with his golf shoes," said O'Sullivan.

"I am not connected with the Yale group in any way," claimed O'Sullivan, "I just use their curriculum."

"My five teachers are unquestionably qualified. They are all law students. Three of them have MA's, one has his PhD, while the one in the group with only his BA was the Niagara District Mooting Champion which lets me make allowances for him," claimed O'Sullivan.

"It's really disgusting," pointed out one 3rd year law student, "They're playing on people's fears."

LSAT training programs are apparently a popular business. Competing groups in the USA claim program trainees enjoy a 50 to a 100 point increase in LSAT scores, according to O'Sullivan, although he would make no such claim himself. O'Sullivan's program, he said, "dissects the LSAT." "People in seminars are given instruction in their weak areas."

"The mechanics of LSAT questions are examined from the instructor's point of view," O'Sullivan claimed.

All for $95.

Varg blasted at Queen's Park

By MARK L. LYONS
 It's often been claimed that the pen is mightier than the sword and Larry Grossman seems to share that sentiment.

Grossman, the rookie PC member from St. Andrews St. Patrick devoted a large segment of his Nov. 7 maiden speech to the legislature to a scathing indictment of The Varsity's election coverage, specifically as it applied to Conservative candidates.

Near the conclusion of an hour long speech that dealt comprehensively with transportation, rent control and human rights the young MPP launched into his tirade against the popular U of T newspaper.

Wading into verbal battle with bemused opposition members, Grossman claimed in reference to Varsity election coverage "I'm not naive enough really to always expect fairness — perhaps never to expect fairness being a Tory — but I couldn't resist bringing the election issues of The Varsity here today."

Grossman went on to note that The Varsity printed articles almost twice as long as his own on NDP candidate Barbara Beardsley and Communist candidate Frank Cunningham. NDP leader Stephen Lewis termed Grossman "paranoid" and claimed The Varsity's length of articles showed "excellent judgement" and concluded "that's what universities are all about — let them have their fun."

No progress on grading

By KRISTINE KING
 The Academic Affairs Committee has made no progress in reaching a consensus on grading practices at the university.

Committee members last night vaguely agreed uniformly be established by the use of letter grades as opposed to percentage marks, but could not decide what letters to include or how marks would be scaled.

The major point of deliberation by committee members was a proposal of the faculty of Applied Science and Engineering that the letter "E" be included in the marking scheme. It was felt an "E" range would fill the need for distinction as to whether a student had failed marginally or completely.

The committee favoured the addition of an "E" grade and the use of a 12 or 15 point grade average scale but hit a major road block when Associate Dean R.H. Farquharson revealed recommendations of the Arts and Science sub-committee on Standing. Farquharson said the committee will recommend to the steering committee on Monday that a Grade Point Average (GPA) system be introduced with a 4 point scale and marks be assigned according to the letters A, B, C, D or F. He said the Committee had never considered an E grade and its inclusion will "torpedo the Arts and Science plan for a grade point system."

Farquharson said the 4 point system is used at eight Canadian universities and by a majority of American institutions. He also pointed out Dalhousie University in Halifax is the only one to use an "E" scale in Canada.

It was noted that use of letter grades should be apportioned with percentages because as one committee member pointed out, students often want to know their percentage mark.

The committee appeared to think that definitions of letter grades were useful as long as they left room for individual marker's interpretations.

Campus paper commie-funded

The Varsity, the student newspaper at the University of Toronto, was rocked today by a major scandal that threatens the very existence of the century old institution.

The bombshell was dropped at a lastly convened press conference held in the North Sitting room of Hart House. Joe McArthey, spokesman for a newly formed United Students Coalition Against Radical Student Newspapers charged that The Varsity and several other prominent student publications across the country were secretly receiving funds from Communist sources.

"We have been led to believe all these years that advertising and a SAC grant were all the sources of financing that The Varsity has," said McArthey in a voice choked with emotion. "But the truth of the matter is that when you compare revenues and expenditures of The Varsity you find a shocking discrepancy."

McArthey went on to describe how he was able, with help of some secret correspondence provided by the rebel Board member, to trace the source of the funds to a national student group in Ottawa which allegedly operates as a front group for a communist organization in Soviet Russia. "The funds are channelled in from Eastern Europe," McArthey continued.

Damn, almost had it. There it was, the big story of the year, almost enough to qualify for the by now mythological Big Scoop. How come we missed it? Because there was nobody to cover it, that's why. So there.

Volunteer newspapers are a conundrum. The editors, who want nothing more than to wield total control over the lives of their reporters, are constantly met with the realization that they can't fire somebody for refusing to do a story. So compromises have to be made, on both sides.

We can't just sit here and watch the big stories of the century go down the drain, so we're playing it cool and suggesting as heavily as possible that certain reporters cover certain things.

But there aren't enough. Writers, and most importantly people with curious minds who can become obnoxious when attempts are made to confuse issues are desperately needed.

You don't like this newspaper? Put your typewriter where your mouth is and do something about it. We are for the variety of political preferences. Join us as we push fearlessly forward in search of truth, justice and a good egg-salad sandwich.

Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott has been invited by three student council heads to speak at the University of Toronto.

The invitation was extended at a meeting yesterday between Parrott and representatives from the Students' Administrative Council, the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students and the Graduate Student's Union.

The three representatives offered suggestions to the minister on student aid, the composition of the university's Governing Council and university financing. They expressed concern that "the shortfall in funding during the 1975-76 academic year will undoubtedly have significant effects."

"We are especially concerned about the 'future' (particularly 1976-77) and wonder frankly how the universities are expected to maintain their academic programs and support services," their brief stated.

In entering the speaking invitation, the three encouraged Parrott "to meet with your university and our constituency. As you know there are three campuses at the university of Toronto—we would be very pleased to have you speak at all three campuses."

Board nixes Parrott may Big Scoop essay ads speak here slips away

In an almost unanimous vote Wednesday night, the Varsity Board of Directors decided to terminate the placing of advertising for essay and term-paper services.

The vote followed two years of debate and a large amount of mail received by board Secretary-Treasurer David Simmonds, all of it recommending such action.

The motions read in full: "The Varsity shall refuse to publish any advertising which encourages contravention of Section E (1) (a) (1) of the University of Toronto Code of Behaviour."

That section of the Code, implemented as of October 1, makes it an offense "to represent as that of the member in any academic writing, essay, thesis, research paper, project, or assignment submitted for credit in a course or programme of study, any idea or expression of an idea of another."

The Varsity unit until today carried two display ads for such services on Wednesdays and three classified ads every issue. Advertising revenue for the ads was projected over the rest of the year at $400 by Varsity advertising manager Richard Frank.

"They'll be back," he said. "Next they'll be offering tutoring services. Either way, they'll reach their audience."

(the LGMB) were the first group to every try it", Campbell said, "and it was embarrassing for all involved—especially the LGMB". The LGMB did not leave the parade that year until confronted by a Deputy Chief of Police.

"Once again this year, every policeman on the parade route will be alerted to the fact that the group (LGMB) should be removed. Parade this year, must be removed immediately," reads the last sentence of the confidential document. The LGMB was not contacted for their opinion of the document for as is common with their capers "lightning rarely strikes twice."

Skulemen banned from parade

By DAVID LLOYD

In a confidential Eaton's document, it was learned Thursday that the downtown department store has greatly increased its security measures to keep unauthorized groups from entering that company's annual Santa Claus Parade.

The document, that was supplied to The Varsity, refers to the successful attempt by the Lady Godiva Memorial Band (LGMB) to enter the yearly extravaganza two years ago.

According to publicity coordinator for Eaton's Jane Campbell, Eatons have been assured by the police that it will never happen again. "They

Sad SAC Services say suds surtax stinks

By JOSEPH WRIGHT

SAC Services commissioner Doug Gerhardt is protesting what he feels to be too high handling charges on cases and kegs of beer at Hart House for a SAC sponsored dance.

The handling, or corkage, charge runs at $4 per case or $15 per keg of beer. In addition to the corkage fee, SAC pays a government gallonage tax of $1 per case and $7 per keg.

Gerhardt points out SAC must pay for the rental of the hall, $15 for the first hour and $5 per hour after that for bartenders as well as paying the food vendor required by Liquor Licensing Board of Ontario (LLBO) regulations. "I can't see where the extra expense is coming from," he said.

Terming Hart House's control of the licenced facilities as "almost a monopoly", Gerhardt said, "We know if we ran it ourselves we could do it cheaper." "All they do is order the beer from the LLBO and load it."

Hart House supervisor Rosemary

Bolitto said the corkage fee was applied to recover costs not covered by the room rental or the other fees.

She said these include the cost of the beer's delivery, cost of cups, depreciation on equipment and refrigeration space and some part of administrative costs. Bolitto admitted they sometimes made a little money.

Gerhardt said the corkage cost worked out to be $400 on 100 cases of beer, the legal maximum SAC is allowed to sell, based on 60 ounces of beer for each of a maximum of 500 people.

Services assistant Glen Cernyk said the dance would cost about $2,600 and added the dance was "an expensive service". At SAC prices of $2 advance and $2.50 for at the door admission, if the dance is only three quarters full SAC would stand to lose $700, Cernyk said.

He also thought the Hart House corkage fee was "a little exorbitant."

Despite illegality, discos discriminate

By TOM CMAJDALKA

Despite direct contravention of the Ontario Human Rights Code, many discotheques continue to advertise free or reduced admission to women clientele.

Human Rights Commission spokeswoman Kim Harris, said the policy was illegal, and that the Commission would prosecute if a warning was continued after the commission.

Harris added substantial evidence and complainants would have to be brought forward for any action to be taken.

When asked about the success of the advertising gimmick used by the popular Toronto discotheque, the Bellows, a spokesman said Bellows had a reduced entrance fee for women and that it was quite successful. When he was told that this kind of advertising was a violation of the Ontario Human Rights Code, he immediately said the reduced rates were effective on Thursdays only and that Bellows isn't open on that day any more.

However, he defended Bellows' practices as non-discriminatory. "Bars are places where women go to meet men and men go to meet women, hoping that they can rock on for that night," he said.

After being informed that various feminist organizations objected to that type of advertising, he said "There will always be some group that objects to something," and added he wasn't particularly worried about it.

"In the eighteenth century there were people that objected to theatres, but after a time they, too, were accepted," he rationalized.

He pointed out the Toronto Star and the Toronto Sun had run ads for Bellows stating that women were admitted at reduced rates.

"It was all over everywhere," he said, referring to the advertising campaign that was launched when the Bellows opened.

Last week both the Star and the Sun emphatically told the Varsity they would not print any ads which said women would be admitted at reduced rates because it would be discriminatory and a direct violation of the Ontario Human Rights Code.

Besides discotheques, many body rub parlours advertise their services "For Men Only". Rene, the manager of Pleasure Place, said he does not discriminate against women, but it would be up to his "girls" whether or not they would "rub a chick". All the women present said that they would do it.

Rene however, said he would not change his sign because "it would be too much trouble" and that he had "a lot of money to get good lawyers to delay any court action until the claimant ran out of money." When asked what he would do if a claimant had enough money to see the thing through he said, "Belief is stronger than all my money. I'd change the sign."

Metro won't help renovate track

By LAURIE WALSH

Despite U of T's hope for Metro funds to renovate Varsity Stadium as an outdoor track and field centre, the Metro Toronto Parks and Recreation Committee decided Thursday not to affiliate themselves with educational institutions.

The parks committee met to consider a new outdoor track and stadium to replace the track lost when CNE stadium was converted to a baseball stadium last spring.

The Committee approved a plan to upgrade the outdoor track and field centre at East York stadium with an expenditure of $425,000. The recommendation must be approved by The Executive Committee of Metro Council on Friday.

Despite a refusal by the Parks and Recreation Coordinating Committee eighteen months ago to aid U of T's new athletic building, Metro Council had debated a sharing agreement with York University, another educational institution.

A 10-acre site at York for the track and field centre was suggested as an alternative location but was rejected by the committee. One chief reason for the refusal was that the land was not owned by Metro.

U of T hoped to submit an application for a Metro grant for the renovation of Varsity Stadium to permit a fuller use of it as an outdoor training facility.

The request was made to the parks department by U of T Internal Assistant Frank Iacobucci in September. In a letter Iacobucci said "Varsity Stadium is centrally located and ideally situated for public transportation. It has long and rich history of track and field use and presently it is the regular training ground for the Toronto Olympic Club and our own Track Club. There is a strong likelihood that next summer the Stadium would be renovated for the accommodation of Olympic soccer matches. That would be a logical time to undertake additional renovations to turn the Stadium into a first-class modern track and field facility."

However, according to Iacobucci's

Special Assistant Jack Dimond, "The University was not given enough time to prepare a detailed proposal. A new all-weather track would have been planned."

The East York Stadium was recommended despite obvious drawbacks and opposition. The track will be inadequate for throwing events and will cause traffic congestion, parking problems in residential areas and ratepayer opposition in East York.

Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey said "I know that there are drawbacks and that I am making myself unpopular but I'm going to support the East York site. Maximum use of the facilities are to be made."

U of T Phys-Ed Professor, Bruce Kidd said that Varsity Stadium may yet be renovated through other fund sources. The Montreal organizing committee for the Olympics, COJO, may have to improve the stadium in return for use of it in Olympic soccer matches. Wintario and the Olympic Lottery are also possible sources of funds, according to Kidd.

Anti-facist organization formed

A Committee in Support of the Spanish People was formed at a Wednesday night meeting commemorating the 36th anniversary of the death in China of Norman Bethune.

The contention of the two superpowers, the US and the USSR, is sharpening in Spain, said a representative of the revolutionary anti-facist people's organization of Spain (FRAP).

The speaker said 1973-74 brought a major historical event, the creation of a national anti-facist front. Its major role is to wage armed struggle and fight for national liberation against the Franco fascist regime, he said.

FRAP has been built out of a policy of unity, and is being forged anew in today's conditions, the speaker noted. "The Spanish people must not be betrayed," he said, and pointed out FRAP was opposed to the policies represented by Santiago Carrillo, leader of the "Communist" party of Spain which supports Soviet social imperialism.

When Franco's regime executed three FRAP militants, and 2 Basque militants on September 27, the permanent commission of FRAP coined the slogan "Liberation for Spain".

The fascist military regime murdered these militants, he said. "The only compromise possible with the fascists is when we are holding the gun and they are lying dead."

"The working class, peasants, students, professionals, are all intensifying the struggle to answer fascist terrorism," he said. "The government thought the executions would stop the struggle of the Spanish people, he said, but "today is not a time to lament, it is a time to mobilize the forces and intensify all forms of struggle against fascism, until it is annihilated."

"If the fascists execute us, we will die, with honour, knowing we have contributed to the struggle in Spain," he noted.

Richard Daly, National Spokesman of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) said he was enthusiastic to join in the struggle raging all over the world and to participate in the struggle against repression.

He pointed out Bethune died in the revolutionary service of the people of China, fighting a heroic battle against Japanese imperialism. Bethune, said Daly, was steeled by the events of his day, and stood up to serve the people in response to the political and economic crisis of his time.

Daly said the situation developing today was also marked by a vast heroic surge of the people who are standing up to resist the shifting of the economic burden onto their backs. Bethune was a scientist who paid attention to the real world, respected the Marxist theory of reflection, summed up the problems facing people and actively struggled to implement solutions, he noted.

Daly said Bethune was a fighter against fascism, colonialism and imperialism, and the people should learn from his spirit. Daly said his burning spirit has terrified Canadian revisionists ever since, who classify Bethune as being egotistical, or having a bourgeois life style. But Bethune actually lived as a great anti-facist fighter, practicing self-reliance and serving the people, said Daly.

Daly said Bethune embodied the spirit of proletarian internationalism of the Canadian people, and fought for his views in both Spain and China. The collusion of the fascists led to the temporary defeat of the Spanish people, he said, but as fascist attacks accelerate against the people, people are once more resisting all over the world.

Western Europe is a major area of contention of the two superpowers, said Daly, and the south western flank is "an area of extreme contention." "The best way to support the heroic struggles of the Spanish people, is to stay firmly in our place, and fight vigorously and heroically with the spirit of Norman Bethune and resist attacks on the working class and people today."

It's a sly day, this Friday. Sleuthing tonight, prying information out of unwitting minor officials: Chris Du Vernet, Christine Curlock, Sharon Stevenson, Mark Lyon, Greg Richards, David Lloyd, Tom Craijalka, Lydia Burton, Laurie Walsh. Photos by Pel and White Inc. and John Raffrey. Thanks to Diamond cabs and Mother's Sandwiches, quite unlike mom used to make.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St. East.

Is the axe being properly weilded?

By the waters of Babylon, we sat down and wept. Today's reading comes from the Holy Book of Budgetary Restraint, the umpteenth chapter of the epistle of George Connell to the unbelievers.

Wednesday's Varsity carried budget chief Connell's latest forecasting for next year. Looks like some of our staff will be trudging the streets looking for work next year as the university makes further cuts in its spending to stave off an outright auction of the Robarts library.

It is assumed, due to the university's contract commitment to teaching staff, that the unemployment lines will not include tenured staff. It does mean that the buildings will be cleaned less often, that the libraries will run less efficiently and most importantly that the people who keep the physical plant operating will be over-worked.

It's time to question a few of the university's premises. First on the list is the hallowed tenure contract. At present, the university cannot fire a tenured staff member except for neglect of duty, "failure to maintain reasonable competence in his or her discipline" or "gross misconduct".

So why stand back? There's every likelihood that the university, strictly applying the "reasonable competence" clause, could save itself considerable expense by seriously asking itself and the students specifics about who is doing their job and who not. Certainly there must be objective criteria sufficient to avoid a witch-hunt or overtly political firing decisions. If there aren't, there should be.

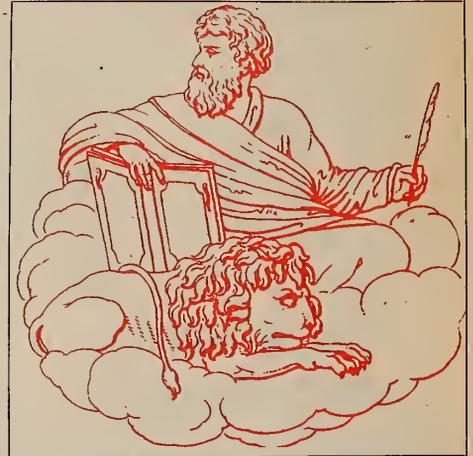

Every other employee at this university must work under the tacit threat that if the job doesn't get done, she or he will be held responsible. There is no reason not to apply this rule to the teaching staff. Anyone who maintains that there is not one teacher who shouldn't be teaching is covering something up. Students see it every day, but then again they're not competent to judge this sort of thing, are they?

Faculty members, don't try to discredit this by calling The Varsity "anti-faculty". It won't work.

This is an extremely serious situation that we all share and a solution demands that we look at every facet of this university and make some decisions. They had better be honest ones, and turning a blind eye to incompetence in the faculty won't lead towards them.

We are not suggesting that great bugaboo of "dismissal of staff for fiscal reasons". What we are suggesting is an honest appraisal of "reasonable competence" and some attempt at applying these standards rigorously, as rigorously as the university seems to want to apply grading standards.

The budget man plays god without the benefit of omniscience.

"Thou shalt not encourage cheating," says the Board.

Board treads on dangerous ground

Without a doubt this newspaper has gained a little more credibility amongst the faculty now that we have decided, rather now that The Varsity Board has decided, to terminate the placing of ads for temp-paper services, essay services or essay banks. Out of sight and out of mind, you know.

The Board has decided to take a moral stand on an issue. Although the motion attempted to explain it as a motion demanded of us by the Academic Code of Behaviour, the fact that the decision was based on a moral judgement can't be hidden.

The first rather disturbing problem is the Board's willingness to place The Varsity under the provisions of the Code of Behaviour. University vice-provost Robin Ross takes this as a matter of course and the Board accepted his interpretation of one section outlining the "groups" responsible under the Code. The wording is sufficiently obscure to allow this interpretation.

Under Section C-2a, a "group" means "a club, society, association, committee or other body of members having an affinity based upon common or collective interest or purpose, whether or not officially recognized by the University . . ."

Loosely applied that means that the newspaper, which is strictly none of the above, is responsible to a tribunal for allowing the advertising of something that is not yet illegal under the laws of the land.

The moral framework of the decision is quite complex, but in the end the Board made a moral decision that stops short of the crucial point. Principles are not made on the merits of one case, so the Board had better quickly decide just how far it wants to go in basing advertising policy inside a moral framework.

Everybody's framework is different. The most clearly dangerous thing for a newspaper that depends on advertising to do is to start muddling the works with judgements about acceptability. If a newspaper works on advertising, it has to blindly accept market theory. Temp-paper services are there because there is a demand for them, and refusing their advertising will not make them disappear. Worse than dangerous is attempting to make an advertising policy as the situation arises.

If the Board wishes to become moral, then let's take a long look at advertising that promotes sexuality as a commodity, promotes sexual stereotypes, or in the case of army recruitment ads, promotes the possibility of outright murder. But drawing the line at essay services, and doing it in such a way as to obscure the fact that a very definite moral decision is being made, sheds absolutely no light on a problem that faces every newspaper in this country.

Varsity item has "curious aspects"

To the Editor:

The item in The Varsity "Lab Explosion Creates Diamonds" of 10 Nov, 1975, has a number of curious aspects about it. First, it appears to have been badly culled from Lydia Dotto's excellent article in the Globe and Mail, which appeared nearly two weeks earlier. Second, I would have expected The Varsity to take the initiative then and find out what this project is really all about. Third, the idea for producing diamonds in this manner is mine and was set as a Master's Thesis problem. I find it strange that neither my name nor that of my department are mentioned. Fourth, it could not have been accomplished without the assistance of Prof. Ursula Franklin, Dept. of Metallurgy and Materials Science and her assistants, who provided the X-ray diffraction techniques to convincingly show that diamonds had been produced. No mention is made of this assistance. Fifth, the same equipment has been used for many years to study problems of dissociated and ionized gas flows, as well as hypervelocity impact, associated with planetary entry. I thought it would be a fun problem to show that the same equipment can be readily adapted for a possibly exciting commercial application.

World operates as we deplore

To the Editor:

Re your editorial on Wednesday, November 12th called "A curse on all book hoarders, secreters and anti-communal types". Why are you so shocked that the impending library strike has resulted in students hoarding books? Isn't this what our culture is all about? As an ex-businessman who returned to take a degree and change careers, I can assure your readers that the real world out there operates on exactly the lines you deplore.

UN resolution is "an obscenity"

To the Editor:

The resolution passed on Black Monday, November 11 at the UN General Assembly equating Zionism and racism is the latest obscenity in the series that has included the ovation accorded to Yassa Arafat, the expulsion of Israel from UNESCO and the thunderous reception given to Idi Amin, the racist murderer from Uganda, who called for the extinction of Israel. All of these scenarios have one thing in common: they are all part of a master scheme to delegitimize the right of Israel to survive.

Perhaps the security of a small state recently established is not a matter that evokes the world's sympathy or support. What does seem to arouse concern and action is self-determination. The life of a state seems to be an abstraction when compared to the right of a people. However, Israel is nothing more than the realization of the Jewish people's right to self-determination. The state exists. It is a fact. But the dream that founded it and works to maintain it, is the right of the Jews to self-determination in their national homeland.

The PLO in the National Covenant (Article 24) call for the realization of self-determination for all peoples. That is, all peoples except the Jews. The PLO are unwaveringly committed both to the destruction of Israel as a state and to the use of terrorism as the only means of achieving that end. The UN Charter also calls for self-determination for all peoples. On Black Monday, they sanctioned world anti-Semitism by denying Jews alone this right. Anti-Zionism is nothing more than anti-Semitism on the political forum.

This resolution can only summon to mind the black days of the 1930's when Hitler said what he planned to do to the Jews before he actually did it. The world was silent then. The UN resolution, sponsored by the Arabs, Black Africa and the Soviet Union, has sanctioned Jew-hatred. It has given its blessing to all actions against Jews and against the Jewish state. And again the world acquiesced. The scenario is chilling. We must fight this battle with all our strength. The time is now.

What strange logic is behind this all-Canadian double feature?

The double bill at the St. Lawrence was good entertainment from moment to moment, but did not deliver any compelling visions of reality — except that all good and bad things in life are precipitated by jangling bells. Tremblay's short sketch of life in east-end Montreal, which began the programme, was vigorously and shrewdly played by a cast of three, who at its conclusion rushed off to perform in new roles just as competently. Shelter, much-heralded as a fine new play, has the apparent flaw of producing no conclusions save those dunked in rhetoric, but nevertheless provided its audience with entertainment from finely-drawn characters and ricocheting dialogue. The play was professionally done, from solid acting to a precise direction; but its focus could not be made clear. Shelter scarcely lives up to its billing as 'penetrating reflection of women coping with the change around them'; it deals with the relationships of men and women (certainly an area of mutability) but primarily concerns itself with the hallowed Canadian tradition of a wife seeking her deceased husband's seat in Parliament. Although she looked her part, Jayne Eastwood as Jory was not convincing continually; likewise Wendy Thatcher as the amiably man-conscious Calla suffers from a part that makes her into a character and then cuts off her development. Neither were weak in the roles, but the roles had nothing to say after the first act. The problem part was that of the unhappy about-to-be-married Vicky, played with compelling authority by Branda Donohue, who had to act against the overwhelming strength of her mother (Kay Hawtrey). This magnificent old lady was of a kind-hearted and vague-minded sort who are now disappearing; wise in many things, she still cannot adjust easily to others' miseries. The last of the five women to participate in this vision of life in rural Saskatchewan was Marilyn Lightstone who dedicated herself to the part of a deserted mother of five whose husband is obviously courting a much younger (and soft-headed) woman.

Each of the five played with skill and each aided in making the action seem absolutely credible, but their collective efforts could not transfer their own energy into the play. It remained a night of entertainment, and failed to become in any way cathartic. In its exuberant new-found nationalism, the St. Lawrence saw fit to fill the intermission with cover recordings of Canadian folk-songs. Is that the same sort of reason that a Canadian play opens the new season there? Carol Bolt is by no means incompetent, but the company played down her sarcasm and ironies and tried to render her play politically inoffensive. I'm sure it was not designed that way.

REVIEW

Even MPPs must cope with constant flux in personal relations.

A plotless Jungian probe into violence

Black Moon is a film by Louis Malle which is unlike anything he has done before. The film is a bizarre tapestry of Malle's dreams, loves, and fears.

Black Moon is Malle's retelling of Alice in Wonderland.

The film is set sometime in the future during an extraordinarily cruel and brutal war between men and women. Lily, an Alice-like girl, is driving through the battle zone. In her attempts to avoid the combat she gets lost in a forest where she stumbles on to a large estate.

At the house (which is Malle's home) she finds an old bed-ridden woman (Theresa Giehse), a twin brother and sister (the brother played by Andy Warhol's Joe Dallesandro) who are named Brother Lily and Sister Lily, and a swarm of naked children with a gigantic pig.

Malle then begins to bombard us with the most incredible images: the old woman has a radio transmitter by her, on top of which sits a talking rat; Lily meets a mule-like unicorn that also talks; the old woman is breast-fed by Sister Lily; a pig takes on very human-like characteristics — the list is almost endless.

Malle was at the Ontario Film Theater last week where he described how the film came to be made.

"I had just finished Lacombe, Lucien with Theresa Giehse, where she played the old woman, and I mentioned that I would like to make another film with her.

"She replied, 'Yes, perhaps one where dialogue is not at all important.'"

Shortly after that Malle had a series of dreams where he saw a Lily coming into his house and Giehse in his bed.

"Knowing that you are only as good as your last film, and my last films being Murmer of the Heart and Lacombe, Lucien, I thought that I better make this film right away."

Malle based his film on his dreams which he considered premonitions of death.

The film is dedicated to the memory of Theresa Giehse who died early this year.

As she had suggested, this is a film where dialogue is of no importance. The dialogue is sparse and is so insignificant that Malle, because Lily is an Alice, shot the film in English. French audiences therefore, were not aware of what is being said (but are, because French regulations required the film to be dubbed into French.)

Black Moon probes in Jungian terms the fears of death and elements of violence in childhood and children's stories. Malle explores our consciousness as it might have been collectively formed under the violent glow of television.

In Black Moon Lily stumbles upon a dead woman soldier in whose chest a chicken is picking a hole. How many times have we as children stumbled onto dead soldiers in our own living rooms?

Black Moon is a film with no plot. In Lacombe, Lucien Malle was aware of certain irrationalities on the part of the characters but he knew that these could be hidden by the plot. In Black Moon there is no solid story-line to hide behind.

At the screening, someone attacked Malle for not making a film that's 'about anything'. He was asked, "What is this film about?"

Louis Malle: "This is where I think that movies are backward. You don't take a modern painter by the arm and stand him in front of his painting and ask, 'What is your painting about?' If I am able to tell you what my film is about, why should I bother making the film then?"

Black Moon is not a film that one tries to understand; one experiences it.

The cinematography is by Sven Nykvist, who has photographed all of Ingmar Bergman's recent films.

The screenplay is by Malle with Chislain Uhry and Joyce Bunuel. Malle was evasive about the influence of Joyce Bunuel as a Bunuel.

Black Moon opened in Toronto on November 7th.

Swell sounds from ivory-ticklers, flute-tooters.

About three years ago Angel released a boxed set of Mozart woodwind concertos, played by Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic, soloists drawn from the orchestral ranks. The performances have since been reissued on three separate discs, full-price, and the best disc is that devoted to the flute concerto in G and the flute and harp concerto in C — almost an hour of music — the first with Andreas Blau, the second with James Galway and the Fritz Helmig (Angel S-36857). Fears that the conductor might Karajanize poor Mozart can be laid aside: he displays a surprisingly light touch, a sensitive Mozart style (eg. the last movement of the G major, full of bounce), while the Berlin strings sparkle. Tempi are measured, which allows soloists time to phrase. Andreas Blau can certainly compare with his more illustrious competitors, with an elegant, controlled tone especially lovely in the middle Adagio, here taken quite slowly in which melancholy lies just beneath the surface. It is a moving work — you would never guess that Mozart complained to his father at having to compose for an instrument he so disliked. Perhaps hearing Blau he would change his mind.

Even better is the playing of James Galway, an Irishman whose appointment as principal flute was almost as unprecedented as his choosing to leave a few years later. His vigorous yet lyrical performance of this sunny, untroubled work is further brought out by the relatively backward recording of the harp, though for some this could be a defect. Woodwinds too are a little remote compare with Marriner and the Academy of St Martin-in-the-fields, Monteux and Ossian Ellis, where both woodwinds and horns play a more prominent role. But with such glorious, musically flute-playing, plus a spacious sound, who can complain? Galway tends to overblow on low notes, perhaps, but otherwise his Mozart is as good as one could want; the disc is worth it for that alone. (Liner notes are biographically useful, musically useless.)

DG's Debut series is meant to offer young yet proven artists a first recording chance, backed by superlative engineering. The discs are fairly cheap, around $3.50, and include some good buys. David Sanger is an English organist, a former winner of the St. Alban's Festival, and his disc of Bach and Franck (2444-012) is worth the money. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor reveals Sanger's technique and rhythmic command, even if it lacks some of the character, the panache, of, say, Lionel Rogg's interpretation (on a medium-priced Oryx). Choice of registration in the Trio Sonata in C major is well judged. For Franck registration matters much more; it is a tribute both to the organist and to his organ's resources that he can make it sound like one of those French orchestral monsters.

One more, another DG, at full price. Emil Gilels needs no recommendation from me. But his latest disc (2530-476), recorded a couple of years ago and just released, is a surprise. "In Russia, only teachers and children knew Grieg's 'Lyric Pieces'", Gilels is quoted as saying, and how unjust that is his playing proves. Gilels' selection is taken from the ten volumes Grieg published over thirty years. It includes several well-known tunes (often with Grieg people do not know they know them.) It is no surprise that Gilels manages to uncover, through his introspective concentration, depths where none were suspected before. His tempi are slow, sometimes so as to change the character of the music altogether — but why not, when the pianist is as breathtaking as here?

'Puck' is taken very fast, though, and terrifyingly demonic it sounds. Gilels' touch everywhere is magic; it's as if he paints colours with the keys. If you are not yet fans of Gilels or of Grieg, buy this record. (The first pressing I got was not up to scratch, so to speak — even DG is fallible nowadays.)

Howells' intelligent versatility

Anne Howells, the English mezzo-soprano, has made her name in the opera house; she has her Met debut this season. Her intelligence and musicianship, combined with a warm personality, are equally suited to the concert-hall, as last Thursday afternoon's recital for the Women's Musical Club of Toronto demonstrated. Nor is she just a pretty voice.

The programme, falling into four parts, Italian, French, Spanish and English, was skilfully chosen to show off her versatility. She began in fine style with Pergolesi's 'Se tu m'ami', her tone even, powerful, but allowing the humour to smile through. Gluck's 'O del mio dolce ardor' brought out Miss Howells' dramatic resources, a passion in voice and gesture. A Paisiello aria was all we were vouchsafed before she turned to some Faure songs, a total contrast to the world of early Italian opera. Here she showed charm and sensitivity to the poetry, with a well-placed tone. Her voice is a true mezzo, yet she can lighten it in a way at times not unlike Janet Baker's, though she lacks the ability to float the voice or to sing an expressive pianissimo. Enunciation was always clear, as was the deft accompaniment of Martin Isepp. The last of the Faure songs, 'Notre Amour', came off thrillingly.

After the interval we entered the sultry world of Granados, Rodrigo and De Falla, guided by her darker mezzo. Contrasts were striking and expressive, from the solemnity of 'Lorad, Corazon', the cheeky 'El malo discreto', to the despair of De Falla's 'Polo'.

Frigate
Martin Myers
General Publishing, $4.95

Frigate is Martin Myer's second novel, and like its predecessor The Assignment, has received a lot of good press. Do not be misled. Frigate (the name of both the main character and the book) is not a "wildly hilarious and intriguing novel". It is a juvenile, sanctimonious and, long before the halfway mark, very tedious piece of fluff.

Written with a cloying cuteness the tale begins with a giggling premise: Gilbert Frigate, who may or may not be God, is painlessly and bloodlessly parted from his genitals while taking a piss in the men's room of the Rialto Theatre. With a heavy chuckle we follow Gilbert, clutching the velvet case containing his errant manhood, through a period of dark depression until miraculously the departed penis displays its phallic powers. A single touch of his prick transforms a flaming Queen (or any of the more mundaue variety of physical cripples) into a whole man again. Haw, haw, haw.

Along the way there is a lot of "just plain folks" repartee with a bumbling, "small g", God, who would appear more at home on his own T.V. situation comedy.

However, stealing Biblical caricatures, filling them with 20th century cynicism, and having them mouth Wall Street jargon is hardly an original idea. It's been done already by everyone from Bill Cosby to Playboy. So this sniggering scenerio works well the first time, but by the fifteenth installment both the wit and the reader's patience are stretched to the breaking point.

Frigate reads like a High School Yearbook literary selection. It is over-burdened with whispered asides to the reader and takes numerous time-outs for friendly little chats about character development, grammatical constructions, plot ramifications and tricky semantics. I kept expecting a "thought provoking questionnaire" at the end of each chapter. It was not a surprise to learn that Mr. Myers wrote the book during a two year appointment at Scarborough College where he taught creative writing.

Packaged in the new economical Trendsetter edition, Frigate is part of an attempt to bring quality hardcover books within the range of the common man's pocketbook. Unfortunately the binding only makes it impossible to rip the novel in half when your laugh track burns out.

Critic enjoys play

Although the plot of Alan Ayckbourn's 'Relatively Speaking' is severely strained, the production now housed at Hamilton Place successfully provided this critic with an evening of pure joy at it's Toronto opening.

The plot concerns an innocent young man, Greg, who, desiring to marry a not so innocent young girl, Ginny, decides to go and visit her parents. However, due to a mix-up in addresses he ends up at his fiance's ex-lover's home. Later, Ginny herself arrives, not suspecting that Greg is also there, and the weak joke bubbles on until the end. That Greg should continue throughout to think that the ex-lover, Philip, and his wife, Sheila, are really Ginny's parents does stretch the limits of one's imagination but the play, which is built like a fragile house of cards, always seems to escape collapse.

Nonetheless, it is finally left to the players to offer up the real amusement, and this cast has a great deal to offer. Dora Bryan is both credibly vague and endearing as Sheila, the baffled wife. Her first meeting with Greg, who is played with a sympathetic feeling for misplaced self-confidence by Simon Williams, is a marvelous example of comic genius. Bryan never allows herself to break what Coward calls "that hair-line fracture" between the humorous and the ridiculous a line which was consistently broken by the recent touring company of another Ayckbourn comedy 'Absurd Person Singular.

Robert Fleming, as the ludicrously embarrassed Philip, gives yet another strong comic performance. The differences between the bored spouse and the over-aged romantic are always sharply etched. In the scenes where Philip has to pretend that Ginny is his daughter without raising Greg's suspicions, Flennyn provides his audience with some lessons in comic timing which are not soon to be forgotten. Even Phylida Nash who plays Ginny, the weakest of the four roles, turns in a commendable performance.

DO INTELLECTUALS HAVE SEX?

This week ace Review scribe Bill Simpson reports: "I keep running into culture in the funniest places. Laundromats, churches, variety stores, everywhere."

Horny highbrow researches dirty limericks.

Intellectuals have long suffered from a bad press. And let's face it, the image they project doesn't help much. Who can suppress a yawn (at best) when contemplating the scholarly-pallid, flabby-buttocked form of a doctoral candidate making an eager beeline for the dim solitude of the Robarts' book stacks?

In their favor, of course, it can be said that the majority are harmless enough if left to pursue their esoteric interests unmolested. They go about their business, like some little-consulted footnote to the great text of humanity. Not obnoxious, you understand, just a little unconnected. They lack that star quality to quicken the hearts of our nation's headline-scanners and channel-changers.

Or at least so I thought until a few days ago I came across what looked like an ordinary tabloid. Hoping to catch up on the latest flying-saucer news, or at least get a peek at one of Ford's international diplomatic celebrity shindigs, I plunged in. But there was no sign of movie idols, no representative of the venerable World's Largest Vegetables series. There were no photographs at all, in fact, except in large book ads.

The book ads tipped me off. This was some kind of literary mag! It was, as it turned out, nothing less than the Variety of the academic world, the Billboard of big brained; the New York Review of Books.

To my surprise, a cursory examination of the contents proved what I had never suspected: namely, that intellectuals think about sex a lot of the time just like anybody else! Not that they think about sex in the same way we do; relationships of one sort or another. There is unpretentious standard "meaningful", the blunt "discreet supplemental", even the "self-actualizing and creative" relationship.

Intellectuals would be well-advised to capitalize on this little-known propensity, in the first step of a systematic campaign to improve their ratings. There is no innate reason why an academic cannot become a colorful politician or movie star — witness Kissinger's successful transformation. Lectures and publications could follow the format, and we should see articles entitled "Swinging Suburbia in the Middle Ages" or lectures on "Covalent Bonding for Modern Singles". The public would swarm into the classrooms, impatiently demanding more and more detailed monographs, more assignments, more tests. The academic mills, always churning away at a steady but unspectacular rate, could shift into high gear and flood the nation's thriving bookstores with new titles. The beginning of the resulting rebirth of knowledge will, years from now, be fondly commemorated on some suitable holiday.

but underneath the tangled verbiage, the hesitations and the ambiguities, bred into the species over generations of refinement, there was the unmistakable imprint of libidinal urges.

The vehicle for this revelation was the "personal" section of the classified ads, nestled discreetly on the inside back page. The mating-call here takes its own unique form. The following breezy sample is untypical in its directness, but introduces the two main elements of the intellectual's rutting-yelp:

SINGLE BOOKLOVERS gets the cultured, marriage-oriented acquainted.

Culture and marriage, spirit and matter, discovered once again in the marketplace (where else?). From this base, the ads flower out in many directions, some humble, some easily confident. An unsettling evening with Yepes

Is feeling uncomfortable a legitimate reaction to a concert?

That, unfortunately, was the overall feeling that at least one person (yours truly) had to the Chamber Players of Toronto concert at the Edward Johnson Building on November 8th.

"Uncomfortable?", I hear you cry. "That's a strange word to use to describe your reaction." Let me explain: from an overall standpoint, the instruments were played well (although not flawlessly), the musical interpretation was interesting (if at times unorthodox), and the general tone of the evening was disciplined (at times to the point of stuffiness).

It must have been all those qualifying statements that make me squirm.

The evening opened with a very disciplined performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 1 in G Major; it was this work, along with another Concerto Grosso ("La Follia", by Geminiani) which illustrated the remarkable discipline of this ensemble. Aside from a number of "whistles" from the violins (the noting of which is, perhaps, nit-picking), both performances were really quite exciting.

The other two pieces played by the Chamber Players (without Narciso Yepes, the featured soloist) illustrated a rather annoying "stuffed shirtness" in the group's interpretation. (This was towards works which, to be fair, seemed to demand such an approach.) The first piece falling into this category was Keith Bissell's "Variations on a French Canadian Folk Song".

I found it unsettling. A definite issue of integrity is raised by the piece, which comes across as awfully serious, considering the source of its inspiration.

The issue was again raised in the second half of the evening, with the playing of Harry Somers' "Little Suite for String Orchestra on Canadian Folk Songs". The tunes which form the basis of the suite (there are three of them) are drawn from Newfoundland and Quebec folk sources. Nonetheless, they sounded as if they had been produced in the seventeenth century for lute, harpsichord, and continuum. Indeed, except for the final selection of the three (which got into the folk spirit of the music's inspiration), the suite came across as close to a parody of "what folk tunes would sound like if they had been written by a seventeenth-century composer".

This is presumably unfair, the suite was perhaps written as a classical approach which only happened to be inspired by three folk "ditties" from traditionally rural areas. The effect, however, was unsettling in spite of this qualification.

Narciso Yepes, in his two scheduled performances of the evening he played, as well, three encores did not seem to rise to the occasion. He gave a solid (although, again, not flawless) performance of Giuliani's Concerto for Guitar and String Orchestra, and an extremely interesting interpretation of Vivaldi's Concerto for Guitar and Strings. This was interesting primarily because of one factor: the middle movement of the concerto was interpreted much more romantically than is usually the case for Vivaldi's music.

My initial reaction to this situation was one of dogmatic nay-saying; thinking it over, however, it opened an entirely new facet of the music to me.

Yepes' encores were, by far, the best part of the evening for the guitarist. He first played a reprise of the Giuliani piece (and did it better than the first time around), then played progressively more pyrotechnical pieces.

The interesting aspect of the encores was that they illustrated Yepes' strengths and weaknesses quite vividly. His forte is, without a doubt, the tonal quality that he can coax out of the guitar. He obviously has, in addition, a solid technical ability, but his pyrotechnical attempts would not be enough to carry him through an evening.

Earlier in the evening he even missed, rather painfully, two or three trills in the music.

The second encore was the perfect combination: it allowed Yepes to show his technical ability without sacrificing some of the superb tonal quality demonstrated in the first encore (the slow section of the Giuliani work).

All in all, an interesting if unsettling evening. The discomfort stems, to a large extent, from the finer technical deficiencies (the elimination of which would have made the evening worthy of the standing ovation which the audience bestowed anyway). It also comes, I must admit, from the disturbance of some of this listener's established dogmatic opinions (a vitally healthy, yet unsettling, process).

Exposure, the AGO's current exhibition of works by contemporary Canadian photographers is chiefly important as an exposure in the right place at the right time, not so much of the photographers included in the show as of photography itself. The show is in the Education Gallery (to the right and down the stairs at the main entrance) not within the grander less-protected precincts. It is nonetheless there, there at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Photography has arrived, or perhaps more correctly, the boom is on here in Toronto as elsewhere in photography as an art form, in photography as something both commercially and intellectually viable.

The boom is on: this is nothing that is not common knowledge. The question is why? Why this sense of the butterfly finally emerging from the crysalis, of the ugly duckling finally become a swan? Photography At Last Becomes An Art Form, ran the headline to an article by James Purdie in a recent Saturday Globe. Why the sudden transformation? What does it mean? What can it mean?

One would not say that the works included in the Exposure show had arrived on their own merits, or that they justified any great enthusiasm for photography as an art. Over 18,000 photographs were submitted to a jury from across Canada and one hesitates to think what many of them must have been like, if the 200 or so works on display are evidence of the best of the lot. These photographs are by and large rigidly within the conventions of "art photography." Some in a search for aesthetic values have become academic, others which seem simply spontaneous and immediate can easily be dismissed as such. little need to be out this response. If most of us share it, that accompanies the show quite disarmingly reproduces the photographs. There is no theoretical introduction, no analytical essay stuffed with authority and footnotes, no rhetoric a la Sontag. No definitions are attempted, no parameters staked out. We are simply given the photographs. We are simply given the raw material, the "art", if you will, itself. The temptation, as a result, is to see the process of accepting photography as art as the imposition of a set of standards. The temptation is to judge, to set that which one finds good in opposition to that which one finds bad. Art as a matter of taste, as if art were that simple. The art of the sixties never would let itself even be approached as if it could be that simple.

Photography—as-art may in fact be indicative of a new conservatism in art, a conservatism that is reflected in the Puvis de Chavannes exhibition (also at the AGO, in the Zacks Galleries), a conservatism that the A Child of Six Exhibition at the Hart House Gallery may justify, in the continuing vitality of the cartoons on display there.

The Exposure show, in short, is not so important for what it says or doesn't say about photography as an art form, but for what it intimates about the art world. The show affords an excellent opportunity for an easy perception of the ebb and flow of trends and fashions. In presenting us with a new trend riding its crest and perhaps becoming already a new orthodoxy while we cling still to other orthodoxies it enables us to see one trend or orthodoxy in the light of others—and so negate them all.

A little more cynicism in relation to the art world—that's what we can all use.

Randall Robertson

Exposure continues at the AGO until Nov. 27.

Careful predictable baubles

The teachers of design at George Brown College are certainly getting their message across. With few exceptions the jewellery produced by their students—now at the Pollock Gallery's En Bas section—is carefully executed, finely finished—but also predictably current in terms of design and technique.

There are the expected number of pieces that pay homage to Art Deco, Cherie Holt's brooch and Gloria Robins' cufflinks for example. The necklaces nearly always conform to the popular rigid collar ring standard with heavy roughly formed pendants. Nothing new so far, just well-followed formulas sure to appeal to the public.

Certainly not in the Elsa Peretti class yet, the works of Gloria Robins do nevertheless show the sign of one who dares to strike out in a new direction. Her sterling silver ring with pyrite set as a stone has long silver tendrils curling over the other fingers and the back of the hand like a daddy-longlegs. Although based on turn-of-the-century Art Nouveau concepts her methods of applying design could lead to a new and rewarding idiom if they were handled with more sophistication.

Two gold rings by Bill Thomas catch the viewer's interest through their feeling for sculptural mass. But the "tubings" which are also part of the design of the same rings can be seen in many fine jewellery stores in the city.

The problem with the show as a whole may be that although one wears jewellery for the adornment and enhancement of the body, these works really incorporate little respect for the integrity of the body. The pieces are merely metal objects to stick onto the various parts of the human figure; they may even in fact look best stuck onto the velvet lining of the display cases.

Holograms and rats at A Space

Go see Fringe Research Holograms at A Space, 85 St. Nicholas Street, until November 22nd—the Fringe Researchers and their Assistants are on hand from 1 pm to 5 pm, Tuesdays through Saturdays. That's the important part of the message, now—

Holograms, as you probably know but have forgotten, are three dimensional images created with the aid of that wonder toy, the laser. Upon entering the space you see apparently featureless black rectangles hanging on the wall. These are the white light holograms, which can be viewed without the use of a laser. For successful viewing you direct your gaze upon them from near a right angle. The images of objects such as flowers, skeletons and Egyptian antiquities have the corrosive tinge of green kryptonite. Each of these holograms is complemented by a drawing of a rat. When questioned on the link between rats and holograms, one of the Researchers showed me a framed cover of Scientific American which bore the inscription, "Rats and Holograms". There was also a picture of the researcher on the cover. Damn mail service! I must have missed that issue. My suspicion is that to be accepted by the scientific community you must do something with rats—preferably something horrible.

Also featured at the show are: a hologram of a ballerina which you can look behind; a multicoloured hologram of an event in the vicinity of the planet Saturn; various holograms visible by laser light (provided); and various photographs, black, white, colour and stereo, of other discoveries made by Fringe Research.

No cats.

Haste makes boredom

What a drag! Taken again by the art world! This time it's the John MacGregor show at the Isaacs Gallery.

Five minutes is all the viewer needs to ponder any possible message or depth these paintings might have. After being lured into the gallery by the baby-blue and baby-pink powder puff colours seen from the street and dramatically lit at night, there's not much else.

The theme is music—the piano bears the brunt of MacGregor's distortions this time. But gone is the delightful humour usually present in his fanciful distortions of familiar objects. Instead we get hastily-sketched facsimiles, apparently scribbled in a frenzy of productivity to meet some supposed goal—or deadline.

Audience enthralled by dancers' purity of movement

Le Groupe de la Place Royale illustrated last Friday night at MacMillan Theatre that absolute dance, pure of trimming, could intoxicate an audience, absorb it, make it soar, make it tense and move it to laughter. Astonishing? Perhaps, but not to the near capacity audience which experienced Jean-Pierre Perrault's brilliant work, Les Monuments.

Les Monuments was dance within silence and it was movement which created patterns and depths in that silence, giving it a remarkable texture. It involved three women, clad only in the barest of string-strap leotards of subdued colours. The first, Francine Boucher, evolved from blackness, facing the wings at backstage. She kicked high into the air and began a series of movements which fluctuated from fast to slow, tight to limp, and involved her running around the stage. Increasingly, her range and control harnessed the vision.

She paused to watch while Roberta Mohler, a striking figure and strong flexible dancer, emerged from the wings. Both Mohler and Suzanne McCarrey danced while Boucher was a balance and a focus but the focus had to be stretched to include the others. The only sound heard was that of padding feet and arms swinging through the air or slapping a thigh. The total effect was thoroughly overwhelming, a surefire cure for the malady of tunnel vision.

Perrault had the dancers stand only to begin slowly brushing back their hair. It was at first refreshing, soothing. But the pace quickened and the gesture startlingly turned into a kind of mad obsession, a paranoia. A scream braced the air and the action resumed.

Lest the feisty should repel the spectator, Perrault introduced a comic element. His off-beat humour surfaced. One dancer pulled another up by the hair. Two dancers took turns leading each other across the stage, like wheel and axle. One seemingly the dazed puppet pushed along in its stupor by the other, aggressive and self-assured.

In both Les Monuments and Les Bessons, the other Perreault creation performed, the choreographer radiantly made transparent the relationships common since early man. Les Bessons was a dynamic sight and sound spectacle. It dazzled the senses.

Francine Boucher and Jean-Pierre Perrault of Groupe de la Place Royale.

The nine company dancers wore silky, white costumes with long flowing sleeves. They danced before black and white geometrical patterns cast on three separate screens through the medium of slides and also, intermittently in front of a sea-green canvas. The one was futuristic, the other primitive. The sound was an assemblage ranging from supersonic chimes and the magnified drips of a faucet to birds chirping and mesmerized jungle stirrings.

All sense of time was lost in Les Bessons as we were taken from one dimension to another. The Dancers entered behind cloud-like forms, they surfaced and disappeared into the background. Perrault had them dance together and independently in an explosive array of fascinating movement. At one point, before the expanse of green, the company seemingly became a group of exultant, thin antelopes. The herd proudly fled across the stage only to stop critically and scatter.

Both Perrault and Peter Boneham, the other artistic director, in his Marche Sur Glace which emphasized purity of movement, explored the full range of intangible human emotion and experience. In Marche, dancers were seen as individual entities and in pairs. They extended the range of their bodies, touched, withdrew, and struggled. Boneham had them become mere silhouettes that finally faded into nothingness.

Le Groupe de la Place Royale maintained a vitality and freshness throughout a performance which defies all pigeon-holing. But it was over all too quickly. Such ingenuity rarely graces the Toronto stage. Kristine King

Toronto Symphony: up and down like a pogo stick

Believe it or not, Andrew Davis, new Musical Director and principal conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, has something in common with that famous little girl with a curl right in the middle of her forehead. It's not a curl, however, which links the two, but rather that, like her, when Davis is good, he is very, very good, and when he is bad he is horrid. The all Russian program on October 29 featured him and the orchestra at their very best, and it is hard to believe that within the short space of a week, he could also have assailed our unsuspecting ears with a concert of such a bysmal mediocrity, as on Nov. 4, the third in the current season.

The October 29 program got under way with a joyous playing of Borodin-Glazounov's Overture to Prince Igor. With the exception of some fogginess in the trombones and tuba in the thrilling brass episode leading into the ebullient Allegro, the entire orchestra acquitted itself beautifully.

There followed a carefully studied reading of one of the old war-horses of the solo repertoire, Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D, op. 35. The young Soviet violinist, Victor Tretyakov, who had made his TSO debut in the Oct. 28 performance, impressed me not only with his phenomenal technique, but even more by his finely shaped musical interpretation of a work which has almost been played to death. Messrs. Davis and Tretyakov injected with such a shot of new blood as resulted in a performance that was both effective and genuinely affecting. The orchestra was at its vibrant best in the beautiful first movement, and the exciting finale.

The last piece on the evening's program was Prokofiev's lengthy Symphony No. 6 in E-flat minor, op. 111. This forbidding work, with its six flats, sits heavily on both listener and performer, and it is to Davis' credit that he did not allow the composer's most profound sentiments to reduce themselves to wallowing bathos. Instead, his firm control of tempi and of his enormous orchestral forces resulted in a memorable performance of a somewhat neglected masterpiece of our time. Greatly overshadowed by its immediate predecessor, the sunny Symphony no. 5, the sixth contains nonetheless some of the composer's most sincerely moving music. I can truthfully say that I have never heard this powerful opus performed live in so compelling a fashion as under the baton of Maestro Davis.

The Nov. 4 concert was a different matter altogether. It commenced with the first TSO performance of Jeux Ventriens (1961) by the distinguished contemporary Polish composer Witold Lutoslawski. Scored for chamber orchestra including a full battery of percussion and a piano for two performers, the work makes considerable use of the techniques of chance and indeterminacy. It marks the beginning of a new style for the composer, or at least, as he puts it, "a new concretization of everything I believe about music. Since the material presented was largely unpredictable before its performance, it is impossible, after a single hearing, to decide whether Davis and the TSO did the work justice. Suffice it to say that the assemblage of sounds generated for the performance were of considerable interest to the listener, though I missed the rhythmic vitality and orchestral colour of other works by Lutoslawski.

The undisputed highlight of the evening followed: Hummel's Concerto in E-flat for Trumpet and Orchestra, as performed by the great Maurice Andre.

The October 29 concert had given me high hopes that Andrew Davis would succeed in making the TSO one of the truly great orchestras in the world, but the Nov. 4 massacre has given me second thoughts.

Meat packers fight back

GUELPH (CUP) — Cyril Duitschaver, a Food Sciences professor here, must be wondering what he did wrong. Duitschaver sampled bacteria levels in 159 luncheon meats, found uncomfortably high levels in some, and gave the results to the CBC. The CBC broadcast them October 19 on its Sunday evening "consumer" show, Marketplace.

After the broadcast, Food Sciences head J.M. DeMan was quick to apologize to the Meat Packers Council of Canada industry group. DeMan said he didn't like the way in which the findings were presented, and that the CBC was being sensational in its broadcast.

The Meat Packers Council interpreted DeMan's private remarks as a full scale apology, and released them to the media. Meanwhile, Marketplace producer Murray Creed was backpedalling. The high bacteria levels found by Duitschaver weren't necessarily dangerous, he said.

"They may not hurt you, but then a fly in your soup wouldn't hurt you either. Still who wants to eat one?" The only person to back Duitschaver was University of Guelph research dean Dr. William Tossell, who made a statement that the university supported the research fully.

"One could say that most of our research is controversial in some way. But our policy as a public institution, is to conduct research that industry, business or government needs done and to make that information available to the public," he said.

Duitschaver sampled luncheon meats made by four companies — Burns, Schneider, Canada Packers and Swift. Products from Burns had the highest bacteria levels, 12,000 times higher than those of Schneider, the cleanest company. The university's Food Sciences department depends for part of its funding on the food industry, including meat packers. The University of Guelph's Board of Governors is well-stocked with representatives from the meat-packing industry.

RAITT SMOTHERS UNDER BLANKET OF STRINGS, HORN, BACKUP VOCALS

HOME PLATE
Bonnie Raitt
Warner Bros.

Many of the songs on Bonnie Raitt's new album, Home Plate, seem to have a kind of neo-big band sound, which is fine if you like that sort of thing. I don't.

Too many of the songs start out well, but by the end of the second verse the power of Raitt's singing has been totally or partially submerged beneath back-up vocals, horns and/or strings. On listening to two countryish cuts, "Run Like a Thief" and "I'm Blowin' Away", I thought, "Hey, she sounds a little like Linda Ronstadt." But, in contrast to the almost classical purity of the songs on Ronstadt's Heart Like a Wheel album, a few strings are added to these songs, and then a few more, and then everything but the kitchen sink. Still, even the over-instrumentation cannot destroy Raitt's lovely interpretation of "Run Like a Thief", a song about a triangle.

Other cuts on the album have an even more distinctly big bandish sound, even a lyrically traditional (that is to say rather clichéd) blues number, "Sugar Mama". This is the only cut on which Raitt plays guitar.

In line with the echoes from the past, "My First Night Alone Without You" is a slow, torchy number with a feel reminiscent of a few decades ago. (Consult your local musicologist for a more exact date.) In the end, though, I can't complain about age because my favourite cut, "Your Sweet and Shiny Eyes", really sounds like it comes from a nineteen-twenties cowboy record. Completely out of character with the rest of the album, this loose but charming cut features lines like, "Your sweet and shiny eyes are like the stars above Laredo".

All in all, it's albums like these that illuminate the prejudices of reviewers. Bonnie Raitt sings them well, but some of these songs... and I just can't stand them bloody horns.

Hill gets rave: conflict of interest?

Folk music took a giant step forward in September. Then again, perhaps rock music took a giant step forward. The Dan Hill album hit the record stands. Personal, meaningful lyrics were blended with the soulful sounds of an individual's confession of his experiences.

It's hard to be objective about this LP, considering that Dan and Matt McCauley — the co-producer of the disc — are both personal friends. Therefore, it will let you know in all honesty that this album is excellent. Enough has already been written about the transition of Dan from a Don Mills suburbanite to Canada's next big male vocalist. Although this may be an accurate description, a change has not really taken place. The styles may have changed, new chords may have been learned, new intellectual areas of discussion may have crept into the lyrics, but basically, the aim of Dan's music hasn't changed since those early days back in Junior High School.

Furthermore, none of this should serve as a criterion for judging the music and lyrics. You do not have to have shared the Don Mills suburban experience to relate to this album. If you have ever ridden the subway, watched television, eaten in a restaurant or had a birthday, then you should obtain this album, if only to read the printed lyrics.

Hill's album is about life. Life as described by songwriters such as Harry Chapin, Albert Hammond and others. Life as it is; the everyday elements, and those landmark experiences that have had a major impact on our lives. Life as it twists, winds and reveals. You don't really listen to songs like "You Make Me Want To Be" and "Growing Up" (the two singles released to date) without also doing some thinking. The music is an extra bonus. Dan sings, and writes the words and writes the music. The result is "prosody" — the marriage of music and lyrics in such a way to make the songs work. The string arrangements by Matt McCauley are used to complement or contrast with what Dan is doing on guitar.

As stated, Dan is a personal friend. That's not why I like the album. A lot of people were believing in Dan a long time ago, but nobody thought it could turn out this well; at least I'll admit I didn't. Give a listen to this album and you will also be pleasantly surprised! It is a musical masterpiece.

Gino Vanelli is rising star of deprived rock nationalists

Like St. Augustine, Vanelli is torn between desire for redemption and hedonism.

Gino Vanelli
Crazy Life, Powerful People, Storm at Sunup
A&M

Alas! Canadian rock is indeed in a pitiful state. Yesterday's "hopes" have all retreated into mediocrity. The Guess Who is splitting up to await Burton Cummings' latest incarnation. The Stampeders are reworking pallid old graffiti grabbers. Bachman Turner Overdrive has shot their bolt now that CHUM has discovered ZZ Top. The status of home-grown rock on AM radio is Hagood Hardy playing a full-length Salada Tea Commercial. If it wasn't for the strong folk contingent headed by Lightfoot, Cockburn, McLaughlan, Valdy, Dan Hill, and Sara Ellen Dunlop, all would be very gloomy.

There is, however, a very bright star on the rock horizon. A magical star from the East, you might say. If there is anything vibrant and refreshing about Canadian rock, our saviour is Montreal's Gino Vanelli. The analogy of religion can be carried further for Vanelli. His songs are divided between a desire for redemption and an inclination to get out and live a life of sin. The unlikely combination of epicureanism and religious devotion are the major themes in Vanelli's music.

Gino Vanelli has released three albums in the past three years for A&M. His debut, Crazy Life, was totally ignored by both the critics and the public. It shouldn't have been. The next album, Powerful People, was a deserved success, producing the single "People Gotta Move". The album and single did respectably well on the major American charts. The most recent album, Storm at Sunup, is a more sophisticated work, but it has not had the chart success of its predecessor. (I can't give you the latest numbers, because ever since Billboard was put on the reserve shelf at Roberts, it's been a pain to check the charts.)

Gino Vanelli is a Herb Alpert protege. Before a collective snicker is emitted, remember that old Herb has had quite a successful track record, both commercially and artistically. It doesn't hurt to have his clout behind you, or his wife, Lani Hall, singing back-up for you. Alpert produced the first album, co-produced the second, and oversaw the third. Aside from Mr. A's sponsorship, the records are all Vanelli. Gino Vanelli is responsible for the words and music of all twenty-six songs on the three albums. He and his brother Joe arranged all the songs, and the brothers V produced the last two albums. Gino handles all the lead vocals. His voice is expressive, and capable of ranging from gut-wrenching funk to languid balladeering, which indicates the range of these songs. Joe Vanelli plays piano and shares the synthesizer load with Richard Baker. Graham Lear is on drums, while John J. Mandel is on percussion. The band is tight, and has been together for a long time. It shows.

There are no guitars, except for the guest work of Joey Graydon on Storm at Sunup. The synthesizers are the backbone of the music. Joe Vanelli can take his place along with Gary Wright in the pantheon of the synthesizer-as-music crowd. Particularly tasty are the "horn arrangements" especially on the Powerful People LP. Jerome Richards adds his saxophone to the most recent album to fill out the sound.

The music itself is hard to categorize. It's not funk, it's not jazz, it's not rock. But it's good. Vanelli can groove with the best of them, but he refuses to succumb to the disco diarrhea that is sweeping the industry. The sound in a word is full. It has a sensual Latin feeling, one of lushness and deliberation. Nothing is left to chance; yet, there is no overpowering feeling of structure. As a balladeer, Gino is a singer with potential. He is not an Italian Tom Jones, but he can certainly put across his feelings on vinyl.

Vanelli is a romantic, a man who feels things quite deeply. The epicurean-religious dichotomy dominates his writing. Several songs, especially on the first two albums, showcase his religious seeking redemption. "Piano Song" on Crazy Life equates his music with religion. The value of prayer is stressed in "Powerful People" and "Poor Happy Jimmy", his tribute to Jim Croce. (Nice song, but I don't think that they ever met. The song seems to be written on a whim, which is uncharacteristic of Vanelli.) Death is a recurring theme in the Vanelli vision, as is aging, the subject matter of the third album's "Where Am I Going". Vanelli is a family man. "Granny Goodbye" is a homage to a dead grandmother, "JoJo" a celebration of a newborn son, and "Father and Son", with Gino's father Russ singing backup, is a confirmation of the family bond.

There is a strong feeling of helplessness and ennui in the second album, as seen in both "Powerful People" and "The Work Verse". These songs, however, are counterbalanced by the sheer exuberance of "People Gotta Move". The lust for life is especially predominant on the conceptual and more symphonic third LP.

As a romantic, Vanelli sings of unrequited love in "Charizur" and "Lady", and separation in "Felicia". True love is found in "One Woman Lover", "Gettin' High", and "Keep on Walking". The last two songs are essentially the romantic counterbalance of the Storm at Sunup album. Vanelli, as a representative macho Italian male, is often a blatant sexist, as in "Fling of Mine" and "Mama Coco".

The theme of living for the moment is consistent through all three albums, and fuels his best work. Vanelli's tendency towards the epicurean has gotten stronger with each album. The first album's title track, "Crazy Life" is an example of this trait. "People Gotta Move" expresses a lust for life, but the best example on the Powerful People album is the "Son of a New York Gun" — "Jack Miraculous" suite, which is a rollicking celebration of hedonistic life. Jack gets his comeuppance, but you know that he'll do it again. The longer works on Storm at Sunup, especially "Love Me Now", emphasize that Gino would rather sin than be saved. He'd rather "live how he feels", for the moment, than moralize. "Cause men like me capricious and free-live life alone and confused-yet loving whoever they choose... take me as I am-the storm in your life". The moral dilemma is avoided by living life to its fullest, as evidenced in "Love is a Night". None of the phony Mormon purity of a Randy Bachman, just wine, women, song, and suppressed gut feelings.

Each new album for Gino Vanelli has been a progression, both musically and in terms of his total world view. He's also getting more generous with his creations, as Storm at Sunup has longer and more fully realized pieces, and contains 35 minutes of music, as compared to Crazy Life's short staccato bursts, which barely total 23 minutes. Vanelli started off with high standards and has maintained them.

Gino Vanelli has been looking for a followup single since "People Gotta Move". His critical acceptance is assured, but he is striving for the support of the record buying public. His appeal in the past has been to widely diverse elements, but as his Colonial stand proved, Gino is especially popular with gays and blacks. Here's hoping he doesn't sacrifice his artistry for wider commercial success. Don't go disco, Gino!

Gino Vanelli is the man who had the people lined up on Yonge Street for an extra week when he was at the Colonial a few months ago. He is exciting on record but he is even better live. He'll be at Massey Hall on Tuesday with Montreal's Ronnie Abramson. Montreal is sending its finest to Massey Hall. They shouldn't be missed.

Meaty themes of love, destruction paraded forth in Ibsen play

John Gabriel Borkman is one of the lesser lights in the Ibsen canon and, if I may be permitted, a shooting star now shot.

In Borkman, all our favorite Ibsenisms are trotted out once again like granddaddy's war wounds. First, the once powerful, now shrunken and aging visionary haunted by the spectre of unfulfillment. He's the guy pacing up and down blustering about man's will, destiny, the compass, and sundry inexorables.

Henrik broods along . . .

Next, the mother-figure, or psychic leech, who ekes her existence by bleeding the spirit from her young son. She is the lady dressed all in black with the fangs and the crazed look. Then, the woman of passion, capable of love but denied it by the idiocy of a man whose primary interests lie in other realms. She is all woman: intuition, emotion, sex, the works. Finally we have the young son buzzing around with a few good cheers for life and happiness, and a few good sniggers about the air at home not being fit to breathe. He's the one who jets with a woman of promise and is saved from the clutches of home.

Now before the local society for Ibsen hales me to the nearest tree with rope and ladder, I must explain that this caricature is prompted by the Academy of Theatre Art's production of Borkman playing Thursday, Friday, and Saturdays thru November 29.

This production forsakes a tone of dignified realism and gropes around for something not unlike expressionism. The production uses lighting in a way that suggests the emotional tones of scenes, not the time of day. The actors rely on gestures styled to exaggerate stress, and the wooden, stilted delivery of their lines gives their speech an undramatic, frozen quality. (Granted I am interested here in the director's conception and realize I might be simply overinterpreting, mistaking error and mishap for intent.)

The overall effect of the play was unsuccessful, and this interpretation unconvincing. The gravity of action, and the dignity of the characters, certain in the text, flounders in a commotion of overreaching effects. For instance, an otherwise scanty set is dominated by an image of intersecting bars painted against a back screen, suggesting the bars of a prison. This graphic image is surely meant to capture the motifs of enclosure and isolation sounded everywhere in the play. However this conspicuous image brooding over the action seems overly pointed and insistent, characteristic of the production's lack of poise as a whole.

Yet the production did offer performances of note. Brian Neller as John Gabriel Borkman was spellbinding, and Elizabeth Whittan as his wife was a splendid old witch.

The production is certainly ambitious, and I recommend your attendance if for no other reason than on the grounds that it is, after all, Ibsen.

Gerard Stevens

... on free will, destiny, and all your other favorites

Rich Moliere farce marred by stark, functional production

The new home of Toronto Truck Theatre at 94 Belmont St. is a fitting place for the production of Moliere's The School for Wives. When the play was first presented in 1662, it was severely criticized on both moral and literary grounds especially by the organized religions. And now, in a form of timeless literary justice, Toronto Truck Theatre's permanent residence is a renovated church.

It is easy to see how the seventeenth century status quo would have been affronted by the moral lessons of this play. For, under the surface of the main comic conflict between the possessiveness of a rich old man, Arnolphe, towards an innocent young woman, Agnes, whom he has raised to be his wife, and the honest romance between Agnes and a young suitor Horace, there flows a defence of cuckoldry as an inevitable state. In fact, it is a state that is recommended both directly by Arnolphe's friend Chrysalde and indirectly through the traditional comic denouement.

The play, of course, is not so obvious in its lessons. The School for Wives has all the twists and turns of any Moliere comedy. There are the mistaken identities which produce humorous ironies — the poor young woman who turns out to be the long-lost daughter of a rich man, and thus is able to wed a young suitor with whom she has already been having an illicit affair. There are the paradoxes that afflict the main comic character and make us aware of his inevitable fate at the end of the play. But beyond all the didacticism, artificial coincidences, and philosophical dialogues, there is the delightful humour of both situation and character.

The interpretation, the balancing of all these factors is difficult. Toronto Truck Theatre's interpretation, under the direction of Peter Peroff, is sufficient but not exciting and in some places wrong. There is nothing to fault in the casting of the parts. Tom O'Hanley is exceptional as the pompous and utterly confused Arnolphe, looking haggard and whimpering at his ineffectuality in changing the disasters that befall him. Equally competent is Rosalie Shackleton as Agnes. Shackleton plays an Agnes whose later slyness doesn't seem out of character with her former naivety. Good supporting performances are given by Tim Fort as Chrysalde, David Moulday and Virginia Reh as Arnolphe's servants and Art Austin as Agnes' suitor, Horace. Garnet Truax is marvellous in his small part as the notary, but he looks thoroughly stunned when he returns in the final act as Enrique.

But all this fine acting can be wasted when put on a barren, stark stage under almost neon-cold lighting. In deference to Peter Peroff's experience, I'll assume that there was a dramatic reason, other than lack of funds, for this sparseness. But it didn't work. The coldness of the set did, however, highlight Christine Neuss' costumes, which brought a degree of colour and life to the play.

Arnolphe's two servants act in a manner that would be expected of circus clowns. Peroff has them portray two drooling buffoons, who, because of their supposed stupidity, have to be treated like children. Is this fair? Does Moliere have to rely on such trite devices to turn The School for Wives into comedy? I don't think so. In fact, the audience seemed uncomfortable with the absolute banality of these clowns.

How could such buffoons have their insightful dialogue on jealousy? No, these servants should, like others in Moliere, assume a subtlety in their fooling that suggests a mask adopted in order to survive. With this interpretation, the embarrassment of the audience at their silliness would disappear.

If their performance of The School for Wives was not captivating, it was certainly consistent and sufficient to allow the beauty of Moliere's satire to come through. Toronto Truck Theatre fulfills an important role in the small theatre circle by presenting a repertoire that combines the classics with contemporary material. And this will attract groups of people to the theatre that do not normally attend. For some, this could be the first step in a future addiction.

Languid despair in Pinter's "Old Times"

Theatre Mickities' production of Pinter's Old Times provides a glimpse of the latest work from perhaps the most interesting playwright writing in English today.

Like all of Pinter's work, Old Times is a skilfully crafted play. The characteristic Pinter dialogue which moves by fits and starts punctuated by long spaces of silence, alerts us to the disintegration reality has suffered in the minds of the characters. Language pours forth disengaged from an immediate present and a certain past, and words become a comic burlesque of meanings. The Pinter character walks a tightrope between reality and illusion in a desperate attempt to make the unbearable seem comfortable.

The setting is Kate and Dudley's house in the country. The occasion is Kate's reunion with an old female roommate and only friend, Anna. On this night of their reunion, Dudley, Kate's husband, works up all the old bits of nostalgia surrounding his courtship of Kate in the days when Kate and Anna were still roommates. The effort is pathetic and disastrous for Dudley. In the process of reminiscing, he is goaded into a realization of the truth about his wife's and his own real sexual needs which have gone unfulfilled in their marriage.

However, in Old Times Pinter seems to be working overtime to make his points. Again we have the tired mother-whore archetype in the figures of Kate and Anna. Kate, the wife, is the silent, comforting, unsexed woman; Anna, the more aggressive, sexually enjoyed and abandoned lover. It also strikes me as a bit much that one who is so desperately repressing the truth of his wife's homosexuality should turn around sentimentalizing about their love-at-first-sight encounter at a cinema showing The Odd Man Out.

The Mickities production is trim, almost austere. The actors are young. Pinter is a difficult task to set before young actors; time and poise in Pinter present special risks. However the moments of misplaced emphasis and overacting were balanced by their resilient verve.

A fascinating mixture of the fallacious and the incredible

For twenty-two years a Hungarian called Elnyr de Hory (that's an alias) painted pictures which he claimed were by Picasso, Matisse, Modigliani, any number of post-impressionists, and sold to museums, dealers and collectors all over the world. He's had to travel around a lot, from Europe to the United States, all around the American continent, and back to Europe again, but he's only been to jail once, and not for very long. Moreover, he has never offered a painting to a museum or a collector who refused it as fake. Or so he says; it may not come to quite the same thing.

He's retired now: he lives on the sunny isle of Ibiza, in the Mediterranean, in a villa that he doesn't own: his paintings sold for a lot of money, but most of it went to the dealers, some of whom didn't know that they were selling fakes. He still does a little painting: a Picasso today, a Modigliani tomorrow, but just for fun: he figures out how many thousands they would sell for then burns them.

An American called Clifford Irving wrote a book about him, called Fake!, "exposing" him (after he'd already retired) and embarrassing a number of experts who had believed what they wanted or liked to pretend that they knew more than they did. He sent an autographed copy to Howard Hughes—so the original story went—who liked it so much he decided to make Irving his literary agent, to arrange for the publication of his autobiography. The rest is history.

It sounds like a classic case of the journalist being inspired by his subject. But, of course, the Hughes hoax was so complex, Irving must have been working on it even while he was writing Fake!. So he was a liar even then: perhaps Fake! is just a fake.

Why should Orson Welles want to make a documentary about this pair of rascals? Well, before he was an actor or a director, he tried his hand at painting. He spent a summer in Ireland at it, very pleasantly but hardly profitably. When winter came he had to go to Dublin to find work. "Oh, I suppose I could have got an honest job washing dishes or something like that," he says in the movie, "but I decided to take the easy way out and go on the stage. I told them I was a famous actor from New York. So I began at the top, and I've been working my way down ever since."

He went back to the States and founded a radio troupe called the Mercury Theatre. Their most famous production, War of the Worlds, was not actually a hoax—it announced itself as a radio drama at the beginning, the end, and several times in between—but didn't stop thousands of people from believing it, fleeing their homes, phoning the police, claiming they'd been raped by Martians, and so forth. (Possibly a little subsidiary fakery here.)

This made Mercury Theatre so famous they could go to Hollywood. As their first major film project, they decided to do a fictionalized biography of a famous American tycoon, who was to be played by Joseph Cotton. Eventually Press Tycoon William Randolph Hearst was chosen instead, and Welles himself took the lead. "I'm not complaining," explains Cotton, in his dignified accent, "I got a good role in Citizen Kane. But I wonder if I would have been the first person—or the last—to impersonate Howard Hughes..."

After a short magic show, Welles begins his documentary with a little speech on the distinction between fiction and lies (none). He could, but doesn't, quote Cocteau's inane but famous dictum "Film is the art of telling the truth by lies." The film, however, will be different: he promises that everything we see for the next sixty minutes will be absolutely true, based on hard facts. It's not, of course. The film is full of lies. To mention just the few I caught out: those voices you hear are not from the old Mercury production of War of the Worlds. The film clips that accompany them are not from the execrable George Pal movie based on it, but are Ray Harryhausen's splendid animation sequences from Earth Versus the Flying Saucers. More seriously, Welles uses fancy editing to create conversations that never took place. Elnyr says something, cut, Welles comments; cut; Elnyr agrees. Welles uses documentary footage to deceive you. In fact, he is lying by telling the truth.

If you enjoy this kind of cunning concatenation of the fallacious and the merely incredible, you'll like F. For Fake. I found it delicious.

The critic in one of our other morning papers dismissed it contemptuously, saying that Welles was pretending to be profound. He couldn't be more wrong. Welles makes no attempt to get at the facts behind the lies—probably a futile endeavour in this case anyway—it's the lies themselves he likes. A lie is a sort of surface, a screen placed in front of the truth. In the case of art forgery, this is especially obvious: a forger does not have Picasso's "vision" or whatever else his pictures are supposed to "contain", what he tries to do is mimic the container. To be successful, an art forgery must be a beautiful lie. This is a film of lies about beautiful lies, and its basic structural unit is the coincidence, also the basic building block of the implausible excuse.

Welles once made a bad movie, Lady from Shanghai, with a great ending, a shootout in a hall of mirrors. All of F. For Fake is like a shootout in a hall of mirrors: a succession of brilliant surfaces shattered one by one, leaving you, at the end, in the dark.

The surface of personality is gesture and posture. We are treated to all of Elnyr's: his fake aristocratic heritage, his genial smiles, his kinky belts, and above all his repellently beautiful, longfingered, artforger's hands, holding a cocktail, arranging flowers, languidly gesturing, or turning out a Matisse in minutes as he brags in his charming atrocious Hungarian-French accent, "Matisse's line was never as good as mine. It was very hesitant, it was never as flowing, I have to hesitate to make it more Matisse-like."

And we see the surface of the Hughes legend: the glitter of Vegas, the outside of the Desert Inn, where he lived for several years, the lonely stretch of highway where, they say, he's been seen walking at dawn, sockless, and wearing, instead of shoes, . . .

And we suffer all of Welles's well-worn mannerisms, the magician's cape, the big cigar, the mock-serious stare, the world-famous bass.

Is there anything behind all these facades? Here's Irving's analysis of Elnyr's career: "The reason he could not make it as an artist in his own right is that the kind of life he was living prohibited his having a personal vision." But Cliff, remember, is a liar; he's also, unlike Elnyr, a bit of a creep, he does not have a charming accent, and he may have fleas—if he doesn't, I'd like to know what his cute little pet monkey is picking out of his hair—I mean to say, this Reader's Digest stuff hardly strikes one as particularly penetrating. On the other hand, I do like Elnyr's self-defense: "If you hang them in a museum in a collection of great paintings, and if they hang long enough there, they become real." As the poem becomes the man.

SOMETIMES I THINK THERE'S NAUGHT BEYOND! Now there's a profound echo! We may even have found a moral. The beautiful people are only skin deep. The experts, the reputation-makers, support the reputations of fakes to support their own fake reputations. And so Welles shows us Chartres Cathedral. It is unsigned: the architect and sculptors and masons are forgotten, forever faceless. And yet if aught that the imagination or the hand of man has wrought in stone of soul transfigured and soul transfiguring deserves to live . . . doesn't that voice sound a little too much like Lamont Cranston? And is that really a painting of Chartres? One hears, somewhere in the back of one's mind, the tinkle of falling glass.

As if on purpose, some critics have even suspected that this film wasn't really directed by Welles: they find it too awful to be true. I hate to lead with my jaw, so I'll just say, whoever made it, I liked it, or most of it: I didn't care for the ending, I'm afraid, and I'm afraid I can't explain: it's one of those things we reviewers have no right to reveal. But it doesn't spoil the rest of F. For Fake, which is silly, and superficial, and cynical, and really rather wicked, but great fun, downright dazzling, in fact.

art

Perhaps the nearest and most easily appreciated exhibition of art this week is that displayed on the wall shields surrounding the construction of an addition to the Academy of Medicine (corner of Bloor and Huron Sts.). The hoarding mural was painted by school children in conjunction with the publication by the Canadian Women's Educational Press of Climb Mount-ain, a non-sexist story book (in which case you dare not assume that the protagonist is anyone other than a girl).

Two crowd pleasers are Exposure, the AGO's photography exhibition, and the show of holograms at A Space. (Yet another crowd pleaser is the butter sculpture at the Royal Winter Fair, but that's another matter... and I have no idea what it is this year that has received the honor of being, temporarily, created in butter.)

Elsewhere and in brief: Harold Town drawings are at the Cadatsy Gallery, the Art Gallery of York University has works from Dr. Henry Levison's collection on display, the Samuel J. Zacks Gallery at Stong College has a Zong Fellows Group Show, and Jack Bush is at the David Mirvish Gallery. RR

Friday — If you like Mick Jagger, Jorge-Luis Borges, The Last Poets magic mushrooms, marijuana, and flashy editing then you'll love Performance; however you may not be all that thrilled by The Exorcist which has none of the things listed above along with a fair number of other elements missing as well. Both are at the New Yorker tonight at 7 and 9 respectively (all day Saturday too). At midnight they will be showing A Film About Jimi Hendrix. Rock n' Roll movies seem to be tonight's specialty with Son of Dracula starring Harry Nilsson and Ringo Starr at 7:00 and 10:00 on a double bill with Journey Through the Past by Neil Young at 8:30 at the Roxy. The Revue is showing Caged Heat (7:45) which appears to be a Roger Corman exploitation film about a woman's prison. As mentioned here because in addition to its obvious qualities the soundtrack is by Lou In Cale ex-violist for the Velvet Underground. Along with the above is The Harder They Come at 9:30 (also on Saturday). Francis Ford Coppola's film about internal espionage with Gene Hackman playing the role of a Watergate-plumber-style wire-tap artist — The Conversation — starts a two night run tonight at St. Mike's at 7:30 and 10:00 while U.C. is featuring a Jean-Luc Godard double bill of Weekend and Pierrot Le Fou starting at 7:30 tonight only. The Poor Alex continues its Japanese film festival with Kenji Mizoguchi's Ugetsu Monogatari at 8:30 (Saturday too). Tonight's offerings from the Kingsway are a recent American film Aloha, Bobby and Rose at 7:00 and 10:00 and a "vintage" Ray Harryhausen, Dynamation thriller The Seventh Voyage of Sinbad at 8:40. The Screening Room will be showing Howard Hawks-Raymond Chandler-William Faulkner-Llegth Brackett's The Big Sleep with Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall and Don Post's sequel to Don Stegel's Dirty Harry, namely Magnum Force with Clint Eastwood; the showing starts at 7:00.

Saturday — OCA will be showing Sam Beckett's Film starring Buster Keaton, an OCA produced version of Beckett's videoplay Eh, Joe with the title role played by the president of the College and a performance of his radio play Cascando. The show begins at 3:00 at OCA's Gallery Seventy-Six on 76 McCaul St. The Art Gallery of Ontario is starting a Films on Photography series with showings every day at noon (check with them for specific times) each instalment will begin on Saturday and run for a week. Today It's The Daybooks of Edward Weston — How Young I Was which is part one of a two part series. Later at 3:00 AGO will be showing Douglas Sirk's All I Desire (1953) with Barbara Stanwyck. Tonight the Roxy has Mel Brook's Young Frankenstein at 7:30 and 9:30 and at midnight a film of a Cream performance called Farewell Cream.

Sunday — The Autobiographic Filmmaker's Theatre is a twice a week affair run on Sunday afternoons and Wednesday nights dedicated to personal cinema. This afternoon they'll be showing three documentaries by Arthur Lamothe, Manouane River Lumberjacks, Montreal-Manicougan and Harvesting at 2:00; for more information call 923-9429. AGO will be showing Jacques Rivett's L'Amour Fou at 2:00. The Revue has a Truffaut double bill starting tonight and running until Tuesday with his excellent retelling of an account by an early nineteenth century doctor who attempts to civilize a young boy who has lived all of his life at an animal's level — The Wild Child at 7:30 and his film about film — Day for Night at 9:15.

Monday — Tonight some potent twentieth century myths and icons get exploited and exploded. The Roxy is showing Cabaret at 7 and 10:45 and The Blue Angel at 9:15 — see Emil Jennings do his rooster imitation — for all you pre-fascist decadents out there. In four hours of screen time Marcel Ophuls destroys thousands of hours of propaganda both written and filmed in his documentary about the occupation of France — The Sorrow and the Pity — which is showing at the New Yorker at 7:00.

Tuesday — There are two documentaries at Neill Wycik tonight — Fidel and a film about Father Barrigan — The Holy Outlaw at 8:00. D.H. Lawrence meets Sam Fuller tonight at the New Yorker for Ken Russell's Women in Love (7:00) and Godard's Pierrot Le Fou (9:00) while the Kingsway screens the movie of Richard Farina's novel Been Down So Long It Looks Like Up To Me at 7:00 and 10 with Harold and Maude at 8:30.

Wednesday — Heavies tonight! Erindale is showing Fritz Lang's Metropolis at 7:00 for free. The Revue begins a two day run on Godard's La Chinoise at 7:30 and Tout Va Bien at 9:15. The Roxy is showing Visconti's Death in Venice (7:00) and Bertolucci's The Conformist (9:15). The New Yorker meanwhile is screening Bergman's Seventh Seal — the story of the youngest born member of a family of aquatic mammals — and his other nature film for the whole family — Wild Strawberries at 7 and 10:15 and 8:45 respectively.

Thursday — The New Yorker is showing two Fellini films Juliet of the Spirits at 7 and the rarely seen White Shiek at 9:20. PC

rock

It's a big week for concerts in Toronto. Tonight Perth County Conspiracy plays Massey Hall in a benefit concert for Heritage Stratford. Tickets are $3.50. The week's highlight will be the already sold out Paul Simon concert at Massey Hall Sunday night. But there will be no shortage of scalpers on Shuter Street Sunday, so you may be able to get a reasonably priced ticket. Gino Vanelli arrives Tuesday — see our article on him. Black Moses Isaac Hayes will shake the Gardens on Wednesday the 19th. Roxy Music is at Massey Hall on Thursday.

And if you're planning how to escape those library strike doldrums you can ponder the more distant Janis Ian concert at Massey Hall on Saturday, Nov. 24th, or Sparks who will be there on Nov. 27th. Larry Ellinson will celebrate Hanukkah by bringing Keith Jarrett to Massey Hall on Saturday November 29th. On December 1st Frank Zappa and the Mothers will be at McMaster. Allman Brothers will be in Buffalo on Dec. 8, and the Toronto ticket agent is at 964-1125. Edgar Winter will be at the Gardens Dec. 10th and the Who Dec. 11th.

At the clubs, this weekend is a little sparse. Dizzy Gillespie is at the Colonial till Saturday. The El Mocambo has Buddy Guy and Junior Wells until Saturday. Downchild Blues Band will be at the Gasworks this weekend, so you should be able to talk and drink at the same table now. Tom Cochran and Colleen Peterson are at the Riverboat till Sunday. Take your student card. Bill Glenn will be at the Brunswick House Friday and Saturday night, Little Caesar and the Consults will be at the Nickelodeon. Moe Koffman is at George's Spaghetti House and out in Scarborough Flud is at the Penthouse Motor Inn till Saturday. Next week the Presidents will be showing off their new band uniforms at the White Castle Inn way out on 2121 Kingston Road. Th-that's all folks. TH

theatre

Two now-defunct productions have given me great enjoyment over the past week.

The recent adaptation of Titus Andronicus by Hrant Allanak was an interesting experiment in theatre ideology; and Gingerbread Lady at the Phoenix Theatre, an unheralded production, was in fact a showcase vehicle for two very fine actresses to strut their stuff in a very contemporary Neil Simon play about a recently released alcoholic.

Our space is limited this week, so I will pull the annoying trick of merely listing the current shows. Please refer back to last week for details. On campus this week, all sorts of good material. At Glen Morris Studio Theatre all weekend, A Trick to Catch the Old One. At Hart House, beginning next Thursday, Camus' Caligula. The T.C.D.S. is presenting a Pinter play each night this weekend. Check noticeboards for details. At SMC, Brennan Hall, John Synge Comes Next, a one-man show. Tonight and tomorrow, cost $1.00 for students. Last chance for non-hour theatre at the U.C. Playhouse. P.L.S. opens its season with a double bill — watch for details, but I believe it's in the Studio Theatre as well, on Wednesday.

Closed down are The Bear and The Proposal (at Tarragon Theatre) but you can catch The Bear again at the St. Lawrence during the Multifunctional Theatre Festival. Also closed are Titus Andronicus and April 29, 1975 (at Toronto Free Theatre). Queen of the Silver Blades has also gone down (!) Openings (!) are few this week — at the St. Lawrence, tonight, Accidental Death of an Anarchist, in Italian, at 8 pm; tomorrow, Miska the Magnate, Hungarian opera, at 8 pm; Sunday evening The Heiress by H. James, in Finnish, also at 8.

Also opening are Don Juan in Hell by Shaw, at the Toronto Truck Theatre, the Heliconian Hall, 35 Yorkville. Fridays at 8:30, as also Sundays; two shows Saturday at 7:00 and 9:30. Tickets are $2.50 to $4. At the Art Gallery, beginning Saturday, Play Strindberg, Black comedy; until the 18th, and again 21st to 25th; all shows at 8:30 and cost $3.50 or $2.50 for members. At Actor's Rep., the Colonnade, the noon-hour show is to be Fishing-Boat Picture. Shows at 12:30 or 1:30, admission seems to be one dollar. I saw their most recent, Through the Eyes of a Child, which speaks well for the company's quality. And for French-speaking or -comprehending students, Le Theatre du Petit Bonheur presents L'Artichaut Wednesdays to Saturdays at 8:30 with a Saturday matinee at 1; tickets are $2.50 to $4 at 95 Danforth Avenue. Odds and ends — at Seneca tomorrow, Jerry Herman and a small group of friends reproduce his hit show tunes. JW

SUDBURY (CUP) — The two student associations of Laurentian University, in conjunction with the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS-FEO) will be confronting Ontario government representatives on the province's student financial aid policies.

A presentation in the form of "a brief and a letter" will be made to the Ontario Advisory Committee on the Financial Assistance for Students, by the Anglophone Students General Assembly (SGA) and l'Association des Etudiants Francophones (AEF), when the committee visits the campus next month.

A campaign to arouse student interest in the action was formulated at a recent public meeting organized by students and officers of the SGA, AEF and OFS, and the university's students awards officer, Roman Woloszczuk.

Students will be informed of the associations' plans individually by letter, as well as through pamphlets and articles submitted to the student newspaper. They will also request the administration cancel classes when the advisory committee visits the campus November 26.

Those in attendance at the meeting outlined several problems with the province's loan schemes, including high interest rates, expected parental contributions, students' expected contributions from summer job earnings, and the qualifications students must meet to be considered financially independent of their parents.

Woloszczuk cautioned that the committee, set up last year under the auspices of the provincial Ministry of Colleges and Universities (MCU), is not a "beer" board, but is only supposed to gather "ideas" for long range planning.

But OFS fieldworker Rick Gregory said OFS briefs have already been presented to the committee, and included both long and short term suggestions for improving student aid.

The advisory committee, which sports two students on its roster, including former OFS staff member Paul Axelrod, is currently touring Ontario campuses.

All documents dealing with the campaign, including the presentation to the advisory committee, will probably be rendered in both French and English by students in Laurentian's School of Translators.

Alberta slams cutbacks

EDMONTON (CUP) — The student president at the U of Alberta wants his executive council to lobby the provincial government against proposed plans to place an 11 per cent ceiling on grant increases to post-secondary institutions.

SU President Graeme Leadbeater approached the council last month with a letter from the administration which suggested the ceiling would barely allow the university to maintain quality, much less allow improvements on the U of A campus.

But the majority of councillors did not share the sentiment.

Council focused on the federal governments price and wage controls legislation and the general need for economic restraint.

Leadbeater told council that academic funds are calculated by using a complicated formula based on the number of students on the campus. This, he said, could not accommodate an 11 per cent ceiling. Leadbeater said the government should not clamp down just on education, and if there is to be restraint it should be uniform across the province.

"They are not cutting back on the give-aways to industry," he said. "As students we simply have to oppose that."

But Rick Cooper, councillor, felt that Leadbeater was looking at the short term interests and forgetting about long term planning.

Cooper suggested that the council accept the ceiling, and if in the long-term it turns out that students are getting "screwed", then they could object.

Council voted to accept the government's ceiling.

Carleton may ban smoking

OTTAWA (CUP) — Responding to complaints by faculty members and health services administrators, the president of Carleton University has established a committee to regulate smoking on the Ottawa campus.

President Michael Oliver said the committee is designed to make recommendations for policy regarding smoking on campus. They will hold public meetings and report to the president by December 1, 1975.

Student member Dan Perley said the committee would first consider prohibiting smoking in the eating areas of the campus, and also consider the division of classrooms into smoking and non-smoking sections.

Perley said that university cleaning costs would be greatly reduced if university staff did not have to sweep cigarette butts and empty ash trays.

"It's not fair that part of my student fees go to cleaning up the smoker's mess," he said.

According to Perley, the committee, though it has a non-smoking majority, will be making to the entire university in responsible arbitrary decisions on smoking issues.

The committee consists of a college dean, a member of the faculty, a member of the support staff, a member of the student association and two students.

Lack of power bemoaned

OTTAWA (CUP) — The National Union of Students (NUS) made no impact on the Canada Student Loans Plan Group when it met October 23-24 in Ottawa.

The Planery Group, a high-powered federal-provincial body, which meets in a closed session to determine "student loan policies nationally, flatly rejected a request by NUS to include student representatives on the Group.

NUS staff members met with Group Secretary Claude Passy immediately following the final session and were informed their request had been rejected by the provincial student aid officers at the meeting.

Passy, according to those staff members, expressed concern that NUS was not representative because all students are not members, and feared including students in student aid decision-making would require letting in other "outsiders".

NUS wrote to Passy as early as last November to request student representation on the Planery Group, and an opportunity to address the members directly to state their case.

French students protest

SUDBURY (CUP) — Francophone students at this city's community college have organized to fight what they see as a lack of concern for Francophone students' needs and rights on the part of local and provincial administrations.

The group of Cambrian College students, tentatively called the Francophone Students Committee, say their grievances relate to both internal and external matters.

On the external, or provincial level, courses which are promoted in the calendar as being taught in French are in fact taught in English, and there is an extreme lack of French-language reference material in the college library, according to committee member, Richard Pajulnoma.

In addition, the calendar is misleading as to which courses and programs are French and which are bilingual, he said.

The distinction between bilingual and French programs is essential, because of the different job opportunities the two programs offer, said Pajulnoma.

The lack of French-language reference materials makes studying difficult for students who are forced to consult English language texts for courses taught in French, he explained. Additional problems are experienced because the French materials originate in Quebec, in a dialect different from that spoken by Cambrian College's predominantly Ontarian Francophones.

The students presented these grievances and demands for their resolution to the provincial community college administrative body, the Board of Regents, when they visited the campus last week.

The demands also included grievances of local nature, noting that although Cambrian was defined as a bilingual college, "all signs and services" were in English only.

There are no French cultural activities on campus, from either the administration or the Students Administrative Council (SAC), said Pajulnoma, after the presentation. He described the Board of Regents' response to the submission as "favourable".

Although he described the SAC as Anglo-dominated, Pajulnoma said the council is offering "all the support they can."

He said the committee, which will continue meeting in the future, and has plans of forming a permanent body, would work towards affiliation with the SAC.

The Francophone students do not wish to see a split between themselves and the Anglophone students, as is the case at neighbouring Laurentian University, he said.

Last year Laurentian's Francophone students seceded from the Students General Association forming l'Association des Etudiants Francophones.

Literacy tests for dropouts

PALO ALTO (CUP) — Starting this year, 16 and 17 year-old students in California will be eligible to leave high school early if they can pass a special new test to prove they are literate.

It is the first program of its kind in the United States, according to state school superintendent Wilson Riles, who announced the tests.

Up to now the law has been that students must attend school until they graduate from high school or turn 18, whichever occurs first.

Those who pass the new tests will be awarded a state certificate of proficiency. Whereas a regular high school diploma does not guarantee that a student can read, Riles said, the certificate of proficiency will. The tests will be administered by the Education Testing Service of Berkeley California and Princeton.

They are composed of 22 questions covering basic skills in reading, writing and computation. They take four hours to complete.

Questions will emphasize practical situations.

For example, one question might involve filling in a job application form and another would be to add up a cheque book.

Beginning in the academic year 1976-77, the tests will be given four times a year. Students will have to pay $10 each to take the tests to pay for administration costs.

Women's Field Hockey team wins National title in B.C.

By KATHY STEWART

The Toronto Women's Field Hockey Team was victorious last weekend in the first National Field Hockey Championships held at the University of British Columbia.

As well as being the champions in the first tournament of its kind, they also became the first women's team at U of T to hold a national title.

The ladies played a four game round robin tournament against the winners of the other Canadian Conferences—McGill, Lakehead, Dalhousie and U. of Victoria.

On Friday the Blues downed McGill on goals by Carol MacDougall and Diana Millar. Later that day they showed their strength against Lakehead. The final score of 3-0 was due to goals by MacDougall (2) and Sue Scott.

On Saturday, the first match was played against Dalhousie. After a slow first half on a very muddy pitch, the ladies came back with three goals (Sue Scott, Barb Smith, Anne Hofland) to beat Dalhousie 3-0.

The University of Victoria were the final team to meet Toronto in the tournament. They had previously lost to Dalhousie on Friday, meaning that U of T was the only undefeated team remaining in the tournament.

The score after regulation and overtime periods was tied 1-1 (Diana Millar), but U of Vic managed a 3-2 victory in penalty flicks taken to determine a winner (Donna Walker, Nancy Wehrens).

A three-way tie then resulted between Dalhousie, Toronto and U Vic. They had each won one and lost one to the other teams in the threesome. The teams for the final match were then chosen by fewest tournament goals against, placing U of T first against U Vic, and eliminating Dalhousie.

The final match was a showing of excellent play from both sides. After a scoreless first half, Anne Hofland put one in early in the second, and Toronto took control of the remainder of the game, keeping the play for the most part in their opponents end.

The clock ran out as the 1-0 score remained and Toronto became the first National CWIAU Field Hockey Champions.

Congratulations are extended to everyone involved in this super season.

The team this year: Cathy Brown, Wendy Grater, Anne Hofland, Terry Knight, Lynn Knott, Lou-An Mailing, Carol MacDougall, Diana Millar, Penny Redman, Sue Scott, Barb Smith, Donna Walker, Nancy Wehrens, Pat Williams, Liz Hoffman — coach.

Rebuilding year for B-BALL

By DAVID CASS

With the puck squad already flashing their way across the continent, the humble basketball team begins the long winter haul with a young, rather inexperienced line-up.

This situation, however, pales in comparison to the larger problem that all coaches, living or dead, dread: the fatal flaw of lack of height.

Talent exists, to be sure, with youngsters such as George Gorzynski, a powerful player from the Oakwood factory and John Di Giambattista, a product of the physical Catholic High School league in Toronto.

However, since they are first year varsity players occupying the critical centre position where games are dominated, the Blues can look forward to some long nights.

Potential does permeate the entire line-up. While Glenn Scott, last year's high scorer and second team all-star, Randy Filinski, and Bill Francis have graduated, the slack has been taken up by a fine plethora of fine rookies. American-born Dave Gordon, Emil Alexov, and Brian Yeo all have the high school records that make a coach drool like the proverbial Pavlov's dog.

The impression that the team is barely out of the cradle and learning the intricacies of shaving is misleading. With oldtimers like Skyvington, Oolup, Fox, McGhie, Kurczyk, Hilbertus "Bert" Van Cook the team is solid.

The balance of frivolous youth and wily veterans is a coaches dream. But the balance is a delicate one and anything from injuries to advancing baldness could disrupt it. But with John McManus returning for his 21st year as head basketball coach the team should have stable leadership.

The future, then, is bright but the road could be a long and tortuous one. See the Blues take a step along that road tonight at 8:15 pm in the Benson Building against Laurier.

Blues edge Western

The Varsity Blues Hockey team narrowly bypassed the Western Mustangs 5-4 at Varsity arena last night.

According to John Precious, a new addition to the team as a transfer from Laurentian, the Blues almost blew it in the last few minutes.

Leading 5-2 late in the third period Western scored two quick ones past goaltender Bill Lompole who was playing his first game as a Blue.

Goal scorers for the Blues were Frank Davis, Wayne (Shirley)

Morrissey, Al Potts, Graham Wise, and Bill Piffeld.

The Blues are on the road this weekend. Literally. Tonight they play Concordia, tomorrow night they're in Lennoxville for a game against Bishop's College. The trip winds up on Sunday afternoon in Trois Rivières. Whew.

The next home game will be next Wednesday against Ottawa. The attendance figures left much to be desired last night and hopefully the stands will be packed for the Gee-Gees.

All good things must come to an end and so did Innis's two game unbeaten streak. They were downed by undefeated Forestry A 4-1. Innis goalie watches puck with his eyes.

Vic takes first half of Interfac swimming

By DON WARNER

On Wednesday evening the first half of the interfac swim meet was held, enthusiastically participated in by teams from Law, F.E.U.T., Meds, Vic, Forestry, Engineering, U.C., Knox and Trinity.

The overall results left Vic in first place with 65 points, followed by Law-45, Knox-44, Meds-30, Eng.-17, Trin-10, For.-6, U.C.-2 and Fac. of Ed.-1.

Highlight of the meet came in the final race, when the Knox B team of Bill Woodley and Olympic hopeful Rick Madge (both freshmen Blues swimmers) swam the 400 feet relay in a record 3:28.8, easily outdistancing the other teams who were using 6-8 swimmers for the same event.

A small, but talented team from Law was led by a former Olympian, Eric Fish in attaining second place, while Vic's depth proved to be their major asset in compiling a comfortable lead. The individual results were: 400 Crescendo Relay-

1. Meds A-3:51.0 2. Vic 1 3. Law.
- 100 Breast-1. Rick Madge (Knox)-1:08.0 2. Don Shropshire (Vic) 3. Henry Vehovec (Eng.)
- 200 Medley Relay-1. Law A-1:55.6 2. Vic 1 3. Meds
- 100 Individual Medley-1. Madge-58.8 2. O'Sullivan (Law). 3. Jackman (For.)
- 50 Fly-1. Bill Woodley (Knox)-25.6 2. Gary Jones (Vic)
3. Glenn Taylor (Vic)
- 100 Back-1. Woodley-1:00.4 2. Neil Jones (Law) 3. Jones (Vic).

Water Polo meet

By STEVE TOBOLKA

The Varsity Blues Water Polo team makes their only home appearance of the season tomorrow as they host the third round of the OUA Water Polo championships at Hart House pool.

The Blues have had a remarkable unbeaten season even though they are minus three starters from last season. Balanced performances and team spirit proved again to be the strongest ammunition.

In tomorrow's tournament Toronto will meet Queens also in the undefeated ranks. The outcome of the game will most likely decide who is to be the winner of the eastern division.

Previous matches between these two teams reached the ultimate in excitement and entertainment so tomorrow's game is guaranteed to be a dandy.

If you have any intention of supporting an intercollegiate team, Blues water polo is one that needs it the most. Tomorrow's games:

York vs. Queens—11:30 am
Blues vs. RMC—12:30 pm
York vs. Carleton—1:30 pm
Blues vs. Queens—2:30
RMC vs. Carleton—3:30
York vs. Blues—4:30 pm
RMC vs. Queens—5:30 p.m.
Carleton vs. York—6:30 pm

Admission is free so come on out and get wet.

Fisheads end losing streak

Victoria College Fisheads shocked the Electrical Engineers by ending a two-year losing streak with a 4-2 win on Wednesday. Both teams played hard, clean hockey with action moving rapidly up and down the ice. The netminders played a fine game and except for some remarkable saves the score could easily have been 12-4.

Special mention must go to Dave Passmore and Joel Goodman, who obtained the goals for Vic. The fast, hard hitting defence of Tuna, Veenema, and Reid cleared the puck well, and Proctor looked good at centre ice again.

Other standouts on the forward line were Werden, Walker and Sherret. When asked about the game, coach Doug Jackson stated "This is the happiest day of my life. We looked, and played like a well disciplined club out there."

Keep it up Vic.

The second half of the swim meet will be held during the spring term and it is hoped that there will be an even better turnout. Interfac water polo begins this Wednesday in the Hart House pool.

Scar and Erin bus costs may rise

By ERIC McMILLAN

U of T's two suburban campuses are looking towards their bus services for a way of cutting costs.

Scarborough principal D.R. Campbell said in a Varsity phone survey that the college would have to consider charging students for what is at present a free ride. He admitted that there would be problems in cutting the service altogether. The move would be "not very popular", he said.

Erindale College has already raised its price by 20 per cent in the last two months. Erindale principal Peter Robinson said that this was in an attempt to meet rising fuel costs. Erindale currently subsidizes the bus service to the tune of $80,000 per year.

On the larger topic of cutbacks, the principals said that the two suburban campuses suffer the same restrictions as St. George campus.

"But we're used to it," said Erindale's Robinson.

"We've been ingenious in devising methods of coping" said Robinson in reference to Erindale's long experience with hard times.

Both colleges originally planned facilities for 5,000 students but have been held back financially from reaching their targets. Scarborough presently has 3,400 full-time students and Erindale has about 3,650.

The difficulties at Scarborough center around lack of academic facilities, according to Associate Dean Alan Walker. "The new library has been held up two years now because of the government's freeze on capital expenditures," he said.

Walker drew a picture of Scarborough students studying at carrels set up in hallways and in the cafeteria and dining rooms. The postponed "Phase Three" of development called for 14 million dollars spent on library and classroom facilities.

Erindale's Robinson was concerned about class sizes, claiming an increase in enrolment of 20 per cent and a "15 per cent degeneration" in the student-staff ratio. To make matters worse, some session appointments might have to be terminated next summer if there is not enough money for salaries, said Robinson.

Whether Erindale is ever able to reach its objective of 5,000 students "depends entirely upon policies of the provincial government, but we are content to stay at our present level for time to think about our academic rather than expansion problems," he said.

Unlike Scarborough, Erindale has adequate academic and library facilities but Robinson bemoaned the lack of athletic facilities, saying the proposed athletic complex on the downtown campus wouldn't be of much use to Erindale students.

Robinson also spoke of Erindale's inadequate $100,000 budget for replacement and purchasing of equipment. Most of the college's equipment is relatively new "but what about when it begins breaking down?" Robinson asked.

Nonetheless, Robinson felt "there is very good morale among Erindale faculty."

Executive Assistant Lois Seppala said "I think we're going to survive as a college quite well; we have a good nucleus of people quite loyal to the college and university."

Workers in mediation

A mediator has been appointed by the Ontario government who has the dubious task of bringing together the library workers and the management before and during the imminent library strike.

The Library will remain open but many experts predict total chaos when 400 library workers walk-out. The earliest date for a strike will be midnight Wednesday.

Meanwhile anyone around the university who can help CUPE local 1230 with an upcoming teach-in, benefit concert and speak-outs to classes should come to a meeting of The Library Support Committee today at 5:15 pm.

The meeting is in room 4049 of the main library. Bring a friend and lots of enthusiasm. It's your library too.

Course fate to be decided

By JOE WRIGHT

The ultimate fate of the Art as Applied to Medicine (AAM) department may be decided today. The Council of the Faculty of Medicine will consider a motion asking that the programme in Art as Applied to Medicine be phased out.

AAM is a three year program in medical illustration and leads to a Bachelor of Science degree. There are thirteen students enrolled in the course this year.

Although the program is offered at a few American universities, the University of Toronto is the only place in Canada with such a course.

Dean of Medicine R.H. Holmes said there were two reasons for phasing out the program, the financial aspect and the question of program priority.

In view of financial constraints,

Holmes said, the faculty had to consider the $100,000 annual deficit incurred by the program. Outside of money considerations, the faculty had decided that the development of such programs as gerontology and emergency medicine should be granted higher priority, he added.

Holmes said he was reluctant to see the program end but said it catered to only a few students and that with the development of medical photography and television there was a decreasing demand for the services of medical illustrators.

If approved by the council, the phase-out would probably take place over a two year period beginning next July, Holmes said.

Holmes said the possibility of moving the program to the Ontario College of Art was being investigated.

Food Hazard?

PORTLAND (ZNS-CUP) — The former head of the atomic energy generation has suggested that eating may be more hazardous to your health than is nuclear energy.

Dixie Lee Ray, in a speech at an Electric Utility Association meeting in Portland, stated that, "There have been no recorded deaths in civil nuclear applications, while 300 persons choke to death on food in this country every year."

GRADUATE STUDENTS AND THE LIBRARY STRIKE

On October 16th the General Council of the Graduate Students' Union unanimously passed the following motion in support of the Library Workers:

"Whereas cutbacks in library services directly affect the quality of education at the University of Toronto;

And whereas the salaries paid library workers at the university have lagged behind salaries for comparable workers outside the university;

Be it resolved that the Graduate Students' Union supports the efforts of CUPE local 1230 to obtain a fair wage settlement, job security and an end to staff reductions;

Be it resolved that the GSU attempt to keep graduate students informed of the progress of the union negotiations, particularly graduate students using carrels in the libraries, in order that they may be prepared for the impact any strike may have on their study plans;

And be it further resolved that this motion be carried to the Dean of the Graduate School, with strong representations that he use his good offices to urge the university to make a suitable offer so that his students can continue to study."

The GSU has already taken steps to ensure that students who respect the picket lines will not be adversely affected in any way by the strike. The Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council, on the urging of SAC, GSU, GAA and ASSU, has recommended that departments extend all academic deadlines. Dean Safarian has assured the GSU that he will do all he can to protect the interests of graduate students in the event of a strike.

The strike almost certainly begins on November 20th. It will only end quickly if students bring pressure on the university. You can do this by writing to President Evans, passing motions of support for the library workers in your course union, and by working on the Library Support Committee.

If you run into any difficulties because of your refusal to cross picket lines or because of the interruption of library services, let the GSU know at 928-6233.

If your course union wants more information or speakers from the GSU or library support committee, call the GSU at 928-6233.

Boring Board Bans Banks

By BILL MERP
The move by the Varsity Board of Directors to ban all term paper advertisements in the paper did not become law without lengthy discussion.

Before the debate, readers' opinions were sought. Responses came from the SAC, which had voted to request that term paper ads be refused, the APUS (Part-time undergrads) who recommended that "Varsity no longer accept advertising of this type..." and the Faculty Association who "... strongly welcome a decision..." of this sort.

Personal responses came from a first year student who "... would like to think of it (Varsity) as a newspaper based on honesty..." and a professor of philosophy who felt that the essays provided a way of buying success to the detriment of students too principled or too poor to do so. He also pointed out the danger of a move to rely more heavily on exams if the use of essay services became widespread.

Another letter came from faculty, students, and support staff of the Institute for the History and Philosophy of Science and Technology. They feel that "... the writing of essays is one of the most valuable activities in undergraduate and graduate education" and are "outraged that deception in any form should be encouraged..." and view the present advertising policy of Varsity as a particularly repugnant threat."

As if that wasn't enough, Vice Provost Robin Ross had written, sending a copy of the U of T Code of Behaviour and pointing out that Varsity, in aiding and abetting a student to commit an offence, is also committing an offence. This was also the view of the University Solicitor.

No letters were received which supported the ads.

Most Directors of Varsity agreed with the writers. However there was some dissent. Varsity has a long-established practice of accepting all ads, although many are repugnant to staffers because they are sexist, or support the capitalist system. A line is drawn only when blatant exploitation of students may occur, for example when money is asked for before any goods of services are supplied.

One board member said there was nothing wrong with this type of ad. The vote was two in favour and eight against the ads.

UN expert outlines need for reform

By CHRISTINE CURLOOK
"A new international economic order is indispensable to the future security and well being of the entire human family," said UN aficionado Dr. Maurice Strong at Convocation Hall last Thursday evening.

"Canada's opportunity resides in international leadership," added the former UN under secretary general in his speech on "Technological Society and the Need for a New World Order."

Strong, is presently president of Petro-Can, the federal government's entry into the energy field and executive director of the United Nations Environment Program.

After an introduction by U. of T. president Dr. John Evans, Strong expanded extensively upon the most important implications for the future of industrialized societies and for their relations with the developing world.

He warned "Today, the principle threats to man and nature come from himself rather than the forces of nature" and that the scientific and technological changes which man has either intentionally or unintentionally effected are "most dramatically manifested in the acute and growing gap between rich and poor."

Developing countries require the capital, technology and management from the industrialized countries to support a build-up of new productive capacity, said Strong.

He emphasized man is in a "new phase of history, in control of his own evolution" and that the technological society must be a "managed society" exercising the required degree of control over "the forces which are determining our future course."

He pointed out one of the by-products of the technological civilization is the "universal and universalizing culture" typified by "jet aeroplane, modern airports, the Hilton hotel, the international credit card, the automobile, television and transistor radio."

Living in the materialistic universal culture involves little adjustment, yet many people in developing countries find themselves torn between their commitment to tradition and the pressures which draw them inexorably into the new culture, while denying them the means to participate fully in its benefits, he said.

"The framework for the new order must be global in scale," Strong continued, "the common denominator residing upon those issues affecting human survival."

Strong claimed closing the gap between rich and poor is an illusory concept, infeasible in the foreseeable future and that the critical gap exists between those who live at a level of poverty denying human dignity and those living above the basic poverty line. Strong emphasized it was "scandalous" that our resources, technology and management capacities were not employed in bridging this gap.

The principal challenge Strong pointed out, "is more government without increasing centralization and bureaucratization." Instead, Strong said, re-allocating the responsibilities and functions of various levels of government should take place.

China, for example, a country among the poorest in terms of per capita income, manages to meet the basic needs for food, shelter, education, health care and employment for all its citizens without external assistance and has become a significant provider of assistance to others, Strong pointed out.

SAC cuts anti-racism

By MIKE EDWARDS
A four-day conference on Racism, highlighting a speech by Imamu Baraka (Leroy Jones), has been scheduled for early December, but according to conference organizer, Steve Moore, its future is severely threatened on the question of SAC funding.

The Toronto Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression (TARPR) approached SAC asking for $2,000 to help affray costs totalling more than $3,000. The SAC executive, Monday night, on the recommendation of their own speakers bureau, offered $300.

York University offered to fund in proportion to the SAC figure. On a pro-rata basis, York University has to fork over $48.

Conference organizers are furious at the seemingly irrevocable stand of SAC on the two major political issues in Canada today.

According to Moore, the two most important activities of the federal government are their current assault on workers with the wage freeze and the parallel assault on immigrants in the "Green Paper". Moore referred to SAC's non-support of the library workers as an example of indifference over Trudeau's wage controls.

The conference which starts December 4 will have major presentations on Native People, featuring Louis Cameron and Tom Keefick and Migrant labour and Immigration featuring Tariq Ali and Rosie Douglas, who faces deportation December 15.

There will be workshops on December 8, following a march and demonstration to the Toronto immigration offices. Topics include the federal greppaper, mercury poisoning, and the fight against systematic and unjust deportations by the government.

The Baraka meeting is scheduled for the last day of the conference. Also featured will be A. Sadaki, from Durham North Carolina, a long-time member of the US Black liberation movement.

Conference organizers are demoralized by the lack of support from SAC, they are further angered at the conditions for funding given by the SAC executive. They are giving $300 on the basis that the whole conference goes ahead. Conference organizers can't even offer an edited version of the conference to save the embarrassment of cancellation.

TARPR now have support from York International Student Centre, the Latin American Working Group, the Marxist Institute, three Trotskyist groups and some smaller Black liberation organizations. They are now approaching many more for support including the Toronto based Committee Against Racism.

SAC spent several thousand on the recent appearance by Moshe Dayan, and by Angela Davis last year. When approached SAC spokespeople continually referred to the current budgetary deficit of $15,000.

Music haters smash piano for charity

Any machismo rock fans here at U of T? CFTO is offering you a chance to smash a piano on New Year's day. You don't even have to know how to play it.

Channel number nine, also known as Sifo will be celebrating their fifteenth birthday with a 24-hour charity telethon starting 6 pm on New Year's Eve.

Ken Stanley, the world famous star of the world famous Pig and Whistle show is just starting to organize the show and is offering two U of T students the chance to get in on the ground floor. Other local universities are being challenged to enter a team.

The current world record, according to the Guinness Book of Records is 4 minutes 21 seconds and is currently held by two students from Wayne State in Indiana. Contest rules stipulate the use of a sledge hammer only. The pieces of the piano must be passed through a nine-inch hole.

CFTO will supply the hole, the piano, and the sledgehammer. The world famous Glen Cochrane will be making public appeals for four piano next week.

Proceeds from the telethon will go toward the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, who need money to assist victims in buying the medicine and for additional research. The disease, which affects young children's lungs can only be treated with massive doses of oral medication which cost up to $135 a week. There is no cure.

Other records to be challenged during the Telethon include a beer drinking contest, an egg eating contest and a House-worker contest.

The beer drinking contest, which may be held at the Brunswick House, is hamstrung by LCBO regulations which prohibit the broadcast of booze consumption. Thus contestants will have to settle for water. The current record is ten seconds for a fifty ounce glass.

The record for hard boiled eggs is forty in thirty minutes, and the house-brick throwing record is thirty five feet.

Sunday is no fun day. The entire staff missed Santa and you have no idea what that does to us. On news side Eric MacMillan gets most of the credit for the definitive cutbacks stuff, plus his aides. Photos by the assembled multitude. Here's to K.C.R.'s future bambin — of indeterminate gender.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Trying to add meaning to the word "cutback"

We've been throwing the word "cutbacks" around quite frequently in this newspaper and perhaps we've thrown it too loosely. Today's feature attempts to outline what the word means in both a theoretical and practical sense.

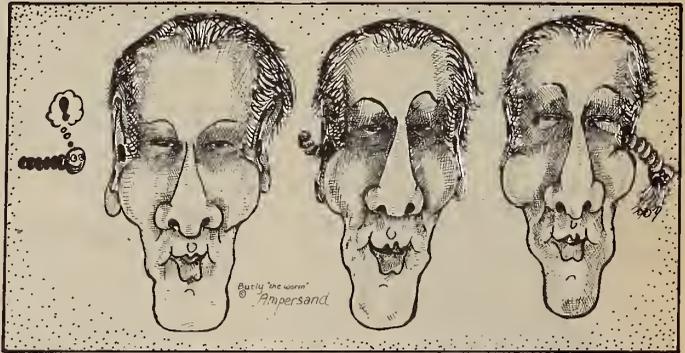

What we're hoping to do is open the university up as much as possible. A lot of the internal pushing and shoving that goes on in this community goes on without publicity. Decisions are made, people are shifted around, programmes cut: all of this happens with no definitive record of the entire picture being offered by the administration.

In a situation in which all the parts of the university share a common misery it is virtual suicide for the university to continue this way. Today's information hopes to break the secrecy. None of the information is confidential, there are no secret sources, but secrecy does not imply that information is being hidden. In this case it implies that the information is being offered in dribs and drabs with little attempt at coherence. So, after approximately 200 phone calls, and hours of information collation by a crack Varsity team we offer a fairly complete picture of the university's desperate bids to stave off a deficit.

The giant question that arises is: "Is the university making the right decisions?" We'd like to leave that one to you. Where do you think the university could save money? Fire some faculty? Cut down on administration at Sircoec Hall? Clean the university less frequently? These are all possibilities that should be looked into before the university attempts to guillotine academic programs.

We're not interested in a talent contest for the most original suggestion, just a detailing from all members of the community, students, faculty, support staff, administration alike, as to how we can keep the wolf from the door while doing as little academic damage as possible. All replies, if desired, will be kept in strictest confidence. The address is on the masthead above, come in and see us or send a letter.

Nothing to do with the editorial, just artist Ampersand's appraisal of the windmills of Trudeau's mind.

U of T Act was lost in the shuffle

One of the promises lost in the provincial election shuffle two months ago was the chance of having the government deal with the long-overdue U of T Act Review.

Before the election, the last minister of Colleges and Universities, James Auld, promised U of T students that the Legislature would get around to the review this fall. Then came the election and the new minister is making no promises that the Legislature will deal with it before Governing Council elections come up next spring.

The spring deadline is important. The review deals specifically with recommendations for the number of student and faculty members on Governing Council. The recommendations from the students councils and the faculty are different (for some elusive reason) and the government must decide on parity or something close to it. This has to be done before the elections in February.

What is required, due to the minority government's reticence, is a full-scale lobby of the opposition to have this dealt with as quickly as possible. Certainly it's not the most pressing issue facing the Ontario taxpayers, but it does leave the U of T Act in limbo and students concerned about their decision-making future. A promise is a promise, even if made by one minister and broken by another.

A word to Santa: Rotate!

Overheard at Pizza, Pizza on Bloor Street, Sunday afternoon: "Is it over yet?"

"No, the street's still blocked." "You mean I have to keep eating this pizza?"

The Santa Clause parade was held on Sunday afternoon, instead of the usual Saturday morning and the streets were closed by police and lined ten-deep with a strange group of cult worshippers. Santa Claus was coming to town amid the recurrent theme of "Let Ireland's share a moment with you."

The troubles in Ireland, Lebanon, and Israel are supposed to be based on a conflict in religion. But what could be worse than being forced to watch a Santa Clause parade because Bloor Street is cut off?

This Varsity staffer lives north of Bloor and The Varsity office, as any fool knows, is south of Bloor on St. George. He is decidedly unchristian and at a time of postal strike, library strike and teacher's strike, the concept of the jolly red christian selling Eatons to young children is a paragon of bad taste, especially when he's late for work.

The military and para-military marching bands, besides striking sour notes, were also striking this reporter with memories of men marching off to get chopped to pieces in Korea, or Vietnam just so Eatons and TTT can go on sharing a moment with you. "Bah, humbug!"

Just one more waste of electricity

It's a pity that in order to rid the world of its top-line fascist there has to be a long involved discussion of euthanasia.

Francisco Franco is being kept alive by machines. It's poetic justice, or something akin, that this machine of men should have to rely upon machines for support in his dying days, but it's patently ridiculous to waste any more time or energy keeping him alive. He has spent much of his life keeping Spain resolutely stuck in the middle ages, using twentieth-century technology to prolong the life of this medievalist is more than just a waste of electricity.

It's comforting to know that when it comes to the topic of Franco, all manner of left-leaning and bourgeois democrats are united in contempt. They may differ on wage and price controls, censorship and the War Measures Act, but whisper the man's name and all manner of faces cloud over with black looks. All of these are united in the death-watch and many turn on the news daily waiting for the announcement.

Where they differ most widely of course, is on the topic of Spain's future. The most optimistic are pushing for nothing short of revolution, the most pessimistic for a consolidation of military power under some closet Franco who is yet to emerge. The middle line are content with a liberal monarchy under the reinstated Bourbons.

Come what may, let's get on with it. There's going to be some sort of involved conflict, all are agreed on that, so the sooner they pull the plug on this dinosaur, the sooner it will all be over.

SAC explains strike stand

To the Editor:
At our October General Council meeting the Student's Administrative Council passed a motion supporting the library worker's demand for a just living wage. Although this letter is late I would like to explain the intent of the motion.

SAC did not feel that it could or should involve itself with the actual demands of the library workers. Since it did not appear that the university administration was bargaining in good faith we felt it necessary to encourage negotiations by passing this motion.

When it appeared that the workers would go on strike the executive passed a motion encouraging the Academic Affairs to ask professors to delay essays and exams in the event of a library strike. Academic Affairs passed the motion at its October 20 meeting.

Negotiations have ceased and the library workers have voted to strike. Our executive hopes that both sides will come back to the bargaining table and make an effort to avert the strike.

Students are concerned that the library workers are dealt with justly and at the same time they are concerned about their studies. A resumption of negotiations is the only chance for both of these concerns to be satisfied.

Art vs. politics continued

To the Editor:
Has anyone mentioned the role of satire in the current war of the artists? (Varsity, Nov. 8, "Art must serve the working class.") Though I do not believe that art "serves" anyone or that its subject matter can be defined by time, class or politics, I do feel that there is room for social awareness in the artist's world. Indeed, many artists have shown themselves to be sensitive to social and political follies, but the difference between art as I am perceiving it and the "art" that is advocated by Cassan or von Millan is in its very presentation: "traditional" art records; political art preaches.

But satire singularly combines the best of both worlds without giving itself away. Two examples that come to mind are Jonathan Swift's Modest Proposal on the oppression of Irish peasants by British landlords in the eighteenth century, and George Orwell's Animal Farm, that disturbing and little fable on revolution and the destruction of individual liberty. Certainly both works chronicle aspects of human injustice in magnificent form. It is precisely the form that provokes discussion and makes these satires memorable. I somehow doubt that we would remember so vividly the plight of those Irish peasants and gouging British landlords had Swift declined this comment: "I grant this food (human babies) will be somewhat dear, and therefore very proper for landlords, who, as they have already devoured most of the parents, seem to have the best title to the children."

In short, provoke, don't preach. Preaching is fine in letters to the editor, but pious, ranky poets should be relegated to fricassee or ragout.

Toike replies to Pearse

To the Editor:
I feel obligated to reply to the letter by R.H. Pearse and Mike Treacy about the Toike Oike in Wednesday's Varsity.

Firstly, I must admit that I was mistaken about the SAC Grant policy. I was honestly under the impression that the $500.00 was for the full year — there was no intention to mislead the readers. This is my blunder and I suppose it would reflect badly on me as an administrator — but I had never pretended to be anything but a student and part-time editor.

We do wish, however, that our critics would at least try to define what they mean by "campus oriented" material. Do they mean articles about the SAC executive members (1 1/2 per cent non-ad material in our first four issues)? Or such events as Shinerama and Homecoming (12 per cent)? Do they include humorous articles and the jokes (25 per cent)? How about features (22 per cent)? Maybe everything that isn't editorial matter or of specific interest to engineers (69 per cent)?

As far as circulation goes, we do consider ourselves campus-wide. The 3,000 engineers (who pay 15 to 25 per cent of the cost directly through their Engineering Society) get 5,000 copies — the other 10 or 15 thousand are distributed around the campus (the SAC grant of $800, pays 8 per cent of the cost). If, as masters Pearse and Treacy claim, "23,000 get stolen (or taken) by off-campus groups" this is the first we've heard of it — I wonder how many Varsity get "stolen"? Why? Incidentally, we hardly consider the 800 to 1,200 copies each we send to Scarborough and Erindale to be a "scrabble".

I am still of the opinion that a large number of U of T students want to read the Toike. I have never once seen piles of Toikes lying around days after they have been published, as I have every other campus paper (except the Balcony Square which I never see period).

Or is Dick still mad because I printed his article upside down?

CUTBACKS - Undergrads Ground Under?

By ERIC McMILLAN

The figure most quoted is five per cent. That's the seemingly small amount departments are being asked to trim from their budgets during the university's current fiscal difficulties.

Five per cent doesn't sound like much until you take into account inflationary pressures in the opposite direction. Even then we all think we know how much bureaucratic fat can be trimmed without scraping the bone of academic quality.

Yet almost all department heads contacted by the Varsity in a university-wide survey appeared concerned about the effect of cutbacks on the quality of education their departments could maintain.

ENGINEERS TAKE A LEAK

Can something as remote to students as the university budget affect the day to day life of undergraduates?

It can if they're studying languages. Would you believe French classes with English as the medium of instruction?

In Applied Sciences it can. Have you noticed your Mechanical Engineering classes of up to a hundred students are no longer being broken down into smaller workable units?

As an interdisciplinary freak you might find your INX courses disappearing next year.

How about geology courses minus the field trips?

Engineering labs with plumbing leaks? These are some of the spectres sending shivers through academia when past, present, and projected cutbacks are discussed. The degree of concern varies from department to department but no chairmen told us they were unconcerned.

And some were very worried. After the growth period of the sixties with annually rising budgetary expectations, hard times come as a shock to some departments.

TWO MILLION DOLLAR S-T-R-E-T-C-H

U of T hasn't been hit as hard this year as some universities in the province because it had a 1.7 million dollar surplus built up over the previous years.

But two million doesn't stretch very far in a budget with expenditures over two hundred million. The 1976-77 Budget Guidelines noted that even with an accumulated surplus "to cushion the shock of government funding decisions" this year will probably end with a two million dollar deficit.

Thus next year promises to be "the most difficult which the university has faced," according to the guidelines.

The university's financial picture is always coloured by the effects of numerous internal and external decisions. The most significant indicators however, are usually enrolment figures, government funding based on enrolment (the BIU index), and expenditures for salaries and facilities.

FUTILE PETITION

The university can increase its income by increasing enrolment, thus gaining both extra tuition fees and a larger provincial grant based on the BIU rating. However, it is generally felt greater enrolment can reach a point of diminishing returns beyond which the resulting income would not be sufficient to offset accompanying expenditures.

An equally futile exercise, so far, has been petitioning the government for more funding. In recent years the formula grant to universities has not kept up with expenses although it has increased. Thus Premier Bill Davis can argue, as he has, that there have been no "cutbacks" at the same time as U. of T. Premier John Evans is asking that the provincial budget ceilings on education be raised.

FROZEN TILLS CHRISTMAS

Which leaves the alternative of cutting expenditures. Which brings us back to cutbacks.

Prime materials for whittling are the budgets for research activities and for salaries, both of academic and support staff.

Salaries can be cut by holding down present levels and by reducing staff through attrition, that is, not hiring personnel to replace people who leave. In fact a hiring freeze has been in effect at U. of T. since August.

According to Personnel, non-academic staff are being hired to fill vacancies only after approval by a Provost or Vice-Provost. Academic appointments are frozen until the university's budget position is clarified, probably after Christmas, although exceptions are made where dire need is shown. A number of department chairmen told us of the difficulties they experience replacing personnel, from secretaries to professors.

EIGHT MILLION $ U. OF T. DEBT

Additional austerity measures already in effect or considered include stretching the teaching duties of present staff (often at the expense of research), eliminating courses, and letting maintenance of facilities and equipment slide.

Even so, it is not expected the university can reduce within a year the deficit presently being incurred. By the end of next year the university could be as much as seven or eight million dollars in the hole, according to the budget guidelines. Stringency measures will be with us for a while.

Departments will have their individual problems coping with these measures, but many of the complaints our survey found are common to all. Increased class sizes, overburdening of staff, and fewer courses were attributed to the hiring freeze expected to continue in some form into the future.

Disciplines requiring a lot of equipment were generally concerned about rising costs and falling budgets for supplies. Departments whose research consists of field work, computer use, or travel, feel the pinch in their research budgets.

Some effects however are difficult to quantify and may be more important in the long run.

Lack of innovation, for example. With most departments stretching money and staff to hold onto existing courses, few if any are considering instigating new courses. For departments like Psychology and Sociology which must respond to shifting trends within the field, inability to adapt can mean a loss of reputation and grad students as well as undergrads.

OLD VEINS NEW BLOOD

Interdisciplinary Studies was conceived in part as a department which could experiment with educational ideas, some of which could later become accepted within the traditional university curriculum. With the demise of this department, this experimentation and input of new ideas would cease.

Another limitation on innovation is the university's inability to hire its own graduates. David Gauthier of Philosophy pointed out professors usually reflect the era in which they were trained. Your fifty-year-old tenured prof. is instructing you in the philosophical vein of the forties and fifties.

There have been recent signs however that even tenured staff may be subject to the squeeze. At least one chairman told us he favoured letting go staff already on tenure and several mentioned the advisability of reverting to contractual hiring.

Some departments find it easier to reduce staff through attrition than others, due to impending retirements and resignations. Those not so lucky however, must keep their tenured staff and cut expenses in areas affecting students more directly.

This has led Michael E. Charles, Chairman of Chemical Engineering, to propose "a multi-year, multi-department approach."

"There is no one retiring in this department," he said, "Therefore we have less flexibility." Charles proposed that those departments able to cut staff immediately, do so, and those in the position of Chemical Engineering would even up the debt over future years.

MEDS CUTS ITSELF

Whether any departments or divisions are willing to cut back more than 5 per cent and let others catch up later is another question. According to the Budget Guidelines however, the Faculty of Medicine is willing to lead the way by planning a 10 per cent reduction over three years starting this year and "should not receive further reductions until other divisions have been reviewed on a similar basis. In whatever stages the cutbacks are made, the question that must be asked eventually is "will the financial squeeze bring a decline in the quality of education?"

Some chairmen did not foresee a decline in academic standards this year, or the next, but merely a trimming of educational "frills" and an increased workload for staff.

Students may argue however that fewer electives, fewer field trips, degenerating facilities, and larger classes, all pose limitations to what they expect from a university education.

Yet the faculty could be right in supposing the worst is yet to come.

Many Tongues, Few Bills

By BARBARA HARRISON

Language departments have special problems in addition to those common to other arts departments. Class size is a crucial factor in language instruction because it is important to give each student a chance at oral practice in class.

Chairman of the combined German departments Hans Eichner expressed the fear cutbacks will mean larger classes and less opportunity for students to converse in German. The problem is particularly acute in first year courses which are already suffering from the pressure of numbers, said Eichner.

The reason for unwieldy classes is the inability of the department to hire new professors as enrolment increases. Eichner foresaw German losing "at least ten per cent" of its staff over the next few years due to retirements and the termination of temporary contracts.

The combined departments of French are also suffering through the policy of attrition. The relatively new French-Canadian studies are in danger of expiring because they are "very close to being short-staffed" according to chairman David Smith.

"One of the dangers of a policy of attrition is that people who leave don't always leave in areas you'd like them to," said Smith. "Often you have people leave who are just the people you need."

Smith pointed out difficulties arise when instruction is in a foreign language and the class size approaches twenty. The average French class has just under that number. When the figure rises to 25, the instruction in English will have to be considered — "a very retrograde step" said Smith.

The Department of Italian Studies has been separated from Hispanic Studies for less than three years and "expansion has taken place at the same time as the financial squeeze," said Chairman S.B. Chandler.

Classes now total 1,200 students but only 14 staff members are full-time.

Half the teaching in Italian is done by teaching assistants. Chandler feared the success of unionizing among grad assistants will result in higher wages and the hiring of fewer teaching assistants. If necessary, some literature classes will be dropped in favour of maintaining language courses which are in greater demand, he said.

Two departments not generally considered language departments also experience language-related problems. Chairman Bill Saywell of East Asian Studies noted the extra effort required by his students to master Chinese and Japanese. They need small classes and summer courses to keep up their practice between terms, needs hard to meet with reductions in staff and money, argued Saywell.

Lorne Kenny of Islamic Studies reported that with restricted hiring policies his department cannot hire language specialists for its courses in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish. Instead, the rest of his staff must fill in.

The department of Slavic Languages and Literature is in a similar position. Chairman C.H. Bedford described the department as being in a "hold the line situation" with hiring.

Chairman G.L. Stagg of the Hispanic Studies department would not comment because "the situation is not clear enough."

Most chairmen however echoed French Department Chairman David Smith's concern that the university administration recognize "there is a point beyond which a cutback will have an effect" on the quality of language instruction.

Noting the administration had a difficult job, Smith said "We just have to hope the French department comes out high on the list of priorities."

DISINTERDISCIPLINARY

By ERIC McMILLAN

It's no secret around Interdisciplinary Studies that Marty Wall is trying to peddle his courses around the St. George campus. As head of a department considered "expedient", he's looking for a home for the innovative INX courses.

The Interdisciplinary program has been cut back in the last year by eight courses, most of which were picked up by colleges. However, Martin Wall does not find this an altogether satisfactory answer.

"The colleges are more interested in developing programs" and are loathe to take over courses like parapsychology, women studies, and alternatives in education without major changes, said Wall.

Agi Lukacs, a course co-ordinator, said, "When a budget squeeze results in a department being cut, the result is often the adjustment of course structures to fit their new homes."

Lukacs pointed to the example of two courses, one on women and the family and one called "The Idea of a Child", being combined and justified in "intermittent meetings with administration" for possible acceptance by Innis College.

POWERFUL INITIATIVE

Fellow instructor Mark Golden expressed dismay the university couldn't keep these two courses although "the family dates back thousands of years, everyone was a child once, and half of the populace is women."

Agi also spoke of the frustration of being hired by the academic term and not knowing before August whether or not you'll be hired. "The cutting of staff results in insecurity all around," she said.

Another loss to the university if the Interdisciplinary program goes under, is the weakening of its ability to adapt to current interests, according to Wall. "If something comes along we can pick it up but no college has the kind of power to take this kind of initiative."

NONENEXT

Wall pointed to the 200 and 300 level "Symposium" courses as examples of the "highly unusual" approach Interdisciplinary Studies can take to new areas of study. Suggested courses are tried out under this heading and if successful can become permanent fixtures.

It would be "unfortunate" if students are deprived of this chance to try out their ideas, said Wall, but as to the chances of saving Interdisciplinary Studies he's "not really optimistic."

"Every year the budget gets worse," he said. The department presently consists of himself, one secretary, and about 20 teaching assistants who for the most part are hired on a temporary basis for the duration of the course. This year it teaches between 600 and 700 students. Next year there may be none at all.

"We're all rather fed up," is how Professor Ben Alcock summed it up. "We always hoped we were seeing our way through thin times and be turning the corner soon but now..."

In some engineering departments like Alcock's, hard times are far from being a surprise because they've been here for the last five or six years. Common complaints in Applied Sciences and Engineering centered around aging equipment and lab facilities.

"The services are not in good condition," said Chairman Michael Charles of Chemical Engineering, mentioning plumbing problems and leaks in the labs.

Charles said the first major effect of cutbacks in Chemical has been postponement of renovations to the Walberg Building. Phases

As one of the largest departments in Arts, Sociology also has one of the worst student-teacher ratios. With only 60 professors for 5,000 students, class size is a major headache to Chairman Irving Zeitlin who personally teaches a theory course to 100 students.

"Budget cuts will only aggravate this," Zeitlin said.

Restricted funds make it impossible to replace retiring colleagues and the department is allowed to hire only visiting professors. "In some cases very distinguished people will be leaving and we'll have gaps in these areas," said Zeitlin, citing a Canadian Society course as one which may have to be scrapped.

Other effects of cutbacks in Sociology include scarcity of research funds, loss of computer time, and further decline of facilities.

"In the first place — this building!" The Chairman, sweeping his arm around his office in the former Borden's Dairy, regarded the deteriorating facilities. He suspected the Borden Building had been "condemned as a fire hazard."

Apart from general decrepitness the building was ill-suited to Sociology due to its location — isolated from the other social sciences and with classes spread over the distant campus — Zeitlin argued. He didn't see much chance of a new building for the social sciences "as originally planned" with the university going broke.

History chief J.B. Conacher told us, "They're threatening a 5 per cent cutback in our budget which is equivalent to the salaries of four people," though he did not consider firing four people the solution.

Enrolment in History has been increasing steadily without a corresponding increase in staff, Conacher said. Last year's ratio of 24 students per prof has risen to 30 maintaining the quality of training if the proposed cuts go through. He also noted the possibility of reducing electives and lab time for students.

FACTS OF LIFE

Chairman of Industrial Engineering Ben Bernholtz said tightening budgets have been a fact of life "for the last few years." Student enrolment is up but the budget for tutors in seminars and demonstrators in labs has not risen enough to counteract inflation, he said.

Industrial engineering does have modern equipment in "the only university lab of this kind in Canada" used to study "the human factor" in interaction with machines, but supplies are increasingly tight, Bernholtz said. He was also concerned that it is becoming "difficult to innovate, particularly in the graduate program." He pointed to "substantial demand" for the part time evening masters program which cannot be met without a general downgrading of the grad program due to lack of funds.

Civil, mechanical, and electrical engineering chairmen repeated the themes of increasing class size and decreasing equipment budgets which have been "under strain for a number of years now."

Neither is Mechanical

Engineering lab apparatus being replaced adequately, according to W.D. Baines. Furthermore, Mechanical is able to provide fewer sections and electives to its students. Classes which used to be broken down to thirty or forty students, now hold a hundred, said Baines.

OPTIMISM DESTROYED

Gordon Slemom of Electrical expects the 5 per cent cut to mean discontinuance of visiting professorships and reduced numbers of teaching assistants, as well as fewer classes. The situation is "serious and gradually worsening," said Slemom.

The most openly pessimistic of chairmen was Ben Alcock of Metallurgy and Materials Science. "The real change this year is our optimism has been destroyed," said Alcock.

Metallurgy has few students of its own but gives classes for engineering students from other departments. Alcock saw the faculty getting away from the idea of many electives. The "supermarket days" of students shopping for courses are coming to an end, he said.

In research "the university has not been meeting the bill," according to Alcock. "We've been contributing by overworking ourselves, but now we're quite disheartened," he said. "We're not prepared to make the effort any longer."

Geological Engineering and Engineering Science do not have any staff of their own.

is year. To make matters worse, attrition has been in the wrong places — in the important Canadian-American and Latin-American studies. Conacher expected the pending cuts to necessitate dropping 5 or 6 second year courses and a dozen senior year seminars.

David Gauthier, Chairman of Philosophy, echoed the concern about eliminating courses. Though the situation is not "catastrophic" in some courses may have to be dropped or offered only on alternate years if they do not meet the criteria of academic importance and popularity.

"We are conscious of our age," Gauthier said when asked about the effect of the hiring freeze on getting young professors. "We just aren't bringing fresh blood on a replacement basis; students are not benefitting from more younger people in the field," he said.

Anthropology the 5 per cent back will probably mean a slight reduction in the number of teaching assistants and an increase in class size, according to department head Drewitt. This is a serious matter in Anthropology because it already has one of the highest student-staff ratios as well as fewer facilities "pressed to the right now."

Linguistic and social anthropology are areas "hardest hit" although it will probably be a reduction in drop courses in general, according to Drewitt. Field trips, especially in archeology, will also have to be reduced with continued financial restraints, he said.

Juel Tulving, Acting Chairman of Psychology, worried "there is no ability left in the system." Psychology must be able to change the times because "students' interests change quickly," he noted. "At present students are flocking to experimental psychology, next it may be something else, and so on."

Other departments the hiring freeze could affect the number of psychology course offerings. Tulving remarked on one faculty member refused tenure: "If he can't be replaced his courses will have to be cancelled and this will have an effect on students since he is teaching popular courses."

Enrolment increases in Political Economy courses have been dramatic: Commerce and finance up 28 per cent from last year, Economics up 26 per cent, and Political Science up 17 per cent.

Chairman Harry C. Eastman said political economy is "growing at a rate that obviously can't be allowed to go on uncontrolled much longer." He saw a need to restrict the number of students passing on from first year to higher grades in commerce. "Unless we limit enrolment in the courses then class sizes are going to increase even more," he noted.

In contrast East Asian Studies has one of the best student-staff ratios in the humanities although it has expanded rapidly in the last five years from a handful of professors and students to 17 profs and over 500 undergrads. Chairman Bill Saywell said, "The hiring freeze hasn't seriously hurt us as a department yet, but it has prevented expansion of the department as we planned it."

Saywell noted research and language improvement in East Asian Studies are more expensive than in other departments because they have to be largely done in the far east. When profs go on sabbatical for research in the east, their courses often are "shelved" for the year.

In addition "we could be hurt very seriously" if the number of teaching assistants is cut back, said Saywell. That would make it more difficult to attract graduate students who depend on the fees and "for the first time good talent in this field is available," he said.

Either professional faculties are having few problems with cutbacks or their deans know better than to open up to Varsity reporters. Whatever the reason, getting the dirt on professional faculty budgets was hard.

Kathleen King of Nursing anticipates a 5 per cent reduction in its budget next year. "We've had the same amount to spend every year but less purchasing power," she said in reference to the effects of inflation.

The main problem in Nursing is finding graduate teaching assistants, said King. However the problem is not necessarily financial.

"We have difficulty fitting in graduate students' time with our teaching needs."

Bill Alexander of Pharmacy revealed the student-staff ratio in his faculty is about the same as it ever was, and echoed Nursing's complaint that equipment and supplies budgets have been

With the noose settling into place, budget cuts will proceed to strangle the sciences.

"We're scared to death of the effects on this department," said Chairman D.A. Macrae of Astronomy. U of T has the largest astronomy department in Canada, he explained, and with continued cutbacks it won't be able to maintain its prestige.

Macrae worried that graduate students would go to the States or elsewhere due to Astronomy's decline and its inability to hire them as teaching assistants. With academic hiring on a temporary basis he said, "It is difficult to get good people."

GEOLGY ROCKED BY CUTBACKS

Geology head David Strangway cited a dramatic increase of interest in earth sciences which cannot be met with expansion under the austerity measures. Enrolment in Introductory Geology courses has risen by half since last year because students have become more "job-oriented," he said.

As a result Geology is having trouble acquiring and maintaining enough "modern sophisticated equipment" such as computers, chemical facilities, and high pressure instruments. Strangway also spoke of difficulties keeping enough technicians to run the equipment and demonstrations.

The most noticeable effect to geology students could be a reduction in field work. Trips are indirectly threatened by the limitation of facilities for analyzing samples gathered in the field. In Zoology Chairman David Metrick also foresaw reduced practical instruction. Courses which previously had three lab hours and two lectures a week are becoming more heavily weighted in favour of classroom time.

TENURED OR NOT OUT THEY GO

Metrick favoured cutting the university's budget by letting go tenured staff rather than slicing into the sciences. "As soon as the university realizes it has to release tenured staff the better, because the way things are going the government is not going to be able to continue to support this," he said recently.

Botany is also hard pressed to maintain and purchase lab equipment. Chairman J. Dainty said lab teaching is bound to be affected. "Inevitably academic standards will suffer," he said.

Dainty did not expect research in botany to suffer because funds come from the National Research Council, but he did foresee the possibility of undergrad courses being dropped and teaching burdens worsening as the hiring freeze continues. He claimed, "We simply don't have the money but we're trying our damndest to maintain standards for the students."

On the other hand Chemistry boss K. Yates predicted cuts on research activities would be "equally heavy" as those affecting undergrad training such as curtailment of study room hours and tutorials in first and second year courses.

Yates shared with Physics Chairman R.L. Armstrong a concern over rising costs of up-to-date equipment. Armstrong pointed out science departments spend 25 per cent of their budgets on equipment, technicians, and demonstrators — expenses spared the humanities and social sciences. Yates claimed inflation trends for scientific equipment run twice as high as general inflation rates.

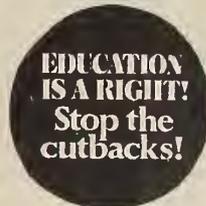

Physicist Armstrong agreed research would decrease although "this is what really determines the reputation of the department."

ZOO T.A.'s HOW MANY STAY?

Mathematics is a field which doesn't require expensive labs yet, R. Wormleighton of math claimed. "If we're squeezed much more, the situation will become quite desperate."

Math's problems center around the difficulty getting authorization to replace staff which is diminishing through attrition. Although it has a large student enrolment, it may have trouble keeping on its 200 teaching assistants if salary raises go through for them, Wormleighton suggested.

Computer Science will suffer the same as the other sciences in the hiring of academic and non-academic staff as well as suffer restrictions on money to pay for computer time, according to Mrs. Sandors of Computer Science. There also looms the expectation of cutting back its graduate programs.

... and a little loose change to divide up between dozens of departmental divisions.

The next person whose private life we delved into was Juri Daniel, Director of the School of Physical and Health Education. Mr. Daniel politely explained "we have reduced the number of options available to students but the core program is not infringed upon (by the cutbacks)". Looking forward to the facilities in the proposed athletic complex on the St. George campus, Phys Ed nonetheless is suffering from a lack of equipment in some areas.

"In Kinesiology we haven't been able to do any filming for years," said Daniel, explaining film is necessary for the study of movement.

The main problem in PHE is summed up as "student-staff ratio too high, classes too large" according to Daniel. At present the faculty has 400 students and 10 full-time faculty members plus cross-appointments from other faculties. Daniel saw the solution to PHE's problems as a "shift of energies" rather than cutbacks in staff. He expressed concern however that overburdening present staff would lead to reduced research activities.

UBC grub will be tested soon

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A University of British Columbia grad student is testing food in the student union building cafeteria for bacterial contamination.

Mark Muller said October 27 his evaluation of hamburgers, tuna fish, sandwiches, and milkshakes will be the first ever test for unhealthy amounts of bacteria in cafeteria food.

"I was shocked to find out they were not doing routine analysis of sub food," he said. "The inspectors never look at food bacteria counts."

Muller said he is most concerned about SUB snack bar hamburgers which become susceptible to bacteria growth when they are left near human body temperatures under an infra-red lamp.

Even if the amount of bacteria in the meat is very small it can multiply rapidly and make the food unfit for consumption, he said.

Municipal health inspector Susan Aikman confirmed that food served at SUB cafeteria and other campus food services outlets has never been tested.

"I would like to do lots of food samplings around UBC but our labs just do not have the facilities," she said.

Aikman said previous inspections which occur annually, have only dealt with serving and handling of food services fare, not with the bacteriological purity of the food. "I think our tests are probably very superficial," she said.

Aikman and Muller, who collected samples together, agreed it will be difficult to determine if foods are dangerously contaminated because there are no federal standards for bacterial levels in cooked meats.

Muller said, "The whole hassle is interpreting results. All I have to go by are proposed standards."

UBC food services head Robert Bailey said food services is constantly checking its operation for cleanliness. He said there has been no evidence in the past of food contamination.

Muller criticized the BC government's "primitive" food standards and health regulations.

He said municipal organizations are left to do most of the testing of food outlets despite their inadequate facilities.

Francophone papers unite

QUEBEC CITY (CUP) — CEGEPS and University newspapers must unite to better promote the interests of students.

So said more than 70 delegates representing 34 student newspapers in Quebec at the founding Congress of the Presse Etudiante Nationale (PEN) meeting in Quebec City November 1 and 2.

The new organization has given itself the task of organizing the student press in Quebec to help mobilize students in their opposition to the government's educational policies. In this they will work closely with the Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ).

ANEQ represents more than 70,000 students in post secondary institutions in Quebec.

Delegates at the founding Congress repeatedly underlined the fact that PEN must have very close ties with ANEQ and that there could be no question of one ever being in opposition to the other.

"There is only one student movement, and we are both part of it, any effort to weaken or do away with one would also weaken or do away with the other," one delegate told a crowd which cheered every intervention in favour of unity with ANEQ.

Although some delegates expressed doubt as to the wisdom of not allowing more autonomy for the newly formed press organization, the PEN voted with only two dissenting votes to unconditionally support ANEQ in its efforts to fight for student's rights.

PEN will be divided into seven regions, each with an executive responsible to maintain communications with each other.

BC students protest funds

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Students at three British Columbia community colleges planned to protest "inadequate" provincial funding.

Students from the Langara campus of Vancouver Community College, Capilano College, and Vancouver Vocational Institute planned to march from the Vocational Institute to the Community Colleges administration headquarters in downtown Vancouver.

"What we hope to do is to point out the contradictions in the NDP education policy," said Capilano student president Bill Bell.

He said the protest was not intended to be a disruptive one, but was intended to make the community conscious of the problems facing BC's community colleges.

The BC education department had promised that the college budget would be maintained for 1975-76, but "we didn't even get a status quo budget", said Bell.

Although the college's budget rose this year by 23 per cent, he said that inflation and rising wages meant courses had to be cut back instead of increased.

"We turned away 1,000 students this fall," he said. "This college as a learning institution is going down."

The walkouts came at the time of a controversy over rising salaries paid to administrators, which students claim were forcing up college costs unnecessarily.

Halifax profs may strike

HALIFAX (CUP) — Professors are threatening to strike if the St. Mary's University administration does not meet their wage demands.

The professors claim they are 12 per cent behind the average income for professors in the Maritimes.

While the University has offered a 16 per cent increase, the professors are demanding 27 per cent.

Since October 24 they have been on a work-to-rule timetable, working the minimum nine hours a week required and, in cases of class time overload, are dividing up the nine hours equally between classes.

Students have been demonstrating in support of the faculty demands. Other demands include a request for more power within the administration, particularly over the selection of Deans and the hiring of faculty.

A strike vote is expected to be taken in the near future.

McGill denies anti-gay bias

MONTREAL (CUP) — The principal of McGill University says that institution does not and will not discriminate against homosexuals in hiring or firing policies.

In a confidential letter leaked to the press, Principal R. E. Bell said that while "there is no official policy" applicable to gay persons, the University "does not ask people who are applying for jobs or promotions any questions about their personal lives."

According to Bell, this practice keeps the administration ignorant of personal information as "in the majority of cases we have no idea whether a given employee is homosexual or not."

Bell was asked in the letter if the university would hire persons who admitted to the personnel department their homosexuality. Bell said "I asked Mr. Matthews our personnel manager about this and his answer was a flat, Yes."

But Bell says this practice does not imply approval of homosexuality.

"We simply do not take up the question," he said.

Hawks hawktie Blues Chambliss a Superstar

By DAVID CASS

When the heady brew of youth and heart took the floor against a cocksure American spiced troupe of b-ball conformationists, we all found out that indeed Goliath can conquer David.

With slinkies for legs and jetburners for sneakers the Wilfred Laurier Hawks thoroughly undressed a rookie laden Blues team by the indecent score of 106-68 and laid claim to the basketball mantle now worn by Waterloo.

With three American magicians Laurier ripped bare all of Toronto's weaknesses and displayed them to all for calm perusal. No height, much youth, inexperience, the lack of a take-charge, holler guy and the knowledge that intimidation may come easily to the Blues this year.

The Blues broke quickly and contained Laurier for the opening minutes leading 10-8 at one point, but as Laurier flexed their collective pecks, the Blues were dispatched with precise teamwork both offensively and defensively.

The Hawks are a fearsome ballclub whose hallmarks are an explosive fast break, inexorable offensive penetration, delightful interior passing and a deceptive zone press.

This whole unit is spearheaded: "by the best player I've seen since I've been here," said John McManus, Blues coach for 21 years. Chuck Chambliss, who played conspicuously at Parkside College in Wisconsin, combined street-ball savvy with a masterful display of basketball showmanship to completely dominate the game and intimidate all who stood in his way. In little more than two-thirds of the game Chambliss netted 40 points.

"Even if we knew about him, we couldn't have defended him," McManus griped. When informed that Chambliss had been drafted by the ABA's Utah Stars, McManus chirped "He looked like a pro player out there." Indeed, if Chambliss is not selected All-Canadian there will be no joy in Kitcherloo.

"Chambliss is great but it's that big blonde kid whose gonna make us go." The gangbuster Laurier coach Don Smith is referring to is Mark Christenson, a product of Kearney State College in Nebraska. A 6-5" centre who plays like a hyperkinetic whirlwind and leaps like 6-10". Christenson controlled both backboards and completely shut off the middle to the Blues while popping 21 himself.

It was mainly his defensive play that held Toronto to a miserable 32 per cent shooting from the floor. Conversely, Laurier shot 50 per cent with most hoops coming inside as

Blues wrestle at Ryerson

By ROMAN PREOBRAZENSKI

Blues Wrestling began its season Friday at Ryerson with mixed results. While the creme de la creme of the team's roster were competing in a tournament in Lakehead, the remaining veterans and an eager squad of rookies challenged a strong Ryerson opposition.

Whilst Ryerson offered muscle and brawn, U of T countered with zeal, desire, and intelligence. Scott Smith, George Muttamaki, and Ed Rector scored superior victories, but Gregg Phelan, Fred Gartner, Wally Cringan (fighting the super fast David Leslie), and Al Kosugi all found their first match of the season an insuperable effort.

Rookie Rick Anderson fought an aggressive first time fight losing by a narrow margin.

The wrestling talent displayed in this initial contest should come to fruition in the Toronto Novice and Open Tournament hosted by the U of T on December 6 and 7.

the hesitant U of T defense claved in under the offensive onslaught created by the inventive Chambliss.

They even dove into their bag of tricks, connecting on the Alley-Oop pass a la Walton where the guard floats the ball towards the net and the big man leaps up to stuff it home. It is the stuff of which legend is made.

Where are they?

Bryce Taylor

Who can forget the first college mudbowl in which Mike Eben caught the only touchdown pass. The fair haired boy who tossed that cookie seemed all set for a life of everlasting bliss.

He had it all: the girl, Carol Goss of CBC's teen show 'After Four' and a career tossing football in the pros.

He opted out of football for the life a surgeon and his cheesecake wife carved up his life by flaunting it with the mayor of Vancouver, Art Phillips. But Bryce Taylor resurrected himself as present of the James Brolin fan club. So much for Saturday's heroes.

Question of judgement- on football officiating

A recent article in The Varsity prompts the following remarks on the quality and judgement of football officiating on the University Campus. In general it is a safe statement to say that most players and nearly all coaches know very little about the rules of football.

Nowhere have I found that more apparent than here at the University of Toronto. And that judgement reaches from the Varsity football coach (whose name, for some unknown reason, appears in the rule book among the members of the Rules Committee), through the rank and file of the inter-fac coaches. Needless to say the 'hoots and holders' from the fans normally reflect a similar ignorance.

However, it is incumbent upon a sports writer to reflect the real situation and to know whereof he speaks in his evaluation of what he sees (or hears about) on the field of play. One wonders whether Jonathan Gross was in attendance at the Mulock Cup games. Remarks such as "... the officials made a mess of the game," and "... an official ruled that his knee had touched the ground before he went in. Quel joke," (no such ruling was made!) simply reflect either ignorance or prejudice — either of which is inexcusable in honest journalism (or is that a joke in itself with respect to The Varsity).

It is by and large true that many of the officials in the Inter-fac games are somewhat inexperienced because they are college students who are willing to take their time to help an "impoverished" program survive with a semblance of order.

However, there is almost always an experienced official on the field in these games to guarantee as accurate an interpretation of the rules as possible. In the case of the Mulock Cup games the UFOA (University Football Officials Association) went to great pains to be sure that qualified men were on the field.

As the newest member of this association, I was lowest in seniority on the field — and I have had fifteen years experience in College and High School football in the United States. The officials on Tuesday at Varsity Stadium were qualified in their experience and accurate in their judgements.

In my judgement, as an experienced official, the quality of the officiating at the Mulock was better than the quality of the football played on the field.

If the quality of officiating had been sharper and better (as it could have been — and as that very crew is capable of being) the game really would have been in the hands of the officials where it never deserves to be. But when players and coaches wrap up the game in ribbons of penalties and hand it to the officials, they dare not cry when the officials begrudgingly take it from them.

I was recently quoted in The Varsity regarding my reaction to the New College — University College Semi-final game on back-campus. At that time I said that the game was one of the cleanest I had ever officiated.

The crew that worked that game was complimented by coach and players alike as to the quality of the officiating. But I take exception to those compliments — well intended as they were. The quality of that game was no better — no worse than any other game we have done on back-campus. It was the quality of play on the part of the participants that made us look good.

When football players engage in good clean hard play, the officials have very little to do. They blend into the countryside like zebras calmly grazing on the plain. Then they are told that they did a good job. To have no job to do does not amount to necessarily a good job. But that is exactly as it should be for an official.

The players for New College and University College deserve the credit that was given to our crew because of the calibre of football that they played. Exciting it was not, clean and sportsmanlike it was. In that game there were a total of four penalties — the lowest number of flags I have ever seen thrown in one game.

That, in itself, is an indication that either it was a well played game or that the officials were asleep (I'm sure, from the Mulock writeup, that the sports editor would prefer the latter interpretation).

The amount of "guff" that the referees for both games endured last Tuesday left me appalled. More than once I reached for my flag but failed to throw it only because it probably would only have kindled the flames of stupidity even more.

In other areas where I have officiated such immature and vulgar reactions on the part of coaches, trainers and players would definitely have been treated with expulsion from the stadium. Maybe a few of those sideline experts ought to thank the even-temperedness of the head officials rather than exhortate the accuracy of their judgements.

Was the officiating at the Mulock Cup on a par with the NCAA or the NFL? No it was not. But then neither was the quality of play. As is so often the case, those with the most criticism and apparent expertise ought to turn their judgements on themselves. Clean up your own backyard. By the time that has been accomplished, you'll have nothing to quip about regarding the officials — if the officials even bother to come out for your games.

Ed Note: Mr. Menke has obviously presented an argument reflecting his vast acumen of football knowledge but he is off base in a few of his judgements.

He sold this newspaper short in assuming that this reporter would not seek the 'facts.'

After the PHYS ED-Vic game an excursion was made to the referees dressing room after it was heard that one of the officials had 15 years experience in the U.S. Not knowing that this said person was the inimitable Mr. Menke our cub reporter inquired as to the whereabouts of this pillar of zebra stripes. He was greeted by a cursory "Who are you" and after explaining his position the welcome was not much better, worse in fact.

Our own beloved Mr. Menke may remember this moment because he was staring me in the face at this time.

Lady Blues tie Mac in Hockey

T-O's game against MacMaster Friday night had a hair-raising ending that saw Mac score with 2 seconds to go, to tie the game at 3.

The puck slid under the arm of sprawling goaltender Judy Reeves, as she attempted to save the shot, which came loose from a goalmouth scramble. The goal broke the lead that Toronto held throughout the 3rd period — a lead which caused the Mac coach to play his leading scorers up to 4 consecutive shifts.

First period action saw Mac score first, but the score was tied in that period on a goal by Lynda Harley. Mac took the lead again, but Toronto retaliated with a goal by Carol Sliptetz and a penalty shot made good by Angie Colm.

The penalty was called when a

Mac defenseman fell on the puck in the crease. Thus it was Blues 3-Mac 2 at the end of the second period.

This score held until 14:58 of the third period, when Mac's 6 attackers put it in. Final score Blues 3-Mac 3. In other action last week, Toronto defeated York 7-2, after the team woke up and cleared up the 2-1 deficit on the scoreboard at the end of the second period. Scorers included Diane Wardrope with 2, Norma Schmitt, Vivian Gearing, Carol Sliptetz, also with 2, and Jan Baird.

The tie and the win gave Toronto 3 points out of a possible 4 following the first week of league action — a good start. The next team the Blues face is Western in a game on Wednesday night at Varsity Arena.

The assembled water polo squads from U of T, York, Queens, RMC, and Carleton gathered in the Hart House pool. The U of T squad was clearly the dominant power of the day, winning all games.

Where will students sleep if picket lines surround their $43 million dormitory?

Library strike looms

Final conciliation talks between the university and library workers ended yesterday, with neither side moving from their latest positions. According to union president Judy Darcy, the university said it will make no more moves until the union makes a change in their monetary demands.

Darcy said the talks may resume again today if, after consultation with his superiors, university negotiator John Parker is willing to submit a modified offer.

The Library Support Committee is asking students to respect and join mass picket lines which will be formed around the Roberts, Medical Science and Sigmund Samuel libraries between 7:30 and 9:30 am and 3:30 to 5:00 pm tomorrow and Friday in the event of a strike.

The library workers are in a position to legally strike at midnight tonight.

The union is calling for a $230 a month increase for all workers, which would give a starting library technician $8,500 a year and provide top ranks of the unionized staff with an 18 per cent raise.

The university has offered an increase of 15 per cent, with workers receiving 12 per cent until the union is granted exemption from the federal Anti-Inflation Tribunal. It also refuses to guarantee no layoffs among unionized workers.

Stack Substitute Strained?

Students seeking alternate sources of knowledge, or at least books, may find temporary placebos at the St. Mike's library.

Circulation librarian Agnes Breen said the library would continue their policy of access for all students of the university, although books will be available on a reference basis only.

Victoria College chief librarian Lorna Frazier said, "We're intending to just carry on with our regular circulation policy." Only Victoria College students, students who take a course with a Victoria College professor and those in Near Eastern or Religious studies are now given library privileges.

Trinity librarian Roxalyn French said the only measures they have taken have been to reduce the borrowing period to one week for those with privileges — Trinity students and those taking courses with Trinity professors.

Besides the SAC executive's call for the university to close all unionized libraries in the event of a strike, several other campus bodies have made recommendations if the strike occurs.

The U of T Faculty Association has recommended that the library be closed in the event of a strike. So has the Library Association of the University of Toronto and the Governing Council's Academic Affairs committee.

Academic Affairs has also called for essay and exam deadlines to be extended in a strike situation, joined by the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences and the SAC executive.

SAC executive has also passed a general motion of support for the library workers.

Gov't attacks health studies

By ELLIOTT MILSTEIN

The provincial government is again attempting to put a financial squeeze on interning students in the health disciplines.

The Ministry of Health has formed a committee with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities to look into the matter of stipends for tuition and living accommodations. Most of the heat is being put on students in the Physio- and Occupational Therapy and Dietetic Sciences.

The formation of this committee follows earlier government attempts in 1973 to remove internship stipends, especially for nursing students. This move was successful, but when the Ministry turned its eyes to rookie doctors, they met with strong resistance.

Murray Tarleton of the Ministry of Colleges & Universities spokesman on the committee, said the Ministry of Health wants to put the students on OSAP. The Ministry of Colleges and Universities doesn't mind this, but would also like to see the stipends continue in some form. He mentioned a type of incentive basis where students willing to work in under-served areas like Thunder Bay, would receive more money. Unfortunately, students in Dietary Sciences would not be eligible for OSAP because interning is not a requisite in their course. They would be left out in the cold.

Educational Research Assistant for the Liberal Party John Creelman outlined the problems with this scheme. First, the loan ceiling for students in this faculty is an extremely high $1,200, he said. Second, he said, this system does not recognize the services that these students are performing during their internships. Third, if they are fortunate enough to receive an OSAP grant, their "incentive" stipend would be deducted from their grant, leaving them in a worse position than they would have been in had they not gotten the stipend at all. Creelman pointed out.

Ontario Federation of Students worker Dale Martin insisted that making students dependent on OSAP is unfair because they work through the summer with no pay and are still expected to contribute money to their education as if they had held a paying summer job.

Many observers feel the crux of the matter is that the Ministry of Health is treating internships as if it were wholly a learning experience and did not contribute any service. However many interns in hospitals find themselves with full case loads and the Ministry is saving itself a lot of money with cheap labour, critics point out.

SAC splits over library closing

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
 SAC President Gord Barnes walked out of a SAC executive meeting Monday night, in an attempt to thwart passage of a motion calling for closure of unionized libraries in the event of a strike.

Introduced by Vice president Sa'ed Saidullah, and seconded by Communications commissioner John Tuzyk, the motion was eventually passed after two more executive members arrived and Barnes could no longer effect loss of quorum by his absence.

On Barnes' return, a move to table the motion was initiated by Finance commissioner Mike Treacy and Services commissioner Doug Gerhart. It passed, but without the two-thirds majority required by Roberts Rules of Order to table a motion.

Barnes ruled the motion to table as carried, but was challenged by Tuzyk and Saidullah. Executive assistant John Bennett was then instructed to locate a copy of Roberts Rules. He returned to confirm the motion to table had not received sufficient majority to pass, and the original motion calling for library closure was thus adopted.

Saidullah called Barnes' action "a ridiculous breach of privilege" and asserted "it was the silliest act I've ever seen done." Barnes countercharged that Saidullah was "making a fraud of the Council by trying to introduce this resolution." He justified his remarks by maintaining Saidullah was "dealing with items that should not be dealt with" by only a bare quorum.

The executive also rejected a motion to endorse the position of the Library Support Committee. Two representatives attending the meeting urged the group to "take a stand that will cause a decision to be made in favour of the library workers."

"This will be the most effective way of ending the strike," they explained. One representative advised Treacy not to "fall into the administration's trap of dividing people" and told him "It is crucial to unite and defend each other."

Unfortunately most were not in a defensive mood, and the library workers soon stormed out of the meeting cursing the executive, amidst shouts of "order" from Treacy.

The executive unanimously passed motions allotting forty dollars to advertise a Greenpeace slide show, an undetermined amount to advertise a meeting and locate a room for an Anti-Trident Campaign Meeting, and a motion to sponsor Shaik Al-Hout, a FLO spokesman.

The Anti-Trident Campaign motion was originally seconded so the executive could find out what it was. After External commissioner Rob Snell explained that the Trident missile was an "absolutely incredible threat to the world" and its very upsetting," the motion was hastily approved.

The executive unanimously rejected an offer to join the Campus Anti-Outbacks Group, who had sent two representatives to the meeting to ask for SAC's membership to fight outbacks.

At the conclusion of the open meeting, Treacy said he was "tired of being misquoted in this rag" as he waved a copy of The Varsity. He explained he was particularly upset by "the pretty heavy language" used.

Low bus rates demanded

By MIKE EDWARDS

There's a move afoot to assist the student commuter with reduced TTC rates. But with three levels of bureaucracy to fight, student petitioners are in for a long ride.

A petition, initiated by nursing students at Centennial College is asking that all post-secondary students be allowed to pay the special rate reserved for high-school students.

Plans are underway at the SAC office to expand the scope of the petition to all post-secondary institutes in the Metro area. A meeting is planned for this weekend.

"We were planning on working on this before," said SAC president Gord Barnes, but he said that SAC was pushed for time by other activities.

Rabert Comier, TTC public relations officer says his department has been inundated with the questions regarding the student fares since the beginning of the school year. He went on to pass the buck to the municipal and provincial governments.

According to Comier, the TTC is subsidized by these two levels of government and couldn't lower the rate unilaterally without a compensating grant.

Dean Robert Pugsley of Centennial's engineering division was involved in a similar campaign last year. In a letter to the TTC he stated that paying standard adult was taxing the already over-taxed student budget.

Pugsley's plan met with little success because of the limited number of people involved. It is for this reason that student organizers are planning to distribute a mass petition. They hope to have 50,000 signatures.

Current student fares are seven for a dollar, and are purchased inside the school building by the students.

Peace council condemns multi-nationals as world-wide threat

The world is beginning to recognize that the "profit making manoeuvres" of multinational corporations and military spending are the main root causes of inflation.

This was the opinion of Karen Talbot, North American representative of the Secretariat of the Helsinki based World Peace Council (WPC) who was speaking at the World Conference on Multinational Corporations held on the U. of T. campus last weekend.

Organized by the Canadian Peace Congress (CPC), the WPC and La Conseil Quebecois de la Paix, the conference sported 194 delegates from 13 countries, according to a conference credentials summary.

The conference aimed to contribute to the United Nations efforts in establishing a "New International Economic Order" which involves, among other things, "the right of every state to choose its own economic and social system without outside interference", according to Talbot.

She went on to explain the conference would also present its findings to the United Nations Commission on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) when it meets in Nairobi next year. The CPC and its Quebec counterpart are branches of the WPC, which is a member of the UN Bureau of Non-Governmental Organizations. With a membership of 128 countries, the WPC makes frequent presentations to the UN and its commissions.

The conference divided into workshops concentrating on three major themes:

- o Multinational corporations and the current economic crisis;

- o Multinationals as a threat to development, national independence and the new economic order, and
- o Multinationals as a threat to peace and detente.

Dealing with the first theme, and its impact on the working class, delegates pointed out that unemployment was a major effect of corporate activity.

A Canadian example is the threat by United Aircraft in Montreal to pull its operations, resulting in Premier Robert Bourassa forcing "an unsatisfactory solution" on the striking aircraft workers, according to Joe Reid of the International Association of Machinists. A discussion paper by the Toronto branch of the United Electrical Workers of America (UE), revealed that labour's share of the national income has dropped from 73 to 70 per cent since 1971, while corporate profits account for an increase of 17 from 12 per cent in the same period.

Alf Dewhurst of the Communist Party of Canada noted how multinationals affect the domestic policies of the host country, citing the apartheid system of South Africa, which creates a cheap source of black labour for industry. The effect of multinationals on an economy was shown by the U.S. government which paid farmers not to grow crops to preserve the profits of the large food producing corporations.

On the theme of multinationals as a threat to a nation's development, Pedro Ferriera of the Portuguese Committee for Cooperation and Peace said the IT&T corporation in Portugal produced goods not needed by the people there. Earnest di Miao of the World Federation of Trade

Bookstore tries worker-control

By DAVE FOLKES

"We all do the vacuuming," says John Anderson, one of the 20 staffers at the SCM bookstore in the ground floor of Rochdale. That perhaps is one of the more obscure results of an experiment in "democracy in business", but to the enthusiastic staff, it is probably one of the more important.

Since last May, the bookstore has been trying to "reconcile democracy with business." This has meant a complete break from the traditional management structure, and the creation of a democracy where decisions are made by majority vote among staff members.

Instead of having a "manager" overseeing the operation of the store, they have set up a Coordinating Committee. This committee, as the name implies, coordinates the activities of various other committees, such as an expansion committee and a publicity committee.

The idea of such a structure is to create a more congenial atmosphere for work, and "a better atmosphere for feedback" according to a coordinating committee member David Rapoport.

The change is part of an overall policy revolution of the Student Christian Movement, which became more progressive in nature after the "quiet revolution" of the sixties, says Anderson.

It also stems from a large staff upheaval which occurred last February as a result of tension between the progressive SCM National Council and the more conservatively operated bookstore. The upheaval resulted in then-manager Bob Miller leaving, along with some of the staff, to set up their own bookstore.

According to the present staff, the concept is working well. "I feel more comfortable with the staff," said Rapoport, "People aren't afraid to come back with ideas, and that's important."

"It's all still at the experimental stage," said Anderson. "We are feeling our way within the guidelines the National Council agreed on for the bookroom."

"It's a genuinely democratic operation — not a facade of democracy," he stressed.

The bookroom is not the first business to attempt such an organizational structure. The Women's Press, and Dumont Press Graphix in Kitchener-Waterloo have been operating successfully for sometime as democratic establishments, the coordinating committee members say.

Most of the problems which developed as a result of the upheaval last winter, and the initiation of the new system, have been ironed out, they say. "Our services and stock are up to the standards that our customers are used to."

Now that things are running smoothly, the bookstore wants to remind people that they are there, with prices and service that they feel is the best around.

"Because of bad press, we think there is a feeling in the university community, because of relationships with the old staff, that they won't patronize or help us. We're asking people to reconsider and give us their cooperation," said Anderson.

One source of amusement to the staff is the reaction of other businesses they come in contact with, such as book suppliers, who operate under the traditional mode.

"It's a bit of a shock to some of our suppliers when there isn't one person who is manager."

Unions said U.S. multinationals engaged in offshore operations began repatriating their profits back to the U.S. when they feared nationalization of their French holdings.

Conference chairperson John Morgan in a speech pointed to Canada's "suicidal" involvement in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and how it profited the Canadian arms manufacturers.

Karen Talbot of the WPC connected the armaments industry with multinational interests in general, explaining the role of armed force in keeping Third World countries under the control of corporations. Only through the growth of detente, such as that between the Soviet Union and the U.S. could these countries successfully realize their struggle for independence, she said.

The final plenary approved the sending of communique to UN officials Kurt Waldheim and Giamani Corea expressing support for the UN's programme of a new international economic order.

The Varsity—Bob White

The "neutral" Hart report reduced the Metro teacher demands on money and class-size but the Board of Education still won't accept it. After four months of trying to avoid the trauma of non-education, the teachers have been forced to strike.

However, the Mean Machine at Parkdale feels upset that one aspect of the strike is a postponement of a crucial game with Etobicoke. Remember Cassius Clay? They obviously don't understand that football is not the cornerstone of a good education, it's pinball.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

With some solidarity it won't last long

Yes, there will be problems with the library strike, but if everybody keeps their head on it will with luck last only a short time.

Tomorrow you'll see an unusual sight, picket lines around the University of Toronto libraries. A lot of students will probably dislike the sight, if only because it is an unsuitable reminder that "Yes, Virginia there is reality inside the university." One response will be probably be to ask the question "What right have you people to do this?"

The question would be better asked of Simcoe Hall. The library worker's demands are quite reasonable; good pay and some sort of job security are not outrageous things to ask of any administration, especially of one so outwardly paternal as this university's. These workers are on strike more out of a duty than of exercising some right. In demanding fair treatment, the strike has always been the last tool in the fight for power. If a union is unprepared to use it, then it is only mauling concern.

The students and faculty here are being asked not to cross the picket lines. The thinking behind this is fairly simple but maybe not 100 per cent logical. If the libraries are totally unused and unusable, the pressure will be that much greater on the administration to make a decent offer to the workers, so the argument runs. It isn't necessarily so, but there's enough of a chance that some sort of worker-student solidarity on this issue may show the university administration that they haven't managed to isolate the two groups with some of their slanderous propaganda on the ancient topic of greed and avarice among union employees.

This probably runs contrary to every student's direction at this juncture, which is to wrap up all the assignments and essays as quickly and painlessly as possible. The strike will make it slow and painful but with help from the teaching staff, the workload can be put off until into the holidays. People will have busy holidays this year, but maybe it's a small price to pay to keep this university from smothering in its own contradictions.

The move is afoot now to close the stricken libraries altogether, which does seem the most sensible thing. This will prevent many of the sneaky things that librarians suspect are already going on, such as the deliberate mis-shelving of books in out-of-the-way places to be retrieved at a later date, or vandalism of books by students in search of information that can't be stolen in book form past the crack para-military Robarts security squad. If the libraries are closed to prevent a massive reshelving, they will be all the more quickly back in service when this strike reaches a longed-for resolution.

Pressure should be placed

No such fisticuffs on the picket line, please.

immediately on the Victoria and Trinity college libraries to follow the same course as St. Michael's library in becoming strictly a reference room. For too long Victoria especially has practised a discriminatory policy against non-Victoria students, and now is the best time for them to make some sort of commitment to the entire university. St. Michael's has made a sensible move and it should be policy at the other federated libraries.

Above all, students have no right, whether or not they decide to honor the picket lines, to harass those on the outside. Whether you like it or not, workers and students are all feeling the same squeeze, and the library workers have decided to stand up and say "no more!" In the long run, their defiance may help us all.

What can you do about rape?

This is addressed to all the women on campus, support staff, students and faculty alike. The Varsity is not an alarmist newspaper, but we would be remiss if we did not notice in print that physical and psychological harassment of women in this area has always been and remains a problem.

Two recent incidences, both stopping short of assault, were brought to light recently. Both of them involved women who work in The Varsity office.

Rape and psychological assault are nothing new, but we will ourselves into thinking that the male-female consciousness that has grown in the last decade has earned women more respect. In this case it's not true. Rape remains a possibility in every woman's mind. No amount of haranguing about liberation will convince someone who is intent on rape to desist.

Men will rape out of social alienation, out of hatred for women and their so-called liberation or out of the knowledge that he is stronger than his victim. Rape comes from the man, but the man is formed by the structure that keeps sexuality as a transaction. For whatever reason, it is a crime with a political nature, and the population must deal with the criminal but above all with the cause.

The government and its police seem unwilling to do either. Women are further harassed in the courtroom and in the end the criminal is treated not unlike a common burglar.

Until Canadian society wants to look at sexuality in a serious way, outside of all this "Why Not?" tokenism, women will not be able to counteract the psychological harassment of being followed on the street or hooted at on street corners by citizens and police alike. This won't be solved tomorrow. But when it comes to actual harassment on a physical level, the one and only answer, and this cannot be stressed enough, is some sort of self-defense program.

On this campus and in the surrounding community, there are a number of methods offered, some better than others. Most will after a few months teach a basic repertoire of self-defense techniques. Others, such as the karate offered on this campus, will offer you that and a lot more.

What is essential is that women understand that they are now powerless, that they are capable of counteracting a man's physical strength, armed or not, with a minimum of fuss. Rapists always make mistakes and if your training is good, you'll have capitalized on that mistake before he knows he's made it.

For your own safety, learn to defend yourself. The next time a rapist reads the newspaper and discovers an attack repelled, it will make him a little more unlikely to challenge a woman on the street.

East Asian asks for library close

To the Editor:

In view of the uncertainty of the present library situation we in our capacity as students in the following departments — East Asian Studies, Islamic Studies, Sanskrit and Indian Studies, and Comparative Literature — feel compelled to demand that the library facilities and services be terminated as of midnight, November 19, 1975. However, we also strongly urge that the ability of the aforementioned departments to function normally should not be disrupted. In this regard, we feel that the non-library positions of the eight and fourteenth floors and the Library Science building remain accessible to faculty, students, and staff. In short, we hope that the Administration will recognize the dual nature of the Robarts complex not only as a library but as the home of several faculties.

Older student speaks his mind

To the Editor:

In last Friday's Varsity you devoted some considerable ink to this whole problem of cutbacks and their effects on students, faculty, and the worth of a U of T degree... it was a good issue. You asked for some sort of response from any of us with time to put a few words together... so here goes.

Because I'm going to be brutally frank, please withhold my name, etc. as I may have to work with some of those I criticize if I try for a MA or beyond.

I'm the ex-businessman who returned to get a degree to change careers, and I soured off in the same issue on the real world outside. Okay... I'm doing a four-year BA in three (I hope) with summer school, 6 credits per winter — the whole work ethic bit. I've been here long enough to put forward some ideas... here goes:

First of all I think you are tackling a symptom and not a cause when you discuss educational cutbacks. You must accept that our western technological society is well into its decline and all our cultural guidelines are crumbling. This has nothing to do with ideologies — it's a fact. The educational bubble has burst — at the elementary level, at the high school level, (hence the strike) and now at the university level. Priorities have changed. 1957 and Sputnik is all in the past. There isn't going to be any more money — period. Forget a university education for all comers — it's yesterday's cultural aim. Our whole growth ethic is bumping the limits to growth (see New York fiscal nightmares) and Robarts Library is a classic example of growth and centralism gone mad.

Okay... if we can accept that expansion is almost over — what to do? We either need more money or fewer students, or some combination in between. Something has to give. If we can face the fact that a university education for all comers isn't in the cards, I know that's unfair and will work against the lower income groups) then what's wrong with weeding out all the dead-end students who don't really want to be here, shouldn't be

Student member asks profs to consider lowering salary demands

To the Editor:

It is refreshing to see public confirmation that Professor William Nelson does not proceed unopposed in his attempt to unionize the University of Toronto faculty members. Re: Your article November 7, 1975 — the Nelson-Crispo debate.

Dean Crispo is correct in saying the faculty members would lose professional freedom and recognition for merit under a union. It would also be next to impossible to maintain, let alone improve the quality of academic excellence and teaching at this university.

Aside from the issue of collective bargaining, faculty demands for 1976-77 salary increases must be made in the context of the overall University budget (faculty salaries comprise the largest component of the budget).

A review of the financial statements of the university for the year ended April 30, 1975 is instructive. They show that operating income did not keep pace with operating expense. In fact expense exceeded income by 1.3 million dollars. The deficit was absorbed by tapping the university's financial reserves. Hence we have a picture of expenses exceeding income and financial reserves being drained. The same pattern has continued into this year's operating budget which is expected to produce a loss that will wipe out the unappropriated net income of prior years.

During the same two years the faculty members have received salary increases totalling 25 per cent on average. The university budget will not tolerate comparable salary increases. In 1976-77 without incurring damaging side effects a reduction in the total complement of teaching staff will be one result. The brunt of this will be borne by those members of the teaching staff who have sessional appointments, new PhD's, and tutorial assistants. They simply will not be hired. Faculty members will inevitably be faced with greater workloads, and students with inferior education.

The magnitude of faculty salary increases will be a major determinant in effecting conditions of university life next year. Salary increases well within the Federal price and wage guidelines rather than at the limit of the guidelines is mandatory if the university atmosphere is to be livable.

When the Faculty Association salary team sits down with the U of T administration, it is crucial that the salary team reflect the views of the majority of faculty members because I doubt more than a handful would want salary increases that will do their younger colleagues out of jobs.

Op-Ed

"Zionism is a form of racism"

On Monday, November 10, the United Nations passed a resolution condemning Zionism as a form of racism and this vote carried by a majority of 2-1 in the esteemed body of the General Assembly. The vote passed by this wide margin because the countries of the Third World, in overwhelming numbers, are resolutely opposed to Zionism. Contrary to the propaganda of U.S. imperialism and their Zionist agents, the Third World countries did not cast their votes as they did because they were bribed with petro-dollars but rather because they genuinely support the struggle of the Palestinians for restoration of their national rights.

Zionism is a form of racism. They very notion that Jews constitute a race of people whose mission is to settle Palestine in complete disregard for the historical and present rights of the Palestinians shows this. The Zionist slogan "a people without a land to a land without a people" goes so far as to deny the existence of the Palestinians as a people. This denial is kept up right to this day. The Israeli "Law of Return" confers citizenship immediately on every Jew immigrating to Israel and denies any such rights to the Arab population.

Zionism is an agent of imperialism, as it has been right from the Basle conference of 1897. It achieved a momentary victory in 1947, propped up mainly by U.S. imperialism, when the "state" of Israel was illegally founded in the homeland of the Palestinian people. Israel was founded upon the expulsion of a large section of the Palestinians from the land which they had worked for thousands of years and upon the denial of Palestinian national rights. Since the first Zionist encroachments on their territory, the Palestinian people have been fighting back and, particularly since the adoption of armed struggle in 1965 as the primary means of regaining their national rights, they have achieved a string of successes. In the last several years they have paralleled their military successes with a number of achievements on the diplomatic front, especially by winning the favour of the vast majority of the countries represented in the United Nations and by isolating the Israeli Zionists in that august body. The countries of the Third World so firmly support Palestinian initiatives against the Zionists because they recognize the struggle against Zionism as part and parcel of the world-wide struggle against imperialism, colonialism, and hegemonism.

Like those two outposts of white racist colonialism in Africa, the regimes of Smith in Rhodesia and Vorster in South Africa, Israeli Zionism employs racism as a tool for the suppression of the Palestinian people. A systematic inequality is maintained through the practice of the Zionists. Arabs living under Israeli rule cannot form political parties of their own but rather must work through the parties of Zionism. Even so Arabs, who constitute 11 per cent of the total population are represented in only 6 of 120 seats in the Israeli Parliament. The areas of Israel where Arabs live are held under military control. The Israeli army can expel the people (as it has done continuously for over 25 years) seize possessions, search homes, detain, restrict the movement and employment of Palestinians, can require passes for movement from one area to another. All such racist and fascist measures employed against the Palestinian people are justified as necessary for "security." In other words the Zionists recognize every single Palestinian man, woman, and child as a threat to the security of Israel. For perception they deserve a little credit. For their denials that they practise racism they deserve scorn, laughter, disbelief. The U.N. resolution shows that the people of the Third World clearly understand what goes on in Israel.

The issue in the resolution is not merely Zionism and the just struggle of the Palestinian people to regain their homeland. U.S. imperialism sputters its impotent fury about the "tyranny of the majority" in the U.N. Its faithful dependencies, including the sell-out government of the Canadian monopoly capitalists echo these sentiments. The U.N. itself comes under attack, is slandered, is threatened that financial support will be withdrawn. The U.S. imperialists are frantic that they have lost their grip on the U.N., that the Third World nations are standing up as one.

The other superpower, Soviet social-imperialism, masks its role on the question of Zionism by doing one thing and saying another. In words it supports the resolution against Zionism in order to curry favour with the nations of the Third World where it seeks to maintain and expand its hegemony. Nevertheless its main interest in the Middle East has been to strive ceaselessly for a situation of "no-war-no peace" in order to further its designs to dominate that part of the world.

Several of Zionism's flimsy attempts to misrepresent the vote on the U.N. resolution deserve a few words of dismissal. They bleat "countries of Asia, Africa, and Latin America are being blackmailed with Arab oil." In the first instance a number of the Third World countries supporting the resolution have plentiful oil of their own — China, Nigeria, Indonesia to mention a few. Second a number of the European nations opposing the resolution are themselves dependent on trade in oil with the Arab states. Most important, for the nations of the Third World opposing Zionism is a fundamental question of principle, is an integral part of the struggle they are all waging to establish national and political independence and build their own economies in a self-reliant way.

The second misrepresentation is Zionism's plea that anti-Zionism is anti-Semitism. The vicious comparisons between anti-Zionism and Hitlerism clearly reveals the complete bankruptcy of Zionism. This resort to the very "big lie" technique of the Nazis stands truth on its head and cannot conceal Zionism's own sordid history of collaboration with the Nazis. We can point to Rudolph Kastner's exchange of the lives of 800,000 Hungarian Jews for his own free passage to Israel and the safety of a small number of other wealthy Zionists. (The notorious Nazi criminal, Eichmann, said of Kastner that he would have made an excellent S.S. officer if only he had not been a Jew.) Or to the basic call of anti-Semites for a very long time that people of Jewish background are "aliens" in their own homelands and therefore should get out — and with which the Zionists have always agreed, adding get out and go to Israel.

The Canadian state and the bourgeois media have done everything possible since the passage of the resolution last week to obscure and misrepresent it as well as to discredit the Third World countries who have become the main force in the United Nations General Assembly. They have made it difficult for the Canadian people even to learn just what the resolution says. Anti-Zionist and other progressive people must take up the task of explaining this resolution to the people of Canada. The interest of the Canadian people, on this question is to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the peoples of the Third World.

Op-Ed

"PLO covenant is blatantly racist"

The latest attempt by the Arab block to facilitate the destruction of Israel has been the Nov. 10 UN resolution stating that "Zionism is a form of racism." The Arab strategy, at present, is to gain what objectives it could not through 5 wars by harassing Jew-hatred.

Only a month ago, no less of an authority on the extinction of peoples than Idi Amin who has murdered 80,000 Black Ugandans was given a standing ovation in the UN as he called for the extinction of the Jewish State. Yet, asserted Amin, there was nothing 'antisemitic' about his idea. His stunning popularity seemed to show that he had judged the world climate correctly; the applauding nations, mostly anti-democratic military dictatorships, if they are to stand by the destruction of the little democracy of 3 million Jews, are unwilling to use Hitler's word for the slaughter. They, and those who abstained, will reverse the event if and only if there is a new word for it.

In effect, the 'anti-Zionism' of the resolution is only a new code word for an old project, which begins by stating that the Jews are responsible for evil (in the UN it equals racism) if they are not it incarnate. Whereas in a religious age Jew hatred was proudly proclaimed 'Jew-hatred', and, in a 'scientific' age referred to politely as 'antisemitism', now that the victims have a state they must be destroyed in political terms. Hence, 'anti-Zionism.'

But who are these righteous nations which sit in judgement over Israel? There is Iraq, which has massacred at least 15,000 Kurds over the last 3 years in an effort to, along with Syria, Turkey and Iran, appropriate Kurdistan. There is the other aspect of Syria: home of the severest Jew-hating regime of the modern world, confining Jews to ghettos, curfews, denying them hospital facilities, emigration, worship or education, while torturing and raping teenagers as part of official government policy. However, one might object that the above are only matters of 'discrimination.' For 'classical examples' of 'racist persecution' one need only turn to Sudan where the government, dominated by northern Sudanese Arabs, allowed its army to butcher, according to the latest estimate of Canadian anthropologist Roxanne Carlisle, close to a million Black Sudanese because they were neither Arab nor Muslim.

What else, precisely, do these nations have in common? They all support the PLO by way of the sibling resolutions of Nov. 10, whose leader, Yasser Arafat proudly proclaims that "when I say peace with Israel, I mean the destruction of Israel." Indeed, from the words of Arafat himself (who has up until now unwaveringly held to them one must not doubt that his "Democratic-Secular State of Palestine" is anything but the code word for the destruction of Israel. It is difficult also to believe that the PLO, which is now ravaging the most democratic secular Arab state, Lebanon, cherishes any of those values. Similarly, how should a "democratic-secular" document such as the PLO covenant on the one hand assert that there is no such entity as "the Jewish people" while on the other stating "the Palestinian personality is an innate, persistent characteristic that does not disappear, and it is transferred from father to sons." Apart from being sexist, and, as blatantly racist in the classical 'blood sense' as any Aryan-Hitlerian doctrine, one wonders why the projected non-exclusivist-secular-state's theoreticians need trouble themselves with such 'distinctions.'

The charge against Israel, an attempt at national character assassination which precedes nation assassination, is serious only that it endangers Jewish lives not in the West, but, in such countries as the Soviet Union, Syria and Argentina which because they are persecuting Jews at present for being Zionists, will use the resolution as their justification of their 'new form of the fight against racism.'

Zionism is not racism any more than the Jews are a race. Indeed, Zionism was the courageous calling together of the multiracial, the dispersed Black Jews of Ethiopia, Chinese Jews of Shanghai, Indian Jews of Cochin, Mediterranean or Sephardic Jews, as well as their 'lighter' counterparts, the Jews of Europe.

In spite of these facts, the UN resolution purports that Israel is 'exclusivist' because any Jew can become an Israeli citizen, an immigration policy which arose because those same countries which voted for the resolution would not let in boatloads of Jews fleeing Hitler's gas chambers. These same boatloads were forced to return to Nazi Germany, the only country which would accept them, in order to systematically-mass-murder them. Yes, Israel is the correction of this mistake.

Moreover, Israel is the correction of other 'mistakes.' Over half the population is Jewish refugees from persecution in Arab lands. The same nations which initiated the UN resolution are the most expert persecutors of their own Jews.

What is 'racist' Israel's response? Arabs can become citizens of Israel if they apply, like anyone else. Arabic is an official language on par with Hebrew, on currency, signs, and spoken in the Israeli parliament, where Arab members sit, representing their villages. Contrast Syria where Jews cannot even vote, never mind hold office.

The fact that the Arabs have reverted to the big lie demonstrates the moral deprivation of their cause. The Arab abuse of language, where black equals white, has temporarily backfired in the West. But not so in the 72 countries where the only refugee is the Palestinian one, the only Diaspora the Arab one, the only suffering Arab suffering, the only rights Arab rights. One could list endlessly terms which the Arab propagandists have lifted from Jewish history in an effort to negate it. While the term "the Palestinian people" has absolute validity though it is but 50 years old, the term "the Jewish people", which is 3000 years old, is null and void according to the PLO covenant.

In its full contextual meaning, the UN resolution denies the Jewish People the right, also, to defend themselves at a time when their enemies are powerful. Israel is the Jewish People's self-defence. The UN, only 30 years after Hitler, murders Jews on paper. It, and the Arabs, have learned nothing from the Holocaust.

Sadly, Hitler could have learned from the Arabs the method of giving their vile passions what Daniel P. Moynihan called the abominable "appearance of international sanction." Canada, in contrast, can learn from studying the Hitler era that one cannot give an inch to a tyrant. We must immediately rechannel our UN funds to useful purposes such as feeding, directly, the starving people of the world, instead of feeding a growing beast.

here, and wouldn't be here if we hit 'em for a 50 per cent increase in fees. I see them all around me, reading Varsity at the back of lectures, dragging their arms reluctantly to tutorials, and generally doing as little as possible to scrape by.

Can you stand some more? Jack up the entrance qualifications and weed out anyone below — say — 75 per cent out of Grade 13 or whatever. In other words, run a Goddamned university we can be proud of and not a bloody educational sausage machine whose degrees mean nothing. And if that would keep people like me out — so be it. And for Christ's sake pep up the discipline around here while we're at it. Assignments on time, or else. Plagiarism and essay services are out. So is rotten research, slopping writing, bad spelling, and all that stuff we should have done in high school.

Get rid of tenure. Of all the old-fashioned feather-bedding schemes, this one has long since lost its purpose. The faculty is dying on its bloody feet for God's sake. Some of my professors are incompetent fools who wouldn't last a week outside in the real world. Others are so good it hurts. . . and they have to work and compensate for all the twits who can't even turn up on time with a lecture prepared. Hire on contract, and fire just like any other business. Bring in younger men and women, especially women — this place has to be the last bastion of male supremacy outside of your average service station.

Lower the university cleaning bills by banning all smoking, eating and drinking, outside of designated areas. Our classrooms are a disgusting example of the kind of slob who come here and the attitude they bring to their studies and the university.

Spend less money on technological gimmickry . . . is a computerized catalog card system really essential or has IBM just got a good contract in purchasing? Lower heating bills by keeping classrooms at the modest temperature of 70 instead of 85 F.

We all face the fact that expansion days are over. We have to announce that the U of T is full up. Even if we had the money it shouldn't be allowed to grow any more. Toronto is full up. Go somewhere else — please. And if all that sounds selfish — it is . . . but it's a cry from the heart of more than me alone. If all that sounds authoritarian — I guess it is . . . sadly, I don't see any solutions that won't be authoritarian and hurt a lot of people. Maybe I'll be hurt but not being able to go on to an MA and beyond. If it means more years of declining standards of required lectures and labs, dirty classrooms and bored tenured professors who would rather not be teaching undergraduates, maybe I'll get out and make room for one more.

Gee, the food around here stinks

Are you fed up? The quality of food here is another manifestation of the mediocrity of the administration. It seems a number of half-wits have manoeuvred themselves into control of the situation.

Complaining to the cashiers doesn't help. Their usual reaction is "I just work here, talk to my supervisor." They reflect an urgent desire to get you out of their way in their frantic attempts to catch up with the hungry queue. Crisp and glib like the Teamster lettuce.

The mob pushes you on as their frenzied state grows. You grab a lonely sack clutching books, gloves, a carton of milk, scrap of Kraft "processed" cheese and a lacklustre salad.

The human body needs fresh vegetables fruit, protein and carbohydrates in natural form. To accomplish this perhaps society should cut down on hair spray, cigarettes and automobiles. If this means Dominion, Kraft and General Motors would be out of business so much the better.

The Roberts cafeteria and the Armour Room are the worst. Outside of apples, oranges, bananas and milk, they offer sheer poison. There is a tremendous variety of unnaturally processed carbohydrate drinks, buns, cakes and tarts, sandwiches using white bread and processed meats (ninety cents!), instant coffee with refined sugar and non-dairy creamer, hot water with artificial chocolate flavour, artificial sweetener and food coloring.

Ontario workers condemn controls

KITCHENER (CUP) — Organized labour in Ontario rejected and condemned the federal government's wage and price guidelines on November 3.

At the Ontario Federation of Labour (OFL) annual convention here 1,300 delegates, representing Ontario's 800,000 unionized workers passed a strongly worded resolution against the guidelines.

The resolution described the government's policy as "shamelessly one-sided, patently dishonest, highly undemocratic, unworkable and possibly unconstitutional."

During the discussion on the motion no one spoke against it though there were many who called for an even stronger resolution. About half of those who spoke wanted a national demonstration and a one day strike.

Gordie Lambert of the St. Catharines and district Labour Council said to the OFL executive, "Lead the demonstrations, don't wait to be invited, organize them yourselves."

And when he said, "If one worker is jailed... then we should shut the province down," he received loud applause from the delegates.

Two delegates representing locals of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) advised the OFL to follow the example set by CUPE at its convention where it passed a resolution directing all locals to defy the wage guidelines. The two delegates called for a national one day strike and a demonstration in Ottawa.

A delegate from the United Electrical Workers reiterated several previous speeches by comparing the wage and price guidelines to the War Measures Act. He said "Some union leaders ducked them and that was the start."

He said the unions must take on the establishment and there was only one way to do it: "a machine shutdown."

Several speakers compared the guidelines to the War Measures Act and warned in a variety of phrases that "democracy was not in good hands."

Speeches against a national demonstration generally called on their locals to get the full support of their membership.

Lucie Nicholson of CUPE and Stu Cooke of the United Steelworkers of America both said they had been to demonstrations at Queen's Park where fewer than 1,500 unionists turned out.

And their sentiments were echoed by another speaker who said "demonstrate, yes, but when you have the troops behind you."

But it was the more militant speakers who drew the applause from the delegates, and in the two hours of discussion there was never any doubt that a motion condemning the government policy would be passed. When a vote was called only a handful of delegates voted against the resolution.

The sentiment of the convention had been expressed earlier by OFL president David Archer in his opening address Monday morning. He told union leaders to continue negotiations despite the wage guidelines and said unionists should be prepared to go to jail to fight the government policy.

The resolution was a distilled version of Archer's opening speech. It offered several recommendations on how to combat inflation. It urged unions to cooperate with the Canadian Labour Congress and its mass education program aimed at exposing the government's anti-inflation policy.

Locals were asked to contribute to a "war chest" to finance the campaign against the policy and to step up the drive "to organize the unorganized."

CUPE follows with challenge

OTTAWA (CUP) — "I challenge you here today — as the rank and file of the Liberal party, as the people who helped elect the government — to tell Mr. Trudeau to live up to his election promise that he can make the economy work without imposing controls."

That was the challenge CUPE President Grace Hartman placed in front of the delegates at the Liberal Party convention held here November 7-9.

The government's economic programs, Hartman told the 2,200 delegates representing Liberal riding associations across Canada, amounted to no more than "wage controls without price controls", and was inequitable because it hit the wage-earner while doing nothing to get at the causes of inflation.

She quoted Trudeau during the 1974 election campaign as stating that "income controls risk hurting the small and the poor" while dividends and executive salaries are allowed to rise "because there are so many loopholes to squeeze through."

Hartman said the delegates had an obligation to the Canadian electorate to make sure the 1974 campaign pledge of no wage and price controls is lived up to.

The delegates thought differently, and although no specific resolution was passed supporting the controls, policies were approved which expressed the general anti-labour and anti-union sentiment of the Liberal party.

One such policy, passed without debate, called on the government, through the Department of Labour to become directly involved monitoring union financial affairs to hear appeals from unions, and to supervise strike votes and other procedures normally controlled by the membership of a union.

China traveller "impressed"

"We were impressed and exhilarated by the purposeful, energetic attitude in China," said Anthropology professor Richard Lee, last Monday in Sid Smith.

Speaking to an audience of 250 about a recent tour of China, Lee emphasized their experience with the agricultural communes. He pointed out there is a drive to increase production in China today.

"Since 1965, just prior to the Cultural Revolution, there has been two and a half times increase in productivity," Lee said in some areas the Chinese are obtaining four crops a year, and in the north at least two annually. The yield of grain was 11.7 tons of grain per hectare, "a very high yield," Lee noted.

"I was impressed by the emphasis on ideological work," said Lee. The feeling is that only with the study of Marxist-Leninist, Mao Tsetung thought is it possible to increase production, he said. During the last 11 months, China has been studying the theory of the dictatorship of the proletariat. "The poor and middle peasants are the most reliable allies of the proletariat in the countryside," he noted.

The Chinese feel there is no theory that does not serve practice, according to Lee. "Every high school student spends one month a year on a commune and one month a year in a factory, as well as taking two months vacation," he said. Lee pointed out the Chinese say people are the decisive factor in making human history. He said at one commune they visited, 700 people succeeded in transforming the barren hillside into lush fruit trees.

Lee also pointed out the cadres are expected to work, as people who work in offices must never be allowed to become a law unto themselves. He said officials at the county level are expected to do 100 days of labour a year, officials at the commune level do 200 days a year, and officials at the brigade level participated in 300 days of labour a year. Lee added the total number of working days is 306 annually, and said this was a method to significantly close the gap between manual and intellectual work.

The Chinese also consider the necessity to close the gap between the city and the countryside very important said Lee. Every commune produces some sideline, like making bricks, agricultural tools, or milling grain, as well as engaging in agricultural labour, he said.

Professor Cranmer Byng, of the history department pointed out women are protected very strongly under the law of 1950, and the tour was often greeted by "extremely competent" women in senior positions. "Cranmer Byng said two slogans are most repeated about women, first "Women hold up half the sky!" and second "What men can do, women can do too."

"Tired of hitchhiking?"
"Flying too expensive?"
"We have an alternative!"

THE KCR ANNOUNCES 4 GIANT STEPS BACKWARD

Floyd (Crazy Lips) Bogan on his famous run through the end zone, out of Varsity Stadium and into the KCR, starting a tradition.

Who can ever remember it! Both down and many to go, when Marty "Mad Dog" Smede slipped the prolate spheroid to Bogan, who stepped between the hyphen of Smythe-Fowles, the Gael's stout defensive end, and tight roped his way two yards into the end zone, across Bloor and into the KCR, before the very eyes of more than a dozen stunned spectators.

And thus was born a legend which to this day no longer exists. But it's back! Crazy legs, the Etobicoke Heel may be gone. But the peanuts, the meat pies, the popular prices, the juke box, the etcetera!

Follow Floyd's slightly-dimmed-but-never-to-be-yawned-at footsteps to the KCR.

And if that don't bring back prosperity, nothing will.

- Once again beer at popular prices - (no cover - no minimum)
- Sweeping renovations (total $97.50)
- Some of Canada's most demanded cuisine (peanuts, meat pies, etcetera).
- Live music plus continuous music from the world's finest musicians (on our thirsty juke box).

Sexist?

Does Meditation Work?

PART ONE

By Bill Wine

What is meditation? Advertisements for meditation and related phenomena vie for space on bulletin boards with sporting events, concerts, and political rallies. Since I teach a course on Altered States of Consciousness in Interdisciplinary Studies, here at U. of T., I am asked about meditation increasingly frequently. I will not speculate here on why society has come to this state historically.

The underlying question: What is Meditation can only be answered experientially. It is more profitable to answer the more basic question "What is meditation not?"

IS MEDITATION RELIGION?

In most cases, orthodox religions deny the validity of this esoteric tradition. Yet in the early history of all major religions there have always been an inner select core concerned with finding the experiential world.

IS MEDITATION THERAPY?

Meditation is distinguished from healing, psychotherapy and brainwashing by the fact that people choose to enter a career of meditation as disciples, whereas patients and clients usually must present themselves for counselling or treatment. But in some ways meditation and medication have much in common. Techniques such as hypnosis autogenic training and relaxation techniques, which are medical procedures are often indistinguishable from the practices of meditation. The rhetoric and the licensing requirements may be different, but the techniques are similar.

IS IT ALL THE SAME?

Different schools of meditation have different theories and definitions, techniques and results, promises and claims. We will focus on this in detail in next Wednesday's Varsity; today we will deal with promises and claims. Overlapping contradictory claims confuse and baffle a person new to this realm who wants orientation but does not need therapy.

In 1970 I was contracted by the LeDain Commission to study all techniques of meditation and report back to them. I spent several years exploring the schools I had not researched long before I joined the LeDain Commission.

My way of dealing with these questions relates to my own findings.

DOES MEDITATION WORK?

Yes and No.

CAN YOU BE MORE SPECIFIC?

To be more specific, YES: experientially all of the schools I entered worked for me; however Zen Buddhism was most to my personal taste. All I know for sure is my own personal experience. BUT NO: no method works for everybody; people work—theories don't. WHAT KIND OF MEDITATION SHOULD I GET INTO?

That's your decision, but here are some guidelines:

Any system of psychotherapy, healing, brainwashing, meditation, and indoctrination work for some people. In a famous text on brainwashing in the People's Republic of China "The Rape Of The Mind" Joost Meerloo distinguishes between "scientific evidence" and what he calls "doctrinal compliance". In simple words, if a person strongly believes that a technique will help him and invests confidence, money or compliance in his guru, priest, therapist, captor or physician then that person will get "well" or "enlightened" and his behavior and mood will change. This change is not linked to the theoretical validity of the school he is buying into except in the most general of ways. In fact the instructor need not even believe in the theories of the system unless he needs to for the comfortable performance of his job duties.

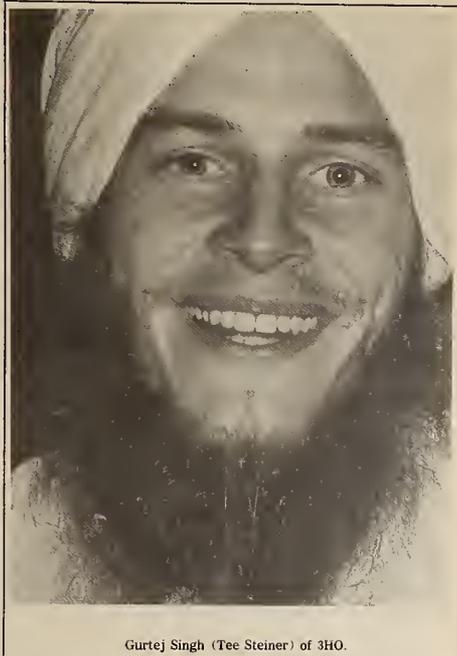

It is the students responsibility to find a system through his own search, that works for him or her.

BEWARE OF THE FOLLOWING CLAIM:

"The BLFTZK method has been scientifically proven to work for everybody". This claim is a distortion. No method works well for everybody. Even results that have been compiled statistically from a large number of subjects' physiological or behavioral responses, do not necessarily have anything to do with what you may or will experience in your own particular case.

Your personal relationship with the person who will actually work with you continuously is of much higher priority than the validity of the school or the guru at the head of it. You are going to have to take a risk with any school or person you work with if you are to get any real benefit from the situation. There are wise and foolish risks in life. Make sure you totally trust the person you will be working with continuously.

Meditation does not "work" You must do the work on yourself. Hopefully a teacher or school if honest will remove any self-deception preventing you from facing the obvious fact that if you want to actualize your self, no one can help you except your self.

THERE ARE CERTAIN DANGERS

A technique may temporarily mask an underlying personality or medical disorder, and so delay necessary treatment. Or a technique may release powerful energies that may disorganize the personality. While it may be argued that this may lead in the end to insight; it might interfere with a career that one has already planned. An example of this danger is to be found in the book "Kundalini" by Gopi Krishna. This is an autobiographical account of a simultaneously spiritual and psychotic voyage, related through the words of the explorer himself and his therapist's Jungian interpretation.

The highest teachings are not widely publicized, and they do not cost much money. It is a false equation to compare high cost with high quality in meditation.

Shaikh M. R. Guru Bawa Muhaiyadeen

Part Two of DOES MEDITATION WORK will appear in next Wednesday's Varsity. We invite you to submit your questions about meditation. Bill Wine will do his best to answer them at that time. Questions should arrive at the Varsity office, 2nd Floor, 91 St. George St., by noon on Monday.

New Women-Only "Bank" Opens Thursday on Yonge

By CAITLIN KELLY
"If you want it done right, hire a woman." So reads a poster on the office wall of the newly-formed Metro Toronto Women's Credit Union. With this belief in mind, the union is preparing to open its doors, to women, for business this Thursday.

To join this new credit union, one must be a woman and a member of the Women's Information Centre (formerly the Women's Place). A deposit of $3 is the minimum accepted, and this "share" entitles the member to apply for loans, vote and run for office at annual meetings.

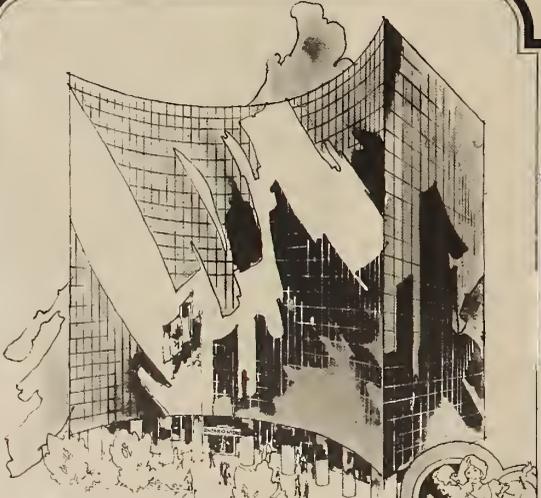

There are three committees within the MTWCU: a Board of Directors, a Supervisory Committee and a Credit Committee, following the standard format of credit unions across Ontario. There are five women on the Board of Directors, all elected, whose job is "operate the union". The Supervisory Committee with 3 members is organized to audit the books and oversee all financial transactions, while the Credit Committee members are the loan officers.

Any member may obtain a loan for any purpose of benefit to the borrower "within the credit union's priorities."

The priorities are specifically laid out. They are: organizational loans to set up "self-sustaining food, craft, trade and housing cooperatives to provide job independence (for women)", educational loans "for women who want training in non-traditional jobs" and personal loans for "emergency situations and personal needs."

Recently, one woman applied to the Credit Committee for a loan to start a crafts co-op. This would seem to have been well within the credit union's outline of priorities, but her loan was refused. The reason given was that she planned to use exports from Costa Rica, and the union felt this would "exploit Third World people."

The idea of an all-woman credit union originated three years ago among several feminists at the Women's Place, and last January plans began in earnest. A credit union was preferred over a bank as being "more in line with feminist

The quiche lorraine can make you see spots, with a headache for later.

Other cafeterias offer a little better variety of real foods in the form of a cold salad plate but without imagination. The same arrangement confronts you month after month. They use cheap cottage cheese, a little stale fruit, a stick of celery and yesterday's roasted and sliced cow.

For $1.50 any other enterprising person could offer a lot more.

The main course at other places is usually something covered in gunk and vegetables cooked just past the point where the goodness drains away. Sometimes you get frozen vegetables such as corn or peas and mashed fluff that looks but doesn't taste like potatoes.

There isn't much else at U of T.

A good diet should contain sufficient vitamins, minerals and proteins and should be acidically balanced. All meats, fish, carbohydrates, processed breads, coffee, white sugar, soft drinks, chocolates and candies are acidic.

A meal should be counterbalanced with four times as many vegetables, fruits and dairy proteins which are essentially alkaline.

A high acidic diet leads to indigestion and stomach ulcers. Processed carbohydrates and caffeine cause tension.

This university has spent thousands of dollars on cooking utensils which we still pay for through increasing food prices. Isn't it time we hired some one who knows how and what to cook.

If you want to stuff yourself with a strict university diet for four years you would come away thinking, looking and smelling like a non-delectable turd.

The women involved are hardly neophytes to the concept of money management, three of them having had their own businesses and all of them having had experience in some organizational aspect of the women's movement.

The credit union plans a policy of a 50-50 split of their profits — half will be in the form of loan rebates and half in the form of dividends on the shares.

The use of the word shares may cause some confusion, as the union is really acting more as a bank, if with feminist principles. An account with the union represents a share, so the dividends paid to each member are equivalent to the idea of interest earned in an ordinary bank. These are not set at any specific rate, but are dependent on the assets, and thus the profits of the union.

Why go to the union? Is it any more trustworthy, friendly or fair than "the Royal" or "TD"? Penny Goldrick, chairperson of the Credit Committee laughed when asked, and agreed that the answer was a hard one. "To support other women," was one suggestion, but it is still to be determined how many women are concerned enough to withdraw from their corner bank and transfer their funds to a one-room office on Yonge Street which is open only on Thursdays.

It is expected such innovations as female loan officers and application forms that will hopefully not demand to know about marital status, employer or monthly income, will attract an increasing number of Metro women.

principles." Every member, once she has made her initial deposit of $5, has one vote. Unlike a bank, the amount of power gained will not increase with the amount of money deposited, so that all members will have an equal say in the running of the union. In the spring of 1975, the founding members went to the Ontario Credit Union League for direction. With the help of the league and fieldworker Bert Richard, the union began to become a reality. Members of the various committees began a training period, still in process, in such subjects as accounting, credit granting and financial analysis. The training is paid for by each member, and they draw no salaries.

FAST FOR A WORLD HARVEST

Go without food on Thursday, November 20.

The most important event on Earth each year is the harvest; but one-eighth of mankind suffering from severe malnutrition is not celebrating...

HOW CAN YOU HELP?

How do we solve the World Food Crisis? Even if North Americans wanted to do so, we could not feed all of the 460 million malnourished people in the world. Their only hope lies with the one billion small farmers in their own developing nations. YOU can help them to meet this challenge by supporting OXFAM's rural self-help development projects in more than 20 nations. DAY CARE DAY CARE DAY CARE

For three years, parents and children from the university community have occupied a small building opposite Varsity Stadium. But the longest occupation in Toronto's history will officially end Saturday when the Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre Number Two moves back into the newly-renovated University Building.

The building was seized in the Spring of 1972, when parents started a 25-hour a day occupation for eight straight months. Threats from the university to evict never materialized, and since that fall the building has been used to provide day care facilities for 30 children.

The university has now agreed to sign a ten year lease with the parents, and the provincial government has provided $98,000 to pay for renovations and new equipment for the old building. Money for the renovations came from the Day Care Expansion project, a $15 million programme proclaimed by Queen's Park in June 1974. The Project provides 100 per cent capital funding for renovations to existing public or co-operatively run Day Care Centres.

At 3:30 p.m. on Saturday, November 22nd, the parents and children will begin a "Victory Celebration" with a commemorative march. The walk will follow the same route taken when they moved from their temporary location on the corner of Huron and Bloor Streets to begin the occupation of the present building.

Prisoners in Chile after Coup d'Etat

The following account of the life of political prisoners in Chacabuco concentration camp in northern Chile was written by a refugee from the military regime presently living in Canada.

All the political prisoners in the camp have since been removed. A few are free in Chile; most have been expelled from the country by the Pinochet regime.

section of the Fourth International.

All these actions, of course, had to be carried out under the strictest security. If the prisoners were caught they faced forced labor, torture, and even the danger of being shot. A whole system of tricks, signals, secret messages, communication channels and nightly visits to other sectors of the camp were some of the ways these political activities were carried out.

The discussions of the lessons of the Chilean revolution were the single most important political activity. In small clandestine groups, the prisoners discussed their own political experiences.

The most politically experienced companions were questioned on many key issues: the reasons for the defeat in Chile; the role of the workers' vanguards; reformism and ultra-leftism; the absence of a revolutionary party; the mass organizations of the workers and peasants, and their political meaning; the resistance following the military coup; and whether the present regime could be called fascist or not.

On July 26, 1974 the prisoners celebrated the anniversary of the Cuban Revolution. Meetings were held to explain the origins and lessons of the Cuban experience.

August 21 was the anniversary of the death of Leon Trotsky, the co-leader with Lenin of the Russian revolution. The comrades of the PSR organized about 150 prisoners in a meeting to discuss the life of Trotsky and in particular his theory of permanent revolution.

The activities to commemorate the coup were planned in the barracks of one of the PSR members. At 7:45 am on Sept. 11, 1974 the entire camp observed a minute of silence and for the rest of the day normal activities were suspended. Tears rolled down silent cheeks in homage to fallen militants.

This action was a big success. About 300 prisoners out of 450 participated in it. This is very high when you think of the risks involved, and the fact that the Communist party members and right-wing Socialist Party members boycotted the activities.

I'd like to conclude by reporting one episode involving comrade Luis Vitale, well-known historian and Trotskyist militant. He was ordered by the camp's head officer to make a speech during the ceremonies in commemoration of "La Concepcion" battle (one of the most important battles of the war between Chile, and Peru and Bolivia.)

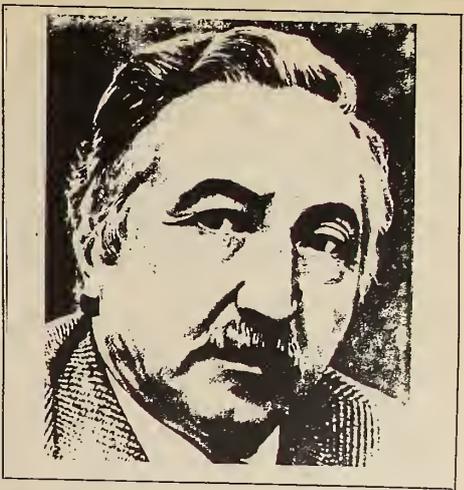

The situation was very delicate because the officer's intention was obviously to whip up nationalist and chauvinist feelings, and to humiliate Vitale. Three battalions of soldiers were present along with a big deployment of weapons, tanks and flags.

But Vitale transformed the "patriotic speech" into a protest act. He pointed out how the struggle of the soldiers showed the courage of the poor and dispossessed of the city and the field. He showed how useless this heroism was because in the end British imperialism prevailed through its control of Chilean saltpeter, the main economic resource at that time.

To the prisoners it was an example of revolutionary inspiration. But among the officers restlessness was turning into indignation. The camp commander flew into a rage, but he couldn't punish Vitale. As Vitale pointed out, he was only "repeating the version contained in officially approved history textbooks."

These prisoners, including Vitale, were able to get away from Chile as a result of a vigorous international protest campaign. It is essential that this campaign be continued to end the political repression in Chile.

Luis Corvalan has been in prison since the coup in Chile in September 1973. He has been moved to a number of concentration camps, including the one on Dawson Island near the Antarctic in the Straits of Magellan. Corvalan, 59, is now in Tres Alamos camp near Santiago and in bad health. He is suffering from asthma, hemorrhoids, duodenal ulcers and disease of the gums from bad diet. The military junta has banned medications and special treatment during the winter. His health is rapidly deteriorating. Last September, an international campaign was started aimed at getting Corvalan's release. He is a central figure in the campaign to release the many thousands of political prisoners still in Chilean jails.

SCIENCE VS ETHICS

Does an increase in scientific and technological knowledge have to result in the destruction of human lives and seemingly irreparable damage to the environment? The answer given by many seems to be "yes". We seem to be faced with the dilemma of having but two unpalatable alternatives: either dismantle modern technology or face a likely doomsday.

But is this dilemma real? In this brief essay we wish to show that the dilemma in question is not caused by anything in the nature of technology. Rather it is the politics of those who control science which creates the dilemma.

Science in a Liberal Society vs. Science in a Marxist Society

Liberals assume that once science has progressed so that we know how to achieve a given result technically, the problem then becomes one of convincing policy-makers that the solution should be put into operation. In recent years the ecological threat has challenged these liberal notions in two ways. First of all, policy-makers seem often to ignore the solutions offered by scientists, as when the government continued to use chemical agents in Vietnam long after there was overwhelming evidence that these chemicals would cause long-term, perhaps irreparable damage to the environment. Secondly, even when scientists make do agree with the policy-makers, corporations seem to have an endless capacity to resist the decision when losses of profits are involved. Liberals, however, because their view of society is basically one of accepting the structure of power and privilege, seem to construe the problem as one of the "dangers of technology" and its effects.

Marxists, on the other hand, take a completely different approach. They start from the premise that modern capitalist societies contain two essential classes: owners of the means of production who run their businesses primarily to make a profit, and workers who sell their labor in order just to make a living. According to the Marxist view, the ethical implications of the uses of new scientific knowledge can only be judged according to which of these two classes will primarily benefit from it. Three simple rules-of-thumb principles guide Marxists in analyzing how science will be utilized in capitalist society:—Advances which improve the lives of workers will only be acceptable to the owners of the means of production if they also happen to serve the interests of the latter.

—When there is an advance beneficial only to workers, the capitalists will make every attempt to evade or prevent its implementation (e.g. mass transit). —An advance profitable to the capitalists, which happens to bring great harm to workers, will be used by the capitalists as long as they can manage to do so (e.g. pesticides, chemicals in foods).

In Marxist theory, there is no way to resolve the conflict between the two classes except by a seizure of political control of the entire society by the workers—who represent the overwhelming majority of the people—leading eventually to a society without classes altogether. Once the working class holds political power, the apparent science-ethics dilemma will tend to disappear, for any discovery which would harm the majority of people could not be put to use simply because it would bring profits to the few. In this society, science would come under the democratic control of all the people.

A corollary of this conclusion is that until capitalism is overthrown, scientists must always choose whether they are working for the capitalist class or the working class. Liberal scientists, who think they work for "science" in reality end up working most of the time for the class which holds power—that is, the capitalists. To illustrate how these different approaches work out in a concrete case, let us take a look at one of the ecology movement's major concerns—over-population.

A Liberal Dilemma—What To Do About Overpopulation

Probably the most painful dilemma facing liberal ecologists today is "overpopulation." With global famine on the horizon, with world resources apparently being stretched to their outer limits, people keep producing children at rates that threaten to push population far beyond the capacity of the earth to support it. And liberals ask, "what is it that has brought on this problem? Was it not the rising standard of living which came about as a result of the technological advances of the industrial revolution? Was it not the outcome of the discoveries of medicine which allowed for a lowering of the death rate while bringing no accompanying reductions in the birth rate? In short, the population problem appears to them to be the direct if unintended result of the advance of scientific knowledge.

In the face of this crisis liberals have tried to develop solutions. In the 1950's moderate attempts were made to induce "birth control" by appealing to people's "better instincts". These programs, the experts agree, have failed. Confronted thus, with the apparent fact that people, particularly in the poor countries of the world, will not voluntarily reduce their birth rate, increasingly stringent measures have begun to be considered. American foreign aid is now often made contingent upon acceptance by the receiver-nation of a certain dose of birth-control technology. Family-planning schemes for poor nations are peddled by scientists working for foundations or government agencies. Paul Ehrlich, the veritable dean of the ecology scientists, has recently written the starkest statement yet. Looking at 30 years of failure to make significant reductions in population growth in India, he advises that "India's government may well have to resort to some coercive method sooner or later, unless famine, war, or disease take the problem out of its hands." Some scientists, apparently concerned with the failure of their programs to check rapid population growth, now find themselves compelled to consider alternatives—"some coercive method"—in direct violation of their liberal beliefs. One dilemma leads inexorably to the next: technology produces overpopulation, overpopulation threatens the world, the world must control "coercive methods".

Overpopulation—A Marxist Approach

To understand the "overpopulation" in the world today, we must look at the class-structure of society as well as the technology being developed by science. Evidence suggests that there is something about the nature of a society itself that helps to determine how many children will be produced. Perhaps the most convincing argument for a social theory of population growth comes from a recent study done in India by the economist Mahmood Mamdani. During the years 1953-1959 the Harvard School of Public Health conducted a study of its own pilot program to control population growth in a village in the Punjab. In 1969 they initiated a follow-up study on their attempts to introduce birth-control devices among a group of Indian farmers. Everyone agreed that the program was a failure. But why would the poor farmers of India, among the world's most impoverished people, refuse birth control when it was offered through the medium of a well-organized, well-financed, intensive program? The liberal experts were baffled.

Mamdani, using a Marxist analysis, found something quite different. Relating his study of the project's failure to caste and class relationships in the village, he discovered that poor villagers consciously view their children as labor assets. Increasing land fragmentation combines with the new opportunities in post-colonial India to provide special incentives to the poor family for the production of many children. If most of the children could work at agriculture and other jobs, the combined efforts of the family might be enough to put one child through school and into a bureaucratic post. Then the family would have some hope of economic security or even advancement. Even if this dream did not come true, the presence of numerous children among the poorest families was viewed as a cost-saving device. One villager explained: "Why pay 2,500 rupees for an extra hand? Why not have a son?" The message is clear. For the poor in this village in India, children are not a population "bomb" but rather a means of survival and even advancement for the entire family. Though society as a whole is threatened by the

Blues win 2/3 in Quebec

By JOHN ROBB
Last weekend saw the Varsity hockey team on a road trip to La Belle Province. The outing was satisfactory for the team and coach Tom Watt, the Blues winning two of three contests.

The Blues met the Concordia Singers in Montreal on Friday night and won 3-2. Concordia is a strong club but the Blues prevailed. Lennoxville is not a fun place on a Saturday night, but the Blues made the best of it, demolishing Bishop's College 14-2. In the pros two games in two nights is a burden but the Blues outdid the moneymakers by playing a third game Sunday afternoon in Trois Rivieres.

The Patriotes handed Toronto a 7-3 loss that was a reflection on a defensive lapse that lasted the entire game.

Blues fans will see more of this loose defense 'style' as Rocci Pagnello, Charlie Hughes, Dave Rooke and Wayne Morrissey are encouraged to move the puck up the ice and not hang back so much.

Coach Watt feels these players are capable puck handlers and wants them to fit in with the aggressive style the team has adopted this year. Forwards Frank Davis, Ron Harris, Larry Hopkins and Doug Herridge help to make this strategy work with their incessant checking.

The Blues have had a good exhibition season. The team is not super talented but has an excellent attitude and is working hard. This must continue if the team is to go anywhere this year.

Apparently the power play has improved over last year and is putting the puck in the net with more consistency. The team's penalty-killing is solid and stood a test in Trois Rivieres being two men short twice.

So all you rabid fans can rest easy. The regular season starts this weekend as Varsity travels to McMaster on Friday night, then returns to Toronto to host Ottawa on Saturday. Game time is 8:00 at the arena.

M.A.A. and W.A.A. report

The Director of the Men's Athletic Association along with the Director of the Women's Athletic Association made reports to the Internal Affairs Committee yesterday at Simcoe Hall.

The themes of the two dissertations were directed to the increase in participation on all levels of participation. Mr. A.D. White of the Men's A.A. pointed out an increase of 790 people in intramural competition in 74-75 over 73-74. White also pointed to the dual roles of the seven full time staff who work in intercollegiate and intramural athletics.

The system can hardly survive without money and the recommendations of the Fisher Task Force point to this. The reality of a new athletic complex, the plans for which being recently passed by City Council, will alleviate much of the strain on Hart House and Benson Building caused by peripheral campuses.

One unidentified member of the Committee questioned whether a restriction on use by non-students would alleviate part of the problem. It is easy to see that this would only bring staff and fringe participants to a boil.

The Women's situation is far more alarming. In a program that offers more instruction than the men's, i.e., 202 classes in 32 subject areas. Participation rose from 9,765 in 73-74 to 11,840 in 74-75. Anne Hewett the Director of the Women's A.A. pointed to the erosion of university funds towards women's athletics laying the burden on the W.A.A.

Volleyball Blues win in Kingston

By O. ILNYCKYJ
Kingston — As winter approaches sports fans across the country are desperately seeking replacements for the men of the gridiron upon whom they sometimes bestow their loyalty and enthusiasm.

Be original. Discover the international sport of volleyball. Join a winner — the U of T Volleyball Blues.

Over the weekend, in the first league action of the season, the Blues towered over all opposition. Despite a relatively sluggish start the Blues defeated a much improved RMC team by the scores of 15-8, 15-12, 11-15, 9-15, 15-7. Then the Big Blue Machine moved into high gear.

Following RMC their prey were the Queens Golden Gaels, who narrowly beat out the Blues for the second and final playoff berth last year. Seeking just revenge, the Blue Machine lobotomized these local laymen in straight takes 15-5, 15-13, 15-7.

The final act matched Toronto against the talent of York. Playing less than spectacular v-ball against a defensive oriented team the Blues were forced to come back from a 14-3 deficit in the final game to take the match 15-6, 15-12 and 16-14.

In previous action this year the Blues reached the semi-finals of an OUA exhibition tournament at Waterloo, only to lose to a strong, disciplined Western team. Defeated more by exhaustion than by its opposition, Toronto showed occasional flashes of brilliance. Consistency, the hallmark of a champion, is sure to develop throughout the season.

Despite only four players from last season, coaches Tiit Romet and Reg Eadie molded a powerful, cohesive unit. Subsequent league activity will take place on November 30 at Sudbury where the "Machine" will face the combination of Fyerson and Laurentian. Once again U of T has a winner.

Blues Boffed in Sudbury 79-67

By DAVID CASS

Sudbury. Nirvana of the masses. What better way-station from which to launch the basketball season than Sudbury.

The Blues could probably think of a few no doubt. What with the notorious officiating juxtaposed neatly with Laurentian's consistent play, the atmosphere took on all the otiosity of Stompin' Tom Connors lyrical ballad "Sudbury Saturday Night".

The Blues managed a respectable and courageous performance considering the fact that the refereeing appeared to be a sometime affair. The officials seemed afflicted by an overwhelming desire to stand around and view the action from afar mainly because of their lack of conditioning. Visions of Zero Mostel abound in my "kepleh".

Indeed, coach McManus, a mild-mannered sort who believes in "live and let live" grew livid at a particularly farcical call and lambasted the deserving arbiters.

When a man who has never had a technical foul in his entire career blows his stack, you can be certain that it is not concerning some trifling oversight.

Through it all, U of T remarkably maintained its composure. Although pressured by a man-to-man press, excellent guardwork by Doug Fox enabled the Blues to overcome it fairly successfully. The offense showed more balance with rookie Bingo Alexov sniping for 15, Hilbertus "Bert" netting 14 while "Kushy" Karczyk and old reliable Willy Fox gunned for 12 each.

P.S. — Anyone entertaining thoughts of forming a Glenn Scott fan club, do so.

Lady B-Ballers lose to Mac

By ADRIAN STANOWSKI

Last Thursday the Women's Senior Basketball team was host to McMaster in their second league game of the season.

The girls dropped their first game to Guelph by an unmentionable score, but improved considerably against McMaster. They still lost 53-46, but most of the girls were pleased about the improvement in their play. That's nice to hear.

During the first half of the game, both teams seemed to be of equal strength. McMaster's centers were accumulating some points but a 1-2-2 zone defense worked hard to shut off the middle.

The second half of the game began with Mac utilizing full and half court presses alternatively, which Toronto dealt with effectively. Some bad passing by the Blues later on led to several interceptions which were converted into baskets. The sands of time were running out on the Blues.

Since there are only three members of last year's team present on this edition, the majority of the team is laden with the "heady brew of youth." (Thank you David Cass.)

The combination of a rookie-laden team and a new offensive system contributed to many of the mixups and turnovers in the game. Hopefully as the season goes on experience will make the unit more cohesive.

Going for a jumper.

Fong loses final appeal

By PAUL McGRATH

Henry Fong has lost his chance at repeating for the third time his final year at the University of Toronto Faculty of Medicine.

After three weeks of hearings and six weeks of subsequent deliberation, the Governing Council's Subcommittee on Academic Appeals dismissed his appeal to overturn a November 1974 decision by the medical faculty's Board of Examiners requiring Fong to withdraw.

The committee's 12 page report summed up the proceedings with this statement, "The Faculty of Medicine reached the conclusion that Mr. Fong did not have the clinical ability that is necessary to practise medicine and that must be demonstrated before a degree is granted. Sad as the result is, the Subcommittee sees no reason for interfering with that judgement."

Fong's defence attempted to prove that the faculty's decision was based on evaluations tinged with personal bias and was arrived at while there existed a "climate of racism" directed against students of Chinese origin within the faculty.

After detailed analysis of the charges and the evidence relating to them, the subcommittee dismissed both of the charges.

Fong's defence maintained that Fong was by no means the worst student in the faculty, and that others with similar or worse academic problems had been allowed to repeat academic years. Some of those students are now practising doctors.

The subcommittee's report stated that "Dr. Steiner (the Associate Dean of Medicine) agreed that other students may have been allowed to have a third opportunity to pass a particular subject. The Subcommittee could see no significance in this since it must be supposed that these other students were judged capable of successfully completing the requirements to be admitted to the practice of medicine whereas Mr. Fong was not. There surely can be no automatic rule about multiple repetitions."

In dismissing the possibility of racial bias in Fong's case, the Subcommittee noted the existence of certain views regarding the admissibility and desirability of a large number of medical students of any one racial stock. Among these, the Subcommittee noted the underlying assumptions that "medical doctors of one cultural background are not capable or acceptable by patients of another cultural background."

"The Subcommittee rejects these views, whether they be racist, xenophobic, or simply wrong."

The Subcommittee did not feel that the existence of these views at that time in the faculty could have personally affected the judgement on Henry Fong.

"... these views were expressed by a handful of individuals, only some of whom were in any way associated with the University of Toronto. Merely to show that prejudice exists... does not lead to the inference that prejudice affected the judgement unless the prejudice is so common that it is probable the persons making the judgement were affected by it."

An associate dean of the faculty, Dr. Llewellyn-Thomas, stated in testimony during the hearing that the topic of the number of Chinese students within the faculty had been a major point of controversy among the staff. Fong's defence maintained that the prevalence of the controversy on students of Chinese origin, and references to "communication problems" in Fong's case laid sufficient doubt that he had been treated with impartiality.

The defence also stated that on a personal level, Fong was badly treated. They cited testimony to the effect that Fong was notorious during his second attempt at the final year because of his attempts to prove that he had not been given an adequate second chance.

According to the evidence, reports on Fong's performance were worse on his second attempt than his first. The defence maintained that this was due to a conscious effort by Dr. C.H. Hollenburg, chairman of the university's Department of Medicine, to have Fong withdrawn a second time. According to associate dean Llewellyn-Thomas, Hollenburg had been involved in the first decision to have Fong withdrawn and was quite angry when Fong was allowed to repeat the year.

The defence also pointed out that on the second occasion Fong was being tested by people who were quite well informed of Fong's previous troubles, even though they had not sat on his first testing committee.

The Subcommittee replied: "It is common enough in the academic world for repeating students to be judged again by the same teachers as on the first occasion. The appellant had the benefit of a different setting and different assessors. The Subcommittee must conclude that he was fairly treated.

Fong's defence felt that much of the problem in this particular case lay with the faculty's form of assessment in the final year, which is for the most part in the form of subjective assessment over periods as short as four or five days.

"It is difficult to see," the Subcommittee reported, "how clinical performance can be assessed in any other way." The defence has a number of options to further Fong's case, including an appeal to civil authorities. It is not yet clear whether they will take the case to a divisional court for a ruling.

SAC set strike soon Varsity may vanish

By JOE WRIGHT

Students may be noticing the effects of their SAC executive more than usual soon.

Unless they come to terms with their unionized employees, members of CUPE 1222, students will be in for a strike which may bring all SAC services to a halt.

Not only will Gord Barnes have to do his own typing, but The Varsity may cease publishing for the duration of the strike and Ontario Federation of Students vow they will not come onto the U of T campus.

There are eight unionized staffers now employed by SAC. Although The Varsity editorial staff are not unionized, the advertising manager and his assistant are paid by SAC and are members of CUPE 1222.

Matters come to a head tomorrow afternoon when the union members hold a strike meeting. All indications so far point to an overwhelming vote to walk-out.

The SAC staff, members of CUPE local 1222, are demanding a weekly pay of $170 for each of their members. This sum is between five and twenty dollars more than the SAC management is now offering for three job classifications.

The union is also asking for an input in running the SAC office, specific job descriptions, and medical and dental services.

SAC employees say they often provide the only continuity in the office from one year to the next, and feel job descriptions are essential in working for eleven different bosses.

Chief negotiator and executive assistant John Bennett charges Gord Barnes with stalling the negotiations over the past two months. Barnes was quoted as saying "we won't miss them anyway."

The management refuses to accept any concept of office democracy, says Bennett, and pay their staff less than the lowest paid fieldworker on other campus student organizations.

U of T's part-time student union (APUS) pays a minimum of $175 a week to its fieldworkers and the graduate students union (GSU) pays $180. The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) pays $173.

If they win their demands, Bennett estimates the total SAC payroll next year will be only $74,000 and $3,000 less if they don't win the health care package.

ALL THE NEWS THAT'S FIT TO GET DOWN

...meanwhile admin battles another union

By ERIC McMILLAN

Who are these people? They spent months in futile negotiations with administration over wages, job security, and working conditions. After long delays the university presented counterproposals unacceptable by labour negotiators.

The union recognized the distance between the two sides and asked the Labour Relations Board for a conciliator.

Does this sound like the library workers?

Should conciliation break down, the university could find itself once again in a strike situation — but this time with the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA).

Both union and administration officials expressed hope last night that the conciliation talks which open tomorrow morning will lead to a resolution of the dispute, yet there are few signs either side is prepared to make major concessions.

GAA president Jay Drydyk explained "As a result of the university statements that they did not find our proposals a basis of agreement, we applied for and got a conciliator."

The university has been considering the GAA demands since September. In December the administration presented a series of counterproposals.

Drydyk called the university's response "status quo proposals" which "essentially aren't proposals at all." "They are descriptions of the conditions under which teaching assistants work, and descriptions of the worst conditions at that."

The university "refused to accept our idea of job security," Drydyk claimed. The GAA has been bargaining for a guarantee of five years employment for TA's who are here that long. The administration has so far refused to change its policy of treating graduates as "sessional employees" hired for one year at a time, said Drydyk.

The GAA would also like to see TA work hours specified, but the university's counterproposals include a clause to the effect that "individual disciplines such as academic qualifications, ability and diligence" determine the workload of each TA.

Drydyk called this "an escape clause you can drive an elephant through" because it could be used to overwork a TA on the excuse the TA hasn't been diligent enough.

Milton Israel, chairman of an Advisory Committee which helped determine the university's response to the grads' demands, did not wish to reiterate the administration's arguments last night but claimed to be optimistic concerning the outcome of the talks.

"We're quite content that it's going to conciliation," he said. "We'll get some help from the Labour Relations Board."

Israel had earlier cited the university's "present financial circumstances" and "lack of resources" as the basis for its resistance to the grads' demands.

Drydyk would not comment on the possibility of a TA strike in the case of a break down in conciliation because he did not wish to "prejudice conciliation."

Margery Fee, a graduate humanities representative, said the talks would be unsuccessful unless the university comes up with a better response to the GAA demands. She said the university has been delaying on the excuse that the budget hasn't come down yet, although "the university budget is more or less set now," said Fee.

The GAA has established a publicity committee which plans to contact every graduate student and begin leafletting undergrads for support starting this Thursday, according to Drydyk.

Flat feet anybody? Well, read on-

By BOB COLLIER

Need a job? Can you glower ferociously yet maintain an even temper? Can you stand still doing nothing for three hours? Can you dominate library picketers? Can you pick your nose with aplomb? Do you want $10,733 a year?

Then you can join U of T's phalanx of jolly blue giants and become a campus cop.

Obviously considering that a score of heavies is not nearly enough to defend this campus against riotous students and rampaging picketers, campus security chief George Huff has advertised for yet another three (3) boys-in-blue, at a total cost of $32,199.

Did someone whisper "cutbacks" in my ear? Did I hear something about a hiring freeze? Nonsense my boy, campus security is at stake.

According to the job description posted on campus bulletin boards before Christmas, to earn $10,733 a year the successful applicant's duties will include "patrolling grounds, investigation of complaints, and crowd and traffic control."

Note the reference to crowd control. I guess that means us.

But they aren't ordinary policemen that they hire around here.

These cops need high school graduation, a diploma from a "formal police academy" and "previous law enforcement experience."

That leaves me out I guess.

Government forks over

By MIKE EDWARDS

Apparently succumbing to the season of goodwill, the Ontario government has announced an increase in its financial support for colleges and universities. But no one seems too sure of where the money will go.

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) is convinced the government is intent on freezing enrolments, and on raising the OSAP loan ceiling.

Colleges and Universities minister Harry Parrott, announced an increase of 14.4 per cent for all 41 Ontario post-secondary institutions. The increase applies to the 1976-77 fiscal period.

This compares with last year's budget increase of 16 per cent which worked out to be approximately 7 per cent per student.

U of T president John Evans said the university had received "fair treatment" when compared to lesser grants for other areas of government funding, namely social services.

Evans made special note of the parallel government announcement to freeze graduate programs for two years.

He noted this "removes the incentive to expand graduate programs as a method of improving the financial positions of a university."

Evans cosied the actual increase at 12 per cent which he said "must meet the costs of the five per cent growth in student enrolment as well as the impact of inflation."

OFS took the opportunity to denounce the government on its overall cutback strategy as applied to education. "The quality of post-secondary education will be allowed to continue to decline at the present pace for at least another year," they said in a special press release.

OFS fieldworker Rick Gregory said the allocation of monies will be on a different system this year so "It will be impossible to gauge the impact of the increase until university budgets are finalized."

Gregory also said it was Parrott's intention to increase the loan ceiling in OSAP financing. He said Parrott revealed this in an interview with the Sudbury Star earlier in December.

Gregory suspects the loan ceiling will rise from $900 to $1,800. With an increase in the federal program of loans, the Ontario grant budget would drop accordingly, he said. According to Gregory, the government's generosity will be paid for by students.

OFS is currently organizing students to protest the general cutbacks and the recent McKeough report which recommends a 65 per cent increase in tuition fees, a freeze on all government capital expenditure and massive cuts in health and welfare spending.

Protest plans include a rally at U of T on January 21.

Strike over? Whoopee! Think I'll stick my head in a pail of sand.

The library strike - how it ended

By BOB COLLIER

U of T's first major strike abruptly ended on the last day of the fall term after three weeks of picketing. Striking library workers accepted an 18 per cent average pay raise in a Convocation Hall vote December 9.

Members of CUPE 1230 voted 62 per cent in favor of accepting the offer, which was three per cent higher than the offer refused in an overwhelming mid-November vote.

Simcoe Hall's offer involved a retroactive payment for the last six months of 1975 and a lump sum for 1976 paid to all workers irrespective of their rank or salary plus the 18 per cent increase.

The new contract represents an average pay increase of 18 per cent. Workers on the low end of the pay scale will be offered a 21 per cent increase on their base rate of $5,770 per year, while the highest paid workers are being offered 10 per cent hike on their average base rate of $15,300. The new offer represented a five per cent drop for the highest paid over the previous offer.

CUPE 1230 president Judy Darcy was disappointed by the outcome of the vote, but in an impassioned speech to union members, she urged them to forget the confrontations and name-calling of the previous three weeks and return to work without resentment or anger.

After three weeks of picketing, the union members appeared divided about the merits of the strike. More than a quarter of the 430 union members were still actively picketing but many others, especially in the higher paid ranks, were beginning to grumble about lost pay.

They noted that their increase was lower in each successive offer and were dubious about whether the trend would continue.

Many of the lower paid workers seemed satisfied with their 21 per cent increase but others were seriously concerned that these in the higher categories were getting only half the increase they were offered.

Many saw the advent of the Christmas holidays as the decisive factor in the vote to return. With students off campus for almost a month, the university would have had little pressure on it to settle. The union members didn't want to spend another four weeks on their starvation level strike pay.

Only in the last four days of the strike did the university attempt to open the libraries and then it was merely a token effort. The library administration blocked off the lobby of Sigmund Samuel library with a large desk and provided a collection of runners to fetch books.

If a student had forgotten a call number, a librarian would collect the card file tray and place him under police guard while he looked through it.

No attempt was made to open the Robarts or the Sci-Med libraries.

Part-time workers were major losers during the strike. They were laid off during the strike and lost three weeks salary. Some part-timers felt Simcoe Hall was afraid of a confrontation if they refused to cross the picket line.

Throughout the strike, the campus cops did a roaring trade. There were up to fifteen policemen on duty at a time at both the Robarts and Sigmund Samuel libraries at a cost of $10,000 a year each.

What did the strike solve? The library workers won a little more money, developed a sense of unity and increased their morale and the university lost a little money and a lot of arrogance.

And the strike has led the way for increased wage demands from support staff. Already, bookstore clerks, SAC staff, graduate assistants and faculty are threatening labour action for 1976.

Gov't hits deaf education

By MIKE EDWARDS

One target of the government's drive to cut back is Silent Voice Canada incorporated, a small non-denominational agency on Shaftesbury Avenue which attempts to provide remedial education for the Toronto deaf community.

A one-time grant from the Ontario Ministry of Community and Social Services ran out last Dec. 31. The agency was originally funded as a federal Local Initiatives Program.

Silent Voice was incorporated in June 1974 and has spent about $80,000 in their first eighteen months of operation.

The St. Francis Deaf Bureau which had been in operation for six years previously formed the nucleus of the new agency.

The staff at the centre will continue working through January, executive director Victoria Kargul, continues to spearhead a fund drive, looking to other governmental, church and charitable sources.

The group runs educational programs for the adult deaf and deaf immigrants. About 100 people a week employ the agency's services. Classes centre around life skills (using the subway, signing cheques, dealing with bureaucracies, etc.).

The centre also teaches signing, the language of the deaf. An integrated educational program that includes signing is not available elsewhere in Metro.

A seven-year-old student at Silent Voice was recently rejected by the Metro school system because of behavioral problems. Workers at the centre feel that Silent Voice was his only alternative and are happy that his language skills are now improving.

Programs for the multi-handicapped deaf are available in other Southern Ontario centres but are not open to Metro residents.

Interviewed at Silent Voice, two workers seemed enthusiastic about their work but expressed frustration at establishment programs. One came to Silent Voice after working in the Metro school on Davisville. The other was interested in mime theatre but became involved in education. Both said they started with Silent Voice because they needed jobs.

"The biggest problems facing deaf people is lack of awareness in the hearing community and a lack of language in the deaf community," said one.

They expressed a growing resentment in the deaf community about the poor facilities provided by the government. But one of the most recurrent complaints is on the overall philosophy of the system.

According to experts in the deaf community, the mainstay of the Ontario system is "oralism" which emphasizes lip-reading and speech therapy, along with the use of hearing aids.

Social workers around Silent Voice maintain that signing is an important part of a deaf person's education.

"The proper organization should be forced to carry the services," said one worker, but she was dismayed at the conservative attitude of educators.

"What do we do when people say we have a perfectly good oral program now?" she asked.

Proponents of "total communication" which includes lip reading, speech training and signing, insist on giving children a language first. "They just don't have the words to express themselves," said a student educational consultant with Silent Voice.

"Children are frustrated, they will start screaming and throwing things," said the consultant, a graduate student at OISE.

"With oralism you are asking a child to transfer modalities before they are able to conceptualize the ideas," she said. "Any baby can understand signing."

Appeals committee took no chances

There's no doubt that the Subcommittee on Academic Appeals would have been stepping out on a limb in granting Henry Fong his appeal against the Faculty of Medicine. To them, the limb was just too flimsy.

By no means did the Subcommittee dismiss the case lightly. The length of time in deliberation and the detailed nature of the report testifies to what must have been a long and difficult process.

This does not mean that they can't be wrong. This case was possibly the most complicated issue any of the members had ever had to deal with, involving masses of letters and documents and hours of spoken evidence. It was damn close to impossible to crystallize any clear impression of the dealings between Fong and the faculty between 1973 and the present.

As equivocating as it may sound, the only thing that is clear is that there is sufficient doubt that Fong was treated in an impartial manner in his second attempt at the final year.

It certainly can't be said that the faculty decided on concrete action on the situation of students of Chinese origin by finding a patsy in Henry Fong. That would have required massive effort and collusion. Of course it's out of the question.

It appears that the problem was one of retrievability. There were beyond a shadow of a doubt students who had fared worse in academics than Henry Fong. Some of them were considered retrievable, even if it meant two repetitions of a year before they got through.

Henry Fong, halfway through his second chance, was deemed beyond redemption. Why? Looking at Fong the person, the clues can be found. He fits none of the stereotypes one would expect of a "Canadian" doctor. He is shy, sometimes nervous and has a stutter. He is of Chinese origin inside a faculty where he and his fellow Chinese are being discussed. People are saying that they lack clinical ability, that they have problems communicating and suggestions ranging from interviews to psychiatric assessments are being offered as a solution to these rather fallacious comments. Henry Fong was indirectly under the gun.

Let's change the circumstances. Henry O'Donnell is a student at the Faculty of Medicine who has had a poor record academically. In his fourth year he has problems in the clinic getting used to dealing with people. Would O'Donnell have had the same problems? Chances are a nice talk with the Dean (due to O'Donnell's Irish confidence and mastery of the nuances of the English language) could have produced an amicable settlement. Anyone involved in the medical faculty will agree that they bend over backwards for students in trouble.

They didn't here. His second attempt was plagued with pressure, everyone knew about him and quite likely had conceptions about this strange case, and few would accept the challenge it would have required to instill in Fong the clinical ability which most certainly can be learned. If the Faculty of Medicine is trying to convince that all their graduates work well with patients, it won't work.

It's not that he was hounded out, but it's apparent that his makeup, and that includes race and his own peculiarities, made it easy for them to give up on him.

There are leftovers. The "climate" in the faculty at the time is a stalemate question. While you can't prove that it had anything to do with Fong's expulsion, it can't be denied that it was a very controversial subject at the time. The Committee was right in denouncing some of the opinions expressed within the faculty, but would not go as far as saying that Fong might have been a casualty.

It simply can't be dismissed. Somewhere back in the heads of everyone in this country is the feeling that there is a difference between "us" and "them" and Henry Fong managed to fit a lot of the stereotypes that "we" have managed to attach to students of Chinese origin. Where there is "sufficient doubt" in our legal system, and it applies here, the doubt must go to the defendant. That does not by any means brand any of his assessors as racists, but takes into account that somewhere in that structure there are strains of thought that might work against him. It's only fair.

It's possible that this will go further than the Subcommittee on Academic Appeals. Somewhere along the line justice must seem to be done.

What's in the pot this year? Bones and gristle.

Government money helps but not enough

"We are not out of the woods." That was President Evans' response to the announcement of an increase in government spending on the universities.

He's quite right. While the increase does not cripple the university, it does mean that we'll be buying canes until next year. Given the freeze on enrolments, on academic appointments and on capital spending, it means budget cuts slightly less drastic than was expected when the budget was drawn up.

What it doesn't mean is that the provincial government is any less intent on paring down the amount of money they ship out to keep the universities running in good health. It doesn't mean that they accept the idea that the university must be academically alive and staffed with fresh people every once in a while. It doesn't mean that they have any idea what's happening to us over here.

For instance, on the same day that the president mentioned above, he received a letter stating that the government would fund no growth in graduate student numbers. Of course within the framework of the situation among graduate students this means that they won't be turning out more unemployables. The lot of the grad is quite dismal — teaching jobs are fairly difficult to find and the money being offered is useless. So this plan is right in step.

Because of this, the university has to reconsider its new graduate programs, the like of which are always waiting in the wings hoping for funding. These programs have to be funded within the existing "pie."

The big question seems to be "what the hell is the government doing with the money that they're taking away from the universities?"

Well, there are various interpretations, depending among other things on what your particular shade of politics is. The hard-core lefties see the government storing capital to be put to use to aid the monopoly capitalists in their search for energy resources, the profits from which flow uninterrupted down south of the border. The conservatives see it as storage to put the stops to inflation. Others point to wastage in the civil service and the government's extravagant tastes in brand-new but already obsolete transportation systems.

Whatever it is, from our point of view the government has its priorities bass-ackwards. Health, education and welfare are the primary responsibilities of any government, and when this government starts to table reports that recommend significant cuts in all of these areas, it's time to wonder.

So our job is clear. It's necessary to go after Bland Bill and his friends in an unfriendly way and ask some questions. We'll check back when we have some answers.

They settled for too little

"A bum deal." The library workers took it nonetheless.

Everyone was surprised at the results of the vote on the university offer that eventually ended the library strike. Most surprised was the CUPE 1230 executive who had the rug pulled out from under them.

Why did they settle? The university's last offer was not significantly higher than the previous one. For those at the top of the pay scale it represented a three-per-cent decrease. The secondary issues, job security among them, were not settled at all.

A few possibilities: It was the first major strike in the university's history. People like to think that this sort of thing doesn't have to happen here, so the strikers were operating without a precedent on totally alien ground. They came from rather quiet jobs onto a picket line that was less than quiet. They had very few beefs with their management in the library, but found themselves

SUPPORT LIBRARY WORKERS

CUPE Local 1230

yelling "scab" at some perfectly nice people. It's not a pleasant situation, but strikes never are.

Nobody wants to be on strike over Christmas time. Strike pay was not good. And if you had to mingle with U of T police all day, you'd probably go back to work at the first available opportunity. They're not exactly stand-up comics.

But that doesn't escape the fact that they settle for far less than the original strike vote seemed to indicate that they would stand for. They have a little more money, but they are in no sense secure. It's surprising really.

Maybe it comes in part from dealing with a heavy-handed university. There was in the back of everybody's mind that if they went past this date, it would probably last another month. The university was adamant that this was a final offer.

And maybe also the university had them convinced that this was something they shouldn't have been doing. In many ways it's still a world unto itself here.

Student press seeks student organization

By LEA RYAN

Throughout the 38th national conference of the Canadian University Press in Montreal political discussion bubbled around the issue of how the student press can assist in organizing against cutbacks in post-secondary education. The next question was "What can we do?"

The conference, organized by the University of McGill Daily was held from Dec. 27 to Jan. 3 for delegates from some 120 CUP papers across Canada. But according to many delegates, the conference reflected a level of preparation for struggle with its attendant confusion rather than one where direction has been established.

One step in establishing the role of CUP was taken in the Service Commission meetings which established a policy position for the news service, one of the major services CUP provides for its member papers. That position included a commitment to assist students across Canada to organize by providing comprehensive information and analysis about cutbacks in education.

Two lines emerged during the course of the conference about the role of student newspapers. The first was that the student press is to actively assist in sorting out the issues in front of the students, and give them tools to fight with. The second view was that the student press should remain "objective" and report on issues going on, without exercising a leadership role.

During the plenary session, the Varsity supported a motion to admit the Ontario Student, newspaper of the Ontario Federation of Students, into CUP as a full member. Varsity delegates argued that the Ontario Federation of Students is the legitimate formal student organization within Ontario and should have the rights and privileges of other student organizations within CUP.

Opponents of the motion insisted upon the distinction between the student movement and student press, intimating a contradiction between the two facets of student organization. They argued the press' role as being one of "objective" reporting on facts, rather than assisting to develop a fight on the part of the students against cutbacks. The Ontario Student was eventually accorded a none-voting associate membership.

The issue was raised again during the plenary, in the form of a Varsity motion to recognize ANEQ as the legitimate student organization of Quebec students, and to establish formal relations between CUP and ANEQ.

Supporters of the motion stressed new newspapers, who form the vast majority of the CUP constituency. In these seminars, the issue of "objectivity" and how news writing can reflect the interest of one class or another were raised.

The political education seminars concentrated on education delegates from across the country about the situation in Quebec. Seminars were held on the recent history of the Quebec labour movement, education in Quebec, and Quebec and the national question.

Montreal reform councillor Arnold Bennett gave an overview of the Quebec Labour Movement. He explained the formation of Quebec labor's Common Front in 1972 and what lessons had been learned from the necessity for student press and student organizations to work together.

The motion was opposed on the grounds ANEQ does not represent Quebec students. This view was proposed on the basis that before organizing students to resist attacks by the government on definite day to day issues, students should agree on "higher demands."

Seminars on the technical aspects and various political questions coincided with the meeting of the commissions responsible for the practical direction CUP takes.

Seminars were held on the issues of news writing, layout, review writing, feature writing, typesetting, libel and slander, and provided assistance on these issues, the issues of how does one go about putting out a paper. They were particularly helpful to the small or that uniting of the National Confederation of Trade Unions, the Quebec Federation of Labour, and the Quebec Teachers Corporation (QTC).

A spokesperson from the QTC analyzed in some detail the events which led to the growing militancy of the organization. He pointed out fighting on the economic questions allowed teachers to draw conclusions about the necessity to unite with other public sectors who are in struggle.

The speaker at the seminar on Quebec and the national question said Canada consists of two nations, Canada and Quebec. However, audience members disputed the argument, maintaining the basis of a nation is common territory, history, language, economics and culture. They stressed that while Quebec is a nation, Canada is not yet.

Chinese study papers harder than Canucks

Chinese people read and study their newspapers more than Canadians do, a speaker on the press told an audience of university journalists at the recent Canadian University Press Conference in Montreal.

"A certain time of the day is set aside for reading the paper, and the articles are discussed," said Stephen Griffiths, a former television journalist who recently spent two years in China as an exchange student.

He said the largest circulation Chinese paper is the Reference News, a daily which discusses "the world situation."

He said some western observers claimed the paper is read only by "top cadres and government officials," but disputed their claim.

"Our work team had a subscription to it, and everyone read and discussed it during the day," he said.

"The average Chinese person has a greater knowledge and understanding of world affairs than the average Canadian," because the Chinese read and discuss their papers, Griffiths said.

"I was amazed at their knowledge of world events," he said. "For example, they knew about Trudeau's wage and price controls before I did, and came and asked my opinion of them."

He added that Chinese people asked many questions about strikes, Watergate and Wounded Knee.

Griffiths said the Reference News selected its stories from foreign news services very carefully, in order to avoid printing "trivia such as kidnappings and plane crashes." "They concentrate on recent developments in the European Economic Community (Common Market), detente, and the Angola situation. And they include foreign perspectives on China, both for and against, so the Chinese people will know what world opinion is about them," he said.

Griffiths said all Chinese papers display the same interest in events of national and international importance as opposed to more sensational news such as "fires, rapes and murders."

"I'm not saying things like rapes and murders don't happen in China, but they don't consider them newsworthy."

Griffiths said all papers in China are under party control. The People's Daily, which has the second largest circulation in China, is controlled by the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party.

"The Chinese people would agree this could lead to press dictatorship and use of the paper for propaganda, but they would qualify this by saying there are two kinds of dictatorship," he said.

One kind is the "bourgeois dictatorship in the west," shown by "who controls the paper, who writes in it, and whose interest it reflects," he said.

The other is the "proletarian dictatorship," which is "biased in favour of the working class."

"The papers are censored in that they don't allow purposeful expression of capitalist, bourgeois ideas," Griffiths said.

"There is a dictatorship over the bourgeoisie to prevent them from gaining power, but there is democracy for the people. And the concept of the people includes over 95 per cent of the population.

"They believe in the free discussion of views and opinions, and that it is necessary for the whole population to discuss issues in order to view all aspects of a situation before making a decision on it."

Griffiths said 30 to 40 per cent of the content of Chinese papers is written by "amateurs" rather than professional journalists.

One Varsity editor's contribution to the discussion was that his favourite newspaper is the National Enquirer.

CUP refuses Quebec union

By TERRY GLAVIN
The Canadian University Press adamantly refused to recognize the Association Nationale des Etudiants de Quebec (ANEQ) as being representative of the Quebec student movement at the close of their 38th annual conference in Montreal.

A resolution calling for the recognition of ANEQ as the sole legitimate representative of Quebec students was overwhelmingly defeated by CUP delegates at the final plenary session Friday. The resolution was put forward by the Varsity and seconded by the Algonquin Arrow.

Arrow editor Ron Phillips supported the motion on the grounds "There is simply no student organization in Quebec doing anything. There is no other noticeable progressive student organization in the province."

ANEQ was founded in 1973 after four years of total inactivity of student organizing in the province. The Unions Generale des Etudiants de Quebec (UGEQ) dissolved in 1969.

Jeff Kessler of the McGill Daily argued against the motion on the grounds that "ANEQ does not represent the student movement in Quebec," adding "ANEQ's policies go against our basic policies."

President Richard Bousquet of the Press Etudiants Nationale (PEN), a Quebec student press organization, expressed sadness that the resolution was defeated. "CUP should be more involved in what's going on in student movements," Bousquet complained.

Research is presently being conducted by PEN and CUP concerning the future of their relations with each other.

The defeated ANEQ resolution stated one of the main reasons the conference was held in Montreal was to enable delegates to pay closer attention to the Quebec student movement.

University of Calgary's Gauntlet editor Noel Jantzie, the main opponent of the ANEQ resolution, said because he "did not see the role of CUP as being to legitimize student organizations."

"I think we should deal with ANEQ as a representative body of Quebec students but whether they are the sole legitimate representative of the Quebec student movement will be decided by the students themselves."

ANEQ Information Secretary Daniel Degenais did not see the intent of the resolution as one of "legitimizing" the organization. After the plenary adjourned, he said ANEQ "considered the proposal as one of principle. This conference was supposed to pay more attention to Quebec students."

The ANEQ delegation had spent the conference week in Montreal as observers, and had hoped their presence would encourage interest in the political situation of students in Quebec.

ANEQ representative Yves Boyer was surprised by the decision of CUP delegates to defeat the proposal. He concluded that CUP "doesn't want to take a political position on ANEQ. Maybe they don't have enough information."

Former National Union of Students fieldworker Bob Buckingham, expressed his views by saying "I would say it's unfortunate that the proposal was defeated. I see them as the sole legitimate representative of Quebec students."

Post-Holiday Letdown Blues

Twas the night before school and everyone was feeling lousy. It wasn't a great holiday. The library strike left me with an essay to do over the holidays and it isn't close to completion. Negligible amounts of money were made and any that was blown on the New York Rangers. I'm a hopeless addict when it comes to the Rangers.

An interesting possibility arose when I was informed that the Blues could be going to Poland for an exhibition series. Having been over there previously Tom Watt knew that approximately 9,000 dollars would be needed. Being the eternal optimist I went down to the good old American consulate and spent close to twenty bills getting my passport renewed. That's right, I'm from the land of the home and the free of the brave or however that goes.

In any case the money never arrived from Wintario (of all people) and the holiday was spent waiting for Super Drearies 76. At this point in time (2:00 pm Jan. 4) the NHL hasn't taken a game despite all those who feel that 3-3 ties count as victories.

The Blues did play a little hockey and on Dec. 15 they played very little and lost 5-3 to the Bowling Green State University Falcons. The Falcons are in the NCAA top ten and feature a roster that is well stocked with Canadians. Led by Locals Mike Hartman and Paul Titanic (brother Peter plays for York, cousin Morris plays for Buffalo) Bowling Green outshouted the Blues who had just come back from a two game series against St. Mary's in Nova Scotia. Since my editor wouldn't front the funds necessary to make the trip all

I can say was that the team managed a tie and a loss.

The NFL playoffs are so bad. Right now I'm watching a football game where the score is 3-0 late in the third quarter and a hockey game where Buffalo leads the Marxists 9-4 at the end of two. You figure it out. Oakland looks hopeless and Pittsburgh can't get arrested. The Sabres are involved in a contest that will not win any awards for precision netminding. Sidelnikov became a goalie after he failed geometry. He has no idea what an angle is. There are also rumours that he was thrown out of the army because he couldn't keep his legs together long enough to stand at attention.

What will the new year bring? Predictions aren't my bag but Scarborough will win both divisions of interfac hockey and New won't win a game. End of predictions. One thing I would like to predict would be an upturn in attendance at all sporting events. If you want to fight cutbacks, go out to a game, meet or match and get your mind off essays, tests and grades. Next Blues game is this Friday. — J.G.

SIDELINES... In case any of you have seen the Toronto Lawnmovers play recently, the emergence of Dave Tataryn as a WHA goalie should please all latent Blues fans. Tataryn, who played for the Blues in 71-72 before transferring to Laurentian, was a four time OUAAs all star. His goals against the Blues was 1.75.

Blues Begin New Year in First Place

By MEL RASKIN

Welcome back! The Varsity Hockey Blues are alive and well, and during the Christmas break have climbed to undisputed possession of first place in the OUAAs by virtue of three straight league wins.

On the week-end of December 6-7, Blues had two encounters against the Laurentian Voyageurs in Sudbury. Conference teams play each other 4 times in the revamped schedule, with only the top 3 teams in the OUAAs East and West divisions making the playoffs. So the importance of each win is apparent.

Going into this series, Laurentian and Toronto were tied for first spot with 8 points apiece. For 40 minutes, the first game was a see-saw affair, but in the third period, Blues exploded for 5 goals, and a 9-3 win. The second game, played Sunday afternoon, was a more close-checking encounter, again won by Varsity 3-1. So now the Blues were in first place, 4 points ahead of Laurentian.

On Wednesday, December 10, Blues wound up the first part of the regular season with a game against York in the barn known as the "York Ice Palace." Don't get me wrong — there's nothing (much) wrong with the arena, but the fans who inhabit it... Anyway, the local media was really plugging this match as the continuation of that cross-town rivalry which has always existed between Toronto and York.

But in this instance, the "match of the season," was the mis-match of the season as Blues romped to an 11-2 win. Even the usually optimistic Ian Wasserman of York Radio confided to me that after the game, York coach Dave Chambers could only mutter something about "drastic changes," and "it will be different next time."

Blues fans will be pleased to know that Captain Kent Ruhnke currently leads the OUAAs East in scoring with 11 goals and 5 assists. Kent is certainly one of the most exciting players to watch. His quick rushes and clever moves make him a favourite of the fans, and a threat to the opposition every time he's out on the ice. When Kent doesn't get a goal, you're guaranteed of at least seeing him hit the post.

The second half of the regular season certainly favours the Blues. Eight of their twelve remaining league games are home encounters. And remember, there's an hour's free skating after each game. ALL THIS FOR $1.00 AT THE DOOR. Blues first home game of 1976 will be this Friday at 8:00 against Queen's. Be there.

Athletic Cutbacks

At a recent Internal Affairs committee meeting the Men's Athletic Association brought with them a revised estimate of its 1976-77 budget, amended after a decision that training meals would be eliminated for the basketball, hockey and football teams.

The original budget estimate was $147,000 but the termination of the meals would bring a savings of $24,000 making the revised total a tighter $123,000. A special appropriation would also be made in the expenditure column for the purchase by the rowing club of their first shell at a cost of $6,000.

The Men's Athletic Directorate is also requesting a $10 increase in athletic fees, from $20 to $30. The budgets will be discussed on Jan. 20. Cutbacks are a big issue on campus and the university feels that the estimated $130,000 that an increase in fees would bring is necessary to maintain a small deficit. The revised estimates for 1975-76 show a deficit of $92,814. The Athletic Association already had accumulated a deficit of $47,697 in 1974-75, and is shooting for a surplus of $74,000 next year.

As in all matters involving cutbacks somebody loses. In late November the coaches of the basketball and hockey teams sent letters to members of the Athletic Directorate. Tom Watt of the hockey Blues, wrote a strong letter asking for an explanation of the university's position on Varsity sport, while pointing to the physical necessities of team meals.

According to Watt the problem of the training table is only the "tip of the iceberg", pointing to the need for a full-time trainer and better travel arrangements.

Coach Watt feels that this new stance is contradictory to the original commitment by the university to "excellence". "Perhaps as the Coach, I am working under an illusion that the University of Toronto wants a very good hockey team. . . However, perhaps the time has come to re-evaluate this situation and that if competition is not important to the university, let's take a serious look at the future of the team."

An interesting coincidence in the matter of athletic fees is that the increased revenue is very close to the total rent received by the university in 1973-74 when the Toronto Toros occupied Varsity Arena. The school operated in the black that year with a $98,924 surplus. Apparently pro hockey was good to the university.

With the Toros here the Athletic department didn't have to worry about the slipping attendance at all events that is so evident this year. According to Watt, this is a major problem. In days of yore Blues games were sellouts and the program paid for itself but with an average attendance this year that is less than half of capacity the hockey team is feeling the pinch.

Students suds-slurping will have to wait

By CLAUDE HAWPER

U of T students had better not hold their breath waiting for a full time centralized campus pub.

According to SAC services commissioner Doug Gerhardt the two most likely possibilities are a successful conclusion to further negotiations for existing space with the administration and failing that, construction of a new SAC facility.

Gerhardt said the problem for the last decade has been that SAC has put "all its eggs in one basket", counting on campus centre plans for the formation of a full time student run pub.

And while a pub is still slated as part of Campus as Campus Centre plans before the Governing Council, student governors believe it is unlikely the project will go through in view of the university's financial problems.

Late last year, according to Gerhardt, SAC's alternative request for pub facilities in a building at 16 Hart House Circle now occupied by the School for Graduate Studies were scuttled. A committee allocating space decided to allocate the space to the classics department and the ombudsman, without even considering the SAC proposal.

Another SAC plan ran into opposition from residents of Sir Daniel Wilson residence who objected to the use of a basement common room for a pub. SAC dropped the plan.

Gerhardt said a major reason for the present SAC push was a fear that U of T administration is planning to try and institute its own full time pub, without any student control.

SAC has sent a letter to internal affairs vice-president Frank Iacobucci demanding further negotiations on getting space for the pub. But failing the success of these negotiations, Gerhardt says SAC could begin plans for building its own pub, which would also include a gamesroom. This would be financed by an increase in student fees over 5 or 10 years which would require a referendum.

In any case SAC feels the pub is a strong priority as far as services go on the campus and one which students are very concerned about. A poll done last year surveyed 2,500 students of whom 80 per cent said SAC should get a permanent pub as soon as possible.

Editorial

Two recent events in the SAC office call into question the continued term of office of the current SAC executive.

They are stalling in aiding the Ontario Federation of Students, of which they are a member, in their fight against the government's attack on students living conditions and educational opportunities.

And, despite the increasing need for some sort of student organizing on this campus, the executive is forcing their employees to strike for better working conditions.

In both cases the executive has acted unilaterally. They appear isolated from the real situation at the University of Toronto. They talk only of saving money and maintaining good public relations.

If they are so convinced of the correctness of their position, they had better show more willingness to consult a larger cross-section of the student population than themselves.

Meanwhile thirty thousand undergraduates here are forced to put up with faulty equipment, growing classes and a dwindling choice of courses.

Prove your point or resign.

SAC workers vote to strike soon

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
SAC unionized employees last night voted 6 to 2 in favour of rejecting SAC's latest offer. A strike will commence on January 15 unless an accord is reached.

"If there is a strike, we have no contingency plans, SAC president Gord Barnes said in an interview.

"The SAC office would have to be closed and there would be a restriction on how much work we'd be able to do," Barnes explained.

Both the SAC executive and members of CUPE local 1222 remain firm in their bargaining positions. "Unless they offer some sort of office democracy or some sense of participation here, we'll go on strike," warned John Bennett, the local's chief negotiator.

Barnes indicated no change in SAC's offer is forthcoming. Remaining optimistic the union would capitulate, Barnes said. "I don't think any of them want to go on strike, but some might."

If a strike occurs, most SAC services will cease. It is unclear whether the Varsity newspaper will publish. According to SAC External Commissioner Rob Snell, the council could "show twice as many free films with the money we save."

Reaction was mixed as the results of the vote were revealed. Kevin Kelleher, one of the employees voting on the contract, told the Varsity "they're (CUPE) the most militant union on this campus."

Negotiation began last September before the contract expired. Five or six more meetings followed that, according to Barnes. Conciliation began, but was unsuccessful. "The conciliation process helped get the two sides closer together, though," Barnes said.

Disagreement finally narrowed down to a twenty-dollar difference in starting salary for secretaries, a fifteen dollar difference in starting salary for special projects assistants, and a five dollar difference in starting salary for the Varsity ad manager. The union also requested a free health plan for all employees, which the council refused to implement without corresponding salary reductions. Without including bonuses, which are based on length of employment, SAC salary proposals ranged from $155 to $165 per week, as CUPE proposed an across-the-board starting salary of $170.

Resentment and employee antagonism have already been built up. Finance Commissioner Mike Treacy confirmed that bitterness over the prolonged negotiations soon became evident in their discussions. He cited "the loss of bodies" as the drawback in the event of a strike.

Treacy cited the SAC budget deficit, which in his own estimate is already running at $15,000 as a consideration for SAC's negotiating team. "We don't want to have to increase our SAC fees," he claimed.

SAC won't support demonstration

By MIKE EDWARDS

Local organizers for a planned rally and demonstration against government cutbacks were taken aback by a surprise announcement from SAC president Gord Barnes at a steering committee meeting Monday.

Referring to a SAC letter addressed to the OFS executive, Barnes said SAC is "not willing to put time or money behind a demonstration." However, when contacted an OFS spokesperson said they have yet to receive a copy of the letter.

The demonstration, set for January 21, is preceded by a rally at Convocation Hall. Barnes contends that SAC will organize for the rally but not the demonstration because it would be a "public relations disaster."

However organizers have committed themselves to the demonstration at Queens Park, and students from York, Ryerson, Waterloo, Carleton (Ottawa) and other centres are planning to attend. Many Ontario schools plan to shut down on the day of the demonstration.

The main theme of the rally will be the Henderson report which calls for higher tuition fees and less "special interest" courses.

Nobody seemed concerned" moaned SAC external commissioner Rob Snell, when reporting on a SAC executive-OFS meeting to a regular SAC executive meeting later that night.

"We can distribute without their help," explained an OFS field-worker. "The SAC decision although unfortunate, has very little bearing on the outcome of the demonstration."

When asked about the origin of the SAC position, SAC Finance Commissioner Michael Treacy said it was arrived at by the executive using emergency powers. The position has yet to be considered by the SAC general council. It was endorsed by the executive with only one abstention.

Barnes claimed "There is a fair amount of sentiment" for the SAC position. However when contacted, local student council presidents knew nothing of the rally or the demonstration.

The OFS spokesperson promised a greater organizing effort over the next few weeks. He was enthusiastic about the clear commitment from the U of T's Graduate Student Union and Arts and Science Student Union.

The January 21 date was set last fall at a regular plenary session of OFS. It was to coincide with government student-aid hearings in Toronto.

However, with the release of the Henderson (Special Program Review Committee) report, OFS decided to change the theme of the rally and add a full scale demonstration. The OFS decision was made by emergency plenary last December 15. SAC representatives abstained on the question.

In publicizing the rally SAC has produced yesterday an eight page tabloid, "SAC Special", and plans to produce another one next Tuesday. They also plan to hold a meeting of all student council presidents on January 13. All interested students are invited.

SAC also agreed to hold their next general council meeting on the downtown campus. They had originally intended on holding the meeting on the Erindale campus. "We've got to encourage people to get out to Erindale," said SAC Women's commissioner Shirley French arguing against the move

Jerry Rubin waiting to do it

By CLAIRE TALLARICO

Loyola News

Jerry Rubin, the street radical of the 60's, is no more.

Speaking to a crowd of over 300 Loyola students last Dec. 4 the former radical Yippie delivered a message on "the ideology of sharing."

"We must begin to tell each other our secrets. The moment something is acknowledged, we are free," he said. "Our vulnerability is our best defense."

"The mass movement gave us a mass entity in the 60's. Individuals now realize that they had to find themselves first. We need a psychological and spiritual movement and the spiritual is inside each of us."

"If the individual begins to look at who he really is," Rubin explained, "then he will have his opportunity to find out who he really is."

Rubin stressed the need in the world for love and communication.

"Until you love yourself, you have nothing to offer anyone else," he said. Not being able to share ourselves "we can not free our own personal persons."

Create alternatives

Rubin sees "changing people's consciousness and freeing ourselves from our own personal persons" as the way to "change the political-economic systems."

"In this way, we will be creating alternatives, not in just a political program, and not just a one shot line. This is not the way the system will change. It will change in people, in beings."

While Rubin's audience was attentive in listening to his advocacy of sharing and communication in today's world, during the question and discussion period it was obvious that people wanted to talk about what had happened to the student revolution of the 60's.

"What can we gain by talking about the 60's?" asked Rubin. "Everything that has happened in the 70's was planned in the 60's."

The resignation of Richard Nixon and Spiro Agnew and the Watergate affair were the examples cited by Rubin as the 60's triumph.

"The real revolutionary scare of the 60's," said Rubin, "was the reflection of their (the politicians) own guilt. We were nowhere near as strong or as powerful as they thought we were."

Future Revolution

Rubin believes that a revolution will come again but not a revolution in the same sense as the 60's.

"It's cycles. In the 60's there was a mass upsurge. The 70's are a whole different thing — they have rejected the 60's. The 80's will be a whole new package. It will be the best of the 60's and the 70's."

"The revolution of the 80's will not be restricted to students," said Rubin. "It will expand to the working people and nothing will be able to stop this revolution it will be so massive. But it will be non-violent. It will be a different kind of movement psychologically and spiritually inspired. It will not be rebellion for the sake of rebellion."

In talking about universities Rubin said, "I think that basically universities are prisons. There will be breakouts in the future but not now. Now is the time to use university for everything that you want as an individual."

SAC is looking for part-time typists to participate in a new "SAC Essay Typing Service."

Employment will be on a franchise basis. SAC typewriters (I.B.M. Selectrics) will be available for use in the evenings at the SAC office.

Interested people should apply to the SAC office, 12 Hart House Circle or call 928-4911 for details.

U of T "shopping list" is restricted document

The university doesn't think you should know.

Despite staff reductions, cuts in building maintenance and all the other effects that cutbacks are taking on campus life, the university is preparing to spend slightly more than $4 million on capital projects on the St. George campus, the exact nature of which is currently classified as restricted.

Research and Planning vice-president George Connell last month presented the Resources subcommittee with the list of capital project proposals requiring provincial support for 1976-77. Only those projects termed "high priority" are included in the $4 million figure.

Considering the proposals a "shopping list", the subcommittee recommended they be approved within the limits of funds available, but considered detailed attention to individual projects inadvisable before response from the government.

Subcommittee members were given a list of proposed projects for the St. George, Erindale and Scarboro campuses. Major projects on the St. George campus are listed in order of priority, with additional projects listed without a priority rating.

Listing of proposed projects at Erindale and Scarboro are listed in order of priority, as well as a list of proposed energy management programmes. Health Science facility projects are also listed in order of priority, which would be funded by the Ontario Health Resources Development Plan and would provide approximately 10 million over a period of ten years for Health Science facilities in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin told the subcommittee provincial funding of between two and four million dollars was expected for the high priority St. George projects.

Rankin said approximately $6.5 million was available for the construction of the new Athletic Complex and that about $3.5 million had been guaranteed by the province. He said the project was expected to be up to one million dollars short at this time.

Rankin also detailed a proposal for a high temperature water line to replace the present inadequate and deteriorating line serving the west campus.

From the calendar folks . . .

By CHRISTINE CURLOOK
Ever wonder how Metabolic Enzymology and Control Mechanisms (BCH 423S), Brain Mechanisms in Motivation and Species Specific Behaviour (PSY 345S) and Message, Meaning and Methodology of Literary Expression (FRE 450) get their names?

Well the names are still a bit of a mystery but the course identifiers—the crucial letters and numbers which follow—are now to be determined by a special body set up for just that purpose.

Electrical engineering professor H. W. Smith, chairs the somewhat obscure committee known as the Working Group on Course Identifiers, whose function reside in identifying courses for academic administrative purposes. This includes course sectioning, timetabling, room allocation, program control and the use people are most familiar with, for academic record purposes and in academic calendars and transcripts.

The group concerns itself with the difficulties of complexity in course identification and met during the summer to resolve the intricacies of Canadian Unions", and J. E. C. Robinson, the company representative.

The group proposed restrictions for each component of the identifier. The first component should exist as a three charter alphabetic string denoting the academic unit which has academic responsibility for the activity, they found.

The second component, the group recommends, should denote the identity of the activity within the academic unit and should be a three or four character string. The third component, they say, should be a single letter, denoting the time period of the activity.

The complete identifier must always appear as a seven or eight character string without blanks, thus serving to reduce errors in maintaining accurate student records.

The committee also noted the "unfelicitous" appearance of the inch-long piece of identifier but remarked that its function resides in simpler manageability in preparation of keyable information material for machine records.

The Working Group put forth their recommendation for implementation in 1976-77 but with consideration to those divisions currently using rudimentary course identifiers, they stated it might be necessary to defer implementation until 1977-78 in some cases. The group also found that "No free characters will be permitted," for example widespread use of "Z" to signify pass-fail grading will be eliminated and an alternative method will have to be found for calendar identification.

Artistic organizers charge "intimidation"

By ERIC McMILLAN

"They've waged a two year war against the union and they've won," is how union organizer Laurell Ritchie explained Artistic Woodwork Co.'s recent success in having the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) decertified as bargaining agents for their employees.

Workers at Artistic Woodwork voted 62 to 36 in favour of decertification. Union officials claim the company management instigated the original petition calling for a vote and intimidated workers, many of whom are immigrants, into voting against CTCU membership.

Ritchie pointed out only 19 of the original 110 strikers involved in the bitter and violent strike two years ago at Artistic are still working at the picture frame plant. She claims the loss of union supporters is due to strikers not being hired back, immigrants who did not last out the strike, and workers being fired or pressured to quit in the two years since.

"The vote was rather respectable given what was going on and the balance of forces there," according to Ritchie. She found it "interesting" the original petition listed 85 out of 110 workers wanting a decertification vote, yet the secret balloting showed 36 workers on the side of the union.

Ritchie did not consider the vote "a total defeat" because "there are a lot of lessons here for the citizenry of Toronto."

"There's going to have to be much more organizing among the immigrants in the sweatshops of Toronto and there's going to have to be substantial change in the labour laws in Ontario," said Ritchie.

The CTCU had experienced difficulties with the Labour Relations Board. "The Union feels it ran into problems with the Board as soon as the strike was over," according to a CTCU press release. Section 64 of the Ontario Relations Act was interpreted by the Board as disallowing the re-employment of strikers who did not ask for their jobs back during the strike itself. As a result the company refused to allow nine strikers back to their jobs.

The panel which held the hearings on decertification consisted of three "no" votes against the CTCU, according to the union: George Ferguson, counsel against the CTCU in the 1971 Texpack dispute, H. Simon who "is dedicated to the destruction of the Confederation of Canadian Unions", and J. E. C. Robinson, the company representative.

The CTCU asked for both a rehearing of the petition because it was "clearly Company tainted" and an overhaul of the Labour Relations Board.

So far they have lost on the first point.

Ritchie said the union would not challenge the decertification vote at this point. "We will try to maintain contact (with Artistic workers) but there's not anything we can do at the moment."

Rumors, innuendo, hearsay and notices

Budget Chief George Connell, cornered in Hart House yesterday, said that the U of T's 1976-77 budget, originally expected last year, will not be available for another two weeks. He is working for presentation at the next meeting of the Planning and Resources committee. Connell said that since the committee had fallen slightly behind in its schedule, it was decided that the budget would hold until it was certain what the effect of the university's wage settlement with the faculty would be on the total picture. Wage demands are currently being worked out between faculty association and U of T administration negotiators.

The U of T administration and those working at Information Services about the role of the press. The administration according to the mentioned minutes wants to ensure that priority on any issue will be given to the official administration or Governing Council opinion. People from the Information Services say that the situation is not unfriendly, just "seasonal" discussion on the role of the press. Things seem to be more amicable since the administration stopped doing last-minute revisions of the weekly.

The Varsity, as well as being short of contributors, will shortly be in need of a layout editor. Eric Schryver, head of the Dutch-Canadian Mence, will be leaving soon. The job requires a good eye for newspaper form and an ability to deal with mathematical formulae. A slight stipend is offered for your trouble. Come up and see us some time on the second floor of 91 St. George St.

The Law School Committee Against Racism is sponsoring a film showing tomorrow of "To Live in Freedom," a film that is both anti-Zionist and anti-Arab nationalist, produced by Israeli Jews. It will be shown at 1 p.m. in the Moot Court, Flavell House, Faculty of Law. It will be followed by discussion.

A certain member of the Varsity staff has been searching high and low for a badminton partner and has been bending the editorial board's ear because there is no place for said person to advertise this need free of charge. Don't say we never did nothing for nobody. If you want to play, come to 91 St. George St.

Dangerous radicals exposed!

At last we've discovered the real revolutionaries at the university. All this time spent in the last few years chasing the SDS and assorted acronyms was wasted. The true revolutionaries are the people marking your papers and instructing you in the classroom. Yes, the faculty.

At last the Globe and Mail has had the courage to expose the pink menace within our ranks. In a brilliant piece last week on the transience of the student movement (penned by a former Varsity editor now working for the Globe), it was discovered that the students are sleeping and all the boring work within is being accomplished by the teaching staff at the university.

And a compelling load of hokey it was, too. "The student movement? Dead as a doornail," says professor Bill Nelson, whom the Globe notes as an activist in the 1950's in the United States. But let's be serious—twenty years later and a few parallels further north our radical friend did his bit to cause democratization of this university as head of the U of T Faculty Association. So what's an activist?

Nelson says that students were more endearing when they were questioning the basic value of the university within the capitalist system. He says that he quite agreed with them, but that he thought their goals unattainable. Presumably he likes them less now that they're attacking not what the university serves, but how it's run.

Something is being obscured. The leader of the most entrenched faculty inside the most elitist university in this country is sitting student leaders that they're not radical enough. Something doesn't sit quite properly.

When the student radicals were talking about the system and how the university is a tool, one of the things they were attacking the most was the fact that the structure of the university was parallel to and as oppressive as the general structure of society. In attempting to change the university, they came up against a series of walls erected by people exactly like Bill Nelson. It is indeed true that a few years later many have said "bugger this business" and moved on to greener pastures, but if Bill Nelson is going to sit in his office and say that this happened despite his admonitions to students that "if they wanted a revolution, they were going to win it in the streets," you shouldn't believe it.

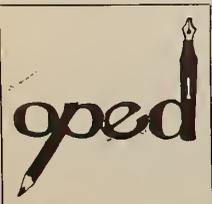

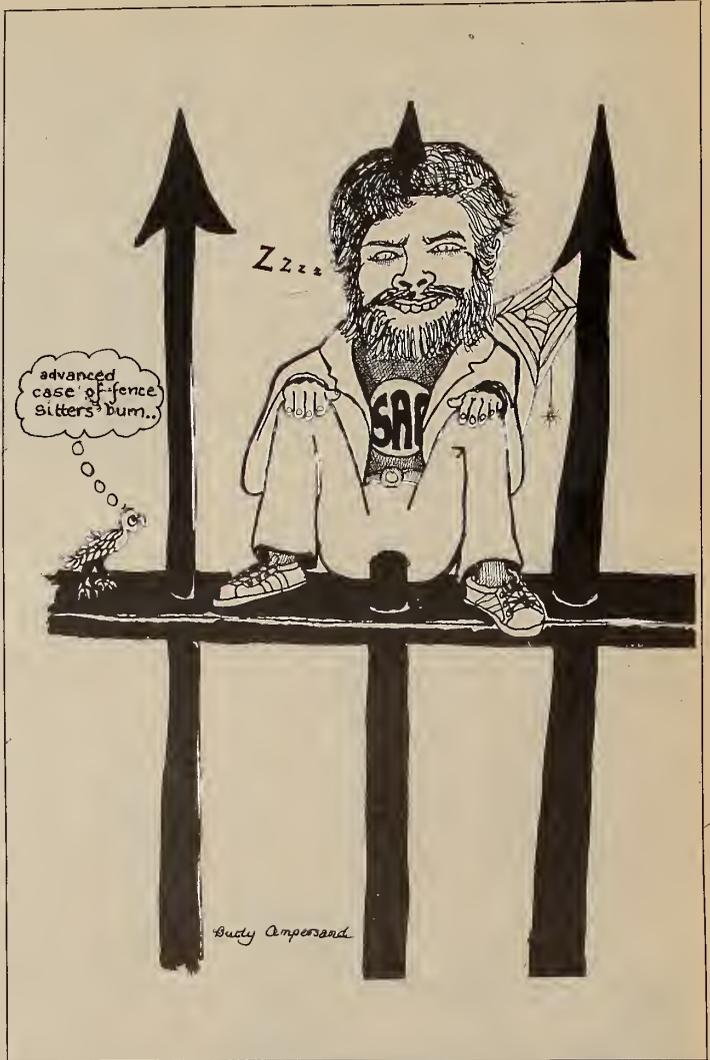

Another faculty heavy, John Crispo, who recently engaged with Nelson in a struggle of the titans on the subject of faculty unionization, stated in the same article that "they're only interested in the mechanics of the system. They never question the system itself." This harkens back to the belief that students were lovable when they were out on the streets decrying imperialism. Now that they're in the committee rooms raising a little trouble, their level of political involvement is "pathetic." Of all the self-serving nonsense ever uttered, that just about takes the prize.

The trouble is that the public may buy this nonsense since they read it in the Goat and Snail. The article goes a long way towards misrepresenting why the situation is as they say it is. It's quite true that that which used to be called in the broadest sense "the student movement" is not up to its old strength or vibrancy, but to give the impression that these faculty members are weeping over that is quite misleading. A part of the responsibility for the demise goes to those who obstructed the changes the student movement wanted first inside the university, and equally to those who did not obstruct the obstruction.

Much of the picture is correct. It is indeed surprising and quite heartening that activism has been taken up by the workers and the faculty on campus. Both groups working together could stir things up to the point where the government could actually become aware that things are not right here. It is also true that survival is now more of an important issue than the university's service to the capitalist system. But certainly it can't be overlooked that much of the reason survival is an issue in the universities is due to the bonds between education and economics. The system is falling apart, and the universities with it. To infer that students aren't aware of that, though, is quite wrong.

The reporter certainly did have the Student's Administrative Council pegged. The picture is rather demoralizing. SAC is unable to come up with coherent policies on the issues of primary importance and has managed to frustrate (with a little repeated help from The Varsity) any attempt at bringing strength to a movement to ensure that there is enough financial oxygen to keep us alive.

One good quote: "But on a short-term basis, closing the university wouldn't be a national disaster." Where have we heard that before?

The following piece was prepared by members of the Committee Against Racism. Unsatisfied with the recent decision in the case of Henry Fong, they have prepared detailed responses based on documentary and spoken evidence given at Fong's hearing. This is the first of two parts.

The adverse decision in the Henry Fong case by the Governing Council's Subcommittee on Academic Appeals represents a direct threat to every student of the University of Toronto. The Subcommittee's judgement includes:

"It is easy to allege that racial prejudice has affected the judgment made about an individual. Such allegations must, however, be substantiated. This can be done in various ways. Sometimes, for example, a prejudiced person will admit the fact of the prejudice and its impact upon his or her judgment. Sometimes the fact that a particular individual harbours prejudice can be established in other ways, and the inference that is affected the individual's judgment may be drawn."

But the judgment does not describe any other way that a charge of racism could be substantiated! So if you are failed because of racial prejudice you had better get a confession from those responsible — nothing less will be considered significant evidence by this Subcommittee. If you are unjustly failed because of personal bias against you, don't bother to appeal — even strong evidence together with a virtual confession will not induce this Subcommittee to give you another chance.

The twelve page decision in the Fong case makes no honest attempt to deal with the evidence of Fong's competence or with the evidence of racial and personal discrimination.

The Evidence of a "Climate of Racism"

The Subcommittee's decision states:

"To establish that a 'climate of racism' existed at the Faculty of Medicine during the crucial time when Mr. Fong was being assessed, evidence of statements made and reported in the press, letters to the editors of various publications and an observation made in the Provincial Legislature, was tendered. This evidence reflected the view that in a Faculty to which access is limited, too many places might be going to foreign-born students to the detriment of applicants born in Canada. Since the only significant group of foreign-born students in the Faculty appears to be of Chinese origin, any policy based on these views would most certainly have its greatest impact on that group. One of the assumptions underlying this view is that cultural differences make it undesirable for an inordinate proportion of medical doctors (and hence an inordinate proportion of medical students) to be drawn from a particular (Chinese) group. The theory seems to be that medical doctors of one cultural background are not capable of adequately treating, or would not be accepted by patients of another cultural background. Another assumption seems to be that immigrants with the intelligence and ability to graduate in medicine from a Canadian university do not have the ability to communicate adequately with other Canadians whose cultural backgrounds may be different. The Subcommittee rejects these views, whether they be racist, xenophobic, or simply wrong. More important from the point of view of this appeal, however, is that these views were expressed by a handful of individuals, only some of whom were in any way associated with the University of Toronto."

This part of the decision is peculiar. The written material referred to explicitly talks about students of Chinese origin repeatedly and specifically; it is ridiculous to make it appear incidental that "any policy based on these views would most certainly have its greatest impact on that group." Even more absurd is the statement that "these views were expressed by a handful of individuals". This is the basis on which the Subcommittee could find the expression of these views irrelevant to Fong's appeal and could go on to say:

"That some people were complaining about too many places in the Faculty going to foreign students would seem to suggest that far from being a pervasively racist institution, it was altogether too even-handed to suit some people."

What the decision omits is the fact that the "handful" about whom definitive evidence was presented includes the then president of the Canadian Medical Association and the Dean of the Faculty of Medicine, as well as other members of the Faculty of Medicine, and that each referred to many colleagues who agreed with them. Moreover, on the basis of these "racist, xenophobic, or simply wrong" views the Faculty of Medicine changed its admission procedures in a major respect by introducing "communications interviews", and has voted to change it entirely by introducing "subjective components" into the admissions scheme! These changes show that it was "too even-handed to suit" a controlling group of faculty, and Fong's expulsion took place in the "climate" in which these admission changes took place. Here's how the Subcommittee describes another piece of evidence:

"One further item on the general issue of prejudice deserves comment. This is a letter dated 17 July, 1974 from a psychiatrist, himself of Chinese extraction, to Dr. Llewellyn-Thomas. It was said to be a response to the concern expressed to the Board of Medical Assessors by Dr. Steiner about the possible development of emotional problems of Chinese students. The suggestion is made that "preventive medicine" in the form of "one or more preliminary psychiatric examinations" might be helpful. This suggestion was regarded as unacceptable, a view with which the Subcommittee is in complete agreement. Nevertheless, the suggestion appears to be motivated by a concern for the welfare of Chinese students rather than by racist views."

The above quotation is coherent only because the Subcommittee left out the phrase "or rule out some, if any, who are emotionally unsuitable for enrollment into the Faculty" from their summary of the letter. How can the suggestion that there be a special psychiatric screening of students of Chinese origin with the possibility of ruling out "unsuitable" candidates be motivated by concern for the welfare of Chinese students? The Subcommittee states "this suggestion was regarded as unacceptable", but doesn't state by whom. Perhaps they meant by the Committee Against Racism. They certainly could not have meant Medical Faculty Associate Dean E. Llewellyn-Thomas, who responded to the suggestion by writing "the need for some preventive medicine along the lines you suggest is becoming important."

One of the most startling pieces of evidence of a "climate of racism" in the Faculty of Medicine was Associate Dean Steiner's admission that he had told the Medical Post:

"Our staff have complained that we are admitting increasing numbers of students who can't speak English. So we said all right, name them. The names came back and they were nearly all Chinese names. When we looked at these people we found among them many who were in fact born in Canada, who had gone through their entire schooling here."

Dean Steiner admitted under cross-examination that the students he was referring to spoke perfect English, and had apparently been reported by Faculty of Medicine staff as having inadequate language ability solely because they had Chinese last names. He stated that there were around a dozen such students reported by Dr. Loach, the Period II co-ordinator in the Faculty of Medicine. Dr. Steiner said that he had made no investigation to determine which faculty members had reported such names, and that it was quite possible that they included some of Fong's instructors.

Incredibly, the Subcommittee on Academic Appeals does not mention this important evidence at all, perhaps because it is impossible to see how any misquoting or distortion could cover up the fact that it is compelling evidence of racism against Chinese students in the Faculty.

Further evidence of the "climate of racism" was presented by Dr. William Cheng, who testified that there was a widespread feeling among medical students that there was discrimination against those of Chinese background. In particular, Dr. Cheng testified that many students felt that clinical teams that consisted largely of students of Chinese background got very little attention from certain instructors.

The evidence mentioned above of the "climate of racism" against students of Chinese origin is substantial. Henry Fong is the only student ever forcibly withdrawn from the final year of medicine in the history of the University of Toronto, and Henry Fong is of Chinese origin. On this basis alone Henry Fong's expulsion should be opposed and reversed, and, in fact, the Canadian Party of Labour and the Committee Against Racism took up the case on this basis. As support for Fong's appeal mounted, the medical school was forced to reveal more and more information which became evidence to strengthen the allegations of racial discrimination.

Direct Evidence of Racism against Fong

One letter in Henry Fong's file states:

"Dear Dr. Steiner:

RE: Henry Fong

This clinical clerk did the Ambulatory Care Block at the Toronto General Hospital in the first Rotation. Double-checking with the people responsible, the only comment was that, in this first rotation, the role was a passive one. The only positive comment was that he did attend regularly.

As an aside, his sister attended the clinic as a patient. She was distressed on being asked to disrobe for examination. She left and did not return.

I would agree that ethnic and cultural differences do not include dishonesty."

Why is there a reference to Mr. Fong's sister, Miss Fong, in a letter reporting on Henry's performance? The judgment of the Subcommittee says:

"Miss Fong's evidence put this incident in an altogether different light, but again, assuming a complete misunderstanding of the situation on the part of the clinician, it does not follow that any element of racial prejudice was involved. Physicians (and others) have been known to misunderstand the behaviour of people of all races."

The Subcommittee appears to have missed the point — whether or not Miss Fong was misunderstood, why is there any reference to it in evaluating Henry? Henry had nothing to do with his sister's examination.

Dr. Steiner was asked during cross-examination if the writer was agreeing with him about "ethnic and cultural differences", and he said "no." Dr. Steiner was asked what that sentence about "ethnic and cultural differences" meant and with whom it was agreeing, and he said that he didn't know and had not thought to investigate, although the letter was addressed to him.

Dr. Steiner also claimed to not know what was meant when another of Fong's instructors wrote to him:

"In view of the nature of the comments and judgements concerning Mr. Fong, I believe that his performance during the one week spent at the Princess Margaret Hospital should be totally ignored when a decision is made concerning his continuation in the clerkship."

(Henry Fong had passed the rotation at Princess Margaret.)

Even before Fong's expulsion in November, 1974, the Canadian Party of Labour had predicted that the attack on Chinese Medical students would lead to expulsions at the Medical school. (See The Worker, Vol. 6, No. 19, Oct. 19, 1974.) The expulsions could then be used to justify racist theories already circulating about Chinese students and to justify a discriminatory admissions policy.

During the appeal the medical school finally released one of the main pieces of evidence against Henry Fong, a letter by the Physician-in-chief, Dr. Marotta, which stated that Fong's pass in Medicine (one of the most important rotations) should be ignored. The letter also states:

"It is not my intention to go into the admission requirements for the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Toronto, but as one looks over Henry Fong's file it becomes apparent that there is a recurring theme of shyness, lack of ability to communicate, lack of appreciation of the idiom of the language, quietness, reserve, etc.

Certainly this boy would be reason enough to reinstate the interview system.

Realizing all the pitfalls and variable assessments by different interviewers, nonetheless, one finds it difficult to conceive that this type of personality and this lack of ability to communicate would not be universally recognized

This letter of Dr. Marotta's gives the clearest statement of why Henry Fong was thrown out of medical school within a few months of his M.D. — some medical school professors thought he had the wrong "type of personality" for a doctor. These professors think that people who are "shy" and have "lack of appreciation of the idiom of the language" should not be allowed into Medical School, and to emphasize their point they demanded that Henry Fong be thrown out.

The Subcommittee's finding on Dr. Marotta's letter is:

"In light of these views, that Henry has some communication difficulties, it is difficult to see how Dr. Marotta can be accused of racial prejudice in concluding that an interview might have prevented Henry Fong from gaining admission to the Faculty."

Perhaps it should be emphasized that Dr. Marotta was not on trial for racism; Henry Fong was on trial for his career. Such evidence as the above letter would force any fair committee to give Henry Fong another attempt at completing his M.D.

There is another piece of direct evidence of racism against Henry Fong. Dr. A. Hudson, the Period III co-ordinator (i.e., the person in charge of all 4th year medical

"Dear Dr. Llewellyn-Thomas:

I have spent an hour and a quarter with Fong, Mrs. Fong and Miss Fong.

Basically a repetition: mother complaining loudly for the entire hour, during which Henry said three words. Eventually I told Henry, in front of his mother, that he had to become a man before he became anything else and that he would have to leave home and escape the pathological domination by his mother. I suggested a career in a pharmaceutical laboratory and told him that I would try to help him get a job. Henry seems determined to carry on with Medicine and I, therefore, said that Hong Kong seemed the only alternative. Mother replied that she did not wish to take the family back to Hong Kong, and I was forced, once again, to point out to her that we were discussing Henry's medical career, and not hers. I told her that I felt Henry was a big boy now and that he could travel to Hong Kong by himself."

Remember that Henry is a Canadian citizen who came to Canada with his family more than ten years ago. If Henry was a black man and he'd been told "Africa seems the only alternative", there are few people who would not agree that his expulsion must be considered invalid. Whatever Dr. Hudson's motives may have been, the view of Mr. Fong as a Chinese person who should go back to Hong Kong to study is certainly prejudicial against Mr. Fong. Perhaps this view is the reason that, as Dr. Cheng testified, Dr. Hudson's name comes up often in students' discussions of faculty prejudice against Chinese students.

GRADUATE STUDENTS DIVISION IV

Ballots have been mailed to voters in the current by-election to fill seats representing Division IV on the Council of the School of Graduate Studies.

Any student registered in Division IV (Life Sciences) who has not received a ballot may obtain one at the School of Graduate Studies, 65 St. George Street, Room 102.

The by-election closes at 4:00 p.m., Wednesday, January 14, 1976.

Toronto college faces $½-million deficit

By PAUL HILL
The Seneca-Inquirer

Seneca College expects a $510,000 deficit this year because of escalating educational costs and changes in the government's financial policy for colleges and universities.

Dick Kirkup, assistant director of Administrative Services for Seneca College, says the government, which used to subsidize the College on a students per capita basis, now supports it through a global financing plan. The new plan increases the previous year's figure by 1 per cent rather than paying a fixed sum to the College for each student who enrolled, which used to be the practice.

The deficit, the first ever experienced by the College, is causing restrictions to be placed on all campus budgets. Mr. Kirkup said one of the more obvious results of the squeeze will be the implementation of parking fees for all members of the College.

Without gaining the expected revenue of $93,105 to offset the $92,740 cost of parking maintenance and security, the College deficit would exceed $600,000.

In a memo from the President to members of the Administration, college cutbacks were listed along with suggestions to the deans as to how to further reduce expenses.

Some of the effects of the College cutbacks:

The reduction of two periods a week for all diploma students.

The termination of one two-year class.

The reduction of five to four periods a week for some students.

The reduction of custodian and support staff to be replaced by part-time employees when necessary.

Kirkup said, "It is a choice on cutting back on the existing programs, laying off faculty or secretaries, or having people double-up on their work."

Alvin Curling, assistant director of Student Affairs, said the reductions in College budgets have resulted in Student Affairs' administrative services being reduced by half.

One College source said finances have been wasted on unproductive functions and students were allowed easy entry into College programs because they represent additional funds. Now, student enrolment will be more difficult in order to make sure monies are used effectively.

Seneca plans to build an olympic swimming pool costing an estimated $7.7 million. Kirkup said the pool's construction will have no effect on the deficit because the money would be acquired through grants or cost-sharing programs with provincial or municipal governments.

Kirkup said Seneca's financial future will depend on the "philosophy of Queen's Park and the Ministry of Colleges and Universities."

Rubber, leather freaks excited

By BARRY BLACKBURN
Ryersonian

Ryerson Fashion student Sue Ann Chousky has been commissioned to design costumes for a sado-masochist festival this spring.

At the end of March or the beginning of April, 1976, there is planned a sado-masochist festival to be held at the Centre for Experimental Art and Communications at their new location, 86 John St.

"This festival is going to be a tongue-in-cheek look at leather," says Ms. Chousky. "There will be collages and art mediums, paintings, and a video movie on toilet training. Also included is a fashion show which I'm doing of rubber fashions (jumpsuits) and cocktail vests."

Related to fashion, sado-masochism is restricting and must allow for the proper equipment to be used. The bare essentials must show making the most use of the skin, she says.

Ms. Chousky gets her ideas for the fashion designs from "my imagination, experience and dirty novels," but she added that she hasn't tried out any of her sado-masochist designs.

When asked why the grotesque is appealing to sado-masochists Ms. Chousky says "It brings out the best in them."

"Basically, I'm just designing the collection and I have some grotesque ideas for them. They gave me a commission, and my love for designing will go to any limits."

The true story

By JOSE PEREZ

December 29 marked the eighty-fifth anniversary of the massacre of most of a band of 350 Sioux Indians at Wounded Knee Creek on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota.

That 1890 massacre was the culmination of nearly three decades of all-out war during which the United States sought to dispossess, subjugate, and if possible physically eliminate the Indians living on the Great Plains.

Wounded Knee marked the end of Indian freedom in the United States. Since then Indians have been brutally oppressed. In recent years there has been a new round of Indian struggles against that oppression, symbolized by the 1973 occupation of Wounded Knee.

The causes of the 1860-1890 conflicts were economic and social. The rulers of the United States wanted the land. Intertwined with this economic question was a social conflict, which accounts for the savagery of the U.S. government's campaign.

The United States and the Indian tribes had totally different and incompatible social systems. The United States was a developing capitalist industrial country. The Indians lived in pre-class society, a form of primitive communism.

The United States was deeply divided into different social classes. Those who owned the factories and mines hired as workers the millions of others who had no wealth. The land was divided into privately owned farms.

For the Indians, on the other hand, "own" the source of livelihood of the whole community was unthinkable.

To enforce the rule of the rich over the poor, the United States maintained standing armies, cops, courts, and prisons. The Indians had no comparable institutions, having no need for them.

In the years following the Civil War, the expanding capitalist economy pushed westward.

But the tribes could not match the United States. Outnumbered and outgunned, the Indians succumbed to the genocidal war waged from Washington.

To justify and promote this genocide, an ideology of anti-Indian racism was developed. Indians were depicted as subhuman, bloodthirsty savages who deserved to be wiped out. Massacres of Indians were billed as heroic military victories, and the butchers who carried them out, such as Gen. George Custer, became national heroes.

By the 1880s the Indians were desperate. Hemmed more and more into small reservations, dependent on corrupt government officials for food, persecuted when they tried to maintain their original life-style, the Indians had no way out.

In those years a Paiute man named Wovoka started the Ghost Dance religion. It was a combination of Christian and Indian beliefs that held that in the spring of 1891, white people and their works would be wiped off the earth. It would be a new world, and the Indians' ancestors and the buffalo would return. All Indians could be in the new world if they did the Ghost Dance.

Wovoka told his followers not to fear reprisals from whites. By wearing Ghost Shirts, no harm could touch them—not even the bullets of the U.S. Army.

The Ghost Dance religion swept the plains tribes like wildfire. Government officials viewed the new belief with apprehension.

Orders went out to arrest "fomenters of disturbances" and to stamp out the Ghost Dance. The army moved troops to Pine Ridge to implement this policy. Because of this campaign, a Minneconjou Sioux chief named Big Foot led a band of several hundred off the reservation.

On December 15, 1890, government agents went to arrest Sitting Bull, the respected leader of the Hunkpapa band of Sioux. During a scuffle the agents gunned him down, and his band dispersed, some joining Big Foot's group.

But when Big Foot heard the news of Sitting Bull's death, he decided it would be safer to go back to Pine Ridge than get attacked by soldiers. He started out in that direction with 350 others.

On December 28, Big Foot's band spotted U.S. cavalry approaching. His group immediately surrendered, not wanting trouble, and they were escorted to a cavalry camp at Wounded Knee Creek.

There the Indians were told where to camp. They were surrounded by 600 soldiers and four powerful Hotchkiss cannons, which could hurl explosive charges two miles. These rapid-fire guns were set up on a hill, so that their fire could rake across the length of the Indian camp.

The following morning, the cavalry ordered Big Foot's band to give up their weapons. Many arms were brought forward. But the soldiers, not satisfied, ransacked the tepees and brought out axes, knives, and tent stakes. Then the soldiers told the Indians to remove their blankets and be searched for weapons. Only two rifles were found.

What happened next is disputed. The army claimed an Indian fired the first shot. According to most Indians, the troops simply started shooting.

After a few moments of confusion, the four Hotchkiss cannons opened up, firing nearly a shell a second, shredding tepees and people with shrapnel.

When the massacre ended, Big Foot and most of his people were dead or wounded. Some 153 were known dead, but many others wounded crawled away to die elsewhere. Twenty-five soldiers also died, most of them from their own bullets and shrapnel. The dead soldiers became heroes, and were awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Forty years later, Black Elk, an Oglala Sioux holy man who had witnessed the massacre, described what it meant in the religious terms of his people:

"I did not know then how much was ended. When I look back now from this high hill of my old age, I can still see the butchered women and children lying heaped and scattered all along the crooked gulch as plain as when I saw them with eyes still young. And I can see that something else died there in the bloody mud, and was buried in the blizzard. A people's dream died there.

Players show refs don't

By JONATHAN GROSS
Imagine the chagrin of this reporter when he discovered that the big Vic-Sr. Engineering game would be just an exhibition contest. Apparently the referees didn't show up. The scheduled officials were McLeod and Zimmerman and when we went to print they were unavailable for a comment nor were they around for the bruising that the two teams were planning.

Anyways the two teams played some inspired hockey for twenty-five minutes of exhibition play with Vic coming out on top 2-0. Last year's Jennings Cup winners have had their troubles this year, occupying fourth place in their division. With Mike Hunt and Jamie Carroll recovering from injuries the team has been lacking scoring punch.

John Richmond, who doubles as manager for the Blues has missed two games this year, both of them losses for Vic. A bright spot has been the goaltending of Scott Czumrik whose average is the best in the league.

Skule has been a surprise this year, being just one point shy of first place with a game at hand. Coach Mike Kolanko points to better team spirit. Leading scorer for the engineers is Bob Russell.

The goal scorers for Vic were Langely and Anderson. Both goals were set up by some superior passing. Team captain Nat Findlay, presently involved in a law suit against a Dents player over the loss of several incisors, outraced a Skule defenseman for a puck and found Langely unmolested for the pass. Shamie did the same for Anderson but on the other wing. No date has been announced for the rematch.

In other action yesterday SMC B, currently riding a three game winning streak after dropping their first four, downed a slumping Jr. Engineering team. Bob Richards, who scored the lone Skule goal in the 3-1 loss commented, "If more guys had shown up we could've won." Bob Russell of Sr. Engineering voiced a similar complaint although his team is playing well. Since most of their classes are during the day the Engineers have trouble attending these lunchtime contests.

Scoring for SMC were Steve Warlow, Dave Boote and Larry Hoo. Sebastian Carubia sparked in the nets for the winners.

On Monday there were a few games of relative importance. One of very little importance featured the loss leaders of New against the Druggists. Pharmacy bageled the Hockey Harlequins 8-0. The only offense New could muster was two penalties. Richie Shaw was proud of his two shots on goal. Edwards and Tierney each scored two for Pharmacy.

UC II hammered Management Studies 7-1. B. O'Connor scored a pair while R. Amamoto had four assists. Emmanuel found grace in a 6-3 win over the Merry Minstrels of Mirth. For A. stayed awake longer than this reporter and managed a 2-2 nondecision with Law.

Students Discover T'ai Chi Ch'uan

Should you chance to wander past the fencing room at Hart House on a Monday evening, you'll probably notice from 20-30 students and faculty going through an unusual series of connected exercises known as T'ai Chi Ch'uan.

T'ai Chi is of ancient Chinese origin which, according to one account, was developed by Chang San-Feng sometime in the 12th or 13th century A.D. In all likelihood he was a Taoist whose ruling aim lay in the search for the secret of immortality. He used this exercise for its therapeutic benefits; both mental and physical. Later, it was applied to the art of self-defence from which sprang the martial arts of Judo, Kung Fu, and Aikido.

T'ai Chi consists of a set of intimately connected movements lasting some 20-30 minutes. The movements incorporate a series of Yin and Yang stances done in slow motion and with perfect continuity. Every part of the body is involved in T'ai Chi. At the same time one must try to unify all bodily functions and motions into one harmonious movement. All of the movements trace an arc of a circle. Relaxation, balance, and centering are also essential aspects, together with deep rhythmical breathing.

T'ai Chi builds energy, while in most activities and Western forms of exercise we lose energy and feel exhausted. It strengthens and maintains the cardio-vascular system, keeps the joints healthy and flexible, makes the reflexes sharp, and it stimulates the need for movement, thus acting as a catalyst for further health.

The most noticeable effect of T'ai Chi is its calming effect. Part of the reason for this is that it demands absolute concentration while all other cares and worries are pushed aside for the moment. It is a psychologically directed exercise and so every movement is intention, not mechanical.

The classes, which are instructed by Mrs. T. Kotowitz, are held on Monday evenings starting Jan. 12, from 7-9 pm. Tickets must be obtained at the programme office at Hart House. For additional information contact Joe Smolders at 921-4806.

Gymnastics, Fencing, X-Country

On Saturday December 13 the Varsity Gym team competed against teams from Canada and the United States at the York Invitational Gymnastics Meet.

The calibre of the competition was very high as spectators were treated to a display by some of Canada's finest gymnasts, including three members of the national team. The Toronto team has a lot of experience and depth this year, and although they were off their form at this meet they made a strong finish.

This year's edition includes Brian Euler, John Fair, Chester Makischuk, John Kelly, Arthur Bowman and Ron Collins. The team has great expectations for the rest of the season, and should have no difficulty in retaining its position as second in Ontario.

On December 6 the preliminaries were held for Ontario Winter Games to be held in February. Two U of T fencers won positions, enabling them to be registered in the Ontario Winter Game finals to be held in Sault Ste. Marie on February 13, 14, 15 and 16.

Elgin McMurchy took second place in epee and achieved a silver medal. Alec Vezer took third place in epee and achieved a bronze medal. McMurchy and Vezer will be the only two U of T fencers at the games.

The cross-country ski season got off to a promising start for the U of T this past Sunday in Midland. In their first race this winter the team placed six skiers in the top 10 of the senior men's category.

The 15 km race required 3 laps of a demanding 5 km loop. Conditions were near perfect, cool temperatures and a well prepared track on a base of fresh powder snow, for this, the Midland Annual Race, sponsored by the Southern Ontario Division.

The team is using this and future zone races to prepare for the University Championship race on February 7-8th.

Over the Christmas break a 6-day training camp was held at Camp Hollyburn near Rosseau in the Muskoka District, to tone up technique and improve conditioning for this strenuous sport. Its success is evident with the fine showing in Sunday's race.

OISE to be phased out says Henderson Report

By BOB COLLIER

If Premier Davis follows through with the recommendations of the Henderson Report, the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) will be downgraded into a contract research adjunct of the university.

The report goes so far as to suggest OISE functions should be transferred to U of T's Faculty of Education and that the building be sublet.

These suggestions are contained in the Report of the Special Program Review — the infamous Henderson Report — which was tabled at Queen's Park just before Christmas. It contains the recommendations of a six man committee which was instructed to find ways for the Ontario government to save money.

This is the committee that wants to raise tuition fees to $70 a year. OISE's reputation for extravagance appears to have irked the committee who drew up the report. They note that the Ontario government lavished almost $12 million on OISE last year, of which building rental alone cost $2.2 million.

The other $9.8 million was spent on postgraduate studies and on various basic research projects. One of these was aimed at finding better methods of teaching elementary school children and another was investigating individualization of students in the school system.

All of the above will disappear within three years if the Henderson Report is approved.

The committee has decided that OISE's postgraduate students should be moved down Bloor Street to the Faculty of Education "to allow for a greater interchange of information and ideas" and that basic research should be phased out.

In line with the trend slowly spreading among government granting agencies everywhere, the committee feels that basic research is not relevant to the immediate needs of Ontario's teachers. Instead of awarding a blanket research grant to OISE every year, it suggests that research projects should be paid for individually, by contract, and their value should be assigned "in the context of ministry and government priorities."

The committee also downgrades the value of postgraduate degrees. It notes that highly qualified teachers cost the school boards more money than those with minimal qualifications but probably aren't worth the extra wage in teaching effectiveness.

OISE's director Dr. Clifford Pitt, disputed the committee's recommendations when interviewed yesterday.

He noted the sole aim of the committee was to find ways of saving money for the government and not to judge the merits of the institutions concerned.

He added, "The members of the committee seem to think we spend all of our grants on pure research. That's simply not true. We're committed to practical work. I'm a practical school person myself."

He noted that the block grant received from the Ministry of Education is used for a great many purposes other than research.

"Fully a third of the money is used for the dissemination and implementation of our findings," he said. "We have nine field development centres around the province whose job is to persuade teachers to use the results of our research."

This building rents for $2.2 million. Phase it out and sublet suggests gov't report.

The rest of the money is used for applied research in education, according to Pitt. He described some of the projects that OISE has initiated over the last few years.

"We have developed a tremendously successful program which teaches remedial mathematics to community college students by computer," he explained. "It has worked so well that the drop-out rate has fallen from 60 per cent every year to only ten per cent. And more than 80 per cent of the students pass."

Other projects at OISE have researched French immersion programmes for kindergarten pupils, women's studies, ways of improving the thinking ability of children and the benefits of the credit system.

"The applications of our research are tremendous," he exclaimed.

Pitt was highly critical of the committee's desire to phase out blanket research funding. "We need freedom to research without any political strings," he argued. "In the past we have done research that has been critical of ministry policies. This will be more difficult if they pay for each research project individually."

Pitt's attitude to a merger with U of T's Faculty of Education was "definitely negative." "If the government wants to spend money on education," he said, "they're better off giving it to us." He noted that Simcoe Hall skims off the top third of the Faculty of Education's (FEUT) grants to pay for the university's central administration.

Independence from the university has many other benefits, said Pitt. For instance, OISE can set its own admission policies and admit highly motivated older students even though they don't have the marks to get into university.

And we can maintain our excellent standards of research, he said. "People don't realize the expertise we have available. We're one of the top six educational institutions in North America and the Canadian pacemaker in educational research."

FEUT, on the other hand, is quite willing to take OISE for its own.

J. W. Gregg, the co-ordinator of Educational Theory, describes the proposed merger as "an organizational relationship."

He was keen to bring graduate students to the teachers college because "the interaction between grads and undergrads is mutually beneficial."

TA's seek undergrad support

By LEA RYAN

The Graduate Associates Association (GAA) had begun the countdown to the end of the month, the date at which the conciliator appointed by the Ontario Labour Relations Board meets with both the GAA and the administration, over their current contract dispute.

Leafletting all over campus began yesterday in order to inform undergraduates why the GAA's fight is also theirs, according to staff representative Diane Moesser.

The second objective of the leafletting was to prepare the campus for the upcoming fight, said Moesser. "Graduate students are certainly sorting out ways and means to fight back most effectively, in the event the proposals are unacceptable."

Moesser outlined the areas which the GAA considers crucial, and on which they have received no acceptable response from the university administration. These include job security, hours of work, class size, union security, check-off and wages. "These are the substantive issues in front of the GAA, and we certainly want to make sure they are dealt with well," she stressed.

Moesser went on to say the GAA was hoping either for clear agreement out of the two upcoming meetings on the 28th and 30th of this month or for clarity on the basic issues dividing the administration from the GAA.

"When the upshot is clear, the membership will be presented with the results and we'll decide where to go from there, what we feel about the decisions and what should be done," Moesser said.

She pointed out the interim period is being spent preparing the legal and technical aspects of the contract, so that the substantive issues, which the administration sees as the last things to be dealt with, will be ready to be dealt with.

Moesser explained the administration's seeming reluctance to deal with these issues as a result of their reluctance to deal with any issues which will ensure the tutorial system.

"The tutorial system is a scapegoat for cutbacks. The administration wants to maintain arbitrary powers for themselves and not make any commitments to maintaining the tutorial system. That's why they won't deal with the number of jobs, job security, small class size, or establish any kind of principle around which jobs are established."

"At the same time departments are organizing while waiting the outcome of conciliation to prepare people for a fight if the results of the conciliation report are unacceptable," she said. "We must have guaranteed job security, hours-of work, limits on class size and a rational method of hiring and firing."

CRTC faced with 9 contenders

By PAUL McGRATH

With nine applicants vying for the three open spots on the Toronto-area FM dial, Monday's hearing of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission to decide the lucky winners is bound to be fractious.

Since all the applications went to the Commission in mid-November and thence became public there has been a mild flurry of activity among all the contestants. Each has been doing their part to intervene in the other's application.

Input Radio, based at the University of Toronto, is the only application headed for the 97.3 spot on the dial. It has applied for a restricted commercial licence and as such, is a unique idea. Nonetheless, along with the 50 or so positive interventions from local community and social services, four groups have intervened against Input's application.

Input manager Richard Lafferty is convinced that the interventions will not deter the CRTC from granting a licence to the group.

Rogers Radio Broadcasting Ltd., owner of CHFI-FM has intervened asking that the CRTC grant only one new FM licence in the city, at 107.9 on the dial. It is Rogers' belief that the cost of consolidating FM transmission in the new CN tower, will plunge Toronto FM stations into "a most uncertain economic climate and could result in substantial difficulties being encountered by all the licensees in the Toronto area."

In addition, Rogers is concerned that awarding licenses for the 97.3 and 99.1 locations on the dial would result in "even greater jamming on the FM dial."

"In summary, Rogers Radio Ltd. urges upon the Commission that only one new FM licence be granted in Toronto and that the allotted frequency be 107.1."

Rogers' appraisal of the FM relations with the CN Tower doesn't apply to Input.

In fact, the managers of the CN Tower are upset that Input has no plans to utilize the Tower for broadcasting. Input is instead using space donated by Manufacturer's Life on the top of their 51-floor building at the corner of Bay and Bloor Sts.

For this reason the CN Tower intervened in the Input application asking "that the CRTC give due consideration and, in fact, encourage all future broadcast licensees to make use of the CN Tower for the reasons outlined above."

Among their reasons, they cited the reduction of aviation hazards and their belief that the public will gain "if all broadcast transmissions are made from the CN Tower." The extra $100,000 that Input would be charged wouldn't hurt, either.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has also intervened. CBC is concerned that there be a channel left for French language FM at Toronto.

Input itself has intervened in two applications, both of them involving some degree of community access, the cornerstone of the Input application. Input's main tenet is the granting of air time to community and service groups on the basis of a restricted commercial licence. Loosely explained, this means the airing of advertising oriented towards a public service or advocacy nature rather than product-oriented.

Input is concerned that two applicants, Service Broadcasting Ltd. and Neil Richard Lundy, have applied for community access radio (an idea the CRTC has nodded approvingly at in the past year, but on the basis of an unrestricted commercial licence).

The profit motive, claims Input "is incompatible with a community access station as the demands of the profit motive will tend to aggravate the integrity of definitive community access programming. A community access station must have support from widely diversified sources, both on an aesthetic and financial level. A station wholly dependent on advertising revenues cannot maintain the necessary independence to allow full discussion of issues by all sectors of the community."

In both cases Input objected to the concentration of ownership and control in the hands of one major shareholder. Input's Board represents a fairly wide cross-section of society and it has demanded that "a station proposing community access should be controlled by a representative community group to ensure balance and objectivity."

The Varsity-Cathlin Kelly

Input station manager Richard Lafferty busily phones for support.

Copland exchanges with students

By CHRISTINE CURLOW
World-renowned American pianist-composer-conductor Aaron Copland involved students at the Edward Johnson Building yesterday in an informal exchange of thoughts on random topics suggested by the audience.

Copland, a remarkably well-preserved gentleman for his rumored seventy-five years of age, expounded upon the necessity for interaction and involvement in the contemporary music scene by young musicians.

He spoke on the importance of studies in the grand masters but stressed the unduplicated inefficiency and excitement in essential involvement with modern innovation and composition. He emphasized music as a living and progressive art and theorized optimistically upon developments in upcoming generations.

Copland recounted to the audience anecdotes of his years of study in Paris at the Palais de Fontainebleau with Nadia Boulanger, his meeting with Igor Stravinsky (who Copland said had changed his name from Leopold Stolkes), attending the famous salons of the early 1920's and being exposed to the genius of such masters as St. Saens.

Copland selected questions from the audience, elaborating in a wry humorous tone on his methods of composition. Asked whether or not he composed with the aid of a piano, Copland replied that he hadn't always, "but then Igor Stravinsky said it was OK."

Copland explained that he composed slowly, adjusting inspiration to time, deliberately spacing his composition over days and weeks. He said this permitted one "to approach the work objectively and critically." He said he was pleased with his legacy on records and expressed his belief that "Possibly one day in the future, Lenny Bernstein may conduct a better recording of one of mine." He hastened to add although "One would have to remain very open-minded in that respect."

In answer to a parting question on the definition of music, Copland replied "Definition? I don't have one. I am sure limitations exist but I would not want to be the one to name them."

Both artsies and Skulemen grumble on new Academic Affairs scheme

By CAITLIN KELLY

For what is probably the first time in the history of the U of T, the Artsies and the Engineers are in agreement about something, and they're both disgruntled. That something is a new marking scheme proposed by the Academic Affairs Committee which involves a switch to the American system of grade points.

Grade points, as opposed to percentage numbers and letter grades are based on a scale of anywhere from 0-27, depending on the system used, and equates a range of numbers with a certain grade point. For example, a grade of 90-100 or an A plus, is equivalent to a grade point of 4.0 in one system.

In a telephone interview Thursday, Engineering Dean Ben Etkin expressed his views on the proposal. He feels that the switch is a good idea, but fears that it may further complicate the problem of converting the Arts and Science marks of engineering students for use in tabulating engineering averages.

The problem inherent in the system is a large one and has serious complications, he feels. The complication lies in the fact that grade points, particularly when recording very low marks, tend to be ambiguous.

"The range of choice should be sufficiently wide so we can distinguish between the dismal failures and the near-passes," Etkin said.

"What we want is the ability to convert to numbers the marks we are given by the Arts and Science Faculty," he explained. The problem arises when, as is often the case, an engineering student is also enrolled in an Arts and Science course. The Engineering Faculty, which bases their marking on an average of marks, must have a clear and meaningful assessment of the student's marks which they can then convert into a percentage-based number. This is then averaged in with other marks from their faculty.

Students stand to lose a great deal if an unsatisfactory system of grade points is put into effect. If a student receives a mark of 45, which is then assigned a grade point of 0, his professors in Engineering have no way of discerning what is a near-miss from a bomb of 10 or 15 per cent.

Since engineers are judged on a fail-probation-pass system, it is of vital importance that their marks be as accurate and clear as possible. Without a definite knowledge of the student's mark, a borderline case could well be assigned to the wrong side of the border.

It is this fear of ambiguity that sent Dean Etkin to the Sub-Committee on Curriculum and Standards in protest when they first proposed the switch in late fall 1975.

Discussion followed between the Arts and Science and Engineering Faculties, in which some small conflicts emerged. These involve the subtleties of marking that seem less important to the Humanities than to the pure sciences.

Currently the four proposed systems are still being studied by Arts and Sciences. Etkin expressed what is probably the sentiment of all students involved, "We're waiting to see what they'll come up with."

Innuendo, hearsay and suppositions

Ontario universities experienced a 5.4 per cent increase in enrolment of full-time students this year, according to preliminary figures from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

This year's confirmed enrolment is expected to reach 158,358, up from 150,178 last year, including a 4.6 per cent increase in the 15,138 graduate students.

An increase of 5.6 per cent in part-time students is also expected to the equivalent of 17,939 full-time students.

There is an increase of 5.8 per cent in enrolments at the 22 colleges of applied arts and technology to a total of 58,236 full-time students.

The first ever U of T student-alumni conference is slated to take place Feb. 28.

On the initiative of the U of T Alumni Affairs Student Liaison Committee plans were made to hold the one day conference for 60-70 delegates on the theme of how students and alumni can cooperate.

Invitations are being sent out next week to the 31 constituencies and student associations who will be asked to send a delegate to the workshop.

The one day conference will feature a formal debate on the topic: Be it resolved that there is no basis for cooperation between alumni and students. One student and one alumnus will argue each side of the question.

The conference will also offer an open exchange, a guest speaker and workshops with a chairperson, secretary and resource person. The five topics include: Career Orientation; Faculty-Student Relations; Scholarships, Loans Bursaries; Student-Alumni Relations; and Personal Assistance to Students.

Nothing beats government reports for filling that idle period between lectures.

Take the Henderson Report for instance. This book can fill your leisure time for the next month.

Take chapter twelve. It discusses the cost of government institutions in Ontario. Did you know the cost of maintaining children in a mental health centre is $23,000 per child per year? That's for each of them, take note.

Reformatories don't come much cheaper. Each resident costs $21,000. Schools for the deaf and blind run to $10,000 per person and retarded children cost $8,700.

These figures aren't so surprising when you find that it takes 100,000 staff members to look after 112,000 inmates. Makes you wonder about the staff-student ratio here.

Union loses Artistic war

By ERIC McMILLAN

What went wrong at Artistic Woodwork?

Two years ago the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) won a battle to represent workers at their North York picture frame factory and successfully besieged the company in a strike which featured picket line violence and well-known skills being busted.

Last week CTCU lost the war. The union was decertified by a 62 to 36 vote of its workers.

Union officials claim supporters had been "pressured or bought off" and a "Western Guard atmosphere" prevailed at the company.

Artistic general manager Sarel van Zyl says, "The employees made up their own minds." As for intimidation, "If anyone was doing it, it was the union, not us," he argued.

The tragedy of Artistic is that the union has failed in making inroads among immigrant workers who usually have little power against employers who use them as cheap labour. If there are thousands of such workers in Toronto "sweatshops", as CTCU officials claim, it is useful to look into what went wrong in the attempt to organize them at Artistic.

Artistic Woodwork has always thrived on immigrant labour, and has been described in some papers as an "immigrant success story" begun 20 years ago by six Estonians. It still employs "a fair number" of immigrants, according to manager van Zyl.

When CTCU entered the scene in 1973, workers averaged 42½ hours per week (plus 4 hours overtime) at $2.00 to $2.95 per hour. After three months of negotiations the union squeezed a 65-cents-over-two-years concession from the company.

However, the main issues revolved around clauses dealing with management's treatment of employees, particularly the right of the company to suspend or dismiss workers without recourse to grievance procedures.

The ensuing strike lasted 14 weeks, attracted support from reformist aldermen and NDP Wafflers as well as academics and students. When the dust settled, 108 supporters including alderman Dan Heap had been arrested and CTCU secretary-treasurer Madeline Parent could say of the contract, "It is not all we wished, but it is a very significant victory."

It's been downhill all the way since then.

The company suspended 9 workers who were not acquitted of charges laid against them by police during the strike.

Some reports claim only 30 of the seventy to eighty strikers returned to work, leaving union supporters a minority among the 130 employees of Artistic.

Union officials claim their support has fallen off in the two years since the strike due to company "intimidation".

With numbers on its side once more, the company could afford to challenge the union again. A "spontaneous" petition was taken up to hold a decertification vote last fall.

CTCU president Kent Rowley charged the petition was company inspired and the two men circulating the petition were former strikebreakers allowed to collect signatures on company time.

Van Zyl denied the charge. If the men were paid for collecting names "I'm not aware of it," he said.

The union took its case opposing the decertification board to the Ontario Labour Relations Board but was ruled against. The Board's decision "did not speak to any of the evidence we had given," protested CTCU organizer Laurell Ritchie. The vote went ahead and the union lost.

The big losers are of course the unorganized immigrants in Toronto factories. "There's going to have to be much more organization among the immigrants in sweatshops," said Ritchie.

"When I was not in the union they didn't say anything to me, but when I joined they gave me lots of trouble."

Artistic workers speak out

Two workers involved in the Artistic Woodwork struggle were willing to talk to The Varsity, but only if guaranteed anonymity.

One of them is an Asian immigrant who quit his job at Artistic two weeks ago because "They were giving me trouble, lots of trouble," he said.

He was first brought to Artistic ("We have a job for you") during the strike two years ago. He was told it was an illegal strike and he would receive "support" and police "protection" in crossing the picket line. He recalls entering the Artistic grounds "in a completely closed car or truck."

His relations with management were fine until he started looking into the labor struggle at Artistic.

"When I wasn't in the union they didn't say anything to me, but when I joined they gave me lots of trouble," he explained.

"Why do you use the washroom so much? Why do you stop work at 4:15 when your shift is over at 4:30? They kept saying."

"I told them I knew why they said that, because I joined the union and because I went to the Labour Relations Board."

He testified at the Board hearings "to support the union," he said. He has since found a job which pays better and which has a better work atmosphere.

A union supporter who started at Artistic five years ago and is staying on, nonetheless says "I wouldn't advise anyone to work there."

Although he is a Canadian citizen, he claimed "They like to push immigrants as far as they go."

"It's a no-good work atmosphere," he said.

When he started at Artistic as a shipper he earned $3.25 an hour. By the 1973 strike he was up to $3.75 and a new contract put his wage up to $4.60.

Since the strike, he said he has been asked repeatedly to turn against the union but has always held firm. The recent petition for decertification he claimed was circulated on company time and company property, despite management's denials.

"I was pleased to see 36 votes the union managed to muster in the face of company opposition. He noticed many of his co-workers have quit or been let go after being "called into the office and everything." The company recently "bribed" workers by giving them a raise as decertification went to the vote, he said.

Asked about the possibility of a company-run union, he said, "I see it coming." He expects the two men who circulated the petition against CTCU to form the executive.

SAC—er calls Treacy "liar"

To the Editor:

There is no more cavalier liar among the several on the SAC Executive than Mr. Treacy. His astonishing statement about the projected SAC deficit of $15,000 on page 1 of the January 7th Varsity is a typical example of the tendency of some of the elected to prevaricate. In fact, the $15,000 projected deficit is a contemptuous lie in the face of students. That amount is the minimum amount of interest SAC will derive from their surplus bank accounts in the coming year.

Those surplus accounts amount to over $200,000 piled up over a period of five years by a combination of underpaying their own staff and overcharging students on fees.

Indeed, the deficit is only projected in order to account for such a phenomenal amount of interest and to maintain the non-profit status of SAC. It must be emphasized that the $300,000 plus interest does not include any of the fees SAC has collected for the present year. During the past several years SAC has not only become a major Toronto banker, but also owns a section of land in Ontario.

Mr. Treacy is seldom if ever known for intelligence, but famous everywhere for the pride he takes in prevarication. This time he has attempted to make fools of all students and The Varsity on the front page of The Varsity. Indeed, even SAC representatives who are not on the executive have no real idea of the actual assets and financial condition of the organization they are elected to. But with this challenge, it is essential that students and The Varsity demand that SAC make its audited financial statement public and a full accounting of all of its assets.

J. Kevin Kelleher,
CUPE 1222 member

Another SAC—er needs support

To the Editor:

I am greatly distressed to have to inform you and the students of the University of Toronto that as of January 16 CUPE Local 1222 will be on strike. We have made every effort to settle our differences with the Students' Administrative Council but we have failed. CUPE has modified its stand as much as we possibly can. We are asking only that we be paid on level equal to the salaries of other student workers, that we have a health plan and that there be some participation in office operation.

In my letter of November 24th I said that I thought it inappropriate to discuss the negotiations at that time. However, since we are rapidly approaching a crisis situation that is no longer true. We are depending on the students, staff and faculty for help in solving our problems with the SAC. Hopefully to prevent a strike. I am preparing a document chronicling the process of our negotiation and explaining our position and how we came to it, for the next issue of The Varsity.

I hope that once the University of Toronto community knows all the facts surrounding our situation it can help to support us. And we need a lot of support. CUPE 1222's bank account presently holds about $20 and our personal savings are meagre.

Keep Smiling,

John Bennett,
Chief Negotiator
CUPE 1222

In Wednesday's Op-Ed, the Committee Against Racism dealt with evidence of "a climate of racism" within the Faculty of Medicine. Today they will deal with evidence of personal bias against Henry Fong.

EVIDENCE OF PERSONAL BIAS AGAINST FONG

Given the evidence of racism against Chinese students in general and Henry Fong in particular, the question remains: why was Mr. Fong expelled while other Chinese students graduated? Part of the answer is Mr. Fong's shyness and stuttering, as mentioned in the first part. Another part of the answer is the personal bias against Fong by a few individuals.

Henry Fong began his fourth year of medicine in the summer of 1973, having been assigned to Toronto General Hospital. He took a 6½ day rotation in Family and Community Medicine under the supervision of Dr. H. Gryniwieski, and at the end of that period Dr. Gryniwieski wrote a letter against Fong, claiming he was dishonest as well as incompetent, and stating that he therefore should not be allowed to graduate. Virtually everyone seems to agree that Dr. Gryniwieski's letter shows strong personal bias against Fong. Associate Dean Steiner described it as "bizarre", and the medical school's lawyer at the appeal said that "it is clear that Dr. Gryniwieski had animosity toward Henry Fong, but that does not imply racial bias." Dr. Gryniwieski's "bizarre" letter was, however, sent to a large number of the medical school departments by Dr. Steiner, so that Henry Fong was slandered throughout the Faculty as a weak and dishonest student. Henry Fong had no knowledge of what was being written and said about him until after his expulsion!

There is no question that the "reverse halo effect" of Dr. Gryniwieski's letter about Fong seriously prejudiced Fong's assessment by other instructors. All witnesses agreed that the subjective nature of the grading procedures in the fourth year of medicine gave the widest possibility for personal or racial bias to affect marks.

When Henry Fong entered the rotation in medicine the head of the department of medicine, Dr. Hollenberg, stated that "as we were aware that Mr. Fong was a weak student" he was watched very closely and allowed "no independent initiative whatsoever." Dr. Hollenberg found his a priori opinion of Mr. Fong borne out in his subjective assessment of him, so he failed him in medicine and recommended that Mr. Fong be withdrawn from medical school. Dr. Hollenberg is a powerful figure in the Faculty; the Board of Examiners was convinced and Henry Fong became the first person to ever be forcibly withdrawn in the middle of his last year. The minutes of the Board of Examiners make it clear that Mr. Fong's failures (in Family and Community Medicine, Surgery, and Medicine) were not the main reason he was expelled; the main reason was "Dr. Hollenberg's insistence that Mr. Fong could never become a competent physician."

Mr. Fong appealed to the Appeals Committee of the Medical School, and he was allowed another attempt at fourth year. Dr. Hollenberg's testimony that Mr. Fong was "irretrievable" had been countered by evidence of Mr. Fong's competence from many of his instructors. There was also a petition objecting to Mr. Fong's treatment signed by more than half of the 240 students in his class.

Dr. Steiner testified that Dr. Hollenberg was "very angry and upset" that Fong's appeal had been granted, and that he was a man who expected to be listened to. Dr. Steiner also admitted that the wide variations in the evaluation of Mr. Fong "might be due to bias, on either side."

Associate Dean Llewellyn-Thomas affirmed that Dr. Hollenberg insisted that Mr. Fong be assigned to Toronto General Hospital or St. Michael's Hospital, and that his insistence was allowed to override Mr. Fong's wish to be assigned to St. Michael's Hospital. When Dr. Hollenberg heard that Henry Fong had passed Medicine in St. Michael's Hospital the next year he solicited the above letter from Dr. Marotta. The letter from Dr. Marotta says that Mr. Fong's pass should be ignored because he is unable to "synthesize" material — exactly the same word used by Dr. Hollenberg a year earlier to argue that Mr. Fong was "irretrievable." Even though Fong was in a different hospital, Dr. Hollenberg went out of his way to discredit the "pass" in Medicine.

The Subcommittee considers Dr. Hollenberg's statement that Mr. Fong is a "highly motivated and 'fine' individual who does not have any competence, does not discuss Dr. Hollenberg's peculiar pursuit of Henry Fong at a different hospital, and concludes that Fong was fairly treated. A thorough reading of the Board of Examiners' and Appeals Board's decisions make it clear that Henry Fong would have his M.D. were it not for Dr. Hollenberg's personal opposition in the existing climate of racism against Chinese students.

HENRY FONG'S ACADEMIC RECORD

What kind of a student was Henry Fong? Everyone agrees that he had satisfactorily completed the two pre-medical years and the first three years of medical school. There is disagreement about his performance during each of his attempts at fourth year.

During Mr. Fong's first attempt at 4th year there was the "bizarre" 6½ day rotation in Family and Community Medicine, and failure in Medicine and Surgery. He was not given the standard opportunity to be "re-assessed" (in the subjects.) On the other hand he did well in about 10 rotations, receiving grades between 70 and 80.

The appeal was of Mr. Fong's expulsion during his second attempt at 4th year, during the academic year 1974-75. This time he took only 3 rotations before being forced to withdraw; he passed Medicine and Dermatology, and failed Surgery. The failure in Surgery was extremely peculiar: Mr. Fong was not informed that he had failed until 2 months later, though students are normally told right away. Furthermore, there was no direct evidence about his failure in Surgery. The only evidence the medical school presented was the second-hand hearsay evidence contained in the letter from Dr. Hudson, (the person who suggested Fong go back to Hong Kong), which quoted one clinician as saying that Fong was "one of the worst students he'd ever seen" and another clinician as saying that "on absolutely no account could this man be inflicted upon the general public." In addition, there was the letter of Dr. Marotta described above, saying that Fong's pass in Medicine was weak. Scanty evidence on which to expel a student who had devoted 6 years to the study of medicine.

There were a number of witnesses brought forward by Mr. Fong. This included several of his classmates (now physicians) who testified that his medical knowledge was certainly at least average.

More significantly, evidence was given by clinicians who were his direct supervisors (similar to classroom and lab instructors) in each of the 3 rotations he took in his last year, and they all testified that his medical knowledge was good and his clinical performance quite adequate. This included Dr. W. Butler, a clinician who supervised

Fong for 2 weeks of his 8 weeks in surgery and who testified that some of the senior staff ridiculed and made jokes about Fong although he found Fong very competent in all aspects of his clinical work.

Dr. L. Margesson, who supervised Fong in her capacity as resident physician in Dermatology testified:

"On my return to work I found that the Appellant had done well in carrying out his and my duties. He had taken appropriate responsibility, with limited supervision and his clinical acumen and judgment as a Fourth-Year medical student were good.

I found that the Appellant's "work-ups" on patients were good as his examinations were slow, methodical and thorough. He did very well on his assessments of the patient.

In performing his duties the Appellant was often required to relate to me the patient's history, the findings on examination and also to draw conclusions and recommend treatment and in doing so I found the Appellant to be quite competent.

In returning to the Hospital following my recovery I noted a significant improvement in the Appellant's ability to relate and discuss dermatological problems."

Dr. G. Harada wrote the following about Henry Fong:

"In July and August 1974 I was the senior medical resident covering one of the teams on the public ward at the St. Michael's Hospital. During that time Henry was one of the clinical clerks on my team. As the senior medical resident it was my responsibility to supervise the work of the interns and clinical clerks on my service. I found Henry's work to be quite satisfactory. While it took Henry no longer than most fourth year medical students to obtain a history the information he obtained was adequate and on the basis of this information he was able to formulate a reasonable diagnosis.

Henry's abilities in physical examination were more than adequate. He did require some assistance in the management and treatment of his patients; however the amount of assistance he required was no more than for the average fourth-year medical student. The number of cases that Henry carried while working on the public ward was less than that of the average fourth year medical student. This was because at some time it took him to obtain the history and also because I assigned Henry fewer cases knowing that he was under a great deal of pressure to do well that year. Henry's care of his patients was adequate and there was no question of ineptness in his handling of his cases."

After discussing Henry's stuttering and nervousness in front of senior medical staff Dr. Harada concludes:

"I think that the one thing that I should emphasize is that I have no doubt in my own mind that Henry's academic abilities are certainly not substandard. Whether or not Henry should be refused another chance for reasons other than academic ineptness is for you to decide."

Amazingly, the Subcommittee has the gall to state: "There were, of course, clinicians who found Mr. Fong's performance acceptable, including Drs. Butler, Harada and Margesson. This makes it clear that Mr. Fong did not make a botch of everything."

Even the Medical School's Appeals Committee, (which rejected Fong's appeal), gave a fairer view of Mr. Fong's performance than the present Subcommittee did. Dr. Rakoff introduced the motion rejecting Fong's appeal as follows: "He noted that those individuals who had been able to overcome the barrier reported that Mr. Fong's performance was average; he was not reported as inadequate, nor was he praised excessively." (The medical school's appeals committee went on to dismiss Fong's appeal because he allegedly had some "emotional barrier", which, it is now agreed by all, never existed and could never justify his expulsion.)

What percentage of medical school graduates could get their instructors to testify to their competence in the face of such a strong attack by the medical school Faculty of Medicine? Mr. Fong must be very competent indeed for Drs. Butler, Margesson and Harada to give such testimony under these circumstances.

Exciting Images just don't cut the mustard without accompanying zippy slogans Does She...? Only the reader knows for sure...

Does She Or Doesn't She?
And How She Did It
Shirley Polykoff
Doubleday

If Ann Landers were a blonde her name would be Shirley Polykoff and she would write great advertising slogans like 'Does She Or Doesn't She (Only Her Hairdresser Knows for Sure)', 'Hate That Grey, Wash It Away', 'The Closer He Gets, The Better You Look', 'Curriers In Your Hair, Shame On You' . . . She would make a small fortune, spend it, have no regrets, and want to tell the world all about it.

So Shirley Polykoff's own autobiography Does She Or Doesn't She? And How She Did It would suggest.

The book's chief virtue is that it lets us know there was indeed one mind, one woman, responsible for all those slogans.

Now you know who to curse.

It is written in the curious snappy, anecdotal, phrase-a-minute style that seems to be an occupational hazard for ad writers (and for some journalists).

Yet the book is disarming. Advertising really needs an Ayn Rand, someone to react to, someone to abhor, you think, not this sophisticated, worldly-wise Jewish grandmother, full of commonsense and pragmatism, who saw the business simply as a way to make a good living. But by undeniably staking out a place for herself, by making sure that attention must be paid to Shirley Polykoff, she reminds us that here we begin, here we end, with the individual human being. And there are so many of them. All different. She keeps us humble.

Recipe for comedy: combine s/m and Communism...

'Swept away by an unusual destiny in the blue sea of August' is the story of rich girl thrown by chance together with poor boy, of their shipwreck on a desert island and their return, changed; or perhaps unchanged, to society. Writer-director Lina Wertmuller is often considered to be political and a feminist. In fact, she makes romantic comedies into which she mixes politics, both of sex and of class: a mixture liable to offend anyone serious about his or her politics. For Wertmuller's films are undeniably funny.

The stars, as in 'The Seduction of Mimi' and 'Love and Anarchy', are Mariangeola Melato and Giancarlo Giannini. He plays Gennarino (Signor Carunchio as he becomes), earthy Southerner employed as deck hand on a luxury sloop. She plays Raffaella Lanzetti, spoiled rich bitch bitching about everything from the radical-chic politics of her husband and his friends to her reheated coffee, the overcooked spaghetti. One face of the Communist Party: the yacht, the wives, kept women, sunning themselves while the men sit in a circle reading L'Unita, sipping their liquor, languidly waiting for the revolution. Another face, Gennarino, staunch believer in

The Party and male supremacy. (The Party doesn't come off at all well in this apolitical political movie; but then no group does, not Men, and least of all Women.)

The stage is set for combat: rich versus poor, the politics of resentment. Gennarino and Signora Lanzetti's Bella Avventura begins. And we know that she will get her comeuppance, her just deserts on this desert island. What we are treated to is a dramatization of the master-slave dialectic, in which master, mistress rather, is forced for survival to submit to the will of the slave. Roles are totally and mercilessly reversed. The comedy — if we are still laughing — culminates with the male giving a hefty slap for each injustice society has visited on the poor ('That's for causing inflation . . . That's for hoarding your money in Swiss Bank accounts . . . That's for income tax . . . etc.'), then with what can only be called a political rape. (It is doubtful if she gets the point of this however — or we, the audience for that matter. I wasn't alone in feeling uncomfortable at the jolting transitions between stock comedy or erotic interest, on the one hand, and the realm of class warfare and sexual politics on the other; the audience isn't sure when to laugh.) Finally she must give up her soul to him — we infer that only so can she be brought to recognize Gennarino as human rather than an object of abuse or condescension. The dictatorship of the proletariat is complete, as is the education of 'Donna Raffaella': she has been turned from a high-class whore into his whore. So much for that.

All the same, the film is funny and genuinely witty. If I have dealt too much with the bare ones of it that's because the bones are what stick in the craw.

Pop star Dylan's fave rave:

Redbone polishes up old Tin Pan Alley rhinestones

Leon Redbone
On The Track
Warner Bros. 2888

Ottawa-August '73. There's this time-weathered character sitting on a bench in the TV room at the Carleton student center and he's surrounded by a dozen very still people. He's all hunched over, his legs are crossed, and he's playing a Fats Waller tune. At the song's end he nods his head slowly and reaches for the bottle of liquor that he has sitting on his right.

He doesn't speak between songs; he speaks through them and what we get is a sound from another time. Somehow nostalgic and yet too immediate to be just that. He picks up on a Jimmy Rodgers tune and it's perfect — his voice, his guitar, his yodels, his whole person create an engaging atmosphere that's hard to describe. We listen for scratches in his voice; he seems like he's been around long enough for that to be possible. And at the end, when he leaves by the back exit which also serves as a fire escape, we all wonder who the hell he is and where he comes from.

Rolling Stone — sometime '74. The interviewer asks last year's Bruce Springsteen if there are any current musicians who really excite him. Dylan replies that yes, there's one, fellow by the name of Leon Redbone. Just incredible. Someone should record him he says.

Toronto — January '76. Redbone's first album is out. It's called On The Tracks, perhaps Redbone's way of paying tribute to the "singing brakeman", Jimmy Rodgers. The front cover is from one of those Looney Tune cartoons and it seems rather fitting when one checks the list of songs. And on the back, there's Redbone himself, his brakeman cap on, sitting in a cloud of smoke from what must have been a good five-cent cigar in his day. And the songs ... two Jimmy Rodgers tunes ("Sweet Mama Hurry Home" and "Desert Blues"), one opening each side; two Irving Berlin songs ("My Walking Stick" and "Marie"); as well, there are strong versions of "Ain't Misbehavin'", "Lulu's Back In Town", and "Haunted House". Ten numbers in all — thirty-eight minutes of Redbone and the unobtrusive yet effective presence of musicians like Don McLean and especially Joe Venuti (violin). All in all, an excellent album. Redbone's throaty voice (a la J.J. Cale) sounds like it was coming out of a Victrola and sometimes as black as night (as in the album's best cut, the bluesy "Haunted House"). His throat trumpet (perhaps he and Cockburn went to the same music school?), is sparsely used and yet creates a neat groove in songs like "Marie".

Redbone has done an admirable job with his gleanings from the hey-day of Tin Pan Alley. This is an LP filled with the past and yet not at all a museum-piece — rather, something mellow to play when the day is over and you want to slow down and listen.

Hackneyed disco gimmicks blight fan's pleasure

Linda Lewis
Nof A Little Girl Anymore
Arista

Someone who was not biased in favour of Linda Lewis (as a result of hearing her earlier albums) might find this record fairly average. Even a fan has to admit that only six (out of ten) cuts are up to scratch.

The record suffers primarily from a lack of direction. There are but four Linda Lewis originals here, and one of them, "My Granddaddy Could Reggae", is excessively cute.

I would have preferred a couple more examples of Lewis' highly distinctive songwriting, in place of the production on three tracks of New York hitmakers Tony Silvester and Bert de Coteaux.

De Coteaux' hackneyed disco arrangement of "It's In His Kiss (The Shoop Shoop Song)" is inferior to the original — and if a cover isn't better than the original, there's no point in doing it. Then there's "This Time I'll Be Sweeter", on which Lewis loses her voice, i.e. I can't tell it's her singing. Middle-of-the-road with a hint of soul, the song seems better suited to a Nancy Wilson or Dionne Warwick.

Frequently Silvester and de Coteaux employ the range of Lewis' voice in a gimmicky way, the kind of thing which caused a Village Voice reviewer to call Minnie Riperton a "blight on the airwaves".

Elsewhere the production by Jim Cregan, who also happens to be Linda's husband, is more sympathetic.

Other songs on the LP include the charming single "(Remember the Days of) The Old Schoolyard", by Cat Stevens (Lewis was Cat's opening act on his 1973 tour), and an excellent song by John Martyn, "May You Never". Unfortunately Lewis doesn't add anything to the original of this last song (to be found on John Martyn's Solid Air); in fact, she even copies Martyn's vocal inflections.

Be thankful for small mercies: Arista had the good sense to replace the cover photos used on the English version. Oog.

Winchester makes up for stiff tab, short stanza

Jesse Winchester opened up a week-long run at the Riverboat coffee house Tuesday before a crowd 100 strong. In spite of the short set and stiff admission price, the crowd clearly enjoyed themselves. Although the set only lasted 45 minutes, scarcely enough time to warm up a larger audience, the response was immediate. Within 10 minutes Winchester had a spontaneous sing-along with a rendition of "Will the Circle Be Unbroken". Both the crowd and the performer felt at ease with the intimate atmosphere generated by the tiny Riverboat. The closeness helped create a rapport of which Jesse is a master. With facial expressions and the odd playful use of his hand, Jesse was able to augment his songs and please his audience.

Proving his versatility, Jesse went from a pair of pensive religious numbers into the satirical "Jesus was a teenager too". If you like easy-listening sold folk, it's worth the effort to catch Jesse Winchester at the Riverboat. He'll be there till Sunday. Cheaper advance tickets are available at SAC.

Toronto Consort's Christmas Concert largely uninspired

The evening of December 11 saw the second concert of the Toronto Consort's subscription series. The programme, entitled "Medieval and Renaissance Music for Christmas," began with four thirteenth century Latin songs. As in their last concert, the playing of all save wind instruments was entirely uninspired. The viol playing seemed to have improved somewhat in the intervening weeks: it was smoother and more accurate. But they seem not to have devoted much time to practising their rebec playing. I was surprised this time to find the polished harmoniousness of their ensemble singing which I had so admired at their last appearance almost totally absent. Ms. Pimenoff's voice was so weak as to be virtually inaudible above the accompaniment.

Toronto Consort's rebec playing was less than angelic

Next we were treated to a rendition of some fifteenth century English carols. Messrs. Walker, tenor, and Crighton, countertenor, seemed to have a greater rapport with one another in their singing than with the rest of the group. Here Prof. McGee's viol playing, although hardly of professional quality, was perfectly acceptable. The recorder playing was most consistently of good quality; but here, again, virtuosity is lacking. The first half of the concert concluded with three Renaissance motets. After the intermission, five additional male voices joined the Consort to sing the refrains of the "Sybil's Chant," in which the soloist, Ms. Pimenoff, continued to sing weakly and without conviction. Finally, the augmented Consort performed a musical skit of the Adoration of the Magi, which was sung fairly well, but somehow did not come off. They had some difficulty with the props, and were perhaps a little disconcerted by the way the concert had gone thus far. But the skit seemed just to be unexciting material of the sort that sometimes appears to be worth performing but turns out to be disappointing.

The encore, a song performed by all ten voices, was the first part of the concert that gained my unqualified admiration; for here, at last, the verve and vivacity which is the hallmark of the Toronto Consort came into play.

Although I understand that this concert was sold out in advance, there may still be tickets available for the two remaining concerts in the series: "Ceremonial Music of the Late Renaissance" by Gabrielli, et alii, with the Kitchener Bach Choir and the London Pro Musica Choir on 28 January and "English Music of the Middle Ages and Renaissance" on 21 April.
