We've got your money, why don't we have you. Each undergraduate pays $1.50 for the continuing story of the Varsity. We need help in spending all that cash.

A copy-runner is needed to take deathless prose to the printer on Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday nights. In addition on Monday, Wednesday and Friday morning, a person is needed to deliver bundles of same to Scarborough College.

If you, or a person close to you can fit such activities into their busy schedule, we will pay them cash money. Phone Paul or Joe 923-8741 anytime for this chance of a lifetime. Don't forget to keep those cards and letters coming in, we still need stuff to write, good English is definitely not a pre-requisite but 72 characters to the line is.

NEW COURSE Dept. of Religious Studies

REL 240 JUDAISM IN THE MODERN AGE 2 L, W 2 - 4; 1 T, N
(Open to first and higher year students)

This course is an historical and critical inquiry into the development of Jewish religious thought in modern times.

Modern Jewish thinkers, like those of the past, have sought to formulate clearly the basic ideas of a biblical religion and then to defend them in relation to the concepts and values of the general culture. This course will explore the impact on Jewish belief and practice of Christian thought, the new sciences, the values of modernity, philosophical scepticism, historical and biblical criticism, and the increasing secularization of Western societies.

Special attention will be given to the development of modern religious movements and the consequences for Jewish thought of such events as the Holocaust and the establishment of the State of Israel. An examination of Maimonides' philosophical writings and his codification of Jewish practice will provide an understanding of the historical, sources and intellectual background of modern Jewish thought.

Instructor: Prof. S. Tanenzapl, Visiting Lecturer

Libraries may close

Robarts may look even more deserted soon

By BOB COLLIER
Over 400 university library workers will strike next month if the present contract negotiations break down, said library worker Judy Darcy, president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 1230.

The strike threatens to shut down Robarts, Sci-Med, Sigmund Samuel and the departmental libraries in pharmacy, engineering, and hygiene. Other university libraries will not be affected since the staff are not yet unionized.

If the 300 non-union staff choose to ignore the picket lines, partial services may continue. While all library technicians would be off the job, part-time students, professional librarians and supervisory personnel may continue to work.

Darcy said no strike date has been chosen, but it would not be before mid-October.

The library workers are fighting for wages equal to that of average Ontario workers, increased job security and more control over the unfair job classification system now in use.

Under the present contract, negotiated in 1973, the average library worker earns only $150 per week before deductions, or about $7,500 a year. Even though most library staffers are university educated, they earn $3,000 to $4,000 a year less than the average Ontario wage earner.

In the lowest category, a starting library technician with a BA now earns only $107 a week. Part-time students are paid the minimum legal wage.

Since the present pay scale is not tied to the cost of living, Darcy estimates that an average worker on a $7,500 salary has lost $1,500 since the last contract was negotiated in 1973.

CUPE is seeking retroactive payment in compensation and a cost of living clause in the new contract. The union estimates an across the board increase of $66 a week would give the library staff a reasonable income.

The arbitrary and unfair job classification system presently used by the administration needs a complete revision, according to Darcy. Under the old contract, workers are given different ranks and correspondingly different wages, even though they may be performing almost similar jobs.

The university's proposal to eliminate 70-80 jobs has angered union members. This will significantly increase the workload for the remaining staff and further reduce the number of hours that full service is provided by the library.

The university claims that the staff will be reduced by attrition, but without a contractual clause to that effect, the union fears that permanent staff will be laid off.

Darcy stresses "The union wants to embarrass the university administration, not inconvenience the students." In the coming weeks, they will be actively seeking student support for their demands.

Next Tuesday, their campaign will go public, with an open meeting held in New College. Darcy hopes to attract students, faculty and technical staff from the whole university to provide the nucleus of a support committee which will be responsible for organizing rallies, demonstrations and publicity for their demands.

The union has been planning strategy since July and carrying on constant discussions with John Parker, the administration's labour relations negotiator. A strike committee has been organized to prepare publicity within and outside of the library, and a fund has been collected in preparation for a lengthy strike.

Students find road blocks to voting

By BOB BETTSON

As many as 600 students at New College and other student residences at U of T are among thousands of people not enumerated for the Sept. 18 provincial election in St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding.

Marilyn Roycroft, NDP campaign manager for candidate Barbara Bardsley, said last night the NDP estimates almost 9,000 people have been left off the list.

The Students Administrative Council held a press conference yesterday to denounce the inconsistency of the District Returning Officer Lesley Singer who accepted a list from Trinity for enumeration but not from New College or University College.

A SAC press release charges that enumeration on campus "has been haphazardly and negligently carried out."

SAC calls for a contingent of deputized revision officers to be sent to each residence as was done at Queens; Brock, and Waterloo.

Otherwise students will be denied the right to vote.

SAC external affairs commissioner Ross Wells sent a letter protesting the situation to Chief Returning Officer on Monday asking for revision officers to be sent to New College, Knox College, Whitney Hall, Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, Devonshire House, Massey College, Wycliffe, and the St. George Graduate Residence.

While Singer admitted in an interview last night that she was not doing as much as some DROs in other university ridings, she felt students were getting the same opportunities as any other person to get enumerated.

Singer said Trinity was incorrectly enumerated when an enumerator accepted a list from the dean of residence. "I can't tell from the dean's list if they fulfill residence requirements or if they are Canadian citizens," she said.

Singer said she had been approached by SAC president Gord

Barnes as soon as the election was called and was making arrangements for tables to be set up at the residences.

However SAC wasn't content with that and wanted special revision desks set up as well as special enumerations, she said.

Singer claimed students already had more opportunities than the rest of the population since they have the right to vote by proxy at their parent's home, transfer their vote to university or get initially enumerated at university.

But on the wider question of the large numbers left off, she was adamant that she had done the best job possible on enumeration. She disputed NDP figures of 9,000 people being left off the lists, but admitted sometimes whole streets and apartments were missed.

The NDP says what Roycroft calls a "sloppy" enumeration has left more than 3,000 voters off the north of Bloor and 6,000 south of Bloor. "Why, 250 out of our 600 members were left off the lists," she said.

Roycroft said she was upset because of the mess in the riding's enumeration. "It's extremely frustrating to have to spend the amount of time and energy we have on getting people on the list. It is eating into our campaign."

She said she felt the returning officer's bias was that it was a person's own responsibility to get on the list if they are left off.

The U of T NDP club said the difficulty in enumerating students was "particularly disheartening." Spokesperson Steve Krashinsky said last night the group was "appalled at the inefficiency and incompetence of the District returning officer which have effectively led to the disenfranchisement of hundreds of students."

Krashinsky charged "if it was Davis' idea to disenfranchise students by calling an election during the summer and holding it in the fall he certainly appears to have succeeded in St. Andrew-St. Patrick on the U of T campus.

The Ontario Federation of Students backed SAC in its charges saying the enumeration problem centres on the refusal of some returning officers to appoint special revising officers to handle on-campus revisions, forcing people to individually visit the District returning office to get on the voters list.

In order to dramatize the situation SAC instigated a busing service earlier this week from the campus to the returning office on Bathurst at St. Clair to encourage students to get on the lists.

The whole situation is clouded by the fact that tonight at 9 pm is the final deadline and many students are going to be left off unless something is done.

Graduate Assistants finally win certification

By BOB COLLIER

The university has finally capitulated in its $100,000 two-year fight to prevent unionization of graduate assistants.

The decision was announced by university and Graduate Assistant Association (GAA) lawyers on June 4, after an 11th hour closed meeting at the beginning of a two-day session of hearings at the Ontario Labour Relations Board offices.

University of Toronto labor-management negotiator John Parker said, "I am glad we were able to resolve the matter rather than have a long and protracted dispute."

A crowd of 50 graduate students, who had come to the board to testify, cheered at the announcement.

The results of last year's referendum on unionization were announced one day later, on June 5.

The count was 445 to 180 in favour of the union. According to Ontario Labour laws, the tabulation was not made until after the conciliation even though the vote was taken months before.

The referendum provided months of amusement for campus journalists as the university lawyers tried to stuff the list of electors with as many anti-union votes as possible.

Dentists, clergymen and lawyers, who give a few guest lectures a year, were graduate assistants the university claimed.

The GAA was required to submit union cards for 35 per cent of its proposed membership before hearings could begin, and university lawyers played the numbers game in an effort to delay the decision.

After finally caving in the university then demanded the inclusion of only 52 post-doctoral fellows instead of over 1,000 miscellaneous professionals.

The GAA began contract negotiations for the 1976-77 session following their certification, and has already won a 12 per cent across the board salary raise for the present session. It applies to students who are teaching this year as well as last.

The base pay for a graduate assistant was increased from $7.00 to $7.85 an hour and the ceiling increased from $10.00 to $11.20 an hour.

A demonstrator in a science course now makes about $1,100 a year for teaching a three hour laboratory once a week. However, many departments are limiting the number of courses a student can demonstrate to only one. This is usually the only income a science graduate student has.

U of T's strongarm, John Parker

The 2,000 member bargaining unit includes all graduate students, undergrads and post-doctorate fellows who demonstrate, mark, tutor lecture. The GAA will represent graduates in professional courses who are licensed to practise architecture, medicine, law or dentistry in Ontario.

They are hired by professional faculties to give one or two guest lectures a year in their speciality. They are not graduate students and don't receive more than a fraction of their income from the university.

Also excluded are persons giving occasional lectures but who are not paid, and those whose primary interests are outside the university.

Athletic coaches and music teachers at the Royal Conservatory of Music and non-teaching research fellows are not represented either.

All these categories, amounting to over a thousand casual instructors, were included in the university's numbers game.

During the last two months, the GAA has been preparing a tentative contract for approval by GAA members. The contract emphasizes job security, wages, hours of work and class size. They will hold a general membership meeting Oct. 8.

Even though the GAA represents all graduate assistants, only those who become GAA members can vote on the contract.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Tenure decision inspires name-calling

Despicable. Treacherous. Some have even called it slimy. Needless to say, students have a right to be disappointed in the governing bodies of the university for refusing to implement the mechanisms for seating a student on the committees that make the decisions about hiring and firing at U of T.

When students left at the end of the last academic year, it was assumed that the long battle for inclusion on tenure committees had ended when the Governing Council endorsed the principle of student membership. The Academic Affairs committee was asked on March 20 to return to council with a proposal on the composition of the committees.

That's when things started to turn sour. It was probably understood by all involved that the faculty would have serious objections to the proposal, but it was a surprise when it became apparent that this opposition would have the effect of reversing the decision. Both Dr. Evans and Arts and Science Dean Greene presented the faculty views in strong terms at different meetings, Greene warning that many professors would refuse to serve on any committee that included a student.

When the Academic Affairs composition model reached Governing Council on June 19, Academic Affairs member William Dunphy attempted to have the student membership deleted from the model, but it failed to acquire the two-thirds majority required.

Despite the failure of that motion, debate was allowed, a flagrant breach of rules of the order. Part of the debate consisted of a speech by Dr. Evans, who was upset that in this time of budget trouble the Council should alienate a sector of the university community. He was quite justifiably upset, but then again all he was asking was that the council alienate another section of the community, one that had a little less clout.

After lengthy discussion, the Academic Affairs main motion on composition was put forward and failed, and students were right back where they started from.

The Student's Administrative Council, in a pamphlet and button campaign last year asked the question: What are They Afraid Of? It is a hard question to answer.

Certainly the faculty are not afraid of students, they deal with them on an everyday level, and most of them probably even like the students they deal with. They can't be afraid of a student juggernaut threatening their survival at the university as only one student on each committee is almost a powerless situation. So what is it?

The faculty seems concerned that students do not have the professional expertise necessary to make proper decisions about what makes a good or a bad professor. The analysis is a faulty one.

Students are constantly exposed to professors in the situation that should matter most in any staffing decision—the classroom. That situation is the life of the university, and any decision made without taking the classroom fully into account is a faulty one. In judging the situation, opinions must be solicited from those who cannot be compromised by professional cameraderie, by those who have absolutely nothing to lose by making a true evaluation.

It is the professional compromise that is most dangerous in tenure decisions. Put a group of people with the same interests in a room to judge each other and one of the results will be a decision that may tend to preserve the whole and not injure any part.

The crux of the matter is: Do the faculty have the strength to engage in a constant process of self-betterment even if it means telling one of the brethren to get lost?

What is most disturbing about Council's decision is the obvious lack of respect among sectors of the university for the policy makers. From a body such as the Governing Council one doesn't expect an about-face, a comment also on council's lack of self-respect.

When decisions are made in good faith, especially after such an acrimonious battle, they should be kept, regardless of pressure.

In the end, it becomes more difficult to sit in a classroom day after day and listen to someone who you know will judge you without allowing you the opportunity of doing the same.

"Doing who a favor?"

Scenario: The elections office of St. Andrews-St. Patrick riding on a not-so-quiet afternoon this week. Countering charges that enumerators in the riding are making it difficult if not impossible for students to vote, the deputy returning officer has just finished telling an irate SAC worker that the province is "doing the university a favour" by enumerating students in their residences.

"Bullshit," rejoins the SAC hack and storms out.

Ever since the Davis government called the election for September 18th, SAC and other student councils across the province have been kept busy trying to make sure that those people who might miss enumeration in their university riding were not denied the chance to vote.

What the aggrieved student rep was responding to was an obvious double-standard in provincial dealings with student voters. In some places in Ontario and even on this campus, enumerators have indeed been quite conscious of the problems and have set up special desks for those who were enumerated in their own home ridings, but require a revision so that they may vote in the university riding.

At St. Michael's and Trinity, enumerators worked from deans' residence lists to compile their list. But at New College, a list was refused, and students found that the enumeration table outside the dining hall were not deputized to handle the revision, which requires a legal affidavit.

Certainly the province, if they could at first not avoid holding an election when there would appear to be the possibility that a sizeable number of people would have a trouble voting, could have at least taken measures to provide adequate service to a portion of the electorate that was unavoidably transient during the process.

Keep your nose on

The editor asked a Varsity staffer to write a nice, "Welcome back" story. And he, quite innocently asked "to what?"

It's sad that such bitterness can abound in a single individual, but it's sadder that no one here answered the question.

The Varsity has had its grimy finger on the pulse of campus activity for the past 96 years. We've seen the undergraduate population mushroom tenfold, virtually overnight. New universities have sprung up all over Ontario.

But the U of T is different, they all say. We have prestige, tradition, tough courses and a clock tower with a carillon. Our standards are high and it's an honour to be accepted. It is also becoming a privilege as fees increase. Bill "Cutes" Davis rewards most OSAP students within his empire with a burden to bear long after the glory has passed.

But we mustn't be bitter just for the sake of being sophomoric. There are many of you out there hesitant but still hopeful. One can still find a meaningful education here, sometimes it comes as a big shock.

The job market is tight and the obvious solution for many of you is to buckle down and churn out the best effort possible. The world is asking for hard work and will offer success in return. But further inspiration is just as hard. Talk to some 1975 grads. If you don't know any just stroll by Canada Manpower.

The U of T is rife with problems, even the administration is going rangy trying to make ends meet. They've chopped many and doubled-up the rest. They transfer educational costs onto the colleges and then cut the budget, they ask the students to pay more incidental fees, for athletics and for other campus services.

So what can we say further? We come to the U of T, keep your nose to the wheel, but for god's sake keep your eyes open. The student council, the Ontario Federation of Students and we here are trying to pave the way for something better, but it seems to us that things have to change. Many are content to mortgage the future in order to pay the price of education now. It seems a little odd at times.

Building for Tomorrow

By Frank McInyre
 Ontario's economy is in the grip of a number of crises causing concern to those of us hoping for a long life in a society secure in its provision for all the basic human needs. The future of Ontario's food production looks bleak, with the loss of 26 acres of farmland per hour and a farm population down 40 per cent in the past decade. Many families today are being forced to spend a disproportionate part of their income to purchase a house or to rent an apartment. With housing starts trailing needs by 40,000 per year, mortgage rates of 12 1/2 per cent annually, and rent increases of 20-30 per cent, in the near future we shall reach a stage where the quality of shelter rapidly declines and many families face personal bankruptcy.

Our energy needs for the future are threatened by inconsistent planning. Hydro's multi-billion dollar expansion plans distort the priorities of public borrowing and spending in Ontario, while the 'need' such investment is intended to meet is self-induced. Contrary to the image in Hydro's conservation ads, energy rate schedules encourage excessive use through bargain rates for bulk purchase. Planning in transportation is chaos. An excessive emphasis on high cost road systems dependent on a diminishing natural resource seriously threatens the long term prospects for low cost and efficient movement of people and products. Rail systems have been allowed to deteriorate, light rapid transit has still not been sensibly exploited to solve southern Ontario's massive commuting problem and the freight rate structure remains discriminatory toward northern Ontario continuing the distortion of Ontario's economic development.

Thirty-two years of Conservative government have brought Canada's richest province to a stage where our youth are uncertain of the future provision of food, shelter, energy and transportation. The most serious aspect of this crisis in basic needs lies in its ever increasing acceleration. The annual lag in house starts increases each year; hourly loss of farm acreage is escalating; percentage increase in Hydro use is greater each year; the rate of over-crowding of our cities increases while the prospect for decentralization weakens. The people of Ontario cannot wait another four years for decisive action to get our economy back into shape. The youth of Ontario must work today to ensure a livable Ontario in our tomorrow.

The Ontario New Democratic Party offers a set of policies designed to tackle these crises in the Ontario economy. The NDP land-use planning would ensure that land suitable for agriculture is protected. The NDP would guarantee farm families sufficient income to ensure adequate return on their labour and investment. An income support insurance plan, contributed to by both farmers and government, would protect the small farmer from bankruptcy through price drop or crop failure.

To ensure that families tomorrow will be able to acquire adequate shelter, the Ontario New Democratic party would use the Ontario Savings Office to provide 6 per cent and 8 per cent mortgages to low and middle income families wanting to purchase a house. To guarantee long term supply of housing the NDP would maintain land banks in public ownership with lots leased rather than sold for development. Such action would reduce the effect that high land costs now have on housing rates. The NDP would ensure long term affordable rental accommodation through the establishment of a Rental Review Board fully empowered to protect tenants from arbitrary and excessive rent increases. The NDP would increase public participation in the provision of housing and rental accommodation where private development is failing to meet the needs of Ontarians.

The NDP would reduce the rate of Hydro expansion and encourage energy conservation through revision of current rate schedules. An energy marketing board would be empowered to handle all energy purchases from outside the province, to review gasoline and natural gas prices, and to recommend roll-backs where increases are unjustifiable.

An NDP government would seriously tackle the problem of correcting the over-emphasis on roads in the Ontario transportation system. Improvements in air and rail travel, particularly in the north and remote areas of the province, would be initiated. Light rapid transit systems would be developed encouraging the use of public transit in urban areas. A provincial transportation planning process would ensure that expenditures in transportation are consistent with decentralization of economic development.

The Ontario New Democratic Party believes that our tomorrow must be planned for today. We believe that Ontario's youth is concerned about the provision for people's basic needs today and thirty years from today. NDP policies in the areas of food, housing, energy and transportation are not flights of fancy. These policies are working in Canada's three NDP provinces. We believe in Ontario's tomorrow enough to work toward building it today. We believe in Ontario's tomorrow. We've got to. It's our tomorrow.

PLUGS

New College will offer a special one year course entitled "FUTURISTICS" for all 2nd, 3rd and 4th year students of the future at U of T.

The course will be taught by visiting professor of futuristics and political science Jim Dator of the University of Hawaii, in collaboration with Mary Ann Griggs of New College.

Dator, one of the world's foremost futurestudy experts, is in Toronto to design a series of television programs for T.V. Ontario (O.E.C.A.) on the subject of the future. He has recently been associated with New College through the interdisciplinary group, the Club of Gnu.

The course is for full credit and has no prerequisites. It will be offered at New College, Tuesdays and Thursdays from 11 to 1. For more information contact the New College registrar.

"Alternatives in Education" (Inn 302) is now available Tuesday and Thursday evenings as well as Friday mornings to 2nd, 3rd and 4th year students.

The course is intended to provoke questioning of the existing educational systems and to explore the "alternative" arrangements that are being created.

Students in the course will have a chance to do practical work in an alternative schooling situation and to find out for themselves if they can provide solutions.

There will be an open information meeting for the course Thursday Sept. 11 at 7 pm in room 2008, Wilson Hall, New College.

Under the Banner of Irish Studies, St. Michaels is instituting the course "Celtic Studies Through the Ages" (INM240).

Beginning with the Celtic literary revival in Ireland during the 20th century, the course will trace the survival of the Celtic culture for over two thousand years, and the expression of the Celtic consciousness in literature, history, folklore and myth.

Open to first year students one course aim will be to bridge the modern and medieval in literature.

The course is offered Mondays and Wednesdays 4 to 5 pm. Instructors include Robert O'Driscoll, Anne Dooley, Eugene Vinaver and Lorna Reynolds. For more information contact St. Michaels Registrar or Robert O'Driscoll, 964-1801.

The Independent Studies course will again be offered by Innis College for undergraduates in any year. The course invites creative proposals from students in fields of their own interest for full credit.

Students are matched up with one of six resource people with experience in a wide variety of fields. The course is conducted on a pass fail basis.

Some areas of study include alternative health care, community resources, social and political problems, human relations, education and Yoga.

Successful applications have included a study of immigrants under threat of deportation, Quiltmaking in Babylonian Times and the History of the Guitar in Europe.

Except for some group studies, all study arrangements are made individually. For further information, contact Renee Block, Innis College at 928-7271 or 928-2511.

Staff and students unite to fight government Cutbacks

By MARK JARVIS
for Canadian University Press
What has been described as a "disaster" in Ontario post-secondary financing has led to the formation of a Common Front for the Preservation of Education in Ottawa.

The Common Front, which consists of students, faculty and support staff at the three major post-secondary institutions in Ottawa, held its founding conference in late May.

The rationale for the Common Front isn't difficult to understand. Rather than fight separately for a share of an inadequate financial pie, the different groups came together to fight the government that fixes the size of the "pie".

The result in some places is quite a change from normal student-faculty relationships. The faculty in some places are beginning to realize that in times of trouble a tenure contract may mean very little, and that a united face must be presented against government pressure. On the other hand, they maintain their rather aloof stance from students. In Toronto, for instance, the faculty were in the ludicrous situation of at the same time courting the students for the Common Front and denying them a seat on committees that will decide faculty contractual situations.

But it isn't difficult to understand why the Common Front says the present amount of money allocated to post-secondary education is inadequate.

At Carleton University, where the Common Front originated, 62 support staff positions have been cut back. The St. Patrick's College library is being sold and the small liberal arts college itself is being integrated with the university, except for a few inter-disciplinary courses.

At Algonquin College, 22 administrators have been shuffled down to become faculty members. Faculty and staff positions left vacant through attrition are not being refilled. Untenured faculty members are being laid off.

At Ottawa University, a 72-page brief prepared by the administration says that the school is on the "brink of financial disaster". The brief also says that support staff dismissals are unavoidable, resulting in reduced services. The student-teacher ratio will be going up, and the campus will be operating on over a $1-million deficit budget next year.

Bob Fortin, the Carleton student who was elected President of the Common Front at its May Founding Conference, said that people organizing the Front realized from the onset that financial cutbacks affected not only people directly involved in education, but the whole community.

He said, "We are maintaining communication with labour groups, church and community groups." He hopes they will develop into active alliances.

All committees formed by the Front are open to interested members of the community, he said.

Ontario premier William Davis, and minister of Colleges and Universities James Auld, in attempting to justify the educational cutbacks, have repeatedly maintained that the public is disenchanted with post-secondary education. The Common Front does not believe this.

"I don't think that there is any 'disenchantment' with education. I think that a politician, in cutting back educational funding, might say that there is such a disenchantment, but that does not make it so," said Charles McCaffray, former vice-president academic at Algonquin College, in a speech to the Common Front. Though the Front was initiated as a reflex action against the financial cutbacks, its scope and aims have gone beyond that.

"We must be concerned with the improvement of and, ultimately, the re-orientation of education in general so that it can come to serve the needs of individuals in society rather than the interests of the dominant economic elites," said Carleton student Dorothy Kent in a paper presented to members present at the founding conference.

Part of this re-orientation calls for elected administrators. Members present at the founding conference agreed that, government appointees do not represent the views of the constituents, while elected administrators were seen to ensure some degree of accountability.

They also felt students, faculty and staff should have voting representation on the Board of Governors at each school.

The problem of accessibility was also raised at the conference. At present a disproportionate number of students enrolled at post-secondary schools in Canada come from families with above-average incomes.

To change this situation, the Common Front proposes that tuition fees be removed, and that "adequate living stipends be provided to students." They feel that the revenue required for this move is not beyond the province's reach.

"Raising the corporate taxes even slightly would provide the necessary revenue," commented Fortin. "What is really needed however, is a reassessment of priorities by the government."

"Post-secondary education should be a public service, like primary school," Kent explained.

Another Common Front position is that the provincial government should provide institutions with five year operating budgets.

"This would eliminate annual budgetary crises, and provide some stability for the institutions," said Fortin. At present, the Ontario government announces the level of operating assistance about five months prior to the start of the next fiscal year.

With regard to the upcoming Ontario elections, the Common Front will be conducting a media campaign, to stress the education issues which they feel are being underplayed by the various political parties.

Bob Buckingham, general secretary of the National Union of Students, feels this tactic will be effective.

"People in Ontario are coming to realize how severely these cutbacks are going to affect the future development of the province," he said. "The Davis government ploy of saying that people are 'disenchanted' with post-secondary is fooling nobody."

Fortin feels that, to be truly effective, the Common Front movement will have to spread. "They have to be organized at the campus level," he said. "Once the individual campuses organize themselves, we can start to think in terms of a broader alliance."

Kent emphasized the importance of the support staff in organizing a Common Front. "They are the ones who really understand the inner workings of a school," she said.

Summar Summery- All the committee news that fits

By PAUL McGRATH

Academic Affairs

Besides the infamous tenure proceedings, the committee, responsible for decisions concerning teaching, curriculum, standards and appeals recommended that:

- the title "University Prosecutor" under the new academic discipline code sounded too inquisitorial. It was changed to "University Discipline Counsel."

- to allow both the Faculties of Medicine and Applied Science and Engineering to require aspiring students to show "adequate ability" in the English language in a pre-admission interview.

- failure to maintain reasonable competence in teaching and research be sufficient grounds for terminating a faculty contract.

- the Library Sub-Committee, which formerly reported to the Governing Council, be replaced by an Advisory Committee on the University of Toronto Library System, a recommendation that has caused a small amount of discontent among the librarians of the federated colleges (St. Michael's, Trinity and Victoria.) The Advisory committee reports to the president of the university.

- any Victoria University student who commits an academic offence on Victoria property be prosecuted by Victoria and not the university.

Business Affairs

- The committee that deals with the business of the university, from hobnobbing with the corporate elite to deciding how many cubic feet of steam is needed for the winter, met four times over the summer, and, among other things, recommended:

- that student societies on campus be informed that they would be denied their second installment of fees collected for them by the university, unless the university's internal auditor was satisfied that proper books had been kept. This followed a report by the auditor, who discovered that 14 of the 27 societies audited had poor or non-existent bookkeeping. Internal Affairs and concurred with the recommendation and it was approved by Governing Council.

- that a $12,000 loan be guaranteed by the university, to the University of Toronto Riding School at Scarborough College, for the purchase of 11 horses.

- that room and board fees for University, New and Innis Colleges be raised an average of $200 each. Devonshire House, offering room only, rose only $60 for the entire year.

- that an eye be kept on the Toronto Historical Board's declaration of some U of T buildings as historical sites, lest it present some obstacles to university building plans.

External Affairs

The committee that deals with the outside world in matters such as public relations and fund-raising, performed the following functions:

- keeping tabs on the fund-raising drives for the U of T sesquicentennial.

- trying to ensure that more than last year's eight per cent of alumni contribute to the Varsity Fund.

- overlooking the dealings between the university and the surrounding neighbourhood, slightly strained at the moment.

- developing the idea of an on-campus information center geared to problems students find outside the university.

Planning and Resources

The committee that deals with the future and how affordable it is dealt with various topics, among them:

- the possibility that academic staff may soon be dealing with the province and not the individual universities when it comes to salary negotiations.

- the mechanisms for setting tuition fees, and the possibility that individual universities may take the initiative to set their own tuition fees if the government funding situation does not improve their ability to stay in the black.

- the provisions the university would have to make to avoid a deficit for the 1976-77 academic year, including attempts to balance the budget by non-replacement of staff that leave or retire from the university.

Internal Affairs

The Committee deals with the day-to-day workings of the services and groups on campus. This summer they dealt with:

- Non-Academic Discipline, a thorny subject that over the summer reached no conclusions on the subject of offenses such as vandalism and disruption of events on campus. They did, however, recommend another working group to replace themselves, a thoughtful move.

- Recognized campus clubs — the committee reported that no group on campus last year had been denied recognition for the current year.

- Incidental Fee Raises — applications were handled from Erindale College Students Union, Innis College Student Society and the Graduate Students Union for a hike in their fees.

Last Chance..

...to make sure qualified voters have been correctly included on the Ontario list of voters.

Revision of the Ontario list of voters for changes and additions ends in the Returning Office, Wednesday, September 10 at 9:00 p.m. EDT.

If you have not been enumerated, or you have found your name has been omitted from the list of voters, or there is an error on it, contact the Returning Officer of your Electoral District.

If you live in a rural area, and are qualified to vote, it's much easier if your name is on the list of voters. And there's still time to get on that list. However, qualified rural voters, not on the list by Election Day, may still vote by having a friend or neighbour on the same list "vouch" for them on oath.

Remember, it's your last chance to make sure you are included on the list of voters.

Any voters making a bona fide change of residence from one Electoral District to another may apply to the returning officer in the electoral district to which they have moved, to have their names transferred to that list. (Under section 29 of the Election Act).

HOUSING: SOME PROBLEMS

Housing situation tight and expensive around campus

University of Toronto's 10,000 students seeking off-campus housing faced a slightly improved housing situation from last year, but a tight and expensive market nonetheless.

Despite an increase in listing of accommodation from last year, chiefly a 15 per cent rise in apartments offered, Housing Director Shirley Mason said "It's the same old problem — money."

Students seeking accommodation near the St. George campus are competing for space in the city's core area, Mason said, where location is a major determinant of cost.

Mason also said due to the fact many students required accommodation for only eight months might be reflected in attempts by some landlords to extract the amount of a full year's rent during the school year.

jump the 25 per cent anticipated last year, the cost of renting is up about 10 per cent. From 1973 to 1974, rents increased an average of 22 per cent for the Toronto area.

Housing figures compiled by the Housing Service show rooms renting for $17 in 1972 are now approximately $27.50. A two bedroom apartment then renting for $185 now costs an average of $285.

This year, the Housing Service estimates, the average price for a one-bedroom apartment is more than $230. Even the most economical student accommodation, a room in a co-op house costs about $24.50 a week.

Mason is quick to point out that combining this with the Housing Service estimate of $19 weekly food costs yields a figure of $43.50, still three and a half dollars more than the $40 per week living allowance calculated by the Ontario Student Awards Program.

Students arriving in Toronto looking for housing in Toronto for the first time are "Horrified by the high cost," said Mason.

The most popular type of accommodation sought by students are bachelor apartments, but undoubtedly at an average cost of $170 monthly many students find shared accommodation to be more feasible.

Part of the slightly improved housing situation may be due to students who retained their last year's residence over the summer. There were more summer listings for sublets this year than before, which Mason said, "Don't move at all."

In the meantime, residences and Campus Co-op report they are full and have waiting lists. The Housing Service reports it had its busiest week last week, and that a considerable number of students are still seeking accommodation.

Housing Service director Shirley Mason points out the situation to a homeless student.

Big enough to sneeze in

One of the newest wrinkles to arrive on the housing scene is the phenomenon of "bachelorettes", but like many other "innovations" of the housing industry, they fail to make any contribution toward good, moderate priced rental accommodation.

Bachelorettes, or "luxury bachelors" are basically small rooms with small bathrooms, advertised as self-contained units. Most are cheaply furnished, including a small fridge, but contain no kitchen or cooking area.

Renting from $35-$60 per week or $160-$210 per month, rooms generally range from 110 to 150 square feet, excluding the bathroom. To offset the lack of space, most units are broadloomed and may contain air-conditioning and intercoms. Yet such features do little to mask an obvious attempt to exploit a desire for privacy and the housing shortage.

Recognizing the dubious nature of such housing, Toronto City Council has passed legislation to stop the spread of bachelorettes in the Annex and will prohibit them in other parts of the city by next fall.

Effective August 8, zoning regulations in the Annex have been changed, making it mandatory for any renovations adding two or more rooms to provide at least 220 square feet of floor space for self-contained dwelling units.

However, according to a brief presented to Council by the Annex Housing Working Group, as of July 50 older Annex houses had been converted or were in the process of conversion to luxury bachelor units. The Annex, one of the city's oldest low density residential areas, is bounded by Bloor Street, University Avenue, Bathurst Street and the CPR tracks to the north.

Renovations have been carried out through building permits issued for "Alterations to boarding and lodging house for use as same." In this way builders have been able to circumvent bylaws regulating the construction of self-contained units.

Houses are often totally gutted and renovated to create the maximum number of bachelor units as possible. As many as 24 bachelorettes may be found in some three-storey houses.

One third of all conversions in the Annex have been done by two individuals and their companies, the Annex Housing Work Group has found.

While recognizing a varying quality in types of bachelorettes, the brief says the majority contain inadequate space for their function, stating the average unit size to be between 100 and 150 square feet.

The National Housing Act calls for a minimum of 240 square feet for a living space designed for eating, sleeping and cooking. City by-laws prohibit cooking facilities in a room used for sleeping.

The brief states most bachelorettes have been constructed with less than two-thirds of this amount of space, and in renovators efforts to utilize "every last inch of income producing space," grotesque extremes are reached.

The Housing Group documented one case where the fridge was located in the bathroom of the unit and it was suggested that a hotplate could be placed on top of the fridge.

The group also reported finding closets only one foot deep, cupboards 2½" in depth and third floor rooms where because of walls meeting on an incline, it was barely possible to stand erect.

Besides the obvious objections to bachelorettes on space or health reasons, other causes for concern are raised.

Conversion of existing accommodation further displaced low and moderate income housing in the Annex, which according to the 1971 Census Tract Data was 80 per cent tenant households. The area has traditionally been a source of reasonably priced rooming house accommodation for students and working people.

It is estimated that the new bachelor units cost about twice as much as the units they replace. In replacing existing housing with that of lower calibre, they also pushed the Annex income mix towards higher income brackets.

Through their occupancy by the week or month and their cramped nature, bachelorettes encourage transience, and according to the Annex Housing Group and City of Toronto Planning staff conversion generally constitutes a deterioration of the area. The number of children in the Annex has been decreasing steadily, and conversion to bachelor units further reinforced this decline.

Bachelorettes listed at the University of Toronto Housing Service, on Brunswick and Howland Avenues and St. George Street proved to be somewhat larger than average, ranging from about 160 to 200 square feet, it is difficult to imagine a living in that amount of space for any length of time.

When asked about cooking facilities, rental agents said a hotplate could be provided. However no ventilation, space or sink is provided for this purpose. Pots and dishes must presumably be washed in a small bathroom sink.

Storage space consists solely of the small closet contained in the rooms. Any person having more than a bare minimum of possessions would obviously have had to find room for them.

Prices, viewed both in terms of space and student income, are exorbitant.

Good Morning! Smash!

Keep your eyes out for the Laz Silverstone Co. Ltd., they have a nasty habit of tearing your front windows out while you sleep.

Laz Silverstone is just one of the many corporate property owners in the campus area (who account for approximately 60 per cent of all housing here), and certainly one of the more friendly of the bunch, if the case of Lazar Rajee is anything to go by.

Lazar awoke one morning to find his window open a little wider than usual, with two workmen on the other side of it with crowbars holding the frame while dust settled around a hole in the wall.

Lazar was renting a room at 250 St. George St., which, along with the adjacent building, is apparently in the way of a 12-storey apartment building. Laz Silverstone has been waiting since November 1973 to tear down the building, but has had to step around city attempts to stop them by declaring the site a historical building, a move that has become quite popular lately with city politicians.

The company finally persuaded the Supreme Court of Ontario to force the city to issue a demolition permit, but before the city had done so, Laz Silverstone moved in the troops without as much as a good morning to the surprised tenants of both buildings.

Most of the reactions were just short of incredulous (How the hell do they do this? Who the hell do they think they are?), and of course the questions remain unanswered.

The tenants were quick enough to call their alderman, Ying Hope, who in turn called the police. Demolition was stopped, and the city has promised to lay charges against the company for the illegal action.

The status of the buildings is still uncertain. The city has a temporary stay of demolition, to allow the tenants time to move, but it is almost certain the buildings will come down.

The case is a good illustration of the shakiness of the housing situation in the Annex. Landlords are worried about rent controls and the 45-foot holding bylaw and want to move as quickly as possible on any piece of land that is already purchased and the plans set for. Laz Silverstone seems to know how fickle politicians can be and wanted to move as quickly as possible to make any further decision a question of shifting through rubble.

The maximum fine for tearing down a house before securing a demolition permit is $1,000. That'll hurt.

Joe Wright surveys the view from spacious bachelorette. This one goes for $175 a month.

AND SOME SOLUTIONS

Politicians offer watered-down rent controls as policy

Rent control is a funny business. While tenant organizers see it as the only way to stop rent "gouging" in the city, developers scatter from the market at the very mention of it, warning that it will only lead to a further shortage. But more people every day doubt the integrity of those operating in the housing market, and are looking to the government for a definitive housing program that will clear up the acute shortage.

Even though the three major parties in the upcoming election are promising various forms of rent review or control, tenant organizers in the city are not enthusiastic about the possibilities of strong action against landlords in the next few years.

"They all fall short," says Alvin Faught, chairman of the Federation of Metro Tenants Associations. Instead of a simple question of rent controls or review, Faught says the parties should be looking into a complete overhaul of the Landlord and Tenant Act, which he sees as one of the more toothless documents on the law-books.

"For instance, out of 109 clauses only five carry a penalty. The police refuse to enforce it, and the Attorney-General refuses to prosecute under it."

Faught's Federation was instrumental in inspiring the strongest rent control legislation ever suggested in Ontario, a city proposal that went to the province as a private member's bill early in the summer. The bill had been well-researched and was quite specific in its proposals. The rent control mechanism was to require two bodies, one to actually fix rents in the city, and another to handle reviews in the form of appeals from either tenants or landlords. The Federation was also adamant in its statement that these measures were only for an emergency period, and proposed a massive government housing programme to ease the shortage.

The bill went before the Private Bills Committee in late June. Like most committees at Queen's Park it was stacked with Conservatives, who were towing the government line on rent control. It was no surprise to any tenant's groups in the city that the bill was turned down.

The surprise came later in the summer, when the Davis government offered, almost immediately after calling the election, a rent review mechanism that would "shame" landlords by publicizing unjustified rent increases. The gambit was immediately attacked as "toothless" and criticism centered on the impossibility of finding a shameable landlord within fifty miles of Metro. Response was so scornful that the government found itself in the embarrassing position of having to plug the hole in the rent platform, which they did quite recently by giving the proposed review boards the authority to sue "gougers," the existence of whom they had previously denied knowledge of.

The alternate proposals from opposition parties come equipped with hamster teeth, neither approaching the biting capacity of the original city bill. The central issue is whether the mechanisms have the ability to roll back rents. The original admittedly pie-in-the-sky target date in the city bill was a roll-back to levels in June 1974.

Neither the Liberals nor the New Democrats have offered rent controls. The Liberals have suggested rent reviews, while the NDP has proposed a review board with power to act.

Poor organizing blocks effectiveness of rent strikes

What is it about the possibility of a rent strike that sends shivers down the spine of most tenants? There is no clear answer, but upon comparing the long list of publicly declared tenant grievances and the paltry list of strong reactions against landlords, it becomes apparent that most tenants in the city are determined not to allow leaky roofs, unjustified rent hikes, terminal dirt, poor security and peeling paint to stand in the way of popping the monthly blackmail in the box.

Probably the biggest contributor to a tenant's reticence to withhold rent is the image of standing out in the gutter holding all your belongings in place against the winter wind. This has been known to happen, simply because a landlord has the right to turf a tenant out for non-payment of rent, regardless of justification.

"The fact is, a rent strike is illegal," says Lee Zaslofsky of Downtown Action Group, "and most people stop right there."

Illegal or not, the philosophy is quite simple. If the landlord fails to comply with his terms of the lease, a tenant has the right to withhold rent. In practice the law works the other way, and has only recently been bent a little to allow that serious grievances having to do with maintenance and cleanliness may be sufficient grounds for a rent strike.

Because of the vagueries of the law and occasional overt intimidation by landlords, tenant action of this nature has been infrequent.

Various strikes or threats of strikes were carried on throughout the city in 1971, most of them involving public housing projects.

Because the landlord in these cases was the government, various degrees of satisfaction were obtained, but the actions failed to set any legal precedents and did not have the snowballing effect that was hoped for by tenant organizers in areas such as South of St. James Town.

Organizing from these actions was unsuccessful, and tenants remain unsure of their rights while buildings crumble around them. One set of grievances involved in a threatened rent strike on Prince Arthur Ave., just north of the campus, included non-functioning air-conditioning, cracked walls, dampness and flooding, poorly maintained garbage disposal and inadequate lighting in hall and stairways.

The most successful action by tenants involves an ongoing dispute between residents of an apartment building on West Lodge Ave. in the Queen-Lansdowne area, and the owners of the building, Pajelle Investments Ltd. The suit was initiated by tenants in January of last year with the tenants demanding that rent money be put aside in a trust fund to be used for repairs on the building.

In what amounts to a historic decision, the Ontario Supreme Court granted the tenants' demand, opening the door to legal justification for a rent strike. As far as is known this is the only victory of this nature and it is a small one. While tenants can now demand proper repairs and maintenance, they still have no redress for some of the more outrageous rent hikes that have been recently recorded, or for complaints of inadequate parking and security. If your building is uninhabitable, you have a chance, if it is unaffordable, you'll have to wait.

The original problem, one of organizing, still remains the prime roadblock to bringing concerted pressure on landlords. A roof and four walls are the most important commodities on the market these days, and the ones that people wish to tamper with the least. Organizers complain that not only do tenants have a laissez-faire attitude about shoddy treatment, but that they are often openly hostile to the idea of taking action. And few of them are optimistic about the future, preferring to look towards the government for relief from some of the well-documented cases of rent-gouging in the city.

Who makes the decisions around here?

University government a tangled web of committees

By BOB BETTS

Who runs U of T?
That should be a simple question to answer. After all who would want to have all the headaches Dr. John and his various minions deal with every day in running this $188 million multiversity.

But strange as it may seem, the decision-making process at U of T, like many other universities, is a tangled web of committees and administrative fiefdoms operated by a large army of pencil pushers and bureaucrats.

Many observers of the university scene disagree on who really wields power. Is it the president? Is it "Simcoe Circle" (the group of vice-presidents and senior administrators around the president)? Is it the deans and departmental chairmen? Is it the senior faculty?

The only sure answer is that it isn't the students.

Students got interested in university government during the radical ferment of the late sixties but long unsuccessful battles for staff-student parity have left students almost as isolated from decision-making as they were in the 1950's.

Taken student representatives have failed to make a real dent on any crucial decisions lacking voting power to win on all but the most insignificant issues.

Democracy???

A case in point is the recent two year battle for student representation on tenure committees.

Playing within the "rules of the game" the Students Administrative Council went through all the traditional channels, writing briefs, gathering support and making a tightly argued, well-supported case for student representation.

The campaign was so successful the Governing Council decided last March after a spirited debate to seat students, in spite of bitter faculty opposition.

But in the crazy Alice in Wonderland world of university politics a victory isn't a victory.

The faculty cried wolf.

The deans of the school of graduate studies and arts and science, the U of T's two largest divisions, stepped in and said the faculty wouldn't stand for the March decision.

Students don't have the maturity or judgment to make this kind of decision, they warned.

So much for democracy.

The council quickly reversed itself despite the pleas of its small contingent of student members (8 out of 50) and decided to reject the inclusion of a student member.

Notch up another one for the faculty Mafia.

But once you get past major policy decisions on issues such as discipline, financial priorities, general academic policy and university relations with the community, it is harder to find out where the power really lies.

The Governing Council has become the focus of whatever interest there is in campus political machinations.

But the experience of many frustrated students and faculty is that the council is more a smokescreen for what goes on behind closed doors, with real decisions made by a small group of senior faculty and administrators who share the same conservative assumptions of the university.

There is a maze of local government at U of T with departmental and faculty assemblies, and college councils. Students confront a bewildering array of different committees, many drowning in their own paper work and seemingly getting very little accomplished.

That is what is frustrating. If you want to change something, if you are really upset with an academic policy of U of T or just how the university mistreats its workers, it is difficult to know where the responsibility lies.

Bureaucrats will blame it on the committees, and the committees on the bureaucrats. So what's a poor plebian to do.

The Business end of the University

The business affairs committee of the governing council is where the corporate bigwigs appointed by Premier Bill get their chance to show off their skills.

The committee has for the past few years operated quietly, dealing principally with routine matters such as property management, pension funds, supervising financial affairs, approving major purchases, and giving the council a financial opinion of policy decisions made by other committees.

Discipline is internal's objective

Since the university isn't only for academic pursuits and even stodgy administrators have other responsibilities, we have an internal affairs committee.

Internal affairs has often acted more as a policing body than an administrative one, concerning itself in recent years with drafting disciplinary procedures. Students have consistently opposed non-academic discipline and the issue was temporarily dropped two years ago after strong opposition.

But recently there have been some minutes made dull reading for most but are usually faithfully perused by bleary-eyed Varsity reporters desperately trying to expose festering corruption.

Usually there isn't any. But U of T is no angel in its affairs, often winning the enmity of its employees (who are underpaid), its neighbours (who are now fighting expansion into the Sussex-Ulster area) and now even the Tories at Queens Park who have turned a deaf ear to Dr. John's pleas for more money.

signs that the administration wants the Governing Council to go ahead with some form of non-academic discipline, regardless of student opposition.

The code, passed in 1973, was intended to put a damper on student demonstrations and deal with discipline "problems" outside the academic sphere on campus.

Internal Affairs is also responsible for: recognizing campus groups, residences, campus services such as the health service, athletics, security and Hart House.

...and three more committees

The Planning and Resources Committee has a mandate so general everything really depends on what the members want to do.

Its responsibility is "reviewing council objectives and priorities of the university, initiate and terminate academic programs and deal with all other matters of major resource implications."

Since the university is in a period of financial cutbacks' planning and resources will have to make major decisions on the feasibility of various plans and present its own ideas on "rationalization".

The external affairs committee is responsible for dealing with the outside world, the great unwashed masses who pay the bill for academia.

In the past this area has been neglected because of the patronizing attitudes which characterized the university's dealing with the general public.

But now the crunch is on for money. The university is trying to polish its image by explaining the university's financial plight to the alumni and the public.

New enthusiasm is going into university public relations, trying to give the university a better community image.

But all this will go for naught if U of T operates as badly as they did over the planning of the athletic complex.

All decisions from other bodies must go through the executive committee before going to the full council. The executive also selects committee chairman, plans agendas, sets committee membership, assigns items of business and generally acts as council referee.

The U of T Act provides for open meetings. The executive committee is an exception to prove the rule.

Some people argue that the president and other top administrators are more willing to express their views freely in private session.

Academic affairs most important

The key committee from the students' point of view is also the one they have had the worst problems from academic affairs, the group that did their level best to scuttle student representation on tenure committees.

The committee spent most of its time last year debating that thorny question and it was here that students kept winning the arguments but losing the votes most consistently.

Having taken over most of the powers of the old senate, the committee is one of the most important in making academic decisions, although much of the responsibility is still delegated to divisions and faculties for internal policy decisions.

The workload for academic affairs has been so heavy that sub-committees deal with many areas including curriculum and standards, grading, appeal procedures, student awards, research and library administration. The committee must still meet more often than any other, sometimes on a weekly basis.

Survival with local bureaucracy

The Governing Council appears complicated but what really confuses most people is the bewildering proliferation of smaller local faculty and college councils and their committees.

Because responsibilities are often not clearly divided it may be impossible for a student at a given college to know who to complain to about a given issue. Should he or she go to the governing council, faculty council, college council or some other bureaucratic creature?

Since The Varsity has no wish to cause its readers to go to sleep prematurely, (we'll leave that to your ontological philosophy prof.), we will not describe in detail the complicated infrastructure below the Governing Council.

BUT, on the other hand, it is safe to say that all important decisions about nuts and bolts issues are made at departmental levels and then rubberstamped by decision making bodies.

If you have grievances about the course content of Philosophy 203, don't go to the Trinity College Council or the Arts and Science Faculty Council, go to the department and threaten to commit hari-kari in the offices if they don't listen to you.

But if you want to influence general decisions being made in each faculty or college, go to your student representatives at that level and find out what is going on.

College councils are generally preoccupied with management of their own pieces of terra firma on campus as well as trying to beef up course offerings to draw students to their cluttered halls. Innis is well known for its more exotic course offerings.

A good way to become involved in university government is to first penetrate a lower level. Local decision-making organs are usually "closer to the people" than the governing council, despite a minority student voice.

One of the fringe benefits of the U of T presidency, Dr. John's palatial Rosedale mansion. Slave quarters in back.

Outgunned students are frustrated on Governing Council

The Governing Council

In the beginning there was the Senate and the Board of Governors and the professors were happy and the students were happy and all was well.

Then students decided maybe they wanted a say in their education. But the senators and governors were loathe to give up their power.

Then the students started getting angry, and the university said we really want to satisfy you, let's have a unicameral structure and get rid of the senate and the board of governors. Then you'll be able to play the university government game too.

But the students wanted parity and that was too much. So the faculty and administration got their big Blue Queens Park friends to seat only 8 students on the new council. And behold there was the Governing Council. And the Blue politicians appointed their business friends to represent the populace. So now it was complete.

Students remain unhappy about more than their lack of seats. They have discovered sitting on committees is not the way to get things done at U of T. The Governing Council with its unwieldy committee structure usually acts to stifle rather than encourage debate at U of T.

The eight student members have found themselves outvoted and outgunned as they struggle to keep up with the heavy workload of sitting on standing committees, keeping in touch with constituents and carrying a full course load.

In contrast, faculty members often get a reduced teaching and research load if they sit on the council and many of the government and alumni appointees, usually prominent in business, can take part of their working days off.

Students, unlike others on council, have one-year terms (faculty, alumni and government appointees usually serve three years). This often means by the time a student member gets to know the ropes he or she is finished.

It all adds up to frustration as the two or three students on each working committee try to make some dent in the process.

In practice the full council meetings are usually just occasions to rubber stamp committee decisions, except on matters of major importance such as discipline and students on tenure committees.

Even then the committees are rarely overruled.

Many students who have served on the council have found that even representation doesn't automatically mean having a say in policy because councilors from outside U of T usually side with administration recommendations.

The other ironic thing about the council is that in spite of their small minority strength on council, students are by and large even more poorly represented on faculty and departmental councils, which make most of the decisions which affect every student's daily academic existence.

Top dogs on Mt. Parnassus

Nelson may lead faculty in unionization

One university figure who is under the gun right now is U of T faculty association president Bill Nelson, a tall, soft-spoken history professor from Texas.

Faculty members are becoming increasingly unhappy with their lot in university and have been talking about unionizing.

Many feel the Governing Council is taking too great a role in the running of the university and faculty members must band together and take a tough line on the protection of their status.

Evans the Godfather

The U of T's godfather is president John Evans, a former dean of the McMaster medical school who came to U of T three years ago.

Even his most vociferous opponents respect Evans for his excellent grasp of the issues. They denounce him as a technocrat and a centralizer.

Students have criticized his lack of action in opening up the decision-making process and democratizing the university.

Many faculty are alarmed at his willingness to overlook established traditions.

Evans himself is a task oriented president who has tried to attack some long term problems: the role of the colleges, duplications, the planning process and administrative procedures.

Nelson has the difficult job of trying to represent his groups as well as the reform minded faculty who would like to see a more democratic university and who favor more liberal reforms, not retrenchment. When called on, he serves as representative of faculty views on various questions.

The faculty association operates with a council structure, accountable to the membership. It is not a trade union yet and only makes representations on various issues to the administration.

Greene heads arts

Arts and Science Dean Bob Greene is at the helm of the largest and most varied faculty. His main worry is money and department heads who also worry about money.

Although he admits he would prefer teaching, the green dean has done a reasonable job in administering what has been the university's most volatile faculty.

The growth of the colleges by developing academic programs is one of the most important issues in the faculty.

Despite his friendly attitude towards students, Greene has stood in their way, excluding them from a more decisive role in the faculty.

The Second Banana?

An unknown quantity in Simcoe Hall is the new provost Donald Chant, who took over as second banana last July.

The provost is the administrator in charge of liaison between the faculties and divisions of the university and as vice-president reports directly to Evans.

Chant, a noted environmentalist, was the Chairman of the Zoology department. A popular administrator he served on several government committees including the Environmental Council of Canada. He was the founder of Pollution Probe.

His predecessor Don Forster left to become President at Guelph University. He was known as a knowledgeable but tough administrator who kept a close watch on everything at U of T.

Carpetbaggers in GC?

Typical of the business representatives on the Governing Council is chairman Malim Harding, head of Harding Carpets.

Harding has been chairman since the council came into existence three years ago and has ruled with a strong hand, acting as an aggressive rather than a passive chairman.

While he usually remains impartial, Harding has taken few pains recently to hide his irritation during recent debates over student representation on tenure committees.

A big red-faced man, Harding arrives at the council in style, in a chauffeur driven black limousine. He and the other business men on campus see their role as watch dogs making sure the university lives up to its role as a good corporate citizen.

University controls On campus boozing

By AMANDA HANSON
The long arm of the administration will now be reaching out to determine how you bend your elbow on campus.
As a result of changes in provincial liquor legislation last year, all campus liquor licences must be administered through a Canteen (master) licence held by the administration.
Individual rooms formerly licensed under special occasion permits must now be approved by the Liquor License Board of Ontario (LLBO) before being licensed for any event.
A grant total of 115 rooms have been included in applications for canteen licences, SAC services assistant Don Boynton said, but approval by the Liquor License Board of Ontario (LLBO) is still pending on all but five of them.
The Engineering Annex, the dining room in Ferguson Hall, Wilson Hall, the Refectory and the Arbor Room in Hart House have now been accepted and licensed as function rooms by the LLBO.
Director of Administrative Services, Alec Malcolm, said the LLBO and the fire marshal's office are still inspecting the other rooms to ensure safety and health regulations are met.
Boynton expressed frustration with the way the administration is working. "They have no policy, no idea of what they want, or how much they can spend on renovations. Everything is in limbo," he said.
The administration does not want to pay "initial operating expenses," said Boynton. "They will have to pay for repairs and they do not want to spend the necessary money."
Malcolm said the administration will cover necessary expenses, but SAC pubs will be "recoverly operations like parking lots".

Beer plans canned by Archie Hallett

By DAN MILLER
SAC plans for a pub to be held at the UC Refectory have been scrapped, due to "18th century thinking" on the part of University College Principal Archie Hallett, SAC services assistant Don Boynton charged yesterday.
According to Boynton, SAC's request to hold the pub at UC's cafeteria was turned down by Hallett "because he thought they were in competition with classes."
"That type of thinking is screwing pubs for students" Boynton said, pointing out that if students want to drink they can go to Bloor or Yonge streets.
Hallett said since the pub would open at three o'clock, it could be seen as competition to classes. "We're attempting to run a college and university here," Hallett said, adding "I'm not puritanical; I'm not against pubs."

Four dates were offered to SAC for the pub operation, Friday and Saturday at the start and finish of orientation, Hallett said. "My constraints suggest those four nights are most suitable."
Boynton said the proposal was "totally unacceptable" because the two dates conflicted with other orientation activities.
SAC now plans to shift the pub operation to the Engineering Annex.

Govt cutbacks issue in Ontario election

HAMILTON (CUP) — The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) will attempt to "get students involved" and make the financial cutbacks in post-secondary education an issue in the upcoming Ontario elections.

But the province-wide student union will not support the campaign of any particular party, or urge students to vote as an organized block.

This was the decision of the Fourth Annual OFS Conference held May 29 to June 1 at McMaster University, as strategy for the provincial elections, called this fall, became the major concern of 70 participants from 17 Ontario colleges, universities and student organizations.

A strong but ultimately unsuccessful movement developed within the conference — led by York, Trent, Brock, and Waterloo — to commit OFS to supporting the campaign of the Ontario NDP.

On the other side of the question, delegates from Carleton, University of Toronto graduate student union, and the OFS executive argued against adopting a partisan stance.

They said the correct role for the provincial union is to inform students of the party platforms and make the Davis government policy of financial cutbacks in post-secondary education an election issue.

Individual campuses and local student unions could support a party if they choose, but OFS should leave that decision to local unions, they argued.

York student president Dale Ritch disagreed, and led the move to have OFS endorse the NDP. He contended that "Just informing students of the platforms of the parties fails to come to grips with the responsibility of OFS to take a stand... to be neutral is to be politically bankrupt."

Ritch said the OFS has "both a right and a responsibility" to take a position and try to get it to the students." He conceded that the NDP "isn't perfect by any means" but that they were the only party with post-secondary education policies similar to OFS, and should be endorsed.

"By not taking a stand in favour of the NDP we are in fact saying to students that the NDP and the Liberals are the same, when in fact they are qualitatively different," he said.

OFS executive chairperson Barb Cameron rejected this argument, saying that although the NDP "has a solid program" the problem is the party's style of election campaigning. She presented a scenario in which OFS supports the NDP now while it comes the fall and the election, the party "waters-down" its platform to attract middle-class voters.

"The NDP would like to sleep with OFS," she said, "but wouldn't want to be seen leaving the motel."

She stressed that OFS and member councils should use the elections to raise issues of concern to students, and to raise the awareness of students about those issues, but said the provincial body had no real interest in trying to elect particular candidates or parties.

These opposing views were first advanced to the conference in a workshop session on Saturday afternoon, and when a straw vote was taken the result was a complete split — eight delegations in favour, with eight opposed.

At the full plenary session the following day, however, the vote revealed an overnight shift on the part of some delegates. The vote at that time saw 11 campuses reject supporting the NDP in favour of an "issues oriented" strategy, with five voting for NDP endorsement.

The motion which was passed called for OFS to "get students involved in the election so that student views and concerns are well-represented" and set as the main priority for the executive and staff of the organization "to educate and mobilize university and college students on each campus in individual riding efforts."

To implement this OFS plans to circulate questionnaires to all candidates regarding their views on post-secondary education issues, to attend and organize all-candidate meetings, to ensure that students are enumerated for the election and aware of where and how to vote, and to establish links with community and labour groups which OFS policies and whose policies OFS supports.

Delegates also agreed to plan a mass rally at Queen's Park sometime during the election to attract public attention to the issue of post-secondary education cutbacks.

Prof charged with assault

By JUSTIN CASS

Out of incidents surrounding the visit of a guest lecturer eighteen months ago, a U of T professor was bound over for trial Tuesday morning on a charge of common assault.

History professor Robert Bothwell, on sabbatical leave in Ottawa, has been charged by Philip Conlon, a clerk with CPR. The alleged assault took place during a lecture given by American professor Edward Banfield on March 12, 1974, at U of T.

Bothwell was also charged by Theresa Hibbert, but because of expert testimony for the prosecution given by Varsity reporter Robert (Ironsides) Bettson, the case was dismissed.

Rising to Bothwell's defence were History professor John Bliss, Political Science professor Walter Berns and graduate student Mark Cordover.

The eighteen month long preliminary hearing is being considered by the Guinness Book of Records for the longest mundane court proceedings in a ferris wheel.

The Banfield visit, in itself, provoked many long hours of debate and verbal harangues that, with this trial, are just beginning to die down.

Because of a law that protects professor Bothwell's civil rights, the Varsity is enjoined from saying anything further.

Banfield on the day in question.

Banfield and the right to speak

By MIKE EDWARDS

In March 1974, Professor Edward Banfield, University of Pennsylvania urbanologist, was invited to speak by the American Studies Committee. What he actually spoke about is a matter of some conjecture since, according to some, he was now allowed to speak at all.

Banfield's book, The Unheavenly City contained some interesting, and somewhat eccentric views on the problems of the city and how they could be solved. He described the US Black population as a "pathological culture", seemingly lower class by definition. He also advocated police control and birth control as viable solutions.

Banfield's visit came on the heels of an international symposium on racism at the U of T, in which he, and others like Arthur Jensen, were singled out as prime enemies.

Members of the leftist-oriented Students for a Democratic Society, had seized on the Banfield visit as an opportunity to organize like-minded individuals in opposition. In the course of events several threats were made concerning Banfield's right to speak at all.

Despite this, no real preparations to avoid ugly incidents were made by the American Studies Committee the U of T security forces, or anyone else.

The inevitable "ugly incident" took place on March 13, 1974, when supporters of the SDS managed to commandeer the stage of a morning lecture and effectively stopped Banfield's speaking.

The previous day, Banfield spoke at two separate events amid hostile questioning and much noise and hoopla. It was at the afternoon performance that charges of common assault were laid against History professor Robert Bothwell, currently on a sabbatical in Ottawa. Two SDS supporters, Philip Conlon and Theresa Hibbert, neither one from the U of T, laid separate charges of common assault. The case is still before the court.

As a result of the incident of the following day, two more SDS supporters, graduate students Tony Leah and Bill Schabas were charged with "conduct prejudicial to the interests of the university". They were tried amidst a fanfair of charges and counter charges of freedom of speech by CAPUT, a semi-defunct committee of Deans and Principals.

The question of academic discipline was already being discussed, and the non-viability of Caput was recognized by all parties to the debate. The Schabas and Leah trial proved to be a source of embarrassment to all concerned.

The Caput trial continued over the summer of 1974 and the two students were suspended for approximately five years apiece. Due to some public pressure the sentences were later reduced to two years, by a motion of the governing council.

The question of discipline has never really been resolved and will probably arise again as an issue at U of T.

The facts and figures involving the visit of professor Banfield 18 months ago are becoming a severe test on people's memories. But quite a few individuals still find it a source of political hay.

For that reason the trial, or "preliminary hearing" for professor Bothwell has a continued "camp" significance that may never really die out.

Where's the money?

14 student societies on the University of Toronto campus have been warned by the administration installment of fees unless they comply with a demand that they maintain proper accounting procedures.

The university's internal auditors discovered that during the 1973-1974 academic year societies were that they will be refused their second keeping poor books or no books at all. Four societies, including the Graduate Business Club submitted no books at all.

The Varsity is currently looking into the matter, and will ruthlessly expose any squandering of student money.

Probe probes issues

By CAITLIN KELLY
In the spirit of Mark Twain, most people love to talk about pollution but few seem to be doing anything about it. When members of Pollution Probe met with political candidates Monday, they found much agreement on the issue but decided to hold their breath until some thing is done.

Attending the forum were candidates from the St. George riding in the Sept. 18 provincial election, and an audience of around twenty. In attendance were: Lukin Robinson (NDP), Frank Vasiliakioti (PC), Margaret Campbell (Liberal), and Elizabeth Hill (Communist). Also participating in the debate were Dave Wood of the Alternative Energy Campaign and Dave Simmonds, Financial Coordinator of Pollution Probe.

Director of Probe and moderator Monty Hummel opened the discussion with the controversial subject of the Pickering Airport. All candidates were in opposition to the project.

Margaret Campbell felt there was no need for another airport. She felt existing traffic patterns could be re-arranged.

Vasiliakioti, speaking only for himself and not the PC's also voiced opposition to the airport.

Hill suggested that the railway system be expanded and utilized much more than it is at the present.

Robinson cited the disastrous results of other "two-system airports" such as the Charles de Gaulle outside Paris, and Chicago's O'Hare, stating that these inefficient examples were living proof of what will happen if Pickering is completed. "I think the notion of air flight under a distance of 300 miles is ridiculous," he added.

Hummel next posed the question of a 55 mile-an-hour speed limit in the interests of conserving energy. Again, all candidates were in agreement, although Vasiliakioti was more concerned with the decrease in accidents that would naturally follow.

Hill said she was in support of lowering the speed limit, although she felt it would not help to conserve energy. "It's the big companies that produce products that we don't need that waste energy. If it were nationalized, the use of energy would be for Canadian needs."

When asked if they would ban non-returnable bottles, all candidates said that they would, although Campbell cautioned against cutting off jobs.

Vasiliakioti said, "We'd ban them; anything that would benefit in bringing down prices... A few pennies here and there are important."

Hummel asked the candidates, "Do you or your parties have any specific schedules, funds or programs for reclamation centres?"

Vasiliakioti stated that the Ontario Conservative Party was committed to a 500 million dollar program for re-cycling waste. "We have developed the most comprehensive program in North America," he said, adding that there are plans to build seven plants in Ontario in the near future.

Hill in her comments was again critical of large corporations, saying they were largely responsible for the waste problem.

Campbell stated her frustration with the cases that are ready for court action, yet have not come to trial.

The issue of public access to information provoked heated discussion.

Campbell said that the Liberals have pledged to open books and records, such as those of Ontario Housing, to the public.

Lukin Robinson told of a bill introduced by Donald McDonald, Federal Energy Minister, that would make all documents available to anyone wishing to see them.

On the matter of occupational health hazards, Robinson and Hill were the most vocal. Robinson felt that all such problems should be a matter of collective bargaining by union workers. Hill said, "The big issue is environment. If a plant has a health hazard, that plant is closed and the workers get their wages until the proper anti-pollution devices are installed. Canada is the only country without legislation against asbestos contamination."

Service cuts at Robarts

By BOB COLLIER

The university library has just announced yet another series of cutbacks in their already reduced services. Due to a staff shortage caused by a university-wide hiring freeze only partial services will be offered after 6 pm on weekdays, during September and October.

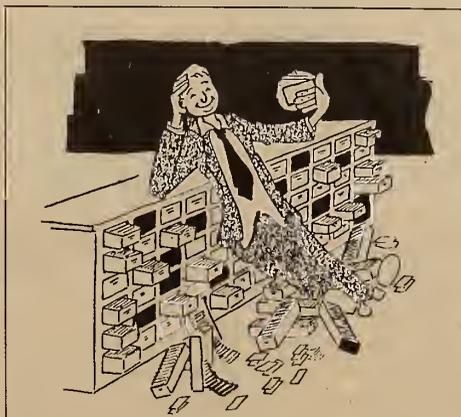

The circulation desk on the fourth floor will no longer be open during the restricted period.

Librarians will not retrieve books from the stacks and books on the various reserve and hold shelves will not be given out.

Temporary stack passes, reserve requests, and search requests will not be made.

The new cutbacks ignore the needs of part-time students, the community at large and members of other Ontario universities for whom the Robarts library was built at a cost of $45 million. Either they come before 6 pm, skipping work if need be, or they don't get to touch the books.

There's one advantage of the new hours, though. They refuse to hand out fines after 6.

Midnight Books Return

Full service to Robarts library users will be restored October 1, Robarts chief librarian R.H. Blackburn confirmed last night.

News of the restoration in service follows the circulation of a notice Monday to library users informing them that partial service only would be available until the end of October.

As a result of the increased hours, the library has also been allowed to hire seven more workers.

Staff shortage due to the university-wide hiring freeze was cited in the notice of partial services as the cause of the reduced hours.

"I am very pleased we have had many more positions unfrozen," Blackburn said.

But library workers union head Judy Darcy said, despite authorization to fill the seven vacancies, there is still doubt that the staff increase would equal the larger workload.

Blackburn admitted, "We will still be short in some sections," adding he had no idea whether authorization to restore full service indicated a softening of the university's attitude toward budget cuts.

Blackburn said full "summer" hours are usual until Oct. 1, but the extension until Oct. 31 had produced some uncertainty.

As a result of the announced partial services, the executive of the Arts and Science Students Union yesterday sent U of T president John Evans a letter protesting the reduction in hours.

In denouncing the reduced library services, the letter said the action would "severely and adversely affect the quality of education offered at this university."

Calling the adequate access to books "the highest priority," the letter called for an exemption for the Robarts circulation department from the hiring freeze and the immediate restoration of full circulation services.

Continuation of partial services meant no circulation desk services after 6:00 pm.

Books would not be available after 6:00 pm from the reserve shelves, telephone request shelf, temporary hold shelf or the closed theses area.

Starting Oct. 1, the library will be open until midnight every night of the week, with full circulation services until 10:00 pm. Book-charging service will continue until closing time. The library will be open Sundays at last.

By KRISTINE KING
The pressure is off "Introduction to Women's Studies" (INI 260) for the current academic year.

Arts and Science Dean Robert Greene reversed a June decision to reduce by one person the number of INI 260 instructors in time for the course to begin. The decision was based on low pre-enrollment figures and the general pressure to cut back university spending.

The news of a reduction in staff, arriving in late June, came as a severe jolt to the five-member collective of INI 260 who then organized to publicize the change and ask for outside support. The course is taught at Innis College.

The collective was concerned that their budget had been almost halved since the course began, eliminating a popular lecture series. Also, the retired member would not have sufficient time to find other employment.

A circular printed by the course instructors along with mention of the issue in a Helen Worthington column in the Toronto Star, resulted in at least 13 letters to the Dean demanding that the fifth member be reinstated. Among those who wrote were Ontario Libram MP Margaret Campbell and NDP leader Stephen Leavis.

Greene replied to all the letters, enclosing a copy of his letter to Margaret Campbell and also an article from the current issue of Homemaker's magazine titled "The Case Against Women's Studies".

The collective's circular charged that the Dean's action had taken away the college's decisive powers by overruling a democratic decision on the future and budget of INI 260. The decision left Innis only the responsibility of teaching the course.

Greene was displeased with the publicity.

"I was very uncomfortable about the political pressure," he said. "My position as Dean must resist political pressure, and there is a great deal of pressure against women's studies. I think it is a very serious mistake for people in the university to go outside to places like the legislature."

Greene was annoyed that the INI 260 instructors had not approached him before publishing the circular and did not send him a copy.

Asked to comment on the fact that the INI 260 budget had been halved, Greene said, "It's a very one-sided point of view."

"I've had long talks with Kate Armatage (one of the instructors), we've talked it out very thoroughly. The university is in a very difficult financial position. The student-staff ratio in this course is much better than in other courses. There are very few courses with 28 students per section."

Greene is aware that the collective is worried about the future of the course but says, "I'm worried about every department. I have to cut back 5 per cent of the budget of every single department. It doesn't seem like much but it will wreak havoc in programs. In the next year, when 4 and 5 people retire, they will not be replaced."

INI 260 was originally sponsored by Interdisciplinary Studies in 1971, one of the first courses in Canada on the subject of Women's Studies. Total enrollment in 1971-72 was 191. In addition the course exposed others to the topic through a lecture series open to the public. Attendance at the lectures was usually around 500.

As the course is the basis for all further studies in the women's program, the 5 instructors are particularly concerned with the attitude of the University to its survival. They look for a firmer commitment.

Greene is not personally against women's studies but thinks it should remain a minor program. He believes that women should concentrate on the harder subjects if they are going to bring about effective change in their social status. The same view is expressed in the Homemaker's article.

"I support women's studies very strongly," he says, and considers it "a very natural sympathy."

"It is a genuinely liberal and humane expansion of one's horizons."

Quiet please: Radio station on Standby until Fall 1976.

U of T Radio Spins Out

By MING MAR
Radio Varsity will not broadcast until September 1976 in order to give station officials time to prepare for an FM license. The news surprised the station's staff, even though the radio's board of directors had decided in late August to pursue this route. Until last Wednesday it was not known whether the Students' Administrative Council would concur. The SAC Executive Committee confirmed the station's decision Wednesday night.

Programming Director Paul Soni said the decision not to broadcast gave the station time to finish their application brief to the Canadian Radio and Television Commission before the deadline at the end of this month.

The station has been working on the FM license application throughout this summer, and now it will continue its efforts without distraction. Soni said the station's efforts would be directed towards developing new programming, preparing pilots, and training the staff.

Richard Lafferty, the managing director, has composed a letter notifying the volunteer staff that the radio will not broadcast next Monday as had been planned. The letter is scheduled for posting today.

The station had planned to broadcast on an interim basis until an FM license was granted. During the summer it had applied for a carrier current license which would have permitted it to broadcast into university buildings. The chance of getting the license were thought to be poor because SAC is not an incorporated body and Input Radio, which was to manage the system, is not student controlled.

The CRTC grants carrier current licenses only to student controlled bodies.

At best, Lafferty said, the station wouldn't be granted the carrier current license until December, one month before the FM license hearings. This, he pointed out, would interfere with their chances for an FM license.

Thus plans for interim broadcasting were scrapped. Lafferty says he will withdraw the carrier current application today, adding that CRTC should hand down a decision by March 1976.

One of the staff caught by surprise was the news director, Ian Roxan. He learned about it only the night before the first staff meeting. Soni phoned him late Wednesday night telling him not to get in touch with the news staff after it was too late to call off the meeting next day.

SAN FRANCISCO (CUP-ENS) — The hookers of San Francisco, and hundreds of others recently staged a huge ball. The ball was sponsored by the Coyote Organization, a sort of prostitute's union dedicated to legalizing prostitution.

The event drew over 1,000 people, paying between $10 and $25 a ticket, billed as the "social event of the year for heterosexuals, bisexuals, transsexuals, transexuals, and other minorities who feel they are discriminated against". The party will probably become a permanent feature of San Francisco's social season.

Costumes for the masquerade ball ranged from ties and tails to nothing at all. Proceeds from the event will go toward a bail bond fund for San Francisco prostitutes.

CANADA DOESN'T EXIST, STATES CANDIDATE SZOBOSZLOI

By HAZEL FARLEY
 An application for an Order of Mandamus to remove Pierre Trudeau, "Prime Minister to English Colony of Canada" has been dismissed by the Federal Court of Canada.
 Applicant Zoltan Szoboszloi, well-known scourge of Toronto law courts filed the application with the Federal Court asking that the Queen recall the Prime Minister to "Buck-King-Ham" Palace.
 Szoboszloi believes that Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Elizabeth II,

"Queen of England and Ireland," are involved in a royalist conspiracy to sell out Canada to the British and that they have in devious fashion unmercifully exploited the Canadian people.
 Other individuals cited in the application include the "Attorney General of the English Colony of Canada" and all members of the Justice Department of Canada.
 Szoboszloi refuses to recognize the existence of Canada as a country because his application for Canadian citizenship was turned down in April of this year.

 He will not swear allegiance to "a foreigner" (the Queen), he says, because it is nowhere stated that the Queen of the United Kingdom and Ireland is also the Queen of Canada.
 Szoboszloi requested in his application that adequate compensation be made available to all Indians, Eskimos, and immigrants, who he claims were imported under false pretenses, until the last penny taken from them under the "fraudulent Installation Oath" has been repaid.

Dunphy tightens up AA

Nothing happened at the Academic Affairs Committee meeting last night amid little fanfare and much non-asking of questions.
 The only high point was an admission by the new Chairman, history professor William Dunphy, that money is tight this year and extraneous reports will not be printed up in bulk.
 In addition, minutes are being printed on two sides of the paper.

One student member of this much revered committee of Governing Council was concerned at the volume of material to be read immediately prior to the meeting.
 Chairman Dunphy greeted new and returning members with a promise of long hours of discussion over marking schemes, foreign student visas and the evaluation of teaching. However most members were too shy to ask questions.

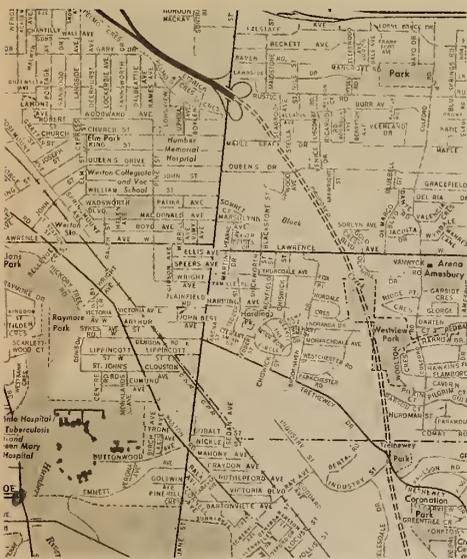

Varsity candidate for ombudsman, Elmo Primrose, hobnobs with Varsity editor (what's-his-name).

Primrose for Ombudsman

The university wants an ombudsman, somebody to look out for the little guy in the classroom, in the hallways, and under the table.
 All summer they've been looking for the person who has the proper blend of sensibility, empathy, laissez-faire and joie de vivre.
 We think we've found one. Elmo Primrose, an individual who is beholden to no one, who refuses to be compromised or bullied in any way. Primrose has been around for a long time, skulking around the steam tunnels and climbing the towers, trying to get the over and under view of what makes the university tick.
 The closest he's got so far is the sound of his Big Ben pocket watch, but give him a chance.
 The university needs a person, or close to one, who can maintain intimate contact with all sectors of the university, student councils, residence counsels, staff and faculty associations — all must be within his grasp and subject to his criticism and advice. And when this one advises you'd better listen and listen good. When Elmo struts his stuff, people watch and pay attention. The university cannot afford to overlook Primrose.
 What are his plans? How will he attempt to solve the many and varied problems in this great institution.

 "Blurch!," says Primrose, and rightfully so. This is just one example of his manner of cutting right to the heart of the problems.
 Get the two sides together to talk about it? "Hell no," says Primrose. Show one side out to Bracebridge, the other side to Wingham and tell them not to come back until they've had a good booze-up and forgotten the whole thing.
 Primrose has offered to chair any possibly acrimonious meeting with an iron fist, to deal with faculty and students on an impartial basis. He doesn't care who gets messed up, as long as things work out.
 Primrose has had experience with being the little guy. After a 5 to 10 sentence at Riverdale, he was paroled and re-entered society as a new person, but with the same problem, the fact that he isn't the most handsome fellow you've ever laid eyes on. His ugliness taught him humility, charity, and a burning desire to communicate despite being hampered by monosyllabic vocabulary.
 Primrose will be around campus today, surfacing and engaging in contact with the community. Keep your eyes open.

Highway 400 headed for lake?

Rally hears speakers denounce Expressway

Any group that tries to unite two parties during an election, must have a good reason. The Citizen's Transportation Coalition attempted that last Wednesday in trying to fight "the expressway dragon". Toronto Alderman Colin Vaughan, a featured speaker at a non-partisan rally led things off by warning that "The Spadina expressway is alive and well and pointed at the centre of the city."

Vaughan was joined by fellow city alderman Darcy Goldrick and twelve candidates in the provincial election. Because of Provincial Premier William Davis' apparent reversal on the Spadina and the Highway 400 extension, PC candidates were not invited.

Davis' decision to pave the Spadina roadway from Lawrence to Eglinton, sparked renewed interest in the fight against expressways by inner-city residents. Over 200 concerned citizens attended the meeting held in Earlscourt Park.

The delicate nature of the united front was demonstrated as NDP candidates continually challenged the Liberal party's wavering stance on expressways.

The Liberal party is in favor of the continuation of the "Davis ditch", but is opposed to any further encroachment of expressway traffic into the inner city.

The CTC, which combines anti-400 and anti-Spadina forces, sponsored the rally. The meeting was well attended by ethnic community representatives in response to a four-language leaflet.

The CTC is convinced that any heavy traffic entering the city will create its own pressure for a link-up with the Gardiner expressway.

Each speaker was allowed two minutes, after which the microphone was unceremoniously disconnected.

Alderman Darcy Goldrick stated that 10,000 people could be displaced by the southern extension of the 400, an obvious crisis when housing is so scarce. He also said that Davis' reversal is "purely a move of political expediency".

Goldrick claims that expressway promises will satisfy north Toronto ridings and thus aid the campaigns of conservative candidates Barbara Greene, Mel Lastman, and David Rotenberg in those ridings.

Alderman Colin Vaughan made a plea for more support and claimed it could be done. He stated that the previous anti-Spadina bloc of 20,000 citizens began in 1968 with a meeting of only ten people.

Vaughan drew attention to the differences between Toronto and other urban centres such as Detroit and Los Angeles. He said, "We live in the greatest city of North America... expressways will destroy this city." Vaughan also made passing reference to a cross-town expressway — a disquieting thought.

Wanna learn something new?

A. B. C. It's as simple as that. But to make it simpler, the Varsity is offering the first annual Anti-Class, a seminar in news-writing. Had enough of the lecture room? Then keep next Wednesday in mind at 2 pm.

The Varsity gratefully acknowledges all those who have come into the office to help out on assignments. We would like to see more. Some of the people in today's paper are first-time reporters, so you see it can't be all that difficult.

One of the problems however is that newcomers feel somewhat less than confident about their talents. In order to dispel such worry, Wednesday's seminar will concentrate on the ins and outs, ups and downs and around and under of news reporting. Starting with the basics, the questions to ask when you are first assigned to a story and working right up to the final editing, we will attempt to explain all the processes that should go into the writing of a good news story.

Emphasis will of course be given to the special problems of writing within the university environment. How to make a boring committee meeting suitable for the front page of the National Enquirer is a good start. We will touch on the lines of power within the university and how to tap these lines for information. As much as we sometimes seem to dwell on the structures within the university, we will also try to instruct on how to keep your eyes and ears open for the other little things that matter.

The seminar should be of special interest to those who are a little reticent about coming into the Varsity office because of lack of experience. It is intended as a primer, and we hope to see some new faces... Wednesday, September 18. Find out who the mystery guest lecture is.

Robarts job cuts pose security threat: Librarians lonely, says Huff

By MIKE EDWARDS

The Robarts Library could be the last place to look for a quiet place to study as a reduction in staff creates security problems on campus.

University vice-provost, Professor Peter Meincke raised the issue last May in a meeting of the Governing Council Library sub-committee.

There have been isolated instances of "anti-social behaviour", but according to G. W. Huff of the Physical Plant department, "There has been nothing drastic during the summer months."

Huff is in agreement with most people that reduced staff is the main problem. "People are going to feel more lonely, especially the women library workers late at night."

"Of course there's vandalism and petty theft all over campus, but five floors of the library are open to the public. The main complaint has just been the personal well-being of the late night staff. They want more people around," he added.

Ironically, the library worker's union is negotiating for better conditions at this moment. One major point of contention is staff reduction.

In addition, the U of T police force is considering reductions in staff to meet existing budgetary pressures. The cost of two permanent patrol officers in the library has been estimated at $55,000.

The library sub-committee is still discussing the problem. So far, suggestions for solutions other than increases in night staff have been electronic surveillance, coordinated efforts with Metro police, user registration, and attempts to increase student use in non-peak hours.

Recognition of campus groups delay until October, says DaFoe

By JAMIE KER

Fifteen campus groups will have to twirl their collective thumbs for another month while waiting for official campus recognition. Administrator Michael DaFoe has given last year's groups a temporary permit while waiting for the decision of Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee, due to hold its next meeting in October.

Official recognition by the university allows a campus group to include "University of Toronto" in their letterhead and, more significantly, gives them a cheap rate on campus meeting rooms.

The last group to fall from favour was the Students for a Democratic Society who, in March 1974, successfully disrupted a speech by University of Pennsylvania urbanologist, and supposed racist, Edward Banfield.

Since the group "violated the rights and freedoms of other members of the university," the Governing Council removed them from favour and sent them up to OISE to plan more disruptions at far greater cost to their bankroll.

However, no campus group was denied recognition last year, according to DaFoe and all 15 organizations who have re-applied have been given temporary permits until the final word comes through.

To be recognized, a campus organization has to supply a list of the executives, an address and a constitution. The group may have non-university members, but they are not allowed to vote, and all members of the university, staff or student, must be allowed to join.

Not just any club can be accepted though. The groups "objectives and activities... should be seen as attempting to contribute to the educational, recreational, social, or cultural values of the university." According to Simcoe Hall's published series of guidelines.

Dwindling budget for Health Service: Students OHIP'S now compulsory Amid concerns of a dwindling budget, the University Health Services still operates for the convenience of students. Only one factor has changed — the insistence on student user's coverage by OHIP.

Last year's operating budget was $600,000. Student fees, at $12 a shot, matches the OHIP contribution. Twenty percent of the budget was contributed from general funding of the University. The Health Service administration is concerned that this source of funds may be cut.

Approximately 180 cases a day are dealt with by the four general services — health, psychiatric, athletic and infirmary care.

General health service is designed to provide the same services as a family doctor, prepared to deal with any emotional or physical problem, including immunization, birth control, venereal disease, abortion counselling and sex education.

Service equivalent to those provided by six full-time doctors are provided by a number of part-time doctors.

The service is open from nine to five, five days a week and is on a first come first serve basis. The wait is usually no longer than twenty minutes.

The psychiatric service has a psychiatrist, psychologist and a social worker on staff. Emergencies are treated immediately, while less urgent cases will be treated within two or three days.

The infirmary is open twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week for students requiring over-night care.

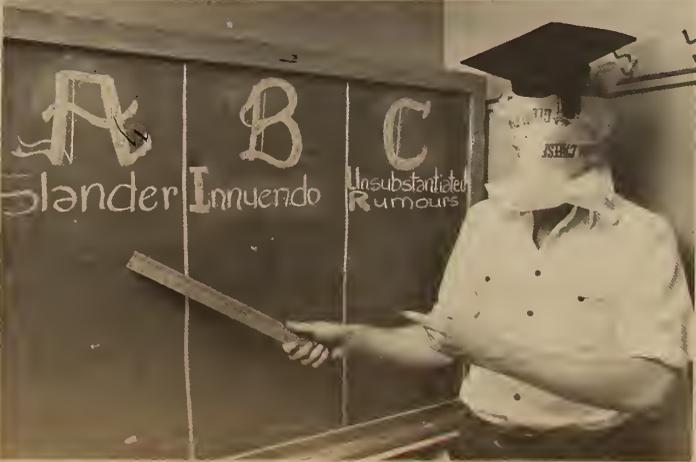

A charge of three dollars per day is made for infirmary care.

The athletic injury service is open from five to six o'clock Monday to Friday for students who sustain injuries through university sponsored athletics or physical education classes.

Some 10,700 individuals are treated annually. The staff of over 50 includes secretaries, nurses, doctors and cooks.

If you have an ache or pain, any trouble studying, or any other medical problem, including birth control, make use of this service. You are paying for it.

The Health service is located at 256 Huron Street, kiddy corner from the Pharmacy building. Phone 928-2439 for men and 928-2456 for women.

Sometimes we don't get no respect

A Varsity worker passing by the Faculty of Education during registration yesterday met a friend who had just spent the morning being run through the mill. The woman was almost in tears — the strain of popping in and out of lineups and of constantly shifting her schedule had forced her to give up finally.

If you've been through any similar mill — and it's hard to orient yourself to the university without a few such processes — you know the feeling of desperation that can grab you when it appears that some anonymous hand has your whole academic destiny worked out, and no pre-registration or self-made timetable will change the path you are slated for.

It's no good pointing out individual cases of abuse and bureaucratic harassment because in the long run individual people or faculties are not to blame. To shift the emphasis in that direction is to gloss over what happens at this university every hour of every day. For every one person that goes up close to tears there are ten who undergo the same problems but with a less apparent reaction.

Maybe the reaction will come later. Library books are stolen and vandalised, university property too. But the worst of it can be seen on the streets and in the hallways every day, that blank look on people's faces as they attempt to keep their head above water without the university's help, because they learned at the beginning that the university was a little too stuffed with paper and numbers to deal with its only rationale, the human student. These people will probably never rip up a library book, attack a professor or jam up the computers, but they are lost at the university.

It's not good enough to say that alienation is inevitable in a place this size. It's true that lineups are inevitable, that over-enrolment may cause human problems when it comes to choosing courses and that the student number, like death and taxes, will be with us always. It's true that the person at the receiving end of the line has to maintain some sort of detachment due to the enormous number of people he or she must deal with in the first two or three weeks.

But is it inevitable that at the end of the line a student gets the undeniable impression that the receivers don't care and that they are constantly changing the rules in an arbitrary manner? "Sorry," and "There's nothing I can do" are simply not good enough responses for someone who has just had a few rugs pulled out from underfoot.

No better is the anonymous way the university deals with people who stand outside their rules, people in exceptional circumstances. SAC, in dealing with a series of academic appeals over the summer, has discovered various quite horrendous stories of people who have faced a monumental series of blank faces and buck-passing in their attempts to gain admission to various faculties or schools on campus. Even before these people get a chance to try the university out, they are effectively told to take their story elsewhere, a story that only gets bigger and harder to handle with each successive put-off.

Respect is a corny word, but the operative one here. For the most part, students come here because they want to, and those people who deal with them on the everyday business level must keep in mind that their job is to help the student make the right choices and to keep as many doors open as possible. Passing on responsibility will not get that job done. The staff must grab that responsibility out of sheer willingness to help and out of respect for the student as a human being, and especially as one in the middle of something that may be just a little too big for the individual.

Students, keep your noses on. At times you may have to demand your rights, but if you deal with the people at the receiving end in a calm manner with your story in simple terms, there's every possibility that things will work out. Respect has to be a two-way street.

SAC hack responds to DRO: Badmouthing was justified

To The Editor:

Lesley Singer, DRO for St. Andrew-St. Patrick claims that she has gone out of her way to get students enumerated. John Bennett, the executive assistant for SAC replied, "Bullshit". There is no more suitable reply.

The situation points to a deliberate attempt to diffuse the student vote by encouraging them to vote in an area other than their permanent place of residence. Surely a student who might be living at the University of Toronto campus eight months per year for four years must see it as his/her permanent residence.

Look at the facts. Ads placed by the government encouraged students to vote by proxy in their parents' riding — a clear attempt to diffuse the student vote.

Enumerators came to the residences before the students moved in. Would they have enumerated an apartment building that had no tenants yet?

Finally, special enumerators were sent to sit in New College. But special enumerators can't enumerate you if you've been enumerated at your parents home. You need a revising officer. None have appeared on campus.

All of this is "going out of our way". How can a district returning officer go out of her way to get names on the list? That's her job!

People at SAC have been trying to get you enumerated. They have become entangled in a bureaucratic web beyond belief. Now it is in your hands.

Provincial policy governs universities. As students this election means a lot to you and to future students. U of T students must vote in numbers to be heard on educational policies in this election. Vote in your university riding. The system is stacked against you. Beat the system and get your vote.

You have until September 17 to get enumerated. That's the correct date — don't be misled by others. But to get enumerated you must state that you moved after the enumeration period and that you consider your permanent address to be your university address. SAC will help with directions, or will bus you there.

At this point only you can get your vote. Do it.

Bland Bill, the Man From Brampton— "weasel words" don't faze him at all

Any commentary on the provincial election should begin with the observation that Bill Davis' initials are the first and last letter of the word "bland." So there it is.

Indeed it is the jut-jawed immobility of the man from Brampton that adds the peculiar flavor to this campaign. He goes along in his merry way promising law and order, a fair return on investment, two cars in every garage and a helping hand for rents while the hopeful Bob Nixon throws "weasel-words" directly at him. They bounce right off, while Bland Bill brushes his cowlick aside and heads for the final roundup on September 18. Nothing, but nothing, seems to faze him.

That is the most menacing quality in Davis, the appearance that he is so used to power that he does not have to respond in any specific detail to attacks on his integrity and does not even have to appear human. Watch him on the news tonight, he'll be there for certain. Watch how his face never changes, how his voice rarely modulates. He could make the list of industrial deaths caused by the lack of safety laws sound like a reading of the minutes of the Business Affairs committee. And the fact is, his government has done little to prevent those deaths.

Watching Bob Nixon in action is another thing entirely. If nothing else, he's human. When he addresses a crowd he looks at them, he can memorize enough of his speech that his face isn't always screwed up in the process of reading, and there is a certain urgency when he talks about things that matter in anybody's book.

Some people have called Stephen Lewis a rabble-rouser. It is usually the case that people who are involved on the losing side of things can afford to shout in public, can afford to be deeply upset and shake visibly on stage while discussing motherhood issues. Does this make a rabble-rouser, or more politely, a "firebrand"? Hardly. It's just that the man hasn't had the taste of power, the necessity of couching his terms, of avoiding the truth or brushing it off.

Of what possible value is all this observation on stage appearance? Don't policies count? Yes, and newspapers should of course be pulling these policies apart and see where they lead. But stop a minute and look at these three men, they are asking for your vote. Could you talk comfortably to any of them for a period of time? Do they seem to have any understanding of your situation or have they been in politics so long that they no longer think in your terms? If you told a dead budgie joke, which would laugh the hardest? Then make your decision.

Ontario students cannot win election

If recent statements by the three party leaders are any indication, government policies towards post secondary education are unlikely to change much, no matter who gets elected.

Of course, spending in Ontario's many universities and colleges is no longer booming as it was in the huge expansion during the late sixties.

And most of this provincial campaign is being fought on bread and butter issues such as housing and the cost of living.

So recent interviews with representatives of the three Ontario parties by reporters from Canadian University Press and the Ontario Federation of Students produced few surprises.

Premier William Davis was the only leader who left open the possibility of a fee increase. He said he would refer the question to the Ontario Committee on University Affairs, an advisory council.

After his first election to power in 1971, Davis dropped an unexpected bombshell on students in the form of $100 increase. Since then his government has come under attack from student organizations for doing nothing about ensuring university accessibility for students from all economic classes.

Although Liberal leader Bob Nixon committed a Liberal government to no increase in tuition fees, he said he would not promise a larger share of the provincial budget for post-secondary education.

NDP leader, Stephen Lewis, also promised not to increase tuition fees but said his party's traditional support of abolition of tuition would depend on "a complete redistribution of spending priorities in the educational system."

Lewis claimed students are already a very select group and more funding would "legitimately raise questions."

All the leaders expressed a willingness to change the Ontario Student Assistance Plan but all were vague on particulars.

Davis admitted the $40 a week living allowance was not necessarily adequate. "It's something we've got to take a look at." But the premier rejected indexing the allowance to the cost of living.

The Liberal leader disagreed saying the allowances under OSAP should relate directly to the cost of living. The NDP's Lewis agreed but linked further reforms to overall government programs to increase accessibility.

Lewis and Nixon disagreed on the present formula financing system with Nixon favoring replacing it with bloc grants to universities administered by a central board. Lewis said the present system of grants based on enrollment "makes sense."

While Davis said student housing will probably become a priority again, he also said the living allowance might be altered if housing goes up by more than the ordinary percentage.

Lewis said the NDP would "go flat out on housing" for the whole province not just for students. "Of course these issues aren't mutually exclusive. If we were able to build 116,000 units a year the implications would be positive for students."

The NDP leader said he views education as "the route to social change" but the party was "struck by the number of anomalies" in the field. He said these were the "enormous amount of capital investment with questionable value, the clear and continuing class nature of post-secondary education and its undefined goals."

Davis on the other hand defended his government from charges of indiscriminate cutbacks. "We haven't any policy calculated to decrease the number of students going to university."

He admitted unease about problems facing graduating students. "It's got to be a short term thing. It has to be. If it isn't a short term thing, we're in trouble."

However, Nixon refused to commit himself to an increase in the $40 a week living allowance. "You say $40 is inadequate, well, maybe it is. But the only reason for improving it would be on the basis of too few job opportunities this summer," he said.

Nixon said recent "cutbacks" were not cutbacks at all but just less of an increase than the required amount. He said a Liberal government would establish a five-year funding program whereby institutions would have "the freedom to adjust their budgets and adjust their priorities to what the government of the day decides is its priority."

Residence students unite

Counter-contracts for residence students and organizing tenants' associations for those living off-campus were two of the suggestions put forward by the Student Tenants' Advocacy Conference held in Toronto August 23-24.

John Chenoweth, a Carleton student active in the Residence Association there, outlined their proposal for a counter-contract, designed as an alternative to the agreement presently being signed between students at Carleton University in Ottawa and the university administration.

Nelson Clarke, who works for the Parkdale Community Legal Services in Toronto, pointed out that the proposed agreement was a good one. "It seeks to gain for the students the basic rights of tenants as outlined in the Landlord-Tenant Act of Ontario. It correctly puts the university administration in the position of landlord," he said.

The Carleton students hope to have their counter-contract in effect for the 76-77 academic year.

Student representatives from a number of Ontario Colleges and universities attempted to outline the major problems of students as tenants.

The lack of any definite legal status under the Landlord-Tenant Act was seen as the biggest concern of residence students. This enables university administrations to enter rooms without notice and evict people, on most campuses, with as little as forty-eight hours notice. It was agreed that counter-contracts would provide the solution.

Grace Slick and Jefferson Starship gave everything they felt like at their Gardens concert, but it wasn't enough.

The Varsity —
Bob White

Starship concert: nothing's left when the feeling is gone

Some music is fragile; especially music where the interest is found in the expression of a personal feeling. When the feeling is gone there is no music left.

That is how I felt about the performance of the Jefferson Starship on September first. Grudgingly they churned out the songs that once meant something to them. The new songs from Red Octopus were clichés both musically and lyrically. The band that had been unsatisfied with the conventions and triviality of 60's pop music left the impression that they were now willing to tag along with the crowd. In short, the focus of their comeback bid is money — not music.

Grace Slick sang fairly well. Unfortunately for her we did not come to hear a passable female vocalist. We came to hear and see the great Grace Slick. For the most part she stayed in the background, only straying to the microphone occasionally between songs to say something trivial or incomprehensible.

Most of the songs were led by Marty Balin whose presence dominated the stage to the detriment of all concerned. Somehow he managed to make "If You Believed Like I Believe" sound more like a middle of the road Frank Sinatra number than a song by the Jefferson Airplane. With only the mildest provocation he insulted the audience, "Shaddup. We play what we want to play." The truth was that he did not want to play at all. Yet this egotist insisted on leading the band and singing its songs with no concern for the sentiments expressed or even for the metre in some cases. He really wanted to be somewhere else. My sentiments exactly.

What made the Starship's performance particularly insulting was that the other bands of the evening would have loved to play all night for us. Both the J. Geils Band and Gentle Giant gave us everything they had. The audience was appreciative but they fidgeted. They had come to see the Jefferson Starship.

There was a long grateful cheer as we first heard Grace Slick's voice in the darkness. For the first few songs we were on our feet. Then we sat down. Then a few people left. The trickle of disappointed fans continued throughout the rest of the performance.

Perhaps rock audiences are growing used to disappointments. It would be well to remember that the more mediocrity we accept the more we will get.

Chekov goes to Broadway - surprisingly, it works

The Actors Repertory Theatre (ART) at the Colonnade is Toronto's newest addition to professional theatre. English actors Susan Cox and Terence Durrant, the co-founders and artistic directors, want their theatre "to be a place where the audience is made to feel truly welcome. . . . We wish to generate some of the basic fun which is so often lacking in contemporary theatre."

In order to provide live entertainment of the most varied nature while utilizing their full potential as creative artists, Durrant and Cox are building up an ensemble company of actors, directors, designers, theatre technicians (and hopefully writers) who will work together on a permanent basis over an extended period of time.

Their first theatrical contribution, a Neil Simon play adapted from the short stories of Russian playwright Anton Chekov, sounds like a very risky venture. But the expertise demonstrated by ART delightfully transforms this essentially banal script into a vitalized performance.

The Good Doctor, running until Oct. 2, is based on eight Chekov stories, and has been moulded by Simon into a series of comic vignettes that explore facets of human nature. Wherever possible, the skits are liberally spiced with typical Simon Broadway one-liners and farce as different characters explore their raison d'être. The vignettes are held together by the 'writer' (Chekov-Simon) who introduces and narrates his work, shows us some of it, and acts in most of his own creations.

When it was performed on Broadway in 1973, The Good Doctor was originally written for a fairly large cast. The modified version that Raymond Clarke has directed for the Actors Repertory Theatre utilizes a three-member cast and a simpler stage design by William Chesney in order to make the production more effective in the small Colonnade Theatre.

The three performers move in and out of the action in mainly teasing and farcical vignettes.

Don MacQuarrie as the 'writer' cuts a very imposing and charming figure, but one suspects that his strength is derived more from his personal charisma and skill than from the script's actual character delineation. MacQuarrie also acts in seven of the eight skits but at times he doesn't demonstrate enough of a chameleon-like changeability to give individuality to each character. On the whole though, MacQuarrie is strikingly effective and gives impetus to the play.

In the skits, actor Brian Tree reveals his comic ability especially as an absurd professional drowner, and as a fanatic civil servant who wallows in apologetic despair to the point of suicide after he accidentally sneezes on his department minister in the theatre.

Because of the somewhat limited material, the third member of the ensemble, Susan Cox, doesn't get the opportunity to display as much of her ability. In this production anyway, broad comedy doesn't seem to be her forte, but she does demonstrate appealing dramatic talent as Nina the young provincial actress who is determined to audition before the great Chekov.

The Good Doctor is entertaining and quite suitable for a Broadway evening of chuckles and laughs but the subtle essence of Chekov's humour is undercut and diffused into Simon's brand of buffoonish comedy. The Actors Repertory Theatre, with their sensitivity and enthusiasm certainly makes the best of it.

Barbara Shainbaum

What does Altman have against non-groovers?

I've met a lot of people who have told me how great a film Robert Altman's Nashville is. Its release became a cover story for Time magazine, important reviewers outdid each other with superlatives, and now there are old Altman pictures showing all over town. I guess that makes Nashville a pretty important social event if not a major work of art.

When there is a lot of hoo-hah over a picture, as there is for this one, that alone pretty well establishes the film as some sort of classic, even if only for a few months. Large amounts of social energy are spent somehow reacting to whatever people think the movie is all about. In the case of Nashville, that's a depressing thought. This film is, among a lot of other things, an insult to the American people and their cultural counterparts in Canada. It may be a misrepresentation of character, but that's another story. It is certainly an insult.

Maybe the success of such a film depends on how much it panders to the viewer's need to feel superior to some vague group of slobs and morons. Or maybe just to identify with the filmmaker and feel so much more hip than the subjects of the movie, the ordinary working people of the United States. I suspect that what is meant by heaping praise on Altman's two and a half hour "epic of America" is really a measure of how liberal, sensitive, and magnificent the picture made someone feel. To steal an image from Altman's pal Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., the viewer feels like a canary in a cathouse. How noble. Maybe Altman should go back to the Renaissance where, of course, everyone was an artist seeking truth and beauty like him. Canary city.

I wish I could ignore all the remarks that Nashville is some sort of breakthrough and advance in cinema technique or whatever. Hollis Alpert in the Saturday Review actually declared that Altman "has moved the American film onto a new artistic high plane." Well, thank god, only artists will be making films now instead of morons.

But even aside from this peculiar narrative style, the film is a hack piece of work, full of as many visual clichés as a made-for-TV crime drama. Take, for instance, the bedroom scene between white gospel singer Lily Tomlin and groovy rock singer Keith Carradine. It's a truly sensitive piece of poetry-on-film; with their lovemaking over, and Carradine the hustler's passion gone, Lily Tomlin dresses and silently leaves the motel room.

Altman sums it all up in one artful shot, laden with meaning and metaphor. He cuts to, get this now, a shot of the tape recorder which had been playing Carradine's music as a soundtrack for their love scene. Just at that moment the tape runs out. The music ends and the empty reel stops spinning. Wow. I guess this must be some of that "hidden meaning" I heard about. This is the "new high plane" of American film.

He staged a large outdoor concert where all his big country and western music stars are to appear at a political benefit for some ill-defined and irrelevant U.S. Presidential candidate. To do this convincingly, he used a large crowd of real people, not actors. The film culminates when a Howdy Doody — lookalike assassin pulls out a gun and shoots not the Presidential candidate but the lovely and talented singer Barbara Jean. (Hey, isn't that a great country singer's name for you.) The assassin is apprehended and Barbara Jean is taken away bleeding heavily on her white dress. A cataonic silence falls over the crowd and a bleached-blonde stage to sing and keep the show going. The crowd sings along with her to a tune with the refrain "it don't worry me . . . it don't worry me." The film ends on an aerial view of this scene, the crowd singing along mildly stunned as if nothing more serious had happened than their favorite football team just lost a big game. What stupid, callous, horrible people these lumpy morons must be, what with their lawn chairs, beehive hairdos and all.

But in order to say this, whatever it exactly may be, Altman has stolen from these people their very souls with his rapacious, lusting cameras. He needed them all in their undershirted reality to make his vision look real. Ad it is their reality that he has stolen and claimed as his own.

Here's how he did it: he photographed them watching the concert and cut these photographs into sequence with others such as the assassin walking furtively into the crowd, Barbara Jean falling to the ground with some blood-red chemicals all over the front of her long white dress ("Cut! Let's try that again, this time you've gotta look more dazed. Don't forget, you've just been shot."). He got the people to sing his song for the cameras ("Great, that's great. You'll all be singing in the movie, so let's really hear it this time!"). When all these strips of film were assembled in the proper order, the impression is created that these people, whose authenticity is so minutely documented with newsreel-like hand-held camera shots, had just witnessed a senseless shooting with about as much compassion as a hot dog-on-a-stick.

Altman made these people look not like they are — whatever that may be — but what he wanted them to look like: a brutal, insensitive mass against which more sensitive souls like himself must struggle to make the world a more beautiful place.

True, Nashville is not a documentary but a work of fiction. It's actually not a bad story. But it rests on a promise of contempt for ordinary American people. It is the same contempt upon which other great works of fiction, the speeches of Richard Nixon, were based. Altman just happens to wear groovy denim shirts and jeans instead of frumpy business suits.

I guess that's probably why they call these people "middle Americans." They get it from both sides, from the Nixons and from the Altmans. Both try to claim them, but both hate them.

Denim with studs, embroidery, and beads makes 70's folk art

At one time jeans were strictly the property of the working man. No one else would be caught dead in them. After the 50's, when blue jeans got wide publicity on the backsides of rebel heroes like James Dean and Marlon Brando, they suddenly became the most easily identifiable trademark of a new generation.

Rugged, easy to wear, abhorred by parents, jeans had the appeal of rebelliousness on one hand and the security of being the national youth uniform on the other.

Meanwhile a century old company named Levi Strauss was laughing all the way to the bank over the bizarre conversion of millions of affluent kids to their merchandise, originally created for California mining prospectors.

And so the craze began. One of the great hypocrisies I remember was the prestigious "faded" look that implied an active and adventurous existence, although it was more often arrived at by numerous bleachings. Now such subterfuge has been rendered unnecessary by the wide availability of "pre-faded" denim products.

In fact whatever minute implications of rebellion were ever there have long since disappeared; society has assimilated blue jeans, so much so that denim is used by high fashion designers ("recycled" blue jeans sell for over $30 at Creed's) and is now enshrined as the basis of a new art form in the current exhibit at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

"Decorated Denim" is a collection of hand-decorated Levi jackets, jeans and skirts, all prize-winning entries in a contest sponsored by Levi Strauss and Co. two years ago in California.

What the company spotted and promoted through their contest was yet another trend in the evolution of blue jeans. Like ugly ducklings, once battered and faded garments have sprouted exotic plumage in the hands of their owners. Sequins, rhinestones, beads, bells, fur, feathers, velvet, satin and thread applied colorfully and inventively, create a flamboyant effect which reflects the 70's swing towards glitter and glamour.

The old uniform is still there but its anonymity is gone. Who could avoid standing out in a jacket studded with eleven pounds ($300 worth) of silver, brass and jewel-toned studs in addition to police whistle, desk bell and removable ashtray? This creation won $1,000 and a first prize for Bill Shire, a 23 year old Los Angeles bellmaker whose clientele includes such luminaries as Elton John and Chicago.

There was also the occasional political or social satire such as the "Watergate jeans" featuring appliqued Nixon heads staring at a gigantic zip-fly underneath the headlines: "I AM NOT A CROOK" and "THE BIG ZIP-FLY".

The exhibit describes itself as a new kind of folk art. In most cases the materials are everyday, the themes simple and expressive, and the practice widespread, answering a need for creativity and self-expression. As one man put it, "self-decoration is the new poor man's art."

Not only has there been great popular response to the exhibit, but one look around the gallery showed that the spectators were not the regular dignified artsy crowd. Children and teenagers were sprawled across the floor copying the designs, but more surprising was the appearance of numerous individuals who looked like they'd come right off Yonge St. The profusion of glitter and the piped-in rock music heightened this effect.

One of the aims of the gallery in the past few years has been to attract more of the community to its doors and to demonstrate that the visual arts are not the exclusive property of aesthetes and academics. Along with this has proceeded a more flexible definition of what constitutes artistic expression, often the closer this relates to daily experience the greater the popular appeal will be.

As at last spring's "Chairs" exhibit, some people might see only a kind of idiot's playground in this kind of show. Nevertheless "Decorated Denim" shows a high quality of workmanship and inventiveness which drew a very positive response of admiration and delight from everyone. If the art gallery is thus able to broaden its basis for appeal, more power to them.

The 18-month North American tour of "Decorated Denim" ends Sunday Sept. 14 at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Marvin Harris,
Cows, Pigs, Wars and Witches
Vintage $2.70

William Irwin Thompson, Passages About Earth
Harper Prenal, $2.25

Back in the not too distant past, when the razing of Simcoe Hall seemed like a distinct probability, we all agreed things had to change, but fast. North American life was on a disaster course, and we couldn't be permitted to consume and debilitate any longer.

We delighted in knocking heads over the means. Some argued the spiritual solution; change people's heads and they will correspondingly create a humane environment. Others argued material structures create the human problems, and must be changed first.

Glibly, we concluded the two were both necessary, since people acted on structures, which acted on people, and so on.

But for the individual, making a personal commitment to change usually meant accepting one of two quite different sets of values and assumptions.

The continuing differences between these values is excitingly demonstrated in Marvin Harris' Cows, Pigs, Wars and Witches, and William Irwin Thompson's Passages About Earth.

Harris is a distinguished anthropologist whose recent work, The Rise of Anthropological Theory, is a breathtaking survey of the forces which created anthropology. Cows, Pigs Wars and Witches claims there are rational, material explanations for social phenomena we have abandoned as inexplicable curiosities. Harris treats us to some delightful accounts of how, for example, pig worship makes complete ecological sense in one society, while just the opposite is true in another.

Harris argues that such curiosities as New Guinea's cargo cults, Kwakwaka'wakw potlaches, Indian cow reverence and Yanomamo militarism are all susceptible of a "banal or vulgar solution that rest on the ground, and that is built up out of guts, sex, energy, wind, rain, and other palpable and ordinary phenomena."

He doesn't think all our traditions are rational (he's no big fan of Christianity), but he does think they have some simple, material basis. Nor would he likely regard his explanation as definitive. What interest him are the broader conclusions to be drawn from these material explanations.

"If wars are caused by innate human killer instincts," says Harris, "then there is not much we can do about preventing them. If, on the other hand, wars are caused by practical conditions, and relationships, then we can reduce the threat of warfare by changing those conditions and relationships."

In other words, a material explanation is grounds for optimism.

Harris concludes that this mundane, objective analysis must apply to all our present problems, and that we could all do with a strong dose of scientific objectivity.

This launches him into a strong attack against the counter culture — those who minimize the importance of objectivity, and want to alter the world by altering consciousness.

Why? Because to shy away from making objective conclusions about the nature of reality is to lose the ability to make moral judgements, and hence to lose the ability to act morally.

"It is quite impossible to subvert objective knowledge without subverting the basis of moral judgements. If we cannot know with reasonable certainty who did what, when, and where, we can scarcely hope to render a moral account of ourselves," says Harris.

For example, Carlos Castaneda's hero Don Juan is "amoral" since he scoffs at the plight of urchins in the street, saying any one of them could become a 'man of knowledge'.

William Irwin Thompson is rapidly emerging as the doyen of the counter culture, hot on the heels of Theodore Roszack.

Thompson's first book, The Imagination of an Insurrection, was a novel account of the role of literature in inspiring the Dublin rebellion of 1916. His second book, At the Edge of History, was a stimulating account of his disillusionment with contemporary academia, and his search for new substance.

Thompson is looking for what he calls a "quantum leap in human culture," a spiritual transformation to lift us entirely out of the industrial-objective way of thinking. He sees us moving into a new "planetary culture", embodying (but for the time being, the mystical).

Our institutions, Thompson says, are no longer in step with the pattern of human growth. To search about for material remedies without spiritual solutions is "as hopeless as trying to power a new house with wires of rubber." Industrial civilization is in for a violent apocalypse, and "for those who lock all their psychic energy into dying forms, and rigidly resist the pulse of life, there is only death and the denial of life."

Thompson's personal voyage is no spaced-out odyssey, but a fascinating description of the intellectual allowing himself to seek the mystical. Eventually he finds it, in a tiny Scottish community called Findhorn, where "I visualized the etheric web of light and knew that there was a new civilization on the earth." Strong stuff from a former history professor — especially one who taught at York University!

But that's just what makes the book so powerful. Here are revealed the sheer guts of a man simply seeking the truth, unafraid to chronicle his own uneven voyage among those also groping after a new planetary vision — the archetypal Paolo Soleri, Aurelio Peccei of the Club of Rome, the German physicist von Weizsacker, and the Indian yogi Gropi Krishna.

Thompson is now running a small educational community off Long Island called the Lindsfarne Association, dedicated to articulating this new planetary vision.

Harris and Thompson are entirely opposed in their vision of the future. Harris urges us to plunge into material conditions and their material causes; Thompson urges us to leave them behind, and adopt a planetary mystique.

"not being able to distinguish between criminal and victim," says Harris, "We must advocate the total suspension of moral judgement." Thompson tells us that "mere political action, however well meaning, would only insulate society from the very cultural forces it needed to survive and evolve."

Both are superb books. The hapless reader will find Harris pulling him in one direction, Thompson in the other. Each is asking us for a total commitment to set of values. It is impossible to accept both simultaneously.

But for those of us who seldom make total commitments, both books raise problems. Can Harris seriously believe we are likely to be motivated by an entirely rational desire to comprehend material problems? And can Thompson honestly say we can simply abandon our present culture, like some hardy amphibian passing from water to land?

Both authors deserve a place close to the heart. I for one would gladly work beside Harris, and worship beside Thompson.

FUN AND GAMES AT THE

The French writer Guy Debord has argued in his work, The Society of the Spectacle, that capitalist society, the society of the commodity, turns reality into images and illusions, and turns images and illusions into reality. The result is a world where everything is a lie, where there is no vision except the dominant vision, no thought except the dominant thoughts, and no reality except the dominant reality. Appearances dominate everything, there is no sound except the "uninterrupted conversation which the present order maintains about itself, its laudatory monologue." The true becomes a moment of the false; "the permitted is absolutely opposed to the possible."

Toronto's CNE must be seen as an example par excellence of the Spectacle. Composed of layer upon layer of images, it incarnates virtually all of the social relations of this society.

To understand the Ex, it is therefore necessary to begin peeling off the images to examine them in a more critical light. (It is necessary, however, to experience them first in their context, for they have meaning only in relation to the other images with which they form an imitation of human society.) At the same time, the attempt to analyze it both in its specifics and as a whole must be fraught with difficulties, for one of the key aspects of the Spectacle is that it separates and divides everything, permitting no unity except the atomized unity it imposes.

Perhaps the most interesting thing about the Ex this year was the absence of the freak show. Embarrassed last year by revelations that a retarded child was being displayed as a freak (astonishingly, even a freak show can be embarrassed), it was quietly phased out this year. One can speculate that what it offered wasn't homogenized enough for the commercial image the Ex is seeking to perfect. Midway operators, we may be sure, are incapable of comprehending the revision that many decent people feel at the presence of a freak show, but they can translate such revision into the language they understand, that of the cash register. Freaks don't quite fit into the capitalist way of doing things, at any rate; they can't be mass-produced. (Although experiments in this direction have been carried out by mercury polluters, napalm warriors, and others with a scientific-organizational turn of mind.) But there was plenty to compensate for the missing freaks, from CN Tower cufflinks and jewelry to relaxo chairs ("Niagara Cyclo Massage: Miracle of Science"). The Food Building ("food" being generously defined as that which is wrapped in plastic and sold in supermarkets) offered such goodies as "All Canadian Wong Wing Chinese Frozen Food" (this particular delight to be found in Aisle D near the corner of Ziggy's) or Tiny Tom donuts rolled along an assembly line. (To remind you of the importance of the industrial working class?)

formidable obstacles. Judging from the cynical boredom on many of their faces, the odds of succeeding are poor.)

Adults looking for a model of living could turn to the Canadians with an International Touch display, which featured such cosy settings as the "Canadiana Family Room", complete with an artificial fireplace bearing a plaque that reads "HOME". Or you could try the "Irish bedsitng room" with the "Concise History of Irish Art" on the table and the picture of an Irish colleen (by William Davey of Scarborough) on the wall. Those seeking European distinction could copy the "Hungarian kitchen", an ultra-modern set-up complete with picture of Emperor Franz Josef on the counter. And for those who wanted to know how the Asian masses live, there was the broadloomed "Oriental Bathroom".

Meanwhile, those in search of culture could buy an encyclopedia at

EATS EATS EATS EATS

The food building at the C.N.E. rivals the feast scene in Fellini's Satyricon. I always thought I was a glutton, but seeing hundreds of Metro gourmands all together in one building turned my stomach right off. I didn't eat a thing. Not one greasy french fry passed my lips. Actually it was more like a combination of the whore house setting and the feast scene from Satyricon. A maze of dimly lit corridors, masses of faces engulfing grisly, over-priced food, the smell of grease and sugar. Mm-mm.

I caught glimpses of crouching figures in recessed doorways stuffing 40-cent pizza slices into their mouths, amidst piles of cardboard cups and half-eaten hamburgers.

Lovely bouncy families from Rockwell paintings approached and receded, with mustard and coke dripping down their chins, against a background of grinning hot dogs on huge advertising displays.

One Clairol shampoo-ad mother standing in front of the donut-making machine told her children they didn't really want any donuts. "Why that woman behind the counter could have been picking her nose while making the batter." The rosy-cheeked children, with fingers half-way up to noses, made disappointing faces and moved on.

Food companies in the Food Bldg. have discovered a new method of advertising and selling their product. You remember the old method, free samples. They've discarded the free sample approach — a thimble-sized cup of egg and banana drink was the only one I could discover.

There were a few counters with a solid battalion of people around them. I was unable to get near enough to discover what was going on, but it is possible that those hundred or so grouped in front of me were getting a free sample. No, over-pricing was the general mode this year — two strips of back bacon on a hamburger bun at 95 cents, 10-15 french fries at 40 cents. And as they say in the food business, everything was selling like hot-cakes.

Or if encyclopedias, micropedias, macropedias, books of knowledge, etc. weren't your cup of tea, you could always "Let Cultured Marble Beautify Your Home".

You take all this in, forced by the crowd to walk in a curious debilitating shuffle that wears you out faster than a day of hiking, and wonder when you'll get to the good parts. Finally you realize that this year again, all this monotonous variety is all there, you begin to examine your psyche for traits of latent masochism. The scenario ends with the victim, functionally lobotomized (how long ago?) repeating over and over, "It's only a movie, It's only a movie..."

LIFE KEEPS GETTING BETTER

The crowd at the Better Living Centre looks like a bunch of tourists who have inadvertently wandered into a department store. Might as well see the sights as long as we're here. All it needs is a tour guide (borrowed from Castles-on-the-Rhine Funtours, Inc.).

"On your left, ladies and gentlemen, the consummation of the washing machine maker's craft. Look at that zinc-coated cabinet! The range of colors almost equals the range of human emotion associated with the elemental act of washing — California Gold, Spanish Avocado, Cordoba Copper, Snow White!"

The surprising thing is that there is hardly any reaction from the onlookers. Bring on your color TV's by the hundreds, Vibra-matic reclining chairs, piezo-electric table lighters. The people just keep shuffling past, gawking dutifully. The objects could be fellow passengers on the subway for all the interest they arouse. There are no quickened pulses, no involuntary oaths and oaths at the sight of so much high-priced hardware. The color TV's and washing machines aren't there to be admired, but rather to be sold.

Out on the midway at least, the money-worries and petty details of getting by from day to day are forgotten. Blow ten bucks on the ringtoss and hamburgers, get giddy on a fast ride while AM hits blare in your ears, that's what people go to a carnival for. But the Better Living Centre brings you back to the world of paychecks, down payments, easy installment plans with 18 per cent annual interest. No wonder everyone looked so glum.

For those impressed by variety as well as florid prose, the Zenith TV exhibit is a favorite attraction. Zenith produces a staggering 48 models of color TV, 18 black and white models, and 31 different stereo systems. The connoisseur obligingly puts aside questions of necessity and utility, revelling instead in this limitless freedom of choice. How to choose between the "Heath" model (26" console with Space Command 1000 Remote Control — "this Country-styled console captures the look and spirit of rural individuality and vitality, from its flared overhanging top to its full contoured base with concealed casters") and the styled console designed to match the tempo of today's dynamic life-styles"? The chinch here, for those unacquainted with the lore, is that the Yorkshire does not offer Space Command 1000 Remote Control, a feature no self-respecting rural individualist would do without. Space Command 1000, let it be emphasized, is no ordinary channel-changer. Space Command 1000 comes equipped with new instant ZOOM. "Just press the ZOOM button and you get instant close-up. The ZOOM picture is 50 per cent larger. Just press the ZOOM button again and picture instantly returns to normal size." This represents, no doubt, the long-awaited beginning of citizen participation in television broadcasting.

Electrohome, with only 28 models of color TV, none boasting anything like Space Command 1000, had to come out second best. Sure, they have remote control with effortless, space-age convenience, but where's the ZOOM? And they come nowhere near the flights of literary fancy executed with such abandon by the Zenith copywriters. If you had a choice between "Warm Mediterranean styling" and "Sophisticated design" . . . Recessed black base has a subtle, cantilevered look . . . odds are the sophisticated, subtle, cantilevered base will win out.

Jane Simpson sat bolt upright. Drops of sweat lubricated her brow and trickled down her back. It was almost dawn. Silently she slipped down stairs, urged on by a summons too powerful to ignore.

She walked around the living room, cringing at the sight of a few strands of cat hair, a clump of dust in the corner, some paper clips under the coffee table. How many nights had she gone sleepless like this, wandering around the dark quiet house?

The urge grew stronger, overpowering her. With a few swift steps she was at the hall closet, now fumbling with the vacuum cleaner. A few seconds, I only need a few seconds, she thought, jabbing the plug into the outlet. She stood still for a moment, her heart pounding, breathing deeply.

She flicked the switch. A sound like the roar of a jet engine split the night's stillness. Quickly, frantically, she gobbled up the cat hair, the dust, the paper clips, and made several passes over the rug for good measure.

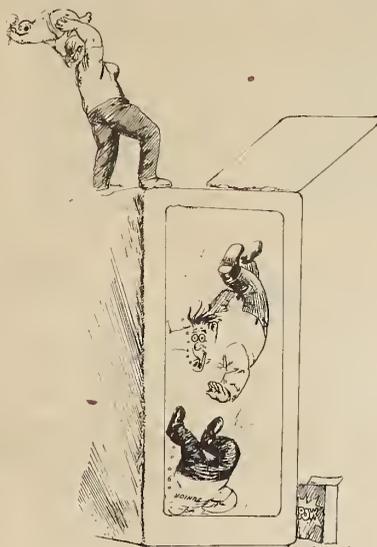

Silence again. Then she heard footsteps on the stairs. It was her husband Bill.

Bill descended the stairs heavily. He had dark circles under his eyes. He fixed her with the gaze of a tired and puzzled man. "We can't go on like this, Jane. It's either a divorce . . . or Filtrex."

She threw herself into his arms. "Oh Bill," she sobbed with joy, "Filtrex, Filtrex, Filtrex!"

After a hard day appreciating the many attractions of modern consumer technology, we settled down in the courtyard of the Better Living Centre for a much-needed burger. The burgers, appropriately enough, were prepared by a newfangled microwave oven such as we had seen only moments before. But now, for a paltry 75 cents, we had the opportunity to examine the object in its natural habitat. We were about to move from voyeurism to participation, from better living in the abstract to better living in the concrete. Alas! As it turned out, concrete might have been preferable. The burger itself was of the consistency of warmed-over lumpy plasticine. The bun was soggy enough to be what was left over of the other brand in a paper-towel ad. It was the kind of food you do your best to ignore while stuffing it down your gullet. Sadly we looked at the microwave oven, its promise betrayed. The humid plastic bag in which the burger had supposedly been rendered fit for human consumption lay on our table like a reproach. The advantages of better living, it seemed, were being garnered by the operator of the burger stand, who could, with the aid of the microwave oven, churn out more burgers in less time than previously, thereby (ho hum) making greater profits. And profits, don't forget, are the key to more and more better living. Next year, perhaps, will see the advent of the soggy warmed-over intravenous burger. I can hardly wait.

A CNE PILGRIMAGE

It's fairly easy to construct an image of the typical pilgrim to the CNE: surely some kind of urbanized yokee, irresistibly drawn to this Mecca of garish schlock to gape at the banal rituals of commodity fetishism.

Unfortunately, such an image, satisfying as it may be, doesn't quite fit the facts. Indeed, it is a moot point whether more people come to the Ex to gawk or to mock. But it is hardly debatable that the Ex, for one reason or another, continues to successfully attract most of us — high brow, low brow, or whoever.

The annual pilgrimage of the scoffers seems most perplexing. After all, it is scarcely plausible to suppose that the elite, Toronto's cultural vanguard, flock to the Ex only to tune the delicate instruments of their critical discrimination. The fact of the matter is, the subtle nuances of cultural sensitivity tend to be no more than superfluous encumbrances once you pass beneath the pretentious splendour — or is it splendid pretentiousness? — of the Princes' Gates. And one doesn't really need to be groomed in a hothouse university atmosphere of intellectual snobbery to develop well-bred contempt for the Ex, which fairly struts its brazen vulgarity. Bad taste at the CNE isn't something you have to seek out and expose — your face is rubbed in it from the moment you walk through the turnstiles. From Bulova Tower to Carlsberg Carillon, from the lowliest hotdog stand to the solemn majesty of the Better Living Centre, the place fairly reeks of french-fried crassness. You would need the bovine compassion of Jesus (or be deaf and blind) to keep from sneering.

But 3.3 million paid admissions — with the stress on the paid, of course — that is nothing to sneer at. It was certainly enough to impress the Globe and Mail's editors, who know what the measure of quality is. The flow of dollars was enough to move the dour storekeepers in the Globe's editorial rooms to devote one of their 'folksy' editorials to the simple virtues of the Ex. (Inevitably, the piece was enough to make a catatonic wince — nothing grates the nerves more than the Globe trying to display what it conceives to be the common touch.)

But in a curious way the Globe is right, if for entirely the wrong reasons, when it claims that with 3.3 million paid admissions — paid, mind you! One can almost hear the cash-register between Paul Godfrey's ears jangling! — the Ex must have something going for it. What the Globe somehow grasped, in its own distorted way, is that the Ex does stand in some tangible relation to human wants, that it represents a response to the need we all have for entertainment and fun. As for the idea that this cotton-candy-and-icy-sno-cones wasteland is an admirable way of meeting these needs — well, that is as stark an illustration as one could unearth of how tenuous a grip on reality the Globe's editorial writers have.

But the point is that cultured disdain for the Ex is rather foolish. People go because there is nothing better to go to. Self-righteous criticism within this one-dimensional empire of the cash register upon which the sun never sets becomes as superficial as that at which it jeers. There is no alternative.

Indeed, the Exhibition is merely a more concentrated and blatant expression of the essence of the society of which it is a part, masquerading, with exquisite irony, as an escape from that society. It is a society that seeks to reduce everything — food, shelter, entertainment, sex — to the single common denominator of cash value. Everything must become a commodity. Nothing can escape. The result is a most paradoxical and contradictory — and therefore most hegemonic — form of religion, a religion in which nothing is sacred, in which everything is profaned.

It is the expendability of any value except money-value that makes the new religion — Marx called it commodity fetishism — so totally pervasive. The old God was a righteous God and a jealous God who was not mocked. The new God of commodity fetishism is quite willing to be mocked if a profit can thereby be made, although one could argue that in a sense it makes mockery impossible because its own daily self-portrayal is more grotesque and absurd than any conceivable satire.

Be that as it may, it is certain that it feels that it has nothing to fear. Where the God of the Jews and Christians had to insist so strenuously that He was the One and Only God precisely because there were so many potential rivals who seemed attractive to the people of the time, the new religion has no rivals. It has destroyed the very possibility, the very thought of an alternative. It is as if the golden calf, the graven image, had not merely conquered the God of the Old Testament, but swallowed Him, whole and complete.

One virtue of this is that the majority at least come to see that the old gods are not merely dead, but transformed into their opposites, as indeed the systems of pseudo-negation that the religion of commodity fetishism once seriously portrayed as the only possible alternative: the bureaucratic parodies of Communism that prevail in Russia and China. At one time they served their purpose as the Devil who would swallow our immortal souls if we weakened in our allegiance to what Guy Debor had called the Society of the Spectacle. If these caricatures of the liberatory ideas of Karl Marx were the only other choice, then indeed there was no choice.

But Satan has come to the CNE, and we see that He is but another version of the one true religion. We can buy hammer-and-sickle T-shirts at the USSR Bazaar in the Better Living Centre, or check out The People's Republic of China booth in the Queen Elizabeth building, where we are offered a "Unique Opportunity: Special Prices for CNE '75." Plus an exchange — Karl Marx has been translated for the modern world by Lenin, Stalin, and Mao, and he too has been transformed into his opposite. But in bringing the exemplars of "socialist" commodity fetishism to the Ex, (it's profitable, after all) the empire of the cash register is depriving itself of its formerly so carefully nurtured mock-enemy of mock-Communism. (Which is not to say that the rivalry wasn't real enough; thieves are always prone to fight over the spoils.)

While this is not enough to cause the ideas of Marx to re-emerge in more than a few cracks in the system, the potential is still there. Marxism, after all, is based on real relations. Thus, for example alienation is portrayed in its total essence at the Ex, where workers reappear as potential consumers to be confronted by temples of consumption crammed with the goods they collectively produced. The opulent poverty of a society that turns everything it touches to gold, and thereby destroys all life, and perverts all human needs, could not be more evident. From it, there is no sanctuary — even the beautiful becomes a moment of the ugly. But when there is no escape, the only choice is to die — or to turn and fight.

MUZAK HATH CHARMS

"If you've got two digits left on either hand, you can play like E. Power Biggs in two weeks." At this point the man with the flame-red jacket and the Macleans' smile pushes the rhythm button and out comes a slow samba, followed by an electronic bass line and the "Genie Magic Chording". Now comes the difficult part, the customer is actually expected to play. That's where this particular salesman loses most of his sales.

Most people would like to be musicians, if only in their own living room. This salesman and those who put him up to his treacherous three-week engagement at the Better Living Centre know that his secret desire resides in even the most tone-deaf of all true petit bourgeois, and his job is to make it as mystically painless as possible. The trick is to offer the customer instant artistic credibility by removing as many of those unnecessary obstacles to genius as possible, amounting to anything that might imply comprehension of the musical process. All you need to know is the melody, and you can't get lost because the keys are all lettered.

The Better Living Centre at the CNE this year contained no less than five separate organ centres, all complete with a handful of salesmen to show you how simple the entire process is. Although I waited an hour, I not once saw any of these salesmen pull off his socks for a toe solo, but they tried just about everything, including one particularly revolting performance by a salesman who pretended to be somewhere the other side of nirvana while an elderly lady performed an unspeakable practice upon the music of J.S. Bach.

One has to remember that these salesmen are there to sell organs first and music second, if they can sell you the former while convincing you that you need know nothing of the latter, they've got it made. The more memorable performances along this line were from the Lowrey organ people, whose salesmen must have undergone months of training to exude that proper air of bubbling effusiveness, presumably the result of that high that only simple music played simply can bring. The bubblest of the bunch put on a five-minute display of the wonders of three keyboard models, including the above-mentioned features, while pulling people out of the crowd to convince them that this music biz is as simple as cleaning your husband's underwear, and much more sanitary. Once you flick all the color-coded buttons, (blue for ballads, red for the snappy up-tempo numbers), set the rhythm accordingly, draw the tone bars and choose a hard-charging bass line, you are ready for a musical experience that you never dreamed possible until you walked in the door. But that's what Better Living is all about, isn't it?

Milstein's Bach is highly personal

Bach's three pairs of sonatas and partitas for the solo violin represent a high point in musical creativity. Paced with the strict technical limitations of the instrument — four strings and a limited range of notes — Bach wrote one of the most enduring masterpieces of the Baroque era. The solo violin music will never stand beside the Brandenburg Concerti, the Water Music or the Messiah in terms of mass popularity, but for the listener who wants to get as clear an understanding of the greatness of Bach as possible, this music is essential.

As might be guessed, the technical demands the music makes on the player are formidable. Consider, for a moment, the complexities of playing a three-voice fugue on a single instrument: not hard on a keyboard, but on a fingerboard, the task is rather difficult. Each Sonata is cast in a strict form, and they are on the whole, more severe and brooding than the accompanying partitas, which are suites of dance-like movements. One movement of the second partita, in D minor, however, must be the most famous single piece for solo violin: the Chaconne. It takes close to thirteen minutes to play and is arguably the finest thing Bach ever wrote.

Every major violinist makes some of the movements from the cycle a part of his or her repertoire, and a few make a point of playing all the works complete. Jascha Heifitz made the Chaconne his "signature piece" for many years, assuring the music a permanent place in the popular repertoire. Recently, Nathan Milstein has been playing the sonatas and partitas, and, happily, DG has captured his interpretation on three well-pressed records.

The microphone is, of course, an unrelenting listener, and deviations from absolute perfection that one would never notice in the concert hall seem much more glaring on disc. Not that Milstein is guilty of wrong notes or gross mistakes in his interpretation; any errors, as such, could be excised in a retake at the studio. Rather, his viewpoint on the music is highly personal. Compared to the rock-steady tempos of Heifitz, or the somewhat detached approach of Henryk Sjering, he appears as a swooping romantic. The overall picture that emerges is anything but unattractive. Milstein's Bach is accurate, technically polished, and especially gorgeous in tone. But it's also a highly individualistic reading; when you hear this man play, you have no doubt that it's his rendition. Like an Olivier making one of the great Shakespeare roles his own, Milstein has given us a distinctive view of Bach's solo violin music. Played with conviction and reverence for the music, the integrity of his performance cannot be denied; that this very personal view of Bach will be rejected by some is also inevitable. For, while Milstein avoids the cold results so often achieved by well-intentioned play-it-just-like-it-was-originally-played performer musicologists, these performances just won't appeal to all tastes.

And I suppose all this long-winded meandering is just a lead-up to saying that it doesn't satisfy my tastes. In the end, though, this runs straight up against the major problem in music criticism. Just who is the critic writing for? These records are so skillfully played, so exquisite in tone, that to knock them is pointless. Perhaps it's just as well to let it go at this: Milstein's Bach won't please everybody; ultimately, it didn't please me; but there's every chance that it might please you. It's records like these that really place the critic on the point of the sword. There will now be a short break while I go ram my head against the wall.

Nelson Freire Plays Chopin
Nelson Freire, Piano
Telefunken 641847 AW, $8.98

Every so often, a musician pops up whose technique encompasses everything: it's as if he or she has, at the end of the arms, two custom-crafted automatons that can do anything. Pianists who can play the notes are a dime a dozen, and there are more than a few whose technique is impressive, to say the least. But in the top stratum, there are just a few. These are the pianists to whom nothing is unplayable; the Liszt Sonata is just another piece to play... the Brahms 2 is a romp with an orchestra. Nelson Freire is one of those pianists.

He has appeared on disc before: in a much-heard Columbia disc of some years ago, he stunned many a set of ears with his Tchaikovsky no. 1. But this is the first appearance I've seen of his on Telefunken, a medium sized European label best known for masterful Bach releases. Titled simply Nelson Freire Plays Chopin (trillingly titled, no less), we get six very well known items, laid out in recital-style order. This is a nice touch; too many many piano discs are assembled from studio takes with little thought given to the aural appearance of the finished product. The Polonaise no. 6 leads off side 1, followed by the Ballade in A flat. The remaining four pieces are equally well-known (if you don't know the titles, you're sure to know the music) and in taking on a group of warhorses such as this, Freire has set himself a test, since every pianist of merit since the invention of recording has had his or her way

Beach Boys: a hardy perennial

Like Frank Sinatra, the Beach Boys thrive in times that have little musical to offer to their old fans. At their two Grandstand appearances on August 30, they attracted capacity crowds who happily attended this revival meeting for social formalism, a reminder of times when even anti-establishment feelings were well-choreographed. At both shows (the second laid on specially to provide seating for those were slow off the mark in ordering tickets) mid-teens predominated, with a goodly turnout from the group's original fans.

The Rock Revival craze cannot be said to have inspired their reappearance; they've been coming back since 1967 with the same lack of obvious success. Perhaps their simple romances still attract the young; certainly their smooth style keeps the attention of white R&R fans. The introductory group, the Stampedeers, were well-received, or rather, politely tolerated. They are not a hot property despite having a remake of a Laura Nyro song on the air waves; and the Beach Boys themselves have not been on AM for the last five years.

Nevertheless, under the influence of warm night and a companionable audience, they played with remarkable fervour and seemed surprised when the crowd rose to its feet when they began with the metallic arpeggios of the "Sloop John B." As a stage show, the group is little short of boring, relying exclusively on hulking Mike Love (in canary-yellow suit and ostrich plumes) and his excessive homosexual humor to amuse the fans.

The music, delivered straightforwardly, was capable of making the group and their listeners friends. On several pieces, the audience was asked to sing along; on the rest a shout of recognition would go up and everyone would stand. A very few of the tunes from their Holland album were played, to lukewarm reception. The arrangement of the material shows that the Beach Boys are well aware of their fans' desire for the old tunes; they played almost no great hits until midway through their set, when they invented an elaborate slow introduction to California Girls. After signing off at two-thirty, they were brought back twice by a crowd who refused to leave. Finishing off with "Surfin' U.S.A." and "Fun, Fun, Fun", they showed that they were, and are, the best white Rock-and-Roll Band around, as Chuck Berry would use the term.

Butterflies is a satisfying weeper

Butterflies are Free is Toronto Truck Theatre's latest production, now playing to October 5 in their new quarters at Heliconian Hall, 35 Hazelton, Yorkville. Competently directed by Jack Walter and presented by a corps of respected Toronto talent, it is Leonard Gershe's bittersweet comedy about love, a young blind musician, and the girl next door.

For those who still shed tears viewing Love Story or Romeo and Juliet, this Broadway hit and movie success will deeply affect you. The realistic plight of the blind is touchingly displayed by Art Austin and beautifully complemented by the flawless performance of Virginia Reh as his neighbour cum lover. Uneven performances at times by other cast members still struggling with lines did not take away from the play's emotional impact.

The four year old Truck Theatre, a former travelling company, has recently moved from their old haunt at the Colonnade Theatre to a fascinating stage at the Heliconian Club which is the last surviving Gothic church in Toronto. The church setting lends a warm rustic charm to the performances and should be visited, if only to witness where Sarah Bernhardt once had tea, the guest of Club members many years ago.

But the move has also been rough on the cast. Seating capacity has been cut in half. As well, prospective audiences are unfamiliar with the new location. Technical crews are hampered by the lack of proper theatre lighting and staging facilities but have held up admirably and few problems were displayed during the performance.

Performances are Wednesday to Sunday at 8.30 p.m., Saturday at 7 and 9.30, student prices $2.50 - $3.50. Lawrence Yanover

IMPORTANT NEWS

In today's modern world, culture is more important than ever. The Greeks had culture also, but they didn't need it as badly as we do since they had slaves to build impressive monuments, wash the dishes, etc. Not so in our contemporary egalitarian age. No, in the up-to-date times in which we live, a person needs a little culture at the end of a hard day more than ever.

This is where the Review comes in, sinking its pointy little teeth into the latest offerings in art, entertainment, and propaganda. The Review needs writers, photographers, cartoonists, production staff, and just about anything else. Anyone interested should attend a meeting in the Review office (first floor, 91 St. George St.) at 5 pm on Monday, Sept. 15. If you can't make it then, call Gene at 923-8741 or 463-1786 anytime.

Cocker's musical stock is rising again

Jamaica Say You Will Joe Cocker—A&M

It has been seven years since Joe Cocker burst upon the music world with his version of "With a Little Help from My Friends", and his track record has had its ups and downs since then. He vanished after the "Mad Dogs and Englishmen" tour, re-appeared again with a poorly put together album and even worse tour, only to vanish again. Since then his tours have not seemed to work out, due mainly to too much booze, but at least his studio work has improved greatly.

"Jamaica Say You Will" is his sixth lp, and is an excellent follow-up to his previous release, which provided him with his first hit single in several years. Cocker has the ability, found in very few performers, to take the material of others and make it his own. This time around he includes material from Randy Newman, Jackson

Browne, Daniel and Matthew Moore and Jesse Ed Davis. He also continues the habit of having a large line up of guest musicians, ranging from Nicky Hopkins, Jim Price and Bobby Keys to old stalwart Henry McCullough.

Jim Price produced and arranged the record, and while it is a vast improvement over his last effort, he fails dismally on the title tune. There are three fast rocking tunes, "That's what I like" in My Woman", "Oh Mama" and "It's all Over but the Shouting", which Cocker handles in his typical inimitable style — singing and screaming as if his life depended on it. All three songs include some excellent alto sax playing by Jim Horn, Price and Bobby Keys.

Of the two Randy Newman songs, "I think it's gonna Rain Today" comes off the best. It is handled in a very fast way and thus doesn't drag and whimper along, as in the Judy Collins version. "Lucinda," however, completely misses the black humour expressed by the author. The remaining material consists of slow bluesy tunes, good love songs that allow Cocker to sing with feeling and emotion. "Where am I now" is just about the best cut on the record, featuring some excellent piano playing by Nicky Hopkins, as well as the rest of the band. "Forgive Me Now" and "If I Love You" are good slow ballads that are enhanced by the band and back-up vocals.

The two remaining tunes stand out for completely opposite reasons. "Jamaica Say You Will" is simply the wrong kind of song for Cocker and no amount of his screaming and wailing will save it. But then there is "Jack-A-Diamonds" which features only Cocker and Guitars, and, although it is completely out of character for Cocker, his voice and delivery are just great without being overdone.

"Jamaica Say You Will" augurs well for Cocker, but unfortunately his continued use of studio musicians forces him to go on the road with second talent bands which really contribute nothing to his performing abilities. Let's hope he works it out.

Taylor made for blues

I Got What It Takes Koko Taylor

Rough-edged and gravelly, rising down to a throaty rumble and rising to a high fade-out, strong and memorable. These are the vocal qualities displayed by Koko Taylor on her latest album, I Got What It Takes, released on the fledgling Alligator record label. Taylor is a veteran of Chicago night clubs. A protege of Willie Dixon, she has been recording for over ten years; but, unlike her white counterparts, she is not widely known outside blues circles. She is probably the female blues singer today.

Taylor's voice is tailor-made for the blues; and her material generally suits her. The best is written or inspired by Muddy Waters, such as "Be What You Want To Be". Its lyrics are challenging and uncompromising, avoiding the stale catch-phrases of most blues songs. Or, if not connected with Muddy Waters, her best songs are rocking blues, like "Trying to Make a Living" and "Honkey Tonkey". Its amusing lyrics tell the woes of an unsuspecting client of a cheap hotel whose desire for sleep conflicts with the unceasing output of a band with a one song repertoire.

The best song on the album is "Be What You Want To Be". Slow, steady and powerful, it gives ample rein to her vocal abilities. She handles it authoritatively and with feeling.

Taylor can do justice to all the material on this album; but it is not always fair to her.

Here's a toe-tapper's delight

Esther Phillips
Kudu (Motown)

Esther Phillips has been around for many, many years and has built up a solid and very loyal following, yet it has taken the discos no time at all to expose her talents to the masses, through the single "What a Difference a Day Makes". She's probably the greatest blues singer alive today, with a voice that can reach from a whisper to a scream, and you know that she means every word that she sings.

Her latest release was arranged by Joe Beck, whose skill and ability with the guitar has been sadly overlooked, and features a large string and horn section. Side one consists of four tunes, and all are geared for discos, with a strong and steady rhythm made for dancing the night away. "One Night Affair" is an excellent song that combines strong lyrics and a fantastic effort on the part of the band. Even with strings added Esther still retains full control with a voice that's clear as a bell. It is a good, long tune which gives Beck an excellent opportunity to play up a storm, which he does without overshadowing the singer or the band.

"What a Difference a Day Makes", the single hit off the lp, blasts along at full speed just daring your feet to start moving. Esther's voice sounds at times as if it was a synthesizer soaring above the wall of music that is provided by the strings, horns and drums. It has to be heard to be believed. The remaining two cuts on the side, "Mister Magic" and "You're Coming Home", are slower but just as good, as the band powers its way through led by the horns and Beck's searing playing.

Side two contains the kind of material that Esther has been performing for so long, slow and bluesy — with a great emphasis on pain and loneliness. She gives Jim Price's "I Can Stand a Little Rain" the kind of vocal treatment it was meant for; full of feeling and emotion. Her voice is like a razor, slicing away at the pain and hurt of life, yet never giving up. "Hurtin' House" bears a great resemblance to "Home is Where the Hatred Is", a song of darkness and withdrawal, featuring a great sax solo and horn back-up. "Oh Papa" and "Turn Around, Look at Me" are slow love songs that play with the feelings and emotions of the singer.

INNIS COLLEGE WRITERS' WORKSHOP

Since 1969-70, the Innis College Writing Laboratory has sponsored writers' workshops open to both student and non-student writers. This year there will be one workshop in fiction and poetry. The size of the group will be limited.

Only writers who can commit themselves to regular attendance at weekly evening meetings should apply. Send a sample of your work, marked "Workshop," to Roger Greenwald, Innis College, University of Toronto. Include a telephone number if possible, and a stamped, addressed envelope if you wish return by mail. Keep a copy of your manuscript.

The Innis College Writers' Workshop is not for University credit.

Night Moves: the charming story of a suspicion addict

Nightmoves is a good film but not a great one, which proves that Arthur Penn can be a competent director as well as a good one. Penn shocked the movie world a while back by making blood and guts artistic in his Bonnie and Clyde. But Nightmoves remains a cut above the average detective story and is a safe investment for a pleasant evening at the cinema.

It is the story of Gene Hackman's last case. He finds the missing girl and loses her again, he uncovers a mystery and stumbles on the solution, he finds the boodle and finally cracks the case.

What makes this an interesting film is its care of construction.

Hackman is always solving a case through routine detective work. His wife is cheating on him so he uses his skills to find out with whom. He was a founding child so he uses his skills to track down his family. We find him on a routine divorce case when Robert Kennedy was shot.

The dialogue, which presumably is attributed to screenwriter Alan Sharp, is also full of careful nuances. When asked to share milady's bath Hackman quips "Maybe when I'm feeling really dirty" and when the runaway girl asks if he had ever done her likewise he has to answer ironically "We had a different arrangement".

The two central women in the film

produce interesting effects, one by overacting and the other through typecasting.

Jennifer Warren, a new face, plays the femme fatale au naturel. An interesting character but with a little too many grimaces and mysterious eyebrows, a small flaw.

Susan Clark, as the loving wife who dabbles in philanderers, is her usual mixture of clean-cut and low-cut. The affair and subsequent reconciliation appear to be ridiculed by the film since people are getting murdered while Hackman and Clark plumb each other's guilty depth.

Nightmoves is the story of a detective who can't stop being sly and suspicious. It is a story in tribute to Raymond Chandler with Gene Hackman as the new American hero, in the old American mould, slightly overweight and definitely un-liberal.

But was Arthur Penn responsible for the throwaway description of a Rohmer film? "It's like watching paint dry". A dangerous ploy, to be sure. Was he indicating a certain facetiousness in his own film?

Colleges' problems can't be solved in isolation

The Case Against College
Caroline Bird
David McKay Co., 1975

Caroline Bird, author of Born Female, is a poplizer of ideas current in the social marketplace, and, thus, the interest in her new book proceeds not from the contents, which are muddled from any political viewpoint, but from the fact that "the case against college" has acquired enough popular interest to stimulate a book by Caroline Bird.

The "case" is set forth here with the style and content of a cover story in Time, and, indeed, one expects soon to find the controversy over the idea of universally accessible post-secondary education imaged on the cover of Time. For the fact is that the post-secondary education industry is expensive, and governments, in this era of stagnant economies and unemployed graduates, begrudge the budgets gobbled up by the monolith. Even the Soviet Union, we are now told, notwithstanding its planned economy, is churning out superfluous graduates. The moral, obviously, is that if neither the liberal corporate state nor even the centralist state can make economic hay of post-secondary education, then our only answer is to introduce free market principles, choke off public support, admit only those who can pay, and so constrict the flow of graduates as to re-establish a precise value to each degree and certificate.

After all, this notion of universal access has never worked anyway. Despite vast public expenditures, the children of middle income parents are still the ones who go to university and college. This means that the post-secondary system is financed regressively in effect, if not in intent. But, of course, public services are usually financed regressively; it's part of the economic system to pay for healthcare, education, and public transit through regressive sales and property taxes. It just won't do to talk about financing one service without talking about financing all, and it's no better to talk about all without talking about capitalism.

But within the limited outlook of capitalism, this is not the controversy. The concern is how the economy could possibly absorb all the kids rattling out of the high schools if a good many of them were not immediately packed off to the holding tanks of post-secondary education. It's all very well to tolerate unemployment among poor people who don't know any better and are probably shiftless to boot, but among the children of your parents and mine? It's scarcely to be imagined, despite a prestigious report this month hinting darkly that "large numbers of young people, for the first time, are likely to obtain less schooling and potentially lower occupational status than their parents."

Clearly, we have a social problem in the making. And as any politician knows, the thing to do when faced with a problem is to set apart those whose interests lie together and so to confuse and diffuse the issue as to render it seemingly insoluble and part of the natural order of things. Consequently, while decrying the expense of universities and colleges and the irrelevance of most of what is dispensed there, employers demand more specific certification than ever before. And those whose livelihood depends on certification to perform specific tasks must then defend their particular bailiwick from encroachment by any other group. Thus, we find new demands for professional status from all sorts of service workers, who find they need protection from other less certified workers who are willing to perform some of their tasks for less money.

The case against college, if there is one, involves distinctions between education and training and training and jobs, and these are not distinctions that are likely to be made satisfactorily either by politicians or employers. Since the educational system is financed by the state, it will naturally serve the ends of the state — which in a capitalist state is to say that it will serve the interests of employers.

Back in the saddle again . . . a hearty "Hi" to all guys and gals who keep it clean and dig the scene! Who knows what's down in T.O. town! Who . . . eh? what? Stop what foolishness? Oh, alright.

Opera: we're deep into the season now, and if this is the first you've heard of it, then don't give your performance in Psych 100 much hope — you're just not awake. Tonight marks the grand opening of Madame Butterfly starring Maria Pellegrini, also to be seen next Thursday at 8:30. Saturday's matinee is Puccini's Manon Lescaut (it's a Puccini year) starring Heather Thompson; the evening show is the double bill: Il Tabarro, a rarely heard Puccini one-act, and Il Pagliacci. Laugh, clown!

Tuesday's performance is a repeat of the double bill, and Wednesday is Manon's night again. There's more to come, including Grace Bumbry in Salome, Bernard Turgeon in Louis Riel and the all-new production of Die Fledermaus. Tickets for individual performances are still available, but expensive.

The Edward Johnson Building, just behind the planetarium, is home base for the Faculty of Music, and more bargain events take place under its auspices than anywhere in the city. If you're stone broke from too many book purchases, there are student recitals — a free record library with listening equipment (bring your ATL card) and the overall geniality of a musical community.

There are impressive concerts, too. Tomorrow night at 8 p.m., the justly-renowned Festival Singers of Canada appear in concert — but a rather different concert than is usually heard from this small group of talented singers. The show will feature music of younger Canadian composers. As an avant-garde test of the highest performing order, this shouldn't be missed. Best of all is the student price — just $2.

Heard in recital: pianist Christina Petrowska, Tuesday night at the St. Paul's Anglican Church, 227 Bloor St. E. She'll be playing a program of Debussy Chopin and others. Admission $5, 8:00 pm.

Hubert Aumere is a name unfamiliar to these shores. The concert master of the Munich State Opera, he's making the jump to the solo circuit and makes a stop this Thursday at the EJB. $7 — but just $3 for students. See? It pays to go to school.

And a word to the Wise Record Buyer: Columbia is going all-import, so they're dropping all their domestic stock of classical material. Check out the downtown biggies, who seem to have bought out the remaining stock. Hundreds of fine albums (Horowitz, Bernstein and Ormandy in profusion, not to mention artists like Isaac Stern and E. Power Biggs) at just $3.99. Buy, buy.

One of the good things about Toronto that newcomers may not be acquainted with is its large and growing number of repertory movie houses, which offer the highest quality and widest variety of movies you can see in this city — and certainly at the lowest prices. Admission is at most $2.00 or so and can be as low as 99 cents or even nothing at all, so be sure to get your hands on schedules for the Roxy, the Revue, Cinema Lumiere, the New Yorker, the Kingsway, the O.I.S.E. film series, the Ontario Film Theatre out at the Science Centre, and others of their ilk. Here's a sample of what you can find there this week.

The 99-cent Roxy (Danforth at the Greenwood subway station), which fluctuates between periods of quality and stretches of stuff only a dope fiend could love, is in rather a good phase right now. Monday they're showing Lacombe, Lucien, by Louis Malle, about a young Frenchman who drifts into collaboration with the Nazis. If you've always wanted to see lots of Nazis dancing, this one's for you. Tuesday and Wednesday they continue their political streak with, at 7:00 and 10:35, Les Ordres, the story of how fascism came to Canada with the War Measures of 1970; and at 9:00, Tout Va Bien, Godard's revolutionary comedy with Yves Montand, Jane Fonda, and a strike in a sausage factory.

At the Revue Repertory (on Roncesvalles, about three blocks south of Bloor at the Dundas West station), tonight and Saturday, at 7:30 and 9:30, is Phantom of the Paradise, Brian de Palma's grand send-up of glitzy rock, and the stories of Faust, the Phantom of the Opera, and Dorian Grey. You'd be surprised how well they all fit together. Sunday and Monday at 9:15 they have Truffaut's Mississippi Mermaid, which is rather too relaxed as a thriller but quite charming as a love story; and at 7:30 something called The Sailor From Gibraltar, which I've never heard of but which has all kinds of wonderful people involved with it — Jeanne Moreau, Hugh Griffith, Orson Welles, Raoul Couard on camera and Tony Richardson as director.

Cinema Lumiere (College at Spadina) is running a series of films by contemporary German directors this week. I don't know anything about them, but they sound fascinating, if enigmatic. R.W. Fassbinder's Merchant of the Four Seasons and Fear Eats the Soul run today through Sunday; Jean-Marie Straube's Machorka, Muff and Werner Herzog's Even Dwarfs Started Small Monday and Tuesday; and Straube's The Bridegroom, the Comedienne and the Pimp, and Volker Schlöndorff's A Free Woman from Wednesday to next Friday. All these double bills start at 8:00. Admission is $2.00, but you can get a pass, good for ten admissions, for only $13. It's worth it.

The New Yorker (651 Yonge, $2.00) is showing a number of interesting films right now. Tonight at 7:00 and 10:30 they have The Wild Child, Truffaut's gentle, melancholy period piece about a boy who has grown up in the forest, and the doctor, played by Truffaut himself, who tries to civilize him; and at 8:30 the extravagant documentary Fellini's Roma. On Saturday, at 2:00, 6:00 and 10:00, Richard Lester's cheerful farcification of The Three Musketeers, and at 8:00 the insane Peter Cook-Dudley Moore comedy Bedazzled. On Tuesday a Fellini double bill: at 7:00 8-1/2, his movie about moviemaking — or at least that's the point of departure for all manner of goings-on and silly fantasies; and at 9:30, Juliet of the Spirits. On Wednesday at 7:00 and 10:30, the film from Shaw's own screenplay of Pygmalion, and Bergman's period comedy Smiles of a Summer Night. They also show movies at midnight for $1.50 — the sort of movies people like to see at midnight: The Texas Chainsaw Massacre tonight, A Clockwork Orange tomorrow, and Night of the Living Dead next Thursday.

The Ontario College of Art (100 McCaul) is showing a series of American classics on Mondays at 7:00, absolutely free. This Monday it's Broken Blossoms, a silent tearjerker by D.W. Griffith, who practically invented the movies single-handed, you know.

O.I.S.E., at Bloor and St. George, shows double bills every Wednesday and Thursday at 7:30 for $1.50. On Wednesday they have two Italian movies, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis and L'Avventura, Antonioni's great but somewhat ennuyant study of bourgeois ennui; and on Thursday two Shakespearean films, Polanski's bloody Macbeth and Richardson's cool Hamlet with Nicol Williamson.

Harbourfront has inaugurated the first sail-in movie theatre in Canada — and, for all I know, the world. Movies begin at dusk on Wednesdays and Thursdays. This week they have two Canadian films, The Only Thing You Know on Wednesday and Goin' Down The Road on Thursday, as well as a number of shorts. "Landlubbers are also welcome, of course," their ad adds, reassuringly. It's also free.

If you still insist on spending $3.50 on a movie — our trusty team of roving reviewers will keep you posted on the greatest of the latest. You might even want to travel down to Stratford for their International Film Festival, which runs from tomorrow to next Saturday, and features a number of tempting items, such as a series of Harold Lloyd comedies (every day at 1:30) and F is for Fake, Orson Welles' first new film in a long time. LM

art

Student: meet your tabula rasa. Each new academic year offers new opportunities for new experiences. Art galleries need not be the least among these opportunities, especially since the U of T lies between two major art gallery areas easily accessible after classes or on lunch hours.

A few blocks directly south on Dundas St. are the Art Gallery of Ontario and the galleries its expansion has attracted, the Pollock Gallery, Gallery Pascal, Galerie Danielli. The AGO continues its inimitable and perhaps admirable policy first enunciated in last season's Chairs show, of anything for everybody with its Decorated Denim exhibition (see review page 8). The Canadian Canvas, a cross-country survey of contemporary Canadian painting on the cross-country tour (sponsored by Time Canada) opens today. Galerie Pascal's show of new and old prints by Jules Heller, head of York's Fine Arts Dept., opens tomorrow. One block above Dundas in the midst of the struggling Baldwin St. Village is the Sister Gallery, one of Toronto's more attractive, less pretentious art galleries. The interesting show of sculpture by Cecil Richards, in the classical tradition and genteelly academic (Richards is former head of the Sculpture Department at the University of Manitoba) continues until Sept. 25.

To the north of the campus is the Hazelton-Yorkville area where galleries are even quieter than bank vaults. Either that, or the optimism in the face of month after month of stratospheric rents is only brighter and more brittle than the de rigueur white paint on the walls. Here are Gallery Moos, Galeire Heritage, Gadatsy Gallery, on Yorkville, Nancy Poole's Studio and Marlborough Godard on Hazelton (M-G has a stunning show by British sculptor Lynn Chadwick — think of Henry Moore's pathos plus despair, and hatred, until the 24th) Gallery O on Markham, and Galerie Scollard, Evans Gallery, the Marianne Friedland Gallery and Deja Vu, Toronto's only gallery given over entirely to photographs, all on Scollard. To the east, on Yonge St., below Yorkville, almost side by side, are the Carmen Lamanna and Issacs galleries (Issacs who seems to have cornered the market on what really sells in contemporary Canadian art — Kurelek, Wieland, Curnoe — will present a show by Charlotte Whitten, sure to be one of the highlights of the season, beginning Sept. 27). To the east, on Prince Arthur, above Varsity Stadium, are the Albert White Gallery, the Jerald Morris Gallery, and the Crafts Gallery. On the corner of Prince Arthur and Avenue Rd., is the Innuitt Gallery, Toronto's only etc. (Eskimo art), and just up Avenue Rd. is the Potters' Guild.

The U of T itself harbours the Hart House Art Gallery (go in the main entrance, turn to your left and go down the stairs) which was air-conditioned over the summer to encourage travelling exhibitions to take a rest here. The current show, of mixed media works by Brian Maycock, continues until Sept. 24. (Review next week.) The Royal Ontario Museum (admission free to ATL-bearers) offers permanent exhibits of Greek torsos, Roman busts, Chinese tomb-figures, medieval armour, Georgian silver, as well as changing exhibitions. Nothing big on the moment.

Victoria College, OISE, the Admissions Office, the McLaughlin Planetarium, all also offer frequent changing exhibitions. But stop and look around you — at the Group of Seven paintings at St. Hilda's and at Hart House, at the Gerald Gladstone sculpture at St. Mike's library, at the Barker Fairley portraits at the Faculty of Music, at the Crucifix by Eric Gill in the Hart House chapel, at University College, which is a national historic site. When you consider that you may just discover something with which your whole idea of art may become bound up, than which the very idea of art means nothing for you, the stopping, the looking, here on campus or in any art gallery, may just be worth it. RR

rock

The two most promising acts coming to Toronto this week are Martha Reeves (without the Vandellas) at the Colonial Tavern until Sept. 14, and folkies artist David Bromberg with his band at the El Mocambo until Sept. 13. Cover charge at both places. Also playing this week are: Stringband at the Riverboat until Sept. 14; folkies The Good Brothers at Ryerson Sept. 18; and tenorman Zoot Sims with his band at George's Bourbon Street until Sept. 20. Other bands around town: Star Spangled Washboard Band at the Chimney, Small Wonder at the Gasworks, Crack of Dawn at the Generator, Slaxx at the Forge, Hot Shot at the Young Station, Bullrush at Larry's Hideaway, and Lick'n'Stick downstairs at the El Mocambo. Not to mention Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians at the Royal York's Imperial Room Sept. 15-27.

Incidental intelligence: Cliff ("Summer Holiday") Richard is cutting an album of Russian songs in the workers' and peasants' own Melodiya studios in Moscow... rumors that this will be followed by "Ray Coniff Sings the Internationale" or "Swingle Singers' Favorites from the I.W.W. Songbook" albums are totally without foundation.

Perhaps you haven't had the time before, when you were working or inside your intellectual fall-out shelter, but hey, man, your University includes the City of Toronto, and its prime cultural possession is a luxuriant growth of theatre, so make time to go to it regularly. If you don't want to leave the campus, get involved with Hart House or the college societies. The Trinity College Dramatic Society wins this year's Eagerness Award, having already presented a robust performance of Shaw's Overruled. St. Mike's and U.C. each have flourishing drama groups, and campus groups generally can, and do, use the U.C. Playhouse as a home base for their productions.

This week, a brief listing only: Also Available in Paperback: The Old Firehall, 110 Lombard Street. Indefinite run. Comic revue. Starts at 9 pm through the week with two shows Friday and Saturday.

Approaching Simone: St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road. Until Sept. 14. Wednesday to Saturday at 8:30, Sunday at 2:30. Students one dollar. Sponsored by the International Women's Year, this play is not so marshmallow as its sponsorship implies. Highly recommended.

Butterflies Are Free: Toronto Truck Theatre, at the Heliconian Hall, 35 Yorkville Ave. Until Oct. 4. Wednesday to Friday at 8:30, Saturday two shows at 7 and 9:30. Student price $2.50 to $3.50. See review.

The Caretaker: Menagerie Theatre Company, at the Central Library Theatre (St. George and College). Tuesday through Saturday at 8:30 (until Sept. 20). Students $2.50 or $3.00. The first play of the company's ambitious season is Pinter's dark comedy of nastiness and incoherence.

The Good Doctor: Actors' Repertory Theatre, at the Colonnade. Until Oct. 2, Tuesday to Thursday at 8:30, with a Wednesday matinee at 3 pm. $3.50 for students. See review.

High Lights: New Global Village Theatre, 17 St. Nicholas St., until Oct. 11. Monday to Saturday at 8:30, and Saturday matinee at 2 pm. Billed as a 'musical collage', this describes various heterosexual (mostly) relationships.

The Physicists: Theatre Plus, at the Town Hall (St. Lawrence Centre), until Sept. 27. Monday to Saturday at 8:30 pm. Just as we went to press, Theatre Plus called to announce that henceforth all student tickets will be two dollars; any show, any set, any time in advance. Present your ID. Durrenmenist's comedy about three mad scientists is sure to be a fine production.

Sabrina Fair: Royal Alexandra Theatre, until Sept. 27. At 8:30, with matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30. No student prices, so the range will be from $5 to $10. The play is an old chestnut about two wealthy brothers and their simultaneous liaisons with a glamorous but poor woman.

Within the next two weeks the theatre season will be in full bloom. We are going to try to review most of the shows that go on the boards, even if only in a brief note. To do this, we need a supply of warm bodies, especially those with an interest in theatre (preferably acting). Contact the Review for details. JW

Need a place? Rochdale has room.

By BLAKE WOODSIDE
 Rochdale, originally conceived as an experiment in co-operative living and learning, now stands empty. Its halls are deserted and filled with rubbish. Now in receivership, the building has no planned future, and it would seem as if the parties involved are going to wait for the building to fall down, effectively solving their problems.

 Rochdale was opened in 1968 as a co-operative residence chiefly for students in colleges in the surrounding area. Originally owned by Co-operative College Residences Inc., who now hold one of the five mortgages on the building, the ownership of the building was soon handed over to Rochdale College Inc., a non-profit organization run by the members of the building. This was the first step in the destruction of the building.

Within a short time the building had fallen well behind in tax and mortgage payments, partially due to poor management within the building itself.

It is during this period that Rochdale became notorious as a centre for illegal drug use.

Several spectacular suicides and numerous drug busts added to the growing reputation of Rochdale as a focus for Toronto media. By 1972, only four years after the start of the experiment, the building was put into receivership at the request of the mortgage holders. Tenants began to be slowly evicted, a process which has all but been completed. The experiment was over.

The future of the empty building is now in question. It is listed for sale at between six and seven million dollars and damage to the interior is estimated to be in excess of $750,000.

Many groups view the building as excellent for student housing, but they agree an important factor in the future use of the building is to erase the former image. It is thought even a totally new student population would create, if not the same situation, at least the same image.

Rochdale was an interesting experiment. General opinion maintains that it failed as the result of poor organization of the program and management of the building. A stigma has been attached to the building which will be very difficult to erase, but must be if the building is to be useful in any way. Until a method of doing this is found it will remain empty and decaying, a monument to misunderstanding.

Experience, talent, shows the way for the Blues.

By STAN CAPPE
Winning 10 of its 11 games in one season is a record any team would covet. However the Varsity Blues do not appear overjoyed to brag since their single loss last year occurred in the national championship game. "We just don't feel complete," said one of the Blues as he walked back from the practice field the other night. "It doesn't mean much without that big one."

The Blues head into the 1975 season with only one goal in mind — to finally regain the Vanier Cup. "I don't mind if we lose a game or two along the way," says Varsity assistant coach Dave Copp, "just as long as we win that final one."

It is now 10 years since the Blues became the first team to have its name inscribed on the symbol of college football supremacy in this country. Four points separated them from the silverware last November when they dropped a 19-15 decision to Western Ontario Mustangs at the College Bowl.

This time around they appear as strong contenders to finish the job.

Talent, depth and experience are usually the three important factors which put or keep a team in the championship category and this year's Blues are well stocked in these departments.

Testifying to the talent is the fact that there are eight OUA All-stars returning to the line-up and another joining it via a transfer. The backfield pairing of Libert Castillo and Mark Bragagnolo is once again re-united along with end-turned-halfback Estaban Andryjowicz. The latter will be replacing the injured Bob Hedges in the backfield.

Along the offensive line are all-stars Mike Sokovnin and Glenn Rosborough plus Maurice Charbonneau, a Western Division selection at McMaster last season.

Linebackers John Martini and Julio Giordani and defensive back Richard Nakatsu are the all-stars returning to the defensive unit.

Rounding out the offence will be Dave Langley who will once again start at quarterback with veterans Al Brenchley and Steve Kerr in reserve. Brent Eelsey will complete the backfield. Steve Ince and Mark Ackley still lay claim to the wide receiver spots. Paul McMillan returns to centre with Mike Steele and Walt Dudar at the remaining guard and tackle positions.

The only rookie on the offence looks to be Sam Sinopoli, a graduate of the Scarborough Rams of the Ontario Junior Football Conference, at tight end.

Defensively John Vernon and Nick Desimini join Giordani and Martini as linebackers. Nick Grittani, Ken Hussey, Lubomir Alexov, and Angelo Castellon form the front four.

Two offensive standouts with Queen's and York in 1974 will be featured in the defensive backfield. Bruce Pollock, the Gaels' leading scorer last year and Paul Forbes, the top Yeoman receiver, will join Nakatsu and returnee Rick Jeysman.

Head coach Ron Murphy says the Bragagnolo affair is ironing itself out nicely. The star tailback walked out of the training camp session after its opening session and missed almost a week of practice's apparently due to a conflict in philosophy with the coaching staff.

Although his attendance at the opening practice ensured that he could play only for the U of T, the London Free Press contained an account last week which had it that he was considering going to Western.

Bragagnolo, however, did return to camp last week and though he is not ready to play yet (due to a leg injury), he is expected to return to action by the second game of the season.

"Time is the best healer," said Murphy. "He's working very hard to fit back in with his fellow players."

While the Blues are not complaining about their manpower situation they don't feel the same way about their schedule which is, in a word, odd.

The OUA media guide says that teams are divided into Eastern and Western divisions and play a "partially interlocking" schedule. "We are an Eastern team partially interlocking with the East," says Murphy.

The Blues play only three of their seven games within their division and against only two teams — Queen's (twice) and Ottawa. Their other match-ups are with Wilfred Laurier (two), York and Western.

"We really don't have a break in the whole schedule," says Copp. "Our first two are with Laurier and the next pair are with Queen's, who always give us a tough time."

Noting that York's first opponents include Guelph, Waterloo, McGill and McMaster, Copp says that when the Blues meet the Yeomen in game 5 the suburbanites could have a few wins under their belts and be "higher than a kite."

The last two matches with Ottawa Gee Gees and the Mustangs ensure that the Blues will have an easy finish.

"It is interesting to note that the 'Gee Gee's', the Blues chief rivals in the East never venture out of the division, thus no matter how much U of T wins against the West they will not necessarily gain ground in their own division.

"I think they really stuck it to us this time," said Murphy.

CAPSULE COMMENTS — Blues did not play any exhibitions in the pre-season but did hold a scrimmage with McMaster on the weekend... Nakatsu, Eelsey and Castillo were elected as team co-captains... Blues home opener will be next Saturday, the 20th, against Laurier Golden Hawks. Season tickets can be obtained from the Varsity Stadium box office or the Hart House athletic office for $2.00.

Opener: Hawks vs Blues

By STAN CAPPE
The Varsity Blues have never faced Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks in football before but in the next weeks they will see a lot of them. The Blues' first two engagements on the OUA schedule have them in a home-and-home set with the Hawks, the first of the two tomorrow afternoon at Waterloo's Seagram Centennial Stadium.

WLU took second place in the OUA West last season, one point behind Western's Mustangs. They lost the divisional final to UWU 19-8.

Coach Dave "Tuffy" Knight claims part of the secret to his team's success is the fact that he hardly cuts anyone from the squad. That is an opportune philosophy for this season as he has several vacancies to fill, three of them formerly occupied by all-stars.

Gone from the offensive line is all-star centre Rich Griffith and from the defensive line, Rob Etherington. West division select linebacker Gary Mueller has moved down to London where he will play for Western Mustang.

Two offensive standouts no longer in Waterloo are kicker John Wintermeyer, leading scorer in the OUA West last year, and running back Rick Chalupka, the team's leading rusher.

However quarterback Gord Taylor will be back to run the Golden Hawks triple-option offence. He is a multiple threat by himself as he was the most accurate passer in the West last season, fifth in overall rushing and third in the punting department.

Chuck McMann and Mike Weiler return to their running back positions with rookie Randy Martin stepping into the third slot in the wilderness.

Dan Bovair and Bob Wagner anchor the defensive backfield with all-star Rich Ott shoring up the middle of the line.

Soccer player Mike Karpow is slated to replace Wintermeyer. "We're looking for a lot of running out of them, but they might pass a bit more than they usually do," says Varsity coach Ron Murphy.

He, too, talks of going to the air more often this season. He reckoned the Blues ran the ball 72 percent of the time (at a rough estimate) last year. This time he wants to lower that to 60 percent and spread the ball-carrying around.

That will mean a greater role for four-year veteran Libert Castillo, who should probably get to run with the ball more than he did last season when he saw a lot of duty blocking for Mark Bragagnolo.

Out of the offensive backfield for a considerably longer period will be Bob Hedges who is gone for the season. Estaban Andryjowicz, an all-star at tight end last season will move to Hedges' halfback spot. Game time at Waterloo is 2:00 pm.

conditioning schedule, training any prospective players and working the entire team with about two hours of conditioning each day.

The club has been working out since September 5, but is still interested in students who exhibit a willingness to play.

Their September calendar is filled out with a second exhibition game against a well-trained team from Scotland. The Heriot-Watt University team from Edinburgh will take the field against the Rugby Blues on Wed. September 24 at 8:00 pm at Varsity Stadium. The admission price is free and fan support would of course be very welcome.

By STAN CAPPE
The 1975 Ontario Universities Athletic Association football season opens tomorrow on seven fronts with all indicators pointing to another Varsity Blues-Western Mustangs showdown at the finale.

The Blues boast an experienced and talented squad once again and should be able to take the Eastern Division despite the fact they will meet only two of the other six teams in it over the course of the schedule.

The Mustangs, under new head coach Darwin Semotuk, should also have little trouble regaining the West crown despite the loss of some key personnel.

Gone from the Mustangs national championship line-up is quarterback Bill Robinson who is now tossing footballs occasionally for the Ottawa Rough Riders. Mike Fess, a strong-armed passer and backup pivot for several years is slated to move into the Number One role. He will have an able understudy in Jamie Bone, a transfer from Acadia University who was impressive in the Stangs' 19-3 exhibition win over Guelph last Saturday.

The rest of the backfield will look the same with Dale Parkhouse, Curt Rush, Rick Scarborough and Bob Heartwell returning.

The major change defensively for Western is at linebacker where Gary Mueller, a West Division all-star in '74 has transferred over from Wilfred Laurier.

Tuffy Knight's Laurier Golden Hawks have their work cut out for them this season. They not only have to fill some important vacancies but will also have to fight off stiff challenges from Windsor Lancers, Guelph Gryphons, and, believe it or not, the York Yeomen.

Windsor, a team always capable of a few surprises, could sneak into the second playoff spot if the Varsity Blues and the CIAU help them out. The Blues can help by taking Laurier twice. The CIAU can help by letting Dave Pickett play quarterback for them.

Pickett was voted the top college player in the country two years ago when he led U of Saskatchewan Huskies to their best season ever. However, he is involved in an eligibility dispute with the CIAU. If he wins his case it could make a world of difference to the Lancers' fortunes.

Even without him they don't appear too badly off. Homebrew Bruce Walker, who played last year in the U.S. is also ready to handle the quarterbacking chores.

Another local boy returning from the States is Bob Hogan who coach Gino Fracas looks to strengthen the linebacking corps.

A majority of the students are unaware that there is golf instruction, let alone that there is a golf professional on the staff.

Bill Whitecomb the instructor, is a class 'A' professional and has been a member of the Canadian Professional Golfer's Association for many years.

For the past seven years Whitecomb has held interesting, informative, and educational classes and this is undoubtedly the result of his attendance at many golf teaching clinics across the continent.

The course is excellent for beginners, in fact many of prospective students have never held a club before. It consists basically of learning the proper grip, stance and swing form, which are all extremely important to hit the ball with consistency and accuracy. Students will play a couple of hours a week throughout the winter months and should be well accustomed to golf technique by the time the golf seasons reopens next spring.

Waterloo Warriors and McMaster Marauders are also expected to finish in the Western Division.

Ottawa Gee Gees will look roughly the same as they did last season and are expected to give the Blues the stiffest opposition in the East. All-stars Jim Colton (QB), Neil Lumsden (HB), and Jeff Avery (FLK) are all back on offence. Two new faces in that department are Danny Medwin, from Sheridans College, who replaces Dave Kerr at slotback, and Rocky Depitro, from the Soo, who will start at wide receiver.

Abel Kaput

Albert Abel, chairman of the university's disciplinary body, the Caput, will retire from his controversial post soon, according to an unplugged leak on the university's Executive Committee. The announcement will be made at Wednesday's Governing Council meeting and, until that time, Abel has denied any knowledge of his retirement.

"I heard it was being considered somewhere at Simcoe Hall," Abel said. "But I have not been approached by Dr. Evans."

Executive Committee member, former SAC president Seymour Kanowitch reported that the move was made on the university's initiative, and not Prof. Abel's. Evans said that he had approached Abel about the decision.

Reasons given for Abel's retirement were that he was past university retirement age and the holder of only a part-time appointment at the Faculty of Law.

Kanowitch speculates that another reason for the retirement might be the result of last summer's televised Caput hearings on the disruption of a speaking engagement by sociologist Edward Banfield by members of the Students for a Democratic Society. The hearings were protracted and Abel was criticized as being autocratic and unfair to the defendants.

"I don't think the university liked the way he came across on television," said Kanowitch. "They want somebody with a little more flair, slickness and smoothness, in case of another television appearance."

Abel will be replaced by David Kilgour, who was last year appointed head of the Academic Tribunal, which after October 1 will be responsible for judging all academic offenses under the academic discipline code.

The Caput is responsible, in the absence of a non-academic discipline code, currently under discussion, for all non-academic offenses such as vandalism and disruption of legitimate university activities. It has been seen as an illegitimate body by some student politicians because of its lack of student input.

Kanowitch sees Kilgour's appointment as an attempt to "legitimize" the Caput by placing the same man in charge of both bodies.

Kanowitch is openly breaking the confidentiality of Executive Committee decisions in an attempt to force a confrontation on the subject of secrecy in the university administration.

Correction Input Radio

Friday's story on the situation at U of T Radio was inaccurate on two counts.

The article failed to make the distinction between the old U of T Radio and the new Input Radio, comprised for the most part of the same people.

Input Radio is the new name for the group that is working on the FM license on the University of Toronto campus. If all goes well at the March hearings, they will be on the air with a totally new format in September of next year. Work is progressing now towards completion of the application.

Should the application be denied, there is every possibility that U of T Radio will be back on the air in March. What sort of programming it will offer is not yet known.

The article also had SAC's executive concurring with the Radio decision not to go on the air. The executive cannot decide this sort of thing, but can only recommend to the SAC General Council.

Gays rally for rights

By CAITLIN KELLY

Three hundred gay rights supporters rallied Saturday in Nathan Phillips Square, to protest existing discrimination against gay men and women, and to publicize the dismissal of former racing steward John Damien.

Following a march from Queen's Park, the crowd listened to representatives of gay organizations who called for government action and demanded changes to the Ontario Human Rights Code. Damien was dismissed last

McKee named as new ombudsman

The university has found an ombudsman. After a summer of deliberation, the Executive Committee of the Governing Council has decided upon Eric McKee, director of the International Student Centre. McKee was the candidate proposed by the Student's Administrative Council.

The ombudsman's job will be focused in two directions, to investigate grievances that arise in any sector of the university and to inform the constituents of their right, responsibilities and corrective procedures to follow.

However, the ombudsman does not have the power to form policy or ignore existing policy in his pursuit of justice. His mandate allows him to question rules and make recommendations for rectification.

McKee would not comment on the appointment, which will be announced at Wednesday's Governing Council meeting.

February from the Ontario Racing Commission after a twenty year career.

In an interview, Damien said he was told by the commission that because he was homosexual, he "would be subject to blackmail and conflicts of interest."

Damien said he was sent a letter of dismissal from the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations stating that his continued employment would put the commission "in a bad light."

Damien has since taken the case to the courts.

Ron Damon, speaking on behalf of Gays of Ottawa said "This march is concrete proof that gay people in Ontario have come a long way. Certainly the struggle to defend John Damien is the strongest advance."

He added "There is a curious illness in Ontario that is spread by the Judeo-Christian ethic — homophobia, the irrational fear of homosexuals. The very roots of our society are homophobic. The reigning power, the government, is perhaps the most homophobic institution in this country."

Harry Kopyto, Damien's lawyer, focussed attention on a bill being proposed by gays that would amend the Ontario Human Rights Code to include the phrase "sexual orientation", to ensure basic civil rights for gays. He cited a list of endorsements for the bill which included lawyers, psychiatrists and labour leaders.

Rally supporters also drew attention to what were felt as important issues in the upcoming election. In addition to the reinstatement of Damien, these include guaranteed medical coverage for gay couples under OHIP, equal treatment by the Ontario Housing Corporation, and the inclusion of gays on the Human Rights Commission.

Several candidates have already voiced their support for gay demands, among them St. George candidates Margaret Campbell, Frank Vasilikioti and Lukin Robinson.

Only one candidate, Robert Simms, a member of the League for Socialist Action who is running against Bill Davis in Brampton, took part in the rally.

Cristine Burchill, coordinator of the Committee to defend John Damien, urged action be taken to expedite the proposal that homosexuality not be considered a factor in cases of Child adoption and custody.

Tom Warner, president of the Gay Alliance Toward Equality, warned listeners against supporting the Tories, saying their war against permissiveness has led to increasing and more violent attacks on gays.

"We are stating on behalf of the 400,000 homosexuals in Ontario that gay rights is an issue in the provincial election. We have been subjected to discrimination, harassment and degradation that has been allowed to go unpunished. We believe that to vote for Tories is to vote for our oppressors. If your candidate is not willing to support John Damien in his search for justice, he does not deserve your vote," Warner said.

Undaunted by rain and chill winds, the crowd listened and cheered along with the speakers during the hour long rally.

MCDONALDLAND (CUP-ENS) — Ronald McDonald's plans to take over the world are moving ahead at full steam. Recently, McDonald's opened their largest new facility in the Student Union Building at Ohio State University. If the students there desert the college cafeteria and dormitory meals for a steady diet of Big Macs, the "experiment" will expand to other universities and public and private edifices.

McDonald's director of operations, Clift Gamache, says the company has also opened a facility at one other school, the University of Cincinnati. They've also experimented with temporary facilities at the civic zoo in Toronto, a portable tent at the Ohio State Fair, and even on regularly scheduled flights of commercial airlines — coffee, tea, or a Big Mac?

The Ohio State McDonald's is the company's largest, seating up to 600 hamburger addicts at one time.

When the going gets tough, the GA's get going

By SHARON STEVENSON
The Graduate Assistant Association (GAA), after winning recognition last June 4, has spent the summer planning strategy and drawing up demands for their first contract.

Recognition came as the result of a two-year battle with the administration for the right to organize. Initially the Graduate Students Union (GSU) asked for voluntary recognition. After being turned down, the GSU funded the GAA in its fight to represent the 2,000 teaching assistants and demonstrators who mark, demonstrate, tutor and lecture at the U of T.

Jay Drydyk, vice-president of the GAA at U of T said there are two basic reasons which gave rise to the GAA. First, teaching assistants and demonstrators are consistently underpaid. Second, working conditions and job security. Drydyk said during the present period of cutbacks in education and general inflation the situation becomes even more pressing.

Drydyk pointed out the administration of the 7 per cent increase won by the GAA last year as an example of how the administration deals with teaching assistants and demonstrators.

"If you're overworked, paid incorrectly, or have any kind of gripe about the work you do, it's entirely arbitrary whether or not the department genuinely tries to solve the problem."

Drydyk said some departments simply cut teaching hours. In others the increase was only given to teaching assistants who had worked in that department the previous year. The only recourse was to the department chairman.

"That showed us we need a good solid binding grievance procedure," said Drydyk.

Other demands include increases in wages, elimination of all inequities between department rates, a cost of living allowance, check off of union dues, fringe benefits and institution of a rational system of hiring to replace the present arbitrary method.

Hiring procedures will include posting of jobs with qualifications specified, seniority as the deciding factor when other factors are equal, and job security.

The GAA is also calling for the setting up of departmental committees, with an advisory capacity, consisting of an equal number of teaching assistants and faculty. This committee would deal with problems based on misunderstandings before they become bitter grievances" said Drydyk.

Drydyk pointed out that the cutbacks in education were leading to increased class size, to the detriment of faculty and undergraduates as well as teaching assistants. One of the demands the GAA is fighting for is a maximum class size, and no reduction of tutorials or laboratories.

Drydyk said besides ensuring jobs for teaching assistants and demonstrators, it will also assist the faculty, who otherwise will be faced with an increasing work load, or reducing their teaching hours with undergraduates.

Drydyk and the other members of the contract committee say the situation of increasing economic hardship and worsening working conditions has led to a daily increase in enthusiasm for the GAA.

Departments are spontaneously organizing their own meetings, and inviting the GAA to come and explain what's going on.

In one case, Drydyk said, a graduate student went through registration without signing up. He said she was back shortly after, on the advice of friends in the department who strongly suggested she go right back and sign up.

Drydyk estimates by the end of October, between one-half and three-quarters of eligible teaching assistants will be members of the bargaining unit.

"The union is stronger at the base than ever before," he said. While all teaching assistants are covered by the GAA, only members can vote on the contract.

Drydyk feels this increase in strength will strengthen the bargaining. "Large numbers of people are signing up, participating in departmental meetings. The results by the October 8 general meeting should be impressive."

"The university has to realize that it's not dealing with a couple of organizers and a group of activists. They will be dealing with a strong and energetic organization with over a thousand members," he added.

Other members of the contract committee are equally optimistic.

"The contract is really good. Everyone in the bargaining team is willing to fight for the demands that will eliminate all the inequalities teaching assistants and demonstrators are faced with. Non-union workers on campus could learn from our fight about the advantages of getting organized," said Charlene Gannage.

Merrie Bergmann added: "It's going to be a great year. We have an enthusiastic bargaining committee and we're finally asking for what we should have had a long time ago."

Open door policy instituted at Toronto's oldest a.m. tabloid

Today The Varsity opens its doors to all those who have yet to attempt the great career of journalism.

Ah, yes, the roar of the typewriters and the smell of the ink. Once you catch an earful and a whiff you won't be able to put it down. We here at The Varsity are quite prepared to lock you in a room with four demented typists and a printing press until you submit and agree to take the first fix. Remember, the first one's free.

We need writers. If you'd been at the office last night to see the pained expressions on the faces of the news staff your heart would have gone out to us. There is a mountain of work to be done and we are not equipped to do it as fast as required. After all, someone has to do the dull tedious work of sitting around the office watching the cellulite form on our backsides.

The work is easy. If you know anything at all about split infinities, tautology, redundancy and where to draw the line between fact and fiction, you're well on the way. What you don't know, hopefully we can teach you.

Today the news staff will be on hand around 11 a.m. to welcome you into the fast-breaking, hard-hitting life of student journalism. Don't miss your chance. That's 91 St. George St., 2nd floor.

All candidates meet except for two

By JASON MONAS

The failure to appear of Progressive Conservative Frank Vaskiotti and Libertarian Marshall Evoj marred efforts to schedule an all-candidates meeting for St. George riding Friday.

No reason was given for Vaskiotti's non-appearance at the SAC sponsored meeting in Brennan Hall. Appearing to express their views were Communist Elizabeth Hill, NDP candidate Lukin Robinson and Liberal incumbent Margaret Campbell.

Liberals captured the riding in a by-election two and a half years ago after Conservatives had occupied it for 37 years.

Hill labelled big business and industry as the main culprits for Ontario's ills, branding the Liberals and Conservatives ineffective for subservience to those interests.

In regards to education, she championed free tuition and greater accessibility to university. She also supported an expanded Ontario Student Awards Program and an increase in educational spending.

Hill said the cost of such measures would be covered by heavier corporate taxation. Campbell called the Conservative government cynical and unfeeling. She cited the timing of the election during a period when enumeration was awkward and the failure of the government to publicly reveal the contents of a completed citizens' report on child daycare as examples of this attitude.

Campbell said universities should have five year plans for fiscal and financial spending to replace the present year to year budgets, and also derided government cutbacks in funding.

Regarding the crucial housing problem in St. George, Campbell outlined her proposed legislation for a rent review board, which she said was laughed down in the House last year.

Each municipality with a population of over 50,000 would decide a board with the power to decide whether rental increases were justified. She said disputes would be kept out of the courts, board members would be appointed by the municipality and that the onus would be on the tenant to generate appeals.

Robinson accused the Conservative government of indifference and said they were living in the past. To support his position he pointed to the housing situation. He also cited the case of a delay in revealing the findings of a commission on energy and resources until after the election. Robinson assured the audience an NDP government, if elected, would immediately make such findings public knowledge.

Focusing on agriculture, Robinson lamented the 26 acres of farmland in Ontario that NDP researchers estimate are lost each hour.

Robinson also said the government had a poor record in occupational health, citing unacceptable working conditions in cases such as Elliot Lake. A single provincial review board would be formed by the NDP to set guidelines for the numerous municipal boards created wherever housing shortages and ludicrous rents were strongly felt, Robinson said. Initiative would be placed on landlords, who would apply for increases to the board.

All the candidates agreed pollution and racism must be stopped, as the Conservatives were charged with not doing enough in these areas.

Campbell said racism was heightened by anger and resentment over insufficient housing and exorbitant rents.

Robinson stressed the need to accept minorities wholeheartedly and make genuine efforts to utilize and integrate their resources.

Elizabeth Hill proposed tough legislation against racist organizations.

Rich get Richer

(CPS-CUP) — America's "super-rich" are getting even more super, according to a recent study by the Urban Institute.

The study sets the number of super-rich at 4.4 per cent of the total population and reports that this group owns:

- 27 per cent of all privately held real estate
- 33 per cent of all cash holdings
- 40 per cent of non-corporate business assets
- 63 per cent of privately-held corporate stock
- 74 per cent of federal bonds and securities other than savings bonds
- 78 per cent of all state and local bonds
- Virtually all corporate and foreign bonds and securities notes.

If the 3.5 trillion dollars that makes up America's wealth were evenly distributed, the study theorized, every American over age 21 would have $25,000 a year. As it is, the super-rich average $200,000 a year, while half the population averages no more than $3,000 a year in net assets.

How much rope does Guard get?

The Western Guard is suffering. Its telephone messages this week project more than the usual amount of paranoia and anger, drooling with contempt for the police authorities that carried out 16 raids on the homes of Guard party members last week. Police confiscated guns, paintcans and a quantity of chemicals used, according to the Guard, by the party's "Chemistry Club".

The Guard should be worried. The focus on the subject of racism went two different ways over the summer. On the one hand, an increase in attacks on minorities has made the city more noticeably tense. On the other hand, there has been more public resistance in the newspapers and on the streets to this sort of vigilantism. And finally the resistance has been taken up by the police, after a few years of a basically soft approach to the numerous assaults and racist wall-scravings the Guard has been responsible for.

The Guard is "shocked" at the actions of the police against a "legitimate political party," and assails the Toronto press for not taking up their cause.

If the Guard is legitimate, then so is anybody with a blackjack or a lead pipe who doesn't like somebody else. Let's not pull punches, these people are punks, pure and simple, and their only contribution to legitimate politics is to have someone to vote against, a relief when all other parties tend to melt into each other.

Their message is based on one presumption, that black and white will never live together in peace. The only way for them to enforce that message is to intimidate the black and other minorities in this city through physical and verbal assault. They attempt to appear in public as philosophers, although the single-mindedness of their sole interest precludes any possibility that they could actually have thought about what they are doing for very long.

The question that most concerned about the subject are asking is "How can a city like Toronto allow these people to do what they're doing?" One answer is of course that our political process must allow for all points of view on any given subject to be aired without hindrance. That argument lasts only as long as the Guard stops short of assault. Politics and fists don't mix, so that once these people step outside the process they can and should be given a nice long stint in the Don Jail. The likelihood of that seems distant. Even charges against Guard members involved in an assault recorded on video film could not stand up in court.

There are also those who think that the Guard are unimportant and have no effect. If these people think that groups in this city are not affected by attacks in the streets on their brothers and sisters, then they have lost any idea of what brings people together. This position seems to be shared by a lot of academics, who feel that because the Guard deals more in violence than in ideas, they are no danger. In part, these are the people that allow the damage not only to continue, but to grow. They can maintain this because they are not threatened and have no idea what it is like to be West Indian, Jamaican or Trinidadian in this city.

The only result of allowing the Guard to continue their campaign will be to make this city unlivable. The mixture of peoples in Toronto makes it live and breathe with a thousand different voices and to injure or intimidate one of those voices is a moral crime and should be an actual one. That the voices mix together and create a front against these attacks is the only future for one of the most cosmopolitan cities in North America. If the cosmopolitan aspect is destroyed you might as well pack your bags and head for the Arctic Circle.

Don Andrews, Guard head. Some people refuse to believe that he is dangerous.

Be prepared for Davis

A big toy item for kids used to be the "Rock 'em, Sock 'em Robots", two plastic robots that stab and jab. When contact is made, the victim robot's head pops off and has to be put back on.

Saturday night TV featured two of Ontario's favourite robots, Bob Nixon and Bill Davis, in a marathon match where neither made contact, but then again neither of them quite had their heads on either.

All in all, it was a squallid performance. Both Nixon and Davis threw dollar signs around the room to the point where any mention of money was automatically rendered meaningless because of the monumental differences in spending claims between the two leaders. The context in which they were speaking made these millions of dollars sound like a week's cigarette money.

Nixon and Davis don't like each other and one has to appreciate their refusal to hide the fact. The entire debate was a revelation of the three Varsity standbys: slander, innuendo and unsubstantiated rumours.

Here is something you can do to get some straight answers. Bill Davis will be on campus today begging for student questions about his government's policies. Some sticky questions can be asked, and they fall under these categories:

- Davis' Minister of Colleges and Universities, James Auld, has stated that "students who elect to use the post-secondary system should bear a greater share of the system's costs than the general taxpayer." What effect does this have on low-income families? Does it stand in the way of having their children as well educated as the sons and daughters of Lawrence Park and Rosedale?

- Tuition fees: will the government attempt to prevent the universities from raising their tuition fees for the 1976-1977 school year?

- Rent Controls: Why does the government shy away from dealing with landlords in a firm manner? Are the cases of rent "gouging" not already sufficiently documented?

- Pubs: Why cannot student groups have the responsibility of running their own pubs? A recent move by the government has given that responsibility to university administration, who probably don't want it, and has added another level of administration and probably another nickel to the price of every bottle.

These are some of the important areas that Mr. Davis should deal with once he enters the campus. Don't be put off by evasive answers — if he's not answering the question, tell him so. He's on our turf right now, he should play by our rules.

SAC charged with inaccuracies

To the Editor:

I was surprised to see that the two "Medicine for the People" handbooks were once again included in the SAC survival kit. Aside from the fact that student money is being used to encourage an ideology that most students disagree with, there are several gross errors which should be noticed in these handbooks.

The introduction to the Birth Control Handbook states that "Malthusian theory was disproven by the events of the industrial revolution" and that "Mechanical techniques of farming greatly increased food production."

It is true that for a time increases in food production exceeded increases in population. However, one will find that this was caused by the opening up of vast arable lands (in North America, Argentina, Australia and the Ukraine); the use of chemical fertilizers, new strains of high yielding crops, pesticides; as well as the use of new mechanical techniques.

Unfortunately lands which can still be opened up are mainly marginal and need more fertilizer (compared to existing farmland) to bring into production.

In any case, there is nothing left in the world today comparable to the lands which were opened up in the 1800's and the first half of this century.

Moreover the increasing reliance upon petroleum based fertilizers, as well as new strains of high yielding crops which require heavy use of these fertilizers, is endangered by the increasing price of petroleum and its eventual scarcity.

Pesticides also have been found to have serious drawbacks. The use of monoculture, while increasing food production, has increased the danger of pest infestation spreading faster.

There are other serious problems facing modern agriculture: soil erosion, depletion of nutrients from the soil, and the loss of prime farmland for residential and industrial purposes.

Malthus's belief that increases in population are geometric while increases in food production are linear would still be valid if one looks at the long term picture.

The introduction then cites Brazil as a typical third world country. This is dubious since Brazil is far and beyond richer in land and resources than any other country in the third world.

While there are other third world countries well endowed with resources (such as Venezuela, the Persian Gulf states, Nigeria, Angola and Iran), the majority simply cannot sustain their present rates of population growth from resources within their own borders.

The claim that "Within the borders of Brazil... there exists as much arable potentially food-producing land as exist in all of Europe" has been severely criticized by many people.

Much of the soil is lateritic and literally turns to stone after a few years of cultivation. The 100-inch annual rainfall has a powerful leaching effect on open soil while the summer is a near drought. In any case, the amount of money needed to develop Amazonia would run into the billions of dollars.

The introduction blames the poverty of the third world on U.S. imperialism. There is no mention of the corruption and incompetence of many third world governments (some which call themselves socialist) which squander their money on armaments and prestigious industrial projects of little economic value.

While it is true that the prices of primary commodities (fuel, food, ores) from the third world have remained relatively low while manufactured goods have increased in price over the past twenty years... this situation is now changing.

There is no mention of the growing influence of cartels on the world economy. It is curious also that those third world countries which benefit from cartels are less than anxious to share their wealth with their less advantaged neighbors.

"The I.U.D. and genocide" on page 31 claims that the U.S. has inaugurated a program of genocide via birth control on the Brazilian people. If there is such a program, it couldn't be very successful since the birth rate of Brazil is among the highest in the world, if not the highest. Brazil's present population of 100 million may expand to 200 million by the end of this century.

The V.D. handbook on page 28 refers to "colonized black people" in South African gold mines. The blacks who work in South African gold mines are almost entirely migrants who voluntarily come to South Africa from the "liberated" black-ruled countries in southern Africa.

Perhaps the most incredible claim of all is the one on the same page that 100,000 million (or 100 billion) slaves were abducted from Africa. This must be a pretty liberal estimate since that many people have never existed in all of human history.

Yours truly,
Peter Frost.

Young Socialists charge PC's offer no solutions

"One of my opponents, Bill Davis, took out large ads in the Brampton newspapers saying, 'Come to this meeting to hear the truth.' The truth — the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I think the Davis government is on trial in this election. I'm going to read the indictment."

These were the opening lines of a speech by Robert Simms to an all-candidates meeting in Brampton. Bill Davis's riding, Robert Simms, a 28 year old office worker in Mississauga and activist in the socialist movement for over seven years, is running on the program of the League for Socialist Action in Brampton.

The all-candidates meeting was attended by Davis to be a Davis rally — an applause for Davis's record in government. But, at the meeting Davis came under heavy fire for his government's policies.

Simms accused the government for "deliberate and criminal negligence" in the case of the Indians of the White Dog and Grassy Narrows reserves. "In 1970 the Ontario government knew that a Dryden chemical plant was poisoning the Indian's food supply — their fish — with mercury. Did the Davis government tell the company to stop poisoning the Indians? No. The government told the Indians to stop eating — to stop eating the fish, and made no provision for another food supply. Five years later the company still pollutes and several Indians have the symptoms of Minimata disease — mercury poisoning."

Davis, Simms charged, hasn't got a program against unemployment, but a "program for unemployment." One of the Davis government's solutions to the problem of unemployment is to create 1,000 jobs for college graduates in the Civil Service. But, Simms pointed out, "Thousands are needed. At the same it announced that the civil service will be reduced by 3,000 jobs. This is topped off with a $100-million tax gift to the corporations on production machinery."

"The government says the tax gift is supposed to create jobs. A real new job. Every economist in Canada says unemployment will rise in Ontario in the next few months."

Simms, who is himself confined to a wheelchair, zeroed in on the Davis government's program for the handicapped, which includes a pension allotment for the unemployed disabled of a mere $240 a month. If a person collecting the pension earns more than $50 above the pension their earnings are taxed at a rate of 75 per cent. This is a rate higher than any multi-millionaire pays.

Simms accused Davis of acting to guarantee the profits of big business at the expense of native people's lives, of workers and the unemployed.

Davis's reply to this charge was, "I'd like to say to the candidate who spoke before me, — yes the banks love me, like the oil companies love me today, like the land speculators love me — it's something you should learn that perhaps you haven't."

Simms pointed out that the other major party, loved by the banks, oil companies, land speculators — the Liberal Party — offers no alternative solutions for the people of Ontario. The Liberal Party has been running a campaign on the slogan "we just can't afford another Davis government." But what this means, said Simms, is less government spending on social services, — on unemployment benefits, education.

He spent a large part of his speech talking about the importance of working people, students, women, breaking from the Liberals and the Conservatives — the parties of the banks and large corporations — and supporting the NDP. He said that voting Liberal or Conservative is "like crossing a picket line. The NDP because it is organized by the labour movement is on one side. The Liberals and Tories on the other. We need to unite all across Ontario to defeat the big business parties September 18."

"But, even the NDP does not have a serious program to fight inflation and unemployment. And, it only mentions women's rights. The NDP does not have a program of real solutions to the present economic and social problems we face."

Simms said that the LSA is running in the election because it thinks it has a program of real and practical solutions. Simms put forward in his speech the demand of 30 hours work for 40 hours pay as one real way to fight unemployment. He put forward also the demand for a massive public works program funded by the government. He supported cost of living clauses in union contracts and in pensions, welfare and unemployment insurance payments. He pointed out that a party serious about women's rights had to assist women in winning the right to abortion. And he said that any party serious about improving education in this province had to be for an immediate end to cutbacks in educational spending. These proposals are all part of the League for Socialist Action's program.

The Simms campaign is being supported and built by the people who are most directly affect by its program. The program includes the demands to stop the cutbacks, for free tuition, for a living wage for students, for democratic control of the schools by students, faculty, and support staff. Among the campaign's supporters are students in the universities and high schools in Toronto and Brampton. The Young Socialists, a cross Canada student organization, is organizing high school and campus support for the campaign. One of the YS's main activities is to sponsor a rally for Simms at U. of T. this Tuesday at 2:00.

Many of Simms' supporters are active in the Toronto NDP campaigns, as well as building the Simms campaign.

One of the first activities of the campaign was participating in the Labour Day Parade and distributing information about the campaign to its participants. The candidate's first speaking presentation was at a panel discussion held by the Vanguard Forum, which featured labour militants talking about the rising labour struggles in Ontario.

A rally for the campaign was held last Friday at the Vanguard Forum where the candidate spoke. A special feature of this rally was the greetings given by individuals and organizations who support the campaign. This included speakers from the Young Socialists; Toronto's Gay Alliance Towards Equality (GATE); the Revolutionary Marxist Group; the International Communist Group (a Greek socialist group in Canada); Heidi Fischer, a long-time activist in the feminist movement; Khaled Mouammar, a leader of the Arab community in Canada; and greetings sent by Rosie Douglas, a leader of the black community in Canada. The rally raised over $3,000 for the campaign.

Other events in the campaign include the meetings to be held this week at U. of T. and at York University. On Saturday supporters of the campaign participated in a march for gay rights and the candidate addressed the march.

If you are interested in finding out more about the campaign come to the rally this Tuesday in the Pendarves Lounge at the International Student's Centre or contact the Toronto Young Socialists at 364-4056.

Beardsley: Veteran with a taste for Victory

By MARGARET McCALLUM
Why has Barbara Beardsley, after years of working for every NDP candidate in her riding, decided to run on her own? One reason was the urging Ward 6 alderperson Dan Heap.
Heap thinks Beardsley is a fighter; he wants her at Queen's Park to speak for issues he'll be raising with city council.
Beardsley calls herself a "reluctant" candidate, saying she wouldn't have considered accepting the nomination if she weren't a woman. But she stresses she is not just some woman that the NDP are running to get women's votes, but the candidate of the people in St. Andrew-St. Patrick.
The "reluctant" candidate herself hasn't any doubts left either; she expects to win, and knows what she'll do when she does.
St. A and P, a very mixed riding. It includes large Portuguese and Chinese immigrant communities, part of the university, part of the Annex, and part of Forest Hill.

Support in the riding has grown in ten years from 13 to 41 per cent, NDP figures show, but Beardsley feels redistribution of the electoral boundaries since the last election will hurt.
Several polls in the Annex that were strongly NDP in the last election have been added to St. George, the riding to the east, and some of St. George's strong conservative polls in Forest Hill are now in St. A and P.
Beardsley also said the early election shows the Davis government's lack of concern that students exercise their franchise.
Beardsley stresses a vote for the NDP is not just a vote against Davis, but a vote for some very positive things — rent controls that really work; security of tenancy; universally accessible day-care; free and fast public transit that won't destroy neighbourhoods; more flexibility in university grant allocations.

As a member of a party that isn't going to form the government this time, Beardsley still feels able to contribute toward those goals in the legislature.
"I'll be there to apply constant pressure," she states confidently.
Beardsley asks if the Davis government is as committed to public transit as is claimed, why didn't they step in when the TTC raised its fares? Why should subways have to pay their own way when expressways don't?
In response to university fiscal problems, Beardsley feels it doesn't hurt people to have to look at their budgets, but she dislikes rigidity in budgets and would like to see the BIU tied to the cost-of-living.
She also considers deciding how to spend available money is an internal affair of the university, not to be dictated by the government. Courses should be offered on a free market basis; if the demand is there, the course is offered.

Beardsley's main criticism of the university centres on the enrolment statistics. She feels there are not enough children of immigrant or working class families applying for entrance. The amount of money given to institutions should be geared to the economic status of the people they serve, she says.
Beardsley feels the government is renegating on its responsibility to students by forcing them to incur a greater debt than they should.
Beardsley, with the NDP, believes that education costs should be financed directly through the general provincial tax revenues, not property taxes. Increasing the proportion of taxes paid by corporations is one way of getting extra money to cover the expenses of the NDP people-oriented programs.

To lower the cost of housing, Beardsley suggests public ownership of land. The NDP would take government-owned land presently standing idle while the Conservatives wait for developers to build on it. Homes would be built, and the land on which they stand leased to the buyers.
Without land speculation to artificially increase prices, people would be able to afford houses that could be passed on to their children.
But, as the NDP have said ad infinitum in this campaign, governments talk too much about the future. Barbara Beardsley talks about today, in St. Andrew-St. Patrick, and her willingness to fight to preserve and improve the good things of downtown living.
Whether she wins or loses, she'll make her presence felt.

Cunningham: Professor battling monopolies

By BOB BETTSON
The Liberals may say integrity is the top issue in the upcoming election while the Tories say it is leadership. But St. Andrew-St. Patrick Communist Party candidate Frank Cunningham says most people are really concerned about inadequate housing, high unemployment and sprawling inflation.
Cunningham, a U of T philosophy professor is running in St. Andrew-St. Patrick as one of 33 Communist Party candidates in Ontario.
And although Cunningham is not predicting a win, he points out that the old riding, St. Andrew, elected Joe Salsberg from the Communist Party as a member of the provincial legislature from 1943 to 1954. Since then retiring cabinet minister Allan Grossman has represented the riding for the Conservatives.
Cunningham says he joined the Communist Party in 1968 after being involved in the peace movement in Canada in the mid-sixties.

He sees housing as one of the main issues in this election. "The Liberals and the Tories think promoting housing is getting big corporations to build expensive high rises and subdivisions. But Communists see housing as a public utility."
He says the party supports interest free loans for home improvement, legislation to control mortgage rates and a massive government program to build, acquire and renovate housing for low and middle income people.
"Now, housing is just out of reach for working people, with an average sale price in Metro of $58,000," he said. The present crisis is caused by developers constructing luxury housing for maximum profit, not housing to meet average peoples' needs, Cunningham added.
There is also a need for a labour bill of rights, says Cunningham, which would include the right to have a job, the right to join unions, job security, a reduced work week, retirement at 60 with 80 per cent of pre-retirement earnings and complete political rights.

Cunningham also calls for an end to the present educational cutbacks at all levels. "I would like to see spending increased to meet the needs of students and teachers faced with crowded classrooms and a lack of money for innovative programs."
"Cutting educational expenditures is not only discriminating against the working class but is a crime against future generations," he said.
The Communist party would give increased grants to students to ensure anyone capable of attending university is able to do so.
Cunningham criticized the present Tory government for doing nothing to end ethnic, racial and sexual discrimination in Ontario.
"Women make up one-third of the labour force but most of them are getting paid less than men even if they are doing the same jobs. This kind of discrimination should be outlawed."
Cunningham pointed out that as in other cases, the government isn't even enforcing its own laws which call for an end to discrimination on the basis of sex.

Another major concern for Cunningham is the phenomenon of racism in Canada as exemplified by immigration policy discriminating against non-English, non-white groups and the presence of racist groups disseminating hate literature and slogans.
Although the immigration policy as contained in the green paper is a federal responsibility, Cunningham says the Ontario government could bring pressure to bear against the present discriminatory policies as Ontario receives over 50 per cent of all Canadian immigrants.
According to Cunningham, the major difference between Communists and the social democratic NDP, is a stronger Communist policy of nationalizing foreign-owned corporations, particularly in resource industries, and stronger policies on taxing corporations to pay for social programs.

He says the NDP has also disappointed many by not making opposition to cutbacks in post-secondary education, one of its chief priorities.
Although the Communist party does not expect to win this election, Cunningham says the party hopes to eventually join the NDP in an anti-monopoly capitalist coalition which would rule Ontario.
At U of T since 1965, Cunningham has been active in supporting student and faculty struggles for democratization of the university and demanding greater university responsibility to the outside community.
He feels the only way to halt the present drift towards economic disaster in Ontario is a coalition of factory workers, white collar workers, students, small businessmen, farmers and women against the major parties which are dominated by big business.

Kan: Cutback expensive education frills

By LIAM LACEY
After finishing a distant third in the 1971 provincial election, the Liberals in St. Andrew-St. Patrick are waging a vigorous campaign with a new candidate, 34-year-old lawyer Fred Kan. He claims that "Spadina is not an issue in this campaign."
For Kan the critical issues in this campaign are housing, education, and government integrity. Although he concedes that the Liberal pro-Spadina stance cost them support in the 1971 election.
"Davis is using Spadina as a political ploy," says Kan. "How many times can he use it?"

Kan maintains that the official Liberal position has "not been decided yet." But pamphlets opposing the expressway and highway 400 extension are distributed from Kan's campaign headquarters.
Kan believes it is essential to provide sufficient garage space in the area to avoid downtown traffic congestion.
On the issue of housing Kan supports "the establishment of rent review boards to alleviate the plight of tenants."

In expanding his views, Kan adds that such a board must be able "to issue subpoenas, open landlord's books and roll back rents if necessary."
Kan claims that Conservative policy has done little to provide accommodation for people. He points out that the area bounded by Beverly, Baldwin, Cecil and Spadina, and owned by Ontario Hydro, has been boarded up for the past three years. Liberals have promised to provide 150 housing units in this area.
Kan limits himself by adding that "strict rent controls would inhibit developers from building." For the same reason he is opposed to the fifty per cent Land Speculation Tax.

Kan says he feels a "special obligation to represent the student community." He is opposed to raising the student loan ceiling and believes that student grants should be adjusted "in line with the cost of living."
Kan asserts, "Education is a basic human right. Students from low-income families should not be discriminated against. No student should come out of university with over-burdening loans."

Cutbacks in education offered by the Liberal party, will not be "to the core" of education, he says.
"We are talking about frills — certain excessive areas. Students should be provided with a core curriculum and certain basic skills."
For Kan and the Liberal party, the integrity of the Davis government is extremely important. "We're talking about a government that has incurred a huge public debt and which fails to distinguish between party and public funds in furthering its political position."

Grossman: Trying to take over from dad

A small, well-groomed man strides confidently towards me from the recesses of an empty committee room. "You're from the Varsity?"
Larry Grossman, the Progressive Conservative candidate for St. Andrew-St. Patrick, son of Allan Grossman ("By the way, my father won the student vote"), is very concerned about the politics of this newspaper. He presses for a commitment that the Varsity is "anti."

student has been denied the right to vote.
When speaking of rent controls, Grossman points out the folly of imposing controls on only one factor of the economy. He referred to the federal Tory position in favor of wage and price controls as an instance of such a "planned economy."
He avoided anything definite by concluding that "controls are not viable unless interest rates are stabilized."
When reminded of the diverse nature of groups residing within the ridings, Grossman said, "I don't play to power groups."
— But in Grossman's campaign literature is the claim that he is the founding member of the Forest Hill Residents Association and the Vice-President of the West Prep Home Owners Association.

"What about child care, Mr. Grossman?"
"What about it?"
"There simply aren't enough facilities."
"True."
"How do you propose to alleviate this situation?"
"Child care is a provincial responsibility."
"Where does it fall on your list of priorities?"
"It's irresponsible to try to rank issues according to priority. I'll do all I can. I know Barbara Beardsley puts it high on the list, but she places every issue first. You can't do that. Do people think that the premier wouldn't like to see more child care facilities?"

"Do you think Mr. Turner's resignation will influence the Tory position in Ontario?"
"Do you think he's trying to help us?"
"I'm asking you."
After a while, it came out that Grossman felt that Turner was expressing to Trudeau his frustration over Trudeau's "fiddling around."

Grossman was asked how he felt about giving Civil Servants the right to strike. He qualified the question by emphasizing a right wasn't being removed — simply not granted.
"We have no trouble attracting people to the job. A civil servant should accept not having the right to strike as part of the terms of employment," he said.
Grossman was asked about women's rights but right away went on the defensive refusing to be any kind of apologist and refusing to "carry the burden of oppression on his back."

Teen inch Eggs and Fake Steak

amount of chlortetracycline, an antibiotic sold by prescription under the trade name Aureomycin, can be added to raw fish, and a wide variety of preservatives can be added to preserved meat and fish, frozen fruit, beer and wine, without being mentioned on the label.

Artificial flavour does not have to be listed when it is used in bakery products, confectionary, ice cream, ice milk, sherbert, soft drinks, flavoured milk, or alcoholic beverages.

Candy can even be polished with shellac. That's right, SHELLAC. The law allows up to 0.4 per cent shellac on any confectionary. It also allows waxes, like carnuba, currently advertised on TV as a furniture polish, to be used on candy to make it shine.

You'll never know which foods are the fake foods, and which vegetables and fruits are really under-ripe and wearing disguises, unless the food laws are changed.

"Turth-in-Dining" laws were proposed in the legislature of California, and in the San Francisco city council several years ago. These proposed laws — eventually quashed by the restaurant industry's powerful lobby — would have required menus to indicate which items were frozen and prepared off the premises, rather than freshly made.

Thousands of people with allergies to food additives are painfully aware that changes in the laws are needed to require disclosure of all hidden chemical ingredients in any food. The practice of listing dozens of chemicals under a general label, such as 'food colour' or 'artificial flavour' is particularly inconvenient for people allergic to only one or two chemicals, but forced to avoid a wide range of foods because of inadequate labelling.

The Canadian Food and Drug Act lists approximately 480 additives that can be used in or on food. A few of them can be used only in small quantities, but the use of many is only limited by the ambiguous term "Good Manufacturing Practice". A few, like Citrus Red #2 are known to be dangerous, and should be banned. On many, the investigations into the possible dangers to humans are incomplete. Without question, the consumer must win the right to know each and every time a chemical is added to a food product. Anything else is fraud — legal or not.

These fake foods, of course, are full of chemical additives. Flavours are changed, colours are added, and perishable foods are preserved to last indefinitely. Careful reading of the fine print will usually tell you what chemicals you will be eating, if you get to see the labels. But all the additives are not always listed on the label. Canadian food laws exempt a wide variety of food products from indicating certain additives. The presence of food colour, for example, does not have to be indicated when it is used in bakery products (except brown bread), butter, cheese, confectionaries, gelatin desserts, ice cream, ice milk, icing sugar, liqueurs and cordials, sherbert, smoked fish, soft drinks, or flavoured milk drinks. Any of these products may be, and often are coloured, with nothing left to let even the most discriminating consumer know.

Green oranges may legally be dyed to appear ripe, using a coal-tar based food colour known as Citrus Red #2. The once-common practice of stamping "Food Colour Added" on each orange when it was dyed has pretty much disappeared now. The United Nation's Food and Agriculture Organization, and the World Health Organization warned in 1969 that "Citrus Red #2 has been shown to have carcinogenic activity [that is, it may cause cancer - Ed.] . . . the Committee therefore recommends that it should not be used as a food colour." While it is true that the dye, primarily used by Florida orange growers (from October through December), does not penetrate beyond the orange peel, the orange skin should never be sucked or grated for use in baking.

Fresh fruits and vegetables can be waxed or coated in mineral oil, and cheese protectively waxed. Root crops, such as potatoes, carrots, and onions can be treated with anti-sprouting agents. A small

Just staying alive and healthy is increasingly complex in today's world. Large numbers of Canadians are badly malnourished, while the consumption of highly processed foods outpaces fresh produce in our diets. Deaths from cancer and heart disease are rising. V.D. is epidemic. Health care costs soar. Drug companies' profits climb. Disease means dollars, and the illness business is booming.

The system is falling apart.

NUS launches student aid campaign, response uncertain

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students across Canada this fall are being asked to sign a petition demanding "student participation" in student aid decision-making, aid eligibility criteria which are "flexible and realistic", and removal of "the financial barriers to education — no more student debt."

The launching of the National Student Aid Petition Campaign was announced August 29 by the National Union of Students (NUS), the three year old organization which represents students nationally.

Whether students in all provinces will get an opportunity to sign the petition, and whether the national campaign will succeed at all, depends to a large extent on the response of local and provincial student unions to the NUS proposal.

Just what that response will be is not certain at this time. The Atlantic Federation of Students (AFS) has given its unqualified support to the campaign according to NUS executive secretary, Dan O'Connor.

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), the largest provincial student organization in the country, has supported the petition "in principle" but has refused to commit staff or resources to the campaign.

And, the British Columbia Student Federation (BCSF) has said they will support the petition and work on it, but only after other priority issues such as housing are dealt with early

Individual student unions at Memorial in Newfoundland, Calgary, the University of Alberta, Winnipeg, Brandon and the Kelsey Institute in Saskatoon have already responded favourably to the campaign. Since the materials explaining the campaign have only recently been released.

THE DEMANDS

The first of the three demands of the petition is to: "Make student aid decisions without secrecy and with participation by student representatives."

According to a pamphlet being prepared to accompany the petition, this demand arises because "at most post-secondary institutions it has been recognized that student participation results in better decisions."

"Despite the institutional trend", the pamphlet states, "students have virtually NO say in the decisions regarding student aid programmes."

The result is that "decisions are usually made by isolated government bureaucrats with some advice from institutional officials" who fail to realize "the problems that individual students face when dealing with student aid regulations."

Students should be involved at all levels of decision — making which affect their lives and the quality of their education, and should be represented on federal-provincial policy groups, provincial student aid committees and appeal boards, NUS says.

The second demand is for "flexible and realistic eligibility criteria" — specifically: — a more flexible criteria for what constitutes financial "independence" of a student; — aid for part-time students; — lowering the amount of money which parents are expected to contribute to support a dependent student; — increasing the maximum amount of money which students can receive, which is presently "well below the poverty line"; and — rolling back the unrealistic increases in the amount of money a student must save through the summer earnings, despite the high summer unemployment rates.

The third and final item on the petition is to "remove the barriers to education — no more student debts."

NUS takes the position that grants should form the basis of the aid system rather than loans, and says that loans deter people, particularly those from low-income backgrounds, from attending post-secondary institutions.

The pamphlet cites recent examples of provinces and the federal government raising the loan ceilings and reducing grant portions of the aid package "at a time when people need more, not less, support."

NATIONAL CO-ORDINATION

Calling the petition "the students first national manifestation of their demands" on student aid, NUS says the object of the petition is to provide "visible support" for the demands that student organizations have been making "through the collection of the signatures of a significant proportion of post-secondary students."

Once collected, NUS plans to have the signed petitions presented to Parliament and the provincial legislatures sometime in the late fall "to restore a strong lobby" for student aid reform.

According to the NUS release, the Canada Student Loans Plan came into existence in 1964 "as a result of a strong student lobby". NUS feels that, since then, and with the collapse of the Canadian Union of Students in 1969, many of the current problems in the aid system have developed due to the absence of an effective national lobby.

Provincial campaigns, NUS says, can be "safely ignored" by federal and provincial authorities because they have "little national coordination."

The one provincial organization which seems lease impressed with the need for "national coordination" is the OFS which NUS president Pierre Ouellette described in an interview as "the trouble spot".

OFS chairman John Shortall, President of the Student Federation at the University of Waterloo, outlined OFS's dissatisfaction with the campaign.

He said they were not given sufficient opportunity to discuss the campaign prior to the decision by the NUS central committee, and had the whole thing "sprung on us" after the fall program from OFS had already been set.

Another serious reservation according to Shortall, is that they disagree with the petition tactically.

A petition campaign in Ontario last year met with limited success, and some feel that the situation in Ontario has developed to the point where students are prepared to "go beyond the petition" as a form of political action.

But he does not rule out the possibility that OFS might change its mind as a result of discussions with NUS and other provincial organizations.

"We don't want to go against the rest of the country, and we still may not do that," he said, but added that although OFS doesn't want to "look like Ontario chauvinists" they "might have to."

Shortall expressed hope that a planned series of meetings beginning in October between NUS and the provincial organizations to discuss their mutual roles and structures will resolve some of the problems which have been occurring in coordinating provincial and national strategies.

Strange Cult forms at U of T

A strange disease has struck the once-quiet University of Toronto campus.

Lineups are forming everywhere and none seems to know why. Masses of students are forming themselves into long rows outside all U of T buildings in a strange ritual that has the sociologists baffled.

"Cargo cultists have nothing on these folks," says one prof. "I see them out there every day standing outside rain or shine with dazed expressions on their faces. I can't understand, but it sure is eerie."

One reporter got close enough to those involved in the rituals but could get no explanation. When asked for a reason, one dazed student said "I dunno, it's in my blood, I feel restless and stupid unless I stand here. Society's to blame, man, I'm a victim.

The reporter overheard one group reciting almost identical nine-digit numbers in a semi-narcotic trance and repeating the words "add" and "delete" interspersed with code names out of an almost biblical white book. This book apparently contains all the knowledge known to humanity.

What can be done to end the theft of these young innocent minds? The candidates in the provincial election have offered relief in the form of brand new de-toxification centers, where the victims will be weaned from the white book through careful doses of Peter Rabbit and Bambi meets Godzilla. Surely there is hope.

Bill Davis speaks out on students

OTTAWA (CUP) — Bill Davis will not raise tuition in the next two years unless the Committee on University Affairs, headed by Dr. Stefan Dupre, recommends otherwise.

Responding to questions on whether there would be a major shift in the financing of post-secondary education, the Premier of Ontario said there were no specific plans on the government's part to do so.

However, he said, "I don't want to cut myself or the government off from better suggestions coming from the university communities or the Dupre Commission."

Among these ideas might be "giving the universities greater flexibility or independence in financial terms by having an increase in tuition fees which would be coupled with an increase in student support so they would have more funding and students in need would be no differently off than they are today."

He added however, that the government is committed to no tuition increase for the 1975-76 academic year.

Davis was asked whether he thought the Ontario Student Loans Programs which forces students to borrow the totality of their student award, was an indication the Ontario government was shifting to a straight loan system and the elimination of grants.

He denied this. He said he did not think the fact that loans under the Ontario Student Loan Plan were substantially higher than the loan grant combination under the Ontario Student Awards Program would have a great influence on which one the students would choose.

"They will still have a choice," he added and said "I know that everyone is not happy with the student awards programme, but it just happens to be the best."

"The universities have done a fair amount themselves, in the field of graduate studies, particularly, and how much more is necessary it's hard to say. Some university people tell me they've gone as far as they can go, and I can't say they're wrong. I don't know."

On the problems facing students getting jobs after graduation, he did not think this was a long term problem; "That's a short term thing," he said.

"I mean, it's got to be a short term thing. It has to be. If it isn't a short term thing we're all in trouble."

DENVER (ENS-CUP) — Former activist Rennie Davis's sign-off prayers on a Denver television station apparently aren't being answered at the headquarters of his guru, the 17 year-old Maharajji.

According to a reliable source in Denver — a former official in the Guru's Divine Light Mission — the Perfect Master is now some $300,000 in debt. Furthermore, his Divine Sales Company, has reportedly been plowed under due to lack of funds to pay rent.

OHIO (ENS-CUP) — All motorists get infuriated by other drivers who refuse to dim their bright headlights when approaching another car. But a man behind the wheel of a VW on a lonely dark road near Oxford, Ohio, this week took some direct action.

When an approaching Pontiac refused to dim its lights after the VW repeatedly blinked his, the VW driver swung off the road, turned around and gave chase. Within a mile he caught the big Pontiac and forced it off the road. He then backed up ten feet and charged into the rear-end of the big car, backed-up again and charged twice again.

The driver of the crumpled Pontiac, bright lights still glaring, said he was too astonished to even recognize the man.

Hollywood washes out newest disaster movie

Tidal Wave

"After all the officials shouldn't be so nervous. So what if one little island sinks?"

Do not be misled, for despite the television ads, there are no tidal waves in this made-in-Japan, butchered-in-America mini epic. The much-touted white water waits quietly in the wings while fire storms, earthquakes, volcanoes, bursting dams, oil spills and exploding Datsuns summarily eliminate Tokyo, Osaka and the 65 million hapless Japanese who lack Swiss bank accounts.

In the nick of time the Seventh Fleet arrives to transport Mothra, Rodan, Gydra, Godzilla and the folks from Planet Zero to safety in Hollywood (where, unfortunately they were edited out of their next three disaster flicks; The Posidon Adventure, The Towering Inferno and Earthquake) in their place a new monster appears — top billed Lorne Greene as bureaucracy incarnate — who proceeds to take this new disaster to committee.

Much of the original footage of the film originally titled The Submergence of Japan, lies on an American cutting room floor. In its place about ten minutes of Pa Cartwright pacing the U.N. on a high grade film stock is skillfully edited in. Canada's number-one-son makes a brief appearance before the opening credits to offer a mini lecture on Plate Tectonics and the history of Continental Drift, and then disappears till called upon to put the Japanese rescue mission on "Hold".

Eventually though, America, in an overwhelming display of generosity and global responsibility, opens its desert playgrounds of Arizona, Nevada and Utah to the teeming few that manage to clear customs. And mind you, all this despite the U.N.'s sobering reminders of the disease, poverty and crime spawned by huge refugee camps. As the Prime Minister of Australia so eloquently states, "It's easier to accept priceless Japanese adventure art treasures than a lot of refugees."

One is presented with basically two, two, two-films-in-one. The first, a Japanese adventure story, shows the efforts of 110 million people to recapture a dying culture by abandoning a land inundated with U.S. exports: baseball, horse racing, sun bathing, hot dogs and take-out Chinese food. It's a klutzy story told against a panoramic view of exploding models and mat shots. The second is an American "Disaster" movie, with the United Nations sending Japan through proper channels to the bottom of the sea. The result is a recreation of the evacuation of South Vietnam with the role of the Viet Cong ably played by Mother Earth. Unfortunately Godzilla has already done it and done it better.

The Love Interest helps flesh out the plot and tie the two films together. A young oceanographer and a wealthy landowner's daughter supply the lovers and mother nature, the front parlor. Boy and girl watch island explod, boy gets shaken up in Tokyo, girl gets singed on Mount Fuji, boy makes cover of Newsweek, girl gets wet in sinking harbor, boy ends battered and bruised in a box car travelling to a desert refugee camp, and the girl ends up in Geneva. Moral: Swiss bank is mightier than the cover of Newsweek, so what else is new?

As the film closes, with the survivors scattered around the globe, we can only hope that the British will again open their hearts to a lost people and graciously offer them the rest of Arabia.

A Man for Hanging

On the same bill is a delightful little oater about a bank robber plagued by bad eyesight and terminal acne, who is forced to live and relive a sordid and fatal love affair from his past until he accidentally hangs himself, forcing a quick closing of the picture in a record 84 minutes. Starring Peter Breck, the crazed journalist from Shock Corridor, the film is unable to attain the raw emotional ferocity and warm, tender humanity of the Samuel Fuller films it attempts to emulate (or Walt Disney for that matter).

Weather Gives Blues Offence Only 10 pts. Laurier Gets But Three

KITCHENER — A shout went up in the dressing room soon after the Varsity Blues came off the field from their 10-3 opening win over Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks. "How about three cheers from the defence!" chorused the exuberant members of the Blues' offensive unit.

That just about summed what happened as the Blues took their first ever meeting with the Hawks on a cold, windy, rainy, Saturday afternoon.

It was strictly a game of defences. Neither team could generate anything when it had the ball. In fact, no team could put together more than one first down on a series without the aid of a penalty to the other side. The respective offensive totals were each under 200 yards with the Hawks edging out the Blues 183-166 in the yardage department.

Key to the victory was not so much the way the Blues stopped up the Laurier attack but their capacity for coming up with the big play itself. Such was the case late in the third quarter when they set up the winning touchdown.

With the score tied at 3-3 the Blues had driven down to the Laurier seven where, what was to that point, their best scoring drive had stalled. Two plays later the Toronto defenders caught Laurier quarterback Gord Taylor trying to move out of his pocket and forced him to fumble. Out of the ensuing pile-up Blues linebacker John Martini came up with the ball five yards from the goal line.

After Estaban Andryjowicz dropped Dave Langley's end zone pass flanker-turned-tailback Brent Elsey went in to score following the blocking of Steve Ince and Libert Castillo.

Another big defensive play came in the second quarter when Laurier penetrated deep into Varsity territory. Chuck McMann's fine exhibition of breaking tackles came off when defensive back Paul Paul stole the ball out of his hands at the Blues' nine yard line averting what looked to be a sure score for the Hawks.

The final big play came late in the fourth quarter when Laurier threatened to gain some momentum in the Toronto half of midfield. On a second down and short yardage situation the Blues stopped an off tackle slam by fullback Scott Campbell for no gain forcing the Hawks to give up the ball. Laurier made no more threats after that.

"We figured they'd come off tackle at us that play," said Martini. "They hadn't tried it yet and nothing else was really working for them."

Besides those feats the Blues secondary also picked off four Taylor passes and picked up three more fumbles for a total of seven. Varsity coach Ron Murphy had high praise for both defensive units after the game.

"I don't think any team in this league will have an easy time against either of these defences," he said.

"The game proved that both teams are pretty equal," said Laurier head coach Dave "Tufty" Knight. "I was satisfied with our defensive game. We just made too many mistakes offensively."

He pointed to three costly errors which cost his team scoring chances. One was McMann's fumble. Another was a fumble by flanker Wayne Kemick after he took a Taylor pass down to the Blues' 35. The third, and most costly, was a holding in the first quarter which wiped out a 57-yard touchdown pass to Dan Bovair.

While the Blues did not make as many mistakes offensively (they gave up only three fumbles and one interception) they also could not mount anything consistent.

Mark Braganolo's absence from the backfield certainly cut down on their ground game. While his replacement for the day, Elsey, did a competent job at the tailback slot gaining 56 yards on 17 carries the 170-pound flanker found the going very rough once he got through the blocking. He intimated that he would not mind returning to flanker at all once Braganolo is re-inserted into the line up.

Both coaches also pointed to the wet weather and field conditions to explain the low calibre of offence. "It was too cold for both teams today," said Murphy. "We aren't used to such cold weather at this time of the year."

The Blues earlier scoring was all in the first quarter. They took a 2-0 lead at the 10-minute mark when Laurier kicker Mike Karpow conceded a safety touch. Paul McMillan's wind-assisted 65-yard punt went for a single in the last minute.

The Hawks tied the score midway in the second quarter when Karpow, with the wind at his back, booted a 42-yard field goal.

CAPEPULE COMMENTS — Bill Sokovnin picked off two of the Blues interceptions with the others going to Bruce Pollock and Julio Giordani.

McMillan punted for a 32.1 yard average. . . Langley completed only three of 12 passes as did Taylor. The Varsity pivot rushed 10 times for 43 yards while Taylor took off 13 times gaining only 24. . . Blues defensive tackle Ken Hussey went off in the second quarter with injured knee ligaments and may not play in the return match with the Hawks next Saturday. . . Rick Chalupka has returned to play another season for Laurier after being cut by Hamilton Tiger Cats. He saw limited action Saturday as he is recuperating from an injured hamstring muscle but was still the Hawks best ground gainer with 48 yards on 11 carries. . .

Men's Varsity Rowing '75

With new uniforms and a new set of oars on order for this season, Varsity Rowing Team head coach Gord Leighton expects improved performances over the '74-'75 season, which by the way, was the first time in several years that Varsity crews competed.

It's a short season for the rowing crews, whose strength has traditionally been in the lightweight (155 lbs.) event. The team began practices this past weekend and shall continue to train seven days each week. They begin their season on Sept. 27 at the McMaster Regatta and continue for five weeks which includes the U of T Regatta on Oct. 11. The OUA championships are to be held at Brock on Nov. 1.

"It's a short season but tough," says Leighton. "Rowing is different than most of the other Varsity sports, in that we actually teach it. We take novice people and make them competitive at the intercollegiate level in just seven weeks. It takes dedication on their part — morning practices are difficult to adjust to — but you have to remember that it is an intercollegiate sport. Certainly the football, basketball, and hockey players on Varsity teams expect long and tough workouts, and rowing is no different."

The team is still interested in new faces and is holding a meeting at the 3rd floor, south study room in Hart House at 6:45 Monday evening.

MINDS AND MONEY. BLOWN AT ESP PSYCHIC FAIR

By GREG RICHARDS

Fools rush where angels dare to tread.

These words of Alexander Pope at least partly apply to Toronto's second ESP Psychic Fair, a menagerie of fifty exhibits all dedicated to spreading and selling information about the weird and wonderful.

The show ran from Wednesday until yesterday at the Four Seasons Hotel and was no tea party for ordinary angels.

A United Church minister felt at home there at any rate. Rev. Lindsay King of Willowdale worked a pneumatology booth while "psychic" colleagues at other exhibits sold biofeedback devices, vibrating pillows, pyramids, perfume, and palm readings to name only a few items.

Almost everyone present had something to sell, making the card allotting a 10 per cent discount on all the Fair's goods and services the best deal by far.

But money talks, and were it not for the financial success of Fair organizer Al Ward, it is unlikely the event would have materialized.

Mr. Ward himself has been selling pyramids for five years, and began after "seeing myself in a dream building and testing pyramids." A Ward pyramid is supposedly a form-energy device accredited with properties such as the ability to sharpen a razor blade.

Saturday night's featured speaker was Californian Bill Cox, who demonstrated the capabilities of dowsing, with the Cameron Aurameter. Among other things Cox claimed that on our foreheads we all have invisible third eyes which like fingerprints, are personalized.

"Maybe we are gods in the making... in the future our third eyes will create planets and galaxies," he said.

Using the Aurameter, Cox demonstrated the position of a volunteer's third eye by dowsing. Commonly known as divining, dowsing is a process by which "energy fields" are perceived with a super-sensitive wire or stick. The Original Cameron Aurameter can be purchased for $49.50.

More ominous subjects were also discussed by Cox, as he warned, "Black magicians and Russians are going full speed ahead to use awesome psychic powers for destructive purposes." According to Cox, these misguided psychic practitioners are abusing a sacred birthright.

"God gave us that wonderful thing — freedom to choose between levels of consciousness."

Closely allied with ringmaster Ward is The Mind Institute of Toronto. Most booths at the ESP Psychic Fair were being run by graduates of the three-year-old Institute who have branched off and specialized in some field.

The Institute states its purpose is "to accelerate the inevitable growth process of each individual." Courses are offered at the Institute, "for the individual to use in coping with everyday living." Their initial and least expensive course, Mind Dynamics, includes for a fee of $190, 26 hours of training given over four consecutive days.

People manning exhibits politely accepted spectator skepticism, but encouraged earnest participation.

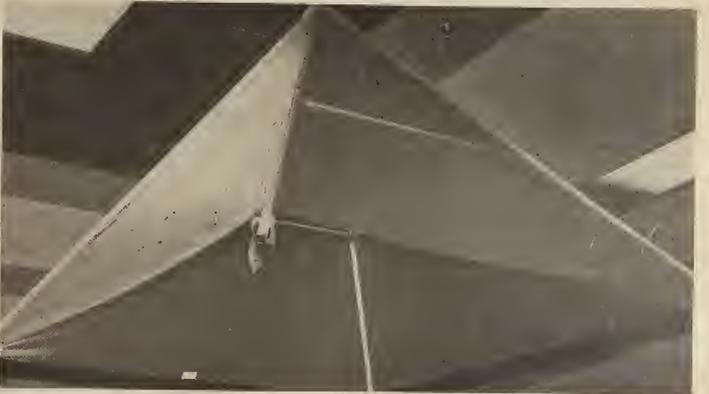

Some members of the public did shove inhibitions aside and delve into the psychic world with no reservations. One mother claimed her daughter was a clairvoyant and said she hoped to find someone at the Fair to aid the young girl in realizing her supernatural potential.

The point most often made, however, was that everyone is psychic and people only differ as to the degree of spiritualistic capacity.

Geraldine the seeress explained, "The Fair is held to give you people a chance to see what we psychics, clairvoyants - weirds, are all about."

University and College Enrollment Up for 1975-76

OTTAWA (CUP) — Advance statistics on education released August 29 by Statistics Canada show that university and college enrolment is expected to increase this year.

Estimates for the 1975-76 school year indicate university enrolment will be up about 3.5 per cent and college enrolment 4.4 per cent while the number of elementary and secondary school students continues to decline.

University enrolment is estimated at 363,000 and college enrolment at 220,000. The number of full-time post-secondary teachers is estimated at 47,600 up 1,300 or 2.9 per cent over 1974-75.

Elementary-secondary enrolment is expected to drop 1.3 per cent to 5.5 million in 1974-75. The decline is expected to continue into the early 1980's, reflecting the low birth rate of the last decade. Full-time teaching staff is expected to be 271,800, down 800 from 1974-75.

Total national expenditure on education for 1975-76 is estimated at $12.2 billion, up 15.5 per cent from a year earlier. But spending on education as a percentage of personal income and gross national product has declined since 1971 despite the increases in dollars spent. Education costs have not risen as quickly as those for other social services.

Per capita spending for education in 1974 averaged $472 nationally. The breakdown by provinces: Alberta $497, Ontario $489, Quebec $479.

According to workers at the Student's Administrative Council, Deputy Returning Officers at both St. Andrew's-St. Patrick and St. George riding have been refusing to revise the voters lists in those ridings to include students. The last day for such revision is today.

SAC worker John Bennett reports that one student was refused twice yesterday, at noon and six p.m., at St. Andrew's-St. Patrick by returning officer Lesley Singer with the reply "I'm too busy."

SAC will be attempting to gain these revisions today. If you have not been enumerated, get thee to the SAC office.

Support Builds

By BOB BETTSON

As negotiations continue on a new contract for U of T library workers, CUPE local 1230 has joined supporters in forming a broadly based support committee of students, faculty and other campus workers.

A group of forty supporters met with union officials yesterday to begin preparations for support activities on campus and hear reports on the progress of negotiations.

The group decided to begin immediately distributing leaflets explaining the workers case and organizing for a noon hour rally to support their cause on Tuesday, October 7. It will meet regularly on Mondays at 5 p.m.

Union local president Judy Darcy said the workers needed the active support of other groups in the university to prevent the administration from using "divide and conquer" tactics.

Darcy charged that the university is already beginning a propaganda effort against the workers trying "to make us look greedy and money hungry."

But, she said "we won't accept that library workers should be made to shoulder the burden of university cutbacks." Darcy pointed out university plans were to dissolve 70 to 80 positions by next year which causing gaps in services and unemployment for workers.

The chief obstacle at this stage in negotiations, Jim Mayer, a negotiating committee member said, is the issue of job security and the related one of setting up a job evaluation team with union participation.

The union is taking a firm stand that the present level of staffing must be maintained and demanding that job evaluation committees be set up to review job classifications and responsibilities.

Darcy said this was so important as a demand that negotiations will founder if the university does not give in.

But, according to Mayer, Parker has gone to his superiors on this point and refused to negotiate on any others in the meantime.

Darcy told the meeting if negotiations continue to bog down the union will be requesting cancellation. She said in any case the 430 workers would not be in a legal position to strike until mid to late October.

Among the chief union demands in a new contract are:

- protections against lay-offs and reductions of staff.
- a shorter work week with a lump sum grant to offset losses to inflation in the last 15 months.
- a series of measures ensuring the

The varsity malcolm cowger

- strengthening of the union including inclusion of part-time workers in the bargaining unit.
- an increase of $25 a month for each worker to bring wages up to the average wage in Ontario.
- increased vacations and other fringe benefits.

One Bill Too Many

William Davis, Ontario premier and currently on the hustings for the Progressive Conservatives, was confronted by an overflow crowd of students at Hart House on Monday.

Most of the questions asked were connected to the student situation in the province.

The first question was on his plans to revise, chop or expand the OSAP program.

According to Bill, there has been a 25 per cent increase in the grant fund over the past "few" years. In addition he is "willing to discuss" the question of the adequacy of the $40 weekly living allowance under OSAP.

"It's the most generous of any student aid program in Canada," he said. "The philosophy of the program will not change. We are not moving to a total loan component."

The Ontario government was accused of instituting the total loan scheme in stages by an OFS election tabloid.

A woman student was angry at the difficulties encountered in her dealings with OSAP. The majority of expenses arrive at the beginning of the year while the majority of the money arrives in January, according to OSAP regulation.

Davis agreed that such things do happen but chopped at the federal government even though the federal portion is the first to arrive. But his true feelings did come out.

"Some students decide at the end of the fall term not to return. We want to ensure that students are there for two terms."

Again Davis referred to the possibility of future consultation with students and his preparedness to discuss the matter further. He had no concrete suggestions to make.

He was much more concrete when asked about "systematic cutbacks". The question referred to the long standing freeze on capital construction and the failure of the provincial grants to keep up with inflation rates.

"I cannot accept the statement that there have been cutbacks," he said, adding that total monies have increased in the last two years. The government, he said, has to decide priorities on an equitable basis, referring to the fact that the Ontario government has been chopping budgets up and down the line.

Davis was almost pinned down on student housing when he admitted, "I can't say that we have found a solution to this." Things returned to normal however, as he offered to "reassess the adequacy of the number of student residences on campus."

Davis was forceful about his opposition to any civil servant participation in provincial elections or their right to strike.

He was self-congratulatory over the plight of the teachers and his solution. Since the teacher's main concern, according to him is teacher-board negotiations he claimed that legislation was probably the most comprehensive in the country.

There were more questions on Turner's recent resignation, the Pickering airport, deficit financing, the state of the economy and political favouritism.

The afternoon whiled away with students asking questions and Davis denying that anything was happening of any importance, in spite of quotes from himself and James Auld, minister of Colleges and Universities, that tuition fees will be going up. He simply denied it.

Most of the concerned students were forced to wander off, mumbling to themselves about misplaced logic and empty pockets.

September 18 Election Candidates

For England, Harry and St. George

Campbell: Soup's on!

By CHRISTOPHER DUVERNET
After capturing the St. George riding after a Conservative reign of 37 years in a 1973 by-election, Margaret Campbell is once again preparing for battle.

Although she is confident of the benefits of a Liberal government, she seemed hesitant to commit herself on future programs. When asked if her Party would remove the Conservative's $1,500 grant to first-time home buyers, she replied "I would think that what we would be doing, far more reasonably, would be to try to hold down the interest rate on mortgages."

Similarly, Campbell appeared unsure as to an increase in tuition under the Liberals if elected. "I can't certainly say this at this time."

"We would certainly promote a larger grant system rather than the loan system in the Awards position."

"What I would say is that in our position we cannot see any increase at this time."

Despite Nixon's support for the repeal of the land speculation tax, Campbell denied this represented a reversal of Party position. "No, it's not true. We support the principle."

"What we don't like is the bill as it now stands. It doesn't catch the speculator. It missed the barracuda and caught the minnows," Campbell added.

Campbell seemed particularly concerned about education but was vague on changes which Liberals might make in the system. "All I can answer on the education scene is we have seen the horrible mess that has resulted."

When asked how the Liberals plan to remove education spending ceilings would affect their promise of cost-cutting in government, Campbell replied, "You can't take one of these programs and view it in splendid isolation as you're suggesting."

Pressed for details of which services might be curtailed to fulfill their promise to reduce government expenditure, she replied, "I don't think it's a matter so much of the services that it would cut, I think it's the approach to creating greater efficiency."

"I would think what we would do would be to replace them (some programs) with more efficient programs and programs that would relate directly service to people."

Although she affirmed her party's commitment to encouraging Canadian industry, when it was pointed out that federal Liberals had given grants totalling over $2 million to an American jeans manufacturer, she stated "No, I don't think I would care to comment beyond the point that what we have said is that we feel we must encourage Canadian industry when grants are being made which in our view have been discriminatory in the same field." Asked if the grant was a discriminatory one she replied, "I don't say that it was discriminatory in the sense that there was another company that didn't get it (the grant), a Canadian company."

Though critical of the present government deficit, Campbell said she was not able to say what a Liberal deficit would be. She cautioned, "Until you get there it's difficult to say."

"I don't think anybody can give you a definite answer until you get there."

Evoy: Ayn Rand Lives!

By GREG RICHARDS

Leader and founder of the Ontario Libertarian Party Bruce Evoy, claims he is offering the only political alternative in Thursday's provincial election. The crusading St. George of St. George riding feels he is battling the dragon of "corporate state capitalism." "We believe the only purpose of government is to protect individuals. There is no society, society is a collection of individuals." Evoy contends a vote for any of the three regular parties, or the Communists, is a vote for statism.

The Libertarians, whose 17 candidates must run as independents because their party is unregistered, advocate total civil liberty although they may not morally sanction acts performed with such freedom. Evoy says, "Sex is a private matter, whether it be straight, gay, or pay."

"We are opposed to censorship, opposed to drug laws, sex laws, gun laws, and all victimless crime laws."

Libertarians advocate laissez-faire capitalism for the economic scene. "The trouble with socialism is that it prevents capitalist acts between consenting adults," said Evoy.

Concerning taxation he comments, "The government makes the mafia look like a two-bit gangster."

A former teacher with twenty years experience, Evoy says in this election, "The top priority is education, because state-run education inculcates only socialism."

He finds other faults with the public school system. "It is a miracle to me that any students are literate. The students are the losers — they don't even know what they're not getting."

Once in office the Libertarians would gradually execute their education policy. "We advocate an immediate start on a long-term phaseout of the public school system into the private sector so that parents would have a multiplicity of school choices for their children."

Daycare service would no doubt be offered by these private schools, according to Evoy.

He also believes that through various means, a system of toll roads among them, transportation facilities should be gradually put in the marketplace of free enterprise.

Because they allegedly destroy the incentive of landlords and developers, there would be no rent controls in Libertarian Ontario. "Rent controls do nothing but bring about slums, dilapidated buildings, and a housing shortage."

"Civil servants should have the right to strike, but we should have fewer civil servants — gradually phase the excess into the private sector," says Evoy.

Evoy founded Canada's federal Libertarian Party in 1973, and turned his organizational abilities to Ontario a year later. He is a tireless Don Quixote and promises to never cease his crusade until he dies.

Marshal Bruce Evoy served with the armed forces in North Africa, and Italy. He says, "It is one of the ironies of my life that I was overseas fighting for freedom, only to return to the flowering Welfare State with all its legalized coercion of the individual and looting of his paycheck."

Hill: answer to NDP band-aids

By LIAM LACEY

Unemployment, inflation, and housing are the big issues in this campaign, says Liz Hill, Communist Party candidate for St. George riding.

In outlining the Communist platform, Hill explained it's "an immediate program for Ontario. We don't say it's socialism. It is part of an ongoing struggle to change society."

Hill feels that business monopolies are ultimately responsible for Ontario's problems.

"The Tories and the Liberals are representatives of monopolies. Monopolies control every aspect of production. We need an anti-monopoly coalition to curb their control."

"The Tory government has sold out to the United States. Because of the U.S. depression we have one. Unemployment will continue without long term planning and the government has never looked beyond short term."

On the housing issue, Hill calls for a rollback of all rents to January 1974. After that, any increases must be justified before a rental control board.

Hill also supports a massive building program of low rental units for low income families, which would serve to supply jobs.

Hill is in favor of a Labor Bill of Rights that would assure jobs for all and basic union rights and conditions.

The sellout to the U.S. has "warped education" claims Hill. She is opposed to cutbacks "which affect working families" and she believes in "universal and free education."

"People ask, says Hill, "where will the money come from? The money is there. It can be made available through corporation taxes levied by higher levels of government."

The present Ontario government has "indirectly contributed to racism and sexism by its failure to act against them," says Hill.

She also blames the press for "giving coverage to fascists."

"Openly racist groups such as the Western Guard should be charged with issuing hate literature and denied freedom of access," Hill asserts.

Hill believes that the onus should not be on women to raise issues of sex discrimination, but the law should assure that such things do not happen. She also supports universal free daycare and maintains that abortion is a woman's right.

An important concern for Hill is the high youth unemployment.

"Youth are the largest group of unemployed and the least protected by the U.I.C.," explained Hill. "It is their future which is at stake."

Although Hill does not expect any of the 33 Communist candidates to win an Ontario riding, she insists she is optimistic. "Eventually we will win. It's just a matter of working."

"But we are up against barriers. The press isn't giving us coverage. We don't have the financial backing of big business parties to place radio and newspaper ads," Hill explained.

Although she concedes "the NDP have some good policies," Hill asserts that "they will not resolve problems. We can't use band-aid solutions. The fault is in the capitalist system."

Robinson: ECO 100 mostly bunk

By KRISTINE KING

NDP candidate Lukin Robinson will fight to establish rent control and an improved housing situation if he is elected in St. George riding this Thursday.

An economist, Robinson believes housing and rent increases are the most immediate concerns of the citizens he hopes to represent.

"A large majority of the residents of the riding are in rented dwellings of one kind or another," said Robinson, "and those who are lucky enough that their rents are not being raised today, know many other people are having their rents raised by large amounts."

"They're afraid the same thing is going to happen to them and, of course, unless rent controls are put on the same thing will happen to them as soon as their leases run out."

Robinson sharply denounced the Ontario government for "the somersaults" that they are "making on this whole question of rent control."

As Robinson sees it, the whole concept of the Davis review board is "ridiculous, virtually useless." It doesn't offer any protection to tenants because rent increases can occur when a lease is renewed, he said, and assed a tenant without a current lease has no status before the rent review board to make an appeal.

Robinson pointed out the example of Quebec where rent controls have been in effect since 1969. "They seem to be working very well and we don't hear objections to rent controls there."

Robinson considers agricultural support programs and daycare to be two important areas where the Davis government has not spent enough money.

"They haven't really put their shoulder to the wheel to organize daycare services for the very, very large number of people who need them," he said.

Robinson also thinks the Davis government has not done enough to improve education in Ontario. He called the Liberal campaign, which stresses a return to the "3 R's", "very old-fashioned."

He wants to see education become a process which relates "to the cultural background and experience" of the children being taught.

Robinson foresees post-secondary tuition fees escalating if the Davis government is re-elected. His attitude is that "there should not be cutbacks in education, the more education the better."

He felt he was not in a position to judge whether cutbacks are necessary but explained, "Our position is that there should be essentially no fees for post-secondary education."

He thinks the OSAP weekly living allowance should be increased because "the cost of living is 50 per cent higher today than in 1971."

While canvassing outside a subway station, Robinson saw a student carrying "the usual fat text on economics." "I've read these texts and I know what they say. The main trouble with economics texts is that they're nine-tenths bunk. They don't help the students really to understand the economic process as in fact it operates."

Vasilkoti: views from a toilet

By ERIC McMILLAN

Frank Vasilkoti is young, dynamic, and articulate in three languages, and as Tory candidate in St. George, he is conducting an energetic campaign.

However, Vasilkoti's wife, Marilyn, concedes, "There's no question Margaret Campbell is a strong opponent."

Yet she shares the general optimism in Vasilkoti's committee rooms that it's still an open ballgame.

Pulling the man with the "mission" away from back-slapping, hand-shaking, and animated discussions in English and French, was next to impossible.

He finally retreated to the washroom for a discussion of the criticism that the Tories have been in power too long to understand the problems of ordinary people.

"All that 32-years-in-power stuff is nonsense! It's people that run governments and that elect governments," he shouted from the toilet stall. He claimed the average age of Conservative candidates is around 46 and that 90 of the 125 candidates never served under former premier John Robarts. Vasilkoti is 38.

The big issue in St. George, according to Vasilkoti, is housing. Until recently he disagreed with the Conservative stance against rent controls, but is now pleased with the Davis proposal for a rent review board. This board would not discourage development of new housing "as in New York and Vancouver," he said.

He claimed the Davis proposal would provide for rebates retroactive to July 30 in instances of excessive rent increases determined by the board. If necessary, the board would take landlords to court relieving tenants of the legal initiative and costs, he said.

Vasilkoti was unsympathetic towards students on educational issues, although his constituency includes part of the university and his wife is a part time student at York. He found student enumeration a non-issue.

Vasilkoti said he was "not sufficiently informed on the pros and cons of tuition increases" to take a stand on the possibility of increases. To the charge that OSAP does not allow students from low-income families to finish college without huge debts to pay, he answered, "I personally paid off a $5,500 loan after leaving McGill."

Since completing graduate work at McGill, he has been advising small Canadian companies in financial planning, according to his campaign literature.

Vasilkoti said education costs account for over 30 per cent of the provincial budget and "the public has said it's enough."

"Very little discipline has been shown by local school boards," he said, adding, "restraint has been shown only by the province."

He blamed Trudeau for inflation. "The economy is a federal responsibility, but the province is setting an example of restraint."

Vasilkoti's dislike of Robert Nixon was not disguised. Nixon's policies of rent controls and cutbacks in education he dismissed as "political".

Tonight's ad-laden effort thanks to Liam Lacey, Greg Richards, Kristine King, Sharon Stevenson, Caitlin Kelly, Eric MacMillan and the road-runner Don Cruickshank. Whatever happened to campus trolls? Come on folks, stuff some telephone booths.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Notes from the 2nd floor

Fear not students, although you may have suspected that one of the prerequisites of being the president of the Student's Administrative Council was to be a "fellow-traveller," "com-symp," or just plain red, it ain't necessarily so.

Our own fearless leader Gord Barnes allowed himself to be grilled by the Toronto Star yesterday for inclusion in a section of local smallwigs and how they planned to vote tomorrow. Gord stuck his neck on the block and said that he would vote NDP. Just a personal choice mind you, that does not mean that SAC recommends that rather radical course to all the students on campus.

Barnes's decision wouldn't have much sway around here anyways, if the survey of the crowd at yesterday's Hart House appearance by Bill Davis is anything to go by. The place was solidly packed with admiring and applauding neophyte PC's, who listened to Davis attempting to ward off SAC plants in the audience. One promise of Davis's as reported in the Globe seems to be misleading, that there would be no tuition increase for the 1976-77 academic year. Don't be fooled by that. Davis said that there would be no government increase, which does not rule out the possibility that the universities on their own might raise the fees, which they have every legal right to do.

Enough politics. The lunchroom on the 14th floor of the Robarts library is a disgrace and has moved graffiti artists in the building to higher degrees of hyperbole and obscenity than the original on the main floor.

The room contains tables, chairs, an empty slot food machine and a coffee device that emits strange martian-like noises at all times. All this packed into and attempting to mask the unusually barren and anti-intellectual surroundings that seem to be the essence of Fort Book.

When will the university learn that tables, chairs and pre-cast concrete do not a lunchroom make? If the attendance in the room at 4 p.m. yesterday was any indication, most people would sooner not eat than sit there. If people will not use it as a lunchroom, may we suggest ping-pong tables or an artificial ice rink for scholars who could use a work-out to relieve those academic tensions? If the university is sincere in wanting this as a lunchroom, how about some color in the room, perhaps something on the walls? Something has to be done to overcome the bland feeling that overcomes any that enter the room, something that intimates that someone up there has actually thought about the function of the room. At present the atmosphere impedes digestion.

A vote for Communists sends a clear message

Ontario is a rich province. Rich in natural resources and rich in the skills of its population.

So why do we have over seven per cent unemployment? Why is so much of our economy under foreign ownership, to the detriment of balanced industrial development? Why is decent housing getting impossible to obtain at an affordable price or rental, while able-bodied construction workers stand idle for lack of employment?

Why is education being cutback at all levels when full economic and cultural development make it so necessary? Why are health services being cutback, a potential matter of life and death for people who need them?

How can the Ontario government be so bare-faced as to pretend that $40 a week is an adequate living allowance for students, as its OSAP grants and loans to students do presuppose, in addition to assuming that students can always get summer jobs — whether employment is actually available for them or not?

Why do Conservative and Liberal governments at Queen's Park and Ottawa for the most part stand passively by while racism rises, and even sometimes try to blame it on the immigrant groups themselves? Why do they not strictly enforce anti-discrimination laws and anti-hate propaganda legislation? Neofascist propaganda, to the extent that it succeeds in making any inroads, divides the working class and assaults the left. Who stands to gain from that?

The truth is that big business has long been calling the tune in this province and country, and fully expects to continue doing it. But when the people on the receiving end of their policies take a stand against them, big business can be defeated. This is why the Communist Party advocates the election of the largest possible bloc of progressive M.P.P.'s, including Communists, in the present provincial election.

We need policies for the people. Free quality education at all levels and a livable non-repayable stipend for all post-secondary students, university and non-university. That would help to democratize

Another far more amusing Robarts folly is the machine that fries and distributes french fries in the bottom cafeteria. When the odds are bad at Woodbine, gambling addicts could set up a seating gallery in front and make book on how many will forget to put the little box in the dispenser, thereby causing the machine (with a slight trace of a chuckle) to drop the fries in a disorderly manner on the tray.

The responses to such an action run from mild amusement to various oaths. Nothing in this university is more varied than people's responses to machines, a subject that would make a good paper for any struggling sociologist.

SAC workers were as red as their unused ketchup yesterday due to embarrassment at the run on hot dogs at their open house. The Weiner and bun situation was such that by 12:30 p.m. they had run out, as none of SAC's three feet seemed to know what the others were doing and the ordering simply never happened. SAC assistant Don Boynton was powerless to prevent the lack of freebies, but they have promised that between the hours of 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. today, that there will be more Shopsy's than SAC hacks as the open house continues tomorrow. A suggestion for some of the excess: calmly walk into the SAC office with an armful and hide them in strategic places such as the Xerox machine, the president's desk and Richard Pearce's mouth.

Two requests

Two requests go out from the newspaper to the campus. We need people. All aspects of a volunteer newspaper — layout, writing, photography, reviewing — suffer when the same people do the same things all the time. We need a kick in the brains from new people.

Second, there is no such thing as a lack of news, but we sometimes have a hard time keeping in touch with the little things. Keep your senses aware of anything that needs reporting, you are your own newspaper if you want to give it the time and attention.

Op-Ed submissions are opinion pieces. We try to keep most opinion out of the news columns, so if you have an axe to grind, this is the place. Submissions should be typed on a 72-character line, double-spaced and should be no more than four pages in length. They may be edited for space reasons.

Communists that they agree with our platform, but wonder why we are running in the election when we have no chance of winning it. And it is, in fact, true that in nomination 33 candidates we have not contested the majority of the provincial seats. But both the Liberal Party and the Tories are supported by, and cheerfully support, big business. A vote for either of them is therefore wasted.

On the other hand, no matter which of them succeeds in forming the next Ontario government, the sort of direction governmental policy will take, in the short run as well as the long, is bound to be significantly influenced by the strength of the left vote in this election. And the strongest possible vote of voting for the sort of left and working people's policies that are needed is to vote Communist. A heavily increased Communist vote will be a sure way of sending up an unmistakably clear message to the seat of government.

— by Dan Goldstick educational opportunity and provide the Ontario economy with the skilled graduates it will need for full industrial development under modern conditions.

We need rent controls and a massive government-financed program to build, acquire and renovate housing for ordinary people, including students. Extension of OHIP coverage to dental care, and the reduction of premiums by an initial 50 per cent. Nationalization of the super-profitable drug industry.

Nationalization is needed of the northern Ontario forest and mining industries, now owned by giant private corporations, U.S. and Canadian, and operated in the interests of their monopoly profits, not the interests of the people (those presently living as well as the generations to come). The creation of jobs through the institution of a 30-hour work week with no reduction in take-home pay.

The effective outlawing of all job discrimination against women is a must, as well as the provision of high-quality day care, at federal and provincial expense, to free working mothers from their "double burden". And adequate medical facilities so that women can cheerfully exercise their right to obtain an abortion.

Who would pay for all this? The big corporations, partly through nationalization, partly from increased taxes exacted from them. The people of this province and country have been paying long enough.

These policies, though anti-big-business, are not in themselves revolutionary. But success in achieving pro-people policies like these will open the door to more effective popular mobilization still, and thus to an eventual socialist transformation of Canada's economy overall.

Rosemary Brown: NDP leadership contestant helping out friend Barbara Brown, who was runner-up at the federal NDP leadership convention last summer, was in Toronto to help canvass for Barbara Beardsley.

Assessing the Beardsley campaign, Brown said, "The issues that she's hitting, specifically, seem to apply to the students today. I think she was the only candidate who spoke directly about the major concerns of students. This should pay off in the long run."

Brown said she has "not been following the campaign in its detail." "News about Ontario doesn't usually come to British Columbia," she explained laughing. Brown was asked to comment on the issues being considered in the Ontario election. "I think it's disgraceful that in the twentieth century we're still not being able to supply people with decent housing."

"We're still arguing over things such as whether land should be banked, conserved, preserved or whatever, knowing the kinds of things we know about the planet and what's happening to its ecology. And, putting people first is going to be with us forever."

Brown said governments must "tax the people who are ripping off your resources. It really is very simple."

But she added, "The Liberals won't do it and neither will the Conservatives. That's the block."

Responding to a question about housing and public ownership of land, Brown,

"You have to recognize that these two, both the Liberals and the Conservatives, are putting the housing money into the private sector and encouraging the private sector to do the building."

"If you're encouraging the private sector to go into something, they're not going to do it so that when they die they'll go to heaven. They're going to do it for the returns they'll get on their money right now," she explained.

Brown briefly discussed Canadian resources management and development with interested students. Federal and provincial governments are currently at loggerheads with the mining industry over the responsibilities of the industry's private sector.

Brown answered a student who pointed out that the private sectors of some resource industries had threatened to leave the country when faced with public ownership. "Resource industries can't leave. Where are they going to go?" she asked.

"The stuff that they're working with is right here. And, there isn't any way to get it out of the country. As a matter of fact, the only kind of industry that seems to be leaving Ontario, under this great conservative government of yours, is the auto industry, which you have no control over anyway. Detroit decides."

Brown added, "The thing they threaten to do when they leave British Columbia is to go to Brazil. Big deal. If that's the kind of climate that they find comfortable to do business in, then obviously they're never going to feel at home in a province where people come first. And, they stay, they don't go anywhere."

Brown told the Varsity she "would certainly compare Ontario to British Columbia before 1972, because we had lived under about the same number of years of Conservative rule. There we call it Social Credit, but it's the same."

She feels the voters are "pretty much the same", and as two of the "three richest provinces in the country we share the same kinds of problems."

"Certainly Toronto shares the same kinds of problems that we have in Vancouver, so there are great similarities."

"You think a little bit slower than we do so maybe this time your voters will get on to making the right choice," Brown said laughingly.

Brown, who once called herself an old-fashioned socialist, said, "They're good old-fashioned issues."

Chinese vote hindered

A wholesale challenging of all Chinese voters marred a heavy advance poll in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding Saturday.

According to a campaign worker in the NDP riding headquarters, a polling scrutineer for Progressive Conservative candidate Larry Grossman challenged all Chinese voters who came to the Borden street polling station.

District Returning Officer (DRO), Lesley Singer confirmed that such challenges took place, but said the challenges were legal.

Problems were created when it was required that an interpreter sworn in by the DRO officiate as prospective voters swore oaths they were the person identified on their enumeration slips.

When asked in a telephone interview, Elsie Kan, wife of the liberal candidate Fred Kan, a Chinese-Canadian, was disturbed by the action.

"I don't understand why he has to do it to every Chinese person and not anyone else," she said.

The scrutineer was identified as a law associate of PC candidate Larry Grossman, but no such person could be reached for comment. When asked, about the incident, a spokesman for Larry Grossman denied knowing anything.

No one was turned away as a result of the incessant challenges but they were the source of considerable bewilderment to some older Chinese citizens.

According to Mrs. Kan, the appearance of the scrutineer was sparked by an unusually high turnout on Friday. Kan said evidently the PC's were worried most Chinese voters were leaning toward her husband.

"I think it's going to be a good, tough fight and certainly it seems as though Barbara (Beardsley) is holding her own in this riding," said Rosemary Brown, NDP member of the British Columbia legislature, after a St. Andrew-Patrick all-candidates' meeting at U of T yesterday.

Intercampus is back

For many years students on all three U of T campuses have been interested in a form of athletic competition which is competitive and yet not all too demanding.

Well, Intercampus sports are here, and all indications show that they are here to stay. This year is in fact the second year of their existence. Many students will ask what Intercampus Athletics are. The answer, although not too well known, is not a difficult one. Intercampus athletics are sports with a degree of competitiveness but without any major commitment. The level of competition, although higher than intramural, is not quite on a par with intercollegiate.

In some sports there are four teams, in others five, divided among the campuses as follows: St. George campus has two teams, Erindale and Scarborough team apiece unless the demand is greater at any particular campus. In that case the campus will receive an extra team or two.

The involvement demands about three hours a week including two hours of practice and one hour of league competition. Seasons extend six to eight weeks with playoffs and championships at the end of each season. The teams are coached by students and are mostly co-ed. So far plans are made for the following sports: Archery, archery-golf (explained below), badminton, basketball and volleyball.

The first sport to get underway is basketball. The teams begin practicing on Monday, Oct. 6 at 7:00 p.m. (For places of competition and practice see Mrs. Sharon Bradley at the Benson Building or call the Benson Building at 928-3441.)

On Tuesday, Oct. 7, archery-golf will commence as one of the most unknown sports on this campus. To understand the sport is simple. To play it is quite something else. To begin with, imagine shooting arrows on wide open fields. This doesn't seem too exciting, but that isn't all there is to it. The open fields are golf courses and instead of shooting at the cup on the green, the player shoots at a padded ball suspended in the air above the cup. Difficult? You bet! The par on the course for golfers is also the par for the archery-golfers.

To get involved in this intriguing sport a student should first get involved with the archery club first.

For obvious safety reasons some experience with a bow is a necessity. For more information on archery-golf or for that matter on any other

Intercampus sport contact the friendly people at the Benson Building, they would be happy to listen and answer questions varsity Blues prepare for Laurier on Saturday.

Rowing costs

One year ago The University of Toronto Woman's Athletic Association sponsored a rowing team for women. The program attracted sixteen members of the fairer sex as well as a lot of support. Many people had high hopes for the team this year, but the program was shafted before it got of the ground. Among many disappointed people was the men's rowing coach Gord Leighton. "We could have developed a good women's program here," said Leighton. "As a matter of fact, several girls from U of T rowed all summer at the Don Rowing Club in Port Credit. They were really keen about rowing here this fall, but the administration has killed the sport."

The men's team at present seems to be faring only a little better. They have been granted a new set of oars, which although not sounding like much does involve some financial commitment since the oars run at about one hundred dollars a piece.

Gord Leighton's expressed concern for the lack of funds to rowers does perhaps hold water. As Leighton explains "In the long run rowing is one of the cheapest sports per competitor the university has. We desperately need our own boats to run a high calibre program, but at $5,000 for a boat, the athletic department is reluctant to purchase the needed equipment."

With high initial costs many of the concerned are asking "How long will a boat last?" If proper care is taken, a boat should be able to outlast a student's stay at the university or his presence on the team. Although several years ago, a simple accident occurred at the Argonaut Rowing Club which destroyed two boats. For reasons such as this and several others, the athletic department is hesitant. At present, the rowers can only hope that Santa Claus comes early this year.

From high on top the second floor of Toronto's oldest morning tabloid, The Varsity announces what appears to be the last "huzzah" for the government of William Davis.

Returns late last night place the Progressive Conservatives in the position of minority governors of the province. The Liberal and New Democratic Party are closely panting for second place, with the NDP slightly ahead. Speculation at The Varsity office posits an entire rerun of the election campaign within three months.

The two campus ridings were no surprises. In St. George riding, incumbent Margaret Campbell registered a medium to strong win over PC Frank Vaskiotti and New Democrat Lukin Robinson. Mrs. Campbell has held that riding since her victory in a 1973 by-election, following several years as a Toronto councillor.

In St. Andrews/St. Patrick riding on the west side of campus, NDP veteran Barbara Beardsley, running in her first election, was narrowly defeated by PC Larry Grossman, son of former cabinet minister Allan Grossman. The riding was considered a Conservative stronghold. A recount is expected.

The results weaken the entire Conservative situation by pulling the rug out from under the most entrenched Tory government in Canada. At present only two other provinces, Alberta and New Brunswick, are Conservative-run.

Dr. Evans fishing for funds, grappling with problems.

JAWS get Evans

By GREG RICHARDS

U of T President John Evans revealed that Ontario has fallen behind Quebec and western provinces in the amount of financial aid afforded universities, at a Governing Council meeting Wednesday.

Evans said Ontario's below national average spending, coupled with the "erosion of purchasing power" poses a serious threat to the "health of the university."

Provincial grant increases in recent years have accounted for only half of the increases in university costs, according to Evans.

Because U of T public services may falter, restricted university spending threatens the welfare of the general population, said Evans. He cited the Department of Dentistry's subsidized clinic on Elm Street as a possible victim of cutbacks.

Scarborough and Erindale campuses have severely felt the shock of provincial stinginess, necessitating the cancellation of prospective capital projects, said Evans. In light of the enrolment situation, this arresting of growth comes at an awkward time.

"For the first time in the history of the university we have had to turn away fully qualified applicants to first year Arts and Science without being able to make any kind of admission offer to them on any of the three campuses," Evans said.

While attempts are made to protect academic faculty and programs, the staff situation is exemplary of internal suffering at U of T, Evans explained. "Fiscal reasons," he pointed out, prompted freezing new and replacement appointments of university workers.

Evans allowed the present staff policy is "admittedly arbitrary," having "top-sided effects", but hastened to add the appointment freeze will be effective only until the university budget is finalized later this fall, when a review may be possible.

The present U of T budget, despite belt tightening measures, is already incurring a two million dollar deficit, according to Evans.

However, he said, "future prospects are grim," and warned of a threatened additional 5 per cent cutback in provincial university allowances which would instantly inflate U of T's deficit to the eight million dollar mark.

"We are not going to take it lying down," Evans pledged, and said the 5 per cent decrease was not assumed inevitable. He promised strong disapproval would be voiced to the province.

Financial restrictions threaten a U of T, which Evans claimed, is essentially healthy. Evans enthusiastically lauded the general quality of students, faculty, and staff.

U of T's popularity attests to the vigorous health of the university, according to Evans.

"In the Faculty of Arts and Science there were over 17,000 applicants for 5,400 first-year places."

"In Graduate Studies, where many American universities report a decline in student interest, our registrations are already over last year's total," said Evans.

Parking still pending

By MIKE SCOTT

A proposed parking structure intended for the east end of the Medical Sciences building will not be built following a decision by the Business Affairs committee last night.

The 300-stall ramp-style garage was rejected by the committee as too costly, despite claims from U of T president John Evans that other proposed sites will prove just as costly.

A parking policy adopted by Internal Affairs last fall called for a three-stage construction of parking facilities on campus to make up for the loss of parking spaces resulting from the construction of Innis College, the planned athletic complex and campus as campus centre facilities.

Two other proposed sites contained in the three-stage plan include one at Spadina Avenue and Bancroft Street and the lot on the east side of St. George Street.

Alex Rankin, Vice-President of Business Affairs pointed to the $8,000 construction cost per car space and the unavailability of outside funding as the determining factors in rejecting the proposed parking garage.

However, when asked what other possible uses exist for the rejected site he replied, "I don't think it can have any other use than a parking structure."

Citing financial stringency and increasing pressure on the university to reduce services, the committee handed a recommendation back to Internal Affairs that the construction of one or more parking garages be deferred at this time.

The committee also rejected the possibility of internal financing of the project through a loan from the Connaught fund.

With the elimination of further parking spaces looming in the latter stages of this year, the Internal Affairs committee will once again face the growing problem of meeting the university's parking needs.

The past two years have seen the university in numerous confrontations with the city over the parking issue. Pointing to the university as a major cause of traffic difficulties in the city's core, the city is presently applying considerable pressure on the university to reduce its number of parking spaces.

Recalling past confrontations at last night's meeting, Alex Rankin joked that the city is convinced that the university should cut out campus parking altogether.

Indeed, the university may be heading in that direction. Evans last night proposed a radical increase in parking fees to discourage usage of existing spaces and to encourage use of parking sites on the perimeter of the university.

Meanwhile, the McMurrich site, location of the rejected parking structure, flounders in its old power plant foundations, half-gutted with water and presently overrun with rodents.

Parking policy still leaves these out in the illegal zone.

U of T OPIRG getting off ground

By DAVE TRUEMAN

The House of Rothschild and the Chase Manhattan Bank, two main financiers of the controversial James Bay project stand to directly benefit from the project, according to a presentation by the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG).

Both corporations own a number of companies which will benefit from the project, including Consolidated Edison of New York, which will be a major consumer of the power produced.

The presentation came as OPIRG held its first U of T meeting Tuesday at Hart House.

OPIRG is an associate organization of PIRG, the American research group which is active in 22 states. OPIRG was first established at the University of Waterloo (U of W) two years ago and at McMaster last year.

In its own words, OPIRG is "an independent research, education and action oriented organization which is involved with issues of substantial public interest."

OPIRG intends to lobby for a referendum on the U of T campus to obtain a fee check-off and establish its activities here. They are sponsoring a series of guest speaker and discussion sessions to publicize their activities and objectives.

Following the James Bay presentation, Sean Casey of Energy Probe, a former division of Pollution Probe, made a cross-Canada survey of future energy developments totalling $70-$105 billion in costs. He pointed out that in most cases these projects primarily served American interests, upset the environment, uprooted native people and adversely affected the economy.

Information was also provided on the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline, followed by a general discussion. Concern was expressed that with increases in energy spending, energy may become an end in itself and lead to an even more centralized and technological society.

Additional OPIRG sessions are scheduled and include a presentation and discussion of the controversial issue of food additives, and a corporate profile of the Garfield Weston Company.

OPIRG devotes itself to research into such issues as consumer protection, land use, housing, environmental protection, occupational health, energy policy and government and corporate secrecy. This research is carried out by students, using the resources of universities.

OPIRG is looking to the potential of 140,000 Ontario students attending colleges and universities. They feel students are in many ways more sensitive to social problems than other segments of society.

OPIRG states their main function as one of co-ordinating the use of course projects and research for the public interest. They feel students could receive credits for work which deals with and benefits the community. In this way the student might act as a concerned citizen as well as being academically motivated, they feel.

OPIRG organizer John Bee said successful operation would depend on funding received from students.

OPIRG receives five dollars per student in the form of a fee check-off at the U of W and McMaster.

Students who do not wish to contribute are able to receive a refund upon request. OPIRG feels student funding ensures a stable financial base, removing dependence on government or corporate grants.

Grad women get rep

By HAZEL FARLEY

Lynda Birchill, a graduate student in philosophy, has been appointed as the first graduate women's representative. She will work in conjunction with both the Graduate Student Union (GSU) and the Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA).

The new post will include a number of responsibilities. Top priority will be given to the collection of information regarding discrimination against women at U of T and the form it takes.

Attention will be paid to the particular interests of graduate women, including practical problems such as daycare and pay scales. Dissemination of information about the growing amount of university research currently being undertaken related to women is also a priority.

On a broader scale, the new representative will keep GAA members informed about current contract provisions for women being formulated by national unions in an attempt to ensure the needs of women members are given full consideration.

For women graduates the appointment is an important first step. However, should enough people be willing to get involved the GAA and the GSU will consider the formation of a women's committee.

Hey mac which way to Whitney Hall?

The Varsity—Bob White

By SUSAN FERGUSON

Whitney Hall another location for the "Hellsborn Chronicle"? No, but they do have a problem with ants.

Following a complaint from some resident students there were 'bugs' in their rooms, the Varsity asked Senior Don Rochelle Schwartz if she had heard complaints. Schwartz said no one had approached her, but she said there had always been a problem with ants. They seem to inhabit the kitchen and have also been seen in the bathroom, said Schwartz. She added if students have complaints about bugs they should certainly approach her or residence housekeeper, Mrs. Gillett. Junior Don Ben Syposz confirmed he had no knowledge of bugs, ants or other six-legged creatures.

Whitney Hall cleaning woman Ellen Dynes agreed there are ants, but said students "had no right to say there were bugs."

Gillett admitted, "We had a few ants in the upstairs kitchenette, but we do watch for them and have the exterminators in once a month to check."

Gillett said, since this is the first time Whitney Hall has had trouble with ants, she feels they must have come in with cartons brought in by students.

Building design bars handicapped

By LAWRENCE CLARKE
It's easy to see why so few physically disabled people attend U of T after reading a recently released report on the accessibility of the university to handicapped.

The report was the result of a study financed by OFY by three U of T Occupational Therapy students and a Ryerson business student. They studied all major buildings at the U of T.

The 14-week, $7,000 project was intended to "indicate to handicapped students the most independent means by which to carry out their academic pursuits at the University."

The study found that many buildings are impossible to enter without assistance; elevators are absent, washrooms inaccessible; lecture rooms, labs, lounges and cafeterias have poor seating and narrow aisle widths; library material is out of reach; fountains, lockers and telephones are inconveniently located and hard to use.

These obstacles prevail in most buildings with the worst offenders—being the old "colleges such as Trinity, St. Mike's Victoria and U.C. Even new facilities such as the Roberts Library provide difficulties for the handicapped.

The current National Building Code calls for minimum criteria for the handicapped. For this reason disabled people would likely opt for the newer colleges such as Scarborough and Erindale and York University.

But the fact remains that one of the biggest and most resourceful universities remains virtually closed to the independent use of architectural barriers as the main culprit and suggests simple structural changes are required in most cases.

The 100 page report lists buildings accessible, inaccessible, or accessible after recommended changes. The report makes 115 recommendations for improvement. Eighteen buildings are listed as candidates for improvement. These include the admissions office, the Faculty of Education, the botany building, Convocation Hall, the Edward Johnson Building (music) and the hygiene building.

Listed as hopeless were: the older college buildings; the SAC media building, the Health Service (1); the Advisory Bureau, the Housing Service and campus legal assistance.

The completed report will be distributed free to interested parties through the Admissions Office at 315 Bloor. However, most interested people will need assistance since the building is listed as inaccessible.

Project members were Aase McMullin, Christie Boyce, and Lynda Lowrie from U of T and Ted Brownlee from Ryerson.

Their report is being sent to the Physical Plant department for possible implementation of the suggested building improvements.

Bookish code boycott?

By MINDA SHERMAN

Students who wish to uphold the boycott of the new postal code will be able to do so by replacing their postal code with their old zone numbers, according to the Registration department of the library.

A spokesman for the Registration department said few students have refused to give their postal codes but said the library does insist on either a code or a zone.

Lou Murphy, president of the Toronto local of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) said the purpose of the boycott is not to obstruct technological change, but to demand support for the right of workers to negotiate their working conditions. He claims however, the new method of sorting mail will displace thirty to forty per cent of the 22,000 Canadian postal workers, when completely implemented.

Murphy thinks the boycott has been fairly successful and he cites a favorable reaction to his recent address to the Canadian Businessmen's Association. Murphy said he was assured considerable support for the boycott of the code.

He denied the accusations made by Postmaster-General Bryce Mackesy that coded mail is being sabotaged by workers, and said illegal tactics are not used by the CUPW.

THE COMMON FRONT: Will they still love us tomorrow?

You may have seen signs on campus requesting support for The Common Front. Two questions arise: What is a common front, and why are U of T students presently caught in the middle of one that seems to smell?

A common front is a political term describing a hybrid organization of groups without (in normal circumstances) a common aim, who nonetheless come together in a time of emergency to face a common enemy on equal terms. In this case the common enemy is the provincial government and its garrisonian policies over the last two years. The groups that have been called together to attempt to pressure the government include the students, faculty and support staff at this and other universities in Ontario.

Common fronts can be curious situations, and no exception is U of T's, where students and faculty who ten minutes earlier may have been snarling at each other over the subject of tenure committees gather in a room with conciliatory smiles on their faces ready to face the demon government.

This is the sort of "necessary" two-facedness that politicians thrive on.

Their quandary is: How can they overlook the recent faculty-led tenure decision and hop cheerfully into bed with as little guilt as possible? If it is a tough decision and one that usually puts the people at SAC through logical contortions in attempts to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

The easiest solution is to say that the government's policies are quickly forcing the university to bank robbery, and if we wait long enough arguing about who's sleeping with whom there won't be a bed left for anyone. Maybe that should end the argument, but there are other considerations, such as political equality.

The faculty are seeking allies. While the students have been progressively hit by lack of funds over the past few years, it's only recently that the university has started to whorper about staff dismissals "for fiscal reasons". All of a sudden the tenured contract is not the worthy document that it used to be. Students will definitely lose a certain amount of education quality but unfortunately, if things worsen, these people will start to lose jobs (as soon as the university has first made mince meat out of the support staff).

So there is one good reason why the faculty is not ashamed to drop their hankies in front of the student body. Allies however must operate on equal ground. Consistently the faculty have stood in the way of allowing students a chance to control certain aspects of their own destiny, leaving a sharp difference in clout between the two groups. Equals are not. If only for that reason the ideal of a common front has already been compromised.

It is probably not hard for the students involved in front organization to make a separation between the two different performances they see from the faculty, one at Governing Council and the other at Common Front meetings. That's what is troublesome, the ease with which politicians can and must change their opinions about the people they deal with when the destination changes.

Nonetheless, no matter how frustrating the government suffocation is, the front organizers and those involved at the Student's Administrative Council must keep in mind that they are dealing, in effect, with opportunists who are willing to use whatever clout students may lend them without offering return on another level. This sort of courtship smells, and the only result will be a temporary dose of some unmentionable social disease.

workers. These delegates came knowing full well that they would lose their jobs for attending the convention. A highlight was the Canadian delegation, 70 people from churches, labor and the community who came to help with the elections. Canadian Director of the United Auto Workers, Dennis McDermott, explained that they had not come as do-gooders but to work in the struggle for justice. The delegation was greeted with a 30-minute standing ovation.

As this article goes to press a number of elections have taken place, and what Chavez has said all along is becoming obvious. The Teamsters may have had the contracts, but the U.F.W. has the workers. At Interharvest, the largest lettuce company, the Chavez union received 1,167 votes to 28 for the Teamsters and 18 for no union. Equally impressive victories have been won at places like the Leroy ranch where it was 83-0 in favor of the U.F.W. and the Tula Vista ranch where the vote was 275 for the Farm Workers to 12 for no union while the Teamsters couldn't get enough support to get on the ballot. The workers in Stockton, the tomato capital, are voting for the U.F.W. in overwhelming numbers. These results have made the growers and Teamsters scared. Many ranch foremen are now carrying guns and are threatening workers who support Chavez. The resistance to the elections is centered in Delano where the growers have been fighting union activity from the beginning. There has been violence and intimidation to frighten workers from voting for the U.F.W. or even voting at all.

Right in the middle of the madness that is California, something big and beautiful is being born. After years of struggle and sacrifice, California farm workers are getting a chance to determine their own lives. On August 28, a bill went into effect granting agricultural workers in that state the right to secret ballot elections to vote for the union of their choice. A similar bill was killed last year by a combined grower-Teamster lobby but thanks to an increasingly effective boycott of California table grapes and head lettuce by the United Farm Workers and their supporters, the growers did not fight the bill this time around. To say that this law was needed is an understatement. It is a sad fact that the people who pick the food we eat are badly exploited. Exploited is a word that gets tossed around a lot, but it's hard and real meaning for a farmworker is that you earn less than $3,000 a year, your life expectancy is 49 years, your children are among the 700,000 under the age of 16 working ten to twelve hours a day and that you have absolutely no voice in what happens to you.

It was an extraordinary event with marching bands, a wedding and the baptism of two of Chavez' grandchildren. Over 15,000 people attended, with 500 delegates, mostly from ranches with Teamster contracts, representing 79,000

Grinding halt

The Big Blue machine has lost its transmission fluid. Nobody is quite sure what did it, but after 32 years of Tory hard-charging, the voters have decided a change is necessary. What direction the change will take is uncertain, with the Liberals and the New Democratic Party fighting for the status of opposition party.

What the vote hopefully means is a shift in government thinking about post secondary education. The folks at Simcoe

Hall, who are probably for the most part true Blue, are nonetheless breathing a possible sigh of relief. A chastened Tory Government means a re-evaluation of some of their more unpopular policies, and we hope that at the top of those slated for rewriting is the topic of university financing.

Perhaps now Dr. Evans won't have to worry about having his carpet cleaned only once every two days.

Although the results of some of the elections will be tied up for some time in the Agricultural Board, the final result will be that the growers fraud that the Teamsters do not and never did represent the workers, will be exposed. Their union is the United Farm Workers and it is with them that the growers will have to negotiate contracts that guarantee a decent wage, controls on child labor and pesticide use, and give workers control over their own lives. However, the elections do not mean that contracts will be signed. With the growers past history of lies and duplicity it is certain that they will try to sabotage negotiations. The one thing that will ensure good contracts is the pressure of the boycott, and so the Farm Workers and their supporters are stepping up their campaign against California grapes and lettuce. The triumph of La Causa will be a major event of our time. It shows that people working together can stand up to the huge corporations that are filling our lives with plastic and poison. The failure of the growers and Teamsters is that they cannot understand that people are willing to work and sacrifice without personal profit for something they believe in. This spirit of sacrifice is the heart of the Farmworker movement, and is why, in the end, it will win.

If you would like more information about the U.F.W. or can help on the Campus Committee, call 961-4434 or stop in at the Newman Center. We need your help.

Oh wow, man, the colors, I mean, it's — uh — far-out, y'know?

Will Laserium go the way of 3-D movies?

Laserium is billed as "an important entertainment medium of expansive potential." Judged by the current showing at the McLaughlin Planetarium however, it's destined to go the way of 3D movies and electronic sounds albums. A curiosity worth experiencing, but once only.

"The Cosmic Laser Concert" consists of laser-produced colours moving against the Planetarium's backdrop of stars. Lights, clouds, and spirograph-type lines dance or pulsate to Pink Floyd, Holst's "The Planets", and similarly "spaced" rock, jazz, and classical numbers.

Ads for Laserium stress its trippiness ("A mindblower!"). The pretentious recorded voice which opens the show promises a trip "beyond space and time", and explains that what you get out of it depends upon what you bring to it.

What you have to bring to Laserium is a late-sixties mentality. Remember psychedelia?

Most of the numbers begin musically and visually low-keyed, and build to an audio-visual crescendo. Fade-out, smattering of applause, then the next one begins modestly again. This makes for an exciting number or two, but the overall effect after an hour is one of having listened to a double album of Inna-Gadda-Da-Vida versions.

Welcome exceptions are the ovals gracefully choreographed to "The Blue Danube" and the charming, if vacuous, square dance to Emerson, Lake, and Palmer's "Hoedown".

At no point are the visual effects overwhelming and only occasionally are they "highly three-dimensional" as touted. The initial lighting up of the Planetarium's starscape is as awesome as anything which follows.

Laserium's claim to display the "purest colours ever seen" may be technically valid, but blue, red, green, and yellow are the basic colours recurring in every sequence. And after all, red is red, no matter how "pure".

One clue to the reason for the show's short-comings is found in the newspaper quote that Laserium is "Even more of a trip than 2001!"

The "trip" scene in "2001: A Space Odyssey" is effective because of its context in the movie as much as for its visual aspects in isolation. The odyssey of the crew, the appearance of the black monolith, and the reactions of the astronaut, overlay the flashing colours and sound effects with meaning and make them more immediate to the viewer.

The voice-over at the start of Laserium warns that no significance is to be found in the patterns presented.

While I don't insist on entertainment always being "meaningful", this kind can be had a lot cheaper than the $2.75 an hour charged by Laserium. Kaleidoscopes can be bought for 99 cents and are endlessly re-usable. You can listen to your own choice of records in the dark.

In Laserium's favour, two points must be made.

Firstly, each show is run by a laserist who supposedly introduces new imagery from time to time. What I saw may not be what you'll see.

Secondly, I wasn't stoned. Maybe this is a prerequisite to enjoyment.

To sum up, Laserium would have been a dynamite light-show behind a late-sixties San Francisco band.

St. Mikes' wordsmith fest starts soon

What? Young poets reading their poems to large audiences just a few yards from carrels where world-famous medievalists gloss St. Thomas? Surprising, perhaps, but it happens, and happens regularly, at St. Michael's College. Although St. Mike's houses the Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies and is developing the University's only undergraduate medieval programme, it is by no means middle-aged. It has recently given rise to the most vigorous regular series of contemporary poetry readings now in the University.

How did this happen? Several years ago two English profs and a number of students moved to bring contemporary poets to the campus on a continuing basis. "It seemed natural," recalls Professor Michael Lynch. "A lot of fine poetry gets read and taught here, from Homer through Chaucer and Milton up to Yeats and Eliot. Some of the best poetry teachers on campus teach at St. Mike's, and of course the place is swarming with Yeats enthusiasts.

"But Yeats and Eliot are no longer our contemporaries," he continues. "Much excellent poetry has been written since the war, is being written right now. It's not just that this poetry was being slighted at the University — and U of T is notorious for neglecting the contemporary arts — but that even the best poetry of the past tends to go stale unless it can be felt as its writers and first listeners felt it. One critic, Merle Brown," and here Lynch reaches professorially for a corroborating text, even says this: "in order to sense the immediacy and vitality of great poetry of the past, one must be responsive to the finest poetry that is literally contemporaneous with him." And that, Lynch concludes, is this Series' noble excuse.

The Series began two years ago with financial support from the St. Michael's Student Union, St. Mike's president John Kelly, and SAC. "We tried from the beginning," explains Professor Sam Solecki, "to mix mature, established poets with younger poets of promise." The coup during that first season was persuading the entertaining Russian poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko to read at St. Mike's — which he did, with gusto, to a capacity crowd which waited an hour for his tardy arrival. The British poet Jon Silkin read that year, as did Pulitzer-Prize winner Richard Howard and Governor-General's-Award winner Michael Ondaatje.

Last season poets such as Margaret Atwood, Irving Layton, Mark Strand, and Eli Mandel read to large audiences in Brennan Assembly Hall. The Series expanded to include the cinema, featuring films about the Four Horsemen, Theodore Roethke, and Ezra Pound. The current Series includes John Frederick Nims, Marvin Bell, Thom Gunn, and Manitoba-born Dale Sieroth who has been called "one of the best young Canadian poets uncovered in a long time." There will be films on Dylan Thomas, Robert Frost, Leonard Cohen, and A.M. Klein. Something is new again this year, according to Lynch. "We've invited Louis Dudek of McGill and Tom Whittaker of Yale, two fine discerners of contemporary poetry," to speak. Dudek will discuss the meaning of modern, and Whittaker some of the relations between contemporary poetry and painting."

As in previous seasons, St. Michael's student poets will give a reading of their own. But this year for the first time an alumnus of the college will perform. Morley Callaghan, who graduated from St. Mike's in 1925 before attending Osgoode Law School, opens the Series next Thursday, September 25, by reading from his newest fiction, "Fitting, no?" says Lynch. "To make a genre exception for our most famous literary graduate? It will be Callaghan's first Toronto reading in years, and we're delighted that he agreed to give it here."

All events in the Series are open to the public and free of charge.

Post-mortem: Approaching Simone

By the time this review finds its way to press, Approaching Simone, which has been playing for the past two weeks at St. Paul's Annex on Avenue Road, will have closed. The unfortunate theatregoer who missed Simone must simply light a candle for its return.

Simone was a rare dramatic event devoted to the life and thought of a beautiful 20th century Frenchwoman, Simone Weil (Otherwise recognized as a philosopher-socialist-libber-mystic &c.)

The 'play' itself is a collage of statement and dramatic event from the life of Simone Weil formulated by playwright Megan Terry. Terry's elastic and episodic framework gathers dramatic force as we approach Simone first through a brief sketch of her tormented childhood, and later through her university career in which Simone establishes the philosophical basis that draws her to socialism and mystical religious experience.

First, and most obvious, Simone is an involved and intelligent thinker. Her feelings toward life are constantly seeking logical-philosophical determinations (The danger here, a danger which Terry imperfectly recognizes, is that we tend to think of Simone simply as a brain.) Simone's thought crystallizes contradictions which provoke 'angst' and compel action; Simone finds resolution through her dynamic will to achieve social justice which later, through the faith of love, finds religious vision. Simone is human and appealing precisely because she is always passionate and involved. By word and deed she directs our attention to ourselves: the possibilities of our individual lives and our collective responsibilities as a people. Simone speaks directly to us, the people who live in the university community. She wonders when we will forsake the word-symbol as a rhetorical device, a projection of our self-alienation, and begin to use it as the desperately needed analogue to the concrete work of society. It is this total commitment to life in its concrete aspect that allows us to follow Simone toward her mystical experience of God.

The setting of the play, a note reminds us, takes place mostly inside Simone's head. Happily with such a magnified personal specimen at hand, Frank Canino's production provided a good focusing distance by adopting a kind of Brechtian 'alienating' format. Banners with Simone slogans draped the walls of the theatre, house lights were often half lit during the performance, musical arrangements provided a cabaret flavor, and the dramatic narrative itself proceeded in a highly stylized fashion relying on mime to assure symbolic effect.

Yet there is a problem with "Simone" - a problem which first revealed itself in the production but which I think at bottom lies in the character of Terry's Simone herself. At times the production flagged in a 'realistic' posture: engaging or demanding active sympathy for Simone as a modern-day saint. This appeal suggested a thrust which the play as a whole could not assimilate.

Simone seeks consolation in a life of stoicism to protest world hunger she repulses the needs of her own body! She finds peace only in thought, work, and later prayer.

Simone's body is her cell, she is condemned to her body. A temperament illuminated with such idealism usually finds life a ghostly place, something that is always presenting its chill exterior. It is right, I think, for us to approach Simone from this exterior vantage.

For her thought and work to appear intelligible, pathos must be cast off. When Simone needs to experience life, she 'investigates' the conditions of factories, battlefields, and churches: the 'schools' of life. But of course what Simone wants and what we all want is admittance to the mystery of the lived present. How and then does the projected endeavor fix such a toehold? For example, how can one who seeks to comprehend the full reality and meaning of the worker do so without making a total, irrevocable and necessary commitment to the life of a worker? I don't think one can, nor finally could Simone. Similarly, the problem with Simone's eclectic, intensely personal religious vision lies in its inability to make the total, unreserved surrender to its avowed faith.

T.S. Eliot found in Simone the "genius of a saint." In a personal crusade against world hunger Simone died of hunger after long fasting in 1943. Heroism like this is certainly exemplary. Yet I wonder if there is not another, perhaps simpler and more permanent truth signified by the worker who, in the face of mighty odds and all that's uncertain, relishes finding an extra bit of cheese packed in his lunchbox, or the men and women who, despite witch burnings and inquisitions, rejoice in the bread of the liturgy.

Holy Mountain seeks refuge in sensationalism

It is not enough for an artist to give completely of himself; he must also be able to know when to stop that giving. There must be such a thing as discipline in any artistic expression; that is, the ability to hint at rather than spell out laboriously; the ability to entice an emotion or thought from the viewer without the use of mechanical symbols and metaphors. An artist should be able to succeed by implication, not explanation.

Alexandro Jodorowsky has all the symptoms of an explainer. He has shown himself to be a master of the excessive; a victim of his own lack of self control. In El Topo, the cowboy 'hero' is surely in search of self-control, on a journey to become master of himself, and yet, like the film itself, he is unable to find any meaningful answers and so seeks refuge in violence and mysticism — the final expressions of alienation. And alienated Jodorowsky is. He is a man with the ability to show his own alienation to his audience through his images and scenes who, in turn, tend to appreciate it with vicarious sensations. Thus, El Topo was a strange creature; being neither art nor entertainment, it fell into a third category — sensationalism.

The Holy Mountain is Jodorowsky's most recent film and though slightly more refined than his previous work, it too finds itself playing only on the senses and ignoring both the intelligence and emotions of his audience.

The excess is there in violence, mysticism and symbolism. So too is the search for meaning in one's life, which ends in farce. But where these excesses have remained, there has been some evolution to Jodorowsky's film-making talent: the movie has been filmed with a little more flair and the soundtrack music is not assailing as it was in El Topo. His talent, however, seems to me to lie in the theatrical not the cinematic.

But what is more interesting than the films themselves is Jodorowsky's conception of humanity which is revealing of both him and his audience.

First, the most obvious point is that Jodorowsky has no respect for matter, particularly in the form of human and animal flesh. This trend has continued into his new movie where we see, among other things, 1001 castrations, a dead corpse spewing out its vital fluids and a quadruplegic struggling to light a reefer. Jodorowsky has forgotten, like many others, that ideas, though not material, originate in and find their expression in matter.

One of Jodorowsky's more serious faults is his ignorance in the use of language. Cinematic communication works only when image and word are in harmony, but Jodorowsky, the director, the star, the set and costume designer and the composer of the film's music, prefers image to language and thus fails in communicating his ill-thought-out conception. At the beginning of The Holy Mountain there is no dialogue and when it does begin it is not in words but in sounds. Later, there is dialogue in English but it is stilted, tired and, for the most part, silly.

Another aspect Jodorowsky prefers to ignore is human consciousness, especially his own. His work consists of mostly sensual images uprooted from his unconscious and put onto film. This can be quite effective at times when used in moderation to illustrate a point, but a movie like The Holy Mountain being a string of images doesn't hold together without the knot of thought. It succeeds only in creating a texture which soon becomes meaningless. Technically, these images are badly put together and the 'story' moves forward rather unevenly.

Usually, the extent to which a male artist portrays females can be a good measure of their own liberation. Jodorowsky has a mixed attitude here, using women as whores of religion, as members of a harem to a factory owner, and as decorations to mystical events. (This must be the first time that human shit has been turned into gold in a movie.) Yet women also play a dynamic role in the film but because of the previously mentioned limitations of The Holy Mountain they seem no more than frauds.

In fact, Jodorowsky doesn't really see people as anything more than the stereotyped images he expresses in his films. And because they are only images without any substance or humanity we do not understand any one person better when the film is over. His films are only self-indulgent phantasies which lead us not to a better understanding of life or of ourselves but only of Jodorowsky's limitations.

Back in the money-to-burn sixties when the provincial government was confronted by the radical demand to know just what a university was anyway, it seemed to react by creating universities and colleges by the dozen so that it could say "Well, it's this and this, and this too". Higher education was for all of us and Massey College was for an elite. The courses at York were oriented towards the product but "liberal arts" was still struggling by elsewhere. The Robarts Library was to be the Mecca for graduate students, a Never-Never land of 1001 carrels. Ryerson Polytechnical was given the right to grant degrees. Scores of community colleges were thrown in for good measure.

Times have changed. The question still exists; the money doesn't. Here at the U of T, however, president John Evans' plans to revitalize the colleges by, briefly, abolishing the distinction between 'college' and 'university' subjects and allowing the individual colleges to develop interdisciplinary programs in particular subject areas for the whole university, have permitted the question to be rephrased, and his proposals may just permit some of us to say "Well, the university's not this, and we think it should be this".

So the implementation of the new drama programme at University College would suggest.

The drama programme is not the only college program being introduced this year. St. Mike's has come out with its Irish Studies programme as well. The latter is a natural choice for the university environment: if it did not exist at a university, it would not in fact exist. The drama programme is different. It does not seem inevitable here, not in the humanistic disciplines which Joyce Cary (speaking about Oxford in particular) has characterised as "that hot bed of cold feet". People, a lot of them, earn their daily bread in the jobs and skills the theatre world attracts. And the university has never been regarded as the best training ground for that world.

Stephen Martineau, chairman of the committee at U.C. which is in charge of the drama programme, readily admits that the programme may seem out of place in the academic world — and that it has had its problems because of that. "There is a great bias against the practical at the university. The first draft for the programme was rejected because the college council felt there were too many practical courses. But I think you've got to have the balance of the practical and the academic. Maybe academic is a loaded word; you've got to have the balance between the practical and the intellectual."

Martineau feels that the programme at present is unbalanced. "It's a compromise between what we wanted and what the college council whose approval was needed wanted." The programme offers four separate groups of courses (from each of which the student makes a selection): History and Theory of the Stage, Dramatic Literature in English, Dramatic Literature in Languages other than English, and the Practical Courses. The first three groups contain 38 different courses (drawn from the English, Classics, Fine Arts, French, German, Italian, Slavic, Spanish, and East Asian studies departments and the Faculty of Music); the last contains three (Problems of Performance, Problems of Directing, Playwriting and Play Analysis).

But Martineau, who teaches the last two practical courses, feels the university may itself have something to give the theatre world. For more important to him than the introduction of the practical courses, per se, is the concept of balance. "This is not a theatre arts programme. I want total balance. Too often if there is exclusive concentration on the practical and the technical, you will find the actors simply being thrown around by the directors. They have no vision, no commitment to something of their own. And they need that."

He accepts the idea of the drama programme as occupying a halfway point between U of T's Fine Art department, where the emphasis is almost exclusively on art history, and the Opera School, at the Faculty of Music, which is strongly production oriented.

The nucleus of the drama programme began five years ago when Anne Lancashire (then teaching on the undergraduate level and now Secretary to the Dean of Graduate Studies) gathered together the people teaching drama at U.C. and New College to talk about providing some sort of common front for the benefit of students, to tell them what exactly was available in drama. When Evans' proposals for the college programmes were announced three years ago — entirely co-incidentally — the U.C. group had something to build on in order to attract a drama programme to the college — luckily enough since it was not the only college to want such a programme.

(There will be conflict ahead, Martineau says, about the development and allocation of future college programmes. Even now, apparently, Victoria and U.C. both have their sights set on harbouring a Canadian studies programme.)

Martineau feels that the college programme concept is the finest thing to hit the university in a long time. He stresses the idea of balance here as well. The position, that is, of the college programme, halfway between the freedom of the New Programme and the narrow channelling of the old Honours Programme. "The programmes narrow in on one subject but they present a great deal of options and choices in relation to that one subject area."

"The college programmes are also knocking down the walls between the departments and incorporating the interdisciplinary approach into the mainstream of the university."

Problems lie ahead. Definite ones that will have to be decided one way or the other and others that simply lie on the horizon. There are over 50 students enrolled in the programme now, Martineau says, "and really that's as much as we can handle. Of those 50, perhaps half a dozen will graduate next year, of we take in another 50, or even 25, next year, we're faced with an immediate problem: what do we do with them? We need another practical course. The practical programmes are the bottlenecks — since we have to limit enrollment in each to 20 students." Martineau hopes to have an earlier-rejected advanced performance course accepted next year.

He also sees the need for a Canadian drama course. Urjo Karela was teaching such a course, at Scarborough, but now he has left to become dramaturge at Stratford and no one has taken his place. Martineau also wants to see an independent studies course in drama. But even though the need for all of these is pressing, budgetary restrictions are also pressing.

More generally, Martineau may not be able to preserve the balance that he seeks between academic — or intellectual — and practical subjects. Improvisation and untrained talent may have to give way to basic classes in voice, in movement, in dance, in stage combat. The students may come to want to be considered not as units in collective productions but rather as individuals with different developing skills.

Nevertheless, as Martineau himself says the great thing about the university is that it can and should offer room for experimentation and freedom.

The important thing is that a new beginning in that direction has been made.

To help business tell its story in this time of criticism and misconception, a series of interviews between freelance writer Dean Walker and the chief executives of major corporations was arranged by The Investors Group (itself owned by Power Corp.). Nine such ads were published over the summer in large Canadian newspapers. In what follows, excerpts from these ads are contrasted with excerpts from Wallace Clement's excellent book, The Canadian Corporate Elite.

"If you sail across Lake Erie, you'll fall off the edge of the world."

J.S. Land, President, IAC Ltd.: "IAC, for example, has shareholders throughout Canada. By and large, these people are not bank presidents, or the heads of corporations. They are average Canadians. Some are pensioners, widows. Some have bought IAC shares hoping that the dividends will support them during retirement." Clement: "In 1961, only one tenth of all income earners owned as much as one share; the top one per cent owned 42 per cent and the top 10 per cent of income earners about three quarters of all shares. . . . In fact, the existence of a relatively large number of small stockholders multiplies the power of the small group of large stockholders by allowing them to control corporations with much smaller amounts of capital than would otherwise be possible."

Jean de Grandpre, IAC Canada: "You should not have an adversarial relationship between 'business' and 'the people'. The size of the business is not the size of the people. The size of the business is small savers, people with $2,000, $4,000, $5,000 in the bank. It is a misconception that somehow separate from the rest of the population. Anyone who has a fund is an investor in the stock market. I suggest that business is not an expense of 'the little man' but is entirely false. Business is at his expense, but not the other way around. Clement: "By mobilizing the financial resources of others, the financial central node in the economy is between accumulated investment. It does not create capital; on the other hand, it is specially gathering reserves of even the most modest through such devices as mutual funds, savings accounts, insurance policies, and other devices to control of reserve capital. It is an enormous power concentrated at the top of these institutions and it is the economic elite."

"The moon is made of cheese"

Ian D. Sinclair, Chairman, IAC Pacific: "I'm the railwayman who finishes in an air brake shop. My work are the key factors who want to take responsibility." Clement's statistics show some incredible coincidences from upper-class business (representing between 10 per cent of the population and 10 per cent of the position).

Martineau: "There is a great bias against the practical at the university."

The many guises of urban reform, in the past and in the present

Saving the Canadian City: the first phase, 1880-1920
Edited and introduced by Paul Rutherford
University of Toronto Press

took up the cause of urban reform. The answer is that the middle class was not only concerned with urban reform, but was involved in a much broader attempt to control and discipline an increasingly alien and restive working class. Forces spawned by the rise of industrial capitalism in the period between 1880 and 1920 had not only severed the old vertical ties that had mitigated against the horizontal ones of class in nineteenth century Canada, but had altered the relation between the classes. The rise of Toronto, for example, saw the emergence by 1880 of an occupationally and religiously segregated community from the relatively homogeneous one of 1860.

A spate of books in the late nineteenth century, such as Of Toronto the Good and The City Below the Hill testified to the middle class's sudden realization that they no longer even knew where the working class lived, much less its manner of life and culture. The slum terrified the middle class not merely because it bred disease and crime, but because it was "entirely hidden from the view of the ordinary passerby." Prohibition and the regulation of working class activities such as pool and vaudeville, if not their outright subversion through the use of "neighbourhood houses" like St. Christopher's House in Toronto, were designed to break down the barriers working class culture presented to the forms of middle class authority.

In the growing factories the drive for efficiency was designed primarily to shatter working class control of the workplace through replacing their skills with machines. This drive was mirrored in the urban reformers' emphasis on government by experts, which can be seen as an attempt to destroy a similar control exercised at the community level. The intricate pattern of loyalty and patronage upon which corrupt colities rested could work to the advantage of the working class and was, at any rate, more familiar and accessible than committee government.

All this is not to belittle the sincere efforts of the reformers. Great advances were made on sanitation and education, although slums are still with us. The point, however, is to avoid isolating the urban reform movement from its historical moment, because to do so encourages an understanding of ideas at their face value. Movements like urban reform develop along the shirting fracture line between the working and middle classes. The ideas generated by such a movement serve to define and channel the underlying conflict, but it is that conflict that provides the key to understanding the movement — not the ideas. By remembering this one can see the continuity today's urban reform movement has with that of the 1880-1920 period, for although the ideas have changed, the conflict has not.

As John Sewell predicted at the end of the 1972 municipal elections, the future conflict would not be between the Old Guard and the Reformers, as the pundits claimed, but between "the north-of-Bloor reformers, and the south-of-Bloor reformers."

Gus Richardson

The decades between 1880 and 1920 saw the rise and fall of a movement composed of urban reformers dedicated to "saving the Canadian city". Their response was premised on the failure of the old modes of city government to meet the new and pressing problems of the twentieth century city: immigration, unemployment, poor sanitation, irregular and unplanned growth, slums and crime. The reforms they advocated were designed, among other things, to reclaim public utilities from private enterprise, rebuild and beautify the urban core, and streamline and rationalize civic government.

This book, a collection of the writing and speeches of urban reformers during these decades grouped around the four themes of control and regulation of public utilities, slums, town planning, and the reform of municipal government, serves as a useful introduction to the ideas current at that time. There are, however, certain problems associated with the study of ideas in history that make the use of this book as a documentary source problematical.

It is important to realize that the urban reform movement existed on two levels. At one level it was a reaction to the very real miseries of the urban lower class, trapped in the decaying cores of cities ill-equipped to respond to the problems of poverty. As such the reformers stood outside the realities of class interest and indeed often found themselves at odds with the vested interests of major portions of the ruling elites.

At a deeper level, however, the urban reform movement was very much a part of the middle class search for new forms of control over the lower classes. It was, after all, the desire "to secure a sound political and social life in our country" that led the members of the Standing Committee on Neighbourhood Work in 1917 to direct their attention to the slums and the "motion picture shows, vaudeville and burlesque shows of the cheapest and most lurid variety, pool rooms, dance halls, and where prohibition is not in force, saloons, located in neglected districts."

Not even ice-cream parlours escaped their vigilant eyes, for if not always "connected with immorality", they were "conducive to idleness, and a disposition to loaf . . .". In short, they were attacking the culture of the lower classes.

We can agree then with Professor Rutherford, when he writes in his introduction that the urban reform movement amounted "to little more than an elaboration of the class presumptions of its advocates (who hoped) to convert the city into the bastion of bourgeois culture." But one is forced to ask why it was this particular middle class at this particular juncture in history that denies most members of Canadian society any influence or participation in the fundamental economic decisions that affect the future and direction of the Canadian nation-state."

W. Earle McLaughlin, Chairman and President, The Royal Bank of Canada: "It's not true that men in my position have power. We only have responsibility."

Walker: "Banks do so have power. My branch manager has power over me when I ask him for a loan."

McLaughlin: "Not really. Because if he says no and he's wrong, he will lose your business to a competitor. The first responsibility of your branch manager is to you."

Clement: "A strong explanation of why capital is difficult to secure for new ventures not undertaken by members of the elite is that the banking circles are so much a part of the established dominant corporate world making it almost impossible for outsiders to 'break in'. The economic elite has both contacts and legitimacy required for access to capital. Access to banks and insurance companies provides the advantage necessary to avail themselves of new investment opportunities. A tight system insures that investments by banks will be fairly stable and secure but at the same time prohibits those outside the small charmed circle from breaking into the elite. For this reason, it is argued that the banks with their extensive contacts in the economic elite provide the focal point for elite continuity and operate as a major exclusion mechanism Extensive interlocking relations between corporations by members of the corporate elite . . . has the effect of reinforcing their rule and creating a community of interest between elites rather than the competitive image so frequently portrayed in dominant ideologies the idea that each corporation is an independent empire unto itself, fiercely struggling with all other corporations, is a myth. Separate corporate structures are a legal screen which clouds the interwoven extension of the economic elite into the highest levels of the Canadian economy."

positions. Women are even more thoroughly excluded from positions of power, accounting for over 50 per cent of the population, but only 0.6 per cent of elite positions. Clement's data "provide conclusive evidence that access to the economic elite has become more exclusively the preserve of the upper class over the past twenty years."

Ian D. Sinclair: ". . . one of the positive things about the market mechanism is that its pressures always result from hundreds of millions of individual decisions.

This is where our economic system has a tremendous advantage. In any regimented society that does not rely on the marketplace, decisions are in the hands of a very few people and they can quite easily be wrong.

The market mechanism, on the other hand, offers a consensus of the decisions of everyone."

Clement: "A variety of separate organizations and relationships cross-cut the economic world, obscuring the fact that at the top a small number of people with common social origins, common experiences, and common interests oversee the direction of economic life. The inner circles of power are almost impenetrable and it is clear that their tight control of the legal fictions, known as corporations,

Arctic oil opera is spoiled

Spoil!
E.G. Perrault
Doubleday
$7.95

No, the Ferrault who has written Spoil! is not a hockey player but rather a Canadian writer of plays, documentaries, poetry and two other novels. Much of his new novel does take place on the ice however — the ice of the Canadian Arctic. This barren, hostile landscape provides a suitable backdrop for the "sense of destruction, of spoiled potential, spoiled happiness, spoiled opportunity" that pervades the book.

Spoil! conveys a pessimistic feeling of personal waste, characterised most effectively in Ian Danebeck whose personal life falls apart piece by piece under the demands of his company.

An energy crisis in the US (presumably in the not-so-distant future) places increasing financial and political pressure on the oil drilling operations of Danebeck's employer High Arctic, a Canadian consortium; at the same time public concern focuses on the effects that Northern development will have upon the environment and on the life style of native people.

Danebeck is caught in a conflict of personal, civic, and company responsibilities. The central question seems to be one of priorities. How do a man's business responsibilities compare to his marital responsibilities? Which is more important, a new energy reserve or a new pollution danger? Perrault does not step towards solving these questions; he merely portrays the irony of how the search for oil, needed to continue the modern way of life, destroys the quality of that life on an individual basis. Utak, an Eskimo employee, for instance, enjoys the modern comforts that have come to the North, but when he murders two white men to revenge his cuckolded honour in the Eskimo tradition, he must feel the white justice of the RCMP.

Unfortunately "spoiled potential" describes not only the lives of the characters, but also the novel itself. Perrault touches on some topical, important issues but fails to come to grips with most of them. Early in the novel there is some suggestion that the energy crisis might not be a real one, and also that the US might use force to secure the continued export of Canada's energy. Neither idea is explored.

The cover claim that the novel contains "high tension" and "intrigue" is misleading. The constant shift in scene from Calgary to the Arctic prevents a buildup in tension in any one area. The only hint of intrigue lies in the suspicion that there is a security leak at the drilling site, and that is never investigated.

The arctic frost seems to penetrate the characters stunting their development and leaving their dialogue stiff and unnatural. It is difficult for the reader to analyse their problems, for the characters do not do it themselves.

The novel closes with an imaginative but ludicrous picture of the Eskimo Utak floundering in pools of diesel fuel, a symbol of the sacrifice of the individual to industrial requirements.

Canadian Canvas

The Canadian Canvas is an exhibition of 85 works by 46 artists presenting a coast to coast anthology of Canadian painting today. The exhibition, sponsored by Time Canada Ltd. to mark its 30th year of publication this year, is meant "simply to please and stimulate, to satisfy and inform". If this is the show's intention, then it does meet its objective but it offers no breathtaking discoveries nor does it stress the regional differences of a country as vast as Canada. The Canadian Canvas presents a variety of artists ranging from the established (such as Jack Shadbolt) to the relatively obscure (such as Art Green).

Quebec's entrees include many well-known artists such as Rita Letendre and Guy du Montpeil who presents a large erotic triptych entitled Love Trip.

Ontario offers as its representatives, William Kurelek, Gershon Iskowitz and Jack Bush among others. Kurelek shows his range of subject matter with two revealing about women except that they make good subject matter.

Close by at the Nancy Poole Studio is a show by Isabel Kann, whose story may very well be representative of many other women artists. Once a promising scholarship student at the Edinburgh School of Fine Art, she left her career over 20 years ago to emigrate to Canada and raise a family.

She expresses no regret for this, however, and in the last few years has completed English and Fine Art degrees at U of T and returned to painting full time.

The results are happy light-filled canvases, largely still-life scenes of flowers and greenery in homey comfortable settings. These paintings are not revolutionary but they are distinguished by a strong harmonious sense of composition and a radiant use of colour.

Also included in the show is a striking portrait of the artist, showing a woman of strength and compassion. No banners were being waved but in the case of such genuine self-expression there was no need for them.

International Woman's Year has had a definite impact on the arts with many exhibitions and shows, some worthwhile, others silly at best, being mounted for the cause.

For instance, the Gallery Dresdnere has mounted an exhibition entitled "WOMEN as seen by gallery artists" which looks more like a pretext for getting their old merchandise out of the back room for a few weeks. There are the usual second rate Picasso drawings, Dali watercolours and a Chagall, none of which tell you anything

A satisfying double bill

If "Double Bill" only means a second Davis term to you (this is written before the election) then you just aren't cut out for the night at the Canadian Opera that presents two one-act items. You're just too political. Most other people, though, will find a lot to admire in Puccini's Il Tabarro and Leoncavallo's I Pagliacci.

Pagliacci, of course, the standard repertoire item, is visually more exciting and, as such, dominates the evening. But a few words should be said about Tabarro: the words that spring to mind are "Louis Quilico". Though this prodigiously talented singer stars in the more famous opera as well, he impressed me in this little-known Puccini item. Hampered seriously by a mundane plot and dull staging, this is an opera that forces one's attention almost entirely onto the music. And what music! It's hard to believe, at times, that this is from the same pen as the composer of Boheme or Butterfly (also being presented at this year's COC season, this being a Puccini year of sorts). Manon Lescault is the third Puccini item, making this season more Italianate than the past few COC packages).

Set on a barge-in the Seine, moored in the center of Paris, we get a mixture of strolling song-vendors, townfolk and seamen. Quilico stars as a barge-owner whose wife is in love with one of his stevedores; Luigi (how fitting if he had been named Steve Adore!) comes to wait for his love one night . . . the husband surprises him, strangles him, and hides the corpse behind his cloak ("il tabarro"). Out comes the wife, down goes the cloak, and all is frozen in a scene of abject horror.

This is pure verismo, the realistic, frankly manipulative (of the audience's emotions) style that swept Italian opera at the end of the nineteenth century, and is a rarity in Puccini. Manipulative he certainly was (just think of Tosca or the end of Boheme) but never so blatantly as in this piece. Again, what saves it is the music: open fifths, fascinating orchestration and musical effects that openly and obviously imitate the sound of flowing water — to indicate the Seine — all mark this off as a departure from what we expect from Puccini.

Thesinging is strong, from chorus and principals alike, but the laurels really go to Quilico. Even though the opera has no well-known arias, compared to the universal recognition accorded the composer's really famous melodies, Quilico transforms what could easily be an operatic curiosity into a viable drama. Nothing, however, can erase the contrived nature of the plot's ending — or the listless staging. Gloomily lit and less than inspiredly set, this is an opera that would do magnificently in concert performance; as theater, it sadly lacks. Ah, but the music!

I Pagliacci, on the other hand is an opera that escapes its verismo, period-piece straitjacket. For generations it has stood as a repertoire staple big aria threatened to reduce it to mass banality; the old 78 was, for quite some time, the largest-selling record in history, causing more astute opera impresarios to avoid the over-exposed work) and will probably be around a hundred years from now.

Pagliacci opens with an aria that recalls the days of eighteenth-century drama — when the plot was declaimed in advance by one of the characters, stepping out from his or her role (for a comic view of this revived tradition, there is the role of Public Opinion in Offenbach's Orpheus in the Underworld). Here, the story is declaimed by Tonio (Louis Quilico) a huge, hunchbacked clown. In the story, he appears as changeable and malevolent as the Hulk (of Marvel comics fame); in the prologue, he is as ageless and all-knowing as an oracular deity.

The plot could also be ageless, and since the protagonists are strolling "commedia dell'arte" players, the opera is typically set in the middle ages, sometimes the Renaissance, occasionally later. Here we see the story unfold in what appears to be immediate postwar (ca. 1945) Italy. The set is that of a bombed-out amphitheater, complete with lights and a ruined Cinzano sign crumpled into the foliage. The players travel in a beaten-up car trailer, and the audience (on stage) is dressed in a range of clothes from peasant black to black marketer's flash to soldiers' olive drab. A remarkable piece of staging.

Here we have another love triangle, between Canio, the troupe's leader, Nedda (his wife) and Silvio, her lover. The centerpiece of the action is a performance the troupe gives before the audience. Mixing the real, off-stage world with the fantasy world of their performance, Canio forces Nedda to tell him the name of her lover. Masks are ripped off, Tonio presses a knife into Canio's hand — and the audience is confused. At one point it yells "bravo!" but only after Nedda is fatally stabbed does it dawn on them that it is not a part of the show.

The singers freeze into a tableau as Tonio tears off his mask and clown's costume and declares, "The comedy is over!" — and the curtain falls.

Manipulative? Of course — but in a way that Tabarro only begins to approach. Aside from having all the "tunes" (Canio's outpouring of misery being perhaps the most famous melody in all music) there is the eternal glamour of the stage and the dichotomy of reality and illusion that actors represent. Endless psychological speculation could be — and has been — made on the importance of the phenomenon; suffice it to say that Pagliacci simply picks up anew on these timeless themes.

Quilico dominates the stage. Here is a performer with an overwhelming acting technique wedded to a glorious voice — a real, living, breathing singing actor, the operatic ideal.

The staging and direction is good, and someone has taken great care to see that the crowds in the onstage audience are not static; everyone has something to do, whether it's drinking, talking or fixatedly watching the action on the "stage". (Unfortunately, in the performance I saw, there was often a lag of as much as a half-beat between the orchestra and chorus. Unforgivable sloppiness! that could have been easily corrected). Canio's killing knife-blow that fells Silvio seems to hit your own gut, so highly pitched is the tension. It stands as a comment on Quilico's acting that his final line hits the vitals just as hard.

Both operas are flawed — these are far from perfect performances. Opera beginners, or those without the patience (or familiarity) to recognize "new" strains in Puccini will be disappointed with Tabarro, despite the fine singing. Pagliacci can appear shabby unless the chorus is primed to GO, and it just wasn't the night I saw it. But go to this double bill for one reason if no other: Wilulco. Once again, he is Canada's premier operatic performer.

Chuckles, snorts, and guffaws

Love and Death, for those of you who haven't heard, is Woody Allen's Russian movie: the title, of course, is not intended to sum up the essential polarity of Allen's cosmic vision — it's a pretty safe bet that he hasn't got one — but to summon up fond memories of all those other Russian twins, War and Peace, and Crime and Slime, and so forth. It has a number of the glorious moments one has come to expect from a Woody Allen Movie; no reviewer can be expected to resist the temptation to quote just a few. With a quite Cantonian self-control I limit myself to one: after being executed for a Crime He Did Not Commit, Boris appears to Sonje, in the custody of the Reaper. She asks him what death is like. "You know that chicken they serve at Treshke's?" he replies. "It's worse." There are, as I say, quite a number of these moments; they are the best thing about the movie, and perhaps they are worth the price of admission all by themselves. Unfortunately, they are very nearly all by themselves.

The problem here is structural, if such a word can be used in what, after all, a family newspaper. I've heard it said, irreverently and no doubt apocryphally, of Tolstoy, that he would polish off an epic and go to bed tired but happy, only to wake in a cold sweat at three in the morning, sit bolt upright in bed, clap hand to shaggy brow, and groan, "My God! I've forgotten to work in a peasant festival!" Now Mr. Allen could have worked some such anecdote into his movie, in the honourous self-deprecatory manner for which he is so justly famous, because whether or not this story is true of Tolstoy, it certainly reveals the basic principle of the construction of Love and Death. He has built up a plot out of all the ingredients one expects to find in every Russian epic (battles, love scenes, a marriage, a deathbed scene, a duel, a prison scene, a great number of intensely serious, if absurd, discussions, and so on) and then filled it as full of jokes as he could. Russians report that this fills them with glee, and even for normal human beings it can be rather fun at times, but too often he merely mentions, as it were, the necessary scene, instead of using it to its full comic effect — probably because this would take him off on a course that wouldn't lead to the other scenes he wanted to include. The unfortunate effect of this is that there are whole scenes that are more or less filler — most of the battle scenes, for example, are pretty perfunctory: even the jokes are rather old and tired — and even in some of the good scenes, there are flat spaces between the jokes.

Perhaps the root of the problem is that the good old Woody Allen character we've come to know and love, who was so wonderfully out-of-place as a revolutionary, or a bank robber, or a Bogart, is not so directly irrelevant to the sort of situation in which he is involved in Love and Death. Mr. Allen has tried to correct this, to add metaphysical fumbling to the physical and moral species his character has always been so adept at, by inserting a number of monologues full of incomprehensible terminology and pseudo-poetic imagery. They don't help, however, because they don't really fit the rest of the characterization, and so diffuse and disintegrate it rather than expanding it, and because in themselves they are more inane than really funny.

In Monty Python and the Holy Grail we have something much more satisfactory to report, not a handful of nuggets embedded in base rock but the motherlode itself, a tissue of the purest lunacy from one end to the other, from the portentous opening titles, with mock-Swedish subtitles ("No, really, moos bites kan bi veri nasi!") until the police have to be called in to put a stop to the goings-on. The really wonderful thing here is how each scene develops in a perfectly logical way, but according to a logic that is perfectly insane. The succession of events is as absurd and outrageous as it possibly could be if they had been chosen at random, and they make the additionally preposterous claim to be sensible, nay, inevitable. A group of peasants claim that a young woman is a witch, and want to burn her, but their wise lord insists that she be fairly tried first: Now, what do you do with witches? he asks. — Burn them! Good, and what else do you burn? — More witches? — Yes, but besides? — Wood? — Right! Now, if you put wood in water, what happens? — It floats. — And what else floats? — (Some hesitation) A... duck? — Splendid! So, if she is a witch, she must weigh... — The same as a duck!! (The lord's largest pair of balances proves that she does indeed weigh exactly as much as a duck; she is rushed off to the stake.)

Those few wretches who have had the temerity to breathe a word against MPHG in my presence have suggested that perhaps they didn't enjoy the second half quite as much as the first. It's no less funny: that would be unthinkable. But I fear that perhaps a whole Python film is more than mere mortals can stand. The eyes glaze over; at the least the diaphragm gives out. But the fault is ours, not theirs, and it is up to us to correct it. I recommend a regimen of, twice daily, Gregorian chant, and the stimulation of the pre-frontal lobes with a small wooden board.

There is a particular delight in watching a well-crafted play. One relaxes intellectually; the sheer competence of dramatic movement and taut dialogue gives reassurance that it is no shallow conclusion which greets us as our Consciences murmur the play's Epilogue. Friedrich Durrenmatt's The Physicists is such a securely-built drama, and around its resonant structure the members of the Theatre Plus company have created characters of humour, whimsy, and, eventually, courage.

The plot? Convoluted. Three madmen are suspiciously housed in a private "sanatorium", attended by pretty and solicitous nurses. Each was a physicist involved in nuclear research: two are now convinced that they are the great creators of modern physics, Newton and Einstein, and the third, apparently the most sane, believes that the shade of Solomon visits him. 'Newton' and 'Einstein' murder their nurses, involving a distressed police investigator who cannot convince the hunch-backed psychiatrist in charge that these men are criminal, or even dangerous.

It becomes apparent that all three put on and off their madness as they highly pragmatic ends are served. Greater forces are at work, as the issues of morality are worked out, than private human life; self-sacrifice becomes the sacrifice of self for humanity. Eventually we see that the man who sees Solomon is faced with the wisdom of Solomon, as he has solved the leading problems of contemporary physics; and like Solomon, he is faced with a great weariness and a distrust of 'sane' humankind.

In its first half, the play is farcical; in the concluding section, often melodramatic. But both sections are redeemed by a thorough direction which exploits each line in Durrenmatt's script to reveal personalities within even the minor parts. In particular, Donald Ewer, as Inspector Voss, bewildered and shocked by the apparent sanity of the madmen and the criminally irresponsible attitudes of the deranged psychiatrist, and John Evans, in a magnificent cameo of the meek Rev. Oskar Rose, who has not the spirit of a grasshopper but who has with the help of the Holy Spirit, or Divine Inspiration of some kind, fathered a family of six, stand out.

Jennifer Phipps, as the Fraulein Doktor, begins weakly, with affected gestures that seem far too stock; yet by the conclusion, her peculiar family history makes her nervous twitches quite explicable, and her megalomania, though it strains the fabric of the play, is nevertheless a reasonable development of the character she portrays.

The real strength of this production, as with many of this company's shows, is the charismatic acting of Alan Scarfe. Together with his two fellow-parkies, (the imposing Gerard Parkes playing a sauve Newton and Eric House as a ruffled but conscientious Einstein), he runs the play to its deepest conclusions about human nature and the responsibility of men of science. In a deepening web of moral complications, as the action descends to cliché and television-special dimensions, he moves our thinking higher and higher and seemingly swells physically as he comes to dominate the hushed stage.

In a moving conclusion, Scarfe repeats that he is in fact Solomon, faced with Solomon's choice, and yet left without the Hebrew King's love of God. The love of man is no guarantee that men will love mankind; and so the three scientists resign themselves to accept self-immurement and the total honesty of madness.

Sci-fi doesn't deserve pseudo-academic embalming

The Ray Bradbury Companion
Gale Research Co.

If science fiction has finally come of age, this book is the sort of thing that will push it towards an early grave, or at least premature senility. A 338-page checklist, eulogy, 'photolog', bibliography and biography, it was anthologized by a close friend of Bradbury's, presumably with his help and encouragement.

As these things go, it is capable work. It is outstandingly complete, having a chronology of R.B.'s life from his childhood on (complete with his pretensions to, and certitude of, literary grandeur at the tender age of eleven). But it is replete with Bradbury and his biographer, William Nolan, name-dropping and setting up their own mutual-admiration society. Only in Bradbury's introduction to this book, where he proclaims his ambition to be a man of destiny, and in the scope of his work, which includes stage and poetic writing, does any real information about the man or his ideas emerge.

I am left, after glancing through this elaborate insult to the creative mind, with an impression of Bradbury as an extraordinary egomaniac who has in passing produced work of genius.

The production of this book, cased, bound in heavy boards and printed on heavy-duty paper, seems to be an example of "academic-coercion" publishing, a department in which the publisher, Gale Research Co., have made their fame. Depending on the snivelling ignorance of trend-haunted institutions, they have presented this study (the work of a jackdaw desirous of an unremarkable immortality) as a crucial tool to the study of America's premier S F writer.

Even if you are a knowledgeable, and avid, fan of Bradbury, don't even dream of spending your money here. Put it to work for you in some of the new and literate histories of the writing of science fiction. Remember, this book may well find itself on the shelves of your local academic library, purchased in the name of the advancement of knowledge.

Menagerie Theatre's Caretaker production brings out humor but little else

The Menagerie Theatre Company's production of Pinter's The Caretaker (through Saturday at the Central Library Theatre) achieves a strange kiss-of-death distinction of making Pinter seem vastly over-rated as a dramatist.

The production, under the direction of Joan Calderera, brings out the surprisingly sustained element of humour in the work but it is successful in little else. The two brothers, Mick and Ashton, and Davies, the tramp who tries to use them and who is used by them, are developed neither in themselves nor, fatally, in relation to one another. Dramatic conflict, for the images it presents and the ambiguities it provokes in the audience's awareness, is one of Pinter's triumphs. But here, the central conflict between Mick and Davies is almost stillborn. Clair Culliford as Mick has only a limited repertoire of movements and the repertory is run through again and again. John Gilbert is good as the querulous Davies but Clairborn's inadequacies unfortunately encourage him to make it simply a character role.

Mathew Gray, as the former mental hospital patient, Ashton, is mercifully only occasionally simperingly out of it all.

Pinter's plays, as is often noted, are essentially thrillers in which there is no resolution, but in which as well, suspense functions as catharsis. One's sense of mystery, even mystification, about what is going on, is used to heighten one's sense of life. And Pinter's plays are as formalistic and as dependent on a set of strict conventions as any thriller. Their resonance derives in large part from the acceptance of their artificiality. But Calderera's production shows little evidence of Pinter's uniqueness as a dramatist.

It is numbingly naturalistic, not as means to an end, but in the end itself. The pity is — now that Pinter is 'popular' after a period of obloquy, (and popular he is: his adultery with Antonia Fraser formed a large part of the intermission 'chit-chat') — productions like this one make it seem justifiably easy to dismiss his work. "This is what the trouble was all about — this?"

art

If you believe that most art reviewers in the daily press gild the lily, to put it kindly, you are absolutely right. The best defense is to get into the habit of going to art shows yourself but not just the must-see ones: the operative phase is "visual education".

Up to the north-east, the Kar Gallery (at the Colonnade on Bloor St.) has a small exhibition of works by three Belgian post-Impressionist painters, including James Ensor. Down in the south-west, Cinema Lumiere (at Spadina and College) has photographs by David Fugino, closing tomorrow, and photographs by Ben Holsberg, opening Sunday, and if the shows aren't very good and are pretentious, what did you expect in a movie house lobby? In between, half on campus and half off, the Sigmund Samuel Canadiana Gallery, behind the Sigmund Samuel Library, has Cornelius Kreighoff as well as works by plagiarists and contemporaries on display through to December 1. (Being Canadian is putting up with Kreighoff. No one else anywhere pays him much attention.) Also half-on, half-off campus, the Central Library theatre foyer has a display of the set-designs for Louis Riel by Murray Laufer.

Brian Maycock's Hart House show of multi-media works continues until Sept. 26 (see next week). The Faculty of Architecture, corner Huron and College, is showing design projects by students of the renowned Architectural Association School, London, England, illustrating the various changes in British taste in architecture with the emphasis on works since the second World War. The exhibition continues until the 26th. Victoria College has its first show of the season, paintings by Huibert Sabelis, in the New Academic Building, from Tuesday on. Yoka Tuimán has a show of realist paintings under the title of Minutiae of Nature at the Meeting Place Gallery, Scarborough College, until Sept. 30. Interesting elsewhere is the exhibition of recent sculpture by Robert Murray, the sculptor Ottawa loves to hate — he did the controversial Haida piece for the front of the Lester B. Pearson External Affairs building there. It's at the David Mirvish Gallery, Markham St., through to Oct. 8.

The Ontario College of Art is offering evening class credit courses ranging from Ikat and Vegetable Dying, and Narrative Dance, to Editorial Illustration and Canadian Film. There has been a massive response: practically all of the courses (each of which costs at least $90) were filled before registration ended yesterday.

Thank you to the myriads who offered their services to the Review, either in person or by more devious methods of communication. I will be in touch with all of you eventually.

Two new, and interesting, events in the city. The first is Theatre Passe Muraille's City: The Toronto Show, an ambitious revue-styled production which previewed Tuesday at the St. Paul's Church Annex. Drivingly energetic, powered by the company's strong bodies and John Mills-Cockell's music, it was highly successful in presenting a view of the city from its parks, taverns, and eateries. We will be sending out a reviewer this week.

The second, as they say in the trade, interesting offering was the Phoenix-like reappearance of the Embassy's Palm Grove Lounge. Now touted as Hard Times and billed as vaudeville (not to be confused with burlesque), the place has uniformed its waiters and reopened the old stage area. Some of the grill work has gone but the scotch is just as oily. For a two-dollar cover, you see at least five acts. On Tuesday, the "opening night," there were five names on the programme, two of whom were five-second novelties and three-minute disasters. Of interest was a magician's assistant who doubled as a stripper (and if they introduce us, I'll give the show a favourable review) and a pair of pale-blond "sisters" who can sing and move. Whereas the TPM show is the kind of thing you'd like to go to with someone whose lascivious tastes closely approximated your own, the Hard Times production is much more chaste, although there is more skin. Definitely a dress-up extravaganza a la Earhart.

Ah, how sordid is life! Currently on tap: Actors' Repertory Theatre, The Colonnade; The Good Doctor — Chekhov through the eyes of Neil Simon. Simon's humour generally dominates. Tuesday to Thursday, 8:30. Wednesday matinee at 3. $3.50 for students. Also, The Old Time Music Hall on weekends. Music and humour, informal, but with the traditional Chairman. Friday at 8:30, Saturday at 7 and 9:30. Students $3.50. Menagerie Theatre, Central Library, St. George and College Streets; Pinter's The Caretaker. The company wants to put on "slick" plays; but our reviewer thinks they can't quite carry it off. (See REVIEW). Tonight and Saturday at 8:30, students $2.50.

New Global Village Theatre, 17 St. Nicholas Street; High Lights, or the Lives of men and women. With music. Monday to Saturday at 8:30, a Saturday matinee at 2 p.m.; students, rush tickets, $2.50.

Royal Alexandra Theatre: Sabrina Fair carries on. What's John Milton doing in a play like this? Chastity? At 8:30, with Wednesday and Saturday matinees at 2:30. $5 to $10. Second City, at the Old Firehall, 110 Lombard Street; Also Available In Paperback, a satiric revue. Monday to Thursday at 9, Friday 8:30 and 11, Saturday 7:30 and 11. $4 or $5.

Theatre-in-the-Dell, 300 Simcoe Street: Two Score and More. Music and clothes from the decadent past. Monday to Thursday at 9, Friday and Saturday 8 and 10:30. $4 or $5. Theatre Passe Muraille, St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road; City: The Toronto show. Tuesday to Sunday 8:30, $2.50 or $3.50, and on Sunday, a matinee at 2:30 which is pay-what-you-can. Theatre Plus, Town Hall, St. Lawrence Centre: The Physicists. One more week to catch this excellent show (for expanded puff, see REVIEW). Monday to Saturday at 8:30; students $2. To reserve would be wise.

This is opera season, too, and you might still flag down the occasional ticket. Here are brief notes on some upcoming events:

Academy of Theatre Arts, 23 Grenville Street; Shaw's Village Wooing. Thursday to Saturday, for three weeks, beginning Sept. 25 at 8:30.

East Side Players, Todmorden Mills, at Pottery Road and the Bayview Extension; Say Louise Sent You. A risqué, if not in bad taste, production, to judge from their advertising. A Roaring Twenties revue. Sept. 26-27, Oct. 3-4 at 8. $4 gets you food, and drinks are extra. What? Speakeasy?

Pepl Puppet Theatre in the Poor Alex Theatre, 296 Brunswick Ave.; Hansel and Gretel to the music of Humperdinck. Saturdays and Sundays, 1:30 and 3. Opens tomorrow for six weeks. Playhouse 66, 66 Denton Avenue at Pharmacy; Enter Laughing, a sitcom about a writer of sitcoms. Thursday to Saturday at 8:30, Sunday at 7:30, students $1.50. Opens Sept. 25.

May I remind you that Hart House Theatre is gearing up for its new season, and that subscription tickets are offered for a minuscule price. Shakespeare, Camus, and a ragbag in between.

JW

movies

More repertory fare, if cannot be emphasized too strongly (or, you'll find, too often) that all of the movies I'll be listing in this column (with a few exceptions thrown in for fun) are far and away better than anything you can pay twice as much to see in a first-run theatre right now. If the first-run situation changes, you'll hear a scream of delight from somewhere in these pages.

Tonight at the Revue, at 7:30, Ken Russell's gross and hysterical but undeniably powerful movie about witchcraft trials in the seventeenth-century France, The Devils. At 9:30, to help you recover, they have Lester's The Four Musketeers, which is every bit as silly and cheerful as the first half they showed last week. That program continues through Saturday and Sunday. Also on Friday and Saturday at the New Yorker, at 6:30 and 9:15, is O Lucky Man, Lindsay Anderson's story of a coffee salesman's quest for the meaning of life. With Malcolm McDowell, and wonderful Liverpool Reggae songs by Alan Price.

Top of the list Saturday is Flying Down To Rio, at the Art Gallery of Ontario. This was the first movie where Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers danced together, and, just like all the others, it's great. (Though in fact here they play second banana to Dolores Del Rio herself no stouch.) This is the one with the big dance sequence on airplanes. There's a pretty good comedy program at the Roxy: at 7 and 10. And Now For Something Completely Different, a collection of skits from the Monty Python TV series, and in between, at 8:30, Room Service, minor Marx Brothers (which is praising with faint damn). Cinema Lumiere begins a series of films by women directors on Saturday, with Attica, a carefully researched documentary of the prison uprising, and Celebration at Big Sur, a very pleasant rock festival movie, with Joan Baez, Joni Mitchell, Crosby, Sillits, Nash & Young, and the scenery of the Pacific Coast. At 8 and 9:30, respectively; the same program on Sunday.

Sunday and Monday at the New Yorker, at 7 and 9:30, is A Woman Under the Influence, John Cassavetes' latest, with a stunning performance by Gene Rowlands. The SMC Sunday film series continues with, at 7:15 and 9:30, Antonia: Portrait of a Woman, a documentary on conductor Antonia Brico by folksinger Judy Collins. The SMC Sunday series is without a doubt the best movie bargain in town. Admission is by series ticket only, but it's only $4 for 20 movies, most of them terrific.

On Monday, the Revue begins a series of films by Alain Tanner, a Swiss director notable for his wit and sense of character in (often against) social setting. Monday and Tuesday, at 7:30, they have his first movie, Charles Dead or Alive, and at 9:15, The Shamander. The Roxy has an Antonioni double Monday: at 7 and 10:40, his latest, the enigmatic and fascinating The Passenger, with Jack Nicholson and Maria Schneider, and at 9, the famous but dispensible Blow-Up. Cinema Lumiere's women directors' series continues with Agnes Varda's Le Bonheur at 8, and Nelly Kaplan's A Very Curious Girl at 9:30. Ditto Tuesday. Ontario College of Art's Monday series of American Classics continues with, at 7, C.B. de Millie's Male and Female.

Tuesday the Roxy has Women in Love, which is probably Ken Russell's best, for what that's worth, at 7 and 10:50, and at 9:15, Bergman's mood-piece Cries and Whispers. The New Yorker has the Billy Wilder transvestite comedy Some Like It Hot, with Marilyn Monroe, at 8:15, and to go with it, at 7 and 10:15, something called The Queen, which is billed as a transvestite beauty pageant.

Wednesday, at the Revue, Tanner's Return From Africa at 7:30 and 9:30. At Erindale, College they're beginning a series of Wednesday night screenings in connection with an inter-disciplinary course in The German Film, but they're open to the public and they're free. This Wednesday it's Wiener's nightmare The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, famous for its expressionistic sets. At 7 in room 292 of the North Building at Erindale. If you're feeling really strong Wednesday you can go to see what sounds like a pretty overwhelming double bill at the Roxy: Russell's The Devils at 7 and Fellini Satyricon at 9. I like the Revue's arrangement better. The Roxy has the same program upside down on Thursday (except that Devils doesn't start until 9:20; in addition to all its other excesses, Satyricon is extremely long. At the Revue, at 8:30, 1933 by Toronto's own Joyce Wieland, and at 8:35 (really) Lina Wertmuller's socio-politico-romantic comedy The Seduction of Mimi. Or you can go to Harbourfront at dusk for Buster Keaton at his best in The General (with Horace Lapp at the piano), and see the poor fellow taken advantage of in his decline by the NFB in Railroader.

Thursday, at the Revue, more Tanner: The Middle of The World at 7:30 and 9:30. That's all folks.

"Ar, ar, ar, Jack, that be many a tale left in these old bones, 'ar, 'ar, 'ar!' was the theme of a talk given by the Walthamstow Professor of Ethnomusicology at last week's Philbus Lectures 1975, entitled "Whither Bulgaria?" Prof. Antrobus' critical acumen was matched only by the sage and spare comments of Pety the Wonder Parrot, perched archly on the eminent speaker's right shoulder.

See what you miss by not coming to these things? Serves you right for not reading your Varsity thoroughly. If you'll kindly pay some attention, you can catch this week's lineup of frivolity and fopishness:

Grand Opera: lumbering along like the lovable but decaying old elephant it is, the COC packs 'em in at the O'Keefe. If poetry is nipping at your nether parts, try the $3.50 rush seats, on sale shortly before curtain time. I don't know when $3.50 became a bargain rush price, but with lettuce nudging $6.59 a head, I guess it's to be expected. Tonight sees fun and bubbling gaiety in Die Fledermaus, the Strauss edifice of flying corks and flippant melody. (I'm afraid that one of these days my trusty thesaurus is going to die a very ugly death from overwork.) Next performance of this opera, featuring Faculty of Music alumnus Barney Ingram, is on Tuesday.

Tomorrow afternoon's presentation is the double bill: the neglected II Tabarro and the superlatively-performed I Pagliacci (see review this issue). The evening performance is a premiere: Salome, featuring the COC's 1975 poster girl, Grace Bumbry, in the title role. The big house is quiet Sunday and Monday; Tuesday sees, as mentioned above, Fledermaus; Wednesday's weeper is Madama Butterfly, and the week is rounded out on Thursday with the last performance of the double bill. Still to come: Louis Riel.

And believe it or not, that's about all that's going in Toronto this week (musically). With the TSO tied up at the Opera, the symphony season is stalled until October, when new boy Andrew Davis gets the big hello; the various chamber music series don't get underway until later; even the CBC is in late summer doldrums. Time to put on a record.

Speaking of which, check out Sam's downtown outlet for a series of Candide-Vox discs pressed (very well, too) in France. My guess is that they're being discontinued by the Canadian distributor; they're great buys at $3.99, complete with ample liner notes. The musical range is extensive — all the way from Gesualdo Madrigals through to Bartok. Also of interest at the same place: Bruckner fans can slake their thirst on the master's complete symphonies, a 12-record set from 1972's "Symphony Edition" on DG. It's a bargain for $45 — even more so when you count the $35 artbook on the Symphony that's thrown in free. Quite a value, and there are plenty left.

Speaking of record shops, is there a more pleasant way to piss away the time than in browsing through the stock at The Book Cellar's Yorkville outlet? The prices, while not the best in town, certainly aren't the worst, and the selection of fancy imported pressings and box-sets is a delight to drool over.

poetry

The St. Michael's Poetry Series 1975-76 opens on Thursday, 25 September, with a reading by the celebrated Toronto novelist Morley Callaghan, at 4 pm in Brennan Assembly Hall.

Young Canadian poet Lionel Kearns reads his poems two weeks later, October 9.

On Thursday, 23 October, two films from the National Film Board will be screened: Ladies and Gentlemen, Mr. Leonard Cohen, and Autobiographical, by A.M. Klein.

The British poet Thom Gunn, author of many books including My Sad Captains and Moly, reads on Thursday, 6 November.

Anthony Burgess, the author of Clockwork Orange and a shorter version of Finnegans Wake, appears in a film to be screened on 13 November, Silence, Exile, and Cunning: In Search of James Joyce.

Several poets who are currently students at St. Mike's give a joint reading on 20 November, and on 4 December the well-known Canadian poet and critic Louis Dudek speaks on The Meaning of Modern.

All events in the St. Michael's Poetry Series take place in Brennan Hall on Thursday afternoons at 4, are open to the general public, and are free of charge.

Geritol generation moving in

By BLAKE WOODSIDE

Rochdale College, now empty, may soon be full of the patter of ancient feet.

According to State and Urban affairs minister Barney Danson, Toronto's former drug centre is likely to be turned into senior citizen's housing. In a letter to SAC, an aide to Danson said "Mr. Danson is in favour of converting the College for use as a senior citizen's development and planning for future use of the building has been going on for some time."

The letter went on to say that a public announcement would be made as soon as possible.

However, Ward Six aldermen Allan Sparrow and Dan Heap, received the same reply over a year ago. The same answer was also given to Kevin O'Leary, a member of People and Law, a Ward 6 legal assistance program, which is currently following one of the many lawsuits stemming from the foreclosure of the mortgage on the building. The Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation in 1972.

SAC is only one of twenty concerned groups which have sent Danson briefs and suggestions concerning Rochdale. These range from the SAC plan to have the City of Toronto Non-Profit Housing Corporation run the building as low income housing, to a proposal by the Kiwanis Club and the Rotarians to run the building as a senior citizen's home.

Government planners have decided to make the building into senior citizen's housing, as opposed to student's housing, to erase Rochdale's reputation. However, according to a SAC study, the layout of the building is not totally suitable for senior citizen's housing.

Aside from the fact there are no balconies, thereby forcing the elderly to travel outside of the building for fresh air and sunshine, the interior layout, consists mainly of shared and semi-shared apartments. The study points out that this is not what one would expect for an elderly couple, or single person. In fact, there is no private single accommodation, and only a small number of doubles within the whole building.

To complicate the issue, government documents have recently been circulated showing that as early as 1969, it was financially impossible for the building to ever keep up its mortgage payments.

Despite the fact Rochdale was cited as an example of a successful co-op housing project, and was used as the basis for establishing similar projects at York and Ottawa Universities, it was known the building was inevitably doomed to economic bankruptcy, the documents point out. It was revealed in a press conference given last Thursday by Bill King, financial manager of the building as of 1969.

As a result, Rochdale College will not be used for any form of student housing in the foreseeable future. The people now involved with Rochdale have already had their collective hands burned once. So for students, if you're looking for a place to stay, Rochdale has no vacancies.

Scientologist suit poses problems

MONTREAL (CUP) — Concordia University Director of Libraries James Kanasy hopes to change a law that forced him to remove a book from library shelves last year, and he has gathered the support of the Canadian Library Association behind him.

The book was George Malko's "Scientology: The New Religion" and it was a book critical of the Church of Scientology.

Under Canadian libel law, the publisher of a book is anyone who makes the book available to the public, as a library does.

The Church sued the Hamilton Public Library and Etobicoke Public Library to prevent them from circulating the book. The Church also threatened other libraries with suit if the book was not taken off the shelves while the case was pending.

Concordia and St. Mary's were two universities in Canada that said they had removed the book.

The Scientologists have since dropped their suit against the two libraries, and Malko's book is back on the Sir George shelves.

But the situation has raised some questions about the law in the minds of librarians.

If a library can be sued for libel, Kanasy pointed out, a threat is posed to intellectual freedom since the library should be able to make controversial material available to scholars and social historians without worry of suit until the material is actually judged libelous.

"What we want to change . . . is that libraries would not be considered as having published a book for having it on the shelves and circulating it," Kanasy explained.

How's this for tasteless?

MIAMI (ZNS-CUP) — The Reverend Carl McIntire officially broke ground last week on the Vietnam Village Tourist Attraction he is constructing in Florida.

The Fundamentalist minister has sponsored 56 Vietnamese refugees who, he says, will be dressed in "authentic costumes" and will play the part of besieged villagers under warlike conditions.

McIntire's Vietnamese land features not only an Indochina village, including ducks, chickens, and water buffalos wandering about thatched huts, but a lifelike heavily-armed Green Beret camp nearby. McIntire told Newsweek Magazine that the special forces camp will be equipped with a speaker system that will blare out the noise of war as American tourists ride through the area on Sampan boats. The Reverend explains, "We'll have a recording broadcast a fire fight, mortars exploding, bullets flying, Vietnamese screaming."

He says the air raid sirens will go off, and C.I. actors will storm the village. McIntire says that tourists who "get into the spirit of the raid" will be invited to take cover with the Vietnamese in the huts.

There will also be souvenir shops selling Vietnamese knickknacks as well as snacks of rice and noodles.

The Pickett Affair

T'ai Chi Chuan

For over a year now, "T'ai Chi Chuan" classes have been held in the fencing room at Hart House. The classes instruct a form of Chinese exercise which purports to aid in both mental and physical vitalization.

Descriptions of T'ai Chi appear in Chinese chronicles from as far back as the fourth century A.D. From the beginning, T'ai Chi has been used for its therapeutic effects. It stimulates blood circulation thus strengthening the heart and other organs. It also helps in such aspects of the body as breath control and depth, muscle tone and agility and reflex accuracy and promptness.

A very important aspect of T'ai Chi is its calming effect. While performing the required movements one must use all physical motion during the twenty-five minute duration. Furthermore, one must psychologically direct the movements. The movements are all bases for pugilistic punches, blocks, and kicks used in other forms of Oriental martial arts. After years of training and practice, T'ai Chi can be used as a means of self-defence. The actual translation of the term T'ai Chi Chuan is 'supreme ultimate of boxing'.

Involving psychological direction, T'ai Chi is unlike most Western forms of exercise. Instead of feeling exhausted after performing the exercise, a feeling of energy is experienced. In a general sense the quiet movements having as their object steadiness and strength allow calm and increased energy to result.

The classes which are held from 7 pm to 9 pm in the evening begin on Monday Oct. 6. The instructor is Mrs. T. Kotowitz and tickets must first be obtained at the Programme Office at Hart House. There will be a demonstration at Hart House on Oct. 2. For additional information contact Margaret McGarry at 961-1962.

Dave Pickett is a young man who likes to play football. He's not bad at it either as was shown last Sunday when he personally dismantled the defending national champions, Western Ontario Mustangs. A few seasons ago he was even named the top college player in the country.

But the 22-year-old native of Saskatoon also likes to play basketball. His problem is that he spent 10 minutes too long on the court.

One of the little known facts of the current imbroglio surrounding Pickett's eligibility to play quarterback for the University of Windsor is that, but for those 10 minutes the entire brouhaha would have been silenced.

It was in his second season of basketball for the University of Saskatchewan when he was injured after 10 minutes of the opening game and sidelined for the rest of the season. However, for that he was credited with playing in one game and consequently it can be said that he played that basketball season, albeit for only a short time.

That is but one of the curious and strange things surrounding the current "Pickett Affair".

There are several others. One interesting tidbit is the way Pickett arrived on the scene in Windsor. He did not just sweep in off the Prairies, appear at the local university just in time for football training camp and ask if he could try out for the team. His coming was probably common knowledge to the athletic department there, the OUAA and the CIAU for at least a few months.

Reports have it that Windsor football coach Gino Fracas got Pickett interested in coming there almost a year ago. The two met in what was described as a "chance conversation" at last season's Western Bowl between UWO and Saskatchewan. Pickett was an assistant coach with the Huskies last year.

Fracas, on learning that Pickett was interested in doing graduate work in physical education told him of what Windsor had to offer in that department. From that point on Pickett did it by himself, according to Fracas. He did not pursue him. By early summer Pickett, Windsor, the OUAA and the CIAU should have known what was about to happen, if they did not already.

The entire affair could have been nipped in the bud had the CIAU stepped in then and cautioned the league and the Lancers against letting Pickett play. The positions could have been established then and the matter may have been resolved before the season would have begun.

However, instead of acting like a responsible body the CIAU waited until the situation got out of hand and then proceeded to over-react to it.

First they suspended Windsor from sports leading to a national title and then did the same to all teams who play the Lancers.

Next they made Windsor's reinstatement more difficult. The school must not only drop Pickett from its team but must also show "good intentions". That is, it must approach the CIAU on bended knees, apologize for its sins and beg "pretty please" to be readmitted.

If, all those measures are not enough they will take further action in other sports. In effect the CIAU has expelled the OUAA, the largest of the collegiate conferences, from one major championship, football, and is attempting to do the same in other sports, like basketball and hockey.

Although the OUAA seems unduly victimized in this regard their behavior throughout the whole affair is also highly liable to scrutiny. It must be remembered that they supported the national eligibility standards when they were introduced in 1973.

However they have changed their position now. First they said they meant to change their rules to conform with the CIAU standard but forgot to, due to some administrative oversight. Later they said they tried to change them but could not on such short notice.

In the latest statement U of T Athletic Director and Ontario-Quebec football convenor Dalt White said the OUAA actually felt their rules were better than the national standards. They were going to try to get the letter changed but to do this they would have to wait until next year.

It appears the OUAA really had no intention of making the changes in the first place and merely delayed them until it was too late.

Their stand against the rule may have some substance to it but changing their position and presenting their new case by means of a power play will get them much support from among the other member organizations in Quebec, the Maritimes and the West.

In this sense they were asking for trouble and now they are getting it.

Nobody is completely in the right in this situation. Pickett and Windsor knowingly flouted the rules. The OUAA followed suit by backing them up. The CIAU is trying to exert some authority and though some of their measures are rather unfair they have to be the ones with the cleanest consciences in the affair.

It must be remembered that the rules are still the rules. The law may be "an ass" as the saying goes, but that is still no reason for breaking it.

The CIAU rule does penalize a gifted student athlete who can play two sports at a varsity level and still keep up a full academic course load. Perhaps it should be changed but that is something for next year.

Meanwhile if the member associations are not going to enforce nationally agreed-upon standards then it falls to the national body to do so.

It is unfair for one conference to have less stringent eligibility rules than the others. It is possible for that group to become a haven for athletes who want to play an extra season or two.

The graduate program in phys. ed. was only one reason why Dave Pickett wanted to come to Ontario. Football was the major reason. He wanted to play and this province is the only place he can do that.

finances have been tentatively arranged for a women's rowing team. The information in that article was received by this desk about a week ago and at that time it was believed that women's rowing was 'has been'. Since that time it has been decided that the girls will be funded. Details will be discussed in a general meeting in room 201 at Hart House on Monday, Sept. 22, at 6 pm. Anyone interested is welcome to attend. (Regardless of level of experience.)

STACK SET STRIKE SOON?

By BOB COLLIER

U of T library workers will apply to the Ontario Labour Relations Board today for conciliation in their contract dispute with Simcoe Hall, said Judy Darcy, president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) 1230.

Darcy said the library union has taken this step because U of T's labour-management negotiator John Parker "is clearly stalling."

She noted that the CUPE local has been meeting Parker for three months but he has persistently refused to make any concrete offers on major clauses in the new contract.

Parker could not be reached by The Varsity for comment Sunday.

According to Darcy, Parker promised to make the university's offer in a meeting with library union negotiators last Tuesday. But at the meeting he refused to discuss any significant matters, saying he would have to see his principals first, she said.

Darcy pointed out Parker has been informed of all the contract demands for the last three months.

At a rally of library workers on Friday evening, union members voted unanimously to apply for government conciliation right away.

"It was a very enthusiastic meeting," said Darcy, "and the results of the vote was met by much cheering and clapping."

According to Ontario labour law, if negotiations are not progressing either union or management can apply for mediation by an unbiased labour expert supplied by the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

The mediator meets both parties within five days and draws up a compromise solution to the dispute.

If either party refuses to accept the mediator's report, the union may hold a secret strike vote.

If more than 50 per cent of union members want to walk out, the strike can legally occur at the end of a 16-day cooling off period.

A strike is now possible by the last week in October.

It would severely disrupt, and possibly stop, all services in the Sigmond Samuel, Sci-Med and Roberts libraries plus departmental libraries in hygiene, pharmacy and engineering.

Darcy emphasized, "We don't want to strike, but we do want fair treatment from the library administration."

The starting wage of a full-time library technician is only $5,600 per year before deductions, $2,000 a year less than is paid by the Toronto public libraries CUPE figures show.

After three years of satisfactory work, U of T gives a university-educated worker less than $7,000, or $4,000 less than the average wage of all Ontario employees irrespective of education and qualifications, added Darcy.

The library workers have organized a Support Committee to take care of all eventualities resulting from a strike.

$164,000 Missing

By LINDA GUTRI

An anonymous letter has led to the discovery of 14 cartons of books in a Toronto rooming house, apparently stolen from U of T libraries.

Roberts chief librarian R.H. Blackburn said the theft took place over a period of 2 to 3 years. Some of the books had been noted missing since 1973.

Despite attempts to control theft through security measures, the library is still left with other problems. "A number of people wouldn't think of stealing, however don't mind cheating a bit," Blackburn said.

"Cheating" ranges from the marking up of books, to removal of book pages, especially from art books and even the removal of entire chapters. People also hide books within the library, thus giving themselves sole access, which Blackburn said, has the same effect as stealing a book.

Blackburn explained each book is part of a collection, and replacement costs many times the original cost of the book. "It is a great pity that people who do this sort of thing don't realize they are not only stealing a book but destroying a collection of which this book was a part," Blackburn said. He added when a book is damaged, not only is that book defaced but possibly a part of the collection destroyed.

Theft also involves magazines, as some 100 journals from the Current Periodicals Room at Roberts are missing over the past year. The university subscribes to over 2,000 journals, some of which are very expensive and often impossible to replace.

Questioned on ways to stop damage to the collections,

Blackburn said, "There isn't any way, if people have direct access to the books. We can discourage it, but there is no way you can watch this and protect against the professional thief."

Total annual loss through theft cannot be estimated because only partial inventory is carried out yearly and only on specific sections of the library. Each section undergoes complete inventory at least every 6 years.

Statistics regarding the disappearance of books from Scarborough College show some disciplines such as English and history missing more than 13 per cent of catalogued volumes.

They estimate to replace all books on the present missing list at average prices and at average salaries for processing would cost $164,593.

Building freeze stops admissions

By MING MAR

Thousands of qualified freshmen were barred from the University of Toronto because of a construction freeze instituted in the early 70's, according to the university's Business Affairs vice-president.

Vice-President Alex Rankin said funds for new construction have dried up. The Ministry of Colleges and Universities (MCU) has, in the 70's, cut capital expenditures to $25 million per year from $125 million per year in the late 60's. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been unable to meet demands for loans.

In spite of the keen competition for provincial money, the university is receiving increased MCU funding. This academic year the university is receiving $3.4 million as opposed to $2.8 million for 1974-75. The money is used only for the regular maintenance and renovation of existing facilities, not for the construction of new space.

The University has to seek non-MCU funds for campus buildings. Hart House's own reserves had to be used to up-grade its servery. Last year the Ontario Health Resources Development Plan spent $200 thousand improving health sciences and dentistry facilities.

The installation of forestry laboratory equipment in Glendon Hall was paid for with money from soil testing agreements between the forestry faculty and the province. Operating revenue had to be used to pay for cost over-runs at Scarborough and Erindale residences.

The building freeze has also stopped the university's land acquisition program in the north-west campus. The north-west campus, bounded by Bloor, Spadina, St. George, and Harbord, had been zoned for university expansion, but now the money to build there doesn't exist.

The university's general building fund is often used to make up the difference between capital costs and the project's allocation. The fund is derived from money for capital expenditures that is not earmarked for any specific building. It also gets money left over from completed projects.

The university is still hoping for at least partial MCU funding of University College phase III construction and of the athletic building. MCU has so far only approved $70.6 thousand for the design of U.C. phase III. The university wants $1.4 million.

The only new construction since the freeze is Innis College, financed by the general building fund.

The most expensive project this academic year is the $1.3 million alteration of the Sigmund Samuel Library. The renovation of the Science and medicine area is scheduled for completion during the Christmas-New Year period.

Plans for expanded residences at Scarborough and Erindale have been shelved for at least two years.

In this academic year the north-east campus steamline will be enlarged at Victoria College and extended to St. Michael's College. Steen Mechanical was low bidder on both sections at $82,601 and $135,560 respectively.

The extension to St. Michael's College is being installed through the basements of the Victoria College residence. A $10-thousand ventilation system has to be installed to prevent heat build-up during the summer. The completed steamline project is expected to cost $254 thousand, slightly less than the $257-thousand already allocated by the M.C.U.

The M.C.U. has approved $513 thousand for Woodsworth College's renovation. Twelve tenders were received for the renovation of St. George St. The lowest bidder, Dalton Engineering, excluded certain items in the contract and was thus invalid. The second lowest bidder, John Rae & Sons at $330,537, won the contract.

During the summer, the Hart House servery was re-equipped. It and adjoining offices had air-conditioning installed.

SAC assistant resigning soon

Don Boynton, SAC services and communication assistant, has resigned his full time position effective Tuesday. Claiming political squabbling has supplanted SAC's involvement in student social activities, Boynton said he was frustrated by the lack of support and guidance he received in the organization of this fall's orientation activities.

Hired in June, Boynton first worked under Services Commissioner Bill Denault who resigned in July because personal commitments had interfered with his ability to coordinate SAC's fall program. Following Denault's resignation, the SAC executive appointed Innis SAC representative Eddie Able as a temporary replacement.

According to SAC observers, Boynton was left alone and virtually unaided, to create a fall program for people he'd never met, on an unfamiliar campus, dealing with an unknown administration. He had no university contacts and no effective services committee machinery to take care of the host of details the orientation program entailed.

Frantic work made possible successful concerts by Myles and Lenny, and A Foot in Cold Water, and Stringband but other events, notably the SAC Pub, were dismal failures due to insufficient preparation.

Commenting on Boynton's resignation, SAC president Gord Barnes said, "I'm sorry that he's retiring and I felt he did an excellent job. I'm sorry we couldn't give him more support."

SAC hopes to be able to appoint a successor to Boynton Wednesday night. "We're interviewing tomorrow and Tuesday and we've had a number of applications," said Barnes.

SAC was only able to appoint an interim services commissioner, Barnes said, because the position must be approved by a SAC council meeting. The summer SAC meeting lacked quorum and was constitutionally unable to make an appointment, Barnes explained.

U of T prof sues housing ministry

By DAVID MACDONALD

A University of Toronto professor is suing the Ontario Ministry of Housing for "illegally approving" a Scarborough subdivision plan, which would create a "huge sprawling executive subdivision of much needed land", he claims.

Dr. Jeremy Carver, an assistant professor of medicine, claims the ministry acted illegally by rejecting his request for an Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) hearing on the Milliken program. According to Carver, the ministry must legally accept all requests for public OMB hearings, unless it is, "a delay tactic, trivial," or made by a non-resident of the municipality. If he wins his case, public hearings on the plan would proceed as soon as possible.

The plan calls for the development of 390 acres of land around Steeles Avenue and Middlefield Road. However the housing will not serve the "real needs of the people" according to Carver, since it will be "low density, expensive and appeal only to those in the top 20 per cent income bracket".

"These people will drive cars downtown adding to transportation problems," Carver explained. He added these houses would not be available to the average working resident of the area.

When asked to speculate on why his request was rejected Carver said "The ministry is hurrying to approve the plan to increase housing starts figures," and to "help their appearance in this area."

Carver also faulted the Municipality of Scarborough for "zero or little" planning with respect to housing needs in this particular area.

If he wins his case, public hearings on the plan would proceed as soon as possible.

SAC pub perishes and nobody mourns

The SAC Orientation Pub died a painful and lingering death late Saturday night but aside from a tired staff slowly storing away over sixty cases of unsold beer, there was nobody left to mourn.

As a part of this year's "frosh" activities, SAC attempted to run a series of pubs out of the Engineering Annex. The last one, a Saturday post-football game dance, failed to attract more than a handful of bored patrons who soon moved on to other diversions.

Three previous bars at the Annex had been forced to close before nine pm due to negligible turnouts. On Wednesday night only 200 bottles were sold at a net loss to SAC of over 100 dollars. With customers paying only 50c a brew, simple arithmetic reveals it took a dollar, either directly or indirectly from student coffers, to turn each beer over to its new owner.

A Patio Pub was originally slated to occupy a site next to the Lash Miller Chemistry Labs on Wilcocks Street, which was closed for dancing and sundry other festive events. When Liquor Licencing Board of Ontario regulations scrapped outdoor boozing, the bar found a temporary home in the University College Refectory before being vetoed by U.C. Principal Archie Hallet, who claimed the pub might distract from student scholastic priorities.

Demoted to a home in the Engineering Annex, the site of several pub disasters in recent years, the pub again proved itself incapable of operating on a sound basis.

The Annex, a nondescript brick building located on the periphery of the campus, was seen as an unattractive location to student drinkers. Given a location with all the charm of a Gotham City warehouse and a conspicuous lack of any promotion critics charged SAC had all the right ingredients for a guaranteed bust.

The only encouraging factor in the pub venture seems the efficiency and expertise Alex Malcolm and his aides at Simcoe Hall have put into the administration of the university canteen licence.

Police may force faulty death sentence decision

Four rather disturbing notes in the news over the past few months, have added a note of hysteria to what up until this point, has been rather a reasoned debate on the subject of capital punishment.

The first was a warning from Metro Police Chief Harold Adamson that Metro police would feel less reticent to use their guns in future if Parliament did not quickly reinstate the death penalty. A further note was added by the Toronto Star, quoting another police official who forecasted an increase in vigilante groups, who would presumably take the death penalty into their own hands. The number of offences liable for the penalty in this situation would, of course, be almost limitless.

On Saturday last, sandwiched among news of Patricia Hearst and the anti-bussing riots in Boston, the Star continued to publicize the sentiment of right-wing Canada by announcing that prison guards across Canada and the police in Montreal are quite concerned about the lack of guts in the penal system, the police to the point that they are threatening a walk-out the next time the federal cabinet commutes a death sentence. Presumably they are anticipating some action in the case of Rene Vallancourt, scheduled to hang Oct. 31 for the murder of Toronto policeman Leslie Maitland in 1973.

As difficult as it is to understand their reasoning about the effectiveness of the death penalty, it is not too difficult to see why police and prison guards reason that way. They do, on a daily level, put their lives on the line, and are fired of what they see as a total ineffectiveness of the courts. From there it is only a small step to a policeman saying "If this man is going to try to kill me, I'll take him with me, because the courts don't care." Thus we have the policeman feeling a little less guilty next time he pulls his gun.

The vigilante forecasting, on the other hand, was the flimsiest excuse for a reaction story that the Star has ever carried. In effect it was open legitimization for anyone disaffected enough from the system to load that shotgun in the closet and prepare for the coming of the criminal horde. And if they don't come, well then maybe it's time to go out and look for them. Certainly the Star doesn't encourage this sort of thing, but it nonetheless slakes their rather sensational thirst for 1984's news today.

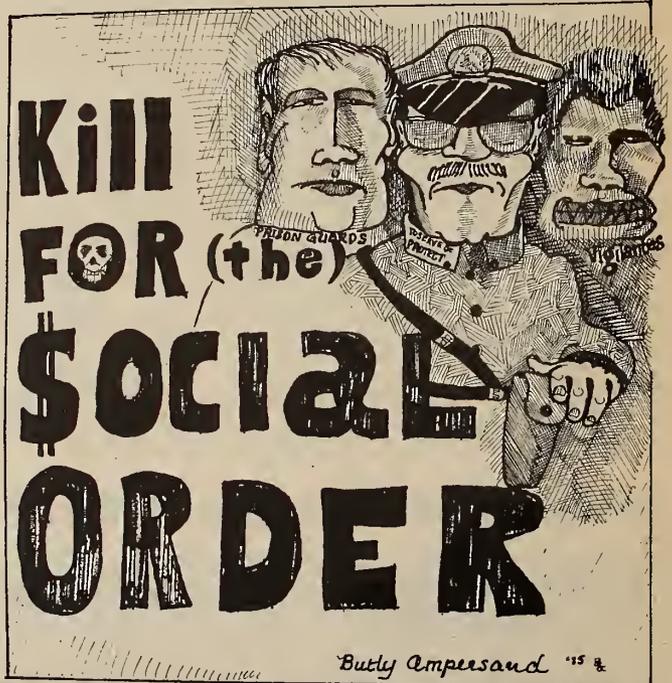

Obviously then there is vocal if not small sentiment for the reinstatement of the death penalty. But keep in mind that this sentiment is expressed most vocally by those closest to the criminals and with the most to lose. Political decisions aren't usually made or forced by people in this position, so if only for that reason the other side of the coin should be perused.

another indication that student groups are not taking a common sense attitude in dealing with the cutbacks issue.

It is well and good to oppose cutbacks on all fronts at the provincial level, but where we are dealing with administrative decisions, students should realize their priorities in education and refuse to support a group of people that are demanding a larger share of our educational dollar. By opposing a cutback in library staff we are ensuring cutbacks in teaching staff, increases in class sizes, and a reduction in programme innovations because the money must come from somewhere and reallocation is the administration's only avenue when they are already budgeting for a large deficit.

Judy Darcy and CUPE local 1230 must be told by the students of the U of T that they are more concerned with in-class deterioration than they are with a slight decrease in library services caused by unloading some of the less necessary staff members. I would hope that students would show this by not attending the rally October 7th that is designed to demonstrate the library workers' large base of support.

Michael E. Treacy
Engineering II

This other side poses only one question — the central one. Is the death penalty a deterrent to violent crime? Does a criminal think about the line between life in prison or no life at all when the decision is made to kill?

The answer is most likely "no". The two processes, the one of killing and that of logical thought for the consequences, don't seem to mesh. One requires a slight tinge of conscience in the middle of an unconscionable act.

The same Montreal policemen threatening a walkout have called for Justice Minister Otto Lang's resignation for his vaguely similar stance on the subject. Lang has said that he feels the state has the right to take human life, but that the actual taking of it is not a deterrent. What he is saying contradicts most reasoning in support of the death sentence. People who believe in it would probably admit that the only reason it should be there is as a deterrent. Now the Justice Minister is saying that there might be another reason for it, but goes no further. Certainly it can't be for the pleasure.

The government can and must resist the pressure from police and prison guards. The policemen are being paid to serve and protect and the lawmakers to make the laws. The question transcends any of capital punishment situation in which the policeman may feel caught — it is a lot more than a question of trying to overcome the gun or knife by threatening the rope.

Kanowitch blasted for info disclosure

To the Editor:
It was with regret and disappointment that I read of Mr. Kanowitch's predislosure of Governing Council Executive Committee decisions. He has dealt a major blow to the very important concept of trust amongst university governors and to the issue of student responsibility.

Mr. Kanowitch, a student member of this committee, violated the confidentiality rule claiming he was attempting to force a confrontation on the subject of secrecy in the university administration. While I agree that Executive Committee meetings should be open to all members of the university, I disagree categorically with Mr. Kanowitch's blatant disregard for Governing Council rules. These rules apply to all members of the council, is composed of administrators, government appointees, support staff, alumni, faculty and students. If students breach the rules of the council, they will soon be left in abeyance by members representing other constituencies and find themselves left out of the decision-making process. During the past few years U of T student organizations have spent thousands of dollars and countless hours of work in an earnest attempt to obtain student representation on tenure committees. To major arguments presented against student representation are that students lack professional expertise, rendering them incapable of judging if a faculty member should be given tenure, and that student confidentiality is unpredictable.

Allegations that students lack ability to judge professional competence can certainly be discredited. Mr. Kanowitch's unnecessary disclosure will make arguments that students are responsible and can be trusted with confidential information increasingly difficult to prove credible.

While I believe there is a time and place for 'confrontation politics', the timing and the issue is wrong for the University of Toronto.

Co-op member fights Ma Bell

To the Editor,
I suppose I should, choked by tears, be extolling Ma Bell's philanthropic concern for my welfare. Unfortunately undeniable doubts have been haunting me.

After listening with saintly forbearance to my insane impulse to have a pair of telephones installed in a Co-op house and having hastily conferred with her 'Director' (or paused to briefly continue some particularly troublesome crossword?) one of Ma's dauntless disciples reproached me with motherly solicitude. Surely I realized that I would be responsible for those inevitable calls to Brisbane and Murmansk that the irresponsible background in the house would surely place? Foolishly I retorted that the previous year I had undertaken a similar liability and rather than having lost my shirt realized a two-dollar profit.

However, the irreproachable cynic I am, I doubted Ma's selflessness and shamelessly pondered that perhaps Her insistence upon a private line in each room had been prompted more by interest in the seven dollar a line charge than in my financial security. Nonsense of course — isn't Ma Bell providing a public service and motivated solely by an uncompromising desire to serve the public's best interests? Still...

SAC rep urges no support for CUPE

To the Editor,
It was reported in last Wednesday's Varg that the "U of T library workers, CUPE local 1230, has joined supporters in forming a broadly based support committee of students, faculty and other campus workers" (Friday, September 12, 1975). The fact that students would belong to such a coalition appears as number was based on the prospects of attrition, but with almost all courses filled the attrition rate decreases as a student's options decrease. Thus in case-oriented courses where even the presence of 35 students is considered overcrowding, the possibility of receiving the best education seems minute.

The result is an increase in demand while the supply of courses is inflexible. Associated with this is the inflexible supply of lecturers, the result of two factors.

Priorities is the first — the university is either unable or unwilling to follow the shift in demand with a comparable increase in lecturers for commerce courses. Finances is the second — given that the university was willing to follow the shift, the availability of qualified staff given the present rates of pay is questionable. The university finds itself competing against industry with nowhere near the supply of resources.

Brian Galvin, commerce supervisor of studies puts it this way, "The well has about run dry for part-time lecturers." In addition, the discipline has "only 11 full-time staff serving more students than some universities." The calendar indicates that the figure may be 14.

Given the administrative problems of which overcrowding is just one, some part-time lecturers already teaching may continue to dry the well by leaving. In addition, full-time professors, who are course co-ordinators, are caught in between the reality of full sections and the individual student who may need special consideration. All of these are disappointed at having to turn students back.

The solution is not readily apparent to most students. Some in the faculty and among the student body feel that the answer lies in convincing the university and the provincial government of the need for more full- and part-time staff and the money to lure them away from industry.

Some feel that the source of the lobbying should be the Commerce Student Association. Although the CSA is not presently prepared to launch a campaign for smaller classes, they are hoping for an effective organization that will present the student opinion in support of the professors to the university administration and the provincial government.

Background: Evans' Memorandum causes fewer disagreements one year later

The three federated colleges — Trinity, Victoria and St. Michael's — have moved past their disagreements with university administration over reorganization of their teaching role.

One year ago there was considerable disagreement and confusion at all three locations as to the intent of U of T president John Evans' Memorandum of Understanding, a document that substantially changes the legal and historical scope of the colleges.

Dr. Evans' document was offering the colleges something that they have always wanted, a chance to keep more of their students on home ground by cross-appointing staff to teach what were before strictly university subjects (such as economics, anthropology, commerce and psychology) inside the colleges.

The change the colleges were required to make was substantial. They had to give up their right to appoint, promote or fire their own staff — certainly the thorniest issue of the entire package. Further compromises included giving up the regulation of course offerings.

Reaction was quick and stormy in the governing bodies of all three colleges. They had long enjoyed a special status, one that allowed them to teach duplicating programs in the "college subjects", (English, French, German, Classics and Religious Studies). At St. Michael's the hottest item was the dissolution of their rather eccentric philosophy department into a new university department. The hackles resulting from that action have not yet fully descended. Most of the controversy centered around the apparent differences between college and university hiring practices, with the colleges feeling that they were giving up their "ethos" by losing their right to appoint. They felt that within the separate communities there was more of an emphasis upon teaching as the primary function than was evidenced at the university.

Although the Memorandum was primarily an academic paper, the fiscal rationale behind it provides a look at the numerous problems in university financing. Financial restraints from the government, combined with the shift of student interest from the humanities to the sciences, necessitated for the colleges some sort of revitalization. Students spending more of their time across campus played havoc with the funding arrangements in the colleges, as well as slowly lessening the number of college students who spent all or part of their class time at the college location.

In future The Varsity will attempt to keep the university community informed about as many aspects as possible of this rather major shift in university organization.

Commerce students face decreasing options, crowding

By DAVID J. SHEEHAN

Commerce students on campus are finding overcrowding of their classes a problem of almost crisis proportions. Students who stood in long registration lines two weeks ago reached the front only to find virtually all sections of many commerce courses full.

There are 77 sections of commerce starting this fall on St. George campus. Of the 70 researched 51 (almost 73 per cent) were filled, with no new admissions allowed. Of the remaining 19 sections, nine are open-ended sections where only room fire restrictions or sheer inability to enter the room results in some sort of limit. A further seven are sections of one course (COM 221F) and only four are day sections.

Some of the individual courses have population problems that run from frustrating to frightening. Some fourth-year students could not gain admission to COM 421, an omission that would have left them short of their B.Com. requirement, but were finally admitted at the cost of dropping another valuable course, COM 328F. The latter is a course required for those headed to be chartered accountants, and all five sections are presently filled. Another quirk of this course is that even though it is a third-year course, some students have been mistakenly told that only fourth-year students were allowed to take it.

The backlog situation is bad this year but promises to be worse for students in the next two years. All sections of COM 100 are filled (55 students each) except for the night section designed for overflow that now contains approximately 200 students.

At St. George and Erindale campuses the number of students enrolled in introductory accounting will be somewhere between 1,800 and 2,000 students, an estimated increase of 100 to 300 students over last year. U of T's famous "machine" for producing accountants and businessmen has too many inputs for its output potential.

Although the more obvious problems detailed above are incurred at present by only a minority of commerce students, overcrowding affects virtually all commerce students.

Fifty-five students has been set as the arbitrary number for most commerce sections, even though professors have remarked on how dangerous it is to have 55 students in such case-oriented courses as finance, marketing, intermediate accounting or commercial law. The

Saucer Health Hazard

Flying saucers cause cancer and you don't even have to inhale, a prominent physicist insists.

The mysterious other-worldly vehicles utilize a form of atomic power that, when released into the earth's atmosphere, causes radiation 19 times more dangerous than smoking five packs of cigarettes a day.

And those are plain-end cigarettes too, not your wimpy filtertips," says Dr. Wolfgang Fliedermaus, a professor of physics at the Institute of Going-A-Bit-Red-In-Helsinki.

"Most flying objects are birds and insects and they, too, are unidentified whenever you don't know what they are."
"Bugs and birdies don't cause cancer unless you smoke them. But UFO's cause cancer no matter what you do."

Dr. Fliedermaus discovered cancer and flying saucers in early 1946. "I spent the next several months researching both phenomena, the disease and the saucers, and found a startling connection. Both cancer and the flying saucer appeared on earth in 1946."

"Think about it," he went on. "Did any of the dead people you know succumb to cancer before 1946? Probably they died of something like TB, beriberi, yaws, pellagra and the creeping crud."
It was a tantalizing theory, but Fliedermaus needed proof. "I had to catch me a UFO," he said. He admits his first efforts, consisting of fishing nets strung between pairs of tall trees, were crude.

"All I caught were insects and birds; flying saucers just dodged over the nets," he said. "And those fellows fly too damned fast to get a good shot with a gun. I calculate the saucers fly 2,400 miles per hour and you have to lead them about 94 miles. I never even winged one."
"I suspected that they might be radioactive," he explained. "Several researchers in the past had mimicked the symptoms of cancer by exposing laboratory mice to large doses of X-rays."

Though he believes the problem of cancer is now solved, Dr. Fliedermaus says he has plenty of work ahead of him. He has still to convince the powers that be to outlaw flying saucers.

"I've been getting the royal runaround. Immigration told me to come back when they were finished deporting illegal aliens from Vietnam."

Our only hope to escape the deadly scourge of cancer is that we might outlive the interplanetary visitors responsible for bringing it here, Dr. Fliedermaus said.

"After all, the white explorers who brought anthrax to the American Indians got VD in return, which can kill you just as dead."

"The spacemen right now may be infected with an earth disease they are unable to control. It's a slim hope, I'll admit. But it's all we've got until I can talk the government into banning flying saucers. We're in big trouble."

Dr. Fliedermaus is not willing to wait patiently for results, he threatened drastic action although, as he puts it, "nothing could possibly overshadow the horror of rampant flying objects."

GLORIA STEINEM Ms LED BY THE CIA

By GABRIELLE SCHANG
Reprinted from the Berkeley Barb

Canadian University Press
Gloria Steinem, founder and editor of Ms. magazine, and president of the Ms. Corporation, has an association spanning ten years with the CIA which she has misrepresented and covered up. To some people, particularly feminists, the relationship seemed obvious, if nebulous and difficult to verify. Others will probably remain incredulous until Time magazine finally acknowledges it. And then there will be people who don't perceive the implications of such a liaison and still more who simply shrug it off.

A group of women tied in with the origins of the modern women's liberation movement and concerned about its future, who call themselves the Redstockings have been able to piece together enough documentation to convincingly expose and describe the Ms-Steinem-CIA connection. Moreover the Redstockings have closely examined the financial backing and contents of Ms. magazine and have arrived at the conclusion that the ideology put forth by Ms. has been positively harmful to the women's movement.

In a sixteen page press release distributed on May 9, 1975 at the (MORE) Journalism Convention in New York City, the Redstockings identify themselves as the initiators of such concepts as "consciousness-raising" and the "Miss America Protest" during the 1960's.

These were some of the first women to speak out publicly about their own abortions. Despite criticism from conventional quarters, they urged women to take control of their own bodies, to get to know themselves and ignore the dictatorial status quo. The Redstockings also assert that they contributed, with relative anonymity, such slogans as "Sisterhood is Powerful" and "The Personal is Political". The coining of phrases like these launched the mass movement, in fact.

They are concerned because Ms. seems to be the voice of women's liberation, when in reality it has become a substitution for the movement itself. The Redstocking women point to a typical CIA intelligence technique they see operating here, the systematic creation and/or support for a "parallel" movement of organization which provides an alternative to real radicalism. They attempt to show how this subtle, yet mammoth manipulation of women by clandestine elements of the corporate structure transpired.

The first revelations of Gloria Steinem's relationship to the CIA appeared in the New York Times in 1967, in an article stating that Steinem has a part in launching a CIA front group which was called the Independent Research Service (IRS). Just prior to this exposure Ramparts magazine had disclosed that the organization was CIA funded. The purpose of the IRS seems to have been to subvert communist minded youths, on an international basis.

The supposedly Independent Research Service was in fact totally dependent on the CIA. It is believed to have been formed in response to the Communist World Youth Festivals, occurring throughout the 1950's and 1960's.

These festivals were held in the Communist countries until 1959, when the festival for that year was scheduled to take place in Vienna, neutral territory during the Cold War. The U.S. State Department did its best to discourage American youths from attending. Some did go, though, and in the meantime, the CIA covertly arranged for the IRS to organize an anti-communist delegation to attend and disrupt the festivals.

In 1967, Ramparts exposed the intricate laundering and funneling process by which the IRS obtained money from the CIA. The funds passed through five different foundations (The Borden Trust, The Price Fund, The Beacon Fund, The Edsel Fund, and The Kentfield Fund) on its way to the IRS, as well as the National Students' Association and other groups.

The final channeling was accomplished through the well-known Boston law firm of Hale and Dorr. This same firm produced Joseph Welch as attorney for the U.S. Army in its confrontation with Joseph McCarthy, and more recently, James St. Clair as Nixon's chief counsel during the Watergate scandal.

Mystery Book

No one claims to know why Gloria Steinem was chosen to 'found' and direct this group, but two early organizers of the IRS stated in a New Republic article of May 11, 1959, that "most of the sponsors have had considerable experience in domestic and international youth and student affairs." What in Steinem's past prepared her for this work?

It is a matter of public record that Gloria M. Steinem graduated from Smith College and then received the Chester Bowles Asian Fellowship to the Universities of New Delhi and Calcutta, India, in 1956-58. All the Redstockings could glean of her activities in India is the alleged publication of a book in 1957, called The Thousand Indias.

Although the recent edition of Who's Who in America lists the title of the book, all attempts by Redstockings to find it in the past or current listings of the Cumulative Book Index of the New York Public Library, Books in Print, and the Library of Congress were unsuccessful. The very existence of Steinem's book cannot be determined, let alone its contents or the identity of the publisher.

According to the recent Redstocking press release, in a February 21, 1967 interview in the New York Times, Steinem was described as a "full-time Independent Research Service employee in Cambridge, Mass., from 1959, until after the Helsinki Youth Festival in 1962." Under media pressure, Steinem could not disavow her CIA association but she gave a distorted view of her activities at the festivals. Steinem claims all the group did at the two festivals was establish a newspaper, news bureau, cultural exhibits, and jazz clubs.

The group's most important work, she said, was convincing youths from Asia, Africa, and Latin America that there were some Americans who understood, and cared about their situation. Steinem emphasized, "I was never asked to report on other Americans or assess foreign nationals I met."

The Redstockings charge that this statement is an alarming lie. In a "Report on the Vienna Youth Festival," printed with Steinem's name on it as Director of the IRS, there are 13 pages devoted exclusively to biographies, political affiliations, and even some superficial analysis of persons from 11 countries participating in the festival.

Youths were monitored in much the same way at the 1962 World Youth Festival in Helsinki. In addition to the news and cultural events put on by the IRS, the Helsinki Festival was marked by four nights of "spontaneous" rioting against the festival, during which 40 people were arrested. It was reported by Newsweek, in August, 1962, that "Pravda, of course, blamed the disturbance on well-financed CIA and FBI agents . . . Secret Agent

This is Gloria Steinem's background from the late 1950's and early '60's. She functioned as a secret representative of the American government abroad. At least she was representing certain American interests, and her activities in the IRS involved her inextricably with the U.S. domestic political intelligence network. Another fact extorted by the Redstockings, is the group's publication of a pamphlet in 1959, called "A Review of Negro Segregation in the United States." Steinem's name is listed on the inside cover, this time as co-director of the IRS.

The pamphlet focuses on the supposed advances made by black people in the U.S. For example, "Beyond the noisy clamor of those who would obstruct justice and fair play, no alert observer can be unaware of the concentrated effort to rule out segregation from every aspect of American life".

The reason some discrimination still does occur, according to the research group, is because "it is also self-perpetuating, in that the rejected group, through continued deprivation, is hardened in the very short comings, real or imaginary, that are given as the reasons for the discrimination in the first place."

In other words, the oppression of black people continues, not because of white ruling class interests, but because black people actually have become inferior.

The Redstocking analysis equates this denial of black oppression with Ms. magazine's rationalization to explain the prolonged subjugation of women. Both blacks and women have supposedly become apathetic and deficient.

By 1967, the IRS was declared "largely inactive" by the New York Times. Steinem, however, was still a Director in September 1968 when Ramparts broke another story. This time they disclosed that the CIA had plans of their own for another World Youth Festival to be held in Sophia, Bulgaria. A scandal involving some confidential letters implicating the CIA, which found their way into print before the festival, had the effect of curtailing the CIA's plans for youth in Sophia.

It was during the following year, 1969-70, that Gloria Steinem first began publicly identifying herself with the women's movement. Around this same time, Redstocking researchers noted, there was a change in the biographical information listed about Steinem in Who's Who. Reportedly, Who's Who sends data sheets to their subjects, requesting them to furnish the details.

The 1968-69 edition was the first issue ever mentioning Steinem, and at that time she was listed as "Director, educational foundation, Independent Research Service, Cambridge, Mass., NYC, 1959-62, now member Board of Directors, Washington."

By the 1970 edition of Who's Who, this entry was shortened to "Director Educational foundation, 1959-60." No mention of her position in Washington on the Board of Directors appears, and she abbreviated her term of employment with the IRS to one year. The censored version appears in successive versions of Who's Who.

There does seem to be an attempt, on Steinem's part to mislead Ms. readers and conceal parts of her past. For instance, her bio-blurb in the June 1973 Ms. is even vaguer: "Gloria Steinem has been a freelance writer all her professional life. Ms. magazine is her first full-time salaried job."

Then there is Gloria Steinem's mysteriously swift rise to national prominence so soon after the 1967 exposures. It is a common complaint among ex-CIA agents that past involvement in the agency often impedes their ability to find other forms of employment. This was not the case with Steinem. Again, according to the Redstockings:

"Her career skyrocketed after the 1967 exposures. Much of the credit for this must go to Clay Felker, publisher of New York magazine. Recently in the news for his acquisition of the Village Voice, Felker immediately fired its two remaining founders from their jobs as publisher and editor.

"Felker was Steinem's editor at Esquire, where her first free-lance pieces were published. He hired her as a contributing editor to New York magazine in 1968, and booked publicity spots for her on radio and TV talk shows. Felker put up the money for the preview issue of Ms. in January 1972, a large part of which appeared as a supplement to the 1971 year end issue of New York magazine.

"In effect, it was Felker who made Steinem famous by giving her a platform from which to establish her women's liberation credentials. These facts are all part of the published record. What has not been widely known up to this time are the earlier political roots of the Steinem Felker collaboration. Felker was with Steinem at the Helsinki Youth Festival, editing the English language newspaper, put out by the CIA-financed delegation."

In addition to Steinem's initial boost from Clay Felker, the Redstockings were able to determine to other major sources of funds for the then fledgling Ms. magazine. One resource was Katherine Graham, owner and publisher of the Washington Post, and Newsweek. She bought $20,000 worth of stock before the first issue of Ms. was ever published. According to perfect Ms. "ideology", Graham was recently featured on the magazine's cover, depicted by the headline as "The Most Powerful Women in America." (10 74).

It should be noted in conjunction to this fact, that Newsweek became the most enthusiastic mass circulation magazine promoting the IRS, and later Gloria Steinem as an individual. (See early article of 5.10.65, and cover story of 8.16.71.)

The second major money source for Ms. was Warner

Communications, Inc. They purchased $1 million worth of Ms. Stock, after the preview issue appeared. Warner's allegedly put up nearly all the money and only took 25 per cent of the actual stock holdings. Even the Ms. editors admitted that this was a trifle odd: "We are especially impressed that they took the unusual position of becoming a major investor, but a minority stockholder; thus providing all the money without demanding the decision vote in return." (Ms. Reader, p. 226)

Warner communications is a mammoth operation, now owning Warner Brothers movies and records besides having large holdings in cable TV, publishing, building maintenance and construction, parking lots, and other companies. What was their vested interest in women's liberation which inspired them to make such an unlikely business deal with Ms.? Well, Warner is also the owner of National Periodical Publications, which publishes the Wonder Woman comic books.

Wonder Woman

Warner bought the Ms. stock in May 1972. In July 1972, the first regular issue of Ms. appeared on the stands, featuring a cover story on Wonder Woman. Wonder Woman as a feminist hero, no less. The truth is that Wonder Woman was an army intelligence officer, working "for America, the last citadel of democracy, and equal rights for women." The Ms. story also announced that Wonder Woman comics, which had been on the wane since the 1940's, would be reborn in 1973 with a woman editor.

Next January's issue of Ms. told readers that the magazine would soon publish a book on Wonder Woman: "it is the first Ms. book. (In fact we hadn't planned one so soon; it just grew out of readers queries about how to find these comics...)"

This exemplifies the fraudulent relationship Ms. has with its readers. It seems obvious, once the facts of financing are known, that the commercial interests and politics are coinciding in the Ms. empire.

The 1973 version of Wonder Woman was to be more pacifistic, in adherence to the general line pushed by Ms. In both her old and new model, Wonder Woman's guiding incentive is "patriotism"—a stance protective of American ruling class interests.

The promotion of this comic strip heroine is also an indication of the anti-people attitude of liberal feminists who ignore or actually denigrate the real achievements of down-to-earth women. The Redstocking investigators point out that this practice "leads to an individualist line that denies the need for a mass movement, and implies that when women don't make it, it's their own fault."

The elitist line is actually one of Ms.' biggest selling points in attracting advertisers. In order to get ads, Ms. has sold out the ordinary woman. From a Ms. ad in the New York Times of March 19, 1974: "... a standard market survey shows the Ms. audience of 1,400,000 as having the best educations, living in higher income households, holding more managerial-professional jobs than any other woman's magazine readers, and 54 per cent of them are between 18 and 34."

The ad policies of Ms. are an equally important indicator of the magazine's financial and political backing, especially in view of extreme selectivity regarding which ads they will accept. This stance makes any ad they chose amount to an endorsement.

Blatantly sexist ads are most often rejected, along with ads for cosmetic and fashion products. However, Ms. seems to have no moral problem accepting public relations and job recruitment ads for large corporations. ITT is one of the most regular advertisers in Ms., along with non-product ads from Ortho pharmaceuticals, Exxon Oil, Chemical Bank, Bell Telephone, Singer Aerospace, Shearson-Hamill stockbrokers, Gulf and Western oil, and Merrill Lynch stockbrokers.

In their special "Human Development" section each month, Ms. runs a series of advertisements for careers in companies like these. A letter in September, 1973, from Amy Swerdlow of Women Strike for Peace, questioned what the recruiting of women for ITT had in common with Human Development. "Let's have a Ms. story on all ITT activities around the world. Then let the reader decide what talented women will find at ITT headquarters," she submitted.

Ms. editors replied that in light of all the unemployed women, and women on welfare, they could not be too selective about job ads. As if welfare mothers are all headed towards ITT careers. There is much controversy over whether Ms. magazine is a commercial or political enterprise. Elements of both seem to exist, as ingredients of the Ms. ideological package.

"Under media pressure Steinem could not disavow her CIA association."

Rape warning to men

Recently, in a television appearance, Pat Carbine, now publisher of Ms., and formerly editor of McCall's in 1971 when that magazine named Gloria Steinem "Woman of the Year," declared that the women's movement was currently in "Phase Two." Radicals were necessary for getting things started, she conceded, but the moderates were now in control.

The Redstockings women feel "to the extent that this is true it represents the decision of the American establishment — the people in a position to choose who gets access to the press and air waves, who gets hired to the token women's jobs, who gets funding for their projects."

According to the data researched by the Redstockings, Ms. owes its existence to a higher rank of corporate America. "Phase Two" of the women's movement, as described by Pat Carbine, and exemplified by Ms. magazine, seeks to cover up the historic connection between feminism and radicalism. In order to avoid the latter, it must distort the former beyond all recognition. Why is it that Ms. publishes no articles on forced childbearing and its economic function in society, for example, but does tell you how to bring up your kids with its "Stories for Free Children"?

Why is more space devoted to "etiquette for humans" and "Populist Mechanics" than to a root analysis of women's unpaid and or exploited labor, which, as Susan B. Anthony reminded us, has been the society's wheels turning for centuries? What is the political function of Ms.'s popular image as the magazine for the liberated woman? The very reason for the resurgence of the modern women's liberation movement, after all, was the realization that emancipation was a myth, and women were not liberated.

The Redstockings say they realize what raising these issues will do within the women's movement. They feel strongly that the time has come to necessarily draw some lines, as long as there appear to be two divergent forces at work in the name of the women's liberation movement. It cannot be overlooked that women really need a revolution in their lives and it should not be forgotten that it is the CIA's job to prevent revolutions.

The Redstockings think it is time to renege the radical ideas and leadership which marked the growth of the modern women's liberation movement. All the trappings of the radical upsurge remain, but the content and style have been watered down.

The data published in the Redstockings press release will soon appear as part of a 160 page theoretical journal called Feminist Revolution. In it these women, who term themselves activists and originators of the women's movement, will analyze the movement's successes and errors, and propose a new offensive.

Meanwhile, the Ms. empire proliferates with information and resources gathered in the name of women's liberation. This process of information collecting is especially dangerous when put together with the fact that Gloria Steinem and cronies like Felker have a traceable history in intelligence gathering for the U.S. government. What does Ms. do with all the data it has collected over the course of years pertaining to the lives of many sincere radicals and women innocent of the Steinem CIA connection?

Intelligence
Approached from an ideological perspective, it may not seem to matter whether Steinem has kept up her association with the CIA while she is editor of Ms. magazine, and president of the Ms. Corporation. Both the CIA and Ms. can be viewed as beholden to the same power elite, whether they are working separately or together.

The Redstockings assert that on another level it is crucial that this question be cleared up: "A great deal of information flows into the Ms. offices constantly. The Gazette, a regular feature of news of the women's movement, requests that the readers send in stories about their own and other women's activities."

"Incidents have come to our attention of women who were asked to write overviews for Ms. on various aspects of the women's movement. These articles were submitted, but were drastically cut or never published — although lots of issue space was filled up with reprints from books already having mass distribution. Ms. has the names of individuals and groups mentioned in this data rich material. The rest of us don't, with the result that we are left isolated and in the dark."

Another Ms. related group now under scrutiny, called the Women's Action Alliance (WAA), was founded by Steinem in 1971. Its office is located in the same building as Ms. according to Redstocking research, despite its name, the WAA is not involved in action. They simply concentrate on intelligence gathering. "Although it described itself in a 1974 concentrate on intelligence gathering. 'Although it described itself in a 1974 mailing as 'impoverished' it had already received a $20,000 grant from the Rockefeller Family Fund for the establishment of a 'national clearinghouse' information and referral service, on the women's movement. Contacts to be used for this project, according to the Foundation Grants Index for that year, included access to key women leaders, information files assembled by outside sources, and a close working relationship with Ms. magazine."

Since that time there have been many more grants for the 'impoverished' WAA, from Carnegie Corporation: $51,000; Sachedi Fund: $23,000; Carol Buttenwieser (Leob) Foundation: $5,000; Arca Foundation: $12,000; Chase Manhattan Bank Foundation (Rockefeller): $5,000.

As the Redstocking expose points out, it is essential that people with access to this kind of information be trustworthy. The information gathered should, of course, be used to further the objectives of the women's movement.

Gloria Steinem's history of information gathering for the CIA and her apparent expertise in this area of domestic intelligence would seem to disqualify her from her current role as the walking logo of the women's movement. The fact that she has never disavowed her connection to the CIA, although she has misrepresented her past actions as an agency employee, imply that she is still covering up and therefore she has not earned the trust her position requires.

Steinem, with her vehicle Ms. magazine, has undertaken the job of rewriting the story of the women's movement. Ms. magazine represents the movement now, as if nothing else had existed before it. Why real feminist pioneers cannot be ignored, Ms. has a way of undercutting their accomplishments.

The Redstocking report points to a bizarre statement by the Ms. editors to introduce an interview with Simone de Beauvoir. Ms. stated that the author of the Second Sex, whose monumental exposure of white male supremacy laid the groundwork for the modern, organized movement, was about to join the movement at that time. This issue appeared in July 1972, with the headline: "New Feminist: Simone de Beauvoir."

Also published by Ms. is something called "A guide to Consciousness Raising." Kathie Sarachild, a Redstocking who says she thought of the idea, was never consulted or mentioned, and her definition of the term was altered in the process. The Ms. people now present themselves as consciousness raising experts to their considerate audience. It is easy to see how they can pull off such a sham, from their financial standpoint.

It is less simple to know what can be done about this co-optation of the authentic women's movement, which began in radical and militant fashion. Attacks from corporate America marked the emergence of a strong mass movement. Most frequently, it was declared that such attacks were alienating women, turning them off. Despite opposition, a mass movement was under way.

I am changing. There is no more guilt over passing up the man hitchhiker. Now it's a matter of, "not on your life, you mother fucker." And the anger is mounting as the rapes and murders and beatings keep on, and as the "little" beasts grow, like lifestyle alterations. Like hearing my sisters complain, "I can't go out at night. I don't have a car." It's not laziness that keeps them from walking. My knowing the jeers and stares I get — even in my car, if I'm on certain streets and neighbourhoods at night (my own neighbourhood). And there's my own fears in my gut each time I'm on foot and alone and there's no one around to help if I should be attacked. Outraged that I cannot react at all, am helpless to the sneers of men. Making them mad could cost me my life. Then there's things to read, like about Inez Garcia and Jo Anne Little. I lost count of the women murdered in Seattle. And there's things to hear like more, and more of my friends saying things like, "sure I was raped once."

I want to tell all men — look, just how involved are you? Do you really care if rapes continue on as they are (that is, so long as it doesn't happen to your wife or your daughter, your possessions)?

WHAT ARE YOU DOING, those of you who are not raping women? What are you doing is letting women deal with it, worry about it, die from it.

The myth about rape has been destroyed by the facts. One ironic plus coming out of recent increases in rape: A very small percentage of women are raped by psychopathic crazy men; the majority are raped by men that function just fine in our society.

LISTEN TO MY WARNING. This is going to build up folks; pressure on women is getting heavier and heavier and heavier. As the pain increases, anger increases. I don't really know how the anger will be released, but be assured, it will be released. Anger is one of the best motivators of action there is; it produces powerful positive action whether they be positive and productive or negative and destructive.

Could a man ever feel the same anger and pain as I do about rape? Maybe not, but a man can feel the responsibility at maybe even feel a little bit of pain over their own sexism and over, if not themselves, the men they have known who have raped women. Maybe just a tiny tinge of pain over their willingness to let continue and even support other men's and their own degrading treatment of women.

I am writing this as an outlet for my anger, I never expect men to do this. I don't expect rapes to stop. I read in a magazine a quote from a woman, Susan Griffin, "the same men and power structure who victimize women are engaged in the act of raping Vietnam, Black people and the very earth we live on. . . . No simple reforms can eliminate rape."

I firmly believe that rape is at the core, the extreme, the violent acting out of the sickness there is in this society, a by-product of sexism, first cousin of racism war, etc. It's all deadly. I feel the men in this society who have determined all there is to determine, both those men that rape women and those who don't are all, every one, responsible for rape.

Those men who are the least concerned the least involved are guess who — the people who have the most in common with those who commit violence to women. This is hard to believe, but some men don't even see certain rapes as a crime at all.

I have to be responsible for guarding my life on the streets and my sanity as well against crimes committed by members of one half of the population, of a society ruled and dominated by men, the attackers, my enemy.

And at the same time I have to control my anger, living in this society with men who feel no responsibility at all, see no connections, have "nothing to do with anyone who would rape a woman."

CIA moves in on Steinem

(CUP) — The past is catching up with Ms Magazine editor Gloria Steinem, who has been accused by radical feminists this past summer with subverting the women's movement.

The charges stem from complaints of radical feminists that the "soft" feminist content of Ms Magazine is counterproductive to the movement, and that it creates the false impression that the women's movement and radical politics are separable.

But most importantly, the charges have to do with Steinem herself, and her past involvement with the Central Intelligence Agency.

A radical feminist group called Redstockings released a report last May detailing Steinem's activities with the Independent Research Service (IRS) in the late 50's and early 60's.

IRS, the Redstockings pointed out, was a CIA front group funded to disrupt and monitor activities at the Communist World Youth Festivals, and Steinem was its full-time Director.

Steinem did not deny the charge that the CIA funded her group, but responded at first by claiming she saw nothing wrong, and by calling the accusation that she was subverting the movement ridiculous.

She said the CIA did not tell her group what to do, and that she did not make reports on who attended or what went on at the Youth Festivals.

But the Redstockings came into possession of a 13-page report by Steinem written after one of the Festivals which detailed the names of participants, political affiliations and other political intelligence about those who attended.

Steinem's attempt at ignoring the charges failed, and the issue came to a head in August when a women's conference at Sagaris, Vermont dissolved into factions over whether to accept funding from the Ms Foundation, as planned by the organizers, without an adequate rebuttal from Steinem.

Steinem sent a letter to the conference explaining her case, and admitted it for the first time that accepting the CIA funding "was a mistake." But she also attempted to take an offensive move by accusing her attackers of engaging in a "McCarthyite attempt" to discredit her.

Not everyone was impressed with Steinem's rebuttal. In fact, a third of the women then withdrew from the Sagaris conference and held an alternate meeting nearby.

Betty Freiden, a Steinem ally turned antagonist, was one of them. "By dismissing the Redstocking charges as McCarthyism," she said "I don't think she (Steinem) shows respect for the women's movement. She doesn't answer the charges sufficiently and it's dangerous to dismiss real evidence of infiltration."

Real evidence of infiltration is what some of the women at the Sagaris meeting said they found at the conference itself. Two or three women who were passing back and forth between the pro and anti-Steinem factions were accused of spreading misinformation, causing confusion, and generally acting as "agents provocateurs". They denied working for the government or any agency.

Steinem herself did not attend the conference, and stayed at her post at Ms Magazine where a rift over the Redstocking charges has reportedly deepened.

Sports: Strong Women - Easier Births

By ROBERT GRUETHER

Reprinted from Urban Reader

In sport, as in many other sectors of this society, Canadian women do not receive the same treatment as men. In the Vancouver region, for instance, a recent survey compared participation figures for males and females who used the area's playing fields in organized programs. This comparison revealed that the proportion, or improporion of boys and men to girls and women was nearly 83 to 1. At the provincial level, statistics taken from the Member Association Reports to the Annual (1974) Meeting of the British Columbia Sports Federation, although omitting information on volleyball and basketball, and providing no breakdown by sex on lawn tennis (11,700 participants) and inter-school athletics (72,217 participants), indicate that male participants outnumber females by nearly 8 to 1.

This imbalance of men to women in sport is not limited to participation alone, but is present in sports education, administration, coaching, research, and commercial sport. In fact, this scarcity of women influences the participatory aspect of sport, and makes it difficult, if not impossible, to create programmes that would attract mass participation by girls and women. If women are to take initiative in creating sports programs, they should be in decision-making positions and they should be receiving training that will qualify them for such positions in the future. What is the situation, then? How many women are teaching and how many are being trained?

A recent survey taken in the western provinces indicated that few women in physical education are in decision-making positions. In Canada in 1974, approximately 25 per cent of university physical education faculty were women. Only 2.4 per cent of the positions higher than professor in these departments were held by women. In all thirty-one Canadian schools that had co-educational departments, the co-educational head was male. Drawing on the enrolment figures from nineteen Canadian universities, H. R. Nixon of the University of Saskatchewan found in 1972 that women comprised 43 per cent of the physical education undergraduates, but that the percentage of women in Master's programs dropped to 23.5 per cent — a figure similar to the percentage of women faculty in physical education departments.

Outside the university, in other areas of sport administration, recreation, and physical education, women generally have little authority.

For example, in Saskatchewan, as Pat Jackson reported to the National Conference on Women and Sport "... of the fifty-three sport governing bodies associated with Sask Sport, only nine groups have women as presidents. And of these nine, only two have specific interests in both male and female programmes."

She goes on to say that in the 35 National Sports Governing Bodies in Ottawa, there are only five women holding positions such as executive-director, or executive-secretary.

The picture in coaching, which frequently provides on-the-job training for administrative positions, is no more encouraging. Opportunities for women to coach are limited in the first place by the fact that male teams are almost always coached by men, while female teams are coached by both men and women. In the second place, the percentage of women coaches tends to decrease as the level of competition increases. Thus, by the time we reach the international level of competition, we find that since 1960 Canada has had 9 women coaches, and 175 men coaches.

Women athletes, however, are faced not only by a situation where there are few women administering programmes and few women coaching, but also by a lack of information — or misinformation — concerning their physiology. Although numerous myths about women's abilities or inabilities concerning sport abound, only a small percentage of sport research is devoted to studying women.

For this reason information is frequently sketchy or completely lacking, as is the case with the effects of long-range conditioning programmes on women, or the physical capabilities of older women, to mention only two such gaps in our knowledge.

In professional sports the opportunities for women athletes and coaches are even more limited. Without getting into a discussion of women's physiology, we can state that women have been excluded from the opportunity to participate in many sports that have been successfully commercialized — like hockey and football — because it has been believed that they were physiologically not suited for such activity.

As Bruce Kidd, of the University of Toronto, stated in a report to the National Conference on Women and Sport, "The influence of commercial sport in Canada upon all other forms of sport, including sport for women, as transmitted through the mass media has generally been very great — and very harmful. The needs of profit and publicity maximization have led to playing conditions that make the pursuit of excellence and the maximization of playing opportunities all but impossible. In addition, many of the commercial league place a premium on male-oriented physical violence, as example which dissuades not only women but men from active participation in sport."

While the media increase the impact of professional sport, a recent study of TV sports found that women receive less than one per cent of all coverage and that this coverage frequently portrays women athletes negatively. As Glinda Sutherland recently wrote in Kinesis, "... there is often an emphasis upon her 'feminine' qualities, and her physical appearance rather than upon the excellence of her performance. Indeed, one sports writer compared the fast-moving action of a women's volleyball team to 'tigresses in heat'."

To put this another way, sport in our society is defined and portrayed as what men do. Sport is most often seen as the kinds of activities men engage in, and how men play them. This often means emphasizing violent and aggressive behaviour, which certainly discourages women as well as many men, from mass participation. As a result of this situation, to quote the National Conference on Women and Sport again "... much of the published material concerning women's sport makes irrelevant comparisons between the performance of the women athlete and that of her male counterpart. Rarely does this information recognize that women's sport is unique, and that women deserve equal access, opportunities, and respect for their accomplishments."

But it isn't just that sports are viewed from a male perspective. The other half of the situation is that sports and athletic endeavor are considered unfeminine or unladylike. Women are discouraged from taking part in sports in an active way.

Dr. Esther Greenglass of the York University Department of Psychology stated in an address to the National Conference on Women and Sport: "... a women's socialization is directed toward encouraging her not to develop her own potential or individuality, but rather to live through others ...

"For girls in adolescence, the establishment of successful interpersonal relationships becomes the most important self-defining, achieving task ... What happens then is that qualities such as independence, aggression, and competitive achievement, all the things that might conceivably threaten a success in heterosexual relationships, are largely given up ...

"Girls and women who are motivated to achieve in athletic or intellectual tasks are defying social conventions by engaging in what is considered to be unfeminine, competitively aggressive behaviour. "In the area of sport, we have been told by the experts that athletics can be physically bad for women and that competition may masculinize their appearance. The literature is replete with statements like, "There is no need for women to play football, or box, or wrestle. Black eyes, swollen noses, and cauliflower ears don't do much harm, but are certainly unfeminine."

Are athletics necessarily harmful to women? Scientific data do not support the view that it is possible for women to indulge in a sport which is too strenuous for them. There are those who suggest that women's ability to reproduce is at stake, but research suggests that the uterus is one of the most shock resistant of all internal organs — it has to be. Furthermore, the external genitalia of females are less exposed than that much exalted symbol of male virility, and could easily be protected from injury. In fact from other research, it has been found that athletic participation may actually result in easier delivery.

It is no surprise then, that little positive encouragement is offered the female athlete, or that, subsequently, the aspiring female athlete has few models to emulate. Unfortunately this lack of encouragement and paucity of models inhibits women and girls from participating in physical activity or sports, and thereby creating self-confidence in, and respect for their bodies.

Not only are women frequently denied the exploration of an entire realm of experience, but their health suffers as a result of inactivity.

As Dr. D. A. Bailey states in an article on exercise, fitness, and physical education, "... it is clear that exercise is of benefit in terms of controlling high risk factors associated with sedentary living, such as overeating, mental stress, high blood pressure, etc. The importance of physical activity in terms of preventive medicine and positive health is clear."

It is also clear that the average Canadian woman does not get enough physical exercise and as a result is in poor physical condition. A 1974 study on Canadian cardio-respiratory fitness indicates that Canadian women were unfit relative to Swedish norms. When compared to the less rigorous fitness categories established by the American Heart Association, 47 per cent of the women were below the average category. (Canadian men need't congratulate themselves. They were in only slightly better condition: 40 per cent of them were below the average fitness category).

Surprisingly, the two are groups of women who were tested with the worst fitness levels were the youngest: 47 per cent of the fifteen to nineteen group were below average, 54 per cent of the twenty to twenty-nine group were below average.

An alarming aspect of this study, for both men and women, is the fact that 28 per cent of the number of people contacted to participate in the study were excluded from the test for medical reasons. Since they are not included in the test results, this tends to indicate that fitness levels might be even lower than presented by the report.

Another interesting point revealed by the study was that "women also have a limited perception of their own level of physical fitness. We asked each subject to rate his or her fitness as below average, average or above average and compared these ratings with the corresponding predictions of aerobic power ... the twenty per cent of the women who thought they were of above-average fitness had the lowest group mean aerobic power."

This report, however, does not leave the reader entirely without hope. Its authors believe that Canadians can improve their cardio-respiratory fitness by engaging in programs of physical exercise. Certainly then women should be encouraged to participate in sports for the sake of their health. Such participation might give women a better sense of their own physical fitness level, and perhaps in addition will help attack the stereotype of the passive, weak woman.

It is necessary for children as well to get a certain minimum of physical activity. To quote from Bailey's paper cited above: "On the basis of what has been done we know that physical activity for our children is important for the support of normal growth and also it seems it may be important over the long run in terms of mature capacity, and consequently may have a direct bearing on adult health problems."

Yet, as we have seen, girls, especially at adolescence, are discouraged from participating in sport. In addition, as Bailey points out, Canadian schools allocate less time for physical education than almost any "civilized" country in the world, with the resultant "alarming increase in postural defects" and obesity. Bailey also cites experiments in other countries which show that students who receive more time for physical education mature more quickly, are more independent, and have better health. Their motor development is better and is better balanced, their "tools of intelligence" are much keener, they perform better academically, and they are less susceptible to stress than their counterparts who received less extensive time allotments for physical education.

It should be apparent by now that something is wrong with our priorities in regards to sport. The commercialization of sport has helped to develop a society of spectators rather than active participants. On top of this, sexual stereotyping has further denied many girls and women opportunities to participate in athletics.

Certainly a change in the present state of affairs is long overdue. Women must be placed in decision-making positions where they can develop programmes for girls and women programmes that will encourage mass participation, that will help girls and women to achieve their own level of excellence, that will give special attention to the less skilled, and not exploit the talented, that will teach skills that can be used throughout a woman's life, and that will give women back control of their bodies.

ORIENTATION?

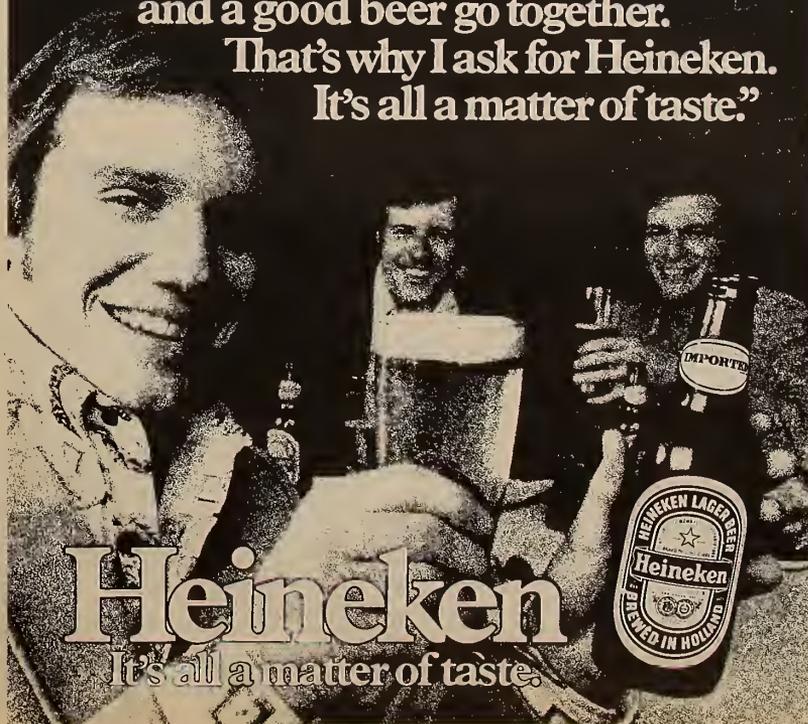

Word has been filtering through about the paucity of fun for frosh at Orientation events, especially those organized by SAC.

The Varsity is somewhat isolated from such happenings or non-happenings and would like to know what's going on.

If you have an opinion to voice, an axe to grind, an event to celebrate, or news of impending doom, feel free to drop on up to the second floor of the "SAC media building" at 91 St. George.

Nice people with space to fill.

University sitting on babies

Tight for space, toddlers accept responsibilities! Perhaps election results will change daycare priorities.

By DARYL PIPA

If any U. of T. students or faculty members are parents of children needing daycare supervision, they won't be able to use the Margaret Fletcher Daycare Centre. There's no more room.

According to Nora Lupton, head of the seven-member staff working at the university founded centre, the house is presently holding a capacity of 48 children and even has a waiting list extending to September 1977.

It is probable not all of the children on the waiting list will be placed in the centre by 1977 if the building retains its present capacity.

Lupton said no plans are being made to expand the centre to accommodate more children, and said she had received few complaints despite the limited daycare facilities on campus.

The centre is presently housed in a renovated carriage house on Devonshire Place, which was formerly used for university storage and is divided into six crowded rooms, though U of T owns an empty garage situated directly below the second floor centre.

"Expansion depends upon the attitude of the university," Lupton remarked.

The Devonshire Daycare centre, a student co-op venture which was the result from a three year occupation of the building by determined students and parents, stands immediately to the north of the Fletcher centre.

The university recently, if reluctantly surrendered ownership of the house, though it had been standing heated and empty for a year prior to its occupation. It is presently undergoing renovations financed by a $100,000 Ontario government grant.

26 children are now enrolled in the co-op daycare centre supervised by a staff of four full-time workers. Parents using it do not have to be students or U of T workers but only members of the community. The co-op is a non-profit organization in which the parents pay only the bare costs of supervising and feeding their children while attending the daycare centre, although eligible parents can also apply to the Metro Board for subsidies.

Until the house renovations are completed, hopefully by the end of October or the beginning of November, the children are being tended in a room at Eastdale Secondary School. When finished, the co-op centre will be licensed to accommodate thirty kids, while a new budget is presently being worked out by the government to subsidize six full-time daycare workers instead of the present four.

Karen Light, an active parent and ardent organizer of the co-op admitted it has been a long fight for the centre and added, "There is still a need for more money for daycare and more concern for daycare."

On the daycare situation at U of T, Light stressed, "The need for good daycare is horrendous!" Light said those currently involved in campus daycare have spent five exhausting years working for both the Margaret Fletcher and the student co-op centres and that they are just "too tired" to fight for another. Yet she added, they are hoping that their community members and other concerned people and parents at U of T will keep up the battle for proper and adequate daycare facilities.

Violence and Democracy

By MIKE EDWARDS

Teamster-inspired violence in California vineyards in the past month precipitated the beating of a UAW organizer from Hamilton. George Steplac, a 60-year-old organizer for the United Auto Workers was part of a Canadian delegation touring California in mid-August as part of the UAW's continued support of the United Farmworker (UFW) call for a boycott of California grapes and lettuce.

According to reports from UFW boycott organizers here in Toronto, the violence is part of a last ditch effort by growers and members of the Western Conference of Teamsters to sway the worker's voting against representation by the UFW.

The UFW has been forced to consider a boycott of the election in the entire Delano area because of the danger of escalating violence. They have petitioned the governor for a call up of the National Guard to protect the rights of an estimated 25,000 workers in the Delano area. Even local police have felt the Teamster wrath.

Most of the workers are Chicanos, of Mexican-American ancestry, and have been subjected to decades of economic exploitation by growers, immigration officials and recently the Teamsters, anxious to retain influence in the agricultural industry.

In other areas in California, UFW organizers are generally pleased with developments. There are a great number of shut-outs in elections, which started September 4 under brand new legislation protecting such elections.

However, until the situation is such that UFW picked grapes and lettuce are available, the boycott is still on. The struggle for chicanos based union has been going on for at least ten years, the growers are not going to give in easily.

Cash for CLAC

A Campus Legal Assistance Centre (CLAC) request for funds to upgrade their present facilities was deferred Friday, at a meeting of the Committee on Accommodations and Facilities (CAF).

CLAC made the request for renovation funds in order to better utilize space and hopes to both improve capacity and an atmosphere which they say is at present somewhat archaic and un conducive to good communication between client and counsellor.

The committee has deferred the request, originally for about $10,000, until the U of T Physical Plant can assess the cost of the required renovations.

At CLAC, the 70 odd students are volunteers. The review council is paid jointly by the Department of Justice and the U of T Faculty of Law. The Attorney-General's Office paid 19 students during the summer. SAC contributed $10,000 last year, and the GSU $750. The office is rent free from the university.

Legal Assistance 928-6447

By DAVE FOLKES

Admit it, you are in trouble. The time could be now, or sometime in the future, but when the scales of justice threaten the balance of your life, you better know who can help you. The law students at the Campus Legal Assistance Centre (CLAC) say they can, and at no direct cost.

Just what can they do, and how good are they at doing it? After all, it's your problem, so it's serious. You owe it to yourself to find out.

Basically, the student workers at CLAC can give you advice. They are legally allowed to represent you in Small Claims Court (under $400), Family Courts, and Provincial Courts. They can represent you in criminal courts involving highway traffic offenses such as careless driving and more serious charges, and summary conviction offenses. They may also represent you before administrative tribunals, such as Workmen's Compensation, Welfare, and Unemployment Insurance.

A large number of cases the students deal with involved Academic Appeals, student loans, and immigration.

Landlord-tenant disputes also make up a high proportion of cases.

The Student Legal Aid Society (SLAS) of the U of T Faculty of Law, which runs CLAC, has a full-time professional lawyer, Dick Gathercole, as well as two other lawyers who come in two afternoons a week, and an articling student. Collectively they form a Review Council that supervises student-run cases at the various Student Legal Aid Society clinics, of which CLAC is the largest.

Gathercole handles cases in courts higher than Provincial such as Supreme Courts and Courts of Appeal. In general, Gathercole will only take on special cases or cases handled by students that have taken on a more serious light. Otherwise if the students cannot take on a certain case, the client is referred to outside help, such as the Ontario Legal Aid Plan, or a lawyer. In other words, if they can't help you, they know who can.

There are approximately 160 U of T law students at the various SLAS clinics, 70 alone at CLAC, each of whom may be handling as many as five cases. Can the Review Council, about the equivalent of two full-time lawyers, keep an adequate eye on all these cases?

Gathercole definitely feels more supervisory staff is needed, on about a one lawyer to 30 law student ratio, rather than the one to eighty that it is now.

However, "we at least ensure that the types of things that students might do out of ignorance... won't happen."

In any case, Gathercole feels that the calibre of law student is very high, if only due to the high admission standards, and that on the whole, the students are very serious about their task, and equally concerned as we are that a good job is being done.

The students' expertise often equals or perhaps exceeds that of actual lawyers, according to John Laskin, co-chairman of the SLAS. His reasoning is that most lawyers will not bother with minor cases such as the centre handles, and as Kathy Laird, chairman of CLAC, puts it, the students are more "scared" than lawyers, and try harder when representing cases in court.

Asking claims that the centre has been remarkably successful with academic cases, such as Academic Appeals, often reversing decisions previously made. Those who have been shafted for a credit, take heed!

How important a function are CLAC and the other legal aid clinics performing? Everyone we spoke to agreed unanimously that they are performing an essential service.

"In Ontario, we have one of the least comprehensive legal aid plans... organizations like ours have to try to fill a huge gap," says Gathercole.

"I feel very strongly that the legal profession in Ontario has not lived up to its responsibility to give adequate legal protection to the people that need it."

Certainly people do seem to need it. The clinics are overworked, and they have to handle cases on a priority basis. Individuals vs. institutions, for example collection agencies, landlord-tenant disputes, academic cases, are given high priority. Cases of individuals against individuals such as with car accidents, are often handled on an advisory level, as representation might tip the scales too much the other way. After all, justice for all, regardless of income or social class, is their ultimate aim.

ENGLAND (CUP ENS) — Government scientists in England are battling against what they term a plague of Himalayan porcupines which are ravishing the forests. The porkies are descendants of a pair that escaped from a zoo five years ago.

TUCSON (CUP EN) — The scientist in charge of a committee studying pollution from spray cans has called for an immediate halt to sales of all aerosol sprays.

Dr. Donald Hunted of the Kitt Peak National Observatory was speaking at a news conference in Tucson. He has been named to head a national Academy of Sciences committee studying the effects of aerosol propellants on the atmosphere.

Recent studies have indicated that fluorocarbon propellants have been breaking down the earth's protective ozone layer. The ozone shields the earth from excess ultra-violet rays. Scientists fear that the reduction in ozone may be accompanied by an increase in skin cancer.

According to Dr. Hunted, half of the world's annual production of fluorocarbons — half-a-million tons — is produced in the U.S. Dr. Hunted said he was speaking on behalf of himself, and not the committee. "The best opinion is that a problem is on the way," said Dr. Hunted.

International Caffeine Drug Trade

Looking deeper in a cup of coffee

By ALAN FOSSEN (CUP)

The 70's will definitely be looked upon as an important turning point in the relationship between imperialism and the underdeveloped world. No longer willing to see their resources ripped off at low prices just to perpetuate the profits of corporations, producers of primary commodities are linking together in order to obtain more revenue and more stable income. Coffee is just one of these commodities.

It is second in value only to petroleum among primary commodities traded internationally. In value it accounts for over 13 per cent of all primary commodity exports and represents 1.2 per cent of total international trade.

International trade in coffee worth $2.3 billion (1968) is generated by 42 coffee-growing countries. All of them are underdeveloped and many rely on coffee sales as their major source of foreign currency earnings. Across the world 20 million people are employed in nurturing the coffee crop and many more are dependent on it

Now the coffee producing and exporting nations are attempting to form an organization similar to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC).

The United States, promoting the interests of the giant coffee corporations (U.S. buys 40 per cent of the world coffee production) has done a great deal to try and sabotage any tendency on the part of the coffee producing nations to form what Kissinger describes as another "cartel" which will "gang up on the developed world."

If we cut through the glaze and veneer of the stories put forward by Kissinger and the media we can analyze the role that this very important commodity has played in perpetuating underdevelopment, in order to amass great fortunes for the owners of the coffee companies. We also can see that the underdeveloped world now is only trying to redress the imbalances in world trade, incomes, and standards of living brought about by capitalism and imperialism.

Coffee as Cash
Coffee is the lifeblood in foreign exchange earnings for many countries. Colombia, for example, relies on coffee for nearly 68 per cent of all its exports and five of the other leading Latin American producers obtain more than 30 per cent of their overseas earnings from coffee sales. In Africa, half of Angola's export trade is accounted for by coffee, while in Uganda the percentage is around 44 per cent and in the Ivory Coast over 30 per cent.

That the countries of Africa and Latin America are so dependent on the export of one commodity for their foreign exchange is a direct result of imperialism.

Much of the most fertile land in the underdeveloped world has been taken to be used for the growing of export crops such as coffee, sugar, tea, tobacco and bananas. Throughout the centuries great areas of land have been made infertile by careless growing of these crops. Huge plantations owned by a small local landowning class or directly in partnership with foreign food firms have "locked-in" the fertile lands for the growing of cash crops for the developed world.

The most abhorrent aspect of the plantation economy is that it restricts severely the amount of arable land available for the growing of food for the millions of peasants, the very ones who, working on the plantations, face continuous hunger, malnutrition and often starvation.

Int'l Coffee Agreement

From 1962 to 1972, trade in coffee was controlled by the International Coffee Agreement (ICA). Its purpose was to prevent massive over-production. To this end it fixed export quotas for each of the producing countries. These were reviewed and amended annually by producing and consuming countries together. In principle their effect was to stabilize the prices of all grades of coffee.

This agreement was unfair to the producing nations, as the consuming nations had just as much or more to say about the price of coffee and the amounts to be sold every year. As a delegate from the Ivory Coast put it in 1970, "No one seems to put limits on what we have to pay for manufactured goods from industrialized countries."

The U.S. led the way for the consuming nations in the development of this agreement and did everything they could to try and increase the quotas from the producing nations and thereby reduce the price per bag that the corporations had to pay. But what we as consumers had to pay was something else. The highest the market would bear was and still is the principle here.

In 1972, the ICA broke down primarily because the producing nations felt it was no longer in their interest to maintain such an agreement. The fact that OPEC was started that year gave impetus to forming an independent producers group.

Cafe Mundial Co-op

In Sept. of 1973, Brazil, Colombia and the Ivory Coast, the three biggest producers of coffee (56 per cent of world production) set up a multinational coffee marketing corporation called Cafe Mundial. The purpose of the corporation was to compete with other buyers (i.e., the developed nations) of coffee, purchasing coffee when prices are cheap and then selling coffee when prices are up.

Led by Brazil, Cafe Mundial policies to sustain coffee prices took action. They consolidated cooperation among the 42 coffee producing countries of the world in an effort to decrease exports and encourage the coffee producing countries to increase imports of coffee.

This agreement only lasted for shortly over a year because many of the producing nations were unhappy with Brazil's dominance of the organization and the small quotas allocated to them.

In January of this year coffee producing countries of Latin America met in Mexico City and launched an organization whose first task was to withhold 30 per cent of the crop, about 18 million bags, in an effort to raise the price. Backed by an $80 million pledge from Venezuela, the organization was hailed as the most progressive and important step that had ever been taken by coffee producing nations. Just last month in London, the old 62 members of the ICA met in an attempt to hammer out some sort of agreement and the Brazil delegate described the agreement reached as the "atomic bomb of the coffee trade". Just what the exact details of this agreement are have not yet been spelled out.

In the consuming nations as might well be expected, the processing, sale and profits of coffee are all controlled by large corporations. An exchange in New York deals in coffee futures. Brokers buy and sell coffee from anywhere between a month and a year ahead making what are called "green coffee contracts". The future market in all commodities does not add any real value to a commodity, but only provides a way of making more money for the wealthy by speculating on the value of commodities in the future.

We now pay jacked up prices for coffee that the corporations bought cheaply in the past year. For them, new prices provide windfall profits.

General Foods is the largest coffee producer in North America, controlling over 38 per cent of the coffee sold. (This is the same General Foods that is paying their White Spot employees in Vancouver peanuts.) Its brands include Maxwell House, Sanka, Maxim, and Yuban. The second largest producer on the continent is Standard Brands which sells Chase and Sanborn. These two companies, along with a few others, dominate the coffee market.

Laurier running back tries to go over the top . . .

. . . But Blues defender has things in hand and stops him short.

Blues Beat Laurier Again

Wilfred Laurier head coach Dave Knight says that by the fourth game of the season his team should not be making any mistakes. Unfortunately for him his Golden Hawks were still making costly errors in Saturday's second game on their schedule and they contributed to the U of T Varsity Blues second victory over them in as many weeks.

The Blues swept their home-and-home set with the Hawks coming from behind to defeat them 21-17 before 8,000 fans in Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate football action at Varsity Stadium.

In the first meeting between the two teams in kitchener last week Knight pointed out four miscues on the part of his players which cost them the game. This time around there were two but they were no less expensive to his team.

Both occurred on third down and short yardage situations deep in Blues territory and both involved "audible" calls by quarterback Gord Taylor.

On the first, early in the third quarter with the Blues holding a slim 10-9 lead, Taylor called a play at the line to which none of his three backs reacted to. Left holding the ball he was quickly smothered by Varsity linebacker John Martini for a three-yard loss.

Knight explained that the centre's snap arrived too quickly on the play. "Our first string centre, Ed Dietrich, got hurt early in the game and his replacement, Doug Bestard, got a little excited . . ." said Knight.

The Hawks did manage to score a go-ahead touchdown two series later. Fullback Scott Campbell slammed over from a yard out after Rick Chalupka set up the score with a 60-yard run up the middle.

A pass interference call on the Blues gave Laurier a two-point convert and a 17-10 lead. Early in the fourth quarter they threatened to lengthen that margin when they marched from midfield to the Varsity 19. On third and two, Taylor once again called the play at the line but tight end Mike Warbick failed to pick it up. Consequently the man he supposed to take out of the play, Martini, quickly corralled Campbell and with help from Nick Grittani and Wayne Cohen stopped the Laurier fullback for no gain.

That proved to be the inspirational play for the offensive unit which had sputtered since the early second quarter. Five plays later Steve Ince beat linebacker Mike Murphy deep and took a Dave Langley pass over the shoulder for a 71-yard touchdown. Mike Sokovnin's convert tied the match at 17-17.

A rough play infraction by the Hawks late in the fourth quarter prolonged another Varsity single off a 35-yard field goal attempt. He also added his second three-pointer of the game to seal the victory with 30 seconds left on the clock.

"We were better today than we were last week," said Knight, "but so were they."

The Varsity — Brian Pei, Bob White

Western sent back beaten

The season opener is an important game. It often is an indicator of a team's relative chance of success.

Judging by the Varsity Blues soccer team's impressive four to one victory over the University of Western Ontario on Saturday, it can be said that this year's team is off to a flying start.

The final score is certainly encouraging for coach Bob Nicol but far more pleasing is the style of soccer the team displayed. It was constructive, continuous and attractive. The backline defenders played as a coherent, unyielding unit. The midfielders distributed the ball intelligently, and the forwards took their chances well. The buildup was sometimes one-sided and slow but will improve as the season progresses.

In the scoring department, Pat

Pitters put Toronto ahead with barely three minutes gone in the first half by tapping in a well-timed pass from Vince Zerrullo. Vince Zerrullo made it two to nothing ten minutes later, slamming a fifteen-yard shot past the goalie into the left-hand corner.

The Blues increased their lead to three at the twenty-three minute mark, capitalizing on an indirect free kick and some sloppy clearing by Western's defence. Greg Pinheiro tucked away Mike Hendrick's rebounding shot. Western's only salvation in their disastrous first-half was a goal scored on a penalty shot which the Varsity goalkeeper, Drew McDougall, very nearly stopped. Jeff Crewe sewed up the victory for Toronto with a well taken penalty shot in the second half.

There are certainly errors to be ironed out but the team has good reason to be confident going into Wednesday's game against York.

Weekend Rugby

The Rugby Blues got off to a slow start this weekend with a double-loss to Guelph. Both the firsts and the seconds lost to the experience of the Guelph squads which are both basically comprised of the players who carried them as the OAAA playoff champions last year.

The first team lost a one-sided affair but nevertheless displayed much potential and hope for the future. This season the team has only four veterans returning and this is shaping up as a building year. "We have lots of potential but we lack much needed experience . . ." explains head coach Ron Brown, " . . . we hope to gain experience by playing lots of exhibition games against good clubs." Well the team will gain some experience on Wed. Sept. 24 at 8:00 p.m. at Varsity Stadium as they play an exhibition contest against a high calibre Scottish University team now touring the university circuit. The game should be a good display of rugby and should attract lots of spectators as the admission is free.

Consequently the Golden Hawks did mount a good deal of offence as their yardage went up from 183 last week to almost 400 yards Saturday. Of that total 345 was along the ground, most of that split between Chuck McMann and Chalupka. The former rushed for 148 yards, mostly inside, while latter picked up 137 yards, much of them off option pitches.

However, the Blues, with an aerial attack of 223 yards totalled over 440 yards on offence. Langley hit his receivers on nine of 14 passes and both touchdowns came via the air. The first was an 11-yard strike to flanker Brent Eley in the second quarter which put the Blues ahead 10-3.

The Hawks managed to get on the scoreboard first as they drove 61 yards from the opening kickoff to set up Mike Karpow's 26-yard field goal. The Blues evened the score late in the first quarter on a 37-yard kick by Sokovnin for three points.

A Langley fumble on the Blues' 39 set up the first Laurier major score. The Hawks took seven plays before McMann went in on a six-yard off tackle blast. Karpow's placement was wide leaving the Blues ahead 10-9 at half-time.

CAPSULE COMMENTS — Libert Castillo was the top Varsity rusher with 102 yards . . . tailback Mark Bragagnolo, making his debut, gained 60 yards on 14 carries . . . Estaban Andryjowicz had the best average with 81 yards in eight attempts . . . Ince caught three passes for a total of 127 yards . . . Eley took in four for 36 . . . John Trimm making his first appearance in a starting role caught two for 43 yards . . . Taylor was good on seven of 14 for 74 yards . . . Pollock's knee injury could sideline him for the rest of the season however Giordani is expected to be back in the lineup for next week's meeting with Queen's Golden Gaels . . .

Negotiations break down

By BOB COLLIER
Negotiations have broken off between library workers and the university administration.

The contract dispute, centered around job security and wage demands, must now be solved by a government mediator. Failing this, a strike of over 400 library technicians could take place by late October.

John Parker, U of T's labour-management negotiator, said "Negotiations have reached an impasse" in a press release yesterday. He was unavailable for comment.

Library worker Judy Darcy, president of the library workers' union (CUPE 1230) claimed, "It is impossible to negotiate with Parker unless he makes a concrete offer." "He is clearly stalling," she added.

In the press release, Parker described negotiations with the library union as "extremely difficult." He claimed the union submitted "over 60 proposals on the last day" before the previous contract expired last June.

Darcy replied Parker had had adequate time to study their proposals and reach a decision. "Parker took a month's vacation after we gave him the proposed contract," said Darcy, "and since then we have met him eight times in 45 days."

"It was Parker who broke off for two weeks in September," she added.

The library workers' demands for guaranteed job security are "a major obstacle" in the negotiations, said Parker.

He claimed the workers' economic demands "even less realistic" than their rejection of layoffs.

"The total cost of the union's economic demands are close to $2.5 million," he calculated.

This figure was angrily denied by Darcy, after a Monday meeting of the Library Support Committee. She said Parker's mathematics included "many phony costs which the university never intends to pay."

She added, "These figures are fabricated to be used as propaganda against us."

University calculations are based on statements that the library union wants an average annual increase of $4,900 plus a $1,500 cash settlement for each of the 430 unionized workers.

The library rebuttal, written by negotiating committee member Tom Bribresco, charges Parker's estimates are grossly inflated. Bribresco said the union only wants an average increase of $3,200, not the $4,900 that Parker has publicized.

The $1,500 cash settlement for each employee is equally ridiculous, said Bribresco. The union only wants that amount for library workers who have been on the job for at least two years, he said. "If the person has only worked for six months, we don't think he should get more than one-quarter of this amount," Bribresco explained.

Darcy guessed that Parker included various extraneous costs in his budget.

"If we want a two-hour unpaid lunch-period once a month for a union meeting, Parker adds up the cost of hiring replacement staff," she said.

Progress has been extremely slow even in the contract clauses that have been negotiated over the last three months.

The university has offered paid maternity leave to female employees who have been on the job for a year, but this is not acceptable to the union. The largely female staff want maternity rights as soon as they move on to permanent staff, usually at the end of three months.

In addition, the union feels they have been offered a reduction from present health benefits, because the university's latest offer refuses to provide sick pay until the fourth day of illness.

Robarts moves closer to an enforced shutdown as negotiations break down.

Library staff closer to strike

The library Support Committee moved several steps forward at a Monday meeting in its preparations for a strike for job security and a fair wage.

More than 50 campus staff and students have already joined the newly formed Committee which is organizing the fight for the demands of library workers.

Unless Simcoe Hall and the library union come to an agreement before the end of October, a strike could incapacitate Robarts, Sci-Med and Sigmund Samuel libraries plus the departmental libraries in engineering, pharmacy and hygiene.

At the meeting an enthusiastic group voted to hold a campus-wide lunch-hour rally on October 7 to win support for their cause. Posters, leaflets, buttons and T-shirts have already been prepared for distribution during the coming weeks.

The work-load has been distributed among three different sub-committees. One group is in charge of raising a strike fund to pay the living expenses of workers during a lengthy strike and another is preparing a massive publicity campaign.

Among their projects is the distribution of fill-in coupons endorsing the library worker's campaign. Committee members hope that hundreds of faculty, students and staff will sign these and mail them to the union.

The library workers are demanding increased job security and a wage equal to that of an average Ontario employee, about $11,000.

Management plans to eliminate 75 jobs this winter have angered library employees, said Judy Darcy, president of the library union, because it would necessitate further cutbacks in services and increased workloads for remaining employees.

Library demands that one worker do the work of two has already resulted in confusion and inferior services, said Darcy.

Artistic Woodwork fights to decertify union

By ERIC McMILLAN
The Ontario Labour Relations Board is a "thieves' kitchen for company lawyers" and should be "cleaned up from top to bottom," say union officials fighting decertification of their union at Artistic Woodwork Co. Ltd.

The charge came in response to a Board order for a decertification vote, following a petition signed by 80 of the 120 employees at Artistic.

R. Kent Rowley, President of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU), claimed the petition was company-inspired. He charged many of those who signed the petition, including landed immigrants, were pressured into signing.

"The foreman pulls them over for a little chat about their landed immigrant status and he doesn't mention the union but they get the message," Rowley said.

Two of the men circulating the petition, he charged, were strike-breakers during the strike at Artistic two years ago. He claimed they were allowed to collect signatures for the petition on company time.

Unless the Board agrees to reopen hearings for new evidence, Rowley said, the strike-breakers backed by the company will have their way in decertifying the union.

The Board's refusal to accept additional evidence, was cited by Rowley as an example of how the Board acts as "an absolute obstacle to organizing in Ontario."

"The Board has become a joke," he said. "Our union is trying to organize poor immigrant workers, but the Davis government is following policies of supplying employers with cheap labour."

He pointed out the three-member Board dealing with decertification consists of George Ferguson, counsel against the CTCU in the 1971 Texpack dispute, H. Simon, "who has spent a lifetime working for American unions," and J.E.C. Robinson, a Board management representative. "That's three votes against us," Rowley said.

When the CTCU questioned the objectivity of the Board, the three members retired to consider the point, then declared themselves impartial, according to Rowley.

Throughout July and August, the Board heard arguments for an against a decertification vote.

On September 11 the union met with company representatives to protest the company's use of two former strike-breakers during the hearings.

On September 12 union organizer Laurell Ritchie, personally delivered to the Board a letter protesting the strike-breakers' testimony.

The Board's decision in favour of a decertification vote was released September 15 but was post-dated the Artistic Woodwork's management are risking a return to the violence of 1973 by attempts to decertify the union.

10th. Ritchie claimed this was "a very unusual practice" and said she suspects the Board simply wished to avoid the issue of strike-breakers.

Rowley partially attributed the Conservatives' poor showing in working class areas in the recent provincial election to the government's attitude towards labour.

"Our throats are being cut all down the line by these various Davis boards," he said.

He called on the government to "clean up" the Ontario Labour Relations Board and said, "It's not any use to amend the law if the Labour Relations Board does not follow the law as it presently exists."

He also asked the government to institute changes to prevent the continued exploitation of immigrant labour.

Conflicting facts confuse local election horror story

By ELLIOTT MILSTEIN

Conflicting reports are circulating about irregularities in last Thursday's provincial election, most concerning enumeration and election procedures in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding.

John Bennett, SAC Executive Assistant, has recounted several instances of students who tried to transfer their vote from their parents' riding to St. A&P. These are students who were enumerated during the regular period, August 20-23, but moved to downtown campus in September. On Sept. 16, at 8 p.m. Bennett presented himself at the election office with four students. According to Bennett, Singer refused to transfer their votes because she was instructing class of Deputy Returning Officers in election-day procedures. They were told to return the next day only to find that she had "arbitrarily chosen a 12-noon deadline".

Roderick Lewis, the Chief Returning Officer for the province, backed up her decision. Bennett says his group included a woman who tried to re-enumerate three times and ended up "in tears." Singer, he claims, "refused to enumerate one woman because she was returning her parents' home in St. Catharines next summer."

Ross Wells, SAC External Commissioner, supplied more details about the original enumerations of each college in the St. A&P riding, specifically Trinity, New and UC.

SAC claimed Singer refused to accept lists from University and New Colleges, and said she promised to send enumerators to the campus. According to SAC, an argument then ensued involving SAC, Singer and various deans as to where the enumerators should operate.

New College Dean of Women Ms. A. Taylor said she and Singer decided to set up a table in the residences against the wishes of SAC president Gord Barnes, who she claimed wished to have enumerators go from door to door in residences. Barnes later denied this. Enumerators were subsequently installed in residences at New College and Devonshire and Hart House.

Unfortunately it was a futile exercise. Most of the students who showed up for enumeration were already enumerated at their parents' place of residence and needed deputized Revising Officers, who were not at the tables, to register.

Wells said he asked for Revising Officers to be sent, and was refused by Singer. After sending a letter to Ontario Chief Returning Officer Roderick Lewis, Wells said he was given a reply that students who return to their parents' place of residence in the summer are not eligible to vote in St. Andrew-St. Patrick. Wells said he responded that the place where an individual spends the majority of time is their riding, and remained at odds with Lewis.

According to Wells, when 17 students accompanied by a SAC lawyer arrived at the returning office on Sept. 17 before the enumeration deadline, Singer re-enumerated some of them. However when the lawyer left, Wells said, Singer asked those students remaining for their home address. If they did not give a Toronto residence, they were refused enumeration, said Wells. Wells said students used to filling out university forms always use their parents address as a permanent address.

At various polls, according to Wells, some citizens not on the voters' list were allowed to vote after a quick phone call to the riding office. An estimated total of 1,000 students living on campus were not enumerated.

Singer denial

Singer, who first contacted about the charges, refused to talk to the Varsity, which, she claimed, had misquoted her in the past. She added she had "heard enough from students." Upon being granted an interview, the Varsity found her on the whole cooperative with information on what she terms "the roughest riding in Ontario."

Singer denied practically all the charges laid against her by SAC and NDP workers. She maintains that all students were asked their permanent address, and if the reply was "Toronto" and proof was given, they were granted the right to transfer their enumeration from their home riding. She did not suddenly start to ask this as soon as the NDP lawyer left the office.

She claimed that most of the students came to the riding office for proxies to vote at their parents' address and not to change their enumeration. "They didn't even want to vote here," she said. She complained many of the students who arrived on August 17 had not been enumerated at all and were applying long after the end of enumeration on Sept. 10.

However, section 29 of the Election Act provides for those who could have been enumerated in another riding, but who moved before the election. Therefore those students who came to the office before the deadline on the 17th were seeking a legitimate procedure. Nonetheless, according to Ms.

Singer, if the students could prove a legitimate change of address, they were not turned away.

Responding to the charge of an "arbitrary deadline" on the 17th Singer claims after consultation with both Roderick Lewis and SAC president Gord Barnes, the deadline had been set. Barnes denied the conversations took place.

As for the tear-stricken woman who appeared three times, Singer said "no one came here three times."

The most serious complaint about the enumeration procedures was that she accepted a list from Trinity, but not from New or UC Singer countered, "I do not accept lists from deans" and said it must have been an enumerator. Once the people were enumerated, even if it was done in this manner, she could not de-list them. She added the whole thing was a mistake which she was not willing to make again, she said.

All voters should have had enumeration slips with them which we would check against our list, said Singer.

In answer to accusations there was not a concerted effort to enumerate students, she pointed out there was an extra sixteen day period at the end of August and early September to reach the residents that were missed.

When asked why tables were not set up during registration, as was done at McMaster, she answered it was not asking students a lot to go to Hart House, or, if they missed it, to come to the riding office, like everybody else.

The central issue in this long debate is why the government chooses to call the parents' home a permanent residence rather than a student residence where the student spends 8 months out of the year.

Singer claims the Election Act decrees that, in her words, "permanent residence is the place to which a person habitually returns."

When asked what she would do if the Election Act were changed to define permanent residence as the place where a person spends the greatest portion of his time, she said she would follow it, but she considered it unfair.

Liberals upset over Scar counts

By JASON WRIGHT

As a result of alleged voting irregularities in Thursday's provincial election, Scarborough East Liberal candidate John Coates has made a request for a final addition.

Coates said he was given figures on Thursday night indicating he had received 8,169 votes to 18,734 votes cast for re-elected Conservative candidate Margaret Birch.

The next day, Coates said, he was told a computer error had been made and a new count showed a revised tally of 12,598 for Birch and 9,212 for himself indicating a 6,000 vote drop in Birch's total.

On Saturday, Coates said, he was given new figures showing he received 8,608 votes to Birches 12,645 and was told by district returning officer Shirley Painter that the third count was official.

NDP candidate Anne Marie Hill said she had not been notified of the change in the vote count, although she said the Liberals had. "There certainly has been things going on that have dissatisfied us on a number of counts," Hill said, adding the NDP had not been informed of events on several occasions.

Hill said she was told by Ontario Chief Returning Officer Roderick Lewis to take her complaint to the firm responsible for the election tabulation.

When asked about changes in the vote total, Lewis said "I know of no such change," and termed returns on Thursday night as "media counts."

Coates said he had complained to Lewis but found him "not very cooperative", and said Lewis told him he would be laughed at if he requested a recount with the existing margin of votes between him and Birch.

Coates stressed he was not in doubt about the outcome of the election and was not asking for a recount, but said he was requesting a final addition.

Papers asking for a final addition, Coates said, were being sent to a county court judge yesterday, who could call for a recount at his discretion.

A delay in getting the returns and the enormous discrepancy in the figures, said Coates, "leaves us with a sort of residual doubt."

Coates said in the official results of returns provided by returning officer Painter, there appeared to be mathematical errors. There are six columns of figures on the official returns form, one each for unmarked ballots and spoiled ballots and one each for Birch, Hill, Coates and Libertarian candidate Robert Tothill. According to Coates, the total of the columns does not match the figure given for total votes cast.

Defending the official count, Painter said, "Nothing on the sheet has to balance", and claimed the columns' total are not necessarily supposed to yield a total votes figure.

Painter called the original 6,000 vote discrepancy "an adding machine error" and said only the third set of returns were released as official.

Input Radio decision comes from SAC at first meeting

By PAUL McGRATH

Input Radio's future will be decided tonight. The proposed campus-community FM station will be given thumbs up or down at SAC's first General Council meeting of the new year.

Tonight's decision follows a summer of preparation and philosophizing at Input about the nature of the radio station. Last March SAC set up a new board of directors of the station whose job was to determine the station's goals. SAC promised $70,000 towards capital costs and $50,000 towards operating costs if the summer's work proved viable.

The Board's three major areas of research over the summer were financing, programming and community involvement. The financing formula calls for a total of $175,000 in the next year for operating costs. If all goes well, SAC will provide $50,000, and donations another $50,000. Subscriptions, advertising and other grants will make up the remainder. Within five years, the operating budget will be a projected $405,000.

According to station manager Richard Lafferty, response from community groups interested in becoming contributors has been substantial. He mentioned tenant and environmental groups as tops on the list. Their role will be to contribute programming on community issues with the university community first in mind as an audience.

The station refused to tip its hand of programming cards until the January CRTC hearings that will decide on the FM license for the station. The release of such information, according to Lafferty, would jeopardize the originality of the proposal. The competition for the few available spots on the FM dial is fierce.

Input does however provide SAC with a breakdown of weekly programming without naming names. Of 119 hours, 49 hours will be musical, 30 hours newsy, and 22 hours each for university, community and entertainment programming. As well, the university and community will contribute 8 hours each for programming intended "to promote communication between the two."

The Board has agreed to divulge specific examples of programming ideas at the meeting.

The station had hoped to try out its ideas commencing last week by broadcasting on cable-FM but came up against a CRTC ruling that demanded a carrier-current license for such an operation. Since Input is not a student-controlled organization, the idea of pre-FM programming fell through.

Input's Board is a hybrid. The original body that applied for incorporation as Input Radio Inc.

The turntables will start to roll with a different flavour if SAC decides to grant Input's operating money.

included representatives from the student body, U of T administration and outside interests. Since then the Board has added one student and various other corporate representatives, including Nicholas Steed, editor of Quest Magazine, H.

M. Turner of McLaren Advertising and Peter Brophy, a vice-president of Xerox. It is hoped the corporate members will be instrumental in the fund-raising drive. Input has a donation target of $30,000 by Nov. 1. SAC approval of the funds for Input is contingent on 1-3 of the station's programming being of a campus nature, that the Board structure remain the same for the next three years and that Input raise the necessary $30,000 by the target date.

Wednesday's child is full of fill(er). Helping with the shovel — Jason Monas, Elliott Millstein, Bob Collier, Kathy Kelly, Eric MacMillan, Dave Gledhill and all those beautiful desk folk. Bill Glenn of course and Alan Castle on wheels. Special felicitations to Rick Astley without whom...

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Does Input know what it's getting into?

Input Radio seems confident that the CRTC will grant its request for a campus-community radio station after the January hearings (for which they are preparing a voluminous brief).

The FM proposal has a sound philosophical backing. The station's focus will be first and foremost the university community, which is of course a conglomerate of varying viewpoints and interests. Their hope is to produce programming that will take into account all the variables within the community and to give all these variables a chance to have their voice heard. Next in line is the rest of Metro.

A typical day in the life of Input Radio might see, for instance, a roving team of mobile units sending live reports from all over Metro or the university on what the people in the street think about any subject under the sun, including African killer bees. The approach will be free-form, open to any sort of spontaneity.

The people who are setting up this rather novel approach to radio may however have absolutely no idea what they are getting into. This sort of programming is probably quite difficult to maintain in any reasonable quality over a long period of time and would require an extremely competent staff at the other end to keep it in some semblance of order.

The station's prime rationale is that it will be accessible to a large number of groups in the community for the airing of their particular views. Already they have had sign of support from ratepayer and environmental groups over the entire Metro area.

But we come up against a problem of potentially too much broth and not enough cooks. It is simply not good enough to welcome a multitude of people into a radio station and expect that they will be able to produce coherent programming on the subjects that are near and dear to their hearts. If the station is going to have any concept of itself, there must be a continuity; the station's ethic must be branded into every program.

What is required is a professional crew of news-minded people who can keep track of this sort of programming and turn it into logical patterns of information. Anyone who does this sort of work will tell you that it's the most nerve-wracking chore in the world. Experience at The Varsity tells a similar tale. There is an extremely large problem in attempting to deal fairly with a variety of groups, each with something to say. If we had a penny for every time someone has said "we would like to see this in The Varsity," we wouldn't need a SAC grant to keep us operating every year.

No slight intended, but if the list of people that will be primarily responsible for the new direction is any indication, they will have a hard time keeping on top of the work.

As it stands, Input Radio is the old U of T Radio under a new name with the old faces, and part of the reason that the FM idea is finally happening is that U of T Radio had just about run itself into the ground through entirely lacklustre programming and poor organization in both the news and the music department.

If this is to be avoided (and keep in mind that there's a lot more money at stake this time around), Input Radio must go out of its way to attract a number of new faces and above all, people with professional experience, hopefully in this sort of programming. SAC, before it makes a decision tonight must satisfy itself that the people involved know what they're doing and how they're going to do it. Until then, this very promising idea is just a very expensive dream.

Parker distorts

In a university, supposedly dedicated to the pursuit of truth, there should be no place for hypocrisy and distortion. Especially, when the perpetrator is a highly placed spokesman of the university staff.

Granted, John Parker the chief labour negotiator for the personnel department has an extremely difficult job.

But, that is no reason to distort the truth.

Parker bases his calculations of the cost of library workers' demands on figures which bear little relation to the truth. The workers want an average annual increase of $3,200 a year, not $4,900 as Parker claims.

The workers want a cash settlement of $1,500 for two year employees only, not for every one of the permanent union staff, as Parker claims.

Parker is dealing with intelligent sensible people. Let him treat them that way and perhaps negotiations might continue without acrimony and confrontation.

Fights All Cuts

To the Editor,
 The September 22 issue of The Varsity printed a letter by one Michael Treacy which argued that U of T students have no interest in supporting the current demands of campus library workers in CUPE local 1230. It is worth replying to it only because its parochial and short-sighted views and anti-working class bias are probably shared by a considerable number of U of T students.
 Treacy's main argument is that while it is "well and good to oppose cutbacks on all fronts at the provincial level," students have nothing to gain by opposing an "administrative decision" to cut back in library services.
 It must further be pointed out that while students do not constitute a distinct social class, the great majority of U of T students have an interest in protecting the jobs and living standards of campus workers, just as they have an interest in defending the economic position of the working class as a whole. Why?
 The social direction of the majority of university students is the working class — within a few years most students will be confronted with many of the same threats to their livelihood that now confront the campus library workers under the impact of the capitalist economic crisis:

Treacy Letter Distressing

To the Editor,
 I was distressed to read the letter in Monday's Varsity from Michael Treacy expressing his disgust at students who would support the library workers (CUPE 1230). I feel obliged to reply in language that Treacy will understand.
 Let me refer to two incidents that I noticed last year. One was during the essay "exam" period when about a dozen students were standing at the short-term loan desk. One woman (about age 60) was working frantically to serve everyone. The long delay and inefficient service was due clearly to a shortage of staff. At the same time I recall shelves upon shelves and carts upon carts of unsorted books. This too was clearly due to an insufficient number of workers to make the unemployment, inflation, etc. It is this very real material interest that makes it increasingly important for students to take the side of the working class in the struggle for a socialist revolution which would establish a planned economy capable of eliminating unemployment and inflation once and for all.

Students should not view campus workers as their competitors for a share of the "educational dollar". Cutbacks in educational spending result in a general deterioration of campus conditions: the quality of education, the quality of services, the living standards of workers and, through cutbacks in bursaries, living allowances etc., the living standards of students as well. If Treacy were consistent in his argumentation, he would have to say that students who are not receiving bursaries or stipends do not have an interest in opposing cutbacks in this area either. In fact, students must struggle for free tuition and a living allowance (tied to the cost of living) as part of a fight for universal accessibility and against the class bias of the university. Treacy's approach would succeed in further dividing the necessary opposition that must be mounted on a cross library run properly.

The point is that for you who, like Michael, have the cancer of self-interest eating away at your body, it is still worthwhile to support the library workers. They are not demanding "a larger share of our educational dollar." They are working for job security and the maintenance of a work force large enough to serve the cancer-ridden masses efficiently.

A final note to you who are not yet overcome by the disease. The library workers are also fighting for a fair wage and protection against the staggering rate of inflation. If you believe that these goals are fair ones then join the support committee.

Ross Wells,

campus basis — by students, faculty and support workers — against the educational cutbacks.

To these divisive attitudes, the Trotskyist League (U of T club) counterposes the need for a common struggle among all groups on campus affected by the cutbacks — excluding the administration, which is incapable of carrying out a real struggle against them by virtue of its ties with the capitalist ruling class. A strong show of unity among all these groups can alone succeed in stemming the cutbacks. But their definitive reversal can only be achieved through the action of the labor movement as a whole, since campus workers wield very little social power.

Unlike Treacy, we do not trust in the administration's ability to determine what the "priorities" for U of T students should be. This is why we call for opening the books of the university to full inspection by students and staff. And this is why we call for student-factory-worker control of the campus under a workers government. Full support to CUPE local 1230! Stop the Cutbacks!

Rhonda Caplan,
 Trotskyist League
 (U of T Club)

Impeach Erin student pres.

To the Editor,

Erindale College has always been considered the infant brother by the downtown campus. While this is by no means fair to the students and staff of Erindale, the current state of student politics here would certainly reinforce that impression. In the four months since Gregg-Michael Troy was elected as president of SAGE, the situation has become so muddled that it would be funny if it were not such a tragic waste of time and money.

The issue at the moment is the continued existence of Troy as president since he has been suspended from the university. Under the old SAGE constitution Troy must resign since the president must be a student at Erindale, but under the new ECSU constitution (which Troy wrote this summer) no such stipulation exists. Troy's wishes notwithstanding, the old SAGE constitution is still in force.

This minor difficulty could be overlooked if Troy had worked for the good of the students, but much of his time seems to have been spent in an attempt to singlehandedly control Erindale College. Like all of U of T Erindale has suffered cutbacks in its budget. Students returned this year to find that transportation and cafeteria costs have increased drastically with no input from the student body. Troy simply has not shown up at College Council meetings where these matters were discussed. What he has done is to spend over $8,000 on a new SAGE office, hire an organizer (at an undisclosed cost) for a folk festival that was never held, and then charge $13 a head for orientation activities.

Erindale does not need a student union, not when "union" is simply a

Waiting for nasty review

When are you going to publish a review of the Handbook? Surely it's a tradition at The Varsity to say something about the SAC orientation book given out to incoming rookies.

In years gone by the editorial comments about the 8 x 10, 100-page book have gone as far as the Toronto Star. In 1971, a handbook editorial virtually summoned students to arms over the calling of Metro Police on campus to maintain order. The title that year was "The Year of the Seige". It was edited by Alex Podnick, an ex-Varsity editor.

In the following four years, the SAC effort has been edited by Innis College students. In order: John Helliwell, Briane Nasimok (and friend), Tony St. John-Hine, and Beau Glenn.

euphemism for an absolute dictatorship. Erindale does need a student government that will solve the many problems we face, but solve them in a democratic, mature fashion, not by issuing a royal proclamation.

Troy's attitude towards both his constituents and the administration has been deceitful, cynical, and arrogant. If the students of Erindale College want a concerned, responsible student government their first move is to demand Troy's immediate resignation or, failing that, his impeachment.

Science stuff Student union

By CAITLIN KELLY

The Arts and Science Students' Union (ASSU), is planning an intensive campaign to set up new course unions, concentrating in the sciences.

According to ASSU fieldworker Jeannie Greatbatch, there are plans to increase the variety of services offered. Five new unions are planned to be operative by Christmas.

Greatbatch outlined the problems encountered by science students. "The course load is a lot heavier and the schedules are less flexible." Intimidation tactics are also compounding the problems of science students. Students known to play an active part in course unions are harassed by professors and union members applying to graduate school have difficulties being recommended, according to Greatbatch.

A change in the funding of the ASSU is being proposed. In the past, the union has had an agreement with SAC for a $2 rebate for each Arts and Science student. After a trial period the funding was to have been taken

CLC Cheesed on Farmers

SASKATOON (CUP) Despite lack of resources and interest by the National Farmer's Union (NFU), the Kraft Boycott still exists, at least in principle.

Reliable sources within the NFU say the organization was asked by their last national convention to proceed with boycott action. However, hampered by a very small budget and a lack of personnel, the NFU has been having trouble off directly by the U of T. The fee increase to $4, and the question of separate funding should be dealt with by September '76. There will be a student referendum this year.

The major costs of course unions are for paper for evaluation questionnaires and summaries and research journals. When possible, speakers are brought in and field trips are organized for interested students.

If students have grievances in a course with no union, Greatbatch urges them to come to the ASSU office. "Students that have complaints about courses often don't know where to go if there's no course union; we offer services directly through our office for them," she said.

following up with the boycott which was particularly strong until about one year ago.

Some executives within the NFU apparently feel that unless the organization gets on with action, they should "get out all together." But some former boycott organizers favour an increased budget for the members of NFU to pay for research and promotion needed to continue the boycott.

While the Kraft boycott has been primarily a farmers union boycott, receiving much support from labour groups, particularly in the west, some observers predict a labour withdrawal later this year.

"People have forgotten why they must boycott Kraft," said a Canadian Labour Congress source in a recent interview. In order to fully support a boycott, any boycott, the organizers must have clearly defined aims and political objectives. They say the Kraft boycott lacks all of this.

But as the National Farmer's Union, the principles are still there. The boycott has not been called off. If renewed support can be found, they say efforts will be made to continue the boycott of Kraftco products.

PREMIUM PILSENER

Henninger tastes different from Canadian beers because it's made from different ingredients and in a different way. Only two row barley is used. Yeast is especially flown in from Frankfurt. It's doubly fermented. It is allowed to carbonate naturally. It tastes like a German beer because it is.

Henninger. Das Schmeckt.

Meister Pils is a true light tasting German pilsener brewed from the same ingredients and in the same way as it is in Henninger's Frankfurt brewery. Now you can enjoy the light distinctive taste that has made pilsener the most celebrated of all the world's beers.

Both Henninger and Meister Pils are made in Henninger's own independent brewery and are available at your brewers retail outlet for just a few cents more than regular beer.

Bouncy Enrollment Means Boom AND Bust

By PETER O'MALLEY
Canadian University Press

In the year 2001 there will be 16.3 per cent more post-secondary students in Canada than in 1974. If this increase were gradual and steady, educational institutions and government policy makers could fairly easily make provisions to adapt.

But, according to an educational statistician with Statistics Canada, the increase will be anything but "gradual and steady", and he predicts that enrollment patterns between now and the end of the 20th century will have a significant impact on the life of the post-secondary community.

In a paper presented to the Statistical Science Association of Canada, Zoltan Zsigmond of the Education, Science and Culture Division of Statistics Canada, warns of "the potential hazards the future holds" if education planners fail to consider "demographic facts and their possible impact" on post-secondary enrollment.

What makes rational long-term planning so complicated, and so important, he argues, is the roller-coaster appearance of the line graph projecting enrolments over the period from now until the end of the century.

Whereas in 1974 there were 567 thousand post-secondary students in full-time attendance at colleges and universities across Canada, by 1982, according to Zsigmond's estimate, this figure will increase 18 per cent, to about 670 thousand.

This projection is based on the increase in the size of the 18-24 age group, from which 80 per cent of the post-secondary student population is drawn. Zsigmond assumes the participation rate — the proportion of that age group that attends post-secondary institutions — will remain at the current 20 per cent level until the end of the century.

As the 18-24 age group rises and falls, so will post-secondary enrollment, according to Zsigmond.

Which is why the enrolment situation will dramatically reverse itself after the 1982 high point. Those born during the "baby boom" years will have already passed through the 18-24 age group and the post-secondary system, and the size of the group will then begin to diminish in accordance with the decline in fertility rates evident since the 1960's.

Zsigmond predicts the low-point in enrolment will come around 1992, when roughly there will be 520 thousand students, 22 per cent less than 1982.

After 1992, says Zsigmond, demographic trends based on census data indicate that enrolment will once again start to increase to about 660 thousand, just slightly above the 1982 figure.

THE PLANNING PROBLEM

The problem of planning for growth in the post-secondary sector is clear. For every 100 students that need teachers, classrooms, and other services in 1974, there will be 118 in 1982, only 82 in 1992, and 116 in 2001.

If planners attempt to target to accommodate all the students needing facilities in 1982, they will have excess capacity after that date until the 90's.

And if they opt to plan for no more students than will be around in the 1982-92 period, institutions will find themselves short of resources before and after that ten year period.

Zsigmond outlines some of the possible implications of demographic change and enrolment levels on the post-secondary sector.

One is that the enrolment fluctuations will not affect all programs equally. Those faculties in which enrolment is determined more by the availability of facilities than by the number of applications, such as medicine, dentistry, and other professional programs, will be less affected by demographic patterns than general programs.

"It is the general faculties, particularly arts and science, that are likely to feel the effects of the population decline," Zsigmond writes.

"First year admissions (in these programs) depends largely on the number of secondary school graduates there were the preceding spring. When the 18-24 year old age group starts to decrease, so will 'general' enrolment."

The attitudes and actions of administrators will also be effected, he says. They will have to ask themselves "Is it reasonable to curtail current growth to cope with future decline? Should some programs be eliminated and academic staff reduced?"

And an important requirement Zsigmond says, will be "more effective and realistic budgeting" in the future, and replacement of the "usual single-year planning" currently imposed by governments on post-secondary institutions.

According to Zsigmond, those whose lives are apt to be most affected by the enrolment decline are teachers. If the current national student-teacher ratio of 12:1 persists to the peak enrolment year, 1982, about 8,400 more teachers will be needed. But should this number of teachers be sustained the ratio will have fallen to 9.3:1 by 1992.

Unless the ratio is lowered as enrolment declines, by the early 1990's there will be about 12,500 "surplus" teachers — 26 per cent of the present total full-time post-secondary teaching staff. And most of these will be in the general faculties.

Classrooms will continue to become more crowded until 1982 . . . then a student shortage will mean empty seats for ten long years . . . followed by a building boom as bad as the '60's.

Students to be squeezed much worse in years to come

By PETER O'MALLEY
Canadian University Press

What all this means to the current crop of post-secondary students, and those to come along in the future, depends on the decision reached by educational planners as to how to accommodate future trends, a subject for speculation.

Based on past decision, the surest bet would seem to be that government will not pump in sufficient funds to provide the resources needed to handle the increasing enrolments forecast until 1982.

To do so would mean "excess capacity" after 1982. Less resources, crowded facilities, and increased class-sizes (or more "term" contracts for faculty) would seem to be a more orthodox government response.

A deteriorating quality of education will result when an increasing number of students are provided with a constant level of educational resources. This is not the only result to be expected.

Student housing conditions, for instance, will likely worsen. What institution would build student residences to meet the 1982 enrolment level, knowing full well they will not have the students needed later on to pay off the mortgage?

Another result of increased enrolment is that the number of graduates will also increase until the mid 1980's, meaning the already reduced value of the degree in the marketplace will continue to decrease.

And those students who contemplate careers in academia had better perish the thought, or start shoveling tenured faculty aside in preparation for that day in 1982 when the student-as-commodity begins to grow scarce.

This predicted deterioration in the quality of education and the reduction in its market value, it should be remembered, is occurring at the same time as federal and provincial governments are demanding that students borrow more money to pay for it. So student loan repayment will become an increasing burden, and the default rate is likely to increase.

Those students who come later will not be in such a bad predicament. As the cost-per-student increases they will need rich parents or bigger loans. But the product they buy should improve in quality.

The reduced student-teacher ratio, the many years of teaching experience of those tenured faculty who remain, and the wide-open spaces in classrooms and cafeterias could provide an enjoyable learning environment, even if it is a little less than dynamic.

And as they graduate in ever decreasing numbers, they will find that graduates have once again become somewhat scarce on the job market, and are able not only to get jobs, but to command high incomes.

POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS AND OPTIONS

The situation described above for students in the 80's does sound somewhat reminiscent of the "good old days" before the expansionary upheavals of the 60's and 70's, when post-secondary education was a comfortable preserve for the comfortable few.

However, after 10 years, in 1992, the demographers show that once again the 18-24 age group will be increasing in numbers and pressing for entrance to the post-secondary system.

Are they likely to be let in? Will post-secondary education again see enrolment increase? Or will government policy see to it that the "participation rate" is lowered so as to avoid another round of expansion?

The question is political rather than demographic because to say the university age group will increase is not to say that enrolment itself will increase. Student aid policies and academic admission standards are just two of the devices that can be used to determine actual enrolment levels.

Admission standards are a good example. In Ontario, for instance, the great hue and cry about the allegedly low academic qualifications of students being admitted to colleges and universities did not gain momentum until the government had shut off the financial tap.

All that is really indicated by the now-popular appeal for increased admission standards is that the system feels there are too many students, given current resources. "Raise the standards" simply means "eliminate students".

Will such devices be employed to reduce the participation rate when the 18-24's start increasing in number again in 1992?

Government policy will decide. Government may listen to those who will argue that the failure of our economy to absorb the post-secondary trained manpower of the 60's and 70's means we cannot afford another attempt at "mass" post-secondary education, and urge that the "cooling off" of the system as a result of demographic trends in the 80's be continued by deliberate policy into the 90's.

And others will argue that the failure of our economy to provide jobs for graduates was just that — an economic failure, not the failure of the education system. They will urge government to maintain and increase the participation rate, so as to make post-secondary education "universally accessible."

In any case, the winning side will be those with the strongest political base, who may or may not be those with the best arguments. They will determine the future of post-secondary education of Canada.

"The Colour of Liberty"...Visiting Portugal's

By LEE WAI-KWOK

The Lisbon air during the day in early September was dry and unbearably hot. In the evening, however, a light breeze would blow in from the harbour and brought along with it a blissful and serene mood.

It was six o'clock in the evening. Parca Mousinho de Albaquerque was busy with the usual evening traffic rush. Sharp, often impatient horns from passing cars fused with the jubilant music from a nearby carnival. The atmosphere was completely free and peaceful.

Ten minutes walk from the Parca, in the University of Lisbon, an 'International Youth Village' attracted hundreds of radicals from all over the world to its tents. I was the only Canadian in the group. A pub in the Village became the daily meeting place for political debates and discussions, as well as folk songs and dances provided by the 'tenants' in the Village. The debates and discussions were often mild and rational, compared with the more heated ones in Rossio Square and Pedro IV Square, about 5 kilometres south of the University, the gathering-places for various political activities since the revolution, on April 25, 1974.

This gives a brief outline of Portuguese society today. On one hand, it is business-as-usual, with an obvious air of relief arising out of the liberation from nearly 50 acres of fascist rule; on the other, it is tense and highly unstable because of the uncertainty about the future, and illusions among the people — tense and unstable, but not violent.

THE RECENT PAST

The April 25, 1974 coup in Portugal was masterminded by a number of rank and file army officers who had formed an organization called the 'Movimento Das Forças Armadas' (MFA), or the 'Armed Forces Movement', to oppose the promotion policy of the fascist Caetano Regime. After the coup, an assembly of about 400 army officers became the ruling organ of the country while the real power fell on the hands of a junta of 30 senior ranking officers in the Supreme Revolutionary Council of the MFA.

"the people are with the Armed Forces Movement"

General Antonio Spínola, a one-time colonial general who had written a book criticizing the colonial policy of the Old Regime, was chosen by the MFA as the first President of the new Republic. This posed an immediate problem in the political arena, namely the contradiction between the rising working class movement, the left wing forces in the MFA and the left wing political parties on one hand, and Spínola, a 'liberal democrat', his military allies and political supporters on the other. The sharpening of this contradiction, triggered largely by the rising influences of the left, led to the unsuccessful coup attempt by Spínola on March 11 of this year.

The 'defeat' of the right-wing forces was followed by a split in the until-then 'unified left'. This was manifested during and after the April Election in this year of the Constituent Assembly, in which the Socialist Party (PS), modelled after the German Social Democratic Party, received 33 per cent of the vote, the 'centre-left' Popular Democratic Party (PPD) 26 per cent and the Portuguese Communist Party (PCP) 12.5 per cent. The remaining votes went to smaller political parties and organizations such as the Portuguese Democratic Movement (MDP), a close ally of the PCP, the Movimento de Esquerda Socialista (MES), the Maoist PCP-ML, the Trotskyist LCI and so on.

The Election results, however, had no immediate effect on the ruling mechanisms of Portugal. The MFA continued to hold on to the power it has so far enjoyed. Meanwhile, Communist influence grew in the Armed Forces. This coincided with the drastic growth in worker's power. Factory and office workers seized power and elected worker's councils to run the factories and offices while farmworkers took over the land and set up farm co-operatives.

Perhaps the single most important event during this period was the seizure of Republica, the PS daily newspaper. A group of pro-PCP workers occupied the office building of the newspaper and stopped it from publishing articles critical of the PCP.

This incident, together with the growing Communist dominance of the government, incited the Socialist Party to withdraw from the Cabinet. It was soon joined by the PPD. Together, these parties demanded the resignation of allegedly pro-Communist Premier Vasco Santos Goncalves and the end of "Communist Monopoly" in the government.

This created the most serious political crisis since the March 11 coup. Splits in the MFA into various factions occurred. It was on the first days of September that the crisis reached its climax.

CALM AND THE STORM

I arrived at Lisbon's 'Station Apolonia' at about 9:30 in the morning of September 1. My first impression of the city was that it appeared surprisingly calm and quiet. There was no sign of a turbulent crisis going on, and except for the posters and slogans on the street walls, one could hardly see any traces of the political storm that has rocked the country in the past 16 months. Along Rua Sapateiros and Rua Augusta in Lisbon's main commercial district, thousands of early-shoppers and office-workers could be seen walking in a leisurely pace and giving occasional glances to the shop-windows. There were no apparent signs of fear and excitement.

Not too far away, on Rossio Square and Pedro IV Square, the scene was completely different. Every time I passed through these squares, which I did every morning and every evening during my stay in Lisbon, thousands of people were there to discuss the political situation.

The scene in Pedro IV Square was especially spectacular and ironic, and, in a way, could be viewed as a miniature of the present Portuguese Society. On the east side of the Square, many department stores and expensive cafes lined the street. Here capitalist consumerism had its way. Every afternoon, long line-ups of eager shoppers could be seen outside the few garment stores which were having "Clearance Sales!" the heavy make-up and the greedy looks on the shoppers' faces told the story. At the early hours of the morning and the evening, well-dressed, middle-age gentlemen with briefcases and walking sticks by their sides could be seen sitting leisurely and luxuriously in the roadside cafes. These people had at least one thing in common — the bourgeois quality reflected in their faces, clothing, speech and all their forms of self-expression.

REAL NUTS

I was able to talk to one of them, one day. Bernardino Miranda, a senior executive in a commercial firm, spoke to me in English in an assured tone and a confident manner.

"These people across the street thinks they can change the world. They are real nuts! They have threatened the moral institutions and social orders of our society and have driven our economy into ruins. One day they will earn their prizes... " (And then, swinging his big fat head, he fixed his conscientious eyes on a lady passing by.)

On the west side of the Square was another world. Here, tens of thousands of Lisbon residents would stop by everyday to listen to, or participate in, the seemingly endless debates and discussions on the recent developments in the political arena. Almost every political group, with the exception of the PPD, had a booth there selling its own publications and all kinds of badges. There were daily handouts of pamphlets by the political parties and the MFA, announcing important party decisions or calling for public meetings.

"the Armed Forces Movement; Sentinels of the People"

The International Youth Village provided pup tents for political tourism.

Revolution

September 1, outside the Presidential Palace, to protest against the return of Portuguese troops to Angola. Open conflicts such as this between the rank and file of the MFA, and their senior officers, are not unusual.

The street debates and discussions were very vigorous, with a lot of gesturing and clenching of fists. Exchanges between two political rivals often led to shouting, but there was seldom physical violence involved, but they all had a common abhorrence for physical violence and vengeance.

"VIOLENT INCIDENTS"

This does not mean that violence was completely absent. One evening when I was walking along Rua Braancamp near Marques de Pombal, the pivot of Lisbon's traffic system, loud voices attracted my attention.

A group of 16 or 17 people were shouting and swearing at each other. A pushing match broke out. Two men ran to get help from their nearby comrades, and returned with a half dozen reinforcements. They rejoined the confused scuffle, while the verandas of nearby apartments filled with anxious onlookers. At last a jeep load of military policemen happened by, and they were received with noisy explanations from both sides.

A UPI reporter and I went to take some pictures at this point. Both of us received strong reactions from the annoyed MP's, who chased us away. A button was ripped off my shirt, but the unlucky reporter drew punches from the excited crowd, and left with a bruised nose.

The atmosphere remained tense for awhile. But before long the scene was dominated by the impatient noises of the home-bound cars. There was no bloodshed. No one was charged. So much for what the media likes to call "violent incidents".

When the excitement was over, we were told the scuffle was between some members of the FEMLE, a Maoist group, and some PCP members. Apparently the PCP had lost a Worker's Committee election in a nearby office building, just a few days before the incident, and, according to the people who told us the story, were "highly disturbed" by this. The Maoists had come to put up posters announcing a demonstration. Some posters were pasted on the walls of a PCP office, and were immediately torn down. This led to the only street scene I saw during my stay in Lisbon that came close to a "violent incident".

POLITICAL TOURISM

Back in the International Youth Village, there was a mixed mood of holidaying and politics which New York Times (Sept. 7) reporter Marvine Howe has aptly and sarcastically called "political tourism". The majority of the participants in the village were German and Scandinavian socialists or communists, with a few French, British, and Italian lefties. At almost any time of the day or night groups of people could be seen gathering around the long tables in the Village pub, where the Portuguese situation was discussed and debated endlessly.

The participants, most of whom were students, spoke different languages: German, Danish, Swedish, French, English, Italian, Spanish, and Chinese. Yet somehow there was no language barrier. We all interpreted for each other, and we all had a common basis: we had come to see, and hoped to understand a revolution in process. We talked about each other's countries, and, as the only Canadian, and the only Asian there, I was grilled about everything from Quebec to Maoism and Chinese food. The university of Lisbon, where the tents were set up, was quiet and "orderly". A tour of the university buildings gave the impression that everything was undisturbed inside the university, and the 'normal' academic air still prevailed. Inside the social Science and Humanities Building, for example, a few students could be seen dozing off in the garden at mid-day while the goldfish in a nearby fish pond swam lazily, completely ignorant of what was going on in the outside world.

The university walls, however, were filled with many slogans written mainly by the MRPP, a Maoist organization said to have great influence among the students and the professors. It is a pity that the various student groups could not be reached for information because classes do not begin until the end of September. Nevertheless, I was told that many university students and professors have "joined the social struggle" in the summer and would return to the campus this fall with a "higher degree of social consciousness". My informer, a student at the University, an organizer of the Village, and a self-confessed Maoist, was optimistic about the future development of the Portuguese society and the student movement in particular:

"Discussion shows the light! In Portugal today, the people welcome what has been going on. We are a peace-loving people and would like to see the revolution continue in a peaceful and rational way. When the students return to their classrooms this autumn, they should have learnt a lot from their summer experience and can advance the student movement to a higher stage..."

The same feeling was reiterated by Manuel Rodrigues, a retired pilot with whom I had a pleasant conversation one evening in the Carnival.

I CANNOT DIE

With a light-heart and an empty stomach, two British friends and I stumbled into the Carnival. Here we found the real Portuguese people — happy, cheerful, optimistic and honest faces, free from external pressure and full of Iberian Romanticism. We had a blithe evening and enjoyed the roast chicken and Portuguese 'vinho' at a surprisingly low cost before leaving the gates of the Carnival to face the social reality again.

My stay in Lisbon has been a short one. Obviously, I did not have sufficient time to understand all the aspects of Portuguese life and my observations might be very superficial ones. But going through the crowds in the streets, talking to people with different social backgrounds and observing events as an outsider, who might be more rational and objective than those who are actually involved, all have enabled me to know more about the sentiment of the Portuguese people.

The crucial problem of the Portuguese revolution today, as I see it, is whether or not a new force with a new ideology can rise fast enough to relieve the Portuguese people of their agony. This 'new force and ideology' cannot be provided by any kind of bourgeois thinking, nor can orthodox Marxism-Leninism do the full job. For the Portuguese people simply reject all kinds of dictatorship — whether this be bourgeois dictatorship or bureaucratic dictatorship in the name of the proletariat. They want to be treated as human beings who possess the fundamental human rights in name as well as in reality.

As I was writing this, a weak yet confident voice from afar struck my heart-strings, and I heard, the words of Jorge de Sena, the Portuguese poet:

"Nao hei-de morrer sem saber qual a cor da liberdade."

Who's Who in the Revolution

International Communist League Liga Comunista Internacionalista (LCI)
A Trotskyist organization related to the Fourth International.

Portuguese Democratic Movement Movimento Democratico Portugues (MDP CDE)
A left-wing party said to be a close ally of the Communist Party in the Constituent Assembly.

The Socialist Squad Movimento de Esquerda Socialista (MES)

Supported largely by the Lisbon intelligentsia, the MES has great influence in the MFA rank and file, particularly in COPCON, the international security forces under General Odele de Carvalho.

Armed Forces Movement Movimento Das Forças Armadas (MFA)
The group that staged the coup, and still largely runs the country.

Movement for the Re-organization of the Proletarian Party Movimento Reorganizativo do Partido do Proletariado (MRPP)
A Maoist organization which was banned in the Constituent Assembly election this April. It draws its support largely from students and university professors. The MRPP is apparently the strongest political group to the left of the PCP.

Portuguese Communist Party Partido Comunista Portugues (PCP)

The pro-Moscow Communists, described as the "only remaining Stalinist CP in Western Europe".

Portuguese Communist Party, Marxist Leninist (PCP M.L)

The pro-Peking Communists. Several members of the former PCP Central Committee are in its leadership.

Popular Democratic Party (PPD) Described by the left as a 'bourgeois' party, and by the western press as a 'left-of-centre' party, the PPD draws its support mainly from the Lisbon business world and the Portuguese middle class. It has formed an alliance with the Socialist Party to fight against what it calls "Communist Monopoly" of the government.

Portuguese Socialist Party (PSP)
The Portuguese counterpart of the NDP or the German Socialist Democratic Party. It receives immense financial support from its Western European allies, and topped the polls in the April election.

Revolutionary Party of the Proletariat - Revolutionary Brigades (PRP-BR)

The Portuguese chapter of the International Socialist (IS), or Independent Socialist as they are known in Canada, which draws strong support from the radical MFA rank and file.

Nightsticks were used and freshman arrested when Toronto police forcefully broke up a student snake dance last Saturday night. The dance, part of the Victoria College Freshman Weekend, had reached the corner of Bloor and Avenue Road when the disturbance occurred.

Arrested was Tom Buck (Forestry I) residing at South House, who was booked on charges of creating a disturbance. Among those hit by nightsticks were John Todd (Vic II), and Art Swanson (Vic I).

"At first I thought he had hit me with the flat of his hand," Swanson said later, "But then I saw the butt end of his billy under his sleeve."

The snake dance, started at Victoria travelled east on Charles Street to Bay, where three policemen tried unsuccessfully to stop it. The students continued to snake across Bay street, holding up traffic.

In his annual speech yesterday to newly-enrolled students, President Sidney Smith vigorously refuted critics of modern young people.

Speaking in Convocation Hall yesterday the President also described the University's expansion program and the need for better salaries for professors.

After blaming the older generation's constant criticism of modern youth on the adult's forgetfulness, caused by "baldness, bulges, bifocals and bridges," President Smith said, "I recall clearly that in the dismal thirties many persons described the youth of those years as empty-headed and light-hearted."

Dr. Smith continued by explaining that good building alone could not make Toronto a first class University. This could be done only by having a first class staff, and the only way to get such a staff, he added was to give the professors an income "large enough to support and educate their families, to purchase books, to refresh themselves by travel and attendance at meetings of learned societies, and to partake of cultural activities."

Two editorials

This editorial is about the Student's Administrative Council — known familiarly as SAC. No don't go away, it isn't that kind of editorial.

The first meeting of the new Council is this Wednesday. All University of Toronto students may attend. Not many do usually.

We think you should take in some meetings this year. The usual reason given for this is that you, as a student, should be interested in what is being done about your extra-curricular affairs and should keep tab on your chosen representative who sits on the council. This is a valid reason and we back it all the way. But we have another reason.

SAC meetings can be more fun than a barrel of monkey's. This depends on what is being discussed and what the members of Council are like. We do not suggest right now that the Council are all a great bunch of refugees from the all-Varsity review. But the 1950-51 Council is, from all indications, an above average one in ability.

Peace is a magic word today in a time when the world seems to hover on the cliff-edge of another mass holocaust, it is no wonder we would clutch desperately for any hope of peace.

Is banning the Atom Bomb synonymous with Peace? This is what the Stockholm petition implies. What about making war by other means — which have been the rule rather than the exception? What about Korea?

We all crave peace. We all think of the Atom Bomb as an unspeakable horror. But signing the Stockholm Peace Petition is allowing these feelings to blind us to the real intention of the petition. Anyone who signs becomes another cipher in the figure that Moscow and its successful propaganda machine quote in their campaign to convince the non-Western world that Russia is for peace and the West are "capitalist war-mongers".

City Course Self-congratulatory

By JASON MONAS
City Politics is not an easy course, so why is it popular?

Students are selected on the basis of curiosity, desire to be involved and a willingness to work. Three years after its inception in 1973, there were over 200 applications of which 25 were selected.

The games civic politicians play, the effects of power on people and the differing media coverage of provincial and municipal government, are some course discoveries. Analysis of municipal elections, establishment of a campus information centre, organization of neighbourhood groups, and researching city policy are some of the tasks undertaken in the course.

Each student is apprenticed to a city alderman for eight months, or works on a particular civic issue. Along with this, regular meetings of City Hall are attended, and seminars, assignments and discussions are generated in the classroom from municipal business.

Special guests, such as media personalities and city developers are periodically invited to discuss their policies. Students say they have been provided frank answers on controversial issues.

Innis principal Peter Russell sees the course as "a bold and innovative step in line with the aims of university."

Creator of INN 306 Alan Powell, who describes himself as an advocate sociologist, said he designed the course "to make students think, to touch their own lives." The sterile classroom is replaced by everyday involvement, theory integrated with practice and experience, he explained.

Powell feels he has acted as a "broker" between students and politicians. He suggests contacts to students, is a problem consultant and acts as a resource person. Powell says many times in the first year he didn't have the answer, but gradually became more informed through student feedback.

Graduates of INN 306 may enter

The Varsity | Mike Cowger

INN 306, an in-depth continuation of the study of City government and may also become resource persons for new City Politics students.

Grading is made through a self-evaluation and an instructors mark. If these marks don't agree the student is allowed to justify his position. Any final decision is arbitrated by other students of the course.

A number of politically active people have emerged from the course, a measure of its success. Ron Struys is assistant to Alderman Dan Heap, Marie Murphy has involved herself in community organization, Ross Wells is a U of T SAC commissioner, Brian Ashlon was involved in the campaign of alderman Ying Hope, and David Langer has served as campaign organizer for Alderman Michael Goldrick.

Murphy described INN 206 as "a unique experience in university," and said it had changed her life. Many former classmates are still close friends.

One result of the course has been Powell's book, "The City: Attacking modern myths". Students have contributed to the book and it is well known to politicians and journalists.

The timing of the course has been instrumental in its success. A reform movement in the city, and two civic elections seem to have coincided with it.

The only major student criticism of INN 206 was that there was not enough structure or theory. Powell says this was deliberate, but there are now required texts. Some former students feel an acquaintance with city politics and politicians is also helpful.

Last year only INN 306 was available because of other demands on Powell's time. This year only 206 is available and Jim Turk is replacing Powell who is taking a one year sabbatical without pay.

INN 206 has been a unique course in Canada in terms of concept and success, its students feel. Powell sees variations of it in other disciplines as potentially very fruitful.

New Grad Union Gathering Grief

By BOB COLLIER

The Graduate Assistants' Association has received "a very good reception" in its campus-wide tour of graduate departments, said GAA organizer Dianne Moesser yesterday.

The GAA has just started a fortnight's campaign in which they plan to address teaching assistants in 30 departments around the university. They have already visited two science departments, chemistry and aerospace.

In the mammoth campus tour, the GAA hopes to air their proposals and win support for their eventual confrontation with the university administration.

Since they won bargaining rights for all U of T teaching assistants last June, the GAA has been preparing their first contract for presentation to the university personnel department later this session.

In addition, departmental union stewards will be nominated and elected at these meetings. Moesser claims adequate publicity for these elections has been given, but "if the department members don't feel ready to vote," she said, "we'll make alternative arrangements."

The GAA union steward represents the department on a steward's council to be formed in the near future, and is responsible for bringing up departmental grievances at GAA meetings.

Among their most important demands is a fair wage for all teaching assistants, but the GAA has not planned any definite pay scale so far, said Moesser.

Fair hiring and firing practices

The Varsity | Bob White

Dianne Moesser: grad organizer are an integral part of their proposed contract but several sections are concerned with fringe benefits and limits on class size. It is expected the GAA will attempt to win ratification for the compulsory collection of union dues at the departmental meetings, but Moesser said no firm decisions have been made on the matter.

Sask. Students Bust Budget

REGINA (CUP) Barely three months after pushing through a $5.90 fee hike, the University of Regina Student's Union is facing bankruptcy.

The situation is so serious that council shut down the entire Student Service Centre for June, and closed the Cafeteria until September.

An emergency council meeting August 3 was told that the union is now facing debts of $17,000 in addition to legal debts incurred in a 1968 housing dispute.

Council secretary treasurer Elspeth Guild placed the blame for the debts on several factors:

- The 1974-75 budget made allowance for a $3,000 cafeteria loss, but rising costs of food and other supplies drove this up to $10,000.

- A loss of about $7,000 in the print shop, where several publications have provided much less business than expected.

- A communications gap between the students' union and the University Registrar office led to an undercalculation of fees amounting to $4,000 which had to be absorbed by the students' union.

SU Vice-president Don Maclean reported that all SU employees had agreed to take June off without pay.

First Prof Union Headed For Walkout

OTTAWA (CUP) The first contract talks ever between a faculty union and a university in Ontario appear to have broken down.

The Carleton University Academic Staff Association (CUASA), which was certified as the bargaining agent for the 600 department heads, professors, instructors and librarians during the summer, delivered an ultimatum to the university on Sept. 11.

The University was given until September 18 to respond to the wage demands presented by CUASA. If the university does not come up with a salary proposal, CUASA will request intervention by a provincially appointed conciliator.

Wages are not the only issue still left unresolved between the union and management negotiators. Union involvement in hiring and firing of academic staff, grievance procedures and other matters related to working conditions are still to be decided.

CUASA went into the negotiations with 75 pages of proposals and, so far, the university has not responded with counter-proposals.

"The hangup has been the sheer volume of matters to be negotiated," said Board of Governors member and management negotiator Cliff Kelley.

In a statement released Sept. 11, management says they intended to respond to some of the union proposals at the last negotiating session, but the union insisted on talking about wages.

When the university negotiators refused, CUASA walked out of the talks and issued their ultimatum.

The university says the "complex and ambitious approach" adopted by the union made "lengthy bargaining inevitable."

Professor Bernard Wand, CUASA President, dismissed as "poppycock" any suggestion that the scope of union demands tended to slow bargaining. A first agreement must touch all the bases in terms and conditions of employment, he said.

The university feels the union should have limited their first demands for a one-year contract "to a few salient points so that agreement can be reached quickly and "leave less pressing matters for a second or third subsequent round of negotiations."

One issue the union says must be decided is their role in hiring and firing decisions, previously the prerogative of the University Senate and Board.

This is particularly important to the union because the possible effects of recent government financial cutbacks on academic staff was cited during the CUASA certification campaign as a major reason for forming a union.

Compiled by News Desk

Flights of Fancy

OTTAWA (CUP) A member of the Carleton student council is convinced that Ontario students can afford $5 million for a used Boeing 707, set up a corporation to fly it, and then persuade students to use it.

Dan Perley, the Vice-President of Internal Affairs of the Carleton student council, is so convinced that he has visited the Boeing plant in Seattle and talked to senior executives of the company. They claim the plan is feasible. The Ontario Federation of Students disagrees, and has told Perley in a letter "the principle of such a corporation is not feasible, the costs being prohibitive."

Perley now feels OFS is not responsible to the average student. Nor is his council very enthusiastic about the proposed Student Air Corporation. Council president Dave Dunn says that with financial cutbacks and other student problems, getting into the airline business would seem to be "a contradiction."

Perley is undaunted, and continues to investigate his proposal. His plan is to start with one plane, make a profit by the third year, and then buy more planes — new ones this time.

Perley says students would get cheaper flight rates than by commercial airlines and that running an airline would improve the image of students by showing them to be "responsible."

Someone who took a lighter view of the student airline controversy recently posted bulletins around the Carleton University centre reading: "Wanted. Commercial pilot. No experience necessary. Will train. Contact Dan Perley."

He got one reply from a commercial pilot with three years experience.

Steal this Book

NEW YORK (CUP) People across the country are apparently taking Abbie Hoffman's advice, and have been ripping off copies of his book, titled Steal This Book.

The Erie Metropolitan Library in New York reports it recently discovered that all three copies of the Yippie leader's book had been removed from its shelves.

Library worker Ronaleen Lee says that the Erie Library is connected to 700 libraries across the United States by the Library of Congress's computerized card catalog.

A check of the 700 libraries, Lee states, found that only about 15 of them still had copies of "Steal This Book".

Lee says "Very few of the bookstores we've contacted even bother to order it anymore. They just can't keep it on the shelves."

Angeles to make arrangements for his death. He asked that he be cremated and that his ashes be mixed with sufficient quantity of industrial polyethylene to make 25 commercial model frisbees. Said Dr. Johnson, "As I think toward the future, and envision that scene, and the hours, perhaps even years, during which my remains will wait through the air between the hands of those whom I have loved so much, my heart even now rises in anticipation."

The Forest Lawn folks replied that such a request was beyond even their abilities.

PACIFIC GROVE, CALIFORNIA (ENS-CUP) The world's number one frisbee freak has been temporarily rebuffed in an effort to ensure that his mortal remains will be turned into frisbees.

Dr. Stancel Johnson, a 42-year-old psychiatrist from Pacific Grove, California — and author of the book "Frisbee" — recently wrote to the Forest Lawn Cemetery in Los

False Face Fired

PITTSBURGH (CUP) A Dequesne University administrator resigned September 13, one day after the student newspaper reported he has falsified parts of his resume when he applied for a job there last year.

Prior to his employment by the university in May 1974, Carl Dobrin had submitted three letters of reference and later this summer, turned over his resume to the university.

After four months of investigation into the credibility of that resume, the Duquesne Duke published a story relating Dobrin's falsification of the document.

Dr. Helen Kleyle, assistant to the principal said "We have no reason to doubt the newspaper story. We did not search Mr. Dobrin's academic references, more because his job was a non-academic position. We gave him every opportunity to refute the story, but he did not."

Efforts to reach the resigned university relations director for comment were unsuccessful.

According to the newspaper Dobrin said he received a B.A. in English and an M.A. in journalism at Columbia University but the Columbia alumni records department said there was no record of his having attended the university.

Dobrin said in his resume that he worked for United Press International in 1957 but U.P.I. told the student reporters they had no record that he had worked for them.

He said in his resume that from 1952 to 1957 he was an assistant foreign news editor for the Associated Press, but the A.P. said that that title was created only two years ago.

Are you interested in sports? Do you have opinions you want heard? Do you want your point of view in an article? Can you be counted into travelling around the province following the teams that represent the university? Are you endowed with the ability to represent your college or faculty sports in The Varsity?

It's about time the people to whom this paper caters to get up off their rear ends and contribute to these pages. It's not hard finding things to write about. It's not even hard to write them. So why don't you submit something every now and then? Sheer laziness. It must be that, no one has ten minutes every other week to speak his piece. (We all know that is not true.)

The problem here is an obvious one. The Varsity sports desk is the loneliest in town. So far Stan Cappe has had to carry football on his shoulders. Which, as a matter of fact, he does very well. Anne Lloyd has promised hockey, and Jean Bubba-Carson has chosen swimming. But we need more. We have dozens more openings and just a few people to cover them. A full commitment isn't necessary, but it would of course help.

We are desperately interested in bodies to do their share in putting forth a sports page which shows a cross-section of thoughts and opinions that the general public can relate to.

To those who are willing to help out, all power to you! Drop in to The Varsity at 91 St. George, second floor and state your interests and stake a claim.

O-QIFC Football Summary

In O-QIFC action on the weekend, Queen's Golden Gaels defeated the Carleton Ravens four to one in a game that was marred by non-stop rain from start to finish. Queen's air attack was nullified by the weather and so their entire offensive yardage of 202 yards was acquired on the ground. The weather also squashed Carleton's passing game as the team's quarterback completed only one pass for a small gain.

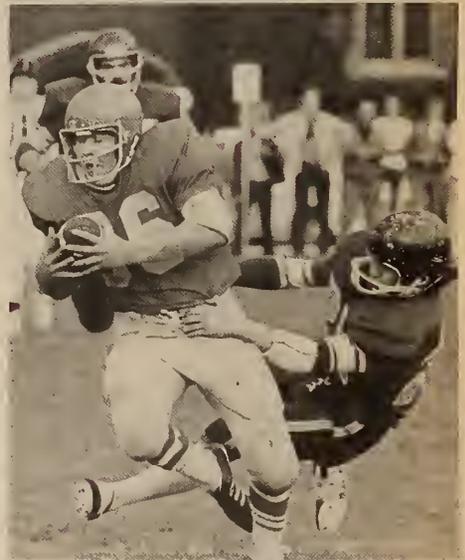

While the Ottawa Gee-Gees defeated Bishop's University 43-7, the York Yeomen were busy extending their winless streak to two years, two games. The Yeomen had a 16-9 lead after three quarters but decided that it couldn't end that way, so they very laboriously allowed two fourth quarter touchdowns to the Waterloo Warriors, who beat them by a score of 23-16.

Bill Hatanaka scored two touchdowns for York while Kevin Beagle added a field goal. Dave Brown and Paul Johnson picked up touchdowns for Waterloo and Tim Craine added a field goal. In other action, Guelph walked over McMaster to the tune of 45-0.

One of the highlights of the game was a 45-yard interception runback for a touchdown by Stan Strecker of Guelph. Guelph's five touchdowns were scored by Craig Holt, Vaughn Wright, Jim Mossup, while Bruce Morris rushed for two. The win is the second straight for Guelph who now have delusions of being number one.

Finally, Concordia managed a 31-27 decision over McGill Redmen on a touchdown scored with 1:42 remaining in the game. Wade Clare's third touchdown won the game for Concordia, which was a seesaw battle all the way through.

Blues-Laurier game a CIA plot

SPECIAL TO THE VARSITY — At the present time, behind the closed doors of Simcoe Hall there exists a committee which is investigating the recent work of the Campus Intelligence Agency (or the C.I.A.). It is unknown to most students because the members have banned the news media from attending.

The commission is headed by the Vice-President for Internal Affairs for the University, Mr. Frank Iacobucci. Mr. Iacobucci was appointed head of the commission by President John Evans after reports were received that the CIA was carrying on illicit operations on the campus and 'fooling' the public wherever they could. The Varsity Intelligence Agency (V.I.A.) acquired the information by means of wire taps and listening devices in position at Simcoe Hall. The following was discovered about the Varsity Blues game against Laurier last Saturday afternoon.

The Varsity Blues did not play Laurier on the weekend. It was discovered late last week that the Golden Hawks had no intention of playing the Blues at the Stadium on the weekend. The C.I.A. decided however that the fans could not be disappointed and that the show must go on! The necessary steps were taken and the massive preparation proved successful.

Head coach Ron Murphy was contacted in the usual way. While taking a shower he discovered a small tape recorder in the soap tray and upon turning it on he was 'let in' on the peculiar circumstances.

The Faculty Of Sewing was given a rush order for thirty-five Laurier Golden Hawks uniforms.

Dave Copp was contacted by means of a small radio in one of his golf balls. While addressing the ball he heard faint cries of "don't hit me! don't hit me!". Upon picking up the ball, he put it to his ear, (we don't know which one) and was clued in to the problem at hand. (His mission, should he decide to accept it was to stage the game and to fool the fans so as to protect them from being burned by the tickets costs. As usual should he or any of his party be caught or discovered the C.I.A. would disavow any knowledge of his actions. The golf ball of course blew up in five seconds.)

The game plan was set up and some of the players were as follows. Ron Murphy was taking Gord Taylor's place at quarterback. Dave Copp was a running back. The offensive and defensive line was the Blues own blocking sled powered by the Zamboni from Varsity Arena. The receivers were the Womens' Track Team, (that is another reason why the Golden Hawks passing game was so useless. The rest of the Laurier team was comprised of various clerks and information personnel from Hart House and the Benson Building.

The Blues were also informed of their predicament. They had to play in such a way as to make Laurier look like a strong team.

All the hard work and preparation proved successful and no one knew the difference on Saturday afternoon. The Blues allowed Dave Copp to score a few touchdowns and they took it easy on both Murphy and the Zamboni. The Faculty of Sewing and the Faculty of Disguise performed marvelous jobs with the Golden Hawks' sweaters and disguises respectively. (i.e. beards, hair, etc.). It was only after the game in the dressing rooms that the plot was discovered by a laundry man while picking up towels at the Laurier dressing room. The C.I.A. in view of their discovery appropriately compensated the old man with a life membership in a scuba diving course. He has been practicing at the bottom of Toronto Harbour for the last few days.

But what does all this mean? What of the real Laurier team? Why didn't they show up? What would have happened if they would have shown up? What of the old man?

At this point it would be appropriate to explain Laurier's actions.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier University allied with several other universities in endorsing the CIAU decision in regard to the Dave Pickett case. The University Of Toronto has joined the ranks of the OUA's supporters and is thus a rival of the Laurier policy. Laurier knew that the Stadium would have mostly Blues supporters, so in a move to create problems for the Blues, they decided late in the week not to appear.

The aforementioned course of events leaves us with several options of thought. A: The readers can disbelieve the entire article as a myth and curse the sports desk at the Varsity for waisting their time. B: The readers can believe the facts the article puts forth and admit that they couldn't tell the difference. C: The readers can disregard the entire page and pretend that they didn't read any of it. D: All of the above: None of the above.

For those who chose either A, or C, thanks for your time but don't bother reading on because the moral of the story is only subliminally important to you. To those readers whose choice was B, read on.

The facts are that the Dave Pickett case could have been avoided if someone would have remembered to change the OUA's eligibility rules last year. Therefore the moral of this story is obvious. "A slitch in times saves nine".

Radio Input gets plug

By MIKE SCOTT

Radio Input is now a step closer to becoming a reality following a SAC Council decision Wednesday night to purchase for the purpose of lease to Input up to $70,000 of capital equipment, and to provide an interim budget of up to $12,500.

The go ahead vote followed three hours of debate, chiefly among new council members, after a presentation by members of the Radio's interim board of directors.

The interim board presented examples of programming that will be embodied in the co-op style radio. Plans include airing amateur musical talent and coverage of events not carried by commercial stations and the CBC.

"Examples would be the recent CRTS hearings and the International Symposium on Crime," said station manager Richard Lafferty.

Radio board chairman, Dave Naylor attempted to refute a recent Varsity editorial which claimed Input Radio was merely the old U of T Radio under a new name with old faces.

Naylor said there was 93 years of combined communications experience on the interim board, and claimed the proposed FM station has attracted a large number of new faces with the professional experience to make the project work. Much of this experience comes from the corporate representatives the radio has co-opted.

Naylor announced the station's successful negotiation of an antenna site atop the Manu-Life Centre and added the interim board is making progress in reaching the Nov. 1 deadline for its $30,000 donation target.

SAC's financial commitment to Radio Input is contingent upon their realizing the necessary $30,000, on 33 per cent of the station's programming being of a campus nature, and that the structure of the board of directors remain the same for the next three years. So far, Input has a three year annual commitment of $2,500 from Xerox of Canada.

The meeting was marked by confusion around the radio issue due to new SAC council members unfamiliarity with the history of U of T Radio, and the Input Radio proposal.

SAC Communications commissioner John Tuzyk attempted to clarify doubts concerning the FM question with an eight page brief outlining the history of attempts made by U of T Radio for an FM license.

SAC Finance commissioner Michael Treacy displayed numerous briefs of past attempts the station made in obtaining FM certification and questioned the viability of the present one. Tuzyk replied that Input Radio has worked all summer preparing their brief and an audio-visual for their January CRTS hearings.

Other SAC Council members expressed their concern over committing future SAC funds to the station because SAC decisions and policies are usually not binding from one year to the next.

The SAC motion to grant funds to Radio Input included a commitment to the station's operating budget for the next three years.

"As a rule SAC decisions are not binding on future Councils, but in practice past commitments are usually carried over the years," explained Tuzyk. "It's a question of semantics," he added.

An amendment to recommend, rather than committing funds on future station operating budgets was easily passed by council.

Treacy questioned what he thought were exorbitant commitments from SAC towards the three-year operating budget of the station and moved to reduce the recommended figures for the two year period following the station's initial year of operation. However the Treacy motion was defeated.

An amendment to alter the proposed board structure for the radio was introduced by Danny Henry, an interim board member. Henry did not agree with SAC's position that 6 of the 17 non-campus representatives on the board should represent specified community groups. "This would hurt the flexibility that the Radio hopes to maintain to aid in its continuity," exclaimed Henry.

This amendment also failed as SAC approved the proposed board structure. The structure calls for 33 members, 10 of which will be SAC appointees.

A question was raised over the future of the satellite campus radio stations at Erindale and Scarborough should Radio Input obtain FM certification at the CRTS hearings.

Tuzyk was unable to elaborate but said that the two stations would be mentioned in Radio Input's brief to the CRTS, and they could potentially become production centres for the FM station. He also said the two stations have yet to be contacted about their future roles in the project.

Troy quits post

Gregg Troy, president of Erindale College Students Union, has resigned his post due to academic reasons. Troy's resignation was ratified at a Wednesday night meeting of the union's council.

Troy's resignation follows the rejection of an academic appeal Monday. Due to his involvement last year in the Erindale newspaper, Medium II, Troy's marks were not sufficient to prevent his suspension from the college. He had been on academic probation. Under the Erindale constitution, the president must be a student.

"It was the newspaper that cost him his appeal," said ECSU Information officer Dave Leslie.

Earlier this week, in a letter to The Varsity, Robert Callaghan, one of Troy's opponents in last year's election, suggested that Troy resign for other reasons. Cited was Troy's allegedly "deceitful, cynical and arrogant" attitude towards both the students and administration at Erindale.

Troy was unavailable for comment, but Information officer Leslie called the information supplied to The Varsity "wrong, that's w-r-o-n-g," Leslie pointed out that one charge, that Troy has spent $3,000 renovating the ECSU offices, was totally false. The money, according to Leslie, was spent by the Erindale College administration and not the Students Union.

"The only money that we spent was for shampooing the rug," said Leslie, "and that did not amount to $3,000."

Ray Pidzamecky, ECSU vice-president will take over as acting president until a new election can be called. A date will be set next week.

"Minamata" spreading

By MATHILDE VERHULST

The Minamata Disease Patients Alliance (MDPA) of Japan, a group which recently forced the Japanese government to provide $83 million in compensation to Minamata's mercury-diseased victims and their families, will visit Toronto this weekend.

The visit is sponsored by several concerned native peoples' groups and others in Toronto, including the Toronto Chapter of the Canadian Association in Support of the Native Peoples, the Native Canadian Centre of Toronto and Rikka, a Japanese-Canadian quarterly.

The visit comes two months after the Native Peoples Delegation visited Japan as guests of the MDPA. The public is invited to attend the dinners, film, open forums, and panel discussions which will continue all weekend.

The Native Peoples Delegation comprises members of the Grassy Narrows and White Dog Reserves, two Indian reserves in the Dryden-Kenora area where symptoms of mercury poisoning have been reported.

The mercury poisoning has been traced to the chlor-alkali plant of the Dryden Pulp and Paper Co., which is located 55 miles south-east of the White Dog and Grassy Narrows reserves. In the mid-fifties the disease was traced to the Chrisso Corporation in Minamata, a fishing and farming town on the southern island of Kyushu, Japan.

The mercury levels in the river fish which the area Indians have depended on commercially and as a diet staple for many years, are up to 30 times higher than acceptable government standards.

Organizers of this weekend's visit are quick to emphasize the seriousness of the methyl-mercury poisoning, now known as Minamata Disease.

Vicky Hunter, a member of the Native Studies Collective, one of this weekend's sponsors, said there is "more than a possibility that it (Minamata Disease) is showing up in Northern Ontario."

"The more subtle symptoms of the disease are showing up where there is mercury dumping by heavy industry," Hunter noted.

The symptoms of Minamata Disease can include: a tingling and growing numbness of limbs and lips, a lack of balance and co-ordination, slurring of speech, a heaviness in the back of the head, and tunnel vision.

In its advanced stages the disease causes the nervous system to degenerate. Spells of unconsciousness are common, and uncontrolled shouting and involuntary movements occur.

Ultimately, methyl-mercury

The library: Insecurity and boredom

By ERIC McMILLAN

What do the library workers want?

With the possibility of a library strike looming, students may be lifting their heads from their library books only now to ask this question, although the contract negotiations which broke down Tuesday are into their month.

The demand everyone understands is higher wages. As the dispute moves into conciliation, CUPE 1230 is asking for a $265 monthly increase for the 429 workers it represents. The average wage is presently $650. The increase would bring the average annual salary up to $10,980 from $7,800.

Figures produced by the CUPE Research Department show U of T workers last year were paid less than many other public and college library workers in Canada. However, CUPE is asking for parity with Ontario workers in general.

"We've adopted the position that the average amount of work done in the library is as much as the average work in Ontario," says union negotiator Jim Mayor, "and we should be paid accordingly."

Statistics Canada reports the average Ontario wage as $11,000 a year.

CUPE is also demanding a cost of living clause which would tie wages to the Consumer Price Index. They want retroactive compensation for ravages of inflation over the past two years of their previous contract. Compensation would amount to $1,500 per worker.

Job security issues are also primary considerations. Library negotiators rejected the union's request for a specified minimum staff level at the level of June 30 when the previous contract ended and for a "no lay-off" clause.

Issues, which the negotiations did not get around to discussing before breaking down, include the effect of computerization on job security, on-the-job training, and promotion by seniority.

Mayor pointed out the library's response to the non-monetary issues has been to "cost" them. The one hour per month the union wants for meetings, he said, was "costed" at $28,000 even though "the library is not going to hire extra help for that one hour every month."

The numbers

the people

By ERIC McMILLAN

What's it like to be a library worker at the Roberts?

"It's a dead-end nothing job" is how one worker summed it up.

"Very boring" is the judgement of a file clerk.

Another thought the job was better than others she has had.

To get the human story at the workers' level behind the contract dispute I asked a number of library workers at the Roberts why they needed the increased wages and job security.

One worker answered, "The fixed-price theory — that there's only so much money — has to be nailed to the wall."

He said pressure must be applied not only to the university which faces cutbacks on all fronts, but to the provincial government to let the universities have more money. "As it is," he said, "the budget cuts force us into a jungle where we have to compete with each other for funds."

Another was worried about the extra workload resulting from the dismissal of staff. Some claimed they are doing the same amount of work as always but the work piles up.

Is the increased workload affecting the service to students?

"The public is treated like shit" one staffer said.

"No, the public is treated well," another argued.

They are now, but what about in a month from now when the work is backed up?" asked a book searcher.

Regarding the quoted average wage of $7,800 a worker made the point that the median wage could be even lower since a few of those covered by the bargaining unit make much more money while a large number make less than $6,000.

Almost all those questioned had some post-secondary education and some had BA's or equivalent. Were any of them having trouble getting along on their present salaries?

All agreed that singles and married couples with both working could live adequately on what they were getting but that working parents were squeezed trying to provide for their families.

Were they willing to go on strike to support their demands?

"There's been talk of a strike for a very long time here," said a worker who did not want a strike but would honour the picket line if there is one.

Others were more enthusiastic and one complained, "The older workers don't want it."

Callaghan is no longer pugnacious

The man who once knocked out Hemingway is now short, fat and an amiable raconteur.

He's also tired of hearing about the Hemingway boxing episode.

Morley Callaghan spoke of his years in Paris with Hemingway and Fitzgerald to a capacity crowd Thursday at Brennan Hall, before reading from his fiction.

"I'm sick to death of hearing how I saw through Hemingway as a big masculine phony and knocked him out to prove it," he said. "I adored the man. He was my first admirer, the first guy who told me I was a real writer."

Through Hemingway and Fitzgerald, he said, his writing came to be read by people all over the world at a time he considered himself as just "a working newspaperman."

He called the old times "the days of high art" when "how you said something was all-important rather than the confessional aspects of the work." A story had to be perfect, he said, and the author's personality was kept out of it.

Callaghan called Norman Mailer "a showboat" and "the embodiment of the assertion of personality above the work." He said, he likes writers who are individuals and cited Robertson Davies as an example.

Other Canadian writers he appreciates are Margaret Laurence, "a good natural writer", and Marie-Claire Blais. Margaret Atwood he said "writes well", but he had "grave misgivings about her novel 'Surfacing.' It's like a thesis," he said.

Although Callaghan claims to hate nationalism, he argued English-Canadian writing is "more universal than anything in New York."

"Do you realize what a shocker that is?" he asked. "We've absorbed with our mother's milk the idea that every Canadian is a born poet," he

Food situation insecure says global expert

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET

President of the Worldwatch Institute, Lester Brown, has called for the establishment of a joint U.S.-Canadian Commission on Food Policy to avert "increasingly unmanageable food shortages".

In a lecture at Medical Sciences Auditorium, the noted food authority asserted that global "food security is less than at any time immediately following World War II." At the same time, he noted "the degree of dependence on North America is increasing". The lecture was the first in the Marfleet-Falconer series on the global food situation.

"Literally scores of countries have become important food importers over the past quarter century," he noted, "but not one new country has emerged as a major exporter during this period."

Consequently a North American food policy must be developed in which, according to Brown, the role of importing countries, ecological factors, and decreasing supplies of water and energy must all be coordinated in a global context.

Otherwise, "unless recent dependence trends are altered, restrictions on grain exports from North America will become commonplace."

In particular, North America must assess the role of the Soviet Union. Brown charged that the USSR's entry into world markets as a major importer "is a major source of instability".

"Recent year to year fluctuations in Soviet grain harvests have exceeded the normal gains in the world grain crop".

The Soviets have both a short growing season and an inefficient agricultural sector which has led to consistent food shortages in the last five years.

Brown sees some hope in the situation. He predicted, "The Soviet Union's dependence on North America might encourage them to decrease before spending" when they see their intentions are not antagonistic.

Smoke 'em quick folks

By BLAKE WOODSIDE

Smoking may soon be banned in classrooms, if the campus Non-Smoker's Rights Association (NSRA) has its way.

The fledgling organization held its first meeting at U of T on Wednesday evening, and priorities listed by the group's president, Elizabeth Dixon, include their achieving status as a recognized campus group and making an immediate appeal to all professors to ban smoking in their classes until an official decision can be made by Governing Council.

Comprised mainly of people to whom cigarette smoke is harmful because of some medical disorder, either allergy or lung disease, the group is making its appeal on humanitarian rather than missionary grounds.

"If only twenty percent of the students in any particular room are smoking, this is enough to affect the other eighty percent," said NSRA president Rosalie Berlin.

The group has found mixed reaction to their personal appeals in the classroom. "Some people look at you as if you were crazy," said one member of the group. Still another member remarked: "When you tell them that you're allergic to tobacco smoke they say, 'You're kidding' and blow smoke into your face until you have an allergy attack and they are convinced."

Many members of the group said they were afraid to ask people to stop smoking for fear it might ostracize the class and the professor, especially if the instructor himself smoked.

However, they hope this situation may clear up as soon as the group gains official recognition from the university. One member, who has recently moved to U of T from Calgary said, "It's becoming quite an issue out there. Some students actually carry around fire extinguishers."

The group bases much of its hope on the Bill of Rights for Non-Smokers, ratified by the Ontario Legislature in November of last year. It states in part, "Non-Smokers have the right to breathe clean air free from harmful and irritating tobacco smoke. This right supercedes the right to smoke when the two conflict."

Scar-Erin filled up

By LAUREL BOWMAN

Scarborough and Erindale campuses are full this year for the first time since their establishment.

Many Scarborough area students have been denied admittance to Scarborough College due to an influx of students refused admission to St. George campus.

Downtown students with slightly higher averages have edged out qualified Scarborough area students because of lack of space and the selection procedure for accepting applicants.

In the past, Scarborough College was able to accept any applicant with an average of 67 per cent or higher.

Students refused admittance at the downtown campus were often sent to Scarborough or Erindale, where the criterion for acceptance was simply a high school diploma. This system was continued at Scarborough without considering where the applicant lived.

At Erindale, however, priority was given to those applicants living in the Mississauga area, or those applying for a course only offered at the college.

Follow the leader if you can find someone

Ten free issues of the Varsity's first issue and a can of worms goes to the person who can properly identify the origin of this phrase: "Why doesn't SAC do something about this?"

Irate students? Scarborough and Erindale reps? No. The question is most heard from the members of SAC's own General Council. What seems to be the problem?

The first rub seems to be one of leadership. Somehow those people who run for the position of representative on the General Council don't feel a part of the entire decision-making process. According to SAC executive member John Tuzyk, who is justifiably upset at that sentiment, many of the elected members are interested in what they can get without asking what they can give. They prefer to think of themselves as observers rather than participants in SAC work.

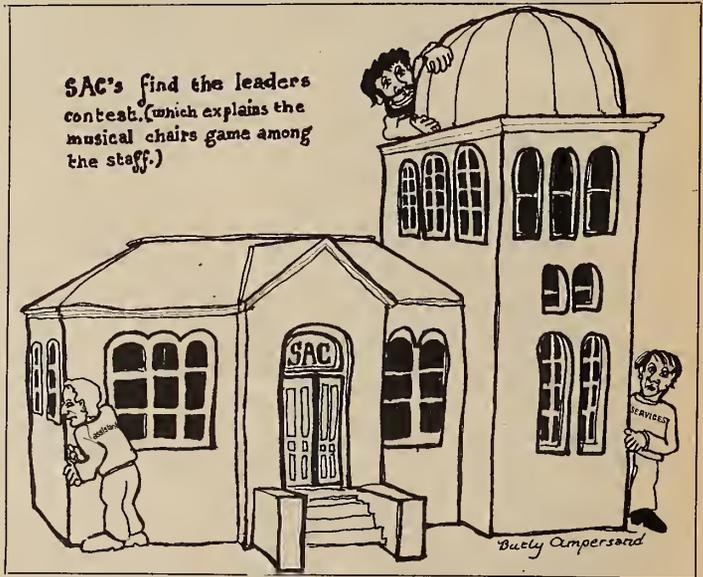

In a political situation like the above, the people in charge must take their job seriously and the first step in that direction is to make sure that all those underneath take their jobs as seriously. People in volunteer situations generally need a push to make them realize that work needs doing and that they must be responsible for at least a portion of the dirty jobs, the legwork and the inevitable paper-shuffling. Without that, an executive is hampered.

An illustration is necessary. Last week SAC's most harried worker, Don Boynton, resigned due to, in his own words "lack of support" from the SAC Executive. Boynton was put into a difficult position as SAC Services assistant earlier in the summer with no campus contacts, little idea of how the university operated, and little help from the executive. Boynton's job normally working under a Services Commissioner, was accomplished without one; he ended up being hampered by his inability to make executive decisions.

The lack of a Services commissioner was due to two classic cases of irresponsibility. Bill Dennault was elected in the spring but during the summer could not find the necessary time to conjure up an orientation program. He was closely followed by Eddie Able's Magic Disappearing Act (Eddie took his job seriously for about ten minutes). Now the position will be filled by Doug Gerhardt, who is shifting over from Education commission. There has or course been no continuity in a Services program, and SAC has lost one of its most capable workers, who probably wouldn't have minded serving three masters, but couldn't find one.

It's probable that this sort of laissez-faire politics is not evident through the rest of the executive. But an executive is doing only half of its job if it does not ensure that the rest of the body does its, too. Executive leadership requires more than addressing the issues, it means above all addressing the people, in a loud voice if necessary.

Whose job is it to keep tabs on all these people, especially to make sure that the council members give as well as receive? In the end, it's the president's. He may have been elected on a platform that has everything to do with issues and nothing to do with leadership, but the former is useless unless he has a tight enough control on the latter. The General Council needs a good talking to from Gord Barnes if they are to be anything more than a convenient rubberstamp. Failing that, it is up to the constituents to keep tabs on what your people are doing over there with your money.

Varsity encouraging "parochial interests?"

To the editor

Recently a Varsity editorial questioned the value of participation by students in the Campus Coalition Against Cut-Backs. Students, it was said, should not be found in the same bed as faculty, who are known to stab them in the back.

It would be unfortunate to lose sight of the genuine, university-wide interests pursued by the Coalition and notices only the squabbles between University groups. All estates, students, faculty, and non-academic staff, are concerned to persuade the Ontario Government to provide adequate funds for a high quality university education for all qualified students.

Coalition representatives openly concede that the interests of each estate within the University are not identical. For example, CUPE's demands for a $3,180 wage increase, a reduced work week, and an additional 2 week's holiday, etc. would cost the University some 2.4 million dollars. At a time when the University administration is committed to reducing its budget by 8 million dollars, meeting the Library workers' demands would necessarily cause a severe reduction to the rest of the community of Library or other services. It would also augment pressure for a tuition increase. And, if the Library workers strike, lack of access to books will harm students' course work.

No, all of the interests of students, faculty and non-academic staff are not reconcilable. But does disagreement, even on major issues, mean that we should not meet to arrange common action regarding our common concerns vis a vis the Ontario government? And is it not of value to have the regular opportunity to talk with each other about our differences closer to home?

Rather than encouraging each estate to cling narrowly to its own parochial interests, May I urge the Varsity in future to consider the welfare of the university as a whole and support rather than knock efforts to pursue those interests which all members of the University have in Common.

Support committee responds to Treacy

To the editor:

In a letter (Monday, September 22) Michael Treacy expressed the opinion that students should not support the library workers, and that cutbacks should be fought' only when they directly affect the classroom.

All aspects of education, however, complement each other. Cutbacks in the library will affect the classroom. Under the current program of cutbacks library services will deteriorate more. Students will encounter longer waits for books. New books will take longer to reach the stacks. Library hours may be cut further. Thanks to protests from students and faculty, full services will resume October 1, but with staff cut by more than 20. The poor wages and working conditions that exist now make it hard to attract and hold onto staff. This could result in a shortage of qualified staff.

The library workers want increased wages, to the average wage in Ontario, with a cost of living clause, and a retroactive cost of living bonus. Due to inflation they have lost $1,500 over the past two years. They want job security, a new maternity leave clause, as well as more union rights.

How will these demands benefit students? Students are fighting for cost of living adjustments in student assistance programs. Unity between students and others in this area would cost of living adjustments closer for all.

Upon graduation many students will work in institutions similar to the U of T library. Fighting for better conditions for library workers now will benefit them in terms of better quality, better paying jobs. In general, increasing the standard of living for library workers now will give an added impetus to the fight for a better standard of living for all, including students.

In order to maintain the standards of living and education, such as they are, and to force them up, we must unite to oppose all cutbacks, specifically library cutbacks at this time.

What can you do? Get involved with the Library Workers Support Committee. It meets at 5:15 p.m. Mondays in Roberts room No. 4049. Come to the rally in front of Roberts Tuesday, October 7, between 12:30-1:30 p.m. For more information call Doug Croker at 928-8973.

"Anti-student" labelling of faculty "less than fair" to individuals

To the Editor:

I wish to comment on your editorial of September 19, 1975. A lot of time and energy has been spent by representatives of the organizations who take part in the so-called Common Front, the more appropriate label being U of T Coalition against Cutbacks.

The saying of a fellow Slav (Jan Nasaryk, the first president of the Czechoslovak Republic in 1918) comes to mind: "It is hard to change a bad thing to good, and even harder to change a good thing to better." Looking around the country, the continent and the world at other universities, most of us find our good. Constant maintenance plus creative energy are needed just to keep the level, let alone make it better. The government's reluctance to engage the province's resources for this purpose is the prime target of the coalition's activities, in spite of members' conflicting interests in other areas. In labelling certain groups as anti-student, you stand less than fair to individual members of such groups, and less than constructive to the University Community as a whole.

Ten fingers and a chunk of musical insight

If feminists want to increase the proportion of women performing in our concert halls, the piano keyboard is not the place they should concentrate their energies. Conductors, soloists, whatever, but not pianists! I don't say this out of sexism, but out of common sense: there are women pianists today that outclass all but a few of their male counterparts, and the record companies, holding as they do the key to international success, are paying attention to them.

First, an old established virtuoso: Alicia de Larrocha. First known as a strong interpreter of the music of her native Spain, her recorded repertoire has branched out into the music of Mozart, Ravel, and a host of other composers. A good introduction to her art can be heard on Mostly Mozart, a 1974 album recorded in conjunction with the New York music festival of the same name. Featuring three Mozart items and a performance of the Bach-Busoni "Chaconne" that defies any other recorded performance I've heard in its transcendent beauty, the album is a joy to listen to. (London CS-6866).

Larrocha's Spanish efforts can be heard in a complete recording of Albeniz' Iberia, glowing with her native approach to rhythm. (London CSA-2255).

1975 was a "year" with many names — an International Women's Year, and a Ravel year (centennial of his birth) just to name a couple. Quite fitting, then, that Larrocha's newest record celebrates both these events (although the women's year connection is only incidental). Both Ravel's piano concertos are technically demanding works, characteristic down to the barlines of the composer's style. Unlike the composer's String Quartet, though, there is no danger that either piano concerto will ever be Bobbsey-twinned off with a companion Debussy piece. (In fact, it has been the fate of both composers' quartets, in each case the only one each of them wrote, to appear in perpetual company on LP. The works complement each other stylistically, they sound acceptably pretty, and — most important — they each fill one record side neatly.)

There is a brooding quality to the concertos that mark them off from the rest of Ravel's works; the gloominess is most pronounced in the more famous of the two, its fame coming partly from its novelty. The "Concerto for the Left Hand Alone" was written for a pianist who had lost one arm in the World War. It might have been more aptly titled a "concerto for one hand and one foot", since the pedalling needed to sustain the chords is vast and complex. If Ravel's performer had been a double amputee (one arm, right leg) we never would have had this enigmatic but masterful work.

Christina Ortiz is a new name on the concert scene, and in person looks more like a country and western singer than a concert pianist. But the performance at the keyboard gives the lie to the fresh-scrubbed look: this girl has talent to spare, and has arrived on the LP plateau with a pair of highly entertaining discs. She hails from Brazil, had an early success, studied with all the right teachers, made a stunning New York debut, etc. So why bother with a recap of the bio?

Proof of her talents lies primarily in the first of the two albums, a rendition of the two Shostakovich Piano Concertos. This is a risky program to take on, because old Dimitri is still very much alive and may kick back. Even more risky: the composer himself recorded these two works for the same record company in 1957, along with his early "Three Fantastic Dances", a short solo-piano vehicle. True to form, this same 3-minute filler item appears on Ortiz' disc, which I'm sure is no accident. The Shostakovich-performed album is a landmark one, which not only sets the standard of interpretation, but is also a crackling, dynamic performance. In short, she has chosen a far more risky debut vehicle than yet another reading of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1.

In a head-to-head comparison with the composer's performance, I'm torn: Ortiz' performance is more spectacular, recorded better, more muscular. But Shostakovich's bears the stamp of authenticity, and comes off as more playful, inventive and — most of all — avoids the trap of schmaltziness in the middle movement of the second concerto, a dreaming, songlike thing that lulls the unwary player into too much rubato and all the antics of a Chopinze. Despite a valiant effort, Ms. Ortiz falls prey to the urge to slide into those whalelike phrases.

It isn't likely that anyone will second-guess Ortiz on her second release, a collection of piano music from her native Brazil called Alma Brasileira. Except for Heitor Villa-Lobos, the names are largely unknown to North American ears, but are largely a pleasing lot. Very pastoral at times, occasionally vibrant, as in Garnier's "Dansa Negra" and "Dansa Brasileira". There aren't any transcendent masterpieces here, but a lot of expertly-played little delights, like Villa-Lobos' "A Prole Do Bebe", the "doll" suite. (Angel S-37110)

Bravo to both these women, then, the veteran and the newcomer. All of which goes to remind us, if we ever needed a Women's Year to remind us, that ten fingers and a good chunk of musical insight are all that the keyboard demands. Sex simply doesn't enter into the picture.

Suffering, confusion mark Jurtra's view of marriage

Last week at the 11th International Film Festival in Stratford, Claude Jutra's new film, Pour le meilleur et pour le pire (For Better and For Worse) was shown for the first time in Canada.

Jutra (Mon Oncle Antoine, Kamouraska) explores the marriage of Helen (Monique Miller) and Bernard (Claude Jutra), a middle class couple living in a Montreal highrise.

Jutra shows us marriage as an irrational, love-hate relationship. There are moments of tenderness yet there are also more acts of extreme cruelty. The couple love each other, yet they must also torture one another. Helene declares: "I'm going to make you suffer for the rest of your life."

In Jutra's conception of the marriage there is nothing new. We have seen it in Bergman's Scenes From a Marriage. But if Jutra has nothing new to say, he has a new way of saying it.

When we watched Scenes From a Marriage we remained isolated from the characters on the screen (as we do with most films). But in Pour le meilleur et pour le pire, Jutra forges an emotional link between the audience and the characters by structuring the film in parallel with the progress of the marriage.

As the film opens (as the marriage begins) it seems to be a trivial and silly comedy. The couple are just too loving, the games they play too cute, their squabbling too insignificant. The viewer understands everything and is in full control.

However, as communication between Helene and Bernard begins to break down, the viewer begins to lose that control he has. We share in Bernard's confusion and in his own lack of control in the marriage.

Events that are real and common become unreal, while unreal events become very real. For example, going to work for Bernard becomes a surrealistic, Kafka-like journey. His car won't start; when he tries to hail a taxi they speed by him. Finally he manages to have one of the cabs stop but it pulls up onto the sidewalk and nearly runs him over. The Shakespearean disorder of these scenes is further heightened by black and white photography.

Later in the apartment Helene crashes through a window. Bernard catches her before she can fall. Helene hangs from the twentieth floor screaming at her husband: "Don't touch me. Take your hands off me."

One assumes at first that this is not real, that it is happening in the imagination of one of the characters, but Jutra presents evidence that convinces one that this episode was a very real one.

Bernard and Helene float along in a rare moment of conjugal bliss.

Later however, a visitor asks about the window and Helen tells him that her husband broke it with his heel. Is she telling a lie or did the whole episode occur in the mind of one of the characters? We are never sure.

Jutra splits the world into that of the real and unreal (colour and black and white). The real world is inside the apartment house, the unreal world is beyond the walls.

Unreal things of the outside become real on the inside, but the couple are still unable to relate to them. A mysterious woman dressed in black appears and disappears magically on the outside; on the inside she knocks on the door and is known to the couple as a madwoman that lives "downstairs". Yet whether she is on the outside or inside, she haunts and terrifies the couple. In the end Helene and Bernard attack the woman and beat her.

Jutra comments: "The woman is a black creature that lives inside of you and which terrifies you, makes you feel guilty and is the source of anguish."

In many ways Jutra's film is too mysterious. This is probably because he tends to be more emotional in his direction rather than intellectual. His film is saturated with symbolism but many of his symbols he chooses unconsciously. Jutra often doesn't know himself what many of the things and events in his film mean. When asked what he is trying to say, he replies: "I don't know; I just made a film. I'm never trying to 'say something'."

Pour le meilleur et pour le pire is a harsh and uncompromising look at marriage. It is a cold film abandoning the "pretty" photography of Jutra's earlier works.

The film is scheduled to open in Toronto and Montreal on October 10th.

Callaghan offers shallow dialogue, stilted narrative, and narcissism

A Fine and Private Place
Morley Callaghan

MacMillan of Canada, $9.95

Morley Callaghan has soft blue eyes and great natural composure. He has such a solid fresh-faced air of well-being that no one would believe he is a man who delights in criminals and sometimes gets them mixed up with saints. His unlined face with not a wrinkle in it has a high colour and in him is a kind of relaxed power. Some would say he has a friendly garageman's manner; others would insist that he has a cool lordly ease. He's really a tame pussycat. He's also a tiger. A hidden tiger.

We've never met. But Eugene Shore the central figure in Callaghan's new novel A Fine and Private Place is so embarrassingly like Callaghan himself that one feels safe, if not in fact bound, to use the phrases such as those above that he uses in describing Shore to describe him.

A Fine and Private Place is about an elderly Toronto novelist who is unjustly neglected by his fellow townfolk and it is by an elderly Toronto novelist who feels very bitterly that he is unjustly neglected by his fellow townfolk. It's a situation that does not make for great reading. The novel is in fact, Callaghan's Maurice (not a particularly good book either because of the intrusion of the author's emotions). Unlike E.M. Forster, though, Callaghan doesn't love another man; he loves himself. Also unlike Forster, Callaghan has not committed his book to posthumous publication. The grave's a fine and private place — and very silent — so why wait?

The novel is a veritable pseud's encyclopaedia of stilted narrative and shallow dialogue. The plot merely serves to hold the stereotypes and poison pen portraits apart. Nevertheless it is an immensely enjoyable book. Never once did I feel a twinge of pity for Callaghan in writing such a silly, self-serving work. The book gives one an exhilarating sense of self-satisfaction in being able to recognize a novel as a very bad one indeed so very easily. One puts it down feeling renewed, refreshed; no matter how much one might like to, it is difficult to read good literature all one's days; but duty has been done, bad literature has been read; one has earned the opportunity for the good.

Shore's style, Callaghan says, "was unadorned and colloquial. It could even be called commonplace", but although it may irritate at first, "the ease of the style and the story take over". The story never really gets up off the ground but the style hovering as it does between that of a CBC play and a pulp novel is lively. Lisa, the woman in the novel, (who laughs "the laugh he had always wanted to hear from a woman — deep and husky, a warm dark laugh, coming out of her whole being") has "a head like the Egyptian queen Nefertiti". At the same time no doubt increasing her beauty she "is wearing a small brown leather miniskirt with a black crepe blouse and black stockings — and the black legs, and Lisa's long black hair "make your eyes go to the brown miniskirt," Callaghan adds. Shore dies in the novel. Lisa decides to wear her black dress to the funeral; it has "such a simple elegant expensive look to it".

The novel does provoke a few unanswered questions:

What did Northrop Frye ever do to Callaghan that he should be so pettily if vacuously satirized in it as Dr. Morton Hyland? Not pay him enough attention? (Or receive too much attention himself?) Callaghan has Hyland-Frye say about Shore-Callaghan that he is "essentially a minor talent with no real sense of mythopoeia and was quite outside the perennial stream in literature". He is, in turn, described as a "pickling bastard" who looks "very theological" but who is full of "false humility" — and he and his method are described as "an albatross" around the neck of Canada's English Lit grad students.

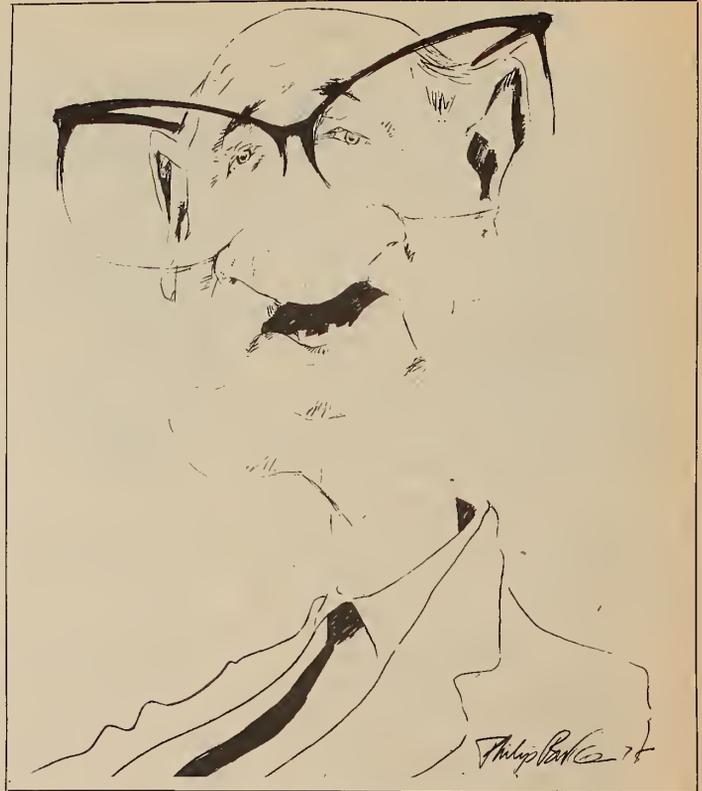

Who is the model for Al Dawson who becomes haunted by what a good novelist Shore-Callaghan is and who conveniently says such things as (apropos one Shore-Callaghan novel), "The criminal saint. It's incredible but there it is. Twenty years before Genet. Yet it's not the saint of Genet and Sartre. In fact, I've never been sure that Sartre understands saints...". Only possible contender I can think of is Barry Callaghan. And perhaps there is a father's love involved here. Al (Shore always calls Al "Al" and Al always calls Shore "Sir") is described as "pale and thin from living on hamburgers and cornflakes... his eyes are full of nervous energy... he looked like Jesus just out of the desert".

Would Callaghan have dared to publish this work if Edmund Wilson (the discoverer of Callaghan to whom he has hitched his wagon and who appears in the novel as Stanley Kunitz) were still living? Wilson did not make it his life purpose to win justice for Callaghan as "a master who ought to be read wherever the English language was spoken". That suggestion as it is phrased in the novel was made in one chapter of O Canada. Wilson published many other books, and outside Canada, and inside it as well, maybe everywhere in Toronto except at Callaghan's, he is remembered more for those others than he is for that one.

But not least among the unanswered questions is that, as Al notes in the novel, until now Callaghan has been "content to be as anonymous as one of those old sculptors who worked on the cathedral of Chartres, living only in the light their work cast on them. And now...?" Why the change?

If it is simply a process of aging then others are aging far better. One can understand the temptation towards the end of a life for a concern with how one's reputation will survive after one. It's a common valetudinarianism. The odd thing though that Callaghan seems not to have realized is that if one lets that concern take control then it may serve as a means of judgment far more effective than anything that has preceded it. Callaghan, indulging not so much in egotism as in narcissism, seems to take more satisfaction in Edmund Wilson's description of him as a novelist than in his novels and this novel in particular, which is so insistent on Shore-Callaghan's greatness, the result, not unlike that in the scene in the Wizard of Oz, in which Toto reveals the identity of the Great Oz, is a disturbing taste of cynical manipulation and sterile vanity.

CONTRACT DISCUSSIONS

The G.A.A. is holding a series of meetings in the week of September 29 to October 3 to discuss the contract proposals which the bargaining committee will be presenting to the university. Departmental representatives will also be elected at these meetings.

Look at the table below for the date and time of your department's meeting.

A general membership meeting will be held on Wednesday October 8 to elect a new executive for the upcoming year and to vote on bargaining priorities.

Contracts are won or lost by the amount of support given to them.

Come to the meetings and make sure your particular department's interests are well represented.

Artists and other aesthetes used to have to starve in wretched garrets like the above, until they realized that working together was the way to improve things.

Co-ops give artists control over their work

We tend to think of the starving artist as a thing of the past — if he complains at all it's because the Canada Council grant hasn't come through quickly enough. In addition to this the art market is highly inflationary and has been for a long time so one imagines that artists are reaping fantastic profits. Nevertheless it still may not be easy for an artist to make a living.

Substantial grants are not easy to get and even an artist who is lucky enough to be shown in a commercial gallery may well find the costs prohibitive and the rewards insubstantial. After the costs of framing (up to $50 a painting), materials, studio, plus just keeping alive, most commercial galleries charge fees of $300 and up to exhibit as well as taking 40 per cent commission from sales. Considering that an exhibit might take a year's preparation, the artist could even be in debt after a successful show.

All of which provided incentive for a group of young Toronto artists to band together last year as the Artist's Cooperative Toronto (ACT). The cooperative bases its operations around a beautiful century-old mansion at 424 Wellington St. W. on which they have a ten year lease. Four coop members, John and Marilyn Leonard, Glen Elliott and Jamie Lyons, live and work there, while others are scattered about the city.

Their great pride is the gallery, recently renovated and rebuilt by coop members who shared the costs of $3000. Not only does this mean permanent showing space for ACT members and associates but the only charge to exhibit is the rent on the room ($70 for two weeks).

"We didn't want a cooperative with firm membership rules", explained John Leonard, "so we set up a nucleus of about seven or eight people with expertise in all areas of the arts to plan and contribute." Around this nucleus are many associates and less active members. They want to remain as flexible as possible, working with outside artists who want to exhibit and adding to their membership "in order to keep it a self-rejuvenating thing".

They were quick to point out, however, that "we have to insist on high standards to keep it in our own interest." If the quality of the individual shows is high then, they believe, the coop as a whole benefits from the exposure.

Already, Art Bank, the Canada Council collection, has purchased $3000 worth of work from them and public response has been good, in spite of what they describe as low pressure sales tactics.

John Leonard realistically refers to the coop as a "vehicle in the interest of artists" and happily there is a minimum of hype and pretension surrounding their operation.

Nonetheless they are obviously all friends, helping one another and enjoying their liberation from the established system — and not merely in a financial sense.

Not only do they have more control over the timing and arrangement of the exhibits than in a commercial gallery but, as Marilyn Leonard said, "it's a good feeling to do it personally and people actually seem to prefer buying from the artists."

Occasionally they have the chance to do something purely for fun such as last February's Valentine Show where drawings and prints were all going for $1.40 and $14.00. Financially they were lucky if they broke even on the frames but, as a strictly non-commercial endeavour, it was jokingly felt to be "spiritually cleansing".

For next spring ACT is planning a show which they will select from the major art schools "to introduce the best of the Arts graduates." Not only is this an excellent opportunity for the students involved but ACT is attracting new talent to itself by sponsoring them.

The cooperative strives for diversity, preferring not to make the traditional distinction between crafts (jewellery, furniture, weaving) and fine art. Among the resident artists Marilyn is a weaver (they recently opened a shop called Romney Wools on Jarvis St.), John is a realist painter and Jamie and Glen are both abstractionists.

They do not spend much time criticizing one another's work but when asked if they were afraid of becoming a kind of mutual admiration society the answer was emphatically no.

They feel that by encouraging new talent and directions they will remain open and dynamic. The cooperative imposes no dogma or regulations upon its associates.

The artists stress the importance of community, socially in their "feasting and drinking" and artistically as well. "Working together is an energy creating thing", said John. "We feed off one another's energy and so become more productive."

When I left, Glen was helping Jamie to build the last frames for his show which opened on Sunday. It turned out to be a show which justified ACT's pride in their standards.

The large canvases belong to the area of modern art known as colour field abstractions. In this case acrylic paint is applied using spray guns to create areas of flat colour.

The series is called "Rainbow. Provenum Paintings" and in all the paintings a rectangular "proscenium" motif is used which echoes the frame and serves to articulate the space. It also creates a feeling of depth, a sense of looking through into a dream setting of softly glowing shapes and romantic colours.

Devil's Rain: elusive charms of a stock screamer

Hot voodoo! On my mind... Once it was dolls, made up to look like whomever you cursed, and stuck with a pin here and there to show you cared. A good way to put a stop to her running around, or all that homework, right? But that was before Papa Doc himself died, and they walked on the moon, and London bridge got moved to Texas. Now there's The Exorcist and Earthquake and Ben and Hilda and Them and Us, and... Klatu Barada Micto is on a Ringo Starr album and Divine is famous for eating doggie poo in Pink Flamingoes. It's what you might call the Sensational Seventies, where people get eaten alive, eliminated in the primaries, kidnapped by the C.I.A. or the Manson family, wiped out by a plague of killer bees from Mexico or a mass default on the municipal bonds of the Big Apple. The Age of Fear and Loathing, and Jerry Ford. Which is important, because here we are in the American midwest, the darkest evening of the year, and peering out of her bungalow window in a black fright wig is Ida Lupino, muttering something about a fresh cup of coffee. Her good old boy John is there, his whitehaired wisdom showing in every slow old movie he makes. The camera pans across one of the truly great technicolour crucifixes of all time, hanging on the nearby wall, and in bursts William Shatner, his big-browed cowboy hat full of rain and Inner Meaning. Music sting. Cut.

QUESTIONS.

1. If you were making this movie, how long would it take you to produce: a) the devil worshippers, b) the Secret Message, c) any rational, compelling explanation for these events? Would you believe about two hours?

2. Having come so far in the rain, how long would it take you as Captain Kirk to go back out in it, looking for a truck which you'd heard pull up in the driveway? Even if you thought it was your kidnapped father?

3. At $3.50 a go, would you say the price was right?

But the titles, shot over Bosch's Garden of Earthly Delights, showed promise: full of a newfangled, technological torturousness, aided and abetted by Al De Lory's stomping, dirgelike music, it built up to something inferentially medieval, scary and potentially mind-blowing. Granted, sitting there in the quizzical dark, you couldn't say exactly what, but... now the plot sickens, as they say, and as soon as big Bill is outside again, finding a voodoo doll pinned to the steering wheel of his father's truck, why, wham mo, lights flash on and off in the house, there's the banging and screaming right out of Horror Castle and — well, we're off, with Ida among the undead and William about to crucified upside down and turned into a zombie, and Ernest descendants of old Ernie have come drygulating our heroes again, and... But the fun of the thing is that in modern times we don't believe things like that, see, they're just figments of the imagination, see, or maybe the subconscious. So what we have is Eddie Albert, silverhaired old Parapsychology wizard, and his assistant Tom Skerrit, delving into this young thing's subconscious, see, and what should she turn up but this devil's mass, and... since Skerrit is Shatner's brother, anyway, hang the family resemblance and just let's say he's adopted or something, why the whole Mod Squad soon turns up in Redstone (Come in under the shadow of this Red Rock) and...

But that's enough of the plot. Sufficient to notice its awkward, squidlike, monstrous improbability, every arm of it waving some gesticulating major character, all of whom are destined to get together in some extremely uncomfortable way before long.

All this is prelude, unbelievably enough, to the main scene in which the devil-worshippers, once bewitched Billy has broken the Devil's Rain bottle, all turn into wax themselves and ooze away. You may say it's only a little makeup, some running wax and a couple of rubber gloves, partially inflated, and some handy asphalt, lying around for "special effects." You may say that Ok, so the devil may not look like this, but does that mean he has to look like Ernest Borgnine?

Borgnine, in a role his face was born to play, living it up as Satan himself. And not only that (as they say in the movies) but witch-burnings, fire from heaven and E.S.P. and a black mass right here in the town of Redstone, in the good old U.S.A. Sound interesting?

Since the sub-plot of this movie involves those who really died about 1720, and are living through a kind of instant replay in 1975, the circumstances take a little too long to explain. Suffice to say that The Devil's Rain is not the literal rain, although it may be that too; but a glass bottle, a kind of Plymouth Rock colour-TV, in which the souls of some imprisoned devil-worshippers have been waiting all these years for Ernie to find his book of attendance and lead them all off to hell. Seeing that William Shatner's first wife (the one from way back when) stole the book and the family has handed it down for generations, you can easily see why in modern-day America, operating out of (what else?) a ghost-town, the film is only a celluloid illusion anyway, a running blur of poor definition in which one distortion is as good as the last. You may say that colour television has all of us in love with the dissolve, wherefrom we get the idea that... All I say is that if you can watch hamfisted Willy Wonderful handling that Loblaws meat special in front of the butcher's block again after all this, and not shudder, well you've probably been asleep. Remember when it was your next-door neighbour unpacking those seed pods in his basement there, back in the frightful '50's? While the whole town slept, and the half-ton pickups were full of bodies and the state police wouldn't believe you, and...? Somebody wrote a poem about this one. It goes, "My candle's burning at both ends, it will not last the night..." Just be sure that when it goes out, you aren't caught out there, in the rain, with your flesh feeling funny and your face kind of loose or if you do, don't dare look in a mirror, because...

system of production where certain standards can be maintained but never exceeded, resulting in blandness and stagnation. The underground audience, although very small, seemed to understand this, and was excited by Passe Muraille's choice.

Kinch resigned, claiming he didn't have the time to give to such a project. He was replaced by Paul Thompson, a native of Prince Edward Island. Thompson had recently returned from Lyons, France, where he had apprenticed for two years with Roger Planchon's Municipal Theatre. Some stories have it that Thompson was a ruthless, tight-fisted manager.
Whether this folklore is true, or another attempt to find a genuine Canadian cultural hero, Thompson did manage to hold the theatre together. To maintain a theatre whose greatest advantages are realized under conditions of near-chaos is difficult. But to maintain such a theatre as long as Thompson has, and make it flourish, is a remarkable achievement.

Beginning with Thompson's

DOUKHOBORS, where nudity once again prodded Torontonians toward realizing that underground theatre, was engaged in a different kind of activity, Passe Muraille slowly evolved a system of collective creations. In this approach, the entire cast resorches a subject, and with the help of a director, and sometimes a writer, puts together a show from the material they have collected. Some of these shows have been about Canadian historical controversies. Rich Salutin's "1837:
THE FARMERS' REVOLT" was one of the first to bring large audiences and popular success to Passe Muraille. On other occasions, the company travelled outside Toronto, and spent a summer talking to the locals about the history of the area. "THE FARM SHOW. UNDER THE GRAWACKE, about a northern mining community, and OIL, set in Petrolia, Ontario were all put together in this way. Interestingly enough, the shows elicited tremendous gut reactions when shown to the people the shows were about, a measure of the kind of value Passe Muraille's kind of theatre can have.

These shows are all very much in keeping with at least one of Passe Muraille's original intentions, to help Canadians know more about their own history, and develop a home-grown understanding of these subjects, as opposed to regarding these events from the point of view of someone else's history. (i.e.: "Sir
John A. was OUR George Washington")

Another of Passe Muraille's original intentions was realized more through misfortune than specific intention. Passe Muraille originally also referred to itself as 'Theatre Without Walls.' This has often literally been the case. Even with the success the theatre has enjoyed, it has been unable to hold on to a permanent space. When Holy Trinity Church was torn down to make way for the new Eaton's Centre, Passe Muraille occupied a spare room in a church at the corner of Dundas and Sherbourne where performances were liable to be interrupted because the entrance led directly onto the stage, and latecomers would find themselves stumbling over the actors to get to a place to sit. For a while Passe Muraille was able to use the Enoch Turner School House. The famous I LOVE YOU, BABY BLUE, which like FUTZ scandalized the public and brought both press and police (and unlike FUTZ, huge audiences) was staged at the Bathurst Street United Church. But the church elders, concerned that the show was considered by many to be obscene, decided they didn't want any more Passe Muraille shows and once again the theatre was forced to move, this time to St. Paul's Annex at 121 Avenue Road.

Now that Passe Muraille has achieved a certain amount of popular support, they have a tough choice to make. In the past, they have consistently stuck to emphasizing subject matter, rather than commercial polish. This policy was appropriate to their original aims, and is part of the reason for their present following, and influence on other theatres. But now, in order to maintain that original philosophy, and in deliberately choosing not to 'go commercial' by paying attention to those things which build and sustain a popular audience, they run the risk of losing the large audience they now have.

Factory Theatre Lab, which bills itself as 'the home of the Canadian playwright,' is a splinter group from the underground theatre movement that gave birth to Passe Muraille, and still shares many of the same production techniques and philosophies. Tarragon Theatre is a splinter group of Factory. The underground movement, which first found expression and public notice in Passe Muraille, and to which Factory and Tarragon have added impetus, has affected every theatre in the country. Every Canadian theatre, to a greater or lesser extent, has followed in Passe Muraille's footsteps and is at least paying lip service to Canadian content. But now that it is no big deal to do Canadian plays, it is questionable how much leadership Passe Muraille can offer other theatres if they do not also have the authority of a large audience.

Seen in another way: the theatre which was first established to be a theatre community, and develop a new relationship with that community is finding that the community is now a little too large and demanding to suit some of the theatre's other objectives. There is now a large enough audience that frequents small theatres, and enough small theatres, good and poor, for this audience to have developed standards and expectations of their own. The theatres are no longer so clearly in the position of leading and educating the audience.

This issue will have to be dealt with in the coming season, which is already underway. "CITY: THE TORONTO SHOW," directed by Cheryl Casman, is currently playing at St. Paul's Annex on Avenue Road. It is a collective creation, in many ways typical of Passe Muraille, if there is such a thing as a typical Passe Muraille show. It employs many of the methods Passe Muraille has developed, with their delights and their drawbacks too.

Greg Leach

Passe Muraille's Toronto show: simplification of the heavenly city

REVIEW: CITY: THE TORONTO SHOW

A SIMPLIFIED VISION OF THE HEAVENLY CITY

Theatre Passe Muraille's latest production, collectively created and released to the public only after slick timing had been added to the original sketches, shows at times great flaws in its design. Chief among these is the limited picture of city life which emerges from its fast-paced, real-life situations. Offsetting the gains made by the cohesion of the cast is the incoherent attempt to mythologize the political struggles in the city; and so the collective approach, although ensuring a definite stance from the production, has failed to satisfy anyone who does not have a stake in that view of the city.

It was my impression that the large audience shared with me an appreciation of the first half of the show that faded in the concluding section, when we were all completely mystified. The switch from humour, and even satire, which portrays today's city life, to the bleakness of what the city might become, bewilders but does not redirect the observer.

City succeeds and fails simultaneously; it presents an essentially humane picture of Toronto, a city they have seen and conceived in terms of 'people spaces'; its public parks, its bars, its communities based on shared accommodation and interests. Most of the material used in the early part of the play is based on actual observation and rings true.
Nevertheless, it's life seen only from a limited perspective.

The rare representation of Toronto's super-rich was not successful; they were shown to be languid and woolly-minded in a way that defies the reality of elitism here. Likewise, the middle-class home-owner puts in his appearance only once (and draws a genuine laugh from an otherwise passive audience). The population of the city, to judge from this sampling, consists of the very young youth, with life to burn, and the old who are down-and-out. In particular, the cast could exclude that beery, smell-of-old-apples aroma of Toronto's outdoors elderly.

The play was continuously prodded onwards by the powerful performance of John Mills-Cockell (synthesizer) and his percussionist.
Synchronized with his mood changes, the entire cast could move quickly into new roles with only the minimum of effort and stage properties.

In the second act, oddities began to surface. Up to this point, the visions projected were perhaps violent, but not fanatical. The play became subservient to an inchoate symbol-system, and as the music rose to crescendoes of frustration and chaos, a well-known politician presided over the destruction of city life as we are all supposed to know and love it. While at times this was most effective (particularly with the introduction of an immense puppet) the stage action made little sense.

To conclude the show, the entire company sings a paean to something-or-other, which ends the play on an upturn but tells me no more about the symbolism of which this music was apparently the transubstantiated essence.

City is, like other TPM productions, a sure source of controversy. It has its moments of raw sexuality, including a brutal (but speeded-up) rape, an incredible male strip, and a young housewife recounting her life in a massage parlour. It also contains the now-obligatory bared breast.
Theatrically, too, it is a subject of discussion as those who support this kind of theatre seem to feel that TPM has now entered a period of chrysaline creativity. It remains, however, an intriguing and a warm-hearted production by a dedicated cast, and an opportunity to hear John Mills-Cockell at his inventive height.

The best way to spend a mythical Sunday afternoon

The Best
Peter Passell and Leonard Ross
Pocket Books, $1.75

The Best Visual Representation of a Good Idea is undoubtedly the light bulb that flashes uncompromisingly above the heads of innumerable cartoon characters. The pantheon stretches from Offissa Pup to Sluggo. In such company must now be placed the authors of The Best; it is hard to imagine them without at least a few kilowatts hovering above the minds that conceived what is surely a Good Idea and often (something of which Sluggo is constitutionally incapable) a funny one.

After all, things are just soooooo shoddy these days that, my God, wouldn't it be grand to have a little book that listed the best of the lot. You can picture Peter Passell turning to Leonard Ross, probably over Dom Perignon in a ritzy Manhattan somewhere-over-the-rainbow (yet the book gives no information on these men, and we must judge their judgments in a vacuum), and suddenly realizing that it would indeed be a Good Idea. There would be short alphabetical entries describing the absolute undiluted best of a commodity, chosen pretty well at random. The Best Peanut Butter would follow The Best Patriotic Prep-School Poem.

Lace it with Irony. The Best Example of Analytic Thought:

"Whenever a person is called upon to make a speech, the first question that enters his mind is 'What shall I talk about?'" — Gerald R. Ford. Spice it with humour. The Best Put-Down of a Critic: "I am sitting in the smallest room in my house. I have your review in front of me. Soon it will be behind me." — Max Reger, a German composer. But ensure that the bulk is opinionated fact that might just lead the caveating empor to choose wisely if he craves the best sports car, the best ski boots, the best telephone answering machine. Because there is little enough time in this most expensive of all possible worlds to waste it looking over the competition if you're in the market for the best jet (private) under $1,000,000. The book fills a need, and it will doubtless fill myriad heads with dreams of the best strategy for investing in the stock market lest the best resort hotel in Mexico go to seed. There is an irresistible (and cruel) leap from knowing the best to wanting to possess it.

So these two chaps are swilling the Dom Perignon, they who do know all about the best cruise ship, and what they might not know is that when they get down to compiling this extended joke they'll come up with a pleasing style, bright but not too assertive, and probably the only bit of non-fiction that reads like a stream-of-consciousness novel, going nowhere in especial but having immense fun in doing so. It may well have been their intention to while away that Best Time of the Week, the mythical Sunday afternoon, with a book of no importance. But, my God, pleasure is important, isn't it, so there you are.

Well then, what an ineradicably good idea! It will start conversations and probably end a few, it will entertain the best of the jaded minds that breed these days like rabbits, and it might guide you to the Nirvana of the best sleeping pill. But it will not endure. Nor, my God, will Miss America, who is, nonetheless in her prime a thing frivolously beautiful to behold.

Skiing down Mt. Everest

Yuchihiro Miura skied down 6,600 feet of the South Col of Mt. Everest in two minutes and 20 seconds. Then he fell and slid down 1,320 feet. He stopped 250 feet above the canyon-like Bergschrund Crevasse. He lay on the snow wondering if he was still alive.

The Man Who Skied Down Everest, the film that Budget Crawley has made of this 1970 exploit (now at the University) is a feature film rather than a documentary. It develops two different concepts together, the factual record of the climb and the downhill run, and, as the press kit puts it, "the fantasy of Miura's challenge to the mountain, and the gradual coming together of the poetic and the actual in the MOMENT OF TRUTH at the top of the run!" The presentation of the latter, both superficial and pretentious, only increases one's enjoyment of the factual record; the inauthentic provides a context for the authentic.

There is a clear distinction between the two. Crawley carved his film out of an earlier Japanese film about the 1970 Japanese Everest Skiing Expedition, of which Miura was merely a member. He has centred it on Miura alone. To do so he had to shoot a lot of new footage. Over 40 per cent of The Man Who Skied Down Mt. Everest consists of clips shot two or three years after the actual expedition (and clips shot more often than not in the Japanese Alps rather than in Nepal). In any of the close-ups, if you think that Miura simply looks as if he is trying rather hard and rather self-consciously to appear as if he is in a mystic trance that is exactly what he is doing.

The film is accompanied by passages, read by Douglas Rain, of prose and poetry from Miura's diaries, passages in which he lay an apparently successful claim to a position as a combination of the Zarathustra of the skiing world and an Outward Bound übermensch. "I have travelled the world to ski, To soar with the winds, To laugh with the Gods," runs one passage. The narration is not, however, accompanied by massed wailing choirs.

But the run was made, the danger was there and there lies the true poetry, the true excitement of the film: in the shots of the snowfalls like atomic bomb explosions, in the sheer physical perfection Miura, then 37, knew he had to achieve, and in the run itself, in which Miura went from zero to 100 miles an hour in less than 6 seconds, in which, on the 45-degree slope, he felt all the time as if he were at the front of a wave threatening to topple over on him, during which he felt as if he were falling into a world of air, and wondered if he would be able to maintain consciousness.

The film contains no information about the kind of skis or bindings Miura used: in fact, it contains no information about any of the technical problems he faced.

2nd City sparkles

In brief, Also Available in Paperback is a well-packaged treat of quality entertainment.

Second City's newest satirical revue cleverly lampoons familiar situations — rising prices, love problems, PTA meetings, the other 'joys' of modern life — with perversely funny twists and turns, leaving their audiences chortling with delight. Piercing truths were hurled in jest at the laughing nodding audience, providing effective social satire.

Vivaciously and sharp wit generally rule the show, and, although an odd skit flops, it's quickly forgotten. The cast, with their tight ensemble acting and vivid character types, expertly handles the satirical and wildly farcical skits and some improvisational comedy. The five versatile performers each have memorable characterizations.

Catharine O'Hara, gifted with a wonderfully mobile face, is equally convincing as a glamorous girl in a singles bar or as a harried school-marmish teacher reprimanding her problem children's problem parents. Andrea Martin shines as a rapturous Jesus freak who converted from Zen macrobiotics to macramé before she found Jesus and her man.

The male parts are just as strong. Benjamin Gordon is effective as a lumbering husband-fool and as a thoroughly disturbed psychotherapy leader. John Monteith's thick but well-meaning father and his swaggering, greasy duck-tailed hood are exact replicas of the real article. Dave Thomas excels as the jeering abusive President Thieu, a guest on an Elwood Glover-type noon-hour talk show that "brings you people from all over the world, at great expense to you — people who are not only famous but also boring and dull".

Second City is an intelligent capable troupe who infuse Also Available in Paperback and the Toronto theatre scene with laughter and enthusiasm.

Three songwriters who deserve more recognition

The singer-songwriter field is getting overcrowded. It's simpler — all you need is a guitar or a piano. None of this huge outlay on instruments which is necessary if you are a group.

As an unfortunate byproduct of the numbers of solo performers nowadays, some deserving ones get lost. This article deals with three female songwriters who this writer feels deserve to be much better known.

A good song, for me, is like a puzzle, in which I follow the writer unlocking the secrets of the melodic pattern he/she has chosen. This is a hard experience to describe — it's almost an act of recreation — but a concrete example of a song that can be treated as a puzzle is Joni Mitchell's 'Blue'. At any rate, the songs of Veronique Sanson and Linda Lewis are like 'Blue'. Ellen McIlwaine's music, on the other hand, grabs you with its intensity.

The range of styles that a West Indian with a Cockney accent can draw on convincingly is very broad indeed. Linda Lewis' grandfather came to England and she was brought up in East London. She started off as a child actress, but became interested in music in her late teens, first with a group called Ferris Wheel, which recorded an album, and then as a solo, doing four LPs of varying degrees of availability. These are: Say No More, Lark, Fathoms Deep, and a new one, Not A Little Girl Anymore. There is also a Warner Brothers compilation of tracks from the first three, with a few singles thrown in, called Heartstrings.

The first thing you notice about Linda Lewis is her voice, which can do numerous parts. Sometimes she sounds like Minnie Riperton. In fact, when I first heard 'Lovin' You' I thought it was Linda Lewis, but I couldn't see her singing those lyrics. Lark and Fathoms Deep are No, this article isn't about Rita Coolidge, but about three songwriters who haven't received the publicity Coolidge has.

littered with brilliant songs. Fathoms Deep in particular rates comparison with Joni Mitchell's Blue or For the Roses. (Though Lark is Linda Lewis' personal favourite.)

The lyrics on Fathoms Deep are consistently excellent. "Red Light Ladies" is about the prostitutes of Amsterdam. Red light ladies, where did your love go? Saving all your money to buy a car, Will you travel very far? The refrain takes off on Dylan's "Lay lady lay". During the fadeout, barely audible, are the words "That's OK".

Most of the songs are love songs, but they don't come out clichéd. The best song on the album is probably "Wise Eyes", a series of arresting images which combine to suggest the detachment and coldness of the mysterious "Wise Eyes". Wise eyes Looking thru the night Sitting on a mountain rocking. Or: I saw your tear thru a telescope I knew that Venus was involved Oh, you're so cold, you're so cold. The album ends with a playful benediction, "Moles". Bless all the moles in their holes Bless all the rabbits in their burrows . . . Bless all you one-headed, two-headed, two-legged people Listening to my song, bless you all . . .

Veronique Sanson, happily, is more easily found. Round Records, Records on Wheels, Wing Jazz (a good new store on Queen just west of Beverly) and Sam's all carry her three LPs (all on Elektra).

On the cover of the first one, Sanson looks a lot like a doll, wearing a blue jacket and slacks with the words "Support Command" on the shoulder — a French impression of an American uniform. A toy piano rests on her knees, and in the background, a lush eighteenth-century ornamental garden. On the back cover, in profile, she looks like Dory Previn.

This apparently arbitrary mishmash of visual symbols is explained when one listens to what's inside — a successful wedding of French North American pop styles.

I first heard Veronique Sanson in Wing Jazz. I was the only person in the store, and the clerk put on something to pass the time. I heard four songs and was knocked out by each one — "Pour qui", "Vert vert vert", "Besoin de personne", and "Bahia". Asked the name of the singer.

Sanson writes extremely beautiful melodies. The range of her lyrical preoccupations makes most rock look sick.

The biggest problem facing her popular acceptance is, let's face it, the fact that she sings in French. All the same, I would prefer her to continue writing in French, if writing in English would mean her lyrics would lose their subtlety, as would probably be the case. Lyrics are printed with the second and third albums, and products of our great Canadian educational system should be able to make some sense out of them. Lyrics for her first album, which many people like best, are not included, so you take your choice. Sanson is big on angst, but the songs on the first two LPs, Amoureuse and De L'Autre Cote de Mon Reve, seem upbeat compared to those on her most recent album, the first since her marriage to Steve Stills, Le Maudit (the Wretched, the Accursed).

Recorded in 1974 in Los Angeles, it features musicians Donnie Dacus (now sharing lead guitar duties in Stills' own band), Kenny Passarelli (has played with Joe Walsh, Elton John), and Joe Lala, as well as L.A. sessionmen Leland Sklar, Russ Kunkel, and Stills himself (bass on one track). Though as far as further husband-wife collaborations are concerned, Ted at Round Records said it well: "He's only bugger up her music, and she can't do anything for him."

The title-song "Le Maudit" is ostensibly about someone trapped in the music business, but more and more "Le Maudit" appears to be Sanson herself. Southern California doesn't appear to have agreed with her at all. The lyrics give an impression of pretty intense emotional desolation. A sample from "Boudna": Et quelquefois Le bonheur me frole Comme si un peu de Verre me caressait le dos which, translated (badly) is: And sometimes I am touched by happiness As if a piece of glass caressed my back.

Ellen McIlwaine's quite different approach is typified by a song she does called "Up In Heaven Shouting I am So Glad". Except she didn't wait to get to heaven. Her vocal style is highly idiosyncratic and involves lots of whooping (what else is there to call it?). She is an excellent guitar player, particularly on slide.

Born in Nashville, brought up in Japan, she first made it big in New York City and now lives in Montreal, even recording on a Canadian label, Kot'ai (means "peaceful revolution", and is taken from the I Ching). Over the years she has recorded four LPs, one with a "psychedelic" group called Fear Itself, and three solo. Honky Tonk Angels and We the People on Polydor, and The Real Ellen McIlwaine on Kot'ai. We the People is still readily obtainable.

United Artists, who distribute her most recent album, don't appear to be pushing it with much enthusiasm, but in some ways it is what it says — the real Ellen McIlwaine. McIlwaine sings and plays largely unaccompanied, but the sound is never bare. Her repertoire, as usual, is about half originals, half borrowed material.

Live, Ellen McIlwaine is at her best. She claims that many male performers are unwilling to have her as an opening act, for fear of being blown off the stage. I can believe it. She comes to Toronto about once a year.

The high priestess of female singers-songwriters in my book is Laura Nyro, the "Ophelia of the Bronx". She hasn't done anything in about four years, but her New York Tendrberry remains one of the most valued records in my collection. She may be somebody's contented wife by now, but I can't believe it.

The best way I could think to end this piece on female songwriters is with a line from one of Laura Nyro's earliest songs, "Buy and Sell": Two pennies will buy a rose Three pennies and who can tell? On a street that comes and goes By the name of Buy and Sell.

OLD TIME MUSIC HALL

History repeats itself as farce

It takes a lot of nerve to get a sophisticated Toronto theatre audience singing some old, silly tunes and laughing at their own boldness. But within the first few minutes of the Actors Repertory Theatre's production of Old Time Music Hall, the "Chairman and Host" Raymond Clarke had all the audience in the Colonnade Theatre bouncing to Daisy, Daisy, give me your answer do. I'm half crazy. All for the love of you. Raymond Clarke's warmth and exuberance were not the only factors that caused this spontaneous response. The tone for the evening had already been established by the recorded, turn of the century British songs and the piano playing of Paul Horan, guaranteed to evoke nostalgia even in twenty year olds. Combine this with Marlene Rain's red and gold stage setting and replica, oil burning stage lights and entertainment became the guide word for the night.

The one line jokes came fast. But sometimes not as fast as the delighted protests of the audience anticipating the well-worn punch lines.

The jokes, however, were not sufficient to cover the shaky singing ability of some of the cast, especially in the straightforward, melancholy numbers. But the singing could be overlooked because of the energy and theatrical skill with which the songs were put across by everyone. Sue Cox, co-director with Terence Durrant, was impressive in all the parts she performed, particularly in her portrayals of Burlington Bert and the washerwoman. Brian Tree also stood out with his fine sense of dramatic timing in the use of pauses during his solo presentation of "It's a great big shame".

ART seems to have picked up on the trend in Toronto towards cabaret theatre and comedy marked by the revival of vaudeville at the Embassy and the success of theatres like Theatre in the Dell and the Teller's Cage. But Old Time Music Hall exposes possibly more than it is meant to. The turn of the century, the 20's and 30's, are often remembered in these productions for the carefree attitude of the rich, the charleston or the clothes. This era was, however, predominantly a time of war, hardship and depression. The entertainment was meant to bring a shallow joy, a momentary stop-gap in, what was for many, a frightening future. This is remembered in songs like, "It's the same the whole world over. It's the poor what gets the blame. and It's a long way to Tipperary . . ." The shame is the ART did not grapple with this aspect of Music Hall music and comedy to move beyond the realm of economic profitability and entertainment to that of social responsibility. It could have been done, without diminishing the fun value, by drawing on satire. Perhaps they were trying by including some of the songs they did or by the frequent repetition of Raymond Clarke's introductory "brought to you at enormous expense, your very own . . ." On the other hand, after two hours of old one-liners and frivolous songs, maybe it was really expecting a little more from an obviously serious and talented company of actors. Old Time Music Hall is presented every Friday and Saturday night at the Colonnade Theatre.

Actors Repertory Theatre hawks nostalgia

Subjective camera captures essence of chandler's tough-guy weltanschauung

At its opening in Toronto five weeks ago Farewell My Lovely had been put out on the market with only a moderate advertising campaign. Moderate, that is, by the standards of a year of first runs that had witnessed such monsters as Jaws, Nashville (the ad-men worked overtime on saving that turkey with three complete overhauls on its campaign in its first three weeks), Rollerball and Mandingo, to name a few of the more obvious. Since then the theatre owners have decided to show a little more faith in the film by changing its current ads to emphasize Mitchum's performance, putting recent favourable reviews into the text and buying it more space on the entertainment page in the Friday editions of the Sun and the Star. In other words Farewell My Lovely will be around for a while yet.

This review, then, is not going to be a plea for everyone reading it to rush out to some small backstreet grindhouse where the self-financed first feature by a young director and his or her cast of unknowns is going to get the boot because nobody is paying money to see it. No, we are dealing with a slick professional package of obviously commercial intent but that is not to be read as a put-down. The craftsmanship, economy and intelligence put into Farewell My Lovely is, in my opinion, more than enough to waylay whatever misgivings one may have about shelling out the going rate for first-run accommodations.

This review is not however an unconditional rave. Farewell My Lovely is not the definitive screen version of a Raymond Chandler novel nor is it "the damndest thing you ever saw". It is, quite simply, a well-made film, something which is very rare in this year of merely great motion pictures. Among the properties of the cinema the least understood by both critics and even the most competent film-makers is its transportive power when for the duration of the film the viewer becomes involved with the proceedings on the screen. Some of the early theoreticians of film aesthetics used to talk about the relation of films to dreams. A film like Farewell My Lovely can go a long way towards restoring in the modern film-goer that kind of sensibility.

Director Dick Richards' stylizations are consistent from characterization to set decoration to lighting. The thought that has been put into the "look" of this film is not a display of eye pleasing nostalgia but is based on a genuine understanding of the image evoking quality in Chandler's writing. In the novels Marlowe's firsthand descriptions of the environment are not just set pieces to fill in the spaces between dramatic scenes with lots of snappy tough talk but rather they are scene setters and reflections of Marlowe's character. This point of view element in the novels has been noticed by other film-makers. It could well be the inspiration for the wandering camera work in Robert Altman's The Long Goodbye and is most definitely what prompted Robert Montgomery to film all of The Lady in the Lake from subjective camera angles.

Richards is obviously fascinated by the richness of detail in Chandler's work. He has taken Marlowe's perceptions as essences giving the landscape and inhabitants of the film a rather grotesque quality. In many ways he has done a reversal of Altman's The Long Goodbye wherein Marlowe is treated like an unchanging essence.

That two such views can be produced of subsequently equal complexity from the same body of works is a tribute to Chandler's ability to excite his reader's imagination.

The liberties taken in adapting the script are not among the film's flaws. Nobody to my knowledge has yet fit an entire Chandler plot into a film. What scriptwriter David Zelag Goodman has done is a worthy condensation which still leaves us with a workable mystery story. The flaws are few and widely spaced with most of them falling into the category of "camping it up". Despite the very modern photography (there is more Bertolucci than Hawks in this film) Richards tosses in some rather hairy looking anachronisms like the Vorkapitch sequence dope vision (a Vorkapitch sequence is one in which two or more scenes are superimposed on top of each other usually signifying a passage of time, named after its inventor Slovk Vorkapitch) which almost approaches high camp. Another off-colour area is Charlotte Rampling's performance which is very uneven in spots. Possibly her characterization is not as skippy as it seems as she is only given a few minutes of screen time to play against Robert Mitchum who from beginning to end dominates the film.

Mitchum's career to date has largely been one of being the memorable part in otherwise forgettable films. Like Marlowe he has had a lifetime of bad scenes where the only thing to do was to say his lines well and hope that it would all be over soon. That world weary look on his face is for real and Farewell My Lovely is an excellently crafted showcase for this man's all-too-neglected talents.

Rug-cutters brave throngs, risk deafness in strange rite

Anything-for-kicks frosh sublimated away their tensions with a night of energetic jitterbugging

SAC's first big dance of the year, bringing A Foot In Coldwater to Hart House was a qualified success, in spite of an over-capacity crowd, an amplifier with an overactive thyroid condition, and general SAC disorganization.

The problems with the dance started over a year ago when the LLBO-Ontario's answer to Catch-22 instituted many regressive changes in their already ridiculous licensing requirements. The Great Hall at Hart House, which has held as many as 2400 people at Oktoberfest can now hold only 500 people. The administration now holds the canteen licence which governs all campus pubs. Therefore SAC has not had to deal with the morass of hopeless LLBO bureaucracy. But U. of T.'s administrator Alex Malcolm has sprouted a few grey hairs since the campus pubs came under his jurisdiction.

Further problems occurred installing the power supply for Coldwater's hot amps. SAC paid over $800 for the services of electricians to hook up and monitor the engineering nightmare of fuses, wires and switches. SAC got plenty of decibels per dollar but many people complained of bursting eardrums even though the amplifiers were at their lowest possible setting. It seems that Coldwater is not equipped to play such small gigs. Indeed those on the dance floor found conversation impossible and the ticket-sellers for the bar were using sign language. Coldwater performed well musically in spite of the painful level at which they were heard.

The dance was billed as a SAC service. This meant that when SAC finished adding the $1800 it took in at the door and $700 the bar brought it was short $1000 in covering its expenses.

The band cost $1,000, the electrical modifications took another chunk, staff and security cost $200, and, oh yes, the beer tickets, promotion, damage to Hart House.

The expense of this dance can be justified as a student service, but SAC needs to operate more efficiently. Tony Hine

A marketable commodity

The one thing that is certain is that RCA finally decided to push a Jefferson Starship album. You may have never heard about Grace Slick's Manhole or Slick and Kantner's Baron von Tollbooth and the Chrome Nun or Marty Balin's one album group Bodacious. But if you haven't heard of Red Octopus by now it's because you don't listen to the radio, or go into record stores, or read magazines like Rolling Stone.

Which is not to say this is a good album, just marketable. I really envy Robert Christgau of the Village Voice for first thinking up the idea of the Consumer Guide, in which he rates records from A to F, like a report card, because I'd like to give Red Octopus a C plus.

Why then is this one marketable? Because they've gone back to doing hip love songs, which is what (it was a long time ago) the original Jefferson Airplane dealt in, when they were led by Marty Balin, back before Grace Slick was with them.

Marty's back, and he's an excellent vocalist, and he wrote or helped write five of the ten songs here. Yet I'm not as delighted as I feel I should be. Perhaps it's that the Slick-Kantner team, for all their faults (a certain lack of intellectual discipline being foremost) were at least sincere, whereas Balin's psychedelic soul seems somehow calculated in these days of retrenchment on all musical fronts.

Take "Miracles", for instance. Balin wrote this one, words and music, and it's bound to get the most airplay of any cut on the album (an edited version may even be on the way as a single). It has a catchy tune, but it goes on far too long. The lyrics are strictly written on the Alice Cooper plan (ie, while watching daytime TV), and the best line is a modern reworking of an old love lyric cliché, I had a taste of the real world when I went down on you girl, which strikes me as funny, but the humor was probably unintended.

There's plenty of talent in the Starship, but little discipline. The lyrics (or words, which is a more apt description) are all written on the Alice Cooper plan and there are only two memorable melodies. The two instrumentalists are very busy doing nothing, with the exception of Papa John Creach, when audible, and the band generally on Paul Kantner's "I Want to See Another World", the best song on the LP. (Maybe his sincerity rubbed off.)

What this stuff really is, is middle-of-the-road, and who needs it? It used to be that rock was more sexually explicit than M-O-R, but when people like Vikki Carr are singing songs with titles like "When You're Sleeping Between Two People", you know even that convenient way of distinguishing between the two is gone.

Personally, I'd opt for Papa John Creach on his own or Hot Tuna anytime. Chris Brobert

Cale hasn't lost vitality

John Cale, Slow Dazzle
Island Records ILPS 9317

In the sixties, John Cale was an instrumental figure, along with Lou Reed, in the formation of a group that established for itself a singular place in rock mythology. The Velvet Underground were pioneers in the then virgin territory of electronic distortion. In this regard they gravitated towards the extreme, as some of their songs (eg. "I Heard Her Call My Name," "Lady Godiva's Operation") sounded as if they had been recorded in Lou Reed's bathroom, and were therefore something of an acquired taste. But to those who did come to critique that taste, what seemed to critics its most reprehensible quality was actually that which was most desirable. The musical truth that was the Velvet Underground transcended production values. At its core was a healthy dose of pain mixed in with the musical pleasures, a pain supplied in part by the volume, but more important by musical rough edges that scratched at the nerves and lyrics that went for the throat.

Years have passed but there are no flies on John Cale. Velvet Underground fans will be glad to hear that he is still producing vital rock, but in such a way that there can be no mistaking the fact that here at last is a rock artist from the sixties who has found his second creative breath and is managing to find new dimensions to explore, musically and lyrically, unlike others who are still bogged down trying to rehash the last decade's leftovers.

What has emerged on Cale's last album, Fear, and this new album, Slow Dazzle, is a controlled, sophisticated style that will be pleasing to a wider audience, but that still manages to avoid straying far from the gut rock that was the Velvet Underground. Included among the musicians Cale is now associating with are ex-Roxy Music keyboard whiz Eno and Roxy Music lead guitarist Phil Manzanera.

Phil Manzanera is most conspicuous on "Roll a Roll" at the end of side one in which he whips out a wickedly sour guitar solo. But the major part of the album is pure John Cale. A surprising number of songs are love songs ("Darling I Need You", "Taking It All Away", "I'm Not The Loving Kind"), but it must be explained that John Cale writes love songs like no one else. Emotional without being sentimental, desperate without being reactionary, it is these love songs that best utilize Cale's powerful, melancholy voice, and that best represent the new John Cale. Studied bizarreness remains exclusively human Going Through the Motions, the 1984 Miss General Idea Pageant's public rehearsal of the audience for that pageant, held last Thursday in the Art Gallery of Ontario's Walker Court, presented something one rarely encounters these days. Of course it was an in-event among the anti-establishment establishment of the Toronto art community and in-events are common enough. But it was also an event of some potential importance and interest that received absolutely no coverage either before or after its occurrence from any manifestation of the local media.

Can you imagine what that is like? In a world where so much has been co-opted by the media have you really not been co-opted as well? Can you imagine going to something without any preconceptions whatsoever and going not because you have a read a review or an advance story or an advertisement but simply because you know that it's there, even though you don't know what it is? It's as if having become habituated to-looking in mirrors, which only tell you how much you are like other people, two eyes, a nose, mouth, you suddenly find yourself looking through a pane of glass at a strange new world which throws your reactions back at you, which actually does confront you far more than any mirror can with yourself.

One understands the problems that the media would have though. The Miss General Idea Pageant is "not a philosophy or a school nor is it a perfume" (as Max Ernst negatively defined Dadaism) The Pageant, originally apparently a satire of beauty contests and the stereotypes they support, was held a number of times through the Sixties. Marcel Peanut, the winner of the 1971 Pageant, will reign as Miss General Idea (yes, he's a man) until 1984, however, since the group sponsoring the pageant needs the time to co-ordinate efforts for the special Miss General Idea Pavilion it wants to build. Everything up to 1984 is a rehearsal. The pageants and the rehearsals both seem to be striving hard to apply Richard Hamilton's definition of Pop Art to the event and make it as well as the object, "a work of Art, Big Business, popular (designed for a mass audience), transient (a short-term solution), expendable (easily forgotten), low cost, mass-produced, young (aimed at youth), witty, sexy, gimmicky, and glamorous". Recognize that the event does not get its mass audience, that it is forced to be for an in-group, and that it has to be low cost, and that's probably the best description you could have of the pageant and the rehearsals.

(As well, though, the event, whether pageant or rehearsal, has become something of a fetish, especially now that the actual pageant has been put off until 1984 and now that the rehearsals before then are being videotaped. The satire has also lost its bite. In the love-hate relationship between pop art and pop culture acceptance and indifference seem here to be triumphing over irony.)

This theoretical bias notwithstanding, the actual rehearsal event itself was not intimidating. The evening as a whole seemed to be nothing more, if nothing less, than a party, with the charades-like rehearsal, involving the usual beauty pageant biz ("May I have the envelope please?") and silent clapping, cheers, and spontaneous standing ovations on cue, as well as this year's Miss General Idea costumes (marking a titillating return of the venetian blind) in the first half and a dance, to Rough Trade, in the second half.

But even though the emphasis may have been on the act of coming together, on the idea of a good time, I can still understand the problems the media would have. Guests were encouraged to dress for 1984, and although they wore little that provided any context for that year, they did indeed dress—or undress. How would one write about the heavily-lidded, vaguely sinister man in a black suit and black shirt wearing that ultimate fascist gesture, black lipstick? How about the fellow who had carefully cut out the whole back of his jeans, leaving only the seam to separate the exposed hairy buttocks? How about the two fragile timid creatures clinging together who looked and were dressed like Lady Hamilton in the gutter or Colette at the end with wispy moustaches and facial hair and all who were in fact young men? In a light bright chipper brittle way? With bemused tolerance? With frigid let-me-make-myself-clear irony? With greedy sensationalism?

If Marlene Dietrich had chest hair, then Marlene Dietrich was there. Toronto's Andy Warhol look-a-like was there. One woman, vaguely allegorical, vaguely Pre-Raphaelite, wore musty red velvet and flowers in her hair and had a stuffed dove and a gas mask slung over her shoulder. (A bit heavy-handed this.) Others were there: in white face, in tight (tillyeh)ght) black leather, in tuxedos, in ballroom dresses, in pantyhose and a dozen feathers, in breastplates and jeans; as early Theda Bara, as Renaissance troubadours, as Russian peasants, as Russian courtiers. Golden boy homosexuals met wustful court jester homosexuals.

The scene needed only a few mad or corpulent dwarfs, a few swallows flitting around from potted palm to potted palm and the occasional lean keen-eyed alley cat or restless ocelot to keep them moving to be complete. Plus perhaps one torch singer singing "Life is a cabaret, Come to the cabaret" at one end of the foyer, and another singing "what? 'Singing in the Rain'? — at the other.

And yet, for all the superficial bizarreness of the rehearsal, it was strange how indifferent to it or only mildly amused by it, certainly not how shocked, one might be. One was aware of one's own identity, one's own niche, by contrast, of course. There was also the feeling much like that one gets in the small claims courts at the Old City Hall that what one was dealing with was exclusively human: the range was wide but that range was set within that context. Most important, though, was the fact that the Art Gallery did not turn into a pumpkin at midnight: the people were still there, still wearing black lipstick, still with henna-dyed hair, still lonely and still seeking not to be, after midnight as well as before. Some of them, if they were committed to put on the make-up and the dresses that they did in the first place, were committed enough not to take them off.

Perhaps it was best that the media did not discover, or refused to discover, the pageant, and its participants. Randy Robertson

... but at midnight it didn't turn back into a pumpkin.

The saga of a coroner and happy warrior

Coroner
Morton Shulman
Fitzhenry + Whiteside

Coroner is the saga of Morton Shulman, M.D. and happy warrior, who as chief coroner of Toronto from 1963 to 1967 clashed repeatedly with the medical, legal and political establishments of Ontario. It is an often light-hearted romp through the deadly minefield of official incompetence, blunders and cover-up.

For his troubles Shulman was sacked not once but three times by the Tories, and it is a mark of the author's political acumen that the public uproar generated by the firings forced the government to back down twice. Finally the government was able to rid itself of Shulman only by eliminating the post of chief coroner itself. And then he promptly had himself elected to the legislature.

This illustrates something important about Shulman. No one should assume that he was a political innocent; he was in fact a tough in-fighter who parlayed the control of a P.C. riding association into the chief coroner's job through adroit negotiations with Premier Roberts himself. He was no Don Quixote; he took positions to get specific results and often got them. From 1952 to 1962 some six to ten Italian immigrants were killed each summer because builders found it cheaper not to shore up excavations. Shulman exposed the situation, the builders were forced to stop the practice and labourers stopped dying. Not all his interventions ended so successfully. His efforts to have disciplinary actions taken against Toronto doctors treating cancer patients with horse serum were stymied by both the medical profession and Queen's Park.

Morty is no Don Quixote, or even Sancho Panza.

But manipulation and cover-up by the pillars of society are not the most striking about this book. After all, it's nothing new that professional associations allow their members to evade responsibility for their actions when the victims are the poor and the helpless.

More important than the indictment itself is the fact that Shulman reveals society's sacred cows to be ordinary barnyard animals. He strips away the mystique and exposes medical and political pettiness, greed and incompetence to ridicule — the ridicule that should enrage a government which appoints a senile doctor as coroner because he would not make trouble, or which denies a Chinese coroner any cases because he might make trouble (with sensitive Wasps).

It has been said that faced with hate and loathing, power survives very well, but if exposed to universal ridicule and laughter it crumbles quickly. Shulman's book makes us laugh; it could be the first crack in the wall.

Two very different poets

Selected Shorter Poems
James Reaney
Press Porcupine $3.25

Virgins & Vampires
Joe Rosenblatt
McClelland and Stewart Limited
$4.50

James Reaney is better known publicly as the author of The Donnellys. Partially for that reason, one can see in this selection of shorter poems an unfinished, exercised texture — monologues, and sections that are more like drafts of short plays than poems.

Reaney is by nature a storyteller. His instincts and his work reflect a concern for settings, attitudes of mind and emotion. His is no visionary. Too often his reflections seem trite and irrelevant, lacking any real or consistent depth.

His poetic form appropriately complements these naive concerns, and dismisses the need for poetic language or imagery for the sake of prudishly commenting on the surface of things observed. His 1949 poem Grand Bend is in retrospect a good example.

"It is the rutting season At Grand Bend And the young men and the women Explode in each others' arms While no chaparrons attend."

So what? What he is trying to say could be better said in essay form or at least in a more sardonic or witty fashion. That's assuming it's worth saying at all.

Too often Reaney thinks himself a poet writing a poem, and thereby produces convoluted lines like "But could it still be not that when my back is turned I disappear and nothing is?"

At such moments one can only question the sanity of editors at Porcupine Press for the overstatement of the cover blurb describing Reaney's vitality and poetic vision.

If anything, Reaney's poems bring back his own line of "dear bad poets Who wrote Early in Canada And never were of note."

Though he occasionally glimpses through the morass of his "learned illiteracy", the event is so rare as to negate the bulk of his work. Maybe Reaney's talent lies strictly in plays, for this book leaves much to be desired both in content and style.

In both style and content, Rosenblatt excels as a poet of the highest calibre. He is one of those wild, imaginative poets who do not conform to the traditional literary compromises of taste. He lays it all on the line, takes all the chances and without giving in an inch, holds on to startling and sometimes disturbing images.

Be forewarned: for Rosenblatt metaphorical world for predatory man.

His concern for language is expressed in his poem Our Soil "the printed word on the page needs more moons. words that can bite cleanly" and "the sea of prose needs its turquoise flying fish, to charge out of the calm waters."

Rosenblatt's poems are like that turquoise flying fish — clean, readers it is all or nothing in Russian roulette style.

Not only can Joe Rosenblatt toss off iambs like nobody's business, he draws too.

In his seventh book Virgins & Vampires, Rosenblatt has created a series of poems that reveal a sardonic wit and a fiery imagination. As the bizarre illustrations which accompany his poetic works, Rosenblatt is a unique visionary.

Poems for him are like "fishing by an invisible brook" or "predator birds with verbs of claws and nouns of bloody beaks", or "red earth, rich in supernatural nutrients".

His use of language never approaches pretention or tediousness. Instead, it is intensely alive and infested with images from the world of insects and animals, a supple, trimmed, and luminous. They open an area of the mind that is alive and unpopulated, full of the paradox of excess and yet as intense as a laser beam creating fantastic holograms.

Rosenblatt has created a collection of sharp gems, precisely cut and horrific in their clarity. Without the wit which they possess, the poems might have been just a collection of startling images. But Rosenblatt's talents are diverse and multidimensional. My favourites are those that border on social satire and leave nothing unscathed.

Some of his titles alone are so ludicrously funny that they deserve mentioning. Death By An Electric Can Opener, Of Spit Between Sidewalks, A Haunted House Dreams of Sherbet, Dwarfs Wrestling, and Our Bodies Are On Automatic Pilot.

There is no way around it, Rosenblatt is a damn great poet. He may be irrelevant, tenacious and downright nasty, but on top of that his work is funny and in all senses of the word, prophetic. To quote any lengthy section of his work would be to take away from any new reader the pleasure and enjoyment of fine poetry in action.

This has to be the best book of poetry I have read in a long, long time and I will want to read it again, soon.

The cultural background of economic domination, eh?

Hollywood's Canada
Pierre Berton
McClelland and Stewart,
$13.95

Hats, or rather toques, off to Pierre Berton for coming up with this year's number one miffy idea. While the rest of us were out boring ourselves silly debating the question of American economic domination, Pierre very quietly slipped away and started watching the movies they made about us.

The result is a powerful indictment of the Hollywood movie rigour a cultural historian would require (unless you count the interview with Hermione Gingold).

What's more, says Berton, because we've been so used to seeing ourselves portrayed as Americans, we've come to accept ourselves as such. But really we're different. The fact that Hollywood can make so many mistakes about us proves it. And if we're different we must have our own identity, only much more diverse and difficult to describe than the one Hollywood portrays.

Now hold on a minute here. Drawing on the depths of wisdom

Should Hollywood take the blame for this shameful celluloid record? Heck no, says Berton: they were just trying to make an honest buck, giving the folks at home what they wanted.

Well, clearly, someone south of the border be it Hollywood or not, deserves the proverbial pie in the face, since what the folks back home either wanted or got as Canadians was a cast of simplotions playing out their idiot fantasies against a two-dimensional scenic backdrop. You might almost think the Americans were doing us a favor by looking after us, if all we amounted to was snow, mounties, trappers and half breeds.

If that was all Canada was to the Americans — a handful of symbols to play with — then it was the victim of a process much like that which took place in Vietnam, when American soldiers were able to think of Vietnamese as gooks, and kill them with impunity because they weren't quite up to being Americans.

If the movies are anything to go by, that's exactly what happened in Canada. Not in a violent sense, because there was no need for it. But in an all pervasive, cultural sense which had Canadians believing they were inferior Americans, selected for some second rate status. Call it pornography, for want of a better word, the silent partner of economic domination — and when revealed, perhaps the more powerful one.

Berton has done an admirable job in getting this book out, although he doesn't pursue his analysis half as far as he should. He chronicles the inexactitudes, drops a few teasers at the end, and then pulls out. Did the strength of Hollywood's presence prevent the development of a Canadian film industry? Would a domestic film industry have been any better than the American one? Unanswerable, says Berton. Perhaps, but not to be tossed off so abruptly. What was the effect of the Hollywood movie? To what extent were there attempts to start a Canadian industry? Just how has our national image, if indeed there is one, been Americanized?

One curious point remains. Why did Hollywood all but stop making statistics, Canada is now the world's second largest market for American movies. Why make movies about Canadians when you can make them at home, and still have the "Stay here, woman, while I go out and milk the elk"

—W.C. Fields

"Oh Andre, they are feet for a Queen."

"Oui, ma Cherie, that ees who I buy dem for — my Queen"

"But who can blame Malloy that the bright eyes of Marie LaFarge had made him forget his quest?"

"My time has come to take the Lone Trail, Joe, and I'm going — Alone!"

movies about Canada at the end of the fifties? If it had been such a rich subject for so long, why the sudden stop?

Perhaps that answer is not too difficult to find. According to recent Canadians beating a path to your door?

Perhaps all those terrible movies about Canada weren't such a botch-up after all.

David Simmonds

Hollywood's version of a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Bank of Commerce culture's treatment of Canada, and the opening of a whole new chapter in our understanding of American domination of the Canadian identity, eh?

For the most part, the book is a catalogue of inaccuracies, as Berton shows how most of the 575 American movies that have dealt with Canada as a major subject have exhibited a stunning disregard for the truth.

Canada, according to Hollywood, is a land of frozen wastes, towering pines, yodelling Mounties in full dress uniform, crazy half breeds, scaly hunting Indians and crooked French Canadians (recognizable by their pidgin English, sashes, toques, beards, and lust for loot, love and laughter).

All this, of course, appears beautifully ludicrous today.

Berton rises splendidly to the not too difficult challenge of putting Hollywood's sense of accuracy in its place. He painstakingly and proudly shows how the mounties' hats were always the wrong shape, how the birch bark canoe could easily have been replaced by a simple outboard motor, how the towering pines didn't grow anywhere near where they were said to, and how the Klondike tended to drift over to Alaska when it really belonged in the Yukon.

Berton dwells on several Hollywood fascinations (the ice, the loneliness, the madness) but saves his best efforts for the mounties, those lovable, patient creatures whose noble profession, notwithstanding their efforts to the contrary — the movies held to ridicule. There's also an interesting chapter on the "Canadian Cooperation Project," a joint Hollywood-Canada venture of the late 40's, designed to produce more home grown flicks, which ended as a professional Hollywood whitewash (and reads much like the saga of the Auto Pact).

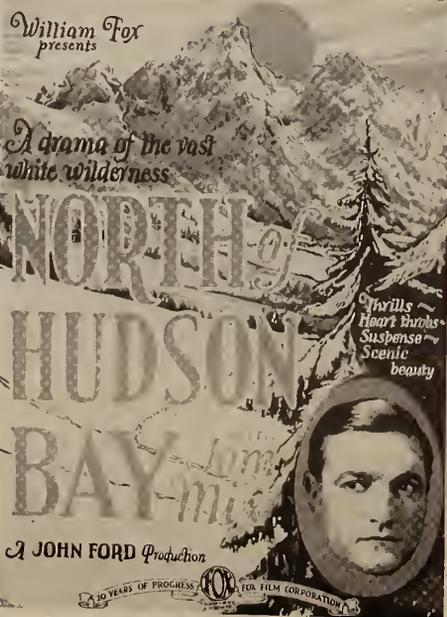

All this is good clean reading fun (putting captions on some of the stills would make a great party game), although Berton's "I know Canada better than anybody" attitude is cloying after a while. But so what? What does this loving catalogue of inaccuracy amount to, aside from a nationalistic chortle?

Well, says Berton, it amounts to two things. One, it shows how Hollywood (being somewhat more popular around the planet than the NFB) gave the world a completely false impression of Canada. Two, it proves that Canadians were prevented from understanding their own identity because, as Berton puts it, "Hollywood blurred it so well."

Both appear reasonable conclusions, although neither is documented with the empirical contained in Philosophy 101, Berton cannot infer that because Canada is not an orange, it must be an apple. Berton has proved not that Canada has a unique identity, but that it is historically and geographically different from the U.S.; just how different, he doesn't say. In fact, if all that's different up here are the species of trees, we might as well put the whole subject of the Canadian identity to bed.

The important question is not the question of the Canadian identity, but the power of American domination.

Billy unleashes God's dynamite

It isn't too difficult to make fun of Billy Graham's latest contribution to man's spiritual quest. Angels, the title tells us, are God's secret agents; elsewhere they are referred to as "God's heavy artillery", "God's dynamite"; the archangel Michael is "the Prime Minister in God's administration of the Universe".

Within this military/bureaucratic motif, angels fulfill several functions. They bring messages and assistance from God to humans, they struggle with Satan's hordes in the Battle of the Ages, and they sing praises before the throne of God when not otherwise occupied. The bulk of Graham's book consists of a light gloss on familiar Biblical stories in which angels appear, livened by his speculations on those events (Moses on Mt. Sinai: "It staggers the imagination to wonder what kind of headline would be prompted in the daily press..."). In general, angels are the shock forces are at work". All signs point to a spiritual reawakening.

Graham and the others who make up our unlikely secular priesthood preach a comforting message. What you see here isn't all there is, they say. Lots more where that came from. Just wait and see. But the cost is either death (the only way to purify man's essentially depraved nature) or a retreat into pure spirit (more common among Graham's hipper counterparts). Either way, any suggestion that the wretchedness and narrowness of life lived in human society is not something necessary is quickly brushed aside. Even the shadow of transcendence will attract our allegiances, which are badly in need of someplace to go. Meanwhile the possibilities of transforming our lives evaporate. Fools rush in, as Ricky Nelson used to say. See you at the malt shop, Ozzie.

Gene Allen

troops in the war for men's souls which will end in God's inexorable victory.

The most remarkable feature of the book is the ease with which Graham expresses himself in the idiom of the present day. Transcendence becomes a talk-show staple and is thus legitimized. Satanism has become a topic of investigation for "university professors" and "hard-nosed scientists". In his conversations about world affairs with eminent statesmen such as Henry Kissinger and Dean Rusk, Graham expresses the opinion that "supernatural reactionary as this projection of the modern world upon the Victorian aesthetic standard is not.

The Collection is created overnight in the parking lot of the Sea Winds Motel in Carmel-by-the-Sea, California which is adjacent to the Big Sur region. Under this "metal American sun" where there are "arcade shops selling homemade candles and bookstores displaying the complete works of Kahlil Gibran" the Victorian Collection is alien and vulnerable. Each night Maloney dreams the same dream, reliving a creative resurrection: "And in the dream, he rose from the bed, climbed out of the window, and walked again, among the aisles of the Collection."

Included in the Collection are the Oster Crystal Fountain from the Great Exhibition of 1851, objects from the Marvell Collection of Toys, a marquetry dressing table with botanical woodcarvings by Messrs. Trollope, silver tea sets, bridal breakfast services, ornamental urns, statuary, chival glasses, corner cupboards, ottomans, poufs, corner cupboards, the parlour of a brothel, the furnishings of a music hall, erotica in the Indian Room designed for the Marquess of Longview by Sir Arthur Quiller-Jones, costermongers' cycles.

Publicity ensues and the Collection's authenticity is debated by experts. Waterman (also the Waterman and Wasserman), whose relatives have played John the Baptist in the Oberammergau passion play plans to achieve equal journalistic importance in promoting Maloney as the creator of a miracle. His girlfriend Mary Ann McKelvey provides Maloney with the banal and disappointing reality of sex in contrast to the surreptitious passionate Victorian eroticism.

Maloney's dream turns into a nightmare in which the aisles of the Collection are seen through a television screen. Promoters offer to create a "shopping centre, a mall with adjoining hotels, fountains, restaurants and a plaza". The wooden fire engine from the Marvell Collection of Toys has, inexplicably, "Made in Japan" stamped on it; the crystals from Oster's fountain have the lightness and dullness of lucite. A madman holds a sign: GOD ALONE CAN CREATE Do not believe this lie.

Maloney tries to renounce the Collection as he realizes there is no life in it. Soon his only wish is to sleep rather than to dream. The Collection is forgotten by the public and Maloney's release is sought in unconsciousness.

Moore has presented the dilemma of the artist who creates through a simple act of the imagination, is tortured by creative impotence, subjected to philistine scrutiny and used by hucksters. There is a jibe for Canadians — "We Canadians, we never recognize originality because we have no real use for it!"

This is going to be a dull week in Toronto, but the best hope for relief will be found in the city's clubs. Best bets are the El Mocambo, the Riverboat and the Sandpiper. Papa John Creach is at the El Mocambo until Saturday, and the following week Tom Rush, whose version of "Both Sides Now" is reputedly Joni's favourite, is appearing there. Folkie Ray Materick (Put the Coffee On) is at the Riverboat, if you can afford the cover charge, and Joe Mendelson is at the Sandpiper which is located on St. Clair west of Yonge.

Concert-wise the immediate forecast is foggy with chances of clearing in the middle of October. Best bet is probably the free concert this Sunday at the Bohemian Embassy at Harbourfront which features John Mills-Cockell, ex-Syrinx member.

The Bee Gees will play the Gardens on Monday night, as they continue their first tour since the band drifted apart for about 2 years, and Massey Hall has two in quick order, Ray Buchanan on the 29th and Rory Galagher on the 30th.

In the immediate future, things are a little more promising. Steve Goodman plays Convocation Hall Oct. 3, Jethro Tull is at the Gardens Oct. 7, Strawbs is at Massey Hall Oct. 12, Rod Stewart will be at the Gardens Oct. 23, and Edgar Winter will be there Dec. 10.

In the distant future there are rumours about Ry Cooder, Procol Harum, Led Zeppelin Paul McCartney, and the Allman Brothers.

Opera still occupies the bulk of the music scene, gushing forth in an uninterrupted stream from the bowels of the O'Keefe. Tonight's presentation is Salome, by all accounts the most successful version of the Strauss piece the COC has ever mounted, with kudos aplenty going to Grace Bumbry... which is, frankly, no surprise. Tomorrow's mainline is Die Fledermaus, by that other Strauss fellow. Watch out for flying corks.

The evening performance deserves more attention: it's the premiere of Louis Riel, arguably, the finest Canadian opera ever written — one that holds true to the historical facts, eschewing the Anglo myths surrounding this still-controversial figure. Bernard Turson re-creates his role, and if the multi-media effects don't flub, this could be worth lining up for (also being presented next Friday night).

Monday night: Madam Butterfly, featuring Maria Pellegrini. Tuesday is Fledermaus time again. Wednesday sees Salome return to the stage, and Thursday is Manon Lescaut's turn. A few words about Manon, in lieu of a tull-scale review. Although this opera has been established in the popular repertoire for an eternity, it might be worth asking why. The COC presentation wasn't bad by any means — and the singing of Heather Thompson as Manon and Ermanno Mauro as Des Grieux gave continuous satisfaction (although one would have appreciated a little more acting on Thompson's part); at times one got the impression of attending a costumed, but very well-sung, recital).

Lacking most severely in this production is a sense of dynamic staging, of excitement. The sets are tired; the last scene in the wastelands of the Louisiana Bayou looks artificial and tepid. Good lighting can overcome these sorts of faults to some degree, but the illumination only approached this compensatory level in the last few moments. Manon was Puccini's first great success, but it isn't nearly the opera that Traviata or Tosca is. It's an early work, full of splash and verve — and a couple of undeniably lovely arias — but it seems tired out today. Oh yes — someone should coach the chorus a little more seriously. They have great fun fondling and fooling with each other in the tavern scene... and this may distract them from their timing as a group. At least it would distract me.

If all brings to mind a favourite phrase of Dr. Johnson's: "Worth seeing? Yes, but not worth going to see."

And that's all she wrote, folks.

"Happiness is like England and will not state a case," says Stevie Smith in one of her poems. There are a number of shows opening in Toronto this week that will not state a case, that are nothing more than one artist's view of the world around him, nothing more but nothing less. Among such shows are Claire Shoniker's at the Sister Gallery (opens Monday), William Houston's at the Merton Gallery (opens Tuesday), and, so it would seem, Rebecca Burke and Catherine Pentland's exhibition at the Hart House Art Gallery (opens Wednesday, preview — it's your gallery, your fees pay for the wine and cheese that will be served — Tuesday, 8-10 p.m.).

Hart House is a gallery for students; Gallery Seventy Six (76 McCaul St., just down from the Art Gallery of Ontario) is a gallery of students — the students of the Ontario College of Art. Sanand Patel's is the current show.

Laing Galleries — yet another gallery near the campus (on Bloor St. just down from Palmer's) — re-opens after its summer break Oct. 1. Successful engineers And company presidents will go here to buy oil landscapes and genre paintings. Why not go now? RR

movies

Another weekful of wonders. Here goes.

Friday: There's now a U.C. Film Club, which is showing a series of thirty films over the year for only $6.50, or $4.00 for a term, or $1.00 for a single program. Friday nights at the Medical Sciences Auditorium. This Friday (and for once Saturday too: they're expecting a big turnout), two of Bergman's best: Persona at 7:30, and Shame at 9:15. Check their ad inside for the rest of the year's attractions. Also on Friday, at the Roxy, a double bill of films with numbers in their titles: Zappa's 200 Motels at 7 and 11:30, and 2001: A Space Odyssey at 8:45. At the New Yorker, a W.C. Fields double bill: You Can't Cheat an Honest Man at 7 and 9:30, and The Bank Dick at 8:15 and 10:45. And at Midnight they have, yet again, The Texas Chainsaw Massacre. Take someone you love. Cinema Lumiere continues its series of film by women directors with, at 8 The Ceiling, a Czech film, and at 8:45, from Hungary, Good Riddance, about the problems of young working people.

Saturday people who liked 2001 can come back and see A Clockwork Orange, at 7 and 9:30, at the Roxy. At midnight they have two hours of "the best of the old-time comedies and cartoons": Betty Boop, the Three Stooges, Superman, and many more. The New Yorker has a solid day of comedy: at 2, 4:45, 7:40 and 10:40, the Marx Brothers' Animal Crackers, at 3:40, 6:30 and 9:30, Fields' Never Give A Sucker An Even Break, and at midnight Monty Python's And Now For Something Completely Different. More women's films at Cinema Lumiere: at 8, La Vie Revee, by Mireille Dansereau of Quebec; at 9:45 Daisies, a Czech comic "parable on the destructive of nihilism."

Sunday at the Revue, Pasolini's Medea, starring Maria Callas, 7 and 9. Light & trothy musical fun at the New Yorker: That's Entertainment! at 2, 6:10 and 10:15, and Ken Russell's The Boyfriend, starring Twiggy, at 4:15 and 8:25. The SMC Sunday film series continues with Jimmy Stewart in Harvey, at Carr Hall, 7:15 and 9:30.

Monday the Revue has two relatively little-known Hitchcocks: at 7:15 Dial M for Murder, with Ray Milland and Grace Kelly, and at 9:15 The Wrong Man, with Henry Fonda. They repeat the same programme on Tuesday. The

theatre

Stop!! Stop!! Are there more burgeoning theatre critics than there are burgeoning Canadian playwrights? Much as we appreciate this barrage of creativity, there won't be enough plays within a fifty-mile radius to give each of you even one to do this year. Thank you, all those who have given me your names... I will turn up something for you to do.

This year the Review hopes to cover campus theatre more completely than in the past. And apparently the local theatre people are more anxious to be covered, as well. Hart House, under the aegis of the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, is publicizing itself thoroughly, as is Theatre Mickities (of St. Mike's) whose season is now underway. Please, please, please: if you are the publicity agent for a campus theatre organization, get a message to the Review at least ten days in advance of your opening night. Farflung as our network of Eyes-of-the-King is, nevertheless it might miss you.

Dance, it seems, is also theatre (no other department has taken it on) and we hope to bring you a review of Jennifer Mascall who has enjoyed a varied career in the dance and in movement studies. Three pieces are performed, Friday, and Saturday evening at 8:30, at 155A George Street, (Queen and Jarvis) for a cost of $3. Interesting.

Sir George library workers walk out

MONTREAL (CUP) — Following a breakdown at the negotiations table, the library workers at Sir George Williams University walked off their jobs September 19 in a one and one half hour protest of administration demands.

"We are going to make it as tough for the administration as they have made it for us," said Nancy Marelli, union negotiator.

The breakdown in talks centres around the issue of whether three union people should be free from work with pay. They would act as full-time liaison officials for the duration of negotiations.

The administration in a written proposal said it will allow only one person to be freed from work.

Although negotiations broke down at the common table discussions, the walkout occurred only at Sir George.

Sixteen library unions from across Quebec, with the exception of Laval and McGill, have been negotiating jointly for a collective contract since their contracts expired May 31.

Union negotiator Peter Page stressed "the study session (walkout) was not taken across Quebec; various unions are planning individual activities."

On September 19 the general assembly of Sir George union employees, the group with the authority to take action, called the walkout. Page said, "people are upset, they want to see things happening."

Page is annoyed at the administration. He says, "They are trying to establish right from the beginning an atmosphere which says this is what we are offering and you'd better take it."

THE GOVERNING COUNCIL SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMISSIONS AND AWARDS REQUEST FOR BRIEFS RELATING TO REVIEW OF UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ADMISSIONS POLICY ON STUDENT VISA APPLICANTS

The Subcommittee on Admissions and Awards is now charged with reviewing the University of Toronto Admissions Policy relating to student visa applicants. These students are defined as students who are not permanent residents of Canada, i.e., who do not have Canadian citizenship or landed immigrant status.

Some divisions of the University have found it necessary to limit enrolment of applicants on student visas because of the numbers of qualified applicants. Background information is currently being compiled from all academic divisions of the University concerning admissions practices, enrolment pressures, and information relating to funding of students on student visas. The Subcommittee on Admissions and Awards has endorsed the principle that where policies and/or practices exist which affect applicants for admission, these should be published in divisional calendars and related material. No distinction is made based on country of origin in treatment of applicants for admission to the University of Toronto who are permanent residents of Canada, i.e. both Canadian citizens and landed immigrants compete for the available places on the basis of merit.

The Subcommittee invites individuals or groups to submit comments or briefs containing a statement of general views relating to University of Toronto admissions policies and practices with reference to citizenship of applicants for admission. A statement on existing University of Toronto admissions policies and practices with reference to citizenship of applicants for admission is outlined below for your information.

Submissions should be directed to Professor M. W. Lister, Chairman, Subcommittee on Admissions and Awards, Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, to be received no later than Monday, November 3rd, 1975.

STATEMENT ON

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ADMISSIONS POLICIES AND PRACTICES WITH REFERENCE TO CITIZENSHIP OF APPLICANTS FOR ADMISSION

The University of Toronto makes no distinction based on country of origin in its treatment of applicants for admissions who are permanent residents of Canada. Both Canadian citizens and landed immigrants compete for the available places on the basis of merit. Applicants from abroad who are temporarily resident in Canada on a student visa are subject to quotas in some divisions of the University where it has proved necessary to restrict enrolment because of the numbers of qualified applicants.

The practices followed by the various divisions of the University vary, since some divisions are under much greater pressure from applicants than others. In some cases, there may be as many as ten qualified applicants for each place available.

The Faculty of Medicine considers applicants who are landed immigrants and Canadian citizens if they have resided in Ontario for one year before admission. In addition up to twenty-five places, i.e. approximately ten per cent of the first-year enrolment, can be filled by applicants of high academic merit from outside Ontario and these twenty-five are chosen on grounds of merit only, regardless of their provincial or national origin. The Faculty also accepts up to five students sponsored by bodies such as the Canadian International Development Agency and the Armed Forces.

The Faculty of Dentistry gives preference to applicants who are established residents of Ontario, i.e. Canadian citizens and landed immigrants who have had two years of residence in the Province of Ontario. Applicants who are on student visas will not be considered unless sponsored by CIDA or an international agency.

The Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering limits the number of undergraduate student-visa admissions to up to five per cent of the total and will not accept more than up to half of these from any one foreign country, unless there are insufficient qualified applicants to fill the remaining places.

Nursing, Dental Hygiene, Pharmacy and Rehabilitation Medicine admit no applicants on student visas unless they are sponsored by CIDA or a similar government agency.

In the School of Graduate Studies there is a complex problem arising from the difficulty of evaluating the foreign academic qualifications presented by some of the applicants who are on student visas. The School itself does not restrict the entry of qualified applicants from any region of Canada or from outside Canada. Several major granting agencies limit support for students from outside Canada and thereby limit their access to the School.

A number of student-visa applicants for admission as part-time students were turned back because of a misunderstanding of Federal Government regulations applying to such students, but this error has been brought to the attention of the divisions concerned.

In times of emergency, the University has waived some of its normal non-academic admission requirements in order to take in refugee students from Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Chile, etc.

The existing practices in all divisions are being reviewed by the Subcommittee on Admissions and Awards of the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council.

COU limiting space for foreign students in province

WATERLOO (CUP) — The Council of Ontario Universities (COU) may have taken another step toward establishment of a quota system for foreign students in its recent adoption of four principles for determining admissions policy.

D.E. Irish, University of Waterloo representative to the COU reported September 15 that universities should adopt admissions policies consistent with the following principles:

- that universities first responsibilities are to students from Ontario and the rest of Canada;
- that persons with landed immigrant status should be considered Canadians;
- that since other culture may contribute to enriching the university setting, other countries should be represented;

- that preference be given to admitting qualified Canadian students while at the same time setting aside a sufficient number of places for applicants on student visas.

Irish said "Quotas may be acceptable, but that is better than keeping all foreign students out."

Following the Irish statement, Waterloo federation of students president, John Shortall expressed the opinion that the COU was laying the groundwork for introducing a quota system to Ontario universities.

"Although the principles themselves don't set a quota on foreign students, they can easily be used later to justify that type of system," he said.

After arriving an hour late to the game at Varsity Stadium, the York Yeoman team fought hard for the first half but lost game in the second half by a score of 1-0.

Americans Shaft Women Jocks

WASHINGTON (CUP) — A memorandum from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare says the US colleges must end sexual discrimination in sports within three years. The memo provides further explanation of regulation signed by President Ford in June.

But the regulations have only been published this year, after Congress passed legislation three years ago to end discrimination against women's sports in colleges. Another three years will pass before the regulations take full effect.

The legislation was designed to end discrimination against women's sports program based on scheduling, use of facilities and purchase of equipment. The memo stresses that "educational institutions are not required to duplicate their men's program for women" and that "equal expenditures for male and female teams are not required."

"The fact that difference in expenditures may occur because varying costs attribute to difference in equipment requirement and levels of spectator interests," the memo says, "does not obviate in any way sex discrimination in US college sports the responsibility . . . to provide equal opportunity."

Soccer Blues Beat Fundless York Team

Soccer has vast potential as a university sport. It has taken root in the American college leagues, however in Canada it is struggling. This is partly due to the absurd ruling by the league officials who disallow the entrance of players who have played in the local semi-professional league. The main cause however, seems to be a self-perpetuating loss of credibility. A sport which is at the bottom of the priorities list come budget time just hasn't a chance. The conditions only worsen.

The classic case is the York University soccer team which played the Soccer Blues on Wednesday. York arrived an hour late in a scattered cavalcade of cars filled to the brim with bodies. Some of the team arrived at the Stadium, the others would arrive eventually. The York team has no bus this year. Their budget has been cut back, and as usual, it seems that soccer is always the first to suffer. It is isolated instances like this that eat away at the game. Slowly the importance and the seriousness which should surround any intercollegiate game disappears, and the league degenerates into a pick-up affair. In the end it is the players who lose out. Given a fair chance they could dignify the sport and advance it in Canada.

Toronto continues their winning streak as they blanked the York gypsies 1-0. It was a shaky exhibition of soccer by Toronto who played well beneath their capability. The hustling and tenacity of the York players in the first half upset and unbalanced the defense of the home team and had it not been for the alert goaltending of Drew McDougall, Toronto could well have found themselves a goal behind.

Drew McKeown scored the only goal of the game, four minutes into the second half. It was a tremendous effort by McKeown who took through a ball from Vince Ierullo, fought off two York defenders and slipped the ball underneath the diving goalkeeper.

The Blues gained the upper hand after this goal and controlled the remainder of the second half to secure the win.

It was not an attractive victory, but a victory nonetheless and another step towards establishing a winning attitude. Toronto will attempt to extend their winning streak on Saturday when they take on Laurentian on Saturday. The game is to be held at Scarborough College at 2:00 pm. Hopefully the Laurentian players won't have to hitch-hike from Sudbury.

Skule Team Looks Good

The powerful Engineer football team took to the back campus field on Wednesday afternoon and it appeared as though the Phys.Ed. team was in for the beating of their life.

The Engineers came out looking like a team. Their brilliant blue uniforms (many of which must be new) were truly a magnificent sight. Mathematically, and scientifically-oriented minds, powerful masculine bodies adorned in Skule colours thundered onto the field. The sight was awesome. People stared, jaws dropped, the ground shook.

Phys. Ed. took the field. The players were calm, confident and self-assured. Their ragged sweaters shone in the sunlight. A myriad of colours. Blues, greens, reds; a sweater is a sweater. A sweater does not make the football player. A nice clean uniform does not help a player's ability. And that's the way it was.

The mighty Engineer team choked in fine fashion. At the end of the first half it was 9-0 for Phys. Ed. They were just getting warmed up.

The main firework display started in the third quarter. The jocks punted the ball deep into Skule territory. There was a short interval between the punt returner catching the ball and punt returner being dragged to the ground by a solid hit from Phys. Ed.'s Greg Bastamoff. The Skule quarterback dropped the ball as if he had been eating the colonel's fried chicken. Peter Vernon recovered the ball in the end zone for six more points. That was the end of the Skule team. A good team can take their share of problems and still come out on top. The engineers encountered a problem and fell apart. After a converted pass, another jock touchdown, and a jock field goal the game ended, 24-0 for Phys. Ed.

Armed with slide rules and calculators, the engineer team left the field acting as if they wanted to test the saying "if you can't beat them on the field, you can't beat them in the alley".

Rugger Blues Win

The U of T Rugby Blues with the help of a few veterans surprised a lot of people on Wednesday night when they came from behind to overtake and beat the visiting touring rugger team from Scotland, Heriot-Watt University. Neil Sorbie, Gary Mossman, and Brian Smith who are all ineligible for OUA competition were brought in as extra players and they aided the team in the victory. Heriot-Watt took an early lead in the first half of the game on some spectacular running and passing moves. The score remained 8-0 at the half and the Blues knew that they would have to come up with some excellent rugger in the second half if they had any hope of challenging the Scots.

The second half of the game was a different story. The Blues came out determined not to be outdone and began a powerful campaign to overtake their Scottish opponents. Brian Smith applied his experience and scored two tries. Bob Pavlions, Nick Beverage and Joe Gilmore also scored tries. Bob Algie added a conversion to complete the Blues scoring. Ray Mexon the top scorer on the Watt team picked up two tries for his team and played an excellent game.

The Rugby Blues efforts were not in vain as the game ended in a score of 22-14 for the men in Blue. The boys from Scotland although playing an excellent game were just not good enough.

PICKETLINE POISED

By BOB COLLIER

Amid enthusiastic clapping Friday, a packed auditorium of library workers voted unanimously to guarantee the job security of other campus workers who support them in the event of a strike.

The vote was taken at a lunch-time meeting of the library workers' union (CUPE 1230). Over 300 workers crowded into the library science auditorium, filling all the chairs and standing room at the back.

The union is attempting to consolidate support from around the campus in case attempts to reach an agreement with the university fall through.

The library workers hope the eleven other campus unions will honour their picket lines or walk out in sympathy with them. If they do, cleaning staff, bus drivers, plumbers, electricians and elevator maintenance workers would set up picket lines around the library.

Among the workers the library union hopes to win to their side are the part-time library staff who are not unionized at present. If they continue to work during a strike, they could take over many of the union jobs and allow the library management to continue to offer partial services.

The union members have won a great deal of support from part time staff, in spite of their fears of wage loss and disciplinary action.

To allay their concern, the union membership voted unanimously at the Friday meeting to guarantee them financial support and job security if they honour the picket lines.

Negotiating committee member Jim Mayor promised, "We won't go back to work if they are disciplined. We are making it part of the contract."

The union will use money from the union strike fund to partially make up lost pay.

Members of other campus unions will not be supported financially if they walk out in sympathy, but the union will guarantee them protection against disciplinary action.

Many of the library workers were angry about what they termed as "Parker's lies" to the media. Last Tuesday, the university labour-management negotiator, John Parker, distributed a press release to campus media which library workers said greatly exaggerated their demands.

In the press release, Parker claimed union members wanted increases of $4,900 a year instead of the workers' figure of $3,200 and that all 430 workers were demanding a retroactive anti-inflationary payment of $1,500. The union had only wanted this sum for two-year employees.

Negotiating committee member,

Tom Bribiesco called this a "propaganda statement" to twist the students and campus staff against them.

The union executive has asked a CUPE expert on cost-analysis to assist them in their negotiations with Parker and to help them prepare a detailed rebuttal to Parker's calculations.

To win assistance from all areas of the campus, the library workers have instituted Support Committee meetings in Roberts on Monday afternoons. The group is planning a rally on October 7, and will sell buttons and T-shirts and distribute leaflets under the direction of the union executive.

Ontario Hydro may use dangerous gas?

By DAVE FOLKES

It is unlikely that the gas sulphur hexafluoride (SF₆) will ever explode. But its use in a system by Ontario Hydro for the first time is causing grave doubts in the mind of McCaul Street residents.

The system is contained as part of a controversial Hydro switching station proposed for construction on McCaul, between Elm and Orde Streets.

Much of the opposition to the facility has been based on questions of safety. It's proposed location is directly across from residential dwellings on McCaul and a public school on Orde Street.

Currently the project is stalled pending city approval of demolition of two remaining buildings on the site. After hearing a report opposing the facility from the South East Spadina Steering Committee Wednesday, City Council will decide whether to again defer demolition permits or give Hydro the go-ahead.

Legally, Hydro has the right to expropriate the land, which it already has done, and go ahead and build because the facility conforms to commercial zoning.

The report is seen as a last ditch effort by a community which has fought long and hard to preserve their neighbourhood from what they term as Hydro blackbussing.

The report points out there are both residences and a public school across from the station which would be affected by any pollution or safety factor both during and after construction.

The report states the four storey switching station will involve a new system using the gas SF₆, which, according to one expert, is a possible safety hazard. Hydro can't breathe it, and there is a definite possibility of explosion.

The report also says there are possible alternative sites, away from residential areas, though one is across from the Mt. Sinai hospital.

According to Hydro spokesmen, the station is needed to maintain reliability of supply, based on projected load growth estimates. They also insist that the new system is safe.

The major dispute is over who should bear the burden of the social and environmental costs of this installation.

The residents claim it is their commercial neighbours, the office buildings, stores, and TTC who need the reliability of supply. As it stands now, it is the light users, the residents, who are going to suffer the most and benefit the least, they say.

The report questions the actual need for the station as well as its location. Load growth figures are termed questionable, and it is argued that Hydro is doing nothing towards energy conservation which might eliminate the need for such a facility.

According to the report, Hydro has two options: "build a central switching station or change its policy with respect to influencing demand in the centre of the city. City Council must seek full justification from Hydro for rejecting the latter option before proceeding with the demolition permits of 221-223 McCaul."

The present rate structure is such that the light user subsidizes the heavy commercial and industrial user, encouraging rapid growth of energy use.

Hydro refuses to employ usage deterrents, such as meters which charge more during peak hours, according to the report. Similar efforts in Los Angeles have reduced power consumption by 10 per cent.

The report also raises some significant questions on the station. It asks why the facility isn't being built underground, for example under the recently constructed Hydro Tower near Bay and Elizabeth. A similar facility has already been built underground in Quebec.

The report points out this would be the only station in the downtown core handling voltage as high as 115 Kv. In ten years when it is converted to a transforming station, it will carry 230 Kv. Why does it have to be built immediately beside a residential area, the report asks.

It also questions the safety of SF₆, and its potential to explode under faulty conditions.

The City Planning Board has been asked to prepare a report on the feasibility of changing Hydro's

"Don't let Minamata be repeated," members of the Minamata Disease Patients Alliance (MDPA) of Japan pleaded Saturday.

The three Alliance members, who suffer from the methyl-mercury poisoning disease, were speaking at a press conference on the weekend held as part of their Toronto visit. The visit is sponsored by the Coalition Against Mercury Poisoning (CAMP), a group formed from native peoples' organizations in Toronto.

"We've become sick like this because of mercury," said MDPA Chairman, Tsubunori Hamamoto, who required assistance to reach the podium and spoke with difficulty. "We don't want this to happen to anyone else."

Hamamoto said the purpose of the MDPA visit to Canada this weekend was to make the Canadian people more aware of pollution, particularly pollution caused by industrial progress.

"I can see how industrial progress can be important," Hamamoto said through an interpreter, "but I think that progress for human beings is more important." He was referring to the "crucial situation" mercury pollution has created in Minamata and in northern Ontario.

The three MDPA members had just returned from a visit to the Grassy Narrows and White Dog Indian Reserves, located 55 miles north west of Dryden, Ont. where symptoms of mercury poisoning, now known as Minamata Disease have been reported.

They stressed symptoms of mercury poisoning they witnessed in northern Ontario are the same as those, Minamata, a fishing and farming town in Kyushu, Japan was experiencing 20 years ago.

The mercury poisoning among the native people of the reserves has been traced through the fish of the Wabigoon-English river systems to the chlor-alkali plant of the Dryden Pulp and Paper Co., a heavy chemical pollutant of the river systems in the area.

MDPA member, Iwao Hamada said he was "surprised and shocked by the expanse of the polluted area" in Dryden.

Former chief of the Grassy Narrows Reserve, Tom Keesick noted not only are the native people being affected by the mercury poisoning but the whole surrounding environment is being contaminated.

He said the black bear and the otter, two indigenous animals which depend on the English-Wabigoon river fish as a main food source are rapidly disappearing from the area.

"The Indian people are not killing these animals. Dryden Paper is killing these animals," Keesick charged.

Keesick rejected an opinion expressed on the television program 24 Hours last week which stated the Grassy Narrows natives were dying from alcohol, not from mercury poisoning.

"I don't know what else we have to do to prove that we are dying a slow death from mercury poisoning," Keesick challenged.

The early symptoms of the disease can include a tingling sensation and numbness in the fingertips and lips, lack of balance and co-ordination, slurring of speech, headaches, loss of hearing, and tunnel vision.

groups and the monolithic crown corporation.

As it stands now, Hydro for the most part makes its own policies and decisions. Even if the demolition permits are deferred by Council on Wednesday, Hydro would likely have the decision overruled by court order.

Whether or not the proposed switching station is approved, the entire issue of Hydro policy in urban of hearing, and tunnel vision.

Some of these symptoms were found in the resident natives when a team of Japanese medical experts visited Grassy Narrows and White Dog last March.

Dr. Masazumi Harada, one of the doctors, reported seven definite cases of Minamata Disease among the 89 people tested.

Harada discovered a correlation between the levels of mercury found in the hair of those tested and the frequency of symptoms. The higher the mercury levels in the hair, Harada found, the more symptoms of methyl-mercury poisoning the patient displayed.

Harada's report, which tables the results of the tests carried out last spring, is now being prepared for the Ontario Ministry of Health.

Harada also discovered higher levels of mercury in residents who ate the river fish regularly than in those who did not eat the fish.

"Perhaps your situation is the first massive pollution due to inorganic mercury contamination and must be thought of on a world perspective," Teruo Kawamoto, an organizer of the Minamata campaign to win compensation for the Japanese victims said.

Keesick said the Dryden Pulp and Paper and the Canadian government "should be held totally responsible for the mercury poisoning in northern Ontario."

CAMP, MDPA and other concerned native rights groups meet this morning with the Ministers of Environment, Health, and Natural Resources at Queen's Park. A special meeting with NDP Opposition leader, Stephen Lewis is also planned for today.

centres is likely to end up in the Ontario Legislature.

In any case, Wednesday will be an important day for the Ward 6 community. If they win, they hope to see a park and low-income residential housing built on the proposed site.

Veterans of the 1971 Hydro Block issue, a similar proposal which they defeated, they hope they have seen the last of Hydro.

Hong Kong student marooned by customs

Vancouver (CUP) A simple error by a Hong Kong graduate student has led to the abrupt cancellation of his U.S. student visa.

Furthermore, the U.S. Consulate is refusing to even acknowledge what happened.

According to Dave Johnson, Ombudsperson at the University of British Columbia, Poon Lam, a candidate for Graduate Studies at that university accidentally drove down a wrong road at a customs checkpoint on September 9 which crossed the U.S. border.

The border patrol apparently thought he was evading customs and cancelled his visa, confiscating his car.

The U.S. officials refused to listen to Lam's explanation and forced him to pay $100 for the return of his car.

The student went to the American Consulate in Vancouver the next day but the Consulate General Mr. Burgoon, refused to give him a hearing and apparently sent him on a "run-around".

He was sent back to the border but they do not have the authority to issue visas there. When he returned to see Burgoon, he was ordered to leave the office.

Ombudsperson Johnson set up a meeting between student, Lam, the university student president, Burgoon and himself for September 16. On their arrival Burgoon refused to see anyone but Johnson and flatly refused to issue another visa, saying that the student's family ties were not strong enough, and that he would never leave the U.S.

But Lam had showed Johnson a pile of letters sent to him by his mother in Hong Kong recently that indicated strong ties. And Johnson said the U.S. stance is absurd because Lam is the same person he was when he had the first student visa.

The implications of the cancellation are annoying said Johnson, Lam has a brother in the States, now Lam cannot go to visit him. If Lam ever wishes to go to Graduate School in the U.S. he will not be able to.

Health and Housing services may be cutback

By M. J. SCOTT

The university is considering the elimination of the Infirmary and the Advisory Bureau and a consolidation of the U of T Housing Service with that of Ryerson and York University as their answer to provincial purse tightening on post-secondary education. The university is faced with its first financial deficit and has turned to the five support services for a quick kill.

Despite the administration's own resolution to fight the government, they have offered an across the board cut of five per cent.

Representatives of the five services have been meeting with a study group from the Internal Affairs Committee of Governing Council to discover ways to save themselves from a fate-worse-than-debt. In total, the services account for 1 per cent of the university's budget.

The university has never favored the development of the Placement Service, the Advisory Bureau, the Health Service, Housing Service and the International Student Centre. These saw their beginnings in work done by SAC, church groups and other outside organizations such as the Federal Department of Veteran Affairs.

Internal affairs has admitted to its own failure to advise the groups and expressed their "concern" in creating a situation by which such services have to work in a "vacuum".

Internal Affairs hopes to review its service priorities in time for the 1976-77 budget talks, later this year.

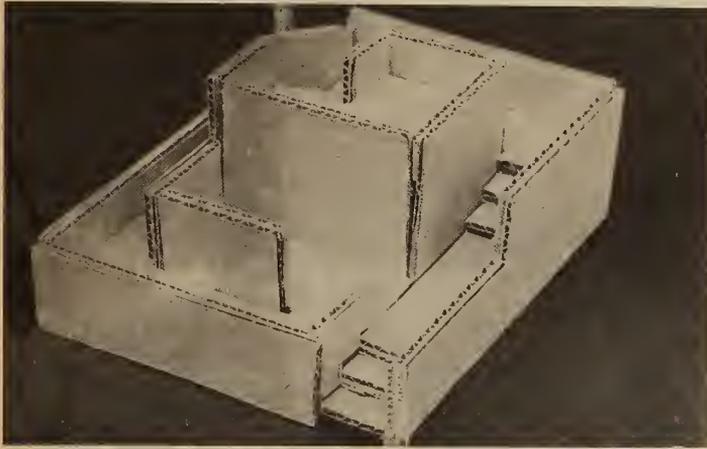

The administration is seriously considering passing its buck in a number of ways.

They want the Department of Manpower and Immigration to take over the placement service and would like to consolidate the housing services with that of Ryerson and York or perhaps a larger group of post-secondary institutions.

The administration wants to handle the Infirmary division of the Health Service and the Advisory Bureau in a more direct manner. They will be closed down if the Administration has its way.

These services have taken a certain amount of pride in their personalized and informal manner. They are perhaps the only bulwark against the impersonal bureaucracy that infects most multi-versities.

They are faced with their own dilemma about what to do. By creating an increased user-demand in their own defence, they put a strain on an already tight budget.

Will Advisory Bureau, Infirmary and Placement Centre go the way of Campus Centre?

The Varsity — Frank Rooney

In 1964 the University had accelerated its financial support of the five services and began an office for Admissions and Student Awards. However, despite the remarkable and documented success of these ventures, the Administration has been chopping and shifting the budget since 1970.

These services were set up on shoe-string budgets and volunteers from the beginning so there is very little slashing space available to them. The only real alternative is to close shop.

An ad-hoc study group was set up by Internal Affairs to close the barn door on "whittling" cuts of campus services.

The study group, made up of members the administration and a student, reported their concerns to Internal Affairs and recommended that no more budget tampering be undertaken until a more intensive review takes place.

Half Saigon jobless

By MING MAR

Pleading for Canadian aid for South Vietnam, government spokesman Trung Tan addressed an overflow crowd of 200 at the King Edward Hotel Saturday.

Responding to Tan's efforts the audience donated more than $300 to the reconstruction effort and unanimously petitioned the federal government for help.

Tan, a Ministry of Information and Culture representative, is on a money-raising speaking tour. The Canadian Aid for Vietnamese Civilians, which has so far contributed $305,000 in materials and cash, is sponsoring his tour.

Tan is the first official of the Provisional Revolutionary Government to visit Canada since the fall of Saigon. Prior to the Saturday meeting, he was received at City Hall by Alderman Reid Scott, representing Mayor David Crombie.

Although the Canadian government has not officially recognized Tan's visit, he will meet several members of Parliament tomorrow at an Ottawa reception organized by Andrew Brewin NDP MP for Beaches-Woodbine.

Through an interpreter, the soft-spoken Tan said South Vietnam was carrying out a program of reconciliation and reconstruction in spite of sporadic counter-revolutionary activities.

The economy, buoyed by the American war machine, collapsed with the Thieu regime. In Saigon alone 3 million are unemployed (a half million are prostitutes) out of a total population of 6 million, Tan said.

The Communists are now operating those factories abandoned by fleeing owners. The number of unemployed, he said, is being cut by sending them to farming communities.

Tan said Vietnam wants normal relations with all countries, including the US. He urged Canadians to write their MP's to get Canada to support Vietnamese membership in the United Nations. "The Communists' goal is to build a strong united Vietnam, said Tan, adding that Vietnam is one country. Priority is given to newsmen from their allies, he said, but later newsmen and tourists from all countries would be invited.

During the question and answer period, American expatriate Charlie Simac announced AMEX, a group of American expatriates was demanding the American government pay Vietnam the $30 billion stipulated in the Paris Peace accord, that they normalize relations, and they stop obstructing Vietnamese UN membership.

Tan was frank but basically supplied no more information than could be gathered from current periodicals, and was diplomatic on sensitive issues. When questioned about the Sino-Soviet split, he replied Vietnam was grateful for aid from all its allies. However, during his address he thanked only the Russians by name for their military aid.

More Morley...

Callaghan's first reading of the night was "The Wedding Dress", one of two stories he wrote as a U of T student at 22. He followed with selections from his latest novel A Fine and Private Place published five years later.

He noted this novel has been widely interpreted as being autobiographical. "As a writer grows older," Callaghan said, "you want more and more to assert your personality on the surface of the work."

He laughed at those who criticized him for having "the audacity to write about myself when I should be sitting at home by the fire reminiscing about what I did as a boy."

Dogwork waiting

By LINDA GUTRI

New SAC Services Commissioner Doug Gerhart says he doesn't have a clue who his new assistant will be.

With the resignation of former assistant Don Boynton, Gerhart says they are faced with "quite a problem." "For $124 a week you just don't get that many people", he added. The job lasts 8 months consisting of a 5-day, 40 hour week.

Ads for the position were placed in the Star and the Globe, said Gerhart and only six hopefuls await interviews. Should the interviews fail to produce a suitable candidate, he said better ad campaigns would have to be carried out and employment agencies contacted.

"As an assistant is concerned, anything goes," said Gerhart. He added, "it is the assistant who does the dog work. The commissioner does some of it, and the assistant does some important things too. Perhaps it is better to wait to get the best person than make a snap decision now."

The bill, passed in a 4 to 1 vote, calls for U.S. citizenship to be restored to anyone who declared that he had left the country or renounced his citizenship because of the war. It also grants amnesty to any soldier who "disobeyed a direct order which, if obeyed, could have led to the death of another human being."

The chairman of the House Civil Liberties committee, Robert

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — Medical researchers, believe it or not, have developed a vaccination against L.S.D. trips.

Medical World News reports that the "Anti-acid" vaccination is the work of microbiology professor Edward Voss of the university of Illinois.

The vaccination has been tried only on animals thus far; it has been used successfully to bring quick ends to "trips" being experienced by laboratory rabbits and mice.

Doctor Voss suggests that it can be injected into humans to treat a person who is suffering from an unpleasant L.S.D. experience.

The Village Voice, however, says, "The government will probably start vaccinating high school kids so that they'll never be able to get a high".

NEW YORK (LNS-CUP) — Religious leader and presidential confidante Billy Graham recently let it be known that he has little use for minimum wage laws, asserting "we live in a free enterprise system where people can accept or reject offers made to them.

In response to a letter asking his opinion on a church that ran a help wanted ad offering a job below the minimum wage, he said, "I would say that even though the wages offered may seem too small to you, they may seem adequate to an unemployed person who has not been able to find well-paying employment."

"With a national average of nine per cent unemployment," he continued, "it is just possible there are many people in the vicinity of that church who would be happy to work for the wages mentioned, even though they are under the minimum wage. If the employer and the employed are happy with the contract they have made, far be it from me to complain about it."

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS-CUP) — A bill extending amnesty to all draft dodgers and deserters who opposed the Vietnam war has been approved by the House Civil Liberties committee. The proposed law would grant full amnesty to all soldiers and draft dodgers willing to sign a sworn statement saying the reason for their actions was a moral opposition

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Evans, George Connell (Mr. Budget), and Sabia.

While budgeting continues, the campus grumbles about accountability

There has been no small amount of grumbling recently among those affected adversely by government cutbacks around the university. The grumbling, however, is directed mostly at Simcoe Hall because of its "usurpation" of various rights and decisions that had been formerly made at a lower level.

One of the subjects is a perennial, ye olde budget. There are many in the university concerned that decisions affecting the future of the university are being made, for the most part, in secret and that those who make these decisions are not directly accountable to the Governing Council.

Students can't afford to ignore this issue or disregard it as irrelevant to their situations. The decisions made by the budget committee affect in a noticeable way such things as classroom size, course offerings and laboratory hours all the way down to the temperature in the classroom. Although most sectors of the university are involved in the proceedings and on the committee, the major decisions are made without the necessity of Governing Council approval.

The budget committee, after hearing all the submissions from department heads and division heads, makes its decisions and reports to the president its findings. Somewhere among all the input is a series of "Budget Guidelines" that come from the Planning and Resources committee, who are charged with looking at the future and gauging how affordable it is.

Planning and Resources seems concerned that their submissions are not detailed enough and leave to the budget committee far too many policy decisions that should previously be worked out in Governing Council.

What this means is that the policy-setting body at the university does not have as much say as it would like in what are especially at this time the most important decisions being made, decisions that affect every student, teacher and worker.

Both Planning and Resources chairman W.J.D. Lewis and planning vice-president George Connell have tacitly admitted that this is the case. Last week, when asked by student governor Michael Sabia why Planning and Resources members couldn't observe the budget committee in action, Lewis replied that any decision of that nature would have to come from the president. Nonetheless, all involved in the discussion, seemed concerned about "democratizing" the budget process.

Except for the budget guidelines, the only other meaningful Governing Council input into the process is an appraisal of the finished budget by Planning and Resources, which Sabia calls "window-dressing". The numbers that the committee is asked to deal with are in such large aggregations as to be almost "meaningless", according to Sabia. What worries people the most is that this last process is not even required but is done only at the president's discretion.

An example of the sort of hackles that this form of decision-making raises came in an interview of vice-provost Donald Chant in the latest issue of the U of T Bulletin. He commented that there was

"unhappiness" among the division heads because Simcoe Hall has been forced to make some of their decisions for them, the most problematic of which was the recently announced hiring "freeze". This sort of rancor seems to be only one of the results of the sort of budgeting the university feels forced into by government parsimony.

This is not to say that the president is offering himself dictatorial powers when it comes to financing this rather large enterprise. It does mean, however, that before the process ends at the president, all sectors of the university as represented in Governing Council must have adequate time to prepare their input into the decisions that will affect their well-being. Some sort of appeal mechanism might also be necessary. Those people that work with money because of the large numbers involved, tend to forget that dollar signs represent people here, and when you chop dollar signs from budgets you are chopping people.

Shucks, those guys aren't so bad after all

Our editorial of September 19. They still love us tomorrow, raised a few eyebrows around the University since we cast aspersions on the moral fibre of the learned members of the faculty here at the U of T, the K-Tel of Ontario Universities.

The viewpoint expressed, that the logical wanderings of faculty representatives on the Governing Council over tenure makes all faculty untrustworthy, is not shared by all members of The Varsity staff.

In the first place, there has never really been a reasonable analysis of the whole tenure issue. Under the general heading of The Quality of Education, tenure-reform was raised as a short-term practical solution. Is this the only solution to a declining quality of education?

The fight to have student representation on tenure committees was a campaign promise of past student president Robert Anderson in 1973. However the student voter turnout was extremely low and over 700 students took the trouble to abstain on the ballot.

The following year a referendum was undertaken, asking students to confirm the necessity of seating students on tenure committees. This was endorsed by a margin of 8 to 1.

However, at the same time good teachers were getting fired, good courses were dropped and incoming students were still being fed an establishment bias and fees were going up. Nothing "practical" was done about this.

The question isn't whether having students on certain committees is a solution, the question is who is running this university.

Anyone who can honestly state that the faculty, or even the entrenched leadership of the faculty is running the university is living in more of an ivory tower than the supposedly tyrannical faculty hacks.

The tenure issue, perhaps valid in its own right, is becoming a dead letter. In addition, the political backbiting and polarization spawned from the whole thing has taken students and faculty away from a reasoned solution to the troubles of the university.

The September 19 editorial was a carry-over of that polarization. An explanation of the Governing Council reversal on granting students representation on tenure committees is in order, especially since Ryerson, for one, has begun procedures on doing just that. However the important questions before us are what to do about the $8 million deficit given to us as a present by the Ontario government.

Students are now forced to compete with each other just for registration in certain courses. When registered they still have to rush from class to class to ensure a seat. Tape recorders are used as psychology course lecturers. Incidental fees have gone up mysteriously to cover hidden cuts in university budgets and library workers are torn between low wages and the alienating effects of a prolonged library strike. And when all is said and done, there still aren't enough good jobs for qualified graduates.

The Varsity is not responsible for all the political donuts in the university, we can only report about what they do. A common front to fight the cutbacks is certainly in order. But we must try to protect the interests of the student community. There can be no more fee hikes, no more crowded classes and no more bullshit.

Over three hundred people picketed the Food City supermarket at Dupont and Dufferin this past Saturday, as the United Farm Workers (UFW) boycott of California table grapes and head lettuce entered a dramatic new phase.

In an effort to convince Food City to remove the boycotted products from their shelves, the UFW and their many friends are asking people not to shop at the chain until it honors the boycott. The picket line resulted in an amazing demonstration of the support the Farm Workers have here in Toronto. Car after car of shoppers turned away to do their grocery shopping elsewhere, and the store's business was noticeably down.

While Food City has been deaf to moral arguments from the Farm Workers, it is felt they will be more responsive to the economic message from their consumers which hurts their profits.

The boycott has become more important than ever due to the tense situation in California, where elections are taking place in the fields. The workers have shown their preference for the UFW by voting for the Chavez' union in overwhelming numbers. However, when they saw that, given the chance, workers were voting for the UFW, the growers panicked and began to fight.

When Farm Worker organizers in Stockton attempted to enter a tomato ranch September 2, 40 members of a gun-toting vigilante group "Posse Comitatus" pointed shotguns, pistols, and AR-15 military type rifles at them and prevented their talking to the workers.

Workers have been threatened with violence and loss of jobs if they support the UFW, Farm Worker organizers have been denied access to workers while Teamsters can come and go as they wish.

The California labor board responsible for holding the elections, has shown a reluctance to act, having not yet considered even one of the complaints about unfair labor practices. In an effort to insure fair elections and protection from grower-Teamster intimidation, the UFW is urging people to write to California Governor Edmund (Gerry) Brown in Sacramento, Calif. and ask him to see that elections take place in a lawful manner.

As the growers see that they can get away with more and more, they are becoming more brutal and open in their threats. If the Board does not take action soon, it is feared that farmworkers will be killed as they were during the grape strike of 1973, when the growers unleashed a reign of terror against strikers.

The workers see the UFW and non-violent organizing as their only hope for a better life for themselves and their children. By working together they have come a long way and they will never go back to the misery and slavery of the last hundred years. As a migrant woman from Florida said at the recent UFW convention "I may be poor, and I may be black, but now I am somebody."

Anyone with an axe to grind can have, for the asking, this space opposite the editorial page. Op Ed submissions should be typed on a 72-character line, double-spaced and should be received two days prior to publication by 5 p.m.

The grape and lettuce boycott is being intensified all over the world. Here in Toronto, grape imports have dropped 38 per cent from last year due to the boycott, but there are still no major chains honoring the boycott as yet, so there will be an increase in boycott activity.

Here on the University, the student-faculty boycott committee is organizing a premiere of the farm worker documentary Fighting For Our Lives which has been called the best labor documentary ever made. It will be shown on Oct. 30th at the Med-Sci Building and organizing help is needed. Anyone interested is urged to drop by the UFW office at 89 St. George or call 961-6284 or 368-0189.

Settimi

MIME! Free at UC Playhouse Saturday

By KEN WYMAN

After working the streets of Toronto all summer as a whiteface busker, entertaining the crowds for their coins, Settimi is happy.

Partly it is the money. "On a good night, if everything went well, I could make $100 in three hours. I'd have to quite then, because everyone would see this tiny hat overflowing with cash, and they'd say 'he's not poor' and not give any. So I'd take off my make up and play my flute, or guitar. Just doing it for grins now."

"I could make more money at Yonge and Wellesley than in Yorkville. Everyone who went by on Yonge Street would toss in a quarter, or a dime. In Yorkville the big spenders would leave bills, but half the crowd wouldn't put anything into the hat.

But partly its creative satisfaction that has made this a good summer for this talented mimist. "I've doubled my material," he grins. "On the street you have to be so innovative. Anything might happen, and you have to be ready for it."

Roping Winos

"One night an old wino-type saw the crowd I had, and all the attention I was getting, and I guess he was jealous — he wanted some too. He just walked up beside me while I was performing, and stood there, nodding happily at all the people. And I was losing them. The action was here, with me, but their focus was about a foot off my shoulder. Either I had to chase him away, or make him part of the act. So I backed away a few feet, and lasooed him with an imaginary rope." Settimi jumped to his feet to demonstrate. "I started pulling myself toward him, hand over hand, and he started backing away from me. But that was O.K. Everytime he took a step, I let the rope jerk me forward. Finally, he freaked, and ran off through the crowd, dragging me down the street behind him, until I let go of the rope, and he was gone."

Tim Settimi sat down to his cup of tea again, having mimed the complete incident for his small audience. He is a gentle person. He could not have yelled at that wino, or told him to get lost. His compassion for the little man, for society's perpetual loser, is part of his life. He began to tell another story:

"Someone started yelling from the crowd one evening . . . You think that guy's a bum. He's no bum. I'm a real bum. I'm from Nova Scotia, and I'm a bum.' And then he reaches into a flower box on one of the buildings, and ripped up a pathetic little pansy, roots and all, and threw it at me. It hit me in the chest, scattering dirt, and the crowd just gasped.

He split, but the next night he was back, with a plastic rose in a pop can. And he wandered in behind me, going 'mew, meow, meow,' and crouched down beside one of the pillars behind me. I thought 'Oh no, this is it. What am I going to do.' I had been making mime flowers, spreading my fingers for the petals and so on. So I asked him if he'd like a flower, and he said 'yes'. I asked 'A real one, or an imaginary one?' He said, 'A real one.' Some one had left a rose with the change in my hat, one of those 19c roses sold on Yonge Street, and I gave that to him. And then he says, 'My mother never taught me how to love.'"

"Boom! Heavy. Now he was my buddy, there was something between us. He left later, and I didn't see him again for a month. When he did show up again, he just stood in the crowd and watched and watched quietly, and it was like seeing an old friend again."

Born on Halloween

This gentleness is part of Settimi's whiteface mime character. He's Everyman. Charlie Chaplin. He's the victim of all the people with the power, and the money, and the guns. All the imaginary people he's communicating with are bigger than him. Everything always goes wrong, but there's almost always a happy ending.

For Sylvan — the satyr, the Pan character in Settimi's act, this is not the case. Pan is mischievous. A lover of wine, music, and sex. A girl chase who is always rejected because of his horns, and pointed ears. And so he hates himself, a turns nasty, and chases after still more women.

Sylvan is so separate from Settimi that the mimist always refers to the character in the third person. As a being with a life of its own, Settimi releases Sylvan, rather than performing him.

That being was born several years ago, as a halloween costume. "The people at the party I was going to were a little freaked out about it. They loved it, but they found him scary. The horns reminded them of Satan too much. Now Sylvan always carries a flute, and people can say 'Oh, music . . . it's Pan. Satan carries a pitch fork.'"

Five Flutes

The flute is the key to Sylvan's character. Since he cannot speak, he must use music to express all his emotions. In one portion of Settimi's act a bird teaches Sylvan to fly. At first he is clumsy and hesitant, but soon he is soaring. His joy is tremendous, and he wants to sing, or yell, but he can't. Finally he has to land, and take up the flute again and play. As Settimi says "Joy has to be shared to be real. It's a little like watching a really good show on TV, when you're alone. If you laugh out loud, it's almost embarrassing."

In another routine, Sylvan has a musical contest with Apollo. The harp is Apollo's instrument, and he plays it pompously. The music is heavy, emotional, and slightly down. Sylvan dances, and then plays his piece, a light baroque number for five flutes. (In the show four parts are on tape and the fifth is played live.) King Midas, who has been asked to judge the contest, proclaims Sylvan the winner. Apollo angrily casts a spell that causes King Midas' ears to grow as long as an ass's.

It's a happy show. Settimi is a happy fellow. Even his father, a staunch Chicago engineer-businessman who heads a plastics conglomerate, is beginning to accept him, he says.

A "Godfather" Wedding

"When I first told my father what I wanted to do, his reaction was 'Oh no, the kid's a prancing fag.' But now that I'm doing alright, and I can send him press clippings, and he's seen me perform a couple of times he's not so upset.

"At my sister's wedding . . . picture it, a big Italian wedding, just like in the Godfather, only my father is the Patrone . . . I gave my sister a song I wrote for her wedding present. When the 'Polka King Orchestra' took a break I got up on the bandstand with my guitar, and made a few jokes about how I was too cheap to buy her a toaster, and then I sang the song.

"Well my parents were all misty, and the aunts and uncles had tears in their eyes, and my sister came over and she was just sobbing, and even my brother-in-law, who's a pretty tough guy, was a little touched. They liked it. And it was a good song. So they're beginning to get used to the idea that I'm a performer.

"Now it's been a couple of weeks since I spoke to them last, and wait till I tell them . . . a Toronto producer wants to do a TV show with me in the lead as a mime artist who falls in love with a deaf woman. They'll flip."

Yes, it's been a good summer for Settimi.

Racism alive and well

By DAVID GLEDHILL

"Roach, Paki, white power, jungle bunny."

The growing use of such phrases denotes a change from subtle to overt Canadian racism, concluded participants in a public forum on racism held by Catholics for a Social Change.

Featured speakers were Professor Doctor Wilson Head, member of the Urban Alliance on Race Relations, Ms. Judith Weisman, a mayoral consultant on racial issues, Reverend Michael Paschal, who is involved with the city's Caribbean community and Indrani Bell a member of the black community. They expressed deep concern about this new trend towards violence, profanity and increased public attention on the actions of the non-whites in Canadian society.

Bell, told an audience of more than hundred people, one of the many incidents which she said leaves her feeling like "packing it all in" and returning to Guyana. She related, how a gang of at least a dozen girls confronted her and began taunting her with such insults as "Paki go home, Paki pig, roach, we don't need you here."

Bell said she is "afraid to walk, talk or work outside," spending most of her time in the house.

Speaking as an individual, Weisman pointed out this new trend in racism could be traced back, almost to the day in Oct. 74, she said when Robert Andras, Minister of Manpower and Immigration, announced changes in the country's immigration policy. The whole question of worker visas and illegal immigrants, coupled with the current unemployment situation has only served to heighten public tension, said Weisman. She urged the audience to examine racism all the way back to the Western rationale of enslavement of racial groups for economic purposes.

Reverend Michael Paschal of the Caribbean Toronto Catholic Secretariat, recounted that in 1914 in Trinidad the Catholic Church refused to accept black girls in the white only convents, and prohibited blacks from ministerial schools. He added that up until the early '60's, at least one school in Ontario refused to admit black students.

Head questioned the popularly held opinion Canada "does not have a race problem" and therefore "racism does not exist here." As far back as 1773 when we imported our first black slaves we've had a race problem, he pointed out.

All black communities have existed for years in the Maritimes and south western Ontario, but it is only within the last eight or nine years that cities such as Toronto have witnessed a substantial growth in their black communities.

In talking to older blacks, some of whom were born in Canada, Head found they have experienced a subtle, hidden and hypocritical form of racism all their lives. Terming this "submerged" discrimination, he said it came into play in such crucial areas as employment and housing.

In recent test cases which Head was involved in, a pair of blacks sought jobs and apartments. Two whites who were sent a short time after to the same locations had no problem finding a job or renting the apartment, Head said.

Following the speakers, the audience broke up into discussion groups where they discussed experience with racism and how to deal with it.

Portuguese colonies, imperialism in reverse

By PIPPA BROWN

Definite improvement in socio-economic conditions has been made in Guinea-Bissau and Mozambique since their liberation, said three recent Canadian visitors to the former Portuguese colonies. The praise was in sharp contrast to the situation in Portuguese Angola.

Speaking to a Wednesday meeting of the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of South Africa (TCLSAC), speakers John Barker and John Saul said the PIAGC and the Frelimo regimes had adopted a reasonable and pragmatic approach to government.

In both countries, the new socialist parties in power were directing their efforts towards reconstructing the federal economy and providing better medical facilities and social services, they said.

According to Barker, the government of Guinea Bissau had successfully begun to implement its new policy. Several large new hospitals and federal housing projects were in the process of being built.

But the improving socio-economic conditions and the relatively stable political situation in Guinea-Bissau and Mozambique contrasted sharply with the state of affairs in Angola, they said.

Richard Lee, who had just returned from a European conference on Angola in Amsterdam, warned the situation in Angola was "very grim."

Persistent intervention by international powers from both east and west, as well as constant interferences by neighbouring African nations frustrated any hope for a peaceful settlement between the warring political groups in Angola, he said.

Lee doubted the November deadline set for the establishment of Anglocan independence would be met. However, Lee stressed "We could look forward to the development of Angola into a free state under the guidance of the Popular Movement to Liberate Angola (MPLA). The important territorial gains recently made by the M.P.L.A. make it the most powerful liberationist movement in Angola, he said.

The three speakers heartily agreed that the struggle for African liberation was a never-ending battle. They urged more support in terms of financial and military aid be sent to African liberation movements.

57 year-old turkey answers all your questions

By CAITLIN KELLY

Ann Landers, self-professed "57 year old turkey" and most widely-read columnist in the world, made a surprise appearance at North Toronto Collegiate Institute on Friday morning.

"No doubt many of you have been wondering what the old battleaxe looks like," she began in her address to 800 students. "I did not come here to deliver a sermon. I came here to talk about what bugs you and what you can do about it."

She compared the world of her adolescence to that of today's teenagers, conceding that teenagers of the seventies "have different problems": "It's much more difficult to be young and decent today than it ever has been", she said, adding that pornography "to get us revved up", was an influence unfelt in her day.

On the subject of drinking and smoking, Landers stressed moderation and abstinence if possible.

"When I was 15, I promised myself that I'd never smoke a cigarette or take a drink. My decision had nothing to do with morals; I wanted to amount to something. I thought I'd have a better chance if I kept myself in shape."

Whether it is her hectic schedule of speaking engagements and attempting to answer 1,000 letters a day, or her professed abstinence, Landers is in remarkably good shape.

"The letters have changed, people are asking different questions, said Landers. Her opinion on drugs and alcohol however remains emphatically negative. "If you're wise, you'll stay away from both of them."

She is against the legalization of marijuana, but is strongly in favour of its decriminalization.

"In Texas, a kid can get 15 years if he's caught with two joints in his pocket. I think this is outrageous!" The criminal element involved with imprisonment also bothers her immensely.

Landers takes the position that homosexuality is a "dysfunction", although she said she has lobbied for homosexual rights. "I have compassion for them", she said, and told of her fight for a bill that made Illinois the first state to decriminalize homosexual relations.

"Sex is like dynamite, it makes all the difference what you use it for," she warned. She agreed "sex is a natural instinct", but added, "If we obeyed every natural instinct we'd end up in jail for assault and battery, mayhem, even murder. Civilized people are expected to curb their natural instincts; this sets us apart from cats, dogs, rabbits and gorillas."

She sympathized with the problems of frustrated teenagers, and paraphrased Kinsey's report on the levels of sex drive. In reference to adolescent male sexuality, she said, "He is his horniest at 17!"

She advocated masturbation as an alternative to sexual promiscuity, "It's not going to make you crazy and your hands will not fall off!" she assured her audience.

She also cautioned against the dangers of venereal disease and urged the use of effective contraception, citing what she felt were the safest methods. She listed the symptoms of venereal disease and added, "I'm not trying to scare you, I'm just telling you the way it is."

She said she draws on the knowledge of professionals in various fields to substantiate her answers. "I have access to top consultants in every area of human behaviour. My information comes from the top authorities." She is on the board of overseers of Harvard Medical School and the sponsors committee of the Mavo Clinic.

"I love kids and I care what happens to them", Landers fished. "If you have any little problems or big problems, Ann Landers is your girl."

The Varsity — Caitlin Kelly

"No, you won't weaken your spinal cord," says friend Ann.

Blues In First Place After Decisive 26-0 Stampede Over Queen's Sentiment obviously does not find a place in the hearts of the U of T Varsity Blues.

Here it was, Frank Tindall's last official visit to Varsity Stadium as a coach and one might think that, as hospitable hosts, the Blues would leave him with at least one happy reflection on the afternoon.

They didn't even do that as they blanked their traditional rivals, Queen's Golden Gaels 26-0 before a gathering of over 12,000 in Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate football action here Saturday.

The win, their third in as many starts this season, left the Blues atop the Eastern Section in a tie with also undefeated U of Ottawa Gee Gees.

The score in this case was only partially indicative of the play. The Blues easily dominated the Gaels and not only kept them off the scoreboard but also limited their offence to under 100 yards. Furthermore, after their first sequence of plays the visitors from Kingston never again scrambled from the Toronto side of midfield.

"Our defensive unit had their best game so far," said Blues head coach Ron Murphy. "We did not feel we played a great game last week (when Laurier piled up 400 yards of offence) and so we were out to turn things around."

The weak throwing of Gaels rookie quarterback Paul Shugart confined Queen's to a ground offence and that got nowhere linebackers John Vernon and Nick Desimini who nearly completely shut off the Gaels' outside running game.

"The front line put on a heck of a lot of pressure," remarked Desimini. "They made the rest of us look good. It was trouble getting to the ball carrier the way they kept their blockers off."

Although the Blues put on an impressive show it must be remembered that the Gaels do not possess one of the more potent offences in the league. It was rendered even less potent by the absence of first-string quarterback Doug Latham, who was sidelined with an injured hand. Shugart had a thankless assignment and, unfortunately for him, did not get much help from his team-mates.

The Blues, offensively, did as well as they had to. They took the lead on their second possession of the game after eight and a half minutes of play. Mark Bragagnolo, who appears to be back at the top of his form, set up the score with a 34-yard run to the Queen's 20 yard line. Three plays later fullback Libert Castillo went in from six yards out on a draw play.

Midway through the second half another long run by Bragagnolo set up the second major. Quarterback Dave Langley scored on a sprint out from one yard away.

Two converts and a single by kicker Mike Sokovnin gave the Blues a 15-0 lead at the half.

The most spectacular major score came in the third quarter in a most unlikely manner for the blues. Paul Forbes, with the help of some excellent blocks at midfield, sprinted 62 yards on a punt return for six points, the first such touchdown for quite a while for a Toronto player.

The punt return has long been a neglected aspect of the game with the Blues however this year they are starting to spend more time on these specialties.

"It was supposed to outside to the left but the Queen's players over-reacted that way so I cut back into the middle," said Forbes, who ran the last five yards into the end zone backwards.

According to Murphy that last piece of showmanship was not in emulation of Montreal's Johnny Rodgers but rather a gesture in return for one Gaels' Peter McNabb inflicted on the York Yeomen last season on a similar play. Forbes was a member of the Yeomen last year.

Following that play two safety touches, conceded by Queen's punter Will Kennedy, were the only additions to the Blues' scoring total for the game. That did not mean they lacked for further opportunities, however.

Soon after Forbes' runback the Blues were back in scoring range as Langley's 18 yard run took them to the Gaels' six yard line. At that point, with Langley slightly hurt back-up pivot Steve Kerr went into the game and promptly fumbled on a keeper play.

Kerr was also denied a major score twice in the fourth quarter when the Blues were inside the Queen's 20.

CAPPELLE COMMENTS —

Bragagnolo led all ground gainers with 179 yards, 166 of them rushing . . . Castillo ran nine times for 39 yards, Langley six for 36 . . . Langley completed six of 16 passes for 68 yards while Kerr was good on one of five for four yards . . . Kerry Powell was the Gaels' leading rusher with 54 yards on 17 attempts . . . Shugart completed three of six passes . . . Tom Ciangelo, who played at Carleton last season, was activated into the lineup and provided a very adequate replacement for linebacker Julio Giordani . . . with his four points on kicking Mike Sokovnin moved into the team scoring lead with 14 points, two ahead of Brent Elsey . . .

Soccer Blues Suffer First Loss Of Campaign

By MIKE BEAL

Varsity Blues soccer team suffered their first defeat of the season Saturday, a 2-1 decision at the hands of the Laurentian Vees. The game was played at Scarborough College, and most observers agreed that for excitement and entertainment, the game was one of the best displays of soccer this season.

The opening kick-off set the pace, with both teams immediately setting the scene with quick action and good ball control in efforts to open the scoring. Both defenses were solid, preventing any good-scoring opportunities until 21 minutes into the game, when Vees scored their first.

The underdog situation seemed to fire the Blues and the resulting surge very nearly yielded the tying goal.

Vees widened their lead at 34 minutes when some sloppy clearing by Blues gave away a 4-man-on-3 break. Ted Domalewski's low shot seemed to surprise MacDougall and the result put Vees ahead by 2.

Again the Blues came back with some fine chances before the half ended but couldn't put a mark on the scoreboard.

Some lineup changes at the interval seemed to work well for the game, as they applied constant pressure for the final 45 minutes. Still, the Blues couldn't find the mark until 72 minutes, as centre half Chris Horrocks sent a beautiful ball over the heads of Vee backs. Ierullo and Vees goalkeeper Vic Pessot both went for the ball and collided leaving a loose ball and an open goal, opportunities that Greg Pinheiro seized to score the lone Blues goal.

The Blues remain optimistic about their playoff chances. Their next match takes them to Trent on Wednesday followed by a home game with Guelph Saturday at Varsity Stadium, where it is hoped that attendance will break the normal record of 25.

SICKBAY SHUT?

Feeling tired? Got the flu? Poor baby. Students requiring medical treatment may be left out in the cold next September if budget cutbacks force the university infirmary at 42 St. George to close.

The information comes as a shock to college heads and residence deans.

Last Thursday Dr. G.E. Wodehouse, Director of the infirmary, learned it is likely a recommendation will be made to the central Budget Committee on October 20th that the 1976-77 Health Service Budget be reduced by more than $50,000. The information came from Professor F. Iacobucci, Vice President-Internal Affairs.

The reduction will necessitate the infirmary to close and according to Dr. Wodehouse, "it most certainly will be approved."

The infirmary is the only 24-hour service in the university aside from the campus police. Staffed by fully-qualified nurses, it operates a night answering service and drop-in centre, in addition to providing basic medical treatment for students not ill enough to require hospital treatment.

Iacobucci emphasized that no decision has as yet been made but admitted it is "one of the alternatives that the university has been seriously considering" in cutbacks.

Iacobucci said there are no alternatives outside of "raising fees to make the deficit disappear" and continuing "to collect OHIP recoveries" which the infirmary has done in the past. He added that the infirmary issue "underscores the seriousness" of cutbacks in services.

"The infirmary receives over 400 calls per year after hours," said Wodehouse, "and, six to eight people use it every Saturday and Sunday."

He said bed occupancy figures were down due to mild weather but would certainly increase in the event of a hard winter.

He is against the decision and wrote to college heads and deans to publicize the infirmary's doubtful future. "I don't recommend it," he said. "After 33 years I think it will be a tremendous loss to the community."

Innis College Principal Peter Russell was shocked by the news. "The infirmary served a very important function," he said. "I think it's very sad."

Russell stressed his shock "is not focused at Simcoe Hall but across there at Queen's Park." It is a "political matter".

He said it appears that "until we show that the quality of life at university is deteriorating, until it is tangibly visible," the government won't do anything about it. "It's too bad you have to create a mess," said Russell.

Professor G. Ignatieff, Trinity provost, expressed similar concern and stressed, "I would regret and deplore the closing of the infirmary." He said Trinity students use the infirmary and Trinity residences have no facilities for a health service of their own.

Ignatieff regards it as a "serious lessening of the services available to students."

"This shows the desperate plight the university seems to be in," he said.

University College Principal A. Hallett thinks that out-patient departments are taking on larger treatment and pointed out that Toronto General Hospital is very close.

Hallett called the news "a little bit unfortunate" and described the infirmary as a "very convenient thing" which is very desirable and good to have. But, "one can't have all conveniences" in this financial situation and he stressed the university had to face the "loss of a number of things."

Reaction at Victoria and New Colleges, where students definitely use the infirmary, was stronger.

Ted Walker, Dean of Men at VC, said he is both "very concerned" and "very disturbed" over what he feels is a "great loss to the university community."

Walker discussed the matter with the president and principal yesterday. "Our common view is that it's a very bad thing," he said. "We use it quite regularly."

Walker said the matter will be raised at a council meeting next

In the varsity: Bob White

Since the Infirmary is closing down, the health service will have messy doorsteps as the wounded and the weary search succor.

week to determine a reaction.

New College Dean of Women, Mrs. A. Taylor said the "infirmary has been a great facility."

Taylor said "there really isn't anyone to give students proper attention and food" when they are sick.

She knew of many instances where students had become ill during the night and were taken to the infirmary.

If the infirmary is closed next year minimum service will continue to be available. Wodehouse said they will do the best possible by operating telephone and bell-boy answering-services with nurses and doctors on call, a system the infirmary has always used.

Student Isolated By Meds Bias

By PAUL McGRATH

Amid charges of discrimination against students of Chinese origin in the University of Toronto Medical faculty, the university on Oct. 17 will hear the academic appeal of Henry Fong, a fourth-year medical student expelled last November.

Fong will appear before the Academic Appeals sub-committee of the Governing Council following the denial earlier this year of an appeal to the faculty of Medicine.

Fong is asking to be allowed to repeat his fourth year at another medical school, charging that discussion of his ethnic background was a significant factor in the decision to expel him. In this discussion, he says, makes it impossible for him to receive an objective assessment at U of T.

Fong's trouble started in the 1973-74 academic year with a personality conflict with Dr. H. Grynielowski during Fong's clerkship in Family and Community Medicine.

This altercation led Grynielowski to write to Associate Dean Steiner both informing Steiner that Fong would fail the rotation and demanding that he be expelled. She made charges, which have not been proven, that Fong was "dishonest".

Fong believes it was this initial confrontation which led to a stigmatization of his personality among many members of the medical school faculty. Shortly after this, Steiner wrote to the chairmen of departments in which Fong had taken courses, asking for an evaluation of his performance as a student.

Although Steiner's letter makes no mention of Fong's racial background, it is apparent from the replies it had been discussed either at meetings of the chairmen or in correspondence. The replies are surprising because they include both evaluations of his performance and comments about his background, sometimes with equal weight.

One reply, from W.J. Simpson, director of Medical Education at Princess Margaret Hospital, states Fong had passed his rotation in Therapeutic Radiology. But he goes on to say: "In view of the nature of the comments and judgments concerning Mr. Fong, I believe that his performance during the one week spent at the Princess Margaret Hospital should be totally ignored when a decision is made concerning his continuation in the clerkship."

Although it is not clear whether the "comments and judgments" referred to racial discussion, another reply to Steiner ends with a cryptic sentence: "I would agree that ethnic and cultural differences do not include dishonesty."

In a closed Board of Examiners meeting, Fong was expelled, but shortly thereafter the Medical School Appeals Committee allowed him to repeat his fourth year.

Fong started his repeat year with an eight-week rotation in medicine, which he passed, and moved on to a rotation in surgery. The next segment of the series was an elective time, in which Fong chose to study Obstetrics and Gynecology.

However, he had already failed surgery but this information was not relayed to him until the last day of elective time.

On this basis, the Board of Examiners was reconvened and Fong expelled again. He appealed again, citing family problems as he had in the first appeal, but it was denied.

Fong refuses to label anyone in the faculty of medicine a racist, but he is nonetheless convinced that there were discussions about his background during the process of his expulsion, and that this had an effect on the outcome.

The cloak of secrecy now surrounding university budget proceedings may be lifted soon, if only as far as the Planning and Resources Committee is concerned.

According to a letter sent to members of the committee, one or two special joint meetings are to be held between Planning and Resources and the Budget committee before Dec. 10.

Chairman of Planning and Resources W.J.D. Lewis in the letter cited the "special role" of the committee in the budget process. He also mentioned the importance of the committee becoming acquainted with major policy issues of the draft budget in order to discharge their responsibilities.

Planning and Resources is responsible for sending guidelines to the Budget Committee to inform the latter in percentage terms of required budget cuts. They also review Budget Committee recommendations to ensure that they conform to guidelines and long-range priorities of the university.

All operations of the Budget Committee are carried on in secret, including the finalized budget.

Some members of Planning and Resources, according to the letter, had expressed the hope they might be allowed to sit as observers at

The Committee Against Racism (CAR), based at U of T, calls the situation differently. They see the Fong case as only one part of a massive campaign centered at the faculty of medicine to limit the number of Canadian citizens of Chinese stock who come to the faculty.

Pressure uncovers budget secrets

Budget Committee meetings. In dismissing the proposal as unfeasible, Lewis states the presence of observers might "constrain the freedom of members of the committee (Budget) in their review of issues."

But despite the joint meetings it appears unlikely that budget information will go beyond Planning and Resources. Budget chairman George Connell said it was up to the Budget Committee to decide, but that it was probable the meetings would be held in camera.

The first meeting, tentatively scheduled for Oct. 16, would not provide budget figures but would primarily furnish background information, Connell said. He added this would probably entail such matters as anticipating changes in university income and expenditure.

Figures to be released at any subsequent joint meeting would probably be very aggregate, said Connell, most likely at the aggregate level of budget groups as large as the Faculty of Arts and Sciences and the various colleges.

Planning and Resources committee member Michael Sabia said "Undoubtedly I think this is a step forward," and added "but because the university has done this they have a responsibility to provide meaningful figures."

He cautioned the committee would not necessarily be helped much "unless you can get behind those highly aggregated figures."

Lewis said he saw the meetings as an attempt to "achieve a greater degree of continuing liaison."

"I think it's fair to say Planning and Resources wants very early notice of policy so that they can deal with them in a realistic time-frame."

He said Planning and Resources was less concerned with figures than with the overall financial situation and the direction in which it was going.

"Unquestionably current financial stringency underlies our need for advance information," Lewis said. He expressed hope that a second joint meeting could be arranged in late October or early November.

Asked if he thought this new action by the budget committee indicated an opening up of the budget process Lewis said, "Personally I hope so." He added there is a "need to operate as much as possible openly."

"All the real surplus has been squeezed out of the budget," said Lewis. "Now we're making choices."

Lewis said he didn't think the budget should be debated piece by piece, but remarked "I think the university has to be managed with a high degree of consensus."

SAC Sandbags Common Front

By BOB BETTSON

The Common Front of U of T's students workers and support staff is still together and planning to meet next week to plan further strategy against government cutbacks despite disagreements between students and faculty representatives at last night's meeting.

The coalition, started last March to oppose government cutbacks which threaten the quality of education at U of T is composed of various member organizations from among students, staff and faculty at U of T.

Last night's meeting ended up inconclusively after SAC was rebuffed in an attempt to force the University of Toronto Faculty Association to take a position opposing tuition fee increases. SAC wanted UTFA to withdraw from the coalition if they didn't comply.

SAC vice-president Sa'ad Saïdullah told the group the SAC executive had decided on the demand because they felt the faculty should take a position. He said Nelson gave SAC assurances this would be done earlier.

Saïdullah said SAC felt if organizations within the coalition couldn't agree on a common position then there was no use continuing.

UTFA president Bill Nelson said the faculty association does not "accept requests as to what it should or should not pass at its meetings."

He said he didn't think faculty felt strongly one way or another on the possibility of a tuition fee increase. But he termed the SAC demand a "red herring."

He said he resented the demand and felt that the faculty would certainly reject support for the motion if SAC continued to use it as a threat.

Other representatives at the meeting took SAC to task for threatening to split the coalition on the issue.

Arts and Science Student Union fieldworker Jeannie Greatbatch called the SAC position "childish" and said the coalition should instead discuss positive actions.

Ontario Federation of Students observer Dale Martin pointed out that coalitions have existed only to work for one common goal.

Martin said the coalition should confine itself to the one issue of fighting cutbacks and agree not to deal with disputes among its members.

SAC representatives insisted that there should be a "minimal" program agreed on by all groups or else any action is pointless.

A motion formally rejecting the SAC initiative but calling on all groups to oppose tuition fee increases was tabled pending SAC reaction to the unfavourable reception its suggestion got at the meeting.

In another move, one of the more quiet elements in the coalition, the University of Toronto Staff Association which represents many non-unionized staff, officially withdrew from the coalition.

UTSA President Betsy Conally wrote in a letter to the other members that UTSA was withdrawing due to the lack of a concerted focus on the part of the coalition.

Conally said that UTSA's limited resources could probably be put to better use elsewhere. An UTSA spokesman at the meeting said the group might reconsider if the situation changed.

Canada's own mercury poisoning

By CHRIS DUVERNET

Anyone who thinks the Mercury poisoning in Minamata City Japan is 8,000 miles away should think again. Speakers representing Indian and Metis groups from Quebec, Ontario and NWT met with Japanese victims of Minamata disease last Sunday to express concern at their own troubles with Methyl-Mercury poisoning.

Joe Keesak, a member of the Ojibwa Warriors Society said "We do not like seeing our future", referring to films of the effects of prolonged mercury pollution in the Japanese fishing village of Minamata.

"We are a dying race of people" he said to the crowd at OCE auditorium. "Though we are far apart we share the same common problem."

Brother Samuel a spokesman for the Group to Arrest Minamata Disease accused the federal government of negligence in its treatment of native-people suffering from mercury poisoning. "Indian Affairs never did anything," he asserted.

Following their recent visit to Japan with the Minamata Disease Patients Alliance (MDPA) speakers expressed their anger and shock at the Japanese situation.

Effects of poisoning by mercurial compounds in Minamata City, Japan include "disturbances of movement, concentric constriction of the visual fields, dysarthria, disorders of articulation, impaired hearing, sensory disturbances, and tremor." Cases where patients did not recognize their parents, were totally incapable of performing even the most basic physical functions, and were unable to grasp or express the nature of their surroundings were shown to the Canadians.

In 1956, when the disease first became conspicuous, Ninon Chisso company officials refused to admit that their chemical plant in Minamata was responsible in any way.

It was not until 1968 that the Japanese government designated the plant as the source of pollution, despite the continual recurrence of poisoned workers, local fishermen, consumers and household pets during the twelve year interval.

In Canada a 1971 Quebec government study first indicated the presence of mercury in Northern Quebec areas which the Indians fished. They thereupon "shut down fishing run by Indians". But it was not until June 1975, when another test was run, that a budget proposal by the natives to alleviate their plight was accepted by the national Health and Welfare ministry.

In the Northwest Territories, said the observer for the Metis Association, Tapaway Chretien, the one study undertaken was never finished. "Research has been very small."

"We have a problem in Yellowknife," he asserted. "There are children with 180 parts per million." "Our area is also a disaster area. The condition is red."

To alleviate their situation the Northwest-Territories group has been "isolating specific cases".

"What I heard from native people in Canada reminds me of the situation in Minamata exactly 20 years ago. I think this is going to be the third case of Minamata disease in the world," said the maker of the featured films, Noriaki Tsuchimoto.

"It's not only the problem for native people and fishermen. In Canada the first victims are the native people but I'm sure that white people will be affected by mercury too."

The Japanese delegation has spent several days in Toronto and plans to visit the Ontario-site of the alleged poisoning, the Grassy Narrows and White Dog reserves.

Protest gain longer hours

By KAREN MCGUIRE

Responding to student protest over E. J. Pratt library cuts, the Budget committee of Victoria College voted last night to appropriate contingency funds to restore weekend services.

Acting on general recommendations of the Victoria SAC (VUSAC) and 800 students who had signed a petition demanding restoration of weekend hours, the committee voted to spend $1,200 to extend library services on Saturdays and Sundays.

The committee also decided to conduct a survey of students using the Pratt to examine how hours and staff may be reshuffled to provide maximum service.

Because of a deficit of $0.5 million dollars in Victoria's last budget, the Pratt Library was among a number of academic and residence services in which cutbacks were made to reduce overall expenditures. The library administration had planned at the outset of the year to close entirely on weekends in order to work within its reduced budget. Decreases in staff and in book appropriation also account for substantial proportions of the budget cut.

Residence students appeared to be those most likely to suffer from the loss of weekend library hours. For students who live at or around Vic, the Pratt is a close, convenient place for study and research. But with the opening of the Roberts Library and the expansion of the University library system in the past few years, Pratt Chief Librarian Ms. Lorna Fraser, said many off-campus Victoria students who formerly used the Pratt on weekends are now working at the larger libraries, leaving the Pratt largely for residence students.

Attendance at Pratt on weekends had diminished so much, said Miss Fraser, that closing it at those times appeared to be one of the most obvious and least painful solutions to the library's present financial crisis.

Yet the entire closure of the library on weekends would also have ultimately pushed residence students off the campus. VUSAC vice-president Robin Wardlaw protested before the committee that such a move would result in the loss of the "spirit of community which Victoria has long had."

Arguing this consideration was more important than the actual number of students using the library on weekends, VUSAC representatives convinced the committee restoration of weekend library services at Victoria would help the college regain a sense of community that would eventually increase the number of students using the Pratt.

Wardlaw pointed out, "No one can contest the fact that library usage has been low. Extending library hours will bring students to Victoria and to the library."

This move comes at the right moment when the cross appointment of professors is bringing students who formerly had classes at Sid Smith back to Vic, creating a potential for a sense of college community.

The survey of student opinion on library hours should be completed by the end of next week, and new hours will likely be in force by the middle of October.

Language testing for aliens questioned

WINNIPEG (CUP) The validity of the test as an admissions requirement for foreign students attending Canadian Universities has been questioned.

According to two articles in the second annual Medical Measurements Yearbook, the TOESL test which is currently used is not a reliable indicator of the students ability to study English.

"If predictions of academic achievement is the major goal", says one article, "then the effort is doomed from the beginning".

The TOESL test is administered to all students whose native language is not English. It is composed of five sections; listening comprehension, English structure, vocabulary, reading comprehension and writing ability.

According to Clinton Chase, head of the Department of Educational Psychology at Indiana University, each section of the test has no bearing on what the foreign student might hope to study in English speaking countries.

As well, he said, the grading is questionable because the reliability is 0.97. "These reliabilities are none to high for tests designed to make decisions about individuals."

Chase concluded, "TOESL is not a useful predictor of great achievements. The manual suggests that TOESL is best used for admission only in conjunction with corroborating data on the candidates. This appears to be excellent advice for the test user."

Others lucky aptitude tests don't count

ST. CATHARINE'S (CUP) Brock first year students who recently took an aptitude test to prove their English skills didn't like the test.

The test, which is being piloted at 4 Ontario universities to test the language abilities of university entrants, was criticized both for its content and for the way it was administered.

A grade 12 graduate enrolled in first year courses called it "the hardest test I've ever written" and complained of starting the test an hour late, not having enough time to finish, and confusion over the computer cards where answers were to be filled in.

Another student, a grade 13 graduate, said she thought the test was "generally fair" but also complained of having to start an hour and ten minutes late.

According to the University, there is no penalty for failing the test, although people who do fail might consider taking a remedial reading and writing test offered as course credit.

The course provides lessons in "basic conventions of syntax, grammar, spelling and punctuation" as well as "thorough practise in the elements of composition", according to the course description.

The problem, say some of the students that took the aptitude test, is that most students are already settled and registered in courses and may not want to, or be able to, change the remedial course after the test results are made available.

Secrecy is not the only way

Dr. G.E. Wodehouse has committed the unmentionable. He has taken a little personal initiative in the hudgeting process by writing to the heads of all colleges and residences informing them of what should have been a quiet decision by the administration, the threatened closing of the university infirmary.

Wodehouse, director of the university's Health Service was informed last week by Internal Affairs vice-president Frank Iacocucci that the health of the university depended on cutting $50,000 from the Health Service budget, which according to Wodehouse, would necessitate this rather drastic action.

The infirmary performs an important function, especially since most colleges discontinued their own infirmaries some years back in the hope that the university would handle the work. For a $4-a-day charge, students who need medication on a regular basis or should not get out of bed for meals can rest in peace. These are students who are not ill enough to take up a hospital bed, but are a risk to have around a residence for fear of infection or because the residence cannot provide the sort of care necessary.

More disturbing than the actual threat is the way it was handled by the administration. An action such as closing the infirmary is a policy decision and a rather major one. If the university administration plans to make major changes in an important service, it cannot just hithely inform the person responsible for upholding the service that these changes will take place without expecting anyone else to have opinions on the matter. The body that is supposed to make such decisions, Internal Affairs committee, knew nothing about such a plan. Student member and chairman of the committee, Tim Buckley, was surprised.

Wodehouse's reasons for writing (as stated in the letter) was to inform all concerned in the colleges so that they could make appropriate hudget recommendations for the next fiscal year should a return to college infirmaries be necessary. But there seems to be a little more to it. Wodehouse is right now a voice in the wilderness saying "now wait a minute!" to the finance folk at Simcoe Hall. His letter may be only an advisement, but it is also a warning and a call for more openness in the hudget. If the only way to get a little satisfaction and some humanity hack into the hudget is to hlow the secrecy all over the university, then so be it.

The university's financial situation is well known to all, and sympathy must be extended to those who have to wield the axe. But executions even in the most civilized of countries are a matter of public record and witnessed by curious crowds. The same must be the case here. Almost everyone suffers from the cutbacks, but if people are unaware of the extent of their common misery there can be no consensus as to what sort of action must be taken. Instead of everyone pushing the government, the only result will be isolated incidences of people like Wodehouse standing up and saying "no more!"

And, instead of a common understanding of the problem, the administration will receive snotty questions like the following: "There are plenty of people at Simcoe Hall who earn over $40,000 per annum. Are they worth it? Are they doing their job? Is the hudget self-preservation?"

The university cannot afford for its own health to operate this way.

To the Editor;
 I read with interest John O'Donahue's letter to The Varsity concerning my decision to release confidential Executive Committee material. Considering the fact that John is also a member of the Governing Council's Executive Committee his letter reflects a distinct naivete about the way

Kanowitch replies to charges of irresponsibility decision-making takes place in reality at the University of Toronto. John argues in his letter that if students breach Governing Council rules, they will soon find themselves left out of the decision-making process. What John has failed to notice is that students are at present being left out of the decision-making process. Students do not now, nor have they ever played a significant role in decision-making.

An excellent example of this is the Governing Council. The Governing Council is composed of 50 members of whom only 8 are students. The Executive Committee is composed of 14 members of whom only 2 are students. The Academic Affairs Committee is composed of 25 members of whom only 7 are students. In the three years that the Governing Council has existed students have been outvoted on every major issue which the Governing Council has dealt with. In short, students have had little role in determining any of the Governing Council's rules or policies, included its policy on confidentiality.

Another point which John raises is that it is important to preserve a sense of trust amongst university governors. Perhaps before John so willingly trusts everybody on the Governing Council, he should take a good close look at who they are. Amongst the 50 Governing Council members are 15 government appointees, the vast majority of whom are wealthy Tory, corporate executives. These include: (1) The Chairman of the Governing Council, Malim Harding, who is also the chief executive officer of Harding Carpets. (2) The vice-chairman, Sydney Hermant, who is also the President of Imperial Optical Ltd.

as well as a director and major shareholder of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, (3) Edward Dunlop, Publisher of The Sun, and a former Progressive Conservative cabinet minister, (4) W.J.D. Lewis, President, Canadian Operations, The Prudential Insurance Co. of America, (5) John Tory, who is, among other things, a director of The Royal Bank of Canada, Thomson Newspapers Ltd., Abitibi Paper Co. and a close confidant of William Davis — just to name a few.

In addition to the 16 government appointees, there are also 12 faculty representatives. These faculty representatives, among other notable things, were responsible last year for preventing students from sitting as voting members of tenure committees. Perhaps John is willing to blindly trust these people, but their lengthy record of voting against student interests certainly does not warrant it.

In conclusion, I would like to offer John O'Donahue some words of advice. Terms such as "trust" and "obeyance of rules", are meaningless abstractions. They take on importance only when considered within the context of a specific environment, in this case the environment of the Governing Council. Before you so eagerly rush off to trust the university governors and abide by their rules John, take some time first to examine exactly who are the rule-makers, and what are the rules they're asking you to obey. Critical awareness, is a much more valuable tool in the long run than blind obedience.

Meds admissions: money-shy only

By ROB PRITCHARD

The policies of admission to the Faculty of Medicine may be changed to give further consideration to the candidates' non-academic qualities. However, nothing is clear since the resolution, passed by the Faculty of Medicine Council last spring, awaits approval by the University Academic Affairs Committee.

The Faculty's Associate Dean Edward Llewellyn-Thomas has disclosed that Academic Affairs' approval is contingent on the faculty's "providing analysis" on the issue.

Llewellyn-Thomas has revealed that he considers changes in admission considerations unnecessary, because evaluating an applicant's character "lends itself to manipulation".

The Admission Committee of the Faculty recommended the proposal, which was to reduce the academic factor of consideration to sixty per cent. However, this was further modified to eighty per cent by a University Committee of Admissions and Awards.

Llewellyn-Thomas said that "the general belief of the public, press, teachers, and the average physician

... that academic excellence does not make a good doctor — prompted the Faculty to consider these revisions in admissions policy.

Presently an applicant must fall within the top six hundred to be considered. From this list, 240 are chosen on the basis of non-academic criteria as well as, again, marks.

A candidate must present three letters of recommendation. As well, his "social, scientific, artistic" interests and "any position where he showed obvious interest in helping people" are taken into account, Llewellyn-Thomas explained.

"First-year students are interviewed to make sure they can communicate in English," he added. He stressed that this policy was not to discriminate against landed immigrants but to guard against students who could "speak excellent mathematics" and inadequate English.

Hazel Lynn, who was a student on the Admissions Committee that designed the proposed changes, expressed hope that new admissions criteria would recognize a candidate's "initiative... the ability to go ahead and do something."

Lynn cited "social awareness" as the characteristic that many medical students would consider foremost, but she countered, "a lot of people have social awareness but they don't have the drive and initiative to do anything about it."

Don McViear, a school superintendent who also served on the committee, agreed with the proposals as well, hoping that they would bring out "good communication abilities and a commitment to medicine" in the applicant.

McViear felt that an appraisal of the applicant's character could be done by means of "interviews, autobiographies... conducted by a lot of people" to reduce the danger of subjective considerations.

Llewellyn-Thomas, by contrast, felt that marks are an implicit "test of commitment and ability."

Llewellyn-Thomas said about expanding the number of admissions that "the number projected is 288, but no decision has been made yet."

"It costs about a hundred thousand dollars to train a medical student. If the taxpayers give us any more money, more medical students could be trained."

Llewellyn-Thomas objected to sundry charges of racism in admission considerations, pointing out that here, in contrast to other universities, fifty-nine students out of two hundred and forty that were accepted were landed immigrants.

Changing Men: The Anti-Sexist Male

By DANNY LEWIS
reprinted from Changing Men

A few years ago, I was playing jacks with a woman friend. I started imitating a sportscaster doing a play-by-play of the game, which she didn't enjoy. I figured she had no sense of humour, but the truth was, that was the only way I was comfortable with the game... turning it into a competition. Jacks, for Pete's sake!

It's hard for men to stop competing. We've spent our lives building a person of consequence, who's able to accomplish things, who's respected by those who know him. In school, status was gained by doing well in sports or getting good grades or fighting well or getting lots of girls. Outside school we compete over even more things: our careers, the quality of our dope, our strength, our knowledge of mechanics, electric circuits, or the workings of capitalism. Conversations in all-male groups often consists of trading insults, seldom compliments. Even when we're trading information, there's a strong element of competition, with nobody wanting to look too dumb.

What I've been noticing lately, and what I'd like to talk about in this article, is that this eternal competition shows up in the way we use our bodies.

Society has given us a whole catalogue of gestures, postures, expressions, tones-of-voice, and movements that are "manly". Those ways of holding our bodies are tools in the competition for respect, and they express a lot of the ways men are supposed to be: that we don't need anyone else; that we are never lost or bewildered; that we won't be pushed around; that we are proud of the "man" we built. I've bought nearly this whole catalogue of manly postures without thinking about it much. I use them in situations where I want to be respected. I'm only vaguely aware of them, so my descriptions will not be very accurate, but I hope they'll spark some recognition in you.

Not to close, man

I hold myself rather upright and rigid. I keep my face relaxed and not very mobile, better not to make a fool of myself. I grin, but I don't smile. It's too vulnerable. If I use my hands at all when speaking, they act strong, rather than soft and sensitive. I don't stand too close to a man I'm talking to. Generally, I don't face him directly but rather half turn away, so we're not so intimate, unless we're actually fighting. I put a little crackle edge on my voice to stand for authority, rather than letting it be soft and loving. I listen in a friendly way, but don't tilt my head in empathy. I don't talk about things unless they're exciting things.

If someone gives me a firm handshake, I make sure I squeeze right back. Even when I'm just killing time, I slouch without relaxing. I feel instinctively that certain postures are effeminate: my knees crossed, or held close together, my hands between my legs. The postures that feel OK are postures of defense or action. There's even a "manly" way to dance... very "in command" rather than letting myself softly sway with the music.

These gestures all add up to a charade fight between me and other me. I'm always ready to fend off a physical attack. That may sound exaggerated, but I think it's true, and not too surprising since I grew up in this culture that idolizes Clint Eastwood, Sean Connery, Larry Csonka, and so on. Even among anti-sexist men, I often see indications of how deeply we've retained a reverence for violence. Several months ago, I was in a discussion about experiences in school. One man finished a story about how horrible school had been by saying "... and I went to high school in New York City." A ripple of "yeah" went around the circle, meaning we knew he had been through it.

In the same discussion I talked about fights I'd had, with an undeniable twinge of pride that I'd had them. None of us would say that violence is a way to solve anything, but there was still a romance in testifying that we knew what violence was about.

So I'm saying that we gain and give respect through competition with other men, and our bodies are an important part of that competition. Fantasies of violence are important to all of us, and we constantly flash body language messages telling others we're ready to protect our bodies. I want to change the way I use my body, and change the way I respond to messages from others. Let me spell out some reasons why.

Backbone

First, I think that using the gestures I described earlier puts other men on their guard. I hurt our chances for creating a real relationship and insure that we'll stay superficial.

"Backbone" is a good word. I've been proud of how much I had. I was a clarified fort. I didn't need anyone, had huge reserves of armour so life's storms would never reach me. I was the opposite of "sissy"... a loser in the status struggle. He doesn't respect himself enough to keep fighting.

I'm starting to see the positive side of sissy. He loves himself enough to cry for himself when someone hurts him. I've had the opportunity to be around a few men who seemed pretty incapable of competing. At first I was put off by them as being just too weak. But I noticed that sometimes it was very easy to be relaxed and real around them. They had allowed me to drop my defences. At the first sign of someone putting me down, however, I'd put together a show of backbone. I want to stop that. Let my backbone-forth dissolve. Let other people in.

Another reason for ending these status wars between men is that they make it impossible for us to relate to women as people. We need women to serve as non-threatening refugees, need them to be soft, caring, non-critical. Need them to say "I'll love you no matter what the world thinks of you and bandage your psychic bruises."

But we spend lots of time sizing up other people critically, and we can't just shut those judgements off when dealing with women. Then the very qualities we need in women become defects in our eyes. We see the fact that they cry easily as a weakness. A sign they can't cope with life's problems as well as we can. Or we'll say "women use tears to manipulate me".

As in my game of jacks, we can't help setting up silly competitions with women. I vaguely remember a series of magazine ads in which a woman had to follow a man into "his" outdoor world, rock climbing or whatever, to earn her drink. She always looked very distressed and wanted to know if there wasn't an easier way. The point is that he needs her not to judge him the way other men do, but he's addicted to competition, and so goes ahead and sets up a test for her.

We're very bad at giving emotional support back to women. Once again the example of crying fits. We do so little of it that we don't know what it's about and can only interpret it as a sign of defeat. We know very little about the positive aspects of crying and generally wouldn't think of helping someone to cry.

Female Chauvinist

As more women turn to other women to find that sensitive support, it unfortunately becomes more common to hear men say "wait a minute. You're being female chauvinist. Come back and struggle with me."

If we want to change male and female stereotypes, we'll have to start finding those "female" caring parts in ourselves and other men, and find the joy in them. That won't be easy because those qualities are big liabilities in the "man" game. They are what make up a "sissy". But if we can learn them, then some day in the rosy future, we'll be able to meet women as equals.

Joseph Pleck wrote a very good article about male competition including its effect on male-female relationships in the April 11, 1974 issue of WIN magazine. I recommend it highly.

A fear I have about making these changes is that I'll occasionally be assumed to be homosexual. That fear has the effect of keeping me, and all who share it, acting bigeigent.

I MUST MAINTAIN THIS RIGID POSITION OR ALL IS LOST!

Last January, I started taking Changing Men (the men's liberation newsletter from which this article is reprinted) around to stores to see if they'd display it where people could pick it up. I daydreamed about how I'd respond if someone said "Oh, isn't this that faggot organization?" By March I was still running through the same daydream even though the situation had never come up. I had to admit it was a charged situation for me, and the charge became because the person asking the question would be assuming I was gay.

I spent last year working in a small tool shop. One day I was labeling a box we used. Being bored, as usual, I started putting decorations around the label. It was fun, one of the few creative moments I'd had at that job. Then it occurred to me that the wavy curly-ques I was enjoying drawing would look girlish next to the straight letters on the other boxes. I drew a little more, but the fun was definitely gone.

Faggot jokes and stories were very common at work. I doubt many of the men had contact with real gay people, but the subject kept coming up anyway. A co-worker told me he stopped in a bar and halfway through his beer realized it was a gay bar. He was so disgusted he didn't finish his drink.

Fear of Homosexuals

Where does this fear and repulsion in straight men come from? I think that sleazy feeling comes from the belief that homosexuals want to touch us. Want us to be passive while they do things to our bodies. We get a creepy crawling feeling of being manipulated. We're the ones who are supposed to do the manipulating... on women.

We get nervous when somebody touches our bodies. Like when a stranger touches my bike or car (I suppose) sword. I get instantly alert. They could hurt it, but mostly they just shouldn't be touching it.

Our bodies are important weapons in the struggle for respect, and homosexuals allow their weapons to be touched in the most intimate ways. Their defenses have been breached. They've let an opponent get inside. It's a much-passed-around bit of straight folk knowledge that even football players and weight-lifters can be queers. They're men on the outside but rotten soft inside. It's interesting that letting a woman touch you doesn't compromise a man in the same way. She's not a potential enemy. She's more like the squirrel getting you ready for battle.

Homosexuals seem to me to be equivalent to the communist menace of the McCarthy era. They're poisoning our white-knight ethic. They can be anywhere, even the highest places. The locker rooms of the NFL. No one is above suspicion. And like the fifties, there's no sure way to prove cleanliness. But you can make things a lot easier on yourself by conforming, by being 'one of the boys'. When I was in high school, 'faggot' was an all-purpose insult, but it was used most often when a boy wouldn't go along with the group. Wouldn't cheat on a test, join in a prank, leer at Playboy.

Good Company

For fear my main thought may have gotten lost, I'd like to try and condense it one last time: I want to have real relationships with people, not the kind that still leave me lonely. I'm realizing that a picture I've had of myself as strong and capable, and able to compete has gotten in the way of those real, friendships, and so I want to drop it. I've transmitted that picture to other people by the way I've used my body, and so I want to stop using my body as weapon. I'll have to be ready to be treated like 'sissy' or 'faggot' by some people. Harder still, I'll have to get positive about those words in my mind. Only when I'm proud of myself as sissy and faggot will I be able to approach other men and women clearly, and with them become all that I can be.

Accepting those labels gets easier all the time as I find out what good company it puts me in.

Prisoners' Rights - End the hole

By BARRY BENDER

On August 10, 1974, Edward Nalon, an inmate at Millhaven Penitentiary, committed suicide in his isolation cell two full weeks after he was ordered desegregated. Recommendations suggested at the inquest by Kingston coroner W.S. Patterson have yet to be implemented.

Repeatedly in the last few years prison injustices have frustrated many lawyers, social workers and ex-inmates. The Attica riot, the Kingston riot and most recently the mini-riot in B.C. that resulted in the death of Mary Steinhouser, motivated this group of concerned individuals to form a loose network of organizations across the country concerned with prisoners' rights. Here in Toronto the Prisoners' Rights Coordinating Committee consists of four ex-inmates of penal institutions, one of whom is a woman. It began after an ad hoc demonstration in front of the United States Consulate protested the Attica indictments which failed to name any guards as defendants. A similar situation occurred in Canada when only the convicts involved in the uprising at the B.C. penitentiary were charged with Steinhouser's murder and evidence clearly indicated she was shot by a guard. To publicize their disfavor, on the day the convicts were to appear in court, September 22, all prisoners across the country took part in a general strike.

The aims of the Prisoners' Rights group are as varied and wide-ranging as the problems of Canada's penal institution. But they do have priorities.

"Our first aim," points out spokesman Rich Carnegie, "is to find some alternative to segregation and isolation; it is mentally and physically destructive." Some rather grisly statistics bear him out. From January 1, 1969 to December 31, 1973 there have been fifty suicides and many more serious attempts at suicide.

The System Kills

At the inquest investigating Nalon's death, inmate Joseph

Wydryk described a prisoner's desperation, "the system killed Eddie Nalon — the lockup system. I have seen people swallow nails, wire and require about 75 stitches just to try and get out of here," he said.

Prisoners' Rights would like to be able to change the whole atmosphere of prisons, rid them of their fear and oppression and despair. "In crimes committed within the institution," here Carnegie means minor charges, "there is no trial, no evidence. It's just the guard's words against yours." Often phoney charges are laid just to back up the "screws" constant demand for greater security.

As light as the crimes committed inside may seem to us out here, the punishment is anything but. Isolation results from almost any infraction; isolation for 23½ hours every day, (the other half-hour is spent, alone in the exercise yard), for days and weeks and even months.

Mr. Carnegie relates a story where an acquaintance of his was sent from a medium to a maximum security prison for "merely refusing to make his bed."

Prisoners' Rights would like to see the prisoners maintain some sense of pride and worth. They call for the government to stress rehabilitation and reform with greater emphasis placed on restitution. This is a system whereby the criminal is permitted to continue as an active member of the community, working to pay back his victim. The restitution system is, of course, only feasible in non-violent, property-oriented crimes. "Those guilty of victimless crimes (such as drunkenness, drugs etc.) should be separate from those guilty of victim-crimes," Carnegie said. "It's ridiculous that somebody caught with a little grass should be locked up with somebody who assaults people," he added.

The problem of homosexuality in institutions is also a matter of concern to the committee although so far no clear solution has been suggested.

Indian Women

Mr. Carnegie revealed in a phone interview that Indian women, before they are allowed to be released on passes, must submit to antibus treatment. Antibus is a drug that causes wrenching and illness when the patient drinks any alcohol. "The discrimination is obvious," he observed.

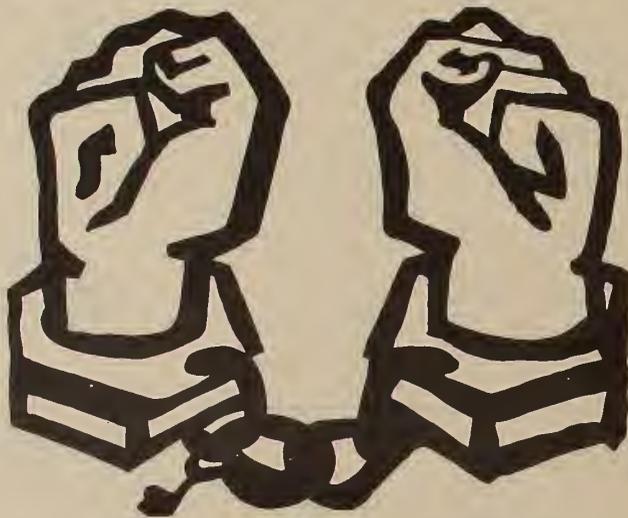

Prisoners' Rights also complains that Canada has only one women's penitentiary, in Kingston, and women inmates from as far away as Vancouver or the Maritimes seldom see visitors. This set-up, where visitors have to travel far and at no small expense, reinforces the class bias of Canada's entire penal system.

At the present, Prisoners' Rights has a mailing list of approximately 250 people, many of whom were recruited at a day-long conference on July 5th. Eventually they hope to be able to lobby Parliament for the needed legislative reforms; but for now they work with existing services and sympathetic lawyers to alleviate problems as they arise.

So far Prisoners' Rights has functioned only on casual donations. It is hoped that their benefit concert on Saturday at the Don Vale Community Centre will raise sufficient funds to allow them to continue to educate the public about the injustices of the existing prison system and importantly, inform the inmates that a group exists that is sincerely concerned about their well-being.

Obviously, to some extent, they are succeeding. Inmates at a federal penitentiary are now in the process of lodging a suit against the Solicitor General, claiming cruel and inhumane treatment under the Canadian Bill of Rights for the time they were locked up in solitary confinement.

Performing at Saturday's event will be Roy Payne, a country-folk singer who has demonstrated his sympathy for prison inmates by performing frequently at penal institutions. The address is 80 Winchester Street.

Roy Payne will sing Saturday in a benefit for Prisoners' Rights and Abolition of Training Schools

'Jail' for kids without crimes

Last year, Bill Brewer, a juvenile probation officer, refused to accept a judge's decision to send a youngster to training school. He termed the institution "brutal and sadistic." He was summarily fired by the ministry and has not been rehired. But he continues to express his concerns through an association called The Committee to Abolish Training Schools. Their purpose is clearly stated in their title.

Through personal experience, many other members have come to realize that Training Schools, ostensibly schools that provide corrective discipline, are little more than juvenile jails.

The group grew out of a conference last May in Ottawa on "Juvenile Corrections and Alternatives". There, a group of social workers decided a committee was necessary to coordinate the campaign to abolish training schools and they formed the Committee.

The Toronto Committee to Abolish Training Schools is affiliated with the Ottawa branch and frequently information between the two is exchanged.

The spokesman of the Toronto committee is Don Weitz, a former psychologist who insists on the adjective "former". He was in the field of psychology for 15 years. But one year of part-time consulting work at Bowmanville's Training Centre was sufficient to convince him "the whole profession is bullshit". The psychiatrist didn't consult with him sufficiently and the psychiatric treatment there was seldom more extensive than a "15 minute chat and pills."

He remembers most "the extremely punitive aspects" of the training school. Kids as young as seven held in solitary confinement, an isolation cell the children refer to as the "digger". The "digger" is any one of five isolation cells at Bowmanville, each with a heavy door, a small grated window, a bed often without a blanket, a sink and an open toilet. They remain there without books, or paper for terms of two days, as punishment for running away, or as long as several weeks for more serious infractions. As Weitz comments, "It's purely a process of over-kill."

As for the school, not much teaching takes place. "Most classes are caricatures of public school with a lot of coercion and the teachers aren't too good," he stated.

Training Schools are characterized by "regimentation throughout, where kids are virtually marched from activity to activity," he added.

The Rock System

Weitz also describes the brutality of the "rock system". The tougher, bigger boys become extensions of staff and carry out punishment for the staff. One notorious example of such punishment is "Niagara Falls" where a youngster's head is shoved down a toilet full of shit and then the toilet is flushed. In another punishment a youth with long hair is held upside down and his hair is used to swab a urinal.

Most astonishing is the fact that many of the children in these training schools have committed no crime that can be measured by adult standards. Under section 8 of the Training Schools Act they are brought before a judge in juvenile court by their parents, or their school, or, very often the Children's Aid Society has brought them. If it is determined that the child is "unmanageable" then the child is sent to a training school — unmanageability is the only criterion.

Section 9 of the act provides for the placement in training schools of these children who have committed "offences which would be punishable by imprisonment if committed by an adult." But even the majority of these criminal cases are petty in nature; only a small fraction of those children committed any assaultive acts.

About 45 per cent of the total number of children sent to training school in a year go the Section 8 route. The majority of them are girls.

This is the real tragedy: training schools are inadequate to retrain or rehabilitate the criminal-child so how could they ever hope to cope with the complex problems of the emotionally disturbed child. Training schools "generate the experience, the trauma, the resentment, rebellion," Weitz observed.

When Dr. Richard Potter became the corrections minister, the ministry which administers training schools, he told the legislature that he intends to remove section 8 from the act. That was in the spring of 1974 and yet the section still stands.

The child stays at the training school for an indefinite length of time determined by the supervisor. It is usually not more than one year. There are a lot of repeaters and each time they run away — into the digger.

Eleven Deaths

Eleven deaths of wards were reported to the ministry by training school supervisors but only seven were investigated. The ministry made a mistake of two in tabulation and two others had occurred outside of Ontario. Don Weitz has expressed his concern that three of the deaths, all girls, were suicides.

The Committee to Abolish Training Schools is active in "encouraging and supporting community based alternatives." Residential group homes is one such alternative. Through the combined efforts of home parents and live-in workers an atmosphere conducive to behaviour improvement is established. Presently there are about 30 in Ontario though some have come under criticism for not maintaining standards.

Street workers are another alternative. The youth worker, whether a social worker or a probation officer, is "meeting the kids on their own turf. In pool halls, pubs or just being available for rapping," Weitz said. They'd provide consultation before and after trouble arises.

Alternatives?

Alternative schools, similar to Twin Valley near Ottawa, become useful treatment areas, since the free school atmosphere and lack of regimentation compels the child to become aware of his social responsibilities.

The Committee hopes to expand their research and education facilities to pressure government into bringing down the legislation they want. Two NDP MPP's are particularly sympathetic, Patrick Lawlor and Michael Cassidy.

They are encouraged by the examples set in B.C., which simply closed both its training schools, and in Massachusetts, where all the training schools were closed and the children were redistributed among schools close to the University of Massachusetts. Many university students got involved and helped out in humanizing institutions such as group homes.

Don Weitz said, "You don't have to keep them (the problem child) 'inside', just understand them as people and show warmth and love toward them."

The Committee to Abolish Schools hopes to build a solid basis of support among concerned people. The Committee is about four months old.

"What we really need are people," Weitz said. The Committee will be sharing in the proceeds from the Roy Payne benefit performance Saturday night at the Don Vale Community Centre.

Letter from a Millhaven inmate

THE FOLLOWING IS EXCERPTED FROM A LETTER WRITTEN BY JOE WYDRYK, AN INMATE AT THE MAXIMUM SECURITY MILLHAVEN PENITENTIARY. WYDRYK WAS ONE OF THE ORGANIZERS OF THE PRISONERS UNION AT MILLHAVEN THIS PAST SUMMER, AND WAS DEPORTED TO ENGLAND SHORTLY AFTER THIS LETTER WAS WRITTEN. IN IT, HE EXPLAINS MANY OF THE BASIC FRUSTRATIONS OF PRISON LIFE, AND THE REASONS BEHIND THE GROWING MILITANCY AMONG PRISONERS IN CANADIAN PENAL INSTITUTIONS.

"So much has already been said; for years book after book and article after article has painted a depressing picture of our penal institutions. The thrust of these accounts is that our prisons are counter-productive.

"Instead of reforming social misfits and fitting them into society, the prisons turn out angry men who often return to both crime and prison.

"Penal prisons are made out to be hell holes where individuals are subjected to sexual assault, mental and physical harassment from both guards and fellow prisoners, and where a life style designed to break a man down rather than build him up prevails.

Facts about prisons are grim. Recidivism rates show that 70-80 per cent of all prisoners eventually return to jails after release. Frequent and intense riots inside prisons reveal that prisoners are finding the experience of incarceration more and more intolerable.

"Often the nation's newspaper accounts of the prison situation fail to appreciate the impossible task given to penal officials. The job of warden includes protecting the public from so-called dangerous criminals, running an orderly prison that protects prisoners from each other, and if he has time, rehabilitating the prisoners.

"There is probably no public institution in North America which so consistently fails to meet its stated goals and which is so great a source of public shame. While the prisons are called rehabilitative, they have shown themselves to be destructive to individual will and mental health.

"Psychiatrist Seymour Holleck has noted 'The prison environment is almost diabolically conceived to force the offender to experience the pangs of what every psychiatrist would describe as mental illness'.

"Prisons as rehabilitative agencies pose some basic contradictions. If a man's nature is influenced by the company he keeps, as many believe, then the prison will reinforce any criminal values a person carries into prison with him. Prisons are obviously not the place to meet good company.

"Second, if self-respect, self-reliance, and individuality are needed to succeed in the outside world, how can a man learn these things in a place where strict discipline and regimentation are enforced to keep the prison going?

"Many times the crime that brought the prisoner to jail was a bad decision. How can a man learn to make good decisions in a place where he is allowed to make none?"

"How many people out there really know what the worst aspect of being in prison is? From the point of view of the prisoners, there is one basic problem. They are locked in, both physically and mentally. The biggest problem is mental.

"On the outside, if you run into a hostile person and have an ugly scene with him, you can escape the tension by simply splitting. But in prison with a concentration of people with hostile feelings there's nowhere to go when tension mounts. Few people realize how punishing this is. The mental suffering caused by confinement in a hostile arena is much worse than most judges realize when they sentence a man.

"The basic feature of mental suffering is being confined amongst hostility with nowhere to go to avoid it. Some guards are afraid of prisoners and treat them like animals, pull power trips on them. The prisoner gets angry, but is unable to take out his anger on the guard, so ends up running a knife into the side of a fellow prisoner. It's not easy living in that kind of tension.

"Some guards know that by keeping the tension between prisoners high, they can control them easier, so they spread rumors which create racial divisions. If the prisoners were ever to co-operate with each other, the guards would be in trouble.

"Another source of mental suffering is the fact that the prisoner is deprived of heterosexual activity. He is deprived of this release, and often begins to doubt his manhood. Homosexuality is very common as a result, and many prisoners have difficulty with guilt feelings.

"Thirdly, prisoners are deprived of meaningful work and pay for the work they do. At the same time they are deprived of the opportunity to make any meaningful decisions about how to spend their time. Everything is regulated. Pretty soon they lose self-respect, forget how to make decisions, and attempt to prove their manhood through defiance. By the time a prisoner reaches the streets, he has lost most of the skills required for coping in ordinary society.

"Finally there is no way the prisoner can express himself directly about how he feels about his treatment. Every letter he receives or sends is censored. His parole depends on only saying 'good things'. So I think you can see there is a lot of tension, and no escape valves.

"The prisoner feels psychologically helpless to do anything about his condition and that's the cause of the greatest suffering. Also, the only serious attempts to improve conditions for the prisoners are brought about by the prisoners themselves. The administrators view prison as a punishment. They seem really unable to introduce meaningful changes.

"Prisons can be as concrete-and-steel symbols for society's most subtle yet ubiquitous psychological prisons of the mind. Any social institution - a school, hospital, factory, office - can fairly be labelled a prison if it seriously restricts a person's freedom, imprisoning him in regulated and routinized modes of behaviour and thought.

"We have used and abused children right from grade school to the neglected ones who end up in our training schools, reform school, and then these modern-day big concentration camps.

"Because of this abuse and because of their oppressive atmosphere, people should not be surprised when 'high schools' and prisons frequently become the targets of their inmates' anger and frustration. When students or prisoners vandalize or destroy the buildings and property around them, they are striking out against the most obvious symbol of their oppression.

"To its prisoners, the most important fact about prison is its authoritarian nature. The organizational structure can be described crudely but accurately in terms of sheer power; guards have it and prisoners don't. Guards may legitimately use a variety of sanctions to control and punish prisoners who disobey orders or engage in prohibited behaviour. Prisoners may have no similar rights they may legitimately use against guards. The grievance forms that are put out for the prisoner's complaints are a complete farce. In direct confrontations between inmates and guards, the prison administration always relies on the words of the guards.

"Because of their relative freedom from regulations, and because the prisoners cannot retaliate, the guards often exercise their power in an arbitrary and capricious manner. Faced with such unbridled authority, most prisoners become fearful of, and eventually submissive to, the whims of the guards. In prison, the guard's word always counts more than the word of the prisoner.

On rare occasions when prisoners have succeeded in gaining enough attention for their grievances to have a guard reprimanded, indignant colleagues have been known to work to rule, or go on strike, accusing the administration of being 'soft on convicts'.

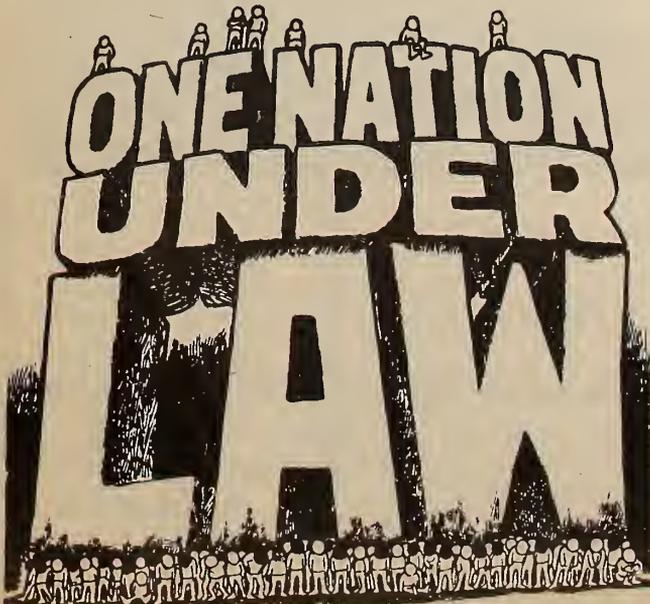

"Let me try to paint a clearer picture of crude and subtle power. Prisons maintain their authority in part through the use of symbols of power. In prison, these include not only the obvious walls, bars, and towering gun posts, but also the 'guard only' rooms and areas off-limits to inmates. For instance, guards have a special toilet right beside the toilet in each working shop. I remember an old dude who is very aware told me that the reasons a great many lawyers lose cases in the Supreme Court of Canada is because they get choked up when they see those nine white-haired judges sitting way up there on that high bench. The trick, I was told, is to look and address those fascists as if they were down at eye level. Guards are discouraged from wearing long hair, or having a natural rapport with one of their charges. If a guard in maximum security shows any sign of humanity, if he relates with the prisoners, the older, harder line guards set the guard up or just plain make it very hard for the guard to work at ease.

"Prison regulations determine what uniform the inmates wear, the length of hair, when they can sleep, get up, eat, wash, go to the toilet, and go outside. Continual surveillance guarantees obedience to these regulations.

"Prisons enforce them not only for practical or operational reasons, but also because they promote an atmosphere of unquestioning conformity. Over a period of time, this atmosphere creates an insidious dependence on the institution.

DOUGLAS FACES DEATH

The Varsity — Andrea WAWRANO

By WENDY HILLIER

On December 15, 1975 Rosie Douglas must present himself and his belongings at Toronto's immigration offices for immediate deportation.

His passport has been confiscated and he has no choice but to comply with this deportation order which will send him back to his native Dominica where his life has already been threatened. As a result, work has begun on Douglas' defence coordinated by the Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression. As part of this campaign Rosie Douglas and Vern Harper will speak on Douglas' case and racism at U of T today at noon at the International Students' Centre.

The only legal conviction Douglas has is that of "public mischief", arising from a 1969 Sir George Williams sit-in against racism. For this misdemeanour he has already served an abnormally long two year sentence.

For the last six years the Canadian government has continually singled out the outspoken Douglas for "special treatment" since he is a revolutionary and an effective spokesman against racism.

This "special treatment" began in 1969, when Douglas was charged for his part in an anti-racist protest. Douglas was among 45 black and 52 white students sitting-in at the Sir George Williams University computer centre. They were making the last in a long series of attempts to get the university administration to undertake an investigation into charges of racial discrimination levelled by black students against a white physiology professor.

The administration reacted swiftly and firmly against the protest to establish law and order. Four hundred armed riot police successfully stormed the computer centre and arrested the 97 unarmed students.

Despite similar charges and common evidence against all 97 students, the average bail for blacks was $5,000, whereas that for whites was only $1,000. Special treatment was reserved for the more militant and effective spokespersons.

During his trial Douglas faced an all-white jury which included one man who in open court asked to be excused from jury duty because, as he said, he was "not overly fond of black people". The presiding judge told him to take his place in the jury and "serve his country". Somehow the Supreme Court of Canada did not consider this sufficient grounds for granting an appeal.

As a result of the court proceedings, only five students were imprisoned. Sentences ranged from 6 months for Ann Cools and Leo Barker to two years for Douglas and Martin Bracey, also a black. Small fines or outright acquittal were the results for the other 92 defendants.

For Douglas, the "special treatment" did not end with the high bail and the long sentence.

The conviction on which the order was based was then before appeal courts. The government got the deportation order in spite of the judge's complaint that he was being pressured.

The media effectively supported the government's efforts to deport Douglas. These allegations totally ignored the fact that neither Douglas or anyone else had been charged with or convicted of smashing the computers.

Despite the concerted efforts of the government to deport Douglas in 1972 and 1973, public pressure and legalities have prevented this action from occurring for the time being.

In May 1973 a special certificate was issued, signed by Solicitor General Warren Allmand and Immigration Minister Robert Andras, branding Douglas "a risk to national security".

Allmand contended Douglas' conviction of arson at the Sir George Williams incident made him a menace. It was pointed out that no such conviction existed but, the certificate was not withdrawn and remains in effect. This "risk to national security" label serves to cut off any appeal by Douglas against his deportation on humanitarian grounds.

Douglas' defence could easily have built a case on humanitarian grounds for him. The Prohibited and Unlawful Societies and Associations Act passed in Dominica in 1974 has been called the most undemocratic piece of legislation in the world today. The act states in part: "No proceedings, either criminal or civil, shall be brought or maintained against any person who kills or injures any member of an association or society, designated unlawful.

Despite this immediate threat and constant harassment, Douglas has maintained his political activity and is a spokesperson or the Black Workers' Alliance and an active member of the Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression.

"There is an increased level of political repression and racism in the country, parallel to the kind of situation that has developed in Western Europe because of the crisis of capitalism. This crisis has caused the government concerned to divert attention away from the real problem, to divide those who are most affected by the economic crisis, to cause great harm to black people and other immigrant people. My whole case is right in the middle of the present immigration crisis".

This statement has been borne out by events over the past year.

The deportation of 1,500 Haitians in Montreal due to the recession is a case in point.

White supremacists like the Western Guard have stepped up their vigilante attacks on racial minorities, particularly blacks and East Indians. Further evidence can be seen in the racially motivated murder of black high school student Michael Habib and outbreaks of racial violence against the natives in Kenora.

At U of T there has been talk of instituting a quota to restrict the number of Chinese and other immigrant medical students.

Douglas' case now hangs in the balance.

'TOUCH' PASS IT ON

"all the fat is gone from the University budget."

— Donald Chant
Vice-President and Provost,
University of Toronto

"the Budget Committee should set a target of $7.5 million as the basic objective for reduced expenditure."

— 1976-77 Budget Guidelines
dated May 30, 1975

"All the fat is gone" and Simcoe Hall still wants to cut $7.5 million from the University budget. This will mean the destruction of the quality of life and the quality of education at the U of T.

The Students' Administrative Council opposes such action. We believe that the Provincial Government should not cripple the university and that Simcoe Hall should not play along."

You can do something to stop the cutbacks.
Drop into the SAC office and ask for more information.

INTRODUCING The York Club

The Varsity — Bob Fisher

The Varsity — Bob Fisher

Hey, subway riders and St. George Street pedestrians! Ever wondered what's inside that impressive Victorian building with the neatly clipped and ever green lawn at the corner of Bloor & St. George Streets? Well, it's the YORK CLUB. What's the York Club? It's yet another bastion of the Canadian establishment, and aside from being a nicer place to eat lunch than the Roberts cafeteria or one of those lunch wagons on St. George, it exists to insure that the rich become richer and more closely co-ordinated in their actions.

The Varsity — Bob Fisher

The brick wall outside has had to undergo some recent patching up, but unfortunately the metaphor of crumbling walls is inappropriate as far as the purpose of the York Club is concerned. Wallace Clement's new book The Canadian Corporate Elite, describes how the upper class in this country has concentrated its power and become even more ingrown, while deciding Canada's economic life.

Look, Com students, look! See the capitalist walk. He is going into the York Club. Those doors have been called the portals of power. In twenty years you will appreciate the meaning of this phrase. Some of you (a very, very small number) will walk through the doors yourself. Your chances are excellent if your daddy or granddaddy already goes there for lunch today. Otherwise, you better be very, very smart and Anglo-Saxon and Christian (nominally). If you aren't all of these things (the last two are at least as important as the first) you might as well forget it. Get into Labour Union Management instead. It's becoming almost as profitable.

California unionbusters slowed by UFW

By MINDA SHERMAN
 "Don't buy them, don't eat them, don't touch them—boycott grapes!" was one of the chants that could be heard on Saturday.

More than one hundred people chanted this and other slogans as they picketed Food City's non-participation in the United Farm Workers (UFW) boycott on Californian table grapes and head lettuce, Saturday.

Miguel Contreras, a member and organizer of the Toronto UFW organization said that everyone views the boycott as a different issue. The number of organizations represented at Saturday's rally indicated the varied support that the UFW internationally received.

Lupe Gamboa, head of the Toronto UFW organization claims consumer participation in the boycott has caused Toronto grape and lettuce sales to drop 38 per cent. He said major food chains in Montreal, BC, and New England have stopped carrying non-union produce.

When asked why the Montreal branches of Steinberg Ltd. participate in the boycott while their Ontario stores, Miracle Food Mart do not, a spokesman said where the chain is a leader, the company can afford to set a precedent but in Toronto it is up to the leading chain of Dominion to set the example.

Gamboa said that Dominion, which is controlled by Argus corporation, refuses to participate and continues to buy the lower priced non-union grapes and lettuce.

The rally was the kick-off for an intensive Fall campaign to keep the public aware of the UFW's demands. Gamboa warned that because of the successes in the elections that have been held, many people think the boycott is over.

He said less than 50 per cent of the elections have been held and that elections are just the beginning of the bargaining process. He added there is little doubt the growers will use all their powers to keep the UFW weak, and try to impede that process as much as possible.

The union representatives, he said, "are fighting a labor issue involving the rights of the three million farm workers to choose their own representation, fair wages, and decent working conditions. The Teamsters, the union chosen by the growers to negotiate for the workers, do not allow or invite its people to participate in the negotiations and decisions that effect their lives."

Contreras added there is little doubt the workers want to be represented by the UFW.

A nun with a placard pinned to her chest calling for an end to child labor says she is fighting for social justice.

According to UFW statistics, one quarter of the farm workers are under twelve years old and their life expectancy is only 49 years. Their average annual wage is $1,877 and the infant mortality rate is 125 per cent greater than the national average.

Richard Garrity was one of seventy delegates who went to California for the UFW convention and he confirmed reports that labor camps are surrounded with barbed wire and armed men to keep the UFW out. He said growers are doing everything they can to frustrate the UFW but workers obviously want and deserve their unions.

The reasons for U of T student Bonnie Heath's participation in the UFW struggle were twofold. She sees the issue as a valid struggle for justice against the coercive powers of the growers in California. But perhaps more important is her underlying utilization of the campaign as basic training in organization of labor issues.

Grads give York chiefs lessons

TORONTO (CUP) The Graduate Assistants Association of York University is seeking certification as a bargaining unit for graduate and teaching assistants, and the York administration has come up with some strange arguments to oppose the bid.

At a hearing last month before the Ontario Labour Relations Board, York's Personnel director opposed certification on the grounds that Graduate assistants "learn from their work" and are "essentially students" who should not be eligible for bargaining rights.

According to GAA organizer Mark Golden, the GAA response was to put students on the stand to testify "yes they do work. They get paid for their work, and if they didn't work they wouldn't get paid" to establish that an employer-employee relationship did exist.

Sid Elson, The Dean of the College of Arts, was caught in a dilemma when he was placed on the stand and had to admit he also learned from his work.

The certification procedures continue, and Golden says that as soon as they are finished the GAA will go after its first contract.

Most Graduate and teaching assistants at York receive $2,500 annually for research, tutorial, instruction, marking papers, and other work similar to that of faculty.

The average annual salary for faculty, all ranks was $17,577 for 1973-74. The average for all male faculty was $18,265, while women received an average $14,161.

York Fault Food

TORONTO (CUP) Plans to boycott Commercial Caterers are underway here in protest against the firm's refusal to hire food service workers who previously had jobs with Versafoods.

The 69 Versafood workers were laid off July 15 when the York catering contract passed to 5 smaller non-union firms. So far, only 28 of the Versafood workers have been rehired and those that were are not covered by a collective contract and receive lower wages than before.

Student, faculty and labour groups sent an open letter last summer to the York administration condemning the University for recontracting the food service operation without protecting the jobs of existing workers, but the university made no response.

Dale Ritch, the president of the York student council, met on September 9 with the now-unemployed workers and their union representatives, and called for a student boycott of Commercial Caterers, one of the five new firms.

Union representative John Sobolewski told the gathering that "students and workers will have to work together if the workers are to get their jobs back."

"Without student support the workers have no chance."

Ritch feels "students are going to have to take strong action to get what they need, and a boycott is just the kind of action that works."

Besides wanting the workers rehired, Ritch wants to mass enough student support to have the private catering firms thrown off campus.

"Students realize they're getting ripped-off", he said. "We want to pressure the administration into kicking the caterers out, and into running the food services themselves, overseen by a democratically elected board of students, faculty, and staff."

Ritch and the council have called for a mass rally of students on October 2 to see if they can find support for the boycott.

"If the boycott works, heads will roll. And if it doesn't, mine may be the first," said Ritch.

We need profit plans

The main problem facing Canadian business is mistrust and misunderstanding of the profit motive and of the competitive enterprise system, according to the new president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Gerald E. Pearson.

"Business must show to Canadians that the competitive enterprise system has done a good job in the past and that there is no need to apologize for it," he said.

He feels strongly the system can do the job required of it given the chance but he fears growing government intervention will destroy it.

"The standard of living that has been provided by the system is second to none in the world. We have satisfied the needs of most citizens in our countries. People are discovering secondary needs that must now be satisfied and because these new needs are not already satisfied the whole system is being criticized."

Dicks deal dope

DETROIT (ENS-CUP) Taxpayers spend millions of dollars to finance drug law enforcement. Finally, a Detroit judge has figured out a way to return some of that money to the taxpayer.

Judge George Crockett, Jr., ordered three convicted heroin pushers to pay back the $11,650 that the Detroit police spent to bust them for six ounces of heroin.

"It's the people's money," said Detroit Police Chief Philip Tannian, "and they ought to give it back."

Dipping into their savings account, Arnold "pretty Rick" Wright, Carol Ann McCuin and Salvatore Perez coughed up the money plus $5,000 for bail.

The money was handed over to the police, who will use it to finance future dope purchase and drug investigations.

The repayment, however, failed to buy light sentences for the pushers. Ms. McCuin was sentenced to a jail term of six-and-a-half to twenty years, while "Pretty Rick" faces a minimum sentence of 13 years for his part in the drug conspiracy.

In God we trust...

Sir George Williams experiment with credit cards for payment of tuition has been abandoned by the treasurer's office after only one year.

"It was just too expensive," said assistant Fred Sauer. "The university has to pay a service charge each time the cards were used. Charge and Master Charge wanted three per cent while American Express wanted six."

"The cards weren't attracting any new business to the university and they weren't saving us any money because all of the card-holders were good financial risks, anyway. They were just supposed to be a convenience for the students."

Bashed by cigarette LOS ANGELES (ENS-CUP) A man who claims that he is allergic to cigarettes has a $100,200 suit charging that he was assaulted by a Union Bank official who blew cigarette smoke in his face.

Paul Noble claims he experienced "increased viscosity of mucus in the lungs, choking and difficulty in breathing... and severe headaches" as a result of the smoke attack.

According to the LOS ANGELES TIMES the case is probably the first ever in which cigarette smoke was branded as "an instrument of assault."

Earlier this year, a suit was brought against a Chicano man for spraying an air freshener on a lit cigarette. The case was dismissed when the jury ruled that he acted in self-defense.

Let it all hang SAN FRANCISCO (ENS-CUP) Eldridge Cleaver's revolutionary new hot pants make their American debut in the pages of the upcoming issue of Rolling Stone, modelled by that famous Paris designer—Eldridge de Paris.

The pants which Cleaver intends to manufacture and market worldwide, feature a prominent, six-inch "aperture" where you would expect to find the zipper. Judging from the pictures in Rolling Stone, it's questionable at best whether the pants will ever be worn legally in public.

Cleaver, who's still wanted by police in California in connection with an Oakland shootout during his Black Panther days, claims to be working on a new design especially for the American biocentennial. The biocentennial "Cleaver" — as the pants are called — will feature a red, white, and blue "aperture" area.

Lacrosse In 44th Year

Wednesday Oct. 1, marks the start of 44th interfaculty lacrosse season. Lacrosse at the university began in the autumn of 1931, and has been competitive ever since. The first playoffs were between VIC and OCE with VIC the first league champion. The success of the league was written up in the 1932 Rule Book which by the way was the world's first Box Lacrosse Rule Book.

In present day action there are fifteen teams, six in division one and nine in division two. The usual teams are back in division one, with the addition of Devonshire House, a team which wasn't in the league last year for unknown reasons. Last years champion, Erindale is back with many of their players returning to the college from last year's 'Daioe Cup' team.

Also returning from last year are many officials. Last year's referee-in-chief, Milt McNeill, returns this year as a referee. McNeill relinquished the post to John Low, also with the league officiating staff last year.

This year there are some rule changes, which John Low, after meeting with the Intramural office during the summer has endorsed.

The main rule change is the extension of the time of a game from six four minute quarters to eight four minute quarters. The equipment rule has also been changed. Maximum padding on any player other than the supplied helmet are four basketball knee pads.

The philosophy of the intramural people is that if a player wears little equipment, he will hit less, in the anticipation of being hit hard or injured, himself. This only poses a problem for players who play by instinct, as they are most likely to cross-check in an illegal manner. Cross-checking in this league allows for no jabbing as in the Ontario Lacrosse Association, but rather 'lay the stick on the player and push'. Other changes are a penalty for hitting after the whistle.

The first penalty for any offence draws a one minute penalty. The second time that an offence is committed, the player receives a two-minute penalty. The third time a player is assessed the same penalty (i.e. three jabbing penalties), his team must play short-handed for three minutes and the player is ordered to the dressing room.

Years ago, there were two sports which were sacred to Canadians, lacrosse and hockey. With hockey becoming increasingly internationalized, Canada still puts out the world's best lacrosse players. Eat your heart out Russia!

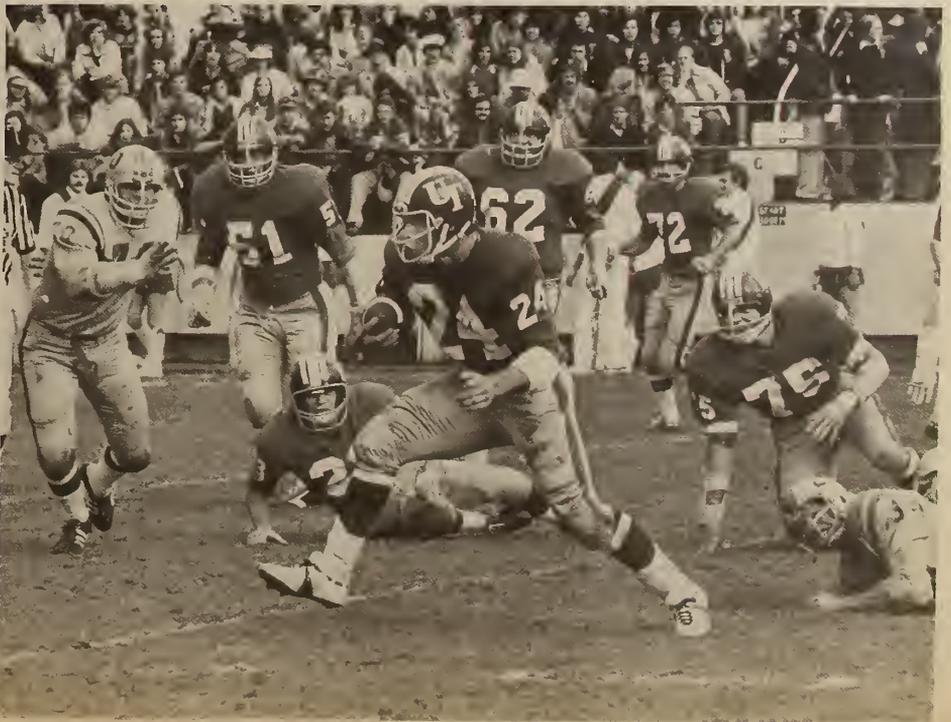

Fotestry running back doesn't quite line of scrimming in this unsuccessful attempt.

For Kids Only

As a result of 'rent-a-car', 'rent-a-sterio', 'rent-a-colour TV', etc. hockey promoters have come up with 'rent-a-skate'. (No kidding.) There are already several companies in Toronto that will rent to virtually anybody, a pair of expensive new skates.

The two main companies in the Toronto area are Sports Lease and Skate Lease International. The skates they lease are the original synthetic skates made by Lange, the people who make the ski boots. One of the companies also offers Bauer Supremes, another skate which retails at a high cost.

The basic contract is simple. The price for rental is half the retail price, and the minimum rental term is two months. Thus a pair of skates which retail for $125.00 can be rented for $6.50 per month or a total of $65 for a ten month period. Deposit is $7 so the entire cost to a prospective lessee would be $72 for a pair of $125 skates, while a pair which retails for $80 would go for $37.

For a player who plans to go through a pair of skates every year to year and a half, renting is a financially sound method of always using a pair of skates in relatively new condition. To the average player, such as the person who plays shinny as often as possible during the winter, or the player who plays interfac at university but has no real intention of continuing serious hockey after leaving the university, renting skates is not financially feasible.

Promoters agree that the plan is designed for boys who will outgrow a pair of skates every year or even during the year. Once a player is seriously involved in minor hockey and progresses to a level where he plays for an acclaimed minor hockey organization his skates are usually supplied. Because of this reason and also the fact that older players really only play 'every once in a while', the players who benefit the most are younger boys, and in fact it is their parents who benefit since they foot the bill.

The lessors also can benefit since they can either re-rent the skates after they are returned or they can sell them. (Thus adding profit to the money they received as rent on the products.) With many players turning to rental, outgrown skates will no longer clutter attics, etc. The old scene of a box full of used skates in the basement will soon be a thing of the past.

Rugby Team Splits Day

By CHRIS SHERRET

The U of T Rugby Blues team showed very poor form against Brock on the Back Campus last weekend as compared to the great style in their game last Wednesday against Heriot-Watt University at Varsity Stadium.

The Blues managed two tries early in the first half, but slowed down to a crawl as the game progressed. The game on Wednesday had evidently tired them considerably. However even in this state they were still able to limit Brock to one try, leaving the score 8-4 for the Blues when the final whistle sounded. The Blues' tries were scored by Scott Brayley and Peter Reid.

The second team did not fare with the same luck as the first and were defeated by Trent immediately after the Brock game.

Future games include: Waterloo at Toronto, on Oct. 1st and RMC at Toronto on Oct. 4th.

New Runs Over Trees & Division A decided

In Interfaculty football action, New College 'ate Forestry's lunch' by defeating them by the ridiculous score of forty to nothing. The new team, which is undoubtedly this year's 'B' division favourite had no problem over-running Forestry which, as it appears does not have much of a team this year.

In other games, Phys. Ed. attired in new sweaters, downed St. Mikes by the score of 30-17.

St. Mikes, after last week's 26-0 loss to Vic, had high hopes for Tuesday's game, but were never really in it. The deciding game of this year's Mulock will probably turn out to be next week's contest between Vic and the jocks. The Eng.'s team although very flashy is without a doubt the weakest team in the league. St. Mike's is not far ahead, with a big team that lacks the ability to put it all together. Phys. Ed. and Vic. are at the top with Vic being the best bet for the 1975 Mulock.

Scoring for Monday and Tuesday are as follows: M. Tierney (New) 22 pts. Nedoszytko (Phe) 12 pts. P. Lucas (New); H. Wolski (New); D. Chic (New); Kancer (SMC) 6 pts. Liscio (SMC) 1 pt.

Finally, Scarborough ousted Meds. by a score of 18-0.

Bus question still stalled

By DAVE LOUKIDELIS

Reduction of bus service to Scarborough College was again deferred at last night's meeting of the Scarborough Council.

As a result of student pressure the proposal was referred back to Scarborough's General Policy Committee. It is now doubtful that any cutbacks in service will be implemented this year.

News of the proposed cutbacks had prompted the circulation of a petition among Scarborough students to gain support for the fight against the proposed cutbacks. Students last night made a direct appeal to the College Council asking them not to approve the proposed cutbacks.

The proposed cutbacks had already received ratification by two other concerned bodies which was the cause of the student's last ditch appeal to the Council.

The reduction proposal includes the replacement of thirteen round trips from the college to Warden subway station with twenty-two trips to the Kingston Road station where students make a connection with the TTC. Secondly, it calls for the reduction of round-trip direct service from the St. George campus to Scarborough from the present two daily trips to one.

It also dictates a reduction of TTC service from Scarborough to St. George campus. The measures were to be implemented as of November 1.

The strong student reaction against the measures was centered on the fact such proposals had not been made last year. It was felt implementation of such measures in the middle of the academic year with no warning would be unfair to affected students, particularly those in first year. Some students have expressed their willingness to provide funds towards the maintenance of bus service.

Scarborough transportation head J. Pickles said there were several major reasons for the proposed cutbacks. He cited budget cutbacks due to the reduction of government aid, inflation in service costs and rising labour expenses.

Some observers feel the Scarborough Administration has not been communicative to College desires and policies for future transportation. It is also widely rumoured that bus service is to be phased out entirely because of a decline in the working condition of the buses, inflation and budget cutbacks.

This may be the alternate form of transportation to Scarborough College if bus service is restricted. Surveyors are looking for ways to link the Taddle and Highland Creeks just in case.

Hydro defers on McCaul demolition

By DAVE FOLKES

A surprise move by Ontario Hydro and some quick-thinking by Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap resulted in a major victory for McCaul Street area residents opposing construction of the controversial Toronto Central Transforming Station, at City Council on Wednesday.

Ontario Hydro had been waiting City Council approval of demolition permits to begin construction of the facility proposed for the east side of McCaul, between Murray and Orde Streets, prior to the meeting.

Opposing the project, the South East Spadina Steering Committee came prepared to do battle in an effort to defer demolition permits for the two remaining buildings on the site, which they feel is too close to homes across the street and an adjacent public school.

But in a surprise move at the outset of the meeting, Hydro representatives requested the demolition permits be deferred.

Taking quick advantage of the situation, Alderman Heap immediately jumped up and requested that the permits be deferred with the following conditions.

- studies and reports be made by the Steering Committee, an independent study regarding conservation of electrical energy and the need for the Toronto Central Station, and Hydro justifying their need figures.

- there be further discussion of alternate sites.

- the east side of McCaul Street, site of the proposed station, be designated medium density residential.

- the 14 original alternate sites be made public by Hydro.

- there be no demolition permits granted until a City Planning Board report requested by the Executive Council on Aug. 20 regarding a Hydro zoning designation change restricting building in C areas within

Students, breathe easy. The final date for course finalizing has been put back to April 1, 1976. This will allow students another six months to decide their academic future.

University president John Evans remarked that as this had been a hard year for funds, the administration has decided that college registrars will be laid off and all pre-registration forms burned.

"Students have had a hard time this year," he said.

"I've seen thousands of them worried over their course choices. This will give them a little more time to decide. After all, we are the K-Tel of universities, and we want to give our undergraduates time to investigate the whole panorama of course offerings and to cash in on the bargains. Tomorrow we're offering all interdisciplinary courses at the low, low rate of 35 cents."

Slowly he removed her flimsy burnoose, pausing only to consult his academic calendar for tutorial times.

"Wait until you get a load of my academic appeal," he said breathlessly, groping for her elbow.

"Grrrr . . ." she replied. "I just love your slide rule."

Sorry.

Dirt on rise?

By DARYL PIPA

If all goes according to the present maintenance plan for U of T buildings and grounds, students and staff could be scuffling through garbage by spring.

As a result of the university-wide hiring freeze, no maintenance workers are to be replaced regardless of those who quit or retire.

Joe Jordan, union representative for the Service Employees International Union which represents maintenance employees of U of T's grounds and buildings, termed this action layoff by attrition.

He added that although no employees have suffered layoffs or salary cuts, the present maintenance force is definitely destined to decrease.

U of T management has already put into effect a "skip cleaning system", meaning that certain buildings including Sidney Smith Hall, 215 Huron, Simcoe Hall, Banting Best, Queen's Park Complex and some houses on St. George are cleaned only on alternate days.

A Combe, assistant manager of cleaning for U of T, stated that it is mostly the private and general offices which are affected by the system. Critical areas such as entrances and washrooms are still cleaned every day in all buildings, a must for adequate health standards.

According to Combe, there have been "no real hassles" with regard to complaints from occupants or workers in the buildings affected by the alternate cleaning system.

"That's the surprising part about it," he commented, "they accept it." When questioned if the employee freeze will be maintained despite the inevitable staff and standard reductions, Combe remarked they "won't let things get out of hand."

the proximity of people working or living.

The motion, with the conditions, was passed unanimously by City Council.

"I was so dazed I could hardly take it in . . . we were prepared for a big fight," said Steering Committee representative Jim Beardon.

Prior to the meeting, Tory MPP for the area, Larry Grossman wrote a strong letter to Mayor David Crombie asking for deferral of the permits until Grossman had a chance to formally study the issue. The letter was distributed on Tuesday to City Council members and Hydro.

Organize against racism, says Douglas

By ANDREA WAYWANKO

More than 100 students crowded into the International Student Centre's Cumberland Hall Wednesday to hear Vern Harper and Rosie Douglas speak on Douglas' imminent deportation and racism in Canada today.

Sponsored by the Alliance against Racism and Political Repression, the meeting stimulated strong discussion on the origin and reasons for racism and the need to combat it on every level.

The meeting was opened by Mary Tate who stressed the urgent need for students to actively organize against racism on the campus, citing the defense of Rosie Douglas and native militants as immediate priorities.

Vern Harper, member of the Toronto Warrior Society commented on the racism against native people and how, after years of battle within the system for a change, natives were now beginning to fight on their own.

"We cannot wait for others to come and say 'look what's happened to native people'. We can no longer wait for sympathy. We have decided to do it ourselves," he said.

However Harper welcomed the growing support for natives and encouraged further solidarity in inviting students to an afternoon Minimata protest at Queen's Park. Harper spoke about the growth of Warrior Societies across Canada as the direct result of the disillusionment of many natives with the government.

A violent confrontation between the RCMP and the Native People's caravan in September, 1974 was a major factor in revealing to natives how the government operates and how change rather than integration is needed, Harper contended.

Harper said the growing awareness of natives is leading them towards a Marxist analysis of the native question, linked with the united struggle for socialism, while maintaining their right to self-determination.

Douglas, who now faces deportation at the hands of the Canadian government emphasized racism is heightened during economic crises under capitalism in order to shift the blame onto minority groups who have little or no defence against attack and to divide the working class.

He explained the university is a direct link in this process through its perpetuation of capitalist ideology and its link with industry, because it is a source of technically trained workers. This makes it imperative that students see the need for combating racism at all levels, he said. Blatant racism, he claims, is a fact of life, especially for blacks, East Indians, Asians and natives.

Controversy sparked by Dayan visit

By SHARON STEVENSON
Moshe Dayan will be speaking on campus next Tuesday, but opposition to his appearance is already being organized by the Ad Hoc Committee to Support the Just Struggles of the Palestinian and other Arab Peoples.

Spokesman Paul Mackay said the committee was unalterably opposed to Zionism. Re pointed out 81 per cent of the total land area of Palestine in 1947 was occupied by the Israelis, uprooting one million Arabs, living in 524 towns and villages. "Three hundred and eighty-five villages were totally destroyed," said Mackay, "and on the basis of this destruction the Zionists built their own settlements and colonies."

Mackay said massacres were carried out against the Palestinian people. Sixty men, women and children were slaughtered at Badrash-Sheikh. At Deir Yassin, where the Irgun Zvei Leumi terrorist organization had the co-operation of the Haganah, 254 Palestinians were murdered on April 9, 1948," said Mackay.

"From 1948 onward, the Zionists have terrified refugees in camps and Palestinians in Israel in the occupied territories, and established on occupied land, the racist and illegitimate state of Israel" said Mackay.

In both 1956 and 1967, Israel waged wars of aggression against the Arab peoples, and increased their land mass, said Mackay. "That is why we say Israel is an illegitimate state, because it came into being by seizing land from the Palestinians, and increased its size by seizing land from its Arab neighbours."

Mackay said Dayan's speech here is an international event, and was significant in that Zionism is unable to find a platform in the Third World, or in most of Europe. "At the UN International Women's Conference in Mexico last summer, the vast majority of delegates walked out and refused to listen to Mrs. Rabin (wife of the Israeli premier)."

"The Palestinian people are fighting a heroic struggle using any means they see fit to oppose the occupation of their land, just as the anti-fascist fighters used any means to defeat Hitler in World War II. Their struggle is just and must be supported," said Mackay.

Mackay said students should oppose Dayan's visit. "There is no neutrality on this question, just as there was no neutrality in the 1960's and '70's when U.S. imperialism was waging a war of aggression in Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos. Students must take the side of the oppressed nations & peoples," he said.

"For SAC to invite him to speak is to take the side of Zionism, and the invitation should have been withdrawn."

SAC University Commissioner Jay Lefton and the man responsible for bringing Dayan to U. of T. holds an opposing view.

Lefton said Dayan's agent contacted SAC to book a speaking engagement for him.

At a SAC general council meeting, a vote to invite Dayan passed 11 to 9. Dayan is being paid $3,500 plus expenses.

Lefton said this gives students "an opportunity to hear him speak at a reasonable price."

"Dayan is in the forefront of activity in the Middle East" and Lefton feels the Middle East is a "current newsmaker."

Lefton defends the views of Zionism because he "sees the necessity of a homeland for the Jewish people." "Israel can play no role in the middle east without co-operation in the area, he said."

"They have to protect themselves." SAC vice-president Sa'ad Saidullah said he was one of those originally opposed to Dayan's appearance on campus. "I opposed his coming because I don't agree with anything that he has done. When you invite a speaker, you're not inviting a mouthpiece, but it does reflect some sort of broad agreement of views. For instance, we wouldn't invite Hitler because we are opposed to his views," said Saidullah.

Saidullah added he didn't like soldiers or aggressive people.

"Just look at the map. Dayan has helped greatly in carrying out policies in that area." SAC decided to invite a speaker from the Palestinian Liberation Organization to ensure that Canadian students had an opportunity to hear the other side of the issue, he said.

Meyer Rosen, member of Rillel Foundation, said it was a good opportunity for students to hear someone who was a member in the Israeli cabinet during the critical years of 1967-73. "Re is usually called a hawk, but he was opposed to sending Israeli troops to occupy the Golan Heights and the Suez Canal during the Seven-Day War. He is one of the few men who really knows what motivated Israeli policy during those years," said Rosen.

Faisal Saab, of the Arab Student Association said Dayan was a hero of that war, now out of power, making a tour to make money.

"As Canadians, we have been exposed to the same propaganda all our lives and some still wrongly think that the Arabs are trying to throw Jews into the sea. The Zionists used the anti-semitism of the Nazis to gain world sympathy. But from being discriminated against, they became the master and discriminated against the Palestinians," Saab added.

Sesquicentennial

U of T sings Birthday Blues

By DAVID GLEDHILL

The money for the birthday party has been cut in half. Another victim of the scalpel wielded in the name of the tight financial situation, the Sesquicentennial Celebration fund, U of T's 150th anniversary in 1977, has been reduced to $150,000 from the pre-budgeted figure of $200,000.

Vice-President of External Affairs Ms. Marvi Bradshaw, who is responsible for the Sesquicentennial Celebrations getting off the ground, expressed her hopes the present financial situation would not deteriorate to the point where the project would have to be shelved. "It is an important event in the history of the university and the province of Ontario."

The decision to fund the celebration was made long before the current budgetary crisis came about, Bradshaw said. The only difference now is that the money the committee has to plan with has decreased by 50 per cent, she said.

The committee has set up groups to schedule activities and events encompassing such subjects as law, medicine, environment, engineering, management studies, humanities, the performing arts, exhibitions and alumni.

The year long celebrations are not to be of the "whoop it up" type but those which show the university to the people of Ontario, what it has to offer and the part it has played in the province's history and pre-history, she stressed.

A new approach in fund raising has been adopted by the university, one of an on going appeal for outside donations. As a result of financial stringencies responsible for the Sesquicentennial cutbacks, the committee adopted this continuing search for funds.

Bradshaw was quick to point out the Sesquicentennial Celebration Fund will seek funds through normal channels such as the private funding committee and will not solicit outside private funds as this might jeopardize the university's own chances of obtaining financial aid from the same sources. This does not rule out the possibility of applying to Wintario for a slice of provincial profits.

In an effort to publicize the event, president John Evans sent a letter to the Postmaster General to investigate the possibility of having a commemorative stamp issued for the occasion.

A Sesquicentennial logo, designed by Allen Fleming, Chief Designer of the U of T Press, was unveiled Wednesday. This symbol will be used for everything in conjunction with the birthday, letterheads, posters, T-shirts and newspaper ads.

No public relations person has been hired to supervise the project, said Bradshaw, who added the committee has the advice of private individuals who have experience in public relations.

The major hurdle as it stands now will probably be getting the general public to pronounce the word "sesquicentennial".

OPIRG slammed at conference

KINGSTON (CUP) — Ken Dryden's proposal to set up autonomous Ralph Nader-like lobbies in Ontario funded by a student fee levy came under fire at the Ontario Federation of Students' Conference, at Queen's University, September 27-28.

After debate in a workshop session and during a plenary meeting, delegates voted to recommend to all OFS members that student councils determine the governing structures of any such groups set up in the province, and link them directly to the council.

Supporters of the proposal argued that the autonomy of these groups from student council control is important to their potential success.

The proposal surfaced last summer when the former Nader Raider and Montreal Canadian goaltender Ken Dryden called a meeting of student representatives to set up Ontario Public Interest Research Groups (OPIRG).

The idea was to discuss the holding of referenda across the province this year asking students to approve a $10 per year fee to fund the research groups.

Dryden met with criticism from students at the meeting, but told them OPIRG intended to push for referenda even if councils objected.

Dryden called another meeting but no-one showed up, so he adopted a strategy of dealing with councils on a "one-to-one" basis rather than collectively. He also reduced the proposed fee from $10 to $5 per student per year.

OPIRG representatives met with delegates at the OFS conference. OPIRG spokesman Peter Cameron and Terry Moore of MacMaster and Waterloo universities, claimed they not Dryden, are responsible for OPIRG, and say they had no prior knowledge Dryden was going to make the proposal.

Moreover, they revealed that the OPIRG forces are split on the actual purpose of the research groups.

Dryden has said Ralph Nader's book Action for a Change was the key document in understanding OPIRG. But Terry Moore calls it "a frontal attack on the new left" in the US which has little relevance to Canada, dismissing it as "ridiculous."

OFS staffer Chris Harries told the delegates the OPIRG concept is "chameleon in nature, changing its colour wherever it goes to adjust to the local tones".

He says OPIRGs, now established at Waterloo and MacMaster, show little similarity in their purpose and approach, with the former being "pinkish" in colour, activist in nature, and focusing on studies of food monopolies.

The MacMaster group, he says, is "liberal red" more research oriented and involved with projects like the construction of a bicycle path.

And the U of T representative of "this most peculiar creature", Harries says, has different ideas again, as does Dryden.

Since OPIRG proposes to split the $5 per student into $3 for the local office and $2 for the central office, Harries asked what the intended purpose of the centre is.

"The question is not whether OPIRG is a good or bad idea. It's 'what is OPIRG?'"

OPIRG spokesman Terry Moore replied OPIRG is "a diverse organization that doesn't have a united ideological point of view" which is now attempting to "consolidate" and write a constitution which would define all PIRGs in the province.

"OPIRG will be more clearly defined by the people who become involved in it", he said.

York delegate Dale Ritch criticized OPIRG as being "opposed to the concept of student unionism" because it splits student organization into separate action and research components.

Ritch feels student unions can and should involve themselves in concerns outside of the confines of the campus, but says OPIRG would tend to split student organization into two autonomous branches.

Moore replied that the concerns of student unions and OPIRGs do not overlap because OPIRGs deal with "the public interest" while student unions deal only with "student interests".

He pointed out that although student unions claim they are becoming more community oriented, none of them are. OPIRG could help students become more involved by using their research skills to advance the public interest, he said.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

The Varsity — Bob White

takes them all on . . .

Day after-day in all corners of the campus we pick up the usual tremors of criticism of this newspaper, so today instead of taking it, we'll dish a little out. Today the Varsity takes on all the "alternate" rags on campus.

Prime on the darts list is the Victoria College newspaper, the Strand, for their cogent editorial on the subject of the library strike. After a rather shallow analysis of the pay situation in the libraries, the Strand concluded that the union was intent on "stifling the intellectual processes of this university as a means for (sic) reaping a monetary gain."

Seeing that action is necessary, the Strand has advised SAC to act as employment agency in the event of the strike by staffing the libraries with students working, presumably, for the same low wages enjoyed by those presently employed.

The Strand reduced itself to name-calling on two occasions, calling the CUPE negotiators "manipulators" and branding their supporters as members of the campus "lunatic fringe." The Calvin Coolidge award for Meritorious Service is graciously extended (it resembles an upraised middle finger).

The Strand might also receive the Critic's Circle Award for their portrayal of all the drama, pathos and tenderness in the life of John Parker, university negotiator. Follow his escapades as he goes forth seeking truth, justice . . .

Although newspapers should not be held strictly responsible for their opinion articles, the Grad Post should talk to their latest contributor, Frank McIntyre, about his piece on the athletic complex. McIntyre has taken the university to task for hoping to build what he calls "a sports mausoleum."

McIntyre subscribes to the decentralized approach to athletics and suggests a series of "mini-athletic-participation facilities dotting the campus."

This suggestion is clearly out in left field for a number of reasons. Those people who participate in athletics on campus, if they are sincerely athletic, are probably involved in more than one sport or art. A two-hour workout involving a series of sports would most likely take double the time if it involved moving from one building to another. The jogging exercise might be a good idea, but the time consumed in dressing, undressing, redressing and overdressing would clearly defeat the idea of a long, concentrated workout.

Considering that much of the discussion in administrative circles revolves around the paucity of both money and space, this idea becomes even more unfeasible. While maintaining that "the University of Toronto has never been a good neighbour" to the surrounding community, McIntyre fails to pick out locations for these facilities. It's probable that they could not be built without making worse neighbours out of the surrounding community or by devastating it entirely.

What can be said about the Toike Oike that hasn't already been said. Even when they try to be nice, which one must assume was the intention in their latest "International Women's Toike," they still come off as high school boys having a little giggle in the washroom. The paper remains an insult to both sexes despite its attempts at good, clean spoofy fun. Sexuality is still nothing more than large chests and mythological penises but at least they've progressed to talking about "doing it" with the lights on. Liberation crawls along.

Balcony Square, the Scarborough College newspaper, should be held responsible for the insulting piece against gays in their latest issue. The writer, Steve Overton, feels a little threatened by all this talk of gay liberation and feels forced to make some fairly unfunny remarks about gay dorms at the college. The only illustration the editors could see fit to run was the sort of ghetto gay drawings that adorn the $1 pocket-books in the Yonge St. bookstores, all muscle and low-hanging crotchets.

Last but not least, Medium II, the Erindale College newspaper, receives the Peter Worthington Banality Award for their inclusion of a "Media Miss" feature in last week's issue. It was a typical cheesecake shot with Erindale scenery in the background, but at least the reader wasn't bored with a list of the woman's hobbies, likes, dislikes and favorite colors.

This sort of material simply should not be included in a university newspaper, whose job it is to provide an alternative, not a poorly-done copy, of what we lovingly call "the straight press."

Anyone with an axe to grind can have, for the asking, this space opposite the editorial page. Op Ed submissions should be typed on a 72-character line, double-spaced and should be received two days prior to publication by 5 p.m.

WHY SUPPORT THE LIBRARY WORKERS?

One of the most important conflicts occurring on campus this fall is the one between our local, CUPE 1230, and the University Administration. Its significance reaches far beyond the six hundred plus library employees to touch all sectors on campus. Among the key issues involved are the level and kind of library service the university should provide, the best strategy to follow to oppose the cutbacks in education spending, and proper levels of benefits and rights for the workers who provide the services on this campus. The importance of these issues, we feel, demands the fullest possible participation from all sectors on campus. It is thus of crucial importance that the issues be clearly and carefully drawn.

LIBRARY SERVICES

One major question that will be determined by the present struggle's outcome is the sort of library service offered on this campus. More than two years ago the main book collection moved to the Robarts Library. Despite the promises of the new building, general library services have continued to decline because the university has steadfastly refused to hire an adequate number of staff. Instead, actual reductions in the number of jobs in the library has been a reality for several years. In spite of more than a doubling of library use (by the Chief Librarian's estimate) and a huge increase in the work load occasioned by the move of the main collection to the Robarts, the total number of budgeted staff positions has actually declined over the past five years. It is there that the reason for the decline in services lies.

Recently the administration threatened to eliminate seventy to eighty more positions within the library system and, in spite of the union's protests, is probably still planning to do so. Execution of this threat would have disastrous effects on both the quantity and quality of library services. The most immediate effect could well be a forced return to partial evening services with minimal or no service at all on Sundays. Later results will be just as harmful and will remind students and faculty of last spring's debacle at the Sigmund Samuel Library: books out of order on the shelves and thus difficult if not impossible to find; thousands of books on tables or in sorting areas with no one to put them in order or reshelve them; and long lineups at charge-out desks with little time for personal service.

Our union is concerned about our ability to serve the members of the university community and we are fighting against any decline in services. We are asking for a minimum number of staff (405, the number of union employees as of July 1) and we will continue to fight for whatever number is needed to maintain essential services. This is a difficult fight for us to win on our own; we need the support of students, faculty and other campus workers.

Our fight against library cutbacks takes on even more importance as a major example of resistance by one sector of the university against harmful fiscal cutbacks. The general campus-wide struggle is made up of many smaller ones and right now, one of the most important of these is centering around the library. To wage a successful anti-cutbacks campaign, we must unequivocally refuse to decide which essential services are to be sacrificed. If we accept the argument that the maintenance of a proper level of service in one area means an inevitable reduction in another, then eventually all of us will lose. Rather the proper strategy is to say no now and all next times to harmful and arbitrary cutbacks. A victory for the library workers would force the administration to realize that a reduction in vital university services and vital staff is an unacceptable solution to the present fiscal crisis.

PROPER CONTRACT DEMANDS

As important as the issue of cutbacks in services is, it is not the only basis on which we are asking for support. Indeed and most importantly, we want your support in general for our contract proposals. We are not demanding that everyone endorse all of our contract proposals but rather that you support our major ones as just and reasonable. Among our proposals, we are demanding a guarantee against layoffs and reductions in staffing. We are asking for the average Ontario wage, for compensation for the losses suffered due to inflation during the two years of our past contract, and for protection of these gains against further erosion by inflation. We are asking for a stronger "union rights" clause and for more concrete protections against arbitrary and willful management acts. We are no longer willing to accept a "low-priority" status.

We most strongly reject the argument that the university does not have the money needed for our proposals or is somehow at the mercy of some villainous provincial government leader. The university will not go bankrupt if it ceases to pay its staff substandard wages. The key question is not the amount of money the university has (when it had lots during the late sixties our wages were still low — $3,700 per year!) but rather how it chooses to spend its money. We reject their past priorities as inadequate and demand that the spending be reallocated to meet the real needs of students, faculty and campus workers.

COMMON INTERESTS

Campus workers should support us, we feel, because we have identical interests. If the library workers win significant gains from the university in this contract, a major push will be provided for cross-campus unionization. Then and only then will the attainment of decent rights and benefits for the 5,000 presently unorganized become a possibility. Students have many interests in common with us as well. Many work part-time in the library and we are trying to bargain on their behalf for higher wages, job security and additional benefits. Also, many students upon graduation, or sooner, will be working for institutions like the University of Toronto and will face the same low wages and poor working conditions as we do. Most library workers have some university education, many have degrees, and some even have graduate degrees. Within a few years, you will have to fight the same battles we are fighting now.

IMPASSE IN NEGOTIATIONS

Negotiations at present have reached an impasse. We have applied to the provincial government for conciliation. This does not mean that a strike is inevitable, but the possibility is becoming daily more like a probability. While we have not yet taken a strike vote, our members are increasingly more prepared to strike if the university will not give us guarantees against layoffs and speed-ups and provide us with good wages and protection against inflation. If it occurs, it will be because the administration of this university has refused to consider the basic needs of library workers and, in response, we have determined to fight for them.

SUPPORT

We are working hard to organize support from all sectors on campus. All of us must stand firm in support of maintaining essential services and providing a just compensation for those who provide the services. We urge all of you to join the library workers support committee (meetings are every Monday, 5-15, Room 4049, Robarts Library) and attend the rally in support of library workers and in opposition to cutbacks — Tuesday, October 7, 12:30 - 1:30 just outside the Robarts. Demonstrate to the university administration that their divide and conquer tactics will succeed no longer!

Rape victimizes three times, forum told

By M. JANE FRENCH

"Women get screwed three times when they are raped. Once by the rapist, secondly by the judicial system, and thirdly by society," according to Dr. Alex Gigeroff a lawyer and criminologist.

Gigeroff made the remark as he addressed a capacity crowd at the St. Lawrence Centre in a public discussion entitled "Rape—Myths and Realities" Wednesday night.

A film entitled Rape—A Preventive Enquiry, in which numerous rape victims and convicted rapists were interviewed, was shown to begin the evening. Comments from the victims emphasized three points: always be aware of your surroundings, don't be naive enough to think that it can't happen to you, and if you are in a threatening situation, try to stay cool and use your wit. The rapists interviewed advised women to submit to attack, and said attempts at self-defense only enrage the rapist and will most likely result in more serious injury, or death to the victim. The greater mobility and visibility of today's women were suggested as explanations for the increase in rapes.

The four panelists, introduced by moderator Judy LaMarsh, were allowed seven minutes each to discuss a particular aspect of rape.

Gigeroff began by giving a legal definition of rape: when a male has sexual intercourse with a female who is not his wife, 1) without her consent or 2) if consent is given only after the woman has been intimidated or threatened, or the male is impersonating her husband, or the nature of the act is falsely represented.

Dr. Gigeroff said sexual intercourse legally involved any amount of penetration, and questioned the severity of life imprisonment, which is the maximum penalty for this act.

He criticized the fact that it is men who almost exclusively run the legal system and stated that the present rape laws are not providing enough protection for women.

Dr. Gigeroff sympathized with both the rape victim and the rapist.

Dr. Ruth Bray, a psychologist who has spent many years dealing with rapists tried to indicate factors which might cause a man to commit rape. These included confusion with regards to his sexuality, feelings of inferiority, a poor body image, lack of self-respect, violence involved in his upbringing, poor vocational performance and concepts about women in which he regards them as powerful and in control. The potential rapist may have been taken advantage of by women and therefore resents them. These factors, especially when accompanied by the loss of a job or his own inability to have intercourse with his wife or girlfriend, can build into a blind rage in which the rapist wants to strike back in order to release his anger. Many times a rapist has no particular victim in mind. All he needs is an opportune moment.

Dr. Bray said the rapist thinks he is proving himself and asserting his masculinity by using sexual violence. The rapist must be taught to have more self-pride and lose his inferiority complex.

Stephen Leggett, Q.C., Deputy Crown Attorney in the Judicial District of York, where 60 per cent of the rape cases in Ontario appear, said there are two main classifications of rape in the courts: one in which the identity of the accused is the issue, and one in which consent is the issue. While assaults falling under the first classification are considered to be the worst kind of rape, those involving consent are usually more difficult to prove, for corroboration is required.

Mr. Leggett received some static from the audience and other panelists due to the sexist overtones apparent in his attitude towards rape victims, whom he continually called "girls".

Dr. Lorene Clark, a political theorist and criminologist was extremely informative and articulate.

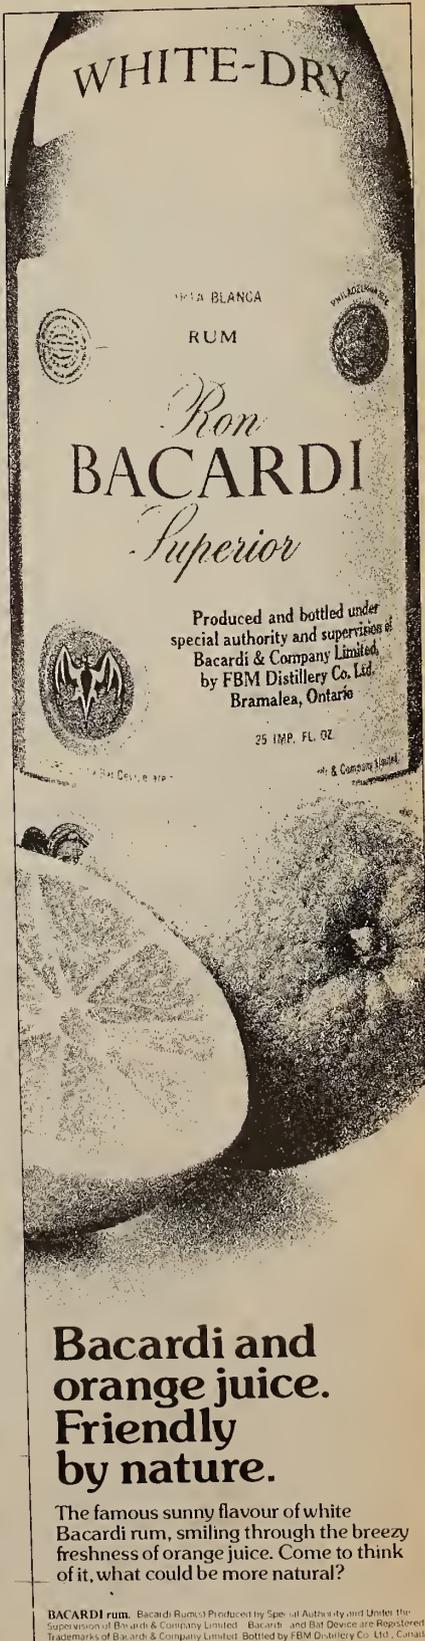

She emphasized rape is not a sexual event for the victim, but an assault resulting in fear of injury, violation of self, or death. Rape should be regarded by the law, not as a "crime of passion" as Mr. Leggett put it, but as an assault.

Dr. Clark compared rape with trespassing or theft. The average sentence for rape, which is two to three years in Ontario, is the same for theft. Furthermore, the longest sentence ever served for rape in Ontario is twelve years.

When an attack on a woman's sex organs can be regarded as similar to an attack on any other part of a human being's body, then rape will be regarded as assault.

Dr. Clark discussed the myths which surround rape, for example, that rape is the worst thing that can happen to a woman. In reality it is men who have this attitude, especially men who regard women as property upon which the rapist has infringed.

A victim should learn not to feel ashamed but rather angry that she has been physically violated. Dr. Clark emphasized the necessity of providing a supportive milieu for the victim from the moment she reports the incident.

Sinclair Scientific kit

The Sinclair Scientific is an amazing calculator. It offers logs, trig, and true scientific notation over a 200-decade range—features normally found on calculators costing around 100.00.

Forget slide rules and four-figure tables! On the Scientific, you can handle directly all three trig functions then inverses.

Logic, analyzing, giving quick access to x^2 (including square and other roots).

Plus, of course, the four arithmetic functions and any calculation based on them.

In fact, virtually all complex scientific or mathematical calculations can be handled with ease.

ONE-YEAR GUARANTEE

Now only 39⁹⁵

So is the Scientific difficult to assemble?

No. Powerful though it is, the Sinclair Scientific is a model of tidy engineering. All parts are supplied—all you need provide is a soldering iron and pair of cutters. Complete step-by-step instructions are provided, and our Service Department will back you up throughout if you've any queries or problems.

Of course, we'll happily supply the Scientific or the Cambridge already built, if you prefer—they're still exceptional value.

- Features of the Scientific
- 12 functions on a simple keyboard
 - Scientific notation
 - 200-decade range
 - Reverse Polish logic

CULTURE MARCHES ON

The latest volume of Pearson's memoirs hides more than it gives away

Mike
The Memoirs of the Rt. Hon.
Lester B. Pearson,
Vol III
U of T Press, $15.00

Mike Volume Three is a disappointment: lacking the easy charm of the early volumes, the book is an almost listless chronicle of Pearson's ten years as opposition leader and prime minister.

Pearson, of course, should be absolved of some blame, since he died halfway through writing the book, leaving his editors to recreate the rest from diaries, files and films. Nevertheless, one senses Pearson, having borne the mantle of prime minister, feels a responsibility to be ponderous when he would dearly love to be precocious.

The accounts of Pearson's last ten years in Ottawa give very little away. Nor does Pearson deliberately reveal very much about himself: insights come almost by accident.

Take Pearson's innocence, his refusal to admit that people had evil intentions. Admirable, in the abstract, but disastrous in practice. Pearson, having a long talk with John Kennedy two days before the 1962 election, is surprised when people draw suspicious conclusions.

Pearson's place, despite his charm and directness, was clearly among the diplomatic, social and corporate elite. Having an audience with the Queen, Pearson is interrupted by a telegram, only to find it says "Urgent saw our village we are to be demolished for parking Gerard Village Association Toronto." Hardly important, when one is with the Queen! But, most likely, hardly important to Pearson at all. His was the world of international manners and its prerequisites: he probably had no inkling just what urban reform was. Those who have seen the Tench Decade film series may want to skip this volume entirely. Yet those unfamiliar with the Diefenbaker-Pearson years will find this a pleasant, if superficial excursion into the noble, if flawed world of Lester Pearson.

The Best of Modern Poetry
Milton Klonsky, ed
Pocket Books, $1.95

We all know by now that each new anthology, collection or selection of Modern Poetry claims in some respect to be definitive, concise and an invaluable reference source to poetry readers. Publishers cram them with edifying introductions and lengthy works in an attempt to produce a marketable commodity.

In this swamp of publishing one occasionally runs across a truly serious and individualistic editor whose writing style is not verbose, and whose ambition it is to enliven the otherwise dead and brutally beaten horse of Modern Verse.

But like Art or Surrealism, terms some use every day, Modern Poetry has never really been defined explicitly enough to assure readers that critics, editors or poets themselves knew enough about it to tell us what it was. They may all agree that it isn't iambic pentameter, that it isn't written during the Victorian era and that Walt Whitman may have begun it all with his book Leaves of Grass but that's where their agreement ends.

For that reason, it is presumptuous of editor Klonsky to title this cross-section The Best of Modern Poetry, and ironically it may well be one of the best collections of contemporary writers to have been published within the last few years.

By avoiding the big names, Eliot, Pound, Crane, Yeats, Dylan Thomas and the rest, he has both theoretically and quite practically given space to new poets whose works are not widely known. He has chosen the less publicized rather than the more, and the personality authentic rather than the historically significant.

For that reason many of the names will be unfamiliar but their works deserve attention. There are even some examples of concrete poetry as yet unpublished in "serious" collections and the most recent works were written as close to us as 1971.

If some people still think of poetry as dry, removed from any real experience of life, this collection would be a good primer to begin with.

My only complaint is to the publishers: why did they refuse to use the original title given by the editor, Shake the Kaleidoscope, and replace it with the mythical title which they did? Raphael Bendaban

NY sophistication at Brennan Hall

Student drama: a marvelous little ghetto! The lights go out. Clomp, clomp, clomp. The actors stumble on stage and arrange themselves. The sets are always wildly out of the period and always of one period — begged borrowed and stolen kitch. The paintings — there are always paintings hung on the flats — look like paint-by-number jobs. Doots stick. The actors drink with devil-may-care abandon from their empty cups. Small talk mumble, fading away as the characters go off stage, is raised to the heights of a self-conscious art.

Audiences are probably irrelevant, as reviewers definitely are. Student drama is self-sufficient, self-justifying, self-renewing.

The Theatre Mickities' production of Noel Coward's Blythe Spirit is vintage student drama. Vintage, not quintessential. (Quintessential requires a student company performing a student script.) It does deserve an audience, though. The company makes the best of its resources, and is good enough to give us — and not least, its actors — a glimpse of other myths, other images (Break a leg! Grease paint! West End! There's no business like show business... etc.).

The actors seem more like characters from a New Yorker cartoon than a Coward play but it is indeed a Coward play and the Mickities, directed by Brian Troy, keep things slipping along on a smooth surface of sophistication, wit and liquor. Tim McElcheran, though more donnish than debonair as Charles Condomine, is consistently good, and he and Maria McEvenue are excellent in their extended flytings. Elizabeth Sacco is suitably mischievously alluring as Elvira. Majda Resnik is Madame Arcati and though perhaps not amusingly eccentric, enough she throws herself into her part with commendatory abandon.

The set is definitely cluttered kitch. The women's costumes, however, are particularly admirable, Maria McEvenue, particularly, cutting a fine figure in hers.

The production continues October 2 through 5 in Upper Brennan Hall at St. Mike's.

It deserves an audience.

Henninger. A different tasting beer.

Meister Pils. Different again.

Henninger tastes different from Canadian beers because it's made from different ingredients and in a different way. Only two row barley is used. Yeast is especially flown in from Frankfurt. It's doubly fermented. It is allowed to carbonate naturally. It tastes like a German beer because it is.
Henninger. Das Schmeckt.

Meister Pils is a true light tasting German pilsener brewed from the same ingredients and in the same way as it is in Henninger's Frankfurt brewery. Now you can enjoy the light distinctive taste that has made pilsener the most celebrated of all the world's beers.

Both Henninger and Meister Pils are made in Henninger's own independent brewery and are available at your brewers retail outlet for just a few cents more than regular beer.

Two German beers in fat little bottles.

Don't look to long for disposable nipples or pure feminism

Here Comes And Other Poems
Erica Jong
New American Library of Canada

Here Comes & Other Poems by Erica Mann Jong is not merely to be read because of the attention received by Fear of Flying. It is deserving in itself because of some very good and original poetry.

The book also contains a fairly natural interview with the author, and some prose pieces including "The Artist as Housewife, The Housewife as Artist," and "Writing a First Novel."

In these, Jong traces the problems of becoming an artist in a world where people are responding to the "woman" issue, but where, still, each woman must seek out her own strengths and prove her creativity.

In a society where men and women do have different life patterns and experiences, each sex should be permitted an authentic expression of its own experience. Erica Jong has done just that. To label her as a pure feminist is a hasty judgement. Her purpose in poetry and the novel is a more serious one. She explores the female psyche in a gutsy, personal way.

Her experiments with the poetic medium encompass far more than the subject of womanhood. Rich imagery is drawn from the so-called trivia of everyday life. For example, fruit and vegetables become sexualized and humanized ingredients for her craft in a highly imaginative way.

A lighter, almost playful approach is evidenced in such poems as "Two More Scenes From The Lives of Vegetables," "Chinese Food," and "The Nose". Her renowned themes of love, unfulfillment, death, fantasy, and good old kinkiness unroll in her poems with a freedom that could not happen in Fear of Flying.

She writes quite sassily of her body, yet never mindlessly, for some complexity between the lovers or in herself is always present.

He thinks the future is a mouth
She invites him into her apple.

Unlike "the women of America with their electric purple sunglasses and disposable nipples" in "The Objective Woman", Jong does not want her outside to become her inside and her inside to become her outside. Her poetry shows an honest effort towards an integration between outer and inner.

Here Comes and Other Poems is not merely a book by a woman for women. It is both a delightful and serious collection of poems and prose in which Erica Jong has proven many things. She has further broken down the cultural stereotypes of women; she has declared her own voice and identity, and she has helped shift the focus of the women's movement from the oppressed and downtrodden mass to the capable and creative self. The last poem capsulizes this:

I am trying to learn to begin to begin to begin.
Laurie Walsh

You are what you eat: asparagus as verbal aphrodisiac?

Briefly interesting but not much more

Public reaction to reviewers in the popular press often suggests that it would perhaps be safest for those reviewers if they could be wide-eyed innocents with an infinite capacity for enthusiastic neutrality. "To see the world in a grain of sand" let this my motto be," many demand that reviewers say, and not only this but also that they see the world in each and every grain of sand.

The current show at the Hart House Gallery (through to Oct. 17) appears, faute de mieux, to be the bow of the Art Committee there to International Woman's Year. It features works portraying women by two women, Rebecca Burke and Catherine Pentland. This show, and all the others like it that have come and that are still to come before the year is out, offer an easy way out. Because the shows themselves say so little, the reviewer can say anything he wants. "Woman, the eternal mystery . . .", or, "Woman, the eternal fecundity principle . . .". He can treat the show as example, catalyst, epiphany, metaphor, revelation. And not least, if the memories of his readers are short enough, what he says about the one show he can say about all the others.

I resist the temptation. As art, as art, the works of these two artists are interesting, momentarily, but not much more. Burke's works, larger than life cutouts of a fetish queen, helmet, gloves, heels and all, who is vaguely and disturbingly reminiscent of Judy LaMarsh, and Pentland's large paintings, in a naive style and all of women who are themselves seemingly rather naive, and open-eyed for all their allure, make the gallery seem tiresomely like a fairground or a circus tent. Motifs and figures are repeated again and again, by both artists: no conclusion — artistic or feminist — seems to have been reached by either.

Elegant 18th-century satire opens varied Hart House season

Subscription tickets are still available, although not perhaps for long, at the Hart House ticket office for a four-play season which begins next Thursday with the Scriblerians' elegant satire Three Hours After Marriage. As the old stock properties are dragged creaking onto the stage, Martin Hunter, the Director of the first production and pilot of the theatre for the season, is drilling a couple of dozen first-year recruits from the Drama Centre into a tight company.

Hunter is enthusiastic about the coming season, explaining that maximal variety in technique, presentation and direction will be achieved in a year when the productions will span four centuries and three distinctive directorial approaches are likely to be made.

It is perhaps the best entertainment buy in Toronto to purchase a student subscription at a mere dollar-and-a-quarter per show. But if you are interested in the theatre from both sides of the lights, you can still be involved in this season's remaining productions. Auditions for Caligula are being held this afternoon at the Glen Morris Church. And next week there will be auditions for the final two plays of the season. Technical crew are always welcome, with or without experience. Drop over to Hart House for more information.

Mascall's Conduction wakes up your senses

Like Lay's potato chips, one visit to the Toronto Dance Laboratorium is not enough. The intimate 41 seat performing theatre, the cider and fruit cake served at intermission, the availability of many of the crew for post-performance discussion were unexpected but thoroughly enjoyed. The Dance Laboratorium was created to give neophyte artists an opportunity to perform their work and receive comment from an interested, serious audience.

Last week, Jennifer Mascall presented an exciting solo dance concert called Conduction which she both choreographed and performed. She imaginatively incorporated many media forms into her interpretations, from Gertrude Stein readings to Greek prose to bird impersonations, from miradangan to harpsichord to transistor radio, from darkness to fire to full light. The program included three works, each one offering a totally different dance experience, both in movement and in staging. The musical accompaniments (or rather noise) and dance themes were less varied, perhaps because modern dance pieces often represent feelings strongly evident in 20th century living — chaos, confusion, futility. However, the loud dissonant refrains generated by the musicians heralded and emphasized the sentiments so effectively danced by Mascall. Her strong, fluid movements, delicate grace and command of space were masterfully blended in the expression of the disorientation and anxieties of her characters. As a performer, Mascall is warm and charming. Her visage conveys a sincerity of emotion that is simple and pure.

In the first selection of the evening, Sleeping Giant, Mascall takes the audience on a journey into a fantasy world which is so overwhelming that it ultimately forces a retreat back to predictable, insensitive reality. A young woman is chopping wood when the scene opens. She soon doffs her work boots and begins a melodic flowing dance, which degenerates into rigid, robot-like movement. Accompanied first by harpsichord and then harsher bells and drums, she dances to oral repetitions of Gertrude Stein's poetry.

The final piece, Envoie, was the most interesting. Having donned a black and white, clown-like costume Mascall, at the start of the work, is rolling on the floor in a sweaty frenzy, while the 'resistor' stretches yard upon yard of tape high and low across the room. Jennifer rises and tries to function within these narrow confines — cars, airplanes, policemen, cheerleaders are some of the life activities she conveys. Soon the tape becomes too constraining and 'our heroine' lapses into a trance-like state, still moving but not feeling. Eventually she falls to her knees again, succumbing to overwhelming forces.

As with any art form, the interpretation is totally subjective. A good performance achieves this end, as may many future performances at Dance Laboratorium. It may be worthwhile to chance an evening there!

It's for your own good: censorship in Toronto

Censorship itself is hot stuff these days. All of us have heard or read a number of arguments for or against, of various degrees of eloquence and intelligence. Few of those that I have come across have dealt in detail with the character of the institutions that impose censorship or the procedures followed.

It is a description of these that I want to offer here, rather than another argument. To a certain extent the facts speak for themselves, of course, and some things are difficult to describe without taking a stand.

The two major guardians of your morals and mine are the provincial government's Board of Censors who deal with movies and the Morality Squad of the Metropolitan Toronto

Police who deal with everything.

THE BOARD OF CENSORS

A great part of the activities of the Board of Censors have nothing to do with censorship at all. They license all professional projectionists, after making sure that they know what they're doing, they have a staff of inspectors who make sure that theatres aren't too flammable and too crowded, that they have enough exits, and so on. All this is excellent.

They also screen every single film that is to be shown publicly in Ontario—including, since the Theatres Act was amended this year, the 8mm film and videotapes which have become so common precisely because formerly they were not censored—they rate each film, and they cut out any pieces they don't like.

Last year they examined 946 feature-length 35mm and 16mm films (as well as shorts, cartoons and trailers); of these they rated 271 as suitable for General exhibition, recommended 329 as Adult Entertainment, and Restricted 338. They made cuts in 134 films, about 14 per cent, and banned 8 altogether.

In order to be licensed, all distributors have to submit all their films to the Board before releasing them. Five members of the Board watch each film right through in their little private theatre. They see four or five films every day, taking notes during each and discussing it afterwards.

They may do no more than assign the film a rating. If they decide that cuts are to be made, they first reach a consensus on what has to go, then send an Elimination Report (a brief description of which shots are objectionable and roughly where within each reel they come) to the producers, who have the choice of cutting the film themselves or leaving it to the Board. Most often, to save trouble and expense, they leave it to the Board.

Then the film goes to one of the Board's four projectionists, who also work as cutters, with a copy of the Elimination Report. Exactly where the cuts are made is the decision of the cutter, so exactly how the film's continuity will be affected is his responsibility. If he feels that the cuts demanded will seriously damage the film, he can give the Board a report to that effect. They may see the film again, and reconsider; they may not.

In particularly difficult cases, the projectionist may set up the portion of the film in question on an editing machine and run it several times back and forth for the Board members. The Board's Chairman and Vice-Chairman, who normally don't view the films, may be called in for an opinion.

Then the film can be sent back to the distributors, after the Board's stamp has been put on each reel, whether anything has been cut or not. A precise record is kept of all cuts, so that other copies of the same film that arrive in the province later can be cut in precisely the same way.

Yes, they save all the parts that are cut out, in a special air-conditioned room. They even have a reel full of their favourite naughty bits, which on occasion they show to government officials: I'm told they are always impressed.

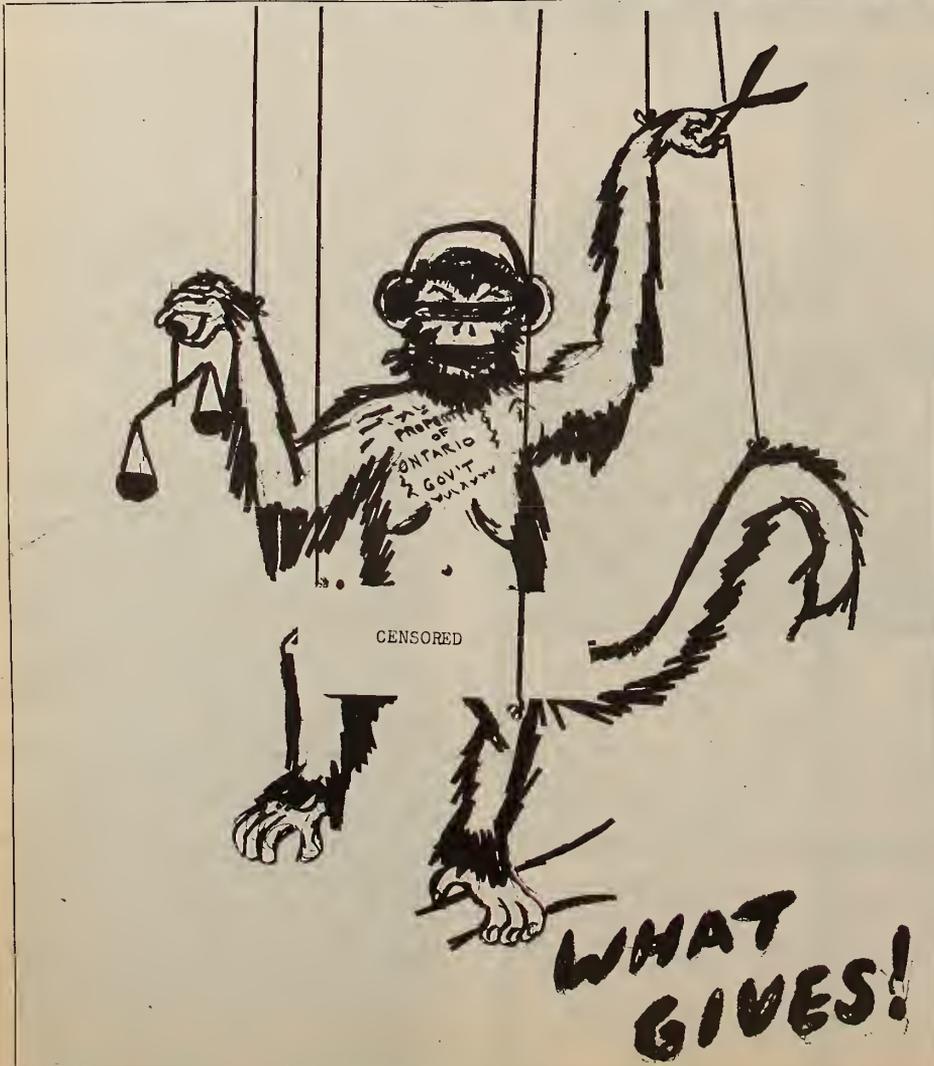

The producers may ask the Board for a specific rating, or leave that to the Board's discretion. Sometimes, if the Board decides to restrict something, the producers will ask them to make further cuts and release it for General Exhibition — this might be the case with a film intended for a largely teenage audience.

Obviously, movies that are to be Restricted are allowed to retain more "offensive" shots. Generally, all that are cut from these are shots of intercourse that show anything from the waist down, fairly explicit shots of masturbation, or physical violence involving a great deal of gore spilled and bodily mutilation. Films for general release will also lose any shots of Full Frontal Nudity — breasts are allowed through these days — and the violence will be toned down a little more.

The members of the Board are appointed, not elected. They work in secrecy: the public is not told what has been cut from a movie, or why, or even if anything has. (The producers know, of course, but often they would prefer moviegoers not to know, so that they can be led to believe that a film will show them more than it really does.) There is a Canadian flag outside the Board's offices at 1045 Millwood, but no sign identifying it. The projectionist-cutters are required to swear an oath of silence.

All this may change. A Nova Scotian named Gerard McNeil, angered by the Nova Scotia Board's habit of banning movies like A Clockwork Orange and Last Tango in Paris, is challenging the constitutionality of the Board of Censors in the courts. His argument is that there is no constitutional provision for any body except courts of law to define or judge obscenity, and there is no other legal basis for regulating the content of films. If he wins his case, films in Nova Scotia (and, by implication, other provinces) could still be seized by the police and ruled on by the courts, but at least there would not be this superabundance of protection.

As it is, there is no official co-operation between the Board of Censors and the Morality Squad. They are independent agencies, dedicated to upholding quite different statutes: one the Theatres Act, the other the Criminal Code. No doubt it's nice to be doubly protected, but it makes the prospect a little unnerving for someone who wants to

Fun with The Star

Afficionados of the Saturday Toronto Star, that waddling confection of a newspaper, certainly got their thirty-five cents' worth out of last weekend's edition. To begin with, there is the reassuring bulk, the awesome solidity of 268 pages. But more important is the almost incomprehensible range of coverage and style — from an Impressionistic souffle on "zany California" to the clam good sense, the meat-and-potatoes authority of an editorial.

One could tarry forever in this garden of delights, and a fully-detailed exegesis would clearly be the happy labor of a lifetime. A brief guided tour will have to suffice for the present.

Students of The Star may have wondered how it would be possible to match last Friday's front-page headline in which the new federal finance minister was referred to as "Big Mac", but such doubters underestimate the amounts of imagination and ingenuity that daily seep out of One Yonge St. The newly-appointed justice minister, Ron Basford was referred to as "Kojak" no less than three times in as many paragraphs. The headline read:

'Kojak' Basford given the goal of safe streets

Aha! A clever connection, see? Not only are Basford and Kojak both cops (one real and one make-believe, let's not forget), but they're both bald too! Does this mean we can look forward to, for example, Pierre Trudeau as Dick van Dyke? Beryl Plumtre as I Love Lucy? Why not go all the way and package world affairs in a nice balance of situation comedy and gripping drama? "Pierre had a bad day at the office trying to convince Canadians to accept a lower standard of living and a trusted colleague resigns. Then he returns home to find Maggie's mother on the doorstep for an extended visit!"

Now for a quick change of pace, flip to the Real Estate section. The ads are always a good bet, page upon page of lushly-executed pitches to woo your eye and brain. The names Manor, Woodlands Manor, Burrows Mills, Hills of Taunton (Oshawa) make in themselves a lyric description of urban life in southern Ontario. And who could pass up "a condominium home so large that you can job in it"? (Eleven times around makes 440 yards.) At the sales pavilion, you're invited to "wander through 3 excitingly furnished model suites." You can even "press a button and see your suite light up on the model."

Or for those who prefer sundrenched radiance to vibrant good health, there is the "Florida condominium homes" development, located near the sunworshippers' paradise of Bathurst and Steeles.

Meanwhile, holding the ideological fort somewhere in the editorial page depths of the Insight section is Borden Spears, Your Man at The Star. Someone should recommend this man for the Order of Canada, so tirelessly does he "represent the readers' interests in The Star's newsroom." This week, Borden unfolds a gripping tale of how The Star faced a situation in which "the news organizations were challenged not by one . . . event but by four of them simultaneously, each sufficient in itself to tax their skills and resources", and in which The Star met the test "with a smooth professionalism that concealed its own art". After a lengthy hymn to The Star's ability to keep hopping with such fast-moving events, the column concludes with the moral of the story. His reply to those readers who saw "an inwholesome absorption with the sick spots in society" in recent coverage of people pulling guns on Ford and the capture of Patty Hearst: "Granting its morbid fascination, it is a record of aberrant behavior that demands explanation. It is part of a newspaper's function to attempt that explanation, but the first job is to tell it. If the newspapers reject this role on grounds of taste, who will perform it?"

OK, so we have been reduced to being consumers of our own history. And of course all we want as consumers is that what we consume lives up to its claims. We end up with unit pricing in the supermarkets and Borden Spears on the editorial page.

This can, unfortunately, be only a sampling of the full flower of The Star's chosen role. And any tour that concentrates only on high points will miss a large amount of useful and necessary information — the stock market quotations, the race results, the movie listings, the weather forecast, even the events of the day. But underneath it, the distinctions between "news" and "entertainment" and "propaganda" get blurrier and blurrier. Which partly explains why, if nothing else, it's so much fun to surround yourself with a Star on Saturday afternoon. A safer bet than movies and only one-tenth of the price.

Another satisfied customer settles down for an absorbing afternoon of reading.

Exodus U.K.
Richard Rohmer
McClelland + Stewart
$10.00

Great Britain is in chaos with riots in Trafalgar Square. The Arabs have withdrawn all their oil money from the U.K. causing the collapse of the British economy. In order to salvage as much as possible from the disaster Australia, New Zealand, America and Canada are begged by the U.K. government to extend financial aid and to each accept some two million British refugees. In Canada, Quebec threatens to secede if the immigrants are accepted and the West intends to do so if they are not.

Incidentally Canadian P.M. Roussel is described as a "highly educated, a literate, totally bilingual man with a legal academic background". Remind you of anyone?

So reads the scenario of Richard Rohmer's new novel Exodus U.K. where as in his previous work Ultimatum he confronts the reader with yet another threat to that apparently most fragile of all vessels, Canadian unity.

Exodus U.K. is a midnight ramble through a right-winger's nightmare; the landscape is studded with Francophones, Arabs and reds. The unions are riddled with communists, Ottawa is riddled with Quebecois, and the P.M. is riddled with drink.

Page after page Rohmer pounds out his message with all the subtlety of a jack-bammer. In fact his writing reads more like a social studies primer for juvenile Tories than a novel. He has a cliché for every occasion.

The royal family: "The Queen simply took the position that she and her family were the servants of the people."

The capitalist: "He had earned his money the hard way in spite of . . . an almost impossible taxation climate".

Productivity: "Productivity in Britain has been killed by the blow of irresponsible strikes promoted by ruthless trade-unionists."

Would hordes of Anglo-Saxon immigrants with their queer customs and values upset Canada's delicate social balance?

The red connection: "We know that much of the strike activity . . . is not only communist-inspired, but communist-led. . . the leaders of the rally are militant activists totally dedicated to violence . . . the seeds of revolution were strong and vigorously nurtured by the Communist party".

Now it is not that I object to the author propagating his views. If he chooses to believe that union activity was the major cause for the fall of the British Empire or that America's interest in the North Sea oil fields is the result of an altruistic big brotherly concern for Britain, that is fine with me.

I have enjoyed many books whose ideas I did not share. But the author must employ literary skills to elaborate his world-view through the vehicle of flesh and blood characters acting in a believable context.

Rohmer fails completely in this regard. He sacrifices character development, substituting instead cardboard stereotypes in a world of black and white. Thus his anti-union British P.M. is not only virtuous and upright but is able to expose with ease the hypocrisy of a young leftist minister. His military men, whether being bludgeoned to death by a half-crazed communist mob in Trafalgar Square or risking life and limb in the Canadian Arctic, are uniformly brave, honorable and polite.

The total lack of credibility of the characters is compounded by inane, stilted dialogue — due to the author's attempts to inform the reader of world events through the mouths of his characters. The result is farcical.

For example, what are we to think of a British P.M. who has apparently lived for a number of years in blissful ignorance of both the organization and the policies of the oil producing states. It all must be explained to him on the morning of the crisis. And does the American Secretary of State really need a quick presidential lecture about oil and money?

Factual errors don't help either. Presumably, American government officials realize that their main sources of foreign oil are Venezuela, Nigeria and Canada; but in this novel they all labor under the illusion that America is dependent on Arab oil.

Exodus U.K. may be appreciated by those who like boredom with a touch of paranoia. It may be what keeps the author up at night. Funny thing though, it put me right to sleep.

BG's serve up tearjerkers with a few new tricks

The new rockin', rhythm n' blues Bee Gees couldn't jerk 15,000 tears at once in the Gardens, but they came out looking good compared to the warm up act. The Dudes were duds.

The new look, new sound Bee Gees played Toronto Monday night at Maple Leaf Gardens. The new sound embraces the newer compositions from the Bee Gees' latest album Main Course which adds a livelier tempo to the traditional Bee Gee harmonies. Backing up the Bee Gees are Geoff Westley and Blue Weaver, two keyboard players from the Straws and Mott the Hoople. A brass dimension has been added with the Manhattan Horns.

In spite of this impressive backdrop, the Bee Gees seemed hampered by the "old hits everyone came to hear" syndrome. Their progress and the success of the recent album, complete with two AM hits "Jive Talkin'" and "Nights of Broadway" can't make people forget the haunting emotional lyrics of those Golden Oldies "How Can You Mend A Broken Heart?", "I Started A Joke" . . . ad nauseum.

The Bee Gees played the oldies, but with a few tricks to keep themselves awake. They started with "I've Got To Get A Message To You", then switched straight to their newer material. When they got to "I Started A Joke" they changed midstream to "Massachusetts", a pleasant time saving medley. During "How Can You Mend A Broken Heart?" idle Maurice Gills mockingly gave cues to brother Barry.

The older hits got the greatest response from the audience, although most of the crowd was born after the Bee Gees were formed 20 years ago.

The best song of the night was "Lonely Days", perhaps because it was the song most appropriate to play in the packed Gardens. But even during "Lonely Days" the Bee Gees fell short of bringing the crowd to its frenzied feet to give concertgoers that "event" aura they came to experience.

The encore was the night's anticlimax. Saturation AM airplay had snuffed the magic of "Jive Talkin'"

Adolphus Delphinus

Bee Gees faced the perennial dilemma: what to do when the audience wants to hear songs they already know?

Carpenters without the drums

The Captain and Tenille
Love Will Keep Us Together
A&M

After twenty-three weeks on the Billboard Hot 100, the general public has been more than exposed to the song "Love Will Keep Us Together", so a review of the album may not seem a necessity. The fact remains however, that any new group or artist who manages to survive almost half a year on the US top 100 must be doing something right. While some sceptics maintain that it was Toni Tenille's way of signing the line: "I will, I will, I will" that sold the record, the possibility exists that there is some talent here.

The overall sound of the album is reminiscent of Karen and Richard Carpenter, with the notable improvement being that Toni Tenille does not play the drums! She does play the piano however, and this makes for an unusual combination considering that the Captain (no names, please) also plays a variety of keyboard instruments. These include Clavinet, ARP Odyssey Synthesizer, Mini Moog Synthesizer, Clavietta, Wuritzer Electric Piano, Hammond B3 and Celeste.

While their initial success was an up-tempo number, the album is a slower-paced effort. Starting out loud and mellowing is the recommended format for any artist. The Beatles proved this. To start out with a soft-rock sound and suddenly discover rock-n-roll has meant the death of several artists, notably David Gates' Bread. Predictions that the Captain and Tenille will become an M.O.R. (middle-of-the-road music) act should come true. This is demonstrated on "The Way I Want To Touch You", the group's new single. Other highlights include two remakes of old Beach Boys material, "God Only Knows" and an excellent version of "Disney Girls".

Despite a mediocre appearance by the Captain at the ONE and worse appearances on US variety talk shows, the album is worth considering. It represents not only commercial success in the music industry, but also personal achievement for Toni Tenille and The Captain, who arranged and produced their first album.

Zappa's newest complex yet clear

The Mothers
One Size Fits All
WEA

One Size Fits All is probably the best album Zappa or the Mothers have put out in the last five efforts, and is certainly the best since Grand Wazoo. It shows Zappa to be in a league all his own, which should surprise no one.

Only Frank Zappa, who, of all rock musicians today, is without doubt the most capable in the studio, could produce an album that is so packed with strange new sounds without being at the same time cluttered. Zappa edits his musical material with the care of a film editor, so that each sound has its place. No second is wasted, and what results is complex yet crystal clear.

Most Mothers albums can be classified as to whether it is the music itself that dominates or whether the lyrics dominate. On albums such as We're Only In It For The Money, and Absolutely Free, even though the music on them is great, Zappa's incomparable lyrics are the focal point. Take, for example, these lyrics from the song "What's the Ugliest Part of Your Body", off the album We're Only In It For The Money:

"All your children are poor unfortunate victims of systems beyond their control

A plague upon the ignorance that keeps them from the truth they deserve.

Where did Annie go when she went to town
Who are all those creeps that she hangs around?

All your children are poor unfortunate victims of lies you believe . . ."

I forget the rest of the words, but the point is, no matter how great the accompanying music might be, lyrics like these are going to stand out. One Size Fits All, however, like Grand Wazoo and Hot Rats is an album on which the music dominates, even though all of the songs but one (Sofa in 13) have lyrics.

Some people might be disappointed that Zappa's lyrics are no longer as biting as they used to be, but I think such disappointment is unjustified. He is either simply tired of flogging a dead horse, or he's as incredulous as the rest of us that America has far surpassed the worst expectations of even the most cynical. At a point in history when football has given way to taking potshots at the president as the national past-time (watch me nick his ear) what place is there for lyrics like those on "I Can't Happen Here"? The prophet does his job when he warns us. Once disaster arrives it is up to reporters to record the boring details. Besides, when he's producing music as good as he is now what right have we to complain even if he does seem to be ignoring us with this apparent conspiracy of silence.

On the inside cover Zappa informs us that this album was recorded simultaneously with another one that will be released shortly. He also mentions that one song (Inca Roads) was recorded for a TV special that he has been working on, so keep your eyes open for further news. An event as earth-shattering as Frank Zappa on TV is reason enough to rush out and buy a colour TV set.

Ella provides new hope for bored rock fans

As the Ella Fitzgerald concert at Ontario Place last Sunday demonstrated, at least one stream of music is still flowing clean and pure. Over 12,000 fans (young and old) packed the Forum for a sunny, crisp day of pure entertainment excellence and proved that point. And you, the "youth market", growing restless listening to old Chuck Berry or Bill Haley hits, issuing a collective yawn at the newest groups being played on the radio, what do you do? Put on another old Beatles record and fondly remember those innovative, exciting 60's? NO!! Turn to jazz! The afternoon opened with a trio: Keter Betts, bass; Bobby Durham, drums; and Tommy Flanagan, piano. Relying on the simplicity of classical jazz pieces, these talented musicians, joined by renowned trumpeter Roy Eldridge, exhilarated the audience with sensitive interpretation and skilful musicianship. A hush, then a standing ovation greeted a legend. Ella Fitzgerald walked onstage to present some of the most durable and powerful music today. Proving her 55-year young voice is up to it, she deftly handled her old material as everyone expected. But she outdid herself with a startling piece from "the Wiz", a new Broadway musical, adding a very contemporary beat which caught most fans by surprise. This is what legends are made of. For those of you about to delve into jazz for the first time, allow me to make some suggestions.

1) Try the radio — a) CBC at 94.1, That Midnight Jazz; b) CFT at 91, Ted O'Reilly, c) CKFM at 99.9, Phil McKellar and All That Jazz.
2) Talk to knowledgeable people at record stores. Near campus you can't go wrong at the Jazz and Blues Record Centre at 893 Yonge or even A & A records on Bloor.

3) Try a few of my favorites: In a Mellow Mood, Oscar Peterson; The History of an Artist, Oscar Peterson; Cleo Laine at Carnegie Hall; Ella Fitzgerald at Carnegie Hall; Bitches Brew, Miles Davis; Ekseption, Weather Report, Buddy Rich, Glen Miller . . .

Fitzgerald showed the crowd at Ontario Place she's still as powerful as ever

Fiddling with Papa John

Members of all three sexes composed the rowdy crowd which assembled at the El Mocambo Tavern last week to watch Papa John Creach play his violin. Although the backup band Midnight Sun drowned out most of Papa John's violin with much louder electric guitar and drum work, nobody seemed to mind.

Papa John was very proficient on the violin; even the "down-to-earthers" at the "good old El Mocambo" were suitably impressed by his two fiddle solos. The only trace of the Jefferson Airplane seen or heard was the "J.A." logo on the band's trunks of equipment. The band's repertoire, predominantly Boogie and Jazz'nBlues, kept the dance floor filled all night.

Between sets Midnight Sun's guitarist and vocalist Kevin Moore was busy converting washroom-goers to his new religion. Prospective patrons of the pissoir were greeted by a sermon centered on "NAMBI O HO RONGGI KO", which when roughly translated (you asked for it) means "Devotion to the incomprehensible law of cause and effect through music". Those who were merely trying to obey the incomprehensible law of the beer by the quart were offered subscriptions to the newspaper "World Tribune", at the budget price of five dollars a month.

And as their bladders blossomed the patrons of the good old El Mocambo finally knew the ultimate truth — why the band's dressing room is next to the Men's Washroom.

FLASHMAN, Harry Paget, Brigadier-General, VC, KCB, KCIE, Chevalier, Legion d'Honneur; US Medal of Honour; San Serrano Order of Purity and Truth, 4th Class. b. 1822, S.H. Served US Army (major, Union forces 1862); colonel (staff) Army of the Confederacy, 1863. Travelled extensively in military and civilian capacities; A.D.C. Emperor Maximilian of Mexico; milit. advisor, HM Queen Ranavalona of Madagascar; chief of staff to Rajan of Sarawak; dep. marshal, US Chmn, Flashman and Bottomly Ltd.; dir. British Opium Trading Co., governor, Rugby School; hon. pres. Mission for Reclamation of Reduced Females. Publications: Dawns and Departures of a Soldier's Life; Twixt Cossack and Cannon; The Case Against Army Reform. Clubs: White's, United Service, Blackjacks (Batavia). Recreations: Oriental studies, angling. Address: Gandamak Lodge, Ashby, Leics.

Late in the 1960's, the papers of Harry Flashman surfaced in London. They were described as "robust, ribald, steamy confessions of a self-proclaimed Victorian rascal". One scholar acclaimed them as "the most important discovery since the Boswell papers."

Harry Flashman reminiscing: "I was in with the fast set, idling, gaming, drinking and raking about town. It was the end of the great days of the bucks and the blades. We were entering into what is now called the Victorian Age. Breeches were out and trousers came in; bosoms were being covered and eyes modestly lowered; trade and industry were becoming fashionable. The odour of sanctity was replacing the happy reek of brandy. The day of the Corinthian, the plunger and the dandy was about to give way to that of the prig, the preacher and the bore.

"At least I was in on the death of that wicked era, and did my bit to make it die hard."

However, it turned out that the Flashman papers were a fraud. They were the fabrication of a Scots newspaperman, George MacDonald Fraser.

Fraser found Harry Flashman in a Victorian novel by Thomas Hughes, Tom Brown's Schooldays. There Flashman is a bully who makes Tom Brown's life miserable. Fraser felt that the disappearance of Flashman in Hughes' novel was a waste of a good character, and thus emerged his Flashman books.

Harry Flashman has become a cult figure for many. To appreciate him fully, one must surrender to Fraser's imagination and admit that Flashman truly lived.

In Royal Flash, Richard Lester (The Three and Four Musketeers) brings Harry Flashman to the screen. Flashman (Malcolm McDowell) is kidnapped by Otto von Bismark (Oliver Reed) and Rudi von Starbberg (Alan Bates) and is forced to impersonate a king of one of the many duchies that existed prior to the confederation of Germany.

The film has a lot of sword fighting, escapes and rescues, assassination attempts, debauchery, dueling, yelling, jumping around, etc.

This film however, is different from all others of the type. In Royal Flash, the 'hero' is an awful shot, a hopeless swordsman and chronic coward. Flashman proclaims: "Never hit a man while he is down; he may get up again."

Flashman is a snivelling, treacherous "rotter". As a herogeist at Rugby School, he tells the boys to be "true, clean and pure" and then he skulks off to a gambling den and whorehouse.

Flashman is a hero only because he manages to stumble into that role accidentally usually while trying to run away! Despite this, Flashman has a charm that always wins our sympathy.

Richard Lester has made another 'slick' and 'classy' movie. He displays the same control over rhythm and pace in Royal Flash, that he has in his other films. New to Lester's style though, are touches of Mel Brooks humour, particularly in the character of Krafsstein (Lionel Jeffries), an iron-handed assassin. Royal Flash is scripted by Fraser himself (who also scripted the Musketeer films).

For the score, Lester reaches back to the music of Richard Wagner and Edward Elgar.

The camera work is by Geoffrey Unsworth (2001, Cabaret, Murder on the Orient Express) who is one of today's top cinematographers.

Royal Flash is dedicated to: "Ronald Coleman, Errol Flynn, Louis Hayward, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., Basil Rathbone, Tyrone Power, and all the others."

The film made its North American premiere at the 11th Stratford International Film Festival where it was well received. It opens in Toronto on October 10th.

Holy Schleswig-Holstein! Is that really Oliver Reed trying to pretend he's Bismark?

Charlotte is irresponsible and not even especially dirty

A few years back, Jean-Luc Godard made a film he wanted to call Love Story. It was about himself, a critic of his relation to the flames of the revolution and his production of Schick commercials. The film was released as Tout Va Bien.

Now Roger Vadim has made a film, Charlotte, about himself. He plays an author, a Norman Mailer of the decadent French bourgeoisie. While writing a book, Freud, Criminal of Peace, he becomes interested in solving the murder of Charlotte, a woman he had dupuced. Her boyfriend confesses to the crime while buying clothes for mother.

The author in search, in search of Charlotte's life as well as the life which made the original Citizen Kane so entertaining, (still so involved are we in a culture which can only copy, imitate, duplicate, with each repetition a process of devaluation), learns all the dirty things Charlotte thought up. Entirely separate from the process of production . . .

"I like subways and the smell of workers." C's gay husband.

The language of consumers becomes a schizophrenic web . . .

"I've written a book against all forms of government." C's boyfriend.

The movie is but a variation on the pattern of love in bourgeois films. Guy and gal (de)find their only reality in each other.

"She was trying to find in sex the goodness she couldn't find elsewhere." The mad . . .

. . . as the external world disintegrates . . .

"All this: I love you, you love me, works only in a vacuum." C's husband.

Love (and everything else) is perceived as a system of signs with no social reality. Decadent pleasure comes from re-arranging these signs in patterns that are defined as unconventional (unique). So for the first six hours of the film wheeee! have shots of Hugh Hefner's wildest four-page fantaspreads: brothers and sisters, shaving cream, masturbation, fathers, vomit, eye gouging.

What an awful film. What an irresponsible film.

The reviewer at the Globe wrote about the beginning and the end. We think he snuck out in the middle. "Usually death doesn't become people; Charlotte was an exception. Don't write the book. It would be like the story of a nymphomaniac and a madman," says C's boyfriend, and turns his attack on the novelist Vadim. "You can't escape the abject conformity of your private life." So much for self-criticism.

Charlotte's father, a civil servant, says to her before she leaves home for the riots of May '68, "We're the last bulwark between democracy and bolshevism."

Vadim has hedged his bets, especially since Godard Gorin used Jane Fonda in their film. Charlotte is a film no one would be arrested for making. Yet.

A fake.

Miura: "This is not a place where you can change danger into mere difficulty."

In the spring of 1970, a man set out "in search of peace of mind and a quiet heart". Many men seek these things, but few go as far, for this man's quest was to take him to the top of the world. Yuichiro Miura went to pay homage to Chomo Luma, mother-goddess of the world, Mount Everest. In a daring plan, Miura sought the ultimate test of endurance — to ski down Everest. Accompanied by an expedition of fellow Japanese, he travelled to Nepal to fulfill his dream, a fantasy judged by Sir Edmund Hillary, original conqueror of Everest, to be impossible.

With the support of 400 sponsors to cover the costs of half a million dollars, the JESE (Japanese Everest Skiing Expedition) left for Nepal. With them travelled scientists and doctors, and, in their midst, Miura himself, driven on his pilgrimage by his ever-present vision of Chomo Luma, the austere mother-goddess.

Born in 1932, Miura was an exceedingly weak child who changed schools 7 times before starting his secondary education; not an auspicious beginning for a man who was to ski the highest run in the world. Nurtured on a special seaweed food prepared by his father, Miura began young to enjoy the sports that were to lead him to Everest, mountain-climbing and skiing. He originally wanted to be a professional skier, and in 1950, set the world's speed record in Italy, travelling at 171 kilometres per hour. Acting as a ski school director in the winters, Miura always sought a greater challenge, and his next exploit was to ski the sacred mountain of Japan, Mt. Fujiyama. It was "not so daring after all."

"Skiing is my doorway to adventure." With the door now opened, Miura wanted to step through and explore the excitement and challenges behind it. The idea of skiing Everest came to him with the realization that he was getting too old to compete in the gruelling world of professional skiing. Instead, he began a rigorous training period that involved carrying 180 lb. weights while clambering among the peaks of the Japanese Alps. "The challenge of the peaks is the challenge of life itself, to struggle higher and higher."

As the idea of skiing Everest approached reality, Miura went to visit Sir Edmund Hillary who first scaled the mountain in 1953. At Hillary's home in New Zealand Miura proposed his idea. Hillary insisted that it could not be done. A computer's statistics supported Hillary's view.

Undaunted, Miura continued his training, and in March of 1970, the JESE left for Katmandu, in the foothills of the Himalayas. From Katmandu, the expedition travelled 185 miles to the foot of Everest. It was to take 42 days, as the procession of 800 laboured up the mountain, laden with scientific equipment, provisions and cameras, for the story of the expedition was later made into a film. (See last week's Review.)

When the group stopped at the 1,600-foot icefall at the foot of Everest, tragedy struck. A party of six Sherpas, on a reconnaissance trip searching for a safe route upwards, were killed as the ice suddenly gave way. This disaster was to seriously endanger Miura's confidence in his venture. He wrote in his diary, "Death should not come suddenly to men who are in the midst of living, it should come silently like a prayer. I feel a hopeless anger. Sorrow comes like the waves of the ocean into which you sink."

A terrible guilt and grief overcame Miura, as he wrote, "There can be no happy ending anymore, no matter what I do"; but this was to be replaced by an acceptance of death. "We must use the energy of those six souls to fight on so that they may rest in peace; those who died will now be watching over us so that we will succeed."

On April 1, the actual ascent of Everest began, and by April 16, Miura and seven comrades had reached the Western Cwm. After a practice run complete with parachute on the Shangri-la glacier, Miura had a basic idea of what to expect and of the braking power of the thin silk that billowed at his back

"like an airy lotus blossom on the sacred mountain."

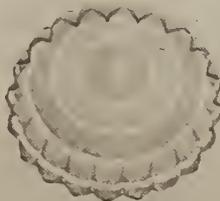

The expedition had stopped at various levels of the ascent for a 5 day rest and acclimatization period. It was to become increasingly difficult for Miura, in spite of his prime physical condition, to function at peak capacity. "Survival is a matter of sheer endurance; my job is to be in perfect physical condition. This is not a place where you can change danger into mere difficulty." The thin air bothered him, too, and he found his intellect and senses becoming dulled in the rarefied atmosphere. "The mountains are beginning to steal my identity; I can't tell where the mountains end and I begin."

While adjusting his body to the increasing demands of extreme altitude, Miura reflected more and more on his purpose, on this pilgrimage to the sacred mountain. His mood changed from delighted anticipation to terror as the day of his descent approached. He wrote, "I have a strange feeling I have been here before" and wondered if perhaps it had been in a previous incarnation. "At night the mountains became a world of silence beyond imagination." Conceding that "there can be no challenge without the risk of failure," nonetheless Miura found himself plagued with doubts as he lay in his tent the night before his run. "Death would be an easy way out."

The day of his run dawned windy with poor visibility. But the sky cleared, and there was no turning back: to have postponed the run would have meant a lengthy return to lower levels for re-acclimatization. His skis were ready after weeks of honing and adjustments. Made in Japan of a special fibre glass, their Swiss steel edges had been polished and sharpened for this one-time test. Donning his helmet and oxygen mask, Miura stood at the top of the world, ready. With a gentle push, he was off, descending the 45 degree slope at 100 miles per hour. Almost immediately his parachute snapped out behind him, bellying quickly and slowing his speed by almost half. Miura travelled 6,600 feet in 2 minutes and 20 seconds, and then it happened.

Out of control, he fell and skidded helplessly for 1,320 feet. "I felt a kind of nothingness, but fear also. There was a 50/50 chance of death, but it was a peaceful feeling. Oriental people believe in reincarnation: at that moment I felt what my next stage would be."

Miura's next stage was to remain a mystery, for 250 feet from the yawning crevasse that would have ended his run and his life, he stopped. Chomo Luma had given her blessing.

The parachute used to keep the speed of Miura's descent within manageable limits.

Newest media cliché, Jaws not pause that refreshes

The strangest things have been happening since the movie Jaws has come upon us. Throughout the past summer, newspapers regularly reported that people vacationing on the Atlantic in the U.S. have been afraid of swimming for fear of being eaten by sharks. Photographs of smiling fishermen standing next to sharks they have captured and killed have appeared a few times. Editorial cartoons have picked up the Jaws metaphor and turned it into a new cliché. Young people have adopted the Jaws symbol on their T-shirts. Jaws — the movie — has made more money than any other film ever produced, except for Gone with the Wind and The Sound of Music. Jaws — the book — has been on the best-seller list for months. So that when we talk about Jaws these days, we're not talking about a movie or a book, but a phenomenon. We are talking about a phenomenon that has entered the collective consciousness (and perhaps, subconsciousness) of a culture. Jaws has touched a raw nerve among the people of North America. It is a well-crafted film which tells the story of a summer resort town for people and for a lone shark who decides to dine on its innocent inhabitants. After a woman is eaten by this fish, the town's ruling class stops efforts by the honest sheriff to close the beaches (as this would ruin the economy of the place). Then, a child is eaten by the killer, the beaches are closed, a shark specialist is called in, the shark is hunted, the hunters become the whole and finally the shark is destroyed by the ingenious actions of the sheriff. But the plot of the film is really only of secondary interest to the psychological effect it has had on its audiences. Why has Jaws been so widely loved and feared? Why has it proved to be so frightening to so many people? In answer to the first question, some might say that people simply enjoy being frightened for an hour or two and like having their nerves frazzled, without actually being threatened. Superficially, this is true: but what are they frightened of? The pain and destruction caused by the shark is the answer. To push the point further, one must ask, why are audiences afraid of this artificially enacted pain and destruction? For myself, there can be only one explanation: this film confirms people's basic fear about the hostility and irrationality of the world they live in. It is a movie that plays on (and profits from) people's primitive ignorance of nature. In fact, Jaws goes one step further than mere exploitation — it tells people that they are correct in fearing nature and its processes and it shows them how this fear is cured. Basically, the movie rests on the precept that human beings are at odds with nature. Since the beginning of human history, nature has been the primary source of fear. "Fear is the basis of religious dogma..." wrote Bertrand Russell "it is fear of nature that gives rise to religion." To be sure, fear is an expression of ignorance. Furthermore, to think of something as being innately irrational is to be ignorant of its nature. And this is where the movie Jaws comes in. People are, despite great advances of knowledge, still ignorant of nature's workings and therefore, afraid of it. Neither science nor art have bothered themselves to explain knowledge simply and with clarity. Jaws, therefore has a great appeal to the irrationally remaining in people's consciousness. The film says to them "Look, here is nature at work. Nothing stands in its way. Nothing can stop its drive to perpetuate itself. It has an intelligence that moves it forward — an intelligence that doesn't care about paltry humans."

The director, Steven Spielberg, conveyed this falsehood by creating a shark unlike any other shark. It is a Great White which the shark specialist and the experienced shark hunter could never have imagined existed. They say this when asked. This shark proves itself impossible to kill by normal means: it is huge, tremendously violent, powerful and immoral. Soon, it begins to hunt the hunters. It destroys their trawler by smashing itself against the boat and pursues their crippled ship with the intent of eliminating the hunters as well. Your average shark, it is explained earlier in the film, is attracted to specific movements in water, but this one sees more. It is driven by an irrational force that isn't particularly fond of people; that is, the force of nature. Thus, with the sides drawn, the war is on. Ideologically speaking, the question is posed, "Who is fit to rule?" Are we humans truly the master race of this planet? The proof is in the killing: the shark is slaughtered and human superiority reigns over nature once again. The solution to nature's dominance is simple — conquer it and destroy it. So, in the final minutes of Jaws the incredible tension — both physical and psychological — is released with relief and we are sent home masters of Earth.

Jaws is a movie about nature in a godless world. In one sense it is an antithesis of the movie The Exorcist, which was about people in a God-ridden universe. Yet both share the feature of irrationality cured by exorcism which has proven itself a psychologically powerful metaphor for today's culture. Both films close people's eyes to the world rather than opening them: there is no attempt to exorcise people's fears, but only the desire to tell people that their incorrect and fearful perception of the world is reality, and make a few dollars out of it. Is there room today for Factory's experimental courage?

Since the underground theatre movement got rolling in Toronto in 1968, it has spawned several small theatres. All of these theatres set their stages in cramped warehouse space or converted churches, and all operated on shoe-string budgets. All of them have committed themselves to a philosophy which, in one way or another, is aimed at rendering theatre more accessible to the majority of Canadians; more involved in the intellectual and emotional development of the country. Factory Theatre Lab is one such theatre.

The theatre was founded in May, 1970 when Ken Gass began a series of workshops in the loft above his garage. After earning his B.A. in British Columbia Gass came to the University of Toronto to continue his study of drama, and in very short order became convinced that the country's universities were completely incapable of teaching anyone anything constructive about the theatre. If theatre in Canada was to have any kind of healthy development, it would have to look elsewhere. Hoping to provide a place where this kind of development could happen, Gass paid for the conversion of the second floor above the Lansdale Garage on Dupont Street largely out of his own pocket. After gathering several new directors around him, he began to hold workshops; one for teachers interested in teaching drama, another a voice class, and two others for acting.

Gass had come to the conclusion that too much of Canadian theatre was imitative of theatre in Britain and the United States. If theatre was to develop in Canada in such a way that had meaning and relevance to Canadians, then Canadians would have to begin writing their own plays, and Canadian theatres would have to begin to stage them. If these new plays were to be more than imitations of plays that had already been written elsewhere, they would have to be supported by the discovery of new techniques of acting, of directing, and of production; techniques which would be developed here in response to our own needs. Gass felt that his workshops, besides providing the needed income for the theatre, could serve as a vehicle for experimentation where new forms and techniques could be developed.

Then came the big gamble. Factory began mounting productions of Canadian plays for the public. The intention, although it has not always been the fact, was to work with playwrights on their scripts in the workshops, and once a play was ready, give it a show-case production. These show-case productions involved a variety of new directors and actors, and there certainly was a great variety of experimentation.

The first shows included A Bedtime Story by Frank McEaney, Creeps by David Freeman, Branch Plant by Harvey Markowitz, and Esker Mike and his wife, Agluk, by Herschel Hardin. Factory was not the first underground theatre in Toronto, but Gass' audacious Canadian-scripts-only policy was sensational, and of great embarrassment to the St. Lawrence Centre when Factory and not the St. Lawrence, supposedly Toronto's municipal theatre, was the first to draw critical acclaim and large crowds to a production of a Canadian-written play. In general, the public's reaction to each play was as varied as the techniques used, but unquestionably, the exposure of Canadian plays had an explosive effect on the Canadian theatre scene. People and ideas came flooding in and theatre became one of the means by which Canadians expressed their new mood of self-awareness which had begun to appear after Expo.

Factory continued into its second year, introducing playwrights like George F Walker (Prince of Naples and Ambush at Tether's End), Larry Kardish (Brussels Sprouts), Larry Pineberg (Stonehenge Trilogy), and John Palmer (A Touch of God in the Golden Age). Unfortunately, the wide experimentation used in Factory's productions met with limited approval, and although there were several shows which drew large crowds, in general audiences were sparse.

Nonetheless, small audiences meant severe financial difficulties. Severe financial difficulties meant that none of the shows received the kind of expertise in production they deserved or needed. This lack of expertise, to complete the vicious circle, continued to discourage audiences, especially when other small theatres were beginning to do these few productions in the interest of doing a more careful job of what theatre the size of Factory. Without these standards, professionalism in acting would go down the drain, which in the long run would hurt not only actors but the whole theatre.

Works brought about the collision of these two institutions, each equally devoted to the development of Canadian theatre, each equally shows they did do.

This is the state of affairs Factory found itself confronted with in December 1972 when they attempted to produce two alternating evenings of fourteen one-act plays under the general heading Works. Up until this point, it was a well known but little-admitted fact that, because of the difficulty of funding an underground theatre in the days before the Canada Council or the Ontario Arts Council fully responded to the needs of such theatres, almost all small theatres survived by occasionally paying actors less than the legal minimum wage established by Actors' Equity. According to Factory's thinking, the most important thing was to provide productions for Canadian plays. And if that meant offering actors $50 for four weeks work, that was unpleasant, but necessary. According to Equity's thinking, it is necessary to maintain certain professional standards, one of them being the minimum pay rate, which at the time was $65 a week for a Adelaide, just east of Jarvis Street. Added to these difficulties, Factory began to find that changes in the Toronto theatre scene, and that they themselves had done so much to initiate, began to work in Factory's disfavour. In the first place, when Factory was first formed, the idea of doing Canadian plays was revolutionary. In the second place, there was not very much of a theatre audience.

Largely as a result of Factory's initiative, Canadian plays are now being done by virtually every theatre in the country. You can't get a Canada Council grant for a theatre season unless you do at least one Canadian play. Because of this, there is now an audience for Canadian plays. And since there are a number of theatres which are able to take time and expend the energy to mount more careful, commercially appealing productions of Canadian plays, the audience that has developed since the late sixties and early seventies has come to expect meticulous production standards and professional polish. The spirit of experimentation, so central to Factory's original purpose, has lost a great deal of its commercial appeal. No longer is it sufficient for a play just to be Canadian. It must also be well-produced.

Factory is now faced with the problem of still wanting to give exposure to Canadian plays but not having a large enough audience for the exposure of these plays to have the former sensational effect. So the question arises: Is Factory obsolete?

Even given that Factory cannot or will not draw large crowds, the theatre, because of its particular history and special facilities, has an opportunity to regain its place in the forefront of Canadian theatre. It may take a little adjustment on Factory's part.

Factory didn't have the Rockettes, but it did have new Canadian playwrights convinced of the correctness of its point of view.

Equity pulled their actors out of Works. Naturally, Factory had to cancel the show. As a result of the ensuing controversy, the Local Initiatives Program, upon which Factory partially relied for funds, refused to renew their grant. Credit dried up, and Factory, already perilously close to extinction, lost their space on Dupont, and began their nomadic wanderings which only recently have brought them to rest in a converted warehouse at 207

There now exists a theatre-going audience, and even if the people at Factory don't choose to attract it to their own theatre, they must admit that these are the people for whom our plays are being written. In order to reach these people, certain standards of playwrighting have to be achieved. This is the greatest single challenge facing Canadian playwrights today. Since Factory exists to be, as the theatre refers to itself, "the home of the Canadian playwright", this must automatically become one of the main problems facing Factory as well.

Fortunately, Factory is ideally suited to tackling this problem. It has facilities for dramaturgy, a workshop program, and an extensive history of working with playwrights. These facilities, formerly used primarily for experimentation, can now be devoted to the development and achievement of improved writing standards. By so doing, Factory will once again render an invaluable service to other theatres, particularly the kind that rely on large general audiences and have neither the time nor facilities to devote to the development of scripts.

movies

This week we have something for everyone.

FRIDAY—If your interests lie in checking out work by young American directors tonight's the night at the Roxy with Vanishing Point at 7 and 10:15 (7 and 10:30 on Saturday) and Brian DePalma's Phantom of the Paradise, with music by Paul Williams, at 8:45. If however you prefer something by the old New American Cinema go down to U.C. for the classic Boaters short Pull My Daisy with Allen Ginsberg and Jack Kerouac then stick around for Max Ophüls' Lola Montes (two complete shows at 7:30 and 9:30). Next door at St. Michael's Agatha Christie's Murder on the Orient Express is showing at 7:30 and 10 tonight. Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange can be viewed at 7 and 9:30 and all day Saturday and Sunday at the New Yorker. The Revue is showing two Hungarian films, Szindbad and Szerlem-Love at 7:30 and 9:30 respectively. If you happen to be a Hungarian film-maker with a taste for the unusual try out Fellini's Satyricon (7 and 9:15) and Robert Altman's The Long Goodbye (11:30) both of which are showing at Cinema Lumiere. What! Not satisfied? Then go join the line-up outside the New Yorker for the midnight screening of Texas Chainsaw Massacre.

SATURDAY—As part of its weekend series of films dealing with the theatre the Art Gallery of Ontario is showing All About Eve by Joseph L. Mankiewicz with Bette Davis at 3:00 pm. With all of the AGO events listed in this week's column tickets go on sale at noon and as the AGO screening room only holds 150 people it may be advisable to take advantage of the advanced sales. The Revue will benefit five night run of Antonioni's The Passenger with Jack Nicholson and Maria Schneider at 7 and 9:30. The Roxy will present the Concert for Bangladesh film with George Harrison, Bob Dylan and Leon Russell at 8:45 while at 12 there is Part II of last Saturday's The Best of the Recently Discovered Old-Time Comedies and Cartoons. Another midnight special is El Topo at the New Yorker.

SUNDAY—The AGO theatrical films series continues with a showing of Jean Renoir's The Rules of the Game at 3. If what you saw there sparked your interest in Renoir then buy a St. Michael's film series ticket and see La Grande Illusion at 7:15 and 9:30. With showings at 3:00, 5:30 and 8:00, Cinema Lumiere has John Schlesinger's Sunday, Bloody Sunday, starring Glenda Jackson and Michael Redgrave with a script by New Yorker film critic Penelope Gilliat.

MONDAY—Would you like to give your ears and wallet a rest? Then head over to the Ontario College of Art, where, as part of their American film series they're showing Chaplin's The Gold Rush and Keaton's The General—admission is free. If it's a raising of your political consciousness that you're seeking then commit yourself to the Roxy for DeSica's A Brief Vacation at 7 and 10:40 or the New Yorker for Les Ordres (a Quebecois look at the War Measures Act) at 7 and 10 with L. F. Stone's Weekly at 8:50; or Cinema Lumiere for two by Jean Luc Godard, Made In U.S.A. and Weekend (Mon. and Tues. at 7:30 and 9:15).

TUESDAY—Reggae and rigor mortis sets in at the Roxy with the Harder They Come, (8:35 and on Wed. 7 and 10:20) the first feature film made in Jamaica, and Andy Warhol's Frankenstein (7 and 10:15 and Wed. at 8:35). The New Yorker is showing for three nights Shampoo (7 and 11 on Tues. 8:45 on Wed., and 7 on Thurs.) with Boys in the Band (Tues. only at 8:55). With its weekly series of new Czech films the Ontario Science Centre is showing People from the Underground (it's about subways not the Resistance) at 7:30. AGO is running an extensive programme of films by and about women with screenings and discussions. At 5:30 there two shorts dealing with the subject of rape, No Lies and No Tears for Racheal, with a representative from the Toronto Rape Crisis Centre present to answer questions and encourage discussions. The 7:00 programme consists of two more shorts, Joan Weston Roderberdy and Men's Lives by Will Roberts and Josh Hanig, with Will Roberts present after the screening. At 9:30 there is a showing of Antonia; A Portrait of a Woman (which will be showing all next week at the New Yorker) by Judy Collins and Jill Godmillow.

WEDNESDAY—Jack Nicholson fans on a bender can get refills of The Last Detail at the New Yorker (7 and 10:40) while Jan Kadar admirers can see Adrift (7:30) and Closely Watched Trains (9:15) at Cinema Lumiere. However if this mild street action is too soft core for you then go to the Ontario Science Centre and sit in on their very lengthy Robert Wise retrospective which begins tonight at 7:30 with The Body Snatchers starring Karloff and Lugosi and Mademoiselle Fifi.

This week Martin Onrot announced that on Oct. 18 The Tubes will be performing at Massey Hall. The concert will start at 11:30 pm. Tickets will be on sale in about a week and a half. Apparently there will be 17 people on stage plus an elaborate video show and god knows what else, so it will probably be worth seeing.

CPJ announced that the date of the RPI Stewart concert has been switched from Oct. 23 to the 27 at the Gardens.

Tonight Steve Goodman is at Convocation Hall, and on Oct. 7 there are two good concerts — Jethro Tull at the Gardens and Harry Chapin at Massey Hall.

Strawbs is at Massey Hall on Oct. 12, and Reggae star Jimmy Cliff is there Oct. 14.

On the 16th Rick Wakeman moves into the Gardens. On the 27th, while Red Stewart is at the Gardens, Murray McLaughlin and Dan Hill will be at Massey Hall.

At the El Mocambo Tom Rush is appearing until Oct. 4 with Black Creek downstairs. Lou Rawls is at the Hook and Ladder Club in the Beverly Hills Hotel, and Mainline is at Larry's Hideaway. At the Zodiac 1 you can see The Angels, and at the Colonial Janie and I are appearing. Dan Hill is at the Riverboat and Christopher Kearney is at the Sandpiper.

Goddo is at the Gasworks. Funktion is at the Generator, Rough Trade is at the Chimney, Father is at the Forge, and Southcoast is at the Nickelodeon. LB

Lots of shows on campus this week. Huibert Sabelis's continues at the Victoria College New Academic Building (review next week). Cathy Pentland and Rebecca Burke's two woman show opened last Tuesday at the Hart House Art Gallery and continues until Oct. 17. See review in this issue. Lorna Livey has an exhibition of prints in the foyer of the Edward Johnson Building. Kady Denton presents her collages at Trinity College's Buttery, beginning Monday. There is a show of sketches and building models by architect Blake Millar at the Architecture Building, 230 College St.

Elsewhere and of particular note are the Millar Brittain retrospective at Galerie Dresdner (130 Bloor St. W.) — opens tomorrow — and the Animals in Art show at the Royal Ontario Museum (which opens Oct. 7). Your ATL card will get you into the museum free as usual but you will have to show your card again and pay 50 cents to see the show itself.

I will not whine, I will not berate, I will not impertune — but the Art department could use some reviewers. Art editors get colds, get restless, sometimes we even get lazy: save us (and not least the public) from ourselves. Leave your name and number at the Review Office.

theatre

As the gigantic theatre operations in the province, Stratford and Shaw, gear down, the Toronto playhouses emerge into the chilling blasts of critical scrutiny. This week your choice of plays ranges from the very amateur through to the theoretical school performance.

Let me, gentle reader, once again retrace your memory about the usefulness, nay more, the aesthetic pleasure of money well spent, when you at long last purchase your subscription to the Hart House season. Of course, we admit frankly that this is the grossest form of editorial puffery, but as their season begins with a play from the Scriberus circle, we consider ourselves topical and typical of the creative atmosphere of 18th century London.

Other local interest theatre is now underway. I am advised that there will be a production opening at the U.C. Playhouse, Pairings, in the near future. This collage will be available on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday nonhours. Also, a reading of Barry Collin's Judgement by Varsity's own critic Bruce Wall, Oct. 7 at 8:00 p.m. in Seeley Hall, Trinity College.

And finally a note has crossed my desk that at George Brown College (Kensington Campus) Ken Gass of Factory Theatre Lab will be offering, for a fee, evening courses in acting.

CURRENT:

Academy of Theatre Arts, 23 Grenville Street: Village Wooing, a revival of a late Shaw play Thursday to Saturday, this week and next, at 8:30. Students $2.00. See Review.

University Alumnae Dramatic Club, at the Firehall Theatre, 70 Berkeley St.: Hippolytus beginning Oct. 9.

And as a final note, there will be a performance by the Burmese National Theatre on October 9 in the Edward Johnson Building. Please reserve; call 928-3744 and be prepared to pay $5.00 or $2.50. This promises to be an exciting event, reproducing the authentic flavour of a thousand-year tradition. JW

poetry

He grew up in Nelson, B.C. Had a brief career as a hockey player in Mexico City. Studied poetry with Earle Birney in Vancouver. Made several short films. Continued the Cook's Tale where Chaucer left off. Worked with writers such as George Bowring and Bill Bissett. And, according to Jack Kerouac, "he is brilliant, that's mah opinion."

His name is Lionel Kearns, author of a number of books of verse including Song of Circumstance, Stacked Verse, Pointing, and Listen, George. His most recent book is By the Light of the Silvery McLune. George Bowring has said that Kearns is "the only poet I know who can bring together good humour (meant both ways), tough revolutionary sentiment, great insight into language, and the fresh image that only the best writer can hurl forth."

Lionel Kearns reads his poems Tuesday afternoon in the St. Michael's Poetry Series, 4:00 p.m., Upper Brennan Hall. Admission is free.

classical

The Review unhappily announces the demise of longtime Classical Music editor Dave Basskin. Basskin, thought by some Varsityites to be roughly contemporaneous with the Mosaic Code, found the pressures of school and his current journalistic endeavours in the wilds of Downsview too great, and reluctantly resigned from his position at the Varsity. But never fear, fans of all-time great tunesmiths as well as limpid prose! The Classical Music section is determined to keep going, which is exactly what it will do with your help.

Even if you don't know Verdi from Vladivostok, you can pitch in. All that's required is an ability to appreciate music combined with the ability to write something resembling an English sentence. People with more specialized knowledge are of course welcome to write too. If interested, call Jane McKinney at 922-0304.

FOOTBALL

The Blues travel to Kingston this weekend for a return engagement with Queen's. Last Saturday, Varsity had it all its own way beating the Gaels 26-0. From past experience Ron Murphy is not taking this game lightly. 'We've gone to Kingston too many times and had too many dogfights to ever expect an easy game,' Murph is also pleased with the injury situation after Toronto's third straight win. Ken Hussey, Rick Jeyzman and Julio Giordani will all be back on defence this week.

A win for the Blues will assume them a playoff berth and will put Queens in a do-or-die situation the following week against Ottawa.

TENNIS

Queens is hosting the OUAA Eastern Sectionals this Friday and Saturday. U of T will be represented by Dave Dimmer, Graham Hibberd, Steve Shamie, Ed Andrutus and Jim Eayers.

GOLF

On this Thursday and Friday, Queens will be hosting the East Section Golf Elimination. The U of T team, having won back to back matches at Windsor and St. Claire last week, will be shooting for a spot in the OUAA finals. The championship will be held at the new National Club in Toronto and the Blues led by John Bays, Neal Mednick, Mike McBride, Rollie Hamar, and Mark McCullough should be top contenders.

The band does their thing at last weekend's game. Off to Kingston for the weekend.

Rowers Prepare For Oct. 11th

By LARRY MARSHALL

The night is cool and clear, only just being broken by faint red scars that hint at sunrise. The lakefront near Ontario Place is likely as quiet as it ever is; the gulls for the most part, are still.

There is sound, though. A rhythmic splash followed by the squeak of hardwood, sounds by now familiar to oarsmen of the University of Toronto rowing team. The men's team has been practising for three weeks, and consists now of three crews: Novice — those who have had no previous rowing experience; Lightweights — an experienced crew with average maximum weight of 155 lb.; and Jr. Varsity — experienced oarsmen over whom there is no weight restriction. As of writing there is no women's team, though it is not because of a lack of oarswomen. Between the Argo Rowing Club and Women's Athletics at the U of T, the obstacles created have proved formidable. As the Red Tape thickens, valuable training time is slipping away. In the meantime, men's crew captain Bobby Boraks and women's crew captain Deb Cumming are working hard to put a 1975 women's crew officially on the water.

The men's team is not without its troubles. Head coach Gord Leighton and assistant coach Chris French must continuously battle faulty outboard motors. Although there are two coaches, there are three crews, and accordingly coaches are spread more thinly than anyone would like. However, after less than two weeks of practise, U of T's lightweight crew was only three lengths behind a winning Western crew at the Hamilton regatta last Saturday. Western has been training all summer, and they'll have to keep it up to stay ahead of us for long. Novice men also showed promise and are training harder than ever.

On Oct. 11, U of T is hosting a regatta for the first time in several years. It promises to be a lot of fun, and U of T crews are working for a good showing. Although plans aren't finalized, the races could contain an unprecedented 180 degree turn, to be carried out inside the breakwater. If so, there'll be lots of action, some unexpected, since a winning team will have to be fast in the turn.

A large home crowd with loud voices would be great to see, and could be enough to bring us in in record time. Races will be held between the Argo Rowing Club and Ontario Place, with lots of viewing room. Make plans to be there, it'll be a good day.

The next action is the 'Head of the Trent' Regatta, Sat. Oct. 4, which very reliable sources rumour to be a gruelling 2.8 mile (or approximately 4500 m.) test of technique and endurance. The University of Toronto Men's Varsity Rowing Team will be there.

The Varsity Rowing Team

Varsity Men's Rowing Team prepares for the U of T Regatta, while the women's team hasn't been able to begin their season due to red tape.

The Varsity: Bob White

Varsity Rugby player carries ball into a pile of trouble. Blues 9-3 over Warriors.

The Varsity: C. Butchers

Women's field hockey breeds a new level of toughness in fairer sex.

Algie Leads Blues to Success: Watch Out RMC

Bob Algie scored three penalty goals for a total of nine points to give, the Rugby Blues a 9-3 victory over the Waterloo Warriors Rugby team on Wednesday.

Ball control was at a minimum due to the wet conditions, as it rained during the game. The Toronto team lost most of the scrums to Waterloo, but the Warriors weren't able to control the ball for very long and the Blues consequently kicked it up field for substantial ground gains.

The victory was the team's second in as many weeks and it shows the team's improvement over the season.

There is a game on Saturday against The Royal Military College from Kingston at 2 p.m. on the back Campus field.

As both Blues teams are showing tremendous improvement in all aspects of the game, they can look forward to a very successful season if they can carry on in this manner.

Grads limit class size

"We were really pleased to see that a lot of thought had gone on in some departments."

Remarkable on the completion of 28 departmental meetings conducted by the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA), organizer Jay Drydyk said the GAA had learned a lot and elicited a good response from over 30 departments surveyed.

One of the main purposes of the meetings was to obtain guidance and direction from the membership in regards to the associations upcoming first contract.

Drydyk said several helpful suggestions were made in regards to negotiating efforts, with a variety of conditions being pointed up in different departments.

This was illustrated in the GAA's intention to limit the maximum class size, said Drydyk. Original contract proposals called for a maximum of 12 students for tutorial leaders and 30 for part-time instructors.

As a result of the departmental meetings, it became apparent instructors in languages would be unable to effectively give essential individual attention to 30 students. As a result the GAA now intends to ask that the tutorial size limit be applied to language classes.

Besides recruiting members and presenting contract demands, the association also succeeded in electing stewards in most departments.

"The bargaining process doesn't consist of just giving proposals and getting answers back," said Drydyk in stressing the importance of their Oct. 8 meeting. "It's a long process and people can aid and directly influence it by coming out."

Support for the library workers will be discussed and debated at the meeting and there will be elections for positions on the executive and the bargaining committee.

The bargaining committee will report and hopes to establish bargaining priorities at the meeting.

"We want to end up with a set of issues, a package," said Drydyk, "which will give a strong mandate to the bargaining committee."

Drydyk said work on the contract has been going on for about a year, adding "I think the university was quite impressed with the scope and detail of contract proposals."

Jay Drydyk is pleased with results of GAA departmental meetings.

NDP Line on Financing

EDMONTON (CUP) The whole educational system in Canada should be much more closely tied to the needs of the communities it serves, said Ed Broadbent, Federal leader of the New Democratic Party.

In an exclusive interview with Canadian University Press yesterday, Broadbent said, "What is needed is a reciprocal system of responsibility."

Arguing that "the public already pays 80 per cent of the costs per student" of Canadian post-secondary education, Broadbent said that "the student has an obligation to work for his or her community."

Although referring specifically to post-secondary education, Broadbent said, "This should hold right through the educational system."

He said that the community should assume complete responsibility for educating Canadians.

What is needed, said Broadbent, are provincial and federal government programs to "guarantee tuition, a living allowance, and jobs that would provide productive labour for the community" during a student's education.

Referring to the ROTP program, he said, "We have already done it for students being specifically trained for military purposes."

"The justification holds in even greater force for people who would be doing future non-military work."

This is consistent, Broadbent said, with viewing education as a social investment.

As for financing a program including free tuition, a living allowance and guaranteed employment, Broadbent pointed out "once a university student graduates, they almost automatically become members of society paying higher than the average income tax. It is at this point that the student pays for the cost of his or her own university education."

Fights wins lower prices

VANCOUVER (CUP) The British Columbia Institute of Technology administration has lowered food prices after students and staff boycotted food services September 18.

By JUSTIN CASS
The Ontario government has entered the negotiation arena in the current library dispute taking over from university negotiator John Parker.

Meanwhile library workers are urging all individual supporters to attend their solidarity rally tomorrow at 12:30 p.m. outside the Roberts. Rally plans include speakers from a broad spectrum of support.

According to Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) representative Grenville Jones, currently working with the library local 1230, a letter requesting the appointment of conciliation officers was filed on September 22.

Confirmation was received by the union from the Ontario Ministry of Labour on October 1.

Such requests are filed when contract talks between union and management break down. The usual practice is for the government to begin meetings and appoint negotiators within five days of a request.

Parker has denied receiving anything from the Ontario government and has requested an additional five days to do anything after such receipt.

Union demands include an across-the-board $60 a week increase, a lump-sum cost of living bonus and better working conditions. Parker has not produced any formal counter-offer.

The workers will be in a legal strike position by late October but they do not want things to go that far. Tomorrow's rally is seen as a way to show strength.

Thirteen U of T faculty members have endorsed the rally, as have GSU, GAA, SAC and other campus groups. CUPE locals 1222 (SAC workers), 1281 (OFS workers) and the Better-Read Workers Union (CNTU) have all supported the library workers from the start.

Speakers at the rally include Judy Darcy union local president, Jay Drydyk GAA executive member, Barbara Beardsley local NDP candidate in the last election, and Frank Cunningham also a candidate.

other means of pressure.

"We decided it was time the bullsh*t stops and we nail these guys with a boycott," he said.

Brown said staff and student support for the boycott was almost universal after student council members circulated through classrooms the day before.

The council brought outside caterers to the campus to feed boycotters who would usually eat the student-prepared food at the food training centre cafeteria.

Boycotters surrounded the cafeteria with picket signs and banners for most of the afternoon.

Brown submitted a brief to the Board of Governors two weeks prior to the boycott asking the price hikes be rolled back, but when no action was taken the boycott action followed.

Bookhandling soon to join computer era

By ERIC McMILLAN
Book borrowing at U of T libraries is to become a computerized experience.

Plans to automate library services starting next spring, "if not sooner", were revealed this weekend in an interview with Systems Librarian Valentina De Bruin.

The projects affecting students most directly are automated circulation and a bibliographic display system which could eventually displace the present card catalogues.

The mini-computer system, Automated Circulation Control, could handle the charging in and out of books, book reserves, and fines among other uses, said De Bruin.

Library books would have bar-coded labels — similar to those on grocery items today — which could be read by the charge-out machines. Library users would insert their own bar-coded cards and the computer would record the transaction.

With this system, a library user could type in the author, title, or call number of a book and have the bibliographic information appear on a television-like screen.

If the query system is tied into the circulation control system — as it might be eventually — the user could also find out whether the book microform, or even a computer-printed book-form catalogue, she said.

De Bruin emphasized the card catalogues will not be dispensed with for quite long time and will be kept up to date. Instruction in the use of the catalogues will continue, she said.

Debruin did not foresee the day when the library would be run entirely without staff. In fact, she said, she could not foresee any layoffs due to automation since the library would be performing more services than ever.

Possible job-redundancy due to computerization was one of the issues in the recent library negotiations. De Bruin claimed the project's advisory group has received input from all areas and levels of library staff.

The present staff is being trained to work with the machines and in many cases will end up doing similar work, she said.

Instruction manuals will be available for the use of the system, she said, and a publicity and training team has been put together. "There's been no publicity yet because it would have been premature up to now," she said, pointing out although definite objectives have been decided upon, the project is still in its planning stage.

De Bruin said she did not initially expect the new system to produce any savings in its initial stages, but in the long run it would be "cost-effective."

"We'll be providing more services. How can you put a value on that?" she asked.

is taken out, when it is due back, and whether an order has been placed for it.

The potential application of the system is even wider, De Bruin pointed out. Eventually it may allow for "browsing" in geographic areas and time periods. For instance, she said, one could punch in a request for a list of books on 18th century France and receive a printout the next day.

The first implementation of the system will take place at the Sigmund Samuel Library, according to Debruin, because it has the greatest circulation load. "The staff can't cope with it," she said.

The anticipated deadline of summer 1976 for automated circulation must be met "if we are to have any hope of maintaining even the present levels of service," stated a progress report on the Sigmund Samuel Library last May. "This is a must," said De Bruin. "If we can't implement the full system by September '76, we'll have to make a decision what to postpone."

After initiation at Sigmund Samuel, the system will spread to other libraries on campus, said De Bruin. Each floor on the Roberts Library may be equipped with automated access to bibliographic information, although it is undecided as yet whether it will be the same on-line access, or Four opinions on the Dayan visit

Dayan's notoriety is justification for talk: Saidullah

For several years the Students' Administrative Council has brought well-known persons on to campus to speak about issues that are of concern and interest to the student body. These speakers have naturally expressed differing opinions on a variety of topics. Angela Davis and Ralph Nader are examples. In recent years, the Middle East has caught the imagination of the world.

The area is constantly under social, political and economic turmoil.

The dramatic OPEC oil embargo on the U.S. and western Europe demonstrated the intricate relationship between that region and the rest of the world.

The Peace treaty concluded by Egypt and Israel has revived interest in the matter. It is an area of the world that is of concern to everybody because events there may very well trigger off global disaster, possibly total annihilation.

The recent treaty ignored the social and political aspirations of the Palestinian people. Lack of knowledge about their positions is common to all of us. The case for a million and one half Palestinian refugees is usually obscured in the media by the infinitely more sensational actions of certain radical splinter groups.

"But even Israel's leaders have now come to realize that no peace in the region is possible unless — at least some of the Palestinian grievances are met." (Toronto Star; Oct. 3, 1975).

Meanwhile we continue to remain unaware of the general and peculiar Palestinian perspective. Fortunately, S.A.C. has been able to secure someone to outline the Palestinian viewpoint to students. One recommendation of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, it has invited Dr. I. Abu-Lughod to speak at U. of T.

Dr. Abu-Lughod has been Advisor to the P.L.O. delegation at the U.N. since 1974. He is Senior Consultant to their Palestine Social Research Centre in Lebanon. As such he is capable of reflecting their views. As a Palestinian refugee who had to flee from his home town, Jaffa, after the Israeli occupation in 1947, he is also aware of the dimensions of the human tragedy in the international drama. He is the author of numerous monographs and at least eight books on the subject. His posting with U.N.E.S.C.O. has allowed him to travel widely in that region.

Dr. Abu-Lughod will speak on "Palestinians and the world: A Palestinian Perspective" on Thursday, October 9 at 7:30 p.m. in the Medical Sciences Auditorium. It is scheduled to be an hour-long lecture which will be followed by a thirty-minute question-answer period.

General Moshe Dayan will also be appearing during this week. He will present the Israeli point of view about the situation.

This is in keeping with SAC's policy of providing both sides of the issue whenever possible. It is hoped that people will avail themselves of the opportunity to be educated by both speakers. A patient and receptive hearing should be given to their cases. One may not agree with a particular school of thought. But since the decision to invite them was made through the democratic process, and the duty of all members of the university community to safeguard it. Disagreement with anybody's opinion does not constitute a right to strangle her claim to the freedom of expression and speech. Our entire system of education is built upon this fundamental premise.

S.A.C.'s interest in bringing in these two speakers is to fulfill its commitment to provide students with alternative viewpoints on the crucial questions of our time. The Speaker's Programme was born out of realization that education does not consist merely of attending lectures, writing examinations and passing courses. Hopefully, the intellectual stimulus of actually hearing and seeing the speakers will result in a broadening of student perspectives and the realization that neither one has the magic answer.

Vice-President-SAC

Ad-hoc committee says students should oppose Zionism

General Dayan, a leading representative of the racist and fascist Israeli Zionists is coming to speak at the University of Toronto on October 7th. He has been invited by the Students' Administrative Council (and thus by implication the student body.) This invitation, to a representative of the Israeli Zionists, who are nothing more than the Thies and Lon Nols of the Middle East, the servile tools of the U.S. imperialists in waging aggression against the Palestinian and other Arab peoples, is a serious affront to the U. of T. students and to the entire Canadian people. U. of T. students should demand the withdrawal of this invitation but if SAC pursues this despicable action, students should organise to denounce Dayan when he arrives.

This invitation comes at a time when the Palestinian people are persisting in their just struggle to regain their homeland and restore their national rights. It comes at a time when the Palestinian people's legitimate representative, the Palestine Liberation Organization, is enjoying greater and greater international recognition and respect (highlighted by the granting to the PLO of observer status in the United Nations).

It comes at a time when the vast majority of oppressed nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America have expressed full support for the Palestinian people's struggle and absolute opposition to the Israeli Zionists and the two superpowers. It comes at a time when the oppressed nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America have spearheaded a campaign to expel the Israeli Zionists from the U.N. and other international forums.

It comes at a time when across Europe and North America progressive students and working people have expressed support for the just cause of the Palestinian people. It comes at a time when the Palestinian people enjoy more and more support for their just cause and the Israeli Zionists and their imperialist masters grow more isolated every day.

This is 1975. This is the year of the liberation of Cambodia, Vietnam, and Laos. This is a time when the people are everywhere rising up opposing the two superpowers, and supporting each other's struggles. This is the era of world revolution. It is at this time that various Zionist collaborators on SAC want to announce to the world (and it must be understood that this speaking engagement is mainly for international propaganda as well as for confusing the Canadian people) that the Zionists are not isolated reactionaries, that the Zionists can still find a place to hold a rally, that on behalf of the U. of T. students, this Zionist general is welcome to come and speak. This is why this invitation is a serious affront. It is a sinister manoeuvre to make it appear that the Canadian students are not opposed to Zionism.

This is a very serious matter that we must deal with. Will we allow these Zionist collaborators on SAC to use us in their scheme to do international propaganda for Zionism and imperialist aggression in the Middle East, or will we oppose it? Will we as students side with, support, and consider as our own the struggles of the oppressed nations and peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America or will we side with the two superpowers, U.S. imperialism and Soviet social-imperialism and all reaction?

Will we follow the path of Norman Bethune, the path of proletarian internationalism, or will we follow the path of the Canadian monopoly capitalist class, the path of complete servility to U.S. imperialism. The vast majority of students showed in practice during the 1960's where their sentiment lay, by their massive opposition to U.S. imperialist aggression in Indo-China. Now is the time again to show where Canadian students stand.

Must withdraw invitation

Moshe Dayan, a central architect of Israeli military and political policy for over two decades, has been invited by SAC to speak at Convocation Hall on October 7. By sponsoring and helping to finance this meeting SAC cannot avoid lending its political and moral support to the cause of this spokesperson for the Israeli ruling class.

The great majority of students on this campus, Jew and non-Jew alike, have no interest in supporting this reactionary spectacle. SAC's guest exposes the ideology of Zionism, a doctrine that seeks to distort the legitimate concerns of Jews over their historically experienced oppression into a movement for an exclusivist, sectarian state. According to Zionism non-Jews in general are held responsible for anti-Semitism while capitalism, the social system which breeds racism and fascism, is left blameless.

The Zionist state of Israel was created by the annexation of Palestine and the vicious dispersal of the Palestinian people. With each subsequent war Israel, backed by American imperialism, has expanded its boundaries, extended its direct military rule and continued to deny the most elementary rights to Arabs in the occupied territories.

The policies of Moshe Dayan represent an absolute deathtrap for the Jewish working class in Israel. All he can offer is permanent warfare, austerity and continued political repression.

Revolutionary Marxists struggle for the unity of the Arab and the Jewish masses in the fight against both the Zionist state and the existing Arab regimes to establish a socialist Middle East, with equality for all nationalities. We call on SAC to withdraw its sponsorship from the Dayan visit.

Hillel responds to "racist" charges

There has been a flurry of excitement over the imminent visit by Moshe Dayan, former Israeli Defense Minister, to the U. of T. campus. Dayan, whose name is probably the most electric of any Israeli spokesman, is due to address the student body on Tuesday, October 7th at Convocation Hall. Most of the excitement has been positive and it seems outwardly that most students look upon the visit by Dayan, the invitation by S.A.C. and upon the situation of Israel with at least mild approval.

There is nonetheless a fringe element which disagrees and would, if they could, cancel the S.A.C. invitation as a way of condemning Israel. Of course, these people are convinced that Israel and Dayan are anathema to the Canadian student and that all their righteousness is on their side. They may be right for massive demonstrations against Israel and in particular, Dayan. Surely they are not simply Jew-haters of the latest variety; surely these educated culturally refined people are not using Marxist-Leninist Trotskyite verbiage as a cloak for naked bigotry. Surely, like most orations of this sort this fringe element assumes a posture of glib rhetoric in which "we" are the struggling, oppressed victims and "they" are powerful, nearly-invincible demigods of evil and suppression. The language of their message readily attempts to label and condemn. Thus, Israel and her people (perhaps three million in total) are "racists" and "fascists" who have somehow victimized some 40 million Arabs, her surrounding neighbours.

Since we all hate fascism or the spectre of Hitler, Goering, Heydrich, Goebbels et al — and we all "hate" racism — the spectre of the martyred Dr. King — naturally then we can respond positively to being called upon to hate the "Israeli Zionists".

Now it seems to me that hatred is a language of the desperate; it produces nothing but more of the same frustrating emotion. Few of us wish to engender hatred within ourselves in so feeble a fashion and so that appeal of these theoreticians of international chaos and hatred will fall on deaf ears — at least in this nation and in this university.

We are asked to get on the bandwagon of anti-Israel sentiment. The argument goes something like this: Israel is hated by some and the Arabs or Palestinians are feared (for their oil) by others. The time is ripe for a lynching, everybody wants one so get aboard. However, morality is not decided at the level of political and economic expediency. The world has witnessed unending succession of occasions when nearly all its constituent states have acted with expediency uppermost. Most recently one could point to the Arab oil embargo when, save for a very few nations, the nations of the world responded with cowardice.

The present attempt by the antagonists of Israel is to push her out of the family of nations. She is to be stripped of all credentials of an accepted State. Expulsion from the U.N. is just another variety of an old phenomenon: hatred expressed in its action-dimension (terrorism) becomes more palatable to those who might otherwise object to it on moral grounds if the hate-object is dehumanized and disenfranchised. If Israel can be made into a non-state (even the most primitive of human society warrant U.N. status) and if her people — Israelis and Jews elsewhere — can be made into sub-humans, non-persons ("Israeli-Zionists" as their rhetoric reads) then there need be no sense of moral wrongdoing, no nation or people will be guilty of eradicating Israel as state and people.

The methodology of human reduction was developed into a science by the Nazis some forty years ago. . . the Nuremberg laws of 1935 followed by the death camps and with their awesome savagery and indescribable losses for the Jewish people. Perhaps few Germans realized that the Nuremberg Laws would result in the reduction of their neighbours to ashes and soap but once human beings and states which represent them are reduced by others from fully human to less than human and less than creditable, the opportunity exists for the fullest expression of hatred. It is not inconceivable that unchecked modern day hatred of Israel and Jews would give us another Holocaust to remember.

Banks, students, editors may be charged for plagiarism

A hoo-ha is brewing about essay services and according to a Council of Ontario Universities' report the day may come when a student who hands in a purchased essay as his own may be liable to fourteen years imprisonment.

The concern is over plagiarism, students buying essays, custom made or from the agency's files, and passing them off as their own, a practise which poses many questions for those in education. Are these services immoral? Do they undermine the educational system? Do they tip the balance in favour of the better-off student? And who is using the service and why?

If it is as one of the agencies suggested "technical students who have no interest in academic topics like English and History," but have to take them, so they buy a paper, does this mean that general education or tokenism toward it cannot be institutionalised.

Those are the questions but how are the answers to be found? The first problem is to distinguish between the bonafide research agency which strictly provides reference and research material, and those who sell papers with the knowledge that the essay is going to be submitted by the student as his own work.

The chevron asked the owner of Termpapers, Mr. Ron Connort, if he had any way of knowing that students weren't merely handing in the purchased essay. He said that the papers were sold for reference and research but that there was no way of checking how they were used. He suggested that the same was true of those who sell whiskey and have no knowledge as to whether the customer is an alcoholic.

But it seems, however, that these agencies are very aware of how students are using their product, and actually make provisions to ensure that no two students in the same university hand in identical papers.

A chevron reporter phoned these companies and made enquiries about buying a paper. He said that the professor had given the whole class the same assignment. The reporter wanted some guarantee that other students wouldn't submit the same work. Essay Services assured him "we keep a record of where every paper goes and where every paper is from." He was also told that if someone else from the same university ordered the same paper the student would be asked to choose another paper. The final guarantee was that the same paper would not be sent twice to the same university, and to put his mind to rest he was informed that the company sent papers to universities all across the country and so the problem doesn't usually arise.

With Termpapers the guarantee was not so steadfast. He was told that the company writes on the back of each paper what universities it has been sent to and if a client from the same university wants the same paper he she is told that it has already gone there. Usually this is enough to put the client off that paper, but if the client insists — "we will sell it to him."

The other problem in investigating essay agencies is how to establish the extent to which they are being used. Connort did say that his company got response from all the five or six ads run in student newspapers across the country.

Connort, however, did give some indication of the volume of his business. He said in the fall and winter terms 15 to 20 writers are kept busy producing custom made work, and that is over and above the demand for essays on file. (All the writers have their degrees checked.) Connort also said that since he started the business three and a half years ago demand has certainly increased.

Students using these services pay about $5 a page for a custom made paper, which can be delivered in 8 days. There is a minimum charge of $25. But if the essay requested is one of the many essays on file the cost is between $2.50 and $2.75 a page, (converted to metric that's about five beers a page). There is also some demand from students doing their masters, and for them a custom page of research comes in around $7 a page.

Connort said that most of the demand is for "academic topics such as English and History as opposed to the technical field."

To the charge that his service was immoral he said that the people who use it have had several years in educational institutions and so if they feel they have to use these services perhaps there is something immoral in education.

But he did agree that his service tipped the balance in favour of the better-off student commenting "I suppose that applies to anything in society."

None of these arguments satisfy Kessel. He feels there is a danger that if professors cannot be sure that students are submitting their own essays then they may be forced to use other means of examination. This would penalise students who prefer writing essays. Kessel said that he came across this problem in a Sociology class.

He also said that he thinks these agencies handicap those students who can't afford their services, and all things considered that they are morally dubious.

He feels that if the university has certain standards then they should be maintained and any changes in the examination system should come as a progressive step and not as a defense against plagiarism.

The COU report also expresses serious concern about plagiarism, and says "... even if the number of fraudulent papers being submitted is small, the perception that the practice exists is very deleterious to the morale of students, undermines the credibility and integrity of the academic process, and can drive the system back towards an increasing reliance on examinations."

It also states that "A student who uses such a false paper may be charged under sec. 326(1) for "uttering forged documents" and is liable to the same penalty" (imprisonment for fourteen years or less).

An Unfair Trade Practice charge may be another way of stopping plagiarism. The report points to successes achieved in Wisconsin where an examiner issued a restraining order against an essay agency on the grounds that:

- The term paper business take undue advantage of student weaknesses and aid and abet the student to commit a fraud.
- The university is deceived into unfairly awarding course credits.

- They foster an unequal and unfair relationship between students who use the service and those who don't.

And once again students using the service and editors "who aid and abet" may be charged.

But the harshness of the report is qualified in its conclusion where the author Prof. T.P. Chen says "In my opinion, prior publicity and appropriate warning must be given before such sanctions are to be applied, although decisive action may sometimes prove to be necessary in handling blatant offenders, particularly term paper companies. The more appropriate measure is for the educational authorities to obtain an injunction or cease and desist order against the offenders."

One final suggestion in the report is that since most of the Term Paper companies are incorporated in the U.S. and are beyond the reach of Canadian courts that the Postmaster General could issue a mail-stop order. Since most of the companies' business is conducted by mail such an order would "... effectively intercept the illegal mails and, thus, nip these plagiarism activities from their buds."

In case all of this is not sufficient to deal with essay agencies, the COU is investigating the possibility of drafting a bill which would not so much nip their buds as chop off their heads.

Election Over, Way Open For Student Militancy!

KINGSTON (CUP) Students are in a better position to push the Ontario government into increasing the financing of post-secondary education and improving student aid as a result of the recent Ontario elections.

This was the consensus of the delegates at the fall conference of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) held at Queen's University September 27-28.

But whether the provincial student union and students themselves had much impact on the results of that election — a minority Conservative government with an NDP opposition — was a point of some disagreement.

The OFS declined to support the NDP at a meeting held earlier in the summer, despite disagreement that the NDP favoured the same educational policies as OFS. The prevailing view was that OFS should not adopt a "partisan" stance.

This decision resulted in OFS mounting a campaign based on "raising the issues" but without urging students to vote for any particular party.

Some delegates felt the poster, pamphlet and media campaign by OFS was a success, while others expressed doubt that it had any impact on students as a whole.

No statistics as to how students had actually voted were available to settle the dispute.

Whatever the role of students and the OFS in the elections, it was agreed that the minority government in Queen's Park meant the political situation was right for a stepped-up student campaign around educational issues.

Central to this campaign are the issues of post-secondary financing and student aid.

OFS reaffirmed its opposition to the financial cutbacks policy of the provincial government, and decided to make use of the upcoming public hearings on Student Aid as a focus for its student aid campaign.

As well as submitting briefs, the delegates agreed to organize mass meetings or rallies of students at those cities where the government will be conducting public hearings later this fall.

These mass meetings are planned for Sudbury, Thunder Bay, Ottawa and will culminate in a large rally in Toronto on January 21, the date when it is expected that OFS will make its presentation to the hearings.

Some delegates expressed reluctance to endorse any attempts at mobilizing students for mass meetings or public rallies, notably the delegates from Queen's, U of T, and Western.

But, with a minority government in power, and after two years of caution on the part of OFS in committing itself to any action requiring the mobilization of students, the thinking of the majority seems to have shifted towards favouring more militant forms of action.

Cooperation between the National Union of Students (NUS) and OFS on student aid strategy for the next three months is ensured, although the two bodies disagree on certain goals and strategies.

After debate, OFS agreed to join NUS in pressing for student representation on the Canada Student Loans Plenary Group, on the basis of OFS and NUS opposition to student loans.

Opposition to the NUS demand to seat students on the Plenary Group came from OFS fieldworker, Rick Gregory, on the grounds that OFS was opposed to student loans.

OFS policies call for the abolition of tuition and the establishment of living stipends in the form of grants rather than loans.

Varsity women capture tennis title

Varsity Women's tennis team captured the Division A title Saturday by placing first over McMaster and Waterloo Universities in matches played at Waterloo.

The women placed first in both singles and doubles matches.

In the singles, Wendy Jones first defeated the McMaster contender 6-4, 2-6, 7-5 and proceeded to polish off the Waterloo rival in a tightly-played 4-6, 6-4, 6-1 match. In other singles action, Diane O'Hara played a winning two-hour match against McMaster only to be outplayed 1-6, 2-6 by her Waterloo opponent. She placed second overall.

In doubles play, the team of Penny Petroff and Kate Maynor took their division title by easily defeating Waterloo 6-3, 6-4, and McMaster 6-2, 6-4. The combination of Kate's strong ground strokes and Penny's accurate volleys proved too much for their opponents. The prospects for this doubles team are promising in their next meet on Oct. 18.

The other doubles team of Carla Mann and Linda Harley won their first match against Waterloo but went under to McMaster in the afternoon 3-6, 2-6.

The entire team will proceed to the finals on Oct. 18 in Burlington where they will meet the winners of Division B (Guelph, Western and York).

Our Farewell To Frank

The weather in Kingston on Saturday was sunny and warm, and just perfect for the Queen's University annual homecoming. Unfortunately, the weather was also perfect for the U of T Varsity Blues offensive unit and they made this plainly obvious by scoring thirty-two points on the Queen's Golden Gaels team, (much to the dismay of the hordes of Queen's graduates and students who came out to support the Golden Gaels against their traditional rival, the Varsity Blues).

The festivities began with three parachutists landing on the field, followed by Roland Mitchener, the Queen's U Chancellor, partaking in an honorary kick-off.

The Varsity Blues, impartial to the pre-game happenings were undoubtedly concerned about winning their fourth straight football game, as winning is something they are slowly but surely making a habit of. As the Blues' season unrolls, it is obvious that they are in for another spectacular campaign, to be hopefully highlighted by the recapture of the elusive Vanier Cup, and the reign of national champion.

The final score was 32-10 in Toronto's favor and this is reflected in similarly one-sided statistics which show Toronto's total offence as being close to 600 yds., a change from last week's 282 yds. in a game in which the Blues tamed Queen's by a score of 26-0.

Queen's also showed marked improvement. This week they were able to mount an offence, which was probably the result of Doug Latham, their first string QB, coming back into action after a hand injury. The Gaels managed a touchdown and a field goal for a total of ten points. Their total offence was just under three hundred yards which is a far cry from the mere ninety-eight they struggled for last week.

The Toronto quarterbacking department saw the use of all three Blues QBs with Dave Langley handling the major portion of the game.

Langley completed 11 of 22 passes for a total of 194 yards through the air with the remainder of the Blues air attack being supplied by Al Brenchley who incidentally completed two passes on three attempts.

Langley's first pass came at the end of a scoring drive which lasted about four minutes and twenty seconds. He led his offence 60 yards to the touchdown, which was scored by Mark Ackley who caught the ball in the end zone after being closely covered by a Queen's defender.

In the first quarter the Blues were successful in most of their drives but they received costly penalties which by the end of the game had totalled to nine penalties for a total of ninety penalty yards. At one time penalties put them in a 'first and twenty-five' situation which eventually caused them to punt away the football. When they regained possession they managed to sustain another drive which lasted about two-and-a-half minutes and resulted in a 19-yard field goal by Mike Sokovnin. Thus at the beginning of the second quarter, Toronto was in command of a 10-0 lead.

For the first part of the game Queen's found themselves consistently deep in their own territory. Half way through the quarter Langley once again passed to Ackley and after a convert by Sokovnin the Blues were ahead by 17-0.

It was late in the second quarter when Queen's offence first set foot on Toronto's half of the field. The Golden Gaels carried the ball down the field for about three minutes and finally put their first points on the board against Toronto in 88 minutes of football. Latham completed a pass to Colin Nickerson who stepped across the goal line to put six points on the scoreboard for his team. The Golden Gael's kicker Will Kennedy completed the scoring of the half by converting the touchdown.

Halftime score Toronto 17, Queen's 7.

Early in the third quarter Toronto once again took the ball deep into Queen's territory. The Blues were in scoring range and the Golden Gaels were covering the Blues running backs in an attempt to prevent another touchdown. Langley capitalized on this and carried the ball across the goal line himself. Sokovnin's convert was blocked and with Toronto holding a 23-7 lead, it was Queen's turn to boost their score.

Queen's maintained offensive drives into the third quarter but ran out of steam as the game approached the fourth quarter. It was late in the third quarter when the Gael's scoring for the day was completed. Kennedy was successful on an eight yard field goal and the score became 23-10.

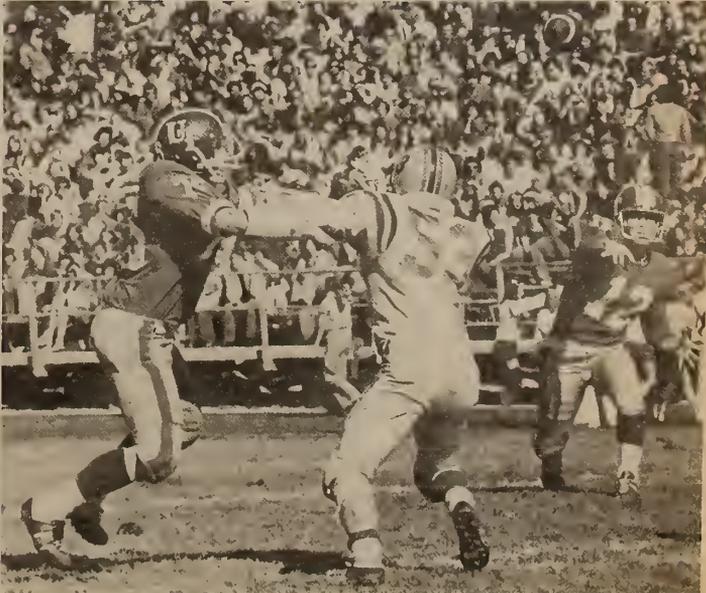

The Blues however kept the scorekeeper working. Mark Braganolo, not to be outdone in the touchdown department powered through from the two yard line to make the score 29-10 for the Blues. Sokovnin finished the Blues scoring by converting the touchdown.

Although Varsity was in scoring range later in the game they were not able to put points on the board because of a Blues fumble on the Gael's one yard line. Queen's gained possession of the ball at that point, but when Toronto's defence earned their keep by not allowing them any yardage they were forced to punt. The Queen's punter had to punt from the end zone but decided to concede the safety touch and thus the game ended 32-10 victory for the Blue and White.

The game was good for Toronto because coaches Ron Murphy and Dave Copp were able to use all three quarterbacks in a game situation. Both of the subs had minor problems with Kerr being intercepted on late in the game and Brenchley fumbling on Queen's one yard line.

Brenchley, who was put in with about two and a half minutes remaining completed two excellent passes which surprised many as he had no time for a warm-up.

Oscar Fava, another Blues running back was put in late in the game and carried once for 15 yards.

Library rally attracts 300

By SHARON STEVENSON

"If the boss gets in the way
We're gonna roll right over him roll right over him
roll right over him
If the boss gets in the way
We're gonna roll the union on."

Beginning with that chorus, a Tuesday noon rally in front of Roberts library expressed the same sentiment as a crowd of 300 gathered to hear messages of support for library workers.

More than 16 organizations, as well as 13 U of T professors endorsed the rally, organized by the Library Workers Support Committee and the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) local 1230.

CUPE 1230 president Judy Darcy told the crowd the rally was a positive sign "the university administration's tactics were failing. We are told that we are greedy and unreasonable in an attempt to pit students against workers, and faculty against both. This strategy of divide and conquer will fail," she promised.

Darcy said CUPE 1230 had taken a stand to give its membership protection against layoffs and cutbacks, and accused the university administration of lying about the union's demands. "We asked for a two-hour lunch break once a month so that our members could attend union meetings. The administration said that added $30,000 to their costs," she explained.

"The university has refused to make us an offer, on wages and other issues. They are not willing to guarantee no layoffs. On these issues, we are not willing to accept the deep heartfelt feelings of the administration, we want it in black and white," said Darcy.

Darcy said the union had applied for conciliation and were informed an hour before the meeting that the conciliation meeting wouldn't be until October 16, almost a month after the union had applied. "This stalling tactic won't work," said Darcy. "The workers aren't taking a stand, and are not prepared to accept the status of the past. We aren't willing to accept cutbacks in jobs or services, and we are prepared to strike to get these things," she stressed.

Graduate Assistant Association organizer Jay Drydyk pointed out students should support the library workers, "or services will be made worse than they are now." He said the university had forced both the graduate assistants and the library workers into organizing to "fight for the things we need. We are a crucial and indispensable part of this university," emphasized Drydyk.

Professor Ken Bryden, speaking as a member of the Faculty Association, pointed out all workers are "entitled to a decent wage and decent working conditions." He called upon the university administration to make a meaningful wage offer.

Bryden hoped there would be no breakdown of services, but said that if there was, the university should remember "who is responsible." In an entertaining skit, library workers produced a theatrical John Evans, who suggested the rally should have a joint focus, to provide higher wages for library workers and higher fees for doctors.

SAC External Commissioner Ross Wells brought a message of support from the SAC Executive. He said students as well as library workers had to fight cutbacks.

Wells said the administration wants a strike, in the hope students will oppose it and cross the picket lines. Wells said this would not prove true, and that the whole university community should oppose the lack of bargaining on the part of the administration.

He read a motion of support passed by the SAC executive, which stated,

"Whereas SAC has committed itself to the maintenance of the quality and standard of education at the U of T in the face of government cutbacks, and

Whereas the maintenance of extensive library facilities is a fundamental criteria of the quality of education on the U of T campus,

Be it resolved that SAC support the efforts of the library workers, CUPE 1230, in their struggle for a just contract which would include a fair wage settlement, job security and an end to staff reduction through attrition."

David Mole, chairman of the support committee, ended the rally by saying free access to the library and books was crucial to the university. "Campus workers have received the short end of the stick for years. The struggle of the library workers provides a focus for all those who want to fight back," Mole said, and called on students to aid the support committee.

CUPE 1230 president Judy Darcy (front) seems pleased with the turnout at yesterday's rally.

Dayan says Israel not satisfied with pact

By BOB BETTSON

Former Israeli minister of Defence General Moshe Dayan lashed out last night at the recent Kissinger agreement in the Middle East saying it had not brought anyone closer to peace.

Dayan told a capacity crowd at Convocation Hall that the agreement recently signed by Israel and the Arabs was bad. Israel agreed only under American pressure, he said.

Dayan said the agreement had been made without significant concessions from Egypt. He added the Americans should take the burden of compensation for the loss of oilfields held by Israel.

Dayan said serious negotiations could begin on issues including the Palestinian question, only after the state of war ends.

Another shortcoming of the recent agreement, Dayan said, was the attempt by the Americans to isolate Egypt from Syria and ignore the Soviet Union.

"But he did concede it was better to have this agreement than none at all."

The majority of Dayan's 45-minute speech featured a retelling of the last 30 years of Middle East conflict.

Throughout his remarks he continually emphasized the crucial importance of continued American support of the Israelis to counteract Soviet support of the Arab nations.

Although he conceded to one questioner that this was leading to Israel's dependency on the U.S., Dayan said this will not compromise Israel's national goals.

Dayan said increased American involvement has been a reaction to huge shipments of arms and support personnel to the Arab countries by the Soviet Union.

He recounted that during the six day war only the threat of direct American involvement kept Soviet soldiers from directly trying to halt Israel advances.

The interests of the two superpowers in achieving a lasting solution in the Middle East was demonstrated after the Yom Kippur war in 1973, Dayan said.

The U.S. and the U.S.S.R. stepped in for the first time without UN intervention. They set up direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab states in Geneva.

"I wish we could get peace by ourselves without anybody between us, but this seems impossible. We need somebody on our side and that must be the Americans since the Russians are already there. America is the only country which can stand up to the Russians," Dayan said.

Dayan praised the agreement reached after the Yom Kippur war, as the best which could have been worked out. He said the Egyptian move to reopen the Suez canal was a "clear constructive move toward peace, and we cooperated."

Dayan said he was optimistic for a peaceful solution soon because with every war Israel has moved closer to the Arab capitals.

"They now realize there is a better way than war. They can get more territory from negotiations with Kissinger than with their armed forces," he said.

On the Palestinian question Dayan went on the attack. He lashed out at the Arab governments for not taking care of 600,000 Palestinian refugees when the Israeli government had immediately taken care of 800,000 Jewish refugees from Arab countries in 1948 when Israel came into existence.

He said the Arabs had prevented the establishment of an independent Palestinian state next to Israel when they decided in 1948 to invade Israel and tried to destroy the young nation.

He also pointed out that instead of forming an independent Palestinian state on the west bank of the Jordan before 1967, Palestinians in that area had demanded annexation from Jordan.

In answer to questions from the audience about Israel's lack of preparation for the Yom Kippur war, Dayan said there was some mistake in interpreting Arab movements before the war but the army was prepared and was eventually successful after initial delays in mobilization.

He said a 14-month study by an Israeli commission had "exonerated the government of any blame for a lack of preparedness but had recommended the blame be put on several army and intelligence chiefs."

In response to repeated questions on concessions Israel should or should not make, Dayan carefully answered that peace talks should begin without preconditions and it was impossible to discuss compromises beforehand.

He said one of the best indications for future success in peace negotiations is the waning Russian popularity in the Arab states, and a desire to avoid confrontation with the United States. Therefore the Soviets, he said, will try and achieve a detente in the Middle East like the one in Europe.

Dayan denied a suggestion he was making his present tour to bolster Israel's flagging support in North America. He said he had been asked by the universities to lecture in North America.

"After all I don't think there is anyone else who knows as much about the Middle East as I do," he said smiling.

Dayan says Israel was forced into peace by United States.

Protest over Israeli warrior's visit sparked by plight of Palestine refugees and political prisoners.

Militants Gloat Over An Isolated Israel

By SHARON STEVENSON

A militant demonstration of fifty people marched in front of Convocation Hall in opposition to last night's speech by Moshe Dayan. Forming a circle opposite the main entrance, the group marched with red flags and placards and shouted slogans opposing Dayan and supporting the Palestinians.

The demonstration was organized by the Ad Hoc Committee To Support the Just Struggles of the Palestinian and Other Arab Peoples. Peter Gibson, spokesman for the committee, said the participants in the demonstration were students and workers from Toronto with many representatives of different national minorities, including Palestinians.

Gibson said the demonstration was the conclusion of a campaign at the U of T against Zionism, which began with distribution of a leaflet several weeks ago in support of the Palestinian people.

Gibson said a UN speech last week by Idi Amin, leader of the Organization of African Unity, which called for the expulsion of the illegitimate state of Israel from the UN, reflected the sentiment and will of the vast majority of the peoples of the world.

"Zionism is extremely isolated throughout the world today," said Gibson. "In the last 10 years the Palestinian people have taken up armed struggle and struggle on the diplomatic front. The just cause of the Palestinian people is bound to win in the near future," said Gibson. "All the Zionists can do is muster support to raise money from themselves. They are desperate, and even grow reluctant to defend the cause of Zionism. They squirm and want to ignore the origins of Israel," said Gibson.

Protestors continued to shout slogans, including Zionist Dayan, Get Out of Canada; Victory to the Palestinian Liberation Organization! and The Palestinian People Will Win! until Dayan entered the building.

At a meeting following the demonstration, Gibson proposed the formation of a committee at U of T to take up support for national liberation struggles in various parts of the world. "Students were in the forefront of the struggle against U.S. imperialism in Cambodia, Vietnam and Laos," he said. "They should continue this glorious tradition."

(Hear ye)²

The Committee Against Racism will host a meeting tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in support of Henry Fong's appeal to Governing Council. Speakers will include Charles Roach-lawyer; Sociology professor Janet Salaff and Mathematics professor Peter Rosenzhal. The meeting will take place in the Pendarvis Lounge of the International Student Centre, 33 St. George St.

Also, the Varsity holds its weekly staff whine and cheese-off fest today at 2 p.m. There's been a fair bit of verbal action aimed at us in the last week, so come and let it all out. That's at 91 St. George St. on the second floor.

Controls mar evaluation

By MIKE EDWARDS

Course evaluations funded by the administration have been "deliberately edited so as to completely distort the original meaning of criticisms presented in the individual evaluations", according to Richard Balmis, a third year economics student.

Referring to the editing of his last year's summary of ECO 200, Balmis said it had stated Professor J. W. Winder had "heeded the message" to improve his course, which had been classed as "the worst" in the previous year's evaluation.

The edited version said only "67 per cent of the students indicated they would enroll in this section again."

Editor of the evaluations was Political Economy Student Course Union (PECU) chairperson Nonnie Balcer, but they were published by the Political Economy department. The statistical tabulations were also compiled by a faculty member.

All other arts and science course evaluations have been conducted by the student unions and published by the Arts and Science Student Union (ASSU).

Current PECU chairperson Joel Sokolsky defended the departments participation. In avoiding what he termed "libelous statements". He claimed derogatory statements were included in evaluations two years ago, and that the written summaries "didn't reflect the overall opinion for the class." He said the bias of 1973-74 PECU president Howie Stein were played up the exclusion of a more general consensus.

Economics professor Allan Bloom was particularly singled out by Stein, Sokolsky said. "He called everyone Bloomisms. Bloom got the longest (negative) write-up."

Balmis, who worked on two course summaries, was upset over many deletions from his original material. One comment, that professor J. A. Sawyer was too autocratic and inflexible over curriculum changes was ignored. Most of the other changes were minor but Balmis felt the total effect was to distort and cover-up.

Sokolsky could only suggest the editing had been carried out for space reasons but could not be definite since Balcer had done most of the work singlehandedly. She is now at Cambridge, England.

The department has been assisting with evaluations for several years. Large classes are supervised by PECU volunteers while the professors of smaller classes hand out the questionnaires, observing standard requirements for confidentiality.

Some observers have speculated financial woes might inspire the department to give financial control back to the students via ASSU.

Professor David Foot, an economics lecturer, compiled and analysed the statistics last year. He said the basic rationale for departmental involvement is to ensure continuity through the summer months. According to Foot, the department takes careful note of students' year-end comments.

He also mentioned that some statistical analysis of the results were carried out by the School of Graduate Studies and some of the conclusions will be presented the Political Economy chairman Harold Eastman in the near future.

Collaboration between students and administration on course evaluations is rare in Ontario, according to Marilyn Burnett, fieldworker for the Ontario Federation of Students. She discounted the fear that students would be hamstrung by libel suits.

"There was one case at the University of Western Ontario two years ago but the students won in court," she said. Distribution of an evaluation handbook was delayed when a professor sued the students after losing her job.

Despite Balmis' main concern that conditions lead to faculty censorship, implicit and explicit, Commerce students have approached Eastman for help with questionnaire design and statistical summaries. Commerce is a division of the department of Political Economy not covered by PECU.

Nalnis said he was upset over the entire handling of the evaluation editing. The fact that professors could review their own criticisms was suspicious enough, Balmis said, and added he felt Balcer had surrendered editorial control entirely to the department.

PECU gets some financing from the ASSU to carry out a speakers program. This year plans are in the works for a visit by Finance Minister Donald Macdonald, a screening of the film "The Battle of Algiers" and a wine and cheese party.

Tuition fee disagreement stalls cutback fight

By MIKE SCOTT

SAC will quit the Common Front if a SAC executive decision made last night is upheld by the rest of Council at tonight's general assembly.

In withdrawing their membership from the anti-cutback alliance, SAC was reacting to a past confrontation with the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) at a meeting last week.

At that time, UTFA refused to incorporate into the overall strategy, a SAC motion calling for opposition to further tuition fee increases.

"Every segment of the university should oppose all cutbacks in Government, education spending, including those cutbacks which may result in further tuition fee increases," said SAC Communications Commissioner John Tuzyk, in attempting to clarify SAC's position.

Since its inception last March, the Common Front, comprised of various U of T organizations, has attempted to formulate strategy for mounting a campaign against government cutbacks in educational spending.

With SAC and UTFA at loggerheads over the 'tuition fee' issue, SAC executive members feel it is doubtful a common front against the cutbacks will be launched.

"The Common Front will collapse if SAC quits," said SAC vice-president Michelle Harvey. However, a rider clause in the SAC motion would allow them to rejoin the alliance should UTFA reconsider their position.

SAC will be the second member group to quit the alliance following the U of T Staff Association (UTSA) withdrawal from the Front last week.

In other business the SAC executive decided to meet with the Erindale and Scarborough College student councils to answer their allegations that they are not receiving an equitable amount of SAC services.

SAC has recently been accused of failing to initiate meaningful services on the suburban campuses.

High level concern over academic standards leads to arbitrary lowering of grades

By PAUL McGRATH

James Eyras is "still outraged". The Political Economy professor, who teaches two undergraduate courses, is fuming about an "arbitrary decision" made at the end of the last academic year that turned a number of his "A" students into "B" students.

Due to growing pressure around the university to lower the average marks in Arts and Sciences courses, the Academic Standards committee of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences refused to accept Eyras' recommended marks for his two courses POL 208 and POL 312. As a result, any student who received an 80 in either course was knocked down to a 79.

The changes were made "over his most strenuous protest," according to a letter included in Eyras' course brochure for this year.

Eyras sees the second-guessing on the part of the committee as a "commentary on my incompetence" and said is personally quite affronted by the entire procedure.

Eyras was on vacation when his marks were rejected, and over the phone to Political Economy chairman Harold Eastman refused to alter his marking. He left the changing to Eastman but threatened to resign if each of the students affected was not notified by mail of the lowering.

Eastman made only slight alterations on the borderline between "A" and "B" grades. A letter followed to all those affected.

"I don't object all that strenuously to any policy they want to make, but I want to know in advance. If that's the way the game has to be played, then that's the way the game will be played," he said. "But I object to being dealt with unilaterally."

Eyras did question the ability of a "faceless committee" to appraise a student without reading the papers submitted.

Eyras added that the committee's work may be aimed at "kooks, sadists and masochists" in the faculty who for one reason or another mark either too low or too high. He cited one case where the committee had actually raised the class average.

Department chairman Eastman echoed the fear that marks in Arts and Sciences over the past few years have been "inching up" but remarked that the faculty office is looking at courses in which "A" students are not between 10 and 40 per cent of the class.

He said, he would have preferred that "such drastic action" had not been taken in the last year.

A new grading policy, the work of the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards, will be a topic of discussion at the next meeting of the Academic Affairs committee.

Pressure on marking has been felt elsewhere, especially in Interdisciplinary Studies, according to chairman Marty Wall.

"Our marks tend to be higher," said Wall. He admitted that he keeps an eye on all the marking in Interdisciplinary and that he "cajoles" his staff.

The reason for the higher marks according to Wall is the smaller class sizes in their courses.

Interdisciplinary instructor Mark Golden on the other hand attributes the high marks to the level of commitment of those students who take interdisciplinary courses. Those students who stay in such courses, he maintains, are usually the best.

Golden is most upset at what any change in grading practices will mean for the future of undergraduates.

"The big joke is the 'C'," he said. "They push it at you as a respectable mark, and everyone knows the grad schools won't accept it."

Tampering with marks is thievery

"I've been robbed." That should be one of the student responses to any tampering with the marking system at the university. A few students have already had their pockets picked, as our story on page 3 indicates, and it appears that the thievery may become more pronounced in the year to come.

In the past few years, since the arrival of the New Programme in Arts and Sciences, the faculty has become increasingly concerned about what is seen as "the erosion of academic standards" and "grading inflation." In other words, students are being awarded too many A's and B's and some form of normalization must be achieved by weeding the "respectable" C.

In some departments this trend has already led to quiet guidelines on the subject with the approved "norm" being that A's and B's awarded in any one course of over 25 students should not average to 40 per cent of the class total. Professors are encouraged to keep these numbers in mind. If they are not kept in mind, committees like Academic Standards may have to bring pressure to bear, as they did last academic year with Professor James Eayrs' two undergraduate courses.

Issue should not be taken here with the obvious immorality surrounding Eayrs' case, in which academic policy was set in an arbitrary manner after the marks had been awarded. What is more disturbing is the overall picture of a faculty concerned that if the marks are high, it must be because they are going soft.

While we as students must sympathize with those profs who feel they are losing their academic teeth, we should nonetheless insist that we not be made the losers because of this concern.

An A is an A. A student who shows excellent grasp of the information handed to her-him and is able to analyze and then synthesize it into clear critical evaluation deserves one.

It is quite possible that a preponderance of people who possess the faculties listed above may be attracted to a certain area of study, possibly to one course. If given the right incentive and if the information is presented capably and with enthusiasm, chances are these faculties will be employed. A high proportion of good marks, rather than evincing a soft touch on the part of the professor, could very easily be a compliment to her his teaching ability.

It is also possible, admittedly less so, that students work harder now than they did in the past. That is a point impossible to argue, although Arts and Sciences Student Union fieldworkers have in the past offered evidence of increased library usage and a doubling and sometimes trebling of the reading load in support of such a thesis.

Regardless of these variables, it is difficult to understand how a committee detached from the specific classroom situation it is dealing with can build arbitrary curves into a system and expect to come up with a fair evaluation. If a student in the eyes of the professor deserves an A, nothing short of the discovery that the scholarship was plagiarized should change that evaluation. Any sort of numbers game involving normalization is robbery.

As far as the respectability of the "C" grade is involved, the University of Toronto cannot operate in a vacuum. There are graduate departments all over the continent who will immediately show any transcript with a number of such grades on it to the wastebasket. What is satisfactory to one school may be unsatisfactory to the next. If the university must tamper with the grading system in order to keep up a "tough" appearance, it must keep in mind that it may be placing in jeopardy the academic future of a good number of students.

Dr. Evans recently touted to Governing Council the academic merits of this year's batch of students, so he'd better stand by them when it comes down to some numerical proof of his statement.

The unsigned op-ed on the Middle East in the last issue was not the product of the Varsity editorial staff. The article was submitted by Paul Mackay from the Toronto Student Movement and does not necessarily reflect our point of view.

Better we be denounced for something we didn't write than not be denounced at all. Keep those cards and letters rolling in.

Henry Fong needs help to fight U of T racism

The Committee Against Racism (CAR) is supporting Henry Fong's fight (Varsity, 1 October) against expulsion from U. of T. Medical School because there are clear indications that his ethnic background was a significant factor in his expulsion.

Dr. Bette Stephenson (who was Canadian Medical Association president and is part-time U. of T. lecturer and newly elected M.P.P.) started the public campaign against Chinese medical students' year ago with her claims that they "devote themselves entirely to academic studies" leading to "fewer opportunities for Canadians", (Star—24 Sept. 1974, Globe—25 Sept. 1974). Dr. Stephenson was talking, of course, about landed immigrants and citizens of Chinese origin, as there are virtually no Asian foreign students in the proper sense, (i.e., on student visa) in the medical school.

Many Torontonians of Chinese background reacted to Dr. Stephenson's statements by writing letter to the press and holding protest meetings. CAR held two meetings in the medical school and collected signatures on a petition demanding that medical school and other University of Toronto officials reply to Dr. Stephenson's slander of Chinese medical students. U. of T. president Dr. John Evans accepted our petition and promised some statement would be issued by him "within a month" (none ever was issued). "You know" Dr. Evans told us, "I have been getting a number of telephone calls from mothers and fathers all over Toronto who agree with Dr. Stephenson. They say that their children should have preference over foreign-born students."

Of course we did know what Dr. Evans had told us. After all, that was the whole point of Dr.

Stephenson's press release — to get people blaming foreign-born students, particularly Chinese students, for the fact that they, or their children, or their friends, couldn't get into medical school. And, unfortunately, some people fall for such racist explanations.

Such an explanation is absurd on the face of it. More than 2000 applicants are rejected, and about 240 are accepted, at U. of T. medical school each year. If the 60 or 70 foreign-born successful applicants were thrown out that would still leave more than 1940 applicants out in the cold. Similar figures would result from excluding all students of Chinese origin, no matter how many generations their families have resided in Canada. There are many reasonable proposals for improving medical school admissions, but excluding "foreigners" won't help the situation at all. Let us talk about real solutions.

Unfortunately Dr. Stephenson and her colleagues at the top of the medical hierarchy don't want to talk about the real solutions. They might hurt their own privileged positions, so instead they try to create scapegoats.

Dr. L. M. Cathcart of the U. of T. Department of Family Medicine wrote a letter to the Toronto Star (21 October, 1974) stating:

"She is quite right in objecting to any preponderance of candidates for medicine of non-Canadian status — whether Chinese or any other nationality. I fully agree with her."

"This brings me to the experience we have had as teachers of the non-Canadian Chinese student. We are finding a high proportion of these students have great difficulty in communicating with patients. Medical problems and symptoms are stated and then shared partly through talk and careful listening."

Anyone with an axe to grind can have, for the asking, this space. Submissions should be typed on a 72-character line, double-spaced and should be received two days prior to publication by 5 p.m.

"Coincidental with this is the careful auditing of non-verbal sets of cultural responses and implicit complex cues. Cross-cultural thought patterns differ, allowing communication and interpretation gaps to appear."

"I would be just as concerned if I were to practise in China and to attempt gathering my information with the nuances of their methods of imparting it to me."

"Where there is difficulty in information-gathering and integration into a relevant organic and or emotional diagnosis, there will be danger for the patient. This observation is shared by many of my colleagues, including one of our most outstanding experts in Chinese affairs in the faculty."

"Intellectual capacity and academic standing should not be the exclusive guidelines for admission of any candidate to medicine. We need candidates who can relate to the attitudes, feelings and facts of patient problems in Canada."

"The faculty of medicine admissions committee should look again very carefully at their policies, and take heed of Dr. Stephenson's expressed concerns."

Dr. Cathcart's "colleagues" were at M. Michael's Hospital, deciding to expel fourth year medical student

Caucus gives support

The University of Toronto is subject by law to the Ontario Human Rights Code which states that "No self-governing profession shall exclude from membership or expel or suspend any person or member or discriminate against any person or member because of race, creed, colour, age, sex, or marital status." (Section 1Va, subsection 2.)

At this juncture, when representatives of the medical profession teaching at this university are publicly decrying Chinese and other non-Anglo Saxon students as a threat to the quality of medical service, we are disturbed that a terminal-year student, Henry Fong, has been expelled from the Faculty of Medicine. There are strong allegations, supported by prima-facie evidence, concerning possible racist attitudes and personal bias in decisions regarding Mr. Fong. The burden of proof that its actions are fully consistent with the Human Rights Code rests squarely on the Faculty of Medicine, which has so far declined to stand publicly on this issue.

The future of both Mr. Fong and the University's commitment to equality are at stake here, and justice must be seen to be done. We therefore urge that:

- 1) Pending a thorough impartial investigation, Mr. Fong be reinstated;
- 2) The Governing Council undertake a public investigation of racism in the University of Toronto by establishing an investigative committee with open terms of reference and a membership representative of all sections of the University.

For the Steering Committee, Faculty Reform Caucus, Peter Fitting

Henry Fong. (It's a good thing Dr. Norman Bethune didn't study under Dr. Cathcart!)

Dr. Morton Shulman jumped on the bandwagon. The NDP MPP said in the Ontario Legislature on 21 March, 1975: "This was three years ago. Everything went well until this year, when they (landed immigrants from Asia) started taking clinical classes. The professors discovered to their horror that a very significant proportion of these people, something like a third of them, could not communicate with the patients."

The only Asian student who has ever been expelled from U. of T. medical school in fourth year is Henry Fong. His "communication problem" was one of the main topics at his January 1975 medical school appeal.

Henry Fong's ethnic background was referred to in the discussions of his case within the medical school. It was decided by the "colleagues" of Stephenson and Cathcart and Shulman that Henry Fong should be expelled when he was within a few months of obtaining his M.D.

The U. of T. Medical School has instituted "communication interviews" (Varsity, 1 October). Would you like to be a Chinese student having your "nuances" judged by a Dr. Cathcart?

The U. of T. Medical School is introducing subjective criteria to go along with the objective criteria of grades in determining admissibility. Should a medical school faculty which has been expressing such bias against Chinese students have the right to subjectively evaluate applicants?

Henry Fong is asking the appeals committee of the Governing Council to allow him to complete his last year of medical school at another university. CAR supports this demand because it is crystal clear that racism was a prime factor in Henry Fong's expulsion.

CAR has obtained a lawyer to represent Henry Fong in his 17 Oct. appeal. CAR is also circulating a petition supporting him.

Palestinians will not be forgotten

To the Editor:
For decades the Zionists tried to make the world forget the Palestinians. They refused to acknowledge their existence and they unfortunately succeeded for a while. But now the world's 105 sovereign nations stood firmly to support the Palestinian struggle and denounced the racial, inhuman and unethical Zionist behavior. Thus, it is surprising to find a supposedly progressive student body providing a platform for extending blatant falsehoods.

We should not be surprised, but actually disgusted by this Canadian system, supposedly democratic, which ignores the demands of the public at large for the sake of a certain powerful group with split loyalty.

Despite the clear and unquestionable rights of the Palestinians, we were led to believe the exact opposite by the media.

It is time to open our eyes and minds to the truth. It's time to look upon the Palestinians the way they really are and not the way the Zionists want us to see them.

It's time to recognize the legitimate and just struggle of a million and a half human beings. It's time to rid ourselves of the moral myopia and be able to feel the discrimination inflicted upon these people by those who were direct subjects of the same kind of suffering. Time has come to denounce the racist and barbaric Zionist practices and to reject their policy and representatives. It's time to stand firmly behind suffering people, Arabs and Jews alike. Lastly, time to welcome the P.L.O.'s views and support its justified struggle.

With great and unyielding optimism, I look forward to a time when we, as Canadians will stand on our own feet and deal with world issues objectively rather than being deceitfully influenced by a powerful group or nation.

We have had our fill of poisonous propaganda; the moment has come to prove to ourselves that we still have the strength to stand by justice no matter what the consequences are. It's time to join the ever-growing ranks of P.L.O. supporters in hoping that Dr. I. Abu-Lughod will be able to clarify and present the P.L.O. views on the issue of Palestine. It is one of the few and very rare occasions we have to be exposed to the other side of the Middle East conflict.

Dayan shouldn't be welcome here

To the Editor:

Those prominent and respectable citizens (such as Premier Davis), who protested so loudly against the idea of allowing Palestine Liberation Organization representatives into Canada to attend the UN criminology conference, have voiced no objection to the impending visit of Israeli warhawk Moshe Dayan. The P.L.O. is terrorist, they said. In fact, it is the Israeli government, and not the P.L.O., which is terrorist.

It's terrorist for Israeli war planes to fly regularly over Palestinian refugee camps, bombing and strafing. It is no secret that the principal victims of these attacks are civilians including young children. The Israeli military announces these raids as retaliatory attacks on P.L.O. bases and "staging areas". Yet in fact, every Palestinian refugee camp is a P.L.O. base. It is well known that Dayan's only disagreement with the Israeli government's attempt to terrorize the Palestinians into giving up their revolt is that (according to him) the Israeli authorities are not pursuing the policy viciously enough! This terrorist aggression is based on a gross underestimation (easy for racists to make) of the Arab people's will to resist, which Israel's military policy only strengthens.

In contrast, the P.L.O. has expressly criticised, and disassociated itself from showy terror attacks on Israeli airplane passengers and other civilians, upon which Zionist propaganda focusses so effectively.

"We prefer to meet the enemy on the field of battle," the P.L.O. has insisted.

This is not just for humanitarian reasons. There is also the very valid consideration that in a war of liberation such as the Palestinians are now waging against Israeli occupation, the widely publicized terrorist sideshow put on by the breakaway grouplets is militarily useless and politically damaging.

By a strange inversion of reality, Zionist propaganda keeps dinnning into us that the issue is Israeli survival. In fact, though, it is Israel which, taking advantage of the military superiority it has enjoyed, conquered and occupied the Palestinians homeland in 1967, and has continued since then to rule over it by police-state methods. This is in complete defiance of UN condemnations. Honest democrats in the outside world ought to support the Palestinian, as much as the Israeli, right to self-determination.

Meanwhile, Palestinian patriots have no choice but to fight for their country's liberation, gun in hand.

Moshe Dayan, the most notorious symbol of Israeli aggression and oppression from which the Palestinian people suffer, ought not to be a welcome visitor here.

Off-target with Israel criticism

To the Editor:

I would like to reply to the two left-wing opinions on Zionist Moshe Dayan's visit to U of T.

Contrary to Chris Huxley of the Revolutionary Marxist Group, I say that Jewish students would do well to support Zionism, and as he no doubt realises, the vast majority of them do. He maintains that it is the capitalist system that breeds anti-Semitism. This is probably false, but most of all it is irrelevant. Even if he were correct about anti-Semitism's origin, as long as the world is not dominated by Utopian Marxists the Jews will need their own state. Indeed, as states depart and the world becomes one big family the Jewish state has a right to be among the first to tear down its borders. And anti-Semitism is not irrelevant: for example, of the three revolutionary groups presently fighting over Argentina, two are avowedly anti-Jewish. For most of Argentina's 450,000 Jews Israel would be the only refuge. Even if Canadian Jews can be unconcerned about their own safety, they ought to support Israel and Zionism out of sympathy for their brothers and sisters elsewhere.

But there is of course more than simple refuge involved. While all other peoples seek national identity and national self-determination (and none more earnestly than the Palestinians, whose rights I support and who could have a state alongside Israel) there is no justification whatsoever for the Jewish people to be denied this right. This is something with which I think non-Jews as well can sympathize, and generally do. Israel is merely a state in which Jews predominate. It is not even legally sectarian, for there is no official religion. Its immigration policy is racist, but whose isn't? Moreover, I would like to reassure Chris that the Jewish working class in Israel is happy with the Zionist state. I spent two months in Israel two years ago and talked with the dozen or so first cousins of my parents who live there. They were all keen Zionists and in favour of the continued existence of Israel. They are, moreover, working people, not wealthy capitalist oppressors. Also, there is full political freedom in Israel, and even a Marxist party that advocates many of the same things Chris does. Its share of the popular vote is negligible.

Reader agrees about males

To the Editor:

In your recent article, "Changing Men: The Anti-Sexist Male" (Oct. 1), I agree with the author's diagnosis that men are added to the competition. The author's observation that male society "often consists of trading insults" is accurate. I strongly disagree with the article's tentative solution to this problem. As a Christian, I do not have to be "proud of myself as a sissy and a faggot" to "be able to approach other men and women clearly."

Instead, I can look to Jesus of Nazareth as my example. He was able to approach both sexes "clearly" and openly without the slightest hint of sexual motivation. He was able to cry in public, but no one could possibly call him a "sissy". Finally, not only does Jesus give me the example of the "anti-sexist male" to follow, he also gives me the power to follow that example.

Story and Photos by Caitlin Kelly

The building is of the brick-box type, 1950's vintage. It is panelled in slabs of bland wood and the dim hallways are lined in grey industrial carpeting. It could be an insurance office anywhere, but it is the headquarters of the 3HO Foundation, and a glance at the receptionist will soon dispel any doubts. She is dressed all in white, and a large turban covers any hair she may have. She smiles at me as I stand uncertainly in the doorway, and I smile back, but already I am a stranger in a strange land.

The office walls are lined with framed documents, a seemingly vehement proclamation of the clinic's qualifications. A note in sky-blue italic script is taped to the door, stating that the price of a professional massage is now $10.

I am directed to the second floor where I am greeted by yet another white-clad woman, Kirpal Kaur, Public Relations Manager for the 3HO. She is barefoot and I offer to remove my shoes. As I do so, she explains that it is practice as a mark of respect.

In 1969, a Sikh named Yogi Bhajan founded "a religion of loving service." This was the Happy, Healthy, Holy Organization, or 3HO. With its roots in Los Angeles, the 3HO soon spread and now boasts 110 centres across Canada and the U.S. as well as several in Britain and Asia. The organization derives its name from its attempts to integrate these three aspects in its followers.

Bhajan's aim is to "balance the technical life of the machine with the enjoyment of life", and to achieve this, devotees follow a strict set of guidelines. They follow a vegetarian diet, avoid alcohol and drugs, and practice pre-marital celibacy. They rise at 4 each morning for 2½ hours of chanting, meditation and Kundalini yoga. It is a "righteous" lifestyle, for as Yogi Bhajan says, "There's only one way and that way is through righteous living." He is not unaware, however, of the powerful appeal of his movement, particularly to young, white Americans. "Americans have very reasoning minds; give them something to adapt to, and they will give their life to you."

The Canadian headquarters of the 3HO are housed in three storeys at 732 Spadina Road. The first floor is the reception office and the massage clinic. There are several small rooms with massage tables, curtained for privacy with yellow drapes.

NO CRAYONED JESUSES

The library and classroom are located in the basement. The classroom is large with about 20 wooden chairs and a large moveable blackboard covered with anatomical diagrams. It is the kind of room where Sunday school classes might be held, but there are no crayoned Jesuses on the walls. Instead there are detailed medical diagrams, a shiatsu chart of pressure points throughout the body, and a huge, intricate poster describing the healing properties of various herbs.

The foundation holds a massage class in this room, where, after a year of intensive training, students if provincially licensed may practise professionally. It is the largest massage therapy school in Canada; this year's graduating class had twenty to thirty members. "We try to keep it small so people can get individualized attention", Kirpal says. "We're based on a quality versus quantity output."

To become a licensed masseur, a student must attend three evenings of classes a week from 7 to 10 p.m. A licensed chiropractor teaches the course, and after 500 hours and 6 months of practical work, students may give massages to the public under supervision. These student massages are available for $3, a service Kirpal points out, that is both inexpensive and beneficial.

NO YONGE STREET MESSAGES

Kirpal stresses that the foundation's massages are a far cry from the Yonge St. variety. "We're trying to get out of the physical-sexual orientation and get back into massage as a form of communication." She feels that massage has been badly exploited, and urges that it be used as a method of tuning into the more spiritual aspects that it has to offer.

We return upstairs, where the school clinic has three rooms for massage, although it is "in the process of expanding." I am led down a white-painted hallway to the yoga room. I stand in the doorway, and a feeling of . . . happiness? overcomes me. The room faces east, and although it is a dull day, light fills every corner. Bright-blue broadloom cushions my steps as I explore. Resting against the far wall are two classical guitars, and in front of the east window is a fur-covered platform for the teacher. An altar fills one corner; on it is a picture of Yogi Bhajan and several plants. There is an incredible feeling of peace, but not piety, a latent energy perhaps that lurks somewhere amongst the Japanese paper-lamps.

The third floor of the building is in an old house that the newer offices have been grafted onto. It is an apartment for a couple of the 3HO, but everyone uses it. It is small yet very cozy, with lots of plants on the altar, a Breughel print and a Sony stereo. The Foundation's presence is evident only in the framed picture of the Yogi Bhajan on the picture, and a large poster of Guru Nanak, "a very humble man, very in tune with himself."

As we sit on the floor, Kirpal and I sip peppermint tea, and I ask about the all-white clothing that all members seem to wear. She explains, "Basically, it's a technique that's used to bring about a change. By wearing white and a turban, you immediately start to look at yourself in a different way; it's a constant reminder of your consciousness. It symbolizes service and purity." The outfits consist of a loose-fitting top and drawstring, stove-pipe pants called "churdas". They are cut very tight at the ankle, which Kirpal says is good for the venal circulation.

The turbans are a Sikh tradition, but are worn so as to affect certain pressure points that "affect subtle planes of consciousness." In women, they are worn fairly high, on a diagonal line with the cheekbones, while men's are slightly lower. The hair, unshorn, is worn at the top of the head, purportedly the highest energy centre of the body. According to the 3HO, the hair is an electromagnetic conductor, and that wearing it close to the pineal gland stimulates the consciousness. The only time the hair is let down is at night to correspond with the changing magnetic fields of the earth.

PRINCESSES AND LIONS

I am curious about her name, and ask what her previous name was — as I do so, a passing male member advises, "I wouldn't answer that." But, courteous as ever, she tells me: Christie Mattsson. According to the Yogi's principles, all followers are given a surname on the basis of sex, and a "spiritual" name when he feels they are ready. All men are given the surname Singh, meaning Lion and the women the name Kaur, meaning Princess. Married couples share a first name, but retain their surnames to denote sex.

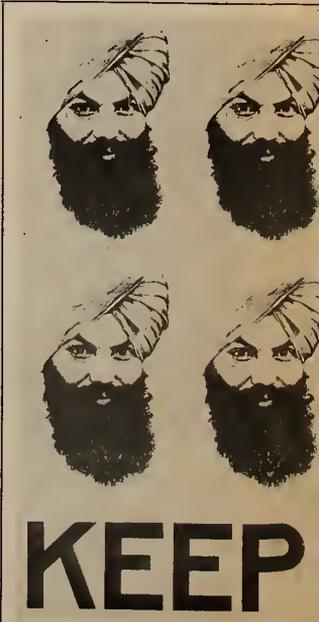

Kirpal, whose name means "kindness", elaborated, "The given names have a completely different vibratory effect. They mean something you try to live up to." She sees the process of name-changing and the wearing of white as "a way to expand . . . It's creating a whole new set of situations you can grow into."

A tall, lithe man enters the room as we talk and sits down with an engaging smile, "Hi, I'm Gurutej."

Ted Gurutej Singh Steiner is the director of 3HO Canada. He is a registered masseur and teaches several of the Foundation's classes. He and his wife are also provincially recognized Sikh ministers, and as such may perform legal marriages. He speaks frankly about 3HO and himself. While studying history and political science at the University of Kansas, he became a "political activist", and was subsequently expelled for his involvement. Not surprisingly, he is disillusioned with the institution of university, and especially its precepts.

"University students in general are selling out; your main sell-out years are between 18 and 22. To sell out is realizing that there's

Revolution

Kirpal Kaur

maintenance and gardening for such clients as Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey. (For such manual labour, dark clothes and turbans are worn.)

The 3HO also runs an ashram on Palmerston Ave. where men, women and children live communally. Unmarried couples sleep separately; the Yogi feels that too many competitive games start to happen with "uncommitted" sex. According to Kirpal, pre-marital sex is "not needed". She says, "The yoga we do helps channel frustrated sexual energy to higher centres. Society is crumbling because everyone is gratifying their sensual desires." Unlike other disciplines, marital sex is condoned outside of procreation. It is seen as a form of union, "not only on a physical level, but a spiritual level."

There are approximately 40 members in the ashram, and the only requirement Gurutej Singh makes for admission is that "you have to be serious about experimenting with a life style that requires service." New members are attracted to the ashram through yoga classes, through a "change in consciousness", and there are few drop-outs. "People are attracted to a healthy life".

500 YEARS OF SPIRITUAL SOCIALISM

Service plays a very important role in the lives of 3HO members. Says Kirpal, "We live together and work together and we try to expand our consciousness, but the base is learning how to serve people, serve the society." Gurutej adds, "We practise a lifestyle set down 500 years ago - spiritual socialism."

The principles of the 3HO are founded on those of the Sikhs, an East Indian sect. Gurutej stresses that, within the 3HO, "Sikhism is a science as opposed to a system of tradition." When one joins the 3HO, one is "joining a lifestyle, not an organization." He differentiates between the 3HO and other groups, and dismisses transcendental meditation as a serious pursuit.

"They say if you do 20 minutes a day, far-out, but we're not into that." He doesn't condemn smoking and drinking, but feels that maintaining such habits while doing TNM is inconsistent. "Don't give up anything until you have a replacement", Singh says, offering 3HO as an alternative.

The Foundation is not merely a group of turbaned freaks, as many people see them, but an active social force. Funded by a grant from the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate, (a branch of National Health and Welfare), the foundation investigated alternatives to drugs use such as massage for psychological benefits and the use of herbs as medicine.

Our conversation draws to a close and I ask Gurutej if he has anything in particular he wishes to add.

"To be truly spiritual today means you also have to be political; a political revolutionary calling for a complete transformation for society. The ideal is the compassionate, socially and politically sensitive individual ready to sacrifice for people. This must be done in the name of a universal truth that exists beyond all time, beyond all problems and beyond all duality. The spiritual revolutionists see the entire world within themselves. In this lies their power to create change."

Breath of Fire

something wrong in what you're doing, but failing to have the courage to go beyond the norm of society to find alternatives which mean risk and sacrifice."

LEARNING ABOUT LIFE AND DEATH

"In the university, people don't ask about the universe; no one ever brings up their universal identity. They don't teach you to explore your life at university."

He warms to the subject and continues, "We're interested in education. We are aware of the fact that 20th century education leaves out the main ingredient of learning; what's not taught is how all the things learned apply to one's self. People are taught to use their mind, but not how to understand pain, how to deal with death or sex or how to eat. Nobody's trained to cope with the problems that the New Society brings."

He offers the 3HO as an option. "It is an alternate lifestyle, and we're offering alternative education. It teaches technical knowhow of how to change the course of your life; a different way to relate to yourself in society."

Gurutej admits that the 3HO lifestyle is "very North American in its appeal to people who have benefited from technology; people who have the material independence to pursue past materialism." He is not against materialism, "I think possessions are fine", but sees it as a means to an end.

The 3HO labels itself as a "non-profit charitable educational organization." They run a bookstore, snack bar (honey ice-cream is a specialty), and Golden Temple Conscious Foods, "a family shop supplying natural foods, aquarian books, herbal remedies. Plants and natural hygienic products." The foundation also runs a landscaping business, doing

Who the hell is Harold?

By BEA HAMPSON

An economic historian, social scientist and a rabid Canadian nationalist, Harold Innis (1894-1952) had at the time of his death, "an international reputation equalled by that of no other Canadian scholar," according to Donald Crighton, his biographer, and a world renowned historian in his own right.

Innis was in many ways a radical, years ahead of his time.

In 1942 Innis played an important role in stopping the Mackenzie King government from conscripting university students, stressing that academic training was vital for the survival of a society.

Harold Innis was also very critical of Federal policy, especially in the area of Canadian commercial relations with the United States. He said, "There is very little intellectual atmosphere around the place (meaning Ottawa), and one feels how much we have lost to the United States. We follow along and kid ourselves we are our own masters." How little things have changed on the Canadian scene.

Harold Innis believed the development of communications technology was the essential key to progress. In his works, he illustrated this thesis with examples from all periods of history. His analysis ranged from studying the effects the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway had on industrialization and urbanization in Canada, to the impact the invention of the cuneiform tablets and papyrus had on the ancient Babylonian and Egyptian civilizations.

Certainly to students, one of the most important contributions Harold Innis made to twentieth century society was his firm and very vocal belief in the vital importance of the university tradition. For him the university tradition, the tradition of scholarship, and of free and critical inquiry, was the essence of Western civilization.

He studied at McMaster, Toronto and the University of Chicago. Returning to the U of T in 1920 as a lecturer in political science, Innis's talents were soon recognized and he rose quickly in the academic world becoming head of the department and then Dean of the Faculty of Graduate Studies in 1947.

At the founding ceremony of Innis College in 1964, Dean of Arts and Schéche, Vincent Bladen said:

"The Innis tradition, a tradition at once austere anduring is more than a body of teaching for the guidance of undergraduates in their studies; it is also a set of distinctive and lofty standards and a critical and independent outlook on public affairs. It is to be hoped that the Innis tradition will be honoured not merely in words but also in deeds."

It is precisely this tradition and the goals it stands for that the students and staff of Innis College have endeavored to follow for the last twelve years.

One Month Late for $8 Million

In an interview early this week, Art Wood emphasized that the new academic building would be fulfilling two important functions. It would provide the space and facilities that were desperately needed by the college. And, he intimated, that the presence of a permanent structure would serve to legitimize the status of Innis as a college.

It was obvious from the beginning, in 1964, that Innis College would need a permanent home. Why did it take nearly twelve years for Innis to get that home?

Former principal, Robin Harris blames the Provincial governments anti-inflationary policy in 1968 as the chief cause of the delays. The new budget at Queen's Park froze all money for capital expenditures, and thereby vetoed the allowance of funds for construction.

Until 1968 it was part of the provincial government's policy to allocate funds to colleges for construction. Harris maintains that if Innis had submitted his request to Queen's park a month earlier, the requested sum of $8,000,000 for the award winning Massey-Flanders design for Innis College would have been approved.

This is a frustrating thought for a man who spent four futile years of negotiations to have building plans approved by the city and the university and who has already secured the site for construction.

The university of Toronto played a vitally important role in 1968. It dipped into its private resources and agreed to supply funds for a building for Innis college. A precedent was set!

"The university bent over backwards to help us all," said Art Wood.

The university was unable to put up the total amount required to build the Hart-Massey design. Economic constraints necessitated a new plan for Innis college.

The Diamond-Myers plan was substituted for the Massey Flanders design. The Massey plan for two sixteen storey residence towers were omitted.

The basic plan was a low rise academic building, which would incorporate some of the existing victorian houses in the area, for later use as potential residences.

There is some disagreement between Art Wood and former principal Robin Harris about the potential merits of each design.

Wood feels that the original design "had it been built, would have been the best of its time." Prof. Harris shows more insight when he says the "style of the campus has changed since 1968."

Harris emphasizes that "today's students would not put up with the conditions of high-rise apartment dwellings."

Harris went as far as to say that "it's lucky, in a way, that the government did put the freeze on."

In general, the staff and students of Innis college are pleased about the physical appearance of the new building.

One of the most pleasant qualities of the structure is the way in which it complements the streetscape. The gables on the new building resemble those on the Victorian houses and the building's low profile blends in well with its setting.

Some students complained about the very functional and almost too practical look of the building's exterior, criticizing the fact that the air-conditioning pipes were left exposed.

However Art Wood points out that the pragmatic look of the structure was in part deliberate. He says, it is a reflection of Harold Innis' philosophy, where in "technology becomes very much a part of the aesthetic quality of a building."

Any exterior drawbacks are more than compensated inside. Large windows and skylights give an attractive illusion of light and space.

Some concern was expressed by student president Mike Friend over the administration of student services, like the snack bar and the pub. He feared the university's handling of these services might lead to higher prices.

Eli Marcus was a little sad at having to leave behind the entertainment and mealy graffiti of the Vladimir House residence washroom. He cheered up a little when friend Perry Rosenblatt reminded him that this would be compensated by the use of two additional pinball machines.

But the main concerns of students, although they were generally enthusiastic about the whole thing, centred around the effects of newness and sterility on the surrounding community.

"Innis has always been a place for people, not things."

Will the traditionally closely knit and highly spirited Innis community survive the switch?

The leaky first home of the Innis experiment.

Will the real Innis College please stand up -

What will the future of historic MacDonald-Mowat house.

The new building: People who live in glass houses shouldn't.

Mickey-Mouse House?

Innis has survived. Despite the fact that it lacks the prestige and tradition of the federated colleges and the ominous labyrinth structure of New, the other constituent college. Without a permanent home, and housed in the cramped quarters of the Macdonald-Mowat and Vladimir homes, Innis College has not only survived but thrived during the past twelve years.

Innis was unique from the beginning. Founded in 1964, it is the only college on the campus in which all decisions on any policy are made by committees with equal staff-student representation. This precedent in administration has been an organizational success. Members of Innis College also feel that it has served as an example to promote the development of further cooperation in staff-student relations in the university community at large.

The "mickey-mouse" reputation Innis has for its academics is in part attributable to the experimental and innovative nature of its course program, says Art Wood assistant to the principal at Innis.

Wood goes on to say, however, that the recent changes in Innis's academic policy which involves stricter supervision and control of its Independent Studies programs "will no longer leave the college open to the charge of being 'mickey mouse'!"

Last year's Memorandum of Understanding has allowed Innis to expand its academic program. Specialist and minor programmes in Urban and Cinema studies as well as new course offerings in Drama, environmental studies and Canadian Culture studies are some of these additions.

Grades Up Involvement down

By BEAU BELLES
 Monday's meeting of the General Committee of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science took on an ominous tone right from the opening minutes.

Only ten students had come forward to claim a handful of the twenty-four open seats in the fall by-elections.

Arts and science Dean Robert Greene did not enliven proceedings with his report from the committee on Academic Standings. In an effort to allay Committee fears over the "moderate escalation of grades" in recent years, Greene was able to report a marginal decline in average grades of about one per cent in 74-75. An "average grade" in a course now hovers around 71 per cent.

Greene also reported that twenty-five courses with large enrollments had submitted final results last Spring in which over forty per cent of the class had received A's. The chairman of the departments responsible had been sent letters asking them to account for this untoward scholastic benevolence.

Associate Registrar, Prof. M.G. Finlayson wanted to know if the same questions had been asked of those courses which awarded a disproportionately low number of A's.

SMC President Father John Kelly expressed the belief that escalating grade averages reflected the increased admission standards of past years.

Greene replied that although heavy competition to enter certain courses raised the academic standards of those courses, and despite the higher calibre of students entering the university today, he felt the mood of the General Committee was for a halt in the upward movements of grades and prices.

Dayan has no audiences

By SHARON STEVENSON
Leading Israeli spokesman Moshe Dayan cannot find many platforms throughout the world, said Peter Gibson at a meeting organized by the Ad Hoc Committee to Support the Just Struggle of the Palestinian and Other Arab Peoples.

Gibson told the Monday meeting the Palestinian fight for their homeland is "part and parcel of the struggles throughout the Third World for liberation."

The Palestinians have occupied the territory of Palestine throughout the past two thousand years, Gibson said, resisting the aggression of the West during the Crusades, the Ottoman empire, and the British mandate in the Middle East, he said.

"The Palestinians developed agricultural activity and exported both olive oil and oranges," said Gibson. "When the Ottoman Empire was broken up in 1917, the vast majority of Palestine's inhabitants were Arabs," he said.

"The population also included some Jews who had lived peacefully side by side with the Arabs for centuries," he said. He added other Zionist Jews arrived in the decades preceding 1917.

"Every religious group, Muslims, Jews and Christians, living in Palestine co-existed peacefully until the Zionist movement was organized on a large scale," said Gibson.

Committee member Paul Mackay said Theodore Herzl, founder of Zionism, organized to obtain the support of the imperialist powers. "As early as the 1840's, Lord Strassbourg was advocating the development of a British protectorate in the Middle East," said Mackay. "In 1917, the Balfour Declaration supported the setting up of a Jewish national home in the Middle East. It did not guarantee the ongoing political rights of the non-Jewish population, who were over 90 per cent of the population of Palestine."

Mackay said "Arabs were forced out, denied rights, Arab goods were boycotted, only Jews were hired to work the land, and settlers were brought onto the lands of the Arab people by the British," he added.

Mackay said the Zionists went to any lengths to create public opinion for the formation of Israel. "Two hundred and forty Jewish refugees from Nazism were murdered by a bomb planted by an officer of the Haganah on the ship the Patria in Haifa harbour in 1940," he claimed.

After the 1947 UN partition of Palestine, the Zionist terrorist organizations stepped up their attacks on the Arabs in Palestine in order to drive them out and gain more territory, said Mackay. "Moshe Dayan participated in the territorial expansion of Israel and the expulsion and suppression of the Palestinians." In the 1948 war, 300,000 Arabs were expelled, and there are now one million Palestinian refugees, he said.

"Israel is a colonial power — the occupiers of the land and robbers and stealers of the Palestinian homeland," said Mackay. "Britain, the U.S. and Soviet social imperialism have all fought for hegemony in the Middle East," he said. "The Zionists played a role in assisting them."

One audience member objected to the presentation and claimed the Zionists brought different facts to bear on the history of the Middle East.

OTTAWA (CUP) International Women's Year in Canada may have lauded and applauded females across the nation, but "the rights of these women have not been assured and their needs have not been met," says the Ottawa Women's Centre collective.

To protest the lack of effective government action on women's issues, the Ottawa Women's Centre, together with other women's groups and interested organizations such as CARAL, Voice of Women, Gays of Ottawa, and Women's Career Counselling, is organizing a march October 25, to coincide with the federal government's announcement of its achievements this year on behalf of Canadian women.

The march will protest ineffective and extravagant spending in lieu of acting upon equal pay for equal work; access to free quality child care; safe, effective birth control for all; and equal job opportunities. Other neglected issues of concern include equal rights in marriage and property law, removal of abortion from the criminal code, equal custody rights for lesbian mothers and the inclusion of sexual orientation in the Human Rights Code.

About five million dollars (or 50 cents for every female Canadian) has been spent by the federal government on International Women's Year.

"Much of this money has gone into setting up the IWY Secretariat and funding elaborate publicity campaigns and conferences," claims the Ottawa collective, asking how this benefits the working mother with poor daycare facilities in her area, the university graduate who cannot land a job unless she types, or the female worker who is paid less than her male counterpart.

"Most of us would rather this public display of concern be replaced with real, lawful solutions," says the collective.

Desk Apology

Scarborough No. 1

Scarborough College absolutely destroyed Forestry, (and that is the only way to describe it) by the hideous score of 53-0, on Wed. Sept. 24.

The latest prediction for the outcome of the season is as follows. Scarborough over New in the final.

A second apology is also necessary. In the Monday issue of The Varsity, (Oct. 6) the football story entitled "Our Farewell To Frank" was cut short.

The fact remains that Frank Tindall, the Queen's coach is retiring this year, and the Varsity Blues, among others, are just not giving him a happy final year as a football coach.

Finally, any students interested in writing for the sports page and making money doing it please call the number at the top of the page.

The sports desk owes the Scarborough College Football Team "Educated Animals" an apology. About two weeks ago there occurred a temporary break in the 'interface information grapevine'. The result was that this desk omitted an interface score, but more important, we erred in a football prediction. We would now like to take the time to apologize to Scarborough as well as to 're-predict' the Division 'B' outcome.

Ladies Are No. 1

By KATHY STEWART

The University of Guelph hosted the Annual Early Field Hockey Tournament last weekend. Among the most exciting matches were those in which the U of T Lady Blues competed. With only one goal scored against them in a seven game tournament, the women tied with McGill for first place. Their strong offence and unyielding defence combined for an unbeatable team against most of the opposition.

In the first match against York, the Toronto team led all the way with a handy 3-0 victory. Scorers were Diana Millar and Nancy half to get on the Scoreboard against Westerb, but Barb Smith and Carol MacDougall connected for Toronto giving the team a 2-0 win. Waterloo held the ladies to a scoreless tie but the ladies came back in the next game with a 3-0 victory over Queen's. (Millar, Hofland)

On Sunday, McGill managed a 1-0 win over Toronto and afterwards Toronto blanked Guelph 1-0 in a game that was decided with only minutes to go (Cathy Brown).

All the teams that compete in the Ontario finals were represented at Guelph, but certainly the team to watch this year will be the women from U of T.

U of T Sports Roundup

Blues Football

This Friday at 8:00 p.m. The Blues host York under the lights at Varsity Stadium.

The Yeoman coming off their first win of the season last Saturday, are expected to be flying high for the cross-town encounter. York lost its first three games by very narrow margins while the Blues are still undefeated after four games.

Coach Ron Murphy is concerned about this game for a number of reasons. "First, York always plays their best football against us, and second I am concerned that while they will be higher than kites — we may be looking ahead to our game next week against Ottawa".

It comes down to an important game for both teams. York must win to keep any chance of a playoff berth alive and Varsity must win to keep pace with Ottawa leading to their showdown on October 18th.

U of T Golf

Varsity golfers placed second in the sectional meet at Queens trailing the host school by seven strokes. By virtue of the finish however, they qualified for this week's championships at the National Club here in Toronto.

Rug.-Row.-Run

The Rugby team visits York on Wednesday. The Yeoman are usually a strong side and the Blues must come up with a good effort. The Rowers are hosting a regatta at the Argonaut Club on Saturday. The Track team is travelling to Waterloo for an Invitational Meet at 11:00 in Seagram Stadium on Friday and on Saturday and Cross Country team is hosting a run at Sunnybrook.

Archery Bullseye

The early morning frost-bitten practices have once again produced a winning women's archery team. Last Saturday the team handily defeated Guelph, Queen's and Western by an overwhelming 300 point margin, with Toronto's team total being 3,013.

Individual placings were also encouraging with Guelph's Linda Kazianko taking first place, but the Toronto team capturing the next four placings. (M. Challis, K. Cercian, B. Gliener.)

In two weeks time the team will be travelling to Queen's for the championship tournament. Good Luck Girls!

Palestinian calls for armed struggle

By BOB BETTSON

The goals of the Palestinian people, a people illegally deprived of their homeland, will only be served by an armed liberation struggle to create a non-sectarian democratic state, according to Dr. Ibrahim Abu-Lughod.

Abu-Lughod was speaking to an audience of 200 at a SAC sponsored forum last night. He said the Palestinian people and their representative organization the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) have gained increasingly widespread support for their struggle for liberation of their homeland.

This culminated, he said, in recognition of the PLO by the United Nations for observer status in the UN, and resolutions passed supporting the right of the Palestinians to self-determination. Abu-Lughod, a professor of political science at Northwestern University, said he was not speaking for the PLO but said the PLO, although not a government does represent the Palestinian people, enjoying active support.

Abu-Lughod said the PLO is experiencing unprecedented success on the international scene, and is recognized by 105 countries, more than recognize Israel.

Yet, Abu-Lughod said, Israel continues to refuse to even acknowledge the Palestinians as a people. He referred to a 1969 statement by then Prime Minister Golda Meir that "there is no Palestinian people."

Yet Abu-Lughod said before the artificial creation of Israel, 93 per cent of the people in Palestine were non-Jewish. "Palestinians have since become the invisible man," he said. "We have never been recognized as human beings."

Yet when Palestine was dismembered to create Israel in 1948 there were 1.4 million Palestinian Arabs, he said. Now there are 3.5 million scattered throughout the Middle East, more than the number of Israeli Jews.

Abu-Lughod said the main characteristic of the Palestinian people is they are young, modern and highly educated. They form "a highly cohesive national community" despite their fragmentation, he said.

Palestinians today form an important part in the Arab national community and are in the forefront of radical movements within Arab countries, he said. This sometimes brings harsh measures from governments within these countries.

Abu-Lughod said the present main current of Palestinian thought is united in its pursuit of restoration of their national homeland, patterning the struggle on other third world national liberation movements.

In answer to questions from the audience, Abu-Lughod said the PLO does not condone terrorism but does support armed struggle for liberation from Israel, which now exists on land to which it has no legal right.

SAC will support library strike

By MIKE SCOTT

SAC will support the library workers demands for a new wage contract following a decision made by general council Wednesday night.

Debate on the issue saw the Council divided on the question of support for the workers as the motion carried 21-16.

Council members supporting the motion voted on the issue of the library workers is directly connected to the fight against education spending cutbacks, and thus they should be vigorously supported in their demands for a fair contract.

SAC Women's Commissioner Shirley French pointed out that university wages are not comparable to those in the outside community. "Starting salaries for U of T library workers are $250 a month less than those of City library workers," she stressed, adding, "The poor wages that exist now make it hard to attract and hold onto qualified staff."

According to a spokesman for the library workers, the staff shortage is already beginning to directly affect students at U of T. A lot of new books the library has received in the past few months are not reaching the stacks due to a lack of staff to process them, he said.

SAC reps opposing the motion felt the university is justified in not conceding to the wage demands of the library workers, claiming all sectors of the university are facing the same financial dilemma.

However SAC Internal assistant Kevin Kellcher said university belt tightening might be premature as provincial funding does not come down until late this year. "The university could be using this time to press the government for increased financial assistance," he added.

"People at this university should not be accepting the administration's financial belt tightening blindly," said SAC

Communications Commissioner John Tuzyk.

In other business, council ratified a SAC executive motion to withdraw from the Common Front because the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA), another member group of the alliance, would not support SAC's motion to oppose tuition fee increases at a recent meeting of the Common Front.

In a surprise move, Ontario Public Research Group spokesman John Bee withdrew a request for a referendum which was to decide whether students wanted the research to be established here. He said the group would wait until it had established a broader base on smaller campuses.

The council also accepted the resignation of External Affairs Commissioner Ross Wells, and acclaimed Heather-Gwynne Thomas as the new Education Commissioner.

Innis fest offers gazpacho in rain

By CAITLINKELLY

The engraved invitations were sent out a week ahead of time. They read, "The Principal and Members of Innis College invite you to join them on Thursday October 9 at 4:00 pm for a Thanksgiving Benefit to celebrate the new Innis College Permanent Building."

An auction, street dance, barbeque, tours and a carnival were planned, and a striped pavilion was set up behind Robarts Library in readiness for the hordes that would descend.

They didn't. The afternoon was cold, grey and drizzly. The pavilion was half-filled, but the barkers were loud enough to give an impression of bustling activity. In CNE style, they urged curious bystanders to "Try the horse game! A winner every time!"

At the opposite side of the tent, Innis staff were selling baked goods at inflated prices. Sponge cake with a rummy icing was a little too chewy at 50 cents a slice, and the cheesecake was beyond my range at $1. Jars of gazpacho and relish were going for $1 to $1.50, but all for a good cause. A kerchiefed woman, looking more tired than exotic, sat beneath a sign proclaiming her as Madame Sosotris, feminist, who would read your I Ching or tell your fortune for 50 cents.

The best bargain was the T-shirts. Designed and silk-screened by Innis College members, they went for $3, but were well worth the cost. A humanized sink in red latex stood atop the words, "Kitchen Sink Fund", imprinted on white cotton. Beside the T-shirt table stood the actual kitchen sink. It too had a sign above it pleading for donations. A dollar bill was taped to the cardboard as a hint.

The goal of the kitchen sink campaign is $50,000 to "provide the essentials which are still needed for the new building". On the north-west corner of St. George and Sussex, the building is due to open in January 1976. Due to the government freeze on capital spending, the college must be financed by private university resources. Unfortunately, they don't exist.

A slick little booklet entitled "Innis College Comes Home" found its way into the office, complete with fish-eye views and avocado headlines. It promises the new building to be "a valuable physical resource", and makes its pitch: "The College needs desks, chairs, sofas, study tables, sound and projection equipment, lamps, lockers and bookshelves."

But these forebodings didn't seem to worry the crowd gathered in the pavilion. They wandered sampling the cake and inspecting the tables at the far end of the tent, laden with a large and strange collection of objects.

These pieces were for the "lavish auction" to start at 7:00 pm. Included were such delights as a weekend at The Hyatt Hotel, raccoon heads, 3 pairs of skates, 11 Reader's Digest hardcovers and a Givency tie. Several professors donated their time and talents. A sampling: frisbee lessons by U of T president John Evans, a fitness program designed by Bruce Kidd, free legal advice to the ticket-prone from Law Dean Martin Friedland, an hour-long jazz concert and even a gallon of home-made wine.

The mood was one of optimism, a little forced, but enthusiastic nonetheless. With a little help from a pub in Robarts basement, spirits were high, and everyone seemed to have a good time. Even if the auction didn't sell everything, no doubt Innis College will find a use for a concrete canoe.

Students' voice on Canada loans Plan called "an inappropriate suggestion"

OTTAWA (CUP) — The request by the National Union of Students (NUS) for student representation on the Canada Student Loans Plan is "an inappropriate suggestion," according to the chairperson of that group.

David Levin, the chairperson of the CSLPG and the director of the federal finance department's Federal-Provincial Relations Division, said in a September 30 interview the NUS request will be considered at the October meeting of the Group, but stated that he opposed including students in the group.

The Planary Group sets the rules governing who will get student loans and how much they will get. It presently consists only of student aid officers from the federal and provincial governments, meets annually in closed session, and releases no information about its discussions or activities.

"Here are a bunch of administrators — civil servants — getting together trying to scratch their heads on how to improve the (student loan) program working within the constraints they have to, and I don't think it would help the work we do to have students or any other group of people involved in our work. At that stage we're in a different world," Levin explained.

He described the role of the Planary as being "to arrive at nationally acceptable standard practices with respect to the administration of student loans" but conceded that "administration" included "substantive policy matters" determining the nature of the program.

While noting that the "bulk of the decision-making" about student loan policy involves the Planary Group, Levin said he sees no role there for student representatives. "Student organizations always have the opportunity to make representations with respect to particular program changes," he said, suggesting that NUS should "submit a brief" if it wanted, rather than seek representation.

Submitting briefs, he said, is "part of our traditional way of doing things" and stressed that it is not usual to include people affected by government programs in the decision-making process itself, citing areas of health care and welfare policy as examples.

According to Levin, if students have anything to say about student aid, they should direct their attention to the provincial governments, not to the Planary Group he chairs.

"I equate students with the ministers not with the civil servants," he said. "Where there are basic policy issues that have to be decided, proposals to be put forward, then students have to have contact with the (provincial) ministers of education."

The process he favours has student groups submitting student aid proposals to provincial ministers, who may decide to raise them at the Planary Group, if they do, and if the Planary approves the proposal, it is then returned to all the provinces for approval. Finally, if the provinces approve, it is returned to the federal finance minister for final decision. Once the change has been decided, Levin said, only then could it be made known to the students and the public.

According to Levin, the federal government plays only a passive role in student loan policy formulation, even though it is a federal program, while the initiative for policy development comes from the provinces.

He agrees that students "might have a point" in arguing that they cannot make adequate representation about possible student loan policy changes since the present secrecy blanketing the decision-making process prevents them from knowing what, if any, changes are being considered.

But although the existing procedures "may be imperfect" as far as student input is concerned, Levin feels that students are dissatisfied with the opportunities they now have to communicate their concerns, then they have to go to the provinces and say "as you people formulate suggestions for changing this program we want an opportunity to participate." Levin said this is "a way of improving the input of students."

As for students being seated on the Planary Group, that will be on the agenda for the upcoming meeting of the group, and is in the hands of the provinces, Levin said. When asked if NUS would be given an opportunity to address the meeting, as requested, Levin replied: "I don't think we could do that. There's first a matter of time. The agendas are fairly long usually and, as I say, my own view is that it is not a good thing to do. It is not done in these kinds of situations and would create a bad precedent. It would really foul up the discussions of the Planary."

The Planary is scheduled to meet in Ottawa on October 22, according to finance department sources.

Fight erupts at Dayan UBC speech

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A fist fight and alternating shouts supporting Israel and the Palestinian people punctuated retired general Moshe Dayan's speech at the University of British Columbia on October 1.

Two persons were ejected during the 35-minute speech in which Dayan told the largely partisan audience of 1,000 that Mideast hostilities will only cease with a commitment by Israel's enemies.

Security was tight in the student union ballroom as Dayan, known for his military successes in three of Israel's four wars with its neighbours, called for an end to the state of war between Egypt, Syria, and the Soviet Union and Israel.

"What is needed before anything else is a clear commitment by Egypt, Syria, and the Soviet Union to end the state of war," he said, pinning blame for the continuation of hostilities on Israel's enemies.

Dayan said that "no real meaning" existed behind the favourable response given last year by the United Nations to Palestinian Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat. The PLO was a terrorist group which could only be dealt with by violence the general said, reflecting "hard-line" Israeli thinking.

Dayan also expressed dissatisfaction with the recently negotiated agreement with Egypt. He said a better accord could be reached if Arabs and Israelis negotiated directly, rather than through the U.S.

Masada financing withdrawn

By MOSES GREENBLATT
Without any student consultation, funding for the Zionist student publication 'Masada' has been withdrawn following their controversial first issue.

Vice-president of National Bnai Brith, Don Jubas told an emotionally taut meeting of U of T Hillel students council that Bnai Brith was no longer willing to fund the publication under its present editorship.

Jubas' statement followed a motion carried by the student council to continue funding the paper, and to allow it complete editorial freedom.

The Jewish Student Federation (JSF) at York University, co-sponsors of 'Masada,' later informed the editors that they too had withdrawn financial support. Geoff Clarfield co-editor of the magazine stated that Lou Garber, the Executive Director of JSF had passed judgement arbitrarily, without consulting Masada staff and disregarding wide student support for the magazine.

Speaking on behalf of Bnai Brith Jubas said the first Masada issue contained an article about Federal Housing Minister Barney Danson, a prominent member of the Jewish Community, which was disgraceful and potentially libelous.

Clarfield conceded that the JSF withdrew funds for the same reason. But Doidge, his editorial partner, added, "Masada is aggressively Jewish and proud of it. The Jewish community at large (including Danson) is afraid and ashamed of its Jewishness. This is all we wanted to point out in the article."

The second issue of the magazine was halted on Thursday Oct. 2 as it went to press. A phone call from Hillel Director Ben Mayer informed the printers that no money could be provided for its publication.

Doidge commented "Hillel has repeatedly responded passively to the bombardment of anti-Jewish propaganda on campus. They would rather have Masada fall and use its funds to nourish another coffee house. This is their watered down approach to Zionism and Jewishness."

What particularly upset Doidge at this meeting was Hillel Director Ben Mayer referring to the Masada editorial collective as "pigs". "This could only decrease the already withering student support for Hillel", he added.

The Masada staff said they were "shocked and dismayed" at the treatment accorded them by Mayer and Garber. One member frankly admitted that after devoting a full summer of work for the magazine for no remuneration, "I was tired of being shlt upon by these guys."

Garber later explained in a letter that funds would be reinstated if three items were fulfilled:

- The formation of an editorial board
- The development of an editorial policy.

- The "broadening of input"
- When asked to comment, Clarfield replied that:
- An editorial board does exist, they only want a board of their own design.
 - An editorial policy certainly exists, which is stated on the inside cover of the magazine, and this Zionist policy makes the bureaucrats uncomfortable.
 - Broadening of input obviously refers to their desire for future control of contents which up to now have been pursued in a free and democratic manner.
 - "Bnai Brith tried to offer the students money for a publication without editorial freedom." Doidge explained. "They want the students to pussyfoot when it comes to Jewish self-defense. The students rejected the loaded proposal for obvious reasons."

Several Hillel members said they were astonished at Jubas' suggestions. Many admitted this was the first time they realized that council decisions were not binding on the Hillel foundation and that they were only considered a consultative body.

Immediately following the fiery meeting, editors Morman Doidge and Geoff Clarfield said the paper would continue to publish no matter what, because student and private support had not been withdrawn.

GAA backs library workers

By KRISTINE KING
U of T library workers have the full support of the Graduate Assistants' Association.

In an organizational meeting Wednesday night the GAA passed a motion to support efforts of CUPE 1230 to win a contract offering better working conditions and fair wages for library workers. The GAA recommends that in the event of a strike teaching assistants hold elsewhere classes regularly scheduled in Robarts Library and refrain from assigning work that would require students to use libraries where workers are on strike.

GAA members elected a new executive, filled open positions on their bargaining team and set eleven contract priorities in preparation for their next confrontation with the University on October 20.

President Jay Drydyk said it is very important for faculty and students to consider GAA priorities because they aim to improve learning conditions.

The GAA will ask that the number of tutorials and laboratories not be cut back and will negotiate for a maximum class size.

Drydyk said it is important to students that tutorials be maintained, and said English class sizes are rising. One department, he said, has already cut back, holding tutorials every other week.

The GAA wants to eliminate all inequalities in pay scales of teaching assistants. The association represents all U of T teaching assistants and about one-third are members.

Another priority is a substantial pay increase to compensate for losses in previous years. The GAA will also request a 5-year contract.

Negotiations will also focus on establishing a ratio of contact hours (with students) to total hours worked. In the case of seminars the GAA will require 2:10 hours per week and 5:10 in the labs.

This written clause would ensure that no assistant works more than he or she was hired to do.

Complete job security and fair hiring and firing procedures are also major considerations in the contract.

Heap assails Council

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
"Don't take no for an answer," city alderman Dan Heap told members of the Committee of Interpreting and Social Services for Portuguese Wednesday night.

His remark came after describing to the group how his attempts to obtain council support for the Interpreting Services had been defeated 6 to 1.

He told the elderly audience: "We're getting the run-around at Metro council. We have not been able to convince council of its responsibility."

Aginaldo Rego, a worker at the translation service described how the body had been very active in the past while operating on funds from the federal government.

"We do a lot of translating over the phone" he said. "We help city hall, day care, mental retardation centres and, we service doctors themselves." Later in the evening he told press representatives "If you stick around for my speech, I'll mention even more agencies."

Although the group had invited members from all major media to what they had described as a press conference, only the Varsity and the ethnic press attended. The C.B.C. arrived an hour late. Rego charged, "The media is ignoring us."

Valter Lopes, chairman of the meeting, read a communique to the press in Portuguese. Bob Spencer, a member of the Board of Education, expressed the board's support for the group's attempts to receive government funding. The group had invited Robert Welch and Premier Davis but neither could attend the meeting. Although places were left at the head table for these men, Davis' chair was soon filled by Heap.

A number of opposition MPP's attended, but only NDP member Ross McLellan sat at the head table. In a press release he distributed, McLellan expressed his "deep concern" for the Interpreting Services plight and suggested that Wintario funds be taken away from multi-cultural projects and distributed to the group.

Rego outlined the services' activities numerically, based on a fact sheet he had prepared for presentation to the press. When questioned, he admitted only about six people actually were connected with the service, in addition to "another twenty on the periphery". He claimed the group still managed to "service 10,000 individuals, put out 12,000 pamphlets, and answer 26,000 inquiries."

Lopes, after presenting the group's situation and introducing politicians attending the meeting in Portuguese, told the press "Bear with us if you're not able to understand what's going on."

The conference concluded as Heap explained to the group that he disagreed with the policy of "help" from government. "If you push on unilaterally I believe you can win it. You have a strong case," he told them.

Free fitness testing for students

By MIKE SCOTT

In an attempt to motivate students to develop a better fitness attitude, the University of Toronto Athletic Association (UTAA) is once again sponsoring Physical Fitness Testing on the half-landing at Hart House.

The fitness testing is open to all students of the University and is free of charge for those who have a U of T athletic membership. Non-members pay a $6 service charge.

Fitness testing co-ordinator Joe Rabel says the object of the testing is to give a student a physical profile of himself.

The testing is comprised of four main components: body weight, body strength, cardiovascular endurance and recovery heart rate. The results of these measurements form the physical fitness profile. Based on these results a diet and exercise program is prescribed to the student to improve his or her fitness profile.

On entering the fitness test a student's excess body fat is measured with calipers to determine the percentage of body fat to total body weight. "The recommended percentage of body fat for university males and females is 9 per cent and 14 per cent respectively," says Rabel. Body strength is then measured with a handgrip dynamometer, and serves as an index of total body strength.

In testing cardiovascular endurance, the student performs a bicycle stress test at three different levels of resistance. The physical work capacity of the student is then given as a measure of kilopond metres per minute. The recovery heart rate following the bicycle test is also noted and serves as a measure of heart and lung efficiency.

Statistics from last year's fitness testing showed that 75 per cent of all males and 50 per cent of all females who took the test were deemed fit.

Students taking the fitness test are encouraged to return for another testing after applying their diet and exercise program. "This gives them an indication their progress in reaching an ideal physical fitness profile," says Rabel.

Students interested in taking the fitness test can make an appointment at Hart House, Room 108 or call 928-3084.

The Bathone Health Group will hold a public meeting and film on the subject of mercury poisoning tonight 8 pm in Med Sci room 3153.

The Varsity will not publish Monday due to an outbreak of pumpkin pie in the office. Just one more thing to be thankful for on Thanksgiving. Our condolences to all the turkeys.

Our apologies to all those who were axed from the Here and Now column in the last issue. Strictly a technical problem and no slight intended.

Students will no longer grovel

Surprise! Students have been opening their OSAP envelopes lately to discover nice round zeros being offered by the provincial government where there had been hopes of at least a small loan. Not a particularly good way to start out the day.

It used to be only mildly annoying to be confronted with government indifference to the student financing situation, but now that the government seems to have declared outright war on the student population it seems a proper time for public resistance to their financing policy.

The government resents students. We don't contribute to the economy in any outstanding way, we lay around in libraries and read all day and we ask for money without offering anything in return. Furthermore if you don't placate us with subsistence allowances, chances are we'll end up on the welfare rolls or living in Rochdale shooting junk. So the government sighs and hands out money that it would rather spend elsewhere.

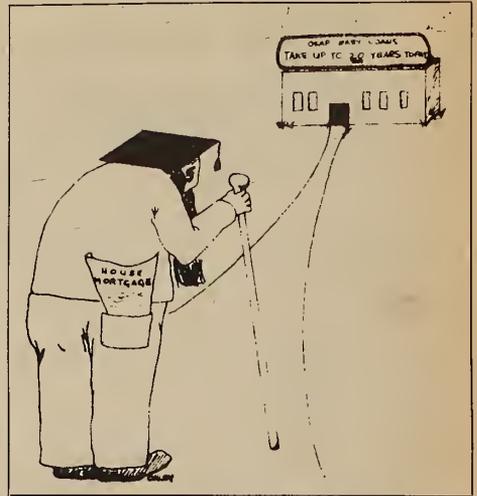

No government administrator would mutter anything like the above in public (although some of them have come dangerously close) but one can only surmise that some equally anti-intellectual sentiment is at the bottom of the government's attitude to post-secondary education. Somehow it simply doesn't trust students and is unwilling to make a firm commitment in what should be one of its most important areas of policy.

Without going to the public on this rather large subject (financing was a non-issue in the last election despite student campaigns to make it one), the government has taken it upon itself to form policy of a rather reactionary nature, policy that puts thousands of citizens in financial peril.

We are not overstating the case. Students are put in the position of having to scrape together funds for an expensive occupation, often running themselves into debts of thousands of dollars to afford what should be one of the most unalienable rights of every citizen regardless of age or economic situation. This point cannot be stated strongly enough. It is the government's duty to provide affordable education. If it is remiss in this, it is tampering with the future.

The government has two options. It can drop this half-measure pretence of support (which it seems to be bit by bit heading for) and leave students to fend for themselves with summer earnings and the mythological parental support. That would be a great deal more honest than forcing students to grovel before people who appear to have no understanding of the situation.

Or, possibly with the prodding of the New Democratic party, the government should immediately get to work on arriving at a rational understanding of the importance of post-secondary education without any of the utilitarian "more scholar for the dollar" malarky we've been hearing. Then it must immediately start to make good this position with adequate support for the students and stop these insults on our dignity.

We are students. We are not parasites. And we will not grovel before a computer that spits zeros at us.

If you wish to discuss this problem with the new Minister of Colleges and Universities, he can be found in Room 3102 of the Royal York Hotel. He's there rent-free at your expense, so head down and see if he'll loan you five dollars for that textbook you thought you couldn't afford.

Students shouldn't have to settle for second choices

To the Editor:

In response to the article "Grads limit class size", (Varsity, October 6), I support, in theory, the recommended tutorial size limit being set at 12 students. In practice, however, students at the Faculty of Social Work are being "screwed" by the Faculty's successful attempts to limit the size of their respective classes.

More than 16 or 18 students want to enroll in a popular course, for example, the procedure which most professors follow is to draw names from a box and the lucky "winners" comprise that class for the term. Invariably, students do not succeed in getting into most of the courses they want and by the end of registration week, they are wondering whether they are enrolled in a graduate school or something akin to a gambling establishment.

To have a lottery system determine your academic program for the year is both a personally degrading experience and a completely unacceptable means of determining class composition at any level of education, let alone at graduate school.

Men Insensitive? Nonsense!!

To the Editor:

What a pleasant exercise of hope and joy to discover something in The Varsity of interest, as opposed to the consistently and disconcertingly unromantic phenomenon of poillitcs.

I refer to the current exchanges on woman, and specifically to an article of October 1, which suggested that men lack the emotional sensitivity required to be able to cry. Nonsense! Man is the sentimental sex. Vide Shakespeare, Goethe, Byron, Keats, Yeats, et cetera. Can you imagine a female Hamlet?

Attempting to elicit some kind of response, I left roses on a girl's doorstep at midnight for a month. They made no impression. She left for Spain and returned with a Spaniard. I sent poetry to another, equally unmoved.

Women are too practical to be romantic, and they lack the melancholy essential to wit. But they do have, in abundance, an ineffable, elusive quality that is quite capable of breaking a man's heart, and making him cry. There, you see: I'm sentimental.

James Sayers

Dear Editor Persons:

Nobody ever says anything new about the Toike, but we don't mind since the Toike rarely says anything new either. We are impressed (but our egos not inflated) by the admirable restraint with which you have avoided comment on the Toike for a whole month.

All good things must come to an end, however, and in your editorial on Friday you completely missed the point. Although you recognized the what of our last issue, you wholly overlooked the why.

Our latest issue was not intended to be the slightest bit "nice". (The closest we ever expect to come to that particular state was in our first, take-home-and-show-your-relatives issue.) Though you may find this hard to believe, we actually intended to describe engineers as "high school boys having a little giggle in the washroom." We personally never cease to be amazed at how immature the typical engineer really is.

As editors, you are no doubt aware of just how much the content and image of a paper depends on the hangups of its writers; perhaps even more so than those of its editors. (We've been watching with some amusement even the progressively more pleading tone of your ads for new contributors.) If anyone thinks the stuff the Toike prints is bad, they should see the other 90 per cent.

No one else on campus prints dirty jokes on a regular basis.

In fact, no one else makes a habit of even mentioning sex at all in any form. (Sexism is of course a totally different matter.) As far as we can tell, this is the main reason why the Toike is so widely read — and why people actually complain if they miss one. If they don't like it, at least they can get upset about it. Almost all the complaints we had about our first issue were that it was not offensive or dirty enough.

We can be either or both when we want to (just wait . . .), but in the meantime we're just trying to have fun.

Other than these slight quibbles, we fully agree with what you said. Your faithful readers,

Eric Hartwell (editor)
Held Brestlaer
(assistant and part time co-editor)

What next?

The great cultural cataclysms come quietly. No screaming headlines announced the coming of the phonetic alphabet, nor did we attend the more recent advent of value-free social science. But culture fans throughout Metro found their categories crumbling Toike Oike, of all unlikely places.

Entitled "A Woman in Engineering Training", the article was a short autobiography written by a woman who dropped out of engineering just before graduating.

In a pleasant and non-rhetorical style, the article documented the sexism the woman faced, and how she eventually became freidins with some of her male classmates. The author concluded by saying that her reason for dropping out was finally not related to sexism, but rather to her inability to accept the inhuman values and uses of engineering.

Can our battered identities take any more of this? Or will the Toike revert to form? Stay tuned for further details.

Reader sends anecdote; watch the Robarts coffee

To the Editor:

Anyone who has wondered about the "coffee" in the local vending machines will be interested in the following anecdote from My War with Congress by Adm. B.S. Canard, USN (Ret.):

"Just before the end of the war in Europe, and American naval patrol captured a German merchant ship, it looked like an ordinary merchant ship, it didn't have a naval escort, still, for some reason the officer in command of the American patrol thought it looked kind of suspicious, so, rather than take any chances, he ordered it captured — and, as a matter of fact, it turned out to be just an ordinary merchant ship, carrying a cargo of ersatz coffee. Then, before they could do anything with it, the next day the war ended, and so the US Navy found itself stuck with this shipload of ersatz coffee, which it finally stored away in a warehouse in Oklahoma, and then forgot all about.

"In 1972, Congress was putting the budgetary screws on the Armed Services, as usual, and the Navy was looking around for any fat it could trim, and it found this old warehouse, which it decided would not be worth keeping up any longer, considering that what was in it was almost completely worthless — it was unacceptable as foreign aid, the FDA wouldn't allow it as animal feed, it would cost too much to decaffeinate it for use as fertilizer — or so the Navy thought, and so it offered the stuff for sale at a nominal price. A consortium of Canadian vending machine companies bought the whole lot — enough to keep all the coffee vending machines in Canada perking till well into the next century."

Zounds! Coquetry, cuckoldry, and a harried surgeon

Take an antiquarian curiosity and pendulant like Dr. Fossile, conceive of him returning home fresh from his marital marriage to a young and hot-blooded Mistress Townley; give him a homely niece ravaged by furor poeticus, immersed in the turgid depths of her lofty tragedy, of the Great Deluge; add a couple of Townley's beaux competing in a wager to see which of them will bed her before the good doctor does; throw in an itinerant Pollich luminary of the sciences, a mummy, as well as the pressing claims which his patients exert on the doctor's attention, diverting him from his more urgent task of consummating his marriage while trying to foil the plots of his bride's lovers; top it all off with an unclaimed bastard: and you have that incredible confusion of disguises, intrigues, mistaken identities and transformations which could only emanate from the lucubrations of the Scriblerus Club — or maybe Joe Orton. Indeed, the biggest joke of the play is that the stage-time is exactly parallel with the actual time, yet crammed with sufficient incident to sustain a plot for three days instead of three hours. By which it seems the authors were having themselves a good laugh at the expense of the classical units.

Written by John Gay, Alexander Pope and Dr. John Arbuthnot, Three Hours After Marriage is a hilarious romp in the vein of other scriblerian material, in which the authors seek to debunk the literary, social and political mores of their day; not to mention getting in a swipe or two at several of their contemporaries upon whose heads they were particularly desirous of heaping abuse. The authors pursue their avowed aims with a freedom and relish which should make us thankful for the Hart House revival of a play that deserves much more exposure to an audience than its general history of neglect would indicate.

Unfortunately, due to the exigencies of meeting deadlines, this reviewer was reduced to the lamentable expedient of seeing a dress rehearsal in an empty auditorium: lack of an audience's energy to replenish the actors' energies is a disaster, particularly for a farce. Consequently, the play was less funny than I had anticipated; but it is difficult to decide whether this was due to the production, the script, or the conditions under which it was viewed.

Such reservations notwithstanding, a few observations may nevertheless be in order. For one thing, the musical interpolations from The Beggar's Opera are not an inspired notion. At the top of the second and third acts the songs merely bog down the action, and destroy the atmosphere of the piece by some seemingly specious moralizing. The curtain-call song, however, does work, closing the play with a jaunty up-beat cynical glee that is quite expressive of the rest of the piece.

Occasionally the production falters due to clumsy blocking, and often the tempo is marred by extraneous business, leaving me with the impression that the director distrusted either his script or his cast. In that very funny scene in which Fossile's poetic niece is precipitated into agonies approaching labour-pains as the pompous ass of a critic, Sir Tremendous, rips her magnum opus to pieces, director Martin Hunter has Mistress Townley and one of her lovers, Plotwell, cavoring about behind everyone's back. The supposed humour of this situation wears thin pretty quickly and merely diffuses the focus of the comedy, which, in this scene at least, is mostly verbal.

Other bits of business are often reminiscent of adolescent locker-room antics. While not necessarily being out of place in a burlesque of this nature, it would require more experienced actors to bring it off successfully, without the self-consciousness of some of the present company.

I can't escape the uneasy feeling that Hunter is trying to be too funny, much to the detriment of the focus and tempo which the dynamics of the script demand. In comedy, however, the humour is in the focus and tempo, not in the extraneous business. Due to this confusion on the part of the director, the production does not build properly to those moments of high comedy that should bring the house down — and, Lord knows, there are enough of them in this play.

A similar criticism may be levelled at the acting company, which also misses — by and large — the tempo of the lines, building to a single focus of that one line that will break up the audience. Many of the lines are lost in the evident haste of the actors to get to the next laugh-line. Tempo in comedy or farce is not necessarily a matter of speed as such: an actor may easily take his time over a good line and relish it goether with the audience. What slows the tempo of a comedy is confusion and lack of focus, no matter how speedily the incidents crowd in upon one another. I imagine, however, that with the presence of an audience the actors will sort themselves out as they begin to react to the laughter in the house.

The acting company as a whole is quite satisfying. They work hard, and it is gratifying to note that their labours are rewarded in the delivery of the lines: to the least of them they project well, speak distinctly and audibly. Yet they have not quite mastered the art of farce. They are overly dependent on the lines to create the comedy, rather than bringing a fully fleshed-out three-dimensional caricature to the lines. Allan Park's Sir Tremendous is the exception: he breathes the caricature, and could probably get a laugh even if he never opened his mouth. Douglas Abel's Underplot is another fine performance: his body and his energy bring up to the absurd bravado of his lines.

Both these gentlemen, however, play minor roles, while the burden of the piece falls mostly on Russ Waller's Fossile. Considering the difficulty of the part, and the demands which it makes on him, Waller does a fine job. He is possessed of a great voice and a marvellously expressive features. I would have preferred him to play Fossile as somewhat older and considerably more decrepit, and so give himself a chance to do more with the part, but it is difficult to fault him for what he does do. Most important, certainly, is that he is quite competent in sustaining the play through all those moments when it is up to him alone to do so. He has a good presence, and is a strong actor.

On the whole, the women outshone the men. My only criticism of Dorothy Kelleher's randy and mischievous Townley is that I would like to have seen a little more 18th C. birchiness from her; and perhaps even some confusion, some sense of imminent peril in her reactions, when those events which transpire in front of her directly affect her own welfare. I feel this would make her quick wit and nonchalance in dispensing with intrigues, lovers, husbands, and babies all the more hilarious.

The costumes, by the way, are stunning. And, as a recreation of Fossile's closet of antiques and curios, the set is solidly in character, and shows an amazing attention to detail. Only the large bed (upstage right, which really needn't be there at all, mars it).

Such criticisms as I have here outlined are somewhat technical in nature; I do not think that they in any way detract from the enjoyment of the production, and I predict that audiences will be rolling in the aisles as soon as Three Hours After Marriage gets under way. Go see it!

Madama Butterfly soars away despite some mechanical acting

When Giacomo Puccini's Madame Butterfly was first performed at La Scala in 1904, the audience hated it and the critics mercilessly panned it. The Italian audience of the day could not understand the absence of a glorious tenor aria in the first act, and the second act was far too long. Puccini had an inexorable faith in the opera, however, thinking it to be his best and so he edited the first act and split the second into more accessible lengths. Three months later, when it was produced at Brescia, it began its career of success and since then has become a staple for international operatic repertoire.

To narrow down our field of vision a bit, the performance of Madame Butterfly last Monday by the Canadian Opera Company was great. My main criticism would be that the characters did not seem to realize onstage the drama inherent in the music. At times, gestures and mannerisms appeared tacked onto the characters instead of being a natural extension of their personalities. This came across most acutely in the love scenes where there was a lack of dynamic relation between the characters. However, it seemed to pick up in the second act with the delightful grace and interplay between Suzuki (the Met's Judith Forst) and Cho-Cho-San (Covent Garden's Maria Pellegrini).

The chorus singing, under the direction of Charles Wilson, was well-blended and effectively ethereal, but again the group was rather wooden. Also, the tendency of the Company in general to go suddenly from piano to the heights of Passionate Forte is off-putting because one's emotions are not given a chance to build up and therefore, one feels a little left behind.

These considerations aside, I found the performance on the whole to be very well-polished and I would strongly recommend going to see the matinee on Saturday (see the What's Up) if you so be inclined.

Montreal audience astounded by Baryshnikov in Swan Lake

MONTREAL — It is not one of his favorite roles, but Eric Bruhn's choreography which gives the prince several opportunities for some lyrical dancing, was sufficient to tempt Mikhail Baryshnikov to dance the role of Siegfried in the National Ballet's production of Swan Lake.

The event last weekend was significant not only because it was his debut in the role since his defection from the Soviet Union one year ago, but also because it was the first chance a Canadian audience has had to see him in a full length ballet.

The first glimpse we had of him was in the summer of 1974 when, as a guest artist with the touring Bolshoi Ballet, he performed the Don Quixote pas de deux.

His dramatic flight from the O'Keefe Centre focussed attention on him and after legal matters were settled he paid homage to Canada by performing James in La Sylphide with the National at Ontario Place, a role which did not offer much of an opportunity for him to display his phenomenal technique.

He then set out to conquer the New York audience and we were left in the frozen north with only memories and speculation.

Our patience is finally being rewarded.

A capacity crowd filled the Place des Arts in Montreal last weekend to witness the event and they were not disappointed.

Even the National's orchestra, which has known some embarrassing moments, rose to the occasion without a squeak.

Mikhail Baryshnikov is the National's newest Guest Artist and he may be the best thing that has happened to Canada's National Ballet.

Every detail of his now legendary technique is true. Not only does he leap without apparent preparation, he actually suspends himself in mid-air, arresting time for a dramatic fraction of a second, and then lands as if he were treading the surface of the gravity-less moon.

His brilliance includes more than mere technique. As an actor he is both sensitive and economical, wasting not a movement. Every look, every gesture was calculated to contribute to his portrayal of a youthful, naive young prince (a pleasant change from those haughty overbearing aristocrats who have dominated certain of the National's productions in recent years.)

The differences between Nureyev and Baryshnikov, both trained by the late Alexander Pushkin, are dramatic. Nureyev would have us believe his every breath emanates from his soul. Baryshnikov is a much more intellectual dancer, calculating the effect of every nuance and movement.

There is however, one great danger with Baryshnikov's approach, which becomes painfully obvious Saturday night. While dazzling the audience with invisible technique and sublime acting, he does not generate the sort of rapport among the other dancers that Nureyev does. This means the other dancers must, on their own initiative, project a personality.

Nadia Potts, Baryshnikov's personal choice as Odette Odile, was technically superb and indeed believably enchanting in the second act but it was not until her dying moments that she managed to transcend the rigours of the role to become emotionally convincing.

Baryshnikov may prove to be the perfect Guest Artist for the National. The company will learn a great deal from this consummate technician and he will not completely overshadow the other dancers in the relentless gratification of an oversized ego.

And lucky Toronto! You will have him in your midst for the whole of the National's spring season at the O'Keefe!

Impossible Object deserves to stay in limbo

Impossible Object is John Frankenheimer's lost film. He made it in 1973 in France and Morocco with Alan Bates and Dominique Sanda. The film is about Harry (Bates) a writer who lives in France with his wife and children. Harry meets a Natalie (Sanda) and they have an affair. Harry's problem is that he cannot make a commitment to either his wife or Natalie. So much for plot originality.

The company that made Impossible Object went bankrupt and the film lab that processed the prints, refuses to release them until they get paid. Catch 22: the lab can't be paid until the film is released. Thus, Impossible Object is a film floating in limbo.

I saw a pirated print of Impossible Object and conclude that limbo is precisely where this film belongs. As already mentioned, the plot is neither interesting nor original.

The characters are terrible. Harry is such an idiot that it is impossible to believe that he'd get paid for anything that he might have written.

Natalie is worse. She too is an imbecile, and twice the imbecile for having an affair with an idiot like Harry. Nothing is more boring than watching two imbeciles trying to make love.

The performances in this film are no better. Alan Bates indulges in ego-tripping; he acts, and he acts, and he acts... He creates weird little characters and games for the amusement of his screen children. However, one cannot escape the feeling that Bates' weird little characters and games are really for the audience's benefit. Bates displays his acting abilities ad nauseam.

Dominique Sanda on the other hand is so totally "spaced-out" that no convincing or effective relationship could possibly be formed between Natalie and the other characters.

To make things only worse, Frankenheimer tries to be "artsy"; he tortures us with "streams of consciousness." These include confusing flash-forwards and cheap Visconti-Fellini-like effects: swans, bizarre women, skeletons having pool parties. If one was ever to compile a list of the most idiotic moments in cinema, then Frankenheimer's "streams of consciousness" would be at the top.

What really made me react violently is that Frankenheimer is attempting to commit fraud. He hopes that critics and audiences will be cononed by his ridiculous scenes into concluding that simply because they are obscure they therefore must be complex and have deep meaning. However, these scenes are so badly done that even the simplest mind can see through Frankenheimer's fraud.

I admire Frankenheimer for his films like The Manchurian Candidate, Seven Days in May, Birdman of Alcatraz, Seconds, but today I find him to be a declined and fading director.

Frankenheimer is out of touch. By coincidence I know a number of people who have met Frankenheimer and they all, without exception, seem to say the same thing: Frankenheimer is desperately seeking admiration, he expects people to gild around him and regard him with awe; he is over-defensive about criticism.

When I met Frankenheimer, I saw all these characteristics in him. Worse though, I saw them manifesting themselves in his work.

One thing that struck me when speaking with Frankenheimer was that he does not regard film as an art; to him it's a business. Whenever I would ask a question on an artistic level, he would reply on a commercial one. If I asked how other filmmaker's work influences him, he would tell me how their marketing and budgeting methods influence his.

I asked him about his next film. "It's a film called Black Sunday. It concerns an Arab terrorist-Black September attempt to blow up the Superbowl with the Good Year blimp filled with plasticine and the Israeli and the American Secret Service attempts to stop them."

"If you could make any film you wished, what would you make?"
"A Black Sunday."

"Why?"
"It's the kind of film I'd like to make."
"Why?"

"I like the story."
"Why?" (I wasn't going to let him get away.)
"I think it's exciting."

The Varsity — Peter Wronsky

Frankenheimer and wife Evans think about the good old days when movies were movies and a buck was a buck.

Hollywood image of bad old days unsatisfactory for both then and now

The 1929 stock-market crash signalled the beginning of the great depression. Brother Can You Spare A Dime is an accurate retelling of the images of the time.

We are taken from the time of the crash to the end of the great America recovery, otherwise known as World War Two. We are shown nothing that wasn't available to be seen at the time. The question of the film is not why did it happen. The puzzling message of Philippe Mora's film is why is it still going on.

The world-wide recession currently affecting us all is no different from those times. With the exception of a few minor reforms, such as Unemployment Insurance, conditions now with high unemployment and a lowering standard of living are very much the same.

The contradiction of the title song, "... Once I built a tower" is still here. Buildings are going up all over town and yet no one can find a good place to live.

But Brother is not a good film. It assumes that the viewer can assimilate the lessons of an era in two scant hours. It cannot stop to explain who killed Senator Huey Long or how his class analysis was assassinated as well.

We follow all the insincere speeches of Franklin Delano Roosevelt who managed to say things would get better continuously for thirteen years, while things never improved a bit.

The film is a puzzle. Perhaps it's a challenge for film reviewers to put the pieces together for the audience.

Or is it the job of the film reviewer to reprint material from the publicity blurb? "Twelve crazy, painful see-saw years"

Or "ironically enough, in 1933, at the height of the depression, no dimes were minted."

Brother is not a good film because it is not a complete film. Clips from Cagney films that depict in a moment the suffering of millions, are isolated from the context and methodology. What does Cagney do to alleviate his misfortune?

Does he start reading Marx and Lenin? Does he expose Roosevelt for lying about American military involvement? Does he join with his fellow workers to press back the bosses' assault on wages and working conditions?

Or is that just a bunch of chatter from malcontents? The film doesn't say. If it said, it wouldn't be a commercial success.

The film is a testament to the contradiction of Hollywood image-making. They can't lie about what is happening, but they can mis-direct people from a way out. By taking these image out of the context of the Macho-American storyline, Mora has shown that something is seriously wrong with the American collective consciousness.

Go see the film, listen to the questions, and ask them out loud. The New Deal was a bunch of bullshit. The doubletalk of President Ford, and prime minister Trudeau is no different.

It's good to ask questions. Mike Edwards

Tarragon adopts a careful response to quickly-changing conditions

Tarragon Theatre was formed in a former cribbage board factory in the fall of 1971 by Bill Glasco. After a mad scramble to get the building ready on time, the theatre opened with David Freeman's Creeps which played to full houses from the beginning of October to Christmas. Such early success was unusual for an underground theatre, although there is some debate whether Tarragon ever was truly 'underground.'

Glasco is a former professor of English at the University of Toronto. As he puts it, when he 'fell out of love' with Academe he went to New York to study acting and directing for two years. Upon his return to Canada, he joined forces with Ken Gass at Factory Theatre Lab. It was at Factory he discovered Creeps, a play set in a sheltered workshop for victims of cerebral palsy.

Glasco directed a production of Creeps at Factory, working first with Freeman to sort out the script and give it shape, and then with the cast who had the difficult task of acting with bent and crippled bodies while still being audible and comprehensible to the audience. The earnestness and the black humour of the play struck home and word-of-mouth reports brought crowds to Factory. Up until then, Factory had been used to plays with integrity, but not to large audiences, and the play's success added important momentum to the Canadian-play movement which was still struggling to get off the ground.

GLASCO LEAVES FACTORY

Glasco soon became unhappy with the administrative workings of Factory and decided to set up his own theatre. Like Factory, Tarragon's purpose was to work with Canadian playwrights and produce their work. But Glasco felt that the best way to help Canadian playwrights was not merely to mount a production just to give the play exposure. It was important that the theatre, having decided to do a play, should work on the script with the author in the interest of developing it and refining it as much as possible before it went into production, and then apply the most solid and professional techniques possible. This careful method of production eventually led Tarragon to more consistent production standards, which meant that it was easier for Tarragon to build up and retain a large audience. This success sometimes led people involved in the underground movement at other theatres to accuse Tarragon of selling out the movement and stalling the development of new and original Canadian forms in order to achieve commercial success.

Popularity was by no means quickly achieved. After Creeps, Tarragon did quite a variety of shows, none of which drew crowds, and near the end of the season, it looked as if the theatre was going to have to close down. Then came a play which, because of its style and subject matter, was to brand its author, the director, and the theatre as producers of 'old fashioned' drama. The play was Leaving Home, by David French. The script had been developed under Glasco's guidance from a one-act sketch about a family from Newfoundland who live in Toronto and their son, who, as the title suggests, wants to leave home. The situation, the characters, and the sentiments of the play were all easily recognizable to Toronto audiences and people turned out every night to say, "That's us! That's us!"

The popular success of the play meant that Tarragon could continue into its second year. It also served to further convince Glasco of the importance of developing a play to its fullest potential before putting it on, and then giving it the most competent production possible. Furthermore, it underlined the advantages of plays that lend themselves to accessibility for their audience.

In Tarragon's second year, Glasco introduced Quebec playwright Michel Tremblay to Toronto with his production of Forever Yours, Marie-Lou. By this time Glasco's production philosophy was beginning to become a trade mark and Tarragon was expanding its audience beyond the group of people for whom the new Canadian theatre was an expression of the underground movement. By the third season, Tarragon was attracting people whose previous theatre-going had been limited to the more established theatres, and still others for whom theatre-going had been a rare occurrence.

FULL HOUSES

In terms of audience, the third year seemed to be a high-tide for Tarragon. Full houses every night almost all year long meant that salaries could be increased beyond the subsistence level, and when the production of Hosanna by Michel Tremblay was taken to Broadway by New York producer Norman Kean there was a feeling that underground theatre had come full circle, matured, and become the main stream of Canadian theatre. Somehow it was felt that if the Americans liked Hosanna, Canadian theatre would be vindicated, and Canadians would finally have developed a cultural form that stood up internationally. Events prevented such a convenient assessment of the situation.

Hosanna, which left Toronto on a wave of high expectations, was received with mild approval in New York. Having failed to receive the official New York stamp of approval, Canadians were now stuck with the responsibility of deciding for themselves just how valuable their theatre actually was.

By this time it was no longer unusual to see a Canadian-made play. A number of theatres had proved that we could mount sophisticated productions. The theatre-going audience had grown to include a wide range of people, not much so that, although it could not properly be said that there was a mass audience for theatre, it could at least be said that there was an audience whose tastes had variety, depth, and maturity. No longer could theatres mount productions that it was good to have theatre, and the more the merrier. Now theatres had to apply certain standards to their productions and judge whether what they were doing made sense in the Canadian context.

INSTITUTIONALIZATION

The problem facing underground theatres had been altogether changed. Theatre was no longer an underground crusade. It was an ongoing thing, part of the continuing cultural life of a large number of people.

Small theatres existed because they had something to say, and they tended to think of the delivery of that message as a kind of crusade. If you're fighting a crusade, it's a lot easier to remember what you stand for. It's much harder to be an ongoing, continuing institution and not lose sight of your original purpose. This is the problem the established theatres had been trying to deal with for years, and unless the small theatres were able to evolve a way of dealing with it, they would fail in the same way.

David French's script of Leaving Home helped create a Tarragon tradition of realistic drama that audiences could identify with.

None of this was clear to the small theatres at the time, and Tarragon was no exception. When the fourth season began, the theatre proceeded along the same lines as before, and very soon ran into difficulty.

Tarragon couldn't decide whether it was going to be 'underground' or 'establishment.' It had some characteristics of both. It ran on an underground budget, although salaries had been improved. However, salaries hadn't improved so much that anyone was getting wealthy, and when Actors' Equity put the theatre in a higher pay category on the basis of the success of the theatre's third season, Tarragon found it hard to make ends meet. After all, inflation and recession had cut into people's entertainment budgets, and the theatres weren't quite as full as they had been. Tarragon aspired to fully professional production standards, but continued to use experimental methods. All but one of the fourth season's plays were mounted using ensemble-style techniques, different from the so-called 'old-fashioned' style Tarragon had come to be known for. But although Tarragon was unclear about its shifting role, it was not altogether unaware that a shift had occurred.

There was still no clear way of telling which way theatre in this country was going to develop. A way to tell how the relative merits of different developments could be gauged was even less clear. But if underground theatre was to survive beyond its 'crusade' era, it would have to have impact and meaning for its audience. Only then could standards of judgment be set. And the only way theatre can have sustained impact and meaning for the kind of audience that had developed in Toronto was for it to be well-done. Since Tarragon's original aim was to develop Canadian scripts, that meant Tarragon's responsibility was in assisting in the development and achievement of high standards of playwrighting.

FOCUS ON PLAYWRIGHTS

At the end of the third year while Tarragon was still flushed with the success of Hosanna, Glasco felt his theatre was still not doing all it could to achieve that aim. Aside from the personal guidance he himself and the directors who worked with him could give to playwrights, there was no permanent aspect of the theatre which was directly devoted to raising the level of playwrighting. Accordingly, he set up his writers-in-residence program.

The first step in setting up such a program was to find the right person to run it. Such a person had to be experienced in theatre and at the same time have the ability to work with playwrights, a nervous, temperamental, stubborn lot at the best of times, and help them to improve their writing without at the same time forcing them to conform to a preconceived style or approach. To be able to encourage with a firm hand, and not be coercive is a rare talent. The rare talent Glasco found was Bena Shuster, a former actress who has worked for several years in publishing and as a literary agent in New York.

Shuster selected nine very different writers and began to help them with their scripts while at the same time pleading and cajoling them to make themselves more aware not only of what was going on in theatre in other countries but also what theatre was being done in Canada. She brought in the artistic directors of several theatres to talk to the writers, as well as other people prominent in the Canadian theatre world. She arranged for the writers to see plays at many of Toronto's theatres, and help weekly meetings where the playwrights would read each other's scripts and discuss them. The result was nine writers with considerably broadened horizons and nine very different scripts, all of which were given a staged reading at Tarragon at the end of the year. All nine plays had benefited from Shuster's insistence that no matter how different the writing it must be done well. All of them benefited by her insistence that each script be refined and refined again until it was the best possible statement of the writer's intentions.

SABBATICAL

Tarragon is not mounting any productions of its own this year. Recognizing that the needs of the theatre community had vastly changed since his theatre was founded four years prior, Glasco decided to spend some time considering what will be the best way to respond to these new needs before redirecting Tarragon's energies. It is possible Glasco will re-open with a new policy of doing both new Canadian plays and classics, which would increase the demand for excellence placed on Canadian playwrights. But although Tarragon is not producing this year, the writers-in-residence program continues, and Shuster is just now about to name her new writers.

Not every theatre could conduct such a project. Not every theatre would want to. Each theatre is unique. Each theatre has a different purpose. Each theatre must serve its own purpose the best way it can. Obviously, what's appropriate to one theatre is not necessarily appropriate to the next. Given Tarragon's purpose, its approach is a very sane, well thought-out response to the new and shifting conditions the theatre finds itself in. It is to be hoped that other theatres, each in their own way, will be as quick to recognize the changes in the theatre scene that have taken place and respond as constructively as has Glasco's Tarragon.

The twinkle is still in GBS' eyes, even many years after his demise

An excellent production of a durable whodunit

What goes tick-tick-tick surprise? Any who-dun-it by master crafter Agatha Christie of course and especially The Mousetrap which is the locus classicus of her skill and appeal. Fortunate indeed then that the Phoenix Theatre Company is giving an excellent production of this play in its second storey theatre islanded in the middle of a car lot on Dupont St.

There is a certain level of experiences that one feels one owes oneself: fruits in season, one's cigars from Dunhill's, one's soap opera from the British Royal Family and as one's Mousetrap, the original production which has been running continuously in London, England, for well nigh 23 years. But the Phoenix Theatre Company's production, here though it is in Toronto and here only until Nov. 2, is a satisfying bastion of British phlegmatism and English bloodst, nevertheless.

Justice is done not only in the play but to it as well. (It is directed by Jack Walters.) Ann Twohig as Mollie Ralston has a scream that must be the envy of many of self-conscious amateur. Ken Parnell as Mr. Paravacini is slippery enough, dapper enough, in a word, foreign enough, to be a very suspicious character indeed. Bryan Foster is the witty cowardly homosexual Christopher Wren: a turn to villainy is only too plausible. Matthew Gray, as Giles Ralston, is square enough, repressed enough, and so more than sinister enough.

The play might well be described as eight stereotypes (Graham Harley, Elaine Nalee, and Walter Ekins are among the other fine actors) taunting the audience to search for a plot. It works. Not, in truth, having seen the London production or any other, I did my searching and conjecturing as zealously as anyone. Not until the moment of revelation itself did I know who the murderer was. (Neither a habitue nor a devotee I, of the form, it must be admitted.)

Not least impressive in the play is Agatha Christie's instinct for restraint. There is no rhythm of suspense and gore, suspense and gore, and yet the suspense is no less provoking.

Not one drop of blood is, in fact, dropped. This is good clean old-fashioned murder. But Christie's economy of means is marvellously effective. I shall not soon forget the leather-gloved hand moving slowly from the narrowly opened door towards the adjacent light switch. Mrs. Boyle (Ann Antkiw) alone in the room notices it only when it rests finally at the switch.

"Who's that? Who's that?"

Too late, Mrs. Boyle, too late.

Shaw's views of sex and class make good entertainment

A good bet for an evening's entertainment is Village Wooing performed by the Academy of Theatre Arts. George Bernard Shaw presents the eternal dilemma of how a woman traps a man successfully. The dialogue is sparkling and witty and sprinkled with Shaw's peculiar satire directed at the English class system, the French class system, and Americans' inability to comprehend either of the two.

Village Wooing is held together by the two cast members. The Academy production was badly hampered in the first act by "opening night jitters" which destroyed the rhythm of the play. However, as the rather sparse audience warmed to their roles, the players warmed to their roles. The result of this interaction balanced the second and third acts which came across as well paced, well played and extremely well received. Brian Neller is very convincing as the brusque, and irritable "Marco Polo Man" and Alwena Jones shines as the multi-faceted young woman who is capable of, and willing to use female guile in order to achieve her object.

Perhaps the most striking feature of the Academy of Theatre Arts production is the obvious presence of unity within the company. From the moment you enter the east wing of the Ward Price building at 23 Grenville St. there is an unmistakable immersion into the unique little world of the company. Everyone from the ticket seller to the property man is doing his her utmost to make Village Wooing a success.

In many instances a small theatre company runs the risk of playing through its run to a largely empty auditorium and opening night at 23 Grenville St. was no exception. Village Wooing is well worth the price of admission so don't let the lack of a line up at the box office fool you.

Yikes! Call in Hercule Poirot!

Funny and sympathetic writing ruined by inept production

Alan Ayckbourn's comedy Absurd Person Singular is, without a doubt, a very skillful piece of technical work. However, Ayckbourn's special talent for writing humanized farce has been completely undermined in the inept production now housed at the Royal Alexandra. Rather than presenting sympathetic portraits of six middle-class Britons on three successive Christmas Eves, the play has turned the characters into vulgar comic stereotypes.

The first Christmas Eve is set in the spotless kitchen of Sidney, a small-time businessman, and his muddled wife, Jane. They are struggling to entertain their bank manager, his gin-soaked wife, a young architect and his very depressed spouse. Naturally one finds the usual farcical disasters running rampant. In the next act, while the architect's wife tries to attract attention by killing herself, the bank manager's wife downs yet more bottles of vodka, and ever-efficient Jane carries on with the cleaning up. This act ends with the hysterical trauma of the three women, all at varying stages of decline, joining one by one in singing "The Twelve Days of Christmas". The third and final section, entitled "Christmas Future", is set in the large, yet unheated, kitchen of the bank manager. The big surprise here comes when good old Sidney and Jane arrive, having just made a financial killing by going into property development, to provide the audience with a disturbingly funny demonstration of the power that can go along with money. Were the play given a chance, one would see that the playwright is not simply manipulating caricatures but is rather revealing very realistic people. As it was presented on Monday evening, however, I could only laugh at the inept attempt which fell flat on its face.

Eric Thompson's direction was as dull and clinical as the ineffectual performances he was able to inspire. No one in this third-rate touring package seems to have the slightest idea that comedy, out of necessity, is a very serious business. Even the tired-looking sets of Edward Burbridge manage to match the objectionable quality of the whole production.

It would be difficult to find a contemporary playwright who has written more accurately on modern class politics than Ayckbourn. For that reason I still feel that there is much to recommend in this very human comedy. You just have to take your pickaxe along to find it.

When Santa Claus come to town, it's a sure sign the season of depression and drunkenness is near.

More potshots at marriage dig under the surface

Recent cinematic history has seen several attempts to bring the moviegoer into the dark, sinister mires of the husband-wife relationship. King's A Married Couple and Bergman's Scenes From a Marriage are two obvious examples of this growing genre. Pierre Granier-Deferre, director of Le Chat, has produced a highly successful film experience which can relate its message to a greatly diversified audience — in other words — one doesn't have to be married and scarred by forty years of living together to learn from it.

For only at one level is Le Chat about a destructive combat waged between an aging married couple. However, in capsule-comment form the movie may appear to be just that. Simone Signoret and Jean Gabin play the roles of a life-weary and spiritually desolate couple whose once passionate love is now eroded by years of (can it be?) just living together. Julien Bouin (Jean Gabin) takes in a stray tom-cat as something to focus his attention on, and his wife — driven by a lethal concoction of hate, jealousy, anger and booze — brings about its ultimate destruction. This murderous act drives the husband to use the weapon of silence. He pledges never to utter a single word to her again. Sketchy, vindictive notes, indifferently flicked from one to the other, are the sole means of communication between this silent couple.

The movie works very effectively at this level. Simone Signoret does an excellent job in portraying, through her face and body postures, the perfect combination of bitterness, vain hopefulness and tragic wastefulness. Jean Gabin provides a good balance as her seemingly unaring spouse.

Through a thoughtful use of flashback technique, Granier-Deferre provides us with impressionistic tidbits to enlarge our perspective on the situation. This device shows its greatest effectiveness in the last third of the movie, where the division between past and present is subtly obscured and because of this, we forget that the director has been playing with our sense of time and sequence of events.

The editing of the film is equally thoughtful, for I'm sure there is not one wasted frame to be seen in the entire ninety minutes. The petty games which these two alienated people indulge in are variously represented but never overdone, and although this may be a 'boring' couple, we are not bored in watching them. Even in the opening credits we are given useful material. In fact one can safely assume that in this footage is essential, in the director's mind at least, to the overriding theme of the film.

This preliminary footage has nothing to do with the married couple. Rather we are taken on a screaming ambulance ride through a section of Paris which is at the mercy of the bulldozer and where the all-too-familiar hi-rise complex is being erected. This image is crucial in bringing us to another level at which this film operates. The old couple lives in this ravaged area. On all sides of their once beautiful home, they daily watch the wrecker's ball demolish the old stone edifices to make way for the new. The buildings being razed are old — and so are the Bouins. Mme. Bouin's nightly screams don't seem to bring back her lost youthfulness. She demands to know why her husband treats her as a mere object. Why has he changed? Is it because she is old? No — he says — I have changed because the world has changed.

The sound of the bulldozers and wrecker's ball is deafening, and it is the only sound which fills the even more deafening silence which exists between the couple. The roar of machines has obliterated and superseded conversation; alcohol and pills fill out the space in Mme. Bouin's life as the cat and prostitutes similarly function for M. Bouin.

Post-mortem: ambitious amateurs at Scarborough

The set looks as if it might fall apart, as soon as someone slams a door. The publicity man gets up on stage at the beginning of the play to announce a fifteen minute delay — the car carrying the sound tapes for the show has run out of gas on the Parkway. Most of the cast have fake Jewish accents; those that don't, have English "BBC" overtones. And the play? It's a rather out-dated, semi-autobiographical comedy about a struggling young actor set in the New York of the 1930's.

Does it sound tempting? Does it sound worth your while to trek out to the wilds of Scarborough to see this play?

Bouncy Tull shows concert mastery

Jethro Tull proved last night that they are one of the better live bands around. During their two hour set Tull performed a variety of their numbers spanning most of the musical history of this British band.

After opening their set with an excerpt from the Thick As A Brick album they launched into what could almost pass as a greatest hits concert. Numbers from as far back as 1969 up to date were presented in a not so coherent manner. It was as though Ian Anderson sought to present his band's musical evolution to the audience. Unfortunately at times the set seemed incoherent.

Even though the concert was somewhat marred by this confusion Tull proved their musicianship in a display of competent playing seldom seen these days. Each member of the band did all that was required of him and more. To see the togetherness of this band was a really great experience. Their camaraderie was evident yet subtle. Individual songs were well done and Strangely enough, it is worth the time (30 minutes to the Victoria Park subway station from the campus) and the money ($10.00 for the next four shows) to see the next of the Scarborough Theatre Guild's productions. This is good theatre. Amateur theatre, yes, flawed theatre also, but still well worth watching here in Toronto.

Some members of the audience attending these performances have never seen live theatre before. For them it is a revelation, proof that live theatre is just that — alive, exciting, and intriguing. The Scarborough Theatre Guild does not only play drawing room comedies or re-run of late night movies like Enter Laughing. Their programme this year includes a production of Jean Anouilh's Ring Around the Moon, and the first Toronto production of Michel Tremblay's Les Belles Soeurs since that of the St. Lawrence Centre. The Theatre Guild is completely funded by ticket and membership sales, so they depend on the sell-out audiences for Enter Laughing to provide the cash to produce theatre that will broaden the artistic scope both of the players and of the audience.

Even within the confines of the traditional and conservatively-scripted Enter Laughing, the director, Ken Albanese, has moved out in new directions. The theatre is equipped with two hundred permanent seats, arranged around three sides of a revolving platform stage. Albanese has used his space wisely, opening up this proscenium-style play, and moving some of the scenes into the audience. Some members of the audience seem surprised to have actors playing scenes almost in their lap, but this adds interest to a play which could otherwise have dragged very badly.

This theatre is a community centre. The stage is booked every night, either for performances or for rehearsals of the three Scarborough groups which lease the theatre.

Auditions are open to everyone. You don't have to live anywhere near Scarborough to become a contributing member of the Scarborough Theatre Guild. They seem to be a very open group of people, and if you are looking for a before you hit the 'big time', (Hart House?) you might try giving this group a call. The contact people are Norma Francis (439-0772) and Bob Wilkinson (489-1209). And by the way, if you are a black, baritone actor-singer, please get in touch with Ms. Francis right away. You are promised a beautiful song in a beautiful musical production next month.

Get set to shed undialectical literary presuppositions, Mac

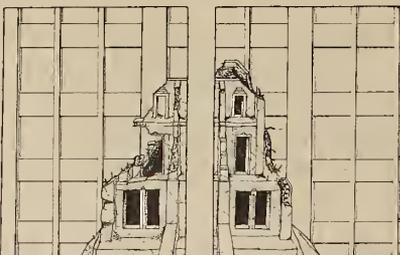

The Cage
Martin Vaughan-James
The Coach House Press, $14.00

The Cage is Martin Vaughan-James' fourth visual novel and the one which I predict will firmly establish him as the major proponent of Canadian experimental fiction today.

Now I use that word "fiction" quite loosely, for Vaughan-James' works are billed as "visual novels", and in fact do not pursue the same kind of traditional narrative form as does say . . . Pierre Berton's The Last Spike. In The Cage and in his other visual novels, Vaughan-James attempts to incorporate both literary and visual elements in a dialectical interplay which aspires towards freeing the spectator reader of his rather canonical literary presuppositions. Plot, characterization, psychological implication, political and social statement, and other "anachronistic questions" are suspended in favour of a more fundamental concern — that of the engaged, ordering, imagination of the reader. The artist has developed his novel in calculated steps, and it is the experiential value of the work rather than its referential content which is the primary concern. Vaughan-James himself says:

The purpose of the narrative itself then, should not be the representation of preformed and sterile conclusions and solutions, but rather the evolution of an arena of words and images within which the reader can perform an active and participatory role.

This short theoretical overview is necessary because The Cage does not present us with any hard and fast content in the sense mentioned above. It is essentially a portrait of the immanent destructive qualities of culture — be it modern or otherwise. The opening sequence is set in the ruins of central Mexico in what appears to be Teotihuacan. The Temple of the Sun looms in the horizon and the pen and ink drawings vacillate between depicting the ancient splendor and the modern decay of this monumental structure.

Vacillation is the major technique that Vaughan-James employs to combat externally imposed systems of logic or reasoning. Through the presentation of a multitude of inexplicable and fascinating juxtapositions he forces the reader to re-experience confused verbal visual sensations in much the same way as the author originally experienced them.

Hints of what Vaughan-James calls "the inevitable flood of mute destruction" now begin to appear to the reader. We see the straight, clean, lines of Aztec architecture metamorphized into heaps of irregular rubble. We see the landscape become splattered with black ooze as enormous ink-clouds swell in the sky. We see such familiar cultural implements as cameras, typewriters, tape-recorders, and telephone transformed into black onyx idols dedicated to the gods. In short we begin to experience for ourselves the pulsing, rhythmic force of mute destruction which comprises the basis of Vaughan-James' world view. Culture must invariably turn upon itself and devour its very foundations.

In the remainder of the book this essential movement is repeated, although in a modern setting. A kind of personal iconography is developed by Vaughan-James to help explicate his theme, but it is important to realize that most of his images and words are chosen precisely for their lack of symbolic content. His decaying rags, rusted skewers, clotted rope, and swollen clumps of bedding are only meant to serve as what one reviewer calls "oblique referents". Any inventory of symbolic content would be superfluous in the context of his theoretical statements.

Why read Synergetics? Because it's there . . .

Synergetics
Buckminster Fuller,
Collier-Macmillan Canada, Ltd.,
$25.00

There is a huge book on the table. It has almost 900 pages, a title that sounds like another Easy Cerebral Weight Gain Programme, and a cover of such imperial purple that it surely refers to itself as "we". You might try to stare it down, but books, unlike their authors, are insensitive. You might try to tip it down the incinerator, but even mere men, such as Abengedo and the boys, emerged from fire unscathed. You might even ignore it, but it's . . . too big. In the end, I suppose you have to pick it up. Buckminster Fuller, born in 1895 sometime in the future, has triumphed again.

He calls Synergetics "Explorations in the Geometry of Thinking". It's all very intimidating, and adds abstruse theory to obtuse theory until it seems more an arithmetic of thinking. But does it all add up? You hack through it with a heuristic hatchet (a metaphor that I fear Fuller might appreciate), stung by serpentine thoughts on physics and wrappability and interaccommodative simultaneity, and you ask if it all adds up. So you think back to the metaphysics that smuggled under the equally absurd story of "The Little Prince", and you suspect that it might. Fuller claims that he's after "an ever more inclusive and refining comprehension by all humanity of a happy state of generalization that this mass of diagrams and tables and a poem on numerology might provide. Of course, it's damnably hard to understand, but you pick it up anyway, because it looks . . . thick like a good stew.

There you are, then, sifting through this dense mass and it's sunning outside so your attention wanders. Back to Buckminster Fuller in the 30's — architect, engineer, inventor, graduated in the iconoclasm of '21 or something like that, went on to be ahead of his time. You think of the Dymaxion car he built back then. Looked like a big goldfish on wheels, used energy awfully well. Same with the Dymaxion house. It looked rather like a huge tinfoil barbecue and worked pretty well, too. And now there's this huge invention, this book, and it looks like the proverbial ton of bricks, and you know that Buckminster Fuller has done a few things in his life, so this distillation that's putting a dent in your hand where you're holding it must mean quite a bit. Yes, but can you catch it? And you think again of Fuller in the past, with his real, honest-to-God Mammam car, and maybe you think that those were the days when Fuller's genius came out in polished aluminum rather than polished neologisms. Those words! But you keep on reading because it's strangely compelling, like an old photograph of people you never really knew but who seem to have . . . personality.

Anyway, you shouldn't yearn for the past. Here's Fuller saying that he wants to "release humanity from the false fixations of yesterday" and you can see that he's got a sort of, well, a Moral Impetus in all this exotica of domes and astronomies. He's a Don Quixote with a noble quest, but using his imagination rather than living in it. All right, that's it — he wants to show us something. If only more people realized that showing is far removed from showing off. But Fuller doesn't show off; he effaces himself a bit.

He's one of those New Homers, like McLuhan and Chomsky and Robert Altman, who send a heroic idea through trials and triumphs and eventually home to the faithfully waiting Modern Age. The idea's the thing. So you don't mind the obscurity so much if the idea's worth getting at — all this stuff about synergy being a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — and you read just a little bit more . . . tolerantly. Damned heavy book though.

No, you can't really read the thing; you have to worship at the shrine and that takes dedication. Novels take slight, bemused attachment (which is why some novels become friends) but, no, not Fuller. Dedication. It's all a bit theological in the end, this man sprinkling watery phrases through the density of the physics, phrases like "god is the unknowable totality of generalized principles". General principles are sacred? It sounds nice. It makes the meanest child's opus with its espousals like "humans got bodies, you betcha" seem biblical. And you wonder a little at Fuller's pretensions, but you've seen that he's sincere and laughable and somewhere in between he's ingenious. Of course it might be a huge mistake, with its religious reasons in a vast cake of science. But you think, perhaps as you shut the book with calloused fingers, that to err is human and to err hugely divine.

So you've got this big book that has a Whole Lot in it and you might as well pick it up, because it's better to know that there might not be much there for you than to suspect it. Men, much better than I have loved this book and maybe it's wise to judge a book by its lover.

Enthusiastic Goodman is master of varied styles

One of the least ballyhooed concerts of the current year took place Friday night at Convocation Hall with Steve Goodman presiding over 1,500 fans and fanatics. By the time it was over it had become one of the most enthusiastic and gratifying shows of the year. Playing alone for two and a half hours, Goodman alternately humoured and soothed the crowd with his potpourri of standards, obscure old songs and wry little numbers.

Arriving onstage Goodman seemed somewhat overwhelmed with his greeting from the crowd and joyfully rewarded them with "When The Red, Red Robin Comes Bob, Bob, Bobbin' Along". Accompanying himself the entire evening on his guitar he displayed samples of every possible idiom in popular music—country licks, snatches of blues, swing lines, classical pieces—a realm of styles written into his songs or delivered in between numbers. He has the nerve to do Marty Robbins impersonations or to spoof the ubiquitous Monty Hall and "Let's Make A Deal", yet he has the sincerity and credibility to enthrall the audience with Mike Smith ballads, "Spoon River" and the "Dutchman", gently caressing the silence with his voice.

Goodman is a traditionalist in musical styles but treats them with something less than reverence if it suits him. One song from his own repertoire would disappear into a spiritual and then would pull Richard Nixon, Patty Hearst and higher education's dinosaur, Con Hall, into its framework. He worked so well from one era to another, a styling of Shel Silverstein sweeping into his own moving acapella song "The Ballad of Penny Evans", that the bridges seemed quite natural.

Until I saw him after the concert I really had no idea how tiny Goodman is. Onstage he skipped, shuffled and shadow-boxed in the tight spot till he literally became bigger than our dimensions, energizing the show and his now-captivated audience like a disciple of the Elton John Give 'Em Hell Onstage School.

His mind was acutely sharp, lyrics spilled out of him, small talk like no one I'd seen since Randy Newman, and the response was overwhelming. Feeding off this noisy plasma, he poured it on, entertaining and cajoling his way through two encores. One of the encores was, in fact, a song promising more as long as there were folks out there still asking for it. The tempo rarely flagged. I never counted the number of songs he'd sung (it was difficult to differentiate between start and finish at times) in anticipation of closing. It was a charged night for Steve Goodman and for the promotion people who saw a good crowd clap and chant its way through a show they had awaited with some uncertainty.

Having delighted his audience so thoroughly, Goodman's reputation is safe in Toronto. He worked till exhausted and convinced everyone that the man who backs John Prine is indeed an artist in his own right. Bruce Dowbiggin

A solo creation of listenable electronic music

Electronic music is divided into three categories. Musique concrete is the result of sounds processed through tape recorders and electronic effects generators. Computer music is music either written or performed by computers. The remaining classification encompasses all music performed on synthesizers. It is the ability to create ear-pleasing synthesized sounds that has elevated people such as Rick Wakeman (in the field of rock music) and Walter Carlos (in the field of classical music) to their present heights.

Two things may be said about the latest synthesized music album on the market. The first matter concerns the title of the album. Electronic Realizations for Rock Orchestra is definitely electronic. It definitely represents the realization of many ideas in the field. It is definitely rock music; although many older listeners enjoy the album for its purity of sound and absence of meaningless lyrics—the type which have flawed many of Wakeman's near-perfect creations. (The album is, in fact, all instrumental.) The music is also definitely orchestrated, in a Walter Carlos-inspired style. Thus, the title describes the album well.

The second matter concerns the designation of the album's artist. Synergy is not a group, team or ensemble. Synergy is Larry Fast. Obviously convinced that there is something in a name, Larry decided to release the album under this interesting name. He also decided to do many other things, including composing four of the five selections on the album, performing everything on the album, arranging everything on the album, programming the album, engineering the album, and doing the production on the album. The instrument credits on the album are impressive. Larry plays or operates: Mini Moog, Oberheim Expander, Mellotron, Oberheim DS-2 Digital Sequencer, Galvanic Skin

Response Voltage Controller (sounds interesting), ARP 2600 Synthesizer, 360 Systems 20 20 Frequency Shifter, Musitronics Instant Phaser, Eventide Clockworks Digital Delay Unit and API automated computerized quadraphonic mixer. Paul Wilkinson Soul saviour no longer sweet: resurrection next time around?

In 1972 I was a fifteen year old schoolboy at one of England's oldest and most respected public schools. I had short hair, wore a school uniform, played rugby for the school team and got good marks. Now I am eighteen, I wear jeans, my hair reaches my collar and I am a freshman at the U. of T. What happened? Was it hard drugs, women, or liquor? No, it was none of these. It started back in '72, when, one fateful day, I went to my local record shop to buy an album by the new American group called the Eagles. It had not yet been released so I asked the assistant to recommend something. I left the shop clutching a shiny new record; the title was short and sweet, Lou Reed.

Four years and eight albums later I am a regular Lou Reed aficionado. Sure, my standard of living has gone down, my family rarely speaks to me and they tremble every time I approach the stereo, but who cares? In the words of the maestro himself, "You've got to live your life as though you're number one. You've got to live your life and make a point of havin' some fun." To quote another standard, "It leaves you breathless."

Commercially that first solo record was a flop. One critic said it sounded as if it had been recorded in a broom cupboard. Still it is vintage Lou Reed, with a great combination of hard rockers and tender love songs. He struck gold with his next platter, Transformer, produced by David Bowie and Mick Ronson. In England it was an enormous success, as all of Bowie's fans bought it and he even had a hit single with "A Walk On The Wild Side". He was on the crest of a wave and everyone waited with eager anticipation for his next production. This was Berlin and everyone hated it. Continuing the themes of Kosinski's novel "The Painted Bird" it was a gory love story. One magazine voted it the year's most disappointing record and everyone seemed to agree. It is filled with depression and it is perfect mood music to slit your wrists by. Still, the lyrics are poignant, the music tight, and the production very dramatic. Let me cite an example from "Men of Good Fortune"

*Men of good fortune often cause empires to fall
While man of poor beginnings often can't do anything at all
The rich son waits for his father to die*

*The poor just drink and cry
And me, I just don't care at all.*

Two of his next three records are live recordings, both from the same concert, called Rock n Roll Animal and Lou Reed Live. Musically they are two of his best efforts and the sound is a faithful reproduction of the actual concert. Old Velvet Underground songs are performed but in a new style that is just as powerful as the old. In between these two came Sally Can't Dance, one of his most successful albums. "Baby Face" is without doubt the stand-out track and it has converted many new fans.

So once more Lou Reed is riding high and once more he blows it. For his last record is the aptly named Metal Machine Music. I could say it sounds like someone has hit a computer with a sledgehammer and recorded the results, but I will not. BMI might sue me for defamation of character. Metal Machine Music is a loser but Lou Reed is a winner. I love his music, I love his lyrics and, as he says back on the fateful first record;

"I'm going to miss you, now that you're gone. One sweet day, one sweet day".

Long apprenticeship crafts tight band: Hans Strymer Band tunes up

Hans Strymer has been involved with music for well over a decade. Originally from Hamburg, Germany, Strymer was influenced by the expatriate American groups playing in the traditional jazz clubs of Hamburg during the late fifties and early sixties. The Beatles were also playing in Hamburg at this time, and while what happened to them is a story which hardly needs telling, the Hans Strymer story is one that is only now beginning to emerge.

In the mid-sixties Strymer could be found in Edmonton, playing the guitar and harp in several groups. By 1968 he was living in Vancouver where he worked at The Bunkhouse, one of the first after hours coffee houses located there. In 1969 Strymer joined a new band from Vancouver called Django, who were a little before their time. Although popular with the underground, they never made it on the national level.

Today, the Hans Strymer Band consists of Hans (vocals and harmonica), Ed Patterson (guitars), Wayne Kozak (saxophones), and Geoff Eyre (drums).

Their album, The Hans Strymer Band, is one of the finest to be released by a Canadian group this year. The music is a distinct mixture of blues and rock. With a total of ten songs in the album, there are at least six salable tracks. These include "Hello Central", "Someone's Knockin'", "Too Long At The Fair", "Follow Me Down", "Sweet Sympathy", and "Goodnight Carmalita". All of these are potential hit singles, while the remaining four tracks are FM-oriented blues.

There are three factors which make this album appealing: the strong raunchy vocals of Strymer (which at times sound much like a mixture of those of Joe Cocker, Ritchie Havens, and Dr. John), the tight and exceptional musical backup work done by the Hans Strymer Band (in particular, Wayne Kozak) and the all-round superb production job by Don Hamilton.

It's good to hear an album like this by a Canadian group. If they have a follow-up piece which is in any way comparable to this effort, the Hans Strymer Band could very well become the next big Canadian band. Paul Jones

movies

We continue with our programme of unmediated films at our noble city's noblest theatres, the repertory houses. If you want first-run listings, read the Star.

FRIDAY: The Poor Alex Theatre, at Brunswick and Bloor, has a series of Japanese films: Fridays and Saturdays at 8:30, for $1.50. Tonight and tomorrow they have Kurosawa's samurai picture Yojimbo — the movie that inspired Sergio Leone! The New Yorker begins a week's run of the Judy Collins-Jill Godemilow documentary Antonia: A Portrait of the Woman, about Antonia Brno, the conductor, and by implication, the problem that women artists face today (Antonia who?). Tonight and Monday through Thursday at 7, 8:45 and 10:15; Saturday and Sunday at (brace yourself) 2, 3:45, 5:30, 7:15, 9 and 10:30, so you have no excuse to miss it. The U.C. Film Club is showing (7:30 at Medsciud) two Mexico films: Bunuel's Los Olvidados, about JDs in the Mexico City slums, and Time in the Sun, bleeding chunks of the Cine Viva Mexican, a documentary Eisenstein tried to make, collected with really admirable dedication from Hollywood and Russian files by Marie Selon, his friend, secretary and biographer, and stitched together to the best of her ability. She's no Eisenstein: it's a disappointment, a real heartbreaker, but it's full of haunting Eisenstein images of landscapes, folk festivities, and wierd, masochistic religious rituals.

Saturday, 3 pm, at the A.G.O., for $1.50, a film version of Moliere's Tartuffe, by F.W. Murnau (who made Nosferatu, the best vampire movie ever) and starring that immortal ham Emil Jannings. Silent, of course. It's part of a series there exploring relations between theatre and film which continues on SUNDAY with Brook's production of Marat Sade, Peter Weiss's meditation on the French Revolution, with Glenda Jackson as a sonambulist, Charlotte Corday (her first major role) and Patrick MacGee as your favourite Marquis. Also on Sunday, at the Revue, the recent Freebie and the Bean at 7:30, and at 9:30 Mean Streets, Martin Scorsese's Inferno, set in New York's Little Italy, starring Harvey Keitel and Robert di Niro before Coppola got hold of him. And at midnight the Roxy has another of their Total Aesthetic Experiences: The Texas Chainsaw Murders, Mothra, Dr. Phibes Rises Again and Scream and Scream Again, with parts of Ladies and Gentlemen. The Rolling Stones for lyrical intermezzi.

MONDAY, at the Roxy, at 7 and 10:30 Bob Fosse's Lenny, with Dustin Hoffman, and at 9, Almanac's masterpiece The Long Goodbye; the script is by Leigh Brackett, who wrote the script for the Hawkes Bogart The Big Sleep (with a little help from Faulkner), from Chandler's last, most personal and most melancholy novel; Marloe is played with all the fatigue of a man who is just trying to be decent in a society that will tolerate anything else, by Elliot Gould; and there is a cameo by Henry Gibson, who is all the more sinister because you keep expecting him to be cute.

TUESDAY, at the Roxy, at 7 and 10, M. Huliot's holiday, an early Jacques Tati, and at 8:30 Steamboat Bill Jr. by Buster Keaton.

WEDNESDAY, A.G.O. continues its series of Women on Film; it's free. At 5:30, Three Lives by Kate Millett; at 7 Godard's The Married Woman, about marriage as concentration camp — it was banned when it first came out; and at 9 Les Filles du Roy, a film about French-Canadian women by Anne-Claire Poltre. Two Hitchcocks at 7, Rebecca, today and Thursday; at 7, Rebecca, with Laurence Olivier and Joan Fontaine, and at 9:30 Notorious, his own favourite of his films, with Ingrid Bergman, Cary Grant and Claude Rains. If seeing Tartuffe and Saturday has turned you on to German Expressionism, you can head out to Erlinde at 7 for The Golem.

THURSDAY More Women on Film: at 7 Black Girl, by Ousmane Sembene of Senegal, the first black African repertoire. Students $2. Also, on Oct. 14 at 8, Dr. Peter Williams will be holding a lecture-seminar on the organ works of Bach. In Walter Hall and it's free, so come and get cultured!

That's all for now, folks (and others!). Have a great week! JM

rock

The only concert announcement this week is the news that on October 25 at 8:30 pm, Hank Snow and Tim Daniels will be appearing at the Stratford Festival Theatre. The rest of the concert news has all been previously announced. Next week there are no less than four concerts in Toronto, Strawls at Massey Hall on the 12th, Henry Cliff at Massey Hall on the 14th, Rick Wakeman at the Gardens on the 16th, and Tubes at Massey Hall on the 18th. In the more distant future are Sha Na Na at York on the 26th, Rod Stewart, at the Gardens on the 27th, Murray McLaughlin at Massey Hall on the 27th, The National Lampoon Show at Seneca on Nov. 1st, Bonnie Raitt at Massey Hall on Nov. 2nd, and Paul Simon at Massey Hall on the 16th.

In the clubs, Shawne Jackson is at the Forge, Ray Hutchinson is at the Friar's, Dan Hill is at the Riverboat, Lilife Caesar and the Consuls are at the Nickelodeon, Tobi Lark and T. Company are at the Generator, The Good Brothers are at the El Mocambo, and Mose Allison is at the Colonial.

On campus there is a free lunch time concert by the Heartaches Razz Band behind the SAC office this afternoon from 1:00 to 2:00. The alternate site is the Hart House Debates Room.

classical

Well, let's see. Classical guitar buffs, take note! Julian Recital will be doing a Luz and Guitar Recital Thurs. Oct. 30 at 8:30 pm at Massey Hall. Tickets are $3, $5, $7, or $9. Mail your cheques or money orders to: International Artists, 178 Victoria St., Toronto M5B 1T7 and enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Also, the first concert in Series "A" of the Chamber Players of Toronto features Narcisco Yepes, the famed originator of the ten-stringed guitar (and hence, an arch-enemy of Segovia!). He'll be doing the Vivaldi and Giuliani Guitar Concertos on Nov. 8 at 8:30 pm in the McMillan Theatre at the E.J.B. Students: $4.30.

The Women's Musical Club of Toronto will be presenting the Glinka Quartet on Oct. 16th at 1:30 pm at the Eaton Auditorium. Tickets are an easy $1.50 for students. At the A.G.O., on Oct. 16 at 8 pm, there will be a program of 18th and 19th century music. Free with admission to the Gallery. It'll be held in the Music Room at The Grange. Further enquiries: 361-0414.

The Canadian Opera Company rounds out its season Oct. 10 with Manon Lescaut and Oct. 11 with a matinee (2 pm) of Madama Butterfly and an evening performance of Die Fledermaus (in English). Tickets range from $6-$15.50 and performances are 8:15 pm at the O'Keefe Centre. Student matinee performance: $3 and for more info, call 363-9256.

Speaking of voices, Leontyne Price will be making her only Toronto appearance on Oct. 15th, 8:30 pm at Massey Hall. She'll be doing a programme of Handel, Mozart, Schubert, Tchaikovsky ... Tickets are $3-$6. Call 363-7301.

Closer to home, the first concert of the Thursday Scholarship Series will take place Oct. 16 at 8:30 pm at Walter Hall in the E.J.B. Corand Fenyves, violin, Vladimir Orloff, cello, and Patricia Parr, piano, will perform great works from the piano tri-repertoire. Students $2. Also, on Oct. 14 at 8, Dr. Peter Williams will be holding a lecture-seminar on the organ works of Bach. In Walter Hall and it's free, so come and get cultured!

art

Jack Frost is busy while you sleep and each day is a new art gallery. Oh those reds and yellows and browns. Oh yes. We're trying hard for the populist touch here but can you blame us? "Art criticism" — the very phrase seems to prompt fervent unsolicited avowals of know-nothingness. We have not, in short, been inundated with the names of people wanting to review for this section.

Coming up next week at University College is an antiques and treasure auction sponsored by the UC Alumnae of the Sixties, and consisting largely of their donations and those of other concerned graduates — including William Davis (who has given a doorknob from Queen's Park), Bora Laskin (the minutes from his first meeting as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada), James Reaney (one of his manuscripts), Claude Bisseli (an oil on ivory of University College) and Roland Michener (an Eskimo sculpture). There is a lot of other treasure, some of it cheap, Jocelyn Paul, one of the organizers of the event says. She instances old napkin rings, room number and all, from Whitney Hall (these hopefully will go for $5 each). All proceeds go to the UC Restoration Fund. Admission to the auction — Thursday, Oct. 16, from 8 p.m. on — is by catalogue and these cost $1.50 each. There are two previews, however, open to the public without charge, Wednesday, 3-8 p.m., and Thursday, 6-8 p.m.

I think I'll go to the auction itself and make a bid — one bid only — on the UC oil donated by Bisseli.

The following Monday and Tuesday evenings, Oct. 21 and 22, Sotheby's of Canada (a branch of the Sotheby's) presents its annual fall auctions of Canadian art at the Robert Simpson department store downtown. Admission here is also by catalogue — these are $5. (We'll bring you a story the following Friday.)

Yet another near campus harbor for the occasional art show has cropped up. (Is anyone out there keeping count?) The Education Centre Gallery, 155 College St., 6th floor, has an exhibition of the oil landscapes of the late Howard C. Dierlam through to Oct. 16.

Continuing: Colette Whiten at Carmen Lamanna (closes next Thursday); Miller Brittain at the Galerie Dresdner (until 25 Oct.); Animals in Art at the ROM (until every family in Toronto wondering what to do on a Sunday has seen it).

Special events: Robertson Davies reads from World of Wonders, the concluding volume in the Fifth Business and The Manitowice trilogy, next Wednesday, Oct. 15, 8 pm, at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Free, except for admission to the gallery (50 cents for students). The Hart House Art Committee begins showing films regularly again the next day: Oct. 16. The films which will be shown twice during the day, 12:15 p.m. and 7:30 p.m., in the Art Gallery, include ones on Krieghoff, Kane and Correliue.

Merely a few brief notes today from a harassed editor.

Current this week: Academy of Theatre Arts, 23 Grenville Street: Shaw's Village Wowing at 8:30, tonight and tomorrow. Is the later Shaw a decline from his earlier triumphs? See Review. Two dollars for students.

Actors' Repertory Theatre, The Colonnade: The Promise, by Arbuzov

Tuesday to Thursday at 8:30, and Wednesday an earlier show at 3:00; on Friday and Saturday, Old Time Music Hall. Times are 8:30 for the Friday event and 7:00 and 9:30 for Saturday's shows. $3.50 for students.

The Bear Theatre, operating out of the Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgman Avenue. Two Chekhov one-act plays. The Bear and The Proposal, open the 15th, $2.50 for students, but $4.50 on the weekend nights and only $1.75 for the Sunday matinee at 3:00. All other shows at 8:30; no performances Monday or Tuesday.

Creation 2, playing in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Trinity Square (Albert Street entrance) presents Face Crime, an exploration of Joseph Stalin. Previewing tonight for one dollar, all subsequent shows will be $2 student price. October 10-November 1, no show on the 17th, or on Sundays. All shows at 8:30.

Firehall Theatre (U.A.D.C.), 70 Berkley Street: Hippolytos, by Euripides, working from a recent translation. Tuesdays to Saturdays at 8:30 until the 25th, $2.50 for students except for the weekend nights when it's a dollar more.

Hart House Theatre, entrance beside the main entrance and somewhat subterranean: Three Hours After Marriage until the 18th. Curtain time 8:30. See Review.

New Theatre, 736 Bathurst Street: Human Remains, a new play by Larry Fineberg under the direction of Steve Katz. A ghoulish work from all accounts, and to cater to your tastes, they will be midnight shows on Fridays and Saturdays. Evening curtains are at 8:45, and there is a Sunday matinee at 2:45. Tickets are $1.50 to $4.50; no word yet on student discount.

O'Keefe Centre opens its season on Monday with The Dame of Sark, a realistic drama based on Sybil Hathaway's personal resistance to German occupation of her bailiwick. With Dame Anna Neagle. Mondays to Saturdays $3.50 to $8.50 with the possibility of a half-price ticket for the Wednesday and Saturday matinees at 2:00. All evening performances at 8:30. The Phoenix Theatre, 390 Dupont Street, The Mousetrap. See Review. Redlight Theatre, at Harbourfront: 10,000 Hettcats in Deep Freeze. Passionate women's Lib? Free shows each night this weekend at 8:30. I'd recommend this on the basis of having talked with the company director.

Royal Alex: Absurd Person Singular. It may be expensive; it may be good, too. (See Review). It runs Monday to Saturday at 8:30, matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30.

Ryerson Theatre, 43 Gerrard Street: A double bill of O'Casey's Bedtime Story and something called Stay Where You Are. Monday to Saturday at 8:30 and a Saturday matinee at 2:30. Students $1.50. Unfortunately I know of this only by word of mouth and I cannot guarantee you that the show is on the boards again this week.

Toronto Free Theatre, 24 Berkeley Street: April 29, 1975, a new play by Martin Kinch detailing the aftermath of an automobile accident. Free previews each night this weekend; starting on the 15th, $3 and $4. Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30, Sunday matinee at 2:30 as well as in the evening. Reservations are requested; call 368-2856.

Toronto Truck Theatre, recently rehoused at 94 Belmont Street, continues Butterflies. Are Free at the Hellenic Hall on Hazelton Avenue, Fridays and Sunday at 8:30 and Saturday at 7:00 and 9:30.

Western civilization falling to pieces, according to Muggeridge

By CHRISTOPHER DU VERNET
"Western civilization is falling to pieces," alleged Malcolm Muggeridge, Wednesday at an open meeting of the Theological Society at Wycliffe College.

Muggeridge told an overflow crowd that today's "institutions are not working." Comparing the western world to the Roman empire, he cautioned even though both civilizations were "richer than they've ever been", the Roman empire cracked up because the moral shape was breaking."

"Unless men have a sense of moral order they will not be able to construct any other order."

Muggeridge's informal talk centered on his recently filmed television series in which he discussed St. Augustine, Pascal, Blake, Kierkegaard, Tolstoy, and Bonhoeffer.

He explained, "The TV series meant more to me than anything else." "After it was all finished I felt I had to say why these six had been chosen. By accident I had fastened on six stay-behind agents of God." The former editor of Punch magazine explained "God never abandons his creatures. Always there will be these stay-behind agents, who keep alive the spirit of God."

Each of the men Muggeridge had had attributed in keeping the spirit alive. Augustine proved that "We as Christians are concerned with a city not built by men," he said. Pascal, he claimed, showed that "Man could not master his own destiny, man was not in charge." Blake, whom he considered to be "one of the greatest geniuses", "produced a magical awareness of what lay ahead.

Unidentified ex-humorist says society as we know it is slipping on the banana peel of decadence.

"Kierkegaard, Muggeridge felt, "exposed the consequences of the confusion of the kingdom which Jesus proclaimed and the heaven on earth."

Tolstoy he considered to have kept alive Christianity in "the most materialist state that has ever existed." "While it on the one hand prevented the gospels from reaching the people, their essence was available in Tolstoy." Referring to Russia, Muggeridge said "The Holy Spirit is working there perhaps more remarkably than elsewhere." Bonhoeffer indicated that "built into history" is anti-history, the everlasting love of God," said Muggeridge.

Asked whether he was one of these stay-behind agents, he replied, "I'm not smart enough."

Muggeridge was particularly critical of television as a medium. "They ever must believe a lie, who see with, not through, the eye," he said, quoting Blake. "What inconceivable lies TV has induced.

Chief crime increase lies in petty crime, ombudsman Arthur Maloney tells forum

By LAURIE WALSH

"Our magic belief in Law and experts is just not paying off. Our expectations are too much for us."

Speaking to a capacity crowd Wednesday evening at the St. Lawrence Centre, J. W. Mohr, head of the Canadian Law Reform Commission was one of six panelists discussing the question "Who Is The Criminal?", the first of a three part series on crime sponsored by Toronto Arts Productions.

Contrary to what he termed "media mythology", moderator Arthur Maloney, Ontario's new appointed Ombudsman, said the chief increase lies in minor offences, especially negligent driving offences, and other petty criminal code offenses.

Maloney said the criminal is not merely the unlucky one who gets caught and convicted. Shoplifters, for example are responsible for an estimated two billion dollars worth of unpaid merchandise in Canadian stores, he pointed out. "We are all indicted," he stressed.

According to Deputy Police Chief Jack Ackroyd, crime is growing at eight times the rate of population growth. "Our criminal justice system is just not working to control crime," he concluded.

Crime data, Ackroyd said however, could be misleading, because many crimes fail to be reported. In actuality, less than one per cent of the population were involved in major crime in 1974, he said.

Dr. Irvin Waller, Research director for the Solicitor General said "The ratio of eight to one quoted by Ackroyd seems unrealistic. We can all safely walk out of here tonight out to the streets. Toronto is a lot better off than most other North American cities."

Waller said because the average criminal trial involves a young person, precautions could be taken to reduce the incidence of crime. The community should be just as involved in crime prevention as the law force, he stressed.

Mohr attacked the public attitude of dealing with crime as if it were outside ourselves. "Crime is a reflection of the whole society and should call forth an examination of what values we live by and which ones we want to live by," he said.

The causes of rising crime, and not only the apparent symptoms, should be the focus, he emphasized. "Solutions to the rising crime problem are not locked up in psychiatrists' cabinets nor so befuddled in courtrooms that we don't know what we are doing." Crime represents society and it is the community who can deal with its causes most effectively, he pointed out.

A spokesman for the Attorney-General's office, Ross McLeod said: "Some people are just plain bad people and until we come up with some alternate method of handling them, they should be in jail." "If lack of respect for others is one of the roots of crime, then a failure to instill this is present, McLeod added.

In a lively and controversial question and answer period, the audience raised a number of issues.

One man who identified himself as an ex-convict, angrily addressed Ackroyd and attacked Metro Police for what he claimed was unjust treatment and a violation of his rights.

A poem on the evils of crime and killing was read by a man, to the impatience of the audience.

Reacting to the heated debate, a nervous young woman began to cry after complaining, "Solutions are farther away than when we came."

One ex-prisoner said the preference of her fellow inmates had been for the Don Jail rather than what she termed "the useless rehabilitation" of the Vanier Institute. This seemed to surprise most panelists, and Maloney said he would certainly investigate the matter.

Despite the heated exchange and at times open hostility, the audience seemed pleased with the evening's discussion.

ANEQ blasts student groups

QUEBEC CITY (CUP) — The newly formed National Association of Quebec Students (ANEQ) has blasted much of the Canadian Student Movement for allegedly refusing to develop relations with their association, while at the same time calling for "unity between students of Quebec and Canada."

According to a resolution passed at the ANEQ Congress held here September 27-28: "The National Union of Students, the Ontario Federation of Students, The Atlantic Federation of Students and Canadian University Press have refused outright to establish even an informal unity with ANEQ."

"We find this act to be unfriendly and inopportune at a time when it is necessary to build unity in the face of a common enemy" the resolution stated.

The motion was ANEQ's response to the decision by the groups named in the resolution to "indefinitely postpone" a conference between ANEQ and the Canadian student groups planned for last summer.

The reasons given for the postponement as indicated in a July letter from those groups to ANEQ, was that the Canadian student movement itself is not yet sufficiently developed to enter through NUS into a formal alliance with ANEQ.

The ANEQ resolution called this reason "insufficient" for cancellation of the conference.

Native students organize

BRANDON (CUP) — Following three long years of struggle a Native Student's Union (NSU) has emerged on the University of Brandon campus.

Native students number about 200, or 10 per cent of the student population at Brandon.

According to a spokesperson for the Union, the native students want to play a more significant role in the life of the University community.

Dr. P. Voorhis, of the Native

Studies Department stressed recently that these students have very special needs, rights and interests. He views the Native Studies Department as a "symbolic" relationship with the students, noting that mutual benefit arises out of this relationship.

The native students have not felt a part of the Brandon University Students Union, he said, which has led to a lack of confidence in the student council.

Blues vs York Tonight

Item "A".

"We really needed that win... It was a big psychological barrier we had to overcome and finally we did it."

That is what York University football coach Nobby Wirkowski had to say about his teams victory last week. York has been trying to win a game for the last two years but was unable to beat any team until last week they managed to down McMaster 17-8. The win gave York second last place with three losses to one win, while forcing McMaster to last place with four losses to no wins.

Therefore, York has nowhere to look but up. They will probably have to win at least two more games in order to gain a playoff berth. Because of this they will be probably more psychologically prepared than they have been in any game in the last two years. As Ron Murphy put it, "They will be higher than a kite."

Item "B".

For many years now, the University of Toronto has been playing against York University in a game which is beginning to resemble an annual 'cross-town' rivalry. No matter how either team does in league or season action, a very big and important game for both teams, is when they meet each other at Varsity Stadium to do battle for the rank of No. 1 university for football in Toronto. (This rivalry probably stems from the academic rivalry between the two universities, with Toronto always far ahead on top.)

By combining items "A" and "B", and by taking into account the fact that Toronto won last year's game 26-7 it becomes obvious that York will have a passionate desire to win tonight.

There are also other points to be considered.

Dave Langley, the Blues QB played for another university football team before donning the blue and white. Langley played for York in 1973, the last time (other than last week) York won a game. To many York players, Langley is a traitor of sorts.

Paul Forbes, a Toronto defensive back, also played with another college football team before coming under the wings of Ron Murphy. The team he played for — you guessed it — was York. His reason for transferring to Toronto was because York had no faculty or college of education. Thus, after four years at York, he came to Toronto to study and play football.

Toronto has won all of the games between the two to date. This year will prove to be no easy win however. York will have many players of high calibre prepared for the contest. Bill Hatanaka, among the best receivers in the league last year will give our secondary one of their hardest games to date. Kevin Beagle, Dan Bertolo, and Sergio Deluca are all able to put points on the board, and that will of course, be their primary objective with help from other outstanding players such as Paul Kotsopoulos and QB Doug Kitts.

Although York is traditionally strong on the ground, their air attack should be the most dangerous to the Blues.

The Toronto defensive secondary will hopefully cover their zones well enough, and adapt to any new plays York might plan to introduce. The sport desk prediction of the score is Toronto 29, York 7.

Waterpolo Winners

The Waterpolo Blues played impressively in Kingston last Saturday winning all three of their matches by large scores.

In the first game, they walked over Carleton University scoring thirteen goals while allowing only three. The second game wasn't much different with a 13-4 decision over a weak RMC team. In the final match, the team played against Carleton for the second time, and this time it was probably overconfidence which caused them to beat the Raven team by only 8-4 (five goals less than the previous encounter).

On the whole, the team looks good. Two weeks ago, it was a different story at the York Tournament. The players didn't perform as well as they could have because they were disgruntled at the fact that they lost George Gros to the Canadian National Waterpolo Team. It didn't take them long however to realize that although it was nice to have a star, it was their team effort which was the team's greatest advantage. The result was that they went into the Queen's Tournament with confidence and a winning attitude.

At the Queen's Tournament, the only team which could have come close to their performance was Queen's, although the Varsity's comparative performance test shows that the chances were that they would have probably beaten Queen's by four goals.

The tournament statistics and the Toronto scoring is below.

Queen's Tournament Goals

Queen's 6; RMC 3
Toronto 13; Carleton 3.
RMC 7; York 4

Rowing Team Ready For Toronto Regatta

By LARRY MARSHALL

If nothing more, members of the University of Toronto rowing team are becoming connoisseurs of the fall sunrise. The clear cool weather of late has produced spectacular displays; the consensus of the lightweight crew is that the showing of Oct. 8 has as yet been unequalled.

Whether it has been the aesthetic appeal of early morning lakeshore, or the brisk snap in the air, is uncertain, but crews have shown marked improvement of late, whatever the reason. An early season clocking of the lightweight crew over 1,000 metres showed a time of 3 min. 47 sec., while this week they unleashed a 3 min. 33 sec. effort for the same distance, and expect to be under 3 min. 30 sec. by week's end. Since five seconds is roughly equivalent to one boat length, such progress is encouraging.

The novice crew was ahead of two crews at the finish of last Saturday's Head of the Trent regatta, improving by one their placing in the previous Hamilton meet. The shell used by the lightweight crew was used in an earlier race by a makeshift crew of Argonaut oarsmen and two U of T lightweight oarsmen. Unfortunately, they were forced off the course during the race by a meandering Brock crew; the resulting delay cost them 30 seconds. Nevertheless they were only 3 seconds out of first at the finish. This unplanned excursion also damaged the rudder assembly beyond repair, and with no time to make alternate arrangements, the lightweight crew was forced to scratch.

Plans for the U of T regatta, Oct. 11, are close to being finalized. It will be run in a "Head" fashion, which means the start will be staggered, competitors racing against the clock. The distance will be approximately two miles. Crews have been organized into three divisions, with crews in each division racing together.

At writing, Division 1 consists of Novice and Lightweight 'eights', Division 2 of Jr. Varsity 'eights', and Division 3 of Varsity 'eights' and men's 'fours'. Depending partly upon water conditions, these races could be run from the Humber River to the Argonaut Rowing Club, or alternately from Ontario Place to approximately the Boulevard Club. In any case, viewing should be best from the vicinity of the Argonaut Club, which is about 1/2 mile west of Ontario Place on Lakeshore Blvd. The first race is set for 10 am but it may be wise to be early. The action, at least that on the water, should be complete by 1 pm, but hopes are high that the Arg Club bar will be open to supplement the spirit of the occasion.

Soccer Blues Win Again

After a disastrous performance in a 2-1 loss to Guelph on Saturday, The Varsity Blues soccer team got back on track in St. Catharines Wednesday with a win over a weak Brock U. side.

The win brings the Blues record to 3 wins and 2 losses, but raised hopes of a playoff berth once again. But it was not simply the win which encouraged the team, but rather the style in which it was achieved. The Blues' forwards scored eight times while the defence did not allow a single goal by the opponents. Though Brock put forth a good effort, any team must play weak soccer to win by such a score.

It was certainly a far cry from Saturday's display. Against Guelph, the team was totally inept. After Vince Ierullo scored for Varsity three minutes into the match, the Blues could do nothing right. They even went so far as to present the Guelph team with the tying and winning markers on own goals — full-backs Michael Beal and Geoff Crewe each directed the ball into their own net to account for all of Guelph's scoring.

But Wednesday was a different story. The Blues seemed full of vengeance, all of which was taken out on the innocent Brock goalkeeper. Drew McKeown was the main force in the Blues' attack, with goals at 17, 20, and 35 minutes. Vince Ierullo scored two more, one at 15, the other at 63 minutes. Greg Pinheiro, Pat Pitters and Geoff Crewe (on a penalty kick) rounded out the scoring with goals at 41, 47, and 57 minutes respectively. The rest of the team carried out their assignments effectively, producing a strong defence and a balanced attack. Myroslav Shkandrij was outstanding in the midfield, as he controlled most of the play in that area.

In all, it was a most encouraging win for the Toronto team, who face a tough side from Waterloo tomorrow at 3 pm at the stadium. To make the playoffs, they must win all of their remaining 5 games, and so each match is crucial at this stage.

Library workers say no to federal wage freeze

Library workers will not be reducing their demands in the face of the federal wage and price controls, said Greg Collins, vice-president of the library worker's union, CUPE 1230.

"We feel that our demands are just and reasonable and we're sticking to them," he said in an interview yesterday.

But he noted that his statements were unofficial until they are ratified by the union membership at a general meeting to be held later this week.

Collins said he hopes the library workers will be exempted from the federal controls because they work for a provincial institution.

"It is still premature to judge," Collins noted, "but Premier Davis may not go along with Trudeau's proposals or, like the postal workers, we may not be included."

However, Davis announced Monday evening that the Ontario government would cooperate with the federal controls. He refused to comment on the details of the new policy until he'd met with the Ontario cabinet.

In any case, the union will stand by their present contract demands at their first conciliation meeting with the Ontario Labour Relations Board tomorrow.

The Ontario division of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), who represent library workers, is vehemently opposed to wage and price controls, and their stand is supported wholeheartedly by the library workers, said Collins.

At a general meeting last May, union members unanimously approved a strict admonishment to the Liberal party for considering wage and price controls and promised they would not submit to its measures.

Collins promised the library local will support the Ontario CUPE Congress in actively opposing the proposal for controls. In addition, CUPE will actively support any union which defies the wage controls.

Collins pointed out wage and price controls are not fair because they lock poorly paid workers into an unjust status quo.

He added, "The controls only halt wage increases. They don't affect prices."

The library workers consider their demands are fair and reasonable because their salaries are far below those paid to similarly qualified personnel in the public and private libraries elsewhere in Ontario.

The starting pay of an English major, with a BA, is only $107 per week at U of T and after three years on the job $6,500 is a typical annual salary. The workers goal is to win a salary equivalent to that of an average Ontario worker, about $11,000 a year.

The university's libraries are already suffering from staff shortages according to chief librarian R.H. Blackburn, yet the library intends to cut another 75 jobs this winter.

Controls Unfair - GAA

The Graduate Assistants' Association (GAA) will not be changing its contract demands despite the announcement of federal wage and price controls Monday night, said Jay Drydyk, the newly re-elected president of the GAA yesterday.

But, his statement will have to be ratified tomorrow's meeting of the GAA bargaining unit.

Drydyk considered the economic controls to be "extremely unfair" to lower income groups including graduate assistants. He pointed out Trudeau's annual pay raise of $4,600, expected in January, will be twice the total wage package demanded by teaching assistants and demonstrators at U of T.

Drydyk added he couldn't change the contract proposals since they were approved by the GAA membership at a general meeting last Wednesday.

The contract proposals voted on by the graduate assistants includes a demand that their pay be increased to $2,200 for a ten hour slot, a raise considerably more than the proposed federal ten per cent limit.

This contract is intended to cover the 15 month period from mid September 1975 to Christmas 1976 and is centered around demands for a reasonable wage, job security and a better teaching environment.

The GAA would like to see that all teaching assistants and demonstrators are paid a flat rate of $2,200 for a ten hour weekly workload. The ten hour slot is equivalent to two hours of seminars or five hours of laboratories a week, plus the ancillary duties such as marking tests and preparing labs. Markers hope to earn $15 per hour

New gym has crush on houses

By ERIC McMILLAN
U of T must report to City Council on its expansion plans and on the fate of buildings on the site now slated for demolition before the proposed athletic complex can receive final approval.

The by-law to exempt the complex from present zoning laws has passed third reading at Council and will go to the Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) at the end of October after the U of T reports are received.

The city had asked U of T to investigate the possibility of moving the existing buildings on the site to a location north of Harbord Street instead of demolishing them for the planned complex, according to Jack Dimond, assistant to the Vice-President of External Affairs.

Although Dimond would not say what the university will recommend, it is rumoured the buildings will be demolished. They include the Criminology Buildings, the Mathematics building and the former Ring Audio store on Spadina Avenue and the Great Lakes Institute on Harbord.

U of T must also report on what "permanent assurances" it can give regarding expansion on the North-West campus. Dimond claimed, "There are no plans to do anything in this area before 1980."

Present zoning regulations allow for a density of two times the ground area for the site of the proposed athletic complex. The complex will require a density of slightly over two times ground area. The site plan by-law passed by Council would exempt the area bounded by Spadina, Classic Avenue, Harbord, and the Benson Building from the present zoning rules.

The delay before the site plan by-law goes to the OMB for approval will allow for objections to the by-law to be submitted to City Council.

Dimond foresaw no objections from within the university but said he would not be surprised if submissions were received from "some of our neighbours." Such objections, he said, have been not on the merits of the athletic building in itself but its presence as a symbol, and its institutional facade.

Ross Wells, who resigned as SAC External Commissioner last week, called U of T "the worst developer in town." In a few years, "Students are going to wonder where all the housing went," he said.

Dimond dismissed this contention as "a flight of fancy." He noted a student referendum last year approved the building of the athletic complex.

Part of U of T's report to City Council must deal with the possibility of low-rise housing on the north side of Harbord, but Dimond would not comment on the report's recommendations.

Dimond rejected the possibility of low-rise housing on Spadina to shield the complex from the street and said the athletic complex will be only six feet higher than New College immediately south of the site.

The criminology centre is one building slated for demolition.

and instructors and part-time lecturers $3,600. The average professional salary at U of T is in excess of $17,000.

To preclude cutbacks in the number of teaching jobs, the GAA contract specifies all graduate assistants be guaranteed employment for five years and that the teacher-student ratio return to the 1973-74 levels.

At the general membership meeting, a large part of the discussion revolved around the seniority rights. It was finally resolved that new graduate assistants should be paid the same as those more experienced, but that senior teaching assistants should have first chance at available jobs and be laid off last.

The GAA hopes class sizes will be limited to no more than 12 students, although some demonstrators presently confront 30 students for as many as three continuous hours.

Looky's back in business.

York boycott succeeds

By MIKE SCOTT

Cafeteria operations were brought almost to a standstill as a result of a two day boycott of campus food services by York University students last week.

The boycott which was conducted last Wednesday and Thursday proved 80 per cent effective in reducing cafeteria usage, according to Dale Ritch, president of the Council of York Student Federations.

Students were protesting 30 to 60 per cent increases in prices, union busting activities by new caterers, and "funny money", a compulsory meal token purchased by resident students, Rich said.

The boycott effort was aided by campus ethnic groups who sponsored wholesale food outlets while students picketed the university's commercially run cafeterias.

The boycott came at the height of a conflict between York's student council and the university over the campus food issue, and stemmed from a decision made by the administration last May to turn student services into profit making ventures.

At that time, York's administration ousted the existing cafeteria shop, local 254 of the Restaurant, Cafeteria and Tavern Employees Union, and installed five outside caterers who boosted prices and instituted the compulsory meal token for residence students. The meal plan offered no discount from regular meal prices.

A Food Action Committee comprised of York Student Council members and other York students has drawn up three demands which will be presented to the university administration following a campus referendum to be held in six weeks.

Students want the campus cafeterias to be run by the university on a non-profit basis, under the supervision of a committee of students, faculty and staff. Students are also demanding the reinstatement of the former union shop and the abolition of the compulsory meal token.

"The overwhelming success of the boycott showed the administration we mean business," Ritch said, adding "There will be no backing down from our demands once the referendum results are in."

Commercial Caterers, who control 40 per cent of the campus food business, have already agreed to reinstate the former union shop, but have yet to rehire ousted union members to meet the union's requirement of 65 per cent union staff.

The whole issue of student services as non-profit ventures will be the subject for debate at the next Ontario Federation of Students conference.

Open letter to the president

President Evans:

We strongly recommend that you publish for the comment of the university community the report of your Presidential Advisory Committee on the 1976-77 budget.

Although we believe that this practice should naturally be carried out, this year there are special reasons. We understand that the budget committee is attempting to cut $7.5 million from the base operating budget of the university. Hardly an easy task we admit, but we believe that the budget committee's decisions cannot possibly be understood by the university community unless we know of them.

We have spoken with many student groups and student representatives who are very concerned about the decisions currently being undertaken by the budget committee. The decision to close down the infirmary, for one, has caused a great deal of controversy in the community.

It seems to us that you have found it practical and in the best interests of the university to publish other Presidential Advisory Reports (including recent reports on pensions and the Forster Task Force on Appointments Policy). We see no reason why the same practice cannot be followed with respect to the budget recommendations.

We would welcome an early reply to this recommendation.

Yours truly,
Gord Barnes

Science "bones" threatened by university budget cuts

By LINDA GUTH
Next year's proposed 5 per cent budget cutback continues to remove the "fat" from science department budgets and now threatens to restrict scientific "bones".

Chairman of Zoology Dr. Metrick explained, the Faculty of Arts and Science is faced with a 5 per cent budget cutback which cannot be shared as equally in the Arts as in the Sciences.

Dr. H. L. Armstrong, Chairman of Physics said in the Humanities and Social Sciences, approximately 90 per cent of the budget is spent on academic salaries, compared to a 75 per cent salary expenditure in the sciences with about 25 per cent spent on equipment, technicians and demonstrators.

Because of staff tenure, the cutbacks cut deeper into that 25 per cent science spending, already hard-hit by inflation, Metrick said.

Metrick doesn't see the sense in extracting the greater portion of the budget cut from the sciences. "This personally is causing me considerable concern. This will reduce the quality of education considerably more than in the Humanities and Social Sciences," he said.

"It is illogical. It doesn't make sense," he said, adding "I think that as soon as the university realizes it has to release tenured staff the better, because the way things are going the government is not going to be able to continue to support this."

Chairman of Chemistry Dr. K. Yates said inflation trends for scientific equipment have been running from 20-25 per cent per year, much higher than the 10-12 per cent general inflation.

Science departments have been faced with budget cuts for the last six years, but Armstrong predicts this year's will be a large one. "Because of the continual reduction we've had and the size of the cut this year, I will predict that this year's is quite a major cut," Armstrong said.

Each of the science departments decides where the cutbacks will be made and each department chairman has predicted where they will be affected. However, as yet none knows exactly how much money the cuts will entail.

For Zoology, Metrick foresees a general trend towards reduction of lab time with an increase in lecture and tutorial time. There will be 4 lab hours every 2 weeks and 3 lectures per week, compared to the previous 3 lab hours and 2 lectures per week.

Starting in 1977, fourth year courses with small enrolment could be given every other year, making a small group of 400 year courses open to 2nd and 3rd year students.

Small enrolment might also mean some 400 level courses could be given in one place for three campuses. A reduction in the number of demonstrators is foreseen, as well.

Metrick also says 3 academic staff are resigning this year and money will be saved by not replacing them.

Yates predicts no Chemistry courses will be cut out, but he foresees a reduction in the number of tutorials in 1st and 2nd year courses. Study room-resource centre hours will be drastically curtailed, he said. Yates doubts there will be a decrease in the number of labs, although some demonstrators may disappear.

He stressed that the cutback effects were aimed only at undergraduates. "Equally heavy cuts will fall on the research activities of the sciences," he said. In Physics, the cutting of only one undergraduate course. Applied Nuclear Physics, will be combined with a course in Chemical Engineering. There will be some graduate courses cut out of the curriculum though.

He feels there will be less money for up-to-date equipment and that fewer instructors, demonstrators and tutors will be hired. Lab and tutorial groups will also be larger.

Hiring will be confined to grad students from the Physics department. The amount of department research will also decrease.

Armstrong explained that the cutbacks will affect a shift in academic staff time towards undergraduate teaching.

All three chairmen agreed that the academic quality in the sciences would decrease as a result of budget cuts. "I think the quality of something will go down, whether it be the research or the undergraduate teaching, quality certainly will decrease," Armstrong said. "The quantity of research will go down and this is what really determines the reputation of the department."

Scientists are being hampered in their continuing research.

U of T academic union starts to fight discrimination

By MIKE EDWARDS

For a gay to "go public" is a serious matter. A faculty member at the University of Saskatchewan lost his job because of it. But a U of T group feels that going public is an important step in furthering the rights of gays in Canada.

Doug Wilson, a fully certified teacher and sessional lecturer in the College of Education at Saskatoon, was disqualified from supervising practice teachers by the U of S Administration. His only "offence" was to seek public support for a homosexual academic association.

Scarboro sociology professor John Lee and three others are planning a similar association here.

The Gay Academic Union (GAU) has been officially instituted. Their stated aim is to "combat sexism and discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in the school system."

The union wants to "promote research and study courses on the gay experience, and the improvement of library holdings on gay studies and gay literature."

Prof. Lee at the founding meeting last week charged that "thousands of Canadian teachers are living in daily fear of discovery and disgrace — not for something illegal they have done, but simply their sexual orientation."

The union is particularly concerned about the treatment of the founder of their Saskatchewan counterpart.

A special union press release states:

"Mr. Wilson showed more courage than most in making his sexual orientation public. The university should have supported his action as an example of academic freedom."

The Dean of the Education college James Kirkpatrick and the University President R. W. Begg have justified their disqualification of Mr. Wilson on the grounds that the public would object to a homosexual representing the university in city classrooms.

Three hundred university staff have publicly supported Mr. Wilson's right to be re-instated and have been joined by the province's Human Rights Association, the university student council and members of the provincial legislature.

"I know personally of many people in education, including well known leaders in library and museum administration school boards and in teachers' federations, who are actively gay on their private lives," said Prof. Lee.

"I hope the formation of the GAU will encourage more of them to come out from behind their mask of respectable heterosexuality," he added.

Vicky Pullam, a graduate in law enforcement, Albert Gedraitis, a high school teacher, and R. T. Wallace a graduate in library science have all joined Prof. Lee in "going public."

The GAU, in addition to joining the defence campaign for Doug Wilson, are planning to investigate the amount of gay literature in U of T libraries and lobby for more acquisitions.

They also plan to offer resource people for seminars and gay study courses and are moving ahead on plans for a Sociology of Education degree course at OISE.

Lee announced that the GAU would oppose sex stereotyping in student counselling and take other actions to support gay students who want to "come out."

"Just a short time ago the school libraries were refusing to put a copy of Time magazine on the open shelves for students to read, because the cover featured a gay American army hero," added Prof. Lee.

Lee welcomes students to his Scarboro college office to discuss gay studies or the new Union. A general meeting is planned for this Sunday afternoon.

SAC seeks info on OSAP problems

By ELLIOTT MILSTEIN

SAC is working on a brief for the Interim Committee on Financial Assistance For Students and they need your help.

SAC feels the committee will more readily accept a well researched brief. They are requesting all students to present their problems, complaints and suggestions.

The Committee was set up last January to "formulate recommendations for the Minister's (Colleges and Universities) attention . . . on the financial arrangements which will be required . . . to assist students in undertaking their post-secondary education."

SAC originally declined to respond to their request for a brief.

However, following the election, and the appointment of a new Minister of Colleges and Universities, they felt it may now be more worthwhile.

As a result, SAC executive assistant John Bennett and Internal assistant Kevin Kelleher will be in the Balcony Square office at Scarborough College all day on Oct. 17 to listen to Scarborough students' complaints.

They will hear complaints at Erindale College from 10 to 4:30 pm on Oct. 21 in the SAC office, Rm. 3094 South building. Students on the St. George Campus will be able to present their views at the SAC office Oct. 14-20.

The SAC brief must be submitted to the committee by Oct. 31. The committee will then study this and other submissions, in open meetings across the province. A meeting in Toronto will be held this January.

Bennett said the SAC brief will deal with practical problems, such as difficulty in getting money on time, and interpreting the forms.

The Ontario Federation of Students will be submitting a brief dealing with more theoretical questions, such as the size of the loan portion.

Pat Phillips, Student Awards Officer for the University of Toronto, is on the committee. He hopes the briefs will not be a restatement of old grievances, but will bring to light problems that have not been previously aired.

This is also what SAC has in mind. They don't want to write the brief before hearing the students.

SAC says it's now up to you. If you have had any problem, or if you didn't get enough money, or even if everything went smoothly for you, but you have an idea, show up at the interviews. If you could bring something written, it would help, but it is not necessary.

This is your chance to do something about OSAP.

Libraries won't extend services

By GREG RICHARDS

No extension of services will be offered in the event of a university library strike according to representatives of the independent libraries at St. Michael's Trinity and Victoria Colleges.

"Good God no! We'd need student help for that and we can't finance it," replied Trinity librarian Ms. Finch when asked about extending services.

The present policy at Trinity allows anyone access to the stacks and reading room, but only Trinity students are permitted to borrow books.

With St. Michael's library facilities offered to all U of T students, chief librarian Father Black said in the event of a strike and a great "increase in business", borrowing privileges might be curtailed, making St. Michael's a reference library. Father Black considers a university library strike a delicate situation.

"I personally have great respect for people who legally go out on strike. I wouldn't want to be accused of strike-breaking."

Regardless of any strike situation, students from other colleges will still be confined to the Victoria library's reading room, said assistant librarian Len Dutton.

Only Victoria students may enter the stacks at the college library. Dutton quickly added that library services will shortly be reinstated on weekends. A widely circulated student petition complaining of service cutbacks persuaded the Board of Regents to increase finances.

Support remains

The Library Support Committee, in a hastily convened meeting late Tuesday, has backed the library workers a wholeheartedly in their fight for a reasonable wage and for job security, said Agi Lukacs, liaison officer for the Information Sub-Group.

At the meeting of campus-wide supporters of library workers, a determined crowd of students, faculty and support staff voted unanimously to "declare unequivocal opposition to any form of wage control" and to reaffirm its "continued support of CUPE 1230's efforts to achieve its demands."

In its statement, the Support Committee claimed that an inflationary situation "is caused by corporate profits" and that "workers must respond by defending their right to a livable wage."

Vote today

A referendum is being held by the Arts and Science Students Union (ASSU) today and tomorrow to decide the future of academic life for many students.

Students will vote on the continuation of funding of the course unions, and the central body which co-ordinates their activities, ASSU. ASSU currently receives a $2 per student rebate from the Students Administrative Council. But this rebate will be unavailable to ASSU next year, thus ASSU needs students to decide whether they are willing to have the university administration levy an ASSU fee directly. ASSU is also asking for an increase of $2 in their fees. This additional money will be used for an organizing drive in the Sciences, as well as for increasing the services offered to students by those course unions already in existence.

Correctionings

In last Friday's Varsity we made the erroneous statement that the Students' Administrative Council had voted to support the library strike.

This is not the case. The SAC motion supported the library worker's search for a just contract, but did not mention the strike.

In last Wednesday's Varsity we also stated that the Graduate Assistant's Association was looking for a five-year contract. Again, not true.

The GAA is hoping for a 15-month contract which will include a clause demanding job security for teaching assistants for a period of five years.

Fong appeal is only the first step in fight against racism

When Henry Fong appeals to the Governing Council Friday morning to overturn his expulsion from Medical School, he'll be asking for a lot more than the chance to repeat his fourth year at another medical school.

Although the appeals committee will be dealing only with Fong's rather curious case it will be intentionally or not, finally sticking the university's feet into the muddy subject of racism on campus.

Racism is an ugly word, and when we use it we're not talking about lynch mobs, placards and assaults on minority groups. That sort of thing does not happen here; apparently we're too civilized or historically conscious to allow such tactics on campus.

But discrimination operates in ways other than random violence and hate rallies. In institutions such as ours it operates in institutional ways, in attempts, for example, to limit the number of students of foreign stock (whether they are Canadian citizens or not) or in attempts to add non-academic criteria to admission policies. More subtly, as in Fong's case, it operates through backroom decisions tinged with discussion of racial background.

Combined with this is the racial slander found in the letters columns of the Globe and Mail signed by members of the medical faculty, statements opining that Chinese students are not the stuff of which good doctors are made, that they don't know the Canadian culture and that there are altogether too many of them in our medical schools.

This sort of erroneous opinion works on the supposition that there is such a thing as a Canadian and that the country can be divided into two camps, "us" and "them." "Us" means for the most part North European stock, and "them" is everybody else. This is a good distance off the mark.

Canada is a country of immigrants, and no amount of haggling about how long certain groups have been represented here as opposed to others will disguise that fact. Everyone with citizenship papers is a Canadian. For one Canadian citizen to make distinctions based on the racial background of another violates the ethnic reality of this country, and amounts quite simply to racism.

Furthermore, if the university tolerates through its silence this sort of analysis by its employees, it is playing with its reputation as an institution of higher learning. Allowing public statements of this nature, especially those by people who could quite possibly put their words into administrative action, will only in the long run cost the university its credibility in the community, whose support it cannot afford to lose at this critical time in the university's financial situation.

The university cannot be satisfied with the verdict in the Fong case, no matter what it may be. This is only a beginning. So far, the administration has handled the entire subject with asbestos gloves, but it can no longer afford to ignore how its large machinery operates to the detriment of this country's sizeable minorities.

A can of worms it may be, but it's time to open it.

Wage, price controls: Who's kidding whom?

The announced wage and price controls by the Federal government must be viewed with more than mere suspicion. We are asked by Lucky Pierre to help fight inflation.

He says: "If Canadians in great numbers do not agree to practise self-restraint then, as surely as night follows day, the rate of inflation will explode upward. Either we live within our means or we endure permanent and worsening inflation."

There is only one way to lessen the effects of inflation — to get more money!

The current burlings from Ottawa are clearly designed at alleviating the effects of inflation on only one group of people, that which controls the money. By adhering to the wage "restraint" guidelines they can save more of it.

John Parker, for instance, who has been meeting the library workers demand for a $3,500 per annum increase with a stoney silence, can now hold up the front page of the Toronto Sun which outlines the $2,400 maximum.

Of course Trudeau has limited the guidelines to firms that employ 500 people, construction industry workers and fee-earning professionals. But the message is clearly directed at everyone.

We are asked to swallow two lies. First, wage increases are responsible for inflation and second, that the government intends to limit prices.

On the first point, the vice-president of the Canadian Labor Congress, Shirley Carr said, this past Labor Day, that wages which accounted for 72.9 per cent of national income in 1971 declined to 70.5 per cent in 1974. Meanwhile profits before taxes rose from 12.3 per cent to 17 per cent.

Workers have no control over money supply or credit levels which are recognized as real contributors to inflationary problems.

It's impossible to say what the government intends to do about prices. Time can only give us the results of their proposed review bodies. But the price of things is not the place to look for abuses. The main concern of profit makers is to increase their profit. Prices are governed more by the free market than by parliamentary decree. Profits are increased by lowering costs; not necessarily by raising prices.

So Trudeau asks us to accept a lower standard of living. He is kidding us, and the big papers are going right along with it.

The large Toronto dailies have been asking for wage controls for a long time. The editorials yesterday reflect this. Both the Star and Sun said "it's about time" and the Globe and Mail says "it's not enough but it'll do."

The Globe and Mail added to this confusion in an August 4 editorial:

"In the second quarter of this year the average annual increase over the life of major union collective agreements was 18.8 per cent . . . And how does this compare with the United States? In all industries the U.S. rate of increase was 12.5 per cent in the first quarter and 9.8 per cent in the second."

But the Globe neglects to mention that only a minority of Canadian workers are covered by the specified contracts and that the unorganized majority very rarely win such 18 per cent contracts.

Further, in the industrial sector, which produces goods that have to compete on world markets, wage increases have been significantly below the figures usually quoted. Teachers, nurses and civil servants have been the few people able to fight inflation so effectively.

NDP chieftain Ed Broadbent discounts any control on profits or prices.

"The claimed intention to check price increases by regulating profits will simply lead to skillful covering up of profits," he says.

The only truly effective part of the prime ministers proposals with the control on ordinary people's wages and salaries," he continues.

Lou Murphy, president of the Toronto local of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (currently considering a strike) is more direct. "We might just tell him to shove his guidelines."

It is clear that the wage and price guidelines are an excuse for the person who gives you money to you less. Inflation won't stop because of it.

The government fools with logic in trying to blame ordinary wage earners for inflation. The government couldn't give a damn about prices. They have shown over and over that they are not on our side. We are students, wage earners and consumers and we are getting ripped off by inflation, unemployment and cutbacks in social services. Going along with Trudeau's "fight against inflation" is an error. The only fight possible is to demand more money, good jobs and adequate spending for social services.

If that is not available then something is wrong. But it is not our fault.

Op-Ed: Appeal will test determination to fight racism

Our purpose here is to bring the university community's attention to what has become known as "Henry Fong's Case" — the expulsion of a fourth year medical student which has caused much controversy in this university. Rumours and subsequent tension generated by the case have polarized the university to a point when a non-partisan clarification becomes necessary.

Insofar as "Henry Fong's Case" is concerned, two major aspects intrigue us most:

- whether or not justice has been upheld in Mr. Fong's expulsion.

- whether the charge of discrimination based on Mr. Fong's ethnic background was, as has been claimed, authentic.

A review of Mr. Fong's academic history shows that he is not a particularly outstanding student. Nevertheless, that he is academically competent seems to us to be beyond reasonable doubt. Mr. Fong entered the U of T Medical School with a Grade 13 average of 85 per cent at the age of 17. His first two years in the medical school were completed with excellent results in some courses and minor difficulties in others. His results were especially remarkable in the second year, when he achieved 100 per cent in Pathology, 95 per cent in Immunology and over 80 per cent in Infection, which won him a total of three Honours. Besides these, he was able to obtain over 80 per cent in a few other courses in his first and second years, which were not counted as Honours because of the number of students getting the same grade.

The aforementioned "minor difficulties" referred to his failure in two courses during these years — Anatomy and Principles of Diagnosis and Treatment. In both cases, he successfully passed the supplementary exams and was therefore able to maintain a "clean record".

As an aside, we were told by some medical students that failing a course is nothing very unusual for the early year medical students, who are allowed to write supplementary exams. Should a student fail the supplementary exam, he/she could repeat the course for at least a year. There are, however, examples that students were allowed to repeat the same course more than once.

It was in his third year that Mr. Fong's "trouble" with some members of the medical school began. His overall result in the third year was in the margin of 70-80 per cent, while he found difficulty in two courses. The first of these, Comprehensive Exam, was failed by one mark short of the passing grade and was soon remedied as he passed the supplementary exam for the course. The second one, Genital Urinary System, was failed under very peculiar circumstances and therefore deserves some elaboration.

The course was composed of a 'written' part and a seminar. Eighty per cent of the marks was allocated to the former while the remaining 20 per cent went to the seminar portion. Mr. Fong obtained 70 per cent in the written part — i.e. 56 per cent for the total or 4 per cent short of the passing grade. Confident that he could get the remaining 4 per cent from the Seminar part, Mr. Fong found, to his surprise, that he failed the course despite his regular attendance of the seminars. Disillusioned and frustrated by this, he wrote a letter to the Dean of the medical school challenging the assessment of the course, and he refused to write the supplementary exam. The reply he obtained was he either wrote the re-assessment exam or faced possible expulsion.

Under such pressure, Mr. Fong bowed to the 'authority' and wrote the supplementary exam, which he passed easily.

The reason for his failure, meanwhile, remained unknown to him. Furthermore, Mr. Fong's letter to the faculty might, according to Henry Fong, have upset 'someone' in the faculty and laid down the roots of his future troubles.

In summary, Mr. Fong's performance in his first three years ranged from excellent to average. Of the thirty-odd courses he has taken, he found difficulty in four of them. But in each of the four cases he was able to overcome everyone by means of either supplementary or re-assessment exams.

Henry Fong was expelled from the medical school in November 1974 after six years — including two years as a pre-med student — of satisfactory learning and within two months of receiving his M.D. The events that led to his expulsion were a long and dramatic chronicle of bizarre incidents, many of which have been mentioned in The Varsity report on October 1 and the Committee Against Racism article on October 8 (Varsity, p.4). In view of this, and the fact that pre-trial revelation of some of the facts might be unfavourable to either side, we did not choose to elaborate on the details of Mr. Fong's experiences in the fourth year.

The following incidents however, which are documented and known to both sides as well as those who have followed the case closely, hopefully can show some light on the kind of treatment Mr. Fong has been given. They might serve as some basis for the consideration of whether or not justice was upheld in Henry Fong's expulsion:

(1) After supervising Mr. Fong for six days, Dr. H. Gryniowski, Fong's instructor in "Ambulatory Care" wrote a letter to the Dean charging Mr. Fong with "dishonesty, irresponsibility and incompetence", and recommended for his expulsion. The "dishonesty" charge, which has attracted many interpretations and rumours, arose out of Mr. Fong's being asked to examine all the cranial nerves of a patient. Mr. Fong examined some of the nerves and reported that they were "grossly intact". Did this mistake alone constitute the broad generalization of "dishonesty, irresponsibility and incompetence"?

(2) Dr. Hollenberg, who had seen Mr. Fong only three times, recommended his expulsion. It is interesting to note that in a letter to the Faculty Dean, Dr. Hollenberg remarked that the reason Henry Fong was able to pass Internal Medicine was that the instructor in the Internal Medicine Department responsible for giving him a pass was not experienced. A similar remark was made later by Dr. Hudson, the Fourth Year Coordinator, who warned that Henry Fong should not be allowed to take Pediatrics because "the assessment procedure in the Pediatrics Department is a farce."

(3) While some would label Henry Fong "dishonest, irresponsible and incompetent", other instructors think otherwise. Dr. Margesson, Mr. Fong's supervisor in Dermatology, for example, has given much credit for his trustworthiness and medical knowledge. It so happened that Dr. Margesson was sick for about a week during Fong's clerkship with her. As a result, Henry Fong was put in charge of the clinic for the week and was able to keep everything in order. All these were put down in an affidavit to the Appeal Committee by Dr. Margesson.

(4) When Mr. Fong failed Surgery, (the official explanation for his expulsion), he was not informed of his failure until when he was expelled, which occurred several months later. This disallowed him to repeat the course during his 'elective time'. Attempts to seek the reasons why he failed surgery were not responded to; neither has any explanation been given why he was not immediately informed of his failure in the course.

If 'academic incompetence' was not the cause of his expulsion, what other 'sins' have Mr. Fong committed? While we cannot provide any answer to the question ourselves and are as ignorant as any one else who is not directly involved in the case about the 'true' causes, two events of very peculiar nature attract our attention.

In a letter to Dean Steiner with reference to Henry Fong, the following remark was made by one of Fong's instructors:

"I would agree that ethnic and cultural differences do not include dishonesty."

To whom was "I" agreeing to? Who was trying to link Fong's 'dishonesty' with his 'ethnic and cultural' backgrounds? What else has been said about these "ethnic and cultural differences" besides "dishonesty"? What were included in these "differences" if "dishonesty" was not?

In another development, Mr. Fong was told that if he applied to medical schools in Hong Kong and Taiwan he would be given a good recommendation; but if he applied to medical schools in North America he would receive no recommendation at all.

He did apply for a medical school in Hong Kong but was turned down on the grounds that he is a Canadian!

These two incidents give ample evidence to the fact that the ethnic and cultural backgrounds of Henry Fong, or discrimination based on these backgrounds, had a part to play in his expulsion. It is hard to say how deep this discrimination was involved in the case. For it is not something that can be measured with cylinders or rulers or beam balances. Exactly how much racism entered into Henry Fong's expulsion does not seem to be the major point. Why? Isn't the mere fact that it was there scaring enough?

A few black sheep do not constitute the whole herd. We disagree with the charge that the medical school is 'racist' just because one or two of its members have been selling their racism. We believe that the majority of the faculty and students of the medical school are not racist.

But those of us who have lived in the ghetto can easily tell that one or two cockroaches are very often the fore-runners of millions to follow. The only safe way to get rid of an infectious disease is to curb it once and for all. The steps taken might be painful. But the doctors, more than anyone else, should know that it is worth the trial.

The university administration and the Faculty of Medicine are more aptly reproached for what they have not done instead of what they have been doing vis-a-vis 'racism in the university'.

One whole year has slipped by since people like Stephenson, Gaiheart and Shulman made their discriminatory slurs against the Chinese students. No single statement has been issued by either the Administration nor the Faculty of Medicine to denounce these slurs, despite continual assurances of their 'anti-racist' stand. Quietism and reticence, ladies and gentlemen, are the best soils for racism!

Henry Fong's case thus provides a good test of the university's 'determination' to fight racism. It will certainly not be ended without all the facts being uncovered from under the whitewash. Ombudsman McKee's office may as well be ready for its first major task.

Faisal employs stereotypes

To the Editor:

In his letter to The Varsity Faisal Saab, President of the Arab Student's Association, does a disservice to his cause by using stock-in-trade antisemitic stereotypes.

Faisal Saab chooses to 'sensitize' us to the Palestinians by desensitizing us to Zionists, whom he simply calls "inhuman". His depiction of them as a deceitful, powerful group, haunting the world scene while controlling the media (shades of the notorious Protocols of the Elders of Zion!) would be far more plausible if there were 21 Jewish States instead of Arab ones blackballing the West with their oil.

More revealing still is the charge that Zionists have a "split loyalty". This lie has been exploited since the Middle Ages through Hitler to continue medieval oppression of Jews. Long before there was an Israel Jews were depicted by antisemites as "a state within the State", and for this reason incapable of loyalty to the State.

Such a charge, in modern times, on Faisal's lips, asserts that having a loyalty to Canada and any other foreign state is treason to Canada. This charge would condemn as a traitor anyone who supports North Vietnam, Czechoslovakia or Hungary. Surely Mr. Saab would not suppress political freedom in this way! Happily for political freedom, this repression applies only to Jews.

If Faisal Saab were to insist seriously on split loyalty charges he would have more reason to condemn the leaders of the Canadian Arab Federation, Peters and Hajjar. They have threatened to have the Canadian people punished with further sanctions and embargos unless we support the Palestinian terrorists. No Canadian Jew has ever done such a thing.

I cannot construe Saab's meaning when he refers to "barbaric Zionist practices". The P.L.O. (which Saab commends to us) piously condemns terrorism in-general, but takes credit for, and indeed celebrates terrorism in-particular, directed mostly against civilians, women and children, Jews and non-Jews, inside and outside Israel. Zionists, in contrast, have never taken to such indiscriminate practices, and when a Jewish group came anywhere near that behaviour, it was condemned by the rest of the Jews, not celebrated.

Citizens must seek accountability

Heaven forbid that Metro Councillor John Sewell should presume to have the right to publicly criticize the integrity of Metro Parks Commissioner Thomas Thompson in the 'Island Trout Pond' issue! The nature of Thompson's character is indeed unquestionable: witness his tireless and dedicated commitment to the dispossession and cauterization of the cancerous Toronto Island Community with a plan which would redistribute the 5 per cent of total Island space which the Community occupies much more equitably between a private yacht club, a monopolistic food and amusement concession and a much needed addition to the public's collection of 'grass and tree' mausoleums.

The issue of which the public should be very clearly aware is not that a kindly, faithful public servant of long standing has been publicly and brutally blistered without defense by an irresponsible radical who just accidentally won both a seat and a voice on Metro Council. Rather, the issue seriously hinges on the concepts of public trust and public responsibility. Ought an elected representative of the people be privy to or be denied a truthful, public account of the back-room affairs of a senior appointed public official? Ought not an appointed public official be responsible to report to Council in an absolutely forthright manner? Is it not the responsibility of an elected representative to obtain an absolutely truthful account of affairs from an appointed public official? If sufficient grounds exist for an elected representative to doubt the absolute truthfulness of an appointed public official, is it not a breach of the former's responsibility to the public not to pursue the truth in every possible manner?

I submit that the Royal Commission on Metro Toronto ought to examine very critically both the role and the tenure of appointed officials (Commissioner and Chairman alike) and also their relationship to elected officials. One possible alternative to the present system of unlimited tenure for senior appointed officials is to restrict their term of office to a specified period of time, and to make it non-renewable and subject to yearly review and approval.

By voting overwhelmingly (20-8) to censure the conduct of John Sewell, Metro Council sought to vindicate a supposedly maligned public servant. Yet, in so doing, Council whitewashed the very important issues which I have raised. Very clearly, we as citizens have the undeniable right to demand accountability from both our elected and our appointed public servants. Therefore, we must insist in unison upon an answer to these issues.

Canada and Brazil:

The Brascan Connection

A High Brazilian Official was quoted in "Jornal Do Brazil", June, 6, 1974 "There are 100 Million Brazilians . . .

Fifty million of these are poor savages, who have to be civilized by the other fifty million . . .

Of these other fifty million, 40 million are unable to accomplish this task. So there remains an elite of 10 million who have the ability and the duty to lead the other 90 million . . .

There are 5 million who are really involved in this mission. The other 5 million are opposed to the manner in which the mission is carried out . . . Those who do not adapt themselves to our regime will be our greatest enemies . . .

With respect to the political regime, it must exercise maximum authority. All of the peoples who became great did so thanks to their great dictators. The French had Napoleon; the Germans, Bismark; the Russians, Stalin; the Chinese, Mao Tse-Tsung. Even the English had a dictator, Cromwell . . .

The United States is the only exception, but that is a special case."

Brascan — Canada's very own multinational corporation? The head office is at 25 King St. W., right here in Toronto. The President is a Canadian. So far, so good. However, American companies hold the majority of the shares, although they hold them through their Canadian subsidiaries in order to simulate Canadian ownership.

Never mind this discrepancy for now. No matter who has his finger in the pie, there are those who claim that the multinational corporation is an indispensable part of modern business life. As Alastair Gillespie, Canada's Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce until last week, put it "Multinationals are important and they produce results. Do you know that in the U.S. the multinational corporations produce more jobs and more foreign earnings than the purely domestic companies? They do, and we can do the same here."

Expand and Diversify Indeed, Brascan's performance has been impressive. The corporation's biggest operation is an electric utilities firm, Light Servicos de Eletricidade S.A. The "Light", as it is often called, expanded its sales to $118.9 millions.

However, dynamic its growth, has been Light-Servicos has been an accomplice to uneven development in Brazil. Its focus for operations has been, understandably enough, wherever money could be made. Until recently, potential profits have lain predominantly in the industrialized southeast area encompassing Rio de Janeiro, Belo Horizonte and Sao Paulo. The "Light" pours one-half of Brazil's total electric energy into this one region, servicing 20 per cent of Brazil's population. Somehow, the remaining 80 per cent of the population is supposedly serviced by the other half of the electric energy. However, this situation may soon change, because regions in the interior such as the Mato Grosso are showing increasing signs of profitability. Yet, one cannot help but consider the fact that Canada's utilities are publicly owned. Light-Servicos, on the other hand, accounts for 90 per cent of Brascan's revenue, and is the largest single private enterprise in Brazil.

Brascan strictly adhered to its philosophy of "expand and diversify" during 1974. A few recent acquisitions in Brazil include: 70 per cent interest in a large sardine canning firm, 60 per cent control over the Jacunda tin mine, and 49 per cent of a leading seafood operation.

Brascan's profits for 1974 totalled $119.2 millions.

Other side of the fence To put it mildly, 1974 was a good year for Brascan. But it was a bad year for Brazil. Brazil is the eighth largest oil importing country in the world. The rapid increases in oil prices at the end of 1973 severely jolted Brazil's already strained balance of payments situation. By the end of 1974, her net foreign debt stood at $12.1 billion. In addition, inflation hit the astronomical figure of 34 per cent. Nevertheless, official figures indicate that Brazil's Gross Domestic Product rose by 9.6 per cent in 1974. How was this possible?

Easily, for the Brazilian government took the palliative so often taken by developing countries — when the going gets tough, encourage foreign investment. This is exactly what happened. Withholding Taxes on interest and minimum maturities for the regulation of foreign capital were cut. This cleared the way for a greater inflow of foreign capital, thus allowing Brazil to achieve such purely illusory growth. Furthermore, it is safe to assume that even such illusory growth was nullified by the effect of rampant inflation.

Exploding the myth of the miracle What has often been referred to as

The Brazilian economic miracle has run a very precarious course during the past decade. As Jim Drainin and Jamie Swit wrote in This Magazine (Jan. 75) "Only so long as new investors place their capital in Brazil at an ever increasing rate does capital remain available for earlier investors to repatriate their profits. The successful experience of these corporations in turn feeds the capitalists' euphoria about the economic 'miracle', in turn encouraging new investment and the continuation of the cycle." During 1974 there were signs indicating that this bubble might burst. In August of that year Nissan Motors of Japan announced the cancellation of plans to open a large factory near Sao Paulo, citing Brazil's economic instability and balance of payments problems as reasons.

Once again, Brazil opted for the palliative. The government began to woo foreign investment in a big way.

Brascan comes through So, this past spring, none other than Brascan, Ltd., came through with a loan of $100 millions (only one-tenth of a billion) that it had put together in order to finance — Brazil's development? Not really. It was designed to underwrite the expansion of Brascan's subsidiaries in Brazil. Next question, how did Brascan put together a loan of such substantial proportions? According to Business Week, this required "a tactic that involved U.S. banks, Arab petrodollars and its (Brascan's) own economic clout in Brazil." The crux here is that the Brazilian government guaranteed the loan. In other words, if Brascan defaults on repaying the loan, the government would be stuck with the task of paying back to corporation's creditors in the U.S. Arabia and wherever else they may be.

Comforting to Brascan, but not to Brazil with her net foreign debt of $12.1 billions (gross foreign debt of $17.3 billions minus foreign exchange reserves of $5.2 billions leaves us with the net figure). One might well wonder what business the Junta leadership had giving its guarantee to a loan of $100 millions.

But there's more. Brascan plans to spend another $12 billions in Brazil from now until 1978. The corporation plans to cover one-third of this tab, hoping to find the rest abroad. Of course, additional guarantees by the Brazilian government would be required. However, if the necessary funds cannot be obtained abroad, Edward Freeman-Attwood, Executive Vice-President of Brascan, says "we might even have access to government funds to expand." Is it possible that Mr. Freeman-Attwood hasn't heard about Brazil's $12.1 billions worth of foreign debts? Small wonder that Brascan's President, Jake Moore, is eager to capitalize on what he calls the Brazilian government's "pragmatic approach to economic policy."

Complicity in repression Antonio Gallotti, the head of Brascan Brazil (the holding company for all of Brascan's holdings in Brazil) is a self-proclaimed fascist. He says, "My opinion for Fascism was dictated by my hatred of Communism . . . To internationalism, Fascism responds with nationalism, to class struggle it responds with corporatism . . ." Gallotti is typical of the Brascan supported elite which wields power in Brazil today.

During the reformist rule of Joao Goulart in the early 1960s, strict limits were imposed on the profit and royalty remittances of foreign-owned corporations. Brazilian Traction (renamed Brascan in 1969) felt the squeeze. They entered negotiations with Goulart. These negotiations broke down in June 1963. To Grant Glassco, President of Brazilian Traction at the time, the whole thing smacked of a Communist plot. He commented, "More and more, the various agencies of the government were infiltrated by extremists, many of whom were Communist-inspired and directed."

"Optim for Fascism" . . . Brascan president Moore (L), and Antonio Gallotti Brascan V-P and president of the Light'.

So much for reformist governments in developing countries.

Then on April Fool's Day, 1964, Goulart was toppled by a military coup. Lo and behold, within two days, Brazilian Traction's shares rose from $1.95 to $3.60 each, and Brascan has been laughing all the way to the bank ever since. Glassco spoke in somewhat different terms about the new junta than he had spoken about the Goulart regime. According to Glassco, the new government was "made up of men of proven competence and integrity." I'm not going to dwell upon this sinisterly distorted statement. Suffice it to say that by October 1972, the British-based group Amnesty International had proof of 1,081 documented cases of torture under the military dictatorship. Is it worthwhile trying to imagine the number of cases that haven't been documented?

But why worry about "men of proven competence and integrity" resort to such unsavory methods of maintaining the public order? Well, in 1972, the President of the World Bank, Robert McNamara (a man not renowned for Communist sympathies), noted that Brazil's economic "miracle" left something to be desired. He remarked that the richest 3 per cent of the population had seen their share of the national income rise during the 1970s from 29 per cent to 38 per cent, while the poorest 40 per cent had seen their share drop from 10 per cent to 8 per cent.

Now, to update this picture, in the eleven years since the coup, the Brazilian worker has seen his real wages drop by almost 50 per cent. I have already mentioned the rampant inflation that gripped Brazil last year. The lower classes were made to bear the brunt of it. From January to May, 1974, food prices in Rio de Janeiro rose 30 per cent. The price of basic beans, one of the basic staples, went up 30 per cent in January alone. To make the plight of the masses worse, the government set a ceiling of 25 per cent on wage hikes. Furthermore, only 1 per cent of the federal budget was allocated to health, compared with 4 per cent under Goulart in 1964. The official figure released for unemployment in 1974 was 18 per cent. However, when those in tertiary services are added (street vendors, shoe shiners, etc.), 30 per cent would not be an unreasonable estimate. Thus, the repressive apparatus and frequent use of torture serve to prevent mass discontent from bubbling over.

The question of Canada's interests

The impoverished masses of Brazil provide a source of cheap labour. Brascan has little compunction about taking advantage of the fact that a Brazilian worker's wage amounts to about one twentieth of that of his local counterpart. However, by exploiting the opportunity to produce more cheaply in Brazil, Brascan is actually jeopardizing the possibility of Canada's exports competing with those of Brazil on the international market.

In Canada there is a Crown corporation called the EDC (Export Development Corporation). The EDC lends money abroad, which the recipient can use only to purchase Canadian-made products. Back in 1972 the EDC lent Brascan's subsidiary, Light-Servicos, $26.5 millions for the purchase of equipment from seven companies in Canada, all of which were American-owned.

Free All Political Prisoners

Brazil: torture like castration by hanging and films of trains rushing at victim's families

By LIAM LACEY

This week in Toronto, and in countries around the world, demonstrators are marching on the embassies of nations that hold and abuse political prisoners.

The marchers are organized by Amnesty International (A.I.), a widely respected and politically unaligned human rights group that works for the release of all people imprisoned for their beliefs or ethnic origins. These people are termed "Prisoners of Conscience", and A.I. has declared October 12th to 18th "Prisoners of Conscience Week".

In over a decade of research Amnesty International has uncovered stories of thousands of people around the world languishing in overcrowded prisons without any clear charges against them, or hopes of being brought to trial.

A.I. experts also say there's been a worldwide epidemic of torture over the past fifteen years — that torture has evolved into a grotesque science, with its own doctors, psychologists and research facilities. It has its own specially trained police, judges and international experts. Amnesty International claims to have proof that there is a world trade in sophisticated instruments of torture.

Evidence of torture is cited in sixty-four countries, and an estimated thirty of these use torture as standard government policy. These include almost all the Latin-American countries, Haiti, Spain, Turkey, and the U.S.S.R.

"The worst cases have happened in military regimes, where governments feel unstable," explained Sean McBride, former A.I. President, at a 1973 conference in Ottawa. In South America particularly, science and the military have combined to develop fantastic refinement in the art of torture.

Castration by Hanging

In Brazil for example, torture ranges from castration by hanging, to audio visual films that alternate photos of the victim's family with approaching high-speed trains. Electric shock treatments are applied to genitals, children are tortured in front of their parents, and in Rio de Janeiro, Amnesty International has verified the use of "The Purple Room" where victims are subjected to ultra-violet light.

In Uruguay an entire ward of a military hospital is set aside for pharmacological torture. In Buenos Aires, prisoners are forced to listen to tape recordings of their own screams while being tortured.

McBride warned that "torture knows no political boundaries." For example, in 1971 British servicemen disoriented I.R.A. suspects with sensory deprivation. The suspects spilled their information in less than forty-eight hours, but all suffered subsequent mental degeneration to the extent that one prisoner is now in a mental institution.

In the U.S.S.R. political dissenters are diagnosed as schizophrenics. They are kept in overcrowded wards, beaten, humiliated and treated with drugs they are told will damage their intellectual powers.

Canada and the U.S. are relatively clean, according to Amnesty's standards. There is no evidence of sanctioned torture in the U.S., although Amnesty's report points out "allegations of police brutality and harsh treatment abound."

Amnesty also says that U.S. government experts in such organizations as Agency for International Development (A.I.D.)

train the police of underdeveloped countries in torture techniques.

Strategy and Tactics

On a daily basis, Amnesty members, mostly academics, work to oppose torture, capital punishment, poor prison conditions and unjust laws, in their efforts to preserve people from the brutality of those in power.

Campaigns and conferences are the way Amnesty International has always worked. The organization was begun fourteen years ago by British lawyer Peter Benenson, as a one year program to free political prisoners. Soon Benenson and a group of fellow lawyers and academics found they had a full time job cut out for them.

A.I. now has consultative status with the U.N. and cooperative relations with most international bodies. In 1974, an A.I. founding member and executive chairman, Sean McBride, was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

In London A.I. full time staff members collect information on political prisoners from newspapers, sympathetic prison guards, anxious relatives or released prisoners.

London then sends the names of prisoners to one of almost sixteen hundred groups in the thirty-one countries in which Amnesty is established. Each group adopts three prisoners — one from a communist country, one from a western country, and one from an underdeveloped nation. Relief supplies are sent and the government holding the prisoner is deluged with requests urging their release. The number of post cards sent on behalf of one prisoner has sometimes run as high as fifty thousand. In addition Amnesty publishes the names of five prisoners in each monthly news letter and urges members to send mail to aid in their release.

But is it really possible to "shame" totalitarian regimes to release prisoners who disagree with their systems?

It's hard to tell. Most governments refuse to admit that outside pressures bring about prisoner releases. But ex-chairman McBride estimates about fifteen thousand Amnesty adopted prisoners were released from 1961 to the end of last year.

2,500 set free

Amnesty was especially gratified after the release of twenty-five hundred Roumanian prisoners. A warden admitted that his superiors had tired of receiving so much mail.

Amnesty officials also believe their campaign greatly influenced the passage of a resolution in the U.N. last year calling for action against torture. As one Amnesty member explained, "Even authoritarian governments are highly sensitive to public opinion. That's why it's the most important sanction for defending human rights."

As an organization that is committed to opposing official brutality everywhere, Amnesty International tries to maintain a scrupulously unbiased reputation. No government subsidies are accepted, so the organization is dependent on its membership for funding.

Amnesty groups cannot adopt prisoners in their own countries, and prisoners who have advocated or used violence cannot be adopted.

Angela Davis Ineligible

The last stricture is one of the organizations most controversial. Many members were unhappy that black activist Angela Davis could not be adopted because of the charges against her.

Criticism also comes from outside the group. They have been called "imperialists" by the Soviet Union in response to Amnesty's pressure for the release of about three hundred and fifty adopted political prisoners out of an estimated five thousand in Soviet prisons.

Indian leader Indira Gandhi recently accused A.I. of being active in a "Hate India" campaign.

The organization pointed out that they have worked in over a hundred countries in the past year, including most of India's neighbours, but India's massive imprisonment without trial campaign has A.I. worried.

Only two Indian provinces have released official statistics, and both are unbelievably low. Unofficial estimates say that anywhere from twenty thousand to fifty thousand people are being held without trial at present.

Amnesty estimates that it costs $500 to research and prepare case sheets on three adopted prisoners. An additional two hundred dollars will fund a nation-wide telegram campaign on behalf of a recently arrested person in danger of torture.

Unlearning Helplessness

But money is only one of Amnesty's problems. A major one is the sense of utility people feel in any attempt to fight for human rights.

"It is a learned helplessness. We are disposed not to believe anything can be done," says Susan Swan who chairs the Toronto group.

Swan, a professional writer and poet, joined Amnesty last year, after researching and writing an article on torture for the Canadian Magazine.

In her introduction to the article "World Torture 1974" Swan admitted that "When I started my research, I cried over some of the descriptions of torture, but soon I didn't cry."

"Some things," Swan continued "make moral outrage appear pointless, almost silly, and the dangerous result is that it seems reasonable to forget you read about them in the first place."

This Week in Toronto

Swan's feelings echo those of Philip Berrigan the ex-priest and U.S. activist who spoke at U of T in February 1975, as part of a North American lecture tour on political prisoners.

Berrigan spoke of "the crime of despotism that is fed by the crime of apathy." He maintained people are "coerced into numb neutrality, obscuring our common plight — the struggle for survival against the madness at the top."

The Amnesty campaign, running from the 12th to 19th of October is designed to help shake people out of this apathy.

At 8:00 pm last night over two hundred marchers and supporters placed lighted candles on the doorsteps of the Haitian and Turkish consuls, the Korean and South African and Malaysian Trade Centres and at Czechoslovakian National Airlines. A candle was burned in one of the City Hall gardens to protest Soviet imprisonments since there is no official USSR building in Toronto.

Prisoners of Conscience

One of the most tragic and uncontrollable problems Amnesty International attempts to deal with is long term imprisonment. Many of Amnesty's 3,600 adopted prisoners have spent years in jail for their political or religious beliefs.

Frequently kept in solitary confinement, the "prisoners of conscience" have no contact with the outside world. Added to this are the financial hardships suffered by the prisoner's family.

To illustrate the effects of long term imprisonment, Amnesty has selected 12 case studies to illustrate the importance of their work for "Prisoners of conscience week". These are the stories of three of those prisoners:

Oksana Popovich

OKSANA POPOVICH, 47, was originally imprisoned at the end of World War II for Ukrainian Nationalist activities — apparently collecting money for Ukrainian political prisoners. Ten years later she was released but the hard physical labour and camp conditions left her permanently disabled.

In 1975 while convalescing from one operation and awaiting another Popovich was again arrested for distributing unofficial literature.

She was sentenced to 8 years, which will probably be 8 years of inadequate medical care, poor diet and hard labour. Popovich is one of about 250 women prisoners Amnesty is working to have released during International Womens Year.

Ben Khader

BEN KHADER was arrested in 1968 in Tunisia with about 100 other students who were charged with subversion against the government. Khader was charged on the basis of his association with a leftist magazine.

While awaiting trial Khader was held in solitary confinement and tortured. No attempt was made by court-appointed lawyers to put forth a proper defense and Khader was sentenced to 16 years in prison.

In 1970 Khader was temporarily released to live in internal exile. But in 1972 he was returned to prison during a new wave of detentions. Finally in 1973 the government decided to revoke his amnesty and he is now serving the remainder of his 16 years. The cells in the prison where he is held are effectively dungeons.

Cephas Sebanda

CEPHAS SEBANDA was a Rhodesian political activist before the Smith Government declared independence in 1966. That year he was sentenced to a five year restriction in a region some 320 kilometers from his home.

When his restriction ended in 1971 Sebanda was not released. Instead he was served with a detention order of indefinite duration. For 1974 he was transferred to prison. He is now entering his tenth year of detention without trial.

New movement for Metro reform

By DAVID GLEDHILL

"The God in Godfrey has got to go," says Marie Murphy. In an interview, the organizer for the newly formed Movement for Municipal Reform (MMR) said she hopes that Metro citizens will wake up and take a stand against the seemingly unlimited power that Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey wields.

The MMR was born out of a citizen's meeting held by Toronto city council's Reform Caucus after the last municipal election. The consensus of the meeting was that there should be one citizens group for all of Metro. This group would deal with city wide issues such as the Spadina Expressway, TTC fare increases, the centralization of power and a host of other problems which affect all those living within the city limits.

Murphy, fresh from Barbara Beardsley-NDP campaign in St. Andrew-St. Patrick cited the example of Karl Mallette's appointment to the TTC by Godfrey. "The people in Mallette's riding showed how much they loved him by making him the sixth place horse in the last election race. Yet there is Paul Godfrey, unelected, with no one to answer to, giving Mr. Mallette a position with a great deal of power," she said.

"The success of such a citizen's group organized on a city wide scale is dependent on all the various groups getting together and sitting down to formulate a policy designed to fight abuse of power," Murphy remarked.

A similar organization was formed to combat the power structure in Montreal which Mayor Jean Drapeau had erected around himself, she pointed out. The Montreal Citizen's Movement, it successfully fielded enough members in the city's election last fall to provide an effective opposition for the first time in the mayor's long reign.

"Keep in mind," she added, "Mr. Drapeau used the War Measures Act of 1970 to squash all his potential opponents by throwing them into jail. I feel this threat of the political abuse of power in this city too."

The MMR which is just in the crawling stage of life, has a convention planned for November, at which time they hope to formulate a policy around which the group will organize and take positive action.

"I have found the people of the city fairly well organized to the point where they have input at City Hall, much more so than the suburbs where the average person feels unable to express concern over the actions of elected members," she said.

"One basic weakness of the groups all over Metro is that they tend to organize around one in main issue, be it Spadina or a tree being cut down and when the issue is decided the group folds. The MMR will be a permanent organization which will attack all issues at all levels of municipal government," she added.

The group is steering clear of any political labels at this time, trying not to alienate any potential members who might be frightened off in the initial planning stages. However, Ward Six aldermen Dan Heap and Alan Sparrow of the Reform Caucus have taken out the $4 memberships while their colleague John Sewell, has chosen not to. "We feel Mr. Sewell and the group have the same end in mind, we are just using different methods," Murphy observed.

"We are not trying to make the politicians we have today change their spots, we are just trying to produce some new politicians," Murphy explained.

The aim of this one-day physician-led workshop is to catalyze the process of looking at some of those issues that influence our sexual behavior. Most sexual attitudes were formed by our families and by society rather than actively being formulated by ourselves.

Hopefully, this program will facilitate a more conscious choosing of psychosexual values in accord with our real needs.

New minister raises horses, but not grants

By ROD DRAGO

Harry Craig Parrott is the man to write to about problems with your education. He is the new Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities. He's also an orthodoxist, so if he can't fix your student loan, he'll fix your teeth.

There is no guarantee that he will answer your letters but he might get very upset if you annoy him too much.

He has been a member of parliament for four years. In the last session of the house there are twenty lines of speech from Harry Parrott. But his passionate dislike of newspapers makes up for a lack of diplomatic presence.

According to an eyewitness account, Harry went to the offices of the Woodstock Sentinel-Review to complain about an article that appeared last June. But on finding the front doors locked, he launched a barrage of stones at the main windows from the Woodstock main street. They let him in.

The official government release describes him as an orthodoxist, married with three little ones. His hobbies include golf, and standard-bred horse farming (trotters and pacers).

He is a member of Chalmers United Church and has been a member of the Woodstock City Council, the Woodstock traffic committee, and has worked as a fund-raiser for the Red Cross and the United Way.

He has a post-graduate degree, from the class of 477, and has served under his predecessor, James Auld as a parliamentary assistant.

He fought for his country in 1940 and 1941, entering the U of T in 1942.

Not much is known of his views on post-secondary education. Possibly this has led NDP Opposition Leader Stephen Lewis to "reserve judgement" on this new cabinet member.

At Scarboro College last year, he explained the lack of working people sitting on the U of T Governing Council by saying that most of them were not "smart enough" for the position.

In January at Ryerson, he denied the need to raise the $32 OSAP room and board allowance. It was in fact raised to $40 this year.

Dr. Parrott's views extend beyond the field of education. He is reported to be personally against grants to students, schools or cities, and ran in the past election with the slogan "Service is the name of the game."

He increased his plurality in the last election indicating that he is good to his constituents. But he is well known for the occasional Freudian slip. One time he introduced his wife as the woman he sleeps with most nights he's in Woodstock.

He loves his privacy and would hate to be disturbed at his Toronto residence, room 3102 at the Royal York Hotel.

The new minister is a strange bird.

"No Peace To Come"

By PAUL MITCHELL, CUP (Paul Mitchell is an information officer with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers).

The long and bitter struggle between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the federal government has once again surfaced in its full intensity this year as the union and government try to negotiate a new collective agreement.

The issues in this negotiation are many and encompass long standing grievances of ten years or more. Also heightening this year's confrontation is the Postal Worker's disenchantment with their wages which have risen in more than 21 months. The union itself has been without a collective agreement since October 1974.

But the root of the problems in the Post Office this year can be traced to two elements. A history of poor employee-employer relations and the struggle over technological change and the resulting threat to job security.

This year the union states that the vital question of technological change, job security and some of the smaller, but very important issues, must be cleared up if there is going to be any hope for labour peace in the Post Office.

Compounding the situation is the Public Service Staff Relations Act (PSSRA) which prohibits Postal Workers and all public servants, from negotiating the effects of technological change, job security and classifications. These restrictions are not contained in the Canada Labour Code which governs unionized workers under federal jurisdiction in the private sector.

The union is not opposed to automation and believes in the need to update Canada's outdated mail handling facilities. But the union wants some say in this transformation and protection from its effects.

The union's goal this year is to gain wage, job and classification security for its members and some positive benefits from the automation program.

Along with the current struggle over automation is the union's attempt to solve some of the smaller issues which have plagued the Post Office for years.

These include the use of casual labour, a restructuring of the grievance procedure, week-end premiums for workers whose regular shifts fall on the weekend and some extra incentive for workers who have to work night shifts.

The problems in the Post Office have been surveyed, reviewed and documented many times since the first National Postal strike in 1965. PATERNALISM, NEPOTISM AND NEGLECT

This strike led to a Royal Commission on Working Conditions in the Post Office chaired by Judge Andre Monpetit. His report, tabled in 1965, documented the Post Office as being riddled with paternalism, nepotism, favouritism and neglect. The judge's report pointed out the need for collective bargaining to protect Postal Worker's rights.

The government introduced legislation in 1965 which gave all government employees the right to strike but placed many severe restrictions on collective bargaining.

This legislation and the problems resulting from the government's failure to implement the recommendations of the Monpetit report, led to further National Postal strikes in 1968 and 1970. Since then the Post Office has been faced with a series of work stoppages, slowdowns and other signs of worker discontent.

Another major problem in the Post Office is the division of responsibility for its operation and the large number of unions in the Post Office which can all stop mail service to some degree.

This division of responsibility has led to calls from the union to make the Post Office a Crown Corporation under the Canada Labour Code which would consolidate authority for the Post Office and end the Postal Workers legislative problems.

As it now stands the Post Office Department is responsible for the daily operation of the Post Office. But the Treasury Board is the real employer of Postal Workers and must agree to any contract before it is signed. The Public Service Commission has the responsibility for hiring all Post Office personnel and the Department of Public Works looks after the maintenance of Postal facilities.

This division of authority often leads to a great deal of buck passing which further frustrates Postal Workers.

When the public is faced with a strike in the Post Office it tends to blame either the CUPW which represents 22,000 inside workers or the Letter Carriers of Canada which represents 16,000 Letter Carriers.

TWENTY-TWO UNIONS
However, there are 22 different unions in the Post Office which can, if on strike, all cause the public some degree of inconvenience. CUPW has always advocated one union in the Post Office but the government has consistently refused to allow this because it is in their interest to have several unions to play off against each other during contract negotiations.

While these problems bear significantly on the negotiations this year and must eventually be solved before there can be real peace in the Post Office, this year the Postal Workers are trying to resolve the biggest problem they have faced yet - automation.

CUPW instituted a Boycott the Postal Code campaign almost two years ago as its main weapon in trying to force the government to give Postal Workers the right to negotiate the effects of technological change.

The Postal Code is the key to the automation program and the system says Postal Union Rep will not work unless 77 per cent of all mail is ultimately coded.

The automation and modernization program in the Post Office started as a result of recommendations contained in "A Blueprint for Change", a massive government study on the Post Office completed in 1969 for then Postmaster General, Eric Kierans.

The program, which has already started, calls for the expenditure of more than one billion dollars on buildings and equipment in 27 urban centres. The spending is concentrated mainly in Toronto and Montreal as more than half the country's mail passes through these two centres.

The automation and mechanization program involves the use of very sophisticated machinery. The first step in the automated process is the Culler Facer Cancellor which cancels and faces mail all one way in preparation for sorting.

It also rejects any mail thicker than three-eighths of an inch, with bent corners or mail containing anything such as a paper clip or staple. It also rejects any mail smaller than three and one half inches by five and one half inches or larger than six inches by ten inches. All rejected mail is sorted manually.

Mail then proceeds to the coding suites where operators read the postal code, if the mail has one, and key the code on the letters so it can be translated by the Letter Sorting Machines. It does this by placing small yellow bars on the envelopes.

Mail is then sent through the Letter Sorting Machine which can sort 23,500 letters per hour to 288 different locations. The machine's programming can be changed to run the letters through several times for a finer sortation.

Full automation, which will follow the completion of the mechanization process, involves the introduction of the Optical Character Reader. This is the ultimate in automated mail sortation machinery and will eventually replace the key coders and manual sorters.

THIRTY THOUSAND LETTERS PER HOUR

Using computer programming and electronic scanning devices it can translate typewritten postal codes at the rate of 30,000 letters per hour, and put the yellow bars on the envelopes. From the OCR the letters go to the LSM for sorting.

This automation program will be supplemented by an extensive mechanization of mail handling facilities. Mail will be moved by computerized transport, a machine will empty and shake out mailbags and conveyor systems will move the mail inside the plant. Machines will also be introduced which can sort large envelopes.

The new technology is enormously labour saving because a Postal Clerk following the old manual sortation methods, is only expected to sort a maximum of 1,800 letters per hour.

The introduction of the new technology will also vastly alter the work schedules of Postal Workers and could change their classifications.

Besides relying on the automated machinery the Post Office is circumventing the union's position and its control over the workplace by following policies designed to take work out of the union's hands. The Post Office has started to hire large numbers of casual labour, who receive lower wages than Postal Workers, have no union protection or job security. It has also hired many term employees who have contracts which only allow them to work for terms of three, six or 12 months.

The effect of this large casual work force is to deny the hiring of badly needed full time Postal Workers. It has been estimated that the use of casual labour has meant the equivalent of 4,000 full time jobs.

The government is also applying pressure on special permit holders to pre-sort their mail before it reaches the Post Office. In the past unionized Postal Workers have always sorted all mail but now the government is forcing private mailers to perform these tasks at the expense of Postal Worker's jobs.

The Post Office is increasing its use of private sub-contract post offices in smaller centres. These Post Offices operate at the expense of postal sub-stations run by the government with unionized employees.

JOB EROSION

This practice could also lead to the further erosion of Postal Workers jobs. As the Post Office opens the large automated plants it consolidates smaller Post Offices in the area. The Post Offices consolidated are left with only a small wicket service which is exactly the job the Post Office is contracting out.

The Post Office allows a system of private mail carriers to operate in violation of the monopoly provisions of the Post Office Act. Corporate and communications companies using these systems are mostly immune from postal strikes. These companies operate at the expense of the taxpayer who must support the Post Office's many non-profitable operations.

The introduction of automated technology will mean many things to Postal Workers. The primary result will be a reduction in the workforce. While the union knows this is inevitable it wants to see it done through attrition rather than mass layoffs.

15h	local	3:00pm
17h30	local	5:30pm

This is the main reason why they want articles on job security in their contract.

The machinery could also mean a reduction in Postal Workers classifications. The Post Office tried to do this in 1974 when it said that all workers operating coding suites would be given a new classification P.O. 1 rather than a P.O. 4.

This would have meant a loss of $.54 per hour in wages. This unilateral Post Office declaration plunged the Post Office into a 16 day strike before the coder job description was enlarged and their salary made equivalent to a manual sorter.

Queen's Park Stalls Poison Cleanup

By HAZEL FARLEY

Mercury pollution is becoming a controversial issue in Ontario and local native groups are concerned with the provincial government's handling of the problem.

Traces of mercury poisoning have been found among Indians living on the Grassy Narrows and White Dog Indian reserves located 55 miles north-west of Dryden, Ontario. Symptoms of the disease have been likened to those of the well-known Japanese Minimata Disease.

On a recent visit to Toronto, members of the Minimata Disease Patients Alliance (MDPA) of Japan claimed symptoms of mercury poisoning found in Northern Ontario Indians are the same as those experienced in Minimata and expressed horror at the expense of the polluted area.

Native Indian leaders say the provincial government is not treating the problem seriously, but the provincial government denies this.

A government spokesman from the Ministry of Health claims the provincial government has been researching mercury poisoning since April 1970 when excessively high levels of mercury were first discovered in the blood of local Indians. Consequently, a ban was placed on all commercial fishing in the area and local doctors and residents were made aware of the danger.

The spokesman said since 1970 the provincial government and industrial plants using mercury have carried out numerous tests on local rivers and water supplies. "For five years we have been telling local Indians not to eat the fish," he said, "but they continue to do so."

Alternative unpolluted fish supplies were provided by the provincial government but the program is faltering, the spokesman said. "Indians are now demanding that the fish be delivered to their doors not just to a central freezer," he claimed.

The government has gone as far as finding alternative "suitable" land for the Indians but they refuse to move, the spokesman said.

Mercury levels in the rivers have apparently been reduced to meet with the accepted standard set by the World Health Organization but it could take from fifty to seventy years to totally clean up the area.

The province is sending a group of doctors to Japan to research the symptoms of the mercury disease.

The group will leave Toronto in two weeks time and will be led by Dr. James Stopps, senior consultant on environmental health for the Ontario Ministry of Health.

Despite all the government claims, Indians and local groups are still concerned that the government is merely stalling. They feel the government should be more concerned with medical research within Ontario where the source of the problem lies.

Critics have charged that the provincial government is scared of stepping on the federal government's toes. Indian affairs falls under federal and not provincial jurisdiction and as yet the federal government has shown no concern over the matter.

Research on mercury poisoning was undertaken this summer by a group of U of T medical students called The Bethune Health Group. The group was established last spring and has been researching into various workers' diseases such as asbestosis and mercury poisoning.

A group spokesman said their findings indicate the symptoms of mercury poisoning in Ontario are the same as those of Minimata Disease. They too feel the government is not taking enough interest in the matter and are lending their support to local native groups trying to pressure the government.

woman marries house

DENVER (CPS-CUP) The typical housewife contributes as much to the economy of the U.S. as the typical student, retiree or person in an institution, according to a recent Social Security Administration study called "The Economic Value of a Housewife".

There are 35.2 million women currently keeping house in the U.S. The Social Security Administration computed their worth strictly on the physical or mechanical tasks they perform. The conclusion was that housework is valued at between $5,500 and $7,500 a year.

Before this study, the Social Security Administration used the average domestic's salary as the value of a housewife. Others occasionally threw in prostitute's fees as part of the calculation.

pie prank peeves prof

DENVER (CPS-CUP) It used to be funny when the university's dullest professor got a pie in the face during last year's pie throwing fad. It wasn't very funny, however, when a professor chased a pie thrower out of the classroom and pressed battery charges against him.

But last month the pie thrower got off the hook temporarily when a Kansas District Court jury couldn't make up its mind. The case against James Dillard, a Kansas University (KU) student who hit a psychology professor on the leg with a pie, ended in a hung jury.

David Homes said he pressed charges against Dillard because Dillard interrupted his class and hurt the image of KU.

Dillard said he threw the pie "in good fun" and because Holmes' class offered him $20 to make the hit.

Another trial may be started in November.

Trinity Has High Hopes For Division II

Dear Sport Editor:

Your seemingly knowledgeable prediction as to the outcome of Division 2 football, leaves something to be desired.

Great rumbungs, of magnitude 6 on the Richter Scale, were heard as John Strachan's final resting place shook with wrath, having heard this outrageous blasphemy. It becomes painfully obvious, that you have yet to witness the Pelicans of Trinity (the Lord's chosen) demonstrating the fine art of football.

A monumental upset may be in the making, as the hallowed halls of Trinity tremble with anticipation. The odds seem to be insurmountable, yet the oddsmakers have been known to be wrong (i.e. Jimmy the Greek had Goliath picked at 4 to 1 odds against the lowly David and the Philistines as 2 to 1 favourites over Samson). The bookies took a beating and might again, as the Pelicans take to the field in defence of truth, justice, and the Canadian way.

There is no more awesome a sight than Dave "Divine" Wright and his 11 Disciples waddling over the hordes of heathens towards the promised land (not Jerusalem but Touchdown City). The parting of the Red Sea and Mao's Long March would be hard pressed to match this feat.

Your prowess as a sportswriter is obvious to all, yet it would be to your credit (on that big scoreboard in the sky), were you to see the light (God's gift to Trinity) in giving the Pelicans the recognition they so justly deserve. This would no doubt enhance the quality of your revered sportspage, but also hasten the Lord in becoming an avid reader.

In these times of social and moral decadence, it would seem a shame to ignore these new Messiahs who are prepared to lead sports fans out of the wilderness and to forgive their sins of worshipping false idols (i.e. patronage of their college teams).

It is therefore your duty as a concerned citizen and student of this university, not to mislead the unsuspecting and trusting, lest they should dwell in the dens of football iniquity.

Respectfully yours, Hagen Gocht

Dear Pelicans:
Some say that your playing is for the birds. The birds however, want no part of it. In my heart, there is however, a place for furry-four-legged creatures such as you purport to be. Trin vs New and Trin vs Scar. (Oct. 27) shall reap the holy truth.

Rowers Slow: First Blue Regatta In 4 Yrs.

By GORD LEIGHTON
Varsity held its first rowing regatta in more than four years on Saturday, but failed to win any of the events. Powerful crews from the University of Western Ontario made a clean sweep, winning all seven races in both women's and men's divisions — and the UWU Junior Varsity crew took home U of T beer mugs for the fastest time of the day.

The regatta represented a major deviation from most rowing regattas. Rather than being rowed over 2,000 metres, the course was lengthened to 2.2 miles and the crews rowed in "head" fashion — one after the other against the clock.

Only one snag interrupted the regatta when Varsity's organizers learned that one of Toronto's naval units was holding their national whole-boat regatta at the same time, but heading in the opposite direction. No collisions occurred, and the university regatta was immediately shortened from the planned 2.8 miles to 2.2 miles to prevent mishaps.

U of T was noticeably absent from the women's events, but competed in every men's division. The Varsity novice crew placed last in a six-boat race, four seconds behind fifth-place Brock University and almost a minute behind the winning Western crew.

The U of T Junior Varsity crew fared no better, out-classed by more experienced and stronger crews. The U of T lightweight crew, however, improved its standing by defeating McMaster and placing third — a definite improvement over the past two regattas.

The lightweight crew also entered the Heavyweight Varsity race, but was outmuscled and outclassed as Western and Trent raced to the wire. Western beat Trent by only one second, a full 22 seconds ahead of the Toronto crew.

Head coach Gord Leighton, however, is not dismayed. "Our lightweight crew has shown definite improvement over the past week, and should be able to reach a very competitive stage in the three remaining weeks of the season," he said.

"Our novice men are much smaller than the crews from some of the other universities, and our equipment is inferior. Those two factors cost us a lot on Saturday."

Blues: Nice Try York

Many U of T students were disappointed last Friday night at Varsity Stadium. They arrived at the game expecting an exciting football game, a classic contest between two arch-rival universities.

A rivalry to be decided by the sweat and strain of representatives of each college compounded into a perfectly timed unit with the task of carrying a small inflated pigskin ball down a gridiron to the glory of victory. These conglomerations of bodies, offering their health and strength to the cause had nothing closer to the wants of their hearts than to carry their team colours to victory when the final gun sounded.

Enough of these dreams. Friday night at the Stadium wasn't like that at all. The York Yeomen came to the Stadium with a debt to settle and they were determined not to leave without defending their honour. In their opinion, Toronto had won too many games to go unscathed. It was their turn to bask in the glory of winning the 'game of the year', it was their turn to be respected in the football circles of the city and finally it was their responsibility to avenge Toronto coach Ron Murphy for the shame he had reaped upon their university for the past nine years.

The U of T Blues had other things on their minds. They wanted to perfect their offence, giving experience to a maximum of personnel and extended their winning streak.

Friday night at the Stadium was like Friday night at the fights. The winner won by a knockout, the loser was carried off the field. Toronto threw a left hook by the name of Mark Bragagnolo and York being too soft was flattened for 213 yards on twenty-four carries. York responded with a field-goal attempt, unsuccessful for close-range.

Although Mark had a good game it was teamwork that won the game. (Teamwork is a veteran on the squad.)

The Varsity Blues embarrassed the York Yeomen. When York left, it was without defending their honour, or even avenging anybody. Toronto won the game 56-0. It was more than defeat, it was devastation.

In many football games it is not unusual to hear the score and the statistics singing the same song. Friday was no different. Toronto's net offence was just a few feet short of seven hundred yards. The Blues allowed only 190 yards. Mike Sokovnin, (whose score prediction was closer than the sports desks) was called upon to convert eight touchdowns, which he did without problem. Steve Ince filled in for an ailing Mark Ackley. Steve picked up

Copp have better ways to spend their time on a Friday night than to play host to a bunch of children in red and white uniforms?

Worst of all, it is feared that two players are out for the season with injuries.

Paul McMillan a veteran on the team, and Steve Itoe, just in from Riverdale C.I. Both sustained injuries which Blues coaching staff fear have sidelined them for the balance of the season.

What is left after such an two touchdowns for the Blues. Paul Forbes, ex-Yeomen player was called on only once to return a kick-off (as York had only one) which he returned for 23 yards.

Many people are amazed by the Blues performance, while being shocked by York's showing. Where did this York 'team come from? What high school do they really play for? Doesn't Ron Murphy and Dave onslaught? Toronto gained a little game experience, two injuries, and two points for winning the game. What course of action would be appropriate now?

The Blues have but one alternative. Next year they must once again field a team that will again embarrass and devastate any team York that will attempt to dishonour them.

Soccer Blues In Losing Slump

the ball.

McKeown manoeuvred down the right and noticed Vassliou inside and behind him on the field. The ball was sharply played into the path of Vassliou, who from 20 yards hit a low shot beyond the reach of Marcus Klien in the Waterloo net.

Unfortunately for the home team, their vital advantage in momentum was short lived. With his back to the goal, Zene Moszora made the spectacular and usually speculative overhead scissors kick. Although he didn't set the ball loop into his net, the delight of his team-mates was sufficient reward.

Losing 2-1 with the clock running, their frenetic and ill-directed activity subsided. Thus in the last fifteen minutes it was the visitors who most threatened the score.

Ladies Move In On Victory

Performances by the U of T's women's track and field team at three invitational meets this Fall auger well for the O.W.I.A.A. championships at Sudbury next Saturday.

Four newcomers to the team have been particularly impressive. Anne Perkin, a young and inexperienced athlete, has shown great promise with placings in the sprint events at all three meets. With improved starting technique her times are sure to drop. In Bev Kratoski the team has another fine sprinter, but in this case, with plenty of competitive experience. Although her training has not been geared towards Fall competition, her performances in the 200m and 400 m have been strong and she could well place at Sudbury. Margaret Cummings, formerly with the Waterloo team, adds depth to an already powerful group of middle distance runners. Last but not least is Susan Bradley, an athlete who needs no introduction to track and field followers. At the first meet of the season she smashed the 100m hurdles record of 14.2 by 0.6 sec., despite lack of competition. Unfortunately for the team, she will not be present at the championships, as she will be busy representing Canada at the Pan-Ams in Mexico.

The core of last year's team, Geri Ashdown, Sally Beach, Caroline Hebblethwaite and Lesly Evans — is back again and fitter than ever. Strong performances in the 400m to 1,500m events can be expected from them, and the 4x400m relay team would have to drop the baton to lose that event on Saturday.

Kanowitch charges 'blacklisting'; council ignores Salaff question

By PAUL MCGRATH

Student governor Seymour Kanowitch confronted yesterday's Governing Council meeting with a letter showing an attempt by former mathematics chairman George Duff to "blacklist" a lecturer for political activities.

Duff's letter, now two years old, involves Stephen Salaff, a mathematics lecturer who had been on a sessional appointment during the 1972-73 school year. The university's failure to rehire Salaff, a popular lecturer, was one of the catalysts for the 11 day occupation of the mathematics department in March 1973.

Duff's letter recommends to Woodworth College, where Salaff was seeking a part-time appointment for the 1973-74 academic year, that Salaff not be hired.

Seymour Kanowitch in happier times

Duff said Salaff's activities in the year previous to August 1973 "have given rise to many difficulties, including in particular the sit-in of last March. His conduct has raised serious questions of personal responsibility and professional ethics. The confidence that I had earlier placed in him is therefore at an end, and I recommend that no employment be offered to him."

The revelation of the letter came after unsuccessful attempts by Kanowitch to both have it considered by Governing Council and to pressure U of T president John Evans into opening an inquiry into the matter.

A council member attempted to have what little discussion there was moved into closed session because of its personal nature, but Kanowitch was equipped with letters from Salaff authorizing a public disclosure of all the documents on the subject. Kanowitch's attempts to have the matter aired at all were disallowed because the letters had not been submitted to the council.

Salaff has been seeking a part-time position teaching mathematics at Woodworth College since 1973. He has been negotiating with the university for a mutually agreeable body to consider the grievances surrounding his treatment by the mathematics department. No agreement has been reached.

So far the university's offers for arbitration committees have not included a student member, a point which Salaff insists upon. On this point Salaff has the support of the University of Toronto Faculty Association and its president, Bill Nelson. Nelson has endorsed the idea of student representation on the grievance committee in letters to U of T president Evans.

Salaff was unhappy with the university's July 7 offer of a three-person committee with no student member. He was told in a letter dated Aug. 1 that if he did not reply to the university offer by Aug. 7, a one-person investigation would be set up. The university has since taken this course, after withdrawing the offer of an arbitration committee on Aug. 26.

Salaff also took issue with what the university thought should be the terms of reference of the committee. Salaff thinks it should investigate things like his non-rehiring, salaries as the result of his non-rehiring and the alleged "blacklisting" by Duff.

An Aug. 26 letter from Internal Affairs vice-president Iacobucci to the university's investigator, R.E. Scane, reveals that the university is adamant in considering only the topic of Salaff's non-rehiring.

Since then Salaff's attorney has written to Iacobucci saying that the Scane investigation is not to be considered legitimate and has charged both Scane and Iacobucci with a conflict of interest due to their "close collegial relationship".

Kanowitch's confrontation at Governing Council can be seen as an attempt to break the stalemate that presently exists between the university and Salaff. Kanowitch will attempt to have the subject discussed once again at next month's meeting.

Darcy says no contract offer by university

By JOE MORGAN

U of T's 430 library workers have again run into problems with university labor relations manager John Parker and ministry of labor officials, according to union president Judy Darcy.

Darcy said after a 30 minute conciliation meeting yesterday that the university has refused to make a counter-offer to the union's demands.

She said Parker had told the union he could not make a wage offer until it was clarified whether the library workers fall within the federal government's wage controls.

He also refused to budge on the union's demand for the inclusion of part time library workers in the bargaining unit, she said.

"The conciliation officer from the ministry of labor said the ministry is not issuing any reports and wouldn't say anything one way or another, Darcy reported.

In response to the stalemate, the library workers will be holding a special meeting today at 4 pm to consider further action.

Darcy said the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) national office has told the union they would be exempt from the wage controls. The whole subject will be discussed at a CUPE national convention to be held in Toronto next week.

It will be at least another month before the union will be in a legal position to strike. Darcy said the conciliator has promised another meeting by October 28, but she said the process can go on and on, because even after the report is tabled there is a 16 day delay before a strike is legal.

Darcy said she had hoped to have an offer she could take to the membership.

The union is demanding a $265 a month raise for all workers as well as other fringe benefits.

Demonstrators march for amnesty

By CAITLIN KELLY

Protesting international political detention, Amnesty International Canada (AIC) staged a march Tuesday night stopping traffic at several downtown intersections. The march was held as part of Prisoner of Conscience Week, declared by Mayor David Crombie.

Led by Trevor Bartram, a member of the AIC executive, a crowd of 300 rallied at Nathan Phillips Square where posters and candles were distributed.

"The candles symbolize the hope of prisoners of conscience in jails all around the world," Bartram told the supporters. With candles lit and posters held aloft, the parade began its march to seven buildings whose representatives of countries holding prisoners of conscience.

A "prisoner of conscience" is defined by the AIC as a person jailed for his or her beliefs. They are a neutral organization of with no political affiliation, and will defend anyone whose basic human rights are violated, "provided they have neither used nor advocated violence".

The charter of the AIC is based on four articles of the UN Declaration of Human Rights. These are: protection against cruel and inhumane treatment, protection against arbitrary arrest and detention, and the rights of freedom of speech and freedom of political thought. These universal human rights were set out by the UN in 1941, and according to the AIC, several of the countries detaining "prisoners of conscience" have signed this declaration, and are consequently in flagrant violation of the agreement.

Accompanied by several policemen, the march was a quiet and moving one. Beginning with the astrolab in Nathan Phillips Square representing the USSR, posters and candles were left at the doors of most of the designated buildings. These included the Trade Commissions of South Korea, South Africa and Malaysia, and the Consulates-General of Turkey and Haiti.

As the marchers stood outside the South Korean Commission, Bartram related findings of an AIC investigating committee that had gone to South Korea in March 1974. "In spite of massive attempts to hide it, torture was systematically being used in Korea," he said.

At present, said Bartram, the AIC is working for approximately 15,000 prisoners around the world. "The AIC finds out why they're arrested and sends out facts of their detention to amnesty groups around the world," he explained. Bartram said the simple act of writing letters to

Graduates from past years return to campus for homecoming this weekend

Present inhabitants of the university are warned to keep their eyes on their liquor cabinets and to be on their guard against whoopee-cushions and hand-buzzers this weekend.

Waves of elderly folk with blue jackets and wistful looks in their eyes are reported heading towards campus hoping to recapture lost youth as the annual Homecoming takes place.

This year will be different, according to Mary Brown in Alumni Affairs. In the past, the homecomers have felt a little lonely, faced with an empty campus. This year undergraduates, graduates, workers, winos and their brothers and sisters are all invited to partake in the events. Saturday will feature the Homecoming parade with a revival of the old school pep set, the Blue and White Band, leading the way. Floats from various faculties, schools and institutions will be part of the parade.

Of course, the Homecoming game between Ottawa Gee Gees and U of T Blues will be the focus of the afternoon, promising to be a tough game between Canada's two top-rated college teams.

The events will top off with the Homecoming Dance Saturday at Hart House. Alumni Affairs is hoping to see a plethora of students at this event, and the band will play anything from fox trot to bumping music. Tickets are $7.50 a couple for alumni, and $5 for students. See you there.

offending governments and making their actions public is an effective tactic. "Publicity works! We've had a lot of releases because of the publicity," a spokesman added. The National section of AIC for Canada was founded in 1972, and now has branches in eight provinces. It works in conjunction with National Sections in other countries in its campaign against torture and detention, not only for political beliefs, but for ethnic origin, colour or language.

Generation gap, will grow with cutbacks at U of T says Evans

By PAUL McGRATH

U of T president John Evans has warned of a "serious generation gap" within the university if it remains necessary to limit academic appointments in the future.

Speaking at yesterday's meeting of Governing Council, Evans noted a "bulge" in appointments during the university's growth over the last decade, but said the "severe financial restrictions" imposed by the provincial government in the last three years has put a stop to any new hirings.

"In our stringent financial circumstances we are having to make temporary one-year appointments because we are unable to accept longer-range commitments of funds," he said. He said this would avoid "possible dismissals for fiscal reasons."

Evans pointed to a 19 per cent increase in student enrolment in the last three years, with no corresponding increase in appointments. In that time, the university has hired and promoted only to fill the gaps left by retirement and death.

Evans could see no immediate solution to the pressure on staffing but detailed some of the methods that had been suggested within the university, including the lessening of the workload on older faculty who would be offered part-time appointments, an early retirement plan, or more creative allocation of existing funds.

Evans' attack on government stringency was made to Governing Council in response to what he felt were "extremely misleading" statements about university education in the Globe and Mail last week. An article contended the university was offering students nothing they couldn't receive elsewhere at community colleges, that evaluation of both students and teachers was almost non-existent and that curricular experimentation was a waste of the taxpayer's money.

Evans agreed the university was in need of "more satisfactory methods of assessing the effectiveness of teaching" before a professor enters the tenure stream and added such assessments should form part of the "regular annual review of the individual's performance." These and other considerations are under review currently by the Academic Affairs committee.

Evans took the Globe to task on curricular experimentation.

"The article I referred to seems to condemn introductory and interdisciplinary courses out of hand as creating the illusion of understanding. If this were true, this university would stand condemned, for we have actively sought for areas of innovation and experimentation in an attempt to offer a considerable diversity of opportunity to our students."

Evans argued most of the important changes in curriculum structures of the past twenty years have been geared towards offering the student "the most favourable balance of freedom of choice, study in depth and personal contact and supervision."

He pointed to the "systems" approach in medical education as an example of pioneering and argued that the interdisciplinary method was the only way to attack such problems as environmental studies or community health.

"None of these experiments is of questionable academic integrity," he said.

Dr. Evans holds up chin as he ponders generation gap.

Panelists favour rent control

"Housing is not a favour or a luxury, it is a right," said alderperson Dorothy Thomas to a capacity crowd at the St. Lawrence Centre last Wednesday.

Thomas was part of a five-member panel discussing rent control at a forum sponsored by the Metro Toronto Public Affairs department. The other panelists were New Democratic Party leader Stephen Lewis, MP Margaret Campbell, Peter Farlinger, president of the Urban Developers' Institute (U.D.I.) of Canada, and Alvin Fought, president of the Federation of Metro Tenants' Association.

"If everyone has the right to acquire affordable housing shouldn't everyone then have the right to build affordable housing?" argued Farlinger.

Lewis replied this was not so. "Landlords have ridden over tenants for so long that tenants deserve a moment of retribution," he said.

Lewis spoke in favour of rent controls as did Campbell, Fought and Thomas. "Nothing makes sense in Ontario until we begin to build houses," said Lewis, who in his opening remarks criticized the provincial and federal government's failure to boost the supply of housing. He also disapproved of Queen's Park's proposed methods of implementing rent controls. Lewis said all rent controls should be retroactive from July first 1975 and no exemptions should be granted to any builders. Lewis was referring to a suggestion made by Premier Bill Davis that exemptions be granted to new buildings and that not all rent payments should be retroactive.

Farlinger was the only panel member not to urge that tenants' rights be improved. "People are living in fear, this cannot go on," stressed Campbell. She emphasized hidden clauses in leases were often used by landlords to unjustly raise rents and evict tenants.

Student co-op dwellers are ignored in tenants' gripes.

Lewis and Thomas urged bargaining rights and Security of Tenure be given to tenants. These measures would serve to prevent unfair evictions and rent hikes by landlords.

Farlinger, alone in protesting imposition of rent controls, argued that controls would discourage private investment in housing which would eventually stop all construction and create even greater housing problems than presently exist. In Vancouver, he said rent controls have stopped practically all development. Lewis was quick to point out that Farlinger's statistics in this case were incorrect.

"If private investment stopped funding housing development, who would?" Farlinger asked. He argued further that the government could not be trusted with the task since "its past record shows it should not be relied on to handle this problem." Lewis immediately retorted that he did not believe Farlinger's "hoge" about private investors vacating the market. The discussion was then thrown open to speakers from the floor.

Nearly everyone who spoke supported rent controls. However, most of the issues that were brought up concerned improvement of tenants' rights.

The revision of The Rights of the Landlord and Tenant's Act was a crucial point brought up by a speaker from the floor. Both Lewis and Campbell agreed this legislation was heavily weighted in favour of landlords and had to be changed.

There was a strong feeling among the people present that the problems of boarding house tenants and student co-operative dwellers were being ignored because of exaggerated complaints by apartment inhabitants.

MORE ON BRAZIL

The Brascan Connection, in Wednesday's Varsity, was written by Ed Nunes-Vaz. The concluding paragraphs of the article were inadvertently left off, and we offer them to you now:

"If the reader has remained unmoved thus far by the humanistic arguments, then consider these facts, which directly affect us in Canada. A majority of Brascan's shares are American-owned (delegates of significant U.S. firms such as Kennecott, Sears Roebuck, and Grace & Co. have been sitting on Brascan's board of directors). Furthermore, as I have already pointed out, Brascan's activities in Brazil are detrimental to Canada's exports. The Export Development Corporation (EDC) supports the activities of companies like Brascan, and our tax dollars support the EDC.

"In other words, Brascan doesn't only help to maintain the Brazilian masses in economic submergence; its activities in Brazil are detrimental to Canadians as well. The maximization of profits by a few is blocking the path to socially and economically relevant development in Canada — as well as in Brazil."

150 against Green Paper

By SHARON STEVENSON

One hundred and fifty people marched on Parliament Hill to greet the opening of Parliament with opposition to the government's Green Paper on immigration. The demonstrators shouted slogans and carried placards and red flags before listening to various speakers.

Richard Daly, National spokesman of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) (CPC-ML) pointed out that in the post Indo-China era, reactionaries are being increasingly isolated.

Daly said the role of the Canadian government was to "ingloriously follow the US imperialists," and that the Green Paper tried to make the Canadian people appear racist. National minorities are carrying on valiant struggles against physical attacks in both the East and West-Indian communities, he said.

Daly said the campaign was to increase fascism on the cultural front, against the immigrants but that the campaign had led to great unity against the legislation.

He also said the attack on the immigrants is an attack on the working class because workers from the Third World are brought here on a temporary basis and given subsistence wages and no rights. The effect is to lower the whole rate of wages for the entire working class, said Daly.

Daly said the slogan "Defeat This Government" would become increasingly popular as the Canadian people united, particularly with the introduction of wage and price controls.

A speaker from the native and Metis community pointed out a year earlier, the government had been greeted by the Native People's Caravan at the opening of Parliament, and said they were part of a tide of people rising in opposition to the government. The demonstration ended with the formation of a National Ad Hoc Committee to Oppose the Green Paper.

At a Toronto meeting to oppose the Green Paper Sunday, Hardial Bains, chairman of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) said Minister of Manpower and Immigration Robert Andras' recent pronouncements have escalated the attack on the immigrants. Bains said the Green Paper doesn't represent anything new as far as the basic contents are concerned and that it reflects the fact that the ruling class is racist and fascist at all levels. Bains pointed out rallies and demonstrations should be directed to deal with organizing against the government. "It is the government that negates us that is extremist," said Bains.

He said immigrants from Asia, Africa and Latin America are told they are the cause of the problems in the society. The society is at a very serious turning point, with the economic crisis reaching new proportions, said Bains. Economists are predicting an inflation rate of 20 per cent and unemployment of 10 per cent and this crisis is leading to the sophistication of fascist machinery against the people.

Bains said Andras is creating propaganda to the effect that immigrants take away jobs. He pointed out during a recent period there were 25,428 immigrants who came to Canada, and during the same period 325,000 workers became unemployed.

Bains said the government would only change if it is viciously opposed, and called for the defeat of the government. He said immigration laws should be based on serving the needs of the people of the world and that Andras wanted immigration to serve the needs of an economy dominated by US imperialism.

Bains said the entire immigration procedure should be scrapped, and that anyone who wanted to immigrate should be able to find work and enjoy all rights.

Ed Clarke, chairman of the National Black Coalition of Canada, said the country was built by immigrants, and that the Green Paper represented a move toward fascism. Clarke said Andras' policy had to be changed and committees like the East Indian Defence Committee were convincing people to stand up and fight for their national rights. "We better start doing something about it right now," he stressed.

Friday, fyday, hiday, bye-beyday. Helping with the poetics: Bea Hampson, Sharon Stevenson, Caitlin Kelly, the sports folk, Bob Bettson, Philip Burke doing in Kanowitch, Don Cruickshank running the copy, Boots Randolph and Flipper's twin brother. What a lineup. The morning ain't nothing without The Varsity, Toronto's oldest morning tabloid.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Are we being used?

Seymour Kanowitch is a nasty troublemaker who likes to have The Varsity do his dirty work for him. Usually we are only too happy to comply.

Kanowitch is currently concerned, quite justifiably, about the case of Stephen Salaff which is detailed on page one. Upon receiving no satisfaction from Dr. Evans that there would be an inquiry into the treatment Salaff has received from the university's administration, most notably from former mathematics chairman George Duff, Kanowitch has dropped the matter into the hands of the media, whom he hopes will make hay of it.

Kanowitch's trump card is a two-year old letter from Duff to Woodsworth College recommending, because of Salaff's involvement in a sit-in at the math department two years ago, that he not be offered employment at Woodsworth.

Unfortunately, it is a little tough to make much hay out of that. Yes, it did amount to a blacklisting of Salaff at Duff's behest and was politically a bad move, especially in writing. Yes, it was a staffing opinion based on non-academic criteria (Salaff's political involvement) and as such violates the spirit of appointment policy.

But, the letter is two years old, Duff is no longer at the university.

There is very little that can be done about the letter except to say in retrospect that Duff was wrong.

However, if the letter and the sentiment expressed was the actual and only reason for the university's failure to rehire Salaff, then a great injustice has been done.

What is more critical at present is Salaff's search for another full-time appointment at the university, and the trouble he is receiving in that search. All summer there has been a considerable amount of haggling about the composition of the committee that will look into Salaff's appeal to be reconsidered for full-time appointment.

Salaff wants to make sure there are students involved in the decision-making and the university is reluctant to allow a student presence. Early in the summer a three-person committee was offered to Salaff by the university, with room for a Salaff appointee, a math department appointee and a chairman chosen by the two.

Despite letters to Evans from many student councils and faculty members including an official submission from Faculty Association president Bill Nelson encouraging student representation, the university said that no such presence would be allowed.

Salaff wants three things, and it's possible he may get only one of them. The explanation of the university's failure to rehire him may never come out in a hearing. Although Duff's letter fills in a few gaps, it may not be the entire reason. Back pay for his loss of employment seems justified only if a "blacklist" can be proven as the only reason for not rehiring him.

But the question of his rehiring is one that should be answered satisfactorily. Salaff has been in limbo for far too long waiting for the university machine to get around to that question. The question should be taken up without further delay and guidelines for this procedure followed that will include student representation.

1975 has been designated as International Woman's Year but it advanced the status of women? Do women enjoy equal pay for equal work, or the right to safe legal abortions? Clearly, just saying that this is a woman's year amounts to nothing.

Women will get no rights unless they fight for them. Part of that fight is the rally to protest the treatment of Dr. Henry Morgentaler.

Morgentaler, a Montreal physician, dared to openly challenge Canada's presently ambiguous abortion laws. The law permits abortion under the auspices of a specially legislated three person committee. This hospital-based review committee must rule that the continuation of the pregnancy is likely to endanger the life or health of the woman.

But that's all in theory. In practice, less than a quarter of the hospitals in Canada have such committees. In addition, some of those committees find it necessary to rule against all abortion applications.

The law contains no clarification for the concept of "health" Does this include her social, psychological or economic well being? The decision rests with the hospital triune that sometimes relies on the report of the attending physician.

Morgentaler, who has been a long-standing advocate of women's rights, made the decision to challenge the hypocritical abortion laws in 1969.

He opened a clinic in Montreal which dispensed with the review committee and performed abortions on the request of the woman alone. The CTV program W5 in May 1973 asked and was allowed to film an actual abortion being performed.

It was obvious that the government was keeping a low profile only if Morgentaler did likewise. In November, after the CTV program, the phones were tapped and police raided the clinic.

As a side-light to this police action, women were subjected to forceful internal examination. One who was on a student visa was pressured into testifying against Morgentaler. A clinic nurse Joanne Cornax was also charged and still faces trial proceedings.

But the governmental attack on Morgentaler did not stop at legal action. He was brought to trial and acquitted by a Quebec jury. The Quebec court of appeals in an unprecedented move, reversed the jury decision. The usual practice would have been to order a retrial based on an "error" of the presiding judge.

Police action had resulted in a number of separate charges. So, to add insult to injury, Morgentaler was taken from jail to face yet another trial. Morgentaler was acquitted in June 1975 but remains in jail. He has been refused parole.

The Morgentaler case represents an attack on all women in Canada. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women and the Ontario Status of Women Council have spoken in favor of removing abortion from the criminal code and against the particular victimization of Morgentaler. They represent the opinions of thousands of other individuals and organizations, including doctors, lawyers and legislators who have also spoken out.

A benefit rally will be held this Sunday at 8 p.m., supporters of Morgentaler and the fight for women's rights should attend. Convocation Hall, 8:00 p.m.

To the Editor:

Although this year's Political Economy Course Evaluations need no apology, I would like to clear up some points brought to light by your article, "Controls Mar Evaluations" which appeared in The Varsity of Wednesday, October 8.

Reading your report one would get the impression that there was widespread dissatisfaction with the course critique. However, Mr. Balnis has thus far been the only student to have come to the PECU office to complain, and his objection was so banal and inconsequential that I am surprised he took the time to bring it up. He faulted us for not printing a comment he had made in his write-up of a certain professor. As I explained to Mr. Balnis in our office (an explanation that he failed to give The Varsity) his write-up was too confusing to be of use to students and that, having reviewed other students' comments on that particular course, we found that he had not reflected the overall class opinion.

The written comments on professors were based solely on the statistical results and the open ended questions of the evaluation forms filled out by each student.

Because of gross errors in the previous course critique a new procedure was agreed upon this past year. After all the write-ups had been completed a letter was sent to all professors by H. Eastman, chairman of the department. The letter indicated that the professors had three weeks in which to read over their write-up and make objections if they felt they had been wrongly treated. Now, by wrongly treated we meant that the write-up did not reflect the statistical summary and the open ended questions. To the best of my knowledge only one professor sought to object and his write-up was rewritten, but it was still the worst of all those appearing in the critique.

The Varsity would have us believe that cooperation with the department in the production of the course critique made their authenticity doubtful. Not only do such objections cast doubt on the integrity of the course union members and those people in the department who have given us a great deal of assistance, they are patently untrue.

This may come as a shock but the department and the faculty have shown themselves quite interested in seeing that the evaluations are done fairly and that they reflect the real opinion of the students in each course. The mere fact that the department makes itself available to help seems to indicate the value they place on cooperation.

In short, we stand behind this year's course critique. We are thankful to professors Eastman and Foot for their assistance and hope that we can, The Varsity and Mr. Balnis notwithstanding, continue our cooperation in the future.

Joel J. Sokolsky,
Chairman, PECU

To the Editor:

The October 8th, 1975 issue of Varsity contained two articles concerning the changing of marks in certain Arts and Science courses, particularly those in two courses in Political Science. The tenor of each of these articles can only be described as being one of emotional outrage, containing as they did such terms as "thievery", "robbed", "obvious immorality", "crooks, sadists and masochists", with reference to the decision of the Academic Standards not to accept these marks without alteration.

As a member of this "faceless committee" I naturally found the tone of the articles offensive, but this is not what prompts me to write.

It is interesting, and I think significant, that nowhere in these articles were the facts of the case presented. One fact is that of the 271 students registered in the two courses (POL 208 and 312), no less than 119 were initially assigned A's and a further 107 were initially given B's. This amount 44 per cent received an A grade and nearly 40 per cent received B. In addition, only one student out of 271 received a failing grade. (One wonders what he did to deserve this singling out.)

A second fact is that no marks can be awarded to any student until they have been reviewed and approved by the appropriate committee of the Department and Faculty. No staff member is authorized to inform students of their marks until such approval has been obtained, and in fact it is only the Faculty which can really release final grades and not the instructor. It is regrettable that the students were initially informed of the grades in these two courses, but that is not the responsibility of the Committee on Academic Standards.

Terms such as "thievery" are obviously out of place to describe the decision of this committee not to accept the marks initially submitted in these courses. I believe this decision was fully justified, not only in terms of maintaining meaningful academic standards, but also in terms of fairness to students in other courses where 83 per cent of the students do not expect to receive an A or a B grade.

An A in an A is an A only if some discretion is used in assigning such grades.

Professor and Chairman

Brault's magnificent "Les Ordres" won the award for Best Film of 1975.

Etrogs drip and sparkle as Canuck film folks distribute kudos and condolences

It was a name-dropper's heaven. The reporters mingled with the directors, the actors with the judges, and everyone not quite in the know wondered who that man in the brown crushed-velvet suit could be. It was the 26th annual Canadian Film Awards Festival, and the "beautiful people" had come out in full force to oggle and be ogled, some hopefully to walk away with one of the gleaming golden statues, an Etrog. Named after its sculptor, Sorel Etrog, the figure, now presented as Canada's answer to the Oscar, is a coveted piece of metal.

The Canadian Film Awards Ceremony was established in 1941, "to celebrate and honour Canadian films and the people who make them." The first winner was "The Loon's Necklace" by Crawley Films, a company still flourishing. Crawley claimed this year's award for best non-fiction feature film with "Janis", a portrait of the late Janis Joplin.

This year's ceremonies were held at the Shaw Festival Theatre in Niagara-on-the-Lake. After a week of preliminary judging and viewings, the 285 films entered were narrowed down to 64 eligibles by the panel of 7 judges. The jury was chaired by critic Gerald Pratley and included Denis Heroux, Tadeusz Jaworski, Janine Manatis, Josef Svorecky, Vaclav Taborsky and Les Wedman.

On Sunday night the crowd came, clad in denim, peasant shawls and Chinese silk. The audience of 500 managed to ensure the 2½ hour presentation with the help of host Peter Gzowski.

His commentary was funny and rambling, and maintained without the help of cue-cards. The evening itself was as unpretentious as Gzowski, and went by without the tinsel, timed-to-the-minute touch that Hollywood imparts to such occasions.

The 39 Etrogs were presented by such celebrities as actresses Doris Petrie and Trudy Young, cameraman Dick Leitman, Sorel Etrog and Gratien Gelinas (who presented the John Grierson Award to Pierre Juneau).

For cinematography in a non-feature film, Ken Gregg won for his work on "Deedee", an episode of "The Collaborators". Paul Vanderlinden won for "Eliza's Horoscope", which also picked up the Etrog for best feature film, winning over such well-known as "Black Christmas" and "Child Under a Leaf".

The overwhelming winner of the evening however was "Les Ordres", selected as Best Film for 1975. Michel Brault won Best Director for his work as well as Best Original Screenplay.

"Why Rock the Boat" swept the awards for both Best Actor, Stuart Gilliard, and Best Supporting Actor, Henry Beckman.

Margot Kidder was named best actress for her roles in "Black Christmas" and "A Quiet Day in Belfast". In the non-feature category, Jayne Eastwood was honoured for her part in "Deedee" and William Hut for his role in the "National Dream" series.

In view of the fact that there were no awards given last year, the jury made a special award to "The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz" for helping to promote the Canadian film industry. Patrick Rousseau was the sole winner for the film, with an Etrog for Best Sound Recording.

Unfortunately for autograph-seekers, few winners were present at the awards ceremony, as producers, assistants and friends picked up the statues for the winners. Acceptance speeches were mercifully short, and by 9:30, the pavilion set up for the buffet was filled. For $15, watery beef stroganoff, white rice, salad and muffins were offered.

A four-foot ice replica of the Etrog was set up behind the food tables, dripping steadily, but few people noticed. The losers were busy eating while the winners, golden figures beside their plates, tried to look nonchalant.

Lo-calorie catharsis is tasty lunchtime fare

First thought upon entering the U.C. Playhouse on Friday: "Uh-oh! Are there any seats left?" The place was packed. The wave of a hand caught my attention and I ran to grab one of the few vacant seats. The occasion which had lured this energetic crowd from their lunches was the final performance of Pairing, a theatrical montage on the subject of romance.

Lunchtime Theatre is presented by the students in the U.C. Drama Programme; members of the acting class do the acting, while a student from the directing course does most of the directing with critical aid from his classmates.

Pairing was composed of edited segments of plays dealing with different aspects of romantic love, deftly sewn together with student-conceived pantomime sequences. The pantomime was not brilliantly executed; finesse in pantomime requires years of work, but the execution was passable and the concept was excellent. In fact, the pantomime did more than unify the production, it gave new meaning to material which I found simplistic and outdated. One of the plays represented was about a woman caught between two equally repulsive lovers — one, a he-man, the other, a frustrated intellectual.

Her complaint was that she wanted one man who could be both of these things. The scene was definitely comical, but the young woman's problem was childish. The pantomimes following this segment of the show also expressed the problem of finding a suitable mate, but the mime did more than restate an overworked question, it expanded and complexified the question, giving a fresh twist to what could have been a cliché production.

There were a number of notable flaws in Pairing. There was often a lack of motivated movement on stage, and all of the actors require some voice training. I often felt that there was a lack of direction; the actors obviously understood their material but often had little idea of what should be done with it. Perhaps if the director had spent more time coaching the actors on voice, movement and motivation, there would have been more polish in the production. But the plays that will be seen in Lunchtime Theatre are viewed by the students as ongoing productions, in other words, they are by no means complete and necessarily lack polish. The rehearsal time is short (three weeks on and off) and the material is chosen purposefully for its difficulty. The series is an educational experience, and the students are trying to expand their acting abilities by grappling with forms that are outside of their previous experience. For this reason, there will be flaws in all of the plays, but the standard of this series remains surprisingly high.

There is no question of the value of Lunchtime Theatre. I anticipate a constant improvement in the series as the Drama Programme matures; the talents and imaginations of the students are only beginning to emerge. As the series goes on we can expect that it will become an increasingly entertaining way to spend the lunch hour. Theo Stevens

The simple pleasures of low-budget movies

The Film Board Films

The uninitiated movie-buff rarely stops to think of the difficulties of film-making. Of what those enormous multi-million dollar budgets are needed for. Of what films would be like on shoe-string budgets, without expert directors, cutters, dubbing, montage, superimposition, without all that little extra that we've come to take for granted.

It then comes as quite a revelation to see films made for around four hundred dollars (no, not four hundred thousand, 400). It is a shock that makes one appreciate the need of that $3.50 every time you see a first-run flick. These films don't receive it and it shows.

The films I saw are the production of the U. of T. Film Board. The Film Board is a Hart House club and receives financing from SAC and from Hart House. Last year they received about $1200 from each source and made about six films. I saw five, not all made last year, and all need work, all need funds, some more desperately than others.

Mallé in Wonderland is refreshing by its shortness. It is nothing but a vignette showing pursuit, action, helplessness. It has a few technical faults.

Undoubtedly the two best are made by the same film-maker — Ira Levy. His India in Images has overtones of Marguerite Duras' poignant, Cannes-festival prize-winning India Song. It is made of a series of post-cards, but made so well that it matches any National Film Board travelogue that I've seen. The chef d'oeuvre, however, is Furnace of Passion. It is witty, well-shot, it has a very good script. For ultimately it is the script that makes or breaks a movie — it is almost impossible to make a good film out of a bad script (though not vice versa). Furnace of Passion has everything, it is good enough for general release. It shows more than promise, it shows real talent. Claude Jutra, Ted Kötcheff, Donald Shebit, move over.

Anyway, the point of all this is that there are movies being made here. So if you've always wondered if you have that something special to get into the movies or know someone interested in financing films, the Film Board would like to hear from you. This year's Film Board president is Lorne Macdonald at 654-9330.

A much-needed antidote to cathode-ray narcosis

Last Saturday evening at Ye Olde Hamilton Place Mr. Charles Dickens, in the person of Mr. Emyln Williams, filled each corner of the large stage with enchanting ghosts. All at once one could imagine the indulgent nurse, Mrs. Gamp or the solemn Mr. Dombey sitting with his uninspired son Paul or the smiling French peasant knitting in the middle of a Parisian square while all the carriages of the rich paraded past. The characters all came brilliantly alive. While Mr. Chops, the sometimes wealthy dwarf, danced lithely at the ends of Mr. William's gentle fingertips the sorrowful echo of the thousand dead from 'The Battle of Life' could be heard lingering in the beautiful voice of the speaker. This was an entertainment which implored its audience to listen and to dream; talents which, for most of us, were stolen with the advent of television. It was a true feast of the mind's eye and ear.

By being made aware of the enchanting characters the audience finally became aware of themselves and in the end they rose and cheered with as much delight as a group of children who have suddenly found a marvelous new toy to play with for the very first time.

Henninger. A different tasting beer.

Meister Pils. Different again.

Henninger tastes different from Canadian beers because it's made from different ingredients and in a different way. Only two row barley is used. Yeast is especially flown in from Frankfurt. It's doubly fermented. It is allowed to carbonate naturally. It tastes like a German beer because it is.

Henninger. Das Schmeckt.

Meister Pils is a true light tasting German pilsener brewed from the same ingredients and in the same way as it is in Henninger's Frankfurt brewery. Now you can enjoy the light distinctive taste that has made pilsener the most celebrated of all the world's beers.

Both Henninger and Meister Pils are made in Henninger's own independent brewery and are available at your brewers retail outlet for just a few cents more than regular beer.

Two German beers in fat little bottles.

Sentimentality doesn't destroy "Lies My Father Told Me"

Lies My Father Told Me

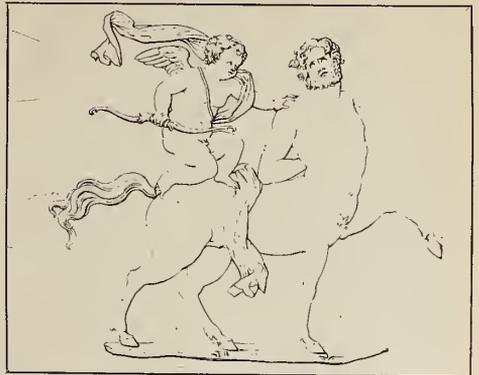

It's the story of a young boy growing up and learning about life in the Jewish section of Montreal, many years ago. His father Harry (Len Birman) is what many people today would call a pig; he's also a bit of a brute. He thinks he's ahead of his time: he keeps making inventions that he hopes will "revolutionize the garment industry" — a kind of paleo-permanent-press trousers, expandable cufflinks (so you can push up your sleeves without undoing your cuffs) — but they don't work and they don't sell, which doesn't improve his temper. The most important lies he tells little David are that money is what counts in this world, and that if you want to get ahead you've got to be prepared to hustle; he also tells him once that he's going to take him fishing but instead leaves him in a restaurant and has him fed with chocolate sodas to keep him quiet while he pops into the back of the shop for a little off-track betting.

David has other friends too: Edna, the goldenhearted neighbourhood whore; Mr. Baumgarten (Ted Allen, who also wrote the script) the tailor and goldenhearted communist, who's always trying to get the grandfather to read Lenin's latest (wise old Zeyde refuses, of course: he's rather proud of having read Only One Book); little Cleo, blonde and cute, with whom he romps and discusses the facts of life.

As I left the theatre, I really heard a lady say to her lady friend, "Thank God you brought the Kleenex!" She didn't have a cold.

The director is Jan Kadar, whom you may have heard of before: back in Czechoslovakia, some years ago, he made a film called The Shop On Main Street, about a small-time shopkeeper's descent into hell during the Nazi occupation. Not only was it excellent, it also won an Academy Award as Best Foreign Film of the year. I haven't been able to find out why he left Czechoslovakia, but it's not hard to guess.

Now it's rather hazardous for foreign directors to come to North America and try to find work here, though I suppose there are worse fates. Milos Forman, who made Firemen's Ball in happier days, came to the States, made one quite good movie called Taking Off, and vanished. If Kadar came about the same time, he's gone a long time without finding work at all. And seeing Lies My Father Told Me one's first reaction is "The poor man! He's travelled to a far country and fallen among Canadians — they've tricked him into doing a remake of Duddy Kravitz — his English isn't good enough for him to see through that script —"

In fact, that's a little hasty. There are indeed moments in the movie that are just too much, and there's no denying that the whole is full of stock situations and sentimentality. But when we think of a film as sentimental, we're thinking of style as well as attitude. Films these days are no less sentimental than they've ever been — the focus has shifted from things such as the family to buddyship and degenerative diseases — but the presentation is usually much cooler. The flamboyant and the larger-than-life, presented without the technical qualities which enable us to stand apart from the movies of the thirties and enjoy them as camp, and without the morbid attractions exploited by Russell and Jodorowski, are unexpected and disturbing. And not only is this kind of film less fashionable than the low-key variety, it is harder to do. It demands consistently finer work from all involved: a low-key mistake might slip right by an audience (if not an eagle-eyed reviewer), but a flamboyant one is hard to ignore, though it may not damage the film any more.

So much for why you shouldn't hate Lies My Father Told Me. But why should you like it? Well, it makes you laugh and cry. The situations may have been done before, but that doesn't make them incredible or unaffectionate. One doesn't have to repudiate stock situations or characters: one can welcome them as old friends. After all, we've long been used to the idea of Frenchmen making American gangster pictures, so there seems to be no reason to object to another foreigner's reviving other old styles.

Best of all, the movie is shot with an affectionate attention to the appearance of old Montreal and the quality of life there. What stays in one's mind is the look of things: buildings, tools, clothes, people's faces, lined with their own cares.

An emotional message from "Animals in Art"

In spite of my initial hesitations about the "Animals in Art" exhibition now at the Royal Ontario Museum until Dec. 14 (it sounded as thrilling as chewing dry turkey meat), it actually turned out to be an enjoyable experience.

The show consists of 300 paintings, sculptures and carvings, all of them animals. The ROM considers it to be the "largest and most comprehensive" wildlife art show ever. This may or may not be true, but the show still comes off successfully by being a well-organized and unique exhibit which broadens the scope of the ROM.

Wildlife art is a newly re-discovered form, which has largely been ignored in art galleries. With the increase in environmental awareness in the last decade, interest in wildlife art has grown considerably.

The works of Lady Elizabeth Gwilliam were of such discovery. Her watercolours of the birds of India are life-size, accurate in setting and detail and pre-date Audubon (considered to be the first accurate wildlife artist) by 20 years.

Wildlife art is somewhat unique in that it plays a double role. On one hand, it can record the many facets of animal life. This may include appearance (colour, shape, texture), motion (in flight, swimming, attacking) and the drama of survival. At the same time, all this must be done with artistic skill.

Individually many of the paintings weren't that spectacular, but seen collectively they convey a strong, emotional message. Thus, while a picture may not be your everyday Leonardo da Vinci, it probably offers a special look at one or more aspects of animals and nature.

While the show's emphasis is on wildlife paintings, there are about 65 sculptures, carvings, stuffed animals, reproductions of cave drawings and Egyptian tablets, and everyday objects like signs and tools. They covered a broad spectrum of cultures and time periods. The use of animal motifs in mythologies, religions and daily life is touched upon. This area could have been greatly expanded, especially since four-fifths of the show consists of paintings. Why not a few more Inuit carvings, for example?

"Animals in Art" is a good, worthwhile show marking a small step forward for an often hesitant ROM. Its imperfections of space and emphasis are important, but not enough to prevent it from being a stimulating experience. Whether or not you're willing to fork over the 50c student admission fee is up to you.

Hoechst thinks ahead

Helping Build Canada

Products and ideas from Hoechst have touched and improved the quality of people's lives in every area around the world, in a hundred countries on six continents. As an affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organizations Canadian Hoechst Limited has a full century of research and achievement to draw upon. In Canada, Hoechst is an autonomous company employing Canadians to serve Canadian needs.

Hoechst in Canada concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyes, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. Ideas: The spark we run on Hoechst develops a constant stream of new ideas to keep its research pointed in the right directions. Ideas about what is needed, ideas about what is wanted. Ideas about what is possible, ideas about what is probable in the light of a constantly changing, ever-increasing body of basic knowledge.

Imagination steers the ship

Imagination is a prime source of the new ideas Hoechst uses constantly in order to keep developing better products — more effective medicines, better chemical and industrial materials. Imagination is only half the battle, but when good ideas are properly teamed with the discipline of applied research, they constitute a formidable force in the search for improved products in every area of modern life.

A heavy among film critics discusses theory, horror flicks

In the process of composition, as every poet knows, the relation between experience and language is always dialectical, but in the finished product it must always appear to the reader to be a one-way relationship. In serious poetry, thought, emotion and event must always appear to dictate the diction, meter, and rhyme in which they are embodied; vice versa, in comic poetry, it is the words, meter, and rhyme which must appear to create the thoughts, emotions, and events they require.

John Russell Taylor is one of the 'heavies' among film critics (a 'heavy' being someone like Pauline Kael, Andrew Sarris, John Simon, etc.) Taylor was the film critic for The Times in London. He has written 18 books among which are Cinema Eye, Cinema Ear; Directors and Directions; The Angry Theater; The Hollywood Musical. He has also written several television plays, among them being a new, faithful adaptation of Dracula. He is presently teaching at USC and writing an authorized biography of Alfred Hitchcock.

A few weeks ago I had dinner with John Russell Taylor where I taped most of this interview.

Someone once said that our best criticism is that of poetry in that the only people who read poetry are poets and poetry critics. The poetry critic has the comfort of sharing with his readers certain general and important assumptions about the art. However, the film critic, because of the mass appeal of film, shares no such assumptions and is largely an impotent individual. How does it feel to be impotent?

I think there is probably some truth in that but in many ways I would regard that as an advantage. I think it would be a great weight of responsibility to bear if one felt that one was in a position such as Clive Barnes is in the New York theater. If he can't all by himself keep a play open, he can all by himself close one. If Barnes doesn't like a play then thousands of potential theatergoers will decide they don't want to see it.

It's a very worrying position to be in. I feel very strongly that one man's opinion after all is only one man's opinion. As a critic you may be a little more experienced in the field that you are writing about, but finally it's still just your opinion.

Whether this degree of irresponsibility, and that isn't exactly the word I want; I mean the state of not having responsibility for the success or failure of what one is writing about, whether that makes for better or worse criticism I'm not quite sure. It may I suppose, cause a certain confusion in one's aims because one doesn't know quite who one is writing for.

Who do you write for?
I suppose you can say that one is really writing for oneself but beyond that if I ever visualize a readership, it would probably be the people connected with the film. I would more likely be writing for the film's writer and director than the film goer. I would think that what the film goer would want from me would be mainly information and I don't think they are likely to take my judgement as gospel; at least I hope they wouldn't.

What do you look for in a film?
Well, first of all, that it entertain me and hold my interest. I know that entertainment is almost a dirty word. We heard a number of times this morning: "Are you making a serious film or just an entertainment kind?" Entertainment is a vital component of any art, or else people wouldn't be still performing Oedipus Rex or Hamlet if they weren't in a sense, entertaining; they affect one's emotions and hold one's interest. I expect, to put it naively, not to be bored by a film. If I am then I think there is something wrong with it.

What is being bored?
Well, I think I mean something rather special in that there is a particular sort of boredom which can come from artistic deficiencies in a film which don't have anything to do with literary judgements of it. I can be bored by a film about something that I am very interested in. It's a matter of whether the filmmaker has talent or not. It's the quality of the filmmaker's regard for something, the quality of his own involvement, his interest in his subject matter rather than the subject matter itself. Alfred Hitchcock once told me that he wasn't interested in characters or plots. He said, "It's like asking a still life painter if he is interested in apples. The answer is, if he is honest, 'No, not really, but I have to paint something.'"

I think that there is a sort of telepathic communication between the audience and the filmmaker. In certain cases you find yourself taking what the filmmaker is doing on trust. You may not know why he should think it interesting to concentrate his camera on four square inches of bark on a tree for five minutes without flinching, but somehow there is something that creates confidence in you. You feel that he knows what he's doing even though you don't know what it is. It is very hard for me to explain to someone in such cases, even though it is my job to do so, why I like something. You come down to where you must say, "I don't know why I like it, I just like it."

Do you find your opinions about the same film changing over time?
There are bound to be changes over years. I felt that way rather with Antonioni's films. I don't like L'Avventura now as much as I did when I first saw it. It seems to me that the placing of that film in its time had a lot to do with my response to it. I haven't reversed completely on it; I don't think it's a terrible film but it seems to me a little faded. The reverse also happens.

One of the classical questions in cinema is that of the highly mysterious and elusive "theory of film criticism". How do you stand on that?

I think it emerges from a terrible surviving insecurity among people of the cinema and among those who write about it. We have just gotten past the stage where any serious consideration of cinema had to start by asserting very determinedly and aggressively that film was after all an art, no matter what anyone else said. I don't understand why people feel that we need a theory of film criticism. There is no prevalent theory of drama criticism but nobody complains very much about that.

When I think of Godard, Truffaut, or even Bogdanovich, who all started as film critics, I begin to feel that film critics are really frustrated filmmakers. Have you ever wanted to be a filmmaker rather than critic?

I suppose every film critic does nurture this sort of desire. I don't have any feelings that I 'ought' to be making films. I don't have any conviction of my own talent as a filmmaker but inevitably every now and then the idea arises if only in terms of, "Well, I couldn't do worse myself."

I have a slight feeling that I would be the kind of filmmaker that I don't particularly like or respond to. Every now and then I see a film which I don't like but I feel a sense of recognition. It's usually a film which is over-intellectual where the filmmaker has thought too much about how one makes films in the abstract rather than just making the film. I have a horrible suspicion that that's how I would be as a filmmaker.

I was very much surprised that the film critic for The Times likes horror films best.

Ah yes, perhaps it's a peculiar taste. Often, given my sympathies for horror films, musicals and rather strange 'way-out' films, rather than the solid 'success' films, I would sometimes take a sort of perverse pleasure in citing what I thought was the most interesting film of the week. I would take some little B-feature, write about in length and then say, "Oh yes, there is also this multi-million dollar film that just opened but I didn't bother."

1975: CANADIAN PUBLISHERS

The new Maclean's

The new bi-weekly Maclean's is a commercial success, if the amount of advertising in the first issue is any indication. Page after luscious page of ads opens Time's and Newsweek's latest competitor.

By my calculation, 56 per cent of the first issue is ads. Time generally keeps its advertising content below a half.

The important difference between Maclean's, now "Canada's Newsmagazine", and the other newsmagazines, of course, is Canadian content. Time appends a few pages of Canadian news to its U.S. edition and calls itself Time Canada.

The new Maclean's seems to parody this approach with a four page Canada section followed by three pages of "The World", subsuming American news. The news is marshalled into narrow columns studded with small pictures of talking heads — the blah grey and white layout we're familiar with from other newsmagazines.

Trouble is, I don't think the parody is intentional. Maclean's is seriously aping Time and Newsweek.

There's even a People page, for chrissake. Gossipy items about the rich and famous.

Yet in the midst of this imported journalism — four articles in the old Maclean's style.

The writers are familiar. Walter Stewart writes a funny critical piece and a just critical piece. Editor Peter C. plugs his latest book, "The Hatchet Lady". Marci McDonald leaves her hatchet behind this time to sob along with poor little rich Carole Taylor "who never learned to laugh... until she fell in love".

This is the meatiest section but its juxtaposition with American-style news reportage is jarring.

Maclean's as a newsmagazine is a compromise between going all out for international coverage and sticking to "the world through Canadian eyes." Maclean's can't report on the world as exhaustively as Time, but neither does it opt for covering world events only as they affect Canadians. Stories on Rockefeller and Gandhi, for example, don't mention Canada at all.

And that People section — My Canadian sensibilities are affronted by a John Diefenbaker anecdote next to gossip about the Duchess of Bedford's rapist-lover. A Straiford Festival item beside one on Hugh Hefner's Playboy mansion.

But I'm also thrilled. Canadian trivia is raised to the significance of American trivia! We've made it! (Wonder what Dief thinks?)

What bothers is not so much that Maclean's is changing — those confessional-type articles were wearing a bit thin — but that it has not tried to create a distinctive style. Perhaps a People page is inevitable, but the standards of Time and Newsweek and their style — names dropped in bold and celeb pics snappily-captioned — are not.

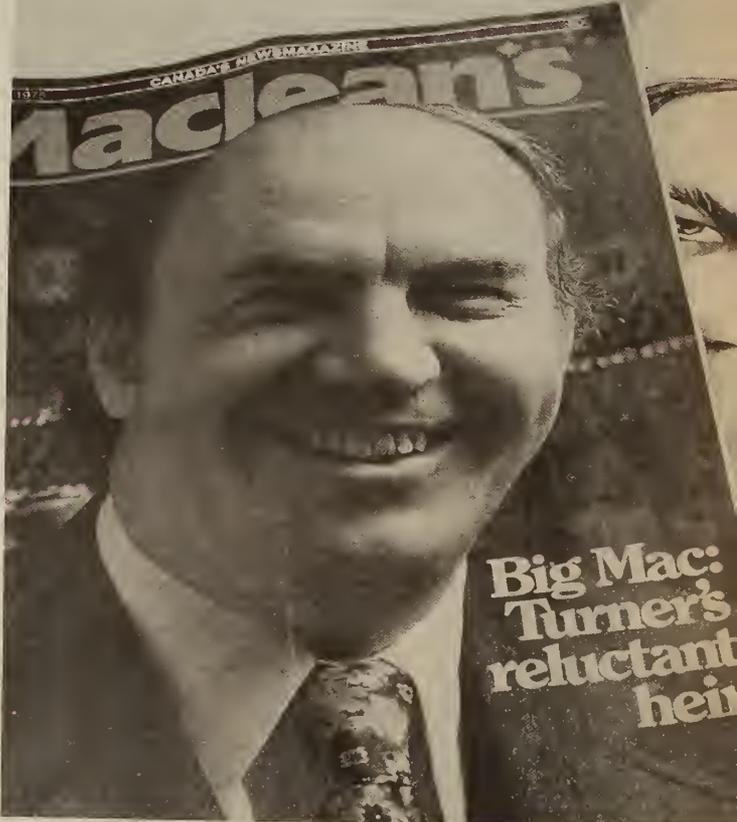

And why must news be laid out three uniform columns to a page? Maybe its blandness is what constitutes objective journalism. Just the facts. Personality sketches fenced off into boxes so you won't confuse them with the news.

Journalism with a face is still kicking in the cultural sections at the back of Maclean's. But even these have been reorganized into Time-like departments and layouts. Books and Films are no longer thematically-written essays but piecemeal reviews. The Books section ends with "Maclean's Best-seller List".

Maclean's first issue as a newsmagazine strives for the best of two worlds, instead of for a distinctively Canadian and unified approach. The second issue, out this week, should indicate whether Maclean's is interested in becoming a Timelessly Canadian newsmagazine.

That's one nice thing about the bi-weekly Maclean's. Until your old subscription runs out you'll be getting two issues for every one you paid for.

Canadian Tire points out the dialectical interplay of fun and necessity

Every Canadian who has a car, home, or leisure time will be glad to see the Fall and Winter 1975-76 Canadian Tire Catalogue, numerous copies of which have been considerably dropped into Metro mailboxes recently. Don't let its unobtrusive appearance fool you. Take the opportunity for a tour through its pages before consigning your copy to the recycling plant.

The reader's eye is first struck by the distinctive Canadian characteristics which grace many of the objects offered for sale. Consumers are thus allowed to savor the unique advantages of their renouncing none of the latest innovations in metropolitan technology. Consider, for example, the Van Wyck Electric Can Opener. Not only does it boast the "clean-automatic" feature, the magnetic lid lifter, the convenient cord storage in base. Near the bottom, just beneath the cheery vegetable-motif design, are printed the words "Ouvre la boîte", surely for the benefit of any befuddled Francophone who might come into possession of such an object.

This concern for our ethnic and cultural diversity is laudable. It is comforting to know that Albertans and Quebecers, Vancouverites and Nova Scotians, can use the same can opener equally, without fear or favour, as full partners in Confederation.

Nor does the company's perceptive reading of the Canadian collective persona stop here. Realizing the harsh fact that some are fated to munch more and some less of the national productive pie, Canadian Tire nonetheless makes it possible (as far as is within its power) for all to share in the fruits of their labour. No need to despair, then, if you can't start right at the top with, for instance, a CDE De Luxe Swivel-Top Canister Vac. There's still a "low-priced canister" to provide "power cleaning at a thrifty price", or (for the truly indigent) an "easy-to-store Elektribroom". Canadians of every socio-economic sector can be free of fear that their broadband will betray traces of undisciplined living.

Although the sections dealing with household wares and sporting goods have their undeniable attractions, the catalogue's reputation has always (and rightly so) been based on strength in hardware and automotive equipment.

The faithful reader will not be disappointed this year. Here also, here especially, there is unmatched variety. Sometimes, it seems, the copy-writers are carried away by the heady atmosphere. A tire, for example, is "devilish good-looking" and has "lasting beauty".

"Revitalize that poky engine", one page croons; "Your car deserves the best", another answers.

Amid the gimmickry and your choice of colour, however, some sections of the catalogue are presented tersely and informatively, without much fanfare. Many items are useful and necessary: replacement headlights, extra faucets for part-time plumbers, brake linings, screwdrivers, paint. They will be bought by people who, through necessity or choice, fix things themselves. The notion that someone is considering buying something for use in an independent and self-reliant way seems faintly subversive. If nothing else, the descriptions of do-it-yourself equipment point up the hysterical vacuity of the rest of the catalogue (what subway car ads for the ad industry solemnly call "information"). And it is encouraging to realize that there are large numbers of people who reject the passivity offered to consumers.

The discouraging fact is that this rejection can remain encompassed in an otherwise narrowly-defined set of possibilities. Self-reliance is all right on weekends. But the serious business of Monday to Friday is aptly served by the apparently more valuable abilities for subordination, repetition, and frustration.

Tubes mix professionalism with futile imitations

The Tubes
A+MSP 4354

The people responsible for this album would be best advised to forget all about it as quickly as possible and get started on another album to fulfill the potential that is suggested on this effort but not realized.

Top priority should be the development of a unique style. It is evident that these musicians are highly skilled professionals, but they seem satisfied imitating other bands under the guise of satire. This would be acceptable, except that the element most conspicuous in its absence from this album is intelligence. How much longer must we suffer with groups who harbour the misconception that all there is to good satire is the supposedly outrageous flaunting of the band's preference for unusual sexual practices?

But lest I give the impression that the album is totally without hope let me repeat: it is clear that the musicians know how to play, but the trouble is that most of the songs are imitations of other people. Mondo Bondage has guitar runs that sound exactly like parts of Schoof's Out, Boy Crazy has a lead vocal that mimics David Bowie, but most offensive of all is the extended monologue at the end of What Do You Want Out Of Life which is a bare-faced copy of the one that accompanies the Dental Hygiene Movie in Zappa's 200 Motels. It is here that the band's true aspirations are revealed and their final futility most evident. It's embarrassing to listen to.

Far be it from me to crush anyone's fantasy of being Frank Zappa. That's why The Tubes should bury all the copies of this album in their back yard or dump them in Frisco Bay. It's not very good. And what makes it worse is that they can obviously do better once they realize that they can't hide their lack of creativity under the catchword satire.

Manzanera makes music to sip creme de menthe by

Phil Manzanera, Diamond Head Island Records

Phil Manzanera used to be best known as the lead guitarist for Bryan Ferry's Roxy Music. That was before this album. Forever after he shall be known as an important artist in his own right. This album is proof positive that Roxy Music had a lot more going for it than Bryan Ferry's kinky vocals.

The whole album has an overall Latin flavour to it, but at the same time it contains a great deal of variety. The Big Day is a frenetic song with a nervous rhythm, the type which you can't get out of your head for weeks. The vocal is by ex-Roxy keyboard virtuoso Eno, and it is my guess that he also wrote the lyrics which display a dry humour that is his trademark. The song is a masterpiece and it alone would make the album worth buying. But there is much more. The album does not really start to fly until side two. The first song, Miss Shapiro is another one on which Eno is the dominant factor, and it descends on the listener's ears like a plague of locusts. But once it is over the mood of the album changes drastically as the real Manzanera emerges. The music is highly synthesized and electric, but unlike Yes or Rick Wakeman who produce music that would also have to be similarly described, Manzanera's music aims at painting pictures of peace and serenity. The words on The Big Day talk about running off to Peru where the natives have "lengthened the day" and "strengthened the dollar". Listening to this album it is possible to imagine sitting on a porch overlooking the Pacific, watching the sunset while sipping creme de menthe.

Jimmy Cliff gives reggae fans what they really wanted

Tuesday night Jimmy Cliff and the Jamaican Experience showed a large Massey Hall audience what Reggae music is all about, and that includes getting what you really want, getting what you really want, and getting what you really want, not necessarily in that order.

The people came to hear the hits, and Jimmy obliged. In this respect he is not unlike any other AM star in that he has a large back-log of bit records and the concerts are dutiful reproductions of these, with a little bit of arrangement thrown in to liven things up. Of course what sets Jimmy Cliff apart from most other popular artists is the quality of his music. If you've never heard The Harder They Come or You Can Get It If You Really Want, they are songs with a compelling beat and sweet melodies. It makes you want to dance but unlike Disco music it is equally good to just listen to.

On Tuesday night the band was tight, Jimmy was in good voice, and the audience was very receptive, bringing Jimmy back for two encores. On stage he is a dynamic figure and almost always the centre of attention. The almost refers to the odd time somebody's five year old daughter felt inclined to wander out from backstage to dance next to Jimmy and join in on the odd chorus. Only then was the full attention of the audience not on Jimmy.

The concert had that kind of good-time, family and friends feel about it, a feel that engulfed the performers and the audience. If Jimmy Cliff decides to come to Toronto more often I'm sure nobody who was in the audience will object.

Whimsy, fluidity, and ritual from Burmese National Theatre

Thursday night (Oct.9) was the premiere North American performance of the Burmese National Theatre. The seven performers demonstrated a very ancient classical form of dance. Each dancer's angular movements were contained within their own biosphere maintaining a low centre of gravity. They were able to produce extreme flexibility in their joints. Continual hyperextension of the hands and eversion of the feet were used to mark time. This allowed their designs and gestures to appear highly stylized.

What is most striking is their fluidity, in movement, of whole body even in deep bending. There is an old saying among Burmese dancers that "when a human dancer dances he must be like a puppet, and when the puppet dances he must be like a human dancer." The dancers most certainly appeared puppet-like.

The second half of the performance proved more exciting when the males donned masks and the costumes became more elaborate and colourful. The dancers then dramatized tales which appeared quite whimsical.

The seven musicians remained on stage during the whole performance. Their oriental sound from drums, gongs, cymbals and horn seemed redundant. The ritualistic sound became more creative in their solo pieces at the close of the performance with jazz modes and an actual melody. The dancers and musicians displayed their commitment to their art and to themselves as an integral unit.

Layton appeals to the appreciative child in us

Irving Layton
McClelland and Stewart, $4.95

Here are two quotations, to see what you make of them

"a poet shouting love as if it were a bomb" and

"the bad poets of this century laying their heads like kebabs between a woman's thighs".

It means that Irving Layton is bombastic for he is a poet and here are some new poems, reasonably.

Perhaps his words are explosive, at least he wishes them to be, saying "don't be a waffling poet; let each word you write be direct and honest like a crack of a gun" but is his penguin loaded with shells instead of blanks? I think so, reasonably.

Here are selections from his last five books of poetry which he probably and loosely defines as the art of being intense and affectionate about most things from poop to ruts.

There is imagery of Greece, the orient, the Cabbagetoown and lots of making love, which is not so much a receptacle of images as an image itself for the force that Layton lavishes on life — the obligatory thrusts into the womb of things that prose can't quite make out. To tell the truth I've never liked Layton, being more threatened than pleased to think that "my wife's daily kiss turns me inexplicably into vapour or a black cloud" but Eliot would have said it sadly, seriously, and Layton doesn't. He says such things vitally.

A staring contest with the bard of Downsview Isn't something to be entered into lightly.

So I still don't like Layton but I prefer him to a lethargic inarticulate mess. And, yes, these poems are good, badly good; I don't want to see the diseased phalli of which he writes. But I do want to see his images of them.

It's curiosity that does it, the sentiment that appeals to the appreciative child in us, the one who can get a bit of a jolt at subtle sudden connections and recognitions.

There is a poem called "Fishermen" that suggests that the business of poets is to administer to the soul-sick, and children are never soul-sick, so to be diminished into youth by Layton is salutary.

But to go on would be to subject the book to searching analysis which seldom finds anything and suits Layton not at all, Layton whom I don't like but appreciate. Which is to like this book, reasonably.

Layton is simply himself, The Unwavering I.

All the Livelong Day:
The Meaning and Demeaning of Routine Work
Barbara Garson
Doubleday, $9.25

"To live is the rarest thing in the world. Most people exist, that is all," said the immortal Oscar Wilde. Barbara Garson's All the Livelong Day makes a very similar point — the mechanization and routinization of today's world is changing people into machines.

The book is an eye-opener as if expressly designed for us fortunate who won't have to skin fish in a tuna-fish factory or pile ping-pong bats in racks of fifty from dawn till dusk.

Barbara Garson spent several years talking to people working in factories, doing their repetitious movements, taking some of the jobs herself to answer the question "How do these people keep from going crazy?" The answer is poignantly tragic. They play little games with themselves such as doing the job with their eyes closed, priding themselves on the fact that the foreman cannot tell the difference. They do petty sabotage such as scratching the paint on the hood of the Vega going past at the rate of one every thirty-six seconds. The typists try to get a musical syncopated rhythm going, or have little undeclared competitions among themselves.

The overwhelming feeling that this creates in the workers is one of resentment. When asked "How do you manage to keep doing it all day?", a worker answered "It's easy. You just blank your mind." But surely there is something wrong with a system in which people can survive only by blanking their minds. 1984 isn't here yet.

Garson's is a strong indictment of the working conditions which apparently prevail everywhere. They must, she concludes, be humanized so that people see some purpose in doing their set of motions, some result at the end of their daily toil, something to strive for. Industry must be reorganized so that each worker plays a significant role in turning out a fine product without enduring degrading supervision. And the only way she can see of this happening is with worker's control — a socialist state.

Work, she says, is a human need following right after the need for food and the need for love. For most people it is hard and uncomfortable to do a bad job. The need must be satisfied without forcing the worker into doing that bad job. The attitude "If they're gonna give me a robot's job to do, I'm gonna do it like a robot," must be overcome by making the work more than a robot's job.

Garson's point is well-argued. She proves by example, and the examples are well-chosen. She clearly feels strongly on the subject yet she never loses her journalist's perspective. Her prose is lucid, concise, a pleasure to read. The people she interviews all come across as people, warm human beings — the reader is thus filled with indignation at them being turned into robots. They do not, however, seem to have been manipulated by the author to suit her purposes. Although her conclusion can be questioned (and is by me), her arguments do seem to validate it. Altogether, the book would be valuable to anyone interested in the working conditions in the "real world". Barbara Garson, a job well done!

It sounds incredible but . . . most EVELYN WOOD graduates can . . .

devour a book like "JAWS" IN LESS THAN 61 MINUTES (and wouldn't bother going to see the movie)

At that speed the 309 pages come across with EVEN MORE impact than the movie — in living blood you might say and, as usual the book is better!

You can do it too. So far almost a million students, educators, public servants, businessmen, doctors, engineers, nurses, even aquanauts have completed this remarkable course.

A learning skills course developed by Prof. Evelyn Wood, a prominent U.S. educator, for people submerged in reading matter. Practically all learned to get out of the deep water by tripling their reading capacity and increasing their comprehension.

Think for a moment what this means. All of them, even the slowest, can now read an average length novel in less time than it takes to see the movie. They can read an entire issue of Time or The Varsity or Toka Ojka or National Lampoon or Saturday Night in less than half an hour. They don't have to skim or skip to save time.

They read every word on every page. They get their teeth right into the story. They use no machines or gimmicks or electronic devices. Instead they let the material they're studying determine how fast they read.

They attack the storyline and don't put it down until they're finished the whole thing. And mark this well! They actually understand more, enjoy more, and REMEMBER more. That's right. MORE ENJOYMENT, MORE RETENTION, MORE COMPREHENSION, through MORE CONCENTRATION—the key to learning.

You can learn to do the same thing. The only place to learn more about all this is at a READING BOOSTER PRODUCTIVITY SEMINAR — A Free 61 Minute Preview.

This is a modern updated Canadian version of the course President Kennedy had his Joint Chiefs of Staff take. The same course we taught last year in the offices of the Department of External Affairs and the Ministry of Trade and Commerce in Ottawa.

If you think this is just another flimsy story, yet find it hard to keep your head above water, because your associates are trying to drown you out with paper, drop in today for a full exposure.

BOOST YOUR READING PRODUCTIVITY AND ENJOYMENT AT A FREE PREVIEW LESSON. (With absolutely no obligation of course.) To reserve a seat or two just choose the most convenient time, bring a friend and appear on time. For more information call our Toronto number 489-5340

Golden oldie Hippolytos gives relief from modern anemia

Euripides' Hippolytos currently running at the Firehall Theatre, offers us a chance to enjoy a thrilling episode in theatre history, a chance that should be exploited. The unflinching attitude of the play toward its barrowing subject (after 2000 years of Mother Macree our ears still burn), the captivating thrust of its poetry, and the sustained drive of the drama, make the current vogue of the screen sex and violence look pale and puking, and the gestures of our Woody Allens simply so many nervous twitches.

As a note reminds us, "the play is named after a man, Hippolytos, but the true protagonist is Phaedra, a woman of passion who must struggle against her own nature or be damned". Phaedra wrestles to the death with an over-whelming sexual desire for her step-son, Hippolytos. With the exuberant arrogance of his virtue, Hippolytos savagely repulses Phaedra and the ecstatic demands of her sexual desire find no hope of requital. In despair Phaedra hangs herself after treacherously accusing Hippolytos of rape. Explicit motive for Phaedra's demonic passion is passed off as Aphrodite's will to work revenge against the arrogance of the chaste Hippolytos.

This production of Hippolytos by the Firehall Theatre Group under the direction of Juliana Saxton follows the translation of Robert Bagg. Bagg avoids an arrangement of halting end-line rhymes and forsakes the requirements of iambic pentameter.

For the most part Saxton's production is tight and sustained, yet on occasion grows slack when it retreats from the demands of spectacular emotion and elevated language into the shrugging and shuffling attitudes of realism. A more pronounced stylization both in oratory and movement could have invigorated the production. Still Phyllis Benvenuto, as Phaedra was stunning. Michael Kopsa's Hippolytos pitted against Dominic Hogan's Theseus provided a masterful study of the violent tensions confronting father and son. For special effects the production showed all aces. The final scene in which the blood-soaked body of Hippolytos lies in his father's grief stricken arms while the light dying dwindles into shadow, is in itself a masterpiece.

Sharp satire, energetic acting attack stereotypes of women

The speed of the vignettes was reminiscent of Laugh-In. But the humor, based probably on real experiences and deep convictions of Suzette Couture, Marcella Lustig, and Jacqueline Swartz, was a more cutting experience and more cutting because of being seen from the inside. These three created and performed in the Redlight Theatre's production of "10,000 Hellcats in Deepfreeze" a comic look at "stereotypes of women in the media", an offering of the Harbourfront theatre section. The significance of their presentation goes beyond the artistic merits of the actual production, which were many. It reaffirmed some principles of theatre that were raised in the early 1970's by the small theatre movement in Toronto and are subsequently being somewhat obscured by the successes of these theatres. It emphasized how stimulating and entertaining theatre can be when it is seen as a social force. Not just as an area for abstract experimentation, but as a forum for presenting concrete ideas experimentally. Elaborate props were not needed, just three orange chairs, a weaving by Willie Mazereeuw, a functional wardrobe, and infinitely expressive actions and voices of the performers.

Many images, conventions and people were the focus of their satire. Tennessee Williams, Gloria Steinem, Bob Dylan, doctors, psychiatrists, movies, talk shows and Mrs. Randolph Kears were among those that did not escape. A house-wife visiting a psychiatrist who analyzed her physical illness as fantasy is summed up by the biting lines, "Isn't it wonderful that science can help us with our problems. Yes, isn't it wonderful that science can tell us what our problems are." Country and Western songs got a justified jab in a very honestly sung ballad, "Step on me. You know it excites me." And then there was the southern gentlewoman teaching a course in "fascinating servitude" to housewives who are told to remember the motto, "Let him wear the pants, if you can wear the diamonds".

However, some skits fell flat. They were also the ones that could have been the most challenging to the complacency of some people's attitudes towards women's liberation.

Both the Doctor skit and the Big Sister-1984-McCarthyite-courtroom drama dealt with very serious political and social questions. But the treatment was half-way between satire and farce, missing both the impact and insight of satire and the slap-stick relief of farce. This created a tension between the pressure to laugh at an almost comic situation and the impact of the social tensions.

Tension was secondary to enjoyment and laughter — and it is significant that this was accomplished using topics that are both serious and already often repeated. It marks well the future of Redlight Theatre and Marcella Lustig, Jacqueline Swartz and Suzette Couture.

Boyd Neil

Theseus (Dominic Hogan) and Hippolytos (Michael Kopsa) in Firehall Theatre's production of "hippolytos".

Historical drama suffers from ineffectual script

For many the war is something only to be read about in history books or to be seen in old newsreel footage and for even more the name of the Dame of Sark means nothing at all. It concerns the moving tale of the late Sybil Hathaway who virtually became the queen of that particular channel island by singlehandedly holding together her home and subjects by treating the occupying German forces just like the ordinary tourist. Given this promising material to work with one might think that its dramatic presentation would have been as heroic as the deed itself but the final result has been considerably weakened by an ineffectual playwright, William Douglas Home.

The human relationships that mark this episode of history so strongly are left weakly undeveloped. In fact, the entire play is so schematic that the inherent danger which faced the little island of Sark between 1940 and 1945 is all but lost in sickly sentimentality. Consequently, what could have been a dazzling theatrical experience becomes a very thin blooded evening in the unsuitable caverns of the O'Keefe Centre. However, the entire production is uniformly solid and the performances are especially admirable under the circumstances.

Dame Anna Neagle engraves such a strong picture as Sybil Hathaway that she too is successful in saving the day. Her brave smile and the gentle quiver in her voice breathe life into a character which the playwright has, for the most part, left flat. Dame Anna is one of that dying breed of great troopers for she shines through with the same toughness which that other Dame utilized during the difficult war years.

Moreover, Alan Gifford who plays the Dame's American husband and Nicholas Courtney who portrays the doubting Nazi officer, Colonel von Schmettau both successfully establish sympathy for their very plastic roles. Even the small part of Wilhelm Muller, a young German soldier who confides in the Dame and is later killed by an undiscovered mine, as played by Ian Liston is filled with a genuine warmth which is not to be found in the text itself.

Anthony Hollandis' set is beautifully developed and the director, Charles Hickman, fills it as best he can. But what a shame that William Douglas Home has had to turn so much into so little.

Costa-Gravras depicts repression; obscures the nature of the state

The arrival of a new film by Costa-Gravras, the director of Z and State of Siege, is always greeted with a degree of anticipation which greatly transcends the normal response granted the opening of a film; his films seem to assume the status of a political event in themselves.

Costa-Gravras has a genius for uncovering actual historical events which, translated through the medium of film, illuminate entire historical periods and movements; and his latest film, Special Section, is no exception.

For Costa-Gravras, unlike so many others, social and political struggles do not appear simply as a backdrop for the unfolding of the private strivings of a particular individual.

This is not to say that he is insensitive to the suffering and emotions of concrete human beings, quite the contrary, as he fashions from the detail of specific human qualities, a gesture of affection, a nervous tic of a judge or general indicating profound shame, a face drawn with lines of dignity, to actually define and capture the nature of the events portrayed.

Other filmmakers have attempted to employ these same norms of film art, essentially moulded in Soviet cinema, like Godard's idiotic Tout Va Bien, but very few are able to directly pose questions of state power and its attendant repressive and ideological structures with such political maturity and artistic ease.

One might trace the development of Costa-Gravras from his disappointing, rather anti-communist The Confession, through the totally absorbing though journalistic Z, through the politically brilliant State of Siege which exposes possible positions of vulnerability within the State by interrogating in a hammer-like style the political strategies of both terrorism and of parliament as a platform of political struggle, and now to Special Section which ushers us directly into the inter-workings of a judicial system attempting to maintain, at least, the facade of legality.

Special Section relentlessly probes this formally democratic institution which is decomposing under the pressure of historical contradictions and Fascist terror of the Vichy France of 1941.

The film opens with scenes of a classical Russian opera which become literally overwhelmed by the words of Marshall Petain who declares that the time has come to smash all resistance, particularly that of the Communist Party; "Democracy is dead."

As the audience, made up of the Vichy ruling class, leaves the theatre, comments are randomly overheard which expose the nature of the Fascist mentality. Even classical Russian opera is deformed to fit the requirements of an anti-communism which sees workers as the ignorant tools of the barbarian Soviet Union and, then, reduces them to simply "the scum of the earth."

The Vichy government begins the crack-down: a Jew (Tyszelman) and a Communist (Gauterot) are executed; we then sit in on the agony of the Communist Party as its people reach the terribly painful decision to declare total war on the occupying German troops, despite the fact that they are "working-class and are anti-fascist."

The day that "l'Humanite", the Party's underground paper, announces that "twenty German officers will be executed to avenge the deaths of Gauterot and Tyszelman," a German naval officer is shot dead in a subway station.

The Nazis demand immediate retribution; and the Vichy regime responds by passing a series of retroactive laws which, of course, represent a complete break with all French legal tradition but allows the repressive apparatus the needed flexibility to "persecute anyone, at any time, for any reason."

Eventually most of these old and inform men, seen mostly in a steam-room pampering their flaccid bodies, cynically succumb to absurd rationalizations and are subdued without real resistance.

So far so good, but at this point Costa-Gravras' intention to depict the "Totalitarian State" in universal terms radically blurs the investigation of the racial and class nature of a specific fascist state, Vichy France.

In this light, the most obvious symbols which Costa-Gravras employs to convey his message of the "Totalitarian State" become severely undermined by this tension between the general and the specific. For instance, the choice of those who are to die is arbitrarily and randomly made by picking prison files from a large cabinet; and the confusion and fear of the men caught up in this seemingly Kafka-like situation, is beautifully captured.

But the choice is only apparently random. This particular cabinet happens to contain only the files of political prisoners, Jews and Communists; people in general are not chosen to die but two Jews and four Communists, all of whom are workers.

Such situations must be understood solely in racial, social, and political terms and can hardly be considered irrational or absurd.

Happily, the marvellous dramatic instinct of Costa-Gravras, shown so clearly in the brilliant trial scenes, does allow the true nature of the conflict to emerge. The men on trial never bend to the pressure of "the State" but with magnificent dignity and courage affirm their beliefs and convictions. Simultaneously, they offer a profoundly opposing image to the morally corrupt judges.

Particularly electric is the trial of a former editor of "l'Humanite", a man with a tough and worn face which alone speaks eloquently of the struggle, who turns his trial into a trial of his accusers and the vicious reality which they represent; and with an uncompromising purity of hatred and determination, he denounces his enemies' right to even a guilty conscience.

But Costa-Gravras, unfortunately, does not give free expression to this vision, offering instead vague imagery which suggests some universal relation of "the State" and "Justice" for example, when he focuses upon the mechanical, emotionless reasoning employed in the construction of the guillotine to represent the cold and calculating logic of "the State".

Compare this to the potential for dramatic action inherent in the actual historical execution as described by Guillaume Hanoteau (a lawyer for one of the accused) "... that horrible night when Guyot was tortured like the lowest of civil offenders, I had more than the feeling of being witness to murder based on class discrimination.

"Bound hand and foot, rendered cripple with shackles and fetters, his neck alone made free for the blade of the guillotine, Guyot asked me to forgive him for having made me attend this cruel spectacle.

"A humble worker from Colombes, tireless militant who nonetheless held only a modest position in the hierarchy of his party ... he died without complaint, offering his life for France and for his communist ideal."

It is a great pity that Costa-Gravras did not turn his formidable powers of description to the consistent production of scenes of humble working class men resisting with tremendous humanity and dignity the violence and madness which are the product not of "the State" but of fascism.

Recommendation flawed but occasionally disturbing

Murray Markowitz's new film Recommendation for Mercy is loosely based on the Steven Truscott rape-murder case in which a fourteen year old boy was sentenced to hang. The Federal cabinet commuted the sentence to life imprisonment and after ten years Truscott was freed and is currently living under an assumed name.

Truscott's insistent claim to innocence led to Isabel Lebourdais' 1966 book, The Trial of Steven Truscott, in which she condemns the courts for their travesty of justice, thereby defending Truscott.

The notoriety of this legal faux pas has been brought out of the closet again in the form of a CHUM interview with Truscott just weeks after the cinematic premiere of Recommendation. Truscott
