What is Connexions?

Connexions is a non-profit organization providing information and services for activist, voluntary, and non-profit groups, and for all those seeking reliable and up-to-date information about issues of social concern.

Connexions works to build links between people who are striving to create positive solutions to critical social, environmental, economic, and international problems. Simultaneously, Connexions endeavours to make the ideas, goals, organizations and publications of the movement for change and alternatives better known and more accessible to the general public.

Acknowledgements

Connexions is a collective endeavour to which many people have contributed time, money, energy, and ideas. The Connexions Annual in particular represents the accumulated work of hundreds of individuals and organizations who have helped by submitting and compiling information, doing research, doing data entry and office work, and much else.

It would be impossible to mention all those who have contributed in one way or another, but special thanks should go to Chris Defreitas, whose computer wizardry made the task of managing the database a relative breeze, and to Barrie Zwicker and associates at Sources, who provided support without which this project would never have gotten off the ground; as well as to Karl Amdur, Paul McKenna, Lois Enns, Elizabeth Wall, Darlene Fleming, Guylaine Spencer, Peter Binkley, Eric Mills, Andrew Waldie, and the late Elgin Blair. The cover is based on a design by Ted Dymont of Blackbird Design. The Connexions logo was designed by Dale Atkinson of Kai Visionworks. Desktop production was by AlterLinks.

HOW TO GET THE MOST OUT OF THIS BOOK

IS THIS BOOK FOR YOU?

The Connexions Annual is for people who are looking for information and ideas about social and environmental alternatives.

The groups and individuals found in this book believe that change is both necessary and possible. This makes the pages of the Annual a gateway to vigorous grassroots movements of ordinary people who believe that there are viable alternatives to destructive and exploitative institutions and structures – and who are actively working to bring those alternatives into being.

The Annual is designed both for those already actively working for change, and for those who want to become involved. Its pages are crowded with information about groups and resources across Canada: names, addresses, and phone numbers, details of groups' activities, the resources and services they offer, their goals, how to join them.

If you are new to social change activity, you may wish to browse through the entries to get an idea of the variety of groups, and approaches to change, which exist. Or you may want to look in the Geographical Index (P. 177) to find organizations in your own area. The groups' statements of purpose may be particularly helpful in finding ones whose focus or approach appeals to you.

If you are already involved in a group, you may be looking for organizations in other parts of the country which share your concerns, or groups in your area which are potential partners or allies. (If you intend to send a mailing to a sizable number of such groups, Connexions can provide you with mailing labels or computer disks to make your task easier.)

If you are a reporter, or a student, or a researcher, looking for information or experts or spokespeople on a particular issue, the Subject Index (P. 187) is your best starting point. If you are investigating a broad topic, such as Human Rights or Environment, you may want to turn directly to that chapter and browse.

WHAT THIS BOOK CONTAINS

The main part of this Annual – some 1,800 numbered entries in 15 chapters – consists of information about organizations and periodicals. We mailed a questionnaire to groups across the country, requesting factual data, as well as information about activities and goals. The information they provided is presented in an easy-to-read standard format.

The Table of Contents (P. 3) is your quick guide to what is in this book. It shows the chapters into which the Annual has been divided. The chapter headings are broad subject areas such as Peace, Women, or Human Rights/Civil Liberties. (The "Social Justice: General" chapter contains groups which deal with a wide range of issues, as well as groups whose focus didn't fit comfortably under any other heading.)

There are separate chapters for Alternative Periodicals, Other Organizations of Interest, and a Resource and Reading List. In addition, there are three indices to help you find particular organizations or types of organizations: the Name Index, the Geographical Index, and the Subject Index.

LOOKING FOR A PARTICULAR GROUP?

Look in the Name Index (P. 162), which lists all the groups and publications in alphabetical order. Use the entry number to find the group in the main listings. Bear in mind that organizations may have listed themselves under a name different from the one you are looking for. For example, Metis Society of Saskatchewan vs. Saskatchewan Metis Society, or Ploughshares Sudbury, Project Ploughshares Calgary, and Saint John Project Ploughshares. As much as possible, we have tried to cross-list groups under alternative names and acronyms, but undoubtedly there are instances where we couldn't anticipate possible confusion. Persevere.

INTERESTED IN A PARTICULAR ISSUE?

Start off by selecting the chapter which covers the topic, e.g. Peace or Development/International. Browse through the chapter to find particular groups or types of groups. If you are interested in a more specific topic, e.g. Central America, or Military: Canadian, look for the relevant keyword in the Subject Index (P. 187), which will guide you to the groups which selected that keyword. You can also use the Subject Index to identify organizations which are concerned with your subject, but which are listed in another chapter. For example, a group which is found in the Environment chapter because it deals primarily with environmental problems may also be doing educational work on nuclear weapons or Third World development.

Many people have told us that the more they become involved in an issue, the more they find that it is interrelated with many other questions. This truth makes any attempt to categorize by subject, as we have done in our chapter headings, somewhat arbitrary. We have used the chapter headings because information would have been too hard to find without them – but please view them as approximations, not as rigid divisions.

LOOKING FOR GROUPS IN YOUR AREA?

The Geographical Index (P. 177) is organized by province or territory, with the provinces listed alphabetically, and with the names of individual towns listed alphabetically underneath each province's name. Following the name of the town is an alphabetical list of the names of the organizations located there. Use the entry number to find the group in the main listings. Remember, though, that many groups are regional or national in their focus. For example, an organization whose office is in Victoria may have members across British Columbia.

LOOKING FOR PERIODICALS?

Periodicals (magazines, newsletters, newspapers, journals) dealing with a particular issue are included in the appropriate chapter. For example, Peace Magazine is found in the Peace chapter. In addition, there is a separate Alternative Periodicals chapter (P. 135) which lists all periodicals in alphabetical order. Publications which are included in the main listings appear in this chapter as well.

FINDING OTHER SOURCES OF INFORMATION

The Resource and Reading List (P. 157) gives a selection of resources – books, directories, videos, etc. – which have additional information about grassroots organizations, publications, issues, ideas, and strategies.

DO YOU NEED THIS INFORMATION ON COMPUTER DISKS OR MAILING LABELS?

All of the information in this Annual, including the periodicals list, is available on computer disks or on mailing labels. Connexions also maintains a larger computer data base of several thousand groups, associations, libraries, and individuals. We can make these lists, selected by subject or by geographical location, available to your group at a lower cost than if you paid someone to re-type the listings. Our low-cost rentals of these lists also helps us to cover the costs of updating and publishing this information. Contact Connexions at (416)537-3949.

DO YOU NEED EXTRA COPIES?

If you need extra copies of this book, please let us know. Reduced rates are available for groups which need larger quantities of the Annual. (You may wish to consider acquiring a quantity for use as an educational resource for conferences and seminars, or to distribute to members of your network or organization.)

WHO IS INCLUDED?

Our aim in compiling this Annual was to include organizations which are "grassroots", democratically controlled, non-profit, and independent of government. The questionnaire we sent out asked groups to respond if their "primary purpose is to work for social and economic justice, environmental responsibility, democracy, civil liberties, or the creation and preservation of community". Like most definitions, these distinctions, general to begin with, blur at the edges. Undoubtedly we have included some groups which don't really fit these definitions, and left out others which should be in. (However, if a group is not included, the most likely explanations are that we didn't know about them or that they didn't return their questionnaire.) We welcome your comments about what is in – or not in – this book.

WANT TO BE INCLUDED IN THE NEXT ANNUAL?

If you're included in this issue, you'll automatically get a questionnaire for the next one (unless you've moved, in which case please send us your change of address right away). If you are not included and feel you should be, please photocopy the questionnaire on page 219, fill it in, and send it to Connexions, P.O. Box 158, Station D, Toronto M6P 3J8. We also appreciate your informing us about other groups we ought to include, so we can send them a questionnaire. Please help us make the Annual as complete, comprehensive, and useful as possible.

OTHER THINGS YOU MIGHT WANT TO KNOW

Quebec/French Canada: The Annual is primarily a listing of English-language groups. We did not have the resources to make our questionnaires and other materials available in French. We have included information from French-language groups wherever we could, but we realize that our coverage is far from adequate.

Other languages and cultural groups: While we have tried to obtain information from minority groups and groups whose first language is not English, we are aware that our coverage is far from comprehensive. We welcome any help in improving this aspect of the Annual, as well as improving the coverage of underrepresented regions.

Mistakes and Inconsistencies: Inevitably in a book like this there will be mistakes and information that is incomplete or no longer up to date. With thousands of listings to keep track of, we absolutely rely on readers to tell us if they know of corrections or additions which need to be made. Please tell us if you know of any.

We know that there are inconsistencies in the way groups were assigned to a particular chapter. One group may be listed in the Peace chapter, another similar group in the Environment chapter, a third under Development/International. We asked groups to tell us what their primary focus was, and for the most part we allowed groups' own choices to determine where they appear, even where this created inconsistencies, because we know that groups which may seem the same to us may view themselves in different ways. As a reader, you should keep this in mind and search creatively if you are looking for particular types of groups. Use the indices and look in related chapters.

WHO PAYS FOR THIS?

Connexions is well and truly a non-profit organization, running, as one person put it, not merely on a shoestring, but on a "ragged shoestring". Our income comes from sales of our publications, from ads, from sales of mailing lists and related services, and, importantly, from individuals and groups who become members of Connexions. If you or your group want to support Connexions' work by becoming members of Connexions, please see the membership information elsewhere in this book.

FUTURE PLANS AND PUBLICATIONS

As most of our customers and subscribers will know, lack of funds forced the Connexions project into a state of suspended animation in March of 1992. This Annual is the first publication Connexions has produced since that date. Connexions has now entered into an association with sources, the excellent Canadian directory for editors, reporters, and researchers, which should give Connexions a measure of stability which it has lacked in the past while allowing it to retain its independence. Plans for future joint projects are now being made, including another edition of the Annual to be published in 1995.

When Connexions suspended publication in 1992, subscribers were left in the lurch with issues owing to them. We are now in a position to honour those delayed obligations. All subscribers will be receiving the issues they paid for: unfortunately it will have taken a lot longer than anticipated! Our apologies to those who were kept waiting. The wait for the next edition should be a lot less – touch wood! In the meantime, let us know your reactions to this book.

INTRODUCTION

A coal miner who took part in the wave of strikes which shook the former Soviet Union summed up the problems facing his local strike committee as follows: "We have to answer two simple questions: 'How are we going to live?' and 'What do we do now?'"

Those are questions we all have to answer. We live in a world in crisis. Governments, corporations, and institutions assure us they have everything under control, and that better times are just around the corner, but all around us we see poverty, violence, injustice, environmental disasters, and wars.

For more than a decade, they have imposed a new-right agenda on our societies, telling us we have no choice but to adapt to a "new world order" based on "free markets" and privatization. Instead of experiencing the promised benefits, however, most of us find ourselves worse off, economically, socially, and spiritually.

Most of us are not living the lives we would choose to live, but the existing order insists there are no alternatives to itself, and most of us are sufficiently convinced or pre-occupied or discouraged to keep society from coming unglued. Many, many people wish there were alternatives, or think there ought to be, but are resigned to the conclusion that it is utopian to entertain any hopes for real change. The 'system' is too big, too powerful, and we are too weak and too few in numbers.

'What do we do now?' 'How do we live?' All too often, we mind our own problems and don't think about the rest.

Yet despite the pervasive feeling that 'nothing can be done', people do join together to act in common when they feel threatened or wronged, or when they have a goal in sight which they desire passionately enough. Sometimes they organize quietly and gradually. At other times a mass movement explodes into being, seemingly out of nothing, despite the risks and the odds.

This Annual is dedicated to the idea that change is both necessary and possible. Its main intent is practical: to provide information about groups across Canada who are working at society's grassroots to create positive solutions to social, environmental, economic, and international problems.

We hope that by providing this information we will be making it easier for those already active to find out about and contact each other and to do their work more effectively and co-operatively. We hope that those individuals who are thinking about or looking for ways to become active will be able to use the information to find like-minded people to work with.

We hope, too, that this book will help to get out the message that there are viable alternatives to destructive and exploitative institutions and structures, and that there are people organizing to build those alternatives.

It is also a goal of this Annual to stimulate thinking about how we can work more effectively together toward our mutual goals, and how we can reach out to broaden our movements. If we can learn to do this well enough, we have the potential to create a much more powerful social movement, not only national but international in its scope, one that goes beyond single-issue organizing to work toward an integrated vision of a more just and caring world.

This does not necessarily mean that individual groups should be dissolving themselves into a large movement. But often the best thing we can do to help ourselves is to help someone else. By offering and extending solidarity to others, we establish bonds between us that give us strength too. Feelings and actions of solidarity can be a fruitful source of understanding, trust, and power, and that power is something that we too can draw on too.

Empowerment is a critical dimension of the process of change. We are seeking the power to create alternatives, and simultaneously we are seeking to dissolve the power structures that prevent us from doing so. We hope that this Annual will help to empower those working to create the alternatives.

ARTS, MEDIA, CULTURE

The established wisdom has it that the media are neutral purveyors of news and entertainment, while the arts are about individual creativity and cultural values untainted by the vulgar concerns of politics and economics.

However, the experience of those outside the cultural mainstream is rather different. There, it becomes apparent that the arts and the media do reflect the biases and distortions of the wider society.

Working class people, women, people of colour, Native people, lesbians and gays, find that their lives and experiences are distorted or ignored, their voices too frequently unheard. Artists with an alternative vision have great difficulty penetrating the deadening homogeneity of the commercial arts marketplace. Those critical of the status quo have little access to the mass media. In every sphere – television, film, radio, the record industry, publishing – a few giants in the media and the cultural ‘industries’ are almost totally dominant. The saying “freedom of the press belongs to those who own one” reflects the reality well, and not only where newspapers are concerned.

The situation might be compared to a huge sports stadium. Everybody is free to have their say – so the dominant ideology claims – but the established system owns and controls the loudspeakers, the video screens, the action on the field, the rules of the game, and the stadium itself, while we, the people in the stands, have only our unamplified voices with which to make ourselves heard. Not exactly a “level playing field”.

And then, what happens if we decide that we don’t want the game at all, let alone the existing rules? What do we do if we decide that we don’t want to sit in a stadium, subjected to loudspeakers, watching someone else’s game? What if we want to transform the stadium into a park and talk to each other and play our own games instead of watching?

The groups in this chapter are responding to such questions.

Some of them are challenging the cultural and media establishments to make them become more representative and more honest. Others are fighting for Canadian cultural survival in the face of market pressures and government legislation that threaten Canadian magazines, the CBC, and other cultural industries.

Many others have taken the route of creating their own alternatives. Here you will find alternative radio stations, magazines, theatre groups, book publishers, filmmakers and distributors giving voice to points of view that challenge the dominant culture. There are groups devoted to creating space for women, blacks, Native peoples and others who have little access to the mainstream. Groups are making use of the arts to stimulate people’s imaginations so they can see the world in a new way and explore ways of changing it. New forms and new approaches to art are being developed and experimented with. Groups of artists are using the arts to create new bridges of trust between themselves and the communities where they live, and in so doing are helping to create alternatives that give voice to the experiences of ordinary working people.

COMMUNITY, URBAN, HOUSING

When humans have lived, worked, and played in community groupings since the beginnings of our history. Our communities have been crucial to us not only for our physical survival, but also as the source and ground of our social life and our values. Our sense of belonging to a community, of community as a bond between us, has held us together and enabled us to live and act in common. The health of community networks and community-feeling are vital indicators of social health.

Today, communities everywhere are in crisis. Industrial societies have proven themselves to be remarkably efficient destroyers of traditional communities, without, however, being able to offer viable alternatives to replace them. The automobile especially has led to the shattering of human-scale, face-to-face communities. Where people once lived within walking distance of their workplaces, their churches, and the local markets, they now tend to be dispersed and anonymous. 'Home entertainment systems' – television, radios, stereos, etc. – have further contributed to atomization and the erosion of community networks and collective traditions, as have countless other patterns of modern life.

The erosion of community has also eroded much of the basis for potential movements of opposition and change. Successful movements for change require that people know and trust each other, through working together, living in the same neighbourhood, or through voluntary association. Without the existence of natural communities, this becomes much more difficult. Indeed, those in positions of power have often consciously pursued a strategy of encouraging divisions along the lines of race, gender, language, ethnicity, and religion, precisely in order to prevent people from coming together in unions or in community groups to challenge their dominance.

It is no surprise, then, that we are seeing everywhere the signs of a social breakdown which can be linked to the breakdown of community and shared values. The dominant value system can increasingly be reduced to the idea that the only thing that matters is to get as much for yourself as possible. The real estate speculators and the street criminals both live by this motto, and both contribute their share to making cities less liveable. Governments at all levels make planning and transportation decisions which only worsen the problems.

In the face of all this, people are attempting to organize resistance and to work for alternatives.

One key issue bringing people together is concern for the environment: the air we breathe, the water we drink, the noise and the toxic wastes in our neighbourhoods.

Another crucial issue is housing. All across Canada the number of homeless or inadequately housed people has been increasing. Unemployment, skyrocketing prices, a failure to build affordable housing, and government policies of 'de-institutionalizing' those in need of care, like psychiatric patients, by dumping them on the streets, are all contributing to the crisis. Community based organizations know that the disappearance of secure and affordable housing is a major contributor not only to homelessness, but to many of the other social problems with which they are trying to deal.

One response has been to initiate non-profit housing projects and to urge governments to do the same. Increasingly, co-operatives and community and church groups, rather than private developers or governments, have taken on the task of building low-income housing, albeit with much slimmer resources.

Some groups have also raised the vital, but explosive, issues of land ownership and control. They argue that land and housing should not be commodities bought and sold to enrich a few. They have proposed heavy taxes on speculators, and they maintain that land use should be guided by planning based on human needs and respect for the environment, not simply determined by whether someone can make a profit.

Groups across the country are working on these issues. Most are locally oriented, and some are also seeking ways of joining with others to increase their impact and potential.

DEVELOPMENT, INTERNATIONAL

In recent years, we have become increasingly aware that there is only one earth. For better or worse, we share this planet with other people, and with all other living species. If the rainforests disappear, the greenhouse effect will have devastating effects on us all. If other countries are in crisis, if they are ravaged by economic catastrophes, repression, or civil war, their refugees will appear on our doorsteps. If they douse the food they export to us with dangerous chemicals, we and they will both develop the resulting cancers.

Yet there are enormous pressures dividing us and pitting us against each other – nation against nation, ethnic group against ethnic group, religion against religion.

The international nature of the world's economy, dominated as it is by multinational corporations, is itself an enormous source of division and conflict. The system sets up intense competition to attract economic activity, leading to pressure to keep unions out and wages low, slash taxes and social programmes, ignore environmental dangers. Local economies are warped to meet the demands of production for the international market.

Our hope of turning this around is to join together across international borders and other dividing lines to work together and support each other in evolving non-exploitative forms of sustainable development.

We in the 'developed' world have a special responsibility to stand by the Third World, which, already desperately poor, is being plunged into further misery and environmental devastation by massive debt payments to first world banks and by irrational economic policies dictated by the International Monetary Fund, the multinational corporations, and the local elites they enrich.

We owe the peoples of the Third World a debt of solidarity, but beyond that we must realize that the issues of world peace and the global environment which concern us here in the West cannot be solved unless the issues of poverty, women's liberation, land reform, and sustainable economic development are dealt with in the Third World.

Many of the groups in this section are concerned with promoting alternative forms of sustainable development – development as distinct from growth. Such approaches tend to the small-scale and the local, and are concerned with getting resources to those who need them most and will put them to the best use. Perhaps most importantly, such initiatives necessarily require empowering local people and communities (and especially the women who are often the key to rural economies), helping them to plan and implement projects which meet their needs and which they can control. It is a fundamental fact that a development project will only work if local people feel that it is theirs.

Other groups concentrate on education, a key component in development, and equally important in our own country to create support for appropriate forms of development.

Yet other organizations are concerned with issues in particular countries or regions, such as South Africa, Chile, or the Middle East.

All of them grow out of the belief that the principle of 'Thinking Globally, Acting Locally' can and must also be extended to acting locally on behalf of and in solidarity with those in other parts of this globe.

Prophets, Pastors and Public Choices

Canadian Churches and the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Debate

Roger Hutchinson

In 1974 twenty-seven of the world's largest oil and natural gas companies applied for permission to build a pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley to transport Alaskan and northern Canadian gas to large southern markets. Many northern native peoples opposed the proposal and called for a moratorium on major northern development projects until native land claims had been settled. The mainline Canadian Christian churches supported the call for a moratorium and, through the interchurch coalition, Project North, campaigned against the pipeline.

This case study in comparative ethics assesses conflicting responses to the pipeline proposal in relation to "hard facts" concerning the need for northern gas in the South, social-scientific findings regarding the impact of the pipeline on native communities, the rights of native peoples to participate in decisions affecting their lives, assumptions about the way of life of non-native people in the South and the role of religious convictions in public choices.

ECONOMY, POVERTY, WORK

North American Native peoples were astonished by the strange ideas of the newly arrived Europeans. One of the strangest of these was the idea that land – the Earth itself – could be owned, bought, and sold. To the aboriginal people, who saw themselves, the Earth, and the things living on it, as part of a natural harmony, the thought of buying and selling land was incomprehensible, absurd.

Absurd though it was, it was no joke, as the Indians of the Americas, and the blacks of Africa, were soon to find out. The whites not only bought and sold land, they also bought and sold human beings to work on the land they appropriated.

The ideas that seemed so strange to the Native peoples still underpin our economic system. Unlike 'primitive' people, who engaged in economic activity in order to satisfy their collective needs, we have made the buying, selling and individual ownership of things the basis of our economy.

One of the 'things' that we still buy and sell is human labour. In a few countries, incredibly, slavery and serfdom still exist. In the rest of the world, more civilized, most of us are divided between two main groups: the vast majority of us, who for most of our lives sell ourselves to employers by the hour or the week in order to live, and the minority whose wealth enables them to hire, and profit from, the labour of others.

Economic decisions – what is to be produced, where, by whom, and under what conditions, are made by those with economic power – predominantly corporate executives and government officials. The rest of us have little or no say.

The nature of the system ensures that the basis of economic decisions will be 'the bottom line'. Enterprises that are profitable (usually ones that create 'growth') become bigger and stronger; the others are squeezed out. Whether the actual product or activity is rational or irrational, beneficial or useless, environmentally benign or destructive, whether the product is food or weapons, doesn't enter into the equation unless it affects "the bottom line".

Of course, this isn't the way it is supposed to work. The market is supposed to make sure everything turns out for the best. The market, so the theory goes, responds to demand, which reflects the needs of all of us as consumers, making it the most efficient way of allocating resources to where they are needed.

In practice, it doesn't quite work that way. If people in Africa are hungry because they have no money to buy food, they don't create a "demand" in the world market for food, and the market doesn't produce or allocate food for them. According to market theory, they have no need for food. For the same reason, the market continues to produce Mercedes and condos for the rich rather than housing for the homeless: the market allocates resources to where the greatest profits are to be made, not to where the need is greatest.

Nor is the market well suited to meeting needs that can't be produced as commodities. The market doesn't offer you the opportunity to buy streets which are safe to walk on, or water which is clean enough to drink and swim in, or a community in which those too young or too old to drive can get around easily.

The results are obvious everywhere: extremes of wealth and poverty, environmentally disastrous resource extraction and farming practices, planned product obsolescence, urban designs that force dependence on the automobile and destroy communities, working people forced to work for subsistence wages under unsafe working conditions, lack of affordable housing, deteriorating towns and cities, extremes of overwork and unemployment.

These things have not happened without opposition. Labour unions have long brought working people together to assert their interests against those of the owners, and they continue to play a leading role in fighting for better wages, pensions, working conditions, health protection, and social legislation. Anti-poverty and unemployment rights groups seek to improve the lot of the poor, whose ranks are filled disproportionately with women, children, the aged, and racial minorities. Housing co-ops and tenants' groups are responses to the pressures of the housing market. Worker co-ops and community economic development projects cultivate enterprises which try to combine socially useful production with concern for workers' needs and working conditions.

Many of these responses raise fundamental questions about what – and who – our economy is for, and about how we make economic decisions. Why shouldn't economic activities have to justify themselves on grounds of social usefulness if they are to consume our resources? Why does the taxation system place most of the burden on the middle classes and the poor, rather than on the corporations and the wealthy? Why should anyone be allowed to 'own' the natural resources that are found in, or grow on, the earth? Why shouldn't all enterprises have to clean up after themselves, so that they have no negative impact on the environment? Why shouldn't we require them to safeguard the health of their workers and of the communities in which they are situated? Why can't we insist that they make economic sense, rather than simply make someone a profit? Why should there be a class of owners entitled to make decisions which profoundly affect thousands of people and entire communities, while those whose livelihoods and futures are at stake have no say? Why, indeed, shouldn't economic decisions be made democratically, by those who actually do the work and need the goods and services?

If these questions suggest the need for fundamental change, they also raise a further question: How is such change to come about?

Some groups listed here are focusing their energies on building alternatives to the present system: sharing, barter networks, co-operatives, non-profit community-controlled or worker-controlled enterprises, land trusts, credit unions, 'ethical' and alternative investment funds.

Others concentrate on at least ameliorating the worst effects of the present economy as it affects the unemployed, injured workers, and the poor, or on winning a better deal within the system for women or minorities.

Important as these initiatives are, their potential is inevitably limited by the fact that the economic system as it stands has a virtual monopoly on society's resources, including capital, machinery, land, natural resources, and human energy.

The issue becomes one of power. To effect desired change, it is necessary to have the power to set a different agenda, and therefore to challenge the current concentration of economic and political power.

In Canada, the question has been posed more sharply by the (so-called) Free Trade Agreement with the United States, implemented even though a majority of Canadians voted against it, and by NAFTA, negotiated behind closed doors and passed into law with total contempt for even nominal democratic principles.

Free trade, which in fact has little to do with trade and much to do with re-shaping institutions to meet the demands of multinational corporations, is part of a broader corporate agenda aimed at establishing an 'unfettered capitalism' and at eliminating or crippling anything that stands in the way. Social, environmental, and cultural programs are being attacked in the name of reducing government spending and staying competitive, and working people's wages, working conditions, and unions are being hit through 'privatization', plant closures, demands for concessions, and other pressures.

It will take a strong and determined grassroots movement to prevail against this. A crucial role in such a movement will have to be played by the unions, who have the numbers, the organization, and the tradition of militancy to fight back successfully, but if there is to be hope of success, the movement must also include farmers, environmentalists, women's groups, Native people, immigrants and minorities, and many others. One of the keys to building such a movement is mutual acts of solidarity, inspired by the principle that 'an injury to one is an injury to all'. Developing such solidarity is a challenge that we must meet if our individual groups are to transform themselves into a wider movement.

EDUCATION, CHILDREN

Although we like to think of ourselves as a society that cares deeply for children and protects them from harm, children are by no means immune to society's problems. Sometimes, in fact, they face problems that are worse than those faced by most adults.

In Canada, children make up the largest group of poor people. More than one million children – about one in six – are growing up in poverty. In the poorest countries, they die in shocking numbers from malnutrition and disease. Children suffer from family breakdown and family violence; some are victims of sexual abuse. Certain environmental hazards, such as lead pollution, are especially harmful to children. Good day care for the children of working parents is in critically short supply.

Native children, especially, have often been treated appallingly: removed from their communities, separated from their families, forbidden to speak their own language. While the worst of these abuses have now ended, the effects will be felt for many years.

The school system often fails children. Children from working class and non-white backgrounds are disproportionately streamed into dead-end courses, and are much less likely to make it into university. (As governments cut university funding and tuition fees rise, this problem will worsen.) Many students leave school – even as high school graduates – unable, or barely able, to read. Few are really challenged by their schools, few receive encouragement for, or training in, thinking and reading critically.

Yet work is being done to improve the situation of children. There are groups pressing for more and better day care, organizations protecting the interests of children in the justice system, alternative schools trying to improve on the education system's offerings. One positive trend has been the development of school textbooks which avoid the old stereotypes of race and sex, to provide students with a more authentic picture of Canadian society.

Education is by no means confined to the school system, nor to children and youth. Indeed, adult education is one of the 'growth industries' of our time (and one that is far more environmentally benign than many other 'growth industries').

Especially vital are the literacy and English As A Second Language movements. They are tackling crucial problems which are responsible for keeping many Canadians, especially immigrants and the poor, out of the social mainstream. They have been leaders, too, in developing reading materials that actually deal with the lives and problems of the learners, and in involving the learners themselves in helping to create those materials. As a result, such programs have become catalysts for awakening a wider social awareness among people often not reached by other institutions and organizations.

Indeed, education is being seen as an essential element of grassroots development both in Canada and abroad. The guiding idea is that education is not merely concerned with imparting knowledge, but with helping people develop the skills and the confidence to analyse and solve problems and thus to act, both individually and collectively.

Because education is about how people see and respond to the world, education has also been identified as a priority by a wide range of organizations concerned with many different issues. Many groups concerned with peace, anti-racism, the workplace, or gender equality see education as a key to moving forward.

ENVIRONMENT, LAND USE, RURAL

As we witness an apparently unending succession of environmental hazards and catastrophes, awareness is spreading that we are in the midst of a profound ecological crisis.

The dimensions of that crisis are frightening. Global warming – the greenhouse effect – threatens massive disturbances to climate, vegetation, sea levels, water supplies, and agriculture. Airborne pollutants, including acid rain, are causing the death of lakes and forests, and are a major cause of cancers and respiratory illnesses in humans.

Water pollution, including toxic wastes, raw sewage, oil spills, and garbage dumped at sea, is befouling shorelines and making water unfit to drink or to swim in. Fish and marine mammals suffer from these hazards, and from overfishing and huge deadly drift-nets. The earth's protective ozone layer is thinning dangerously, with potentially devastating effects on the marine food chain and on humans who venture into the sunlight.

Rain forests are being destroyed at a catastrophic rate, with inevitable consequences for climate worldwide. We are in the midst of a massive wave of species extinctions, and countless other species of animals and plants are nearing the edge. Stresses on wildlife and habitat range from outright destruction to overhunting to the proliferation of all-terrain vehicles.

Unsustainable farming practices are degrading the soil, depleting water reservoirs that took centuries to build up, polluting lakes, rivers and groundwater with chemicals, inadvertently encouraging the biological selection of pesticide-resistant insect pests, and dangerously narrowing the genetic diversity of cultivated plant species.

If there is any hope, it is that people worldwide are resisting the urge to simply despair, and are instead seeking to do whatever they can to reverse the trend.

Many people are trying to change their own lifestyles by avoiding products and practices which are harmful to the environment, by reusing and re-cycling, by composting, by reducing the use of private automobiles. They are also pressuring governments and industries to change and supporting environmental organizations.

In Canada, environmental and conservationist groups have sprung up around a wide variety of concerns. Some concentrate on local issues, such as the clean-up of a river, or the dumping of raw untreated sewage into the ocean. Others deal with broader problems, such as acid rain, the preservation of wetlands and natural and wilderness areas, the pollution of the oceans and the Great Lakes, energy conservation, nuclear power, excess packaging, the forest industry, or urban planning and land use.

Farming and rural life are one area of particular concern. Canadian farmers (and the rural communities which depend on them) are caught up in the pressures of a market economy that squeezes small farmers while encouraging environmentally damaging farming practices. Farming ranks with mining, fishing, and construction work in its risk of physical injury or death, and in addition farmers are exposed to a range of hazardous pesticides. Farmers who want to get off the treadmill are often trapped by huge debts. In response, organizations working for the survival of family farming and rural communities have sprung up, as has a movement to return to more 'organic' farming techniques. Happily, a market for 'organic' products is rapidly developing.

A movement for change is gathering steam, and is chalking up local successes as well as having a broader social impact.

Those active in environmental issues are also wrestling with how best to organize. Some groups see their role as lobbying and pressuring governments or businesses on a particular well-defined issue. Other groups are strictly local, using tactics that range from education and petitioning to civil disobedience.

Still other organizations have developed broader strategic visions. Some see themselves as primarily ecological (e.g. "deep ecology") while others incorporate an economic and social vision as well (e.g. "social ecology", "bioregionalism" or the Green movements). Some stress the development of alternative models of sustainable economic activity based on decentralist and 'human scale' approaches.

Also receiving recognition is the fact that environmental issues are closely linked to third world development issues, and to questions of peace and urban planning. The increasing awareness of the global nature of environmental problems has made it apparent there is no hope of solving them unless the problems of poor countries generally are addressed. For example, most third world countries have no sewage treatment facilities, no controls on industrial pollution, and no means of dealing with hazardous wastes except by dumping them in the sea. Rain forests will continue to be cleared unless local people see viable economic alternatives for themselves.

There is still hope for reversing the trend toward environmental collapse, but only if we are able to work together worldwide to achieve profound changes. Our many local initiatives are steps toward achieving that, but many more steps are needed before we become a movement capable of bringing about those changes.

HEALTH

In this century we in the industrial nations have witnessed a marked improvement in many of the indicators of human health. Infant mortality has been greatly reduced, life expectancy has increased significantly, many illnesses and injuries which were formerly fatal or incapacitating are now treatable. We tend to live longer, and be healthier.

This progress is largely due to advances such as public sanitation and sewage treatment, drinking water that is free of disease-causing bacteria, better nutrition, improved standards for handling food, and large-scale vaccination. Advances in medicine and pharmacology have contributed, though their contribution relative to public health measures is frequently over-stated.

These benefits have not been shared equally. In the third world, lack of food and clean drinking water kills millions. In Canada, Native peoples and the poor have worse health, less medical care, and lower life expectancies.

In the population at large, health issues continue to be a major focus of concern. Smoking – including second-hand smoke – and inappropriate diet are massive, preventable causes of ill health which reflect not only individual choices but also the effects of advertising, social pressures, and institutional policies.

Workplace health issues are among the most serious and widespread of all health problems. Canadian workers and farmers are killed or injured at work in appalling numbers. Often they are exposed to noise, dust, radiation, and dangerous chemicals, at levels far above those considered 'acceptable' for the population at large. Frequently they are deliberately lied to or kept in ignorance about the hazards which they face at work. (Asbestos companies, for example, knew for decades that asbestos was lethally dangerous before they admitted to their workers that the substance was in any way hazardous.) Workplace health issues are becoming a major battleground as workers fight for the right to earn a living without sacrificing their health.

Such issues frequently become struggles for power, specifically the right of workers to full knowledge of the substances they are working with, the right to have a significant say in managing work to minimize health risks, and the right to refuse unsafe work without being penalized. The emergence of such issues presents a significant opportunity for alliances to be made between unions, environmental groups, and health organizations.

Environmental health issues have similarly become the subject of widespread concern as risks become known or suspected. Air and water pollution are linked to cancer and respiratory disease. Highly toxic chemicals lace our water supplies and the fish we eat. The thinning of the ozone layer makes us more vulnerable to the carcinogenic rays of the sun. Modern farming practices leave pesticide residues in our fruit and vegetables and anti-biotics and growth hormones in our meat. Rising levels of noise cause increased stress for many.

Pharmaceuticals are another issue of concern. One problem is the widespread over-prescribing or mis-prescribing of drugs, especially to the elderly, women, and psychiatric patients. Doctors are often lamentably ill-formed about the drugs they prescribe, with most of their information about particular drugs coming from the companies that sell them. The giant multi-national drug companies aggressively pursue their market share, all too frequently by producing drugs of little value, or their own brand-name versions of another company's already existing product.

In the third world, drug company marketing strategies have resulted in a tragic misallocation of scarce resources, and the companies continue to resist fiercely any efforts to adopt the 'rational prescribing' policies advocated by the World Health Organization. In Canada, the drug multi-nationals, backed by the U.S. government, were successful in pressuring the government to pass legislation drastically restricting the right of independent pharmaceutical firms to produce cheaper generic equivalents of their expensive products.

Financial issues generally are contentious in the health care system. Government spending going to health care has been increasing rapidly in many parts of Canada, yet sectors of the health care system are suffering from underfunding. One important debate revolves around how much money should be going to 'high-tech', hospital-oriented, doctor-driven approaches, and how much to education, prevention, home care, and other health care providers such as midwives, nurse-practitioners, and alternative healers.

Some are also looking for ways to reduce doctors' disproportionately high share of income and power. Nurses especially have been putting their concerns forward with increasing militancy. The Patients' Rights Association has been pressing for patients to have increased say in their own care.

With governments pursuing an agenda of budget cutbacks, it seems certain that financial pressures will increase. One way in which governments have shed expenses has been through 'deinstitutionalization'. In theory, this means moving people from large institutions to community-based care. In practice, it has more often tended to mean dumping psychiatric patients and the disabled onto the streets with little or no support, follow-up, or care. Parents nearing retirement age find themselves forced to single-handedly shoulder the burden of caring for children with severe disabilities; children, especially daughters and daughters-in-law, find themselves responsible for caring for aging parents.

Another strategy has been privatization: in essence, shifting the responsibility for care of the elderly and others from publicly accountable institutions staffed by unionized workers to privately owned companies using workers paid little more than the minimum wage.

Financial considerations also directly affect the users of health care. While the existence of medicare gives Canadians a much more egalitarian health care system than Americans, financial deterrents to access exist in the form of user fees in some provinces.

AIDS in particular is raising significant ethical, economic, and political issues which relate to both health care and human rights. AIDS activists are highly critical of how the health care system has responded to the pandemic so far, and are concentrating their efforts simultaneously on political pressure, education and self-help.

A woman's right to choose whether or not to have an abortion is still under serious attack, presenting a major challenge for pro-choice groups which advocate that women have access to safe legal abortion and reliable contraceptive information.

Many of the groups in this chapter deal with a particular pressing health issue. Others, such as those advocating a 'healthy city' strategy, are trying to develop a comprehensive approach to changing public policy in the many sectors which affect our health. When health is seen in its wider context, it is apparent that many of the issues identified elsewhere in this Annual are also health issues, suggesting that there are many fruitful ways in which health groups and other groups can work together.

HUMAN RIGHTS, CIVIL LIBERTIES

Western society is strongly coloured by the idea that there are rights which belong to all human beings "by right", rights which no authority is entitled to deny or to take away.

At the same time, however, we also know that whatever rights one thinks there ought to be, or whatever rights people are said to have, the rights that people actually have exist only because they fought for them and achieved them. Rights are won.

And rights can be lost. They can be lost if those who are concerned with defending them are isolated, weak, not organized enough, or not vigilant enough.

There is no universal agreement on the definition of human rights. On the contrary, competing definitions – and more precisely attempts to legislate and implement particular rights – give rise to some of the sharpest conflicts of our time. This is because in many instances, the assertion or expansion of a particular human right brings it into conflict with what some other groups see as their rights, or has costs associated with it which others are reluctant to pay.

In our day we can see this as a wide range of groups attempt to assert their rights, including many rights that have a strong social or economic component. Thus the French-speaking majority in Quebec trying to assert its right to a francophone Quebec comes into conflict with the English-speaking minority seeking to preserve its linguistic rights. Tenant groups who see housing as a human right, and workers wanting the right to change unsafe workplaces both conflict with those defending the rights of property. Those advocating affirmative action clash with those who believe that the principle of hiring strictly on merit is being attacked.

In question too is how real 'paper' rights are in the absence of the conditions needed to exercise those rights. How real is our right to free speech when a few conglomerates control nearly all the mass media? Are a forestry giant and a citizens' group really equal before the law when the company is able to bankrupt the tiny challenger simply by dragging them into court and letting legal fees mount?

And what about more radical extensions of our rights? If we have the right to democracy, can't one argue that this should also include the right to democratic control over the corporations which now control most of our economy?

Perhaps the single most crucial question facing any group concerned with extending or defending human rights is that of its attitude to the state. While people and organizations concerned with human rights know that it is vital to win support and allies in the wider society, they also know that the most powerful potential sponsor of all may well be the state itself – the government, the courts, the police.

Therein lies a fundamental dilemma. The state is a dominant force in society whose help often seems essential if a particular right or policy is to be achieved effectively.

Indeed, we are often told that in order to secure our rights, it is necessary to extend the powers of the state. In order to have the right to be safe from crime and terrorism, we are expected to give more power to the police and the state security agencies. So that we may have the right to enjoy essential services, the government has to have the right to ban strikes. To be protected from hate literature, we have to yield to the police and the courts the right to decide what we are allowed to publish or read. In other words, to gain certain rights, we have to give up other rights, especially our civil liberties, our right to be free of state interference.

As a result, we have witnessed a steady erosion of our liberties. We are subjected to restrictions and forms of surveillance that would have been unthinkable in the past. If one trend is clearly visible in virtually every society, it is toward greater centralization, bureaucracy, and social control, and a corresponding curtailment of individual freedoms.

This is a tremendously dangerous trend, especially for those who are hoping to bring about social change, because those working for change frequently attract the hostility of the powers that be. The more we acknowledge that the state has the right to grant or deny us our liberties, the more it is likely to use it in ways we will regret.

For example, the more it is considered permissible to curtail freedom of speech, the more groups working for change become vulnerable to having their freedom of speech curtailed. This has been demonstrated regularly even in Canada, where laws originally targeted at Nazi hate literature have been used against groups protesting American domination of Canada, and where anti-pornography laws have been used against gay liberation publications, feminist videos, and sex education materials.

Consequently, a strong case can be made that a serious strategy for promoting right and liberties should challenge the right of the state to grant or withhold our rights and freedoms. Those who seek a freer or more just society are in danger of subverting their own goals if they expect the government or the courts to achieve them on their behalf. There are times when using them is unavoidable, but there is always a cost: a hidden but real shift of power away from us to the government and the courts. In the long run, our goal should be to create a society that is less, not more, state-dominated.

To do that, we need to look to each other for help. We can better secure our own rights and freedoms if we support the rights and freedoms of others. Groups working to win or defend one set of rights greatly increase their chances if they form alliances with other groups, especially if such alliances are not merely expedient, but rooted in an understanding of how different causes are contributing parts of a larger struggle for justice and freedom. We should try to be guided by the idea that "if one of us is not free, then none of us is free".

For example, most of us may hope never to be in prison, but as long as we tolerate prisons that cage human beings under conditions that would be illegal for animals in a zoo, we lend our acquiescence to the idea that it is permissible to treat human beings inhumanely. If we tolerate discrimination against women, or racial minorities, or the handicapped, we give our consent to injustice. If we accept that anyone may be denied their rights, their freedom, then we undermine our own rights and freedoms even as we undermine social solidarity.

LESBIANS, GAYS, BISEXUALS

Q sexuality is not something that our society handles well. We produce and reproduce sexual images by the untold millions, we talk about sex incessantly but as a society we are profoundly uncomfortable with this primal force.

We have a long history of trying to repress or tame sexuality, of trying to keep it channelled, under control. Consequently, we also have a long history of punishing sexual 'deviance' – behaviour that differs from the prescribed norms – although we have an equally long history of 'deviating' anyway, and often of quietly tolerating officially forbidden behaviour as long as it wasn't 'flaunted'.

Homosexuality was long felt to be particularly threatening by official society, meeting with reactions that were frequently hysterical, vicious, and violent. Homosexuality was simultaneously seen to be completely against human nature, and yet so attractive that a single 'queer' teacher could corrupt a whole school. The very existence of homosexuals was seen as an affront, a threat.

For a long time, gay men and lesbian women felt compelled and were compelled to keep their orientation quiet, 'in the closet', prisoners of economic and social pressure, repressive laws, and frequently personal agonies of doubt and guilt.

In the last two decades this has changed, as a powerful movement for lesbian and gay liberation emerged to assert that their sexual orientation was every bit as "normal" as heterosexuality.

Though much remains to be done, this movement has been a powerful force in changing society's attitudes and in sweeping away legal and other barriers denying equality to gays and lesbians.

Many of the groups in this chapter are focused on continuing the long struggle for lesbian and gay rights under the law, and within institutions like the churches. Others are concerned with providing support and services to gays and lesbians, or to particular groups within the community.

Beyond their particular emphasis, gay and lesbian organizations are also by their nature dealing with the issue of empowerment, giving an identity, strength, and a sense of collectivity to a section of society that was long oppressed and silent. For lesbians, this quest for identity and empowerment has often meant forming their own organizations after finding themselves limited in male-dominated gay organizations.

For lesbians, this process has also meant confronting their oppression as women, and claiming their place in the broader women's movement. For some, it has meant the development of a lesbian 'separatist' identity. For others, who enjoy erotic literature or S&M, it has meant a further struggle to claim a space for themselves within the movement.

The movement has helped to test and extend our sexual limits. The space for diversity which it has created has also benefited bisexuals, who now feel freer to pursue their orientation without guilt or censure.

Together with the women's movement, the lesbian and gay movement has helped to make the wider society understand that personal issues, sexual issues, are also political issues. Gays and lesbians have shown that while on one level – rights, employment, etc. – sexual orientation doesn't matter, on another level, sexual politics are profoundly important. They do matter, and no movement for change can ignore them.

THE PRESENCE OF GAYS IN THE MILITARY, AND HOW IT AFFECTS MORALE AND DISCIPLINE.

THE PREJUDICE TOWARD GAYS IN THE MILITARY, AND HOW IT AFFECTS MORALE AND DISCIPLINE.

NATIVE PEOPLES

North American Native peoples are the victims of a historical calamity that is difficult for non-Natives to comprehend. In a relatively short period of time, a continent-wide web of self-sufficient communities, in balance with nature, was invaded and destroyed by an alien civilization. Most of their land was taken away, the animal populations they had relied on were decimated, they themselves were deliberately killed or ravaged by diseases to which they had no resistance. The survivors were shoved onto reservations with few means of livelihood, their economy, culture and traditions shattered.

Despite the catastrophe that befell them, the aboriginal peoples have shown a tenacious will to survive and prevail, and a great willingness to share their knowledge and spirit with non-Natives. The first whites to arrive could not have survived at all without the help given to them by the people they called Indians. Future generations owe more than they know to the accumulated knowledge of the original peoples. Today, the ecology movement is returning to the ideas of living in balance with nature which the Native people practised.

Across the country, Native people are organizing to deal with the critical and chronic problems that face them.

Land claims are far from being resolved. Multinational resource corporations and huge domestic entities like Quebec Hydro continue to explore and stake claims in the North, despite warnings of vast and irreparable ecological and social damage. The consequences of the institutional racism of Canadian society continue to damagingly affect Native people. This is reflected in rates of unemployment, number of suicides, incarceration and infant mortality rates that far exceed the national average, and substandard health care, education, and housing.

A principal concern of Native people across the country is to achieve viable forms of self-government and self-determination. Governments are being pressured to resolve land claims. Native communities are trying to develop models of self-sustaining economic activities that will give them greater control over their own economic future. Native centres are placing increased emphasis on preserving Native culture, heritage, and language through radio stations, videos, oral history projects, artisans networks and social activities.

Discriminatory legislation has been challenged in courts from the municipal, provincial and federal level to the United Nations. Native women successfully fought the section of the Indian Act which took away women's Native rights if they "married out" of their band.

However, the Indian Act remains a discriminatory piece of legislation, and little advance has been made in the fight to have Native peoples' rights recognized in Canada's constitution or in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Meanwhile, the federal government has been placing additional restrictions on funding for Native communities and Native education.

In the face of this, Natives have been intensifying their resistance, and more militant forms of protest are becoming increasingly common.

Canadians concerned with social justice can also be working in solidarity with the Native peoples in their struggle for justice. We can add our pressure to the demand for a quick and just resolution of land claims and for meaningful economic assistance to native communities. We can also join with them in promoting an approach to living on this continent that stresses self-reliance and ecological harmony.

PEACE

ar, or the threat of war, is an ever-present reality in our world but in the relative comfort of the West, we have the luxury of shutting off the wars raging in other countries by changing the channel on our TV sets.

Even here, however, we have had, for more than a generation, to live with the possibility that human society could be destroyed almost instantly in a global nuclear war.

Frozen in the threatening postures of the Cold War, societies East and West warped their economies and their thinking in order to defend themselves against the threat from the other side. In order to guarantee 'mutually assured destruction', resources were bled away from real human needs and poured into the military.

The Cold War has ended, but militarism, nationalism, imperialism, and the arms trade have not. The major industrial powers, with the United States leading the way, continue to depend on military production to power their economies. Arms remain the number one export of the United States (followed closely by the products of the U.S. entertainment industry), underlining the dictum that "war is the health of the state", even in "peace-time".

In the Cold War era, the western peace movement sought to establish closer ties with independent peace groups in the Eastern bloc. They understood that more successful we are in using people-to-people contacts to create an international peace movement that is not tied to the policies of any particular government, the better our chances will be of taking control of our destinies away from the militarists who often loom so large in governmental decision-making.

This truth — the importance of international links to oppose the rivalries and abuses of nation-states — remains vitally important in the chaotic "New World Order" which is emerging. Preparations for war — and for military intervention against countries whose rulers "get out of line" — continue even as the military searches for new enemies.

In Canada, the peace movement is pressing for an end to the testing over our territory of U.S. and NATO jet fighters, bombers and cruise missiles.

The Canadian peace movement is also demanding an end to the manufacture of arms for export, and an end to the export of uranium, which can be used for weapons even if it is ostensibly intended for nuclear power plants. By allowing such exports, Canada contributes to arms races between Third World nations, and to the potential development of nuclear weapons by such countries.

Vicious wars are being fought right now in several parts of the world, and many other countries have experienced the ravages of war since the end of World War II.

In the past decade alone, the wars in the former Yugoslavia, in Somalia, the U.S.-led war against Iraq, the Iran-Iraq war, the war in Afghanistan, the Sudanese and Ethiopian civil wars, the Indonesian invasion of East Timor, the wars in Nicaragua, El Salvador, Angola, and Mozambique, to name but a few, have taken and are taking enormous tolls of life.

There are many countries where ethnic or tribal minorities are engaged in an ongoing resistance against the central authority, or where governmental repression — assisted by armaments purchased from the industrial nations — is so severe as to amount to war against a particular group in society.

The build-up of the military at enormous cost in countries which cannot even afford to feed their own people is common. Consequently, working for peace and working for economic development are opposite sides of the same coin.

However, the enormous power of the military-industrial establishments, with a vested interest in continuing a vastly profitable international arms trade, makes the task of shifting resources from war to peaceful activities a truly enormous challenge, both here and in the Third World.

While the military of all countries has an insatiable hunger for new weapons of all kinds, these weapons are not necessarily used against foreign enemies.

In many countries, the military is used primarily to buttress dictatorial regimes against their own people. For this reason too, movements for justice must be striving to lessen the power of the military everywhere.

At the same time, it must be remembered that soldiers themselves are often recruited from the ranks of the poor and the jobless, and that a movement for peace and social justice should be attempting to reach them too with its message. A movement for peace must in the end also include the soldiers if it is to prevail.

Purpose: We view the world as one society embracing all of humanity in its diversity. We affirm that the ideals and principles of community life which are basic to civilized existence can and must be applied to international relations. We call for urgent progress in developing democratic world institutions.

WOMEN

The modern women's movement has had a profound and far-reaching impact on almost all spheres of society. It has challenged and changed the way women see themselves, their expectations, their treatment in society. It has shaken and transformed relationships and the family, the law, the educational system, the labour movement, and much else.

Yet for all its success, the challenges that remain are enormous. Women with full-time jobs earn about 65% of what men make. Over 50% of one-parent families headed by women are poor, as against 9% of those headed by men. The pension system works against many women, especially those who have been homemakers or who have taken time off from jobs to raise children. 50% of elderly women live in poverty. Women are subjected to violence or harassment in the home, the workplace, and on the street. The number of women's shelters is nowhere near to meeting the need. Women's right to reproductive choice, to control over their own bodies, uncertain to begin with, is under attack.

Because women tend to be poorer and economically more vulnerable, they are also hit harder by many of the other problems that exist in Canadian society. Non-existent or inadequate child care services make it harder for women to earn a decent living. A lack of affordable housing hits single mothers and elderly women particularly hard. Native women, immigrant women, and women who belong to visible minorities are disadvantaged even within their own communities. Free trade is expected to be especially devastating to industries like textiles which have a high concentration of older female workers.

These problems continue because they are built into the structure of Canadian society, and also because there are still many forces which reinforce sexism in public and private life, and which socialize our children into that system.

The various elements of the women's movement have adopted a wide variety of strategies to challenge sexist structures and ideology. Some groups are working to fight discrimination in the workplace. Others are providing services to battered, disabled, or immigrant women, services designed to help them take control over their own lives. Many groups focus on education or self-help.

Whatever the particular focus, many women's groups are united by the idea that the women's movement needs to concern itself with the entire social system, and with the nature of human relationships within that social system. They believe that the liberation of women cannot be achieved unless the whole system of oppressive and unjust structures is confronted, and equally that those structures cannot be dismantled unless the oppression of women within them is forcefully challenged.

This perspective applies also to movements for social change, who have been and are being forced to confront their own sexism and their own oppression of the women within them, and in the process are themselves being transformed even as they work to transform society.

SOCIAL JUSTICE: GENERAL

This chapter contains two types of organizations. The first is those which deal with several, or a whole range, of different issues, and which therefore chose to be listed here rather than under a specific issue. The second type is groups whose particular focus simply didn't fit well under any of the other chapter headings.

It is true, of course, that any such distinctions are somewhat arbitrary anyway. We have divided this book into a dozen broad issue areas to make it easier to use, so readers could find similar types of organizations and issues grouped together. But at the same time we realize that if you examine any issue closely enough, you find that it both contains, and is contained in, many other issues. Despite all the forces that fracture and divide us, it is still true that we all live together as one human race on one fragile planet. If we hope to achieve real change, we have to recognize that problems and solutions are linked and that we need to work together to make change possible.

ETHICS AND CLIMATE CHANGE The Greenhouse Effect

Edited by
Harold Coward and Thomas Hurka

1993 / ISBN 0-88920-233-8 / xii + 199 pp. Cloth $29.95

Whose interests should be considered in finding solutions to global greenhouse warming? What is best for a Canadian living at the end of the 20th century might not be best for a Somali, or for our great-grandchildren, or for the rainforest of the Amazon or the kangaroos of Australia. Essays by scientists, environmentalists, social scientists and philosophers offer an ethical analysis of possible responses to the problem.
