

Don Vale residents draw battle lines over co-op expansion

by ANDY STANLEY

As the snow started to fall on February 27 a public meeting of well over two hundred Don Vale residents failed to generate the storm of controversy many had expected. Instead, a local co-op quietly rolled over neighbourhood opposition to its plans to build eight new three-bedroom homes.

Don Area Co-operative Homes

Inc. (DACHI) wants to construct the houses on vacant land it owns on Dermott Place, a small lane just east of Parliament St. and south of Carlton. A minor by-law change is required to permit construction.

Some local residents at the meeting raised questions about the proposed design of the new houses. Their criticism ranged from the use of asphalt shingles and aluminum siding to the proximity of the houses to the street.

Some of the local residents say a move by DACHI to have another bylaw changed leads them to distrust the co-op's intentions. DACHI proposed the change to push through long overdue building permits for renovations it made in 1975.

According to the co-op's architect, Stephen Langmead, the houses were renovated by plans filed with the City in 1974, and only a "bureaucratic bungle" prevented permits from being issued originally.

In a leaflet distributed to area residents before the meeting, the property owners' association asked: "Do you want to determine your own destiny... or do you want your destiny determined by DACHI and by planning staff?"

Judie Pirrie, President of DACHI, assured residents that the co-op did not want to dictate planning policy to the rest of the neighbourhood.

"We're very concerned to follow all the rules," Pirrie said. "We have a waiting list of families looking for affordable housing, families that can also add a lot to this community."

"The co-op could spread right across the neighbourhood," said A. E. Chapman, a resident on Sword Street. "There's no knowing where they'll stop. It's a bad picture for property owners."

David Weenan, a prominent local renovator says the co-op did not meet the requirements of the neighbourhood. "Feelings

Feds close City UIC offices

by STEVE HELLER

A picket line of unemployed workers and some elected officials formed in front of the office of John Roberts, Minister of Employment and Immigration, to protest cutbacks in services to the recipients of unemployment insurance.

In spite of bitter cold and high winds the picketers marched for an hour without any let up of spirits. They claimed that the federal government's plans to fire 400 employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission would curtail services. Offices at 909 Jane Street and 1985 Danforth Avenue will be closed, according to James Third, Regional Director for Employment and Immigration.

The immediate cause of the protest was a break-down in communications between Third and Dan Heap, member of Parliament for Spadina riding. Heap says his office engaged in protracted efforts to meet Third and discuss the concerns of the unemployed in his riding. A meeting arranged by Heap and Third last week did not take place because of what Heap calls "a breakdown of communication and news blackout" at Third's office.

Third denies such a meeting was arranged but says he was aware of Heap's involvement. Third's office also cancelled a local tour of Lynne McDonald, federal member for Broadview-Greenwood. He provided no explanation. Heap says reduced service to UIC claimants places a heavier work load on his own office.

Another marcher, Ward 6 alderman Jack Layton, agrees. Layton says his offices are also inundated by calls of unemployed workers seeking help. Layton's ward is one of the sections of the city most effected by any cutbacks.

Bill Fisher of the Canada Employment and Immigration Union — the bargaining unit for the workers in the UIC offices is also concerned. He says the federal government doesn't fully understand the impact of closing UIC offices.

While most of the UIC workers effected are not unionized, Fisher feels the cold wind at his back with a possible ten per cent cut-back in staff with no decrease in work load. He fully supports the efforts of the Toronto Union of

by GEORGE FULFORD

Ward Seven had two special visitors from the Soviet Union last week. Major General Alexandre Ovcharov of the Red Army and Lodmilla Kouznetsova, a member of the Volgograd city council had lunch with former Toronto mayor John Sewell on Monday.

Ovcharov and Kouznetsova were visiting Toronto on an official goodwill mission. They were invited here to help celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the liberation of Volgograd (formerly Stalingrad) from German troops. Volgograd and Toronto are twin cities.

On 26 February 1944 Toronto sponsored a tag day to raise money for the relief of starving people of Volgograd. Four million dollars and 30 tons of supplies were sent to the war-torn city from Toronto as a result of

Province offers loans for summer jobs

by CINDY WIENER

Ambitious students already on the lookout for summer jobs may want to consider the possibility of self-employment this year. The Ontario government is offering interest-free loans of up to $2,000 to student entrepreneurs through its Student Venture Capital Program. Applicants must be at least 15 years old and returning to school at the end of the program.

In 1983 the Ontario Youth Secretariat, which is responsible for the program, saw 876 businesses start up and hopes for more this year. "Most student ventures are in the service industry, where there is low overhead," says Jackie Wood, co-ordinator of the program. "They include such services as painting, roofing, pool cleaning and landscaping."

Other successful ventures have included tennis and windsurfing lessons and computer programming for small companies.

Last year the province gave out loans worth $1.5 million to student summer businesses. Loans that are not repaid by October 1 are charged interest at one per cent above the prime rate.

"The default rate is less than 14 per cent, which is quite good when compared to the 20 per cent default rate for commercial loans at the Royal Bank," says Wood.

Each business is evaluated by the OYS at the end of the program. "Last year, all of the students felt their experience was successful or at least useful." "And 84 per cent felt their businesses were a financial success," says Wood.

Some young entrepreneurs manage to keep their venture going during the school year and others re-apply for loans the following year. Paige Silcox, 21, a York University economics major, started a cookie company that supplies such stores as Holt Renfrew and Ziggy's. Nancy Walroth, 21, a Ryerson business student, sells promotional T-shirts, buttons and key chains for companies and events. And James Drass, 17, and Allen Cameron, 19, started a silk-screening company last summer which they hope to operate again this year.

These businesses are diverse, but one thing these students do seem to share is the desire to be their own boss. One young woman has sewed Christmas notions and sold them at bazaars and another student has made leather belts and sold them at flea markets.

A viable business proposal that demonstrates a student has done some research into his or her idea is the basic criterion for loan approval. "It isn't necessary to be a business student to apply for a loan," says Wood. Applicants must complete a project description that includes details about the product or service they want to sell, names and addresses of potential customers, market size, prices and advertising and promotion plans. They must also outline how they intend to use their loan and how they will repay the money if their venture is not profitable. Students under 18 must have a guarantor to co-sign the loan.

The applications are assessed and the students are interviewed at the local Chamber of Commerce. Then they go through a series of approvals at the OYS.

Co-ordinator Jackie Wood says about 86 per cent of the applications were approved last year.

Information about the program and applications are available at high schools, college and university placement centres and branches of the Royal Bank. Applications will be accepted by the Chambers of Commerce until June 15.

are still very highly against this sort of thing," he said.

John Carson, also a local property owner, disagreed. "I support these by-law amendments," he said. "If DACHI had been a luxury development there would have been no opposition whatsoever."

George Rust D'Eye, Chairman of the Toronto Historical Board and an area homeowner supported the co-op's plans. He called the anti co-op rhetoric "Small minded bigotry." He said there was no longer a rate-payers organization in Don Vale because of the bitterness.

Maureen Penno, spokesperson for the Don Vale Property Owners Association, said she was disappointed about the meeting. She said the meeting was "deluged by DACHI supporters" and plans to continue her group's opposition to further expansion of subsidized housing.

Major General Ovcharov played a key role in the liberation of Volgograd in 1944. As a young officer, he was responsible for the capture of 9,000 German soldiers in the occupied city. He was awarded Russia's highest military honour — the Red Star — for his actions.

Ovcharov and Kouznetsova spent much of last week at official gatherings in Toronto. Between receptions they found enough time to tour the city and do some shopping. Kouznetsova was especially impressed by Canadian winter fashions. She left Toronto with Ovcharov last Wednesday carrying a Sears catalogue.

Unemployed Workers (TUUW) to protest increases in unemployment.

Bill Warrell, chairperson of the TUUW approached the secretary in the Employment Minister's office to express the concerns of his group over the closing of the Toronto UIC offices. He told the marchers that Roberts was unavailable for consultation or comment.

The irony of this situation is evident. The Ministry, by introducing computerized systems to speed up claims is contributing to the problem of unemployment without solving the special needs of the claimants. Some workers in the UIC offices are now facing their claimants from the other side of the counter. They are learning first hand about the dehumanizing tendency of this whole process.

Social Development in the '80s

Jerome Murray, former social activist and retired chairman of the Regent Park Community Improvement Association. Murray says professional social workers are responsible for many of the things he used to do at Regent Park. Photo by Doron Rescheff

by LARRY MORRIS

The 1960s catch phrase, "community development" is being given a new lease on life by some Torontonians seeking solutions to social injustice. To them, the thought of a justice-oriented, broad-based democratic movement sounds attractive.

But, the fact is, their networks of professionals, or "think-tank coalitions" merely serve as information depots for those who are involved. Information depots aren't a bad thing in themselves. But they don't move toward social change, which is the goal of community development.

The latest push for information sharing came at the February 20 meeting of the Toronto chapter of the Ontario Community Development Association which was held at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. The event, brought together more than 50 human resource professionals from across the city and featured John Sewell as guest speaker.

Members of the OCDA fleetingly discussed community-police relations, unemployment and poverty. Yet, no groups advocating responsible action on any of the above issues spoke up.

Bob Alexander, one of the organizers of the gathering, was disappointed. He said nobody at the meeting took any steps to act. Instead, they talked.

Lisette Fernandez, community worker with single parents in Regent Park left the networking session early. She says she was bored.

"The women I work with want community development to be something more than just a buzzword," said Fernandez. "Many professionals use networks as hideaways from people with real problems."

Fernandez knows the single mothers she works with every day in Regent Park won't go away. Nor will their problems. That's why she tries to get ordinary men and women involved.

But social activism is on the wane. There isn't the grass roots involvement there was ten years ago. The ordinary people who got involved have retired in frustration.

Jerome Murray, one-time militant tenant leader from Regent Park, was such an activist. What has happened to him exemplifies what has happened to grass-roots social activism in the '80s.

Fifteen years ago Murray helped establish the Regent Park Community Improvement Association. He was its first chairman.

The urgency of problems at Regent Park compelled Murray to seek outside help. Reform politicians like John Sewell and Carl Jaffray were soon getting involved. A lot got done, but the pace was frantic.

Health problems forced Murray to retire after 18 months as chairman of the Regent Park Association. "My doctor warned me to stay away," he says.

Murray hasn't been involved in any community programs for eight years. He, like many other activists of the '70s, is just too tired.
