The Connexions Digest

The Connexions Annual is a special issue of The Connexions Digest. Published quarterly, the Digest compiles, organizes and distributes information about projects, groups, publications, and useful resources. The Digest includes articles about how to work for change, a Network News section about events, projects, and activities across the country, a New Resources section with information about publications and other resources, the Activist's Bookshelf, and a variety of other useful information. Subscriptions are $25 per year, and include The Annual. Use the form at the back of this book to subscribe.

What is Connexions?

Connexions is a non-profit organization providing information and services for activist, voluntary, and non-profit groups, and for all those seeking reliable and up-to-date information about issues of social concern.

Connexions works to build links between people who are striving to create positive solutions to critical social, environmental, economic, and international problems. Simultaneously, Connexions endeavours to make the ideas, goals, organizations and publications of the movement for change and alternatives better known and more accessible to the general public.

Services Available

Connexions provides services designed to help non-profits deal with the tasks that eat up an organization's time. We're experienced at organizing large mailings, developing and producing publications, setting up computer systems and data bases, and sitting down with groups and individuals to streamline procedures and develop ways of using time more effectively.

Mailing Lists and Advertising

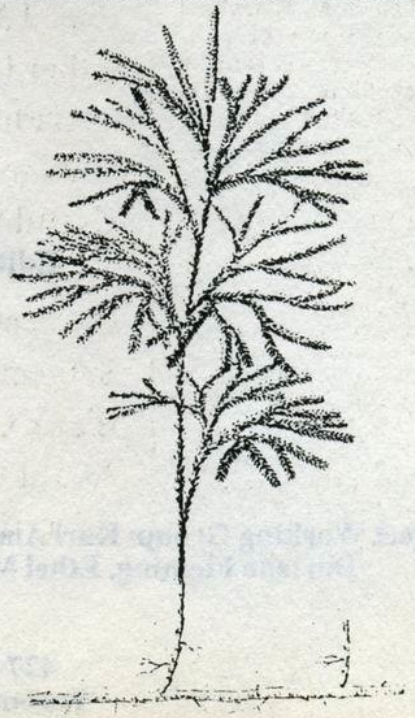

Connexions has extensive lists of groups, libraries, and individuals, all of them potentially interested in information and publications about environmental, peace, women's, and social justice issues. You can obtain these lists – including the groups in this Annual – on labels or on computer disks, and you can select parts of the lists by subject or by geographical location. You may also wish to take advantage of the inexpensive advertising rates in The Connexions Digest and The Annual.

Become a part of Connexions

Are you interested in encouraging social and environmental alternatives? Do you believe that change requires the active involvement of many people working to transform society from the grass roots up?

Then we invite you to become a member of The Connexions Information Sharing Network. You will be joining other individuals and groups across Canada who share your goals and concerns. You'll be helping the Connexions project expand and improve its support of grassroots activism. And you'll be entitled to the benefits of membership, which include a subscription to the Annual and the Digest, discounts on services, other publications, and additional subscriptions for your group, and one or more free books. Please see Page 205 for more information.

If you are interested in becoming actively involved in furthering Connexions' work for change, you may also wish to work directly with us by gathering information, volunteering in the office, or joining a working group. The Alternative Connexions Working Group (see #2055) in particular welcomes the involvement of anyone interested in gathering and disseminating information, experiences, ideas, and visions about social conditions and change.

How to get the most out of this book

Is this book for you?

The Connexions Annual is for people who are looking for information and ideas about social and environmental alternatives.

The Annual is dedicated to the idea that change is both necessary and possible. It is a gateway into vigorous grassroots movements of ordinary people who believe that there are viable alternatives to destructive and exploitative institutions and structures – and who are actively working to bring those alternatives into being.

The Annual is designed both for those already actively working for change, and for those who want to become involved. Its pages are crowded with information about groups and resources across Canada: names, addresses, and phone numbers, details of groups' activities, the resources and services they offer, their goals, how to join them.

If you are new to social change activity, you may wish to browse through the entries to get an idea of the variety of groups, and approaches to change, which exist. Or you may want to look in the Geographical Index (P. 177) to find organizations in your own area. The groups' statements of purpose may be particularly helpful in finding ones whose focus or approach appeals to you.

If you are already involved in a group, you may be looking for organizations in other parts of the country which share your concerns, or groups in your area which are potential partners or allies. (If you intend to send a mailing to a sizable number of such groups, Connexions can provide you with mailing labels or computer disks to make your task easier.)

What this book contains

The main part of this Annual – some 2,700 numbered entries in 16 chapters – consists of information about organizations and periodicals. We mailed a questionnaire to several thousand groups, requesting factual data, as well as information about activities and goals. The information they provided is presented in an easy-to-read standard format. Basic name and address information for groups which did not return questionnaires is found at the end of each chapter.

The Table of Contents (P. 3) is your quick guide to what is in this book. It shows the chapters into which the Annual has been divided. The chapter headings are broad subject areas such as Peace, Women, or Human Rights/Civil Liberties. (The "Social Justice: General" chapter contains groups which deal with a wide range of issues, as well as groups whose focus didn't fit comfortably under any other heading.)

There are separate chapters for Alternative Periodicals, Other Useful Organizations, and Useful Sources of Information. In addition, there are three indices to help you find particular organizations or types of organizations: the Name Index, the Geographical Index, and the Subject Index.

Looking for a particular group?

Look in the Name Index (P. 164), which lists all the groups in alphabetical order. Use the entry number to find the group in the main listings. Bear in mind that organizations may have listed themselves under a name different from the one you are looking for. For example, Metis Society of Saskatchewan vs. Saskatchewan Metis Society, or Ploughshares Sudbury, Project Ploughshares Calgary, and Saint John Project Ploughshares. As much as possible, we have tried to cross-list groups under alternative names and acronyms, but undoubtedly there are instances where we couldn't anticipate possible confusion. Persevere.

Interested in a particular issue?

Start off by selecting the chapter which covers the topic, e.g. Peace or Development/International. Browse through the chapter to find particular groups or types of groups. If you are interested in a more specific topic, e.g. Central America, or Military: Canadian, look for the relevant keyword in the Subject Index (P. 186), which will guide you to the groups which selected that keyword. You can also use the Subject Index to identify organizations which are concerned with your subject, but which are listed in another chapter. For example, a group which is found in the Environment chapter because it deals primarily with environmental problems may also be doing educational work on nuclear weapons or Third World development.

Many people have told us that the more they become involved in an issue, the more they find that it is interrelated with many other questions. This truth makes any attempt to categorize by subject, as we have done in our chapter headings, somewhat arbitrary. We have used the chapter headings because information would have been too hard to find without them – but please view them as approximations, not as rigid divisions.

Only groups that returned questionnaires are indexed in the Subject Index.

Looking for groups in your area?

The Geographical Index (P. 177) is organized by province or territory, with the provinces listed alphabetically, and with the names of individual towns listed alphabetically underneath each province's name. Following the name of the town are the names of the organizations located there. Use the entry number to find the group in the main listings. Remember, though, that many groups are regional or national in their focus. For example, an organization whose office is in Victoria may have members across British Columbia.

Looking for periodicals?

Periodicals (magazines, newsletters, newspapers) dealing with a particular issue are included in the appropriate chapter. For example, the Canadian Human Rights Advocate is found in the Human Rights/Civil Liberties chapter. In addition, there is a separate Alternative Periodicals chapter (P. 144) which lists, in alphabetical order, all grassroots periodicals about which we have information. Publications which are included in the main listings appear in this chapter as well, as do periodicals which aren't in the main listings because they didn't return a questionnaire.

Finding other sources of information

The Useful Sources of Information chapter (P. 162) gives a selection of resources – directories, data bases, libraries – which have additional information about grassroots organizations, publications, and issues.

Do you need this information on computer disks or mailing labels?

All of the information in this Annual, including the periodicals list, is available on computer disks or on mailing labels. Connexions also maintains a larger computer data base of several thousand groups, associations, libraries, and individuals. We can make these lists, selected by subject or by geographical location, available to your group at a lower cost than if you paid someone to re-type the listings. Our low-cost rentals of these lists also helps us to cover the costs of updating and publishing this information. Contact Connexions at (416) 960-3903.

Do you need extra copies?

If you need extra copies of this book, please let us know. Reduced rates are available for groups which need larger quantities of the Annual. (You may wish to consider acquiring a quantity for use as an educational resource for conferences and seminars, or to distribute to members of your network or organization.) Please don't photocopy: you can buy a copy for less than the cost of photocopying, and we depend on sales of the Annual to have the funds to produce the next one.

Who is included?

Our aim in compiling this Annual was to include non-profit groups which are "grassroots" (rather than government sponsored or institutional), groups which see their purpose as working for real social, economic, and environmental change, as distinct from organizations whose primary purpose is to provide services. Like most definitions, these distinctions, general to begin with, blur at the edges. Undoubtedly we have included some groups which don't really fit these definitions, and left out others which should be in. (However, if a group is not included, the most likely explanations are that we didn't know about it or that they didn't return their questionnaire.) With a few exceptions, labour unions have not been included even though many fit the criteria, because there is already a comprehensive 300-page directory of trade unions in Canada (See #2683). We welcome your comments about what is in – or not in – this book.

Want to be included in the next Annual?

If you're included in this issue, you'll automatically get a questionnaire for the next one (unless you've moved, in which case please send us your change of address right away). If you are not included and feel you should have been, please photocopy the questionnaire on page 203, fill it in, and send it to Connexions, 427 Bloor Street West, Toronto M5S 1X7. We also appreciate your informing us about other groups we ought to include, so we can send them a questionnaire. Please help us make the Annual as complete, comprehensive, and useful as possible.

Other things you might want to know

Quebec/French Canada: The Annual is primarily a listing of English-language groups. We did not have the resources to make our questionnaires and other materials available in French, and as an English-Canadian organization we didn't feel that we had the mandate to cover French-language groups in Quebec and elsewhere on our own. We have included information from French-language groups wherever we could, but we realize that our coverage is far from adequate. (We also apologize for the fact that the computer program used to produce this book did not allow us to include French accents – something we hope to remedy for the next issue.) We would welcome any suggestions about how we might approach this in the future.

Other languages and cultural groups: While we have tried to obtain information from minority groups and groups whose first language is not English, we are aware that our coverage is far from comprehensive. We welcome any help in improving this aspect of the Annual, as well as improving the coverage of underrepresented regions.

Accessibility: This year, we added several questions to help indicate groups' accessibility. We asked them to indicate if they were wheelchair accessible, if they had TDD and/or American Sign Language (ASL) services for the hearing impaired, and what languages other than English they could communicate in. We also asked if they had a computer modem. We hope this information will make this directory more useful. We also hope that in a small way it will encourage groups to consider if they have done enough to reach out and make themselves accessible to those they hope to reach and influence.

Mistakes, Outdated information: Inevitably in a book like this there will be mistakes and information that is incomplete or no longer up to date. With thousands of listings to keep track of, we absolutely rely on readers to tell us if they know of corrections or additions which need to be made. Please tell us if you know of any.

Inconsistencies: We know that there are inconsistencies in the way groups were assigned to a particular chapter. One group may be listed in the Peace chapter, another similar group in the Environment chapter, a third under Development/International. We asked groups to tell us what their primary focus was, and for the most part we allowed groups' own choices to determine where they appear, even where this created inconsistencies, because we know that groups which may seem the same to us may view themselves in different ways. As a reader, you should keep this in mind and search creatively if you are looking for particular types of groups. Use the indices and look in related chapters.

Who pays for this?

Connexions is well and truly a non-profit organization, running, as one person put it, not merely on a shoestring, but on a "ragged shoestring". Connexions receives some funding from a number of church bodies, and has from time to time received government grants. Our main source of income, however, comes from sales and subscriptions of The Connexions Digest (of which this Annual is a special issue), from sales of mailing lists and related services, and, importantly, from individuals and groups who become members of Connexions. If you or your group want to support Connexions' work by becoming members of Connexions, please see the membership form on page 205.

Introduction

A coal miner who took part in the wave of strikes which shook the Soviet Union in July of 1989 summed up the problems facing his local strike committee as follows: "We have to answer two simple questions: 'How are we going to live?' and 'What do we do now?'"

Those are questions we all have to answer. We live in a world in crisis. Governments and institutions assure us they have everything under control, or soon will have, but all around us we see poverty, violence, injustice, environmental disasters, and stockpiles of world-destroying armaments.

Most of us are not living the lives we would choose to live, but the existing order insists there are no alternatives to itself, and most of us are sufficiently convinced to keep society from coming unglued. Many, many people wish there were alternatives, or think there ought to be, but are resigned to the conclusion that it is utopian to entertain any hopes for real change. The 'system' is too big, too powerful, and we are too weak and too few in numbers.

'What do we do now?' 'How do we live?' We mind our own problems and don't think about the rest.

Yet despite the pervasive feeling that 'nothing can be done', people do join together to act in common when they feel threatened or wronged, or when they have a goal in sight which they desire passionately enough.

Sometimes they organize quietly and gradually. At other times – as in China in the spring of 1989 – a mass movement explodes into being, seemingly out of nothing, despite the risks and the odds.

This Annual is dedicated to the idea that change is both necessary and possible. Its main intent is practical: to provide information about groups across Canada who are working at society's grassroots to create positive solutions to social, environmental, economic, and international problems.

We hope that by providing this information we will be making it easier for those already active to find out about and contact each other and to do their work more effectively and co-operatively. We hope that those individuals who are thinking about or looking for ways to become active will be able to use the information to find likeminded people to work with.

We hope, too, that this book will help to get out the message that there are viable alternatives to destructive and exploitative institutions and structures, and that there are people organizing to build those alternatives.

It is also a goal of this Annual to stimulate thinking about how we can work more effectively together toward our mutual goals, and how we can reach out to broaden our movements. If we can learn to do this well enough, we have the potential to create a much more powerful social movement in this country, one that goes beyond single-issue organizing to work toward an integrated vision of a more just and caring society.

This is not to suggest that individual groups should be submerging themselves in a large movement. But often the best thing we can do to help ourselves is to help someone else. By offering and extending solidarity to others, we establish bonds between us that give us strength too. Feelings and actions of solidarity can be a fruitful source of understanding, trust, and power, and that power is something that we too can draw on too.

Empowerment is a critical dimension of the process of change. We are seeking the power to create alternatives, and simultaneously we are seeking to dissolve the power structures that prevent us from doing so. We hope that this Annual will help to empower those working to create the alternatives.

Ulli Diemer

Arts/Media/Culture

The established wisdom has it that the media are neutral purveyors of news and entertainment, while the arts are about individual creativity and cultural values untainted by the vulgar concerns of politics and economics.

However, the experience of those outside the cultural mainstream is rather different. There, it becomes apparent that the arts and the media do reflect the biases and distortions of the wider society.

Working class people, women, people of colour, Native people, lesbians and gays, find that their lives and experiences are distorted or ignored, their voices too frequently unheard. Artists with an alternative vision have great difficulty penetrating the deadening homogeneity of the commercial arts marketplace. Those critical of the status quo have little access to the mass media.

In every sphere – television, film, radio, the record industry, publishing – a few giants in the media and the cultural 'industries' are almost totally dominant. The saying "freedom of the press belongs to those who own one" reflects the reality well, and not only where newspapers are concerned.

The situation might be compared to a huge sports stadium. Everybody is free to have their say – so the dominant ideology claims – but the established system owns and controls the loudspeakers, the video screens, the action on the field, the rules of the game, and the stadium itself, while we, the people in the stands, have only our unamplified voices with which to make ourselves heard. Not exactly a "level playing field".

And then, what happens if we decide that we don't want the game at all, let alone the existing rules? What do we do if we decide that we don't want to sit in a stadium, subjected to loudspeakers, watching someone else's game? What if we want to transform the stadium into a park and talk to each other and play our own games instead of watching?

The groups in this chapter are responding to such questions.

Some of them are challenging the cultural and media establishments to make them become more representative and more honest. Others are fighting for Canadian cultural survival in the face of market pressures and government legislation that threaten Canadian magazines, the CBC, and other cultural industries.

Many others have taken the route of creating their own alternatives. Here you will find alternative radio stations, magazines, theatre groups, book publishers, filmmakers and distributors giving voice to points of view that challenge the dominant culture. There are groups devoted to creating space for women, blacks, Native peoples and others who have little access to the mainstream.

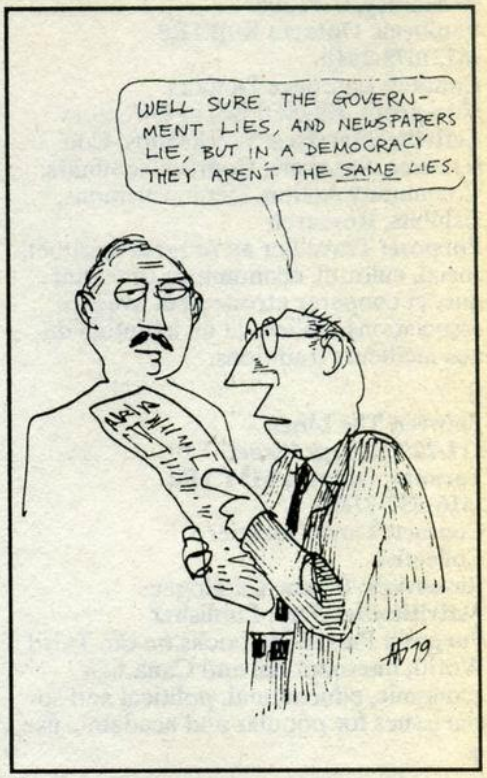

Groups are making use of the arts to stimulate people's imaginations so they can see the world in a new way and explore ways of changing it. New forms and new approaches to art are being developed and experimented with.

Groups of artists are using the arts to create new bridges of trust between themselves and the communities where they live, and in so doing are helping to create alternatives that give voice to the experiences of ordinary working people.

Purpose: To empower social change groups to make their own slide shows/documentaries.

An individual came to us with a group of slides about education and teaching in a Central American country. They would have been interesting to friends and relatives but not to a wider audience. We showed her how to structure a script and to fill in gaps with slides from our own extensive slide collection so that people who saw the show would generate future showings by word-of-mouth. A very gratifying project.

Community/Urban/Housing

We humans have lived, worked, and played in community groupings since the beginnings of our history. Our communities have been crucial to us not only for our physical survival, but also as the source and ground of our social life and our values. Our sense of belonging to a community, of community as a bond between us, has held us together and enabled us to live and act in common. The health of community networks and community-feeling are vital indicators of social health.

Today, communities everywhere are in crisis. Industrial societies have proven themselves to be remarkably efficient destroyers of traditional communities, without, however, being able to offer viable alternatives to replace them. The automobile especially has led to the shattering of human-scale, face-to-face communities. Where people once lived within walking distance of their workplaces, their churches, and the local markets, they now tend to be dispersed and anonymous. 'Home entertainment systems' – television, radios, stereos, etc. – have further contributed to atomization and the erosion of community networks and collective traditions, as have countless other patterns of modern life.

The erosion of community has also eroded much of the basis for potential movements of opposition and change. Successful movements for change require that people know and trust each other, through working together, living in the same neighbourhood, or through voluntary association. Without the existence of natural communities, this becomes much more difficult. Indeed, those in positions of power have often consciously pursued a strategy of encouraging divisions along the lines of race, gender, language, ethnicity, and religion, precisely in order to prevent people from coming together in unions or in community groups to challenge their dominance.

It is no surprise, then, we are seeing everywhere the signs of a social breakdown which can be linked to the breakdown of community and shared values. The dominant value system can increasingly be reduced to the idea that the only thing that matters is to get as much for yourself as possible. The real estate speculators and the street criminals both live by this motto, and both contribute their share to making cities less liveable. Governments at all levels make planning and transportation decisions which only worsen the problems.

In the face of all this, people are attempting to organize resistance and to work for alternatives.

One key issue bringing people together is concern for the environment: the air we breathe, the water we drink, the noise and the toxic wastes in our neighbourhoods.

Another crucial issue is housing. All across Canada the number of homeless or inadequately housed people has been increasing. Unemployment, skyrocketing prices, a failure to build affordable housing, and government policies of 'deinstitutionalizing' those in need of care, like psychiatric patients, by dumping them on the streets, are all contributing to the crisis. Community based organizations know that the disappearance of secure and affordable housing is a major contributor not only to homelessness, but to many of the other social problems with which they are trying to deal.

One response has been to initiate non-profit housing projects and to urge the government to do the same. Increasingly, co-operatives and community and church groups, rather than private developers or governments, have taken on the task of building low-income housing, albeit with much slimmer resources.

Some groups have also raised the vital, but explosive, issues of land ownership and control. They argue that land and housing should not be commodities bought and sold to enrich a few. They have proposed heavy taxes on speculators, and they maintain that land use should be guided by planning based on human needs and respect for the environment, not simply determined by whether someone can make a profit.

Groups across the country are working on these issues. Most are locally oriented, and some are also seeking ways of joining with others to increase their impact and potential.

"In The Neighborhood Of My Heart" combines professional actors and people from Homes First (a non-profit building) to tell stories about the 'homeless'. It is being used by the Co-operative Housing Federation to stimulate discussion about a proposed 100% rent-geared-to-income co-op in the St. Lawrence neighborhood. The building is being fiercely resisted, including a door-to-door campaign warning about the 'kind of people' who will move in. One woman, who had been frightened by these tactics spoke in a discussion following the show. She said the performance had a human face on 'the homeless', and made her want to work in support of the project.

Development/International

In recent years, we have become increasingly aware that there is only one earth. For better or worse, we share this planet with other people, and with all other living species. If the rainforests disappear, the greenhouse effect will have devastating effects on us all. If other countries are in crisis, if they are ravaged by economic catastrophes, repression, or civil war, their refugees will appear on our doorsteps. If they douse the food they export to us with dangerous chemicals, we and they will both develop the resulting cancers.

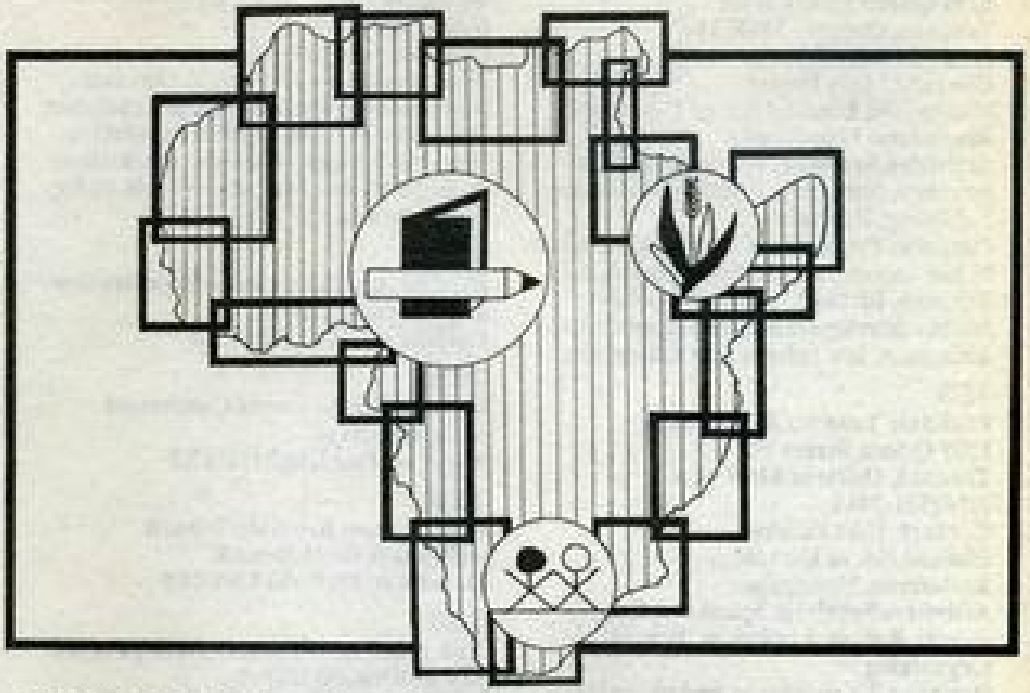

Yet there are enormous pressures dividing us and pitting us against each other – nation against nation, ethnic group against ethnic group, religion against religion. The international nature of the world's economy, dominated as it is by multinational corporations, is itself an enormous source of division and conflict. The system sets up intense competition to attract economic activity, leading to pressure to keep unions out and wages low, slash taxes and social programmes, ignore environmental dangers. Local economies are warped to meet the demands of production for the international market.

Our hope of turning this around is to join together across international borders and other dividing lines to work together and support each other in evolving non-exploitative forms of sustainable development.

We in the 'developed' world have a special responsibility to stand by the Third World, which, already desperately poor, is being plunged into further misery and environmental devastation by massive debt payments to first world banks and by irrational economic policies dictated by the International Monetary Fund, the multinational corporations, and the local elites they enrich.

We owe the peoples of the Third World a debt of solidarity, but beyond that we must realize that the issues of world peace and the global environment which concern us here in the West cannot be solved unless the issues of poverty, women's liberation, land reform, and sustainable economic development are dealt with in the Third World.

Many of the groups in this section are concerned with promoting alternative forms of sustainable development - development as distinct from growth. Such approaches tend to small-scale and local, and concerned with getting resources to those who need them most and will put them to the best use. Perhaps most importantly, such initiatives necessarily require empowering local people and communities (and especially the women who are often the key to rural economies), helping them to plan and implement projects which meet their needs and which they can control. It is a fundamental fact that a development project will only work if local people feel that it is theirs.

Other groups concentrate on education, a key component in development, and equally important in our own country to create support for appropriate forms of development.

Yet other organizations are concerned with issues in particular countries or regions, such as South Africa, Chile, or the Middle East.

All of them grow out of the belief that the principle of 'Thinking Globally, Acting Locally' can and must also be extended to acting locally on behalf of and in solidarity with those in other parts of this globe.

A highlight of our activities came in 1984 when the Nestle Corporation agreed to abide by the WHO Council on Marketing of Breastmilk Substitutes, after the most extensive and successful boycott. It was an excellent example of how a grassroots movement responding to unethical industry practices with disastrous results for infants was able to humiliate one of the largest global conglomerates and changes its marketing practices.

Abu is a young man from Dominica who had a vision – to help the people in his community break the poverty cycle which prevented them from getting an education or a job. He heard about the Plenty Canada Soya Centre and learned from the soy technicians there how to improve the nutritional value of the foods he sold in his bakery by introducing tofu (soy cheese) into his recipes. Abu took a chance, hired some help and began producing high quality protein at a very low cost. Plenty was able to help Abu to upgrade his equipment, and Abu is now employing three people and producing tofu and soy milk for his community, together with the best quality, lowest-priced whole wheat bread and vegetable pies in the Caribbean.

"The issue that is not clear to organizers,missionaries, educators, or any outsider, is simply that if people feel they don't have the power to change a bad situation, then they do not think about it. Why start figuring out how you are going to spend a million dollars if you do not have a million dollars or are ever going to have a million dollars – unless you want to engage in fantasy? Once people are organized so that they have the power to make changes,then, when confronted with questions of change, they begin to think and to ask questions about how to make the changes."

Purpose: Salvaide, a Canadian humanitarian organization, provides economic assistance to rural Salvadorean communities to foster social and economic development, promote repopulation and provide emergency relief.

The essential challenge is the sharing between peoples who are different from one another. Anglophones from the West, Ontario and the Atlantic provinces, francophones from Quebec and New Brunswick, Sri Lankans, Bolivians or Malians form groups of 14 who live and work together for six to eight months. The values, attitudes, lifestyles, perception of male-female roles, concepts of development, etc., generally surprise both Canadian and foreign participants. But in spite of the inevitable confrontations that are bound to occur, it is exciting to discover these differences and to learn to understand them. "Our cultures are so different that I find it hard to believe we all share the same planet... Each time I tell someone about my experiences in Pakistan, I discover something new, a different way in which they have changed me." -Erica, Vancouver, BC

"Yeah, my son's the same kind of phony liberal–billions for the Third World, zip for Chrysler."

Economy/Poverty/Work

North American Native peoples were astonished by the strange ideas of the newly arrived whites. One of the strangest of these was the idea that land – the Earth itself – could be owned, bought, and sold. To the Natives, who saw themselves, the Earth, and the things living on it, as part of a natural harmony, the thought of buying and selling land was incomprehensible, absurd.

Absurd though it was, it was no joke, as the Indians of the Americas, and the blacks of Africa, were soon to find out. The whites not only bought and sold land, they also bought and sold human beings to work on the land they appropriated.

The ideas that seemed so strange to the Native peoples still underpin our economic system. Unlike 'primitive' people, who engaged in economic activity in order to satisfy their collective needs, we have made the buying, selling and individual ownership of things the basis of our economy.

One of the 'things' that we still buy and sell is human labour. In a few countries, incredibly, slavery and serfdom still exist. In the rest of the world, more civilized, most of us are divided between two main groups: the vast majority of us, who for most of our lives sell ourselves to employers by the hour or the week in order to live, and the minority whose wealth enables them to hire, and profit from, the labour of others.

Economic decisions – what is to be produced, where, by whom, and under what conditions, are made by those with economic power – predominantly corporate executives and government officials. The rest of us have little or no say.

The nature of the system ensures that the basis of economic decisions will be 'the bottom line'. Enterprises that are profitable (usually ones that create 'growth') become bigger and stronger; the others are squeezed out. Whether the actual product or activity is rational or irrational, beneficial or useless, environmentally benign or destructive, whether the product is food or weapons, doesn't enter into the equation unless it affects 'the bottom line'.

Of course, this isn't the way it is supposed to work. The market is supposed to make sure everything turns out for the best. The market, so the theory goes, responds to demand, which reflects the needs of all of us as consumers, making it the most efficient way of allocating resources to where they are needed.

In practice, it doesn't quite work that way. If people in Africa are hungry because they have no money to buy food, they don't create a 'demand' in the world market for food, and the market doesn't produce or allocate food for them. According to market theory, they have no need for food. For the same reason, the market continues to produce Mercedes and condos for the rich rather than housing for the homeless: the market allocates resources to where the greatest profits are to be made, not to where the need is greatest.

Nor is the market well suited to meeting needs that can't be produced as commodities. The market doesn't offer you the opportunity to buy streets which are safe to walk on, or water which is clean enough to drink and swim in, or a community in which those too young or too old to drive can get around easily.

The results are obvious everywhere: extremes of wealth and poverty, environmentally disastrous resource extraction and farming practices, planned product obsolescence, urban designs that force dependence on the automobile and destroy communities, working people forced to work for subsistence wages under unsafe working conditions, lack of affordable housing, deteriorating towns and cities, extremes of overwork and unemployment.

These things have not happened without opposition. Labour unions have long brought working people together to assert their interests against those of the owners, and they continue to play a leading role in fighting for better wages, pensions, working conditions, health protection, and social legislation. Anti-poverty and unemployment rights groups seek to improve the lot of the poor, whose ranks are filled disproportionately with women, children, the aged, and racial minorities. Housing co-ops and tenants' groups are responses to the pressures of the housing market. Worker co-ops and community economic development projects cultivate enterprises which try to combine socially useful production with concern for workers' needs and working conditions.

Many of these responses raise fundamental questions about what – and who – our economy is for, and about how we make economic decisions. Why shouldn't economic activities have to justify themselves on grounds of social usefulness if they are to consume our resources? Why does the taxation system place most of the burden on the middle classes and the poor, rather than on the corporations and the wealthy? Why should anyone be allowed to 'own' the natural resources that are found in, or grow on, the earth? Why shouldn't all enterprises have to clean up after themselves, so that they have no negative impact on the environment? Why shouldn't we require them to safeguard the health of their workers and of the communities in which they are situated? Why can't we insist that they make economic sense, rather than simply make someone a profit? Why should there be a class of owners entitled to make decisions which profoundly affect thousands of people and entire communities, while those whose livelihoods and futures are at stake have no say? Why, indeed, shouldn't economic decisions be made democratically, by those who actually do the work and need the goods and services?

If these questions suggest the need for fundamental change, they also raise a further question: How is such change to come about?

Some groups listed here are focusing their energies on building alternatives to the present system: sharing, barter networks, co-operatives, non-profit community-controlled or worker-controlled enterprises, land trusts, credit unions, ethical and alternative investment funds.

Others concentrate on at least ameliorating the worst effects of the present economy as it affects the unemployed, injured workers, and the poor, or on winning a better deal within the system for women or minorities.

Important as these initiatives are, their potential is inevitably limited by the fact that the economic system as it stands has a virtual monopoly on society's resources, including capital, machinery, land, natural resources, and human energy.

The issue becomes one of power. To effect desired change, it is necessary to have the power to set a different agenda, and therefore to challenge the current concentration of economic and political power.

In Canada, the question has been posed more sharply by the free trade deal, implemented even though a majority of Canadians voted against it. Free trade appears to be part of a broader conservative program to establish an 'unfettered capitalism' and to eliminate or cripple anything that stands in the way. Social, environmental, and cultural programs are being attacked in the name of reducing government spending and staying competitive, and working people's wages, working conditions, and unions are being hit through 'privatization', plant closures, demands for concessions, and other pressures.

It will take a strong and determined grassroots movement to prevail against this. A crucial role in such a movement will have to be played by the unions, who have the numbers, the organization, and the tradition of militancy to fight back successfully, but if there is to be hope of success, the movement must also include farmers, environmentalists, women's groups, Native people, immigrants and minorities, and many others. One of the keys to building such a movement is mutual acts of solidarity, inspired by the principle that 'an injury to one is an injury to all'. Developing such solidarity is a challenge that we must meet if our individual groups are to transform themselves into a wider movement.

Sixty-nine editorial staff at Maclean's magazine went on strike to win a 40-hour week. As the only unionized group among nearly 6,000 employees of the huge Maclean Hunter publishing empire, they were under some pressure to set a positive example to other media workers. Two days into the strike they came to us to print a poster. Within 48 hours we delivered a double-size mock magazine cover with a picture fo the pickets, explanation of the issue, and a boycott call. The strikers posted them all over the city. Then they asked us to print up thousands of magazine subscription cards which Maclean's readers could mail in to declare their support of the strike. We delivered them two days later. A day after that Maclean's settled and the editorial staff won a 40-hour week with paid overtime. We felt great. When we learned they had won, we said "Now that's the kind of work we like to do."

Mr. X is a middle aged man with two children. He had always worked full time and came to Work Wells searching for a way to spend more time with his family. With Work Well's help he wrote a job sharing proposal and presented it to his employer. Although this proposal was rejected the employer countered with an offer of part-time work which Mr. X accepted. Now Mr. X is actively involved with his children and their school sports program. He will return to full time work when they enter high school.
–Work Well

Education/Children

Although we like to think of ourselves as a society that cares deeply for children and protects them from harm, children are by no means immune to society's problems. Sometimes, in fact, they face problems that are worse than those faced by most adults.

In Canada, children make up the largest group of poor people. More than one million children – about one in six – are growing up in poverty. (In the poorest countries, they die in shocking numbers from malnutrition and disease.) Children suffer from family breakdown and family violence; some are victims of sexual abuse. Certain environmental hazards, such as lead pollution, are especially harmful to children. Good day care for the children of working parents is in critically short supply.

Native children, especially, have often been treated appallingly: removed from their communities, separated from their families, forbidden to speak their own language. While the worst of these abuses have now ended, the effects will be felt for many years.

The school system often fails children. Children from working class and non-white backgrounds are disproportionately streamed into dead-end courses, and are much less likely to make it into university. (As governments cut university funding and tuition fees rise, this problem will worsen.) Many students leave school – even as high school graduates – unable, or barely able, to read. Few are really challenged by their schools, few receive encouragement for, or training in, thinking and reading critically.

Yet work is being done to improve the situation of children. There are groups pressing for more and better day care, organizations protecting the interests of children in the justice system, alternative schools trying to improve on the education system's offerings. One positive trend has been the development of school textbooks which avoid the old stereotypes of race and gender, to provide students with a more authentic picture of Canadian society.

Education is by no means confined to the school system, nor to children and youth. Indeed, adult education is one of the 'growth industries' of our time (and one that is far more environmentally benign that many other 'growth industries').

Especially vital are the literacy and English As A Second Language movements. They are tackling crucial problems which are responsible for keeping many Canadians, especially immigrants and the poor, out of the social mainstream. They have been leaders, too, in developing reading materials that actually deal with the lives and problems of the learners, and in involving the learners themselves in helping to create those materials. As a result, such programs have become catalysts for awakening a wider social awareness among people often not reached by other institutions and organizations.

Indeed, education is being seen as an essential element of grassroots development both in Canada and abroad. The guiding idea is that education is not merely concerned with imparting knowledge, but with helping people develop the skills and the confidence to analyse and solve problems and thus to act, both individually and collectively.

Because education is about how people see and respond to the world, education has also been identified as a priority by a wide range of organizations concerned with many different issues. Many groups concerned with peace, anti-racism, the workplace, or gender equality see education as a key to moving forward.

Purpose: LDAC is dedicated to the advancement of the education and general well-being of children and adults of normal or potentially normal intelligence who have learning disabilities.

Recently, the Disrupted Lives Exhibit toured our area. It was displayed for several days in the library of a local high school. When I was dismantling the exhibit, a student approached me. He was moved to tears by the hardships suffered by children in Central America and how they go on with their lives in spite of these. He wondered how they could learn Peace when they lived with War, how they could have Hope when they lived with Despair. What I found particularly moving was the fact that we communicated entirely through his small "talk box" yet he felt fortunate enough in his situation as compared to those children in Central America. I wonder how we would cope in either circumstance.

Purpose: York SCM is a non-denominational student group which seeks to integrate the Christian faith with work for social justice.

For two years, we have been working with other community activists to develop a methodology of 'conjunctural' analysis, enabling groups to assess the forces working for and against them and to develop more effective strategies for action. We call this process 'naming the moment'. Last summer, we were invited to participate as an educator in Grindstone Island's Popular Education Week. Thirty people came to our training workshop in 'naming the moment' methodology. Recently, we decided to offer a methodology training program for Toronto community groups. At our first planning meeting, a Philipino coalition member brought in a new Philipino newspaper. Called Conjuncture, it described our work in Canada to introduce Philipinos groups to 'naming the moment' methodology. The woman who wrote the article had been a participant in the Grindstone Workshop! She is now developing conjunctural analysis with a Philipino popular group, a counterpart to the Toronto coalition. It's a continual cross-fertilization of ideas and a solidarity of purpose!

Environment/Land Use/Rural

As we witness an apparently unending succession of environmental hazards and catastrophes, awareness is spreading that we are in the midst of a profound ecological crisis.

The dimensions of that crisis are frightening. Global warming – the greenhouse effect – threatens massive disturbances to climate, vegetation, sea levels, water supplies, and agriculture. Airborne pollutants, including acid rain, are causing the death of lakes and forests, and are a major cause of cancers and respiratory illnesses in humans.

Water pollution, including toxic wastes, raw sewage, oil spills, and garbage dumped at sea, is befouling shorelines and making water unfit to drink or to swim in. Fish and marine mammals suffer from these hazards and from overfishing and huge deadly driftnets. The earth's protective ozone layer is thinning dangerously, with potentially devastating effects on the marine food chain and on humans who venture into the sunlight.

Rain forests are being destroyed at a catastrophic rate, with inevitable consequences for climate worldwide. We are in the midst of a massive wave of species extinctions, and countless other species of animals and plants are nearing the edge. Stresses on wildlife and habitat range from outright destruction to overhunting to the proliferation of all-terrain vehicles.

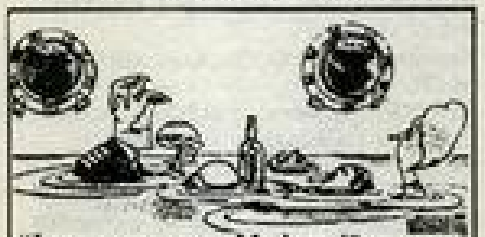

Unsustainable farming practices are degrading the soil, depleting water reservoirs that took centuries to build up, polluting lakes, rivers and groundwater with chemicals, inadvertently encouraging the biological selection of pesticide-resistant insect pests, and dangerously narrowing the genetic diversity of cultivated plant species.

If there is any hope, it is that people worldwide are resisting the urge to simply despair, and are instead seeking to do whatever they can to reverse the trend. The forms of response vary widely.

Many people are trying to change their own lifestyles by avoiding products and practices which are harmful to the environment, by reusing and re-cycling, by composting, by reducing the use of private automobiles. They are also lending their efforts to pressuring governments and industries to change, and they are supporting environmental organizations.

In Canada, environmental and conservationist groups have sprung up around a wide variety of concerns. Some concentrate on local issues, such as the clean-up of a local river, or the dumping of raw untreated sewage in cities like Montreal and Halifax. Others deal with broader problems, such as acid rain, the preservation of wetlands and natural and wilderness areas, the pollution of the Great Lakes, energy conservation, nuclear power, excess packaging, the forest industry, or urban planning and land use.

Farming and rural life are one area of particular concern. Canadian farmers (and the rural communities which depend on them) are caught up in the pressures of a market economy that squeezes small farmers while encouraging environmentally damaging farming practices. Farming ranks with mining, fishing, and construction work in its risk of physical injury or death, and in addition farmers are exposed to a range of hazardous pesticides. Farmers who want to get off the treadmill are often trapped by huge debts. In response, organizations working for the survival of family farming and rural communities have sprung up, as has a movement to return to more 'organic' farming techniques. (Happily, a market for 'organic' products is rapidly developing.)

"I can assure you, Madam, if we were sinking I would be the first to know."

A movement for change is gathering steam, and is chalking up local successes as well as having a broader social impact.

For example, Concerned Citizens of Manitoba, after years of lobbying and public education, saw the adoption of a provincial bill to ban disposal of radioactive waste in Manitoba. The Conserver Society of Hamilton and District were instrumental in establishing the first Solid Waste Reduction Unit in Ontario. The Ecology Action Centre of Halifax helped to co-ordinate a Hazardous Waste Disposal Day for the province. A Toronto group, Ecology House, has created a demonstration project by restoring a barren former parking lot to a state of environmentally sound landscaping. In Sarnia, Lambton Wildlife Inc. is negotiating a management agreement for a nature trail and attempting to purchase a 35-acre tract to save an endangered butterfly from extinction. NETforce in St. Catharines sponsored a study of toxic-waste shock loads in the Welland River, demonstrating a dead zone created by the dumping of large quantities of effluent by a local polluter. The Wildlands League had a significant impact in eliminating logging in Quetico and Killarney Provincial Parks and regulating it in Algonquin. Another encouraging example has been the comeback of species like the peregrine falcon and the bald eagle in the wake of the banning of DDT.

Those active in environmental issues are also wrestling with how best to organize. Some groups see their role as lobbying and pressuring governments or businesses on a particular well-defined issue. Other groups are strictly local, using tactics that range from education and petitioning to civil disobedience.

Still other organizations have developed broader strategic visions. Some of these approaches see themselves as primarily ecological (e.g. "deep ecology") while others incorporate an economic and social vision as well (e.g. "social ecology", "bioregionalism" or the Green movements). Some of these movements are stressing the development of alternative models of sustainable economic activity based on decentralist and 'human scale' approaches.

Also receiving recognition is the fact that environmental issues are closely linked to third world development issues, and to questions of peace and urban planning. The increasing awareness of the global nature of environmental problems has made it apparent that there is no hope of solving them unless the problems of poor countries generally are addressed. For example, most third world countries have no sewage treatment facilities at all, no controls on industrial pollution, and no means of dealing with hazardous wastes except by dumping them in the sea. Rain forests will continue to be cleared unless local people see viable economic alternatives for themselves.

There is still hope for reversing the trend toward environmental collapse, but only if we are able to work together worldwide to achieve profound changes. Our many local initiatives are steps toward achieving that, but many more steps are needed before we become a movement capable of bringing about those changes.

Contact: John Patterson
Purpose: A joint project of groups in Ontario and New York State, working to protect and restore the Lake Ontario ecosystem. We advocate economic, lifestyle and government practices which could help us to achieve immediate reduction in the discharge of toxic chemicals into the environment.

Since 1980 we have lobbied both informally and formally for legislation prohibiting the disposal of radioactive waste in Manitoba. After years of being told this was a federal jurisdiction we were rewarded in 1987 with provincial Bill 28 – the High-Level Radioactive Waste Act which makes nuclear waste dumps illegal in this province. We feel we were the catalysts behind the large community campaign which helped bring Bill 28 about. It's a very small first step in the grand scheme of things but was definitely a highlight for all of us.

Ecology Park opened on June 21st, 1987. After two years of hard labour, 150 volunteers and staff had succeeded in turning a barren one-time parking lot into an example of a new kind of environmentally sound landscaping. Environmental Restoration – that is returning a piece of land to productivity after years of urban abuse – is something which can be a positive, participatory experience for many people who feel powerless and alienated by the scale of environmental destruction in our age. For those involved, Ecology Park stands as a reminder that we can work together to restore some of the damage we have done.

Health

In this century we in the industrial nations have witnessed a marked improvement in many of the indicators of human health. Infant mortality has been greatly reduced, life expectancy has increased significantly, many illnesses and injuries which were formerly fatal or incapacitating are now treatable. We tend to live longer, and be healthier.

This progress is largely due to advances such as public sanitation and sewage treatment, drinking water that is free of disease-causing bacteria, better nutrition, improved standards for handling food, and large-scale vaccination. Advances in medicine and pharmacology have contributed, though their contribution relative to public health measures is frequently over-stated.

These benefits have not been shared equally. In the third world, lack of food and clean drinking water kills millions. In Canada, Native peoples and the poor have worse health, less medical care, and lower life expectancies.

In the population at large, health issues continue to be a major focus of concern. Smoking – including second-hand smoke – and inappropriate diet are massive, preventable causes of ill health which reflect not only individual choices but also the effects of advertising, social pressures, and institutional policies.

Workplace health issues are among the most serious and widespread of all health problems. Canadian workers and farmers are killed or injured at work in appalling numbers. Often they are exposed to noise, dust, radiation, and dangerous chemicals, at levels far above those considered 'acceptable' for the population at large.

Frequently they are deliberately lied to or kept in ignorance about the hazards which they face at work. (Asbestos companies, for example, knew for decades that asbestos was lethally dangerous before they admitted to their workers that the substance was in any way hazardous.) Workplace health issues are becoming a major battleground as workers fight for the right to earn a living without sacrificing their health.

Such issues frequently become struggles for power, specifically the right of workers to full knowledge of the substances they are working with, the right to have a significant say in managing work to minimize health risks, and the right to refuse unsafe work without being penalized. The emergence of such issues presents a significant opportunity for alliances to be made between unions, environmental groups, and health organizations.

Environmental health issues have similarly become the subject of widespread concern as risks become known or suspected. Air pollution is linked to cancer and respiratory disease. Highly toxic chemicals lace our water supplies and the fish we eat. The thinning of the ozone layer makes us more vulnerable to the carcinogenic rays of the sun. Modern farming practices leave pesticide residues in our fruit and vegetables and anti-biotics and growth hormones in our meat. Rising levels of noise cause increased stress for many.

Pharmaceuticals are another issue of concern. One problem is the widespread over-prescribing or mis-prescribing of drugs, especially to the elderly, women, and psychiatric patients. Doctors are often lamentably ill-formed about the drugs they prescribe, with most of their information about particular drugs coming from the companies that sell them. The giant multi-national drug companies aggressively pursue their market share, all too frequently by producing drugs of little value, or their own brand-name equivalent of another company's already existing product.

In the third world, drug company marketing strategies have resulted in a tragic misallocation of scarce resources, and the companies continue to resist fiercely any efforts to adopt the 'rational prescribing' policies advocated by the World Health Organization. In Canada, the drug multi-nationals, backed by the U.S. government, were successful recently in pressuring the government to pass legislation restricting the right of independent pharmaceutical firms to produce cheaper generic equivalents of their expensive products.

Financial issues generally are contentious in the health care system. Government spending going to health care has been increasing rapidly in many parts of Canada, yet sectors of the health care system are suffering from underfunding. One important debate revolves around how much money should be going to 'high-tech', hospital-oriented, doctor-driven approaches, and how much to education, prevention, home care, and other health care providers such as midwives, nurse-practitioners, and alternative healers.

Some are also looking for ways to reduce doctors' disproportionately high share of income and power. Nurses especially have been putting their concerns forward with increasing militancy. The Patients' Rights Association has been pressing for patients to have increased say in their own care.

With governments pursuing an agenda of budgets cutback, it seems certain that financial pressures will increase. One way in which governments have shed expenses has been through 'deinstitutionalization'. In theory, this means moving people from large institutions to community-based care. In practice, it has more often tended to mean dumping psychiatric patients and the disabled onto the streets with little or no support, follow-up, or care.

Another strategy has been privatization: in essence, shifting the responsibility for care of the elderly and others from publicly accountable institutions staffed by unionized workers to privately owned companies using workers paid little more than the minimum wage.

Financial considerations also directly affect the users of health care. While the existence of medicare gives Canadians a much more egalitarian health care system than Americans, financial deterrents to access still exist in the form of user fees and high medicare premiums in some provinces.

AIDS in particular is raising significant ethical, economic, and political issues which relate to both health care and human rights. AIDS activists are highly critical of how the health care system has responded to the epidemic so far, and are concentrating their efforts simultaneously on political pressure, education and self-help.

A woman's right to choose whether or not to have an abortion is under serious attack at present, presenting a major challenge for pro-choice groups which advocate that women have access to safe legal abortion and reliable contraceptive information.

Many of the groups in this chapter deal with a particular pressing health issue. Others, such as those advocating a 'healthy city' strategy, are trying to develop a comprehensive approach to changing public policy in the many sectors which affect our health. When health is seen in its wider context, it is apparent that many of the issues identified elsewhere in this Annual are also health issues, suggesting that there are many fruitful ways in which health groups and other groups can work together.

"Misery is close by, right outside your window. But it doesn't affect you directly. Sleep. So a person hears and does not hear the cry for help. A person does not realize that violence is occurring. He realizes it when everything is over. Too late to do anything... Heroism is first and foremost the courage to see in time."

"As a rule I don't believe in poverty and suffering as a way of learning anything, but in my case the hardship and starvation of my inept queer life have usefully simplified my notions of what a good society is. As with any other addict who cannot get an easy fix, they have kept me in close touch with material hunger. So I cannot take the Gross National Product very seriously, nor status and credentials, nor grandiose technological solutions, nor ideological politics, including ideological liberation movements. For a starving person, the world has got to come across in kind. It doesn't. I have learned to have very modest goals for society and myself: things like clean air, green grass, children with bright eyes, not being pushed around, useful work that suits one's abilities, plain tasty food, and occasional satisfying nookie."

Human Rights/Civil Liberties

Western society is strongly coloured by the idea that there are rights which belong to all human beings "by right", rights which no authority is entitled to deny or to take away.

At the same time, however, we also know that whatever rights one thinks there ought to be, or whatever rights people are said to have, the rights that people actually have exist only because they fought for them and achieved them. Rights are won.

And rights can be lost. They can be lost if those who are concerned with defending them are isolated, weak, not organized enough, or not vigilant enough.

There is no universal agreement on the definition of human rights. On the contrary, competing definitions – and more precisely attempts to legislate and implement particular rights – give rise to some of the sharpest conflicts of our time. This is because in many instances, the assertion or expansion of a particular human right brings it into conflict with what some other groups see as their rights, or has costs associated with it which others are reluctant to pay.

In our day we can see this as a wide range of groups attempt to assert their rights, including many rights that have a strong social or economic component. Thus the French-speaking majority in Quebec trying to assert its right to a francophone Quebec comes into conflict with the English-speaking minority seeking to preserve its linguistic rights. Tenant groups who see housing as a human right, and workers wanting the right to change unsafe workplaces both conflict with those defending the rights of property. Those advocating affirmative action clash with those who believe their right to hire strictly on merit is being attacked.

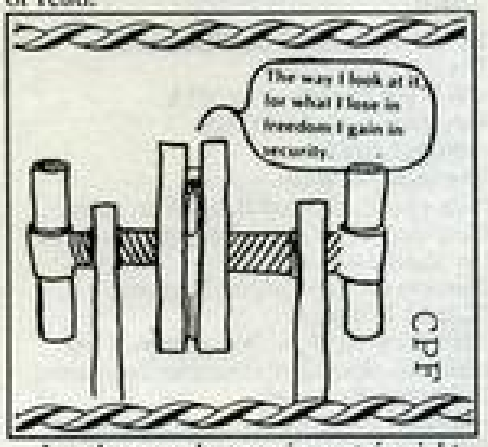

In question too is how real 'paper' rights are in the absense of the conditions needed to exercise those rights. How real is our right to free speech when a few conglomerates control nearly all the mass media? Are a forestry giant and a citizens' group really equal before the law when the company is able to bankrupt the tiny challenger simply by dragging out the case in the courts and letting legal fees mount?

And what about more radical extensions of our rights? If we have the right to democracy, can't one argue that this should also include the right to democratic control over the corporations which now control most of our economy?

Perhaps the single most crucial question facing any group concerned with extending or defending human rights is that of its attitude to the state. While people and organizations concerned with human rights know that it is vital to win support and allies in the wider society, they also know that the most powerful potential sponsor of all may well be the state itself – the government, the courts, the police.

Therein lies a fundamental dilemma. The state is a dominant force in society whose help often seems essential if a particular right or policy is to be achieved effectively.

Indeed, we are often told that in order secure our rights, it is necessary to extend the powers of the state. In order to have the right to be safe from crime and terrorism, we are expected to give more power to the police and the state security agencies. So that we may have the right to enjoy essential services, the government has to have the right to ban strikes. To be protected from hate literature, we have to yield to the police and the courts the right to decide what we are allowed to publish or read.

In other words, to gain certain rights, we have to give up other rights, especially our civil liberties, our right to be free of state interference.

As a result, we have witnessed a steady erosion of our liberties. We are subjected to restrictions and forms of surveillance that would have been unthinkable in the past. If one trend is clearly visible in virtually every society, it is toward greater centralization, bureaucracy, and social control, and a corresponding curtailment of individual freedoms.

This is a tremendously dangerous trend, especially for those who are hoping to bring about social change, because those working for change frequently attract the hostility of the powers that be.

The more we acknowledge that the state has the right to grant or deny us our liberties, the more it is likely to use it in ways we will regret.

For example, the more it is considered permissible to curtail freedom of speech, the more groups working for change become vulnerable to having their freedom of speech curtailed. This has been demonstrated regularly even in Canada, where laws originally targeted at Nazi hate literature have been used against groups protesting American domination of Canada, and where anti-pornography laws have been used against gay liberation publications, feminist videos, and sex education materials.

Consequently, a strong case can be made that a serious strategy for promoting right and liberties should challenge the right of the state to grant or withhold our rights and freedoms. Those who seek a freer or more just society are in danger of subverting their own goals if they expect the government or the courts to achieve them on their behalf. There are times when using them is unavoidable, but there is always a cost: a hidden but real shift of power away from us to the government and the courts. In the long run, our goal should be to create a society that is less, not more, state-dominated.

To do that, we need to look to each other for help. We can better secure our own rights and freedoms if we support the rights and freedoms of others. Groups working to win or defend one set of rights greatly increase their chances if they form alliances with other groups, especially if such alliances are not merely expedient, but rooted in an understanding of how different causes are contributing parts of a larger struggle for justice and freedom. We should try to be guided by the idea that "if one of us is not free, then none of us is free".

For example, most of us may hope never to be in prison, but as long as we tolerate prisons that cage human beings under conditions that would be illegal for animals in a zoo, we lend our acquiescence to the idea that it is permissible to treat human beings inhumanely. If we tolerate discrimination against women, or racial minorities, or the handicapped, we give our consent to injustice. If we accept that anyone may be denied their rights, their freedom, then we undermine our own rights and freedoms even as we undermine social solidarity.

"The purpose of freedom is to create it for others."
–Bernard Malamud

Purpose: Amnesty International is a worldwide human rights organization which works to secure the release of all prisoners of conscience, works for fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners, and works to abolish the use of torture and the death penalty.

Deep and impassioned discussion has taken place about our response to Bills C55 and 84 that deny the refugee reality. Lobbying and opposition continue. People talk about being willing to go to jail. Underlying this is a deep sense that while government may demand adherence to laws that abrogate justice and human compassion, we may choose to refuse. There is a clear commitment to remain in solidarity with refugees, to continue to provide counselling and support irrespective of such actions being made illegal.

Purpose: Defence committee for gay men and lesbians confronting legal difficulties or police abuse; advocate of equality rights for lesbians and gay men.

When two prisoners died in solitary confinement in Millhaven Maximum Security (Ontario) because the guards had cut the panic button electrical connection to their location (so as not to be troubled) and despite recommendation of a Coroner's Inquest they be repaired and kept functional – prisoners requested of the Prisoners' Rights Group that we help them organize a day of remembrance. We did, and August 10th (day of the first prisoner's death) was declared National Prison Justice Day. That was in 1976. Every year since then, prisoners and their supporters across Canada participate in vigils, 24 hour fasts, work stoppage, demonstrations, and any other appropriate way they can to demonstrate their solidarity in respect for those who have died unnecessary deaths in prisons. There has also been international support from prison movements in USA, France and the United Kingdom.

Then they arrested the trade unionists and I did nothing because I was not one. And then they came for the Jews and Catholics, but I was neither a Jew nor a Catholic and I did nothing. At last they came and arrested me, and there was no one left to do anything about it."

–Emily Murphy

Lesbians/Gays

Sexuality is not something that our society handles well. We produce and reproduce sexual images by the untold millions, we talk about sex incessantly, but as a society we are profoundly uncomfortable with this primal force.

We have a long history of trying to repress or tame sexuality, of trying to keep it channelled, under control. Consequently, we also have a long history of punishing sexual 'deviance' – behaviour that differs from the prescribed norms – although we have an equally long history of 'deviating' anyway, and often of quietly tolerating officially forbidden behaviour as long as it wasn't 'flaunted'.

Homosexuality was long felt to be particularly threatening by official society, meeting with reactions that were frequently hysterical, vicious, and violent. Homosexuality was simultaneously seen to be completely against human nature, and yet so attractive that a single 'queer' teacher could corrupt a whole school. The very existence of homosexuals was seen as an affront, a threat.

For a long time, gay men and lesbian women felt compelled and were compelled to keep their orientation quiet, 'in the closet', prisoners of economic and social pressure, repressive laws, and frequently personal agonies of doubt and guilt.

In the last two decades this has changed, as a powerful movement for lesbian and gay liberation emerged to assert that their sexual orientation was every bit as good as heterosexuality.

Though much remains to be done, this movement has been a powerful force in changing society's attitudes and in sweeping away legal and other barriers denying equality to gays and lesbians.

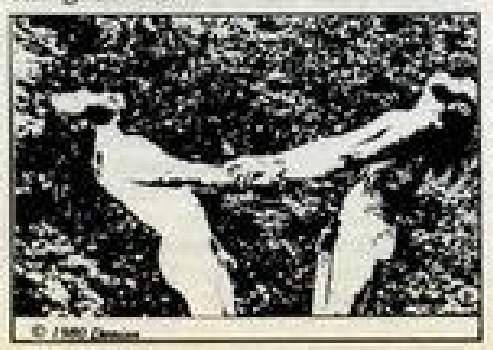

Many of the groups in this chapter are focused on continuing the long struggle for lesbian and gay rights under the law, and within institutions like the churches. Others are concerned with providing support and services to gays and lesbians, or to particular groups within the community.

Beyond their particular emphasis, gay and lesbian organizations are also by their nature dealing with the issue of empowerment, giving an identity, strength, and a sense of collectivity to a section of society that was long oppressed and silent. For lesbians, this quest for identify and empowerment has often meant forming their own organizations after finding themselves limited in male-dominated gay organizations.

For lesbians, this process has also meant confronting their oppression as women, and claiming their place in the broader women's movement. For some, it has meant the development of a lesbian 'separatist' identity. For others, who enjoy erotic literature or S&M, it has meant a further struggle to claim a space for themselves within the movement.

The movement has helped to test and extend our sexual limits. The space for diversity which it has created has also benefitted bisexuals, who now feel freer to pursue their orientation without guilt or censure.

Together with the women's movement, the lesbian and gay movement has helped to make the wider society understand that personal issues, sexual issues, are also political issues. Gays and lesbians have shown us that while on one level – rights, employment, etc. – sexual orientation doesn't matter, on another level, sexual politics are profoundly important. They do matter, and no movement for change can ignore them.

Very rewarding for Gayline in particular is, after each training session (twice per year, approximately), when the new trainees feel confident in knowledge and support of issues they will be speaking about. When they convey this to us, the old counsellors, we all feel particularly that this is one of the reasons for change. To provide community and challenge and help and most of the all, hope for the future. Yours, mine and theirs.

Perhaps, the most significant event to occur which demonstrated our effectiveness has been the inclusion of the sexual orientation clause in the Manitoba Human Rights Code. While the passing of the legislation took relatively little time on the part of our provincial legislature, it has taken many years of lobbying and public education on our part and other groups like ours in Manitoba to develop the acceptance of gay men and lesbians to the point where the people of Manitoba realize that homosexuality is not a perversion but an acceptable way of life.

Native Peoples

North American Native peoples are the victims of a historical calamity that is difficult for non-Natives to comprehend. In a relatively short period of time, a continent-wide web of self-sufficient communities, in balance with nature, was invaded and destroyed by an alien civilization. Most of their land was taken away, the animal populations they had relied on were decimated, they themselves were deliberately killed or ravaged by diseases to which they had no resistance. The survivors were shoved onto reservations with few means of livelihood, their economy, culture and traditions shattered.

Despite the catastrophe that befell them, the Native peoples have shown a tenacious will to survive and prevail, and a great willingness to share their knowledge and spirit with non-Natives. The first whites to arrive could not have survived at all without the help given to them by the people they called Indians. Future generations owe more than they know to the accumulated knowledge of the original peoples. Today, the ecology movement is returning to the ideas of living in balance with nature which the Native people practised.

Across the country, Native people are organizing to deal with the critical and chronic problems that face them.

Land claims are far from being resolved. Multinational resource corporations and huge domestic entities like Quebec Hydro continue to explore and stake claims in the North, despite warnings of vast and irreparable ecological and social damage. The consequences of the institutional racism of Canadian society continue to damagingly affect Native people. This is reflected in rates of unemployment, number of suicides, incarceration and infant mortality rates that far exceed the national average, and substandard health care, education, and housing.

A principal concern of Native people across the country is to achieve viable forms of self-government and self-determination. Governments are being pressured to resolve land claims. Native communities are trying to develop models of self-sustaining economic activities that will give them greater control over their own economic future. Native centres are placing increased emphasis on preserving Native culture, heritage, and language through radio stations, videos, oral history projects, artisans networks and social activities.

Discriminatory legislation has been challenged in courts from the municipal, provincial and federal level to the United Nations. Native women successfully fought the section of the Indian Act which took away women's Native rights if they "married out" of their band.

However, the Indian Act remains a discriminatory piece of legislation, and little advance has been made in the fight to have Native peoples' rights recognized in Canada's constitution or in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Meanwhile, the federal government has been placing additional restrictions on funding for Native communities and Native education.

In the face of this, Natives have been intensifying their resistance, and more militant forms of protest are becoming increasingly common.

Canadians concerned with social justice can also work in solidarity with the Native peoples in their struggle for justice. We can add our pressure to the demand for a quick and just resolution of land claims and for meaningful economic assistance to native communities. We can also join with them in promoting an approach to living on this continent that stresses self-reliance and ecological harmony.

A client with severe alcohol and drug problems worked off a $300 fine through fine option program, by working 70 hours of community service and attending our Driving Without Impairment program. This client regained "self worth" and is now a recovering alcoholic and featured speaker at our DWI courses, high school driver education courses and band office alcohol counseling groups. This one small change has been a joy to all of us.

One of the significant achievements of the Monchanin Cross-Cultural Centre has been that it managed to ignite a public awareness of the issues concerning the Native Indian and Inuit Nations in Quebec and in Canada. In 1978 the Centre organized a 2-month long weekly series of talks by Native Indian leaders from different parts of Canada. This series drew an average of 125 participants every week to our Centre. The response was overwhelming and its impact was considerable. Many Native Peoples support groups were formed. One of the well known anthropologists of Quebec, Remi Savard, termed this 2-month long event as an "important turning point in Quebec." A high point that resulted from this series is when our whole General Assembly, in consensus, went to the Mohawk and Algonquin Nations respectively to ask them on what conditions they would allow us to live on their lands.

The NTS/Co. has trained members of the Native community in a process of theatre as a development strategy that combines the entertainment value of the performing arts with their educational/mobilization capacities for bringing people together, raising social issues and encouraging people to do something about them. The Company has worked for the Northern Justice Conference "Youth in Crisis: A Challenge for Justice", performing four one act plays and facilitating the discussions in response to the plays. They dealt with the legal and social problems of Native Youth and The Law. The Company has also worked with Drug and Alcohol workers across Canada, teaching what we call "Native Community Theatre." For the past two years the Company has participated in the University of Toronto's Global Awareness Conference, by sharing Native views on communication and the environment. These pieces were in participatory, discussion theatre formats.

Peace

War, or the threat of war, is a ever-present reality. For more than a generation, we have had to live with the possibility that human society could be destroyed almost instantly in a global nuclear war. Frozen in the threatening postures of the Cold War, societies East and West have warped their economies and their thinking in order to defend themselves against the threat from the other side. In order to guarantee 'mutually assured destruction', resources have been bled away from real human needs and poured into the military.

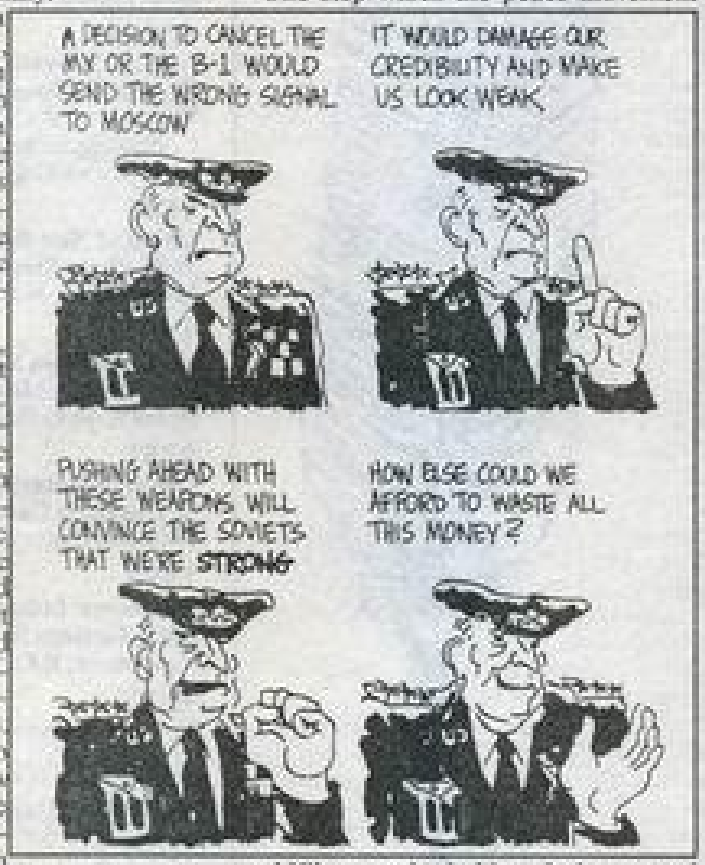

Now, with Gorbachev's initiatives, which have met with widespread enthusiasm in the West (though more among the people than the governments and the military-industrial complex), there exists real hope that the Cold War can be dissolved.

It is far too early, however, to be confident that this will happen. Within the U.S. government, apparently, there is a strong faction which is arguing that Gorbachev is likely to be ousted from power in the near future and replaced by a hard-liner, and that therefore the U.S. should not enter into any agreements to reduce armaments. Certainly the U.S. is continuing to develop massively expensive new weapons systems. The cynically negative attitude of the American hard-liners is dangerous in the extreme. It could well become a self-fulfilling prophecy if Soviet initiatives meet with no response from the West.

A much saner response would be for the West to react positively to Soviet peace moves, to meet them halfway and encourage them. This approach tends to be favoured among the Western European governments (which not coincidentally have to reckon with peace movements that are much stronger than those in North America.) One of the main tasks of the peace movement in the West has to be to create all the pressure it can for NATO, and the U.S. in particular, to respond positively rather than rejectingly to Soviet initiatives.

The western peace movement should also be seeking to establish closer ties with independent peace groups in the Eastern bloc. The more successful we are in using people-to-people contacts to create an international peace movement that is not tied to the policies of any particular government, the better our chances will be of taking control of our destinies away from the militarists who often loom so large in governmental decision-making.

One step which the peace movement would like to see both sides take is a general freeze on the deployment, manufacture, and testing of new weapons systems. In Canada, it is pressing for an end to the testing over our territory of the U.S. bombers and cruise missiles which if widely deployed threaten to help begin a new arms race. The Canadian peace movement is also demanding an end to the manufacture of arms for export, and an end to the export of uranium, which can be used for weapons even if it is ostensibly intended for nuclear power plants. By allowing such exports, Canada contributes to arms races between Third World nations, and to the potential development of nuclear weapons by such countries.

The question of war and peace is by no means limited to the issues of the Cold War. Vicious wars are being fought right now in several parts of the world, and many other countries have experienced the ravages of war since the end of World War II. In this decade alone, the Iran-Iraq war, the war in Afghanistan, the Sudanese and Ethiopian civil wars, the Indonesian invasion of East Timor, the wars in Nicaragua, El Salvador, Angola, and Mozambique, to name but a few, have taken and are taking enormous tolls of life. There are many countries where ethnic or tribal minorities are engaged in an ongoing resistance against the central authority, or where governmental repression – assisted by armaments purchased from the industrial nations – is so severe as to amount to war against a particular group in society.

The build-up of the military at enormous cost in countries which cannot even afford to feed their own people is common. Consequently, working for peace and working for economic development are opposite sides of the same coin. However, the enormous power of the military-industrial establishments, with a vested interest in continuing a vastly profitable international arms trade, makes the task of shifting resources from war to peaceful activities a truly enormous challenge, both here and in the Third World.

While the military of all countries has an insatiable hunger for new weapons of all kinds, these weapons are not necessarily used against foreign enemies. In many countries, the military is used primarily to buttress dictatorial regimes against their own people. For this reason too, movements for justice must be striving to lessen the power of the military everywhere. At the same time, it must be remembered that soldiers themselves are often recruited from the ranks of the poor and the jobless, and that a movement for peace and social justice should be attempting to reach them too with its message. A movement for peace must in the end also include the soldiers if it is to prevail.

We have many moments to remember. A peace camp of teepees for 1 1/2 years which now is replaced by our peace house. Several non-violent actions including a road blocked off the base and a womens' day action involving 200 loaves of bread and a rose and our yearly Remembrance Day peace walks. The ability to operate in donations alone is very heartening. Finally, the people involved are worthy of remembrance.

A major political candidate in a recent provincial election campaign asked to come and speak to our organization. A few days later, a young "ordinary Canadian" man dropped in to check us out, saying that none of his peer group shared his concern about American aggression in Central America and he needed someone to talk to. Both incidents bring us equal satisfaction.

Those who take the meat from the table

teach contentment
Those for whom the taxes are destined
Demand sacrifice.
Those who eat their fill speak to the hungry
of wonderful times to come.
Those who lead the country into the abyss
Call ruling too difficult
For ordinary men.
–Bertolt Brecht

During a summer workshop, two new acquaintances were out in the garden weeding and sharing with each other. Both of them were crying and both were healing. At a recent workshop on "Healing the Incest Wound", comments ranged from "I feel safe here" to "I feel hope that I can get my life back". These experiences are affirmations for me that alternative learning spaces allow individuals to connect with their personal power to heal themselves and each other and to discover new visions for changing the structures of society and healing the planet.

Women

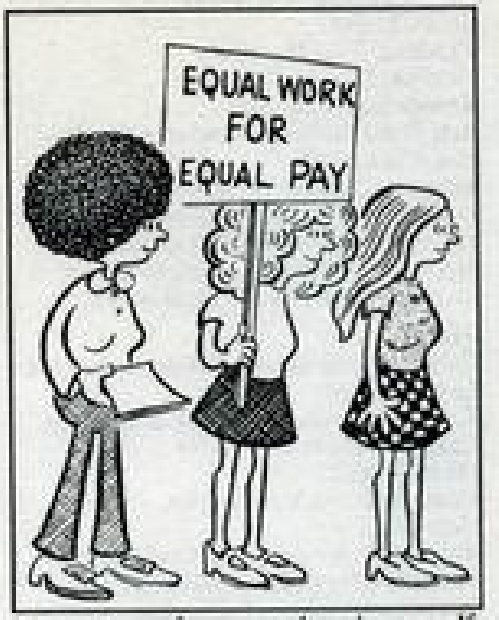

The modern women's movement has had a profound and far-reaching impact on almost all spheres of society. It has challenged and changed the way women see themselves, their expectations, their treatment in society. It has shaken and transformed relationships and the family, the law, the educational system, the labour movement, and much else.

Yet for all its success, the challenges that remain are enormous. Women with full-time jobs earn about 65% of what men make. Over 50% of one-parent families headed by women are poor, as against 9% of those headed by men. The pension system works against many women, especially those who have been homemakers or who have taken time off from work to raise children. 50% of elderly women live in poverty. Women are subjected to violence or harassment in the home, the workplace, and on the street. The number of women's shelters is nowhere near to meeting the need. Women's right to reproductive choice, to control over their own bodies, uncertain to begin with, is under attack.

Because women tend to be poorer and economically more vulnerable, they are also hit harder by many of the other problems that exist in Canadian society. Non-existent or inadequate child care services make it harder for women to earn a decent living. A lack of affordable housing hits single mothers and elderly women particularly hard. Native women, immigrant women, and women who belong to visible minorities are disadvantaged even within their own communities. Free trade is expected to be especially devastating to industries like textiles which have a high concentration of older female workers.

These problems continue because they are built into the structure of Canadian society, and also because there are still many forces which reinforce sexism in public and private life, and which socialize our children into that system.

The various elements of the women's movement have adopted a wide variety of strategies to challenge sexist structures and ideology. Some groups are working to fight discrimination in the workplace. Others are providing services to battered, disabled, or immigrant women, services designed to help them take control over their own lives.

Many groups focus on education or self-help.

Whatever the particular focus, many women's groups are united by the idea that the women's movement needs to concern itself with the entire social system, and with the nature of human relationships within that social system. They believe that the liberation of women cannot be achieved unless the whole system of oppressive and unjust structures is confronted, and equally that those structures cannot be dismantled unless the oppression of women within them is forcefully challenged.

This perspective applies also to movements for social change, who have been and are being forced to confront their own sexism and their own oppression of the women within them, and in the process are themselves being transformed even as they work to transform society.

Rexdale Women's Centre co-ordinated the first ever International Women's Day event for women residing in Etobicoke. The event was a first of its genre as workshops were held in 5 different languages: Spanish, Italian, Hindi, Punjabi, and English. The event brought together over 100 women from many cultures, all sharing their experiences as women and discussing issues which affect or impact on their lives. A history of International Women's Day was presented and discussed. But, more importantly, women from different ethnic groups shared their knowledge of IWD in their countries. The women also spoke about women's roles on their countries and the similarities and differences as women residing in Canada. The women expressed the desire to organize more of these events as they bring women of many cultures together to share their traditions, experiences, and to give support and information. On this day they were united as women.

Purpose: Our vision is a world of justice, equality and peace. We see an end to sexism, racism, poverty, classism, ageism and all forms of oppression.

In December of 1987 the forced closure of a Vancouver drop-in for prostitutes encouraged First United Church to work with other community groups and organizations to open a drop-in centre in the First Church building. The "Women's Information Safe House" is staffed by volunteers and provides an atmosphere of warmth and caring seven nights a week offering support and options through counselling and advocacy. Information is offered re: health, women's rights, alcohol, drug education, and welfare rights. the drop-in centre allows women an opportunity to relax and be themselves. The support forthcoming from the wider Vancouver community for this drop-in centre has encouraged everyone involved. The focus on the centre has opened opportunities for on-going education in the wider community regarding the oppression of these women.

Social Justice: General

This chapter contains two types of organizations. The first is those which deal with several, or a whole range, of different issues, and which therefore chose to be listed here rather than under a specific issue. The second type is groups whose particular focus simply didn't fit well under any of the other chapter headings.

It is true, of course, that any such distinctions are somewhat arbitrary anyway. We have divided this book into a dozen broad issue areas to make it easier to use, so readers could find similar types of organizations and issues grouped together. But at the same time we realize that if you examine any issue closely enough, you find that it both contains and is contained in many other issues. Despite all the forces that fracture and divide us, it is still true that we all live together as one human race on one fragile planet. If we hope to achieve real change, we have to recognize that problems and solutions are linked and that we need to work together to make change possible.

Purpose: To counsel transsexuals, gender dysphorics, education to others, network with other organizations, and support guidance as means permit.

This guy told us he wanted support in a conflict with his girlfriend. She insisted on coming along and telling it her way too. We found out that this guy had "borrowed" $3000 from her, was sleeping with other women, was about to leave her – keeping the money of course – and that he forbade her to cry when they argued. We disapproved. He walked out on us. We've been careful about "male support' ideology ever since. What if that woman hadn't insisted on coming to talk to us?

When our demonstration was a dozen in front of Danbury jail
we furtively collected
–and made a brave loud noise!
–and slipped away in different directions.
When our demonstration was five hundred in front of the City Hall
we were a resolute band
as we took our stand.
We wouldn't go underground.
When our demonstration was twenty thousand far up Fifth Avenue as we could see oh! I was astonished and had the heady feeling of being the sovereign people.
Now this demonstration is half a million.
I listen to it on the radio.
The speeches are lousy, they are half-truths.
Somebody I'm afraid has political intentions.
I'd thank them not to plan my future for me.
I'll find out two or three and picket on the other corner.
I hope, I hope
never to walk alone.
But I'm not getting any younger.
–Paul Goodman

Canadian Alternative Periodicals

Listed here are many of the alternative, grassroots, and social change-oriented periodical publications in Canada. Most are English-language; some publications which publish in French or in other languages have also been included. Where a publication is bilingual, it is listed under both the French and the English name.

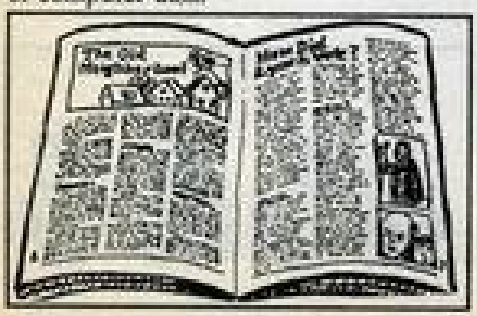

At the end of this section we have included a selective listing of a few foreign English-language social change publications, chosen because they were felt to be of particular interest or value.

This list is not 'definitive', of course. In addition to the question of where to draw the line in deciding what to include and what to leave out, there is also the fact that many alternative publications are ephemeral or irregular. Some are publications with a long history; others are very new, or have published only irregularly. Some are substantial, others are tiny newsletters. In the main listings in this Annual, you will see that many listed organizations produce small newsletters which have not been included in this appendix. As a rule, we have tended not to include newsletters in this list if they are directed mainly at the members of a particular organization rather than at the general public, although here too it was sometimes difficult to know where to draw the line.

Many of the publications listed here are accompanied by a brief annotation, especially if the nature of the publication is not clear from the title and publisher information. We have included subscription information wherever it was available. Most of the periodicals listed will be happy to send you a sample issue if you send them a couple of dollars.

We are attempting to keep this list as complete and up-to-date as possible. If your group publishes, or if you know of a periodical which is not on this list, or if you know of publications on the list which are no longer publishing or which have moved, please let us know so we can update the listings.

This list is available on mailing labels or computer disk.

Know thy enemy

Know thy enemy:
he does not care what colour you are provided you work for him
and yet you do!
he does not care how much you earn provided you earn more for him
and yet you do!
he does not care who lives in the room at the top provided he owns the building and yet you strive!
he will let you write against him provided you do not act against him and yet you write!
he sings the praises of humanity
but knows machines cost more than men.
Bargain with him, he laughs, and beats you at it;
challenge him, and he kills.
Sooner than lose the things he owns he will destroy the world.
SMASH CAPITAL NOW!
But as you hasten to be free
And build your commonwealth
Do not forget the enemy
Who lies within yourself.
–Christopher Logue

* If your organization has initiated one or more separate projects which operate autonomously, please photocopy this sheet and fill in a separate one for each distinct project.

* If your organization has branch offices, please enclose a list of their names, addresses, and telephone numbers. Separate questionnaires are not required for branch offices.

* If you are aware of other organizations which you think ought to be included in the Connexions Annual, please feel free to pass on a photocopy of this questionnaire to them.

Join Us In Building An Information Network for Social Change in Canada

Are you committed to social and environmental change? Do you believe that real change can happen only through the active involvement of many people working to transform society from the grass roots up?

Then we invite you to become a member of The Connexions Information Sharing Network. Since 1975, Connexions has been:

* Linking people who are striving to create positive solutions to critical social, environmental, economic, and international problems.

* Encouraging people concerned with justice to make connexions between different issues to seek out common causes, solutions, and alliances.

* Helping activists share information, ideas, and resources across barriers of race, gender, and geography.

* Providing publications, resource materials, and services to groups and individuals working for change.

* Working to make the ideas, goals, organizations, and publications of the movement for social, environmental and economic alternatives better known and more accessible to the general public.

Become a Member of Connexions

* You will be joining other individuals and groups across Canada who share your goals and concerns.

* You will be helping the Connexions project expand and improve its support of grassroots activism.

* You will be able to take part in developing future initiatives and projects which will benefit us all.

Benefits of Membership

* You will receive the Connexions Digest, a valuable source of information about resources, projects, ideas, and experiences which you can use in your own work.

* You will receive the Connexions Annual, a social change sourcebook which has been called the most comprehensive reference tool on social, environmental, peace and community issues in Canada.

* Organizational Members are entitled to receive a 10% discount on Connexions' services, such as mailing lists and labels, and a 25% discount on extra subscriptions or copies of The Connexions Annual.

Free Books With Your Membership

You can add one or more thought-provoking and useful books about social change to your library for free, by becoming a member now:

* Getting Started on Social Analysis in Canada: a highly acclaimed guide designed to help citizens analyze social problems and develop grass roots solutions.
* Women's Workbook information and strategies on issues facing women in the in the paid labour force.
* Getting There: Producing Photostories with Immigrant Women: Immigrant women surviving in and adapting to a new culture, told through photostories that encourage women to talk to each other about their lives.
* Electric Empire: The Inside Story of Ontario Hydro: A hard look at a giant enterprise which has acquired a dangerous concentration of political & economic power.

RICHARD'S RAG

A magazine of ideas, Richard's Rag features a rational approach to naturism and a natural approach to humanism.

Its major themes are human dignity, the joy of life and body acceptance — treated with a tantalyzing blend of light and learned styles.

Articles cover subjects ranging from the Women's Movement, dying with dignity and witch hunts of the 'eighties to the ethics of nudity and reviews of nude resorts. Each issue also includes editorials, book reviews and a variety of other features.

Richard's Rag is dedicated to the propositon that clear critical thinking is the key to joyful living and an absolute prerequisite to real social progress. It takes the position that naturism doesn't belong in an intellectual or literary ghetto, but in the mainstream of contemporary thought. Sound interesting? A four issue subscription is available for the absurdly low price of $8.00. Eight issues cost $15.00. And these prices are in effect for the proverbial "limited time only," so don't tarry.

Use Connexions as a Resource for your Group or Meeting

Connexions' effectiveness as a medium of networking and information exchange depends on how well it is distributed and read. One way in which Connexions can be very useful is as an educational resource for conferences, seminars and classes, or as a mail-out to members or networks and organizations.

In order to encourage this kind of use as much as possible, Connexions can arrange for groups to acquire bulk orders of the publication at a very low per-unit cost. Contact us for details.

Connexions: Building Links for Social Change

You're here to help. You provide information. You solve problems. BUT...

How are they going to find out....?

- About your publication?
- About your services?
- About the resources you provide?

Connexions can help you make contact...

...with individuals, groups, institutions, and libraries concerned about peace, environment, women's and social justice issues:

1. In our New Resources and Activist's Bookshelf sections, we provide concise information about materials dealing with social change and justice, including names, addresses and ordering information. For free. Just send us a copy of the materials you produce and we'll include them.

2. If you would like more space to tell people about your publication or service, you can reach Connexions' nation-wide readership with an inexpensive ad. Our readers read Connexions because they are looking for information about resources and services.

3. If you wish to mail your own promotional materials to prospective subscribers or purchasers, Connexions can provide you with mailing lists of organizations, libraries, and individuals interested in environment, peace, women's and social justice materials. We can give you lists, on labels or on computer disks, at prices considerably less than it would cost you to compile such lists yourself.

For more information about how Connexions can help you make contact with people who are looking for the publications, resources, and services you provide, contact Connexions at 427 Bloor St. West, Toronto, Ontario M5S 1X7, (416) 960-3903.

Reality Now is an anti-statist tabloid dedicated to exposing and confronting the people, institutions, and attitudes which control, attack and destroy our world and peoples. We focus on prisons and prisoners, Native struggles, the defence of our natural environment, direct action, and anarchism, feminist liberation struggles around the world. We also work as the Toronto branch of the Anarchist Black Cross in the defense of prisoners in need.

The continuation of our work depends on donations and subscriptions. You can help us advance this work by sending $6 (in Canada) or $7 (international) along with your name and address for a 4 issue subscription (free to prisoners). If you haven't already seen the magazine and want a sample, send $2 and we'll send you the latest issue, or send $3 for the past two issues. Look Better, Work Less

Is that newsletter of yours turning out to be a recurring headache?

Has a publication that was to be an easy way of getting the word out about your organization turned into a time-consuming burden?

Perhaps we can help.

AlterLinks specializes in producing newsletters, bulletins, catalogues, and similar publications for small businesses and organizations.

We take on the headaches of producing publications on behalf of groups who seek a professional look to their literature but who do not have large amounts of time, money or expertise to make it happen.

By doing what we do best – producing publications that make you look good – we free you to concentrate on what you do best.

If your publication is a burden you'd like lifted from your shoulders, give us a call.

Can Connexions save you time and money?

Connexions provides information and support services for non-profit, community, voluntary, and service organizations.

You probably know two of the publications we produce: The Connexions Annual, and the quarterly Connexions Digest. Their purpose is to make the goals, organizations, and publications of grassroots and alternative groups better known. We encourage you to use Connexions to get your own message out to Canadians concerned with social issues. Items are included free in the New Resources, Activist's Bookshelf, and Network News sections, and inexpensive advertising space is also available ($60 for a quarter page; 35 cents per word for classifed ads.)

Connexions also offers you additional resources and services which have grown out of our 14 years of work. These include:

Mailing lists of organizations, libraries, and individuals, on labels or on computer disks. Lists include over 4,000 grassroots groups, over 2,600 Canadian libraries, and various media lists. Rates for labels are $47 per thousand. Lists are cross-indexed, and can be selected according to category and location.

Customized directories or lists covering a particular geographical area or interest, produced from our own lists, or according to your specific needs. We can handle all aspects preparation from computer entry to the preparation of final copy on desktop publishing equipment.

Consulting on the development of information systems and office systems within your organization.

Research and bibliographies on social justice-related issues.

If you would like Connexions to help you in your work, please contact Ulli Diemer at (416) 960-3903 or write Connexions, 427 Bloor St. West, Toronto, Ontario M5S 1X7.

Help Us Help You

The Connexions Digest provides information about new resources and projects -- including publications, films, teaching materials, etc. -- on social justice issues as they become available. The Connexions Digest also contains announcements of events, appeals for assistance for support, information about new groups and projects, as well as updates of information appearing in the Connexions Annual.

To do this, we need your help. Please put us on your mailing lists, and send us a copy of anything you publish, and information about anything else you are doing and producing.

We will summarize the information, and pass it on to our readers nationwide through the Connexions Digest.

So ... please keep us informed, so we can keep you, and all our other readers, informed.

Letters

We are interested in your comments about the contents of Connexions. Letters and other submissions are welcomed. Please send them to: Connexions, 427 Bloor St. W., Toronto, Ontario M5S 1X7.

Moving?

Please let us know if you are moving. If you are a subscriber, please send us your subscription label, as the information on it enables us to find the record of your subscription. If you are subscribing on behalf of an organization, please include both your own name and the organization name.

Why Advertise in Connexions?

Connexions does not charge for presenting information about social justice resources and activities. However, the space we can devote to any particular group or item is limited. For publishers, service providers, and other organizations with publications, products and services to advertise to grassroots groups, we also offer paid advertising space. For a modest amount, you can reach a national audience of organizations, activists, and libraries. Advertising rates in The Connexions Digest are $175 for a full page; $100 for a half page; $60 for a quarter page; $35 for one-eighth of a page, and 35 cents per word for classified ads. Display ad rates are for camera-ready material. Submit your ad to Advertising Department, Connexions, 427 Bloor St. W., Toronto M5S 1X7, or call (416) 960-3903.

What others say about Connexions:

"An essential guide for anyone interested in social change – or even the just plain curious. A look at what's happening at the grassroots. Groups that don't usually make the front page."

-Richard Swift, Editor, The New Internationalist

"Fulfills a long held need to connect publications, groups and resources all dealing with issues of social change. Its value is evident... If you are at all concerned with any aspect of social change, Connexions will provide you with a catalogue of useful information."

-City Magazine

"As a teacher, I found Connexions really does connect me with valuable teaching resources."

-Sam Serrano

"Trade union locals, and other progressive groups ... might well consider subscribing to Connexions as it provides a most useful service in summarizing the views and positions of a wide range of organizations in Canada that are dedicated to social change, justice and reform."

-UE News

"A useful resource in doing social analysis with students and other social activists ... brings to the surface what are often the hidden values operating in today's world of institutions and corporate structures; and the ones operative in those who are working for change."

-Don Brown, Anglican Church of Canada

"Connexions provides a unique and valuable service in publicizing the activities and publications of Canadian social change groups."

-John Williams

"The Connexions Annual was the basis for a very successful mailing we did promoting Blackbird Design to the progressive community."

-Ted Dyment

"A worthwhile addition to any library where research is being carried on."
